"Sanders of the River"

A West African barrack square, surrounded by the offices of Commissioner Sanders and the quarters for his native troops, was constructed at Elstree for some of the studio sequences of "Sanders of the River," most of which was filmed in Africa. This scene had to match up with some sequences taken in Africa, and the tropical midday sun beating down on the square was reproduced by one of the largest assemblies of sun-arc lights ever used in a motion picture.

Across the square was drawn a company of the Royal West African Frontier Force, native Hausa soldiers in red fezes, khaki tunics, and shorts, bare feet, rifles, and bayonets, and long, heavy knives at their sides for use in jungle country. Some shots of this native Hausa force, renowned for their smartness and bravery, were secured in Africa. The manoeuvres of the studio contingent were brought to a high standard of efficiency by ex-Sergeant-major Bird, of the Brigade of Guards, who has assisted in military scenes in several London films.

Survey for suitable locations to shoot the film in Africa were made by plane. On one occasion, when the plane came low down, a magnificent herd of three hundred elephants was sighted, and as it flew over them at a height of a few hundred feet, they raised their trunks and pawed the air with their forefeet as if trying to reach the plane. This herd was cleverly photographed and incorporated in the film.

A certain amount of filming was done in the Nabugabo district of Nasaka, Uganda, where Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer had made "Trader Horn" a few years previously. There were very few monkeys in that district, and the "Trader Horn" unit had transported some there from other localities. The "Sanders of the River" expedition found that these monkeys had multiplied, and the place was now literally overrun with them, and their chattering and mischievous ways interfered with the sound-recording vans.

Many of the principal scenes were photographed at Gulu and other places with the special permission of the Governments concerned, and have never before been recorded. The most important scenes were taken among the Acholi natives at Gulu, in Uganda—a primitive but intelligent people, wearing no clothing and of wonderful physique. Their strange customs, war dances, songs, and marriage ceremonies form part of this marvellous film.

These Acholi natives understood what was required of them, and entered wholeheartedly into the spirit of the scenes. One native in particular was a perfect example of a natural actor. He was called Aboya, stood six feet six inches in height, and had a wonderful voice for singing the tribal songs.

Paul Robeson, as Bosambo, with a native choir of forty voices, has recorded some original songs. His deep, rich voice is admirably suited to these African songs, and they form one of the highlights of "Sanders of the River." An

"RUSTLERS OF RED DOG"

Red men and Whites waging a bitter struggle for the mastery, while bandit renegades hunt the wagon-trails for plunder. Don't miss the first instalment of this mighty serial drama of the Pioneer days in the Far West.

"MEN OF THE NIGHT"

As a detective, "Stake-Out" Kelly relied quite a lot upon his fists and his six-gun; but more than once his fate depended upon the wits of a girl when he set out to capture a gang of jewel thieves. A first-rate thriller, starring Bruce Cabot.

"THE WINNING TICKET"

He bought a ticket in a sweepstake, and because his wife hated gambling, hid the little slip of paper. That ticket entitled him to a fortune, but the lucky voucher had vanished. An amusing comedy-drama, starring Leo Carrillo and Louise Fazenda.

extremely difficult task has been accomplished by Mr. Arthur Wimperis in composing the lyrics for these songs, as they had to be written to the rhythm of the original native music.

The Temperament of the Untamed

Temperament, much discussed in connection with human actors of the screen, is as nothing compared to that of wild animals acting before camera and microphone. And temperament with them takes queer twists.

Interesting instances are related by Chester M. Franklin, director of Metro-

Goldwyn-Mayer's animal sensation, "Sequoia"—pronounced, by the way, "See-quo-yah"—in which absolutely wild and untamed animals were used. Its central players are a deer and a puma, raised together from infancy and kept with human beings so that all were good friends.

"We put them together when Malibu, the deer, was a fawn, and before Gato, the puma, even had his eyes open," relates Franklin. "They learned to be friends naturally.

"Every morning I used to pass their pen and say 'Hallo!' to them. The puma, when pleased, has a peculiar whistle. Soon I'd whistle before he saw me, and he'd answer. Jean Parker—the star of the picture—always fed them. The big cat was like a kitten round her. "Sometimes, while we were shooting, we'd move to another location and tie the puma to a tree to wait. He'd get lonely and yell like a dog that's tied up at home while the family goes out. We'd bring him over to where we were working, and he'd be perfectly happy. That proves that animals, even wild ones, learn to enjoy human companionship.

"He loves to ride in motor-cars and hates to ride in lorries. One night he was in the rear of a sedan, and didn't want to come out and work. We begged and cajoled in vain. He liked it in the car, and wouldn't budge. Finally, we all had to haul on the collar attached to his chain."

One man held sway over a territory where death and treachery lurked in every native kraal. His name alone was the Law of the River! A gripping drama of the Dark Continent, starring Leslie Banks and Paul Robeson

The Law Maker

SOLDIERS and sailors and merchant-adventurers, these were the pioneers who laid the foundations of the British Empire, and to-day their work is carried on by the Civil Servants, keepers of the King's peace.

Far beyond the limits of civilisation, out on the remote fringes of Britain's vast possessions, small groups of white men hold sway over territories peopled by many nations, each with its own chief, its own tribal customs, but all with the common instincts to raid, kill, and plunder.

To these the men of the Civil Service give the law, maintaining order where chaos and carnage once reigned; and the story of their work in those savage lands is an unsung saga of courage and efficiency.

The territory of Commissioner Sanders embraced an immense tract of country in Nigeria, and the wide, treacherous river was the highway that traversed it. Here, in the Residency that overlooked the swift waters rolling onward through the dark jungles to the sea, the Commissioner enforced justice according to the lights of the British Constitution.

He had two capable assistants in Captain Hamilton and Lieutenant Tibbets, and a small force of native troops, Hausas. With these he policed an area as large as England, and, such was his character, that he had established peace among the tribes in the space of a few years.

To more than two million savages he was known and feared as Lord Sandi, feared as a stern father might have been feared by his children. To the Colonial Office, closely concerned with the activities of its agents, he was known as one of the finest men in the Service.

One morning after the rains, when the river was in flood, Sanders might have been seen in the company of his junior assistant, Tibbets, a pleasant young fellow and a typical product of the English Public schools.

They were discussing Hamilton, who had departed some days previously on a trip up-country, and who should have returned ere now.

"Do you suppose he's all right, sir?" Tibbets was asking anxiously.

Sanders frowned. There was something striking about Sanders, not in his height or physique, for he was of medium build, but in his features, which seemed to suggest a strength of will tempered by an inherent kindness.

"There's no telling what might happen to a fellow in these parts," he murmured.

"Shall I take a company of men and start up-river to look for him, sir?" Tibbets proposed in urgent tones.

Sanders made an impatient gesture.

"No, no," he said. "Don't be so confidently hot-headed, Tibbets. You know, you're still thinking of earning a Victoria Cross, aren't you?"

The younger man looked a trifle sheepish. At the same time, he could not help marvelling at his chief's calmness. Hang it all, Hamilton was not only the Commissioner's right-hand man, but he was the brother of Julia Hamilton, Sanders' fiancée.

Tibbets did not realise it, but Sanders was considerably more worried than he appeared to be. He was not the type to show it, however.

"Listen," the Commissioner went on. "I was once like you myself. But after Jubilee Greetings From Boy's Cinema To Their Most Gracious Majesties. Long May They Reign Over Us!

you've been here as long as I have, you'll find you've lost all your ideas about glory. The only decorations you're likely to get here, Tibbets, are mosquito bites."

The youngster laughed, and Sanders turned to pour himself a whisky-and-soda. It was as he was on the point of drinking it that the door of the Residency was pushed open, and a man of about his own age crossed the threshold.

He was Captain Hamilton, dressed like his colleagues in khaki shorts, a military tunic, and a shirt that was open at the neck. He was obviously suffering from the intense heat, for he was wiping his face and throat with a handkerchief as he entered the lounge.

"Hallo, Hamilton!" Sanders greeted him, with a placidness that gave no indication of the relief he felt at seeing him. "You're just in time to join me in a drink."

"Thanks," the other said. "I need one."

He sat down, and the Commissioner handed him a whisky-and-soda.

"Any news of special consequence to report?" Sanders asked him.

"Yes," Hamilton answered, "I dropped in on friend Oboja, chief of the Acholi tribe. Found a couple of gin bottles in his village."

Sanders and Tibbets exchanged a glance as they heard this. There were two commodities which were taboo in the territory, for obvious reasons. One was spirits, and the other firearms.

"I had a long talk with Oboja," Hamilton continued. "He said that he was your brother, Commissioner. He said that you had the magic and the wisdom of all the witch doctors who ever lived, that you had ears as long as an elephant's, and eyes in the side of your head, in the back of your head, and where other men sit down." He smiled, and then added ruefully: "But he wouldn't tell me where he got the gin."

"That's easy," Sanders commented. "I had word from one of my spies several days ago, telling me that Farini and Smith were passing through the territory. They're the culprits all right."

There was a pause, and then Hamilton spoke again.

"By the way," he mentioned, "I ran across a queer sort of fellow a few miles upstream. He was in an Ochori canoe, but I'll swear he was no Ochori. He said he wanted to see you, but wouldn't tell me why."

Sanders was listening attentively. "Was he a tall man, Hamilton?" he inquired.

"Why, yes," the other rejoined, "very tall. But out of the two million natives in this territory, don't tell me that you can pick out the very man I'm talking about. Your 'black children' say that you're capable of all kinds of magic, and you'll have me believing it myself pretty soon."

"No, seriously, I think it's possible that I may know something about your acquaintance of the river," Sanders stated. "We'll soon see, anyhow."

He summoned an orderly who was standing on the veranda outside, and told him to fetch the black who had arrived with Captain Hamilton. Then he invited Hamilton and Tibbets to join him in his office, where the three of them sat down.

A minute or two afterwards a magnificent specimen of negro manhood was shown into the room. Well over six feet in height, he was splendidly proportioned, and Sanders was at once struck by the alertness and intelligence of his bold features.

The giant native looked from one to another of the three white men, and finally his eyes became focussed on the Commissioner, as if he guessed that this was the personage he was seeking.

"Who are you?" Sanders asked him.

"I am Asaba, son of the old chief Sulabu, who died some moons past. I rule the Ochori in his place, lord."

The answer had come glibly—too glibly. Sanders eyed the negro with a touch of reproach in his gaze.

"Is that not a lie, man?" he said in a quiet voice.

The black looked uncomfortable, and then hung his head with an air of defeat.

"It is a lie, Lord Sandi," he murmured.

Sanders rose from his chair and crossed to a filing cabinet. From this he produced a document which bore a picture of the negro who stood before him, and underneath the photograph he read the following description, which he quoted aloud:

"Bosambo. Six feet four inches in height. Wanted at Monrovia, in the Republic of Liberia. Convicted for petty larceny. Escaped from the prison of St. Thomé."

The black's uncasiness increased as the Commissioner moved towards him. Then he began to talk volubly again.

"Lord," he protested, "I am living honestly now. I have made myself chief of the Ochori people, and have taught them to live in peace, according to your laws. Were not the Ochoris always troublesome to you, before I came?"

"That may be so, man," Sanders rejoined. "But no one in the territory may become chief without my sanction."

Again Bosambo hung his head, and then the Commissioner addressed him once more.

"Why did you come here?" he asked.

"Lord Sandi," the black answered, rousing himself hopefully, "I bring a high and important message for you."

"Is that not another lie, man?" Sanders remarked.

Bosambo shook his head.

"Lord," he said, "I lie when it is good for me to lie. But to you I will never lie again."

"That will be wise," the Commissioner told him.

"The people of the river say that Lord Sandi knows all," Bosambo went on. "They say that he has great magic. But I know that he has many spies—I, too, have my spies, now that I lead the Ochoris—and that is why I bring you this high and important message."

"One moment," Sanders said. "You knew that in a month I would come to the Ochori village—at the time of the taxes. Is that not why you are here—in the hope of making a good impression so that I may let you remain as chief of the people who have adopted you?"

"King Mafolaba," Sanders ground out, "I warn you! If you harm one servant of the Government, be it only a carrier-pigeon, I will grind you into the dust and you shall be king no more!"

Bosambo looked at him humbly. He was beginning to realise that "Lord Sandi" could probe the very minds of his "black children." Nevertheless, the big negro had not lied concerning the high and important message.

"Lord," he said, "I have told you that I bring news, and it is this: Certain warriors of the Old King have passed through the country of the Oehori on their way towards the coast."

Sanders, Hamilton, and Tibbets looked at one another quickly. Then the Commissioner glanced at Bosambo again.

"The warriors of King Mafolaba?" he breathed.

Bosambo nodded gravely, and Sanders pursed his lips. Of all the native potentates of the river, Mafolaba had proved the most difficult to handle. He had more men at his command than any other tribal monarch—fighting men notorious for their savagery and cruelty; and although he had learned from stern experience to fear Commissioner Sanders, yet he was still prone to make trouble whenever an opportunity occurred.

"You say that some of Mafolaba's men passed through the country of the Oehori tribe," Sanders muttered. "Did you try to stop them?"

Bosambo drew himself up to his full height.

"Lord," he said, "Mafolaba is a great and powerful king, but there is one man on the river who does not fear him, and I am that man. Nevertheless, I did not stop his dogs, because that would have meant war, and I know that this you do not desire. Therefore I sent spies after them, to follow their movements."

"That is well," the Commissioner rejoined. "Now listen, Bosambo. Every nation on the river has Government pigeons, and here at the Residency we have the pigeons of every nation. By these birds messages are sent— But what are you grinning at, man?"

"Lord," Bosambo replied, "the Oehori pigeons that you have here are so old and fat that they can hardly fly. I have brought four more, which I have given to a sergeant out in the compound."

Sanders had already made up his mind regarding Bosambo. The black might be an escaped convict from the Republic of Liberia, but the Commissioner had sensed the sterling qualities of the man, and he had no intention of returning him to captivity on an extradition warrant. Whatever the fellow had done in the past, Sanders was resolved to give him a chance.

"Tibbets," he said, turning to his junior assistant, "have you got a chain and medal of chieftainship?"

"I have them here, Lord Sandi," Bosambo broke in, smiling now as if completely at his ease.

He had brought one hand from behind his back, and grasped in it was a metal chain with a pendant that bore the inscription G. R., symbol of the British Crown.

"The one worn by old Sulabu, your predecessor, eh?" the Commissioner murmured, and, taking it, he placed it around the big fellow's neck.

"Bosambo," he continued, "I am going to give you a six months' trial as chief of the Oehori people. See that you do not fail me."

The black dropped on one knee, paying homage to him in the native fashion. "Lord Sandi," he said gratefully, "I am your servant."

A moment afterwards he had retreated from the room and was gone.

"Do you want to marry the chief as well?" Sanders demanded of her.

Palaver

TWO or three days later, a telegraph message from Government House informed Commissioner Sanders that the warriors dispatched by King Mafolaba had raided the French territory of Dahomey, seized two or three hundred natives, and were marching back to their own country via the land of the Oehoris.

Five minutes after the receipt of that message an Oehori carrier-pigeon was released from the cote at the Residency, and later the same day it reached the village of the people over whom Bosambo had made himself chief.

The bird was brought to him in his hut, and he removed a tiny roll of paper that was attached to it. The contents of the missive read as follows:

"From Lord Sandi at the Residency to Bosambo, chief of the Oehori.

"King Mafolaba's warriors will return through your country from slave raid. Stop them and hold their captives until my arrival."

Ere long the beat of tribal drums was resounding through Bosambo's village, summoning his fighting men to arms, and with his followers in full force behind him the ex-convict took his shield and his spear and led the way from the kraal.

Away in the Bush, far to the west, the slave-raiders from Dahomey were on the march with a column of abject prisoners, men, women and children. Their course lay across the northern corner of the Oehori country, and towards sunset they were still plodding onward in the direction of Mafolaba's realm, when the leader of the expedition perceived a solitary figure on the jungle track ahead of him.

It was the figure of Bosambo, standing there like some magnificent statue—strong, resolute and implacable.

Mafolaba's jackal called a halt, and advanced alone to meet Bosambo.

"Whose dog are you?" he asked, pausing when he was a few yards from the Oehori chieftain.

Bosambo did not answer the question. "You go no farther," he said, lifting his spear threateningly. "That is Lord Sandi's command."

"You know who I am, dog?" the other retorted in proud and disdainful tones. "I am the Captain of King Mafolaba's Guard."

"Lord Sandi says to stop you and hold all men and women whom you have seized," Bosambo announced grimly. "Turn round and march to my village, if you know what is good for you!"

The spear of the Oehori chief was levelled at the other's breast, but that was not all. There had been movements in the long grass and the undergrowth, and now King Mafolaba's minion saw the glinting assegais of many warriors. For the first time he realised that Bosambo was not alone, but possessed a force that outnumbered the slave-raiders by three to one.

Mafolaba's jackal ground his teeth. The party which he himself headed was but one-twentieth of his King's manpower. Away in the city of that powerful monarch, beyond the mountains which shielded his domain, there were regiments which could have wiped out the Oehoris to the last man—many hundreds of fierce warriors flaunting the headdress of ostrich feathers worn by all the Old King's troops. If only two or three hundred of those warriors were here!

But the Captain of Mafolaba's Guard was in a tight corner, and he had no option except to obey. With a scowl he turned and moved back to the spot where he had halted his men and their prisoners.

He had gone only a few steps when he chanced to look back and see that Bosambo was glancing round triumphantly at his Oehori followers. On the instant Mafolaba's captain thought he saw his chance to strike a blow that would demoralise the enemy, and, wheeling unexpectedly, he hurled his spear straight at the Oehori chieftain's breast.

Out of the corner of his eye Bosambo caught the glint of the weapon in the

"You cold-blooded swine!" Smith grated. "I'm clearing out of here, and nobody is going to stop me!"

nick of time, and with a swift movement he warded it off with his shield. Then he lunged forward, and all the strength of his mighty arm was behind the shaft that sped to the heart of the Old King's minion.

It pierced the man's body, and he fell with a great cry. Next second the jungle echoed to a medley of wild yells as the Ochoris leaped from cover to cover and rushed upon the slavers.

Led by Bosambo, they swarmed towards the foe in numbers that overawed the Old King's men, and, having witnessed the fate of their commander, these were in no mood to offer a resistance.

They were speedily taken prisoner, and after his men had disarmed them and herded them together, Bosambo took stock of the wretches whom they had intended to sell as slaves. Like the ladies' man that he was, it was the feminine element among these which most closely engaged his attention.

The unfortunates who had been seized by King Mafolaba's raiding-party included ten girls, all of whom were attractive according to negro standards, but there was one in particular who took Bosambo's eye—a slender girl with a touch of white blood in her, strangely alluring in her dark, native way, with an expression that was winsome and yet bold.

Singling her out, Bosambo looked down on her with admiration and interest.

"What's your name, girl?" he asked her.

"Lilongo," she answered coolly.

"Lilongo," he murmured, as if the name were sweet to his ears. "It is like the sound of a stream running over little stones—Lilongo—"

He paused, and then:

"Where do you come from, girl?"

"You wouldn't know my home," she told him. "I am from the coast." May 11th, 1935.

He smiled reminiscently.

"I know all about the coast," he rejoined. "Lilongo, we shall talk some more—you and I."

He summoned one or two of his men, and ordered them to take charge of the rescued slaves. Then the entire band set out for the Ochori village, where the Old King's captive warriors were kept under guard until the arrival of Sanders and young Tibbets a couple of days later.

The Commissioner and his assistant reached Bosambo's kraal by an antediluvian paddle-steamer, Sanders' means of transport up and down the river—the relic of a generation of Civil Servants. It was known as the "Zaire," and it had accommodation for a company of soldiers, whom the white Lord of the River had taken the precaution of bringing along with him.

Sanders first congratulated Bosambo on the manner in which he had handled a tricky situation, and then he informed him that he had dispatched a messenger to King Mafolaba requesting his presence at a palaver outside the Ochori village.

"He should be here before the day is out," he said. "That is, if he obeys my command."

"He will be here, Lord Sandi," Bosambo declared. "He is afraid of you."

The big negro's prophecy was no idle one, for that same afternoon a great concord of warriors was sighted, and as they approached the Ochori village it was seen that they wore the ostrich plumes of the Old King's fighting men. Mafolaba himself was in advance of them, reposing in a litter borne by four of his servants. Above his gross body and ugly face was a gaudy canopy, which protected him from the heat of the sun.

Sanders, Tibbets, and Bosambo awaited him, the two white men seated on chairs, the Ochori chieftain kneeling with a spear grasped in one hand. Close by, the company of Hausas from the Residency stood at ease, smart as Guardsmen, the butts of their rifles resting on the ground. Bosambo's warriors were in the background.

Mafolaba and his followers came on, and when they were thirty or forty yards from the village they halted. The Old King then alighted from the palanquin in which he had been carried, and one of his servants hastened to place a chair for him, a ceremonial chair decorated with fiendish symbols.

King Mafolaba stepped forward, and, with a distance of several paces separating them, he and Sanders exchanged salutations, after which the negro potentate sat down.

He was a striking figure, fat and evil, with a countenance at once truculent and cunning. His thick, woolly coiffure was hung with beads, and, though he was nude to the waist, his nether person was swathed in a long garment of bright colours.

Sanders leaned forward to speak to him, resting his weight on a cane that he was holding.

"King Mafolaba," he said, "when I summoned you to palaver I did not ask you to bring all your warriors."

An ugly glint was playing in the negro monarch's wicked eyes.

"Sandi," he answered, "I brought them so that a dog of a little chief might tremble at the power he has provoked."

He looked venomously at Bosambo as he spoke those words, but the Ochori chieftain gave him eye for eye. Then Sanders raised his voice again.

"King Mafolaba," he said, "you know full well that slavery is forbidden throughout the territory."

"That is the white man's law," the other retorted. "Before white men set foot on this land, my ancestors were great kings here for three hundred years. To-day, I, Mafolaba, am the greatest king in this country."

"My King is the greatest king on earth!" Sanders rapped out. "His law is the law of this country, and, when petty chiefs and kings bring shame on him, we, his servants, must stamp them out. Take heed of that, Mafolaba, and let there be no more slave raids by your warriors."

The old king's face was working, but he succeeded in mastering his wrath. He was afraid of this Sandi, afraid of those Hausas standing so impressively nearby, soldiers in the pay of the great white Emperor.

"Sandi," he said, "I am your friend. I will do as you ask. But one thing I tell you now—I shall not forget that a dog of a little chief once chopped the captain of my guard."

Again he directed a malevolent glance at Bosambo, but Sanders' voice quickly summoned his attention once more.

"The chief of the Ochori was acting on my instructions," the Commissioner snapped. "He intercepted your captain in my name, but your jackal chose to disregard my commands."

Mafolaba showed no signs of being pained.

"In my village there are nine drums," he said for the benefit of Bosambo. "Each of them is covered with the skin of a little chief who has offended me. I think I know whose skin will cover the tenth!"

"King Mafolaba," Sanders ground out, "I warn you! If you harm one servant of the Government, be it only a carrier-pigeon, I will grind you into the dust, and you shall be king no more!"

The negro potentate clenched his hands savagely. It was only by an effort of will that he controlled himself. "You may go now," Sanders went on in a calmer tone. "The palaver is finished. As for the men of your guard who were captured, they will be sent back to your village when I think fit." Mafolaba rose from his ceremonial chair and turned away sourly. A minute or two later he was in his litter once more, and as he was borne from the scene the serried ranks of his warriors wheeled round to march in the same direction, chanting gloomily as they did so.

Farewell to the River

AN hour after the departure of Mafolaba, Sanders resolved to set free the raiders who had been captured by Bosambo and his men, and, when these had been told to make their way back to their own country, his next concern was the erowd of natives who had almost become victims of the slave trade. "Tibbets," he said, "you'd better get them together and take them back to the Dahomey border under escort. Half the company should suffice." The young assistant hurried off to carry out his chief's orders, and Sanders turned to engage Bosambo in conversation. He had only been talking to him for a few minutes when Tibbets reappeared. "I'm sorry, sir," he reported in some agitation, "but I can't do anything with those girls. The men are willing enough to go back to Dahomey, but the girls simply won't budge." "Won't budge?" Sanders echoed in bewilderment. "No, sir," Tibbets answered. "I think Bosambo has something to do with their attitude." Sanders directed a sharp glance at the Ochori chief, who looked singularly uncomfortable. Then he marched across to a group of dusky females who were sitting outside a hut some little distance away. They were the girls who had been rescued from Mafolaba's slave-raiders. "What is this I hear?" Sanders asked of them. "Don't you want to go back to your homes and your parents?" "No, lord," they answered in one voice, with loud emphasis. "We would like to be the wives of Bosambo, chief of the Ochoris." "What, all of you?" Sanders demanded. Nine woolly heads nodded in response, and again the Commissioner glanced at Bosambo, who had followed him across to the hut uncasily. "Listen," Sanders announced, turning to the girls once more. "Don't you know that Bosambo has five other wives who are just now in different villages? Don't you know that those five wives are old and sour-tempered—that they will beat you and give you much work to do?" The girls looked impressed, and Sanders silenced Bosambo as the latter attempted to protest against the fictitious story that the Commissioner had told. "Now will you go back to your homes and parents?" the white man asked. "Yes, lord," nine feminine voices answered hastily. Sanders smiled, and was about to turn away when Tibbets laid a hand on his arm. "Just a minute, sir," he exclaimed. "I understood that there were ten girls among the natives who were rescued from Mafolaba's raiding party, and I see there are only nine here." Sanders counted the girls and verified his assistant's words; and upon inquiry he learned from the dusky maidens that one of their number, Lilongo, was now at the chief's house. Looking pretty hard at Bosambo, the Commissioner ordered him to take him to his hut, and here the missing Lilongo was located. "Do you want to marry the chief as well?" Sanders demanded of her. "Yes, lord, but I won't marry him unless he gets those other nine females out of his village!" the girl said vehemently. "Lilongo, they are already leaving," Bosambo assured her. "Lord Sandi will tell you so himself." "Yes, and I can tell you of Bosambo's other wives," Sanders remarked. "There are five of them in other villages—all of them old crones who will beat you." Lilongo had begun to smile. "Lord Sandi, that is not true," she said. "Bosambo has no other wives. While I have been here I have watched him. He is too fond of other men's wives to have so many of his own." "Lilongo, that is not true, either," Bosambo protested. "Marry me, and I promise you that no other woman will ever take your place in my heart." "I shall see to that," Lilongo retorted firmly. "But there is something you have forgotten, Bosambo. I am a Mohammedan." "Well, and so am I," the big fellow declared. Sanders looked at him swiftly. "What's this?" he demanded. "Why, only this afternoon you were telling me something of your life, and said that you were a Christian, having been educated at a mission school on the coast." Bosambo was not abashed by this reminder. "Lord Sandi," he said, "for you I am a Christian. I know all about Marky and Lukey and Johnny—and that other Johnny that lost his head over a certain dancing-girl called Salome." "But for you, Lilongo," he added, turning to the girl from Dahomey, "for you I am of the true faith." "H'm, you'd better make up your mind," Sanders commented. "But you two want to get married, eh? Do you think you can hold him, Lilongo?" "I think I can," she answered with a twinkle in her dark eyes. So Lilongo and Bosambo were made man and wife amid great ceremony and rejoicing, and as the days became weeks, the weeks months, and the months years, the chief of the Ochori

"King Mafolaba," Farini declared emphatically, "you can take it from me that Sandi will not come back." May 11th, 1935.

A shower of arrows sped towards the panic-stricken fugitive, and two of the shafts pierced him through the back.

and his mate lived blissfully in their jungle paradise, their people prospering under their joint rule.

During that time two sons were born to Bosambo and Lilongo, and the elder was a constant source of pride and joy to his father, who saw in him a boy who might one day become a great chief—more powerful, perhaps, than King Mafolaba, who sulked and schemed up there beyond the mountains, his hatred of Bosambo still rankling in his mind, his fear of Sanders alone preventing him from attacking the Ochori village in force.

Mafolaba knew too well that the king or chieftain who brought war to the jungle must answer for it to Sandi—Sandi, whom men called the Tiger, and the maker of laws.

For four years the current of the river swung seaward through a territory of peace and plenty, carrying with it no memory of the bushman death-yell or the slash of spear and shaft. And at the end of four years a temporary change was made at the Residency.

Sanders was now entitled to a year's furlough, and during it he intended to marry Captain Hamilton's sister, and spend a six months' honeymoon in England. Meanwhile his quarters at the Residency were to be occupied by one Ferguson, a deputy-commissioner of undoubted courage, though he lacked his predecessor's knowledge and experience.

On the day of Ferguson's arrival, Sanders had a long talk with him, giving him a good deal of valuable advice.

"Well," said Ferguson, when the Commissioner had finished talking, "I only hope I can handle this territory half as well as you've handled it. I can tell you that I'm not looking forward to the next twelvemonth."

"I understand how you feel," Sanders mused. "I was just the same when I first came here. Didn't think I'd ever get the hang of it. But one does. You know, some years ago it was impossible to go upriver and show yourself on deck without a shower of spears coming at you from the jungle. And now—"

"Now it's as safe walking through this territory as it is going across London, eh?" Ferguson remarked with a smile.

May 11th, 1935.

"Oh, safer," the Commissioner laughed. "There's no traffic here. But getting down to serious matters again, how about getting acquainted with all the chiefs before I leave? And when I say all the chiefs, I include the Old King."

"Mafolaba?" Ferguson breathed. "No, Sanders, I've heard all about that bird, and I'd rather see the other chiefs first before I make his acquaintance. I want to feel sure of myself before I have any dealings with him."

Mafolaba was therefore excluded from the palaver that was called and, with that one notable exception, the petty chiefs of the river assembled in the compound before the Residency two or three days later, having travelled many miles in response to the messages despatched by Lord Sandi.

With the chiefs lined up in front of him, Sanders introduced Ferguson, and then addressed the tribal leaders collectively.

"Chiefs and kings," he said, "for fifty moons there has been peace on the river, with no man's hand raised against his brother. Gone are the days of pillaging and plunder, when no woman dared leave her village and no man slept easily in his hut. Is it not true that the people of this territory have become rich and fat in consequence?"

There was a murmur of acquiescence, and one chief, carrying an umbrella over his shoulder, moved forward a pace.

"Lord," he declared, "the people of my tribe have become so rich that even the common men can afford three wives."

"So!" the Commissioner murmured. "Then your people must see that peace is good, eh?"

"Yes, lord," the chieftain answered. "But you know, as well as I know, that if one madman rushes amongst five men who are not mad, then very soon all of them become mad. That is war."

"Your words are wise, Luao," Sanders agreed, and then turned to a chief who had once caused him a good deal of trouble.

"And what have you to say on the matter, Kilonga-longa?" he asked.

"Lord," came the naive reply, "the young men of my village do not make war because if they did so you would punish them."

"Your words, too, are wise," Sanders commented. "Now, listen to me, kings and chiefs. I am going away, and twelve moons will pass before I return. During that time I want you to obey the Lord Ferguson as you have obeyed me. See that you bring no shame upon him, lest my king, in his wrath, punishes you mightily by sending many soldiers against you."

With this final warning he dismissed them, but there was one who lingered, and that one was Bosambo, who now came forward to bid him farewell.

"Lord Sandi," he said, "it grieves me to see you go. You have been father and mother to the people of the river."

The Commissioner smiled. "I shall come back," he rejoined, taking the giant negro's hand in a warm and friendly grip. "Tell me, Bosambo, how is your wife?"

"She is well and happy, lord," the black answered. "Lilongo, she is the light of my life—and a good cook, lord. And my first son, he grows straight and tall, like a palm tree. While the little one, he is so-high. Lord, when you marry I hope your wife will be a good cook—and bear you many tall sons as well."

"Thank you, Bosambo," the Commissioner said amusedly. "And now, good-bye!"

Bosambo gripped his hand tightly. "Remember me, lord," he told him in a voice that was none too steady.

"I'll remember you," Sanders rejoined fervently.

The Jungle Aflame

SOME days after the departure of Sanders from the Residency, a big canoe might have been seen ploughing upstream. A dozen natives were driving it through the water with long strokes of their paddles, and near the bow sat two white men, one a Portuguese outcast known as Farini, the other a renegade Englishman who answered to the name of Smith.

The cargo of that vessel consisted of gin—"enough gin to make the whole jungle drunk," as Smith had already remarked. Liquor that could be bartered for goods which fetched high prices in the markets of civilisation. What did it matter if the stuff was liable to arouse primitive passions and savage instincts which had been kept under control for more than four years?

"We'll soon be in Mafolaba's country, Smith," said Farini. "Strange, isn't it, that our presence in these parts should coincide with Sanders' departure on twelve months' leave?"

"A lucky break for us, I'd call it," Smith commented. "But, you know, his very name is enough to throw a scare into the blacks. Even though he's well out of the way, we're likely to experience some difficulty in trading with them. We've found that out already. They're sort of reluctant to buy gin now, knowing that their precious Lord Sandi disapproves—and knowing that he has ears as long as an elephant's."

Farini's eyes narrowed craftily. "I've thought of that," he said. "Do you know what I'm going to do, now that Sanders has been gone for some days? I'm going to give out the word that he is dead, and pretty soon it will be broadcast all over the jungle?"

"How?"

"By lokali drums, the telegraph of the bush," Farini answered, and by way of illustration he leaned forward and tapped his fingers on one of the crates that formed the cargo of the vessel.

"Sandi is dead," he said smoothly. "There is no law any more." Think what that will mean to them, Smith. And besides, we'll get our own back on Sanders for sending us across to the coast in irons some years ago. He'll be pretty sick when he hears that his black children have become savages again, eh?"

Twenty-four hours later the signal-drums were beating in every village, sending forth the news that had come from the lips of Farini and Smith.

"Sandi—is—dead. There—is—no—law—any—more!"

Day and night the drums throbbled their message, while Farini and Smith set about plying their unholy trade in liquor from the quarters which they had, by this time, taken up in the stronghold of King Mafolaba.

The air of the jungle quivered to the diapason of the rapid, oft-repeated notes: "Sandi is dead! Sandi is dead! There is no law any more!" A message that erased every vestige of fear and restraint from native hearts, fomenting license and rapaciousness in their stead. And soon the first outbreak had occurred—a raid by the warriors of one village upon the inhabitants of another.

Like wildfire the trouble spread. Black demons, crazed with gin, and inspired by the savage rites of the Blood Dance—sweeping through the bush to kill and to pillage. Kraals blazing fiercely in the tropic night. The death yell ringing loud and clear once more. Isolated families of whites trembling in their remote bungalows, waiting for the moment when they would be overwhelmed by the uprising.

As yet it was inter-tribal warfare, but who could tell what turn the situation might take at any moment?

Down in the Residency, Deputy-Commissioner Ferguson listened to the beat of the lokali drums like a man on the verge of a breakdown.

"Again and again and again," he groaned to Hamilton and Tibbets, pressing his hands against his temples. "What are they saying now?"

"It's always the same," Hamilton answered. "'Sandi is dead. There's no law any more.'"

There was a knock on the door of Ferguson's office, and a white man crossed the threshold. He was a minister of religion, a tall man with features that had become lined with care during the last few hours.

"Father O'Leary," Tibbets exclaimed. "What are you doing here?"

"They have burned my church to the ground," the missionary said. "I got away with Mr. and Mrs. Dawson and left them at the Baileys to come on here. But the Baileys themselves are in mortal fear of an attack."

Ferguson clenched his hands. "Sanders' black children," he breathed. "They're nothing but beasts—wild beasts."

"No, Mr. Ferguson, they're not," O'Leary said.

"Then what are they?" Ferguson broke out. "Do you realise that they might have killed you?"

"I realise that, but I didn't come here because I was afraid for my life," the missionary rejoined. "I came here because I learned that Farini and Smith have been peddling gin among the natives."

"Farini and Smith?" the Deputy-Commissioner echoed. "Sanders warned me about those two. I didn't know they were back in the territory again."

"I understand they have made the Old King's village their headquarters," O'Leary informed him. "Mr. Ferguson, that's the seat of the trouble."

Ferguson was silent for a moment, and then he turned to his assistants.

"Captain Hamilton, I am leaving you in charge of the Residency," he said. "Lieutenant Tibbets, you will parade half a company of men and accompany me up the river with them. We daren't take more, for the Residency may be attacked, and we shall have a good many refugees here before long, I'm thinking."

"But what do you propose to do, sir?" Tibbets demanded.

"Travel upstream as far as we can," Ferguson rejoined. "I shall then take ten men and go over the mountains to the Old King's country."

"To the Old King's country?" Hamilton blurted. "Sir, you can't do that! It's suicide—"

"Sanders would have done it, wouldn't he?" the Deputy-Commissioner interrupted tersely.

Hamilton made a desperate gesture. "But, sir, you can't—"

"You heard my orders, captain," Ferguson ground out. "Lieutenant Tibbets, parade your men!"

Forty-eight hours later, having parted with Tibbets and disembarked from the Zaire with ten men of the Hausas, and having entered the lion's den to demand the surrender of Farini and Smith, Deputy-Commissioner Ferguson found himself tied to a stake in King Mafolaba's village.

The ten men of the Hausas were already dead, butchered by the warriors of the Old King. Poor Ferguson! He had purposely brought a small escort to show Mafolaba that he was not there as the potentate's foe, but it had been in vain. The black heart of the fat scoundrel had leaped at the prospect of inflicting torture and death on an agent of Britain's King-Emperor.

It would be some small consolation for the manner in which he had had to bend the knee before the much-feared Sandi. Ferguson, another of these hated English commissioners, would pay the price!

While many hundreds of dusky natives looked on, a witch-doctor clad in the skin of an animal, and wearing a fiendish mask, proceeded to caper before the helpless white man, taunting him with weird gestures. It was a pantomime that continued for some time, and then the Old King rose from a bench on which he was seated and advanced to the stake of sacrifice.

With a movement of his arm he dismissed the witch-doctor and scowled at Ferguson savagely.

The rescue party swarmed into the village, and the underlings of Mafolaba retreated before them in alarm.

"White man," he said, "you came against me with your soldiers."

"That is a lie," Ferguson answered thickly. "I came in peace."

"You came with soldiers," Mafolaba repeated. "They are dead. You, too, will die!"

The captive's face was wet with perspiration, yet he looked at the Old King defiantly.

"You may kill me, Mafolaba," he said, "but the Lord Sandi will avenge me. He will make his way to your village here and crush you. Do you hear? He will crush you, as he has crushed other kings!"

Mafolaba's eyes betrayed a hint of fear, but he quickly recovered himself. "Sandi is dead!" he answered with an impatient gesture.

"Sandi is not dead!" Ferguson breathed. "Sandi lives, and, whatever happens to me, I shall be avenged. You won't escape him, Mafolaba. Wherever you hide, he will track you down—slay you—throw your body to the fishes!"

They were his last words. Mafolaba had intended that he should suffer a slow and lingering death, but rage overwhelmed him, and, raising a spear that he was clutching in his fist, he plunged it deep into the defenceless white man's chest.

A half-stifled groan escaped Ferguson, and his body slumped in the thoughts that bound him to the stake. Back came Mafolaba's hand, dragging out the blood-stained assegai with which he had struck. Then again and again he drove it into the Deputy Commissioner's sagging form—jeering as he lunged—until his victim breathed no more.

From a hut near by, two renegade whites had watched the whole scene. They were Farini and Smith, and now the latter wheeled round like a man in a panic and snatched up a revolver.

"Farini," he panted, "I'm getting out of here. This thing has gone beyond us. I'm getting out."

"Don't be a fool," the other snarled. "We're making our fortune peddling that gin, aren't we? Yes, and they'll want plenty more before they're finished."

"Farini, supposing—supposing they find out that Sanders isn't dead!" Smith gasped. "You saw what they did to Ferguson. You saw the way Mafolaba finished him. Oh, it was horrible—horrible!"

The Portuguese eyed him contemptuously.

"You're getting soft, Smith," he sneered. "Sanders is away at the coast, and soon he'll be en route for England. No one can dispute our contention that he's dead, and long before his year's leave is up we'll be away from here. As for Ferguson—well, he's lucky to have died so easily."

"You cold-blooded swine!" Smith grated. "I'm clearing out of here, and nobody is going to stop me. I'm—"

He got no further, for with an oath Farini knocked aside his revolver and struck him on the jaw, sending him in a heap to the floor. Next instant the Portuguese had pounced on him to disarm him, and he had barely wrested the gun from his accomplice's grasp when a native appeared in the entrance of the hut.

"White men," the black announced, "King Mafolaba summons you to council."

He vanished, and Farini dragged Smith to his feet.

"Come on," he snarled, "and don't act like an idiot! We're liable to fetch up against trouble all right if you lose your head!"

He pushed him out of the hut, and May 11th, 1935.

together they made their way across to the royal bench, on which Mafolaba was seated again. In passing the stake to which Ferguson's dead body was fastened, Smith kept his eyes averted, but Farini glanced at the limp figure coolly enough.

They walked up to the Old King, and he motioned them to a couple of stools in front of him. Sitting there amongst his councillors he looked precisely what he was, a pompous villain steeped in sin, and the devilish emblems that decorated his village seemed singularly in keeping with his character.

"Is—Sandi—dead?" he demanded of Farini in deliberate tones.

"Yes, of course," the Portuguese answered. "Didn't I tell you so?"

"Can Sandi come back?"

"How can he come back?" Farini protested. "I repeat, Sandi is dead."

The Old King beamed.

"When you say that, your voice is as sweet as honey to me," he said.

"But—"

And suddenly his expression changed to a look of intense ferocity.

"But if there is a devil in your heart, then you will die as Ferguson died!"

"King Mafolaba," Farini declared emphatically, "you can take it from me that Sandi will not come back."

The Old King was satisfied, and now he looked round upon his councillors.

"Four years ago, a little dog of a chief chopped the Captain of my Guard and brought shame to me before his village," he ground out. "I want the skin of that little chief. Let the warriors muster for the Blood Dance! To-morrow they swoop down upon the Oehori!"

The Return of Sandi

THE scene was Government House, at Lagos, on the coast, and a reception was in progress there. It was a reception which Commissioner Sanders and his fiancée had attended, and they were dancing to the rhythm of a waltz, when an orderly informed Sanders that the Governor wished to speak with him in his study.

Quitting the ball-room, the Commissioner made his way to his superior's sanctum, and found him standing by his desk, with a missive in his hands.

"I'm sorry to interrupt your dance, Sanders," the Governor apologised gravely, "but I have just received bad news. Trouble has broken out in your territory—serious trouble. Two men, known as Farini and Smith, have been selling gin to the blacks. They are located up in the Old King's country, it seems."

"Farini and Smith," Sanders breathed. "I know them all right. You must remember them, too. Some years ago I sent them here in irons. They came back to the River after serving sentence, but slipped over into French territory before I could lay hands on them."

"They're back," the Governor muttered, "and the situation is bad. All your work ruined in the space of a few days, Commissioner. This is a message I've had from Father O'Leary, and here is how he sums things up: 'Send four battalions, or Sanders.'"

The Commissioner smiled.

"I'm afraid it'll have to be four battalions, sir."

"I'd rather you went, Sanders. This is urgent. I could soon have a plane ready for you."

"No, sir," the younger man protested. "I'm on leave—planning to get married and go back to England on a honeymoon. It wouldn't be fair to my fiancée if I were to alter my arrangements now."

The Governor frowned.

"Let me see, isn't she Hamilton's sister?" he inquired.

"Yes," Sanders rejoined quickly. "Her—her brother's all right, isn't he, sir?"

"At present, yes," was the reply. "Tibbets is all right, too—though he lost half a dozen men after taking Ferguson to the mountains."

"To the mountains?" Sanders echoed incredulously.

"Yes," the Governor answered. "He went into Mafolaba's country with ten men. I understand he said that's what you would have done under the circumstances."

The younger man was looking at him in horror and dismay.

"What's happened to him?" he jerked.

"Is he—"

The Governor shrugged his shoulders. "No news," he said.

In the small hours of the morning a plane left Lagos. It was a plane which carried Commissioner Sanders in its passenger cockpit, and the drone of its powerful motor startled the beasts of the karroo as it winged its way towards the interior.

Shortly after sunrise Sanders was at his office in the Residency overlooking the Niger River, and later that day, while he was in conference with Hamilton and Tibbets, a welcome visitor was announced in the person of Bosambo, to whom the Commissioner had dispatched a message by carrier-pigeon immediately on his arrival in the territory.

"Bosambo," Sanders said, "you are the one chief who has been able to hold his people in check, I am told."

"It is because I have not allowed Farini and Smith to come into my country, Lord," the giant negro answered.

"You are wise, Bosambo," the Commissioner rejoined. "Now tell me what you know of Lord Ferguson."

"Mafolaba killed him," was the answer. "He died like a brave man—a swift death by the spear. This one of my spies has told me."

Sanders heaved a sigh.

"Then Ferguson wasn't tortured," he said fervently. "At least we can thank Heaven for that."

He stood up, and turned to his fiancée's brother.

"Hamilton," he stated, "I want you to take charge here. Tibbets and I will leave with half the garrison and see if we can restore order in the lower reaches of the River. We may need support—and if so, Bosambo's people can be relied upon to provide it!"

Once again the lokali drums were throbbing through the jungle, but now their voice was couched in no tone of exultation. Alarm was the keynote of their strange, weird rhythm.

"Sandi is not dead. The law is back on the River."

Thus spoke the drums, and much more they had to tell—startling news that reached the ears of King Mafolaba as he sat in conference with certain of his chief advisers.

One of his councillors had begun to interpret the beat of a lokali whose rapid notes were coming from afar.

"Sandi—is not dead! The law—is back—on the River! Sandi—and his soldiers—with the warriors of the Oehori—have smashed the army of Mafolaba!"

Dismay seized the Old King as he learned of the annihilation of the fight-

The love of one animal for another though enemies by nature. A story of the primeval forests and of a young girl's efforts to bring up a fawn and a puma in captivity. Starring Jean Parker and Russell Hardie

The Fawn

IN the High Sierra Mountains, where whispering foliaged giants of ancient lineage keep benign vigil over all creatures of the wild, the dawn of a new day was just breaking.

In a beautiful wooded dell a herd of deer were grazing, while, separated from them a little, a doe had settled down with her young fawn.

And back in a more thickly-wooded section of the forest, a sleek puma dozed and blinked drowsily at the rising sun whilst her young cub snuggled up to her side.

But as the sun climbed higher the puma rose lazily to her feet, yawned, then padded off determinedly, her cub gamboling at her heels. As she passed silently and swiftly over the ground, the deer became suddenly alert, their delicate nostrils sniffing the air currents suspiciously. The puma was now within sight of them and, with one concerted move, they broke into a run. With a snarl the great cat was after them, leaving the baby puma behind, whining and sniffing.

Over great boulders and through thick grasses went the great beast. The deer were some way ahead, but there was a doe that could not travel so fast because of her fawn—the tongue salivated at the thought of meat. With each step the puma was gaining, but in her triumph she lost caution. Without warning a trap opened under her, and in the wild struggle to free herself a boulder in the pit became loosened. The stone crashed down on the puma's head.

And on a work-bench in Will Bergman's log cabin, the clumsy, soiled hands of Joe Lucas, his half-breed assistant, were busily engaged in building just such another trap. On the wall of the cabin hung a Californian State License, identifying Bergman as a guide, and entitling him to "ranch" deer.

Joe was a thin, ratty-faced individual. "I reckon by the time the season opens there ain't gonna be no deer around here. Not if we don't trap some of these 'ere puma mighty quick."

A burly, unshaven rascal with small beady eyes grinned to show broken, stained teeth.

"We'll get 'em!" cried Will Bergman. "Even if I have to lie out nights and shoot 'em."

"You lie out nights!" sneered Joe. "Why—" He saw the murderous expression. "Oh, I know you'd do it, but what's the good when you can't see a yard in front of yer nose. But if we don't get them cats they'll kill every deer in the place."

"Then the sooner you get that trap finished the better!" shouted Bergman truculently. "You make the traps and I'll get all the puma in these woods."

His last words were punctuated by a sudden burst of frenzied barking from the dogs outside. The two men went hurriedly across to a window to see the dogs tearing madly down their runaway, following a doe running parallel with their fence. A wild scrambling at the rotten boards, and the three dogs were through. The doe stopped, trembling with fear, saw the dogs and blindly fled towards the densest part of the forest.

Joe grinned. "Dogs is lucky. They can't read game laws."

"Yeah; but them dogs will go tearing through the woods and scattering any deer far and wide!" Bergman snarled. "It'll be hours afore they'll come back. In the morning we gotta make that enclosure stronger. What's more, when I went into town I heard that the Rangers are on the watch. We don't want to lose them dogs or our licence."

On through the woods sped the doe with the dogs close to her heels. The doe made a spirited effort and drew away, and her gam gave her the chance to save her fawn. The dogs had lost the scent and were snuffing round, and during that time the doe hid her fawn in the undergrowth. Then she darted out and away, her one idea being to lead the oncoming dogs away from the hiding place.

The dogs heard the crackling of the dry branches as the doe sped away and, yelping furiously, gave chase. For a while the doe eluded the dogs; she swam streams and brooks, but always the dogs kept to her trail. In an effort to escape the dogs, the doe leapt for some high boulders, but she was exhausted, and she slipped back. In a moment the dogs were at her, and she was pulled down, a quick victim to her pursuers.

The fawn, who had been hidden away so carefully in the undergrowth, lay there quietly and obediently for a time, then curiosity and something more—a vague premonition of dread—impelled it to move out to the open ground.

With nightfall the fawn ventured timidly forth, a lonely, pathetic and dispirited little figure as it wandered along, helplessly alone, starting nervously and running at the howl of the wolf, the hooting of an owl, or the roar of a mountain lion. All night the little creature wandered round in terror.

By morning, almost dead with fright, the fawn came out of the trees into the sunlight, and picked his ways over some rocks towards a stream, then came to a stop at the water's edge, bending forward his thin neck to drink.

Perhaps the rippling of the water over the stones may have lulled the animal to a sense of security, because the fawn appeared not to notice the human being lying flat on a rock and watching so intently.

A man, no—a young girl in thick serge trousers, serviceable knee boots, and a white silk shirt. A dark-eyed youngster, who held her breath as she watched the fawn.

Pursued By Bergman's Dogs

SO worn out was the fawn that he made no effort when a soft voice called to him. He looked up and met such kind, affectionate eyes, and instantly his fears were assuaged.

"Hallo, little man!" whispered Toni Martin.

His pathetic bleat answered her.

"Why, what's the matter?" asked the girl, and very slowly stood up. She held out her slim hand in a friendly gesture, and the fawn stood motionless like a figure carved out of stone. "What are you trying to tell me, baby?" crooned the girl, slowly crossing the stream to the animal's side.

The fawn sniffed at Toni's fingers, and then looked up at her from gentle, appealing eyes. She stroked his back soothingly, and her whispered endearments soon gained his confidence. To his little whimpering bleats she said softly:

"Come here! Don't be frightened, because I want to be friends."

The girl picked the fawn up in her strong young arms and, except for a few bleats, he made no attempt to escape. A tongue came out and licked her cheek.

"I guess I'll have to take you home," announced sixteen-year-old Toni. "Have you lost your mother, darling?"

As the fawn made no attempt to escape and nestled in her arms, the girl was certain some tragedy had overtaken the mother. Suddenly, before her path, she saw the trap and the dead body of the puma. A quick glance showed her how the big creature had died. Lying close to the dead mother was a young cub. Toni quickly knelt down to stroke it, and instantly the wildling put out its baby paws and tried to claw her.

"Here, stop that!" Toni chided it. She reached out again, but once more the paws went out at her with aggressive savagery. All the while the fawn tucked under her left arm fidgeted as if the sight of the puma terrified him.

Toni held him all the tighter, and turned again to the cub.

"You may not know it, but you're in a bad way here." Her eyes glistened as she gazed at the dead puma. "Poor little feller," she continued, a catch in her voice. "It's pretty sad to lose your mother—I know." She had adored her mother, but illness had decreed that it should be otherwise.

Toni swooped suddenly and grabbed the baby puma by the back of the neck. He snarled at her like an angry kitten. She tucked him under her right arm, and then looked from one to the other.

"You cute things," she said. The puma immediately made an attempt to claw the fawn. "Here, here, none of that! Better manners, sir! You don't know it, but I'm taking you home, and I'm going to make you bosom friends."

Slowly she walked through the woods May 11th, 1935.

holding close to her strange pets. Suddenly her heart leapt up to her throat. She heard the yelping and barking of dogs growing louder and louder. She knew it must be the fierce dogs of that rascally guide, Bergman—they must have escaped. Without a second's delay she began to run, terror gripping her, for she knew she would not be able to save her charges if the dogs caught them; in fact they might even attack her.

The dogs had got the scent and soon they heard her running feet. They began to gain steadily on the panting girl, who was hampered by her wriggling charges. A mist came before Toni's eyes and blood pounded in her temples. She could almost feel the hot breath of the dogs on her neck.

Then she stumbled and fell prone to the ground, but Toni clung tenaciously to her pets, and the mother instinct made her draw them close as she lay there panting, too exhausted to rise.

Then unexpectedly Toni heard a masculine voice. And almost before she could realise it a man with a rifle-butt in his hands was racing towards her. The butt of the rifle caught one dog a fearful smash in the ribs, and that knocked much of the savagery out of the creature. The other two dogs showed their teeth and snarled, but hefty kicks from strong hoots drove the dogs away, whining and whimpering.

Toni took a quivering breath and staggered to her feet. A glance round her told her where she was. In her dazed terror she had taken the path to the ranger's look-out, and the ranger on duty had seen her. The girl smiled at her rescuer, and realised the ranger was a young, square-shoulder person with a most fascinating smile.

Breaking The Law Of The Wild

"THANKS. Thanks ever so much." Toni said very seriously. "If you hadn't appeared I don't know what would have happened."

"I'm glad I happened to be on duty."

Toni laughed.

"So am I." She looked at him curiously. "You're new here—aren't you?"

He smiled and bowed.

"At your service, miss."

"I'm Toni Martin," she went on, then indicated with a little nod the animals she still clutched. "And these are my children. I've just adopted them, and so I'm taking them home."

The ranger glanced dubiously at the snarling puma.

"Let me take this child off your hands. Maybe I can help you get your children home."

"Oh, that's awfully nice of you. Thanks!" Toni handed the puma over; then she and the ranger fell into step and started for her home.

Toni soon found out all about the handsome ranger.

"When I had finished my course of forestry I wangled a ranger's job—and here I am." By that part of the story they had reached the steps of a well-built wooden bungalow. "And here you are!"

"Please come in!" begged the girl, and laughed. "I'd like to show you to father."

A spare, grey-haired man sat before a typewriter, and the young ranger noted with an amused twinkle that torn scraps of paper lay about the floor. He had turned round at the sound of the door opening, and naturally the first thing he saw were the fawn and the puma.

"Am I seeing things?" came his incredulous query.

Toni began to explain rapidly the exciting incidents, and her father listened with a grin, to glance occasionally at the young man nursing the puma.

"So you've brought home two pets—starting to make this shack a sort of menagerie, eh?" The father chuckled. "I think, Toni, you should introduce the gentleman who saved you from the dogs."

"Bob Alden's the name." The ranger held out his hand. "Guess I'll have to tell Bergman that his dogs will be shot next time they break loose. Glad to be of service." He shuffled his feet nervously because Toni's expression was rather like hero-worship, and he was a modest young man. "Guess, sir, your daughter's going to have trouble bringing up those two together."

Martin nodded and caressed the fawn. "You're right. See this mark on its back?" He pointed. "A most distinctive mark, and it will grow larger. I guess one could recognise this creature when full grown by that saddle mark."

The father made the ranger at home, invited him to stay and have a meal; but Bob shook his head—he was on duty. He stayed a little while to smoke a cigarette.

"I'm a writer, and I've come to the wilds to get ideas and write nature stories," Martin explained. "I've started about six yarns and torn them all up. I'm running out of ideas—and incidentally money."

"I wish you never had to think about money," Toni had placed the animals on the ground. The fawn did not seem inclined to leave her, but the puma crawled away in search of adventure. She looked at Alden. "Can't you give dad a plot for a story?"

"Not much in my line, but you can always get twenty dollars from the state for the puma."

"For that baby kitten?" Toni was horrified.

"A puma's a puma," Alden stated solemnly. "Young or old. As a matter of fact it's part of my job to kill them on sight, but"—he grinned teasingly at the girl—"but perhaps I just didn't see any puma—that is," he paused to add seriously, "if you'll turn him loose."

Toni's eyes blazed.

"I'll do nothing of the sort. I'm going to keep him—and the fawn. I'm going to bring them up together, and make them love each other."

"Can't be done—they're natural enemies. Young Mr. Puma may be docile enough for a while, but you wait till he gets a taste for deer meat."

"I wonder," Martin joined in. "I've a theory that only sheer necessity makes animals prey on each other. I'm almost ready to believe with Toni—that if this baby puma is fed adequately and the little deer brought up not to fear him, that they could be friends." His eyes lit up. "By Jove, what a grand experiment, and what a plot for a story. The originality of—"

Next moment their ears were suddenly assailed with the snarls of the cub and the terrified bleating of the baby fawn, coming from the direction of the kitchen.

"Doesn't look as if it's going to work out." Alden cocked an eye in the direction of the kitchen.

Toni glared at him and dashed to the kitchen. She swooped down and cornered the two little creatures under the sink. The puma was spitting and snarling, whilst the fawn whimpered with fear.

"Stop it, you two!" admonished Toni, shaking them both. "You ought to be ashamed." She put them down again. "Behave yourselves!"

The Chinese cook's baby was calmly eating his crackers and milk through the rumpus, but as Toni turned away to take some dishes and milk off the shelves, the puma and the fawn dipped their heads in the baby's bowl and starting helping themselves avidly to the milk. This time the puma's snarling had no effect on the fawn, but it had effect on the Chinese baby, who screamed lustily.

The cook had been outside chopping firewood, and, at the noise, came rushing in and spluttered with horror at sight of the animals. He grabbed up the baby.

"Don't be so silly," Toni frowned. "They're only babies, too. They won't hurt anybody."

"You not keep them?" Sang Soo said suspiciously, as Toni poured milk into two bowls, taking one to the fawn and one to the puma.

Toni nodded. Alden winked slyly at Mr. Martin.

Sang Soo threw up his fat hands in despair.

"No good, missie. Everybody know tiger and deer no good company."

"He's not a tiger—he's a puma," the young girl corrected. "And they're going to stick together."

Sang Soo snorted. "Maybe stick together all lite; but stick together him"—he pointed to the fawn—"inside other's belly."

Toni was quite angry because her father and Alden dared to laugh.

"You come back here in a fortnight's time and you see the difference."

"I'd like to come before that, if I may," said Bob Alden.

"You'll be very welcome. Won't he, Toni?"

"Of course, dad." The girl held out her hand. "Perhaps, Mr. Alden will come round and have supper with us to-morrow night?"

Bob accepted the invitation with alacrity, and hinted that it would be wise to say nothing about having a baby puma in the shack.

Malibu And Gato

SOME weeks later Mr. Martin was hard at work on his manuscript, which he had entitled "Sequoia—the story of a strange friendship," when Toni entered the room and motioned to him. Silently they tiptoed to a corner where the puma and the fawn lay peacefully side by side in the little basket that was their bed.

Toni beamed at her father, then looked down fondly at her two pets.

"Cute, aren't they?"

There was a knock on the door.

"Come in!" Martin called.

Bob Alden stepped into the shack.

"Hallo, thought I'd look round and inquire how everyone was getting along."

"You've come at the right time." Toni smiled a welcome. "We're trying to think out names for these little fellows. Any suggestions?"

"I've got a name for the deer," stated her father. "Malibu. It's an old Indian word, and it means 'Rough Going.' Nobody has a rougher road to travel than a deer."

"Talking of Indian names gives me an idea for the puma," spoke Bob. "How about Gato?"

"What does that mean?" asked Martin.

Alden's eyes twinkled.

"I think it means 'The Misunderstood One.'"

"That's a grand name," enthused Toni. "As a reward, would you like to come to supper to-night?"

The young man nodded eagerly. Mr. Martin suppressed a smile and went back to his work.

Some months later the writer was studying a book entitled "The Language of the American Indian," and curiosity prompted him to look up the word "Gato." He whistled when he read what was written there, and got to his feet to go in search of his daughter.

A great clatter from outside made him rush to the window. In the backyard was an old broken-down dog-house. On the other side of wire netting sat Toni, and here she kept a number of rabbits. These were scurrying about in search of some safe cover. The girl sat on a fallen tree, and in the palms of her hands she held two small chipmunks. He could see how intently the girl was gazing at the old dog-house, from which all the noise was emanating.

Martin's eyebrows went up in amusement and amazement as Gato came sailing out of the kennel as if he had been shot from a gun. The cub rolled up against a log, completely winded, and lay there passively. Then Malibu stuck his head out of the kennel and glared defiantly at Gato.

"What's going on here?" Toni came on the scene of battle and looked things over with an experienced eye. Her father opened the window the better to hear.

"You should be ashamed." Malibu hung his head, but came out of the dog-house slowly. The girl took both animals into her lap. "I wonder what you two have been up to."

Gato purred.

"You're not fooling me. It takes two to make a fight."

"Was all that squabbling earnest?" called out her father.

Toni screwed up her nose and shook her head violently.

"No—only fun."

"Toni, I've got a shock for you." Her father looked grave. "In this old Indian book I had lent to me I've found out the real meaning of Gato!"

"I'll kill anyone who dares to touch him!" blazed Toni, and then in her misery sobbed her heart out on her father's shoulder.

The puma hissed and snarled, whilst the guide's breath came gaspingly from his heaving chest as they rolled over and over in the struggle.

"What does it mean, dad?" Mr. Martin was quite serious now. "Gato means outlaw or murderer." Toni gasped. "But Bob said—" "I know, but he was wrong," Martin answered. "Maybe this book is wrong. We'll hope so. Toni, those pets of yours are growing."

"I know they are." Toni picked up the puma and placed the animal close to the fawn. "And I'm going to make him redeem his name."

But even as she spoke Gato made a quick, nasty little swipe with his paw at the fawn.

Death In The Night

WINTER came and passed, and now the puma and the fawn were almost a year old. Mr. Martin was glad that the creatures were so happy and playful together, because they were such pals for Toni. Without the animals and the attentions of Bob Alden his young daughter might have grown lonely in this wild, beautiful, but desolate seclusion.

One morning in spring Bergman stood looking at a broken coop and a heap of feathers.

"If you'd 'a' laid them traps like I told you," he growled at Joc, "this wouldn't have happened."

"I did—but look, Will." The smaller man pointed excitedly. "There's his tracks. Smart, that's what he is. Ife stepped right over it."

"Don't waste time arguing," snarled Bergman. "I'm going out to get him. I'll follow his tracks."

But Bergman cursed heartily when the tracks of a year-old puma ended at the side of a brook. A snapping twig made him jump round and raise his gun, but with an awkward grin he lowered the weapon at sight of Alden.

May 11th, 1935.

"Hallo!" Bergman called out. "Seen anything of a puma round here?"

"The only ones I've seen are those you've collected bounty on," Alden answered sharply. "Don't tell me you've missed one?"

Bergman nodded morosely. "Yeah, and a smart one, too. Raided my chicken coop last night, and I'm out for him."

"How old would you think this puma to be?" Alden asked.

"From his tracks, about a year. Wish you'd pass the word along to the rest of the rangers to keep an eye out for him. Maybe they can get a line on his hide-out. I ain't had much luck."

"I'll get busy on it," Alden promised, and rode away in thoughtful mood. Was Bergman's poacher Gato?

That evening the Martins were very pleased to have a surprise visit from the young ranger. Toni took him to a window and with pride showed him Malibu busy lapping up a dish with evident relish, whilst Gato lay stretched out full length on a rug, taking his ease. He had to admit that they were fine creatures, and laughed when Toni explained that Malibu adored ice-cream.

"I'm a little worried over Gato." The girl shook her curly head. "He used to adore my ice-cream, but the last few days he's seemed off his food. I've let him sleep by the dying embers of the fire because I thought he might be cold out in that dog-house, and Malibu does take up such a lot of room. And if Gato takes up too much room Malibu lashes out in a most spiteful way."

"They never try to fight each other?" "No, Bob, never. They play at quarrelling sometimes." Toni laughed. "Let's go out and talk to them."

Malibu came forward to lick the girl's hand, and then turned to sniff at Alden. The fawn was now a handsome young buck, and the head came up to the girl's waist. The puma was the size of a big dog, and seemed bored and sleepy. The creature eyed Alden without the least show of fear and yawned.

Alden stroked the fawn and then knelt to caress the puma. He looked very closely at the mouth of the mountain cat.

"I think it's time for all good little boys to be in bed," Toni cried. "Off you go." Malibu pranced away and entered his house. The girl smiled down at the puma. "The poor dear looks rather seedy. I shall let him have another night near the fire."

Bob managed to have a few words alone with Mr. Martin before he left. Frankly he told of his meeting with Bergman and the year-old puma taking his chickens.

"I may be wrong, and I hope so," he concluded. "There are slight marks round the mouth that look like blood, and Gato seems to have lost his appetite."

"Just because the poor cat didn't want his ice-cream doesn't prove anything," argued Martin.

Alden ignored that. "See that Gato is shut in to-night, will you, Mr. Martin?"

"You won't say anything to Toni?"

"No," Alden answered as he raised the latch of the door. "And I don't want to have to—you understand? Good-night!"

It was well past midnight, and the living-room was alternatively streaked with darkness and bright moonlight. Seemingly the room was deserted until Gato moved out into the moonlight. Sniffing first at one closed window and then at another, he moved against the kitchen door and opened it. Here again he encountered a closed window. Walking away from it, his great cat's body disappeared for a moment into the darkness. Only his eyes could be seen, gleaming like red-hot coals.

Now he had found the door to Sang Soo's bed-room, where the Chinese cook and his motherless baby slept peacefully. With one leap Gato was at the window-sill and out of the open window into the night.

Padding swiftly over the ground, he was soon crouched on the roof of the low shed on Bergman's ranch. Some pigs could be heard squealing and stirring restlessly. With a silent feline movement Gato dived in under the shelter. The next instant there was the scream of a pig in agony.

Some time later Gato made his silent return through Sang Soo's window. Just as he was about to pass through the door he suddenly turned, and crawling along the baby's bed sniffed it carefully. Then he moved across to the cook's bed and a long tongue shot out and licked Sang Soo's face, as if the young puma were trying to tell her of his happiness. The cook moved restlessly, but did not wake. Silently Gato slid out of the room back to the comfortable rug near the glowing embers of the fire. He licked his lips, yawned, and fell into a contented sleep.

Early the next morning Bergman came through the woods with two of his best dogs on a leash. Alden kept step with him. The guide had appeared at the National Park Rangers Station to report the visit of the puma, and Alden had offered to inquire into the business. It was easy to trail the puma.

Bergman's teeth curled back in a savage grin, as the dogs, with an exuberant burst of speed, shot up to the front door of the Martin cabin. Ife pounced angrily on the door with the butt of his rifle.

As Toni opened it the dogs tried to break loose to enter. From within there came the fierce snarl of Gato. Toni screamed and tried to shut the door. It was Alden who yanked the dogs away, and Bergman pushed into the house, with the ranger at his heels.

Toni stood and faced them as her father hurriedly got up from the breakfast table.

"What's the matter, Bergman?" asked Martin, after a quick glance at Bob's serious face.

"I trailed this cat from my shack," Bergman pointed to the snarling Gato. "He was in my pig pen last night and got two of 'em."

Toni would not at first believe, and cried that Gato would not kill anything.

"I'm awfully sorry, Toni," Alden said quietly. "The truth is that your pet's an outlaw, and even if Bergman doesn't I'll have to kill him."

"I'll kill anyone who dares to touch him!" blazed Toni like a young goddess, and then in her misery sobbed her heart out on her father's shoulder.

"Those two pigs cost me——" began Bergman.

"Bob, make Bergman go away," Martin said. "Fix a price for the pigs and damage and tell him to call later for the money."

When Alden came back into the shack he found Toni had dried her tears.

"Twenty dollars will fix the damage," Alden reported. "And he'll be back this evening. He threatens to take action if you don't get rid of that puma. Toni, Gato's got to go!"

"You can't kill him, Bob," whispered the girl.

"I shall come back here this evening with Bergman to see he gets his money and gives a receipt. Also I shall have to prove to the rascal that Gato is no more." Bob's expression did not change. "A creature like Gato might easily escape."

Martin took his daughter in his arms when they were alone.

"I know how you feel, Toni, but if Gato isn't out of here we may get young Alden into trouble." He coughed.

"Malibu is growing up."

"What do you mean by that, dad?" "Turn him loose as well and give him a chance," her father answered. "I know Malibu is gentle and harmless, but we can hardly take him back to our apartment in town."

"Oh, we are leaving?"

"Yes, dear. My book's nearly finished."

That afternoon Toni walked through the woods, her pet following closely. A mile away and near a ravine the girl called the fawn to her, patted his graceful neck and kissed him good-bye.

Over Gato she lingered a few minutes longer, fearful of what the future might have in store for him. Then she shooed them away. They stared at her solemnly and seemed to understand. Through tear-filled eyes she saw them move away. Gato stopped uncertainly for a minute to gaze at the receding figure of Malibu, then he, too, walked away in another direction and was soon out of sight.

Friend or Foe

TWO winters later, and this scene is far away from the haunts of man. The only sound is the falling of snow from the trees and the faint sighing of an icy breeze.

From some pines appears a herd of young deer, and at their head Malibu, a magnificent four-point buck, powerful of body and fleet of limb, with a handsomely spreading pair of antlers.

A solitary doe wandered incautiously away from the others, and browsed down the side of the ravine. It was then that a mountain puma, padding down a slope, saw her and, with deadly intent, began to stalk her. The great cat crept nearer, gathered itself together and sprang. But it had taken that deer just a split second to hear him as his haunches came away from the ground, and with incredible speed the doe flung herself away, and the lion was left standing alone on the very spot where the deer had been just a second before. The great tail thrashed angrily, and the gleaming eyes seemed to blaze. It was useless to follow the doe, but suddenly the scent of the herd of young deer tickled his nostrils.

Malibu moved slowly forward, and the herd watched their leader. The buck went slowly to a water-hole in the snow and drank deeply. It was then that the puma, standing on top of a rocky ledge, caught sight of him.

Moving with exquisite grace, he edged towards Malibu until he had reached a ledge just above him. Then he crawled cautiously to the edge, and looked at the drinking buck. Over the rocks the puma made his noiseless way, determined to make up for his earlier mistake in losing the doe.

Malibu raised his head for a moment, then, seeing nothing, resumed his drinking.

Stealthily, the mountain puma crept closer and closer until he had reached the perfect vantage point. Then, gathering his muscles of steel, he prepared to make his spring.

It was then that Malibu raised his head and looked straight into the eyes of the cat. For one single second their gaze held, as they both stood, frozen to stillness.

The puma was the first to move, and the savagery of his demeanour had changed to a puzzled bewilderment. He moved nearer as if uncertain—Malibu stood stock still and stared. The puma came slowly to the side of the water-hole, and with complete trust and confidence Malibu moved towards him, for he had recognised his old friend and playmate, Gato.

Approaching each other, their noses touched in mutual greeting. In an excess of joy Gato rolled over on his back, and Malibu playfully prodded him in the belly with his antler. The lion rolled swiftly to his feet and moved to the water-hole to drink, and nose to nose the two friends drank their fill. Then, after frolicking together for a few moments, they rose and trotted happily off together into the thicket. Needless to say the rest of the herd had gone a long time ago.

A sudden sound caused the animals to stop and freeze in their tracks. It was the merry jingle of sleigh-bells. From the top of a ravine they stared downwards. Soon the sleigh and its occupants were plainly visible. There was Martin, Toni, Sang Soo and Sang Soo's little boy. After a long stay in town they had answered the call of the wild.

Malibu looked at Gato and then moved swiftly down the hillside to the valley. Gato whisked his long tail and bounded swiftly after the buck.

The Trap

THE Martin cabin that night was brightly lit. Toni and her father had just finished dinner.

"It's grand to be back," sighed Toni. "I wonder what's happened to Malibu and Gato?"

"And Bob Alden?" laughed Martin, who knew his daughter had not forgotten the young ranger.

"I shall go round and inquire if he's still here!" Her eyes danced. "Just to ask if he's seen my two pets."

"I expect the deer have moved on to better feeding grounds," teased her father. "And the mountain pumas have followed the deer."

Toni smiled back good-naturedly.

"I'd have resented that a couple of years ago as aimed at Gato." She stared at the fire. "You know, dad, we've a lot to thank Malibu and Gato for; they gave you a wonderful plot for a story, and the book went into six editions."

"And I'm hoping to get another plot from this visit," her father laughed. "my publishers want a sequel to 'Sequoia.'"

Not very far from the Martin home a sleigh slid smoothly over the frozen trail. Joe was driving whilst Bergman tossed huge forkfuls of hay on the ground behind them. Now and again the driver glanced round as if scared that someone might be watching.

A deer corral had been constructed at Bergman's ranch. As the sleigh drove through the suspended gate, Bergman dumped a final forkful of hay just inside the corral. Then the rascally guide spread the hay around so that it completely concealed the trap that would spring the deadfall gate.

At precisely that moment Malibu emerged from the woods and approached the gate of the Martin shack. He considered it solemnly, then looked towards the lighted windows. Gato clawed his way up a tree so that he could direct a glance at the cabin. Lightly Malibu leapt the gate, and Gato followed an instant later. They raced forward until they were just under the windows. Malibu craned his neck and peered through the glass wistfully as he saw Toni and her father sitting comfortably in the sitting-room.

Gato, however, sniffed around in old remembrance. Climbing a wood-pile just under the kitchen window, he stared intently at Sang Soo, who was, at that moment, drying and polishing the dishes. The Chinaman saw those great staring eyes and dropped the entire pile of dishes to the floor with a resounding crash.

Toni ran into the kitchen to find Sang Soo almost petrified with fright.

"What's the matter?"

May 11th, 1935.

Then her jaw dropped with astonishment, for she had seen Gato's head framed in the window. In a flash it disappeared.

"Gato!" Toni cried.

With a glad cry she flung up the window, just in time to see the puma pounding away. Then into Toni's unbelieving vision, there came the second of that night's miracles. Leaping past with the fleetness of the wind, came Malibu, antlers held high, his arched legs barely touching the ground. Then he, too, had disappeared into the velvety blackness of the night.

"Malibu!" Toni called, and hoped against hope that he would come back.

But when a few seconds had elapsed she made a quick decision. Opening the kitchen door she shouted into the snowy wilderness: "Gato! Malibu! Wait for me!" Then, turning back into the kitchen, she dashed excitedly into the living-room and grabbed up a woollen cap and a short plaited coat.

"They're here, dad!" she screamed at her father. "Gato and Malibu!"

"I thought I heard you call their names. Here, where are you going?"

"Going after them," cried Toni. "I'll be right back." The door slammed after her.

Malibu, after his sudden fright at Toni's over-exuberant call of greeting, had walked slowly along the snow-covered trail, following the marks made by Bergman's sled and nibbling at the tempting bunches of hay scattered on the trail. And always he kept nearing the unsuspected danger.

Toni, not far behind him, quickened her pace as Malibu's trail became more and more distinct in the moonlight. Every now and again she halloed and shouted "Malibu! Gato!" Now she was running, a triumphant smile on her lips, for she knew that Malibu was almost directly ahead of her.

Following the hay trail, Malibu climbed the hill towards Bergman's corral. The wind was in his face, so that he did not hear his name. His eyes glistened greedily as he saw the big bunch of hay that covered the spring trap. A few more steps and he was passing under the deadfall gate.

Then Toni spied the ranch and the corral. A shuddering gasp shook her slight frame as she saw him walk beneath the deadfall.

"Malibu!" she shouted, but too late. The great gate crashed down, making him a prisoner.

Toni ran to the great gate and exerted all her young strength to lift it, but it would not give an inch. But Malibu had moved close to her now, so she could reach out and pat him.

"Quiet, now!" she hissed. "Don't you worry. I'll get you out!"

Furiously she set to work unslashing and removing some of the bars, at the same time whispering low words of encouragement to the frightened buck. But Bergman and Joe had heard the noise of the great gate. They had a prisoner, and chuckled gleefully, but they did not hurry.

Bergman raised his lantern and started as he heard the crashing of timber. The two men saw a slight figure and rushed forward. Someone was tearing down the walls of the corral and trying to let a great big deer escape.

Toni heard them and worked desperately to make an opening for Malibu. "Malibu, come on—jump!" she screamed, heedless of her own danger.

The buck gathered himself together for the jump to freedom. With a flying leap he went up and through the hole that the girl had made in the corral. Toni shouted with delight, then fearlessly turned to face the two men who were hurrying towards her.

Bergman lost no time. Reaching Toni, he fired at Malibu, only to have his aim deflected as the girl knocked the rifle up in the air. The buck disappeared among the trees.

Livid with rage, Bergman turned on the girl. He dropped his rifle and gripped the girl by the collars of her coat. His evil face leered at her.

"I'll teach you to interfere with—"

But he never finished his sentence because there came a terrified scream from Joe.

"Look out!" The little man's face was convulsed with fear.

Toni and Bergman turned, and there, crouched on a fallen tree-trunk, was Gato, in feline readiness to spring to the aid of Toni and Malibu.

It was the girl who saved the situation. She pushed Bergman away.

"Do as I tell you!" she ordered the two cowering men. "Maybe I can keep him away from you."

Gato was snarling and hissing furiously, fully ready to tear to pieces the creatures who had threatened his mistress. Slowly, inch by inch, the two men backed warily away from the puma.

"Get back to your cabin, but move slowly!" Toni whispered.

Edging backwards as rapidly as possible, the two men barely drew breath until they felt themselves at a safe distance from the gleaming eyes fixed hungrily upon them. Although the snarl had left Gato's face, he was not wholly pacified by Toni's endearing whispers. Uncurling himself gracefully, he jumped past the girl and bounded after the men.

Arms waving madly, Bergman, on the steps of the cabin, shouted:

"Let me in, there! Get out of my way!" And, yanking the other back, he bolted into the cabin, with Joe close on his heels.

Gato prowled around the cabin for a few more minutes, then satisfied that he had scared off his mistress' attackers, he moved towards the woods.

"Gato! Gato!" called the girl.

The puma hesitated and turned his head. Somewhere in the woods was his friend, Malibu.

Toni saw the mountain cat and she moved towards him, but Gato bounded away down the trail. Often she called their names as she wended her way through the trees, but she did not see them again that night, though both were lurking among the trees.

And that night Malibu again trotted the snow-covered forest—unharned, majestic, and kingly in his wild beauty.

Bob Alden's face lit up when Toni appeared the next morning at the rangers' headquarters. She knew from the ardent intent of his gaze that she was far from being forgotten. The knowledge gave her a strange thrill.

She told him all about the return of Gato and Malibu and how Bergman was trapping deer.

"Trapping native deer is a serious offence," he commented. "I'll have a few words to say to that skunk. Another break, and he'll lose his licence." He smiled at her. "Say, I'm glad you're back. How's your dad?"

"Dad's fine and the book's a great success. They want him to write a sequel."

"I'd like to see him again." Boldly he took her arm. "And I'd like to walk home with you."

"And I should like you to walk home with me," she answered with simple coquetry. "I'm so glad to be back in the forests."

Mary Lawrence Decides

IN the studio of her apartment on Riverside Drive, Mary Lawrence, the beautiful, but spoiled darling of New York's younger set, was putting the finishing touches to the painting of a cowboy riding a bucking horse. Standing back, she surveyed her handiwork critically, then shook her fair head.

"No, Ethel, it's really not what it should be," she sighed.

"Nonsense, my dear," returned the other girl. "It's splendid, and I'm sure the Academy will think so, too."

Somehow Mary felt a little annoyed. Her friend's flattery did not have the ring of sincerity about it and, to tell the truth, she was getting a little tired of meaningless compliments.

"As it happens, this isn't for the Academy," she announced. "It's for my Uncle Jed. I thought if I could send him a painting to show him that I'm doing something really worth while here, he might stop bothering me. He writes every day or so, insisting that I come West."

Ethel laughed.

"You? In the West? My dear, how absurd!"

"But that's not all," went on Mary, throwing her brush down and leading the way over to the settee. "This morning I had a letter saying he has sent his foreman, Buck Benson, to try and persuade me to change my mind. And there was another note, too, from this foreman or whatever he is, telling me that he has arrived in New York, and asking when he may call!"

"Do you know this Benson person at all?" asked Ethel, raising her eyebrows.

"No; but I think I have a picture of him somewhere, taken with Uncle Jed at the ranch." Mary went over to a bureau, and began to rummage about in a drawer. "Ah, here it is."

She looked at the snapshot of the two in their wide sombreros, studded chaps, and sagging gun-belts, and a smile came to her lips. Ethel, when the picture was handed to her, laughed out loud.

"But, my dear, what are you going to do? You can't possibly have that kind of person hanging around. People will laugh at you—oh, it's too ridiculous! You can't possibly see him!"

Mary looked thoughtful, and a sudden gleam came to her eyes.

"Yes, I'll see him," she said slowly. "And people will laugh—but not at me!"

Already she was beginning to feel hostility against this man whom her uncle had sent. She had no intention of leaving her art studies in New York for some dead-and-alive ranch in the wilds of California, and a plan for humiliating this unknown messenger was forming in her mind. "I'm going to give a party, and Mr. Benson will be the guest of honour. I'll get Tom and Nellie to come, and the Hoyts and the rest of our gang, but as I want our visitor from the wide, open spaces to feel quite at home, we'll make it a real Western party!"

"You mean—"

"I mean we'll all dress up as cowboys and cowgirls, just to poke fun at him."

The party was arranged for the next evening, and by the time Benson was due to arrive, Mary's apartment was filled with young people, garbed in Western clothes, who were passing the time in a most un-Western manner—chatting, drinking cocktails, and dancing to the strains of a jazz band.

At last the door opened and Mandy, Mary's coloured maid, came in.

"He's here, Miss Mary," she announced.

Mary put down her cocktail.

"All right, show him in, Mandy."

Mandy's round, ebony-black face held rather a bewildered look.

"Don't you think you ought to see him alone, first?" she inquired.

"Certainly not!"

"But, Miss Mary—"

"Didn't you hear what I said?" snapped Mary. "Show him in, Mandy!"

"Yes, 'm," murmured Mandy, turning away obediently.

"Now, let's have that Western music," Mary told the band leader. "Listen, everybody—nature's nobleman has arrived!"

The band struck up "The Cowboy's Lament," and a chorus of cheers and jeers arose from the guests. Then the door opened, and as the expected visitor entered, the noise and the laughter died down and a faint gasp of astonishment went up. For, although the newcomer was a big man, darkly bronzed, and with the stamp of the outdoors upon him, he was immaculately clad in evening dress, and instead of appearing uncouth and ill-at-ease he seemed remarkably self-possessed. He looked around at the company, at the made-up "cowgirls," at the white-faced, absurdly soft-looking "cowboys," and his mouth twisted in a faint smile of amused contempt.

"That's Miss Lawrence, sittin' on the arm of the chair," Mandy told him.

He strode across to Mary and regarded her gravely.

"Miss Lawrence? Let me introduce myself—I'm Buck Benson. I hope I'm not intruding." He spoke with a Western drawl, and his teeth gleamed white and even in the brown of his face.

He was so different from the kind of man she had expected that, for a moment, Mary felt a loss.

"Not in the least," she murmured. "I trust that you feel quite at home."

Once again his keen, deep-set grey eyes flickered over the roomful of New Yorkers.

"If I'd known of this masquerade I would have postponed my visit," he said.

"We both seem to be masquerading, Mr. Benson," she returned.

He came a little closer. So big was he that he seemed to dwarf everybody else in the room.

"I don't want to spoil your party, but I'd like to speak to you alone, if convenient."

"I'm afraid you're wasting your time," said Mary, with a smile. "I've heard all Uncle Jed's arguments, and I tell you as I've often told him—I will never go West. My career is here."

"Your what?" he inquired.

She detected the sarcasm in his voice, and flushed.

"My career. I'm an artist." She led the way over to the studio. "Maybe you'd like to see a sample of my work."

She showed him the painting of the bucking horse, but instead of making any comment he just stood and looked at it, and shook his head.

"Well, what do you think of it?" she asked.

Although a lot of the details in the cowboy's dress were all wrong, Buck Benson could see that the painting, as a whole, was really quite good, but he was determined not to give her any encouragement. From the first he had sized her up. This niece of old Jed's had been spoiled all her life. Well, she wouldn't get any flattery from him! What she needed was to be put in her place.

"Frankly, I think it's terrible!" he told her. "Painting broncs is an art you'll never major in, Miss Lawrence. That is, unless you come West and study and—"

"Perhaps you had better say what you came to say," interrupted Mary coldly. "I'm sure it has nothing whatever to do with art."

Buck turned to her.

"I did have quite a speech made up, but I'll cut it short. Your uncle is a very sick man, and unless you go to him quickly, I'm afraid it'll be too late."

A look of surprise and concern crossed Mary's face. Although she had only seen her uncle on his rare visits East, she felt a genuine affection for the old man.

"He never mentioned anything about being ill in his letters," she said.

"No, he was in hopes you'd come without that," was the answer.

It was at that very moment that Mandy came in, holding something in her hand. "Telegram for you, Miss Lawrence."

Mary took it. Before she opened it she knew what she was going to find. Coming, as it had, just when they were talking about Uncle Jed's illness, she felt a strange flash of intuition, and she knew she would never see the old man again.

"There'll be no answer, Mandy."

"Yes, ma'am."

The print danced before Mary's eyes as she read it. She handed it to the big Westerner, and he took it without a word.

"Oh, I'm so sorry!" broke out Mary, her eyes bright with sudden tears. "I didn't know. I'll start West as soon as possible."

Buck Benson's face hardened.

"There's no hurry now. I'll take care of the funeral—and I don't think it'll make a bit of difference to Jed whether you come or not."

Turning on his heel he made for the door. Mary followed him, whilst the guests looked on, silent and self-conscious. Suddenly he stopped and turned to her again.

"On second thoughts," he told her curtly, "you being his only heir, it'll probably be necessary for you to be there at the reading of the will. I'll let you know the date. Good-night, Miss Lawrence."

Mary's eyes flashed.

"I'll be there, if it's only for the pleasure of discharging you!" she cried out after him.

When the door had closed on his broad back she broke down, and dropping into a chair and waving off her girl friends who tried to comfort her, she sobbed as though her heart would break.

The Runaway

ON a morning when the Californian sun lay hot on sagebrush and cactus, and there was an electric sparkle in the air, Buck Benson drove a buckboard down the Los Gatos trail towards the railroad station where he was meeting Mary Lawrence's train. Beside him sat Ben, a lean, bow-legged cowboy with ears that stuck out from his head and a solemn expression on his perpetually puckered face.

With the reins gripped in one large, capable fist, Buck held the two half-wild broncs to a brisk trot. He was late already, but that was not worrying him much. At the moment he was more concerned with affairs back at the ranch.

Since Jed's death the management had naturally passed to him, and in the last few days a lot of the young stock ranging on the river section had mysteriously disappeared. That meant only one thing. Rustlers. In his own mind he was pretty sure who the rustlers were, but the trouble was that he could not prove it. If only he could catch them red-handed!

"How come you handle wild broncs as easy as you handle men?" jerked out Ben, as the foreman swung the team round a sharp bend in the precipitous trail.

"I understand broncs and men," returned Buck.

"Ever try your hand with women?"

Buck thought of Mary Lawrence.

"When I do I'll use both hands! Giddap!"

When, some time later, they clattered into the station yard, they found Mary seated on a trunk on the platform. Mandy was standing behind her, beside an enormous pile of luggage. Leaving Ben to hold the horses, Buck jumped down and went forward.

He took off his sombrero.

"How d'you do, Miss Lawrence. Sorry I'm late."

Mary, tapping her heel on the platform impatiently, looked up at him.

"So you finally got here. Where is the car?"

"Car? Oh, that's it!" Buck grinned, and pointed to the ramshackle buckboard. "And those things attached to it in front," he explained politely, "are horses." He stared in amazement at the luggage. "Are all these yours?"

"Of course," was the indignant reply.

Buck shrugged, and began to help the station agent load the trunks and suitcases on to the buckboard. A place was found for Mandy between the luggage and the front seat. Buck turned to help Mary up, and then swung on to the seat beside her.

"These are my horses, I presume?" she asked.

"Yes."

"Then I'll drive them," she announced.

Buck caught Ben's eye, and the cowboy was frantically motioning "No!"

"Listen, miss," said Buck; "if you haven't been driving for quite a while, this is hardly the team for you to start with."

"I'll thank you to mind your own business, Mr. Benson!" flared the girl, and with the words she seized the reins and the whip.

"Are you sure you know what you're doing?" queried Buck.

Mary's only answer was to settle herself more firmly in the seat, and with her chin in the air she took a fresh grip of the whip. The near-side horse rolled his eye wickedly, and his ears went back.

Buck began to feel a grudging admiration for the girl beside him. She looked mighty pretty, with her fair hair and her clear eyes and determined little chin. She was spoiled and stubborn as a mule, but she had plenty of spirit, and he liked spirit, whether in a horse or a woman.

"All right," he told Ben. "Let 'em go!"

Ben let go, and jumped back as the broncs reared and plunged forward. Mandy screamed, and the next instant the light wagon went bouncing and swaying out of the yard and on to the trail in a cloud of dust, both horses pounding along at a mad gallop. Buck glanced back, and saw Ben leap on to the back of a saddle horse which had been tied to a hitch-rail in the yard, and start in pursuit, apparently with the idea of rescuing some of the luggage that was being shaken off and scattered along the trail.

Mary, her face white, her teeth clenched, sawed desperately at the reins, but the tough-mouthed and only half-broken broncs had taken the bit between their teeth and were bolting. Buck knew that if he took the lines from her he could soon bring the team under control, but, instead of that, he kept his seat and said nothing. This part of the trail ran fairly straight, and it was an instinct with horses, even bolting horses, to keep to a trail. Before they came to the first bend he would take over, but not yet. She had wanted to drive, and drive she should. This would teach her a lesson!

Suddenly, however, to Buck's horror, one of the reins broke, and the free end flipped back into Mary's face. The broncs, now under no control at all, shot forward at an even faster rate, whilst Mary, clutching the one useless rein, gave a little scream of fright.

Ahead of them, a bare hundred yards away and getting rapidly closer, was a sharp bend in the trail, and Buck knew that unless the runaway team were stopped, or at least slowed down before reaching it, the buckboard would be overturned and smashed to kindling wood. There was only one thing to do, and Buck Benson did it. Without a moment's hesitation he stepped over the dashboard and on to the wagon-tongue between the galloping broncs, and began to edge his perilous way forward. One false step meant being dragged down and mangled under the thundering wheels.

At last he was far enough forward to catch the dangling length of line. Swinging himself astride the nearside horse he gathered both reins, and pulling back with all the steely strength of his big arms he brought the sweating broncs to a trot, and from that to a halt.

"Mah goodness gracious!" moaned Mandy, as Buck dropped off and led the team to the side of the trail. "I don't want no more rides like that. I'se walkin' next time."

Buck looked up at Mary. "Throw me that line!" he ordered curtly.

Mary tossed him the broken line which she was still holding.

"That was splendid!" she told him. "I want to—to—"

"You want to be your age, and not a stuck-up snob," he cut in, starting to splice the rein. She flushed angrily, but said nothing, and when he had finished he climbed up beside her again and thrust the reins into her hand. "Here, take this line and drive. You asked for it."

"I will not!" she blazed, furious.

"All right, I'll throw 'em away. Giddap."

As the team sprang forward again he made as though he were going to toss the reins loose.

"No!" screamed Mary, snatching at them.

By now most of the steam had been taken out of the broncs, and Buck knew they would give no more trouble, so for the rest of the way he made Mary drive. Not once on the long journey did she speak to him, but sat there in stony silence, stiff-backed and tight-mouthed.

When they arrived at the El Fanita ranch-house they found a group of cowboys waiting for them. As Mary brought the team to a stop the lounging, hard-bitten range-riders eyed her with interest and curiosity. Buck jumped off and helped her down.

"Gentlemen, may I present Miss Mary Lawrence."

The men grinned, raised their hats and looked rather self-conscious.

"You are all personal friends of Mr. Benson's, I presume?" Mary asked, looking them over.

"We sure are," assented some of the cowboys emphatically, whilst others nodded and smiled.

"Then consider yourselves discharged the moment I take possession!" flashed out Mary. "Have my luggage brought into the house immediately," she told Buck, with an imperious toss of her head. "Come, Mandy."

And with the men gaping after her in astonished dismay she stalked off into the house, followed by the obedient Mandy.

Buck, stunned by this unexpected bombshell, could only stand and watch her go. Then, hands on hips, he shook his head sadly.

"Well, can you beat that?" he muttered.

The New Boss

THE next morning found Buck seated before a table on the porch engaged in the unpleasant job of figuring out the men's time and writing their pay checks before dismissing them. He had always got on well with his men. They were a hard-working, cheery bunch, and he hated to see them kicked out suddenly like this. The time-book showed that one of them, Murphy, so far from having anything coming, was twenty dollars short.

When Murphy heard that he shook his head sorrowfully.

"Guess I'll have to leave my saddle. I ain't got no twenty bucks. Walkin' sure goin' to be tough, though."

"Don't worry about it," Buck told him. "We'll see what we can do for you."

"Thanks, Buck," grinned Murphy, gratefully.

"I sure never expected she'd fire all us old hands," put in Ben, rolling a cigarette. "We're going to miss you a heap, Buck."

"You needn't feel so sorry for yourself," grunted Buck. "I'm fired, too."

At that moment a buggy drove up before the porch, and a tall, elderly man alighted. It was Radcliffe, the lawyer, and Buck remembered then that this was the day the will was to be read.

"Hallo, Mr. Radcliffe," greeted Buck. "Miss Lawrence is expecting you."

"Howdy. Howdy." Brief-case under his arm, the lawyer came on to the porch and looked around at the group of cowboys. "Well, what's the matter with all you boys?" he demanded. "You look and act like you were going to another funeral."

"We are," returned Buck grimly. "We're burying a lot of pleasant memories to-day. We're all fired."

Radcliffe laughed.

"Well, the newcomer has ideas of her own, eh?"

"That's not funny to us!" growled Buck.

"Come on, Buck," said the lawyer. "I want you to introduce me to Miss Lawrence." When the foreman hesitated he took him by the arm. "Come on, come on," he urged, smiling.

Buck did not feel like meeting the girl at the moment, but he led the way into the living-room and sent Mandy to fetch Mary. When Mary's step was heard outside the door Buck, with a muttered: "Say, I haven't got any business here," started to leave, but the lawyer stopped him.

"Now don't get excited," soothed Radcliffe. "Everything's going to be all right." He thrust the brief-case into Buck's hands. "Just hold this, will you?" Then he turned to greet the girl.

Mary was feeling and was looking in a better temper than when Buck had last seen her. She had slept more soundly than ever before in her life, and the zestful air had put a keen edge on her appetite. She was beginning to admit that perhaps the West might prove to be rather a wonderful place after all—if only something interesting would happen to relieve the dullness.

"Well, well, so this is Miss Lawrence—Mary Lawrence," broke out the lawyer, going towards her. "My, my, but you're more beautiful even than your uncle said you were. And I've heard about you ever since you were knee-high to a grasshopper. Let me look at you."

She turned round for his inspection, and seeing Buck, frowned.

"It seems like you ought to be a little girl," chuckled Radcliffe. He led her over to theavenport. "Sit down right here, and we'll get this business over in a hurry. Oh—er—Buck, bring my brief-case, will you?" When Buck came over the lawyer motioned him to sit down. Awkwardly Buck sat down next to Mary. "Now I won't have to read so loud and we'll all be more comfortable," announced Radcliffe.

Mary got up.

"Is it necessary to have a witness?" she inquired stiffly.

"No-o-o," murmured Radcliffe.

"Then I consider Mr. Benson's presence unnecessary," she said.

Buck started up.

"I told you I didn't want—"

The lawyer put out a restraining hand and turned to Mary.

"But, you see, Buck is not a witness. Fact is, he's mentioned in your uncle's will."

The Will

"WITH your permission," went on Radcliffe, taking a document out of the brief-case, "I'll skip all superfluous matter and get right to the first bequest." He cleared his throat and began to read:

"To my only living blood relation, Mary Lawrence. I do hereby bequeath all my worldly possessions providing and according as set forth herewith.

"One. The property known as El Fanita Ranch, comprising sixty-two sections, or thirty-nine thousand, six hundred and eighty acres.

"Two. All money as is deposited in the State Bank, amounting to three hundred and twenty-six thousand, eight hundred and forty dollars."

The lawyer smiled at Mary.

"So you see, your uncle has made it possible for you to be a very wealthy young lady."

"And when may I take possession of my inheritance?" Mary wanted to know. Radcliffe scratched his neck thoughtfully.

"Well, let me see—I guess Buck will have to answer that."

Mary and Buck looked at him in surprise.

"You see," he explained, "it says here, 'In the endeavour to safeguard the interests of my heir, Mary Lawrence, it is a condition precedent to this agreement that she live continuously for at least one year at El Fanita Ranch, and I hereby appoint my foreman; Buck Benson, guardian of my heir and estate to serve without restraint until such time as he believes my heir, Mary Lawrence, capable of managing her inheritance.'"

There was a moment's silence, then Mary got up.

"May I read that last part?" she asked in a small voice.

"Certainly, certainly, my dear," agreed Radcliffe handing over the will. Buck felt dazed.

"Does this mean that I'm still the boss?" he demanded. "That she can't do anything unless I say so?"

"It sure does. Old Jed would never have rested in peace unless he knew it would be that way." The lawyer turned to Mary. "Well, Miss Lawrence, is everything satisfactory? Do you accept the terms of the will?"

Mary nodded.

"Certainly."

Soon afterwards the lawyer took his departure, and when he had gone Buck went across to Mary.

"This will," he said, rather at a loss for words. "I—it puts me in rather an awkward position. I assure you I knew nothing about it."

Mary smiled. And when she smiled like that, Buck forgot a lot of the hard things he had been thinking about her.

"Now that I understand your official position, Mr. Benson," she said, "don't you think we should be at least friendly enemies?"

"Friendly enemies? Why enemies?"

"I'll ask you the same." Again she flashed out that dazzling smile. "You know, I think I'm going to like the West."

Buck came closer, his grey eyes looking into her blue ones.

"You know, I think I could like you an awful lot if you'd just be yourself," he said.

"Thanks for the compliment," laughed Mary. "I'll try!"

Buck hesitated.

"I guess you didn't mean what you said about firing all my boys?"

"No; I've changed my mind," confessed Mary. "I was feeling furious at everybody at the time, and I had to take it out of somebody. I was sorry about it afterwards."

"Thanks!" grinned Buck, turning away. "Then I guess I'll go and break the good news to the boys right away."

The Rustler

IT was about five weeks later that Buck, riding along by the northern boundary of the ranch to see if there was still plenty of feed in that section, noticed the hoofmarks of a shod horse. Puzzled, he swung his horse, Silver, round, and followed the tracks up the hillside. They were fresh imprints, and could not have been made by one of his own riders as he had sent all the men to round up some steers on the southern side.

On the hard, burnt ground of the hill-top the tracks were hard to follow, but Buck's hawk eyes missed nothing. He saw where a stone had been kicked out of place, where a bunch of grass had been trampled, and he followed the trail till it wound down into a draw where sage-brush and cactus grew thick, then up to the top of a rise.

Suddenly he caught a glimpse of movement on the plain below, and in a flash he wheeled Silver behind a clump of tall bushes where he could watch unseen. And as he watched, Buck Benson's eyes narrowed, and he hitched forward his Colt .44.

About a half mile away a man was hazing a small bunch of two-year-olds before him, making for the wild country that lay to the north-east of the El Fanita. So this was the way the rustlers had been working! Sneaking off a few head at a time.

A thin smile creased the corners of the foreman's mouth. For a long time he'd been wanting to catch the mangy thieves red-handed, and at last luck had been kind to him. Spurring his horse forward, and keeping under cover as much as he could, Buck started in pursuit. By this means he managed to halve the distance between them before the rustler saw him. Once the thief caught sight of the foreman's big grey, however, he wheeled and fled, with Buck after him.

Silver, stretching out into a raking gallop, gradually overhauled the rustler's pony, and as Buck got closer he recognised the man.

"Dick Brady!" he muttered. "I knew it. The king-pin of the whole bunch!"

Suddenly the fleeing rustler turned in the saddle, and two shots rang out. Dust spurted by Silver's flying hoofs. Buck's mouth tightened and he fired back, but Brady had crashed into the cover of a cottonwood thicket and was soon lost from view. Heedless of the branches that whipped his face, Buck followed, and when he emerged on the other side, he saw Brady had doubled back and was heading for the rocks and gorges that bordered the swift flowing Thunder River.

Grimly Buck kept after him. Again Brady fired at him, and again missed. Buck raised his gun, but changed his mind. No use wasting shots when the range was too long; he'd wait till he got closer. Brady couldn't get away. He had him cornered against the river.

The foreman, however, had not allowed for the rustler's craftiness, for when he had nearly reached the precipitous gorge Brady flung himself from his horse, ran forward, dropped his gun, and dived into the swirling waters far below. Galloping up, Buck was just in time to see him striking out for the opposite bank.

Buck's brain moved fast. He saw that the swift stream was carrying Brady along, and that the rustler would be swept around the bend before he could reach that other bank. There was just one chance to head him off, and that was to jump the gorge at the Devil's Leap—a spot where the river narrowed and the sheer sides of the gorge leaned towards each other till their edges were a bare thirty feet apart.

Desperately Buck raced along. Silver's pounding hoofs striking sparks from the rocks. Straight at the gap he spurred. If any horse in the world could clear that canyon, with its steep approach and treacherous take-off, Silver could.

Faster! Faster! The gap yawned before him.

"Come on, old boy!" he urged. He felt Silver's muscles bunch under him as the grey gathered himself together; then he was soaring through the air and had landed cleanly on the other side.

"You beauty!" Buck muttered, leaning forward to pat the silky neck. "Thanks to you, I've got Mr. Brady right where I want him." And cramping Silver's head round, he started to find a way down to the spot where he knew the rustler must land.

Mary Flouts Her Guardian

AS it happened, there was somebody else in the vicinity of the Devil's Leap that afternoon, and that was Mary Lawrence. The beauty of the rugged cliffs and flowing water fascinated her, but that was not the only reason for her presence.

Buck's iron grip fastened on Brady's wrist, and his right came round in a smashing blow

Buck, fearing that she might come to harm if she went riding unaccompanied in this dangerous, canyon-scored spot, had told her to keep away from it, and that had made her more determined than ever to visit it at every opportunity. This was the fifth day running she had come here.

She was lazing on the sun-warmed rocks by the water's edge when she heard shots some way off on the far side of the river. Thinking it was only Buck or one of the men out after grouse, she took no notice, but soon afterwards she was startled by a cry of "Help!" And looking up she saw a man struggling desperately in mid-stream. Caught in the eddies of the strong current, he was plainly exhausted.

For a moment Mary hesitated, then she ran to where she had tethered her horse in the shade of some elders, and snatched the rope from the saddle-horn. Again came that half-choked cry. Stumbling in her haste she hurried back to the bank, and swinging the riata round her head the way she had seen the punchers do, she flung it out with all her strength. The loop fell close enough to the struggling man for him to catch it, and in a few minutes Mary had hauled him to the edge and helped him out. He lay for a bit, getting his strength back, then rose to his feet.

"Thanks a lot!" he gasped. "I was pretty near finished."

Mary saw that he was tall and dark, with a handsome face, marred by a peculiar expression in his brown eyes. At the same time, from the corner of her eye, she saw Buck and the easily recognised Silver scrambling down the cliff face towards them.

"I think you'll be all right till Mr. Benson and I can get you to the ranch," she said.

"Benson?" He looked startled and, following her gaze, saw the approaching Buck. "No—I can't let him find me here!" he jerked out.

"Why not?" returned Mary. "He's my foreman."

"You?" He stared at her. "You are the owner of the El Fanita Ranch?"

"Why, yes."

A strange glint came into his eyes.

"Listen, I'm an officer of the law on the trail of cattle thieves," he said quickly. "My name is Brady, but nobody must know my real purpose here, not even Benson. He thinks I'm a rustler, and although I could easily explain matters to him my hands are tied. I'm trusting you not to betray my confidence. You'll help me, won't you?"

Mary nodded and, as Buck dismounted and strode up to them, she turned to the foreman.

"Mr. Brady here has been hurt," she told him. "You must help me get him to the ranch."

"You needn't worry about taking him to the ranch," rasped Buck. "He's going to gaol!"

"But there must be some mistake," put in Mary. "I can vouch for Mr. Brady's integrity."

"Then the mistake was on your part," retorted Buck. "This man is a rustler. I caught him running some of your cattle off." He grabbed Brady's arm. "Come along, feller!"

Mary pushed herself between them.

"I hoped it wouldn't be necessary for me to make any explanations," she said haughtily, "but the truth is that Mr. Brady is my friend." Something in her seemed to delight in opposing Buck, and the fabrication rose glibly to her lips. "He has been in my employ for the last month, and anything he has done has been with my knowledge and consent."

Brady's eyes gleamed with triumph, and Buck's face hardened.

"May I ask what his official capacity is?" demanded the foreman.

"I employed him as special investigator to check the assets of the ranch," was Mary's quickly thought-up answer. "I must insist that you don't interfere with him."

Buck reddened with anger.

"I think I can do any investigating you want done; and as your guardian I demand that you discharge this fellow immediately!"

"And if I refuse?" asked Mary, raising her chin.

"You won't refuse!" returned Buck grimly, and turning his back on them he swung up on Silver and rode off without another word.

Brady watched him go.

"Maybe, as he's your guardian, I'd better keep away from you," he suggested doubtfully.

"I'll show him he can't browbeat me!" flared Mary. "You shall stay at the ranch as my guest."

"You're mighty kind," drawled Brady. He gave her a long, appraising look that brought the colour to her face. "Shall I get your horse?"

"Please."

As they moved off together, Mary felt a thrill of excitement. Although there was something about the man beside her that she could not wholly trust, the adventure appealed to her.

Especially as it meant antagonising Buck Benson!

Thus it was that Buck, coming out on to the patio of the ranch-house that same evening, was confronted with the sight of Mary and Dick Brady sitting close together on a bench. Not only that, but this man, whom he knew to be a rustler, was strumming on a guitar and singing a love song in a crooning baritone, whilst the girl, with a far-away expression in her eyes, showed every sign of being completely fascinated.

It was too much for Buck. He strode across to them.

"I thought I told you to discharge this man?" he rasped.

"I don't want to do that," murmured Mary. "He plays wonderfully." To infuriate Buck still further she gave Brady a languishing glance. "Besides, I like him."

"Well, by the time I've finished with him he won't be quite so pretty to look at!" gritted the foreman between his clenched teeth; and with the words he seized a fistful of the rustler's shirt and jerked him up off the bench.

With a savage oath, Brady lifted the guitar and aimed a fierce blow at Buck's head. Buck dodged beneath it, caught Brady's wrist and twisted it till the guitar dropped from his grasp. Then he smashed his fist in the rustler's mouth and sent him reeling against the wall. Mary screamed, but this time she had started something it was beyond her power to stop.

With blood trickling from his cut lip and his face contorted in fury, Brady charged back and whipped in a savage blow that landed under Buck's heart with the thud of a horse's kick. Buck staggered, then recovered, and slammed home a left and right that made Brady gasp and hang on desperately.

Resorting to every dirty trick he could think of, the rustler ground the edge of his wrist against Buck's eyes, and then, when he had the foreman half-blinded, tried to butt him under the chin. Up came Buck's fist in a lightning uppercut that ripped Brady's head back.

With the speed of a striking snake Brady's hand went to his gun holster, stark murder staring out of his dark eyes. But Buck was too quick for him, and as the gun leaped to the rustler's fist, Buck's iron grip fastened on Brady's wrist, forced it downwards. The Colt roared deafeningly, and the bullet spattered against the stone floor of the patio. The next instant Buck finished the fight with a terrific right to the jaw that smashed Brady half-senseless to the ground. With his foot he kicked the rustler's gun out of reach.

The fight had brought several of the men on the scene, Ben and Murphy among them.

"Escort this gent to the ranch gate, and see that he keeps going!" ordered Buck.

Ben caught Brady by the collar and pulled him to his feet.

"Come on!"

As the cowboys hustled him off the rustler turned, a baleful gleam in his eye.

"You'll pay plenty for this, Benson!" he snarled.

Wild Cattle

IN the days that followed Mary contrived to see a lot of Dick Brady.

The very fact that her guardian had forbidden Brady to come near the ranch only strengthened her determination to stage a flirtation with the man. Nearly every day she arranged secret meetings.

May 11th, 1935.

and even started to paint his portrait. Although there was a side to Brady that frightened her, she was convinced Buck was mistaken and that Dick was not really a rustler. A bit wild, maybe, but not a thief.

One morning, when the picture was nearly finished, Dick swung down from his horse, where he had been posed motionless for nearly half an hour, and came over to the girl. From some way off came the lowing of cattle and the faint "Yip! Yip!" of the punchers who were herding them, but at the moment neither the man nor the girl took any notice, for they had chosen as their meeting-place a spot that was fairly well screened by trees.

"You're about the best model I've ever had," Mary told him with a smile.

He came close to her, looking down at her. Then, so suddenly that it took her breath away, he clasped her in his arms and kissed her.

"You're wonderful, Mary," he said hoarsely. "Wonderful."

He was tall, good-looking, and in spite of herself she felt his attraction. But she was not in love with him, and she knew she never would be.

"Please, some of my men are coming." She wrenched herself free. "They might see you."

The sound of the moving herd was indeed nearer, and through the trees they caught a glimpse of a milling, jostling mass of cattle.

"All right, I'll go. But will you meet me again to-morrow? By the river, where we first met?" Brady's voice was urgent.

"Well, perhaps," Mary replied. "You see, I'm expecting a visitor—one of my Eastern girl friends—and I'm arranging a dance for her to-morrow night."

"A dance?" Dick's eyes lit up. "You know, I think I'll come to that party."

"But Buck—"

"Don't worry about Buck Benson," returned Dick. "Leave him to me!" He caught his horse and mounted. "Good-bye—till to-morrow." And with a last wave of his hat he cantered off and had soon disappeared from view.

For a while Mary sat musing on his words. What did he mean about Buck? There had been menace in his tone, and in spite of her feud with her guardian she didn't want Buck to come to any harm. And Dick was the desperate type who would stop at nothing once his enmity was aroused.

A crashing in the undergrowth roused her from her reflections, and she looked up, startled, to see three or four steers coming towards her. Apparently they had broken away from the main bunch. One of them, long of horn and wild of eye, came to a halt about a hundred yards off and stood, with lowered head, looking at her.

Mary had a woman's instinctive fear of cattle of all kinds, and with a little cry she turned and ran. To her horror the steer began to trot after her, and as Mary ran faster the beast's trot lengthened into a lumbering gallop. Panic-stricken and spurred on by her fear, she tore blindly along, stumbling and gasping. Headless of the thorns and brush that ripped her clothes, she heard the pounding hoofs gaining on her, and a scream of sheer terror left her lips.

At the same time she became aware of another sound—the faster beat of a galloping horse. She glanced back over her shoulder. Behind the steer, and gaining rapidly on it, was a rider on a white horse. Buck Benson!

Her foot caught against a stone and she fell headlong. Scrambling up, she saw the steer was almost on top of her.

Then horse and rider were alongside, and Buck had dropped from the saddle, caught the end of the brute's horns, and, hanging on with his whole weight, twisted its head round so that it stumbled off at an angle and missed Mary by a few feet. Seizing her opportunity, the terror-stricken girl dashed across to a stunted tree near by and climbed on to the nearest limb.

From this vantage-point she watched breathlessly whilst Buck brought the steer to a standstill, and, using his great strength to lever the long horns downward, wrestled the maddened beast to the ground. When at last he took his weight off its head, the steer scrambled up and ambled meekly off, beaten and cowed.

"Oh, Buck, I was never so glad to see anyone in all my life!" gasped Mary, as the foreman walked over to her.

"You'd have been all right if you had just stood still," he told her, helping her down. "You must never run. Cattle chaso people that run."

"You're telling me!" remarked Mary feelingly.

"Come on, let's go and collect your painting outfit." He whistled, and Silver trotted up obediently. "I'd like to see how you're getting on."

Mary hesitated, but with a grin Buck picked her up, lifted her in front of the saddle as easily as if she had been a child, and swung up behind her. When they reached the easel he looked for a long time at the likeness of Brady which stared up at him from the canvas.

"This rustler must've made a deep impression on you for you to remember him so well," he said slowly. "Looks like he might have posed for it."

Mary coloured.

"He did," she admitted.

"Are you in love with him?" Buck asked in a quiet voice.

The tears sprang to Mary's eyes.

"Oh, Buck, I'm sorry! It isn't because I was in love with him, but I was lonesome—romantic." She began to cry. "And I didn't want you to boss me all the time."

Buck gathered up the easel and the palette and tied them on behind the saddle.

"Here, here, don't cry and get your pretty eyes all red!" he soothed, patting her shoulder. "Barbara won't understand."

Mary looked surprised.

"Barbara?" she ejaculated.

"Yes, she arrived this morning. That's why I was out trying to find you. After all, she's your visitor."

Mary felt a queer little pang of jealousy.

"How is it you call her Barbara so easily?" she wanted to know. "You've always called me Miss Lawrence."

"Oh, I've known her a long time!" he returned casually. "Met her back East at the polo matches. Well, guess we'd better be getting home."

"Leave Buck Benson to Me!"

WHEN Dick Brady left Mary he rode hard, mile after mile, till he reached a certain well-hidden canyon in the wild and rugged country that bordered Los Gatos. Following the dry canyon bed he came at length to the camp which he and his band used as their headquarters. Horses tethered in some bushes nickered at his approach, and three hard-faced men, lounging around a fire, rose to their feet. They looked at him inquiringly.

"Well, did you fix things?" one of them asked.

"I sure did." Brady swung down and came across to them. "Boys, we make our play to-morrow night."

"To-morrow?" One of the men, bow-legged and evil-looking, scowled. "Why wait till to-morrow?"

"They're holding a dance at the ranch-house to-morrow night, that's why," Brady told them. "And you know what the El Fanita dances are like. Every last puncher on the ranch will be there, and they'll have nobody out riding night-herd. Sheriff Corson will probably be there, too, with his deputy and some of his men."

"Huh, I don't see nothin' favourable in that!" grunted the bow-legged one. "He's a tough hombre, that sheriff. I'd sooner he was somewhere's else."

"Don't worry, Steve," said Brady. "I'm going to that dance myself, and before I leave I'm going to let down the corral rails and drive off every saddle horse in the ranch yard."

"You're going?" Steve stared at him in astonishment. "Takin' big chances, ain't you?"

"I'm going to get the girl." Brady grinned. "If things work out the way I think they will, we'll be married by dawn the next morning. I'll have two of the boys waiting at the rocks by the Devil's Leap with a priest from the San Jacinto Monastery."

A tall man whom the others called Hank shook his head and spat.

"Boss, I don't like it," he muttered. "Girls and rustlin' don't mix too good."

Brady's hand went to his gun.

"Who's running this outfit?" he snarled. Then he forced a smile.

"Listen, I'm figuring on driving off every head of stock on that river section at one swoop. I don't reckon on there being any hitch, but if anything did happen to go wrong, as husband of the girl who owns the ranch, I'd be able to straighten everything out."

"He's right," said Steve. "We'd be in the clear. What do you want us to do, boss?"

"You and Hank will come with me," Brady explained. "I'll leave you about half a mile from the ranch-house and go in to fetch the girl myself. She'll be willing all right, and I'll fix it somehow. Shorty and Kergan will be waiting at the Devil's Leap with the priest. Lufe and the rest of the boys will have the whole herd rounded up and moving north, and as soon as the priest has married us, I'll join you. And if Buck Benson and his men trail us, so much the better!"

"How d'you mako that out?" grumbled Hank.

Brady's mouth twisted into a cold grin.

"Did you ever see a better spot for ambushing a posse than the gorge by the Devil's Leap?" he said softly. "We'll be waiting for them. But just one thing—I want you to leave Buck Benson to me!"

Although Mary had been looking forward to seeing her friend again, Barbara had not been at the ranch very many hours before Mary bitterly regretted having invited her. For from the very first moment Buck and Barbara seemed to get on very well together. So well, in fact, that Mary, to her own surprise, found herself being burnt up with jealousy. Only now did she begin to realise what Buck meant to her.

Because she had known Buck in the East, Barbara seemed to look upon him as her own private property, and flirted with him at every opportunity. She treated him with the familiarity of an old friend, and was continually saying: "Buck darling, don't you remember that day at Meadowbrook?" or: "I shall never forget the time that we first met, will you?" until Mary was heartily sick of the sound of her voice.

Had Mary but known, Barbara meant nothing at all to Buck, but she amused him, and though at times he felt rather embarrassed, he was too polite to rebuff her. The climax came the night of the dance; a climax that played directly into Dick Brady's hands.

Except for a few dances which the sheriff and some of the men claimed, it seemed to Mary that Barbara had nearly every dance with Buck. Naturally, Buck danced with Mary, too, but when he did, Mary felt so furious that she made matters worse by treating him distantly and snubbing him. Buck, unaware of the real reason, took it as a sign of her usual hostility towards him, and for the rest of the night kept out of her way.

The night was nearly over, and most of the dancers were getting tired, when Mary, strolling out on to the back veranda for a breath of fresh air, came upon Buck and Barbara sitting together in the shadows. She had no intention of eavesdropping, but even as she turned to go she saw Barbara put her arms round Buck's neck and heard the sound of a kiss. Head in the air, her face flaming, Mary stalked off and out on to the patio as far away from them as she could get.

In the east the sky was beginning to turn pearl grey with the approaching dawn, and a cool breath of air fanned her cheek. Suddenly someone close by called her softly by name.

"Mary."

Startled, she looked round. Then Dick Brady was beside her.

"Dick, you shouldn't have come!" she gasped.

"Why not?" Brady laughed, and pulled her gently to him behind a large shrub. "I said I'd come, didn't I?"

"It will only cause trouble," Mary whispered. "If Buck and the sheriff

"I had to see you," broke in Dick. "You know I'm crazy about you. Look, I've got a horse waiting for you. And a priest. We'll be married—at once!"

His voice was husky and urgent, and Mary felt herself carried away by the glamour of it all. Still, she would not have listened if it had not been for the thought of Barbara and Buck. She was feeling hurt and wounded, and, obeying a sudden impulse, she caught Dick's arm.

"All right. I'll come. But wait for me a minute. I can't leave dressed like this."

She hurried off to her room, changed into her riding things, and scribbled a note which she gave to Mandy.

"I want you to give this to Mr. Benson," she told the surprised maid. "Not now. Not for at least an hour. Do you understand?"

"Why, yes, ma'am." Mandy's eyes were two round saucers. "But, mah goodness, what ever is you aimin' to do?"

"Never mind now. And don't forget—give that note to Mr. Benson in an hour's time. Not before."

"Yes, ma'am."

Creeping downstairs, Mary left by a side door and rejoined Brady unobserved. Together they stole softly from the patio, and were soon mounted and riding away.

The Fight on the Ledge.

AFTER Mary had gone, Mandy felt very troubled. The more she thought about it, the stranger did Mary's actions seem. And at last, in spite of Mary's instructions, she decided to wait no longer, but to give the note to Buck. She found him talking to the sheriff, and when he ripped the note open and read it his mouth tightened.

"Dear Buck"—he read—"I have left with Dick for the spot by the river where he and I first met. It is useless for you to follow us, for by the time you get this note we shall have been married."

"MARY."

"How long is it since she left?" rapped out Buck.

"About fifteen minutes, I guess," replied the frightened maid. "Maybe a little more."

At that moment a cowboy stumbled into the room. His face was streaked with dust and sweat, and he limped from a bullet wound in the ankle.

"Rustlers!" he gasped. "Down on the river section! They've got the whole darned herd rounded up! They winged me. Couldn't do anythin' on my own, there was too many of 'em."

Immediately all was pandemonium.

Sanctuary

WITH daybreak the puma and the deer went their various ways. There was some queer bond of understanding between them. Perhaps they knew that their lives were different, and that it was impossible for them to remain together always—one was a hunter and the other the hunted. But they knew now each other's haunts.

Some weeks later Malibu came upon a heard of does, who turned to stare at the new cavalier who had come within their midst. The big buck, the master of the doe herd, resented the presence of a younger rival, and charged at Malibu. There was a great crashing noise as their heads struck together, their horns locking.

Malibu was young and very strong, whilst the old buck was big and heavy; and, after a titanic battle, Malibu became the master of the doe herd. And soon, on a day when a light snow was falling, the young buck found shelter for himself and the doe he had chosen. Set in between some boulders and trees, it was ideally located on the crest of a small knoll.

Then, as time passed, the snow melted and vanished from the ground, and the beauty of summer was again in the forest, with its green trees and wild flowers in full bloom. Now the shelter housed a new-born fawn. Malibu watched it proudly hour after hour as it lay nursing by the side of its mother.

One day as he was leaving the shelter to plunge into the forest, the doe, after a minute of indecision, trotted along with him. The fawn watched them for a few moments, then darted after them.

In the woods that day, Bergman's helper, Joe, was engaged in the task of tying a bunch of carrots to a piece of rawhide hanging to a tree. Close by Bergman deftly attached a gun to a neighbouring shrub, then, standing at the butt, he sighted off to get a bead on the carrots.

"If the rangers get wise," mumbled Joe, "we'll get gaol."

"If they find out!" sneered Bergman. "Besides, we can't stay here and starve. Then pesky rangers have corralled most of the deer in the preserved areas, cuss 'em!"

Malibu and his little family nibbled busily at the tender grasses as they wandered through the thicket. Then, raising her head towards the low branches, the doe's eyes lit on the carrots. She stared at them, moved closer, snuffing around at them suspiciously with a backward glance at Malibu and the fawn.

Gradually she became convinced it was safe to eat them. Putting up her head to nibble at them, she jerked them to one side. Simultaneously there came the loud report of a rifle.

At the base of the tree the doe crumpled and fell to the ground, mortally wounded, her last agonised glance searching for her family. Malibu and the fawn ran to her side. It was pitiful to see the grief of the fawn. He glanced at his father in mute question—why was his mother so still? Malibu could only stand there in shocked bewilderment.

The fawn bent and licked its mother's ear. At this Malibu tried to force him aside by nudging him gently with his nose. Instinctively the fawn tried to cling to its mother, but now, Malibu, fearful of what might happen next, pushed the fawn to its feet, then indicated by walking away that his son must follow.

From the shelter of high grasses Malibu looked back. Two men had appeared and were stooping over the dead doe. The buck knew those men, and his head lowered as if he would charge them, then he looked at the shivering fawn and nosed the little fellow to move towards the high ground.

Lonely and disheartened, they moved over the boulders, and when night had fallen approached the Martin cabin.

They vaulted the low hedge and stopped at a point just between some trees, and Malibu carefully inspected the house. He saw Toni at the window, and was reassured. He put down his head and rubbed noses with the fawn lying on the ground. Instinct told Malibu that here the fawn would be in the best of care. After a while the fawn slept, and with gentle, stealthy tread, Malibu stole away and disappeared into the night.

All night the great buck waited and watched, and with the dawn went to the high ground overlooking the cabin. When he saw Toni with the fawn in her arms, Malibu tossed his head and turned away. No harm would come to the fawn.

Murderers in the Woods

IT was amazing how Malibu and Gato would appear when least expected. Toni would not see them for weeks, and then one day she would see Malibu outlined against the sky, or Gato slinking through the bushes. Nearly always Toni took the fawn with her.

On one occasion Toni had a bathe in a mountain lake and left the fawn and Sang Soo's baby roped together to a peg. Tragedy might have occurred if the watchful Malibu had not appeared on the scene. A rattlesnake slid rapidly over the ground towards the frightened fawn and the crying baby. As the rattles sang out their song of death, Malibu's forehoofs trampled the snake into the ground with deadly violence. The rattler tried to strike back, but the lightning-like hoofs mangled the vicious creature to an untimely end. Like a statue Malibu waited for Toni, and his eyes seemed to warn her to take more care in future.

"Malibu, be careful." She kissed the buck's wet nose. "Soon these woods will be full of men and guns. I know you're smart, but be careful." She pointed to the distance. "Go way up in the mountains and don't come back till there's snow on the ground."

With a last affectionate hug she took Feng Soo and the fawn and left him.

On another occasion Toni was startled by a deep-throated growl, and looked up to see Gato comfortably ensconced in the crotch of a tree, and, after some persuasion, the puma lazily descended to the ground. The girl caressed his velvety back, and soon he was purring like a small motor. For a while the great cat lay with his head on her lap, until a distant shot made both start.

Toni sobered and faced the puma seriously.

"Gato, this is no time for playing. There are men in these woods who have a perfect legal right to shoot you on sight, so go off to the mountains and see what old Malibu is doing."

The puma yawned, licked her face with his tongue, and strolled away. Another shot sounded, and nearer, and that made Gato vanish with the speed of an express train.

That evening Toni met Alden at the look-out tower by appointment. By now there was an understanding between the two young people, and they had the blessing of Mr. Martin.

The girl described her meeting with Gato and how she feared for the safety of the two creatures.

"Things are going to be better," Bob Alden assured her. "For years big city magnates, game-hunters, and other riff-raff have come here to shoot deer, and it's been more like slaughter than anything else. Deer have become so scarce that the reserved areas have been enlarged and protected, whilst the season has been shortened. In two days' time the season closes, and Master Malibu will be safe—Gato will never be safe."

"That rascal Bergman's the worst menace you've got, Bob."

"Yes, he's always poaching and trapping deer, but we can't catch him," Bob nodded grimly. "When we do, out he goes."

They encountered the gentleman in question with a party of hunters, and from the surly expression on Bergman's face knew that the sport had been bad. The game-hunters paid according to the sport. This year the game preserves had robbed Bergman of much of his usual income, and with only two days to go it meant that the rascal would have to find work in a lumber camp instead of drinking himself stupid on his dirty earnings.

Bergman glowered after the ranger and his girl.

"Stuck up young hussy," he told the huntsmen. "Puts on airs. She tried to tame a puma and it robbed my ranch. The pesky brute's about here still, and one day I'll get it."

"How about getting us some deer instead?" someone suggested. "Not much action for the price we're paying."

Bergman looked at them craftily.

"Wait a minute, gents. I'll give you a guarantee. No deer, no pay. How's that?" There was a grunt of agreement. "To-morrow I'll take you to a special place where if you don't get a buck apiece it'll be your fault, not mine."

Stampeding the Herd

THAT night Bergman sat nervously on his horse looking around furtively every now and then as he waited outside the high wire fence which bore the sign "U.S. National Park. Boundary Line. Hunting prohibited. Department of the Interior." In the moonlight he sighted Joe moving behind several does and bucks. Skilfully Joe drove the half tame creatures through the opening in the barrier.

"Nice work, Joe," hissed Bergman, and slipped from his horse. Quickly the two men set to work to replace the wires of the boundary fence. "If these dudes can't hit them they can't hit nothing."

"They're sure tame enough." Joe shook his head. "If the rangers get wise we're—"

"Cut out all that whining cant!" snarled Bergman. "We got to live, ain't we? And if you double-cross me and squeal I'll—"

"Not so loud, Will, not so loud!" begged Joe. "Course I won't squeal. I ain't yeller."

Dawn was just breaking as the herd of deer followed by Bergman and Joe neared the corral.

"I'll keep 'em moving whilst you get the corral gate open," ordered Bergman.

High upon a rock Malibu had halted to watch the scene that was taking place before him. He snorted a little as he saw the deer move into the corral and saw the heavy trap fall into place. The deer were racing round the corral seeking a way of escape.

Joe and Bergman, their task completed, moved towards their own cabin. "Just as soon as we're through with breakfast we'll get busy," Bergman nodded his head. "They'll be dressed by now." The hunters were staying in a nearby shack. "Then you slip out and come down and let the bucks out one by one. I'll have the boys stationed up the drive that the bucks will take on their back to their old feeding ground, and our friends will think they're great shots—the lunkheads." He chuckled wickedly to himself.

Malibu soon arrived at Bergman's secret corral. Moving along outside, he sensed the danger to the herd and carefully searched for a low spot in the fence. Finding it he vaulted lightly over. Then landing on the ground he moved in and around the herd. Finally he turned and made for the fence at the run, hoping that his fellow-creatures would follow his example. They moved towards the fence and saw Malibu sail gracefully to freedom. The buck looked back and once more vaulted the fence. Twice he repeated this manoeuvre, but the does and bucks did not seem to understand.

Bergman and Joe appeared on horseback. The two men saw a great buck sail over the fence and then back again. They did not for the moment understand what Malibu was trying to do, but when one buck did follow and escape then Bergman yelled lustily: "He's stampeding the herd!" He was nearly choking with rage. "It's that big buck with the white saddle-mark."

Back went Malibu because the rest had hesitated; but they had heard Bergman's voice, and when the buck leapt the fence they did not hesitate.

Cursing and swearing, Bergman urged his horse forward and arrived at the corral as the last of the herd leaped to freedom.

"I'll get him if it's the last thing I do!" shrieked Bergman. He raised his rifle, but Malibu was too far away. "I'll get him! I'll get him!"

The rascal dug his spurs viciously into the flanks of his horse.

Man Versus the Wild

BERGMAN rode off in the same direction that Malibu had gone.

Cunning Bergman rode around a huge rock and waited for a moment. Malibu appeared from the right and paused to try and locate his enemy. Up went the gun, but in that second the deer moved, and the bullet missed by yards.

The guide spurred his horse up the hill, and then up went the rifle as he sighted Malibu climbing. The gun spoke, and Bergman gave a shout of triumph as the deer tumbled to the ground head over heels.

Instantly, however, Malibu had picked himself up and dashed away, his ruse having worked successfully, for Bergman had relaxed his watch. The guide cursed heartily to see a fleeting figure away among the trees.

Malibu did not flee away, but came back to dodge in and out of the trees—he had to get that herd back over the boundary. Perhaps it gave him joy to tantalise the man who had slain his doe. He left the shelter of a boulder and skipped through a shallow stream to the other side. And Bergman spurred his horse on with renewed zest as he rode through the stream, seemingly hot on the deer's trail.

The buck moved cautiously round a large rock as Bergman came riding through the brush. Malibu slipped into a cave and watched his enemy ride past. Bergman gritted his teeth in overwhelming rage because his four-footed foe had escaped.

But Bergman was not so easily shaken off. He reined his horse in and scanned every shrub and clump of brush closely. Malibu poked his head warily out of the cave and moved away. A quick turn of the head and the deer jumped back—he had been seen. Again the bullet sped wide.

Bergman charged after the deer, his murderous intent blinding him to the form of Gato who was lying nearby on a rocky ledge, watching the chase with sombre, heavy-lidded eyes. Never taking his eyes from the pursuer and the pursued, the puma rose to his feet and hurried after them.

In full flight now Malibu flew on, down a steep slope and on to a log that projected out into the stream. Then with a desperate look round he jumped from the log and swam across.

Bergman, on a high knoll, looked down just at that moment. Then his lips curled back in a savage grin. He brought his gun to his shoulder. There was the crack of the rifle and the water splashed as two or three slugs hit close to Malibu. Filled with wild fury that he had missed, Bergman now rode his horse towards the stream, only to be thwarted again, for Malibu had reached the opposite bank and was racing off into the thicket.

Bergman rode away at full speed, planning to cut off the deer on the other side. Filled as he was with a consuming determination to finish the deer off, he had not noticed the spent condition of his horse. Suddenly it stumbled, throwing him heavily to the ground. He rolled over and over to crash into a tree-trunk. Collecting his dazed senses, he watched his riderless horse disappearing rapidly into the distance. But his determination to go after Malibu had not abated a whit. He started through the woods, stopping hopefully every now and then at some slight noise.

Then, projecting out of a bush, he saw Malibu's head. He tried to settle his jumpy nerves, so that his rifle arm would serve him well. Taking careful aim he fired, sure this time, he had scored a bullseye.

But Malibu was moving away, when suddenly he stopped. Then he turned his head and licked a bloody spot on his flank where Bergman's last bullet had grazed him.

Malibu made his way to the top of a saudy bluff—a dangerous, steep incline, which he started to descend. Skillfully leaping down the slanting slope, he reached the bottom just as Bergman came to the top and moved to the edge.

After a few steps the guide lost his footing and started to slide, rolling over and over to the bottom. As he stood up, shaken and much the worse for wear, Gato began cautiously picking his way down the slope after him.

Over the rocky ground Bergman hurried, with Gato always just a little in the rear, silently stalking him. Then he veered a little to the left of Bergman, leaping to a rock that he meant to use as an observation point.

Approaching this very rock, Bergman decided to rest against it to renew his strength. As he walked round it, Gato, from his higher vantage-point, followed his every move with watchful, glistening eyes, never removing them for a second, even when Bergman dropped wearily down and stretched his arms with a wide gesture of relaxation.

Malibu was now approaching a sheltered cave in the rocks. He sprang up to the side of a boulder to enter the cavern, but weak and spent by the bullet wound, he fell back helplessly.

Suddenly Bergman saw him and jumped to his feet. It was the chance he had been waiting for, for Malibu was at his mercy.

But Gato, too, had been waiting for this moment. The raised gun was his own private signal to come forth in defence of his friend. Springing forward, he landed, a huge furry burden, on Bergman's shoulders.

Bergman was flung forward, and the shock sent the rifle out of his hands. He scrambled to his feet to find the great cat preparing to spring at him again. Panic made him turn and bolt for his life. Gato was after him, leaped up in the air and landed on Bergman's shoulders. Now Gato was on top of him, both of them rolling over and over in the struggle. The cat hissed and snarled, whilst the guide's breath came raspingly from his heaving chest.

Malibu, standing in the entrance of the cave, pricked up his ears at the savage sounds of battle. With head thrust forward he left the cave and was soon running through the woods in the direction of the sounds.

Bergman still struggled frantically with Gato, knowing that he was fighting for his very life. Pushing drastically, he made iron bands of his wrists and shoved off the great cat with all his strength.

But his respite was brief, Gato was back again, one of his great paws at Bergman's throat. His sharp claws had already pricked through the skin, leaving a number of tiny red marks that would have meant death had they been deeper.

Bergman became desperato with fear, and, exerting his great strength, threw the puma from him and managed to get to his feet.

The force with which he had hurled Gato to the ground had stunned the puma for a few seconds, just long enough to give the guide a chance to run off. Gato leaped up in pursuit of him.

Bergman was now approaching the river bluff. Once, in an agony of exhaustion, he staggered and fell to the ground. Then, as he saw Gato not far away, he picked himself up and continued running. His eyes were glazed over with fear and weakness, but he persisted on.

Then, just as he reached the bluff, Gato, with a long flying bound, attacked him again. Landing squarely in the middle of Bergman's back, he knocked him to the ground, biting and clawing at him. They fought, their struggles bringing them closer and closer to the edge of the bluff with the river below.

Bergman's eyes were starting from his head as he saw the dripping jaws come nearer and nearer to his face. Now he tried to summon to his aid his very last ounce of strength. They were on the very edge of the bluff, and suddenly the man managed to bring his knees up ing regiments whom he had dispatched against Bosambo's people. Then a cold fear went through him, to be swiftly followed by a paroxysm of rage, and he turned an ugly glance towards the hut which had been placed at the disposal of Farini and Smith.

"SANDERS OF THE RIVER"

Farini was loitering in the entrance of the dwelling, and Mafolaba beckoned him viciously. As the white man approached, the Old King barked a question at him.

"Do you hear what the drums are saying?" he bit out.

Farini spread forth his hands in a deprecating gesture.

"How can I tell what they're saying?" he rejoined.

"Sandi is not dead!" Mafolaba snarled. "Sandi is back on the River. Sandi has wiped out my army!"

Farini had turned pale. He saw the Old King rising up before him with wrathful countenance, and with a quick gesture he made a grab for his revolver, only to be seized by half a dozen of the negro monarch's retainers before he could draw it—only to be struck down by dagger and club.

From the hut Smith had witnessed the fate of his accomplice, and with a gun in his fist he made a dash for the river bank near by. A native tried to stop him, but went down with a shriek as the renegade's revolver belched death. A moment later the white man was blundering into a canoe.

He snatched up a paddle and thrust the craft through the water. Behind him there was a furious uproar, and numbers of Mafolaba's people were running towards the river's edge, armed with spears and bows.

A shower of arrows sped towards the panic-stricken fugitive, and two of the shafts pierced him through the back. Uttering a scream that echoed across the river, he plunged lifelessly into the water, and the current swept his body downstream.

Back in the village Mafolaba was holding a hurried conference with his advisers.

"If Sandi comes here, it was the white men Farini and Smith who chopped Ferguson," he said. "Everybody remember that."

"We shall remember, Lord," one of his councillors rejoined. "But Sandi will not dare to come through the mountains with soldiers until after the rains."

"That is true," the Old King mused. "Listen, this delay will give me time to trap a leopard known as Bosambo. How would you trap such a leopard?"

"I would first get the right bait," another of his councillors replied.

The Old King's eyes narrowed cunningly.

"The right bait," he said. "The woman Lilongo, eh? Yes, she sets great store by her, and it would be an easy matter to take her now—while he and all his warriors are out on the warpath with Saudi."

He summoned three or four of his underlings who were squatting near by.

"Go get me the bait that will bring the leopard into my trap," he ordered harshly. "Go get me the woman Lilongo!"

In Mafolaba's Power

PEACE had been restored to the River again. Chastened and humbled by Sandi's Hausas and their Ochori allies, the tribes of the jungle had learned a lesson which they were not likely to forget in a hurry.

A momentous palaver was held on board the Zaire. It was attended by all the chiefs of the River excepting the Old King, with whom Sanders intended to deal in the spring. And for the benefit of the assembled penitents, the Commissioner delivered a lecture that fairly burned their ears.

He dismissed them at last, and then prepared to bid good-bye to the faithful Bosambo, whose war canoes were lying alongside.

"Bosambo," he said, "you have made the Ochori the bravest people on the River, and I thank you for your loyalty. Go back now to your village, and to your wife and your little children."

"What of the Old King?" the big negro asked. "Is he not to be punished, Lord?"

"He shall be punished, indeed," Sanders rejoined. "But although we have defeated his army he still has many fighting men at his beck and call, and an invading force would find the mountains impassable at this time of the year. When the rains are over and the spring comes round I shall return with four battalions of soldiers, and your brave warriors will join me. Then we shall deal with Mafolaba."

"My warriors will be ready, Lord Sandi," Bosambo told him.

"Good," the Commissioner said. "And now farewell, my friend."

He passed a weary hand across his forehead, and then turned to Tibbets, who was standing near by.

"Tibbets," he murmured, "I think I've got a touch of fever coming on. If it takes me badly, I want you to anchor the ship well out in midstream and wait until the bout passes."

"Yes, sir," his assistant replied. "You're not looking well, sir. Why don't you get to bed right away?"

Sanders nodded, and departed in the direction of his cabin. Meanwhile Bosambo had rejoined his warriors, and, standing at the prow of one of his canoes, with two score of ebony backs bending to the strokes of as many paddles, the chief of the Ochori sang a deep-toned tribute to the Lord of the River.

Late that afternoon, Bosambo and his followers beached their canoes in front of their village and marched towards the huts. But if they expected a clamorous welcome from the families whom they had left behind them, they were sorely disappointed, for the shadow of gloom was heavy on the kraal, and the women and the children and the old men sat in silent groups.

It was Malibu who broke the news to Bosambo—Malibu, the aged negro who acted as major-domo in the chief's household. With trembling voice he told of a surprise raid by a party of the old king's men, told how they had slain the few guards left at the village and how they had carried off Lilongo.

As he listened to the grim story, Bosambo's face was that of a man stricken by grief and rage. Then all at once he wheeled and strode into his hut, where he wrote a note for Lord Sandi. This he gave to Malibu.

"Go," he commanded, "and take my little sons with you. Sandi will care for them. Tell him I have left for the country of the old king."

Malibu gave him a look of fear.

"But lord," he said, "an army could not pass the mountains at this season!" "An army, no—but one man, yes," Bosambo answered slowly. "That is why I go alone."

That evening he was following the jungle trails that led to the mountains, his spear grasped in one hand and his shield in the other; and before a new day had dawned the throb of lokali drums was rising from certain villages that he had passed—telegraphing the news that Bosambo, chief of the Ochori, was hastening northward alone.

About that same time, old Malibu was standing on the deck of the Zaire with the chieftain's two small sons, and the note that Bosambo had written was being delivered to Sanders by Tibbets.

Sanders was in his cabin. He had passed a pretty bad night, and though he had dosed himself heavily with quinine, the ravages of fever were still upon his face and in his eyes. Yet, as he listened to the story that Malibu had given Tibbets, he forgot the illness from which he was suffering.

The commissioner opened Bosambo's message and scanned it swiftly. It read as follows:

"Even you could not go to the old king's country until the spring. Lord Sandi, I give my little sons into your charge—that they may be schooled on the money which the Government has paid me and brought up as the children of the Government."

Sanders jerked himself to his feet.

"Tibbets," he said, "I'm taking the Hausas north. I want you to escort Malibu and Bosambo's boys to the Residency, with a party of picked men—"

"No, sir," the younger man interposed quietly.

"I beg your pardon," Sanders snapped.

"I said 'No, sir.' I'm going with you, sir."

The Commissioner glared at him for a moment; then his face relaxed and he laid a hand on the lieutenant's shoulder.

"Oh, all right, Tibbets," he said. "Give the order to turn the ship upstream, will you? We're pushing our way through to Mafolaba's village."

His assistant looked startled.

"I suppose you know, sir, that no ship ever got so far up the river as that?" he mentioned.

"This one will be the first to do it," Sanders retorted. "I know all about the shallows, Tibbets, but the floods may help us."

The Upraised Knife

THE sun beamed down upon the riverside village of the old king.

Likewise Mafolaba beamed as he sat amidst his people and looked upon the features of a captive who was bound to one of the sacrificial stakes.

The captive was Lilongo, and, while he hearkened to the sound of distant drums, the old king addressed her mockingly.

"You know what they are saying?" he asked her. "They are saying that a dog of a little chief is on his way here."

"The drums lie to you, King Mafolaba," Lilongo answered. "Bosambo will not fall into your trap. He is too cunning for you—"

But the words froze on her lips, for even as she spoke them she saw a figure making its way through the mob of natives in the foreground. It was the figure of her husband, and with countenance set and tense he forced his way to her side and placed an arm about her shoulders. Then he turned his glance upon the grinning face of her tormentor.

"So, clever one," the old monarch said with a leer, "where is your cunning now? Have I not brought you here without a spear behind you—into my trap?"

"King Mafolaba," Bosambo told him. "I come in peace, but you may do with me what you will. This woman is the light of my life, and I would rather die than rule over my people without her."

His wife's lip trembled as she looked at him fondly. Then Bosambo spoke again.

"King Mafolaba," he went on, "let her go free, and I promise you that she will send back two thousand pieces of gold."

The old king laughed huskily.

"It is not your gold I want," he jeered. "It is your skin! Little dog of a chief, you chose to offend me once. For that you will die a slow death. But first you will see your woman die!"

A fierce cry escaped Bosambo, and with an involuntary gesture he drew back his spear, but ere he could strike with it he was seized by half a dozen of the old king's minions, who quickly disarmed him and dragged him to a stake several paces distant from the one to which Lilongo was tied.

Ho was lashed to the post with thongs, and then, while the village resounded to the beating of drums, the witch-doctor of the tribe capered towards Lilongo and began to dance before her maddeningly, even as he had danced in those few moments before Deputy-commissioner Ferguson had met his death.

Lilongo stared at him in horror, and then closed her eyes. Fastened to the other stake, Bosambo looked at her despairingly, tortured by the emotions that had welled up within his breast. The muscles in his cheeks were quivering spasmodically, and he was struggling to break the bonds that held him—struggling in vain.

The witch-doctor continued to go through the motions of the death dance, till at last Mafolaba ordered him aside and summoned his executioner, a powerful savage armed with a knife. This jackal advanced deliberately until he was face to face with Lilongo, and now he raised the dagger that he was clutching.

Lilongo closed her eyes again, and, watching her, watching that blade as the executioner prepared to plunge it into her heart, Bosambo groaned aloud. Then he, too, shut out the scene from his gaze, for this was something that he could not bear to witness.

The smash of a shot broke the trend of Bosambo's thoughts. It was followed by a second report, and he opened his eyes to see Mafolaba's witch-doctor and executioner falling to the ground, while Lilongo stood there with an amazed expression on her face, marvelling at her sudden deliverance from death.

Then came the deadly chatter of a machine-gun, and in the same instant Bosambo beheld the Zaire. Startlingly enough so far as those in the village were concerned, the ship had turned a bend in the river and was moving towards a crude landing-stage built against the bank.

Confusion reigned in the heart of Mafolaba and in the minds of his followers. Panic-stricken and unresisting, they watched Sanders, Tibbets and a company of Hausas disembark from the Zaire and advance at the double.

The rescue-party swarmed into the village, and the nuderlings of Mafolaba retreated before them in alarm. Within a few seconds Bosambo and Lilongo had been released, the former recovering his shield and spear.

Sanders held him back as he attempted to make for the old king, who was standing nervously in the forefront of his tribe.

"Leave him to me, Bosambo," he said, and then turned to fix the elderly potentate with stern gaze.

"Mafolaba," he ground out, "do you remember what I told you once at a palaver in front of the Ochori village—that if you harmed one servant of the Government, be it only a carrier-pigeon, you would be a king no more?"

"I have harmed no servant of the Government," Mafolaba protested.

"Then who killed Ferguson?"

Mafolaba turned a sly, grinning face towards his people and invited them to answer Lord Sandi's question.

"White men Farini and Smith, they chop Ferguson," came the instant response.

Sanders looked at them grimly.

"That is a lie," he said. "I know that Mafolaba spared Ferguson to death, and for his crime I—"

The Commissioner checked abruptly, for all at once the old king's spear came up, and fear and hatred were mingled in the black scoundrel's expression as he tried to plunge the weapon into Sanders' heart.

The shaft never left his hand, for Bosambo was too quick for him, and the assegai of the Ochori chieftain sped straight and true, thudding into Mafolaba's gross body and sinking deep.

The old king collapsed with a cry that was the last sound he ever uttered, and before any of his followers could give trouble they were hemmed in by the Hausas, whose rifles threatened them steadily.

Again Sanders faced the cowering horde of natives.

"Who killed Ferguson?" he demanded. "Answer me! Who killed Ferguson?"

"King Mafolaba chop Ferguson, lord," a host of voices answered.

"Yes, and look at him now," the Commissioner rasped, pointing to the lifeless body. "Ho isn't king any longer. No, and I'm going to set up a new king in his place—a king who won't waste the lives of his people in wars, a king who will be monarch of the whole river, paying homage to none but the greatest King of all, whom I and Lord Tibbets serve."

Some days later, at a palaver to which he had summoned the chiefs of the upper and lower river, Commissioner Sanders formally proclaimed Bosambo overlord of all the tribes in the territory.

It was a proclamation that met with general approval, and when the palaver was over Sanders received the grateful thanks of Bosambo and Lilongo, both of whom were almost inarticulate with pride.

The Commissioner smiled at them, and then took Bosambo by the hand.

"Good-bye, my friend," he said. "I am going away now, and I know that in twelve months' time, when I return, I shall find this country is still a land of peace under your rule. For already your new people seem to like you, Bosambo—even the people who once served Mafolaba."

"Lord Sandi," Bosambo told him, "the people will always like me, for I have learned from you the secret of good government. It is this, lord: a king should be loved, not feared."

"That is the secret of the British, Bosambo," the Commissioner murmured.

"WHEN A MAN SEES RED"

The sheriff called to his men, and with Buck's punchers they dashed outside for their horses.

"Where are those broncs?" went up a shout as they found the slip-rails down and the corrals and stables empty.

Buck knew that Silver wouldn't be far off. The grey wouldn't stray away from the corrals even if he were turned loose and chased off. The foreman whistled, and pretty soon Silver came trotting up. Flinging a saddle on him, Buck saw to it that his gun-belt was crammed with cartridges. Then he vaulted up and thundered off on to the river trail, his face set and hard, his eyes drawn down into two steely slits.

Ben, one of the first to catch up a horse, galloped after Buck, whilst the sheriff and the others stamped off on foot after the rest of the straying broncs.

Instead of going the long way round, Buck headed straight for the river, determined to swim it if he had to. It was thus that he came into contact with a party of about six rustlers who were driving the tail-end of the herd along the stony banks. Without hesitation he rode at them, guns flaming. Two of them tumbled from their saddles. A third yelped like a kicked dog and slumped, swaying and clinging to his horse's neck. The rest, panic-stricken, scattered, whilst the scared cattle broke back and thundered up the bank.

Buck kept on along the river, crashing through the alders and leaping the huge boulders that strewed the way. From the far side a shot rang out, and a bullet fanned his cheek. Another struck fire from the stones ahead of him. Glancing across, he saw, clear in the early morning light, Dick Brady and Mary. They were on a rocky ledge like a platform, far up on the top of the gorge. Behind them he could make out the robed figure of a priest, with two of Brady's men standing on each side of him. Even as he watched, Mary grabbed at Dick's arm, frantically trying to prevent him from firing, but the rustler flung her loose and fired again.

Buck dropped from the saddle, tossed away his gun-belt, plunged into the stream, and struck out for the opposite bank.

A bullet plunked into the water by his head. Then another, so close that the water spouted into his face. With a deep breath he dived and swam under the surface.

After what seemed an age, he reached the other side. His lungs seemed to be bursting as he drew in great gulps of air and dashed for the cover of the rocks. Foot by foot he began to climb the gorge, protected from Brady's bullets by the precipitous cliff face.

Meanwhile, on the ledge above, Mary was watching, frozen with horror. She had hardly left the ranch with Brady before fear began to lay cold fingers on her heart. Then, when she rode out on to the river's edge and saw the cattle being driven off before her very eyes, she knew the man beside her for what he really was.

A rustler! A sneaking cattle-thief! How could she have been such a fool?

She wheeled her horse and tried to flee, but Brady was too quick for her. "No, you don't!" he rasped, catching her horse's bridle.

"You beast! Let me go!" she had cried in loathing.

But Brady had only laughed and hustled her along. Then, soon after they had reached the ledge, and when the priest, who was obviously in the power of the men who stood guard over him with drawn guns, had been about to start the ceremony, Buck had appeared.

She knew now, when it seemed hopeless and too late, that she loved this man who was climbing to her rescue. All she could do was look on, whilst Brady stood with drawn gun, waiting for a chance to shoot Buck down.

At last Buck's head and shoulders appeared above the ledge. Brady raised his gun, and, as he did so, Mary screamed and tried to throw herself on him, but one of the rustlers caught her and held her back.

The gun roared. Clutching his shoulder, Buck slid from view. Blood trickled through his fingers as, still holding his shoulder, he flattened himself against a rock. For a moment he hesitated. Unarmed as he was, it would be suicide to climb over the exposed rim of the ledge. His only chance was to rush Brady from behind.

Painfully he crawled off at an angle, and gradually worked round in a wide detour. As he did so he caught sight of a rider making his way along the edge of the gorge towards him. Gritting his teeth, he gathered himself together and dashed forward.

Surprised by this totally unexpected manoeuvre, Brady wheeled, and in that moment Buck was on him. His fist sent Brady stumbling backwards, but the momentum of the blow swung Buck himself off his balance. He stumbled, tried to recover, and sprawled headlong.

Again Mary saw Brady raise his gun. This time he could hardly miss.

A shot rang out, and Dick Brady staggered. For a moment he swayed, then crumpled in a heap.

Bewildered, Mary looked round, and saw the pucker of Ben appearing from the cover of a boulder. A smoking gun was in his hand, and he had apparently ridden up and crawled forward unnoticed. At the same time a posse of riders under the sheriff came thundering along the top of the canyon. Cursing, the rustlers on the ledge took to their heels with the posse in hot pursuit.

But Mary was oblivious to all this, for Buck's one good arm was round her, pulling her face towards his.

"SEQUOIA"

sharply beneath the puma. Then his hands came up, and with a grip of iron he closed them around Gato's throat, closing his eyes and groaning with the effort of thrusting the animal away from him.

It was a crucial moment in the fight, the only moment that could have saved Bergman's life.

With a kick that had all his weight behind it and a directing shove he pushed Gato over the edge of the ledge. The puma turned over and over before hitting the river.

Though the guide had saved his own skin it had not been at the expense of Gato. Coming to the surface, the puma shook his head, then calmly swam to the bank and climbed out.

Bergman, in a sweat of exhaustion and badly mauled sank to the ground as if he would have liked to lie there for ever. He shook from head to foot at the thought of the horrible death he had just missed. A sound made him look up.

A scream of terror came from his lips. Twenty yards away stood Malibu, and his head was lowered.

Bergman tried to stagger to his feet, but his strength failed him. His face contorted in horror for the last time as Malibu, not slackening his pace, came full head on, his antlers crashing against the hapless guide.

Over the ledge Bergman went, his body striking some of the undercliffs, then hitting the water, it disappeared under the surface.

Malibu looked down from the cliff for a long moment until the water ripples had subsided, and the guide was seen no more.

The Watchers

SOME weeks later, Toni and Sang Soo were driving through the forest, which again had its gleaming coverlet of snow. The sleigh stopped abruptly as the girl heard a familiar voice hailing her.

"Hallo?" Toni beamed at Alden over the side of the sleigh.

"You're just the person I was looking for," Alden cried. "You must get out of the sleigh. Over there is something you must read." He pointed to the trees.

Toni promptly handed the reins to Sang Soo.

"You wait here. I'll be back in a minute." Then she hopped out of the sleigh with the quite unnecessary but willing assistance of Bob's strong arms.

Sang Soo laughed.

"Every day you say back in a minute," he pointed out. "Every minute two hours. I go home. You take a walk, eh?"

"All right." Toni laughed to hide her blushes.

Bob led her to where a big notice was pinned against a great pine. It read:

"The boundary lines of the National Forest Reserves have been extended for a fifty-mile radius in every direction. No hunting. U.S. Department of the Interior."

"It's a life insurance policy for your pals," Alden said, watching the happy glow on the sweet face.

The two young people smiled at each other, and Bob's arms drew her close to him.

They may have thought there were no witnesses to their embrace, but over on the rocky crags Malibu watched them interestedly, while Gato sat close by. They turned and looked at each other through the falling snow, then Gato shook his head, and Malibu moved across to him. Their noses met in an affectionate caress. Then they settled themselves comfortably again, the better to watch the two humans whom they loved.

He Didn't Know How to Smoke

David Niven, the handsome young British actor, whose name is being linked romantically with that of Merle Oberon, recently created consternation on the "Splendour" set in Hollywood.

The script of "Splendour," Samuel Goldwyn's latest picture, starring Miriam Hopkins, called for Niven to light and smoke a cigarette—gracefully, man-of-the-worldly. Unfortunately, Niven doesn't smoke—never has—so that when he gingerly took a cigarette and proceeded to light it, he looked exactly like a fourteen-year-old making his first experiment. It took just half an hour, and a packet of cigarettes, for Elliott Nugent, the director, to teach the Briton how to smoke with proper nonchalance. And that half-hour hold-up cost the producer approximately £200.

Johnny Weissmuller Swimming Teacher for Siam's King

Johnny Weissmuller, Tarzan of the screen, is to be swimming teacher for the King of Siam.

He is arranging to photograph a series of his own swimming strokes, to send, with detailed explanations, to the Siamese monarch at Bangkok, as a sort of custom-made correspondence course in natation.

The Siamese King, who is intensely interested in swimming, met Johnny when he visited the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios on his recent world tour. Since then the two have corresponded. The Siamese King asked many questions about swimming, and finally suggested that if he had pictures of Johnny's strokes he could follow the lessons better.

So Johnny is arranging a complete pictorial course for the monarch, and is to film the pictures immediately on completing his present rôle in "Tarzan Escapes," in which he and Maureen O'Sullivan are reunited in another jungle romance.

DeMille on the Trail

If there are any of the erstwhile associates of Colonel William ("Buffalo Bill") Cody in England they had better get in touch with Cecil B. DeMille, who is to make a picture based on the life of the cowboy hero.

He wants the oldest living plainsman who fought side by side with Buffalo Bill, and the oldest living Indian who fought against the colonel.

When they are discovered and their claims authenticated, they will be taken to Hollywood, shown the sights of the town as DeMille's guests, and given rôles in the picture. Letters from hundreds of persons variously allied with Cody

Not Continued in our Next

The comedian, Edward Brophy, who is playing a comedy gangster in "Snatched," an anti-crime picture, had a supreme test of nerve control when he had to lie, with closed eyes, pretending to sleep while a newspaper, covering the upper part of his body, was on fire and blazing in close proximity to his face. What made it harder, Brophy had to remember to keep on loudly snoring till the last possible second.

The scene, calculated to draw laughter from an audience, was anything but funny to the victim. Premature movement would spoil the effect, so Brophy, with the paper blazing all around him, had to lie there straining his ears for Director George Marshall's signal to leap up just in time to escape cremation.

"Say, this is going too far!" exclaimed Brophy indignantly, as he stood looking at the charred remnants of paper after the scene was shot.

"What's the matter, Ed?" inquired Director Marshall solicitously. "Did you get scorched?"

"Yes, but I don't mind that. What I'm squawking about is the paper burnt up. It's the one in which I was reading that serial story."

How Charlie Discovered Himself

Most people know Chaplin as a brilliant master of pantomime, but few are aware that he discovered his genius for miming almost by accident.

Many years ago, as an unknown youngster, he toured the Channel Islands with a variety company. After performing before an unappreciative audience the players were informed that most of the islanders spoke a French patois, only a few understanding English.

The company refused to admit defeat, and in their next performance omitted the dialogue and relied solely upon action and gesture. It was in this performance that Chaplin's talent revealed itself, and showed him the tremendous possibilities of pantomime in surmounting the barriers of language.

Subsequent foreign tours confirmed this lesson, and Charlie gradually perfected the technique which was later to endear his name to every race, white, black or yellow, reached by the cinema.

Employed by Gale Motors largely on the strength of his fame as a football player Randolph Rogers invents a supercharger that promises to revolutionise the industry. but his invention is made to appear a failure for the benefit of a rival company. A high-speed story of a fight for success, starring Norman Foster and Mary Carlisle

A Game—and its Sequel

A RECORD crowd had flocked to the Stadium that afternoon to watch the final football match of the season between the State University of Southern California and Stanford College, for Randolph Rogers was making his last appearance as a player for the State University, and Randolph Rogers had become one of the most famous quarter-backs in the country.

Nan Gale, daughter of Wilson Gale, the silver-haired president of Gale Motors, Incorporated, watched the game with excitement from her seat in the front row of the grandstand, and after a particularly fine effort on the part of the hero of the hour cried out: "Dad, isn't that Randy Rogers marvellous?"

"Quite a player, Nan, quite a player," conceded her father, who had been no mean centre-forward in his own remote college days, but who now turned the scales at fourteen stone and was fifty.

Praise, but not nearly praise enough, from the point of view of the golden-haired enthusiast; and as her idol achieved a masterly kick, foiled only by the Stanford goalkeeper, she exclaimed:

"Dad, I'll bet you a new hat he kicks the goal for the extra point!"

"You ought to give odds on that," protested her father. "He's only missed two all season."

Nan should have been content with that, but she wanted a new hat, though she certainly did not need one.

"You're a big help," she sighed.

On Wilson Gale's left sat Philip Morton, general manager of Gale Motors, Incorporated, a very tall and very self-contained sort of person for whom Nan had no great liking. His chin was weak, but his brown eyes were cunning, and his mouth was cruel beneath a wisp of a moustache. He seemed to be absorbed in the game, but a little smile flitted across his lips.

No new hat would have been forthcoming, however, either for daughter or for parent, had the bet been accepted. With two minutes to go to the end of play and with no doubt whatever as to the issue the head-coach decided to let Randolph Rogers rest on his laurels, and gave instructions for another man to take his place.

Nan opened her blue eyes and her scarlet little mouth in astonishment as the referee announced the decision.

"Barton for Rogers! Rogers out!"

"Oh, look, they're taking him out of the game!" she shrieked.

"Probably tired," said Philip Morton, who knew very little about football, and cared less.

Randolph Rogers walked off the field, removing his leather helmet as he made for the passageway under the grandstand that led to the dressing-rooms. The spectators were on their feet and cheering vociferously, and Nan sprang up to join in the general clamour.

"Come on, both of you, give him a nice big hand!" she shouted.

With the roar of the crowd in his ears Randolph Rogers entered the passageway, where the head-coach gripped him by the hand.

"Nice game, Randy," he said appreciatively. "Sorry it's your last."

"Thanks, coach," returned the black-haired young man with rather a wistful grin on his clean-shaven face. "So am I—sorry and glad."

"I understand," nodded the coach; and then the stalwart policeman who guarded the way to the dressing-rooms stepped forward.

"Randy, how about a souvenir for my kid?" he asked eagerly.

"Sure." Without the slightest hesitation Randy held out his helmet. "Give him this."

"Thanks," murmured the overwhelmed cop, and drew a long breath. "Gosh, he'll go crazy!"

Randy walked on through the concrete tunnel under the stand upon which men and women were shouting themselves hoarse and stamping their feet and clapping their hands.

"Listen to 'em!" commented the policeman. "They're tryin' to wreck the joint."

"Nice send-off," said the coach. "But he's heard plenty of that."

"Sure he has," agreed the policeman, gloating over the helmet he had acquired for his small son; "but it never made his head too big for this."

Nan Gale, who had lost all interest in the match now that her hero had departed, tugged at her father's sleeve. "Come on, dad," she said, "let's go."

At eight o'clock in the evening she and her father and Philip Morton were having dinner in the pillared restaurant of the Lake Café, in Los Angeles, when the manager sped to the platform on which an excellent little dance band functioned and whispered to the conductor.

Abruptly the strains of a slow fox-trot ceased and the conductor turned to raise his hands for silence.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he boomed, "I have a little unexpected surprise for you. We're honoured this evening to have one of the greatest football players of State University. He's just come into the café, so I suggest we all give him a nice big hand. Randy Rogers."

Randy walked in at the glass-panelled doors from the vestibule, a splendid figure of vigorous young manhood in evening clothes, and he looked distinctly embarrassed by the applause that greeted him. From all parts of the room people deserted their tables to swarm round him, and Nan flung down her serviette.

"He's here!" she burst out rapturously.

"So I judge," grunted her father. "Dad, don't you think he's good-looking?"

Wilson Gale glanced over his shoulder at the centre of attraction.

"Yes, clean-cut boy," he nodded, much as he might have approved some rival firm's make of car.

"He certainly sells himself," remarked Philip Morton; and that annoyed Nan.

"Randy Rogers doesn't have to sell himself!" she flared. "Everybody's sold on him!"

It occurred to her that a scheme she had in mind was ripe for fruition, and she leaned towards her father.

"Put his reputation in with Golden Arrows," she said brightly, "and you could even sell them!"

"Sell Golden Arrows?" Wilson Gale frowned at what he considered to be an insult to the cars manufactured by his company; but suddenly ceased to frown, possibly because his general manager had dared to sniff.

"Say, wait a minute!" he exclaimed, and looked again at Randy and at the crowd that besieged him. "So long as people insist on making fools of themselves over this boy they might believe in his recommendation of a car. We've had testimonials from bankers and doctors, but never from a football player."

"You do have ideas," purred Nan, "and that's a honey. It would be the slickest thing conservative Gale Motors ever did. Make him a salesman."

Wilson Gale pursed his lips and considered the suggestion, but Philip Morton expressed disapproval in his own fashion.

"After all," he said, "you've never gone in for the spectacular."

"Well, that's what's wrong with the company," declared Nan, "and I'm about to fix it."

She pushed back her chair and rose to her feet impetuously.

"Wait, Nan!" cried her father. "Wait till we decide."

But Nan was not prepared to wait at all and she flitted off between the tables to squeeze past Randy's admirers.

"Nan must have her heroes," said Morton drily.

"Well, this one may be useful," retorted Gale.

Without the slightest ceremony Nan pounced upon her prey.

"Hallo, Mr. Rogers," she said with a bewitching smile. "Remember me? Nan Gale—at the Junior Prom last year."

Randy did not remember her, but was far too gallant to say so.

"Oh, yes, yes, of course," he murmured.

She slipped her arm through his in the most possessive manner imaginable, and she said:

"Come on. I want you to meet my father."

Willy-nilly he was marched over to the table and introduced to Wilson Gale.

"Dad was in the class of nineteen-hundred," Nan informed him.

"It's a real pleasure, Mr. Gale," said the rather bewildered young man.

"Glad to see you, Rogers," returned the motor magnate. "This is Philip Morton, the general manager of our company."

Morton exchanged greetings without any sign of enthusiasm, and stood up.

"I'm sorry to run away," he said, nodding in the direction of an elaborate bar at the far end of the room, "but I see somebody I know over there."

He drifted away, and at Wilson Gale's suggestion Randy occupied the chair he had vacated.

"I believe you're graduating," said Gale.

"Yes," Randy replied. "This spring." "I suppose you're going into some broker's office as a customer's man?"

"As a matter of fact," replied Randy emphatically, "that's the last thing I want to do."

"I don't quite understand."

"I'd like to get into something I know," was the unexpected answer.

"You see, I'm taking engineering."

"Engineering?" exclaimed Gale.

"Well, that's quite a coincidence. I was just saying to my daughter—"

"He was just saying," Nan broke in without too strict a regard for the truth, "that he'd like to have you with Gale Motors."

Her father rewarded her with a frown. "We thought," he began again, "we might interest you in—"

"You know," interrupted Nan, "your popularity and Golden Arrows—"

"Wait a minute, Nan, wait a minute!" expostulated her father. "We want to make sure—"

"Oh, he'll be interested!" cried the determined girl. "Won't you?"

Randy gave her a little twisted smile, but addressed the head of the firm.

"Are you offering me a job, Mr. Gale?" he inquired.

"Of course he is!" Nan interjected, and her father had hardly any option but to say:

"I think we might find a spot for you."

"That's fine," said Randy. "I've had a few prospects—pro football, and so forth—but this is the sort of thing I really want to do."

Further discussion was arrested by the intrusion of a reporter and two Press photographers who had heard of Randy's presence in the café and wanted a picture of him for the "Times." Nan was elated, but Randy protested that it was not a football field.

"That's all right, Randy," one of the photographers assured him airily. "We don't mind. Look this way, will you?"

The reporter stared at Nan.

"Say, aren't you Nan Gale, daughter of old man Gale?" he asked.

"Yes, of course I am," she replied, with a wave of her hand. "And this is 'old man Gale'!"

The reporter, quite unabashed, greeted the manufacturer of motor-cars. Nan seized upon the opportunity.

"Mr. Rogers," she said, "has just accepted a position with Gale Motors—haven't you, Randy?"

"Well," Randy hesitated, "I—er—I—"

"I'll have a story for you gentlemen in the morning," Gale interposed hastily.

"Swell," quoth the reporter. "Get 'em all, boys, in a family group. We've happened on something."

While flashlamps were blazing and cameras clicking, Philip Morton consumed a whisky-and-soda at the bar in conjunction with his friend, a stockily built man with a wide face and very prominent nose named Gordon Holmes, who was associated with United Motors.

"What's a football hero more or less?" quoth Holmes derisively. "He can't do anything but take old Gale for a couple of grand—and I'm sure we won't mind that!" He gazed shrewdly at his companion and added: "Or is it the daughter you're thinking about?"

"Don't be ridiculous!" snapped Morton, and the subject was changed.

"Seriously," said Holmes, "how long do you think Gale will last once United Motors put the pressure on him?"

"He's a fighter," said Morton.

"Oh, I've seen champions go down fighting!"

Morton looked thoughtfully into the glass he held.

"You know sometimes I'm sorry for Gale," he said slowly. "Golden Arrows have been his life for twenty years—the best car for the best people."

"Aw, swallow your drink or you'll have me crying!" jeered Holmes.

"There's no room for sentiment in business. The world and motor-cars must move. They must progress—time marches on."

He raised his glass.

"Here's to United Motors," he said, "the mother of the motor-car industry."

"Mother or stepmother," said Morton—and drank.

Randy Speaks His Mind

ON a particularly sunny morning, some weeks later, Wilson Gale dropped a sheaf of papers on the blotting-pad of his desk in his own private office of Gale Motors, Incorporated, and turned to the general manager with a gloomy expression on his face.

"Frankly, Morton," he confessed, "I'm beginning to be seriously worried. Too many things are going wrong."

Philip Morton, lounging back in a hide-covered armchair at the end of the desk, seemed slightly startled.

"What?" he blurted.

Gale walked over to the fireplace before he answered slowly:

"The cost of raw material is going up, and the attitude of the banks is unfriendly. We have inexcusable delays at the plant, and in the middle of the best selling season our sales are falling off instead of increasing."

Morton rose from the chair to perch on a corner of the desk so that he could face his employer.

"We've gone over this before, Mr. Gale," he said. "It's just a condition we can't control. After all, Golden Arrow is an expensive car."

"But a good car," declared the president of the company warmly. "We've stood by our dealers and our customers."

"Times are different."

"But people aren't. They're always willing to pay for quality."

Morton reached over to the blotting-pad to pick up the papers that had dismayed Gale.

"In my opinion," he said impressively, "there's only one solution—United Motors."

It was not a solution that appealed to the founder of the firm, nor was this the first time it had been suggested to him.

"Morton," he said, "I've fought this thing out alone for a long time. Golden Arrow will never become a cheap car made by United. That's final!"

The general manager shrugged his shoulders.

"I'm only advocating what appears to be the least expensive course," he argued. "Better give stockholders something for their money than let creditors take charge. We can't stand present competition. You know what I mean—other companies bring out new wrinkles to appeal to buyers: free-wheeling, hydraulic brakes, knee action—"

"If the day ever comes when we have to resort to that sort of thing," Gale broke in angrily, "we still won't sell out to United Motors. We'll quit!"

The door swung open and Nan walked into the room together with her football hero.

"Hallo, dad!" she cried. "I've just been showing Randy round the plant!"

Wilson Gale stared.

"You remember Mr. Rogers, the all-American football player?"

"Oh, yes—yes, the football player. Of course, I remember. How are you, Rogers?"

Randy replied that he was fine; Nan reminded him that he had met Mr. Morton.

"I made him come right over to see you, dad," she explained. "He graduated last week."

"I see," nodded Gale. "And now you're ready to go to work, young man?"

"Not only ready," Randy answered, "but anxious."

Philip Morton tucked the sheaf of papers under his arm.

"If there's nothing else you care to take up with me, Mr. Gale," he said rather stiffly, "I'll get back to my office."

"I'll call you later," Gale responded. "Sit down, children."

The "children" sat, the general manager retired, and the president went round to his own chair behind the desk and lit a cigar.

"We were looking at the new roadster in the show-room," said Nan.

"You like it?" The question was addressed to Randy.

"Like it?" said he with enthusiasm. "Mr. Gale, it's a car to dream about—class, power, and speed to bum."

"We've never specially stressed speed."

"Well, I thought—"

"Oh, it'll do sixty-five."

"It'll do seventy-five," declared Nan, "if it's hopped up like mine."

"Perhaps," said Wilson Gale, with a grimace, "my daughter knows Golden Arrows better than I do."

"Naturally," retorted the daughter. "I drive one!"

Randy stood up.

"I was hoping I might be able to help a little," he said, "but it seems Gale Motors don't need any help."

Nan perched on the arm of her father's chair and nudged him secretly with her elbow, whereupon he said:

"As a matter of fact, I was just talking to Morton about sales. They do need stimulating, and that's where you come in. I want you to pick out the smartest-looking car on our floor, then make a tour of our branches, meet old friends and former students of the State University who'll be impressed with the famous all-American football player. Mix with them generally—and boost Golden Arrow."

"You mean you want me to be a salesman?" asked Randy.

"Exactly," was the reply. "I can't think of anyone better known to college men than you are just now."

"Oh, isn't that exciting, Randy?" cried Nan; but Randy did not find it anything of the kind, and looked distinctly disappointed.

"I was sort of hoping you might put me in the production end," he stated.

"Maybe a short time in the shops would help," said Gale. "But only a couple of weeks. Remember an all-American reputation doesn't last for ever."

"There's one point we ought to clear up, Mr. Gale," declared Randy, stabbing the air with a finger. "I haven't the slightest desire to capitalise on my football career. I've studied engineering. All my life I've worked with motors, and when I started my engineering course I began providing for my future career. Right now I've got a supercharger—"

But Wilson Gale did not want to hear anything about superchargers, or any variations of his offer, and Nan knew it by his suddenly aloof demeanour, and slid from the arm of the chair to stay the flow of words.

"I'm sure dad will be interested, Randy," she cut in, "but another time."

"Report to Mr. Morton in the morning," said her father, and opened a drawer to indicate that the interview was at an end.

"I'm not sure I want the job on an all-American basis," complained Randy.

"Well, think it over," was the impatient rejoinder.

"Yes, come on, Randy," said Nan. "We're due at the golf club at noon."

In her own roadster that could do seventy-five miles an hour she swept him off to a perfectly delightful golf course at Pasadena with the pine-clad heights of Mount Wilson for background; but Randy's mind was not on the game they played there, and on the ninth green he abandoned it.

"That's all to-day, boys," he said to the caddies, pocketing his ball and handing over his putter. "I'll see you at the club-house."

"I thought we were going to play eighteen holes!" Nan exclaimed in astonishment.

"That was your idea," said he, "but there are a few things you and I have to talk over before we go any further. Come on!"

He caught hold of her arm, marched her off to a seat under a massive fir-tree, and dumped her down on it.

"Well?" she challenged as he sank down beside her.

"The first thing I want to talk to you about," he returned almost grimly, "is football."

"Which game?" she inquired.

"The final one."

She raised her brows in a puzzled fashion and tilted her head at him.

"What do you mean?" she asked blankly.

"Just what I say," he replied. "You don't seem to realise it, but I'm through with all that."

"You're still a national hero."

The phrase had become hateful in his ears.

"When I hung up my uniform," he said, "I left that idea for some other fellow to dream about. Football and I are finished. I'm sick of people rushing up to shake hands with me because I'm an all-American."

"You seem to forget that you're famous!"

"So famous," he scoffed, "that the only thing I have that anybody wants is a past reputation. And that's just bunk!"

"There's one point we ought to clear up, Mr. Gale," declared Randy, stabbing the air with a finger.

"Dad doesn't think so," she protested. "That's the second thing I want to talk to you about. When I accepted your dad's offer I only did it because I thought it would give me a chance to work on my supercharger, but it didn't pan out like that."

Her eyes were on his set face, and for the first time she realised the depth of his disappointment at being offered a mere salesman's job.

"I'm sorry," she said in all sincerity. "I didn't know it meant that much. But you know dad's a conservative old thing. He doesn't go in much for radical changes."

"And that," growled Randy, "makes it look as though I'm on the wrong job."

"Why don't you speak to Philip Morton?" she suggested. "He's the general manager."

"That's an idea," he said, with renewed hope. "I have to report to him, anyway."

"A Fanciful Gadget"

PHILIP MORTON'S office was on the same floor as the president's at the Gale motor works, and was only one degree less elaborate in character, with its paneled walls, thick pile carpet, and fittings.

Randy walked into it next morning with a roll of blue prints under his arm, but not too much confidence in his heart because he had gained the impression that the general manager was not very favourably disposed towards football players.

To his surprise Morton seemed to be quite interested in the blue prints, which he opened out upon his desk and examined with critical eyes.

"You see," expounded Randy, "this isn't like an ordinary supercharger, Mr. Morton. Generally there's a resultant loss in economy, but with this carburettor hook-up there should be a saving of about twenty-five per cent."

"That'll be quite a saving," said Morton gravely. "An increase in power with the use of less fuel."

"That's right, sir."

"Humm!" Morton leaned back in his chair, toying with a pencil. "What makes you think it's practical?"

"Well," admitted Randy, "I can't be certain yet. Not until I've built a practical test model. But it wouldn't be expensive to try it."

Morton reached over to a dictograph on a flap of his desk and flipped its speaking-key.

"Get hold of George Stone and send him to my office," he directed, and turned again to Randy. "Tell you what I'm going to do, young fellow," he said crisply. "I'm going to talk Gale into letting you prove your theory before you go on the road."

Randy, of course, was elated. "I don't think you'll regret it, Mr. Morton," he blurted.

"Well, I hope you're right," returned Morton, with a smile. "That's why I've sent for Stone. He's the best mechanic in the plant. I want him to work with you."

"Just give us some space," said Randy eagerly. "Any—"

"I'll do better than that. Stone's got a machine shop in the experimental department. You can work there undisturbed."

It sounded almost too good to be true, and Randy had sudden misgivings.

"What about Mr. Gale?" he asked. "You think I ought to see him and explain?"

Morton waved aside the suggestion with his pencil.

"I'll handle him," he said; and then the dictograph buzzed and he spoke into it again. George Stone had arrived from the works across the yard that divided the office building from the machine shops. "Send him in!"

A shortish but thickset man entered the room, wearing overalls—a clean-shaven man of about forty, heavy-browed and rather lined of face.

"George," said Morton introductively, "this is Randy Rogers."

"How are you?" said Stone in a toneless voice.

"He's got a supercharger and carburettor hook-up that looks interesting on paper," Morton went on. "I want you to help him build a model and test it. It might be sensational."

Grey eyes looked into brown eyes across the blueprints.

"Okay with me," said the owner of the grey ones, and his voice was still toneless.

"Get going then. To-morrow morning."

Randy rolled up the blueprints. "I don't know how to thank you for this, Mr. Morton," he murmured gratefully.

"Don't try," returned the general manager. "Just keep me posted, and let me know after you've made your first test."

With the roll of blueprints once more under his arm Randy hovered in the region of the door, expecting to be taken to the experimental department by the mechanic. But George Stone said:

"I'll pick you up outside, Rogers. I've got to see Mr. Morton a minute."

Randy nodded and went out, closing the door behind him; and then Stone's manner changed completely.

"What is it?" he asked, as one speaking to an equal rather than to a superior. "Have you got something?"

"Certainly not," replied Morton scornfully. "Just a fool idea!"

"And I'm supposed to discourage it?"

"On the contrary; you're going to be of every assistance to him."

George Stone looked nonplussed.

"But I thought—"

"I'd rather have him in your shop than on the road. On the road he might be able to pep up sales a little."

"Oh," nodded Stone, "I get it!"

"You're getting it," retorted Morton. "And when this fanciful gadget of his doesn't work we haven't lost anything."

"Suppose it does work?"

"Don't make me laugh. He's a football player."

"Oh!" said Stone, and went off chuckling.

Randy spent most of that day in the experimental department of the vast plant, minus coat and waistcoat, and he displayed a technical knowledge which surprised the mechanic.

Work on the supercharger was commenced next morning, and before the end of the week he and George Stone stood in front of a running-block on which a motor-car engine had been mounted and connected with a dynamometer.

"All set," announced Stone. "Okay," said Randy. "Let's turn her over."

The engine was started, and the hand on the dial of the dynamometer crept up from zero to seventy-five.

"Is that tops for this motor—normal?" inquired Randy.

"That's right," nodded Stone. "Now cut in your supercharger."

The supercharger was connected to the engine, and the hand moved on round the dial to a hundred. Stone stared at the dial as though he found it difficult to believe the evidence of his own eyes, then stared at Randy whose face was radiant with triumph.

"You satisfied?" cried the inventor. "A hundred horse-power brake test for a stock eight motor."

"It looks good," admitted the mechanic.

"Wait till we get a car on the track. It'll probably do—"

"A hundred and ten," Stone completed for him; "but I'll wait till I see it roll that fast." He looked at a wall-clock. "You'd better go to lunch."

It was Randy's turn to stare.

"Well, there's one thing," he said with a mirthless laugh; "nobody could accuse you of being over-enthusiastic."

At that moment an elderly man, spare of build and a trifle shorter than Stone, walked in upon them from the covered yard outside. A yachting cap was perched at an angle upon his grey head and he was in working clothes which suggested an association with the water. Stone waved a hand to him.

"Hallo, Devlin!" he said. "I got that gear out for you."

He went over to a bench and returned with two gearwheels, which the newcomer took and inspected.

"Fine!" he said. "What do I owe you?"

"Oh, nothing," replied Stone. "It's charged to a new experiment. I had it done in duplicate."

"Thanks, but don't get yourself into any trouble."

"I won't," said Stone airily. "Randy Rogers, shake hands with Terry Devlin. He builds speedboats."

Randy had liked the look of Devlin at first sight. There was something fine and honest about his weatherbeaten face and his blue eyes had a twinkle in them. The two shook hands, and then Terence Devlin's eyes roamed in the direction of the running-block, and he stepped over to it.

"Say, what's this here?" he inquired with professional interest. "Looks like a supercharger you've got on here."

"No telling what it is until after it's tested," said Stone.

"Well, I'll come back and look it over as soon as I've taken these gears out to Billie," decided Devlin; and Randy, nettled by the mechanic's words, said wryly:

"See what you think of it. I'm just going out to lunch—I'll take 'em for you."

Devlin thanked him and handed over the gearwheels, and he went out into the covered yard. A shabby two-seater was standing there, an open one, and on the side of it near the wheel was perched a boyish-looking figure in overalls and a cap.

"Here's the gears, son," said Randy.

The boyish-looking figure swung round, and he perceived that it was a girl he had thus addressed, a particularly pretty girl, brown-haired and very bright-eyed.

"Thanks," she said, and dropped the two gearwheels on the floor of the car and smiled impishly at him.

"Oh, I'm sorry," he exclaimed in confusion. "I thought—"

"Don't apologise," she laughed. "It's happened before."

"Well—er—well, why—"

"Why do I wear overalls?"

"Y—yes."

"I like 'em. They're comfortable, and, after all, you can't wear dresses when you work around a machine shop."

"Here I am, Billie," boomed a voice from the doorway, and Terry Devlin walked over with George Stone. "This is Randy Rogers," he said. "He's working here with Stone. My niece, Mr. Rogers."

"Oh, yes," said Randy. "She was just telling me she works in a machine shop."

"That's right," nodded Devlin. "And there isn't a better mechanic or speed-boat pilot on the waterfront."

Billie flushed and slid down behind the wheel. George Stone said to Randy:

"You'd better go to lunch and get back on the job if you expect to make that test Monday."

"Okay," said Randy. "Good-bye, Miss Devlin. If you're really interested in motors drop around about ten on Monday. You'll see a demonstration of something new."

"That's a bet," the girl assured him, and waved her hand as he walked off out of the yard.

"Pretty smart boy," remarked the builder of speedboats.

"Smart?" echoed Stone with a sly glance for Billie. "Smart enough to have old man Gale's daughter to back him."

Terry Devlin climbed into the car beside his efficient niece.

"Thanks again for the gears, Stone," he said.

"Mind if we come to the test run?" asked Billie.

"Why, glad to have you," said Stone, but without any heartiness.

The two-seater was backed out from the covered yard and the mechanic made his way to the office building, where he ascended to the general manager's room.

"Well, Stone, how's your protégé?" inquired Morton, looking up from his desk. "About to revolutionise the automobile industry?"

"He might do that," was the unexpected reply.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, we finished the model and hooked it on to an old straight eight motor for a brake test."

"Go on!"

"It developed a hundred horse-power on the block."

"You're crazy!" exclaimed Morton incredulously; but George Stone shook his head.

"I'm telling you that kid's got something," he declared. "He's worked on an angle that everyone else has forgotten about. He dampens the air that feeds into the mixture."

Morton pinched his lower lip between finger and thumb and glared at an inoffensive letter-tray.

"If it's as good as you think," he growled, "it'll pull Gale out of a hole and save this company."

"Right," agreed Stone. "He wants to drive a test Monday. How about it?"

"Let him make it."

"You don't want it to work?"

"Sure," drawled Morton, "if it will."

"But I thought we—"

"We are, but I'd like to know what this thing'll do. When that's proved we can make an official test for Gale."

"In other words, this test is for you and me?"

"Exactly." Morton helped himself to a cigar from a box on the desk and lit it. "We can decide about Gale's demonstration later."

The Test

LIKE most American motor-car manufacturing concerns, Gale Motors had a private testing ground at some little distance from the works, built very much like a racing track. Just after ten o'clock on the following Monday morning Randy set off from its starting line on a stock Golden Arrow, sporting model, equipped with his supercharger, while George Stone leaned against a rail with a stop-watch in his hand.

Terry Devlin and his pretty niece had arrived in good time to witness the test of the new contrivance, and they were with the mechanic. Billie, looking as boyish as ever in her overalls and cap, was also holding a stop-watch, and her lips were parted with excitement as the car gathered speed and came roaring over the white line past the group.

"You satisfied?" cried Randy. "A hundred horse-power brake test for a stock eight motor!"

The track was an oval one, five-eighths of a mile in circumference, and on the second lap the supercharger began to make itself felt.

"Plenty of nerve!" exclaimed Billie. "He's really laying his foot on that throttle."

The car flew, the white line was crossed again.

"I caught him that lap!" she cried triumphantly. "Over ninety!"

George Stone nodded confirmation, though he was none too pleased that she had brought a stop-watch with her.

"Looks like he's got something," he said grudgingly.

"And you say that's an old test car?" demanded Terry Devlin.

"That's right."

Billie shaded her eyes against the sun to watch the progress of the car on the far side of the track.

"He's opening up!" she shrieked. "You clock him this lap."

The car whizzed past them, and Stone kept his eyes on the stop-watch he held while she concentrated on Randy's driving.

"Can he handle a car?" she cried. "Look at him go into that turn!"

The Golden Arrow came flying round the bend and was over the white line again.

"What does it say—what does it say?" clamoured Billie breathlessly.

"Hundred and four and a fraction," replied Stone.

"Almost a hundred and five miles an hour," she exulted.

"Can you imagine what his hook-up'd do on a new motor?" said her uncle.

George Stone had nothing to say to that. He put away his stop watch and looked along the track.

"He's slowing down now," he said.

Randy was slowing down. He had caught sight of a smart roadster careering across the grass towards the rails and had recognised the girl at its wheel. But Billie was too far away to recognise her.

"Who's that driving in?" she asked. "Gale's daughter," Stone informed her with a malicious smirk.

Nan Gale ran her car on to the track through a gap in the rail and sprang down from it to greet Randy as he braked and stopped.

"Oh, have you tried it yet?" she cried out.

"Yes," he replied, pushing his goggles up over his crash helmet. "Just finished."

"Oh, gee, I'm sorry I was late!"

"Aw, that's all right," he returned. "Let's see what the official time was for that last lap."

They walked together towards the three by the starting line, and Billie cried out as they approached:

"Hundred and five!"

"Oh, that's fine!" quoth Randy with infinite satisfaction. "Miss Gale, may I present Miss Devlin and her uncle, Mr. Devlin. You know Mr. Stone, of course."

Nan shook hands all round and the whole party walked towards the test car.

"Looks like your father has some thing in this new invention of Randy's," remarked Terry Devlin on the way.

"Oh, that's splendid!" said she. "We must go and tell dad at once, Randy."

"I have to report to Mr. Morton first," protested that young man.

"We'll report to dad," she insisted. "Come on, I'll drive you in my car."

Randy hesitated, but George Stone said:

"Go ahead. I'll take that job over." "All right," surrendered Randy, "but I'll have to get my jacket."

He shed his overalls and flung them into the test car, together with his helmet and goggles, and he took his coat from the seat and put it on while Nan conventionally assured Billie and her uncle that she was pleased to have met them.

"I'll let you know how we come out, son," said Stone, and then Randy helped Nan into her car and climbed in beside her, and the test ground was left behind.

Philip Morton was in Wilson Gale's room when the office building was reached. He had presented some papers and made a report that badly disturbed the president of the company.

"But this isn't possible, Morton!" Gale ejaculated.

"You can see the figures for yourself, Mr. Gale," returned Morton with a gesture of regret. "We sold fewer cars in the last thirty days than in any month last year."

The door swung wide and Nan burst into the room.

"Dad!" she cried, and turned to tug Randy in after her. "We've come to save Gale Motors."

"To what?" exclaimed her harassed parent.

Randy smiled apologetically at the general manager.

"I meant to report to you first, Mr. Morton," he said, "but Nan insisted." "Of course I did," said she.

Morton compressed his rather thick lips, but Wilson Gale was inclined to be annoyed.

"Nan," he began severely, "if this is just another of your schemes—"

"It isn't," she assured him gleefully. "It's Randy's."

Her father threw down the statements that had helped to upset his peace of mind.

"All right," he barked, "let's hear it."

It was Randy he had addressed, but Nan could not wait for her hero to make any sort of explanation. She was far too excited.

"The old model K demonstrator did a hundred and five miles an hour!" she exclaimed.

Her father stared from her flushed face to the slightly calmer face of the football player he had engaged to boost the sales of Golden Arrows.

"You mean to tell me one of our stock cars did over a hundred miles an hour?" he demanded in bewilderment.

"Yes," said Nan.

"How?"

"It's a new theory of carburetion," said Randy, "combined with a super-charger to give speed. Your new model cars could be made capable of doing, say, a hundred and ten miles an hour, and they'd use even less gas than they do now."

"Why, that's impossible!" snorted Gale. "Morton, have you made an investigation of this?"

"Superficially," replied the general manager. "You remember I suggested allowing him to work it out because it seemed to have possibilities."

Wilson Gale leaned back in his chair. "Well," he said after a while, "if it is practical it may give us just the sales stimulation we need."

"I'm ready to prove it's practical," Randy assured him.

"When?"

"To-morrow at the testing ground."

Gale looked at Morton.

"Hadn't we better check Rogers' plans thoroughly first?" he asked.

"Why look over plans, Mr. Gale?" demurred the wily general manager.

"To-morrow you'll see one of your own cars perform."

"Very well then," said Gale.

December 28th, 1935.

The Second Test

THAT afternoon Billie Devlin called round at the experimental department for another speedboat gadget. Stone had had stamped for her uncle. Stone was not in the machine shop, and Randy attended to her requirements with the utmost readiness. She appealed to him far more than Nan Gale had ever done.

"Thanks," she said. "Now we're all set."

"So we are," said Randy. "Mr. Gale himself has promised to watch the test to-morrow."

She glanced round the shop to make sure there were no listeners.

"I suppose you know Gale Motors are practically on the rocks?" she asked.

"Why no," returned Randy in surprise. "As a matter of fact, I didn't."

"Well, it's common gossip," she informed him.

"That's probably all it is," he decided. "Just gossip."

She watched him at work for a while across a lathe, then asked abruptly:

"How long have you known Nan Gale?"

He knitted his brows in an effort to remember when it was Nan claimed to have met him in the first instance.

"Oh, about a year!" he decided.

"Why?"

"I just wondered," she replied evasively.

"She's the one that got her dad to give me my chance."

"And now you're giving him a chance—a chance to stay in business!"

"Oh, come now!" he protested. "It can't be as bad as all that!"

"Uncle says so."

"Mr. Gale would know it if it's true!"

"Maybe we'd better drop the subject," said Billie. "Anyway, I've got to get back on the job—we want to finish that new speedboat I'm going to try out at the end of the week."

She offered her little hand, and he held it.

"You're not going to be too busy to have dinner with me to-night, are you?" he asked. "I'll call round for you and we'll go to the Lake Café—if that suits you."

"All right," she nodded. "And after you become rich and famous I'll remind you of the evening you spent with a poor working girl. Good-bye!"

George Stone's absence from the machine shop was due to his presence in Philip Morton's office. Morton had sent for him to ask questions about the test.

"And you're sure about it, Stone?" he insisted, handing back the blue prints over which they had both been poring.

"Positive," declared the mechanic. "The thing would put wings on a tractor. It's going to be a sensation!"

"It would be worth a lot to United Motors."

"Sure it would, if they could get it! But he's been smart enough to take out his patents on it, and as it stands now it's going to fall right into Gale's lap."

"Taken out his patents, eh?" mused Morton, puffing at a cigar. "I'm in! Well, Gale won't want it. He isn't crazy!"

"Won't want it?" echoed Stone in amazement. "Why won't he want it?"

"Because," was the significant reply, "to-morrow it isn't going to work."

"Oh!" said Stone. "I see."

"That's just it—you see that it doesn't. Later on I'll probably be able to buy it up reasonably, and you and I can get a nice price for it from United Motors."

"Right," said the mechanic, and went off with the blue prints and a grim smile.

Next morning, after a memorable evening with Billie Devlin, Randy drove to the testing ground with George Stone, where they proceeded to tune up the experimental car.

"Sorry Billie and her uncle won't be here to-day," remarked Randy, busy with the engine.

"That's all right," said Stone, with a cryptic grin, "they'll hear about it. Got that oil drained yet?"

"Sure."

Stone removed a can of oil which was standing on the ground, and a few minutes later Nan drove up to the track in her roadster with her father beside her.

"Hallo, young man!" greeted Wilson Gale as he descended. "Everything set for the test run?"

"All set," replied Randy, and then Morton arrived in his own car and walked over.

"Remember one thing, both of you," said Nan proudly. "I discovered Randy!"

"You boys all ready to go?" inquired Morton.

The bonnet of the experimental car was closed, and Randy put on his crash helmet and adjusted his goggles as he seated himself at the wheel. Stone stood back.

"Okay, Randy," he said. "Take her away."

Randy drove slowly towards the starting-line.

"Good luck!" Nan shouted after him. The broad white line was crossed, and the car began to travel.

"He's just warning her up," said Morton as the first lap was accomplished at about sixty miles an hour.

"You certainly had a hunch when you let him build that model," said Gale.

"I thought it might have possibilities," was the meek response.

"Possibilities? Why, that invention should revolutionise the industry!"

The car roared past them at a good eighty-five.

"Yes, Mr. Gale," purred Morton, "it should. Ought to be able to tell pretty quick now."

Faster and faster the car travelled, and the fourth lap was achieved at close upon a hundred miles an hour, but with a, unaccountable cloud of black smoke belching from the exhaust.

A few seconds later another black cloud began to vomit from the bonnet, and Nan climbed on to the rails to stare in alarm across the track.

The car became hidden in its own smoke at the turn, but out of the smoke there came a crash, a rending of wood-work, and the car became visible again on the grass beyond the rails, where Randy had managed to bring it to a standstill.

He heaved himself down from it, flung back the bonnet at the cost of burnt fingers, and squirted a chemical extinguisher at the almost red-hot engine, his eyes bloodshot and his face black with grime.

Nan raced across to him in high concern.

"Randy," she shrieked, "are you hurt?"

"No," he replied a trifle shakily. "Just roughed up a bit."

The others streamed up.

"What happened?" asked Wilson Gale anxiously. "It looked like the motor began to buck."

"It did," said Randy in a very gloomy voice. "Just as soon as I get a chance to look it over I'll tell you."

George Stone stooped in front of the engine.

"Here's your trouble," he announced. "Motor's froze!"

"You mean it's bound from overheating?" asked Morton.

"That's about the size of it," replied the mechanic.

Wilson Gale sighed.

"I thought it was too good to be true," he lamented.

"Well, it isn't the fault of the hook-up, Mr. Gale," declared Randy. "It worked perfectly yesterday."

"It couldn't be the fault of the motor," retorted Gale. "It's a Golden Arrow, isn't it?"

Randy bit his lip and stood gazing ruefully at the engine.

"How long since you changed your oil, Rogers?" asked Morton.

"Why, just before you got here."

Stone spread his hands with a gesture of pity for an amateur engineer.

"Well, that's the trouble with all those high-speed hook-ups," he said. "The lubrication fails to keep up with the turn-over."

"But I made allowance for that!" cried Randy.

"You did on paper," said Gale. "There's a vast difference between theory and practice."

Philip Morton seized upon the opportunity to add to Randy's humiliation.

"Didn't you say you were a graduate engineer, Rogers?"

"Yes," said Randy.

"And you didn't know that an oil-pump couldn't possibly lubricate a motor at the speed a supercharger develops?"

"I told you I took that into consideration."

"Oh, why go into it any farther?" growled Wilson Gale. "It's just another experiment gone wrong. Let's be getting back."

He walked off towards the waiting roadster and Philip Morton went with him; but Nan lingered.

"How about a lift to town?" she suggested.

"Never mind," said Randy gruffly.

"You can still go on that tour for the sales department—I'll fix it with dad."

"No, thanks."

He turned away from her, but she tugged him back again.

"Why don't you be smart, Randy?" she pleaded. "As an engineer you may be bust, but you're still good newspaper copy."

"I wish you'd forget that," he said bitterly.

"But why forget it when it means a good job for you?"

"I don't want that kind of a job. I won't be a football pensioner, if you know what I mean."

"All right," she surrendered. "See you to-morrow."

Her father was calling to her, and she ran off. Stone jerked his thumb at the derelict.

"Tow ear'll bring this in," he said.

"I'll wait for it," returned Randy.

"Okay," Stone walked down the track to the car that had brought them from the works, and after he had gone Randy proceeded to examine the engine more thoroughly.

He travelled back in the tow-car when it arrived, and he was not in the mood to talk to the man who drove it. He entered the covered yard of the experimental department, but stopped short in the doorway of the machine shop where he had toiled with such high hopes. George Stone was at a telephone with his back towards the door, and Randy gathered that Billie Devlin had rung up and did not hesitate to play the eavesdropper.

"Oh, Billie," he heard Stone say expansively, "how about a little celebration to-night? I feel like spending some money. What? Randy Rogers? Oh, he cracked up. Yeah, I told him from the beginning his invention was a flop. Eh? Well, have dinner with me to-night and I'll tell you all about it."

Evidently Billie declined the invitation, for in a disappointed voice Stone

"You're a little fool!" roared Randy, and Billie would have struck him in the face had not Terry caught hold of her wrist.

informed her that he was sorry she couldn't make it and hung up. Randy crossed the threshold as he moved away from the instrument and he swung round.

"Tough luck, kid," he said with pretended sympathy. "I told you to watch that oil pressure."

Randy strode towards him, and his brown eyes were fierce.

"You know there was enough oil pressure to lubricate that motor!" he stormed.

"I don't know anything," retorted Stone. "It's your invention."

"It's my invention," agreed Randy, "but somebody tampered with the oil in that motor. I found traces of emery dust in it. Do you know anything about that?"

Stone clenched his fists.

"If you're insinuating—" he began heatedly.

"I'm just asking," Randy interrupted grimly.

"Then I'm just telling you. You're talking through your hat. I don't know anything about it."

For several seconds they eyed one another inimically; then Randy pulled off his overalls and turned away to get his hat and coat.

Morton Shows His Hand

RANDY wiped the dust of the "Home of the Golden Arrows" from his feet that day. His parents, both of whom were dead, had not left him any very large sum of money, but he was proud and he believed in himself.

In the weeks that followed he avoided Nan Gale and saw nothing of Billie Devlin. In his comfortable flat on the fifth floor of an apartment-house in Hobart Street he got out fresh drawings of his invention and could find nothing wrong with the earlier ones.

Meanwhile the sales of Golden Arrows continued to diminish and the inevitable happened. United Motors acquired Gale Motors, and Wilson Gale fulfilled his vow to retire from business rather than be associated in any way with the triumphant company. He was already a millionaire, and though his heart was in the motor business he was in a position to spend the rest of his life in leisured luxury.

Randy read all about the merger in the newspaper, and he was not altogether surprised when he received a letter from Philip Morton, who had been appointed general manager of the "Golden Arrow" division of United Motors, requesting him to call.

He found Morton installed in the imposing private office that had been Gale's.

"Glad to see you, Rogers," said the suave crook, toying with a pencil. "D'you know I had quite a job locating you."

"I've shifted my quarters," said Randy quietly. "There didn't seem to be any reason why you should want to know where I lived. The last time I was here—"

"Yes, yes, I know," Morton interrupted, "but I haven't forgotten your splendid efforts, Rogers, and I thought I might still be able to help. Sit down."

Randy seated himself in a chair and a box of cigars was pushed in his direction, but he declined to smoke.

"Things are different since United Motors absorbed Golden Arrow," said Morton.

"So I see," returned Randy, glancing about the room. "By the way, what happened to Mr. Gale?"

"Well, he always said he'd quit before he'd sell out to United, so when they took over his company on a decision of the stockholders he kept his word."

"It seems a shame."

Philip Morton shrugged his shoulders and put down the pencil.

"Business, my boy," he said smoothly. "You want to look out for yourself all the time. That's what I had to do when they asked me to take over for United." He lit one of the cigars Randy had rejected. "However, one of the first things I remembered was your invention."

Randy was on his feet in an instant. "What about my invention?" he demanded sharply.

"Regardless of its disastrous test," was the guarded reply, "it has possibilities. I talked to Stone about it, and he tells me that all you need is a little more time to perfect it."

Randy leaned over the desk and planted a fist upon its polished surface. "Just what do you want, Mr. Morton?" he challenged.

"If I offered you a job to develop this hook-up and offered you every practical assistance necessary to develop it, would you be interested?"

"I might."

"Of course," purred Morton, "experiments cost money, but I have a friend who might put it up if you were willing to dispose of those patents you hold."

So this was it! The cards were on the table at last!

"If I let my patents go you'll give me a job, that's what you mean, eh?" said Randy.

"You put it rather bluntly," responded Morton, and picked up the pencil to stab the blotting-pad with it, "but that's about what it comes to."

"It seems a little funny, Mr. Morton," Randy bit back at him. "My experiment proves a failure, and now you want to buy it."

"I've made you an offer in good faith."

"Yes," cried Randy seathingly, "the same good faith you used when you grabbed the Golden Arrow for United Motors. Don't try to deny it, Mr. Morton—everybody in the auto world knows what your appointment here meant."

Philip Morton's face became almost purple and his eyes malignant.

"Get out of here!" he roared.

"Okay," drawled Randy, and he put his hat on his head and turned towards the door.

"You can be sure of one thing, too, Rogers," Morton shouted after him. "It'll be useless for you to offer your invention or your services to any other manufacturer!"

"We'll see about that!" Randy retorted over his shoulder, and though he was in a fine temper he did not slam the door behind him.

Figuratively, however, he found all other doors closed to him when he set out to justify his defiance. He tried in vain to interview important people in the automobile world, and he called on works managers only to meet with rebuffs.

Months had elapsed and his funds were running low when he searched the waterfront in quest of a job and quite by accident found one. It was on a wharf in Los Angeles harbour that he heard two men talking, and pricked up his ears.

"Where's the other boat, Joe?" asked one of them, a typical waterman of enormous bulk.

"Didn't show up this afternoon," grunted Joe, who looked almost a skeleton beside his companion. "He's probably on another binge."

"There's a big crowd out on the fishing barge this afternoon," complained the bulky one, "and we need both boats. The fleet will be coming in within the hour."

The harbour was crowded with shipping; the blue waters of the bay beyond the wharves and piers sparkled in the sunlight, and a mile farther along the waterfront a speedboat was putting out from a narrow strip of planking. Randy looked at a sturdy vessel moored to the wharf on which he stood—a motor vessel, half boat, half launch, with a pilot-house amidships, known locally as a water-taxi, and walked up to the two men.

"I hear you need a pilot," he said. They stared at him, but they were in a dilemma, and the man who possessed no waistine chewed tobacco and spat on the boards of the wharf.

"Can you run a motor-boat?" he inquired.

"Sure," replied Randy with the utmost confidence, "I can run a fleet of 'em."

"We'll see! Here, take this boat out to the Ocean Queen fishing barge. Joe, you go with him the first trip. If he can run her, pick up the other boat."

Randy and Joe went aboard the water-taxi, and Randy started up the engine and took the wheel after Joe had cast off. They stood together in the pilot house as the vessel chugged across the water.

The speedboat parted company from the float against which it had been resting, and Randy caught sight of Terry Devlin standing on the boards, shielding his eyes against the sun, and recognised him.

The speed-boat streaked towards the water-taxi, and Randy guessed that Billie was at its wheel, though she was wearing goggles. He increased speed, seeing that her intention was to cut across his bows, and he leaned out of the window of the pilot-house to griu mockingly down at her.

"Hi, landlubber!" she shouted.

Randy laughed aloud and drew in his head to make a real race of it.

"Somebody you know?" inquired Joe curiously.

"Yeah," nodded Randy.

A fussy little tug and a stately clipper were left behind, and then the engine of the speedboat began to splutter. A harbour service station loomed ahead, and it became evident that Billie proposed to put in beside its floating platform to see what was wrong.

"I'm going to give her a bath!" announced Randy, and gripped the wheel.

The water-taxi swung round in a quarter of a circle just as the speedboat was drawing alongside the pier, creating a huge wave that drenched the girl from head to feet.

"Landlubber yourself!" bellowed Randy from the window of the pilot house—and the water-taxi swept on its way.

"Somebody ought to report that guy!" exploded a mechanic who ran out from the service station to Billie's assistance. "He's crazy!"

"Oh, he's all right!" laughed Billie. "He's a friend of mine."

An Unexpected Visitor

ALL that afternoon Randy travelled to and fro between the Ocean Queen and the shore, running the water-taxi by himself after the first trip.

But after his task was at an end and he had received payment for services rendered, he made his way along the waterfront to Terry Devlin's speedboat works.

These works were unpretentious but picturesque, consisting of wooden sheds with long, narrow landing-stages and a workshop of corrugated iron labelled, modestly enough: "T. Devlin, Marine Mechanic."

He received quite a warm welcome from Billie and her uncle, and was provided with tea in the workshop. Billie asked him all about the test run which had proved such a failure, and he said emphatically:

"I'm positive somebody added something to that oil just before I started."

"Well," said Terry Devlin, "according to Stone your supercharger blew up the oiling system."

"We saw it work perfectly the day before!" cried Billie. "I think Randy's right. Somebody didn't want that test to succeed!"

"Whatever it was," sighed Randy, "it certainly spelt my fun-sh with Gale Motors."

"Why didn't you look us up?" asked Terry. "I can always use a good mechanic."

"Well, I didn't think—"

"Say," exclaimed Billie, "would that supercharger work on an outboard motor?"

"I don't see why it shouldn't," said Randy.

She marched him over to a bench on which a two-cylinder outboard motor reposed, and Randy decided that his supercharger could be adapted to such a machine.

"Uncle Terry, look!" Billie cried excitedly. "If Randy's supercharger could give us as much added speed as it did that car, we could cop that race. Then we'd be flooded with orders!"

Terry Devlin caressed his rather scrubby chin.

"Maybe Randy isn't anxious to—" he began; but Randy cut him short.

"I'm anxious to do anything that'll prove my hook-up will work," he declared.

"Then it's settled!" rejoiced Billie. "We install one on the Phantom and show 'em all up!"

They shook hands on it, and next morning Randy started work on a new supercharger to fit the requirements of an outboard speedboat. Billie proved as good a mechanic as her uncle had described her, and all three got on perfectly together.

The Phantom, a white stream-lined boat, was run out from one of the sheds some days later, and Randy set up the outboard motor, complete with the new supercharger, while Terry Devlin helped. When all was ready he stepped into the boat, and Billie squeezed in beside him, eager for adventure.

"Look," said Randy, "we'll start at the club-house and time her to the break-water and back. That's about an even mile."

"Okay," said Billie.

The engine buzzed, and the speedboat slipped away from the narrow landing-stage and sped off across the harbour. Terry was standing on the boards with a pair of binoculars to his eyes, watching its progress, when a feminine voice hailed him from the end of the stage.

"Hallo! You're Terry Devlin, aren't you?"

"Reckon I am," he called back, and lowered the glasses. "Why, it's Miss Gale!"

It was Nan Gale, looking delightfully fresh and cool in a yachting costume, and he walked along to her.

"I understand Randy Rogers is working for you," she said. "Where is he?"

"He's out on the water," Devlin replied. "He—he'll be back after a while."

"I'll wait," she decided.

He held the binoculars to his eyes again. The supercharger was evidently functioning, for the Phantom was streaking across the water with its nose in the air.

"Look at 'em go!" he cried. "They must be doing better than sixty!"

Nan took the glasses, but held them only for a few moments.

"I take it that's fast for a motor-boat," she said.

"That's faster'n any outboard ever went around here!" rejoiced Terry.

"First time one was ever driven by an all-American, isn't it?"

"A what?" Terry had never bothered his head about football.

"Randy Rogers," said Nan. "He's quite a pilot, isn't he?"

"It's that supercharger hook-up of his," explained Terry. "That's where he's getting that speed."

Nan looked startled. "I thought his supercharger idea was a failure," she said.

"Doesn't look like it, does it?" demanded Terry, the binoculars once more glued to his eyes. "They're timing a lap now."

The club-house on the far side of the harbour had been reached, and the speedboat was racing towards the breakwater and the Pacific Ocean.

Billie, with her hair blowing and her face smudged with oil, was looking after the engine while Randy guided the craft.

"Get her up to sixty-five," he shouted, "and I'll lay you the best dinner in town to-night!"

"That's a bet!" she shouted back.

Terry Devlin might almost have heard, for at that moment he said to Nan Gale:

"He and Billie make a great team. They can both handle motors."

"Must be nice for Randy to have someone with him who's as expert as he is," said Nan. "This Billie—does he work for you, too?"

"Billie?" Devlin's attention was concentrated upon the speedboat. "Oh, yes, yes. Billie's the best boy I ever had working for me."

The Phantom had reached the breakwater and was coming back, slapping the water as though trying to escape from it altogether.

"Sixty-seven," Billie presently informed Randy. "How's that?"

"That's great!" he replied.

"I'll take steak and fried potatoes."

The clubhouse was passed, speed was slackened, and the harbour was crossed. The Phantom slid in between the two narrow landing-stages and came gently to rest almost at Terry Devlin's feet.

"Sixty-seven!" Billie cried triumphantly as he held the boat for her to step ashore.

"That's fine," he said.

She scrambled out on to the boards and Randy followed. Nan ran to meet him and his eyes widened at sight of her.

"Well, this is a surprise!" he gulped. "Where—"

"Dad's yacht is in the harbour," explained Nan, "and I heard the pilot of the water-taxi talking about your new motor-boat."

"Oh," said Randy. "Well, I'm glad you hunted me up. You remember Mr. Devlin?"

"Yes, indeed," she replied. "He's been telling me all about you and your friend."

"My friend?" Randy looked puzzled. "Yes, the boy you were racing with."

"Oh!" Randy grinned with sudden comprehension. "Oh, you mean Billie." He turned to Billie, who was standing stockstill, none too pleased by the re-appearance of the "Gale girl." "Come here, Billie."

Billie advanced with an unpleasant feeling of inferiority, knowing that her hair was all blown and her face was very dirty, and Nan gaped at her.

"You know each other," said Randy with a grin.

"Glad to see you again," lied Billie, with as much nonchalance as she could summon.

"How d'you do?" murmured Nan.

"Kind of blowy after the run," said Billie. "Will you excuse me while I freshen up a bit?"

She ran off to a cabin which formed the domestic quarters of her uncle and herself, and Terry Devlin called out:

"You go ahead, Randy—I'll take care of the boat."

"All right," Randy returned, and he walked with Nan from the landing-stage to a wooden seat outside the corrugated iron workshop, where they sat with all the harbour spread out before them.

"Now I understand your interest in motor-boats," said Nan slyly, and that rather irritated Randy.

"Her uncle was the only one that'd give me a break when I couldn't get a job," he informed her warily.

"She seems very sweet."

"Oh, sure," he agreed. "We're good friends. I sort of depend on her."

"Yes, I can see that."

Randy rose up indignantly. "Billie's the best outboard driver I ever saw," he declared more warmly.

"She's going to help me put this supercharger of mine over."

Nan perceived that she had gone a little too far.

"Wait a minute, Randy," she said. "Sit down, I want to talk to you."

He sat down again rather stily, and she said with a pout:

"You haven't learned yet, have you?"

"Learned what?"

"That things aren't handled like that. It takes publicity and advertising to put anything over. Here you are, a former all-American, and only chance led me to find out where you were."

"Well," he retorted, "if we win the speedboat race to-morrow maybe a few people will know. But it'll be honest commercial publicity based on an engineering accomplishment, and not on a football game."

She accepted the rebuke without comment.

"Is your boat entered in the race?" she inquired, rather unnecessarily, and he replied that it was.

"Think you can win?"

"Sure of it," he asserted, "and this time nobody's going to tamper with the oil."

She looked at him sharply.

"What do you mean by that remark?" she asked in manifest surprise.

"I might as well tell you the truth, Nan," he said bitterly. "Somebody didn't want your father to see a successful test run."

"Who?"

"I don't know," he confessed with a shake of his head, "but I guess it would be somebody that would want him to sell out cheaply and retire, just as he did."

She did not seem to be as concerned about the matter as he had expected her to be, but that was because she had something else on her mind.

"Randy," she asked abruptly, "what

"Give her my compliments," said Randy, "and tell her I hope she finishes a good second."

would you say if I told you that dad was going back into business?"

"Is he?" exclaimed Randy. "You mean that?"

"Maybe I'm telling state secrets, but in a few months you'll see an announcement of a new car on the market—the 'Gale' eight. Old friends who still believe in dad have formed a company."

That opened up an entirely new vista, and Randy's eyes sparkled.

"Then there's still a chance to convince him, isn't there?" he said. "If he sees the race to-morrow he must be convinced. Do you think he will see it?"

"Come to the yacht club for dinner to-night," she suggested, "and tell him just what you've told me."

The appointment with Billie was forgotten.

"Do you think he'll believe me?"

"I'm sure of it," declared Nan.

The Way of a Girl

A TAXICAB drew up in the roadway behind the car Nan had left standing there and a tall, red-headed young man in a slouch hat descended from it and walked over to the form on which Nan and Randy were seated.

"Excuse me, sir," he said, tipping his hat. "My name is Ward, representing the 'Tribune.' I saw the specification of your motor in the entry for to-morrow's speedboat race. It sounded different. Is there a story in it for my paper?"

Randy said he didn't think there was, but Nan cried out:

"You bet there's a story in it. Do you know who this modest young man really is?"

"Oh, wait a minute, Nan!" protested Randy; but it was too late. The reporter screwed up his eyes and said:

"Well, the name does sound rather familiar."

"You played it all over your front pages last year," prompted Nan.

"Say, thanks for the tip, lady. Randy Rogers, the all-American!" The reporter beamed at Randy. "Gee, that is a story! If you don't mind I'll rush along now and get it in an early edition. Good luck, Rogers."

He seized hold of Randy's hand and shook it vigorously, then rushed back to his taxi.

"I wish you hadn't mentioned that," Randy said reproachfully to Nan, but she only laughed.

"You'd better wash up," she said. "I'll wait for you in the car. I have one or two things to do in town, and I guess you'll want to go home and dress. We'll have tea somewhere first."

"Sure you don't mind waiting?" he asked.

"Not for you, Randy," she assured him.

She went off to the car, in which she proceeded to make up her face, while he turned towards the cabin. Billie was in the living-room, clean of face but still in her overalls, and he had a sudden suspicion that she had been listening, for she greeted him with:

"Hi, landlubber, what's the hurry?"

"Why," he stammered, "I—"

"Take your time," she said. "I'm not all that hungry. Besides, I've got to dress."

He remembered the bet and her selection of steak and fried potatoes, and he bit his lip.

"Look, Billie," he said rather meekly, "something has come up. Miss Gale told me to—"

"Oh, is she still here?" bridled Billie.

"Well—er—would you—er—would you mind very much if we postponed our dinner until to-morrow night?"

December 28th, 1935.

"Why?" she challenged.

"Well, you see, I promised—"

"You're going out with Miss Gale; is that it?"

Billie had a very decided little chin, and at the moment it was tilted angrily. There were sparks in her hazel eyes, too. But Randy was not sufficiently acquainted with the ways of women to realise that she was jealous.

"It's strictly a matter of business," he said. "Her father—"

"No need to make excuses!" flamed Billie. "Our date's off! It never existed!"

"But Billie," he protested, "you don't understand."

She flounced away from him to the door, and in the doorway she brushed past her uncle, who was carrying the outboard motor which he had removed from the boat he had put away.

"Oh, Billie," he said joyfully, "I just checked the oil in the motor, and it's as good as when—"

"Forget it!" she snapped and disappeared into the workshop.

Terry Devlin gaped at Randy.

"What's the matter?" he inquired blankly. "You and Billie had a fight?"

"No," growled Randy. "I guess I just don't understand women."

"Well," returned Terry with a grin, "if you think anyone has a patent on that, son, you're crazy!"

Randy shed his overalls, washed his hands and face and combed his hair, and went off with Nan Gale without seeing Billie again.

At half-past six in the evening, just as Philip Morton was signing letters in his office, George Stone bust in upon him and dumped a copy of the "Tribune" upon his desk.

"I thought that might interest you," he said.

A considerable amount of space on the front page of the paper was devoted to the speed-boat race which was to take place on the morrow, and Randy's name occurred in headlines. With frowning eyes Morton read all about the boat the young man was to pilot.

"So here's got it working again!" he muttered.

"Yes," said Stone, "and between ourselves, we know that supercharger's a great hook-up."

"Yeah," Morton flung down the paper. "The car that grabs it will put quite a dent in the sales of United Motors."

"Do you think he'd sell?"

"Not to us. He's not the kind you can take more than once."

"Which means that one of our competitors is sure to land it," said Stone gloomily.

Morton shook his head.

"I don't think so," he said, looking straight into the mechanic's face. "But it's going to put a little job right in your lap, Stone."

Stone beamed at the prospect.

"I think I'll look those boats over to-morrow," he drawled.

"Before the race," said Morton meaningly, and looked at the paper again. "He's driving the Phantom—owner's name is Terence Devlin."

"I know Devlin," returned Stone, "and I know his place."

"That may make it easy," said Morton, "but it ought to make you careful."

Randy had tea with Nan Gale at the famous Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles, after which she dropped him outside the apartment-house in Hamilton Street, to which he had removed his old quarters; and he was arrayed in evening clothes when she called for him soon after seven o'clock.

She swept him off to the Long Beach Yacht Club, across the bay, and in the luxurious club-house he had dinner with her and her father to the soft music of a first-class orchestra and with millionaires and commercial magnates at the other tables in the spacious restaurant.

Afterwards the three went out on to a balcony overlooking the harbour and its twinkling lights, and there Wilson Gale reverted to the story Randy had told him during the meal.

"It's hard to believe, Rogers," he said, "that anyone would deliberately jeopardise your life and future as well as ruin my business. Why, if you hadn't acted so quickly the car would have been in flames!"

"Yes," agreed Randy. "And the worst part of the whole thing is that it's so hard to prove anything, except in one way—the hook-up does work, and it's no different from the first one."

"You'll see that in the race to-morrow, dad," chimed in Nan.

"I must certainly see the race," decided Gale. "And all I can say is that if your supercharger works under racing conditions it must be all right."

"I was never more certain of anything in my life, Mr. Gale," averred Randy.

"And it does work?" said Nan to her father.

"Well," he replied, contemplating the glowing end of his cigar, "if I can make a deal with Rogers, we'll install it as a regular feature of the new Gale eight."

Randy looked gratefully at the girl who had done her best to help him.

"I won't be hard to do business with," he murmured; and then Wilson Gale took out his watch.

"Will you excuse me now?" he asked pleasantly. "I've got to talk to some bankers. I'll be at the finish-line to-morrow."

Randy expressed his thanks. Nan bade her father good-night.

"Don't worry about me, dad," she said. "I've garaged the car, and Randy will take me back to the yacht."

Randy and Nan were left together on the balcony in the moonlight. Through the open doorway of a ball-room only a few yards away came the strains of a languorous waltz.

"Your dad's been fine about everything," breathed Randy.

"Oh, dad's all right!" returned Nan. "But you've got to win to-morrow. Now let's forget about boats and motors."

"Shall we go inside and dance?" he inquired.

The balcony was broad and comparatively deserted.

"Why go inside?" she asked softly.

So they danced on the balcony.

A Blow for Randy!

WHEN Randy reached the speed-boat works next morning he made straight for the shed in which the Phantom was housed. The outboard motor was standing on a bench, but the supercharger was missing.

Filled with apprehension, he shouted for Billie and for her uncle at the top of his voice while he looked all about the shed for his invention.

Billie sauntered in at the door, her hands in the pockets of her overalls and her head in the air.

"Looking for something?" she asked disdainfully.

With relentless fury John Wyatt persecuted the outlaws of the West, and with his band of Vigilantes he smashed up gang after gang; he swore never to give up the trail of vengeance until he had wiped out the fiends who had murdered his parents in the early settler days

STARRING JOHN WAYNE

Vigilantes

VIGILANTES were a self-constituted judicial body, organized in the Western States of America for the protection of life and property. Settlers and pioneers in the early days had to wage continual warfare with Red Indians, and when the latter had been tamed there rose the menace of desperadoes and renegades. These men formed themselves into bands and they pillaged covered wagon trains with less mercy than the bloodthirsty Redskins. Their power increased, and many a small settlement was seared to take any action because the mayor, the sheriff, or the saloon-keeper were in the pay of these rascals. In June, 1851, at San Francisco, the crimes of the desperadoes who had immigrated to the gold-fields caused some men to collect at a secret rendezvous. As everyone in power seemed corrupt and there was no law they would make themselves the law, and these men called themselves "Vigilantes." They cleared the city of the scum. Other states followed their example, and Vigilante bodies came into prominence in Idaho, Montana, and California. These organisations sprung up when outlaw bands were raiding and pillaging, and lasted until the band had been wiped out. The Vigilantes were usually masked, and they gave their prisoners a brief trial before hanging them. This story deals with a band of Vigilantes who rode white horses and ruthlessly persecuted the bad men of the West. The story opens in the years 1848 and ends in 1863.

Ballard's Callous Crime

IT was a morning in early summer when Mark Wyatt crossed the plains of Southern California. With him were his wife Hanna, their two young sons, John and Jim, and about half a dozen pioneers and their dependants. There were four wagons in the train, two hundred head of cattle, and the destination was Maple Valley. A lonely, out-of-the-way valley, but rich in vegetation and containing many springs of fresh water.

Mark Wyatt had sold up his small store in the state of Wisconsin and trekked towards the fertile valleys of California. Falling in with other pioneers they had formed themselves into a wagon train.

To the boys it was a grand adventure this coming to a new land. John was ten, and very grown-up for his age. He could drive a wagon, fire a gun, ride any of the horses and could cook and sew. Jim was five and a mischievous imp. One of John's tasks was keeping an eye on Jim and seeing he kept out of mischief. On this day John was driving a baggage wagon and Jim was on the seat beside him.

They got a big thrill in looking out for wild animals. Caribou, moose, elk, antelope, mountain sheep, beaver, otter and mink were only seen on rare occasions, but they saw plenty of deer, coyotes and jack-rabbits. Musk rats and skunks were creatures that might be found in Maple Valley. Blue grouse, partridges, pheasant and quail abounded in large numbers, whilst the streams were full of speckled trout.

But though it was a holiday for the boys it was grim business for Mark and Hanna Wyatt and the other settlers. All their worldly belongings were in these wagons and it would be a hard fight for existence in Maple Valley. Huts would have to be built, land cultivated and crops planted. This valley might not be so fertile as depicted and the land barren.

The sun beat down mercilessly on the wagon train. Mark Wyatt showed his wife the distant smudge on the horizon, and told her it was a forest at the foot of the Saddle Mountains. Soon they would see the hills, where Maple Valley was situated.

It was growing dusk when the great plain was almost crossed and the promised land lay ahead. Mark Wyatt decided to push on and make camp by a small wood. Two miles more and the great trek would be almost over. The pioneers, though tired and exhausted, gazed eagerly at the vast Saddle Mountains and quickened their pace.

In a narrow canyon were a number of mounted men. An evil, unpleasant bunch of rascals. Bad men and renegades, under the leadership of Mat Ballard. The leader was a monster of a man, heavy-jowled, dark and sinister. A clatter of hoofs and a horseman, a young, hard-eyed youth with the face of a hawk, rode up the canyon at a hard pace.

"What news, Red?" Ballard asked. "Our luck's in," came the answer. "Have just sighted a train of six wagons with about two or three hundred head o' cattle."

"Any escort?" "Nothing to speak of." Red shook his head. "We could get to close quarters before they got wise to our game."

"We could get a good price for those cattle at Mountain Creek." Mat Ballard's face twisted into an avaricious grin. "All right, boys, let's go."

Not many minutes later Ballard and his gang stared down at the wagon train.

"Ride down in a body and then open up," he decided. "You, Red, will take six of the boys to the right flank. Farley, you do the same to the left, and I'll attack from the front. If they show resistance shoot 'em down." John was whistling blithely when he stopped abruptly.

"Coo, look at all those riders. Wonder who they are?"

"Are they Indians?"

"No, but I don't like the look of them. Hallo, what's happening?" John pointed. "Pop's turning."

Mark Wyatt had sensed these men were enemies and decided that his best chance was to get all the wagons together. The wagons would make a barricade. It was an old method of fighting Indians when they rode round on their circle of death.

But Ballard's horses were swift and he had expected such a move. The raiders swept down and round the helpless wagon train and soon the guns were blazing.

Poor Mark Wyatt was struck down by a bullet, and bravely his wife took the reins when her husband slid off the box-seat to the dust. They showed no mercy did that gang of murderers. Hanna Wyatt toppled backwards with a bullet through her heart.

The other pioneers tried to put up a fight, but it was a spirited effort. One bullet did fetch down one of Ballard's men, and that made the rascals so angry that they not only shot down men and women, but also murdered the children.

A hullet struck one of the horses of the baggage wagon and sent both animals mad with fright. They bolted, and John was unable to hold them. The wagon crashed over some stones, and John, losing his balance, was flung from his seat. He hit the ground with a thud and lay still.

Little Jim had toppled backwards into the baggage, but the kid had spirit and managed to seize hold of a rifle.

The gang rounded up the wagons, removed everything of value, and then fired them. The cattle were driven towards the hills to a secret canyon. The last wagon to round up was the runaway, but Red rode alongside the maddened horses. They were about to lift the flap at the back when a rifle was poked through and a childish voice cried:

"Hands up!"

Red grabbed the harrel, and then they saw it was a small boy.

Ballard roared with mirth.

"Say, that kid's got nerve. Let's take him along with us."

Howling and screaming they strapped Jim to a saddle, and, gloating in their victory, rode away.

It was dusk when John Wyatt stirred and sat up. He blinked his eyes and wondered what had happened until he saw the blazing wagons, then he remembered. There was no sign of the raiders, and John did not care very much as he got to his feet and staggered across the plain.

First he found the body of his father and gazed down as if this were some terrible nightmare, then dazedly he moved forward till he came to the figure of his dear mother. He knelt beside her, and though he did not touch her he knew she was dead.

There and then he vowed an oath that he would never rest till he had revenged himself for the murder of his parents. No sign could he find of his brother, and he stayed till morning for a last search. If his brother lived he would find him if he went to the ends of the earth.

Two days later John was seen and rescued by another wagon train, who chose another route when they heard the boy's story of the massacre.

The Forming of the Vigilantes

THOSE settlers soon found that John Wyatt was a useful lad and respected his silent ways, but as the boy grew older the shadow of the past faded but never grew dim. He listened to the advice of elders that it was better to forget.

"One may forget but never forgive," he had answered. "And when I am old enough I am going to search for my brother and the people that killed my mother and father. Never shall I know peace until I have found those fiends"

A settler adopted John, taught him well and coached him with riding and roping. At fifteen, John was the brightest lad in the settlement and the best horseman. At sixteen he experienced a brush with outlaws. It was John who warned the encampment. It looked as if the settlers would be trapped in a peaceful valley, but John had explored the rocks, and with three men gained the safety of the cliffs. From cover they shot down with deadly accuracy on the raiders, who finally rode off leaving six men dead and two badly wounded.

At eighteen John was a trapper and scout, but he had developed wanderlust. He would leave the kindly folk that had adopted him and vanish for days at a time. They knew he was seeking news of the murderers of his parents.

The west was still overrun with rogues and renegades, and John, at nineteen, was in command of a wagon train when attacked. The enemy were surprised at the speediness of the settlers in putting themselves in a state of defence and alarmed by the deadly shooting. When they fled John Wyatt pursued them and brought down two before they reached the safety of the hills.

The kindly folk that he called mother and father died and left John a very valuable ranch. John was twenty-one when they passed over, and for the next three years he worked like a slave making the ranch one of the finest for hundreds of miles around. Moreover, he erected stout barricades round the ranch and had watchmen always on duty. His men rode range always in couples. Two were killed and a hundred head of cattle rustled, but John found out and got his cattle back with four prisoners.

These prisoners were taken off to the nearest gaol, and an angry mob broke into the cell, took the rustlers and gave them a necktie party from the nearest tree. John was too late to do anything. It was primitive justice, and he could not blame the people. There was a lot of unrest among the ranches, settlements and villages, and justice had a way of going astray.

John reached the age of twenty-five, and was satisfied that he could safely leave matters in the capable hands of his foreman, Campbell. He announced that he was going away, and the foreman knew that Wyatt was renewing his search.

In the small cowtowns John noticed the unrest and uneasiness prevailing. Rustling, robbery, pillage and murder were everyday occurrences. The saloons prospered and the towns were full of gamblers, who would shoot anybody for the price of a few drinks. It was then that John thought of those men bursting into the gaol and dragging out those four outlaws and hanging them.

One day he rode into the big town of Custer and was present at a trial of two outlaws. Obviously guilty, they were pardoned and went away laughing.

Custer was the centre of all the evil that prevailed, and the next day John had audience with the mayor and members of the council.

Frankly and fearlessly he spoke and explained his idea, and they listened in silence.

"Gentlemen, advance me some money and I will rid you of these pests," he concluded. "I will give a large sum of my own money as well. But not only do I want money—I need power. Power to form together a body of men to fight these crooks. Grant me permission to form this body and I will clear Southern California of this scourge."

John looked at them hopefully.

The mayor looked at his councillors and knew that his opinion was the same as their own.

"John Wyatt," he began. "We have heard of you, the tragedy of your youth, and the fine deeds that you have done as a young man in fighting outlaws. We also know that the Orchard Ranch is one of the finest in California, that it is superbly run and so well protected that it is almost impregnable. I speak on behalf of all present when I say that we agree with all that you have told us in this room to-day, and that we would willingly help—if we were able." He paused. "You have told us of the deplorable conditions existing, and we are only too well aware of them, but we have no money and little power. I am risking a bullet in speaking as frankly as I do, but I think that every member here is for justice. But though we're for justice our hands are tied. Not only are the coffers empty, but to suggest the organisation of such a body would be to start a massacre in this town."

"But, surely, the people would back you up?"

"They are cowed like we are," the mayor said. "The judges are corrupt and there is scarcely a sheriff, that is not in with these outlaws. If a peaceful citizen dares to voice an opinion he is likely to be shot. If there is a shooting affray all the people scuttle to their slacks like rats. John Wyatt, we are powerless."

"I am a peaceable citizen till I am roused," John Wyatt cried. "I will see if I cannot find a few brave men. I thank you, gentlemen, for listening to me. You'll either hear of my body being found or you'll hear something very different. Good-day!"

Very carefully John Wyatt went to work on a daring idea. He had heard of attempts to form bands of Vigilantes in other towns and he was determined to do the same. At the end of the month John had found out a great deal about certain of these peaceful citizens.

At last came the day.

A grimy blacksmith at work in his forge heard a knock at his door, and he found a note pinned to the woodwork by a sharp peg.

"Your wife was shot dead when you decided to settle in California. Outlaws shot her down and your only child. If you want justice be at Thacker's barn one hour after sunset."

All men who had suffered at the hands of these desperadoes received a similar letter. If they wanted justice to be at Thacker's barn one hour after sunset.

Every one of those men answered the call and went. There were sixty men, old and young, in that barn. By the light of flickering torches John Wyatt talked to his audience and held them spellbound by the power of his words.

"I want twenty picked men," Wyatt cried. "Men that are fearless and can ride and shoot well. They must be prepared to do and risk everything for the cause. No danger must be too great. Every man shall ride a white horse, wear a dark shirt and have a light necktie. In the hills above Custer there is a canyon that would make a fine hide-out. I want twenty men to meet me there in three days from now. Who will join me?"

They all wanted to go. Carefully he questioned those that wanted to serve with him, and finally he picked the twenty that were the strongest and seemed the most fearless. Then he dismissed the others with instructions to be ready at any time to answer the call of justice. To his picked men he gave his orders.

A few days later there rode out of Pasco Canyon a party of horsemen. Their leader rode a great white stallion, and all the other horses were white. The Vigilantes were going to wage a lone fight against the outlaws and desperadoes.

Justice With a Vengeance

VERY soon people began to talk about the White Riders, who came out of the hills to protect travelers and settlers. They did not hang any outlaws, but they killed many and took numbers of prisoners. The latter they would hand over to the nearest sheriff, and woe betide that cowtown if something were not done. Once or twice the prisoners were freed and were generally brought back within a few hours with a grim warning to the sheriff that justice must be done.

One sheriff, in the pay of a gang, tried to round up the White Riders and was himself captured. John Wyatt handed the man over to the citizens he had persecuted. With a rawhide whip the sheriff felt the weight of their wrath. They gave him a horse and he rode away never to return.

After a while, John found hundreds of pioneers who wanted to join the White Riders. He did not wish to make his band too large, and always kept the number at two dozen men. He did organize another band and give them a leader, but would have nothing to do with the command.

"Many help me in the cause," were his parting words to the man he had appointed. "I have spies and friends the width and length of California, and I shall only seek you out if I hear that you and your men are not working for the cause of justice. Look after the eastern section of the Yakima district and you relieve me of a great responsibility. Good luck!"

Many a time desperadoes would ride down on an apparently defenceless wagon train to find that each wagon was bristling with armed men. Wyatt had corralled his horses and lain hidden in the wagons. Gang after gang he broke up by his daring.

His men were better mounted and they were a grim, resolute body of men. No ride was too hard or too long if it were to help the cause. Sometimes the bad men would bring off a raid or indulge in a shooting affray, but within a few hours the White Riders, who had been reported as many hours ride away, would appear as if by magic. The name of John Wyatt came to be dreaded by the wrongdoer.

Of every prisoner that he captured John asked questions, and they concerned the gang that had murdered his parents. He knew when a man was lying, and it was seldom that prisoners refused to talk. An ominous display of guns and the playful handling of a rope were enough to scare the truth out of these cowardly curs. Wyatt learnt many facts and particulars, but he could not find any man who had been connected with his own tragedy.

Report came to him of trouble in the San Juan district, which was a part of California in which the White Riders had not yet operated. Among the rocks of the Cactus Mountains the White Riders had a well-earned rest, though Wyatt had his scouts patrol commanding positions of the fertile plains.

On the third day a scout reported a small wagon train moving in an easterly direction. John Wyatt ordered his men to horse.

The wagon train was jolting over the plains when Wyatt and his men appeared on the trail that snaked down the mountain side. It was a gradual descent, and Wyatt kept the train constantly in sight.

"Are you expecting an attack?" a White Rider asked.

John smiled.

"I was expecting that train. I heard that some miners were anxious to go to a certain canyon to seek for gold, and were hesitating about starting on account of danger. I went and saw the leader, and told him to start when he was ready and that I would be on the look-out for him. He was to tell no one of his talk with me, but let it be known that he was crossing the plains and that he wasn't scared of outlaws. Whether the bait will lure the enemy remains to be seen." The leader's face hardened. "He also had instructions to exaggerate the value of his wagon train, and I think that'll bring some of the rats out into the open."

A scout appeared and reported that he had seen six horsemen watering their horses at a stream a mile ahead.

"A tough-looking bunch, John," reported the scout. "All are well armed, and they are obviously out for mischief. I got near enough to hear their plans. They do not intend to attack in the open, but he in the rocks and shoot down the pioneers as they pass up that gorge." He pointed. "See those jutting cliffs? Well, the trail leads up the gorge between."

John Wyatt ordered the scout to lead the way, and to call a halt at a safe distance from the stream.

Then the leader of the White Riders went on alone and looked at the men, who were camped near the stream, and knew at once that these men were as cut-throat a crowd as he had ever seen. He guessed that at least one more must constitute this band, and that they were waiting here for news of the wagon train.

On returning to his men Wyatt ordered a smoke-signal to be sent up. He was sure that the desperadoes would not see the signal, but that the wagon train, warned to look out for anything unusual, would understand.

The wagon train halted about a mile from the gorge as if camping there for the night.

The scout of the gang must have reported what had happened because the outlaws were seen riding at a fast gallop towards the train. Wyatt sent half of his men in pursuit and half to cover the retreat to the gorge.

The gang had called on the wagon train to lay down their arms and surrender when the White Riders were noticed charging across the plain. At once these hardened scoundrels were in a panic and galloped wildly for the security of the gorge.

Out rode some of Wyatt's men to meet them, whilst others took up positions on the rocks.

Of the eight riders five were shot down and one was flung from his horse, but two, better mounted than the rest, managed to make a getaway. Little did Wyatt know who one of those riders was.

The one prisoner, an elderly, sly rascal, was brought before Wyatt, and refused to talk until he saw the White Riders toying with their guns in an ominous manner.

"Say, that kid's got nerve," said Ballard. "Let's take him along with us."

"If you can give me the information I require you can go free," John told the man. "But you would be advised to leave this part of the world because it would be just too bad if you were caught again. If you can't talk, then a sheriff shall decide your fate, and you can guess what that will be. So loosen your tongue!"

"What do you want to know?"

Briefly, John Wyatt asked if he knew of a gang that used to operate near Maple Valley twelve to fifteen years ago. "That would be Ballard's gang," the furtive-eyed scoundrel answered. "I joined them six years ago because there wasn't any work for an honest, hard-working cowpuncher."

"Given your chance you'd be honest again—if it paid you," Wyatt rasped out. "Tell me more of this Ballard. Was it his gang that we scattered to-day?"

The man nodded.

"Yeah, that's so. But we were only a few of Ballard's men. It was a small wagon train, and only a few were thought necessary. We didn't think you were in this district."

"So Ballard has a lot of men. Where's their hideout?"

"They got dozens of small canyons in these hills, and you can find scores of caves—Ballard never uses the same place twice. But—" he hesitated. "You swear you won't give me away?"

"We don't squeal in this outfit."

"Promise I can go free if I say where you might find Ballard?"

"I promise!" John Wyatt answered. "Ballard's often to be found at Black Diamond."

"That's a pretty big town on the Black River," spoke Wyatt eagerly. "What's Ballard like?"

The rascal described vaguely a big, florid man with drooping moustache and small bloodshot eyes.

"All right," Wyatt said when the man had said all he knew. "Here's your gun—get to horse and out of this State. Every man here knows you, and if you ever return no mercy will be shown. Get goin'!"

The outlaw was given a horse and rode away at a mad gallop. John Wyatt watched for a moment before turning to his men. "Escort this train to safety and meet me in two days' time at the gorge at one hour after sunset. Should you not find me there, go to that stream where we first saw Ballard's men. You remember the stunted pine—in it there may be a message. If there is no message lie hidden in the rocks overlooking the gorge and wait till I come to you."

Jim Wyatt, Outlaw

IN a shack, hidden away in the forests, sat Ballard and his henchman, Red. Ballard was grosser and dirtier, whilst Red's face was a lined mask from which the eyes blazed balefully. Ballard's hair was thinner, and his eyes more bloodshot—Red had a livid scar down one cheek. Fifteen years ago they had not been pleasant to gaze upon, and now their appearance was wholly evil.

"So these cursed White Riders have come to San Juan!" snarled Ballard.

"We guessed they'd visit these parts," answered Red. "We warned Jim to look out for a trap, and the fool blundered into it. Six good men lost."

"Pah, we can raise a score more if we need 'em!" sneered Ballard. "They've gone off with that wagon train, and maybe won't return. They may think they've rounded up all the boys."

"Their leader is no fool." Red leaned over the dirty table. "I have found out somethin' about him. He seeks those that killed his parents fifteen years ago."

"I suppose the bunch that killed his folk are dead." Ballard with age was not so quick-witted.

"Have you forgotten the killing near Maple Valley?"

"What d'ye mean?"

"I mean that this leader of the White Riders is none other than John Wyatt—Jim's brother!"

"Not so loud, you fool!" Ballard gave a nervous jerk of his head. "Jim may be outside—he has sharp ears."

"Jim and Hank were all in when they made this shack at daybreak," answered Red.

"So John Wyatt leads the White Riders?" The evil face of Ballard had gone flabby with sudden fear. "He must never know that Jim—"

"Only you and I know the secret of Jim's identity, for the rest of that gang have gone," interrupted Red. "Jim Harper, a waif of the plains, is all that he is ever likely to find out."

"What of Bull Bradley?" Ballard demanded suddenly. "He was not with us in those days, but he joined us not many years afterwards. Jim reckons he was taken prisoner."

"Bull knows what happens to quitters," Red laughed harshly. "He wouldn't dare talk. I spoke to Hank, and he saw Bull flung from his horse—the fall must have broken his neck. Chief, what do you aim to do?"

"We've planned a clean-up in Black Diamond, and I ain't quittin' till I've got the gold!" Ballard's eyes glistened. "Joe of the Purple Brand saloon is our man, and he has sent word that a big load of gold dust is comin' into Black Diamond within a few days. We got headquarters in that saloon, and we're just punchers come in for a good time. We'll have a final clean-up."

"That gold dust won't go far among the boys," stated Red. "We want the gold and something more. Listen! The White Riders have gone, and I know how to make enough for all. Travelling north from Beaver Flats is one of the biggest herds of cattle ever seen in these parts. If there are not two thousand head of cattle I'm not in my right mind. The cattle belongs to some old fool who is going north to new pastures, and he thinks that as the Valley of the Black River has never been the scene of a raid he's safe. There are half a dozen wagons, and the same number of herdsmen. We know who will buy those cattle, Ballard."

"They would fetch a good price."

"Yes, and with the gold dust we make enough to slip down to Mexico." Red rubbed his thin hands together. "Where we lie low for several months and then collect together a new band or some of the old boys. You don't want to stay here, Ballard, and wait for John Wyatt to get you. If he ever finds out, you're a doomed man."

"Not so much of this talk of doomed!" snarled Ballard. "You were as much in that killing as I was."

"John Wyatt is a deadly enemy!" Red banged a clenched fist on the table. "We must not forget it. Listen, chief, to what I have planned. This wagon train is well armed, and we can't waste men. Not easy to attack in that wide valley, but near Yellow Canyon the cliffs close in, and there is the place to make the attack. They could follow the course of the river and go miles farther, but near Yellow Canyon there is a gorge through the hills. We will send Jim Wyatt—"

"Harper—Harper," hissed Ballard. "Be careful of your tongue."

"Jim Harper let it be," Red shrugged his shoulders. "And Jim will join the wagon train, and persuade them to go through the gorge. Some of the boys then drive the cattle into Yellow Canyon. No one will ever hear of the affair, and we can quietly dispose of the beasts. If inquiries are made it will be after many weeks have passed, and by that time we shall be down south."

"After disposing of the cattle we get the gold dust?" asked Ballard.

"Yes, and we'll have to hustle," agreed Red. "Jim Wyatt's the best-looker and he has a glib tongue. We've broken Jim into this game, and he's the quickest on the draw in this bunch."

"We'll do it," decided Ballard. "But I'd like to do something else before I quit these parts. It's been easy round San Juan, and I don't fancy Mexico. Maybe we might try to get this John Wyatt and his cursed riders. Jim Harper must be pretty sore against being fooled, and he might jump at the chance of getting square. Call Jim in, Red. Maybe he'll have the chance to get John Wyatt—his own brother."

Red pushed back his chair.

"Don't try any fool tricks with John Wyatt. Many a man has tried to get him and failed."

All unaware that John Wyatt was within a few miles of the hide-out, Ballard and his men prepared for their final and largest clean-up.

The Greenhorn

JOHAN WYATT spent his time searching the hills for any sign of his enemies. On the second day he passed through the hills and looked down upon a wide valley and a deep river. This must be Black River.

Dismounting, Wyatt crawled out on to a ledge that overlooked the valley, and, shading his eyes, gazed searchingly in all directions. Except for wild deer there seemed little signs of life, and he was about to get to his feet when he noticed a certain amount of excitement among the deer. In the far distance a cloud seemed to be rising. It was not smoke, but dust. After a while he realised it was a big herd of cattle moving in a northerly direction.

The White Rider lay there and watched the herd draw ever nearer. Wagons appeared, and he saw cowboys riding on the flanks of the herd and cracking long whips.

It was growing dark, and almost opposite the place where Wyatt lay hidden the wagon train halted and camp was made. All through the moonlight rode Wyatt, and by morning he was at the gorge. The White Riders were waiting their leader. By noon the White Riders were on the high ground overlooking the river. As he expected, camp had been broken, and a cloud of dust showed them that the train was a good two miles away.

John Wyatt had made many maps of the districts he had helped, and they were remarkably accurate. Already he had made a rough sketch of the San Juan country, and it was to Yellow Canyon that he told his men to ride and wait his orders. Then John went down into the valley, swum his horse across the river and galloped after that distant cloud of dust. Would Ballard and his men be lured into his trap?

No reason why anyone should be scared of a lone rider, especially a frank-faced youngster like Wyatt. The driver of the rear wagon told him that Lufe Gordon, the owner of this outfit, was in need of extra hands and that he was right ahead.

"You'll soon locate him!" chuckled the driver. "He has a voice like a bull, but look him in the eye, son, and you ain't got a thing to fear."

John Wyatt grinned when he heard a mighty voice roaring threats at cattle that lagged behind. He found the owner was a big, well-made man; blue eyes stared at him beneath slaggy brows; here was a true Westerner. He eyed the young man critically and asked his business.

"Making my way north," John explained. "Got tired of the life south, and decided to get back to my old ranch. I know a job waits me there. It's lonely ridin' in these parts, and I didn't make a fortune south, and I thought maybe I could earn my keep with this outfit." His arm embraced the surrounding country. "I've trapped and hunted these parts, and I know the country better than most men. I could guide the cattle the shortest way and pick out good places to make camp."

"I like you, son. You're hired. What's your name?" bellowed Gordon. "John W. Wilson." It was hard to lie before that frank gaze.

"Better get on ahead. You'll find several of the boys. Don't want to force the pace, but I'll be glad when we're out of the valley. You'll be cattle and trail boss to the end of the trek."

"Thanks, Mister Gordon," John answered. "You can rely on me."

John rode forward along the flanks of the slow-moving herd. He spoke to several of Gordon's men. Finally, he reached the head of the herd and sent the man who had been acting as guide to report back to old man Gordon. It was shortly afterwards that he observed a lone rider way out near the river. He galloped across the grassy plain to find out what the rider was doing.

"Say, blockhead, what do you reckon you're doing?" he called out.

The rider was evidently startled at the sound of his voice and seemed to sway in the saddle. A head was turned, and John could just see a small face peering at him with fright and evident anger.

"You're likely to come to harm wandering away from the train," John brought his horse to a standstill. "And you should be doing a job of work tending to those cattle. Every man—" The brim of the sombrero was turned up and John's voice died away.

It was a girl.

"Who are you?" snapped a pleasant but not friendly voice.

"John Wilson," was his ready answer.

"Sorry I swore at you, but I took you for one of the boys."

"What are you doing here, Wilson?"

"Just taken over as trail boss for Lafe Gordon, who runs this outfit. Who are you?"

"I'm his blockhead daughter, and I ride where I like and when." Her eyes were frosty.

"Then you keep within sight or I'll come after you," he countered with a grin. "I know this country better than most, and often when it looks peaceful and beautiful, then it is that it's most dangerous." He waved his hand to embrace the hills and the valley. "Who knows what bunch of crooks may lie hidden here, what wild animal lurks in yonder mesquite, and last, but not least, the river banks are treacherous. Do you like snakes, lady, because there are plenty of rattlers?"

"I am quite capable of looking out for all those dangers." The girl stared at him curiously. "Say, stranger, what's brought you so far from the beaten track?"

They rode back, and John told her that he was heading north back to his old ranch, and that he had asked her father for a job with the train.

"One gets kinda lonely riding alone," he told her.

"Well, John, I'm glad you've joined up with us, though I didn't like you very much at first sight. My name is Mary."

"Always riles me to see a person courtin' danger when it ain't necessary." He smiled. "Sorry for my rudeness, Mary."

They were good friends by the time they rejoined the wagon train.

John was just thinking about calling a halt for the night when he saw a man on foot. The man was lurching and staggering as if all in, and as John urged his horse to a gallop the figure sprawled full length in the dust.

Lafe Gordon and his daughter galloped after John, and found the new cattle boss putting a water-bottle to the sick man's lips.

"Seems to be all in, boss!" cried John.

The man's eyes opened.

"Robbed by a bunch of coyotes," he mumbled. "Took my horse, my dust and my gun. I've been walking for days."

"Poor lad!" cried kindly old Gordon. "We'll give him a ride in one of the wagons. Guess a night's rest will cure him, and we can do with an extra hand."

Thus did Jim Harper join the wagon train he intended to betray into the hands of the vile Ballard.

Lafe Gordon is Wounded

BY next morning the young man seemed quite recovered. Lafe Gordon and his daughter believed his story, especially when he showed them bullet holes in his sombrero—the bandits had fired at him as he had run for his life.

John Wyatt was not so certain. For a person who had gone through privations and hardships Jim Harper made an extraordinary quick recovery, and the tale about using him as a target did not ring true. He would watch the newcomer closely.

Jim Harper knew that in the trail boss he had an astute Westerner who would not be so easy to bluff and deceive. John Wilson was a puzzle to the bandit spy. The wagon train had scarce got on the move when the two young men became involved in a dispute. Harper asked Lafe Gordon the route the herd was taking, and when he learnt that they were following the course of the river suggested going through Dead Pine Gorge, John answered that the gorge was too narrow.

"Go through that gorge and you save a whole day," said Harper.

"The gorge is narrow and the trail half obliterated by landslides," John told old Gordon. "All those cattle thundering through there might easily shake down those cliffs. A small fall might cause a stampede. It may be a day longer by the river, but it's safer in more ways than one."

"What you mean by that?" demanded Jim aggressively.

"That gorge would make a great place for a trap," John stared at his questioner. "I'm trail boss, and I don't fancy Dead Pine Gorge."

John Wyatt rode off on a round of duty, and when he was out of hearing Jim began to question Gordon slyly about the trail boss, and heard to his surprise that John Wilson was a recent addition to the train.

"If a cowpuncher is heading north it's queer he should come this way." Jim watched the old man closely. "Gold-miners and maybe trappers might come this way, but it's way off the beaten trail. After what I've been through, Mr. Gordon, I'm kinda suspicious of everyone. Is John Wilson genuine or playing some game?"

Mary overheard and was indignant.

"Of course John's genuine. We know as much about him as we do about you."

Jim smiled.

"That's true. My only proof is my old sombrero and the fact that the bandits had cleared me of everything. I couldn't have lived more than a few hours longer if you hadn't found me. I ain't got anything much against the trail boss except that he takes the river trail. I wish I could find someone else that knows this district because they'd tell you that at least a day and perhaps more is saved by goin' through Dead Pine Gorge. Also the river trail is a long, treacherous trek, and in several places it's so narrow that the cattle can only go about three abreast along the river bank, and—"

Ballard's men began to round-up the cattle.

"He told me the banks were treacherous," Mary interrupted, and then shook her head. "I'm certain John's straight."

"You know best, Miss Gordon." Jim gave a sad smile. "But if you're betrayed into a bunch of coyotes don't blame me."

Having sown the evil, Jim Harper went back to a wagon to rest as he still felt weak from his ordeal.

That night Gordon argued with John about Dead Man's Gorge and the saving of a day, but the trail boss answered that the trail was dangerous and whilst he was running this outfit the cattle should follow the river. He excused himself and went off to make final arrangements for the night.

"I thought you were the boss around here," sneered Jim. "But Wilson gives the orders. I don't like the look of things, and that's plain speaking."

Satisfied that all was well with the herd, John came back to his own quarters. He was well aware that Jim was trying to turn the Gordons against him, and it amused him to pretend not to notice.

The horses were hitched by some trees, and the shrewd eyes of the young man saw that a horse was missing—the grey that had been given to the newcomer. Quickly John dismounted and tried to read the trail. The Indians had taught him their magic, and once clear of the camp the trail was easy to find. He slid from the saddle and placed his ear to the ground. Many horses could he hear, so it behove him to ride with extreme caution. In a clearing he observed Jim talking with a number of riders, and he edged close enough to hear their plans.

The bandits were to watch from the hills, and if the wagon train went down Dead Pine Gorge they must wait till most of the cattle were in the gorge, but should Jim be unable to stop the trail boss from following the river, then the gang were to attack close to Yellow Canyon.

Most of the night John rode, but he was back by morning, and there was a grim expression on his face as he smiled a good-day to Jim Harper. He had overheard a promise on the previous evening that if the trail boss showed any signs of making a fight it was Jim's duty to shoot him in the back.

When Lafe Gordon hinted that he thought they should try Dead Pine Gorge John shook his head.

"I can get you through the river country, but I take no responsibility for that gorge," he answered. "Maybe you'd like Jim here to guide you. Queer that he seems to know this country so well, and yet this is the first time he has ever prospected this valley."

Mary wondered which of the young men could be trusted, and she looked longest at John.

By Yellow Canyon Ballard's men attacked, but the fat leader did not risk his hide, and remained with Red watching from the mesa. Jim stealthily drew his gun as John formed the wagons together in a circle, but slid his hand away from the butt because of the intent gaze of the trail boss. Ballard had instructed some of his men to round up the cattle and the rest to attack the wagons.

Scarcely had the fight begun when out of Dead Pine Gulch came a number of dark-shirted riders on white horses.

"The White Riders!" went up the cry, and instantly there was panic among Ballard's men. The men that fought for justice were fitter and better shots. They swooped down on the wavering outlaws with a grim determination and fury that terrified the cowardly rascals. Ballard's men fired their guns wildly at the huddled wagons, and did make a weak attempt to stand against the White Riders, but they soon fled in scattered groups.

Jim Harper's face was white with fury as he cowered behind the wheel of a wagon. He had been tricked a second time by the cursed Riders, and it was obviously from the way John Wilson was riding out to meet the Riders that he was one of them. Then Jim knew that John Wilson must be John Wyatt, their leader, and cursed himself again for being so blind. Well, he must play his own game, and trust that a chance might occur to turn the tables, so he fired his rifle high in the air and over the heads of the fleeing outlaws.

Six were killed and several men who were wounded were captured. There was only one serious casualty among the defenders, and that was brave old Lafe Gordon, who got a bullet through the shoulder. The old man was tended by his daughter.

The White Riders, after a consultation with John Wyatt, rode off with their prisoners in the direction of Dead Man's Gorge. Jim Harper wondered at the reason, and to impress everyone suggested that he might be allowed to go after some of the outlaws that had escaped.

"Guess I could find some of the caves and crevices where these skunks are hiding."

"Don't bother, Jim," John Wyatt rode up and jumped lightly from his horse. "Those rats won't give us much more trouble." He looked down at the wounded man. "By gar, I'm sorry this should have happened, Mr. Gordon, but these rats attacked a bit quicker than my men expected."

"You're John Wyatt, the leader of the White Riders." Mary looked up from tending her father. "I think you might have trusted us." There was a hurt look in the blue eyes.

"Sorry, Mary, but I can't trust anyone in this business. I hope you and your father will forgive me?"

"Sure we do," instantly answered Lafe Gordon. "Did you join my outfit because you knew they were going to attack us?"

"I wasn't sure, but I hoped your cattle might lure them out into the open." John glanced towards the hills. "I was hoping to have corralled the whole dirty bunch." Then he knelt beside the old man. "Let me have a look at that wound."

"I don't think it's very serious," cried Jim. "Pesky bad luck the boss should have stopped a stray."

"Tough luck," agreed Wyatt, and smiled in apparent friendly fashion at the other. "Fraid the boss has lost a good deal of blood. The wound's not serious, but this is a case for a doc. Guess I'm taking you back to Black Diamond."

"How about the cattle, John?" questioned Gordon.

"Don't you worry about the cattle, Lafe," Wyatt grinned. "I'm giving orders for the herders to get busy. They'll take the cattle along the valley. Twenty miles from here lies open country, and you're out of Bad Man's Land. The White Riders will be watching from the hills, in case any fool outlaws try to cause trouble. We'll fix you up, Lafe, and you can rejoin the outfit in about two or three days—that depends on the doc."

Mary went with her father and John Wyatt. Jim Harper waited till they were out of sight, got to horse and went out as if to help the herders, but his destination was Black Diamond.

The Fight in the Saloon

JOHN WYATT handed the wounded man over to the doctor.

"I will stay with dad," said Mary. "I want to have a look round this town," Wyatt told her. "I've heard tales of this place and I want to give the folks the once-over."

"Be careful, John."

Wyatt smiled at her. "You're great, Mary. 'Fraid there hasn't been a lot of time in my life for girls, but you're different. I'll be extra careful. I'll try not to be long."

John Wyatt dismounted outside the saloon and as he hitched his horse to the rail, took a quiet look round the main street. There was a deserted air about the dusty street, the shacks looked dirty and ill-kept, whilst the few inhabitants seemed to hug the side-walk as if they were in fear of their lives. There were a number of unshaven, down-at-heel loafers outside the saloon.

John pushed open the swing doors and strolled inside. The place was half full, and the swift glance he gave round was not reassuring. A cutthroat crowd, and the place stunk of smoke and stale spirits. He went to the bar and ordered a drink from the watery-eyed attendant.

Two men thumping a greasy pack of cards looked round at the tall youngster, and one shot a hand across the table.

"Red, take a good look at that guy. He's mighty like John Wyatt of the White Riders!"

Red turned slowly and then gave a faint nod.

"I never thought he'd have the nerve to come to this place. A word from me and he'd be dead meat."

"Then why don't you give the word?" The other fingered his gun. "Through his cursed Riders we lost a lot of the boys."

"Stay here," hissed Red. "I gotta tell Ballard upstairs. Warn me if he looks like quitting."

Red slipped quietly up the stairs. The swing doors opened and a dark-skinned man came into the saloon, and instantly John turned his back. The newcomer nodded in surly fashion to a number of men before coming to the bar. Chance took him to the place next to John Wyatt.

Red got a shock when he found Jim Harper with Ballard. The younger man had come in by a back entrance. The two were rowing over the last failure. Ballard thumping and banging the table in a frenzy, and Jim looking as if he could kill the older man.

"John Wyatt is downstairs," rasped Red. "What yuh gonna do?"

"Wyatt mustn't see me!" cried Jim. "Don't go down into the saloon," ordered Ballard in a shaky voice. "Red, if we can get Wyatt the White Riders won't have a leader and—"

His words died away as there came a crash from downstairs, and then the sounds of a violent scuffle.

Very slowly John Wyatt turned, and then his two hands gripped the newcomer by his dirty shirt.

"Bull Bradley!" Wyatt rasped out. "What are you doing here?"

Bradley had returned to Black Diamond with a lying tale that he had escaped, but had a bad fall from his horse that had meant hiding in one of the hills till he was better. He had returned on the previous day, and Ballard had been very suspicious. Bradley knew that if Wyatt started talking he was a doomed man—the boys would shoot him down.

The crook wrenched himself free.

"Get him, boys!" he shouted. "It's the leader of the White Riders!"

His vicious blow at John was parried neatly, and then a right came up beneath Bradley's jaw with a force that lifted the rascal off the floor. Bradley crashed back against a table, and glasses were scattered in all directions.

Four men rushed at Wyatt, who waited calmly as if he were amused. The first man went down before a left and right to the face, another was gripped and swung up into the air as if he weighed next to nothing, and the other two received their comrade in their chests.

From the top of the stairs they saw a two-fisted tornado battling against overwhelming odds. John Wyatt was in his element. One man drew a gun, and it was John's booted foot that smashed the man's wrist. On the bar were a number of bottles and these were flung with deadly aim—two men going down as if they were pole-axed.

A leap and Wyatt was on the bar. Five or six ruffians surged forward, and like a battering ram he hurled himself down on them with arms outflung. The whole lot rolled to the floor winded and bruised, and John effectively cracked two heads together before punching his way to his feet. Once more back on the bar. Directly above his head was a veranda. All the rooms upstairs had a veranda that faced into the saloon. Wyatt gripped a rail and swung himself up with scarce an effort, and had just clambered over the rail when one of Ballard's men rushed out of a room at this fearless fighter.

A right hook and a left uppercut thudded to the rascal's jaw. The man staggered back against the balustrade, which collapsed upon the shock. With a yell of terror the wretch thudded down on to the crowd below.

Inspired by the action of this fearless fighter several of the more spirited of Black Diamond's inhabitants attacked Ballard's men, but they quit hurriedly when guns began spitting lead.

A bullet sang past Wyatt's ears, and he knew it was time to go. His own gun barked twice, and then he darted into a room and slammed the door. He crashed the door shut and jerked open a window. When the angry mob burst into the bed-room they found the open window, and as one raised a gun Wyatt dropped off the roof into the saddle of his horse.

Down the street he went like the wind. A few stray bullets flew wide of their mark as his horse's hoofs kicked up the dust.

"Wyatt's gone to get his White Riders!" raved Ballard, and shook his fist at Jim. "You're to blame for this, you fool!"

"You make me sick!" retorted Jim. "One man against a dozen and they couldn't hold him. A lot of yellow-livered skunks!" His eyes gazed round contemptuously. "Not one of you would dare go after Wyatt—you're scared!"

There was angry muttering, but that died when they saw Jim slide a hand to his belt.

"Get out of here!" Ballard mouthed at his men. "We gotta get busy. Get ready to leave town."

Ballard, Red and Jim were alone. "You've got us into this mess, Jim," sneered Red. "What yuh gonna do?"

"Get you out." Jim was standing by the window. "Look over there. See who has come out of Doc Raines' house? That's Jeff Gordon's daughter, Mary. The old man got wounded and Wyatt brought him to see the doc. Wyatt must have left the father and girl to come here. Wyatt's crazy about the girl. If we get the girl we can dictate to him our terms."

A right nook and a left uppercut thudded to the rascal's jaw and he staggered back against the rail with a yell

"Get the girl and bring her here." Ballard's evil eyes lit up. "Then you go after John Wyatt, Jim, and say the girl is in that canyon outside this town. We'll take her to Horseshoe Canyon, and if he wants her to live he must come alone. I'll have the boys hidden in the rocks and they won't miss."

"But how do I explain myself?" demanded Jim.

It was Red who solved that problem.

"You can say that the herders refuse to move without their trail boss or Lafe Gordon, and you came into town to fetch Wyatt. Seeking him, you were just in time to see him make his escape, then you saw the capture of the girl, and overheard what they planned to do with their hostage. You rushed forward to try and rescue the girl and were overpowered. Your life was spared on the condition that you ride after Wyatt and tell him that if the girl is to live he must go alone to the canyon."

"The boys will settle Wyatt and then we'll clean up the gold and quit town," added Ballard. "Get busy, Jim."

"I'll tell her Wyatt's been wounded and needs her," Jim grinned. "This is where I square accounts."

Unsuspecting, Mary came to the saloon and they brought her upstairs. Too late she guessed she had been tricked. They bundled her into a back room. Jim Wyatt got to horse and went out to find the White Riders.

Ballard laughed hoarsely as they watched Jim ride down the main street.

"Get the boys together. I want four to go to the canyon and wait for Wyatt. The others will be ready to clean up the gold in the bank."

"Aren't you waiting till Jim comes back?" asked Red.

"Why wait for Jim?" chuckled Ballard. "Without him we get the biggest share of the dust. He'll get back to find us gone. Serve the young fool right. He will have killed his own brother, and will have to answer to the White Riders. Let's hope they got him."

"What of the girl, boss?"

"Leave her—she's served her purpose," Ballard laughed callously. "He's sent his own brother to his death. Ha, ha! Jim Wyatt, I guess that finishes you."

Mary had her ear close to the door and she heard every word.

Jim Learns the Truth

A MILE outside the town Jim came upon the White Riders, and with upraised hand called them to a halt. He told his story to John Wyatt.

"You're one of the gang," cried Wyatt. "I've known it all along." His face darkened. "Are you lying?"

"Not about Mary being in Ballard's hands," Jim sneered. "She dies within the hour unless you ride to Horseshoe Canyon—alone!"

In spite of protests by the White Riders John bade them wait here for his return. "I'm going alone into Horseshoe Canyon, and if I'm not back in half an hour, come and get me."

"What do we do with this snake?" asked a White Rider.

"I have to go with you, Wyatt," quickly spoke Jim. "I have to come as far as the mouth of the canyon in case of treachery."

The two brothers rode away, but no word was spoken until the canyon was sighted about a mile away.

"My job's done," Jim laughed hoarsely. "I hope you're not too late."

The canyon was so near to Black Diamond that within five minutes Jim was back in the town. He arrived at the saloon, and when he leaped from the saddle stared round in surprise. How quiet everything seemed. No one about and all windows seemed barred and shuttered, then he saw an object that made him stiffen—a motionless figure sprawled in the main street. Something had been going on while he had been away—a man had been shot.

The saloon was empty. Every sign of hurried flight. Jim rushed upstairs and into the small room that Ballard used. It was empty. A suspicion that he had been betrayed seized him, and he looked wildly round.

Ballard had double-crossed him. They had robbed the bank and shot their way out of town.

A sudden hammering made him jump round and whip out his gun.

There was a prisoner behind that door. It would be the girl.

Jim wrenched open the door and Mary staggered out.

"Where have they gone?" he shouted at her.

"They robbed the bank and have gone," Mary looked at him scornfully. "They have paid you in your own coin, Jim Wyatt!"

"I'm Jim Harper!"

Mary shook her head.

"You're Jim Wyatt! I overheard every word whilst I was a prisoner in that room." Her eyes were tragic. "You've sent your own brother to his death. Ballard killed your parents and saved you because it amused him. He brought you up to be as vile as himself, and finally got you to send your brother to his doom. If I had a gun I could kill you."

"John Wyatt, my brother!" He said the words slowly. "John is my brother." His eyes cleared. "I can just remember the big brother who meant everything to me, but it was all so hazy. So I've betrayed my brother."

"Are you going to stand there and do nothing?" Mary grabbed his arm. "Are you going to let him die?"

"No!" His eyes blazed. "Mary, the White Riders are waiting on the bluff two miles out of town on the trail you took from the Black River. Ride and get 'em, and tell them to ride like the wind for Horseshoe Canyon. I'll try to keep 'em at bay till they make it."

Down the stairs rushed Jim, and the girl was only a split second after him. The two horses galloped madly down the main street, and the people behind the barred windows peered forth fearfully.

Side by Side

JOHN WYATT rode at a gallop to Horseshoe Canyon. It was narrow with precipitous cliffs, yet there were ledges and fissures where men could lie in wait.

The White Rider was no fool, and he knew that danger lurked ahead. When Jim Harper had told him that Mary was in peril he had rushed blindly to her rescue, but now that he saw this grim canyon he wondered if this were a trap. The outlaws might have captured Mary, but that did not mean the girl was here. There might be gunmen in those rocky fissures.

But John was fearless. He would go into Horseshoe Canyon, and woe betide anyone who tried to play tricks on him. He dismounted, left his horse by a small cove and proceeded on foot. The canyon twisted and turned, and soon was so narrow that it was like walking on a pebbly track with gaunt, ugly rocks looming all round, and but a glimpse of daylight—the canyon was now two hundred feet in depth.

Wyatt took cover behind a loose boulder. If Ballard's men expected to meet him for a discussion they would have shown themselves before. He took off his sombrero and pushed it over the boulder.

Crack!

When he looked at his hat it had two holes neatly bored. Certainly he had walked into a trap, from which it would not be so easy to escape. He managed to get a quick glance over the boulder and saw a man's head and shoulders.

December 28th, 1935.

His gun spoke and there came a cry of pain.

"One!" softly murmured Wyatt.

Bullets began to spatter round him. If his enemies changed their positions they would find that this boulder did not completely protect him, or they could push over a rock from above—he hoped the idea would not occur to them.

A lull in the fighting, and then John swung round. Someone was coming up the canyon. What a shock to see Jim Harper.

"Don't shoot, John!" he called out.

And John seeing the other's hands were raised above his shoulders was amazed. Jim darted down behind the cover of the boulder.

"What have you come to tell me this time?" John demanded.

"Little time to talk," Jim panted out.

"I captured Mary and helped plan this trap. You were our deadliest enemy. I left you and hastened back to Black Diamond to find that Ballard and the others had double-crossed me. I, who had done all the dirty work, had been left to my fate. I heard a hammering in Ballard's room and remembered the girl. I let her out and demanded that she tell me what had happened." He paused. "She had overheard Ballard talking with Red Mengis about the fool they'd made of me since I was a kid. My name isn't Jim Harper, but Jim Wyatt—I'm your brother!"

John was speechless with amazement. He studied the other's face and he could see the resemblance to his own father. "You can't be the Jim I've searched for all these years."

"I have only a vague recollection of the wagon train, but I can remember you and I driving a wagon. The massacre by Ballard I cannot remember, but I have known all about it because Ballard was always ready to boast of what he did. Ballard never let on that he had saved me from the killing out of some strange sense of humour, and I've always thought my parents were a bandit named Harper and his Indian wife—both of whom have been dead for years."

"Jim"—John Wyatt held out his hand—"I have always thought that you were alive, but never guessed that Ballard brought you up with his gang."

"He taught me to rob and pillage, so that I thought I was but taking my own," Jim scowled. "Easy to sink so low that you deny everything that is decent and honest. Your fight, John, in the saloon made me wish that I had been different. Why couldn't I have done deeds like that, instead of crawling about like some rattlesnake—hated and loathed by all decent folk." A bullet crashed into the cliff face. "The skunks are wondering what is my game. That's a hint for me to show myself," he laughed harshly, "and stop a bullet. Probably they may have guessed that I've found out that Ballard has done a double cross."

"Keep down." John pushed his gun round the side of the boulder and fired. "How did Ballard double-cross you?"

Swiftly Jim told of the gold dust raid, and of other events. The bullets spattered the rocks more frequently, and to stay meant certain death.

"We gotta get out of this place," Jim cried, and pointed. "See that corner. Make it, and I'll keep the skunks at bay."

"But, Jim—"

"Don't argue!" shouted the younger brother aggressively. "I'd shoot every one of that dirty bunch and not turn a hair. I'm for the cause of the White Riders, whose leader is my brother. I seem to remember clearly now what Ballard and his men did. You have travelled miles for your revenge—well, it's my revenge as well. Make that corner or we haven't a chance."

The two brothers made the corner. Bent double, they darted from cover to cover, pausing to fire a few rounds to keep the enemy in check, before they went down the canyon to safety.

One of the gang rashly exposed his head to fire at John, and it was Jim who shot the man down.

Horseshoe Canyon was getting wider. John did not notice his brother reel and clutch at his side. With a great effort Jim followed his brother—the mouth of the canyon was only a few yards away.

Suddenly firing broke out above their heads, and John knew that the White Riders had come to the rescue. Some of them had gone to the high ground and were firing down on the outlaws, who were now caught in their own trap.

"Well, Jim—" John turned and noticed the drawn expression on the other's face. He was just in time to catch him in his arms.

"Get Ballard—get Ballard!" the dying man muttered fiercely. "He's got the gold dust—south trail towards Summersville. Go get him, brother!"

John's hands found the wound and knew that it was fatal. Jim lay so still that he thought his brother was dead. "Jim—Jim!" His voice broke.

The dying youth's eyes opened and a slight smile twitched the lips.

"I'm going, John, and I'm not sorry. I kinda feel I've done something at the end that wasn't all bad. Say you forgive me, John, and I'll die happy."

"There is nothing to forgive. And you saved my life, Jim—" His voice broke.

A slight moan came from the wounded man. The eyes opened for the last time.

"Go, get Ballard. John, get Ballard! It is my last wish."

So Jim Wyatt died and was at peace. John heard a sob and looked up to find Mary looking down at the youth who had sacrificed his life for his brother.

The End of Ballard

JOHN WYATT knew that he must ride fast if he would overtake Ballard and his men. The one surviving gunman in Horseshoe Canyon saved John a lot of trouble by surrendering. Six of the White Riders he detailed to take Mary, the prisoner, and the body of his brother into Black Diamond. Two Riders were dispatched to the wagon train to halt, as there was now no need for immediate hurry. With the rest of the Riders—a dozen in all—he went in pursuit of Ballard.

Once clear of Black Diamond, the scoundrel had set a good pace, but it was far from a break-neck gallop, moreover, he had to consider the old prairie schooner which he had stolen to carry his gold. It was clumsy and heavy; Ballard did not worry, because he thought he would be miles away before anyone thought of pursuit. Besides, no one would dare to follow him. The White Riders had lost their leader, so he had nothing to fear in that direction.

John knew of a track over the hills, and thus, after two hours' riding, they could look down into a valley and see a number of horsemen cantering along a twisty trail.

"Keep to the woods," ordered Wyatt. "We must make a surprise attack. They must not know that we are close behind them."

What a surprise for Ballard and his "Death Holds the Reins"

Read This First

Montana Larkin, an ex-deputy, is planning to join in a land rush with Jinglebob Morgan, his friend, whose brother has provided them with the map of a claim which contains rich mineral deposits.

Montana and Jinglebob make the acquaintance of a rancher named Parker, and are introduced to his daughter, Mary, and his niece, Ann Hardy. From Parker they learn the details of the projected land rush, and agree to ride in company with the cattleman and his party.

Parker's foreman, Gillespie, is a crook, however. Discovering the purpose of Montana and Jinglebob, he beats them to their claim with some of his hirelings, and records it in his name.

Later, Jinglebob's brother Clem arrives on the scene, and reveals the fact that the land secured by Gillespie is worthless, owing to a flaw in the map which Jinglebob had possessed.

Gillespie attempts to force information from Clem, but postpones his efforts when he is hired by a man named Marco Brett to loot a wagon-train, which is owned by Ann Hardy's father.

The attack on the wagon-train failing, Gillespie turns his attention on Clem again, the latter being kidnapped and carried off to a deserted ranch. He is traced, however, and under cover of a desperate gun battle Montana attempts to rescue him from a building that has burst into flames, part of the roof collapsing even as Montana is carrying Clem to the front door.

Now Read On

In Sicomoro Again

THE mass of blazing timber dropped immediately behind Montana's staggering figure, the crash of it resounding in his ears, and all about him there arose a whirl of uplung sparks.

The collapse had missed him by inches, one flaming rafter actually grazing his back as it fell. Yet, like a man in a daze, Montana was scarcely aware of his narrow escape. Faint with the blistering heat of the inferno, half-suffocated by the clouds of smoke, he was only able to keep his feet by sheer will-power, an indomitable spirit urging him forward with the inert body of Clem Morgan clasped tightly in his arms.

He kicked open the door of the burning ranch-house and lurched forth into the night air, and the glare of the conflagration revealed his stalwart form to Jinglebob and the boys who were sheltering in the scrub. With indescribable relief they saw him stumble from the porch and totter in the direction of the ridge where he had left Mary Parker and Happy.

"He's safe!" Jinglebob whooped. "He's safe, an' he's got Clem with him!"

A blatter of gunplay from the barn caused Jinglebob to crouch lower, and the rest of the men in the scrub did likewise. No shots were fired at Montana, however, for the intervening ranch-house still concealed him from the view of Gillespie and his gang, and as yet the outlaws were unaware of his presence.

Not until Butch Riley gained the barn did the crooks learn that the ex-deputy had arrived on the scene.

"Where's Clem Morgan, you fool?" Gillespie demanded of Butch in savage tones. "Why didn't you bring him out? You know what that gold claim o' his means to us, don't yuh?"

Riley wiped his scorched and battered countenance with a begrimed, shaking hand.

"Gil, I—I tried to bring him out," he panted. "But Montana Larkin showed up. I did my best, but Larkin is dynamite. You know that!"

"Larkin!" Gillespie bit out the name through clenched teeth. Then he swung round on his hirelings.

"We've got to get Clem away from Montana!" he jerked. "Best thing we can do is to draw off to the corral back of this barn. Our horses are there. Come on!"

They dodged out of the building in which they had taken shelter, their appearance being greeted by a rapid fusillade from the scrub, but without casualties they reached the corral and prepared to mount.

"Look!" Hank Rodgers shouted all at once. "There's Montana now, and he's luggin' Clem along with him!"

From the corral the gangsters could now discern the figure of the ex-deputy, toiling up the moonlit slope of the ridge with his human burden and making for the buckboard in which Mary and Happy were waiting.

"After him!" snarled Gillespie; but even as he spoke those words a band of horsemen suddenly topped the ridge to stand silhouetted against the starry skyline.

They formed the main body of the December 28th, 1935.

Parker ranch-hands, the reinforcements mustered by Al Mackay, and at sight of them a lusty cheer rose from the scrub in which Jinglebob Morgan and his comrades were lying.

"Gil, we're sunk!" flank Rodgers gasped. "They're too many for us now!"

He was right. The odds were now in favour of the besiegers—only slightly, perhaps, but the Gillespie gang were not of the breed to show fight unless the advantage was on their own side. To give their leader his due, Gillespie himself was not lacking in courage when sufficiently hard pressed, yet he knew the shortcomings of his men, and after a moment's hesitation he gave the order to flee.

"Beat it!" he rapped out. "Head for the hills!"

He scrambled astride his bronc, and his accomplices were not slow to imitate his example. A few seconds later they were galloping from the neighbourhood of the blazing ranch, gouging the flanks of their ponies with their spurs.

Mackay and the newcomers rode in pursuit, and the chase was taken up by Jinglebob and his party as soon as these had secured their horses. On into the heart of the hill-country they dashed, following the band of fugitive outlaws, firing at them as they swept through canyon and valley, but the ponies of the crooks were fresh, and ere long the men of the Parker outfit began to lose ground steadily.

An hour after quitting the Carron ranch, Gillespie and his hirelings drew rein to give their mounts a "breathe," being satisfied that they had thrown off the pursuers. Nor were they mistaken, for at that very moment Jinglebob and the full muster of the Parker hands were cantering slowly and disappointedly homeward, consoling themselves with the reflection that Clem had been rescued even if his foes had not been captured.

As for Gil and his men, these turned in the direction of Hell's Gate as soon as their broncs had recovered their wind, and, travelling at a walking pace, they reached their old hide-out there in the early hours of the morning.

In that cave near Hell's Gate they slept until sun-up, and then, after breakfast had been cooked and eaten, Gillespie gave the word to hit the trail again—this time for Sicomoro.

They gained their destination by nine o'clock and rode boldly enough into the thriving town, for although Gillespie knew that he was liable to arrest on several counts now, he was equally well aware that the law had very little hold in this boom settlement of Sicomoro.

Entering the main street, Gil and his gang made straight for Marco Brett's saloon, and after tying their horses to the hitch-rail, they trooped into the bar-room and marched over to the counter.

"Brett in?" Gil inquired laconically of a waiter.

"He's in his office, talkin' to a cattle buyer," came the reply.

Leaving his cronies at the bar, Gillespie crossed to the door of Brett's private room and pushed it open without the formality of knocking. He at once observed the saloon owner in conversation with a man whom he recognised as one Edmund Yountis, an honest cattle-dealer from Auburn City.

"Then you advise me to see Jim Parker?" Yountis was saying.

"I do," Brett rejoined. "Make it a cash deal, Yountis, and he'll meet your price."

December 28th, 1935.

He paused, suddenly becoming aware that Gillespie was standing on the threshold, and with a hearty greeting he invited Gil to step in.

"You know Gillespie, Yountis," the saloon-owner remarked. "He used to work for Parker."

"Used to?" Yountis echoed. "I thought you were foreman of that outfit for life, Gillespie."

Gil changed the subject, and, after some further conversation, Yountis rose to go.

"Well, Brett," he said, "I'm sorry we can't do business. But I'll take your advice and run over to Parker's ranch at Dry Creek."

He departed, and when the door had closed behind him, Brett favoured Gillespie with an odd smile.

"I just turned down a big deal, Gil," he commented. "The railroad is gonna be extended from Auburn to Sicomoro. Yountis is actin' for the company, and wanted me to supply the construction gang with beef—knowin' that cattle was one o' my side-lines."

"And you turned it down?" Gillespie ejaculated.

Brett laughed softly.

"We didn't do so good the last time we tried to raid a herd o' steers, did we?" he observed. "No, so this time we'll let Yountis make a cash deal, and then we'll go after the dough. That's why I put him on to Parker—and that's why I urged him to pay him off in bills, not by cheque."

"H'm," Gil mused appreciatively, "smart idea, Brett."

"I'll say it's a smart idea," the other stated. "But what brings you here, Gil? You got some news for me?"

Gillespie had news—bad news. In gloomy tones he related all that had occurred the previous night, and when he had finished his story Brett eyed him sourly.

"You know, I used to think you were a pretty useful man," he grunted. "What's come over you lately?"

"Luek's runnin' against me," Gillespie muttered. "But I'll get what I'm after. Brett—don't you worry."

"Well, meantime you can help me in this Yountis deal," the saloon-owner declared. "Branded cattle is too tough to get rid of so close to home, Gil, so when Parker collects—"

He did not finish the sentence, but Gillespie understood him clearly enough.

"I get you, Brett," he said. "Listen, I'll have Tex Sanders ride over to keep an eye on the Parker outfit, an' he can give us the low-down."

"Right," the other man agreed. "You know, Gil, it's gonna be much easier relievin' Parker of cash instead o' cattle—seein' that money don't carry a brand."

Gillespie nodded, and then poured himself a drink from a whisky bottle that was standing on Brett's desk.

"You're right," he announced, "and here's luck to the proposition!"

Brett Takes Command

EDMUND YOUNTIS had called at the Dry Creek ranch and transacted a piece of business that was satisfactory both to himself and to Jim Parker, and when the cattle-buyer from Auburn had taken his leave, the owner of the ranch made his way from the house in search of Montana.

He located his new foreman near a little corral in which an unbroken pony was penned. The ex-deputy was in conversation with Mary, and was indicating the finer points in the bronc's physical appearance as Jim Parker came up.

"Excuse me, Mary," the rancher said to his daughter, "I want to have a little talk with Montana."

He proceeded to tell the new foreman of the deal he had clinched with Yountis, and added that he had promised speedy delivery of five hundred head of steers as a first shipment.

"Okay, Mr. Parker," Montana rejoined. "Where do you want 'em taken?"

"Yountis says there's an old deserted corral just before you hit Auburn," the rancher observed. "That's where you'll head for. You'd better take the boys down to the lower range and round up the herd there, Montana."

"Dad," Mary put in, "will it be all right if Ann and I go along with Montana and the men as far as the lower range? I feel like a gallop, and I guess Ann will, too."

Ann and her wounded father, Bill Hardy, had been driven to Dry Creek from Sicomoro late the previous night, after the affair at the Carron ranch; and though the injured wagon-boss was confined to a bed in the house, he seemed comfortable enough, so that his daughter Ann had no hesitation in accompanying Mary and the hands on the trip to the lower range, a distance of several miles.

The party set out, and Parker waved adieu to them from the ranch-house porch, being joined there by Clem Morgan and Happy, the last-named having been ordered to stay at home and attend to various domestic duties.

"Hey, Clem," called Jinglebob, who had elected to trail along with Montana, "don't get into no more scrapes while I'm away at Auburn with the boys."

"Don't worry," his brother answered fervently, "I'm stavin' indoors till you fellers get back. Reckon I'll keep old Bill Hardy company. I ain't feelin' so good myself after what happened last night."

Neither the departing riders nor the trio in the porch were aware that this exchange of words was heard by a skulking figure in the brushwood thickets not far from the outfit. It was Tex Sanders who was lurking there—Sanders, who had been dispatched by Gillespie to keep vigil at the Dry Creek outfit—and with a final glance at the party headed by Montana, he sneaked off through the vegetation and mounted his bronc, which he had left in a glade some distance away.

Once in the saddle Tex Sanders galloped at top speed for Sicomoro, and some time later he might have been seen clattering into the town, drawing rein only when he was abreast of Marco Brett's saloon.

Dismounting, Tex hurried into the bar-room and crossed to Brett's office at the back of the premises, where he found the crooked saloon-owner in conference with Gillespie and the rest of the gang.

"What's up, Sanders?" Gillespie rapped out, as his hireling appeared in the doorway.

Tex closed the door and answered him jerkily.

"Montana and the Dry Creek boys are startin' after the cattle," he said. "There ain't nobody at the ranch-house now but old man Parker, Happy, and Clem Morgan."

"Fine," Marco Brett cut in. "This is our chance to get that dough, Gil. And, what's more, we can grab Clem Morgan, too."

"Yeah," Gillespie breathed, his eyes narrowing, "we'll make it a day. All we have to do is to rush that Dry Creek outfit while Larkin' and the cowpokes are ridin' herd."

Brett laid a hand on his arm.

"No," he growled, "we won't rush 'em this time. Even three men might be able to hold off a gang until help arrived. No, Gil, I've been figurin' things out, and this time we'll outsmart 'em. Listen, the stage coach that comes through Clear Valley don't carry any passengers—so Pete, Butch, Jake and Limpy can ride it, while the rest of us wait at Devil's Pass. Get the idea?"

"No, I don't," Gillespie muttered.

"Well, a stage coach will be able to get right up to that Dry Creek without bein' shot at, won't it?" Brett retorted.

He proceeded to go into the details of his plan, and then, announcing that he intended to accompany the gang and see that no slips were made, he arranged to meet Gillespie and his men outside the town within five minutes.

Not long afterwards Brett and Gillespie were pounding along the Dry Creek road with their band of accomplices strung out behind them, but when they were still two or three miles from the Parker ranch they turned aside and climbed a slope that overlooked a wide valley.

A quarter of an hour later a stage coach hove into sight on a ribbon of trail that wound through the depression between the hills, and at a sign from Brett four of the gang rode down to intercept it.

The four men in question were Pete, Jake, Butch and Limpy, and, suddenly swinging into the path of the vehicle, they held up the driver with drawn guns.

"Get down off that box-seat, feller," Jake commanded. "We're borrowin' this outfit."

The man on the stage descended to the ground in a perplexed fashion, wondering what Jake and his companions were after, since the coach contained nothing of value. And he was still wondering when the gangsters clambered aboard the vehicle and drove off, Jake taking the reins, and the other three entering the interior of the equipage.

The saddle-horses having been hitched to the back of the stage prior to this, Jake made for the hill where Brett, Gillespie and the rest of the band were assembled, and on rejoining the main body of the outlaws, the occupants of the coach received final instructions.

"All right, get goin'," Brett said at length. "We'll take care of your broncs for you. And remember, when you've got Clem Morgan, head for Devil's Pass."

The saddle-horses had already been untethered from the rear of the vehicle, and without further delay Jake drove back on to the Dry Creek trail. Fifteen minutes later he was in sight of the Parker ranch, and, slouching the brim of his sombrero, he called down to his passengers and ordered them to hold themselves in readiness for action.

At that very moment Jim Parker was seated in the living-room of his home, and was giving Happy certain directions regarding the feeding of the unbroken pony in the little corral, directions that were interrupted as he beheld the coach that was bearing down on the ranch-house.

"Why, there's the stage," he exclaimed, moving to the window. "What brings it here?"

"Couldn't say, boss," remarked Happy. "Fummy, ain't it?"

He followed his employer out to the porch as the stage drew up in front of the building, and he was as astonished as the rancher when Jake and his accomplices sprang to the ground with their six-shooters levelled threateningly.

"Keep your hands off your hardware!" Butch Riley warned Parker and Happy. "An' don't make any fuss!"

The gangsters closed in on their startled victims and bundled them across the threshold of the house, two of the rogues carrying lariats, with which they proceeded to bind the cattleman and his companion.

Parker attempted to struggle, but a gun-butt was raised menacingly above his head, and he was forced to give up his futile efforts. Meanwhile the outlaw who had lifted his hand against him was questioning him viciously.

"Where's Clem Morgan? Come on, tell us where he is, and make it snappy!"

Even as the words were spoken there was a footfall on the stairs leading from the upper floor of the ranch-house, and an instant later Clem appeared, having heard the scuffle below while keeping Bill Hardy company in one of the bedrooms.

He was promptly seized, and, under the eyes of the helpless Jim Parker and the tremulous Happy, he was hustled out to the stage by Limpy and Butch. There he was tied hand and foot, then bundled into the interior of the coach.

Butch and Limpy returned to the living-room to find Parker and Happy bundled in a couple of chairs, Jake and Pete being engaged in opening a safe that stood in a corner of the apartment.

"All right, leave it to me," Jake Conroy was saying. "Gil knew the combination of this crib, an' he give it to me afore we left him."

The safe door was unfastened, and the notes which had been paid over by Yountis that morning were transferred to Conroy's hip-pocket, Parker and Happy looking on impotently the while.

"Okay, men," Jake declared. "Let's breeze."

The crooks tramped out of the house, leaving Parker and his ranch-hand securely bound, and Bill Hardy a powerless invalid in an upstairs room. A few seconds later they were driving away from the outfit, Jake Conroy on the box-seat again, and the other three rogues sharing the inside of the vehicle with the irate Clem Morgan.

In another ten minutes they were entering Devil's Pass, where Brett, Gillespie and the remainder of the gang were awaiting them eagerly.

"How'd yuh make out?" Brett jerked, riding close to the stage.

"Here's the dough," Jake said with a grin, tossing him the batch of notes from Parker's safe. "An' Clem Morgan is inside with the boys."

The gangsters closed in on their startled victims, two of the rogues carrying lariats, with which they proceeded to bind the cattleman and his companion.

There was a murmur of satisfaction from the band of outlaws. Then Gillespie swung himself from the saddle of his horse and handed the animal's rein to Hank Rodgers.

"Take care of my bronc, Hank," he ordered. "I'll ride in the coach with Morgan. Come on out, Limpy—you, too, Butch—and you, Pete."

Clem's "fellow-passengers" emerged from the stage, and Gillespie clambered in, leering at their captive villainously. Then, with the rest of the gang ready for the road, Jake Conroy whipped up the team of ponies harnessed to the vehicle, and the whole cavalcade moved off in a south-westerly direction.

Hot on the Trail

MARY and Ann had reached the lower range with Montana and his party, and had paused there to watch the Parker hands round up the five hundred head of cattle intended for Auburn. When this task had been accomplished, Montana rejoined the two girls on the slope from which they had witnessed operations.

"Well, looks like we are on our way to Auburn," he said to them. "Would you like some of the boys to ride back to the ranch with you? Three or four of us could easily handle the herd."

"Oh, no, Montana," Mary answered considerably. "I guess the men are all looking forward to a little spree when they get to town, and I don't think we ought to deprive them of their fun. Ann and I will be all right."

"Okay," the ex-deputy agreed. "Have it your own way."

He carried his gloved hand to his sombrero and then wheeled to ride off in the direction of the herd, the girls following him with their eyes until he and his comrades were driving the cattle at a steady pace across the range.

"I believe you like Montana Larkin, don't you?" Ann commented, giving Mary an arch, sidelong glance.

The rancher's daughter coloured a trifle, and then smiled.

"Who wouldn't?" she retorted. "What's more, I believe he likes me, too."

"I shouldn't be surprised," Ann murmured knowingly, and a moment later she and her cousin were turning for home.

For a while they rode at a canter, but presently, in a spirit of gaiety, Mary challenged the other girl to a race, designating the Dry Creek ranch-house as the winning-post.

"All right, then," Ann agreed with a laugh. "I'll back my pony against yours any day."

The two of them urged their horses into a gallop and dashed across-country at breakneck pace, each vying with the other in her efforts to draw ahead, and each enjoying the freshness of the wind as it whipped a bloom into her face. But at length Mary's bronc began to force its way in front, and, though still a fair distance from home, the rancher's daughter felt confident that her mount would last the course, for she knew it was in the peak of condition.

She was thirty yards in front of Ann when she topped the crest of a smooth, rounded hill, and it was as she reached the summit of this that she descried something which caused her to draw rein abruptly.

A troop of horsemen were passing through a valley away below her, a troop of horsemen who were strung out behind a lumbering stage coach.

Ann came abreast of her and brought her pony to a standstill.

December 28th, 1935.

"What's the matter?" she demanded of her cousin. "Why have you stopped?"

"Ann," Mary ejaculated, "those look like some of Gil Gillespie's gang!"

She was pointing into the valley, and, following the direction of her extended arm, the other girl descried the men who were travelling along the bed of the great hollow.

Yes, they were Gillespie's gang, sure enough. Even though they were a good way off, it was possible to recognise some of them.

"You're right, Mary," Ann breathed. "We'd better get under cover for fear they happen to spot us."

They backed into a copse, and from the shelter of the trees they gazed down at the crooks without any risk of being observed.

"What do you suppose they're doing with that stage?" Ann queried.

"I don't know," Mary rejoined. "I imagine there's been a hold-up of some kind, but it beats me why they should want to take the coach along with them."

Her cousin pursed her lips. "Anyway," she opined, "I guess we'd be well advised to wait here until they're out of sight. I don't think we'd be too popular if they knew we'd seen them."

"I'm with you there, Ann," Mary answered. "We'll wait until the coast is clear."

Wait they did, and then, crossing the valley, they continued their journey towards home at a moderate pace, the interrupted race being quite forgotten now. And a short time afterwards they gained the Dry Creek ranch-house, little dreaming what was to meet their eyes as they entered the living-room.

Halting in front of the dwelling, they slid to the ground and tethered their ponies, after which the two of them climbed the steps of the porch.

Mary was the first to set foot on the threshold of the living-room, and as she beheld the trussed figures of Happy and her father she uttered a sharp cry. An instant afterwards she was joined by Ann, from whose lips there came a half-stifled scream.

"Dad!" Mary gasped, running forward to the chair in which the elderly cattleman was huddled. "Oh, dad, what happened?"

"Four of the Gillespie gang were here," Jim Parker told her strainedly.

"The Gillespie gang!" Ann broke in. "Oh, Uncle Jim, is my father all right?"

"Yes, it wasn't him they came for, dear," he replied in reassuring tones. "But they rifled the safe, and they took Clem Morgan away in a stage coach."

"A stage coach!"

Ann and Mary reiterated the words in the same breath and exchanged a startled glance. Then the rancher's daughter spoke again.

"You untie dad and Happy," she said to her cousin. "I'll go after Montana and the boys!"

She rushed from the house and scrambled astride her pony, unhitching it from the rail of the porch and jabbing her heels into the animal's flanks. Next second the creature was bounding away from the ranch, and at the top of its speed it bore her over the mesquite in headlong style, with the silken hair of its mane streaming back from its graecifid neck.

Onward Mary galloped, racing through canyon and vale, breasting cane-brakes and thickets, weaving her way through belts of woodland; and at last she espied a great cloud of dust ahead of her, dust that rose from innumerable hoofs.

The cloven feet of the Parker herd en route for Auburn were responsible for that haze, and, catching up with the men who were driving the cattle onward, the girl drew rein alongside Montana Larkin.

"Mary," her father's foreman exclaimed. "Is anything wrong?"

"Plenty!" came the terse rejoinder. "Gillespie's gang have got Clem in a stage coach, and the last I saw of them it looked as if they were headed for Hell's Gate."

Montana ripped out an imprecation and turned to Jinglebob, who was close by.

"Your brother can get into more jams than any man I ever knew!" he said. "Mary, you'd better go back to the ranch. I'll take a bunch of the boys and see if I can head off Gillespie and his men."

"You stand a good chance," she told him. "They weren't travelling fast."

"Good!" Montana jerked, and then, summoning his comrades, he explained the situation to them and instructed two or three of them to take charge of the herd while the rest followed him towards the Hell's Gate trail.

Leaving Mary to return homeward and the cattle to proceed for Auburn under the care of the men detailed for the job of taking them thither, Montana and the rest of the band swung southward with determined mien; and soon the hoofs of their broncs were beating a staccato tattoo upon the sun-swept prairie levels that lay between the rescuers and the hill country.

With their ponies going at full stretch, the hard-riding punchers left the plains behind them and clattered into the rougher terrain of the mountain realms, and half an hour after quitting the Auburn trail they swept clear of a gloomy ravine, to see the Gillespie gang and the stage coach not five hundred yards in front of them.

They were spotted by the outlaws a few seconds later, and there was a confused stir amongst the rogues the instant they became aware that trouble was bearing down on them in the shape of the Parker ranch-hands.

"Larkin and his mob!" shouted Butch Riley.

There was a plunging and a wheeling of ponies, a drawing of guns and a desultory racket of firing, hot lead whistling amid the oncoming men of the Dry Creek outfit. And in swift response the "artillery" of Montana and his comrades belched flaming death.

Brett's voice rose above the tumult of the forty-fives, restoring order where chaos had threatened.

"Beat 'em back!" he roared. "Give 'em all you got, fellers, and stand your ground!"

The crooks rallied and fusilladed the advancing cowboys mercilessly, so that with two or three of their men struck down, Montana's party were forced to slacken up in order to make effective reply. Meanwhile Brett was pulling his horse across to the coach occupied by Jake, Gillespie and their prisoner.

"Go right ahead with Clem Morgan," the saloon-owner barked. "We'll hold off Larkin an' his bunch. On your way, Jake! Beat it, will yuh?"

Conroy seized the whip and lashed at his team of horses, driving them forward along the rough trail, so that in the interior of the stage Gillespie and Clem were pitched from side to side by the mad momentum of the vehicle. As for Brett, he turned to resume command of the men who were firing at the Dry Creek 'punchers.

At that same instant Montana Larkin was preparing to cut adrift from his followers and play a lone hand.

"Look, the coach is makin' a run for it," he rapped out. "Jinglebob, you and the boys keep that pack of gunmen busy while I get past them."

He swerved aside and left the trail to dash across a stretch of open ground to the right of it, effecting a wide detour to outflank Brett and his party; a move that did not pass unnoticed, for leaden slugs whistled around him as he streaked over the turf in a desperate gallop. But, true to instructions, Jinglebob and the boys kept the gangsters busy, and two outlaws who tried to strike off and intercept, the ex-deputy were knocked out of the saddle by bullets.

Bent forward over his horse's head, Montana raced onward fiercely and succeeded in his design—working to the rear of the position taken up by Brett and company, then veering over to the trail again and taking up the chase of the fleeing stage.

Gillespie thrust his head out of one of the windows and opened fire on him. Simultaneously Brett and the gang turned right-about and hammered along the track in pursuit of the ex-deputy, some of the outlaws blazing at Montana's howed back, and the hindmost exchanging shots with Jinglebob and the Parker ranch-hands, who had surged forward the moment the foe had wheeled.

With shot after shot coming at him from the stage and blasts of lead threatening him from the rear, Montana seemed to hear a charmed life. Once and once only was he touched, a bullet cutting a hole in his shirt-sleeve and blistering his left arm, but beyond that slight graze he suffered no hurt.

He was making up on the coach, too, and all at once Gillespie's gun was empty. As he saw the man making feverish efforts to reload it, Montana urged his bronc into a final burst that taxed the gallant creature to the utmost.

"Come on, Silver!" he coaxed huskily. "Come on!"

The animal answered nobly, overhauling the stage in a frenzied spurt, and now Montana ceased to be a target for the men who were pounding after him away along the trail, for they did not dare continue their shooting for fear of hitting Gillespie or Jake.

Speeding alongside the coach, Montana leaned towards Gillespie and with a slashing blow struck out of his hand the gun that he was striving to reload. Then he saw that Jake had dropped the reins and was tugging a forty-five from his holster.

Montana's own "iron" was in his fist, and he jerked the weapon upward, pulling at the trigger. Yet the hammer snapped harmlessly, and, realising that he, too, had used the revolver's last cartridge, the ex-deputy hurled the Colt at Conroy's head.

It struck the driver a glancing blow and rattled his wits. Next instant Montana was clutching the luggage-rail at the top of the stage and swinging himself from saddle to box-seat.

Jake recovered himself and wrenched his six-gun from its sheath, but by then his antagonist was at grips with him, and, with a sharp twist, he forced the crook to drop the revolver.

The forty-five fell on to the trail and pitched into the scrub alongside as Gillespie's had done before it. Meanwhile the coach was careering forward at unabated speed, and, up on the box-seat,

Jake and Montana fought a desperate battle for the mastery as the madly swaying vehicle dashed over the pitted road surface.

Jake clutched the younger man by the throat, and his blunt thumbs pressed fiercely into Montana's windpipe, but with a powerful effort the ex-deputy broke the gangster's hold and drove his fist into the rogne's jaw.

It was a six-inch jolt that sent the fellow sprawling on to the roof of the coach, and though Jake was quick enough to rouse himself and renew the combat, he was met by a flashing uppercut that hurled him clean off the stage.

He thudded to the trail and was lost for a moment in the clouds of dust set up by hoofs and wheels. Then the haze cleared as the vehicle receded swiftly from the spot where he had come to rest, and he was struggling to his feet in a dazed condition when Brett and the gang thundered past.

One of the outlaws had charge of Jake's horse, and this man stopped to lend him a hand and help him into the saddle. Meanwhile, up on the box-seat of the stage coach, Montana had again become a target for the guns of the foe, and he quickly made up his mind to let the vehicle's team of ponies keep going until he had dealt with Gil Gillespie.

Gripping a hand-rail at the side of the coach, Montana lowered himself to the footboard under the off door, and promptly received a heavy blow in the mouth from Gillespie's bunched fist. Almost he was knocked to the ground by the impact of that vicious punch, but he managed to hang on, and, wrenching open the door, he forced his way into the interior of the stage.

Gillespie grappled with him, and the two men lurched to and fro in furious conflict, watched by the anxious eyes of Clem Morgan, who lay helpless on the rear seat, helpless and unable to render any material assistance.

Both combatants were striving might and main to gain the upper hand, but the fight was singularly open, if only on account of the wild motion of the coach, and suddenly the pair of them were pitched into a corner.

Montana was undermost, but he succeeded in heaving Gillespie away from him, and he was on his feet once more when the gang-leader came back at him. Next second the ex-deputy had whipped his right into action, and, with blood spurting from his nose, Gillespie reeled backwards.

The off-side door was behind him, swinging open on its hinges, and the outlaw nearly plunged through—only saved himself by what seemed to be a miracle. Then he threw himself towards Montana again, closing with him determinedly.

Neither Gillespie nor Montana was aware of it, but at that very moment the ponies harnessed to the stage were approaching a sharp curve in the trail, approaching it at a pace which spelled disaster; and on the left-hand side of that trail the ground now sloped away into a dry, barren gully.

The horses reached the bend and took it at headlong speed. The coach rocked after them, but came up on two wheels, and all at once there was an ugly splintering of wood as the body of the vehicle sundered itself from the front portion of the undercarriage.

Over it went, bounding from the trail and hurtling down the hillside with its human freight!

"SUPERSPEED"

Randy swung round from the bench. "Billie," he exclaimed in a strained voice, "somebody's tampered with the motor! My supercharger's gone!"

"Nobody's tampered with the motor," she informed him with exaggerated calm.

"But look—the whole hook-up's been removed!"

"I know it," she retorted. "I took it off."

"You took it off?" he gasped. "Why did you do that?"

She took her hands from her pockets to plant them on her hips, and her chin went up.

"The Phantom happens to be my boat," she said icily, "and this is my motor. If I choose to race it without your supercharger that's my affair."

Randy rather lost his head.

"Are you out of your mind?" he cried. "Why, we've got this race sewed up!"

"The Phantom's still pretty fast," she retorted. "I'll take a chance in her—and drive her myself."

"Oh!" snorted Randy. "Well, if you wanted to drive her yourself, why didn't you tell me?"

"It isn't that!" she snapped.

"Then what is it?" he demanded. "What did you do it for? Mr. Gale will be at that finish-line to-day, and if we win—"

"He and his daughter will undoubtedly be very pleased!" she completed for him scornfully.

"Pleased?" howled Randy. "Do you know what he's promised if—"

"There isn't a bit of use discussing it!" she broke in, and glared defiantly at Terry Devlin, who had just entered the shed. "I'm not interested in Mr. Gale, or his daughter!"

"You're a little fool!" roared Randy, and that so infuriated her that she would have struck him in the face had not Terry caught hold of her wrist.

"You'll find your invention in the workbox over there!" she cried, freeing her wrist to point a finger. "But it's not going on my boat!"

With a toss of her head she went off, and Randy blinked at her uncle, who shrugged expressive shoulders.

"D'you know what she did?" Randy vociferated.

"I sat up half the night with her," was the gloomy response, "trying to get her to change her mind."

"But why did she do it?"

Terry Devlin shrugged again.

"Well, of course, I can only guess," he said, "but something tells me that it was because a certain young man broke a date with her last night and took another girl out to dinner."

"Aw, that's foolish!" growled Randy. "Not to a girl," declared the older and wiser man.

"I went to dinner with Nan Gale last night because I had to talk to her father before the race."

"Oh, you saw old man Gale?"

"Yes." Randy gave a brief account of his conversation with Wilson Gale.

"He's going to be at the finish-line to-day, and if we win he's promised to install our rig on every car he turns out."

"Umm!" grunted Terry. "That sort of puts us in a hole, doesn't it?"

"Completely!"

"No, not completely. When I found out what Billie was up to I got busy myself. I didn't want to see you left out of the race entirely, so I dug up another boat and a motor."

The cloud that had settled down upon Randy's face lifted.

"You did?" he cried. "Where is it?"

"That boat ought to be here in about five minutes, the motor's in the workshop. That gives you less than three hours to get your hook-up fixed."

Randy took off his coat.

"Let's get ready to go to work," he said.

"Come on, then," said Terry. "Let's run Billie's boat out of here."

The Phantom was run out to the landing-stage and made fast there for Billie to prepare it for the race, and a few minutes afterwards the boat Terry Devlin had managed to "dig up" was towed to the other landing-stage by its builder.

Randy got to work upon it with a will after he had telephoned the race officials. It was a boat very similar to the Phantom in general appearance, and its name was Santa Monica, but it was a new boat, and there was no time to try it out. The motor, on the other hand, was not by any means new, and though it performed well enough on the bench, Randy was not too sanguine concerning its capabilities.

For hours he toiled, while the bay was cleared for the race so far as the course was concerned, and crowds began to gather at all sorts of vantage-points along the water-front. Terry helped, kneeling on the landing-stage, and at last Randy announced with a sigh of relief:

"Well, I guess that's the best we can do."

"Better get some gas in, son," said Terry. "You've only got about twenty minutes before the starting gun. I'll go and see if Billie's all set."

"Yeah," said Randy, who was still feeling sore about the whole business. "Give her my compliments and tell her I hope she finishes a good second!"

"I'll do that little thing," promised Terry, and went off to the other floating stage. "All set, Billie?" he called out.

"All but the oil," she replied, and he went back to a store-room which George Stone had visited that morning, before daybreak, and returned with a can of motor oil.

Nan Gale arrived in her car while he was gone, and Billie watched her jealously as she walked round the sheds looking for Randy.

"Hallo, Nan!" hailed that young man. "Just getting ready to start."

"Dad's at the finish-line," she informed him. "I'm going to join him as soon as you shove off."

"Well, hope for the best," he returned, and the tone of his voice surprised her.

"What's the matter?" she asked. "You don't seem so cheerful to-day. You're still sure you can win, aren't you?"

"No," he replied, "not sure."

"But you were yesterday! Oh, Randy, you've got to win! This means your whole future!"

"I know what it means, Nan." He dashed off into the store-room and returned with a new can of oil, which he proceeded to use, and she stood watching him with worried eyes.

"Oh, I can't imagine what's happened!" she exclaimed.

"Nothing's happened," he said bitterly, "except that I've had to switch to another boat at the last minute!"

December 28th, 1935.

"Isn't this the boat you were driving yesterday?"

"No, I've had to put my rig in this new one without even testing her."

"Well, who's driving the Phantom?"

"Billie," he replied, and set down the can and climbed into the boat.

"But I thought that—"

"I'll tell you about it later," he interrupted. "I've got to pull out now."

"I'm still going to wish you lots of luck, Randy," she assured him, and went back to her car.

The Race

TEN speed-boats were competing in the race, and in a very little while they were all lined up in a row some little way behind the pylon that marked the start. On a stand specially erected for the occasion, close to the edge of the water, officials and favoured spectators were gathered together, and amongst the officials was an expert commentator whose voice rang out from loudspeakers all along the shore.

"Well, here we are, ladies and gentlemen," he said, "under a blue sky, facing a lot of blue water. We are about set for the start of the annual outboard races. Last-minute information reaches us that a switch in pilots is declared that may upset all the odds."

There was a pause, and then:

"The Phantom is not to be driven by Randy Rogers, as previously announced, but by Billie Devlin, the madcap of motordom. Rogers, in a late entry, will pilot the Santa Monica, a new boat of which very little is known."

Another pause while the commentator used his binoculars.

"They are bunched together, ten wingless birds, motors hitting perfectly, all ready for a flying start. Billie Devlin will be the only woman entered."

A shot echoed and re-echoed across the bay.

"There goes the gun!" cried the commentator. "The boats leap towards the line! They're off—and the race is on! The little girl in the Phantom got away to a slow start, but she's got a lot of nerve and experience to back it up, though."

The speed-boats flapped the water, travelling at a rate that looked dangerous, bunched together as they were. But long before the conical buoy over by the entrance to the harbour was reached, Randy and Billie had drawn ahead of the others. Even the commentator became excited.

"There goes Randy Rogers opening up!" he said. "He's pushing the Santa Monica for all it's worth! There he goes—out in front! But Billie Devlin's right on his tail! He's driving like a madman! My word, just look at him at that buoy! Wow, he didn't miss it by a foot!"

The supercharger was doing its work. The buoy had been rounded, and Randy came swooping back on the second lap well ahead of all the other boats.

"He's making the water smoke!" exaggerated the commentator. "Going a mile a minute! He must have made up a hundred yards by taking that wild chance. Anything happens in a race like this, folks."

"Here comes Billie Devlin from the centre in the back, trying to work her way up to the front. The leaders are certainly setting a terrific pace. Oh, boy, if they keep on travelling like this we're sure going to see a world's record set on this course to-day!"

The last words were only just uttered when thick black smoke began to ascend from the motor of the Phantom and grew in density. Horrified shouts rang out from all along the water-front, pierced by the amplified voice of the commentator.

"Something's wrong with the Phantom! Billie Devlin's boat—the engine's smoking! The—The Phantom's afire! She's lost control!"

It was only too true. Flames were jetting the cloud of smoke and the speed-boat was running erratically, causing other competitors to swerve in haste to avoid it. Billie, at the wheel, was almost blinded by the smoke, and as the flames leapt up at her she shrank back.

But Randy had looked back to see how the others were progressing, and the mere sight of the smoke was enough to tell him that it was the Phantom the smoke concealed. What had happened to the car had happened to the boat the unknown enemy had expected him to pilot!

Without the fraction of a second's hesitation he swung the Santa Monica round in a great arc and went roaring back to save the girl he suddenly realised meant everything in the world to him.

"She's surrounded by flame!" cried the commentator in a voice that cracked. "But Randy Rogers has abandoned the race to save her! There she goes, overboard!"

To fling herself overboard was the only thing Billie could do. She had no idea that Randy was at hand, but with masterly control of the boat he drove, he slowed down beside her as she came to the surface, reached over the side at the risk of upsetting, and hoisted her on board. Then he swung towards the pylon, one arm round Billie's waist.

"What a gesture of sportsmanship!" exclaimed the commentator. "Rogers is back in the push, and—believe it or not—he's trying to overtake the other boats! In my estimation it's a hopeless job, for all the other boats are half a lap ahead of him. But he's making the Santa Monica hum!"

The pylon was reached and rounded: two labouring speed-boats were overtaken, and two of the leaders crashed into one another and overturned. The Phantom was a mass of flames as Randy shot past it, and Billie shivered.

"Jackson and Smith are leading," the commentator boomed a few minutes later, "but Randy Rogers is well after them! I've never seen anything like this before. Rogers is carrying the added weight of the girl, but he's certainly giving that boat the works!"

There was another spill, and then Randy, who was round the buoy and leading the way home, except for Smith, whom he passed half a lap from the finishing-line.

The nearest competitor was a full quarter of a lap behind when the line was passed and he cut out the motor. The race was won, the future was assured, and the enemy was defeated. All along the water-front voices shouted themselves hoarse as the speed-boat drifted and Randy and Billie looked at one another.

Water was streaming from her overalls and her face was as black as a chimney sweep's, but she was supremely happy.

"Did it!" she cried; and then rapturously they hugged one another, and Randy's face became dotted with the imprints of two sooty lips.

"WESTWARD HO"

men when, without warning, horsemen came out of the forests that lay close to the trail. Men in blue shirts and riding white horses. At their head was a tall figure, and a cry of fright came from Ballard's lips.

Ballard had not trusted anyone with the gold and was driving the prairie schooner himself. Wildly he lashed at the horses in a desperate effort to escape. He shouted to his men to stand and fight—so that he might get away with his gold.

Ballard's men knew that in flight they had little chance as the White Riders were better mounted, so they made an effort at fighting. Remorselessly the Riders swept down on them, rode them down and shot them down. When Red fell with a bullet through his brain, the remnant took to the woods.

John Wyatt had reserved Ballard for himself: The scoundrel, hearing the shots, thought for a moment that he was getting away from the fight. The gold might be all his. Then he looked back and saw the tall rider on the white horse. He seized a rifle and fired, but the schooner swayed too much for good shooting.

Every second John Wyatt drew nearer, and Ballard tried another shot, but the dust kicked up by the hoofs of the horses and the rocketing wagon made his target a dim blur.

A sudden spurt, and through the dust John drove his horse alongside. His arms shot out and gripped the sides of the wagon. Ballard lashed at his sweating horses and then spun round to find the reason of the strange sounds. He saw John clambering on to the wagon, and he lashed out wildly with his whip.

John sprang forward and wrenched the whip away. Ballard tried to draw a gun, and that was wrested from his hand. The old scoundrel fought desperately, whilst the maddened horses dashed forward with the reins trailing in the dust. Ahead the trail turned and twisted, with a drop of thirty or forty feet to a dried-up stream that was full of great boulders.

"At last we come face to face!" Wyatt shouted. "I've trailed the West to find the man who murdered my mother and father, and now I've got you!"

Ballard cursed and snarled at Wyatt.

Without thought of himself he charged at Wyatt in an effort to fling the younger man off the schooner.

John drove his fists to the flabby body and knew that the fight was nearly over. A lurch made him glance ahead, and he saw the danger, but as he moved towards the driver's seat, Ballard gripped him round the waist. Exerting his strength, John broke the grip, spun round and drove his fist hard to the hideous features.

The schooner was at the corner. The horses swung round at a mad pace and the wheels went over the edge. John Wyatt saw what was going to happen and dived over the side of the wagon, twisting in the air to break his fall.

Every bone in his body was jarred by the impact, and he lay there winded. Vaguely he heard a splintering sound, a yell of terror, and then distant crashing.

John staggered to his feet. Ahead he saw two horses galloping with a broken shaft trailing behind them. He peered over the edge of the trail and saw bits and pieces of a smashed schooner, and, sprawled near by, the figure of Ballard.

It was the end of the trail for John Wyatt.

John accompanied the Gordons down the valley of the Black river.

"I am going back to my ranch. I have been away too long," he told Mary, when open country had been reached. "The trail is ended for the White Riders—our mission finished."

"Then we may not see you again?" Mary asked wistfully.

"I was aiming to ask a certain young lady to marry me," John looked at her closely. "But I'm far too scared to be so bold. It would be terrible hard if she should say 'No.'"

"Of course I don't know what you're talking about, John." Mary's eyes twinkled mischievously and happily. "But I've always wanted to go to Northern California and be a rancher's wife."

Thus did John Wyatt, seeking revenge, find great happiness.

Daredevil Horse-leaping in New Picture

It looks as if the daredevil days of the screen are back again. William Wellman, directing "Robin Hood of El Dorado" for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, is reviving the wildest cowboy stunts of the daredevil era of the screen.

One of the wildest thus far reported is the feat of a cowboy in jumping a horse across a deep chasm a la the very best Tom Mix style. Still another is a flying leap from the seat of a runaway stage-coach to the saddle of a galloping horse. Three hundred horsemen participated in a running gun-fight that is said to have had its share of real as well as reel thrills.

Appearing with Warner Baxter, the star, are a number of the best known daredevil horsemen of Hollywood, including Hank Potts, Pardner Jones, Yakima Canutt, Duke Green, Jose Dominguez, Lee Phelps and others who have ridden high and handsome with Mix, Bill Hart, the late Fred Thomson, and other cowboy stars.

The story is based on the adventure-some life of Joaquin Murrieta, the dashing bad man of the days of '49.

The Elephant Boy!

Patric Knowles, who plays the lead in the new Fox British picture, "Wedding Group," has a most original hobby—he collects elephants!

He has had this hobby for some time now, and he has over eighty different kinds of elephants. Some he has picked up on his travels, but most of them have been presents from friends who knew of his collection. They range from minute ivory ones to great big ebony and teak "tuskers"—there is even one that a friend made from pipe-cleaners!

At one time and another Patric has had a lot of trouble with his elephants. The superstition is that they must always face the door of the room and never the window. If they face the window, all the luck will go out of it. It was no easy task seeing that eighty elephants all had their faces to the door, and the maids who dusted Patric's room always would put them back the wrong way round. Eventually, he got so tired of moving them that he banished all the smaller ones to a cabinet, and kept only the large ones about the room.

If the collection continues to increase at the present rate, Patric reckons he will have to rent a wing of the British Museum to house it within the next ten years!

A Flashlight Sets Radio Picture Studios a Problem

When is a flashlight not a flashlight? The answer to this Hollywood riddle is: "When it's in films."

Powerful as the modern commercial hand-lamp is, it fails to function on a film studio stage. In opposition to the intensely brilliant spots and sun-ares of picture-making, even when dimmed for night scenes, the usual flashlight glows but feebly and scarcely registers on the film.

Studio technicians therefore had to perfect a new type of hand-lamp for use in "Seven Keys to Baldpate." Gene Raymond's first starring picture for Radio under his new contract, since many flashlight scenes were called for in the script of the mystery farce.

This was accomplished by building a tiny arc-light inside a regular flashlight case, using carbons no larger than the lead of a pencil, and giving the device power either from a miniature storage battery concealed under the users' coat, or by running concealed wires to the regular lighting circuits.

Several of these high-powered lamps were constructed, and in the hands of Gene Raymond, Margaret Callahan, Erin O'Brien-Moore, Moroni Olsen, Eric Blore and other members of the cast, proved highly realistic in the exciting sequences of the picture.

The Studio Conjuror

"Props" must have one of the most difficult jobs in a film studio. He never knows what he is going to be asked for next, and he is expected to produce odd articles like rabbits out of a conjurer's hat!

The other day, on the set of "Wedding Group," the new Fox-British picture now in production at the Wembley studios, the Scottish minister, played by Alastair Sim, had to offer his guest a cigar. After a little deliberation the directors decided that the ordinary cigar-box was not quite in period.

"Props," shouted the assistant director, "get me a cigar-box, period 1853!"

"Props" looked rather bewildered at this sudden request, but after several minutes of rummaging in his collection of oddments, he returned with a varied assortment of boxes.

Sure enough, amongst the collection there was one which proved suitable to hold a minister's cigars, in the year 1853. Shooting continued—no one seemed to be impressed by "Props" finding such a box at such short notice!

"Extra" Gets a Break

The possession of a wrist-watch proved very fortunate for one of the crowd artistes on the "Ticket of Leave" set at Elstree recently. In one of the scenes John Clements, as "Lucky Fisher," a gentleman-crook in flight from the police, is seen standing by the lift-shaft waiting to go up to meet Dorothy Boyd on the second floor. A detective is watching him. He quickly looks at his watch, jumps into the lift, slams the doors in the detective's face, and the lift whizzes up.

When rehearsing this action, Mr. Clements took a slim gold hunter from his waistcoat pocket, but Michael Henkinson, the director, decided that a wrist-watch would be more in keeping with the character. "Somebody loan me a watch, please," he said, and a crowd player stepped forward.

When the scene had been made, Mr. Clements was about to hand the watch back to its owner, but the director interposed. "You'll have to keep it right through the sequence now," he said.

In order that the watch and its owner should be available at all times the extra, who was originally wanted only for one day, was engaged for the rest of the week.

From Prop-boy to Director

Five years ago Charles Barton was one of the many prop-boys at the Paramount studios in Hollywood. Which means that he spent his time fetching and carrying and doing odd jobs.

Now he has become a director. He made "The Last Outpost," which features Cary Grant, Claude Rains, and Gertrude Michael.

For nearly three years he spent his spare time hanging about the executive offices at Paramount, and at last his chance came. The studio decided to film Zane Grey's "Wagon Wheels." Charlie got the job of assistant director, and within three days the director fell ill.

So the job was handed over to this young man, who is not much over five feet tall, and he made such a good picture, especially in the out-of-door camera work, that when the studio purchased "The Last Outpost" it was handed over to him right away.

It Happened One Night

This, they tell me, is true. It happened to one of the gag-men— he particularly desires his name to be withheld—who was working on the new Jack Buchanan—Fay Wray comedy, "When Knights were Bold," for Capitol Films. He had spent the weekend with his wife, who was away for a short holiday.

He reached his home from the studio on the Monday night, let himself into the empty house, thought he heard noises, went to investigate, and found himself pinioned in the arms of two burglars.

They tied his hands and his feet. One of the ruffians said to the other:

"How about a gag?"

The gag-man misunderstood.

"Sure. Have you heard about the old Etonian at Harar—"

But then the rubber truncheon fell.

Fogged!

John Clements, leading man in "Ticket of Leave," the new Paramount production just completed at Elstree, is nothing if not obliging.

Preparing to leave the studios after working late the other night the players were confronted by a thick fog, and Mr. Clements offered Dorothy Boyd, the leading lady, a lift home in his car. After an hour's crawl through the foggy lanes they found themselves not in London, but at St. Albans. On the return trip they ran out of petrol, eventually arriving home at four a.m.

However, they were both on the set and all ready made up by 9 a.m. next morning. They kept themselves awake during the next day, when not on the set, by singing comic songs, despite the marked lack of appreciation by George Merritt, Wally Patch, Max Kirby and other members of the cast.

Danny O'Hara is a trial to his brother Pat because he persists in managing unprofitable boxers instead of getting a regular job. Worse still, he falls in love with the girl Pat hopes to marry; and his latest "champion" becomes unfit to fight at the crucial moment—with highly dramatic results. A first-rate yarn full of laughs and punches, starring James Cagney and Pat O'Brien False Alarm!

"A DAB of butter I can let you have," Mrs. O'Hara informed Mrs. Adams across the well that divided the kitchen of her flat from the kitchen of the flat occupied by the neighbour who was always borrowing things, "but it's only six eggs that I've got in the place, and those I'll be needin' for breakfast."

Sharp-featured Mrs. Adams expressed her gratitude in rather a lukewarm fashion, being disappointed about the eggs, and Mrs. O'Hara left the window she had opened to get the butter, which she wrapped in grease-proof paper and placed in a paper bag.

An Irishwoman of very ample proportions, she was the mother of three grown sons for whom she lived and laboured, and she did not believe in disturbing the slumbers of those sons a moment earlier in the morning than was absolutely necessary; for which reason she was none too pleased with the woman who had made quite a lot of noise to attract her attention.

From the brick wall beside the open window to the brick wall across the well there stretched a double clothes-line, on pulleys, for the benefit of both tenants of the tall apartment-house. Mrs. O'Hara pegged the paper bag to one of the ropes, and with the other hauled it across the chasm to the borrower, who detached it and shouted:

"I'll be paying you back this afternoon."

"Whist, woman!" rebuked Mrs. O'Hara. "Haven't I asked you not to shout so loud at this time o' the mornin'?"

Mrs. Adams, possessed of the butter, could afford to retaliate, and did so.

"Well, it's time they were up, anyway!" she vociferated.

"Let me be the best judge o' that!" flamed Mrs. O'Hara, and she closed the window with violence to find that the kettle on the stove was whistling and that the clock in the sitting-room was striking seven.

She put coffee in a metal pot and added boiling water, then went out from the kitchen into a wide and carpeted passage and knocked on a door.

"Pat!" she called. "Are ye up?"

Pat O'Hara, eldest of the three sons, raised his red head from a very comfortable pillow in the bed-room beyond the door.

"Coming right out, mother!" he called back.

"S-s-sh!" she hissed, afraid lest her youngest son Danny should be disturbed. "Now see that Mike gets up."

Michael O'Hara was fast asleep and snoring peacefully in an adjacent bed. Lying on his back with his mouth open he did not look a particularly brilliant specimen of young manhood, but in his more active moments he was quite a capable member of New York's Fire Brigade, Company B.

Pat slid out from between the sheets, stretched his arms, shed his pyjamas, donned a pair of blue trousers issued to him by the police department of New York City, and viewed the sleeping beauty from the edge of his own bed as he put on his boots.

"Hi, false alarm," he barked, "out of the feathers!"

A louder snore was his only reward, and he rose to pull the bedclothes off his brother and to shake him by the shoulder. Mike opened a pair of bleary blue eyes and blinked them owlishly.

"Oh," he muttered. "Oh, all right, Pat—all right, Pat!"

The blue eyes became closed again, the mouth open. Pat shook the recumbent form more vigorously than ever.

"Come on!" he commanded.

"All right, Pat," Mike murmured sleepily. "All right, I'm wide awake! I'm wide awake!"

He sat up and yawned.

"I'm wide awake!"

"Stay that way," said Pat, and in his vest and trousers went off whistling to the bathroom at the end of the passage, where he proceeded to wash, to shave, and to brush and comb his dishevelled red hair.

Mrs. O'Hara greeted him as he passed the door of the kitchen, broke four eggs against the side of a frying-pan, dropped a piece of eggshell into the coffee-pot to clear the beverage it contained, and presently stole to the bed-room door to listen for sounds of activity within.

No such sounds reaching her ears, she went into the room—and there was Mike, fast asleep on the top of the bedclothes.

"Oh dear, oh dear!" she lamented. "Oh, you would fall off! Michael! Michael! Wake up!"

Mike stirred, but did not waken, so his mother went to a washstand behind the door, and with a knife that was in her hand smote a water-jug which stood empty in its basin.

The effect was almost electrical. Mike shot out of bed on to his feet before he even opened his eyes.

"Oh!" he cried. "Oh—er—hallo, mother! I—I thought that was the alarm."

"Not so loud," she enjoined. "Hurry up and come out. You're late!"

"All right, mother!"

She went out, whereupon he tumbled back on to the bed; but in less than two minutes she returned and stood over him.

"Get up!"

Mike obeyed with reluctance, and the bed was stripped.

"And stay up!"

"All right, mother," yawned Mike.

"All right."

This time he discarded his nightshirt, as soon as she had gone, and put on his official trousers and boots. He went out to the bath-room, but the door of the bath-room was shut and bolted. He banged a fist on it and shouted:

"Come on, Pat! What're you doin' in there? Makin' your will? Hurry up! Give someone else a crack at it, will you?"

There was no response from inside, but Mrs. O'Hara came running out from the kitchen.

"S-s-sh!" she warned. "S-s-sh!"

"It's not fair, ma," complained Mike. "It was my turn to be first this morning!"

Mrs. O'Hara called out, but not too loudly:

"Patrick, you hurry out of there! Are ye shavin'?"

The door was opened, and Pat appeared with a comb in his hand and a towel over his shoulder. He tapped Mike's massive chest with the comb and grinned at his mother.

"No, sweetheart!" he boomed. "I'm just combin' my hair."

"S-s-sh!"

He frowned at her.

"Mother, what is all this keep quiet business?" he demanded.

"Well, Danny was out late last night, and he's still asleep," she replied.

"Oh, Danny was—?" Scorn changed to consternation as Mike dived past him into the bath-room and slammed the door. "Hi!"

But the bolt was shot, and he had to finish his toilet in the bed-room.

A few minutes later, completely dressed in his uniform, he sat down at the table in the living-room, and Mike arrived in his uniform with a cap upon his head. Mrs. O'Hara, serving the fried eggs from the pan, perceived the cap.

"Tako off the hat!" she said sharply.

The cap was transferred from Mike's dark-brown head to the tablecloth.

"Not on the table!"

Mike restored the cap to his head and regarded with aversion two fried eggs upon his plate.

"Aw, eggs again?" he said dismally. "Look, mum, ain't you got a steak or something? We had a three-alarm fire last night."

"A steak?" bridled Mrs. O'Hara. "What do you think this is, the Ritz? You'll eat it and like it—and quiet, both of ye!"

Pat, who had been glowering at a vacant chair on the other side of the table, sprang to his feet.

"Now look, mother!" he exploded. "Danny's no different than the rest of us—except he won't work! I'm gonna get him up out of bed!"

"You'll do nothin' o' the kind," declared Mrs. O'Hara. "He's a growin' boy and he needs his strength."

"She's right, Pat," said Mike, nodding his head sagely. "Don't you remember he didn't even have the chicken-pox until he was six years old!"

At that moment a door was slammed out in the passage, and Mrs. O'Hara exclaimed:

"He's up! Now I hope the both of you are satisfied!"

Pat Loses His Temper

DANNY O'HARA had emerged from a bed-room in trousers, boots, and a skimpy vest. He was a couple of inches shorter than Pat, slenderer of build than Mike, and the youngest of the three. Like Pat he was a red-head, January 25th, 1936.

and like Pat he had an Irish temper; but there the resemblance ended.

Having slammed the door behind him he opened it again and looked anxiously into the room, then closed it quietly, sailed away into the living-room and saluted his mother.

"Are you all right, Daniel?" she asked.

"I am now," he informed her gaily. "Being greeted first thing in the mornin' by the most beautiful woman in the whole world. Give us a kiss!"

"Go away wid ye!" laughed Mrs. O'Hara, but she gave him a kiss and was hugged. He had more blarney than either of the others, and in that respect took after his dead father.

Pat looked on with scornful eyes, and Danny made a face at him.

"What's the row?" he inquired. "You guys been at it again?"

"No," snapped Pat, "but you and me'll be, if we don't come to some understanding."

"Now, Patrick!" chided Mrs. O'Hara, and she stood between the two brothers. But Danny neither needed, nor sought, protection.

"Wait a minute, ma," he said.

"What's on your mind, sour-puss?"

"When are you gonna get a job?" shouted Pat.

"Why, shame on ye, Pat!" cried Mrs. O'Hara. "Takin' that attitude towards your brother an' all. Has he ever done anything to either of ye to hurt your feelings?"

"I don't know about that, mother," remarked Mike with his mouth full of fried egg and buttered roll. "When I had the mumps, who stood in front of me and sucked a lemon?"

"Be quiet, Mike!" commanded Mrs. O'Hara.

Danny walked round to the vacant chair and occupied it with an air of dignity. Pat resumed his seat and began to devour his breakfast, and presently all three were feeding. But what Pat had said rankled, and Danny looked across the table.

"Say, what's the idea of starting all this business about me gettin' a job?" he demanded.

"Because," replied Pat, "I'm figuring on gettin' married."

"Why, Pat!" exclaimed Mrs. O'Hara in astonishment. "You never even told me you had a girl!"

Pat seemed to be a trifle embarrassed.

"Well, mother," he said, "I was goin' to. I—I only met her a couple of weeks ago."

"This is kinda sudden," said Mike.

"I'll have to think this over."

"Congratulations," said Danny brightly, and stretched a hand across the table—a hand that was ignored.

"Forget the congratulations and find a job!" Pat snapped at him. "You're gonna have to help out, after I leave here. You've been gettin' away with it long enough!"

"He ain't gonna give up his career, no matter how long he lays around," Mrs. O'Hara declared stoutly.

"Oh, career me foot!" snorted Pat.

"If he could make any money handling prizefighters he'd be a genius!"

"With the fighters he's had," supplemented Mike, "he'd have to be a magician!"

Danny nursed his chin and cheek with the rejected hand.

"I'm just lettin' you guys talk!" he jeered.

"And you know yourself, Pat," defended Mrs. O'Hara, "Lucian O'Malley wasn't bad at all, until he got into the ring."

"And then he was indifferent," commented Mike.

"Yeah," said Pat. "And that—that Haymaker Hayes." He laughed derisively. "There was a lulu, too!"

"He went two rounds in Perth Amboy, didn't he?" challenged Mrs. O'Hara; but unfortunately Mike remembered that New Jersey battle, and he chuckled:

"That's right, ma—flat on his back!"

"Ho made the hay all right," said Pat reminiscingly, "but you could never get him out of it!"

"I ought to know," said Mike. "I was in his corner."

"That was just the trouble," Danny retorted. "Ho had three men against him—the referee, the guy he was fighting, and you!"

"Aw, forget the alibis!" Pat flipped an impatient hand. "You gonna take that police examination, or not?"

"Not!"

"It pays fifty dollars a week," said Mike. "Of course that ain't as much as we firemen get, but at least—"

"You keep your oar out of it, Michael!" Mrs. O'Hara interrupted. "Of course, Danny, Pat could help you an awful lot if you would let him—"

"D'you want me to be a cop?" howled Danny.

"Well, that's up to you," she conceded. "Though, Danny, I—I was a little hurt when you wouldn't take the Civil Service examination to be a letter-carrier."

"Don't want to be a postman!" said Danny.

"Let me tell you something!" roared Pat. "There's lots worse things than bein' a cop!"

"But I don't want to be a cop!" Danny vociferated.

"No, you don't want to be a cop!" Pat leaned forward over the table, a fine figure of a policeman who had lost his temper. "What d'you want to be?"

"I don't want to be a cop!"

Mike pushed back his chair and rose. "Aw, this is too much for me," he growled. "I'm goin' down to the fire-house where there's a little peace and quiet. Good-bye, mother!"

He went off in disgust, and Pat threw down his serviette and rose stormily to his feet.

"Will you take that examination and at least try to get on the force?" he roared.

Danny screwed up his face.

"Oh," he derided, "I have to be a cop just so you can get married, eh?"

Pat clenched a fist, but Mrs. O'Hara caught at his arm.

"Let him alone, Pat!" she enjoined.

"Okay, mother!" Pat tossed his head. "I'm always wrong. I give up!"

He made for the door, but she called him back.

"Did you ever see your father, drunk or sober," she asked plaintively, "go out of that front door without kissin' me good-bye?"

He murmured apologies, kissed her, and rammed his peaked cap on his head.

Then, in the passage, he opened the front door of the flat; but she ran after him.

"Oh, Pat!" she cried. "Pat, you were jokin' about gettin' married, weren't you?"

He turned with a sheepish grin. She stood no higher than his shoulder, her waist had disappeared with her youth, and at fifty-five she was more than merely plump; but her face still bore a measure of the beauty that had been hers when she had married a man in far Donegal, and she was his mother. Whatever resentment he felt against Danny he could not visit upon her, nor could he deceive her.

"Well," he admitted, "I really haven't asked her yet. She's a swell girl, though."

"She's got a mighty fine fellow!"

That was pleasant in his ears, and he kissed her for it.

"I think you'll like her," he said, and added with pride: "She's Captain Jackson's daughter"

Mrs. O'Hara's brown eyes widened, but there was no girl in all the world too good for any of her three sons, at all events, in her estimation.

"Pat," she said, "do me a favour! Bring her up to supper to-night—I'll have something special!"

"All right," nodded Pat, "I'll try and get her to come. Of course I—I don't know her awfully well yet, but I think she will. Good-bye, mother."

Mrs. O'Hara went back to the living-room to clear away the breakfast things, and she was washing-up in the kitchen when she saw Danny mount a chair in the passage with a piece of screwed-up newspaper in his hand. She went out to him.

"What are you doin' up there?" she asked curiously.

"It's a secret," he informed her, and wedged the paper between the striker and the dome of an electric bell on the wall above the front door, then descended beside her. "Say, listen, mum—have you got something nice for breakfast? Something like a—like a big steak, for instance?"

"Are you that hungry?"

"No, no," he laughed, "it's not for me. It's for a guest."

"A what?" she asked blankly.

He held her fat arms, danced her along the carpeted passage.

"Ma," he exulted, "at last my luck has changed! I've got a champ!"

"What, another one?" She broke loose from him. "You and your champs!"

"On the level, ma," he insisted. "He's in my room—he stayed with us last night."

It was not by any means the first time Danny had brought alleged champions home with him to roost.

"What's his name?" she inquired.

"Carbarn Hammerschlag," he replied.

She repeated the surname without any idea that it was German for the sparks that fly when a blacksmith is at work and asked if he were a Russian.

"No," said Danny, "he's a conductor."

"I thought you said he was a fighter!"

"Well, he is! He licked three men down at the car barns last night—knocked out all three of 'em in two seconds!"

"He did?" breathed Mrs. O'Hara.

"Why?"

"Well, you see the motorman forgot and rang the bell. Oh, I'm not kidding! You see, he—he's just a little bit peculiar. He used to be a fighter, but flopped, and now every time he hears a bell ring he starts slugging."

"If he's so good, why did he flop?"

"Bad management."

"And you got him? Well, I can see his troubles are over!"

Danny put the chair back in its place and followed her into the kitchen.

"Now, look, ma, look," he wheedled. "here's what you do. You wrestle up a big steak, and some—er—some hot cakes, and I'll tell you what I'll do."

"See that he eats them, I suppose?" she returned dryly.

"No, oh no, better than that. What I'm goin' to do for you I wouldn't do for anybody else in the whole world! And here's what it is! For fifteen bucks I'm goin' to give you a piece of Carbarn Hammerschlag!"

The offer was not appreciated. His mother had opened the pantry door, but she turned to smite him on the chest.

"Oh, no you don't!" she cried. "When you got me to put the rent money on 'Tiddleywinks' O'Malley, that was the end!"

"But, ma, you haven't seen him yet. He's terrific! I'll go and get him right here!"

The "Champ"!

CARBARN HAMMERSCHLAG had risen from the spare bed in Danny's room, but had got no farther than the edge of it, where he sat with his elbow on his knee and his chin in his hand, recalling the events of the night before.

He was a big fellow and a broad-shouldered one, but he did not look like a professional boxer. He was full of face, weak of mouth, and had a nose of such proportions that it ought to have been broken to justify Danny's faith in him.

He heard that young man's voice at the door, but did not budge or even answer. Danny entered the room, but stopped short as his gaze encountered the thoughtful figure.

"Oh, excuse me, Champ," he said hurriedly. "Excuse me! I'm sorry!"

He sped back to the kitchen.

"What's he doing?" inquired Mrs. O'Hara.

"Thinking," Danny replied.

"For one of your fighters that sounds encouragin'!"

"I'm tellin' you, ma," said Danny with enthusiasm, "he's a potential gold mine! With my management he's a cinch for the title!"

"So was Haymaker Hayes," she reminded him. "Where will this goldmine fight?"

"Well—er—I'd like to get him a shot at the Garden."

"What?" Only the most famous boxers appear at the stadium in Madison Square Gardens, and Danny had flown a trifle too high.

"But—er—he'll take Cohen's Barn in Jersey City," he said. "Now, look, ma, you get that steak ready, and I'll get him right out here. Go ahead!"

Off to the bed-room he went again, and this time he interrupted the thinker's meditations.

"Come on, Champ," he said, "I want you to meet the mother."

Carbarn Hammerschlag rose up in his underclothes, and Danny seized upon a gaudily patterned dressing-gown and helped him into it.

"Come on," he said again. "She's gettin' breakfast ready now."

Carbarn permitted himself to be piloted as far as the door, but stopped there to yawn prodigiously and to stretch his arms.

"This way," said Danny, and tugged him along the passage into the kitchen, where Mrs. O'Hara turned from the

"If he could make any money handling prize-fighters," snorted Pat, "he'd be a genius——" stove to contemplate the alleged gold-mine and was introduced.

"How do you do, Mr. Hammerschlag?" she inquired. "Danny's been telling me he thinks you stand a good chance for the title."

Carbarn shook hands with her.

"Mother," he boomed, "when he says 'thinks' he's bein' pessimistic! Feel me biceps!"

"I'd rather take your word for it," she decided. "I'm fixing you a steak."

The "gold-mine" frowned at the frying-pan.

"What, no mushrooms?" he said.

"Oh, Champ!" Danny intervened. "You want to wash, don't you? Come on, I'll show you the bath-room."

"Not me, pal," protested Carbarn with vehemence. "Every time I wash in one of those things I get embarrassed. Gimme a sink any day!"

He made for the kitchen sink, found some liquid soap there, and turned on the tap.

"I'll get you a towel," said Mrs. O'Hara, and she went off to the linen-cupboard, pursued by Danny, who asked her eagerly what she thought of him.

"Well," she replied non-committally, "he's got plenty to say."

"Just think," urged Danny. "I'm offering you ten per cent. of him for fifteen dollars!"

Mrs. O'Hara found a towel.

"Why, I've only got fourteen," she said.

"Ah-h!" Danny wagged a finger at her. "There's that wee bit o' Scots comin' out again! It's a bargain?"

"I'll think it over. Fancy, that's the last clean towel! I never can keep a towel in this place!"

Danny returned to the kitchen with the towel to find Carbarn bared to the waist and washing vigorously under the running tap. He gave him the towel and told him he would dig up a suit.

"You can't wear that conductor's uniform any more," he said.

"Just give me a sweater," suggested Carbarn. "I can still wear me conductor's pants."

Danny scurried off to the bed-room Pat shared with Mike, and his mother was still at the linen-cupboard when he emerged from it carrying a lounge suit of a very pronounced check pattern. She stared after him.

"Hi, what are you doin' with Pat's hest suit?" she called out.

"Why, I—I'm taking it to the cleaners," Danny responded—and took it into his own bed-room.

When he returned to the kitchen his mother was turning the steak in the frying-pan and Carbarn Hammerschlag had dried himself and was buttoning his vest. Down in Seventh Avenue a motor fire-engine passed the apartment-house with clanging bell, and to Mrs. O'Hara's astonishment the hoxer suddenly adopted a fighting attitude, striking out in all directions.

"Here, here, what's the matter with you?" she gasped.

Danny swept up behind the excited tram-conductor and pinioned the waving arms with his own.

"How d'you like him now, ma?" he asked.

"How do I like him?" gurgled Mrs. O'Hara. "I'm goin' to get the fourteen dollars!"

The Girl in the Case

IN common with a number of other officers attached to the second precinct of New York's Police Department, Pat lined up for duty in the station situated in Greenwich Street. A sergeant appeared from another room and spoke to the desk sergeant who had been addressing the men collectively.

January 25th, 1936.

"O'Hara!" barked the desk sergeant. "Here," returned Pat.

"Fall out, O'Hara! Right face! Forward march!"

Pat deserted his colleagues to approach the desk.

"Captain Jackson wants you to report to him before you go to your post," he was informed.

"Okay," he said with a salute. "Thanks."

He went back across the room to a door labelled "Captain W. W. Jackson," and he turned the handle and stepped into a plainly furnished office, the principal feature of which was a massive desk, set almost in the middle of the floor.

"You sent—" he began, and stopped short to gape at a very beautiful brown-haired girl who was occupying the captain's leather-covered armchair behind the desk—a girl in a white hat and a striped frock who saluted him mockingly.

"Hallo, Lucille!" he exclaimed.

"A very fine entrance," said she. "It's too bad father wasn't here to see you. He might have promoted you!"

"I'm just as glad he isn't," declared Pat, moving nearer to the desk and perching on it. "I'd rather talk to you, anyway. How long's he gonna be gone?"

"Only a minute," she replied. "I came down to wheedle some shopping money out of him. And got away with it!"

"Yeah, I'll bet that was tough—all you had to do was smile once!"

"No, twice to-day," she corrected.

"I wish you were around when we're tryin' to get something out of him!"

"Is he that bad?"

"Well," said Pat, "you don't take after him. You know I was gonna—"

"Sorry to keep you waiting, honey," said a well-known voice behind him, and he sprang up and stood to attention.

"Hallo, Pat!"

"Good-morning, sir," said Pat.

Captain Jackson, an elderly and nearly bald-headed man with a blob of a nose and a pair of shrewd eyes as blue as his daughter's, walked round the desk and sat down in the chair Lucille had vacated.

"You've met Mr. O'Hara?" he inquired.

"Oh, yes," nodded Lucille, and was handed some money.

"Huh! Now run along and see if you can spend it all."

She thanked him and tripped away towards the door, which Pat opened for her.

"Wait for me outside," he whispered.

She smiled and vanished, and he turned to face his superior officer.

"You sent for me, sir?"

"Yes," Captain Jackson replied. "Last night the commission appointed me general chairman of the Annual Police Benefit."

"Well, I'm glad to hear it, sir," said Pat, eager to escape.

"They recommended that you be given charge of the programme. Spoke very highly of the way you worked last year's benefit, and I agreed with them that you were probably the best man for the job."

"Well, thank you, sir," Pat seemed to be on pins and needles. "But there—er—there are plenty of men in the department who could handle it much better than I."

"Nonsense!" quoth the captain. "You can do it. I've already put you in charge."

"Well, I'm only too glad to help out the show, as far as that goes, but I—er—"

"What's the matter with you?" asked the captain gruffly. "Have you gotta go some place?"

"No, no, no, sir," stammered Pat. "I—er—I—"

"Well, for heaven's sake stand still!"

"Yes, sir," Pat did his best to obey.

"Is—er—is that all, sir?"

"No! What's this business of my daughter calling you 'Pat'?"

Pat gulped.

"Me?" he asked innocently.

"Yes."

"Oh, well—well, you see, Lucille—er—Miss Jackson—she went to Coney Island the other night, and—er—well, of course, she being your daughter, I thought maybe I'd better look after her!"

"Huh!" Captain Jackson looked stern.

"From now on I recommend you to concentrate on the benefit. That's all."

"Y—yes, sir," Pat saluted and dived out at the door; whereupon the captain's features relaxed and he even grinned behind his hand.

Outside the station Lucille was waiting at the wheel of a smart two-seater which had probably cost her several smiles. Pat crossed the pavement and leaned over her.

"I wanted to ask you something," he confided. "I couldn't very well do it up there. I had a tough time getting away from your old man—I mean your dad."

Lucille laughed gaily and asked what it was he wanted to ask her.

"Mums wants you to come up to supper to-night," he blurted.

"Why, I'd love to come!" she declared. "What time?"

"Oh, seven o'clock," he said delightedly. "I finish at six-thirty, so I'll pick you up."

"No, don't do that," she protested. "It wouldn't give you much time. I can drive over all right. What's the address?"

"One-eight-two-four Seventh Avenue. I'll be waiting for you out in front."

"All right." She waved a hand and pressed the self-starter. "See you at seven."

Pat clicked his heels and touched his cap, then went back up the steps into the police-station. At the earliest opportunity he rang up his mother, in the privacy of a telephone-box, and informed her joyfully that Miss Jackson was coming to dinner.

"Oh, isn't that nice!" exclaimed Mrs. O'Hara, all of a flutter. "I'll phono Mike right away to be sure and get his hair cut on the way home."

"All right, mums," approved Pat. "and look, do me a favour, will you? Tell those lugs not to mention the fact that I'm goin' to marry Miss Jackson. As far as that goes, why can't Mike and Danny eat out to-night?"

That last suggestion in no way met with Mrs. O'Hara's approval.

"Aw, look, Pat," she objected, "I couldn't ask the boys to eat at a lunch-room—and besides, I'd like to show them off a little to Miss Jackson."

"All right, honey," surrendered Pat. "but for goodness' sake show Mike the difference between a knife and fork, will you? And for once in his life have him eat those mashed potatoes without a tablespoon!"

"Sure, I've been meanin' to speak to him several times about that, Pat," declared Mrs. O'Hara, "so you don't need to worry. To-night I'll absolutely see that he eats them with a teaspoon."

A Chance Encounter

LATER in the morning, while Pat was functioning as a policeman in the streets of New York City, Danny and his new protégé travelled up-town by train, wearing sweaters, and proceeded to do some road-work in the residential district of Yonkers.

Carbarn Hammerschlag had many pounds of superfluous flesh, and as the two trotted side by side past spacious lawns and fine estates it was he who panted, not his trainer, and Danny talked to divert attention from mere physical discomfort.

"Is Hammerschlag your right name?" he inquired.

"No," was the reply. "My right name's Hoiskerwitz, but it was too hard to say, so I changed it to Hanunerschlag."

"Oh!" Danny considered that point while several hundred yards of roadway were covered. Then: "Come on, get those legs up high!" he barked. "Move those arms! Come on!"

"I wish I could worry," announced Carbarn presently.

"Why?"

"Because then all I'd have to do would be to sit down and take off weight."

Lawns gave place to fields and trees, with hills in the distance. Carbarn remarked plaintively that the scenery was "swell." A riding establishment loomed up on the left, and he turned his head to gaze appreciatively at two girls in riding-habits who were talking together beside a horse.

"Oh, listen, Champ," said Danny, "there's something else I want to say to you. You'll never get anywhere if you get a dame on your mind, so from now on don't forget that wine, women and song, as well as late hours, are out!"

"Don't be foolish, pal," growled Carbarn.

"Take Robinson Crusoe, for instance," expounded Danny. "He didn't have any women in his life, and look what it got him! They wrote a book about him! Now come on and get those legs up higher! Move those arms!"

Carbarn raised flagging arms, and his fists moved up and down with the movements of his legs. The riding-school was left behind, but he was getting tired and he coveted a rest.

"Hi, an accident!" he exclaimed a few minutes later.

An open two-seater was stationary at the side of the road and a girl was evidently underneath it, since a pair of silk-clad legs and part of a skirt projected near the off-side rear wheel.

Danny stopped, and Carbarn stopped beside him.

"Give me a hand to get her out," said Danny.

Carbarn grabbed hold of one silk-clad leg, Carbarn grasped the other, and a highly indignant girl was dragged screaming from underneath the car and sat up. She was Lucille Jackson, but, of course, they were not to know that.

"Well, what's the big idea?" she stormed.

Danny leaned weakly upon the back bumper; Carbarn, with his hands on his hips, achieved a sickly grin.

"Excuse us, lady," he mumbled. "We thought you was ran over."

"Well, I'm not!" cried Lucille. "And if you'd had any sense at all you'd have looked under the car to see what I was doing!"

"If you're goin' to get sore about it," said Danny, "we can put you right back underneath there without any trouble at all."

"If you're so strong," retorted Lucille, "I'll just lie down and you can push the car over me!"

She picked up a jack which she had been trying to adjust under the back axle, and they saw that the tyre of the off-side rear wheel was flat.

"Here, let me do that," said Carbarn. "You'll spoil your dress."

"It's spoiled already!" she snapped at him, and Danny straightened up with a wry expression on his face.

Danny leaned weakly upon the back bumper. "Excuse us, lady," mumbled Carbarn. "We thought you was ran over!"

"Come on, Champ," he said. "Let's get going."

But Carbarn was obstinate.

"I'll have this bus jacked up in a second," he declared.

"Thanks!" Lucille rose to her feet and beamed at him. "At least, you're a gentleman!"

"Sure," agreed Carbarn with becoming modesty. "The name is Carbarn Hammerschlag. You'll hear a lot about me pretty soon."

He knelt to place the jack under the axle, but it was evident that he was no expert, and Danny called out to him to mind his fingers.

"Got a pair of gloves?" inquired Carbarn with a languishing smile for the girl in distress.

She said at first that she hadn't, then remembered that there were a pair in the dickey, in her golf-bag, and she went to open the dickey.

"But the fingers are cut off," she said.

Danny became impatient, thrust Carbarn aside, and knelt to adjust the jack.

"Can I help you?" asked Lucille.

"To do what?" he growled with his head under the car.

"To hear it all."

"Aw, you're so sweet!" he jeered; and she turned her back on him and regarded Carbarn with critical eyes.

"You must have a marvellous physique, Mr. Hammerschlag," she murmured.

"Well, I don't want to brag," said the ex-conductor of tram-cars, "but at the trolley-men's picnic, when I took off my bath-robe and stood in the sun wearing a pair o' shorts, you should-a heard the chatter of the ladyfolks."

"Were you boxing?" inquired Lucille.

"No, I was in the potato race."

While these two were becoming quite friendly Danny jacked up the car, removed the off-side wheel and substituted the spare. It was a very warm day and he perspired freely in the process; also he acquired considerable greasy dirt upon his hands and a smudge upon his nose.

He completed his task to find Lucille and Carbarn seated side by side on the running-board, and Carbarn smoking a forbidden cigarette which Lucille had given him.

"I hope I haven't kept you waitin' too long," he said with sarcasm.

"Not at all, pal," drawled Carbarn, puffing a cloud of smoke. "Take your time."

"Throw that away!" thundered Danny.

"Huh?"

Danny knocked the cigarette out of the offender's hand into the dust, and Lucille realised that she had made a mistake.

"I'm sorry," she said contritely. "It's my fault. If I'd known he was in training I wouldn't have offered it to him."

"Forget it," said Danny with a wave of his hand. "Your car's ready. Come on, you—up on your feet!"

Carbarn rose with manifest reluctance, but Lucille, who had decided that she liked Danny after all, cried out:

"Wait a minute! You look awfully warm, and I've got a thermos flask full of cold lemonade."

Danny declined the offering, but Carbarn announced that he was thirsty.

"I'll get it," said Lucille, and she ran round the back of the car to get the flask. Danny pushed Carbarn down on to the running-board again and commanded him to stay there.

"You're in training!" he barked.

He joined Lucille at the door by the wheel and he drank from the flask she pressed upon him.

"Are you always so disagreeable when you first meet people?" she asked with a pout.

"No," he replied, "but this is serious. Here I've got a fighter who's supposed to be in trainin', and it's not for him to do garage work, drink pink lemonade or smoke cigarettes. Why, smoking's plain poison!"

"You're convinced of that?" she asked, restoring the flask to the pocket on the door. "Then you'd better get to him, because he's taking another dose."

Carbarn's head was invisible from where they stood, but a spiral of smoke was ascending from the other side of the car. The half-smoked cigarette had been retrieved from the dust.

Danny flew round to the breaker of rules.

"What are you doin' with that?" he shouted.

"Throwing it away," Carbarn responded, and he dropped the end.

Danny ground his heel upon it. "Up on your feet!" he ordered. "Up on your feet! Start runnin' now!"

Carbarn rose, but did not run. "Thanks for helping me," said Lucille.

"You're very welcome," said Danny. "Hi, gimme a swig o' that lemonade, will you?" clamoured Carbarn, but she shook her head.

"No, I won't!" she informed him firmly. "You're in training!"

Danny caught him on the nose with a back-hander, and then the road-work was resumed.

The Missing Suit

MIKE was the first to reach home that evening, and he had duly had his hair cut. His mother marched him into the living-room and proceeded to give him lessons in table-manners till at last he complained that he had so many things to remember his ears were buzzing.

"Is that so?" said she, grimly. "Then we'll start all over again!"

They had started all over again when Pat burst in upon them.

"What's the matter?" he snapped at Mike. "D'you have to ring a fire siren for you to answer? Hallo, mother!"

"Did you forget your keys, then?" inquired Mrs. O'Hara.

"No," replied Pat, "but I wanted to see how the bell'd be answered when Lucille—er—when Miss Jackson got here."

"You'd better tip Danny off, then," said Mike, "for he's liable to yell 'What d'you want?' or something uncouth."

"Oh, and I suppose you'll be all right, eh? Listen, do me a favour. I'm tryin' to make an impression to-night, so lay off those wisecracks of yours!"

"Don't worry, Pat," said Mrs. O'Hara. "Everything's goin' to be all right."

"Well, I'm goin' in to change my clothes," he announced. "If you hear the door-bell be sure and take off your apron."

"Patrick!" Mrs. O'Hara called him across to her. "How do you like my table?"

She had taken a lot of pains over the table, and was pardonably proud of it. A bowl of flowers formed a centre-piece.

Pat assured her that it was fine, and went off to his room; then she retreated to the kitchen to ice a big cake she had made for the occasion, and Mike presently followed her there.

"If this Jackson gal don't hurry up and get here pretty soon," he complained, "I'm gonna crack under the strain!"

His mother gave him the knife with which she had been smoothing the icing, and he licked it with avidity.

"One thing more, Michael," she said. "Not a word to Miss Jackson about Pat goin' to marry her."

"I get it!" he nodded slowly. "Everybody's on to it but her! That's pretty rich!"

"Ho wants to surprise her," Mrs. O'Hara explained.

"Surprise her? He'll knock her cold!"

Pat's voice was heard from the bedroom, and Pat himself appeared in the doorway wearing only his underclothes.

"Where's my suit?" he demanded.

"Oh!" Mrs. O'Hara looked startled. "Why, Danny took it to the cleaners early this mornin'."

"But I had that suit pressed and cleaned yesterday!" exploded Pat. "I wish Danny'd let my stuff alone! It's seven o'clock now, and—"

January 25th, 1936.

A rapping at the front door caused him to break off in consternation. Lucille had arrived, in a check frock with a white collar, and had tried to ring the bell, just as Pat had tried to ring it, but then had used her knuckles.

"That's her now!" he gasped. "What'll I do?"

"Oh—oh, you hurry and get dressed," said Mrs. O'Hara, all in a flutter. "I'll let her in."

She went to the front door, forgetting about her apron, and Pat fled to the bedroom. But Mike had got there first, to change his clothes and the door was fastened.

"Mike, Mike! Let me in!" yelled Pat, hammering on the door. "I haven't got any clothes on! You feather-brained cluck, let me in!"

Mrs. O'Hara was admitting Lucille, and in a panic Pat dived into Danny's room.

"Mrs. O'Hara?" said Lucille sweetly. "I'm Lucille Jackson."

"Oh, how d'yo do?" purred the Irish-woman. "Pat's been tellin' me many nice things about you, but I can see now with me own eyes he hasn't said half enough."

"Oh, that's very charming of you," murmured the visitor.

The front door was closed and Mrs. O'Hara led the way to her own bedroom. Pat looked out from Danny's and ducked back again.

"You can take off your things in here," said Mrs. O'Hara. "The boys'll be home in a minute. Dinner's almost ready."

Mike, having opened the bed-room door and found no Pat outside, walked along the passage looking for him. His head appeared, furtively, and he said:

"Get me some clothes, will you?"

"Get 'em yourself," said Mike. "No body can see you."

Pat stepped forth, but before he had progressed very far his mother's voice reached his ears.

"We'll go into the parlour and wait for the boys," she said.

"Get back!" warned Mike. "Get back! I'll get you some clothes!"

Pat scuttled into the bath-room, because it was nearest, and Lucille was conducted into the sitting-room, which Mrs. O'Hara always called the "parlour," a comfortable sort of room, and one really worthy of more stylish furniture than it contained. Lucille sat down in a chair near a piano, and Mrs. O'Hara sat facing her.

"Patrick's been tellin' me," she confided incautiously, "that you and him were figurin' on gettin' married. Oh dear, I wasn't supposed to say anything about it!"

"Is that so?" laughed Lucille. "Well, did Pat say who we were getting married to?"

Mike conveyed an overcoat to the bathroom.

"Couldn't get me a cane to go with it, could you?" asked Pat with scorn, but he was glad even of the overcoat and put it on. "Is she lookin'?" he asked anxiously.

"No," said Mike. "It's all right: come on!"

The door of their bed-room was reached, but it was closed, and appeared to be fastened.

"Th—that was your idea," faltered Mike, "to put a spring lock on this door."

Pat put his shoulder to the door in an effort to burst it open, and the noise brought his mother running out from the sitting-room with Lucille close behind her. It was an embarrassing moment, but Lucille was amused.

"Hallo, Pat!" she gurgled. "Going out?"

"Why—er—no—yes—er—I—er—"

Mrs. O'Hara took the situation in hand.

"Hurry up and get dressed, Pat," she said. "Dinner's almost ready. Come, darlin'!"

Lucille went back with her to the sitting-room. Mike turned the handle of the bed-room door, and to his amazement the door opened.

"Well, can you beat that?" he exclaimed. "It wasn't locked at all. It must have been stuck, eh?"

"Get out of here!" roared his brother.

So Mike went off to the sitting-room and there did his best to entertain Lucille while his mother was busy in the kitchen, and he was showing her the family album when Pat appeared, dressed once more in his police uniform.

"Sorry to keep you waiting," he said, "but I wasn't long, was I?"

Lucille looked him up and down, and she said:

"Did it take you all that time to wash your face?"

"No," he replied. "I—I took a shower."

"What d'you mean—a shower?" scoffed Mike. "All you did was to take your uniform off and put it on again. What d'you want to lie to the girl for?"

"Dinner is served," Mrs. O'Hara opportunely announced from the living-room.

Carbarn Hits Out!

MIKE was the first to reach the dining-table and he sat down in his accustomed place; but in the nick of time he remembered his lessons and sprang up to offer Lucille a chair.

All four became seated, and apart from offering hot peas to go with cold salad, and eating his own peas with a spoon, Mike did not behave too badly. Half-way through the meal he produced some slips of paper from a pocket.

"Want to buy a couple of tickets to the Firemen's Ball?" he asked Lucille.

"I'm takin' her to the ball," said Pat.

"Well, do you want to buy a couple of tickets?"

"Got my tickets."

"Well, that's what I call loyalty!" said Mike bitterly. "Wouldn't even buy a couple o' tickets from your own brother!"

"Go out and sell 'em," retorted Pat, "like I do."

"All you gotta do," complained Mike, "is to go around and tell a guy he's parked wrong, and he's gotta buy a ticket. I can't go around burning down houses just to sell tickets!"

The front door slammed, and the wad of paper which had put the electric-bell out of action fell to the floor. Danny had entered the flat with Carbarn, and Carbarn was wearing Pat's suit.

"When do we eat, pal?" he inquired anxiously.

"You go ahead and wash, and I'll find out from mother," Danny replied, and he walked into the living-room while his protégé made for the kitchen sink.

Mrs. O'Hara rose hurriedly from the table as Danny approached it. She saw that he was staring at Lucille and that Lucille was staring at him.

"Oh, Miss Jackson," she said, "may I present my youngest son Daniel?"

"We've already met," said Danny with a broad grin.

"Yeah?" snapped Pat. "Where?"

"Danny fixed a flat tyre for me on the road this morning," explained Lucille.

Carbarn walked into the room at that moment, and Pat's attention became diverted to the very conspicuous suit which encased him. Mrs. O'Hara introduced the alleged champion, who laughed.

"Pleased to meetcha again, Miss Jackson," he said; and then Pat rose up in anger and stalked round the table.

"What is this? What is this?" he howled. "Oh, my suit went to the cleaners, eh?"

An accusing finger pointed, and Danny tried to wave it away.

"I'll tell you about it, Pat," he said glibly. "I can explain everything."

"I don't care what it was!" shouted Pat. "What right have you got to lend out one of my suits?"

"That's a hot one!" cried Mike, and laughed in a most unseemly manner. "One of his suits!"

"Patriek! Michael! Danny!" shrieked Mrs. O'Hara. "Will ye stop liftin' your voices?"

The front door bell rang stridently, and Carbaru Hammerschlag seemed suddenly to go mad. Lucille cried out in alarm as his fists shot out to left and to right; but Pat received a jab to the jaw that sent him crashing against a sideboard, whence he collapsed to the floor with a wounded head as well as a measure of concussion.

Mike tried to defend himself, but was knocked nearly silly and sprawled on the carpet. Danny, who knew more about the noble art than either of his brothers, evaded all the blows aimed at him and socked Carbaru on the nose, then gripped his arms and tried to force them down.

"Stop that bell!" he bellowed.

Mrs. O'Hara flew to the front door and dealt with a persistent messenger-boy who had come to the wrong flat. The bell ceased to ring, and Carbaru became quite tame again.

But the damage was done. Pat was carried to bed unconscious, and a doctor was summoned by telephone, and then Danny raised Mike to a sitting position and held Mrs. O'Hara's smelling-salts under his nose.

Mike muttered incomprehensible things, opened his eyes, and blinked at his brother.

"What started that?" he asked feebly. "I—I remember you."

"How does your head feel now?" inquired Danny. "Any better?"

"Like it was hit by a freight train."

Danny looked up at his mother and at Lucille, two very agitated women.

"Oh, it's marvellous!" he rejoiced. "You know, he's got an awful lot o' power in that right of his! Why, that punch didn't travel more'n six inches."

"Don't kid me!" wailed Mike. "He brung it up from the basement!"

The doctor came, a spectacled practitioner who managed not to exhibit any surprise at what he was told, and Pat's head was bandaged and his senses were restored.

"What kind of a club did that guy hit me with?" was one of his first questions.

"Is he all right, doctor?" asked Mrs. O'Hara with a tremble in her voice.

"Yes, he's not badly hurt," was the reassuring reply. "Just keep him quiet to-night, and don't let him get out of that bed. I'll see him to-morrow, and we'll take the bandage off then. Good-night."

After the doctor had gone Mrs. O'Hara went to look after Lucille, and Danny took her place beside the bed.

"I'm awfully sorry this happened, Pat," he said, trying not to grin.

"Oh, shut up!" groaned Pat. "I ought to punch you right in the nose! I bring a nice girl home to dinner and ask you guys to behave for once in your lives, and what do I get? You turn the joint into a trainin' stable for a punch-drunk prize-fighter that can't stand on his heels!"

"What d'you mean?" challenged Danny, his sympathy completely evaporated. "You don't feel so good."

Mrs. O'Hara returned to announce that Lucille had decided to go home, and since Pat was not fit to escort her, Danny had offered to do so instead. Pat objected strongly, but Lucille put her head into the room to say good-bye and accepted the substitute.

"All right, then," capitulated Pat. "Good-night, Lucille. Pick you up to-morrow night at nine o'clock without the bandage."

She shook hands with him and then with his mother.

"Good-night, Mrs. O'Hara," she said; and added, with unintentional irony: "I've had such a nice time."

She had parked her car in a yard at the side of the apartment-house and she and Danny descended to it. Danny insisted on driving, but instead of proceeding straight up Seventh Avenue towards Youkers, he swung right into Houston Street, and thence into Broadway.

"I guess I shouldn't have brought Carbaru to the flat to-night, eh?" he said with a laugh.

"He's quite an athlete," murmured Lucille.

"But you won't hold that against Pat, will you?" he went on. "Pat's a swell guy—make you a grand husband, too!"

Lucille sat up.

"Danny," she said in rather a strained voice, "you and your mother have somehow got the wrong impression. Pat and I have never talked about getting married."

"No?" Danny glanced round at her in surprise. "Well, what's that big dope been talkin' about, then?"

"I don't know."

Broadway was reached, and not far ahead—on the right—an illuminated sign proclaimed the presence of "Joe's Supreme Steak House."

"You're in love with him, aren't you?" asked Danny.

"No!" she instantly replied, and into that one word was compressed much.

"No?" Danny let forth a whoop of joy. "Say, that's something!" He took one hand from the wheel to point. "Tell me, does that sign read the same to you as it does to me?"

"I'll say it does," she responded.

There was a garage quite near to Joe's Supreme Steak House. The two-seater was deposited in it, and Danny and Lucille repaired to the rather crowded establishment and were provided with a separate table at which they devoured steak, fried onions, and chips with much relish.

As they ate they talked—mainly about Carbaru Hammerschlag.

"If only he could uncork that right of his in a match, some night," declared Danny, "it'd be blankets for the other guy."

Joe Gardner, proprietor of the place and himself a former pug, visited their table to ask what they thought of the steaks.

"Fine!" Danny assured him. "Fine!" "They oughta be," declared the broken-nosed caterer. "They're ground out of the finest Kansas City steer beef. Say, you oughta drop in some night and try one of our top sirloins. Bring your wife with you."

Lucille burst out laughing. "Everybody seems to be set on getting me married!" she cried.

"Well, it ain't a bad idea," returned Joe, in no way abashed because he had made a mistake. "I've been married twenty years."

He drifted away to another table.

"What was I talkin' about?" said Danny, his face rather flushed and his eyes very bright.

"Carbaru Hammerschlag," she replied, apparently completely mistress of herself. "I don't know how you can forget him so easily."

"No," he agreed. "No, I—well, what I wanted to say—er—that is—well, you know, he's hopeless when there's a woman around. Why, right now he's talkin' about breakin' trainin'!"

An accusing finger pointed, and Danny tried to wave it away. "I'll tell you about it, Pat," he said glibly.

because he wants to go to the Firemen's Ball!"

"I don't blame him," said Lucille. "It's going to be a lot of fun. Pat's asked me to go with him."

"He has?" Danny frowned, then grinned. "I'll probably see you there. I—er—I always take mum, because she—er—she likes the brass buttons and the band, and all that. Oh, you finished?"

"Uhuh," nodded Lucille.

He drove her home in the moonlight, but the moonlight was not apparent till they had left the brighter electric lights of Broadway behind. Then she nestled closer against him, and he—full of poetry that could not be expressed—ducked his head towards hers and said:

"Swell night, isn't it?"

"Beautiful," she whispered.

After the Ball

THE Firemen's Ball took place at the Central Hall three nights later, and from the point of view of most of those present it proved an exceedingly enjoyable affair. The Firemen's Band provided appropriate music, and the vast floor was crowded with dancing couples.

Mrs. O'Hara, who went with Danny, wore her best lace frock for the occasion. Lucille went with Pat, and she looked positively bewitching in a low-cut gown of pale grey satin, while he was resplendent in evening clothes.

Some of the firemen were in their uniforms, but Mike wore a dinner-jacket suit he had hired and would have been highly pleased with himself if he had known how to dance and his shoes had not pinched.

Danny rescued his mother from him in the middle of a fox-trot, whereupon he practised all by himself—to the considerable inconvenience of other dancers. At the end of the fox-trot Pat left Lucille with him and claimed his mother for a waltz, but no sooner had the waltz started than Danny pounced.

"Shove over, Nijnski," he said, and sailed away with Lucille, while Mike retreated to a palm lounge and removed his troublesome shoes.

"How's your pal Carbar?" Lucille inquired as she and Danny circulated.

"Oh, I had to lock him up at home," was the reply. "I was afraid to let him loose with all these fire bells around. But look, don't let's talk about Carbar to-night."

"That's all we've talked about before," Lucille reminded him.

"Yeah, but this is different." He piloted her skilfully in and out amongst the other couples on to a balcony under the stars. "It gets awful hot in there with all those firemen around, doesn't it?"

"Uhuh," nodded Lucille. "But I'm having a grand time."

"I'm beginning to feel I shouldn't have come at all," said Danny.

"Why?"

"Well—er—aw, forget it!"

He leaned over the parapet of the balcony beside her, tried to talk about unimportant things, and broke off in the middle of a sentence to exclaim:

"Oh, what's the use? I may as well say it and get it over. You know, I've been fallin' for you ever since that first day on the road, and—er—well, I can't get you off my mind. I can't think about anything else."

"You are in a bad state," she said sympathetically.

"I'm in an awful state," he declared, and pulled her round to look into her eyes.

"So am I, Danny," she whispered.

She was in his arms, and he was kissing her, when Pat came striding out on to the balcony. The expression on his face alarmed Lucille, who gave vent to a startled "Oh!" but he looked out across the city and he said:

"Well, what d'you know about that? You can almost see the tower of the Empire State Building from here!"

"Yeah," said Danny, "we were just saying the—er—"

"Smoke?" Pat whirled round with a packet of cigarettes in his hand almost as though it were a gun, and Lucille cried out:

"Pat, let's stop it! Danny, will you please go inside? I want to explain something to Pat."

"It—it's not up to you to do any explaining," Danny protested.

Pat turned to the open doorway, but paused there.

"I'm goin' to see if I can find mums," he said. "See you later." He glared at Danny. "And I'll see you later!" he added significantly.

He disappeared into the building, not in search of Mrs. O'Hara, but in search of the bar; and it was in the bar that Danny found him with a mug of beer in his hand.

"Say, listen, Pat," he pleaded, "just let me explain."

"Explain?" Pat banged down the mug and struck him violently in the face.

Danny clenched his fists to hit back, but dropped them again.

"All right, Pat," he said hoarsely.

"If that's the way you want it!"

He went back to Lucille, but Lucille insisted on going home after he had reported what had happened. He saw her to her car, but both Pat and his mother had disappeared when he went back into the hall, so he went home himself.

Pat and his mother were already there. Carbar was sleeping peacefully in the spare bed, but Pat had changed into the check suit and was gathering together his other possessions in his own room. It was evident that Mrs. O'Hara knew all about the affair, for she was following him tearfully from cupboard to dressing-table when Danny looked in at the door.

"To think that a girl could come between two brothers," she lamented. "And the hard thing about it is that Lucille is a good girl. What are you lookin' for, Pat—soaks? I mended two pairs and put 'em in the second drawer. That's Mike's drawer you're lookin' in."

"What's goin' on here?" inquired Danny as he entered.

"Get outa here!" Pat bellowed at him, and Mrs. O'Hara implored him to go to his own room. But Danny would not go.

"Just a minute, ma, please," he said, and went over to his brother. "Will you stop actin' like such a dumb-bell? If anybody's gonna leave this place it's gonna be me!"

Pat flung down a tie to threaten with his fists, but Mrs. O'Hara thrust herself between her two sons.

"Pat!" she sobbed.

"You rotten little chiseller!" Pat shouted over her shoulder. "You haven't been any good since the day you were born!"

Mrs. O'Hara had her own Irish temper. She smacked his face for that, then wept because she had done it.

"That's okay, mum," Pat told her gruffly. "I guess I had it comin'."

"Say, look, let's be sensible about this thing, ma, will you?" pleaded Danny. "Pat's the bread-winner. He's the guy that gets the dough, and I haven't got a job or anything. Besides, there's—"

"Danny," whimpered his mother, "will you stop?"

"Well, I think it'd make it a whole lot simpler all round if I went out and got a room some place for a while," Danny persisted.

"Do you really want to go?"

Danny looked at his scowling brother and nodded.

"Yeah," he said, and went off to his own room to pack.

His mother followed him there and tried to persuade him to stay till the morning at least; but he was adamant.

"Oh, no, there's no sense to it, ma," he protested. "It'll only start more trouble. And look here, will you stop worryin' about me? I'm not goin' to leave the country!"

She made him promise to come to see her every day, or, at least, to telephone, and she asked him how he was fixed for money.

"All right," he declared. "I'll get along fine."

"You wait here," she said, and went off to a little bureau in the living-room where she kept her savings. But when she returned with some notes for him he had gone.

Mike came home about an hour later to find Pat lying on his bed only half-dressed.

"What's the matter?" he asked, surveying the prone form. "Why don't you go to bed? And say, what's the matter with mother? She didn't meet me at the front door."

"Oh, I don't know," growled Pat. "She's tired, I guess. She danced a lot to-night."

"So did I," said Mike. "My feet's killin' me!"

He sat down to remove the offending shoes, but seemed reluctant to shed his hired garments.

"You know, Pat, I ought to buy a suit like this," he remarked.

"Yeah." Pat rose from the bed. "I'll be back in a few minutes."

He went off to his mother's room, and, as he had feared, she was still up, a huddled figure in a rocking-chair.

"Why aren't you in bed, mother?" he asked huskily.

"Oh, it's easier to think sittin' up," she replied.

"Aw, come on, let's forget it. I'll go out and bring Danny back."

She shook her weary head.

"No, Patrick, it's no use," she said sadly. "He's stubborn like his father. Lucille is a darlin' sweet girl, and I understand how you feel."

"And I understand how you feel," he returned. "Danny's your pet. You don't think you're foolin' Mike and me, do you?"

She wiped her eyes with a handkerchief.

"No, Patrick," she protested, "Danny isn't my pet. I love every one of you alike. Maybe I show a little more towards Danny because—well, because he's the youngest."

"Sure, I know," he nodded. "Now do me a favour, will you? Go to bed, sweetheart—you must be awfully tired."

"All right," she promise. "I will."

Deception—and the Truth!

NEXT morning Danny, who had spent the night in a cheap lodging-house, called for Carbar Hammerschlag and whisked him off to the Broadway Gymnasium, which was not in Broadway, but in Beeker Street. The proprietor, who was more or less of a friend, had been prevailed upon to provide them with quarters on a strictly business basis.

Carbar's training was continued there, as well as on the open road, and Danny visited his mother, or rang her up on the telephone, every day, as he had promised.

A week elapsed, and then, since the Annual Police Benefit was drawing very near, Pat was released from his ordinary duties to concentrate upon the programme. One of the features of the benefit was to be a fifteen-round boxing contest at the Yankee Stadium, and Captain Jackson suggested to Pat that it would be a very big draw if Joe Delancy, the middle-weight champion, could be induced to take part in it.

"He's sick," said Rex Martin with a grimace, "and he's passed out!"

Pat interviewed Doc. Mullins, the champion's ugly manager, and by appointment Joe Delancy met the captain in his office to discuss the matter. Doc. Mullins went with him, and Pat was present as well as two uniformed sergeants.

Delancy, a curly-headed fellow of fine physique, wanted to keep in with the police, but was not at all eager to fight.

"I'm willin' to appear and help the boys out," he said vaguely, "but you know how it is."

Doc. Mullins, with a big cigar in his mouth, hastened to explain.

"You see, Joe's not in such very good shape."

"In other words," suggested Pat bluntly, "you want a set-up! Is that it?"

"No, no," protested the champion. "I just don't want to go in for a long trainin', that's all."

Doc. Mullins elaborated the point.

"We don't want to make it a waltz without music," he said with an expressive gesture, "yet at the same time you can't expect a champ. to go in the ring looking off form."

"You want someone not so tough to beat, eh?" suggested Captain Jackson.

"That's the idea," agreed Delancy.

"Okay!" boomed Pat. "I've got just the guy for you! He talks a great fight, but he can't punch his way out of a paper bag!"

Doc. Mullins inquired the name of this very desirable opponent, but on being given it declared that he had never heard of him.

"Who has?" said Pat. "He's just some slug my brother picked up. Punches guys around car barns."

"That sounds okay to me," decided Mullins in quite a satisfied way, and Joe Delancy looked relieved.

"He'll do," he said.

Captain Jackson shook hands with him.

"Good," he said. "Pat, tell Danny to come in and we'll sign up articles."

Pat made a grimace.

"Oh, no, captain," he objected. "You'd better handle it yourself. Danny and I ain't talkin'."

The captain raised bushy brows at him.

"Oh," he said slowly, "I see! All right, I'll deal with it. Thanks, Delancy, for the favour."

A policeman was sent in quest of Danny and the articles were signed. Practically all the newspapers, next morning, carried a story of the projected fight, and Car barn's training was intensified at the Broadway Gymnasium.

Not without complainings, however.

"Can't we lay off this?" he asked lugubriously, as he and Danny lay side by side on the floor, in their shorts, with their legs in the air. "I ain't gonna hit the guy with me feet!"

"Will you stop your crabbing?" retorted Danny. "You've got the chance of a lifetime for a build-up. After you've boxed the champ. I can get you a match any place."

"Yeah," said Car barn, waving his feet, "but why do I have to practise lyin' on me back? I ain't gonna fight the guy from this angle."

"You hope!" Danny stood up. "Come on—on your feet! Get the skippin'-ropel"

They skipped together, while in a ring across the floor two other future champions sparred at one another, and the proprietor of the place dozed in a chair with a towel over his shoulder and a bucket of water at his feet. All about the big room pupils were hard at work.

"How about givin' me five minutes to get me wind?" panted Car barn, after the skipping-ropes had been abandoned; but Danny grabbed up a pair of boxing-gloves.

"No wind?" he cried. "Here, get these gloves on! Come on!"

In the sparring bout that followed Danny hit hard and often, shouting instructions all the time. A hefty blow struck home on a sensitive ear, and Car barn lost his temper and jabbed with his right to such good purpose that his tutor went down on his back.

"How's that?" shouted Car barn.

"Beautiful," declared Danny, bounding up again. "Come on, rubbing-table next!"

Car barn, flat on a rubbing-table, was protesting loudly at the way he was being handled by greasy hands when one of the attendants pushed his way in, at the swing-doors and approached.

"There's a dame outside wants to see you," he stated.

Car barn jerked himself into a sitting position.

"Who, me?" he demanded eagerly.

"Tell her I'll be right out!"

"Not you, you dope!" snorted the attendant. "She wants Danny."

Car barn sank down again, and Danny covered him with a blanket, enjoined him to lie still, then went out into the hall of the gymnasium. Lucille was waiting there, a little felt hat perched on her brown head and furs round her shoulders.

"Hallo, Lucille!" exclaimed Danny. "Surprise, eh? Want me to show you around?"

"No, thanks," she replied gravely. "I want to talk to you. Danny, is it true you've left home?"

"Who told you that?" he demanded. "My father. What did you and Pat quarrel about?"

"Oh, about things in general!"

"Danny, was it—was it about me?"

He admitted that it was, and to his dismay perceived tears in her blue eyes.

"Don't you think you're being very silly?" she asked, trying to control her voice. "Oh, I know it's partly my fault, but just because we were on a balcony in the moonlight, and I let you kiss me, is no reason for you to think I'm madly in love with you. You and Pat had no reason to quarrel on my account. I'm not in love with him, and I'm not in love with you. What you're fighting about, I don't know!"

Danny stared. She looked quite as upset as he felt, but it did not occur to him to doubt her words.

"Well," he managed to say with an effort, "I—I guess that's that."

"I'm sorry, Danny," she murmured wretchedly, and turned and fled.

She had left her car outside, and she drove away in it to the flat in Seventh Avenue, where Mrs. O'Hara was almost as surprised to see her as Danny had been.

"Come right into the parlour, honey," she said, "and make yourself at home. You know, you'll have to excuse the place, because it's right in the midst of cleaning."

The sitting-room was entered and the blinds were raised, letting in the early spring sunshine.

"I always keep the shades down to fool the moths," Mrs. O'Hara explained with a smile for her beautiful visitor. "Sit down, and I'll go and make a cup of coffee."

"No, no, please don't!" said Lucille. "I won't stay long, and I couldn't drink it. I—I'm too upset."

"I know, darlin'—it's the boys, ain't it?"

Lucille nodded.

"I wouldn't have them quarrel over me for anything in the world," she declared. "You're not angry with me for what's happened, are you?"

"Not a bit! It's too bad Danny had to fall for you, if you and Pat were in love."

"That's what makes me feel so bad about it," Lucille interrupted. "You see, Mrs. O'Hara, I've never been in love with Pat."

"You mean you've never had an understandin' or anything?"

"Never. Oh, I liked him! I liked him a lot, but I never was in love with him. I—er—I—"

"But you do love Danny, is that it?"

Lucille bit her lip.

"Why, I've just seen Danny," she said, "and I—I told him that he took too much for granted. I told him that I never really cared for him."

Mrs. O'Hara was not to be deceived so easily as her son.

"You were lyin' to Danny, weren't ye?" she asked sagely.

Lucille shook her head, but burst into tears—and found herself in compassionate arms.

"What are ye cryin' for, darlin'?"

"Oh, what's the use?" wept the unhappy girl. "I do love Danny!"

"There, there, now!" soothed Mrs. O'Hara. "I never saw anything happen yet that time couldn't heal."

Toothache!

ON the day of the fight Danny called round at the flat. He had wheedled his mother into embroidering Car barn Hammerschlag's name on the back of Pat's dressing-gown, and it was all ready for him.

"Oh, gee, ma, that looks great!" he exclaimed.

"It won't when Pat finds out it's his dressing-gown!" retorted Mrs. O'Hara, whose conscience was not altogether easy. "Come and have something to eat."

Danny protested that he couldn't stay.

"I've got Car barn waitin' for me," he said. "We fight to-night, you know. Don't you worry about your Danny. He gets three square meals every day."

"I know you're lyin' now," rebuked his mother. "Come on and sit down. I've got some soup."

"Thanks, mum," Danny hesitated. "I—I really don't care for any. What kind have you got?"

"Clam chowder," she informed him, "the way I make it."

"Who am I to turn that down?" he laughed, and put his arm round her and marched her off into the kitchen, where she filled a plate with steaming hot soup for him.

"Have you seen Lucille lately?" she asked, sitting down beside him. "I say have you seen Lucille lately?"

"Who, me?" Evidently the question was not to be evaded, so he adopted a casual air. "Oh, no, I haven't seen her, ma! I—I've had other things on my mind."

"She's a mighty fine girl, Danny. She'll make somebody an elegant wife."

"Yeah, sure she will," Danny drank some of the soup. "Let Pat marry her—"

"I'm not the marryin' kind. Anyway, what do I want with a wife? I've got you, haven't I? Say, let me have some bread, huh?"

Some of the papers that day suggested that Joe Delancy was risking his title at the police benefit, and one of the sporting writers who had visited the Broadway Gymnasium several times stated:

"Although practically an unknown, and possessing a style of boxing which even critics cannot fathom, Car barn Hammerschlag is expected to give Joe Delancy a stiff go of it to-night via the fifteen-round route."

Joe Delancy became rather disturbed after reading this, for he had not troubled to do any hard training for the event; but Car barn suffered from greater qualms. During the morning a hollow tooth began to ache, and by the evening his face began to swell, and what with pain and apprehension he was in a fine state of nerves by the time he reached his dressing-room at the Yankee Stadium.

Mike, who accompanied him and Danny, went off to get some toothache tincture. Most of the seats in the vast building were filled by that time, and two stalwart members of the police force were entertaining the crowd with a vigorous if rather unscientific display in the ring.

Danny, with his coat and waistcoat off, had got his protégé all ready for the fray and invested in the borrowed dressing-gown.

"Now you sit right there and relax," he said, pushing Car barn down on to a chair. "Take it easy, d'you hear? You haven't got a thing to worry about."

"Aw," groaned the sufferer, "this tooth is killin' me!"

"Well, don't you think about it, and it'll go away. D'you hear? Don't think about it!"

Car barn sat crouched forward with his left elbow on his left knee, nursing the swollen cheek and making a rumbling noise.

"What are you doin'?" demanded Danny.

"I ain't thinkin' about it," was the reply.

There was a bang at the door, and Doc Mullins entered the room with Joe Delancy, both fully dressed. Mullins introduced himself to Danny, and Danny introduced Car barn. Mullins offered his hand, but Car barn did not shake it.

"Hallo!" he said with gloom.

"He's right on edge," laughed Danny.

There came another bang at the door, and a messenger-boy put his head round it to announce that he had a telegram for Mullins.

"Here," said that messenger, and he took the proffered envelope and tore it open.

The message it contained seemed to disturb him.

"Listen, Champ," he said to Delancy, "we got to blow to Canada right after this fight."

"Why?" inquired the middle-weight champion.

"The guy you fought in Scranton last month died in the hospital this morning."

Car barn shivered slightly, and Mullins pocketed the telegram and gazed pityingly at him.

"Well, good luck, kid!" he said.

"Bo seeing you," drawled Joe Delancy.

They sauntered out from the room, and Car barn rose up in alarm, only to be pushed back into the chair by Danny, who said scornfully to him:

"Listen, nut, don't worry about a thing! That's the oldest gag in the fight business—Cohen's manager used it for years. They're tryin' to throw a scare into you. Now you stay right there where you are! Everythin's gonna be all right. Listen, I gotta go and look for Rex. Stay there."

He turned towards the door, and in the doorway encountered Mike, whom he commissioned hurriedly to look after Car barn.

"Take good care of him," he said. "See that he relaxes. Be right back."

Mike went over to Car barn.

"I couldn't get the toothache tincture," he stated, "but I got something that'll do just as good. Look!"

He produced a bottle of dry gin from his coat pocket, and Car barn gaped at it.

"Hi, listen," he complained, "I can't take that now!"

"You ain't gonna take it now," Mike informed him. "All you're gonna do is take a mouthful and hold it against your gum for a minute like this."

He removed the cork from the bottle, tilted a small quantity of spirit into his mouth, tilted his head sideways for a few moments, then gulped down the spirit and beamed.

"There!" he said. "Like that! Only don't you swallow it!"

He handed the bottle to Car barn and fetched a pail. Car barn filled his mouth with gin, but instead of spitting it out he swallowed it.

"Couldn't get me head back far enough," was his explanation.

"It's as easy as A B C," declared Mike, and acquired the bottle and demonstrated—but swallowed because there was no particular reason why he should not swallow. "Just tilt your head to one side and hold it against your gum for a minute and then spit it out again in the bucket."

Car barn followed all these instructions save the last. Mike held the pail, but there was no contribution for it.

"It must have evaporated," said Car barn.

Again Mike demonstrated, and again Car barn tried, groaning with his mouth full.

"Does it still hurt?" Mike asked. Car barn gulped.

"Awful!" he said.

"But you swallowed it!"

"I had to swallow it to answer you, didn't I?"

The process was continued, the hollow tooth becoming less troublesome, but the neat gin began to take effect on both of them.

The Substitute

UPSTAIRS in the stadium, where the two policemen were battering each other, Mrs. O'Hara and Lucille sat together by the ringside. Captain Jackson was on the other side of his daughter; Pat was on the other side of his mother, and in their immediate vicinity were several members of the Police Commission.

The attention of the men was concentrated on the fighters, but Mrs. O'Hara looked at Lucille, and she whispered to her:

"Won't you let me tell him, darlin'? What's the use of both of you bein' miserable?"

"Oh, I wouldn't have anyone tell him for the world!" Lucille whispered back. "He—he'd think I was chasing him."

"I wouldn't come right out and tell him," Mrs. O'Hara assured her. "I'd just say that I'd heard in a roundabout way that you love him. You know—kinda hint, like."

"You're awfully sweet." Lucille glanced round to make sure that Pat was not listening. "You know if everything did turn out all right you're such a dear person I'd feel sort of mean taking Danny away from you."

"You little sweetheart, you! Maybe I would have to take second place with Danny, but—but I'd be gettin' a daughter, wouldn't I?"

Battler Higgins, of the forty-second precinct, kissed the mat with a thud, but they were not even aware of the circumstance.

"And I couldn't have a better daughter if I'd one of me own," Mrs. O'Hara added almost out loud.

In the dressing-room by this time the bottle of gin was more than half-empty, but none of the spirit was in the pail.

"How does the tooth feel now?" Mike inquired with rather muzzy solicitude, binding Carbarn's right hand.

"I wouldn't even know I had a tooth," was the reply.

"It just goes to show you a man is a fool ever to have a tooth extracted. There you are!"

Carbarn held up the bandaged hand to inspect it, and found that it was united to Mike's by the strip of linen.

"How'd that happen?" he asked blankly. "That's third time you done that."

Mike went to step back and nearly fell over.

"Can't figure it out," he muttered, and unwound the bandage. "I gottern idea. You wrap it up yourself, and I'll keep my hands in my pockets."

Carbarn took a swig from the gin bottle and wound the linen round his hand, tucking in a loose end.

"Tha'sh awful quick," quoth Mike admiringly. "Gi'sh bottle!"

While he was drinking Carbarn rose, adopted a fighting attitude, and made a number of fanciful jabs at his companion's face without hitting him.

"Boy, bring on that Delancy!" jabbered the jabber. "I don't think I'll even let him stay one round. Give him a fire-hose and me a pair o' boxing-gloves, and he won't even get me wet!"

"You know, Carbarn," said Mike, "when you start throwin' those hands around like that you look like a centipede."

He laughed foolishly and heard a knock at the door.

"Come in!" he cried.

Doc Mullins entered with Delancy, and Delancy was dressed—or, rather, undressed—for the fray.

"Just wanted to take a peek at the bandages," said Mullins.

"Sure," said Mike.

"Certainly," said Carbarn, and held up his hands. "Bandagin' my knuckles is a waste of time for me, and, w'ash more, I don't believe that story about that guy in Scranton, see?"

The door was wide open, and somewhere in the building a bell clanged. Carbarn, hearing that summons to battle, clenched his fists and struck out at Joe Delancy.

"Look out!" bellowed Mike.

Delancy side-stepped the onslaught and shot out a straight left that caught his opponent on the point of the jaw and knocked him down—and out.

Doc Mullins looked horrified; Mike gaped at the unconscious figure; and then Danny burst into the room.

"Say, what's goin' on here?" he demanded fiercely.

"I couldn't help it," snapped Delancy. "He slugged me first."

"The 'phone bell rang," said Mullins, "and the fool started hittin' out like he'd gone crazy."

"Well, you didn't have to put him away for it!" Danny shouted. "Now you've done a fine thing for me!"

"Yeah?" sneered Delancy. "Well, what are we supposed to do—cry about it? If he can't make it, call off the bout."

"No, no, you can't do that!" said his trainer with concern. "This is the main event. You bring him to, O'Hara, and then drag him into the ring."

"All right," said Danny grimly. "You get out of here—go on."

Boxer and trainer departed, and Danny went to work on Carbarn, kneeling beside him and slapping his cheeks.

"Anything I can do?" asked Mike, and he tried to conceal the gin-bottle as his brother looked up.

"Yeah," said that brother savagely.

"Drop dead!"

"Now?" asked Mike.

"Now!"

"That's askin' too much!" Mike pulled himself together and waddled from the room, leaving Danny to resuscitate the fallen Carbarn as best he could.

Not many minutes later the call-boy banged on the door and shouted that Delancy was in the ring.

"All right, all right!" howled Danny, and he raised the semi-conscious Car-barn to uncertain feet and dumped him in a chair.

Delancy was in the ring, and the crowd in the stadium had begun to clap their hands and stamp their feet, clamouring for the main event to start. Captain Jackson stood up to speak to Pat.

"There's something wrong," he said. "You'd better go and see what it is."

Pat rose to make his way to the dressing-room, but Doc Mullins intercepted him before he could reach the nearest gangway.

"I'm not gonna keep my man here all night," he stated blusteringly.

The proprietor of the Broadway Gymnasium, who had promised to act as second for Carbarn, strolled into the dressing-room while Pat was on his way to it. His name was Rex Martin, and Danny had been looking for him. He was a big fellow, in a bowler hat.

"Where you been?" snarled Danny, with one arm round Carbarn's neck.

"They forgot to wake me," said the staring late-comer. "What's the matter with him?"

"Liquor!" was the terse reply "Passed out!"

Pat appeared in the doorway, and Doc Mullins was with him.

"Well, you're just in time for the ring," barked Pat. "They're waitin' for your prize-packet!"

"He's sick," said Rex Martin with a grin, "and he's passed out!"

Pat viewed the wreck of a fighter and walked farther into the room.

"Well, maybe that tough brother of mine 'ud like to substitute for him," he said with withering scorn.

"Maybe you think I wouldn't?" retorted Danny.

"Yeah?" Pat waved a hand in his angry face. "Well, you're not goin' to! Not that I don't want to see your head get kicked off, but I've guaranteed the fans a good show."

The bell sounded and Delancy and Danny advanced towards each other, both sparring for an opening.

"Why don't you tell the truth?" raved Danny. "You're still sore at me because you think I double-crossed you with Lucille! That's what you've got in the back of your bean!"

"Okay," returned Pat, controlling his voice but not his temper. "For that crack you're gonna get your ears punched off! That is, if the Commission okays it!"

He went back to the stadium and conferred with Captain Jackson, while Danny and Rex Martin, between them, deprived Carbarh of his shorts and dressing-gown and Danny changed into them. Pandemonium reigned in the stadium while four members of the Police Commission discussed the emergency in one of the rooms beneath the stands, and the official doctor was present.

Danny was summoned to the meeting and the doctor examined him. He seemed to be fighting fit, but he was not of the same physique as Joe Delaney, and Captain Jackson cried out:

"I won't stand for it! This kid is not in condition—it'll be massacre in the ring!"

Danny stepped forward with the doctor's hand on his shoulder and Rex Martin close behind him.

"Now, just a minute, captain," he said eagerly. "Don't forget you've got a whole lot of people out there who've paid a lot of good dough to see Delaney fight. Now, who else are you gonna get?"

That was indeed a poser, and the doctor intervened.

"He's in good shape, commissioner," he said to the tall and distinguished-looking man who held the highest position in the New York Police Department.

"All right," growled Captain Jackson. "I'm out-voted. Go ahead! But if you're takin' too much punishment, O'Hara, the fight's goin' to be stopped, I'm tellin' you!"

The Deciding Factor

A VERY few minutes later Danny made his way to the ring, almost unnoticed, and climbed up into it between the ropes. Captain Jackson was squeezing past a number of people to his seat; Mrs. O'Hara started up from hers.

"Why, look!" she cried. "It's Danny!"

Lucille did look, and she also sprang up.

"What's he doing in there?" she gasped.

"Oh, I'm going to stop him!" Mrs. O'Hara shrieked; but Captain Jackson made her sit down.

"Something's happened to Carbarh," he said. "Danny is substituting. Nothing's goin' to happen. Don't worry!"

He dropped beside his agitated daughter, but Mrs. O'Hara leaned over both of them to speak to Pat.

"Can't you do something to stop it, Patrick?" she cried.

"Aw, he'll be all right, mums!" said Pat cheerfully.

Danny blew a kiss to his mother from the ring, and Mullins whispered to him:

"Don't worry, kid. The champ'll carry you."

"Thanks," murmured Danny; and then the announcer invaded the ring and raised his hands and lifted up his voice to still the din.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he proclaimed, and his voice was amplified by loudspeakers all over the building, "we are now presenting the main event. January 25th, 1936.

fifteen rounds. In this corner the middle-weight champion of the world, at a hundred and fifty-seven pounds, Joe Delaney!"

Delaney rose up and bowed amidst tremendous applause.

"And in this corner," the announcer went on, waving a hand, "substituting for Carbarh Hammerschlag, the challenger, at a hundred and fifty-five pounds, none other than Danny O'Hara!"

Danny, in his brother's dressing-gown, with the name of Carbarh Hammerschlag embroidered upon it, stood up and was received with cheers.

"Referee," said the announcer, "Mushy" Callahan. Timekeeper, Billy Coe."

The timekeeper and the referee climbed into the ring; the announcer departed, and the two contestants met and shook hands in front of the referee.

"You know the rules, boys," said that official loudly. "No foul punches, and in case of knock-down walk to your mutual corners. Get back to your places and come out fighting!"

Danny and Delaney retired to their respective corners, and Doc Mullins whispered to Delaney between the ropes:

"I told him you'd carry him. Knock him out as soon as you can."

The fight began, and the fight was fierce, Joe Delaney doing his best to polish off his opponent before the gong went. Danny defended himself well, but his thoughts wandered and what Pat had said rankled. He received pretty severe punishment, and he was down on his face, and the referee was counting him out, when the gong saved him.

"Oh, Danny!" cried Mrs. O'Hara, and Lucille's face was white and very strained. But Pat sat gloating in his seat.

Mike climbed the stone steps of one of the numerous entrances from the regions below, but was challenged by a uniformed attendant, and, since he could not produce a ticket, was driven away. He stumbled down the passage-way and made for another entrance.

The second round was in progress by the time he ascended again. He saw Danny knocked nearly through the ropes, and he was shouting encouragement when another attendant pounced on him.

"I don't need any ticket!" howled Mike. "I belong here!"

The attendant called a policeman, and the policeman pushed the supposed intruder down the steps.

Danny made no impression on the champion in that round, but retired shakily to his corner at the end of it.

"I wanna stool," he wailed, and as a stool was put through the ropes for him and he sank down on it, he looked up at Rex Martin. "Think I could have some water?"

A bucket of water was held to his lips and he gargled his parched throat.

"The champ said he was gonna carry me, huh?" he muttered. "He meant right to the emergency ward!"

Captain Jackson turned with annoyance to one of his colleagues.

"Why haven't they got a decent second?" he growled. "That kid doesn't know what to do!"

"Can't you get one of the boys to help him, dad?" asked Lucille; and Mrs. O'Hara, with a scornful glance for her eldest son, cried out:

"Boys, nothin'! Why isn't Pat in there helpin' him?"

The bell sounded and Delaney and Danny advanced towards each other, both sparring for an opening. Mike, who had sneaked up a fresh flight of steps and appropriated a vacant seat, waved his fists in the air and bellowed: "Hook him, kid! Hook him! Hook him!"

Almost as though Danny had heard, a left hook was smashed into the side of the champion's jaw and a straight right to the nose followed with lightning-like rapidity.

"He hooked him!" exulted Mike. "Did you see him hook him? Did you—"

"That's my seat!" interrupted a man harshly. "Attendant!"

"Yeah, I'm going," said Mike—and once more he vanished into the depths, presently to reappear on the other side of the stadium and to see his brother go down with a thud.

No attendant could bar his way then. The one that tried to do so was swept from his path, and he almost fought his way to the ringside, shouting wildly:

"Hi, that's my brother! What's the count? That's my brother! Stay where you are, Danny—I'll be right there!"

Once more the gong saved the situation, and Danny was staggering towards his corner when Mike reached the ring, flung off his coat, and heaved himself up into it.

"Gimme that stool!" he yelled at Rex Martin. "Gimme a towel! Gimme a sponge!"

Danny was dumped on a stool and his brother ministered to him, uttering encouraging things all the time.

"You look fine!" he declared, none too truthfully. "Now keep goin' right after him!"

In the round that followed Danny gave a far better account of himself, and though he was knocked all about the ring, he landed one or two blows that jarred Joe Delaney. Indeed, at the end of it that boxer complained to his manager:

"Say, this guy's no set-up!"

"Well, end it as soon as you can," said Mullins.

The fifth round went very badly indeed for the substitute, and Lucille became really alarmed.

"Pat!" she cried. "Pat, can't you do something to stop it? Oh, you've got to! He's taking a terrible beating! He'll get killed!"

Pat leaned across to her, badly disturbed by the anguish in her voice.

"What can I do, honey?"

"Oh, why, get up there in the ring with him where you belong and help him!"

"You really love Danny, don't you?"

"Yes, Pat," she confessed, "I do."

"Can I tell him that?"

"Yes."

Pat drew a long breath, then stood up.

"Watch him win!" he said, and flung off his coat and waistcoat and threw them on his seat. The bell rang just as he reached the corner. Mike had got hold of Danny, who seemed to be completely dazed and badly wounded.

"Don't worry, honey," Mrs. O'Hara said reassuringly to Lucille. "Pat'll take care of him!"

Danny was deposited on the stool and Rex Martin fanned him with a towel; but Pat took charge of the sufferer, driving Mike out of the ring to look on with anxiety between the ropes.

"Take deep breaths!" Pat commanded. "Take deep breaths, I tell ye!"

Danny did his best to obey.

"Call yourself a fighter, eh?" Pat wielded a sponge. "Thought you could take on the champ, did ya? You'll kiss

A Life of Danger

"SO you got your men, Riley!" The grey-haired man behind the big desk smiled approvingly at the square-shouldered, frank-faced young man, who stood stiffly at attention before him. "Take a seat—make yourself comfortable."

Ted Riley, Government Agent, wondered what was on his chief's mind. One was not sent for to be congratulated on the capture of a couple of chief thugs without some reason. This opinion of something in the wind was increased when he was offered a cigar. He smiled and waited.

"Ted." The chief studied his cigar ash. "Smart work getting those two thugs. I understand you got a bad kick on the ankle in the fray."

"All in the day's work, chief. It was nothing."

"Those two thugs belonged to a certain gang." The chief gave Ted a sharp glance. "And we'd feel far happier if their leader were dead or behind bars. Now we know that this gang is out of action at the moment. I mean by that that twenty or thirty toughs are mooning round the night haunts of Frisco killing time and getting drunk. Why? Because their leader is out of town."

"They have orders to lay off anything criminal until their leader gets back," said Riley. "And you're telling me, chief, that there'll be fireworks when he does show up."

"You've guessed it." The chief nodded his approval of the other's acumen. "That leader is Danny Murdock, who made the Bowery so hot for him that he came to the West for his health. Rather to our surprise he has done nothing but organize this tough bunch, and all he seems to have done is take this bunch out into the desert and give 'em shooting practice. Headquarters has the feeling that Danny is up to no good and that it's something big."

"I've heard of Danny Murdock, but never met him," Riley said. "It does look, chief, as if Danny is planning a coup, and that it's so big he needs an army of sharpshooters. Any idea where Danny has gone?"

"Oh, we know where he is, and we could arrest him," the chief explained, "but we haven't got much on him save that of assumed identity. We want something to get that guy for keeps. Danny is at Diamond Island and he's posing as a Major Gray, Government Inspector. Somehow or other he has got certificates and credentials—they're genuine to a certain extent. He was in the army once, and after quitting New York must have hibernated in some small burg, where he convinced some State official that he was just the man for the Government. Through that official he has become a Government servant, and his only bad offence is the assumed name."

"Diamond Island," Riley frowned. "I went down that way on vacation two years ago. Went there for the fishing and had a grand holiday, and we wanted to land on the island but found it belonged to somebody who did not welcome visitors."

"That island has been a smugglers' haunt, and heaven knows what else, for hundreds of years," the chief said. "We've had grave suspicions of that island for the past ten years. A racketeer named Sherwell had it and I guess it was a hide-out for his stores. When America went wet the island wasn't of much use to him, and so Gray has the use of it. Loaned to him by Sherwell. We've only just located Gray on this island and we want to know what's going on. He has a nasty reputation, Ted, but I regard you as not only the most fearless Agent on my staff, but one with a certain amount of intelligence. You've done grand work these last ten years, and if you can get Danny behind bars you can look on promotion as a certainty. I suggest you go on another fishing expedition."

"You want me to start at once?"

"Yes, and remember this, Ted." The chief paused. "If you get in a jam we can't help you unless you've got all the dope on Murdock. This is a sort of unofficial inquiry—guess you understand?"

"Sure, chief, and I think that if you let me draw up to a thousand dollars I can do something," Ted grinned. "Knowing how poor America is I'll try and keep it down, but it takes money to fit out a motor-boat for fishing."

"You can have what money you like as long as you get results!" The chief signed a form. "This will give you all the money you need."

Ted Riley left headquarters and went outside to his car, a powerful two-seater. As he drove away an open touring car parked on the other side of the road moved away from the kerb. The four men in that car were very interested in Riley's car.

"That's the guy!" growled one. "Let's get him!"

Danny Murdock's gang were a murderous, vengeful lot. Riley had dared to walk into a saloon, which they haunted, and yank out Slick and One Eye, when they started a rough house. Riley had gone to the saloon disguised as a sailor in the hope of learning the movements of the various waterfront gangs. Slick and One Eye had been suspicious of his clean appearance and picked a quarrel. The result was the dickens of a scrap and the prime mover taken to gaol. The four men in the car were out to get Riley.

It was late afternoon, and Ted, as he drove out to his lodgings on the outskirts of Frisco, turned over in his mind his plans for the fishing expedition, on which he must start first thing in the morning. His direction was left at the cross-roads, and he glanced up into the mirror to see if anything was behind. There was a car close behind.

Ted became thoughtful when he found the same car behind him at the next cross-roads. His home was near the shore and rather quiet—he decided not to go home yet. He turned his car in the direction of the hills, and grinned to find that car still dogging him. At the next cross-roads he swung left and headed back for town, and now his foot was down on the pedal.

A glance at the mirror showed that he had gained a hundred yards or more, but the other car appeared to be gaining. This section of road was rather quiet for two miles, and he decided that it was not healthy. At the end one dropped down into the heart of the city and there a clever driver could have a lot of fun.

Riley dodged in and out of small turnings, into the drives of several private houses, down roads that were under repair, through a factory yard and eventually eluded the pursuit by getting across a control before the cop in charge held up the traffic.

But on his way out to the coast they came out of a side-turning, and the chase was on again. Ted soon became aware that he had a flat tyre and guessed that a gun with a silencer had burst it. Angriily he swung the car off the road on to the grass. He had no chance at gun play, but he might try bluff.

The other car swung alongside and four guns covered him:

"Reach for the sky!" drawled a voice. "What's the idea chasing me around?" cried Riley, as his hands shot upwards.

"Exchange is no robbery, buddy," the crook sneered. "You're coming to stay along of us, and maybe if two friends of ours were paroled we might do the same with you. If they ain't released quick you may get a ride."

"And some of you guys would go to the chair," retorted Riley. "That sort of talk don't scare me."

"Get the wheel changed, buddy," came the order. "We're taking you and your car."

Ten minutes later the two cars were back on the road. Two crooks travelled with Riley, with the other car close behind. Ted sat next to the driver, with a crook and a gun in the back seat.

What they did not know was that Riley had several little inventions of his own about that car. They came to a hill and Ted's hand went down the side of the seat and pressed a knob—it disconnected the brakes. Another knob put the gears into free-wheel. The car bounded forward.

"The brakes have gone!" yelled the driver.

The car was moving at a good fifty when Ted pressed those knobs again—instantly the brakes and gear came into action. He had braced his feet for the shock, but the crooks hadn't. One winded himself over the wheel and the other lurched forward to crash into Riley's fist. Riley released the brakes and the car went down the hill at a reasonable pace. He dragged the winded crook away from the wheel and hit that rogue over the head with a wooden bludgeon that he took from a car pocket. The dazed crook behind him was showing signs of recovering, and the same bludgeon put the rascal back into oblivion.

The other car was not far behind, and they could see that something was wrong. Riley stepped on the accelerator and at the next cross-roads saw a steam lorry and truck. The driver signalled that he was turning left, and Riley sped forward with the crook car close behind. The crooks had not seen the truck driver's signal.

By inches Riley got through and laughed to hear the truck-driver's curses. The crooks realised they couldn't make it, and applied their brakes too late. They hit the back of the lorry, as they tried to swing their car back to the centre of the road, ripped off one side of their touer, lurched across the road and crashed into a stationary car that was fortunately unoccupied.

That night four more of Daniel Murdock's gang were behind prison bars.

Diamond Island

THREE days later a small motor fishing boat might have been seen chugging along the coast. At the wheel sat a young man in blue serge trousers, blue sweater and open shirt. Around him was the outfit of a fisherman—a net, two or three rods, lines and bait. In a soap-box were plenty of shavings and two cans of petrol. In the far distance was a faint smudge that was Diamond Island.

From a locker he pulled out a small box with a fuse and examined it. He pushed it close to the box of shavings. Satisfied that everything was set, he took up glasses and scanned that distant smudge. Diamond Island was low lying and he should be within a mile of the shore within the next half-hour.

Two miles from the island he anchored and began to fish. After a while he got down under the gunwale of his craft and got out his glasses. Those on the island must not see the fisherman's interest in their activities. There seemed a number of sheds and one large house on the highest part of the island, which was composed of low-lying sand hills. There was something near the foreshore that he could not see very clearly on account of haze, so he heaved up the anchor and changed to a place nearer the island. It turned out to be a large boat-house, slip-way and small pier.

Ted took out a map and studied it closely. Now he had the bearings of the island. A boat called every week with supplies and mail from the mainland, and this pier must be the one shown on the map. Here was the only deep water, as round the rest of the island were rocks and coral reefs.

The island seemed deserted, but not uninhabited. Smoke came from a chimney of the house and also from the sheds. On the pier was a long wicker-work deck chair. A sunshade was over the chair so that he could not see that it was occupied. He fished for a bit and then decided it was time to get busy.

After starting the motor he added far too much oil, and as the craft chugged along a trail of smoke was wafted away by a slight breeze. If there were anyone on the island they could not fail to see the boat. More than likely Murdock had men constantly on the watch for vessels.

Riley took out a cigarette, drew the box of shavings closer and took out the stopper of the petrol can. He pushed over the can and saw the petrol soak into the shavings. He glanced at the island and steered his craft towards the shore. At eight hundred yards he lit his cigarette and nonchalantly tossed the lighted match into the shavings.

On the platform in the sand hills knelt three men—the background of sand made them almost invisible. Two of the men were rough-looking seamen, but the third man was of different class. Danny Murdock was a giant of a man. He wore buckskin riding breeches, a polo shirt and a sports collar.

A fourth man, bent double, joined them. A wiry, swarthy man in a very out-of-place blue suit.

"What do you make of him, Franklin?" Murdock asked.

"Seems to be just an ordinary fisherman," was the answer.

"Ordinary fishermen don't come fishing round this island," cried Murdock. "The fishing's been dud for the past twelve months, he's six miles from the nearest port and he seems too mighty interested in this island." He laughed. "Seems to be a pretty poor hand with an engine—look at that smoke."

"If he is a Government Agent he might be making that smoke on purpose," hinted Franklin. "By making his presence obvious he can banish our suspicions."

"Maybe you're right," Murdock picked up his glasses. "Can't see much of him, but he don't look much like a fisherman."

"What's that?" One of the scamen pointed. "Looks to me as if his craft were on fire."

"Over oiled the engine," added the other. "And set himself afire. The guy's crazy."

Murdock again studied the boat.

"Yes, he's certainly on fire. Looks as if he's trying to beat out the flames. Gosh, that boat is blazing quickly. Ah, he's taken off his coat and boots as if he thinks his only chance is a swim to the shore." He glanced at Franklin.

"Two minutes ago there was just a small flicker of flame and now the boat is blazing from stem to stern. Pretty swift, isn't it?"

They saw Ted Riley jump overboard and swim from his boat, which was now a mass of flames. A sudden roar and the whole boat seemed to be lifted bodily in the air.

Murdock turned to the two seamen.

"That settles it," he shouted. "His craft blows up mysteriously and he swims to this island. Go down to the pier and go out to the rescue in my motor-boat. You handle the motor, Sparky," he instructed the biggest of the two men. "You, Bruno, take the sharpest boathook you can find. In attempting to rescue this fisherman you accidentally drown him, spear him, or run him down. I don't care what happens as long as he doesn't reach this island alive. Get going!"

The two seamen got to their feet and rushed towards the pier.

But the explosion, which had been far louder than Riley had intended, had attracted someone else. The deck chair had an occupant. Under the sunshade had sprawled a girl in a bathing suit. She had been reading, but had fallen asleep. The explosion awakened her and she saw, when the smoke lifted, a smouldering wreck that had once been a boat. Her keen eyes saw a figure thrashing the water—Riley was pretending he was in difficulties. He had blown up his craft to hide all traces of shavings and petrol, but had made a bad miscalculation about the explosive. Before he was rescued he must think out some reason. Little did he know of the sort of rescue Murdock planned for him.

The girl got to her feet and raced along the pier. Moored to a pile was a small craft with an outboard motor. She jumped in, swung the engine and was off like a flash.

Rescued

TED RILEY thrashed the water with his hands and bellowed hoarsely for help. He must make this realistic or Murdock might get suspicious. He had decided that he could explain the explosion by admitting that he had some dynamite on board and that he was taking same to another fisherman, who lived along the coast south of Diamond Island. They intended to use the dynamite for widening the entrance to a small cove.

It was somewhat of a surprise to find that two motor-boats were dashing to his rescue. The water was rather popply and he could not get more than occasional glimpses. The smaller craft had a good start, but the bigger vessel was coming up fast.

"Help! Help!" gurgled Riley, and prided himself that his plot to land on Diamond Island was succeeding.

Ah, the big motor-boat with its two seamen was passing the smaller vessel. Riley was surprised, because the backwash of the bigger craft might cause the small outboard to upset. What he expected nearly happened, and the small craft was swept nearly round in a circle.

Riley saw a big, round-faced fellow in the bows of the approaching craft, and he did not like the leering grin. The craft was going at a terrific speed, and Riley had a sudden sense of intense peril. He jerked back his head, and the point of the boathook missed his head by inches.

The motor-boat swept past and then began to circle.

Riley knew what to expect. That craft had not tried to rescue, but to destroy him. They had failed with a boathook the first time. Again the launch came straight at Riley, and the Agent knew this time his head might be smashed in by the nose of the vessel, after which the evil boatman would probably finish off the rescue with the boathook. In the nick of time Riley sank beneath the waves.

"Help! Help!" he shouted as soon as he broke surface again. It was some measure of relief to see the small outboard coming in his direction.

The launch again came towards him. "Stay still, mister, we'll get you!" he heard the ugly seaman bellowing. "Yeah, but I don't wish to be got," muttered Ted, and did a very realistic act of a man going under for the second time.

This time the outboard kept clear of the wash and speeded forward as the launch tore over the spot where Riley had been. A head bobbed up.

"Help! Help!" gurgled Riley, and, seeing the outboard, splashed towards it.

For the first time he realised the occupant was a girl, but he had no time to wonder as he heard the roar of the launch. His arms gripped the pointed nose of the craft.

"Don't stop the engine!" he bellowed. "Get her away, or the backwash may upset your boat."

The girl pushed over the gas control, and the outboard shot away, and Riley was glad because, as he hung on for dear life, he caught a glimpse of the face of the man with the boathook—an expression of malignant, baffled fury.

"Slow up!" Ted shouted. "I'm coming aboard!"

The flat bottom of the boat of the light craft made it possible to pull himself across the closed-in bow, and the girl assisted by lying to the starboard side to counterbalance his weight.

"Thanks!" gasped Ted Riley as he lay flat on the thin woodwork and stared at the prettiest girl he had seen in all his life. "Do you mind hopping back to shore quick before those clumsy loons decide to run you down or do something equally unpleasant?"

"I think they must be drunk." The girl let the engine have an open throttle.

Riley hung on grinning, and was very glad when they were close to the pier. The launch was some way behind them, and Ted felt that they would not make another attempt to kill him—at any rate, not for the moment.

"Sparky and Bruno are supposed to be excellent seamen," the girl remarked. "They were clumsy. They might have run you down."

"If you hadn't been around, lady, I might certainly have been in Davy Jones' locker," grinned Ted Riley, and his heart missed several beats when the girl smiled back at him.

Next moment the outboard was alongside the pier. Riley assisted her to jump ashore.

"Thanks for saving my life," Riley said. "I was warned that these were dangerous waters for fishing, and that I was a fool to go out without a boatman. Guess I've been lucky." He held out his hand. "You handled that boat of yours marvellously."

Her firm grip of his hand gave him a pleasant thrill.

A Warning

THE girl insisted that the young man come to the house at once. Her father would lend him some clothes whilst his own were drying. He learnt that her name was Ann Baker, and that she lived in the big house with her father. Easy to see that this charming girl was very tired of Diamond Island. Something must have stopped Ted from giving the girl a false name, and it turned out just as well he didn't. The girl was in such a hurry to get him into dry clothes that he did not have any need to talk about himself, except that fishing was a mug's game.

Inside the house a dapper, grey-haired little man was in the hall to meet them. "I heard an explosion, and—" He broke off. "It's Ted Riley."

"Hallo, Professor Baker!" Ted was equally surprised. "Well, you are the last person I expected to meet."

"So you know my father?" laughed the girl. "What an extraordinary coincidence."

"When I was at college I learnt a lot from your dad about chemistry,"

"Reach for the sky!" drawled a voice.

plained Ted as he shook the professor's hand. "And though I've forgotten a great deal, there's some of his wise teaching still in my head. What he taught me has been of great service, Miss Baker. Well, professor, you don't look a day older."

"A little thinner on top, my boy." The professor became serious. "Lun, my Japanese servant, told me that some boat blew up. Were you on that boat?"

"Not at the time of the explosion, fortunately for me." Ted grinned. "I chanced this way on a fishing expedition, over oiled my engine, caught fire, and had to jump for it as there was some explosive on board."

"Explosive?" Ted hesitated. Should he tell the professor of his mission? He knew he could be trusted, but was it wise? He decided to wait for a better opportunity.

"Business and pleasure." Ted spoke casually. "I was taking the explosive to a fisherman farther down the coast, who wants to blow away part of a natural cove so he can use the place for several of his boats. Your daughter, professor, heard the explosion and came to my rescue." He frowned. "Another launch put out with two seamen aboard, and their efforts at rescue work nearly resulted in my undoing."

"Sparky and Bruno, dad," Ann explained when her father glanced inquiringly at her. "I always did think they were the most hopeless couple of men I've ever met. They nearly upset me, and then did their best to run Mr. Riley down."

"I don't like those men very much," the professor admitted, and dismissed that subject with a snile. "I suppose you're wondering what I'm doing on this lonely island? Well, I'm on Government research work. Can't tell you more than that, except that the Government's Agent, Major Gray, brought me here to carry out important investigations. You understand, Ted, that this is in confidence."

"Sure, I understand." Ted nodded his head and wished he could ask a lot of questions. "So you brought your daughter to keep you company. I'm glad I blew up."

"Dad, Mr. Riley is wet." Ann spoke decidedly. "He must change his clothes at once, and we'll have them dried for him."

"I'll get Lun to—" the professor began, but stopped as the door behind them opened. "Ah, here is the major!"

Ted Riley liked neither Gray nor his friend Franklin, and it was apparent by the way they looked at him they were not enamoured with his presence on Diamond Island.

"You're the stranger Miss Baker picked up." The big man plaited himself in front of the Government Agent. "What in Hades caused that explosion?"

Ted explained as convincingly as possible, and Gray granted non-committally at the end. The Agent was uncertain whether his story had been believed or not. Gray would have asked a lot of questions if Ann Baker had not intervened and insisted that her father's old pupil be allowed to get out of his wet clothes.

A sleek, white-coated little figure conducted Riley to a room upstairs. Eyes that were curiously keen looked at the Agent through powerful glasses.

"Gentlemen have had luck lose boat," Lun said as he fetched out the largest trousers he could find. "Now no boat leave island plenty days. Stay here not too good."

"Why not?" Ted asked sharply.

"Very bad this island for health." The almond eyes looked fixedly into Riley's. "Take tip and leave island pretty damn quick. Master call me if January 25th, 1936.

he need me." He paused at the door. "Plenty danger."

Noiselessly the door closed behind the little Jap.

Poison Gas

THE warning convinced Ted more than ever that there was some mystery attached to Diamond Island. Why was the professor being used by Gray for important researches? Old Baker was one of the most trustworthy and honourable of men, and on no account could one associate anything shady with him. It seemed apparent that Danny Murdock had bluffed the professor into the belief that he was representing the Government, persuaded the old boy to come to this lonely island, and the reason was something that Ted intended to find out.

No time like the present with Ted, and without bothering to change, he pulled up a window and crawled out on to the tarred roof. He found a tree growing by the side of the house, and that enabled him to reach the ground quickly. A glance round and he felt certain no one had seen him. He noted a stout wooden pillar that supported the veranda round the upper rooms, and decided that he could easily swarm up it to the roof.

On the way up from the pier Riley had been noting all the buildings, and he had been particularly interested in a squat stone building near the house. A window was open, and there seemed to be all sorts of glass bottles and tubes linked together. Ted only got a brief glimpse, but they crossed a little run-away channel, and the banks were eaked with a vivid yellow slime. Obvious that chemical experiments had caused this discoloration.

Ted found the same window open and crawled inside. It was a laboratory on very up-to-date lines. This was where Professor Baker experimented for Major Gray and imagined he was working for the Government. What on? Suddenly Ted snapped his fingers as he remembered the professor's great interest in various gases. That yellow slime was something to do with sulphuretted hydrogen.

Not wishing his absence to be discovered, Ted could only make a quick examination of the laboratory. There were all kinds of retorts, test tubes and electrical devices, bottles full of queer liquids, and a number of huge gas cylinders. He took a chance and opened the valve of a cylinder, but there came no sound of escaping gas. He tried two more and they were empty. The retorts and test tubes were linked together and seemed to indicate that they had been in recent use—most of them were stained yellow. The experiments seemed to begin with a small oven in which the professor had baked ingredients that had formed a gas that passed along the various tubes, through liquids, and pieces of metals to finish in a large glass tank. This huge glass container seemed to be full of yellowy-white smoke.

"Poison gas," decided Ted, and determined that it was time to get back. He had learnt enough for the moment. Back through the window and a sprint across to the house, up the veranda support like a monkey, and then across the roof to the room. Quickly he dragged off his damp clothes and got into the much-too-small clothes of the professor.

Ted came down the stairs and was relieved to find that the bogus Major Gray and his companion, Franklin, had left.

"Major Gray was concerned about you, Ted," laughed the professor. "It is so important that everything that is done on this island is in the strictest secrecy that he feared you might be a spy, but I told the major that you had been a pupil of mine for quite a number of years. Gray told me that enemies of the United States had their agents everywhere, and that even Americans would sell State secrets if the price were high enough. I would like you to stay for a few days, Ted, as the major thinks—"

"Major Gray does not trust me," interrupted Ted Riley. "And he does not wish me to leave until he is satisfied that I'm on the level."

"You always were quick at understanding." The professor was relieved. "I can't guarantee good fishing, but there are some horses and you can ride. The island is about three miles long and a mile wide. I am busy all day, but Ann would be pleased to show you round the island."

"I don't mind how long I'm a prisoner here," Ted said, and his eyes smiled into those of Ann Baker.

"But haven't you got your job?" questioned the professor. "By the way, Ted, what are you doing, if it's not too impertinent?"

"I'm a Government Agent," quietly answered Ted.

"I must tell Gray that," excitedly cried old Baker. "He'll be delighted to have someone he can discuss matters of importance with perfect freedom. You'll be of great help to him. He'll be delighted to find you are a Government man. What sort of branch do you represent, Ted?"

"Ever heard of 'G' men?" "Oh, yes, most dangerous sort of life." The professor was impressed. "And are you down this part of the world on business or pleasure?"

"Business," snapped Ted. "And I'm after Major Gray!"

"After Major Gray?" cried the girl. "What do you mean?"

"Guess I've got to be perfectly frank." Ted glanced from father to daughter. "Gray is a dangerous crook by the name of Daniel Murdock, and I've been sent here by my Department to find out what Danny is doing on Diamond Island. Maybe if you tell me what all those experiments in poison gas mean I'll know what are Danny Murdock's plans."

The professor told Ted frankly that he had thought Major Gray's papers and testimonials to be genuine. It was after an announcement of a lecture of his discovery of a new poison gas that the major had come to the professor with an offer of help for the carrying out of extensive experiments. Papers purporting to come from Washington stated that the reason for this interest in the professor's experiments was because the Government did not wish a poison gas to fall into enemy hands. They knew his reputation as a scientist, and they wished him to perfect his poison gas. With such a gas they could dictate peace to the whole of the world.

"You have a trusting disposition, professor." Ted's smile was grim when the scientist had finished. "I know Murdock has a glib tongue, but America dictating peace to the world I think should have made you think. I don't blame you. Now, what we've got to do is scheme out what to do next. From your account, this gas is very deadly."

"My experiments are complete." The professor spoke gloomily. "I have promised to conduct experiments at the south side of the island soon after dawn.

My gas will destroy everything living, whether it be human, plant or animal."

"I think it's horrible that a father so nice as you should want to mess about with deadly gasses," argued Ann. She turned to the young man. "Ted, what does Murdock plan to do?"

"Sell it to the highest bidder, use it as a means to make himself very rich, or to stir up some revolt against civilisation. Who can say what Murdock is planning? But we know he is a fanatical rogue, and if he finds out the secret of this gas he could shatter the peace of the world." Riley shuddered. "Professor, you had better conduct your experiments at dawn, but do not let Murdock know you do not trust him."

Little did they know that the Japanese servant, Lun, had his ears close to the door of the room.

A Murderous Attack

JUST before dawn Ted crept from the house by means of the roof and found his way to the south side of the island. He took up a position among some rocks that overlooked the beach.

Two masked figures appeared, and by the height it was easy to tell which was Murdock. The crook was carrying a huge cylinder, whilst the professor laboured under yards of piping. The end of the piping was placed against a bank of grasses and ferns and then linked up with the cylinder.

Murdock signalled with his hand that the experiment should begin. The two men adjusted their masks and the professor allowed the gas to escape.

A yellowish smoke began to creep over the bank, and then the gas must have been turned off, for the two men walked forward to investigate. Ted shaded his eyes so that he could see better. It looked as if the bank had been withered up by the gas and was now no more than a blackened waste. The two masked figures went back to the cylinder and once more the gas was released.

A great cloud of yellow white smoke quickly appeared and seemed to expand. Ted got a shock when he saw a number of seagulls crash into the sea. A flock of wild duck flew over the island, and Ted saw them flutter wildly when above the cloud of poison gas. He shut his eyes as the birds came hurtling down as if they had been shot.

Ted decided that he had seen enough. Moreover, the gas cloud seemed to be drifting in his direction, and he did not wish to suffer the fate of those birds. He decided to make his way down to the beach, as it provided a certain amount of cover. He was walking noiselessly on the firm sand when a cascade of small stones came down the cliff face. He waited with his fists clenched.

A figure jumped down to the beach, and Ted did not wait to ask questions, but sprang forward. His arms gripped the man by the shoulder and flung him to the sand. A surprise for Ted to find that he had captured the Jap servant, Lun.

"What the devil are you doing here?"

"You let me go queek." The Jap's eyes flickered fearfully. "I tell you plenty danger. If we stay here both die. The gas—" He pointed a shaking hand. "Look!"

Ted glimpsed over his shoulder a white cloud. The wind had unexpectedly freshened and they were in the path of the gas. Already wisps of the gas were coming along the sands like ghostly menacing spectres.

Lun wriggled to his feet and sped down the beach like someone in dread terror. Ted got a faint strangling smell of the gas, and then he took to his heels and ran for dear life. A glance back showed that he was getting away from the cloud of deadly fumes.

Riley got back to the house, but he was seen by Bruno, who reported the matter to Franklin.

Ted was surprised to learn from Ann that Lun was nowhere about the house. They were discussing what could have happened to this perfect Jap servant when Murdock and Franklin appeared at the house. The big man was in a towering rage, and held up a twisted piece of pipe.

"Somebody has been down to the pier and tampered with my launch," he shouted. "Look at this busted petrol pipe. Your boat, Ann, has been sunk, and I want to know who did it."

"Well, why look at me?" demanded Ted.

"Who else could have done it?" shouted Murdock. "I'm not satisfied with your credentials, Riley. You were seen snooping round this island in the early hours. Why?"

"Didn't feel like sleep, so had a walk round." Ted looked the crook straight in the eye. "And I thought someone had set the island on fire by all the smoke I saw down the south end."

"Well, we don't intend you shall see any more or damage our craft," sneered the big man.

"Professor Baker knows me and he's told you so," cried Ted. "I didn't damage your boat—why should I?"

"To prevent us leaving Diamond Island. I'd like to ask a few questions of the professor." His tone lost its harshness. "If he satisfies me I may change my mind about you, but at the moment"—he held up the pipe—"I have my doubts about you. You'll find the professor in the stores near the pier. I'll join you there in a few minutes, Riley. Franklin, point him out the way."

Ted had no option but to obey. Franklin pointed to one of the sheds and then said he must get back to Major Gray.

The Government Agent was thoughtful as he walked towards the shed. One moment Murdock had been like a raging bear, and then had changed his tone. He had also intercepted a queer glance exchanged between Franklin and Murdock. He looked round as if he expected to get a bullet in the back. He quickened his footsteps towards the shed. Funny the professor should not come to the house after the gas experiments. All very peculiar. Then there was the matter of the boats. Riley changed his direction and went to the pier—one look told him that for once Murdock had not lied.

On reaching the shed Ted paused to give the place a good survey, and decided it was a deserted, broken-down building—a curious place for a discussion on his credentials. Why not Murdock's own office above the laboratory? He walked up some steps to a wooden door and saw it was not latched. Suddenly he shot out a foot and kicked it open. The result was a howl of pain. Riley jumped through the opening and his eyes took in the scene. On the floor lay Sparky, and in his arms was a looped rope, whilst Bruno, the other seaman, was standing near the door with a great block of wood in his hands. Bruno seemed paralysed by the fall of his companion, but now he made a wild swing at Riley, who dodged the blow. Now Ted understood the change of tone of Danny Murdock—this was the second attempt on his life.

"What the devil are you doing here?" demanded Ted.

Ted Riley was incensed by the treachery and waded into the two burly seamen like a whirlwind. Bruno had his club wrenched from his hands and got a punch between the eyes that made him yell with pain and fright. Sparky tried to get his looped rope over Ted's head and got two pile-driving blows in the ribs that doubled him up. Ted flung the rope in the gasping ruffian's face.

"You two mugs had enough?" shouted Riley. "If you want any more, just say the word and I'll flay you both."

Something in Bruno's eyes made Ted jump round. Coming stealthily up the steps was Franklin, and the man carried a gun. Ted slithered like a shadow to the door, and he glanced slowly at the two ruffians and made his expression convey that if they opened their mouths he would kill them both.

"Sparky! Bruno!" cried Franklin. "Where are you two fools? Have you got Riley?"

"No!" yelled Ted, and out and up went his boot. It connected hard to Franklin's wrist as the shifty-eyed secretary rashly entered the store.

The fight on the veranda was short and sweet. Bang! Crash! Wallop! Ted did not spare his punches, and the short fight ended with him forcing Franklin over a rail and dropping the terror-stricken crook on to hard ground, which was a drop of ten yards and must have hurt.

What should he do next? Where was the professor? Ted decided to try the laboratory. Now that the gas had been proved successful, Murdock would want to quit the island with the formula of the gas. Danny Murdock would not hesitate to murder Ann and her father to keep their mouths shut.

Quietly Ted stole to the laboratory and reached the door without being seen. The professor, with his arm round Ann, was facing Murdock, who was laughing triumphantly and exultantly. Ted clenched his fists.

The Fight in the Laboratory

"If you value your life, forget you ever saw Diamond Island," the big man shouted. "You put a lot of easy money my way, professor, and I ain't got the heart to send you byes, but if you spill one word I'll sure get you. I've dealt with that cursed Government spy, and at dusk my launch will be ready. I'm destroying all this before I leave, and when we reach the mainland we say farewell, and don't forget my warning, professor."

"What are you going to do, you scoundrel?"

"An Eastern Power needs this gas, and they'll get it at a price," chuckled Murdock. "Maybe after that there'll be a beautiful war, and you can read all about it. All thanks to you, professor."

"And I thought I was working to make war an impossibility," bemoaned Professor Baker.

"I've got the formula, and I guess it's mighty swell of me to let you two live." He gave a fiendish laugh. "I'd like to see your faces when that war starts."

"It will never start!" came a voice, and Ted recognised it as that of Lun. There was a gallery round the laboratory, and the Japanese was lying on the boards, with a gun pointing at Murdock through the rails.

For a split second Murdock stared at the little Jap and then his hand moved like lightning to his hip. The two guns roared at the same instant, and Ted heard a bullet ricochet off the floor mighty close to his head. Murdock was famed as a gunman, and his bullet had sped true to its mark.

A coughing moan and a gun clanged to the laboratory floor. The Jap staggered to his feet and Murdock fired again and again. The emissary of a country that desired peace swayed against the rail of the balcony. A rendering snap and the lifeless body of Lun crashed to the floor.

"So perish all those who stand in my path," shouted Murdock. "Danny Murdock strikes ruthlessly at all who dare—"

Murdock did not finish, because Ted Riley had come across the laboratory with the speed of a panther. His steel-like fingers wrenched the gun away from the killer.

"Fight with your hands, you dirty murderer!" taunted Riley. "You've tried twice through your hirelings to get me and failed, now see what you can do yourself. And know this, Danny Murdock, that if you fail to get me you go to the chair for your many crimes."

For a long moment the two took measure of each other and Murdock laughed scornfully. "I can smash you with one hand."

Riley's answer was an unexpected leap forward and a swinging left that landed on the heavy chin. Murdock went down, and when he got to his feet his eyes were blazing with mad rage. He rushed at Ted swinging his muscular arms, but the Government man jumped away.

It was science against brute force. Ann clung to her father and prayed for Ted's victory in a fight that she did not see how he could possibly win.

Ted Riley landed many powerful punches to the face and body, but they seemed to have little effect on Murdock. Ann gave a gasping cry when Murdock's arms wrapped themselves round the younger man, but Ted knew a trick of Ju-jitsu to break the hold. It was a ritual with Ted to practice half an hour each day with the medicine ball, and many bouts he had had with boxers and all-in wrestlers, and his training enabled him to make such a magnificent fight against a man easily two stone heavier. Once he fell, and as Murdock jumped forward up went Ted's feet to the bigger man's body, and Ann gave a cry of excited joy as the crook was sent sprawling over the other's head. Blood was trickling down Murdock's face as he got to his feet.

The crook swung up a chair, but the blow was broken by an arm parry. A vicious short-arm left jab thudded to Murdock's ribs and the chair dropped from his hands. The big man backed away badly winded, but he knew what this fight meant, and soon came back to the attack.

Ann was rejoicing that her hero was winning when she gave a gasp of dismay. There in the door was the figure of Franklin. The man looked as if he had been in the wars.

Murdock rushed and Ted side-stepped to catch the man with a vicious right-handed slap to the jaw.

Franklin saw his chief sent sprawling and decided that it was up to him to help.

"Ted, look out!" warned Ann.

Ted swung round to face the new danger and rushed at Franklin, whom he floored with an uppercut. Franklin went down, but Murdock was on his feet. Ted was not quite quick enough and staggered back before a punch in the chest. He crashed backwards and collided with a table covered with bottles and test-tubes. Everything was swept

Read This First

Montana Larkin, an ex-deputy, is planning to join in a land rush with Jinglebob Morgan, his friend, whose brother has provided them with the map of a claim which contains rich mineral deposits.

Montana and Jinglebob make the acquaintance of a rancher named Parker, and are introduced to his daughter Mary, and his niece, Ann Hardy. From Parker they learn the details of the projected land rush, and agree to ride in company with the cattleman and his party.

Parker's foreman, Gillespie, is a crook, however. Discovering the purpose of Montana and Jinglebob, he beats them to their claim with some of his hirelings, and records it in his name.

Later, Jinglebob's brother Clem arrives on the scene, and reveals the fact that the land secured by Gillespie is worthless, owing to a flaw in the map which Jinglebob had possessed.

Gillespie attempts to force information from Clem, but postpones his efforts when he is hired by a man named Marco Brett to loot a wagon-train, which is owned by Ann Hardy's father.

The attack fails, and subsequent efforts on Gillespie's part to learn the whereabouts of Clem Morgan's claim are alike unsuccessful.

On the night that Clem files his claim in town, Gil and his men confront Montana and some of the latter's friends in Brett's saloon. There are high words, in the midst of which Montana is shot down from behind.

The Road Back

FOLLOWING the smash of the gunshot and the collapse of Montana there was a blank silence in Marco Brett's saloon, but it was a silence of only a moment's duration, for suddenly it was broken by an outcry at the entrance of the bar-room.

Jinglebob and Clem Morgan were responsible for that outcry. Returning from the Land Office, where the elder brother had filed his claim, they had reached the swing-doors of the saloon in the very instant that the blast of the unseen assassin's revolver had put an end to the grim altercation between their friend and Gil Gillespie.

The shouts raised by Clem and Jinglebob caused Gillespie and his rogues to wheel round, but almost simultaneously the younger of the two brothers plucked his "iron" from its holster and pumped lead at the bar-room lights, shattering them in swift succession.

The roar of Jinglebob's six-shooter and the fall of utter darkness created the wildest disorder and chaos. Already keyed up to a state of high alarm by the shot that had dropped Montana, the regular patrons of Brett's saloon were thrown into a mad panic by this fresh outburst of gunplay, and scattered in every direction, some rushing for the exit, some diving behind tables and counter, all inspired by a common desire to give the Gillespie gang and the Parker ranch-hands as wide a berth as possible.

It was not precisely what Jinglebob had bargained for. It had seemed to him that Gil and his men held the trump cards, with Montana's huddled body at their feet and their forty-fives covering the ex-deputy's partisans, and he had fustilled the lights in the hope of giving the Dry Creek cowboys a chance to draw their Colts and avenge the shooting of their leader.

At the same time he had planned to take a hand in the fray himself, along with Clem.

But, far from plunging into any desperate duel, the Morgan brothers found themselves overborne all at once by a mob exodus of terrified citizens, and were bullocked out into the street by that surge of fleeing humanity—to go down beneath trampling, blundering, stumbling feet.

Meanwhile, tumult was raging in the saloon. The Dry Creek boys had taken advantage of the darkness sure enough, and the flashes of their guns were rending the gloom. But the duel was one-sided, for Gillespie and his band were sheering off, swarming in a body towards the private room that was Marco Brett's office.

Into that room they dashed, the first to cross the threshold being Gillespie, who promptly collided with two men who were already in occupation.

The two men in question were Marco Brett and Tex Saunders, and although the office was in darkness, Gil recognized them.

"Which of you fired the shot that knocked over Larkin?" he jerked out. "It was Tex, Gil," Brett jerked. "I was asleep on the couch, and woke up to see him standin' at the door with a smokin' gun in his fist."

"Fool!" Gillespie snarled, addressing Saunders. "I wanted information—not a killin'! You went an' spoiled everything, blast yuh!"

He swallowed his wrath, and then turned to the rest of his hirelings,

"We've gotta get out of here," he grated. "Come on, the side door."

"An' I'm makin' myself scarce, too," Brett put in grimly. "Sheriff Denver an' some of his deputies are in town, and I need an alibi—in case they try to pin the shootin' of Larkin on me."

The crooks ducked out into an alley alongside the building, and a few seconds later Gil and his followers were mounting their horses while Brett was hastening along the street on foot, the saloon-owner keeping to the shadows and heading for the house of a friend who could be trusted to bear him out in any story he might tell.

The Gillespie gang were soon clattering from the town, but once on the open range their leader called a halt and laid a hand on the saddle of Jake Conroy, whom he counted as one of his best men.

"Listen, feller," he said, "you go back an' watch points. See if you can find out what the Morgans aim to do. When you want to get in touch with me you can locate me in the hide-out at Hell's Gate."

Jake nodded and, detaching himself from the party, he watched his comrades gallop off through the night. Then he cantered into the main street of Sicomoro again, where he hitched his brone to the veranda-rail of a store some little distance from Brett's saloon, and lowered himself to the ground.

The sounds of gunplay no longer echoed through the town, though a good deal of shouting still issued from the bar-room, where the disturbance had taken place. As for the street itself, it was deserted except for the figures of Jinglebob and Clem, who were picking themselves up in a sorry fashion and brushing dust and grime from their clothes.

Jake saw the two brothers totter into the saloon, and then he noticed that people were beginning to filter from the dwellings on each side of the thoroughfare—men and women, who gathered in ever-increasing numbers outside Brett's premises.

With his hat slouched low over his eyes Conroy joined that inquisitive and excited crowd and, by dint of much shoving and elbowing, he forced his way to the porch of the saloon. He was actually peering through the swing-doors when Sheriff Denver arrived on the scene with three or four of his subordinates.

The saloon was still in darkness, but, having gained admittance to it, Denver speedily took control of the situation, and before long a naphtha lamp had been fetched.

By the light of that lamp Jake Conroy and those around him gained an impression of the bar-room, and it was a sight typical of a brawl's aftermath—with chairs and tables overturned and scared non-combatants emerging warily from cover.

Conroy's attention, however, was chiefly focused on a group of men near the counter. It was a group that included Steve Randall and the Dry Creek ranch-hands, Clem and Jinglebob Morgan, Sheriff Denver and his deputies—and they were gathered around the prone form of Montana Larkin, whom they were examining anxiously.

There was blood on Montana's scalp, but presently he opened his eyes and looked about him dazedly, and over at the swing-doors Jake Conroy heard Clem Morgan speak in a relieved tone.

"He'll be all right," the old prospector said. "Just creased, that's all."

"How'd it happen?" Sheriff Denver wanted to know.

It was Steve Randall who answered him. "There was an argument with Gil
January 25th, 1936.

Gillespie and some of his pals, sheriff, and suddenly there was a shot. It seemed to me as if it came from Brett's office over there—"

The words were scarcely uttered when Jake Conroy felt someone pushing past him, and as he turned his head he saw Mareo Brett himself. A moment later the saloon owner was striding into the bar-room, with a well-feigned expression of concern on his heavy features.

"What happened?" he demanded, accosting the group of men who stood near the counter. "What's this about a fight on my premises?"

Montana had been helped to his feet now, and he eyed Brett shrewdly.

"You sound as if the whole thing was news to you," he said, steadying himself.

"Somebody took a shot at me from that private room o' yours while I was havin' a little discussion with your friend Gillespie. And a short time ago one o' your barmen happened to mention you were asleep in there."

"Then he was mistaken," Brett announced with sharp emphasis. "I was down the street at Jim Bellamy's place. Bellamy can tell you that himself. Say, what are you drivin' at, anyway, Larkin?"

"Never mind," Montana rejoined. "But maybe it's lucky for you that you've got an alibi."

He turned to Denver, and addressed him inquiringly.

"You seem to be spendin' a lot of time in Sicomoro lately, sheriff," he commented. "Have you got jurisdiction over this new territory now?"

"Not yet," Denver replied, with an ominous glance at Brett. "But I'll be empowered to take in this section for the administration of law and order as soon as the Government gets around to it. And when I do, there's gonna be a heap of cleanin' up."

"Well, sheriff," Montana stated, "if you need any help when the time comes, I reckon you can depend on the Dry Creek outfit. We've got an interest in this new strip ourselves—"

He paused, and then diverted his attention to Clem and Jinglebob.

"Which reminds me," he added. "I stalled off Gillespie so that he and his gang wouldn't find out what you were up to. If they'd known, they'd have stopped at nothing to try and prevent you filing that claim. Did you get it recorded all right?"

"Sure did," Clem answered heartily. "We've got a legal right to that piece o' land now, Montana, and nobody can take it from us."

"Then I think it would be a good idea if the two of you started working it as soon as possible," the young foreman declared.

Clem frowned at him.

"The two of us!" he reiterated. "Didn't I tell you that there's four of us in this deal—you an' Parker as well as Jingle an' me? Come on, let's all go back to the ranch and break the good news that we're gettin' busy on that claim to-morrow."

There was a grunt of assent from Jinglebob, but long before the Morgans and the Dry Creek boys eventually left the town of Sicomoro a horseman might have been seen spurring northward in the direction of Hell's Gate.

That horseman was Jake Conroy, and an hour after quitting the porch of Brett's saloon he was entering a narrow canyon whose walls were riddled with caves; and at the entrance of one of these caves he was challenged and recognised by Limpy Dawson.

Passing into the cavern, Jake swung himself from his pony, left the animal with the rest of the gang's mounts, and strode forward until he rounded a bend in the rocky den; and here, in spite of the gloom, the handiwork of man was noticeable in the tunnel's aspect, for a timber wall had been built across it.

In this wall stood a door through which chinks of light were shining, and, thrusting his way over the threshold, Jake stepped into a crude room occupied by Gillespie and his minions.

Gil looked round quickly as Jake put in an appearance.

"Well," he asked, "what did you find out?"

"Plenty," Conroy said. "First of all, Montana Larkin only got creased."

"Dadblast it!" Ted Sanders cut in. "I thought I'd missed him. One o' Brett's barmen happened to move into the line o' fire at the last minute, an' that put me off. So I only clipped him—"

"Pipe down," Gillespie snapped at him. "You picked the wrong time to take a shot at Larkin, anyhow. But go on, Jake, what else did you learn?"

"Clem Morgan has legally filed his claim," Conroy announced darkly, and at that the gang leader jerked himself to his feet.

He stared at his informant for a spell, and then began to pace the rock floor of the hide-out in silence, a minute or two clapsing before he finally turned on his assembled hirelings.

"A fine bunch of dead-heads you've turned out to be," he breathed. "If it hadn't been for the way you saps have bungled every move I ever planned, we'd have had that gold location in our hands long ago."

There was a chorus of protests, but Gillespie interrupted the remonstrances of his gangsters with a savage gesture.

"All right, all right, never mind the alibis," he rasped. "But from now on there's gonna be no more slip-ups. Clem Morgan has got his land staked, filed, and everything, has he? Okay, we can still jump his claim and work it ourselves."

Jake plucked at his sleeve.

"I heard Clem say that they'd leave for the claim to-morrow, Gil," he mentioned. "Right now they're on their way back to the Parker outfit."

"Right," Gillespie declared. "We'll be in sight of Dry Creek to-morrow at sunrise, and we'll trail that bunch until we find out where the gold location is."

Towards the Claim

IT was morning at the Dry Creek Ranch, and preparations were afoot for departure, a couple of supply wagons having been loaded with stores and equipment.

Beside one of these wagons stood Montana and Parker, and both of them were ready for the long journey to Pine Ridge. Meanwhile the other vehicle was being occupied by Clem, Jinglebob, and two of the ranch hands, Happy and Shorty.

"Montana," Jim Parker was saying. "I've just been talking to Ann and Mary, and they're eager to come along. Yep—Ann, too. She reckons her father is well enough now to do without her."

"Okay, Mr. Parker," the younger man replied. "I'd like to have them with us. How about the ranch? You're leavin' the rest of the boys in charge, I suppose?"

"Yes, with Steve Randall as head man," Parker stated. "I know he was once in tow with Gillespie, but he's proved his loyalty to me, Montana, and I've taken him back into the outfit—permanent. As for Gillespie—well, the Law will deal with him when it gets authority in the section that's been opened up."

Little did Jim Parker know it, but at that moment Gillespie and his crew were a considerable distance from the new territory, being much nearer home—skulking amidst the brush, in fact, on the south side of the Dry Creek outfit.

From the edge of those thickets Gil and his men were keeping watch on the movements of their rivals, and presently they saw Ann and Mary emerge from the house, the former climbing into the wagon that contained Happy, Shorty and the Morgans, the other girl joining her father and Montana.

A minute or two later the two vehicles were rumbling away from the ranch, and, after following them with his eyes until they had disappeared from view, Gillespie turned to his accomplices.

"Good," he muttered. "Parker's left most of his cowpokes at home. Now, listen—I want you, Hank—and you, Limpy—to ride on ahead of us and keep our quarry spotted. Skirt around until you're outa sight of the ranch, and then pick up the trail of them wagons. But be sure you don't let Parker an' his friends discover that they're bein' followed."

"We get yuh, boss," said Limpy. "Then pull out!" Gil ordered. "We'll be comin' up slowly behind you. If there's anything to report that we can't see for ourselves, turn back an' let us know."

"We will," Hank Rodgers rejoined. "It's a good idea, Gil, sendin' us ahead. Two men stand a better chance of keepin' under cover than a whole gang. But don't lie too far back, or you may lose track of us yourselves."

Gillespie informed him gruffly that he knew what he was doing, and ere long Hank and Limpy were cantering off through the thickets, the pair of them effecting a wide detour in order to avoid any chance of being seen by those of Parker's employees who had been left at the ranch.

Some time afterwards they were diligently shadowing the two wagons occupied by Jim Parker and his companions, being careful to remain at a respectful distance and taking every precaution to ensure that their presence on the trail was unsuspected. And in the meanwhile, much farther to the rear, with attention always riveted on Hank and Limpy, but seldom setting eyes on the party from the Dry Creek outfit, Gil and the main body of the outlaws were moving at a slow pace over the range.

The toilsome journey continued for hour after hour, and so well did Hank and Limpy perform their task that never once were they in danger of detection by those in front of them. Indeed, if the wagons occupants had at any moment happened to turn and look back they would have discerned no sign of the trackers, with such skill and cunning were they dogged.

At noon they were on the edge of the dense woods that masked the country around Pine Ridge, and it was here that Clem Morgan called a halt.

Both wagons were brought to a standstill, and the trio in the first vehicle glanced round inquiringly.

"What is it, old-timer?" Montana asked of Clem.

"There's a disused cabin up the left fork," the prospector announced. "Supposin' you and Parker and Miss Mary take possession of it—and fix it up, comfortable-like, as quarters for the lot of us. While you're doin' that, the rest of us will travel a-ways along the right fork."

"What for?" Parker wanted to know.

"Well, there's a tunnel in this strip that I want to find," Clem explained. "I bored it myself when I was prospectin' here years ago—before I was driven out by the Injuns that lived on the territory then."

"Right you are, Clem," said Parker. "But supposin' Happy comes along with us and helps to clean up this cabin you mentioned."

Happy transferred to the first wagon and the journey was resumed, both vehicles being kept on the same course until they reached a point where the road diverged into two separate branches. Here Montana, Happy and the Parkers exchanged a few words of farewell with the Morgans, Ann and Shorty.

"Are you sure you wouldn't like to team up with us?" Mary sang out to her cousin.

"No, thanks," Ann replied with a smile. "I'd rather see this tunnel that Clem's spoken about. It sounds intriguing. Besides, I hate housework."

Mary laughed, and then signed to her father to go ahead, and the rancher cracked a whip above the horses that were drawing the first wagon. They at once plodded forward on to the left-hand fork, and at the same time the vehicle containing Ann and her companions swung off down the right-hand trail.

Back in a covert of tall thickets, not far from the spot where the roads diverged, Hank Rodgers and Limpy Dawson exchanged meaning glances.

"Contact with Gil and the boys, Limpy," said Hank. "Tell 'em what's happened. I'll take the right fork and keep track of Clem Morgan's bunch."

The gangsters parted, Limpy riding to the rear and encountering Gil and the rest of the outlaws shortly afterwards.

"What's up?" Gillespie demanded.

"They've separated," his hireling reported. "Montana, Happy an' the Parkers have turned along the left fork. The others have branched off to the right."

"Why?" Gillespie muttered.

"They was hollerin' to one another afore they split up," Limpy declared.

"We couldn't hear everything, but I believe Clem's party is headed for the gold location, and Montana's for a cabin where they aim to fix up quarters. Hank has taken the right fork, stickin' close to the Morgans."

Gillespie turned to his men and spoke tersely.

"Jeff, you and Tex Sanders and Jake Conroy go with Limpy," he ordered. "Corral Montana and his party in that cabin. Tie 'em up for the time being so they can't interfere with our plans. Then Montana was seized and disarmed, and his wrists were bound behind his back with a strip of rawhide cut from a lariat.

ride back and wait at the fork. The rest of us will join up with Hank."

Tex, Jeff and Conroy moved alongside Limpy Dawson, but before the quartet took themselves off, Gillespie added a caution.

"I don't want no gunplay," he said. "There's a good many lumberjacks scattered through the woods, and shoot-in' might bring 'em down on you. And don't let any harm come to Mary Parker. Remember that."

Limpy and his comrades nodded, and then they kicked their heels into the flanks of their ponies, departing at a brisk pace and leaving the remainder of the gang to follow in a more leisurely style. A few minutes later the four who had been instructed to deal with Montana's party were swerving on to the left fork, and before long Gil and the other members of the band might have been seen trooping along the right-hand trail—the one taken by Shorty, Ann and the Morgans—and by their shadower, Hank.

On the left fork, Limpy Dawson and his associates were slackening speed by then, and were going ahead at a mere canter, keeping a close look-out for any sign of a habitation; and they had been riding for something like twenty minutes when they suddenly espied a small clearing in front of them.

A cabin stood in that clearing. It was in a fairly good state of repair, and from the point of view of any settler, it was conveniently close to water, for it was within a hundred yards of a broad, swiftly flowing river.

Outside that cabin was the wagon which had been driven by Jim Parker, and the rancher was alighting from the vehicle with his daughter, Montana Larkin and Happy.

Limpy and his accomplices drew rein and dismounted, concealing their horses amidst the tall undergrowth. Then they focused their eyes on the cabin again, and watched the three men and the girl push their way across the threshold of it.

Happy reappeared after a brief interval with a bucket in his grasp and started for the river, having been dispatched, apparently, for water. The gangsters peered at his receding figure for a little while, and then Limpy volunteered a comment.

"Right, now we've only got two men and a girl to handle," he breathed. "Let's sneak up on that shack and grab 'em. We can attend to Happy when he comes back."

The proposal found favour with the other three rogues, and they began to steal through the underbrush until they were close to the cabin. Then, with no further cover available, they redoubled their caution and crawled to the very porch of the dwelling on hands and knees.

Voices reached their ears from within, for the front door was wide open. Beyond the threshold they caught glimpse of Jim Parker tidying one of the rooms in the cabin—and another glimpse of Montana and Mary in a back kitchen.

The foreman and the rancher's daughter had seemingly decided to prepare a meal, for the girl was kindling a fire, and, with an apron fastened comically around his waist, her stalwart admirer was slapping rashers of bacon into a pan.

"Now ain't that a sweet, domestic picture!" Tex Sanders whispered mockingly.

Limpy silenced him with a gesture, and then, drawing his gun, he made for the cabin doorway.

January 25th, 1936.

The other three followed him, and the crooks were inside the log hut before any of its occupants realised what was happening. Next second Jim Parker found himself covered by Limpy Dawson's six-shooter, and, at the same time, Jeff, Sanders and Conroy charged through to the kitchen with their irons trained on Mary and Montana.

"Forget you're packin' a forty-five, Larkin," Sanders bit out, "or we'll plug yuh like a dog! All right, tie him up, fellers!"

It was useless to resist. Montana was seized and disarmed, and his wrists were bound behind his back with a strip of rawhide cut from a lariat. Then some rope was discovered in a cupboard, and, to make certain of him, Jeff thrust him into a chair and lashed him firmly to it, so that he could move neither hand nor foot.

Parker was now marched into the kitchen by Limpy, and, having been relieved of his gun, the rancher was disposed of in the same manner as Montana. This done, Sanders spoke again.

"What do we do with the girl?" he growled, nodding towards Mary, who was in the grip of Conroy.

"There's a key in the door o' that cupboard," said Jeff. "Lock her in there."

Struggling, protesting furiously, the cattleman's daughter was bundled into the narrow confines of the pantry and the door was fastened upon her, after which the crooks returned to the porch. And it was as they emerged from the cabin that they beheld Happy away at the river's edge, stooping inquisitively over a canoe that was lying high and dry on the bank.

"Come on," Dawson commanded, "we'll go down an' get that hombre!"

The words were hardly uttered when Happy chanced to turn round, and as he saw the four gangsters striding from the shadow of the cabin his jaw fell and his mouth opened wide. Thus for a space he stood dumbfounded, paralysed with fright. Then, living up to his chicken-hearted if likeable disposition, he gave vent to a yell of alarm and took to his heels.

Sanders ripped out a curse and lifted his six-gun, only to have his arm struck down again by Limpy.

"No shootin', you fool!" the latter harked. "Remember what Gil said. Come on, after that guy!"

They gave chase, but Happy had a good start and he ran with the speed of a man in terror of his life, plunging into the heart of trees and undergrowth and disappearing like a jack rabbit going to cover. Nor did Gillespie's hirelings succeed in picking up his trail, though they scoured the locality for nearly half an hour before admitting defeat.

"A clean getaway," Dawson muttered then. "What are we gonna do about it?"

"What can we do?" Conroy retorted. "We've gotta get back to the fork and wait for Gil. That's orders. Ah, don't worry about Happy. If I know him, he won't stop runnin' until he's clear o' the woods. He won't come back here, anyway."

Limpy Dawson looked somewhat dubious, yet there seemed nothing else to do but abandon the hunt and hope for the best, and soon the four outlaws were trudging back to the spot where they had left their horses.

Mounting the broncs, they set out in an easterly direction, bent on keeping their rendezvous with their leader and the rest of the gang.

Informo

RIDING through the tall timber by way of the trail they had chosen to follow, Gil Gillespie and his party had penetrated into the forest for a distance of two or three miles when they suddenly detected the figure of Hank Rodgers in front of them.

He was motionless in the saddle of his pony, and as they came abreast of him he indicated a side-track that was grooved by the ruts of a wagon's wheels.

"Thought I'd wait a spell an' see if you showed up," he said. "Clem Morgan an' his bunch turned off again—right here."

The Gillespie gang swung on to the side-track, and pushed along it for another mile before they drew rein in sight of a barren cliff, which was separated from them by a strip of rough, stony ground devoid of trees.

In the shadow of that cliff they saw the wagon that had been occupied by Ann, Shorty and the Morgans, who had now alighted and were peering into a tunnel that was half screened by shrubbery—a tunnel that was no creation of nature, like the caves at Hell's Gate, but a monument to human industry, for it was bolstered up by wooden beams.

"Clem Morgan's gold location," Gillespie whispered, his eyes glittering.

"This is all right, I'll guarantee—" And then he stopped, for at that instant two strangers hove into view. Mounted on horseback, they were—long, lean fellows who had spurred from a neck of the woods farther to the north—and on perceiving them Gil and his comrades drew well back into the shelter of the trees.

Watching, the crooks saw the strangers ride to within fifty or sixty yards of the Morgans and their friends. Then one of the newcomers gave a hail.

It was answered by Jinglebob, and Gil and his gang heard every word of the conversation that followed.

"Howdy, there," Jinglebob called. "What can we do for you?"

"You can't do nothing for us, pardner," the foremost of the two horsemen replied. "We're forest rangers, and I'd advise you to clear out of this section plenty pronto. There's a big fire broken out, and it's sweepin' along both sides of the river. It spread across the narrows a mile or two west of here, and it's liable to sweep this way."

Hidden among the trees, Gil and his men eyed one another askance. Forest fire! They were well aware of the rapidity with which a conflagration could travel when fanned by a high wind.

"Better pull our freight," Hank Rodgers muttered. "Get clear o' the timber afore we're trapped. We know where that gold is now, an' we can allus come back to it."

Gil and the rest of the outlaws were of the same mind, and lost no time in making themselves scarce. Indeed, they were well on their way when Clem Morgan raised his voice to sing out:

"Hey, we've got some friends in that old cabin up the left fork. Is there any chance of gettin' through to them?"

"I guess so," he was informed. "But don't you worry about that. We're headin' that way ourselves, and we'll warn your friends for you. You beat it for the east."

A moment later the rangers had wheeled, and, leaving Clem and his party to seek the safety of the open country beyond the woods, they themselves galloped off in the direction of the left fork.

They were destined never to reach their objective, for about ten minutes to the floor with a mighty smash, and Ted somehow kept his balance and did not fall on the broken glass. Then the two crooks made a combined attack and Ted retreated. With a cry of fierce exultation Murdock charged forward to finish the agent—a foot shot out from nowhere and the crook went sprawling. Ted had tricked him again.

Franklin jumped on Ted's back, and the youngster staggered.

"Mind out!" yelled the professor, because he saw how close the two fighters were to the glass receptacle that contained enough poison gas to destroy a nation.

But Riley did not hear the warning. He resorted to a wrestler's trick and tossed the wretched Franklin over his head.

A yell of fear came from the professor as Franklin's body crashed down on the glass receptacle. The glass gave with a crack like a pistol-shot.

Franklin staggered away and collapsed on top of the upturned table. A cloud of white smoke shot out of the broken gas container. The battered Murdock was too exhausted and hurt to rise.

"The gas! The gas!" came the warning cry of the professor.

Ted Riley was staring down at the prostrate Franklin and did not realise the deadly peril that beset them. Then the hiss of the escaping gas made him give a cry of horror.

"Run! Run!" yelled the professor. "The house—it's our only chance."

Ted's chief consideration was for the girl and her father. He pushed them to the open door. Murdock and Franklin could fend for themselves.

Franklin stirred as Murdock got painfully to his feet.

"Danny! Danny!" screamed Franklin. "Get me out of here!"

But Murdock's only thought was his own safety, and he lured out of the door. The choking fumes of the gas followed after him. He tripped and fell, and as he dragged himself up some of the gas swirled round him.

A Call for Help

THE professor and Ted half-led, half-carried Ann back to the house.

They rushed to the door and Ted darted to a window. A great cloud of gas was pouring from the laboratory and seemed to be spreading all over the island.

"We've got to plug up all holes," shouted Ted. "Ann, close every window. Professor, help me drag these rugs close to the door."

Very soon the house was enveloped in a fog of poison gas, and they spluttered as it seeped through cracks. At last they were compelled to vacate the living-room and go up the stairs to the professor's bed-room. With blankets and sheets they stuffed up every crack and hole.

"We're caught like rats in a trap," cried Ted. "We'll stifle unless we can do something." He went to a window. "Professor, what's that wire? Is it an aerial?"

"Yes—yes!" The professor spoke painfully, for he had sniffed some of the gas. "I believe he used to send messages. The machine is in the next room."

In a small ante-room Ted found an up-to-date wireless adapted for reception and sending messages. This instrument was powerful enough to send out sound waves that any ship within fifty miles ought to pick up.

Ted had a fair knowledge of wireless, but this set was a type that was new to him, and whilst Ann and her father fought to keep out the gas he endeavoured to find out how to operate it. At last he found the switch that brought the set into action. In Morse he rapped out an S.O.S.

Government Agents have information on many matters and Riley knew that certain ships of the United States Navy patrolled these waters, and he knew their code signal. There came no answer, and he feared the attempt was abortive when suddenly there came a long buzz. Ted spoke into the microphone.

"S.O.S. Diamond Island calling any patrol ship of the United States Navy."

Ted switched off and turned on the loud-speaker; "U.S.S. Washington on coast patrol twenty miles due North of Diamond Island."

"Poison gas over Diamond Island," answered Riley. "The gas has escaped and three of us are imprisoned in the only house. Trying to keep out gas but can't hang out for long. Come to island with all speed. Landing party with gas masks required. Will try and hold out. Ted Riley, Government Agent S143, speaking."

"Changing course," the Washington replied. "Look out for landing party. Making sixteen knots."

Ted went back to their fight against the gas. The island was completely blotted out. The only satisfaction that they had was that Murdock and Franklin would not trouble the world any longer. But life is sweet, and with scarves fastened round their mouths and nostrils they plugged every minute hole. Amazing the way that gas found some tiny aperture.

Ann collapsed, and after water had brought her back to her senses they made her lie on a bed with a quilt round her head. Ted found himself reeling about the room like a drunken man. It seemed hours since their call for help had been answered. The professor sank to the floor in a coma.

Ted shook the old man back to wakefulness.

"Keep going," he cried. "Help will be here any moment now."

A thin trickle of yellow white gas was seeping through a cracked window, and Ted rushed forward to plug the crack with rags and paper.

The gas had a stupifying effect and Ted longed to lie down and sleep—a sleep from which one would never awake. He found himself nodding, and then swayed to his feet to see that the professor was sagged forward in a chair.

A pail of cold water made the professor gasp and sit up. Ted went to look at Ann and did not like the pallor of her cheeks. He shook her and her eyes opened, she smiled at him and would have gone back to sleep if he had let her.

"You must keep awake," he shouted. "That patrol ship must be near the island. You must keep awake."

"I'm going to help you," Ann sat up.

"Walk about for a bit, but don't go near the windows," he advised, and staggered away to plug up another hole.

The room was becoming misty, but the gas was a little lighter than air and had drifted towards the rafters. They found one could breathe a little better by sitting on the floor.

"Tap! Tap! Tap!"

Ted Riley looked round. Where was the sound coming from? "Tap! Tap! Tap!" He glanced at the windows and at one of them there seemed to be a blurred shape. He swayed across the room and his heart gave a leap as he saw a masked face. A closer look revealed an officer of the United States Navy.

"They're here! They're here!" Ted wheezed out. "We're saved!"

Ted tried to pull himself together and think. If he opened the window the gas would pour into the room and they would perish. The ante-room from which they had sent the call for help—would that do? Ted got across the room to the door—the ante-room was full of choking fumes.

The only chance was for three gas masks to be thrown into the room. It must be done so that little of the gas got into the room because it would take a moment or two to fit the masks. Ted went to the window and tapped. The masked officer came closer. Ted touched the window and shook his head and then pointed across the room to the main door. The officer nodded, and Ted held up a hand to stay him.

Ted went across to the door and made a pretence of opening it, then shutting it quickly, and from the floor gathering up objects—he held up three fingers. He went back to the window and the mask nodded.

Innumerable minutes passed before Ted heard footsteps outside and then three sharp raps. He soaked a towel in water, went to the door, fixed the towel round his face and dragged the door open. He heard three objects land on the floor, and he jerked the door shut.

A considerable amount of the gas had come into the room, but not enough to do much harm. He picked up the masks and carried them to the professor and Ann. He fixed their masks and then coughed as a wisp of the gas caught him. Quickly he grabbed up the last mask and slipped it over his face.

Then Riley opened the door of their prison and outside were several of the masked landing party. Ted signalled that he was okay, but that the other two would have to be carried.

The rescue party conducted them through the wall of poison gas—and what joy when they heard the sound of breakers on the beach! Here the gas was much thinner, and Ted noticed that a breeze had sprung up.

Eight hundred yards out it was quite clear and the masks were removed. Ted briefly explained that a gas container had burst and they had been trapped.

"That should be all gone by the morning." The officer pointed to the island.

"The breeze is freshening."

"Better warn all shipping to keep clear of Diamond Island," advised Ted.

"Already done," answered the officer. "By the way, our landing party came upon two terror-stricken scamen swimming in the sea and shouting for help. The first boat put back with them. They told us it was certain death to land on the island, and that everyone must be dead."

"That would be Bruno and Sparky, a pair of cowardly rascals," Ted decided. "I'm glad you've got them, because they'll be able to do some talking if they want to go on living."

The officer lowered his voice. "We came upon the bodies of three men—one had been shot."

"A brave man who perished in the services of his country," Ted explained. "The other two deserved to die."

The professor and Ann felt very little ill-effects from the gas, and twenty-four hours later the Washington landed the three people she had rescued at San Francisco.

Ted was congratulated on his bravery and for ridding America of a public enemy. His chief pointed out that the inquiry would be private and that the professor's name would be kept out of it as much as possible. The professor had been aiding and abetting a criminal, but the old man's reputation was so good that the authorities would accept his story that he did believe that Major Gray was a genuine Government official.

"Just a matter of form," explained the chief. "I understand that the other person concerned in this matter is going to marry one of the most promising of the Government Agents, so there seems nothing more to be said on the matter." He passed over an envelope. "After that gas you need a holiday. There is enough in that envelope for a honeymoon trip, and when you return I can promise you a fat job at head office."

"Thank you very much, chief." Ted Riley shook the outstretched hand. "Guess I'll be on my way. I've got the prisoner waiting for me outside."

"THE ROARING WEST"

later they were breathing air that was tainted with smoke, and ere long they beheld the gleam of flames in front of them—flames that seemed to stretch from east to west as far as the eye could see, like an army of vivid, devilish spectres, surging through the forest, roaring through the underbrush, coiling themselves around the trunks of tall pines, blasting everything in their path.

The rangers pulled up, and one of them spoke grimly.

"Have to turn back, Phil," he said in laconic accents. "We could never hope to get through that lot. Come on. The folks in that cabin on the left fork have probably realised their danger by this time, anyway."

But he was wrong. Pinioned to a couple of chairs in the kitchen of the dwelling in question, Montana Larkin and Jim Parker had no inkling of their desperate peril—nor had Mary, a helpless captive loomed in the cupboard.

True, they had heard their wagon moving off a little while before as the horses had broken into a gallop, but they did not suspect that the animals had fled before an oncoming inferno that was destroying the forest.

It was likewise true that there was smoke in the prisoners' nostrils, but the bacon that Montana had intended to fry for a meal was burning in the cooking-pan, and it was this circumstance that was chiefly responsible for the thick atmosphere in the shack.

The cabin itself was like a hothouse, for the front door was closed and the windows were sealed, and through those windows it was impossible to see the ring of fire that was sweeping around the clearing, so thickly were the panes coated with dirt and grime.

"I wonder if Happy got away from those rats," Jim Parker mused all at once. "If so, there's a chance he might sneak back and cut us loose."

"I doubt it," Montana grunted. "We'd have seen something of him by now. But listen, Parker, I've got an idea we may not need any outside help. Supposin' I could edge close to you. Do you think you might be able to get your hands to these thongs around me?"

It was a suggestion worth trying, and Montana did his best to jerk his chair inch by inch across the floor, a difficult feat considering that he was securely roped to it, and more than once he was almost brought crashing to the boards. But at last he managed to force the chair into such a position that he was sitting back-to-back with Parker, and the older man then contrived to tackle the bonds that fastened the ex-deputy's wrists.

He had to work blindly, his fingers cramped by the cords around his own wrists. Yet he finally succeeded in not only untying Montana's hands, but also in slackening off the rope that held him to the chair, and as the coils of hemp fell from him loosely the big fellow pulled himself to his feet.

Within a few seconds of being set free, Montana had released his employer. Then he unlocked the cupboard door and caught Mary in his arms as she lurched against him weakly.

"Come on," he said, clasping her around the waist, "we're getting out of here!"

He hustled her across the kitchen, and Jim Parker followed them. A moment later they were out on the porch, and it was then and only then that they realised their desperate plight.

Clouds of smoke were swinging across the clearing in grey gusts, driven by the wind. The forest on every hand presented a blazing barrier of fire, impenetrable, spelling doom to any mortal creature who might strive to pierce the inferno. The very grass around the cabin was beginning to burn, so that presently the log dwelling would most likely be alight as well.

To remain in the clearing meant death by suffocation, if not worse, and it was fortunate for Montana and his companions in distress that the big ex-deputy suddenly remembered an object that he had seen on the river bank when they had first entered the glade.

"Down to the water!" he panted. "I noticed a canoe there. Probably been lyin' around for months, but it may still be sound. Quick, it's our only chance!"

They broke into a run, fighting their way through the dense, stifling masses of smoke, and they were going forward as fast as their legs would carry them when they heard a great tree come thundering down behind them. Clean across the glade it fell amidst a shower of sparks, to lie like a dead giant in flames.

They gained the river's edge and the canoe that lay on the bank. It contained two paddles, and as they floated it they saw with relief that its seams were water-tight. Next instant they were seating themselves in the craft, Montana at the bow, Parker at the stern, and Mary huddled between them.

The two men had seized the paddles, and they steered the canoe out into mid-stream, the strong surge of the current bearing it swiftly onward at the same time.

Aided by the powerful flow of the river, Montana and Parker thrust the canoe through the water at express rate, plying the paddles tirelessly and never easing up for a second until they had outstripped the mighty conflagration that was travelling with them. But even as they were congratulating themselves, and considering the possibility of beaching their craft farther downstream whenever they felt that they had a safe start—even as this plan was running through their minds they heard a new and ominous sound that caused them to hesitate.

It was not like the muted sound of the inferno which they were leaving behind them on each bank of the river. It was the sound of tumbling waters, the thunder of a cataract, and all at once Jim Parker gave vent to a hoarse cry.

"The falls!" he shouted. "Devil's Falls! We must be close on them!"

He was right. The air was still thick with smoke that had been driven ahead of the forest conflagration by the wind. Through that smoke, however, the occupants of the canoe suddenly discerned the peril in front of them, where the torrent poured tumultuously over the rim of a forty-foot drop, and where misty vapour rose to mingle with the fumes of the forest fire.

"Turn into the bank!" Montana roared.

It was too late. They were not sufficiently close to either bank to reach it in time, with the terrific urge of the current bearing them onward so relentlessly. A brief, losing battle, and then they were plunging over the falls in their frail craft, to go down into the heart of a mad welter of foam!

the canvas again before the next round is over!"

"Oh, yeah?" Danny's flagging spirit was roused. "Well, however hard he hits me, he can't lick me!"

"All right, tough guy," Pat said, as the bell rang, "get out in front!"

Groggily, but with renewed courage now that he had Pat with him as well as Mike, Danny stepped forward to meet his enemy, evaded a terrific left intended to put him out for good and all, and changed over from defence to attack. But most of his punches were aimed at Delancy's face and chest, and Pat yelled:

"Not there, Danny—below!"

"Don't get excited!" Mike rebuked.

"This isn't a fire," retorted Pat, turning to scowl. "It's a fight!"

Danny had heard, and he obeyed his brother's behest. Guarding his own face and body better than he had done before, he aimed all his blows lower, achieved a solar plexus punch that sent Delancy temporarily against the ropes, and, after a clinch broken by the referee, got in a thump to the heart that sent the champion down on his knees.

That round went distinctly in Danny's favour, and the crowd roared. But Danny was glad of the stool and of his brother's attentions.

"So I was gonna kiss the canvas, eh?" he said, breathing heavily.

"Shut up!" snapped Pat. "Save your breath and listen! He's as open as the hunting season! Play him low down—play the body!" A towel was vigorously applied. "D'you get it? D'you hear me?"

"Yeah," muttered Danny. "I hear you."

"Well, listen, Danny, this is the round! End it this round! See? You can't expect a dame to think you're a hero for ever!"

Danny had closed his eyes, but he opened them very widely at that statement.

"What dame?" he asked blankly.

"Lucille."

"Oh, no, not me!" He shook his aching head. He was not going to be taken in by that sort of talk.

But Pat was in dead earnest, and time was short.

"Look, look, look, Danny," he said urgently. "I've stepped out! D'you get it? D'you understand, or do I have to slug you, too?"

Danny was convinced in spite of himself.

"Oh, Pat—"

The bell went, and he got to his feet.

"Remember what I told you," exhorted Pat. "Down below!"

Danny almost heaved himself forward towards the advancing champion, and there was a strange light in his blood-shot eyes.

"Down below, Danny!" vociferated Mike.

"In the kitchen, Danny!" yelled Pat. "In the kitchen!"

Danny sparred, smote, and received a whack in the ribs that would have sent him reeling in any of the earlier rounds, but in this one it seemed not even to concern him. He parried a right sweep with a swing of his right, and then, with his left, he drove straight at Delancy's solar plexus.

The whole weight of his body was behind that blow, and the thud of it was heard all over the stadium. Joe Delancy went down like a log, and the referee stood over him and began to count.

"One—two—three—four—"

"Come on, Joe!" shouted Doc Mullins. "Come on!"

Delancy rose by easy stages to his knees and then to his feet, and he faced Danny again. But all the fight had been knocked out of him, and two swift jabs between his ribs put him down again—to stay down.

"Oh, Danny!" shrilled Mrs. O'Hara, above all the uproar of the crowd.

The referee counted; the fatal ten was reached without any sign of movement on the part of the defeated champion, and Mike scrambled up into the ring, crying:

"That's my brother! That's my brother!"

"Oh, Danny!" Mrs. O'Hara turned triumphantly to Lucille, who was on her feet like practically everybody else. "Now what do you think of him?"

A policeman tried to prevent her from climbing into the ring.

"You can't go in there!" he rapped.

"Who says I can't?" she defied him. "It'll take more than you to stop me!"

Joe Delancy, inert and unconscious, was being carried away by some first-aid men. Captain Jackson thrust the policeman aside.

"It's all right, Collins," he said; and he helped Mrs. O'Hara up under the ropes and his daughter after her.

"Hallo, ma!" said Danny feebly, but happily, hanging on to Pat. "Hallo, darling!"

The ring became filled with excited people. Danny flung his free arm round Lucille and kissed her, and then a microphone was held in front of his mouth.

"Just a word, please," insisted the wireless commentator who had thus intruded.

Danny nodded happily and spoke.

"Folks," he said, "I want you to meet the champion of the world—my mother!" He beckoned with his gloved hand. "Say something, ma!"

"What'll I say?" asked Mrs. O'Hara, viewing the microphone with disuay.

"Say—say 'Hallo!'" suggested Danny; and he hugged Lucille again while his mother stammered that word into the instrument.

TROUBLE

Having abandoned the care-free life of a cowboy to work, single-handed, a mine that is coveted by a crook, Ken Armstrong's troubles become considerably complicated when he adopts the infant son of a dead friend. An unusual Western, starring Ken Maynard

"HEIR TO TROUBLE"

Ken Plays the Fool

It seemed to most of the startled inhabitants of Sicoma City that Ken Armstrong had gone completely mad.

Out from the Wagon Wheel Saloon he came abruptly with a six-shooter in his hand, and whooping at the top of his voice twice discharged the weapon at the inoffensive sky, then vaulted from the veranda on to the back of his white horse Tarzan and set off down Main Street at a gallop, yelling and firing in a fashion that sent many people scuttling into doorways and others diving headlong into alleys and yards.

"Whoo-oo-ee! Yippi, yippi, yippi, yi! Whoo-oo-ee!" he bellowed, and bang! bang! bang! went his gun.

In Jefferson with three deputies, Augustus Morgan, the middle-aged city marshal, strode forth from his office at the bottom of the street just as the wild rider swung left at the corner into Jefferson Avenue.

The deputies had drawn their guns, but the marshal recognized the flying figure, and though furious at so flagrant a breach of the peace shouted imperiously:

"Don't shoot! Get that maverick alive!"

He and his assistants freed their horses from the hitching-rail outside the office and mounted them, and as the quartet set off in pursuit the roadway of Main Street became filled with excited men and women who hoped their lives were no longer in danger.

In Jefferson Avenue buggies and buckboards were driven hastily out of the way as Ken, still yelling with all the force of his excellent lungs, thrust an empty gun back into its holster and drew another one.

February 29th, 1936.

There were women on the board-walks as well as men, and three of the women were spinsters of uncertain age but undoubted courage, and one was a married as well as a spectacled woman named Mrs. Bumps. These four scorned to seek shelter, and Ken—possibly for their benefit—loosed his feet from the stirrups in full career and heaved himself upright upon Tarzan's saddle.

It would have been quite a spectacular trick in any circus, and many who witnessed it held their breath in grudging admiration while it was accomplished. But one of the spinsters, a tall and shrewish-looking dame in a white coat and a helmet-like hat that accentuated her sharp features, cried scornfully:

"Of all the fools!"

Mad or sane, Ken Armstrong was a wonderful horseman. Bracing himself upon the saddle of his careering mount, and still shouting lustily, he whipped off his big white cow-hat and waved it with his left hand while he shot holes in the atmosphere with the gun in his right.

The city marshal and his deputies appeared round the corner, and another of the spinsters—an ugly little woman in a spotted frock whose front name was Amanda and who had never been able to change her surname from Witherspoon, cried out:

"I hope they catch that lunatic before he kills somebody!"

"Who is he?" inquired Mrs. Bumps.

"Why," replied Amanda Witherspoon with a sniff, "it's that Ken Armstrong!"

"And he's gone plum crazy," declared the tall and shrewish-looking spinster, whose name was Tillie Tilks.

Half-way down Jefferson Avenue the frame-buildings of commerce gave place to houses and shacks set in their own gardens, the roadway became exceedingly dusty, and there was no audience for the disturber of the peace. Just beyond the spinsters, therefore, Ken used a booted foot to cause his intelligent mount to turn about.

Tarzan turned readily enough, but at the pace he was going his foothold was none too sure. Ever so slightly he stumbled, but the stumble was enough to dislodge his yelling master from a very precarious perch. Ken descended into the dust on all fours, and the marshal and his deputies shot past him as he was scrambling to his feet.

Hurriedly the representatives of law and order turned their steeds and dismounted to grab him. But Ken evaded them with astonishing agility, put away his smoking gun, and reached with a bound the porch of the Sicoma Hotel, a long and rambling building of wood. There he seized upon a form intended for the use of weary patrons and raised it above his head.

Augustus Morgan and his three deputies were advancing in line to take him prisoner, and too late they realised his intention. The form was hurled broadside at them and they hit the dust together.

Augustus Morgan, despite his years and weight, was active enough when he liked. He was on his feet while the other three were no more than on their knees, two of them holding aching heads. But Ken had not wasted even a fraction of a second. Above the porch was a balcony, and the balcony was supported by posts. He swarmed up one of the posts like a monkey, and from the balcony he whooped defiance.

"There he goes, boys!" shouted the marshal.

"Look out, boys!" jeered Ken, and from the balcony he proceeded to hoist himself on to the flat roof of the hotel with the aid of another post.

"Get up there, boys!" vociferated the marshal. "Head him off!"

The more agile of the deputies endeavoured to climb, but one of them flew after the marshal into the hotel and up a flight of stairs to a ladder that led to a skylight; and these two reached the roof before the climbers and were cheered by the crowd in the street below.

Ken, however, had not waited for their coming. Racing across the flat roof he had come to a yawning chasm where a yard divided the hotel from the office of the Wells Fargo Express Company, and there a mighty jump landed him on the other roof, which was at a lower level.

The marshal reached the chasm, liked the look of it not at all, and retreated to the skylight, shouting:

"Come with me, boys! We'll have him!"

He and the deputy with him descended the ladder and the stairs; the other two, who had got no farther than the balcony, clambered in at an open window and also reached the stairs.

Once more in the street, Morgan belated to Ken to come down and give himself up, not because he expected to be obeyed, but to engage the attention of the troublesome one while his men invaded the Wells Fargo office and a store that adjoined it.

Ken whooped and waved defiance, but he started running across the roofs of single-story buildings the moment the deputies rose up out of skylights in his vicinity.

"Looks like they're going to catch him!" exclaimed Tillie Tilks, craning her neck to watch the chase.

"Yes," said Amanda Witherspoon, "if he don't break his fool neck first!"

Ken seemed to have no regard whatever for his neck. He turned to fire his last shot over the heads of his pursuers, then flew across more roofs, most of them joined to one another.

He came to one a couple of feet higher than the rest—the roof of premises belonging to a maker of saddles and harness—and there he looked down.

Outside the shop-window stood a dappled grey horse, complete with saddle and bridle. Actually it was a wooden horse, used by the maker of saddles and harness to advertise his business, and its hoofs were attached to a board; but from up above it looked very much like a real animal—especially to a disturber of the peace who was more or less at bay.

Ken put a hand on the coping of the higher roof, stepped down on to the covering of a porch—and jumped. He landed with a thud on the back of the wooden steed, and instantly realised the mistake he had made.

Derisive laughter on the part of some of the onlookers did not annoy him in the least. He put away his gun, waved his cow-hat above his sleek black hair, and whooped joyously. But the marshal ran to capture him, and in the same moment a buggy passed the saddle-maker's, headed out of town.

Almost automatically Ken reached for a lariat, and found one where a lariat should be. The rope sang through the air, the noose descended over the back of the seat of the buggy and was drawn taut, and the wooden horse and its rider were dragged along the roadway in the wake of the vehicle by two astonished horses which were very much alive.

"Hi, that's horse stealing!" shouted the baffled marshal indignantly. "You can't do that!"

"Whoo-oo-ee! Yippi, yippi, yi! Whoo-oo-ee!"

Ken, thoroughly enjoying himself, although the progress of his steed did not make for comfort, tugged at a useless bridle and flourished his hat.

In haste the deputies descended from on high, reaching the street through various tradesmen's premises; and they had just rejoined the marshal when the driver of the runaway buggy slashed with the blade of a clasp-knife at the rope attached to the back of his seat.

The rope was severed, the wooden horse swayed violently and toppled over on its side, and Ken's capture seemed certain to those who watched. But Ken was on his feet even as the wooden horse fell, and as he looked rather desperately about him, his own white horse came flying up.

Ken's left foot was in a stirrup before Tarzan could stop, and then Tarzan knew quite well that there was no need for him to stop.

At his leisure, as it seemed, Ken swung himself up into the saddle while the white horse increased his speed—a feat of horsemanship which compelled the admiration of less capable cowboys in the crowd.

"On your horses, men!" roared Augustus Morgan. "We'll round him up!"

Actually it was a wooden horse, but from up above it looked very much like a real animal—especially to a disturber of the peace who was more or less at bay.

—And Wins a Bet!

OUTSIDE the Sicoma Hotel marshal and deputies remounted; but several minutes elapsed before they were in full career, and by that time Ken had passed the last of the houses and shacks in Jefferson Avenue and was pelting along in the general direction of the little mining town of Blue Rock, with sand and scrub on either side of him.

He came to the mouth of a lane that branched away to the left from the coach-road, and there he stayed Tarzan's wild course and looked back.

The marshal and his men were a quarter of a mile away but riding furiously, and straggling behind them were nearly twenty of the male inhabitants of Sicoma City.

"All right, Tarzan," said Ken, "let's show 'em the old thread-the-needle chase."

He turned into the lane, a winding one which led up into the hills, and the scrub was left behind and trees and boulders of rock lined the way. Clouds of dust rose up from Tarzan's hoofs, but he took a steep rise without any slackening and emerged from the lane on to a great rocky butte above Blue River.

On that height the wind was strong. It caught at the wide brim of Ken's cow-hat and sent it sailing from his head, but he did not stop to retrieve the hat. Straight across the flat he rode, and became visible to those who were after him.

"There he goes!" shouted the marshal. "After him! Fan out, men!"

The united forces spread out across the butte so that if Ken turned he must be captured, whereas if he held straight on he must come to a sheer precipice of limestone at the bottom of which the river made almost a U-shaped turn.

The marshal, with two of his deputies, waited at the end of the lane to cut off the last possibility of escape, should Ken manage to elude the others. Time passed, and he saw nothing of the fugitive.

"They must be herdin' him to the edge of the cliff," he rejoiced. "He'll have to give up now!"

Ken had indeed ridden right to the edge of the rock that overhung the river and there had slid from the saddle. But he had no intention of giving himself up. He looked down at the water, a sheer forty feet below, turned his head to whoop mockingly at those who were closing in on him, then jumped into space.

There was a mighty splash as the water engulfed him, but the surface was smooth again by the time his would-be captors dismounted on the cliff-edge to peer down at the spot where he had disappeared.

"He's got more nerve than I have," growled one of the deputies, a man named Link. "Well, that's the end of him! Come on!"

Once more in the saddle, the whole party rode at leisure back to the lane, and Augustus Morgan saw as they approached that they had no prisoner, and was mortified.

"Well, Link, what happened?" he demanded gruffly.

"The darned fool jumped off into the river," replied the deputy. "Must have killed himself!"

The marshal rubbed his chin.

"Let's go down below the gorge," he said. "Maybe we can find his body."

Off they rode, all of them, down from the butte on its eastern side towards a grassy region where the banks of the river were low and sloping beyond the rocks. Their way lay through a steep and narrow pass, and for half a mile or more the river was hidden from them.

Ken had been hidden from most of them, too, but not because he was drowned. On the contrary he came up from a lengthy dive close under the precipitous wall of rock and he swam so close to the rock that he could have touched it had he wished.

The current was strong, but it suited his purpose to swim with it for a while ere he turned over on to his back and floated more or less at ease. With water no longer in his mouth he whistled several times in a shrill and curious fashion.

Tarzan heard, pricked up his ears, and set off along the cliff with an answering neigh. Not for him the narrow pass filled with horsemen who were his master's enemies; there was a way along the ridge which no rider would dare to take, since the foothold was insecure, but it seemed quite a good enough way to a horse whose master needed him.

At a considerable pace, yet with all due caution, Tarzan negotiated the edge of the cliff in its downward sweep, sometimes sliding on his hanches, and he reached the grassy bank while the riders were still in the pass.

Ken shouted encouragement from the water.

"Hold on, boy! Hold on! Oh, good boy! That's the way of it! Wait a minute! Hold it, boy!"

Tarzan sought a place on the sloping bank that was free of reeds and bushes and stood there, swinging his tail. Ken ceased to float and struck out manfully, though with tired arms. He reached the bank, stood breast-deep in water for a while, gulping air into his lungs, then crawled up the bank and reached the horse.

Water streamed from his wet clothes as he hoisted himself into the saddle, but he shook his shoulders as a dog might do and cried:

"They figured on out-smarting us, but two can play at that game! On your way, old fellow!"

Tarzan shot off across the grass, reached a beaten trail, and became headed south-east. The marshal and his posse emerged from the pass into the open to see the young man they had thought dead speeding towards a road more than half a mile away. There was no mistaking the white horse.

"Well, I'll be danged!" exploded Augustus Morgan. "He's headin' for the Bar-X ranch! We'll pick him up there! Giddap!"

The Bar-X ranch was an extensive one and Ken was already on the fringe of it, but the ranch-house and the bunk-houses were a good three miles away—and five from the boundaries of Sicoma City. Ken knew every inch of the rolling pastureland, for he had been foreman of its owner's outfit before he had deserted cattle-raising to dig for gold.

He reached the road and flew along it, and as the corals and the outbuildings loomed up in the distance he stooped to unfasten the girth of the saddle upon which he sat. A supreme horseman he kept his seat without the slightest difficulty while he performed this operation, and Tarzan took a five-barred gate in his stride so perfectly that Ken did not even lurch.

Straight towards a muck-pond the white horse was guided, and Ken descended neatly with saddle and bridle in his hands just before the hurdles that fenced in the muck-pond were reached.

Tarzan, free of all trappings, went over the nearest hurdle as though it were a stick of wood and arched his noble head.

"The mud, Tarzan," directed Ken. "Roll in it, boy!"

Down went the white horse in the oozy mud around the pool, and kicked up his hoofs. His white coat became a dirty brown one, and he was busy deepening the colour when Ken walked on past the pond to the yard where the bunk-houses were situated.

He clicked the latch of a door and burst in upon five cowpunchers who were his friends.

"Here I am!" he proclaimed triumphantly.

The ride from the river had dried his clothes to some extent, but he still showed traces of his immersion. The five clustered round him, and a lean-faced fellow who looked as though he ought to have been a comedian instead of a rider of the range inquired:

"Did you get away with it, Ken?"

"Reckon I did, Hank," chuckled the fugitive.

A score of men on horseback streamed into the farmyard, after one of their number had opened the five-barred gate, and they looked in all directions for the white horse and its rider.

"He's given us the slip again, marshal," complained Link.

Tarzan whinnied, deliberately drawing attention to himself, but he was no longer a white horse and they ignored him.

"Ain't no sign of his hoss around," remarked another deputy.

"No," said Augustus Morgan savagely, "but he headed this way, and I'm gonna take a look in the bunkhouse all the same."

The door of the bunkhouse in which Ken was sheltering had been closed in haste, but Hank was at a window. He saw the marshal and several other men striding into the yard, and he cried warningly:

"Looks like the old mossback's comin' in!"

Ken ran with the others to the window, but deserted it immediately to fling himself at full length upon a bunk.

"He is coming here," he said, "and it's up to you hombres to keep me hid."

He whisked a blanket from a bunk over his head and covered himself with it.

"Strike up some music, some of you," he urged, "and the rest act natural—you know, kinda dumb like."

Hank Carter was not a musician, but several of his companions fancied themselves both as players and as songsters. A guitar, a fiddle, and a banjo were grabbed, and their owners dumped themselves on the edge of the bunk where Ken lay concealed and began to render with zest a lively dance tune.

The door flew back and Augustus Morgan stamped in over the threshold with three of his men.

"Where's Ken Armstrong?" he shouted.

The music ceased, and Ken raised an edge of the blanket to peep round the broad back of the cowpuncher who was holding the fiddle.

"Ain't seen him," lied a little fellow in a bequeered shirt.

The marshal pointed a finger at Hank.

"I'm askin' you!" he rasped.

"Where's Ken?"

"Why, marshal," returned Hank, as though in surprise, "don't you know?"

"If I did," was the explosive rejoinder, "I'd have him in the lock-up, dad-burn his ornery hide!"

The musicians resumed their playing, but with less volume.

"Why, what's he done?" inquired Hank. "Committed murder or something?"

"He's disrupted the peace and quiet of Sicoma City," roared the marshal,

"and he's due for thirty days in the lock-up and fifty bucks fine the minute I set eyes on him!"

"Say, that's a mighty serious charge," said Hank, "but tell me, you being nothin' but the city marshal, how come you be chasin' a man outside the jurisdiction of your office?"

A very shrewd question and one that flustered Augustus Morgan.

"Well," he stammered, "well—er—the hombre got me so all-fired upset, I—I didn't think— Aw, come on, boys!"

The musicians abandoned the dance tune to make a rude noise with their instruments as the discomfited marshal and his underlings retreated to the door, and that insult was not to be borne in silence.

"Just the same," snapped the marshal, "I'm gonna keep my eye on that maverick, and the first time he sets foot in Sicoma City into the jug he goes, and that's that!"

He went out, slamming the door behind him upon ironic laughter. Ken sat up and throw off the blanket, thrust his long legs between two of the friends who had hidden him, wriggled past them on to the floor, and perched on a table.

"Fooled 'em that time, boys, didn't we?" said he.

"Sure did," agreed Ted Hawkins, more commonly known as "Spurs," who was one of the bright sparks of the Bar-X outfit; and he put away his banjo to fish ten rather grubby dollar-notes from his hip-pocket. "Well, here you are, Ken! You win the bet, but it was sure worth it to see how burnt up that marshal was!"

"Thanks, Spurs." Ken put away the notes. "It was a lot of fun playing bad man, to say nothing of gettin' a ten-spot for doing it."

Hank Carter perched on the table beside him.

"Yeah, but you heard what the marshal said, Ken," he commented. "He'll pick you up the minute you hit town again—and you're due to see Jane this afternoon before she leaves."

"Oh, oh!" exclaimed Spurs. "That more'n repays me for losing the ten!"

Ken clapped a hand on his shoulder. "Say, listen, Spurs," he said. "I want to make another bet with you—only this time I want odds."

"All right," said the loser, readily enough, "what's your proposition?"

"I'll bet you another ten that I'll say good-bye to Jane, and the marshal won't get me, either. That is, providin' you go outside and clean the mud off of Tarzan for me."

"Where'd he get the mud from?"

"Oh, rollin' around the muck-pond."

"Aw, now wait a minute—that's a job!"

"That's part of the odds," Ken informed him with a broad grin.

The others waited expectantly, for Spurs dearly loved a gamble.

"Well, all right, pardner," he said, after a very brief interval. "You're on!"

He went off straightway to perform the task imposed as part of the bet, and Ken was delighted.

"When he gets through cleaning that mud off Tarzan," he said, "I can tell you right now I won't get any more bets out of him!"

Disturbing News

JANE, the girl to whom Hank had referred, was Jane Parker, the brown-haired daughter of Ephraim Parker—and Ken's fiancée. Her home was a very pleasant ranch-house on the western outskirts of Sicoma City, but she was leaving home that afternoon with her father and mother for the junction on the Union Pacific line, whence she was to travel by train to Laramie.

She had an aunt in that important city, but the object of the trip was not so much to visit the aunt as to buy clothes for her forthcoming wedding.

She was in the sitting-room of the ranch-house, waiting for Ken, when her mother appeared with a capacious leather bag in one hand and a sheet of paper in the other. Jane looked round from a musical-box she had set in motion.

"Here's your bag, Jane dear," said Mrs. Parker, "and here's a list of things for your trousseau. Perhaps we'd better check them over again."

The bag was deposited on the floor, and Jane looked over her mother's shoulder at the sheet of paper. She was not very tall herself, but Mrs. Parker was almost tiny.

"Are you sure you have everything down?" asked Jane. "White kid shoes, three white petticoats—"

A resounding knock at the front door caused her to break off abruptly, and her mother said slyly:

"Now I wonder who that could be?"

It was Ken, of course. He had ridden right through Sicoma City, even past the marshal's office in Main Street; but no one had expected him to do anything so daring so soon after his morning's escapade, and Tarzan flashed through the thoroughfare at such a speed that hardly anyone recognised the young man in his smart white coat.

Mrs. Parker admitted him and pointed smilingly to the sitting-room; Jane awaited him eagerly enough, but pouted as he swept over to her and took her in his arms.

"You know you're late?" she said severely.

"I know I am," said Ken, kissing her, "but— Oh, Mrs. Parker, I didn't know you were in the room!"

Mrs. Parker had laughed in the doorway.

"I was beginning to wonder if you'd get here before Jane left," said she.

"Why, a whole herd of stampedin' horses couldn't have kept me away," Ken declared.

"Well, I'll leave you two alone to say good-bye. Father will be here any minute with the buggy—he had to go into town."

"That's fine!"

Mrs. Parker went out, and Ken was kissing Jane again when the musical-box stopped. He rewound it and substituted a fresh disc for the one that had been played.

"Gee," he said, "you know, Jane, I—I— Say, you won't be gone long, will you, honey?"

"No, dear," she assured him. "I'll hurry with the shopping. I'm as anxious to be back as you are to have me—more so, perhaps, judging by how late you are!"

He was not at all keen to discuss that matter.

"Jane," he said, "just think of it! Two more weeks and we'll be married!"

A buggy had come to a standstill outside the garden gate, and Ephraim Parker, an elderly and grey-haired man in a dark lounge suit, had walked up the garden path to the porch. He opened the front door and crossed a little hallway.

"Jane!" he called out. "Mother! We've got to hurry!"

He entered the sitting-room to find his daughter in her lover's arms.

"Hallo, Ken," he said, "glad to see you! Come on, Jane—get your duds on!"

Jane scurried off to put on a hat and a little jacket, and Mr. Parker shouted for his wife, who appeared quite promptly in a bonnet that made her look even smaller than ever. The rancher went to pick up the bag, but Ken said that he would take that. Jane returned, and the precious shopping list was thrust into her hand.

"Wait a minute, there," snapped Ken. "I'm not in the hold-up business, and I'm not in the habit of bluffing."

"Come on, mother," said Mr. Parker, and he and his wife went out to the buggy.

But Ken lingered. It was one thing to ride through the town; it was quite another thing to go to a railway station and stand on a platform where he might be caught.

"Let's say good-bye here, honey," he said with some emotion. "I can't bear to think of goin' to that depot and seein' you leave on that train all alone."

Saying good-bye seemed to take quite a while, and Mr. Parker, who had helped his wife on to the driving-seat of the buggy, followed her and picked up the reins, became impatient.

"What's keeping that girl?" he growled.

"Oh, leave them alone, father," said Mrs. Parker. "You were young and romantic yourself once."

Mr. Parker was no longer young, or romantic, and he knew that trains would not wait for those who were. He shouted his daughter's name.

"I have to hurry, Ken," said Jane; and Ken picked up the bag and went with her from the house.

The bag was stowed under the back seat of the buggy and Jane took her place on the seat and leaned down to kiss her lover. Mr. Parker stared.

"Ain't you comin' along, Ken?" he asked in surprise.

"I don't think I will, Mr. Parker," that young man replied. "I couldn't bear—"

"Oh, that's all right, father," Jane interposed. "I understand."

"Oh!" Mr. Parker did not understand, but he remembered something. He fished an envelope from his coat pocket. "Here's a letter for you," he said. "I picked it up at the post office."

"Thanks," murmured Ken. "Good-bye, honey! Hurry back, won't you?"

A whip cracked, and the horses attached to the buggy went off at a snail pace down the leafy lane that led to Sicoma and the junction. Ken and Jane waved to each other till the trees intervened, and then Ken walked over to a rail fence and squatted on it to tear open the envelope of the letter and read what it contained.

Tarzan, who had been waiting patiently for his master near the entrance to the yard of the ranch-house, looked round and saw that he was holding the letter in his hands and staring into the distance with a most unhappy expression on his fine, clean-shaven face. He ambled over and knocked his nose in mute sympathy against the fence.

"Tarzan," said Ken with a heavy sigh, "we've lost an old pal."

He put the letter back in its envelope and thrust it into a pocket. Then slowly he got to his feet and mounted the white horse.

It was no part of the bet he had made with Spurs that he should ride back through Sicoma City, but he had his own ideas of fair-play, and through Sicoma City he stroaked—and was seen only by a few frequenters of the Wagon Wheel Saloon who were half-asleep on its veranda.

Straight along the road that led to Blue Rock he galloped for several miles, then turned into a well-worn trail that provided the easiest and nearest way to the Bar-X ranch.

The boys who had shielded him from the marshal in the morning were back in the bunkhouse for their afternoon rest, and as he opened the door the air was thick with tobacco smoke and they were singing lustily:

February 29th, 1936.

"Skies were clear, October twenty-third; Skies were clear when we were riding herd

With a ki, yi, yippy yippy yi—"

Instruments and voices alike were stilled as he entered.

"Hallo, Ken!" chorused his friends.

"Hallo," said Ken, biting his lip; and they became aware that he was troubled about something.

"What's the matter?" inquired Hank Carter. "Didn't you see her?"

"I saw her," said Ken, and he took off his ceremonial white jacket and tossed it up on to a bunk. "She won't be away long."

"Well, don't look so downhearted at losin' the bet," jeered Spurs. "After all, it was really my ten spot—and it was worth all of that to clean up Tarzan."

"I saw Jane all right," returned Ken with gloom, "but I got a letter containin' some bad news."

He reached up to the jacket for the envelope, and he extracted the letter.

"Boys," he said solemnly, "most of you remember Jack Swift, don't you?"

"Sure," responded several voices.

"We remember Jack Swift all right."

"Well, ho's come to the end of the trail. I gotta letter here from his lawyers. I'll read it to you."

He opened out the letter, and they gathered round him.

"Here's what it says," he announced, and proceeded to read:

"Dear Sir,—Mister Jack Swift, deceased, has instructed us to send his son to you, subject to certain terms and conditions set forth in his will. The young man will arrive in Sicoma City by train the evening of the 20th, at 9.20. We are sending the above-mentioned terms and conditions to our legal representative in your city immediately. He is Mister Uriah Potts, attorney-at-law. Yours truly, Bird & Walsh."

A little silence followed the very slow reading of this epistle; then Hank Carter stepped nearer.

"What're you gonna do when he gets here?" he inquired. "Keep on with your mine, or come back here as foreman?"

"Keep on with the mine," Ken replied without the slightest hesitation. "I need a future now more than ever."

"Mining," commented Spurs, "is a pretty tough job for one man. I'm mighty glad you're gettin' somebody who can help you."

"That's right, Spurs," agreed Ken, and put away the letter. "I'm goin' over there in the morning. I gotta tidy up the place a bit before this boy arrives."

"You've only got two or three days," said Spurs. "Want me to meet him, just so's you won't get mixed up with that city marshal?"

Ken considered the point, but shook his head.

"Thanks, Spurs," he said, "but it wouldn't look right. I'll manage to meet him somehow."

Johnny Watts, a tousle-headed little fellow in a chequered shirt, but a thoroughly good cow-hand, jumped up from a bunk.

"Me and old Jack," he boomed, "uster play and sing half the night through when we was ridin' the range together. He sure was fond of music!"

"You're right, Johnny," said Ken, "and I guess he'd like that kind of a farewell, too." He turned to Mike Andrews, who was nursing a guitar on his knees. "Can I have that old box, partner?"

"You bet you can!" The guitar was handed over. "What're you gonna play, Ken?"

Ken twanged the strings and reflected, "Let's play that old favourite of his," he suggested, "the 'Cowboy's Lament'—shall we?"

Everybody approved, and so everybody sang—as a sort of requiem to a dead friend—that mournful ditty:

"I come out of Austin's fair city— Austin's fair city—'twas early one day.

I spied a young cowboy—a handsome young cowboy, All dressed in white linen, and cold as lay.

We gathered around him; we cried aloud o'er him,

While he told us a story

Of a cowman's sad fate.

He warned us, quite gently, to leave off a-roving—

To leave off a-roving

Before it's too late."

Not a very suitable requiem, perhaps, for a cowpuncher who had deserted the range to marry a girl in a distant town and settle down as a tradesman; but Jack Swift himself would have appreciated it, and there were tears in the eyes of all the mourners before they had finished.

An Offer Refused

THE Union Pacific Railroad prides itself on keeping to scheduled times, despite the vast distances those trains cover, and it was only a few minutes after 9.20 in the evening of the 20th of May that the express from Chicago drew in beside the long, low platform of the junction.

Quite close to the track, beyond the tail-end of the platform, a horse-wagon had been waiting for some time, for the train carried several box-trucks as well as passenger coaches, and in one of the box-trucks there were goods for Sicoma City.

Augustus Morgan leaned against the side of the wagon while Jack Green, the local carrier, conveyed crates and boxes from the train to his vehicle.

"If we could always have shipments like this," quoth the carrier, resting awhile between his labours, "Sicoma City would soon be a mighty important railroad centre."

"You betcha," assented the marshal, puffing at his pipe. "I figured my presence was necessary—don't want any hold-ups!"

"No, sir!" Jake Green, who was none too young and had a limit to his powers of endurance, viewed with some dismay a huge packing-case which the baggage attendant had heaved towards the open double doors of the box-truck. "Guess I'll have to have a little help, marshal!"

The marshal moved slowly to his assistance, the station-master sped along the platform to urge them to be careful—and Ken looked out from the door of the booking-office. He had reached the junction safely on Tarzan, leading a brown horse for the accommodation of Jack Swift's son, but he had waited till the last minute to venture on to the platform.

A conductor who had stepped down from one of the passenger coaches turned to speak to someone still in his corridor.

"Stay there," he said. "I'll see if I can find him."

He looked up and down the platform, and he caught sight of Ken.

"Hi, there!" he shouted. "Your name happen to be Ken Armstrong?"

"Why, yes," Ken replied, and ran forward.

"There's someone inside expecting you."

"Yeah, I know."

"Wait here!" The conductor climbed the steps of the coach. "Here you are," he said, jerking a thumb. "That's the party you're looking for."

To Ken's surprise, a very homely looking woman in bonnet and shawl emerged from the corridor and looked down at him from the steps. She had a baby in her arms.

"Would you be Mr. Ken Armstrong?" she inquired with a brogue that proclaimed her to be an Irish woman.

"Why—why—er—yes, ma'am, I am," stammered Ken.

"Well, here you be, then!"

The baby was thrust upon him, and he had no option but to take it in his arms, gazing at the woman as he did so.

"The poor little spalpeen," she said as the infant began to whimper, and Ken managed to find his tongue.

"But—but— Why, I—I was expectin' a—a young man."

"Sure, and this is a young man," he was informed. "He's after being Mister Dick Swift himself, the wee lamb. Now, you stay there, and I'll go and get his clothes and things."

She vanished before he could stop her, and he was waiting there, with the baby in his arms when the stationmaster happened to look round, and saw him.

"Marshal," he exclaimed, "there's Ken Armstrong down the other end of the platform!"

Augustus Morgan had just helped to transfer the heavy packing-case to the wagon. One glance was enough for him and he set off along the platform, bellowing:

"Hi, there, Ken, I wanta talk to you! Wait a minute! Wait!"

But Ken did not wait for anybody or anything. At the sound of that voice and the sight of its owner he turned and fled with the baby, reached the booking-office, and dived through it.

"Come back here!" howled the marshal, hotly pursuing. "Come back here, Ken!"

The Irishwoman scrambled down from the coach with a bundle of clothing in her hand.

"Here's the baby's clothes!" she cried.

But Ken tore out from the station, managed to mount Tarzan without dropping the baby, and rode off into the night, leaving the brown horse—which belonged to Hank—to follow at its leisure.

He spent that night in his own shack, up in the hills, a few miles from the Bar-X ranch, and the baby slept peacefully in his bed while he rigged up a number of gadgets for its benefit and constructed a cradle mainly out of a barrel which he split in two.

At the back of the shack there stretched a broad expanse of grass and woodland, but in front of it there was a sandy space out of which a hill of brush-strewn rocks rose abruptly. At the foot of the rocks there was an opening, shored up with timber, where a ladder led down into the mine he had acquired a year or so before.

It was a drift mine—a natural passage in the earth and rock—and his holding was not a large one; but already he had dug and blasted a considerable quantity of gold-bearing quartz from it, and was convinced that sooner or later he would strike a really rich lode.

He was not the only one of that opinion. Next morning, an hour or so after sunrise, three men rode up from the valley and dismounted within a hundred yards of the shack. One of them was John Motley, a tall man and rather a handsome one, who was quite a prominent member of the community in Sicoma City, and with him was a shorter and more heavily built man of forty, a mining engineer named Bill Dwyer.

The third man, Ike Davis, was merely one of Motley's workers.

Bill Dwyer led the way to the shored-up opening in the rocks, pointing as he did so.

"That's Ken's drift mine, Mr. Motley," he said. "It's a one-horse digging, but liable to cause us plenty of trouble."

John Motley looked back over his shoulder.

"Take care of the horses, Ike," he directed, and the henchman was thus condemned to remain out of earshot while his employer and the engineer entered the mine and looked down the shaft.

"Has he a clear title to this claim?" asked Motley, twisting the ends of his moustacho and speaking in rather a contemptuous manner.

"Yes," Dwyer replied.

"Well, offer him a thousand dollars—that'll fetch him."

Dwyer laughed mirthlessly.

"I've already offered him ten thousand," he said, "and he's turned that down."

"Ten thousand?" Motley backed out from the opening with a scornful gesture. "Say, you let me handle it! I'll bring him around!"

"Yes," said the engineer, "but our tunnels are up to his claim now!"

He walked out into the morning sunlight, and he picked up a stick.

"Here," he said, "I'll show you." With the stick he drew lines in the sand. "Our south tunnel is here. Ken's boundary line is here. Then we skip his claim and start our other tunnel."

John Motley pursed his lips and studied the rough plan. Ken's mine, it was all too apparent, was in the way.

"Oh, I see," he said. "Well, you keep on working—and right through his property, too. Understand?"

"But, sir," protested the engineer, "there's a law against—"

"I know," interrupted Motley in the smoothest of voices. "You're a good mining man, but a poor politician. You stick to mining, Bill, and I'll handle the law."

Dwyer was inclined

"Well, Tarzan," said Ken, "just one more rehearsal now, because I've got to go to the mine."

to argue, but at that moment Ike called out:

"Here comes Ken Armstrong now, boss!"

Ken had walked out from the shack to a barrow in front of it containing quartz. He had a hammer in his hand, and he was taking a piece of quartz from the barrow when John Motley stepped over to him. Dwyer threw down the stick and followed:

"Hallo, Ken," said Motley, "we were just talkin' about you."

"That so?" Ken did not seem to be particularly interested.

"Yeah. You know, ten thousand dollars is a lot of money—a lot more than that hole in the ground is worth."

"I'm not selling, Motley," returned Ken quietly. "That mine assays a fortune—enough to keep me in comfort for the rest of my life, and I've got no intention of passing it up."

"You're tryin' to run a hold-up on me," accused Motley.

"Wait a minute, there," snapped Ken. "I'm not in the hold-up business, and I'm not in the habit of bluffing. I don't intend to be bulldozed into sellin' my mine for one cent on the dollar either!"

Motley was furious, but controlled his fury.

"Come on," he said curtly to Dwyer, "we've wasted too much time already."

He and the engineer went back to their horses, and Ike Davis rode behind them as they cantered away.

"I want you to rush them tunnels," Motley said, "and pay no attention to boundary lines. I'll show that cowpoke he can't put anything over on honest John Motley. Understand?"

"Yes," growled Dwyer.

A Woman's Help

KEN tipped the quartz out of the barrow, threw some tools into it, and trundled the barrow over to the mine. He descended the ladder in the shaft, and for a couple of hours was busy in the depths, toiling in the light of a lantern.

By that time he was hungry, and decided that the baby was probably awake and hungry, too. He deserted the mine, entered the shack and picked up a bucket, and went out at the back door to a white goat who had recently had a kid.

"Easy there—easy there, girl!" he said as he knelt to milk the goat, pushing the kid aside. "I'm sorry, young fellow, but from now on you're goin' to have to share your meals with my new partner."

Milk strained into the bucket and the kid tried to drink it, but received a smack.

"Hi, hi, hi—get out of there, little 'un!" commanded Ken. "That's not for you!"

Voices hailed him, and round the shack rode Hank Carter and Spurs Hawkins, to dismount beside him.

"Just thought we'd bust over and welcome the tenderfoot to the west," announced Hank.

Ken tried to hide the embarrassment he felt.

"That's mighty nice of you, boys," he said. "But couldn't you make it later—when he gets used to our ways, kinda like?"

Hank was quite definite on the point. "No," he said, "wouldn't be neighbourly."

Ken picked up the bucket and stood looking across the landscape, biting his lip.

"Well, where is he, Ken?" demanded Spurs. "Down workin' in the mine?"

The landscape was beautiful in the sunlight, but it was not in any way helpful. Ken sighed and nerved himself for the worst.

"Well, well," he said slowly, "you may as well know now as some other time. Come on!"

He led the way into the one big room of the shack, with its bare floor and its scanty furniture, and while the others stared about them went over to a bed in a corner on tiptoe.

"S-s-sh!" he warned, and pointed.

"There he is!"

The two cowpunchers gazed down, wide-eyed, at a chubby little six-months-old baby, still fast asleep.

"Gee!" gasped Hank.

"Gosh!" breathed Spurs.

"Cute, ain't he?" whispered Ken.

"Yeah," nodded Hank.

Silently the three stole away from the bed to the front door, and Ken was quite relieved to have shared his shock.

"Say," he confided, "I'm figurin' on you boys helpin' me out."

"Eh?" Hanks looked startled.

"How?"

"Why, listen, I gotta have a whole outfit for him—clothes, nursin' bottles—everything. The marshal saw me at the depot, and I had to beat it before I could get 'em from the nurse. I'm dependin' on you boys to go to town and get 'em for me."

"Not me!" blurted Hank in comic dismay. "I don't want to be mixed up in no baby business!"

"Nor me, neither," declared Spurs fervently. "It—it—it'd be scandalous, that's what it'd be!"

Ken glanced in the direction of the sleeping infant and drew a very long breath.

"Look, boys," he said unhappily, "I can't go myself. The marshal would be sure to pick me up."

A very awkward situation, and one that called for considerable thought. Spurs caressed his chin; Hank scratched the back of his neck.

"Oh, I got it!" said Spurs suddenly.

"Queenie! You know Queenie, down at the saloon, Ken—she'd help you!"

Ken brightened. Queenie Moore was a singer and dancer at the Wagon Wheel Saloon, and used to the ways of rough men; but she was a woman, and a warm-hearted one at that.

"Oh, yeah!" he murmured. "She was an old flame of yours, wasn't she?"

"Well, sorta," admitted Spurs.

"She's got a heart as big as a beer keg. You just tell her I sent you."

"It's a mighty good idea," confirmed Hank. "You could sneak in at the back door of the saloon."

"Yeah," supplemented Spurs, "and me and Hank'll sort of ride herd on the kid while you're gone."

"Sure," agreed Hank.

"It's a good idea," decided Ken, and added hastily: "But don't try to feed the kid, if it should wake—you might choke it. I'll be back just as soon as ever I can."

He changed swiftly out of his mining clothes into his cowboy outfit, put on his big white hat, and went off to get Tarzan.

Spurs looked at Hank.

"Say," he mused, "I wonder how Jane Parker's gonna—gonna—well, you know."

"Why, all right, of course," said Hank. "All women love kids."

"Sure," nodded Spurs, "but they don't reckon to take 'em on their money-moon with 'em!"

In the stress of circumstances, Ken himself had forgotten about his approaching marriage, but, even if he had remembered it, the infant son of Jack Swift would still have needed garments and drinking utensils suitable to its age. He rode down from the hills towards Sicoma City, avoided the main thoroughfares of that ambitiously named town, reached the back of the Wagon Wheel Saloon, across several fields and a yard, and opened its back door.

From the back door he made his way cautiously into a little room used for private parties, and there he stood on a chair to peer through the transom of the door that opened into the long bar-room.

The marshal was not at the bar, nor was any enemy. He shook the bell affixed to the wall beside the transom and jumped down from the chair as he saw Butch Strong, the proprietor, advancing in shirt-sleeved corpulence with his thumbs under his braces.

Butch Strong arrived and stared.

"Hallo, stranger!" he exclaimed. "What's the idea of comin' in the back way?"

"I didn't want the marshal to know I was in town, Butch," explained Ken.

"Oh, that's all right!" Butch waved the irregularity aside. "What can I do for you, Ken?"

"I want to see Queenie," was the unexpected answer.

"Queenie, eh? Well, she's awful busy rehearsin'—can't you make it some other time?"

"I'm afraid not, Butch. It's terrible important."

Butch Strong blinked, but was accommodating. He conducted the visitor out from the little room and along a passage to another room at the side of the bar, which contained very little more than a few pictures on the walls, a couple of chairs on the floor, and an upright piano and other musical instruments.

A man was seated at the piano, and Queenie, arrayed in a gorgeous frock of black velvet with all sorts of scintillating trimmings, was practising a new song, and at intervals reviling the accompanist because he couldn't get the tune right. She was quite young, golden-haired, and beautifully shaped, if by no means slender.

"Oh, that's wrong!" she cried as Butch entered with Ken. "Try it again!"

The accompanist struck a couple of chords, and Ken said:

"Howdy, Queenie?"

"Ken Armstrong!" Her blue eyes rounded at sight of him. "What in the world brings you here?"

Butch Strong vanished; Ken walked forward.

"Well, Queenie," he said diffidently, "I just come here to ask you to do me a little favour."

"Why—sure, Ken," said she quite readily. "Have a seat—I'll be with you in a little while."

"But, Queenie," he faltered, "I—I'm in a terrible hurry."

Something in the tone of his voice impressed her, and she marched him well away from the piano and the man who was seated at it.

"What can I do for you?" she asked curiously.

Ken looked across at the staring pianist.

"Will you excuse us, partner?" he said, and with that grabbed hold of her arm and tugged her away to the little room by the back door, watched by the wondering Butch.

"What's all the mystery?" she inquired.

"Queenie," said he, "I—I've acquired a baby—a little tiny one. And he ain't got no clothes!"

"Most of 'em come that way," said Queenie, who had an idea that this was an ill-timed joke.

"But this is serious," Ken assured her. "This is old Jack Swift's son—" you remember Jack Swift, who struck the trail East to marry a girl and become a shopkeeper Chicago way, don't you? Well, his wife died, and then he died, and the kid's an orphan now."

Queenie looked shrewdly into a handsome but worried face, yet was not entirely convinced.

"Say, is this on the level?" she asked. "Absolutely!" he assured her. "And, Queen, old Spurs Hawkins said you might be willing to help. Him and Hank are out there at the shack, ridin' herd on the little fellow right now till I get back."

Queenie made a grimace, knowing the rough ways of cowboys.

"The poor little thing!" she exclaimed. "What is it you need?"

Ken told her of what had happened at the junction the night before.

"So I need everything," he wound up. "Clothes, nursing-bottles—well, you know a darn sight better'n I do!"

He fished some notes from the pocket of his shirt and pressed them into her hand.

"Take this along with you," he said. "Don't be particular about the cost."

"All right," she decided. "I'll do it, Ken. You wait here for me—I'll be back as soon as possible."

"Queenie," said Ken with heartfelt gratitude, "you're swell! Hi, but—er—don't forget some—er—don't forget to get some—some of them white bandanas. You know."

Queenie would not have forgotten napkins, anyway, but she nodded understandingly.

"All right, Ken," she said—and went off to change her frock.

A Chance for Motley

THE firm of attorneys who had written to Ken in such misleading terms from far-away Chicago had a reputation for honest dealing of which they were proud, but the agent in Sicoma City, selected at a venture from an official law list, was not worthy to represent them.

His name was Uriah Potts, as they had mentioned in the letter, and his office was situated in Main Street, not very far from the town hall. He was a lean-faced man with almost cadaverous cheeks and a hawk-like nose, upon which his spectacles were usually lowered so that he could look over their rims.

It was none to his credit that he acted for John Motley; but John Motley was a useful client, paying well for advice which enabled him to do all manner of underhand things without actually breaking the law.

While Queenie Moore was making purchases on Ken's behalf, Uriah Potts sat at an old-fashioned roll-top desk in his dusty office, listening to Motley.

"So you see," said the smooth-tongued rascal, "we've simply got to get hold of Ken Armstrong's claim by fair means or—other means."

Uriah Potts sat patting his hands against each other in a seemingly abstracted fashion, and this annoyed his client, who suddenly exploded:

"What's the matter, Potts? You're not paying any attention!"

The attorney's thin lips parted in an insinuating smile, and he reached across the desk to take up a bundle of papers tied with pink tape.

"Ken Armstrong's got a bigger goldmine in these legal documents," he said, "than you have in all your holdings put together!"

"What d'you mean?" demanded Motley, staring at the bundle in blank astonishment. "What are they?"

"Just a few documents," Potts replied, unfastening the pink tape, "in-

"When I've finished with you," rasped Motley, snatching Ken's guns from their holsters, "you'll wish you hadn't been born!"

cluding—and concerning—the last will and testament of one Jack Swift—deceased."

He opened out the probate of the will to which he had referred and tossed it to his client.

"It seems," he continued, "that the said Jack Swift had managed to acquire the said fortune as well as an infant son. The child has been sent to Ken, according to my information, and when the proper legal steps have been completed he will become the sole administrator of the entire estate—and that, mind you, without any sort of bond or interference."

John Motley frowned at the probate. "Isn't there some way we can cut in on this?" he asked.

"There is—definitely," Potts replied.

"Swift drew his own will, without the aid of any lawyer, and, although he specifically directed that the child be sent to Ken Armstrong, he also very clearly states"—he repossessed himself of the document and ran a finger down it—"well, here it is: 'When my son Dick has been legally adopted the foster-father shall become sole administrator,' and so on and so forth."

"Well, I still don't see."

"His foster-father," said Potts significantly, "not necessarily Ken—although that was Swift's intention. Any man who legally adopts—"

"Oh, I get you!" Motley beamed with delight. "In this case it will be me? All right, you fix up the legal details and I'll get the child."

Uriah Potts raised a restraining hand.

"Not so fast," he said. "Not so fast! We can't do it with kidnapping, or force. Just drop a gentle hint to the Ladies' Society that Ken Armstrong is not a fit person to have the child, and let them start the rumpus. Then we'll get old Justice of the Peace Simpkins to issue an order, and the child will be turned over to a proper person—in this case, yourself!"

Motley left the attorney's office very well satisfied with the interview, and on the boardwalk in Main Street he encountered Tillie Tilks and Amanda Witherspoon, who had evidently been shopping, since they were carrying parcels. Just ahead of them was Queenie Moore, still more laden, and the two had been trailing her for the past ten minutes.

"Good-morning, Miss Tilks," greeted Motley, raising his hat. "Can I have a word with you?"

"You follow that hussy, Amanda," said the tall and shrewd-looking spinster to her companion. "Well, Mr. Motley?"

"Miss Tilks," responded the schemer, "you being president of the Sicoma City Ladies' Literary and Cultural Advancement Society, I feel there is something you must know."

In the ordinary way, Tillie Tilks would have listened quite greedily to anything he had to impart, but at the moment there was another matter on her mind.

"And you being a leading citizen of our fair city," she instantly returned, "there is something that you should know, Mr. Motley. That dance-hall woman, along there, has been in every store in town buying baby clothes!"

"Queenie buying baby clothes!" Motley exclaimed. "For what?"

"That's exactly what we intend to find out!"

Motley twisted the ends of his moustache.

"I wonder!" he breathed. "Of course, Miss Tilks, you know that Ken Armstrong has a baby at his shack up at the mine?"

"Ken Armstrong!" she gasped. "A baby!"

"Yes."

"Oh, but Ken Armstrong—" She broke off as Amanda Witherspoon came flying along the boardwalk from the direction of the Wagon Wheel Saloon, crying excitedly:

"Tillie! Oh, Tillie! Oh, Tillie!"

"Amanda," said Tillie, "what did you learn?"

"She gave the baby things to Ken Armstrong!" shrieked the ugly little woman, her eyes bobbing nearly out of her head. "I watched her through the window in the yard."

"Then it's true!" exclaimed Tillie, turning to Motley. "It's true! Amanda saw them together with her own eyes!"

"It's scandalous!" declared Amanda vehemently. "Simply scandalous! What are we going to do?"

Motley seized upon the opportunity.

"Well," he said, "my advice would be to call a meeting of the Ladies' Society and have the baby turned over to a decent and responsible person. Mr. Potts will take care of the details—and, of course, at my expense. Wherever this baby came from, it is obviously in the wrong hands."

"I'll call a meeting for this very night," decided Tillie Tilks; but Amanda shook her head.

"How can you, Tillie?" she protested. "The Cattleman's Association is meeting in the town hall to-night."

"As president of the school board," said John Motley promptly, "I offer you the school building for your meeting."

The spinsters were delighted, especially the president of the Ladies' Literary and Cultural Advancement Society, who purred:

"Mr. Motley, how can we ever repay you?"

"I am not thinking of myself," lied their benefactor, "only of the welfare of our beloved city."

"This is going to be a terrible blow to poor dear Jane Parker!" exclaimed Amanda.

"Yes," agreed Motley. "It's a good thing she's out of town."

"But she's returning to-night," said Tillie. "Mr. Parker told me so just now."

"Then," said Amanda firmly, "she must come to the meeting. It is our duty to protect a nice girl like that."

"You're absolutely right, Miss Witherspoon," endorsed Motley. "Well, ladies, I'll see you at the meeting to-night."

He had caught sight of Dwyer, waiting for him in the doorway of Uriah Potts' office, and he raised his hat to the spinsters and walked back to the engineer.

"I want you to mine that south tunnel with dynamite and gunpowder," he stated, "and hook it up to a plunger."

"I don't think I understand," returned Dwyer gruffly. "If we are to blow up that tunnel nothing on earth'll save the Armstrong claim."

"Don't you worry about the Armstrong claim," retorted Motley. "You just do as I tell you."

"But it's a dangerous thing to do," the engineer objected, "and Armstrong will squawk."

Motley laughed.

"He's in bad now," he said, "and no one will believe a word he utters. You go straight ahead with the job."

A Shock for Jane!

FEMALES of all ages made their way to the school building in Jefferson Avenue that evening, and Tillie Tilks lost no time in opening the meeting she had called. She was explaining its object to the surprised assembly when Jane stepped into the main corridor, tired from her long journey but curious to find out why so urgent a summons had awaited her.

February 23th, 1934.

John Motley, who had been lurking there for more than half an hour, greeted her almost effusively. Lest the outcome of the meeting should cause her to think any ill of himself, however, he pretended to try to dissuade her from entering the principal class-room where Amanda Witherspoon had just been called upon to tell the members of the society exactly what she had seen.

"Don't go into the meeting, Jane," he said. "There are things being said that I'd rather you didn't hear."

His attitude had exactly the effect he had counted upon. Jane insisted that it was her duty to attend the meeting, and she pushed open the unlatched door.

There were three women on the platform, two of them seated at a table, the other—Amanda—was standing and speaking.

"I followed that Quenie woman from store to store," she was saying, "while she bought the baby things, and then I followed her to the saloon."

"And she met a man there?" prompted Tillie Tilks, who was seated on her left.

"Yes," said Amanda firmly, "she met Ken Armstrong. She gave him the baby things, and then she gave him some money."

Mrs. Bumps, the other woman who was seated at the table, instantly sprang to her feet, the light of battle gleaming in her eyes behind the lenses of the spectacles she wore.

"Why, I never heard of such a brazen flaunting of the conventions," she cried, "and I move that this society petition the proper authorities to remove that child from a mere shack in the hills where there is no one to give it the care and attention it needs. The whole thing is perfectly dreadful!"

A woman who was sitting in a cramped position at one of the little desks rose up to second the motion, and Jane slipped out from the room badly upset and very nearly in tears.

Motley was waiting for her, apparently full of concern.

"Jane," he said gently, "Jane, let me take you home."

"I still don't believe it," she faltered.

"Well, I'm afraid it's true," he lamented. "The child is up at Ken's shack."

She looked at him piteously. It had been a very nasty shock to her to hear that the young man she loved and was about to marry had actually become possessed of a baby.

"Have—have you seen it?" she asked stammeringly.

"No, not personally," admitted the suave scoundrel, "but I'm quite sure it's there."

"I'll never believe it till I see it with my own eyes!" she cried.

"You're right," said he, "and neither will I. I'm driving out to Ken's shack in the morning, and if there's no baby there I'll make this society give him a public apology."

"Take me with you."

"Are you sure you want to go?"

"Please."

"All right," he said with secret satisfaction, "I'll pick you up about eight o'clock."

Ken was up very early next morning, and for several hours he was hard at work in his shack, elaborating all manner of gadgets for the benefit of the baby.

After he had prepared and eaten his own breakfast he washed and dressed his tiny charge with clumsy but very careful hands, then went off to feed and groom and saddle Tarzan. He led the white horse into the big room and showed him over and over again how the gadgets worked. Tarzan thereafter was called upon to work them himself, and proved an apt pupil.

The baby had reposed on the bed during the course of instruction. Ken picked it up and carried it over to the cradle, to which runners had been attached and connected to a sort of treadle arrangement.

"Well, Tarzan," said Ken, "just one more rehearsal now, because I've got to go to the mine."

He deposited the infant in the cradle and stood up.

"Show me what you do when the baby cries," he commanded. "Go on."

Tarzan put a hoof on the treadle and the cradle was rocked.

"That's it," said Ken. "I guess that'll work out all right. That's it—that's good, old boy. Now show me what you do when he's hungry. There. Over there. Show me."

Tarzan ambled over to a rope which ran through pulleys across the wooden ceiling. His end of the rope was weighted by an iron bar; to the other end, directly over the cradle, Ken had affixed a feeding-bottle which was upside down and full of milk. With his teeth the horse lifted the rope, and the bottle descended till it was well within reach of the baby's little hands.

The baby crowed; the bottle rose again.

"That's right," approved Ken. "Attaboy! Now over here, and show me what you do. Pick it up, pick it up. Come on, show me how you get my breakfast!"

A pot of water was on the iron stove, and over the pot a wooden trough had been fixed at a slant from the wall. To a rope that passed through more pulleys was fastened a trapdoor over an inclined box. Tarzan tugged at the rope, the trap was opened, and down the trough into the pot rolled several eggs.

"That's right," applauded Ken. "Tarzan, you're a wonderful horse—a horse that can cook. You're all right, Tarzan, you're wonderful!"

He walked over to yet another rope near the door, the upper end of which passed through a hole in the wall.

"Now look at here," he said. "Whenever you want me for anything, ring this bell. See it? Ring it like this."

He tugged at the rope and a cowbell outside the shack created a din. Tarzan took a turn at the rope, which he tugged even more vigorously and was patted for his intelligence.

"That's fine, old man," said Ken, and went back to the cradle, where he knelt to make the baby comfortable upon its pillows.

"I've got you fixed up pretty nice now," he said. "Yes, I have. Now there you are, Dick. I'm gonna leave you in charge of Tarzan, and you're in good hands."

He stood up and walked to the door.

"Take care of him, old man," he enjoined, and went out.

John Motley had called for Jane with a buggy, and Ike Davis was with him on horseback. He drove up into the hills off the coach road to Blue Rock with Jane beside him, and the shack was in sight when Ken stepped out from it and turned towards the mine.

"There goes Ken now," Motley said, pointing a gloved hand. "We'll be able to find out about the baby right away."

Jane, who was almost sorry she had asked to come, watched her lover enter the mine and bit her lip as the horses were brought to a standstill.

"I hate this spying!" she said in a worried voice. "This sneaking around behind his back."

"I know," Motley nodded, "but how else are we going to prove that he's innocent? He's out of sight. Come on!"

He sprang down from the buggy and helped her to the ground.

"Keep your eyes peeled, Ike," he directed, and that ugly employee remained in the saddle while they walked over to the shack and entered it.

Tarzan viewed them dubiously. Jane he knew well and liked, but Motley he neither liked nor trusted. Jane looked down at the cradle, and the baby laughed at her.

She burst into tears, and then the white horse knew that something was wrong.

"I'm sorry, Jane," said Motley regretfully. "If I'd known this I'd never have brought you."

Tarzan clattered across the bare boards to the rope against the wall, and the cow-bell rang noisily.

"That's probably a signal for Ken," exclaimed Jane in alarm. "Let's hurry away from here!"

The bell was still ringing as they went out from the shack and back to the buggy, and before they could take their seats Ken came running out from the mine and saw them.

"Jane!" he shouted.

"Jane!" There seemed to her to be no sense in trying to escape, even if there were time to do it; so she turned and waited.

"Jane, when did you get back?" Ken cried as he reached her. "I wasn't expectin' you."

"Apparently not," she retorted scornfully, "judging from that child."

"Child?" he echoed. "Oh, I can explain that!"

"There's no need to," she flamed at him. "I know all about it, and that Queenie woman, too! Let me go!"

But Ken, who had grabbed hold of her, would not let her go.

"Jane," he insisted, "you must listen to me."

"Let me go!" she shrielled; and then Motley stepped nearer.

"Can't you hear what she says?" he demanded. "Let her go!"

Ken released his grip on Jane to glare at her companion.

"How come you to horn in on this, Motley?" he snapped.

"I'm here to protect Jane," was the reply.

"Well, you get goin' pronto!"

"You can't bluff me," sneered Motley.

"You get off my property before I throw you off!"

Motley clenched his fists.

"Say, who do you think you're talkin' to?" he roared.

Almost simultaneously they struck at each other, but the blow intended for Ken's jaw was side-tracked, and it was Motley who bit the dust.

He rose to his feet in a fury, and a fierce battle raged between them. Ken did not go without punishment, but Motley very speedily regretted that he had resorted to fistcuffs. Once Ken went down, but only once, and then—over by some bushes towards which the encounter had led them—he seized his opponent in a deadly arm-lock and heaved him bodily over his shoulder.

Ike, who had been waiting his opportunity, whipped out a gun. But Jane saw him about to fire, and in that moment forgot all about the baby.

"Look out, Ken!" she shrieked.

Ken's six-shooter was in his hand even as he dropped to his knees, and he fired while a bullet was whizzing over his head. Ike, with a shattered wrist, fell from his horse and lay in the dust, groaning, and Motley sat up in a dazed fashion to see Jane climbing into the buggy.

"Jane!" Ken shouted; but Jane slashed at the horses and drove off down the hill.

Gritting his teeth, Ken went back to Motley and jerked him to his feet.

"Now looka here, you!" he rasped. "If ever you meddle in my affairs any more it's gonna be too bad for your future health! Now collect your gunman and get out of here!"

Motley picked up his fallen hat and walked none too steadily over to his henchman, whom he kicked in the ribs. "Get up, bungler!" he snarled.

Ike Davis rose, clutching at his wrist, and saw that his employer was hoisting himself on to the back of the horse. Hastily he scrambled up behind him, and the horse went off with its double burden.

An Official Visit

HALF-WAY down the hill John Motley turned into a narrow way between rocks and came to his own mine.

Not far from its shaft Bill Dwyer and three workmen were gathered round a sort of canister, not unlike a petrol-can in size and shape, but they straightened up at the sound of hoots, and they stared at Motley and at Ike Davis.

"Get down!" Motley commanded curtly as he drew rein.

Ike endeavoured to heave himself off the back of the horse, but fell to the ground and lay there motionless. Motley looked down at him with contemptuous eyes.

"Fix him up, Bill," he said.

"What happened?" inquired Dwyer.

"Oh, the bungler stopped a bullet!"

Motley slid down from the saddle. "Never mind about him—your men can't tend to him. Got that hooked up yet?"

"Not yet," Dwyer replied. "I don't like the idea of this thing at all, Mr. Motley. It's mighty dangerous hooking that plunger up over the explosives."

Motley looked at the canister contrivance, with its plunger, and saw that it was not connected with a flex that trailed across the ground to the shaft of the mine.

"Lost your nerve, eh?" he jeered.

"Well, get it hooked up, or you lose your job!"

Ike, whose wrist was being bandaged by one of the workmen with a handkerchief that was far from clean, scowled in the direction of his employer.

"I'll get Motley for this," he growled vindictively. "He can't kick me around like a dog! Go ahead, Mike, I can stand it."

Motley remounted the horse that was Ike's.

"Get busy on that wiring," he said to Dwyer. "I may need it sooner than I expected. Keep the fellows working on that hook-up. I'm going over to Armstrong's mine."

"All right," returned the engineer surlily.

"I want five men. Can you spare them?"

"Well, while they're with you they won't be working with me," was the reply. "But if you want 'em you can have 'em."

Five men were summoned from below the surface, and on horseback they went off with John Motley.

By this time Ken was hard at work in his own mine, considerably puzzled over Jane's actions, and Tarzan was rocking the cradle in the shack because the baby had begun to whimper.

A wagonette drawn by four horses climbed the hill, driven by a weather-beaten old fellow who piled for hire in Sicoma City, and from the driving-seat on either side of him two men clambered down over the front wheels. One was Uriah Potts, the other a little elderly clerk from the courthouse named Jinks.

These two went round to the back of the vehicle, and, with their assistance, Tillie Tilks, Amanda Witherspoon, and Mrs. Bumps descended.

Solemnly Uriah Potts led the way to the front door of Ken's shack and opened it, and the three dames followed him in over the step, and the little clerk brought up the rear.

Tarzan was rocking the cradle, and they viewed the phenomenon with staring eyes.

"A horse!" exclaimed Tillie Tilks. "Well, for ever more!" gasped Amanda Witherspoon. "Is this a stable or a house?"

They approached the cradle and they looked down at the baby.

"Why, Tillie," breathed Amanda, "it's really quite cute."

"Amanda!" rebuked the shocked president of the Ladies' Society. "A child without a name cute?"

Tarzan knocked her away with his nose, and Jack Swift's offspring liked that and gurgled. Tillie stared at the horse, which had ceased to rock the cradle.

"Why, for goodness' sake!" she exclaimed. "He acts like he don't want us here! We're not going to hurt the baby!"

Amanda ventured nearer the cradle, and was smitten in the face twice by Tarzan's nose.

"Stop that, you old goat!" she cried; but Tarzan bumped against her sideways and sent her staggering.

The whole quartet retreated in haste. "Imagine leaving a horse in charge of a baby!" fumed Tillie Tilks. "And just look at all these contraptions."

The three women proceeded to investigate Ken's domestic arrangements; the tinned stuff upon a row of shelves, the mysterious ropes and pulleys, the bed in the corner.

"What'll we do?" said Jinks, the clerk, to Potts, the attorney. "Ken Armstrong is not here to be served with the order of the court."

"That's all right," replied Potts calmly, "just deliver the child to Mrs. Dwyer and leave the papers here so that Ken can find them when he comes back."

Tarzan went straight to the rope attached to the warning cowbell and tugged at it again and again; but Ken did not arrive on the scene, though he heard the summons.

Five men pounced on him as he came up out of his mine, and though he struggled valiantly enough against such overwhelming odds they held him fast.

"All right, boss, we've got him!" one of his captors shouted, and John Motley strode forward.

"When I've finished with you," he rasped, snatching Ken's guns from their holsters, "you'll wish you hadn't been born!"

The butt of one of the guns was smashed into Ken's face, knocking him nearly unconscious.

"That'll hold him," said Motley, in no way ashamed of his brutal action. "Mount up and take him away."

Ken was dragged away to the horses, which had been concealed behind some rocks, and was flung across the back of one of them. A man mounted behind him, and the whole party went off at a gallop, not past the shack where the cowbell was still ringing, but straight on over rock-strewn ground and out of sight.

Tillie Tilks opened the door of the shack and out flew Tarzan, convinced that something had gone wrong. He reached the mine, and there the sound of hoofs beating on rock reached his alert ears. Without the slightest hesitation he followed the trail of the men who had captured his master.

A buckboard driven by a red-headed man climbed the hill to the shack and was stopped beside the wagonette. A pleasant-faced and middle-aged woman was sitting beside the driver, and the weatherbeaten old fellow on the wagonette greeted her.

"Howdy, Mrs. Dwyer?" he shouted. "How d'you do?" returned the woman, who was Bill Dwyer's wife.

Those inside the shack heard and came out, Tillie Tilks carrying the baby.

"My dear Mrs. Dwyer," she said, handing over the infant, "I'm sure that you will take splendid care of this child until the law decides what to do with it."

Thanks to a Horse!

JANE had driven almost recklessly down the hill into the coach road at the foot of it, but as she drew near to Sieoma City she slowed the horses to walking pace. She had passed first the wagonette and then the buckboard, and she realised that Ken was about to be deprived of the baby he had so suddenly acquired.

Already she had begun to repent of having given Ken no opportunity to explain matters, and she was debating in her mind whether to turn about or to go home when Hank Carter and Spurs Hawkins came riding towards her, Hank nursing a jar of liquor which he had acquired at the saloon.

She stopped the buggy as they pulled rein beside it.

"Howdy, Miss Jane?" said Spurs. "Say, ain't that Motley's outfit?"

She nodded, and the two cowpunchers saw that there were tears in her eyes.

"If that hombre's done anything to make you cry, Miss Jane," blurted Spurs, "I'll take him apart."

"It isn't that," said Jane haltingly, "it—it's about Ken, and—and his baby."

"Oh, the baby?" Spurs looked at Hank and Hank looked at Spurs. "Oh, don't let that worry you any, Miss Jane. Ken's sure got a kid out at his shack, but he couldn't help that. He inherited it from his old pal Jack Swift, who's died."

"Inherited him?" echoed Jane, her eyes very round and her brows uplifted.

"Sure."

"How do you know?"

"I saw the letter, and Hank saw it, too. Didn't we, Hank?"

Hank nodded, and abruptly Jane snatched up a whip and lashed at the horses attached to the buggy.

"Hi, where you going?" cried Spurs, as the vehicle was turned almost in its own length.

"Back to Ken!" shouted Jane.

She drove back to the shack, passing the wagonette at the foot of the hill. Tillie and Amanda hailed her, but she paid no attention to them. Mrs. Dwyer, with the baby, was on her way to Motley's mine in accordance with the instructions she had received, and so Jane did not encounter the buckboard.

She reached the shack only to find it deserted, and she sat down to wait for Ken, imagining him to be in the mine. But Ken had been bundled into quite another shack over by Motley's workings, pending the completion of preparations for blowing up the tunnel.

Ken tried to force open the door of his prison with a piece of wood, after the footsteps of his captors had died away, but the door was a stout one and had been securely fastened.

He found a metal poker at the stove, and was about to attack the door again with it when a sudden knocking at the side wall caused him to drop the poker and to listen intently.

He whistled a shrill and curious little whistle, and immediately there was an answering neigh from outside. He knew then that Tarzan had found him and that it was Tarzan who had knocked

From the back of the stove an iron flue rose up to an elbow-joint whence a long length of pipe passed out through the side wall at an angle. It was a matter of minutes to detach the pipe from the elbow-joint, and then he pulled the pipe in from the wall and looked out through the circular hole it had occupied.

He saw Tarzan and spoke to him. "Good boy, Tarzan," he said, his voice husky with emotion. "Wait there just a minute, old man."

He searched his pockets for paper, but could find none. He took out a handkerchief, still more or less white, and with a charred stick of wood from under the stove wrote upon it at the table.

Back at the hole he called guardedly through it to the horse.

"Come close, boy. Come on."

Tarzan moved close to the hole, and Ken thrust his hand and arm through it and managed to tuck the handkerchief under the saddle.

"Now take it to Hank, at the Bar-X. Tarzan," he directed, and Tarzan backed away from the side of the shack and made a bee-line across country for the bunkhouse of Ken's friends.

He reached it in record time, while down in the south tunnel of Motley's mine a long train of gunpowder was associated with a charge of dynamite, a connection between the gunpowder and the electrical plunger up above was established, and the men started to ascend the shaft.

Hank himself was in the farmyard when Tarzan bounded over the five-barred gate near the muck-pond and made straight for him.

"Well, what are you doin' around here?" exclaimed the cowpuncher.

Tarzan reached his head round to the saddle and managed to pull the handkerchief away in his teeth.

"What you got there?" Hank asked, curiously, and the handkerchief was offered to him.

He read the message, and in a state of wild excitement rushed off to round up all the available members of the Bar-X outfit.

"Look here what Tarzan's brought!" he shouted. "Look what Ken's writ on this here handkerchief! 'Held prisoner in tool-shack at Motley's mine. Come a-runnin', Ken.' Let's go, fellers! Get your horses!"

A hundred yards or so from the entrance to the shaft of Motley's mine, Dwyer watched the last of the workmen emerge from the workings, then said to his employer:

"Well, it's all set now. I'll move the plunger over about a hundred yards. That ought to be safe enough."

"All right," said Motley, and looked round as he heard the sound of wheels. "There comes your wife now!"

The buckboard driven by the red-headed man was approaching, and on it was Mrs. Dwyer with the baby in her lap. Her husband waved a hand, then picked up the canister arrangement and carried it farther away from the mine and set it down near a boulder. Motley went to meet the buckboard.

"Hallo, Mrs. Dwyer," he said, holding out his arms, "let's have a look at what represents so much money."

Jack Swift's offspring was handed down to him, and he was looking into its dismayed little face when Tarzan came flying through a gap between tall rocks near the entrance to the mine, and behind him pounded the boys of the Bar-X outfit, fourteen of them all told, with their guns out.

Dwyer saw them and shouted: "It's Ken's friends! Let's get out of here!"

Shots rang out as the miners made for their horses and scattered in haste upon them. Some of the cowpunchers dismounted at the shack and began to

In the heart of Africa, two men of remarkable similarity come face to face. The year is 1914 and war clouds are gathering. One of the men vanishes in the jungle and the other goes to England to take part in a foul attempt to ruin the Mother country.

Starring Edmund Lowe

"The GREAT IMPERSONATION"

East Africa, January, 1914

A SAFARI was crossing a stream in the dense jungle of the interior of British East Africa. Most of the men were armed with spears and shields, every other man carried a torch to scare away the wild beasts, then came porters with baggage and guns, with two white men bringing up the rear.

It was dark, but the guide knew the way and the safari made a good pace as its destination was nigh. Moreover, this part of the jungle was alive with wild beasts and it was not wise to linger.

Little did the men know that ahead of them a white man, his clothes torn to ribbons, his bearded face white and drawn and his eyes blood-shot, staggered and swayed. Now and again the man would pause to take breath, and always behind him he heard sounds that told him that he was being stalked. He would break into a shuffling run, crashing into trees and bushes as he tried to get to some place of safety—an instinct of self-preservation kept him going. His ammunition exhausted, he had flung away his rifle.

The safari, to keep up their spirits and scare the lions, began to chant some rhythmic song, and the white man heard. His dimming senses tried to figure the direction from which the sound came. Hearing that stealthy rustling he tried to increase his pace, and came into a small clearing lit by the rays of a weak moon. He splashed through a stream and up the bank. He was exhausted. Fearfully he glanced round to see a huge lion appear on the other bank. With a moan he began to run, but his knees and legs had no strength; he fell heavily, but desperation drove him on. The chanting seemed to be so near and yet so elusive. Safety was close at hand, and he tried to make his weary body respond, but his strength was spent, and with a hoarse cry he sprawled among the undergrowth.

The lion crept towards his prey, then roared because, through the jungle, balls of fire were moving towards him. He sniffed at the still figure, then slunk back into the jungle.

The white man lay right in the track of the safari, and the guide nearly stepped on the body.

"Onaku, Onaku—Watzumbi!" he shouted.

The blacks clutched their spears and muttered in amazement at the sight of the white man, whom they thought dead. The halt of the safari caused the two white traders to hurry forward to find out the reason for the halt, and they looked down in surprise as great as the natives at this white man. This part of East Africa was almost unexplored.

The leader—a tall, heavily built man—turned the body over and stared at the deathly white face. He shouted to a boy to hold a torch closer, then he turned to the other man and gave an imperious gesture. The latter knelt and made a swift examination.

"He's alive!"

"We must take him with us to the Von Ragastein camp," decided the leader, and at once gave orders for porters to make a stretcher.

The thing that had once been a man began to moan and mutter in delirium. He struggled futilely when they tried to lift him from the ground, and before sinking into a coma begged them to let him die in peace.

The safari continued on its way, the chanting started again as if nothing unusual had happened, and at last a light gleamed ahead. The safari came into a large clearing, where there were a wooden shack and a number of grass huts.

The sick man was carried into the shack and laid on a trestle-bed. A tall, gaunt man with a monocle in his left eye and a portly man, who was a doctor, promised to do all they could for the sick man. The white traders accepted a drink and resumed their journey.

The doctor examined the unshaven wreck of a man, whilst the other man watched closely.

"Exhaustion and alcoholism." The doctor stood up.

"Do you notice anything about this man?"

"Yes, a remarkable resemblance to yourself," was the reply. "Shave that beard off and he'd be your double."

The gaunt man adjusted his monocle and grinned.

"Years ago we were even more alike."

"Do you know him?"

"We were at Oxford together. His name is Everard Dominey."

The breath whistled through the doctor's teeth at this amazing news.

"And you meet here like this?"

"Long odds, eh, Trenk?" The tall man stared down at the unconscious Dominey. "Perhaps my luck is changing."

"Your—your luck?"

"I've been in this hole three years—three life-times. Maybe this is my chance for freedom."

"Chance for freedom?" questioned the doctor.

"Yes, and—!" He broke off. "Look out! Look out! He's coming round."

Everard Dominey muttered vague, incomprehensible words before opening his eyes. The sick man lay there muttering foolishly, then the eyes opened wider as the brain began to function.

"There now—there now." The doctor pressed him back as he strove to lift his head. "You're all right."

Dominey leered foolishly.

"How about a drink?"

"You've had too much to drink," reproved the doctor.

"Maybe you're right." The exhausted man lay back and his eyes closed, but they soon opened again. "Where am I?"

"Safe in camp among friends," the doctor answered.

Dominey nodded weakly and turned his head to look with bloodshot eyes at the comfortably furnished bed-room. He moved his head slowly until at last he saw the tall, monocled man, and his eyes seemed hypnotised by what he saw.

"You are not seeing double." The tall man removed his monocle. "Don't you remember me?" He laughed. "Number five in our boat?"

"You're—you're Leopold—Leopold von Ragastein—Rags!" the sick man cried hoarsely. "Well, I'll be darned!"

"What on earth are you doing in Africa?"

"I've been hunting lions," Dominey grinned. "My boys robbed me and ran away. Then the lions started to hunt me. Rags! How many years has it been?" He tried to get up.

"Now, now—you must rest." The doctor firmly pushed his head back against the pillow. "When you wake up you can have a long talk."

"And a longer drink," murmured Dominey, and sank back as if the effort of talking had overtaxed his strength.

The doctor bent over Dominey.

"He's asleep."

Leopold von Ragastein tiptoed to the door, and beckoned to the doctor to follow him.

A Callous Scheme

EVERARD DOMINEY slept all through the night and far into the next day, and when he did wake the first thing he asked for was a drink. That and a good square meal and Dominey had recovered a great deal of his strength.

That night the three men sat on the veranda talking and drinking.

"Never have I seen two men so alike." The doctor stared from one to the other. "Of course, your face is a bit more oval," he decided after a study of Von Ragastein. "There seems a slight difference about the lower lip, but only a very close scrutiny reveals it."

"I wish the tradesmen at Oxford had been so observant," laughed Dominey. "They used to send me his bills."

"Why not?" replied Von Ragastein. "You were always charging things to my account."

They all laughed, and then Dominey looked across at his double.

"Tell me—what do you do in this pestilential country?"

"I represent Sir Ivan Brunn, head of the Internationale Munitions."

"Oh, I see, you supply the natives with pea-shooters?"

"We have saltpetre mines nearby," Von Ragastein explained. "Also—I keep my finger on the pulse of affairs."

"What? Here in Africa?"

"When even a little war breaks out we like to have our salesmen first in the field—on both sides."

"You'll be rather busy in Europe if these war rumours are true." Dominey finished his drink and helped himself liberally from the bottle. "Tell me, Rags, don't you ever long for your beloved Vienna—theatres, music, beautiful ladies?"

"Constantly. If I were in your shoes—with no business ties—I would leave for England to-morrow."

"Well, I'll never see England again." Dominey's face had changed—the face of a man despairing and with no hope for the future. "From now on this is my life." He raised his glass. "And hunting big game in Africa."

Dominey would have reached for the bottle again, but the doctor was firm.

February 29th, 1935.

"No more to-night. That constitution of yours has brought you back quickly, now give it a chance. At this rate you'll be dead in six months."

"What of it?" sneered Dominey.

"Think of the fun."

The doctor insisted that Dominey go to bed, and the man who had been so near death, with a last, longing look at the bottle, did as he was ordered. Leopold von Ragastein wished him pleasant dreams, and sat back in his chair.

In a few minutes the doctor returned.

"My friend," Von Ragastein hissed out his words. "The code book—quick!"

"The code book?"

"Yes. Hurry! Get our fastest runner."

Dr. Trenk glanced at his employer in surprise. What was Leopold planning? Without a question he fetched the code book and then went for their fastest runner.

By the time the doctor had found Noga, the swiftest runner, the message was complete.

"Take this to the telegraph station—wait for the reply," Von Ragastein ordered, and went to the veranda rail to watch the man vanish down the jungle track. Satisfied, the white man came back to the table and picked up the bottle of whisky.

"Where are you going?"

"To talk to the Englishman."

"He should rest."

Von Ragastein adjusted his monocle and smiled.

"After he has talked to me." He held up the bottle. "This will loosen his tongue."

Everard Dominey was delighted to see his host and the bottle of whisky.

"Doctors don't always know what is right." Von Ragastein poured out two liberal doses. "Finest medicine in the world. At any rate this one won't do you any harm. Besides it's so seldom I get the chance to talk with people from the outside world that I felt you wouldn't mind my coming in for a yarn."

Dominey took a large swig and gasped his appreciation.

"Grand! You can talk all night whilst this medicine lasts."

After the second or third drink Von Ragastein began to talk of his own private affairs. He was in exile in Africa because of a woman. He produced a picture of Stephanie, a princess of Austria. He had fallen in love with her, and her husband had challenged him to a duel, with fatal results to the husband. The emperor had banished him from Austria and he was doomed to spend the rest of his days in the jungle.

"I can guess from what you've said that you consider yourself a poor unfortunate." Von Ragastein filled Dominey's glass. "It is curious that both of us should be in exile in Africa, but I would wager all I possessed that your story cannot be as miserable and sordid as mine."

"I'm afraid it's even worse," mumbled the half-drunken Dominey.

By constantly refilling the other's glass, Von Ragastein heard the reason why Everard Dominey had buried himself in darkest Africa.

"Little more remains to tell," concluded Dominey. "Doctor Harrison set my arm and I left for Africa to forget." He laughed inanely and stared at his host through half-closed eyes. "Why do I tell you all these things? I've never talked so much to anyone."

"I hope I haven't tired you." Von Ragastein got up from his seat on Dominey's bed. "I don't know when I've been so interested. It is nearly daylight, so I think I'll go to bed. Good-night."

"Good-night," mumbled Dominey, and sprawled back against the pillows. His eyes closed and his head sagged limply.

Von Ragastein smiled, then tiptoed out of the bed-room. Dr. Trenk was asleep at the table with his head on his hands. A quick and vigorous shake awoke him.

"The messenger?"

"Not back yet." The doctor yawned.

"Ah, there he is."

With fingers that shook, Von Ragastein opened the envelope that Noga handed to him. Impatiently he waved the native away and got busy with the code book. When he had deciphered the message his face lit up with joy.

"Proceed as suggested." The doctor was puzzled. "What does that mean?"

"It means I'm proceeding to England," cried Leopold von Ragastein. "I am getting out, Trenk. No more flies, dirt, heat. No more of this."

"But how can you?"

"Because Sir Ivan Brunn says so. You know why I have been slaving for him. He is the most powerful man in the world. His organisation is complete in every country—except for a leader in England. I am going there—as Sir Everard Dominey."

"But you can never carry it through. His friends would know you at once."

"Nonsense! He has been away," Von Ragastein cried. "I was educated for the part. That's why I dared cable Sir Ivan. He has been waiting for a chance like this. As Everard Dominey I would move in official circles and be above suspicion. It is perfect."

"Baron! Baron!" cried the doctor. "Consider the consequences. You can't succeed."

Von Ragastein got up and began to pace the room.

"I must! I will!" he cried. "If I do, Sir Ivan's influence will release me from exile. A civilised life, and I shall be with Stephanie again."

"Not so loud—not so loud," hissed the doctor, and pointed to the bed-room.

"He will hear you."

"He's asleep—dead drunk," sneered the Austrian.

"Suppose he should return home?"

"He won't." Baron von Ragastein laughed harshly. "In two days we will send the Englishman north with a small safari, to hunt rhino. Fill his water bottles with nothing but whisky. His food bags with one day's rations—very salty."

"That's murder!" gasped the doctor.

"He does not wish to live." Von Ragastein shrugged his shoulders.

"You said yourself he would not last six months. It will be so simple, and I need your help. Put Ghana in charge. If the Englishman drinks—they will leave him in the heaviest jungle—alone—at night. If he does not drink—they will bring him to my camp—at the bend of the Blue River."

The doctor shuddered and glanced towards the bed-room and their victim.

"I think it will be better if he drinks."

The Great Sir Ivan Brunn

INTERNATIONALE MUNITIONS had factories in every part of the world. The more war the more money they made; and it was to their advantage to stir up strife than try to work for peace. Every factory was working now at high pressure.

In a luxurious office in Paris, Sir Ivan Brunn, director-general of Internationale Munitions, was looking at a large globe of the world. He looked a tall, grey-haired, well-dressed financier, but it was the eyes that were so keen, so hard and so cold. Standing by the largo desk was a thin-faced man, whose sensitive lips never seemed to be still and whose eyes were just as hard and cold as those of his employer.

"War is just around the corner, my dear Seaman, practically in our midst," Sir Ivan swung round the globe. "If we do not prepare a suitable reception for the gentleman from Mars—it would be very bad manners—and deplorable business."

"I quite agree, sir."

"You will instruct our factories in all countries to go on a three-shift basis—"

"Immediately, sir."

"And in all countries we do not take sides—we take cash." The great man smiled. "Gold, Seaman, from now on."

"Quite so, sir!" purred his confidential secretary.

"This is not going to be a localised squabble like yesterday's Balkan affair. Our agents have made sure of that. With scrupulous impartiality they have kept all the War Offices informed as to one another's plans and preparations." Sir Ivan revolved the globe slowly. "Each country will want the advantage of striking first. They will all inevitably strike at the same time—soon. This war will involve all Europe and may tax our capacity." He pointed a lean finger. "England over-balances the situation—too strong. I like a fair fight—and a long one. We should make a lot of money out of this world war, Seaman."

"A beautiful plan, sir." Seaman rubbed his hands together. The telephone buzzed, and after a nod from his employer he picked up the receiver. "Hallo?" He listened, and then placed his hand over the 'phone. "Baron von Ragastein, sir."

"Admit him." Sir Ivan waited till the necessary order had been given. "Remember, Seaman, we can't afford a scandal. At all times our hands must seem to be immaculate. The moment anyone suspects Von Ragastein's true identity he must be put out of the way."

Seaman's face twisted into a cold, fiendish expression. "I'll attend to that—personally!"

Baron Leopold von Ragastein was shown into the great man's presence. In Africa one had seen a gaunt man in faded drill, sporting an eyeglass, hair cut short and with bristling moustache and a drunken wreck, unshaven and debauched. This man looked so different in his smart grey suit—different from both of them, yet when he took out an eyeglass and placed it in his eye one saw at once the resemblance.

"Herr Baron." Sir Ivan Brunn held out his hand. "I congratulate you. I like a man who thinks fast. This is a great plan of yours—to kill a man and take his place."

"Thank you, sir." One could hear the faint accent.

"Ah, baron, I envy you." Sir Ivan sat back in his chair. "You will have the perfect reward—the laurels of a national hero and the income of a millionaire. That is—if you succeed."

"I can't fail," came the answer. "The only man who can contradict my identity is dead."

"Splendid. You will proceed at once to England and take your place as Sir Everard Dominey. You are no longer an impoverished baronet, Sir Everard, for you have made a fortune in African gold mining. Congratulations!"

"Thank you, sir." Von Ragastein gave a little jerky bow.

"Try again for Parliament." Sir Ivan gave a twisted grin. "Your predecessor tried once and nearly got in. With money you can win through to Parliament. It gives access to political secrets."

"Naturally."

"Dominey Hall will be our British headquarters." Sir Ivan pointed to his secretary. "Seaman here is my intermediary. He is to be obeyed implicitly. As master of Dominey Hall you will provide a safe hiding-place for our operatives. Our plan is a simple one." He paused for effect. "Delay and cripple the effectiveness of England's mighty war machine. The moment to strike is the moment when England decides on war."

"I will do my very best, sir."

"I rely completely on your patriotism—and your greed." Sir Ivan opened a drawer. "This dossier contains photographs and data to guide you. Your relatives and friends—their attitudes towards you, their distinguishing eccentricities, and a complete history of your past life. It is not a very pleasant one. You must memorise every detail." He opened the dossier. "This is your wife."

The imposter took the picture.

"She's most attractive. What a fool he was to leave her."

"Sir Everard Dominey was involved in a tragedy, and like a coward fled the country." Sir Ivan passed over the dossier. "Everything is there. You must not fail. You think you can get through with this impersonation? That monacle—that accent—"

The schemer's laugh interrupted the great man.

"Do not be alarmed, sir. I shall not fail."

"When do you leave for London?" Sir Ivan glanced at his secretary.

"At four o'clock," was the reply. "Sir Everard lunches with his solicitors to-morrow."

"Good!" Sir Ivan held out his hand. "Do not fail us, Sir Everard. Internationale Munitions has a severe way of dealing with failures. Good-day, Sir Everard."

The new Sir Everard Dominey bowed himself out of the presence of the great Sir Ivan Brunn.

The man struggled futilely when they tried to lift him and begged them to let him die in peace.

February 23th, 1936.

The Princess

IN a quiet, but select, restaurant quite close to Leicester Square Sir Everard Dominey sat at lunch with Leslie Mangan, who had been concerned with the affairs of the Domineys for the past five years.

"Sir Everard." Mangan looked at his client with great interest. "I still say frankly that I would never have recognised you."

"Particularly when I pay the bill." The solicitor laughed and shook his head.

"Even your voice seems changed." "I am thinking of going down to Dominey Hall to-night." There was a sharpness about the tone, as if the conversation had not been to his liking.

The solicitor frowned. "Isn't that a bit risky?"

"Perhaps, but I'm going." "You'll find it in bad shape, as you know—there's been no money. The place is mortgaged to the hilt."

"You can notify the bank I'll pay off the mortgage at once," announced Sir Everard.

"What with?" the solicitor asked. "I not only gained my health in Africa—I also made money." He tossed the waiter who had served the wines a ten shilling note. "Whilst hunting wild animals I walked into a district that had never been explored. Rich in gold and easy to mine. Simple, my dear Mangan."

"You amaze me, Sir Everard," the solicitor answered. "You're the first Dominey that has made any money for centuries. What time, Sir Everard, had you intended starting for—"

But that was as far as Mangan got because a short, plump, pleasant woman of middle age rushed up to the table. She gushed over Everard. Why hadn't he let her know he was coming back from India—the tall man with her intervening to say Africa—when had he come home—how well he was looking—and a lot of talk all about nothing. The tall man at last succeeded in shaking hands with Sir Everard and introduced a young man named Eddio Pelham. Pelham had had a fall from a horse and had an arm in a sling. Caroline, Duchess of Devon, would have stopped and talked all about the accident if the Duke—the tall, tired man—had not taken her away. Where was Everard staying—he must come and see them. The duchess gave her husband an amazed look when Sir Everard said he was going to Dominey Hall that night.

"Oh, Everard, don't go down there and torture yourself. You went through all that before. Why try it again?"

"I feel as though I should." Sir Everard looked at his watch.

"Well, if you've made up your mind—there's nothing I can do." The duchess had taken the hint. "Look us up as soon as you get back to London." The duke took her arm firmly.

"Your cousin is a charming woman," said Mangan.

"My cousin—oh, yes." Sir Everard laughed. "Shall we go?"

"If you like I could drive you down to Dominey," suggested the lawyer.

"Thanks very much—save me a lot of trouble."

"I'll go and get my hat and stick," Mangan said. "I'll meet you out in the lounge."

Sir Everard Dominey walked into the lounge and went across to a large gilt table, against which he leaned with apparent boredom. Seated in a chair with a magazine in his hands was Seaman, and that worthy nodded his approval—so far the scheme was running smoothly. Into the lounge came a slim, attractive, well-dressed young woman—she did not look English. She paused to look round at the people in the lounge and a glad light showed when she saw the lounging figure of Sir Everard.

The baronet was smoking and smiling to himself as if pleased at his own astuteness, but he stiffened when a voice called:

"Leopold!" He glanced round and saw the beautiful foreign lady, and with a slight air of surprise, bowed:

"I'm sorry—I think you've made a mistake." The girl seemed angry and perplexed.

She came closer.

"Fancy seeing you in London of all places. Why didn't you let me know?" Sir Everard shook his head.

"You have me confused with someone else."

Now anger flamed in the dark eyes. "Are you denying that you're Leopold von Ragastein?"

"My name is Everard Dominey." Then she smiled.

"You'd rather not talk here—is that it?" she whispered.

"I can only repeat—you are mistaken."

A stamp of the foot. "Are you fool enough to believe that I don't know you?" she laughed. "I insist upon talking to you. My room is No. 412. I'll expect you there in five minutes."

The girl might have said more, but she observed a man approaching them. It was Mangan. She hurried away.

"Wasn't that the Princess Eiderstrom?" he asked.

"I don't know the lady." Dominey flicked the ash from his cigarette. "She mistook me for someone else. Mangan, there is an odd letter or so I should write, and I'd like to meet you here at some time convenient to you. We could have dinner on the way down."

"Then I'll meet you here about seven."

The time was agreeable, and after a hearty handshake the two men parted. Seaman, who had been watching everything, went across to a door, and with a slight movement of the head beckoned Dominey. They whispered together and then went upstairs to Room 412.

Dominey waited outside, till Seaman asked him to step inside. The beautiful dark girl was waiting for them.

"Congratulations, Sir Everard," cried Seaman, shutting the door. "You are doing very well. There wasn't a trace of an accent in the lounge. You were grand."

"Sit down, Leopold." The girl pointed to a chair. "Mr. Seaman has explained all about your being Sir Everard Dominey, and how important it is for you to succeed." She came close to him and he did not attempt to touch her or sit down. "Leopold, tell him that our seeing each other won't interfere."

"It's bound to," Dominey spoke curtly. His eyes seemed anguished.

"I'm no child," was her answer. "Surely, after all we've been through together—the scandal—the duel—the heartbreak—surely you can trust me."

"It isn't that, Stephanie," Dominey answered. "Anyone who knew us before—seeing us together—would recognise my true identity at once. You do not seem to realise that Sir Everard Dominey is a married man. Until my work is finished, Stephanie, we must stay apart."

"You can't mean that?" Princess Stephanie seemed aghast.

"Sir Everard is right," interposed Seaman.

"You let him make rules about us!" cried Stephanie.

"We have been separated so long now—a short time longer will not matter much." He turned away as if it were anguish to look at her. "If I can carry through this deception we can be together for always, but it would mean failure and separation for ever if we met now. You must understand."

"Princess." Seaman had opened the door. "When you've thought it over you'll realise that this way is best. Sir Everard has a very important engagement. Please excuse him. Good-day, princess."

Princess Stephanie stamped her foot when the door closed behind the two men.

The Haunted Room

THE car passed gates that were rusty and went on up an over-grown drive to pull up before a huge red-bricked mansion. On one side were pretensions of battlements, many of the windows were shuttered and the whole place, like the garden, seemed neglected. A Norman archway was the entrance, and the door was a heavy wooden affair studded with iron bolts.

The two men got out of the car. "Cheerful-looking place," remarked Dominey.

"I told you it was run down, Sir Everard."

"Very much so." He gave a short laugh. "Have to see what can be done about it. My architect, Mr. Seaman, will be down here to-morrow."

Mangan walked up the stone steps and rapped on the door, which was swung open almost immediately. An oldish man in porter's uniform peered forth.

"Well, Middleton, here's your master."

"Welcome home, squire," he stammered out and pulled the heavy door wide.

"Thank you, Middleton." Sir Everard nodded and came into a great stone hall. A bare place except for several suits of armour, a huge candelabra with only a few candles lighted, a wide uncarpeted staircase, and a number of high doors. From a door under the stairs three men and a young girl appeared. Two were gardeners and one an under-butler, whilst the girl was a maid.

The men gave jerky bows, but the girl curtsied.

"How long have you been here?" "Surely you remember my daughter, sir?" said Middleton.

"Oh, yes, yes, of course," Sir Everard grimed. "She's grown much prettier since I went away, but you're the same old piece of parchment."

"Can't say the same for you, sir," Middleton spoke with the familiarity of an old servant. "You look a new man. So hearty—not like when you left. This is a happy day for Dominey Hall, sir."

"Thanks." The baronet smiled at the butler. "Will you bring in my bags, please?"

Sir Everard waited whilst the bags were brought in, and chuckled when old Middleton opened a door and said there was some whisky and glasses in the study.

The sound of heavy footsteps made Sir Everard pause as he turned towards the study. A woman in a long, dragging shapeless dress, tied at the waist with a girdle, and having no form of decorations save black beads with a cross suspended, was walking slowly down the wooden stairs. Her hair was grey, her face expressionless, but the eyes were wide and staring.

"You murderer!" Her voice was a husky whisper. "Get out of this house!"

Mangan and Middleton glanced anxiously at Sir Everard.

"No one wants you here. Go back into hiding where you came from!" raved the woman.

"Mrs. Unthank," Mangan stepped forward. "Be quiet."

"How dare you come here?" The woman stood before Sir Everard and glared at him.

"This is my home, Mrs. Unthank."

"If you wish to keep your position you will learn to respect your master," cried the angry lawyer.

"Respect him?" The woman laughed harshly. "The murderer of my son." Her expression was sinister. "And making a mad woman of his own wife."

"I'll have no more talk from you," Sir Everard pointed to the stairs. "Go to your room."

"You ran away once, and you'll go again," was the taunting hint.

"This time I intend to stay!" Sir Everard replied sharply.

The woman backed again and her laughter was high-pitched.

"Oh, no, you won't, Sir Everard! The screams of Roger's ghost will drive you off."

"I'll risk that."

Mrs. Unthank pointed vaguely.

"He haunts the Black Bog, where you killed him on your wedding-night. Because he loved her and you took her from him—he'll haunt you. He'll haunt you out of this house." She backed to the stairs. There was silence as she climbed those stairs so swiftly. At the landing she looked down. "Go before it is too late."

"Quite a welcome," Sir Everard gave a shaky laugh as the woman vanished.

"The woman's insane!" cried Mangan. "You can't keep her here."

"We'll take care of Mrs. Unthank in due time."

Sir Everard squared his shoulders.

Middleton cackled.

"That did my heart good, sir," he muttered with a shake of his head. "She's been needing a sitting on. It's mostly on her account that folks still believe you murdered Roger Unthank."

"If that were true, Middleton, why was Roger's body never found?" questioned the lawyer.

Middleton looked at his master.

"They claim it sank where you threw it, sir. In the Black Bog. I've tried to tell 'em you was nigh murdered yourself—covered with blood, your arm hanging down. It don't do no good, sir."

His master frowned.

"What's all this nonsense about Roger's ghost?"

"That's no nonsense, sir. Every week it howls around the place at night—like an animal that's hurt. Most people say it was that and fear of the law that caused you to go away," Middleton said with an air of defiance. "They forgot no Dominey was ever a coward."

"I seem to have broken the rule."

"Tisn't being a coward to run off because you love someone and know the sight of you drives her to madness."

"How do you know that?"

"I saw the hurt and the suffering on your face that night her ladyship went into hysterics and ran at you with a knife."

"Sir Everard, I had no idea," murmured the amazed Mr. Mangan.

"Maybe I spoke too freely, sir," apologised the butler.

"That's quite all right, Middleton. I have no secrets from Mr. Mangan." The baronet rubbed his chin. "Do you know if she still feels the same?"

Middleton gave a scornful laugh.

"With Mother Unthank feeding her on hate. Why shouldn't she?"

"I shouldn't see her to-night," urged Mangan. "I should leave it till the morning."

Sir Everard insisted upon his lawyer having a drink. When Middleton said that the bags were inside, Sir Everard suggested going to bed. Middleton, carrying a bag and holding a three-pronged candlestick, led the way.

"Mrs. Unthank has prepared your old room, sir," whispered the butler. "But you don't want to sleep there."

"Why not?"

"The devil walks that part of the house by night, sir."

"Good!" Sir Everard gave a short laugh. "He and I can talk over old times."

Middleton looked shocked.

"It's no joke, sir. My daughter has got another room prepared for you, sir."

"Where does Mr. Mangan sleep?"

"The Blue Room, sir."

"Good, then take Mr. Mangan to his room. I'm sleeping in my old room."

"But something might happen to you, sir. I beg you don't—"

"I hate to disappoint anyone, let alone the devil," snapped his master. "Sleeping in there will put me in touch with things again. Don't argue, Middleton, I have decided."

Middleton insisted upon carrying his master's bag to the room Mrs. Unthank had prepared, but he shivered as he looked round and lit the candles. Sir Everard bade Mangan and Middleton good-night and closed the door. Taking up a candlestick he went round the panelled room, with its stolid, old-fashioned furniture and great four-poster bed. Satisfied that there was nothing to fear, he opened one bag and took out pyjamas, dressing-gown, and a few of his most necessary requirements.

Before getting into bed he pulled back the heavy curtains and glanced out of the window at the grounds of Dominey Hall. The moonlight cast weird shadows. He blew out all the candles save the one by his bedside and climbed between the sheets.

Hands behind his back, he lay there thinking. The wind seemed to get up and whistle round the windows, which rattled. He sat up with a jerk. Had he heard a queer, moaning sound? It was the shriek of the wind. He yawned and blew out the light. He had parted the curtains slightly to have plenty of air, and a moonbeam gave a faint light to the room.

Soon the tired traveller was asleep. The tapestry behind his head rustled and parted. A baro arm came forth, and in the hand was a long knife. Slowly it descended, and as the pointed end touched the sleeping man's chin he awoke.

"Don't move!" came a voice out of the darkness. "I swore that if ever you spent a night under this roof, I'd kill you!"

The arm went up for the fatal blow, but the intended victim was wide awake. He shot out an arm from beneath the bedclothes, and his steely fingers gripped the bare wrist. He turned his hand.

A scream of pain in a voice that sounded like a woman's, and then the arm was jerked back with such force that he was unable to maintain his hold. The hand and dagger vanished.

Sir Everard dragged back the tapestry, but all he saw was bare wall. The killer had vanished through some secret panel. With hands that shook he lighted a candle and slipped into his dressing-gown. Suddenly a queer, high-pitched

"Do not be alarmed, sir," said the schemer. "I shall not fail!"

The policeman seized Mrs. Unthank by the arm, whilst the others stared curiously at the dead Roger.

screaming made him jump round. That wasn't the wind, and it was in the grounds below his window. He jerked back the curtain and peered forth.

At first he saw only the moonlight and many shadows. Something moved, and from some bushes came a thing that was bent almost double. It ran across the lawn with a swift, shambling movement. It was not like a man or a woman, but seemed inhuman.

The adventurer touched his chin and looked at his fingers—blood. It was a long while before he got back into bed.

The Second Attempt On His Life

IN the morning Parkins awoke Sir Everard at eight with some tea. The valet was a talkative old man. He had come down the previous day with a footman and three maids, and already he knew all about the place being haunted.

"Get my bath ready and get out my riding things," ordered his new master. "Yes, sir," Parkins suddenly remembered. "Mr. Seaman, the architect, and his assistant are downstairs, sir. Arrived very early, sir. They stayed at an inn near here and came over early. They seem very anxious to start on the house, sir."

"Tell them to have some breakfast," ordered Sir Everard. "I'll join them shortly, and don't pay too much attention to tales of ghosts. Ghosts don't exist these days."

Attired in perfect-fitting riding breeches—the two men had been almost identical in build—Sir Everard Dominey came down to breakfast. He was stopped on the way by Middleton. Had he heard the ghost last night?

"I'm an old hand with ghosts," cried his master. "I did hear a few noises, but they weren't made by Roger's ghost. Get the horses ready, Middleton. We'll ride round the place."

In the study Seaman sat before a loaded breakfast table. A young, February 29th, 1936.

foreign-looking man was also at the table.

"Good-morning, Sir Everard," greeted Seaman. "This is Du Baret." "How do you do?" The two men shook hands.

"I'd like to get him started on the north tower immediately," said Seaman. "We have decided the tower is the best location."

"You're not wasting time." Sir Everard helped himself from a hot dish.

"If you'll excuse me," Du Baret stood up. "I've finished my breakfast." He picked up a number of blue-prints. "I know the house very well, sir, from these plans. We have workmen arriving at midday."

Seaman waited till the door had closed.

"You heard the news from Servia?" The other paused in the act of pouring out coffee.

"What news?" "The Archduke Ferdinand of Austria was assassinated there yesterday," Seaman grinned. "I see you're surprised. This probably means war. We must get our radio installed and keep in touch with Sir Ivan."

"Seaman, we can't move so fast." Dominey shook his head.

"We've got to," rapped out the pseudo architect. "Scotland Yard's been snooping round my office."

"This affair is more complicated than we ever dreamed." Sir Everard glanced at his fellow confederate. "Strange things happened here last night. A ghost tried to knife me, and—"

Without ceremony the door opened and Mrs. Unthank walked into the room.

"I'll request you to keep your servants out of my part of the house. They disturb my mistress."

"I think that can be arranged." The master glanced at her sharply.

"How is Lady Dominey this morning?"

"As well as can be—with you here." "I wish to see her."

"She won't see you." Mrs. Unthank's voice became harsh, threatening. "She wants you to go away and not come back."

"Are those your words or hers?"

"Hers!" She looked at his chin. "You're a fool to stay here. She hates you."

"That will do, Mrs. Unthank, you may go."

"I will—with pleasure!" The door slammed after her.

Seaman glanced inquiringly at his partner.

"Now you see it's not so easy," was the answer to that glance. "If I cannot make peace with Lady Dominey I cannot stay here."

"Don't be absurd," rasped Seaman. "You must stay. We need you. Lady Dominey is ill. She could die."

"Don't be absurd," Sir Everard said sharply. "We are deep enough without that. Her death would turn the whole countryside against me." He wiped his mouth with the serviette. "I'm going to take a ride round this place and figure out some scheme."

"You have your problems, I have mine." Seaman's eyes were cold. "How you solve yours is your affair, but they must be solved. Failure would be very disastrous for you, Sir Everard."

"I realise that." "I shall be back and forth between here and London." Seaman stood up. "Tell your servants to let me have the run of the house."

Sir Everard went out for a ride with Middleton and gave the old servant, who had been head groom and butler since his master left five years ago, instructions to ride where he thought fit.

"I see the mill-yard wall is down." Middleton looked at his master in surprise.

"That wall's been down for twenty years, sir."

"Oh, yes, I forget. Have it repaired."

"Certainly, sir." Middleton smiled. "It's like old times, having the squire take a real interest."

Sir Everard smiled but made no comment. They came at last to a stream and then a railed-off quagmire that seemed to stretch for some distance among the trees. The master reined in his horse and glanced keenly at the stagnant water, the oozing mud and the decaying vegetation.

"Has this place ever been explored?"

"Why, there isn't a man in all Norfolk that'd go into the Black Bog, sir." He shook his head. "No matter what you paid him. It's naught but a quagmire, and foul with poisonous things."

"Nothing lives there?"

"Snakes, swamp birds, a few wild dogs—"

"Wild dogs?"

"Don't belittle things, squire," the old servant said solemnly. "You heard it yourself last night."

"Bosh!" Sir Everard said sharply. "You sound like Dr. Harrison. Only he says that the whole thing is in her ladyship's mind. I wish you'd tell him that you heard it, sir."

"What good would that do?"

"It might help him to get at her ladyship's trouble."

"There may be something in what you say." The owner of Dominey Hall stared at the Black Bog and then turned away as if the place did not interest him. "I'm going to ride down to the village. You can go and see the tenants on my estate and ask about any repairs they need. Bring me a report, later and I'll get them fixed. Later, I'll talk to you about the houses and cottages in the village that belong to me."

Middleton stared after the new master.

"My, but he's changed. He rides better and he looks better; he went away a pauper and now he seems rolling in money. It's a mystery to me."

In the village a rustic informed Sir Everard that Dr. Harrison was at the White Hart playing quoits with some of his cronies. The doctor at once left his game to come and shake Sir Everard by the hand.

"Welcome—welcome!" cried the tall, gaunt doctor. "Why, you're looking better than when you went away. I heard you'd been dissipating—gone completely to pot."

"Pure gossip." Dominey stroked his moustache. "Can you spare a moment?"

"Of course."

"Let's walk down to the common. I want to talk to you about Lady Dominey."

Dr. Harrison talked during the walk of the treatments he had tried. There were times when Lady Dominey would be so much better, and others when he despaired of her sanity.

"I'm convinced that the only hope for Lady Dominey's return to normal life lies in your love. If that can be rebuilt it may blot out these things that now dominate her mind," the doctor concluded. "But I find it hard to advise because the mere sight of you may bring on an attack—a mental relapse."

"I realise that. That's why I came to you."

"On the other hand, if you are careful, kind, gentle, you may accomplish a great deal. For days she seems perfectly normal, then she suddenly breaks out in an hysterical fit of hatred against you. At such times she seems almost hypnotic."

"If I could only talk to her alone—get Mrs. Unthank out of the way."

The doctor shook his head dubiously.

"I've sometimes doubted the wisdom of keeping Mrs. Unthank on, but your wife depends upon her, clings to her."

"A morbid influence," stated Dominey. "Of course, I could bring a nurse down from London."

"If Lady Dominey would consent that would be wise," the doctor agreed.

"If you get her to come to you instead of forcing yourself on her, you would have a better chance."

"I'll find a way."

"When I heard you had returned I was a bit worried, but your manner reassures me." The doctor beamed his approval.

"You look twice the man you were when you went away." The old man touched the other's shoulder.

"Why, the arm seems as good as ever."

"The arm—oh, yes, of course. It doesn't hurt me at all."

"I did a fine job when I set that fracture. Drop in some time and let me examine it. Are you busy now?"

"Yes, I'm in a hurry—must get back—lot to do." Dominey held out his hand. "Thanks for your advice."

"A pleasure." The doctor raised a finger. "Move cautiously with Lady Dominey."

After parting with the doctor, Sir Everard Dominey rode back in thoughtful mood towards Dominey Hall. He pulled up for a moment near the Black Bog; blew his nose as a whiff of unsavoury odour floated towards him, and rode on. The rest of the day he spent with Middleton discussing repairs and complaints concerning houses and cottages. Seaman and the architect assistant went back early, and soon after ten Sir Everard retired to bed. Several times he had thought about trying to see Lady Dominey, but the doctor's advice made him hesitate upon such a step. He went to bed, but he did not sleep.

"Are you hurt, sir?" cried the distressed Middleton.

At half-past ten he heard that weird, wailing screaming and went to the window. There was no moon, but he fancied that he saw a shadow flit across the lawn. He went over to the bed and pulled back the tapestry, laid his ear against the woodwork, and then dealt it a slight rap. It gave forth a hollow sound. He blew out the candles, but did not get into bed. On a table was a flashlamp, and he took a chair near the lamp. He sat there in the darkness and scarce dared to breathe.

An hour passed, and Sir Everard was thinking of going to bed, when there came a sudden, sharp click near the bed. He leaned forward and tried to pierce the darkness. Then he saw that a white patch was forming. It became lighter and lighter, until he saw that a panel in the wall had slid back and that the other side there was a light. So unexpectedly that it made him gasp, a vision in white was framed in the opening. A beautiful woman, who held in one hand a lighted candle and in the other a wicked-looking revolver.

He stood up, and the beautiful woman with the fixed, staring eyes slowly raised the gun.

"Why do you want to kill me?"

"His spirit cries and cries—telling me I must."

"What you think is his spirit, is only the howling of the wind." He eyed the gun nervously.

"No, it's Roger." Lady Dominey spoke like some lost soul. "Why did you kill him?"

"I fought only to keep him from killing me."

She came closer.

"His blood is all over you. I can see it."

"No, Eleanor." His voice was very soft. He beckoned. "Come closer. Let me show you it isn't. Touch me."

Lady Dominey was under hypnotic influence, and he had learnt in Africa of strange practices among the natives. He knew that his eyes could be compelling. She came towards him, and then she stared slowly at him.

"There isn't any." Her voice was a little different. Her eyes sought his.

"Why are you here?"

"To help and protect you."

"But I don't need you. Mrs. Unthank does that."

"Suppose Mrs. Unthank went away?"

"At once the gun arm stiffened."

"No!"

Dominey showed no sign of his fear. "But she's worked very hard." He was crafty. "She needs a rest and a holiday. I want to get a nurse down from London. Dr. Harrison's suggestion. Oh, you can have Mrs. Unthank around if you like—near you."

The expression in Lady Dominey's face had changed—the hypnotic look was going. The eyes had softened.

"She could live in Middleton's cottage." He moved a step nearer. "I want you to get better, Eleanor."

"I can see her whenever I want?" Lady Dominey whispered. He nodded.

"You want me to be happy?"

"Very happy." Dominey put his hand out and took the gun from her hands.

"You are so kind." Now her eyes were puzzled. "I thought I hated you."

"You don't hate me, Eleanor."

"No, I don't believe I do." She seemed to sway. He slipped the gun into the pocket of his dressing-gown, and then grabbed the candle. This he placed on the table. Her eyes were closed. "Sometimes, when I'm tired, I can't always remember."

February 29th, 1936.

Dominey caught her as she swayed towards him. He picked up the unconscious woman in his arms and walked towards the open panel. A passage and in the distance a light—her bed-room. Gently he put her back into bed and drew the clothes over her. He bent over her and saw she was sleeping.

"In a month's time we'll have you as well and as strong as ever," he whispered. "Lady Dominey, you're very lovely." He blew out the light and tiptoed towards the open panel, closed it, walked along the short secret corridor, closed the panel into his room, and went to bed. It was hours before he slept.

Stephanie Makes Trouble

WHEN Seaman came down to Dominey Hall, two days later, he complimented his confederate on his great progress. Leopold von Ragastein had a reputation for being a capable man, but Seaman had not expected to find someone quite as capable as himself.

A host of men were busy on the estate. The gardens were being weeded, replanted and repaired, new walls erected, fountains set in order and trees pruned. In the house there was new furniture, new carpets, and engineers were busy building an electric plant. The tenants and the village had benefited by the generosity of the master they had never expected to see back in England. Roofs, walls and property were repaired and restored. The local hospitals received generous cheques. Also Sir Everard had succeeded in making friends with his wife.

"Doesn't she suspect you?" Seaman asked.

"No," Dominey laughed. "She has been very ill, and is still far from strong. I act the part of a man who is more a sorrowing friend than a husband. Within a week I hope to have her downstairs, and to be able to ask some influential people here." He glanced round. "There must never be any suspicion, and if we are to succeed we must try to win over not only the people, but those in high places."

"You are doing well, Sir Everard," Seaman chuckled. "Sir Ivan will be delighted. I am doing my part, and all is progressing well. I am going to have alterations done to the North Tower—no one save myself and my men must go there. You understand?"

"Of course. I should like to see the place when it is finished."

"Certainly, Sir Everard," Seaman bowed. "I shall see and report to Sir Ivan in the morning about progress here. I propose to tell him that you are contemplating going into Parliament in the near future."

"Certainly, but expense—"

"Money will be placed to your account," Seaman said with a sly wink. "No expense will be spared to ensure success."

A fortnight passed. To the surprise and delight of the district, Sir Everard spent freely. Everything that needed alterations and repairs was dealt with, and the screaming and howling had ceased. Mrs. Unthank had been placed in Middleton's cottage, and told that if she wished to remain at Dominey Hall she would mind her tongue and her manners. Seaman was there most of the time, but busy with the North Tower. On this day the representative of Internationale Munitions had gone to London; he returned early, and encountered Sir Everard just returning from a drive in the country.

"War comes closer to England every day." Seaman rubbed his thin hands together. "It is only a question of days before the entire Continent will be one great battlefield."

"What makes you seem so sure?"

"This morning the innocent bystander was invaded. The little chap in between always gets crushed."

"England has guaranteed its neutrality." Dominey gave the other a searching glance.

"London is stunned. Waiting for the inevitable moment of playing her part," Seaman smiled. "It is excellent news, and we are prepared."

"We must meet to-night to discuss plans, and—"

A car flashed round the bend in the drive. "Hallo, who is this?"

To the amazement of the men, who should get out of the car but Princess Stephanie. The girl, quite at ease and smiling triumphantly, walked towards them.

"How dare you come here?" cried Seaman.

"This is impossible," stormed Dominey.

"But, Leopold—"

"Don't call me by that name."

"My dear, I couldn't stay away a moment longer." She smiled at her lover.

"Princess, if you persist in interfering—"

Seaman began. "The matter is out of your hands, Mr. Seaman," was her haughty, contemptuous interruption. "I've been to see Sir Ivan Brunn. That surprises you. He approves of my being here—as a casual friend of Sir Everard Dominey. Why not? I know all about your plans—I'll help you. I can talk to the women, and bring you news you wouldn't get otherwise. Oh, I'll be careful and so discreet, Leopold."

"Don't call me—"

He broke off. "Bo quiet—here is my wife."

Lady Dominey came out of the house and across the lawn to them. She was very attractive and looked very well. Her brown eyes smiled happily at her husband, and Stephanie clenched her small hands. The two women were introduced, and Dominey explained that Princess Eiderstron was an old friend, whom he had met in Africa and who had come unexpectedly to England. Lady Dominey insisted that the princess join the house-party.

"Oh, I almost forgot!" Stephanie had turned to accompany Lady Dominey. "I have some regards for you. I saw Dr. Trenk in Calais."

"In Calais?" Dominey was surprised.

"Yes, he's been invalidated out of Africa with fever."

"Is he coming to London?"

"He said not." Stephanie smiled at him, but there was no response.

The two men watched the two women walk towards the house.

"This is dangerous." Seaman touched his companion's arm. "But you must not make an enemy of Princess Stephanie. To be involved with one woman is bad enough—two would be fatal."

"What do you mean?"

"I understand that you give every sign of being in love with Lady Dominey."

"You are well served, Seaman."

Dominey's mouth twisted into a hard grin. "She is very attractive, but don't worry. Nothing on earth will soften me or interfere with my job. You had better cable Sir Ivan, and tell him Stephanie's presence jeopardises our plans."

"I will do so." Seaman came closer.

"By the way, our work here is complete and perfect. You must see it."

Death among the clouds! War in the sky as intrepid flyers clash with the forces of organised crime! Tailspin Tommy returns to the firmament of Fame in a smashing drama that blazes its way across the Pacific to islands of hidden wealth, of lawlessness, of savagery and cannibalism. A wonder serial of unforgettable thrills, starring Clark Williams and Noah Beery, Jun.

Tailspin Tommy, famous civilian flyer and ace of the Three Point Aerodrome, is hired by a wealthy business man named Curtis to make aerial surveys of the oil-bearing island of Nazil, in the far tropical realms of the Pacific Ocean.

Curtis is the uncle of Betty Lou Barnes, Tailspin's sweetheart, and is in partnership with Don Alvarado Casmetto, who owns most of the island of Nazil, and whose daughter Incz has been holidaying in the United States.

The services of Skeeter Milligan, Tailspin's mechanic, are also engaged by Curtis, and the party set out in two planes. But word of their approach is later conveyed to Don Alvarado's unscrupulous stepbrother, Emanuel Casmetto, who seeks to oust his kinsman from Nazil, and who is backed by Raymore, a shady American financier.

An airman known as Frondo is dispatched by Raymore and Emanuel in a fighting plane, with instructions to force Curtis and his friends down on the isle of Mandrogos, inhabited by cannibals.

The machine containing Curtis, Betty Lou and Incz is compelled to land in a jungle clearing, and Frondo then turns his attention on the craft occupied by Tailspin and Skeeter. Ere long, however, Frondo himself is attacked by a mysterious aviator who appears on the scene unexpectedly, a man who calls himself the Eagle.

Yet it seems that the Eagle has intervened too late, for with their plane in difficulties Tailspin and Skeeter plunge headlong towards the crater of an active volcano.

EPISODE 3.—

"Hurled from the Skies"

On Mandrogos

THE machine in which Tailspin and Skeeter were seated was diving straight for the lake of molten lava that boiled and simmered in the crater of Fire God Mountain, and, crouching in the forward cockpit of the falling plane, Skeeter heard his friend's voice calling to him through the telephonic apparatus which kept mechanic and pilot in touch with each other.

"The controls are jammed!" Tailspin jerked out in accents of despair. "It's all up with us, old-timer!"

Whether one of Frondo's bullets had damaged the ship's gear the Three Point airman could not tell for certain. He only knew that the joystick would not budge, despite his frenzied attempts to steer the craft out of its headlong plunge.

Below them lay the yawning crater, and the youngsters were swooping towards their doom at a velocity that left them well-nigh breathless. Indeed, the pair of them had given themselves up for lost when the stick suddenly slackened in Tailspin's grasp.

With a shout of relief the youthful airman pulled it back, and the plane answered immediately, gliding out of its furious dive, flying at a level altitude over the Mountain of the Fire God and then soaring skyward again.

"Gosh!" Skeeter panted, as he realised with difficulty that all danger was past. "Gosh, that—that sure was a close one, Tommy!"

Tailspin made no response. He had turned his head and was staring in the direction of the two machines which were engaged in mortal combat high above the jungle—the Eagle's machine and the outfit piloted by the scoundrel who had forced Betty Lou to descend.

Both the Eagle and his antagonist were clearly no novices in the grim business of aerial warfare, but it was soon obvious that the former was more than a match for Emanuel Casmetto's hireling. For with consummate skill he out-manoeuvred Frondo again and again, pumping lead at him from that hidden weapon whose muzzle was lodged in the centre of his ship's propeller.

Within a few minutes of the Eagle's appearance on the scene a burst of lead raked Frondo's plane from nose to tail. At the same time the Spaniard was seen to throw up his arms as a bullet pierced his fallow neck, and as he slumped lifelessly in his seat his craft took a sudden plunge towards the jungle-clad terrain of Mandrogos, tumbling to destruction amid the dark fastnesses of that savage isle.

The ship crashed to earth in a clearing not far from the volcano, and it burst into flames an instant later. Almost simultaneously the Eagle's plane veered off to the north, belching dense clouds of smoke from its exhaust-pipe, and vanishing within the black confines of the screen.

When at length the fumes had dispersed there was no sign of the Eagle or his strange machine, and once again Tailspin and Skeeter were left to ponder over the identity of their unknown benefactor.

"I'd give my right arm to know who that guy is," Skeeter said.

"He seems to be a friend in need as far as we're concerned, anyway," Tailspin rejoined in a puzzled fashion. "But let's see if we can find out who that other fellow was—the one who tried to shoot us down."

Shortly afterwards the two youngsters were landing in the glade where the hostile aviator had crashed, but on arrival there they realised that they were not likely to obtain many clues from what was left of their foe's ship. It was a mere skeleton of charred and twisted metal, and the body of the luckless airman who had flown it was so terribly burned that none could have recognised him.

Tailspin and Skeeter recoiled from the ghastly spectacle with horror in their hearts, even with a reluctant feeling of sympathy, despite the fact that this unknown scoundrel had endeavoured to hurl them to their doom. Then the mechanic observed a portion of fabric which had escaped total destruction in the fire, and which bore a curious emblem in the form of a panther's head.

He picked up the blistered strip of aeroplane fabric and was examining it when a hail attracted his attention. As he and Tailspin looked round they saw Betty Lou, Inez and Curtis hurrying towards them.

The youngsters made haste to join them and prevent the two girls from approaching the awful sight which the burnt-out plane contained, and as they met in the centre of the glade Betty spoke in a tremulous voice.

"Our ship's in a clearing a little to the east of here," she said. "We watched you boys come down. Oh, Tommy, I thought both of you were gone when your machine started to fall in the direction of the crater."

"It sure was a close call," Tailspin answered through clenched teeth. "But what happened to your outfit?"

"A broken strut," Betty told him. "I was lucky to land without cracking up the plane. I think Skeeter will be able to fix it, though."

Tailspin nodded, and then turning to Curtis he indicated the portion of fabric that Skeeter had carried away from the wreckage at the other side of the glade.

"I don't suppose you happen to know anything about this insignia, do you, sir?" he inquired, with reference to the painted emblem of the panther's head.

It was not Curtis, but Inez Casmetto, who offered a reply.

"Yes, I've seen that insignia before," she exclaimed. "On one of my uncle's planes. It was piloted by a man named Frondo, who once belonged to some South American Air Force."

Tailspin looked at her keenly.

"You mean to tell me that Emanuel Casmetto has a flock of airman working for him?" he breathed.

"Yes," Inez rejoined soberly. "There is a man called Raymore who has financed him—"

"Listen!"

It was Betty who had interrupted the daughter of Don Alvarado, and as she held up her hand in an imperative gesture that commanded silence, an ominous sound became audible to her companions—the deep, reverberating note of drums, echoing sinisterly through the eternal shadows of the jungle.

"Savages!" gasped Inez Casmetto.

"Savages?" Skeeter echoed in alarm.

"Yes," Inez cried. "This island of Mandrogos is peopled by cannibals. While Betty was searching for a landing place a little while ago we passed over one of their villages. We must waste no time if we're to get away before they assemble and attack us."

Quick to act upon her words of warning, the other members of the party followed Inez to the glade where the cabin plane had descended, and here Skeeter speedily repaired the machine's damaged strut. Then he stepped back and proceeded to hustle Curtis and the two girls into the craft.

"There she is, good as new," he said. "You'd better get her in the air, Betty. Hurry, now!"

"What about you two boys?" Betty faltered uncertainly.

"Never mind about us," Tailspin struck in. "We'll be right on your tail. Go on, Betty, close that door and pull out of here. Give her the gun!"

A few seconds later the cabin plane was on the move, and, crossing the ground at ever-increasing pace, it rose bird-like into the blue heavens and circled above the trees ere swinging westward.

Meanwhile, Tailspin and Skeeter were racing through the jungle towards the glade where they had left their own plane, and as they ran it seemed to them that the roll of the native drums sounded louder and yet louder in their ears. Indeed, by the time they gained their ship the forest was alive with a confused tumult, so that their hearts were fairly thumping against their ribs when they scrambled into the craft.

They had scarcely taken their places when there was a fearsome uproar at the edge of the clearing, and as they looked back they beheld a powerful band of dusky warriors swarming from the trees and undergrowth—half-nude, capering figures who bounded forth with shrill outcry, a savage horde armed with spears, machetes, bows and arrows.

Skeeter heard Tailspin start up the motor of the plane, and in the same moment the mechanic broke open a crate that was resting between his feet in the forward cockpit. It was the crate which had been brought from Three Point and which was marked "explosives," and, plucking out one of the grenades it contained, Skeeter drew the pin of the missile and then hurled it at the oncoming natives.

The grenade burst with a shattering detonation immediately in front of the foremost warriors, and half a dozen stricken forms were thrown to the ground. Next instant the remainder of the savages were turning tail, and ere they had recovered from their panic the ship from Three Point was storming across the glade.

With scared eyes the discomfited natives watched it soar skyward and turn in the direction of the west, the direction already taken by Betty Lou, Inez and Curtis.

Prisoners

TWO hours after leaving Mandrogos the occupants of the cabin plane beheld the shores of another island ahead of them, and ere long they were passing over a collection of buildings which were peculiarly reminiscent of a cantonment, or military station.

"Well, this is Nazil," Inez Casmetto told Betty. "Right below us is my uncle's stronghold. My father's place is away at the other side of the island."

Curtis at that moment was leaning forward to "tune-in" on the radio, and soon he was calling Don Alvarado's hacienda. Within a few seconds an answer was received from an operator in the Don's employ, and, at the express request of Curtis, the aristocratic Spaniard was sent for.

It so happened that Don Alvarado was talking to Garcia just then—Garcia, the planter who had bought on lease a tract of the Don's land up in the interior, but who was actually in the pay of Emanuel; and, as Don Alvarado was summoned to the wireless-room, his guest contrived to follow him and take up a position near the threshold of that apartment.

"Senior Curtis!" he heard the Don exclaim into the radio telephone. "It is so good to hear your voice. What kind of a trip have you had? Where are you now? What time do you expect to get here—"

"Hold on there," came the jovial response, which was also audible to Garcia. "Not so fast, my dear fellow. First of all, we've just passed your step-brother's headquarters, so you can work out the time of our arrival for yourself. As for the trip—well, it was thoroughly enjoyable until we reached Mandrogos, where we ran foul of one of Emanuel's flyers."

"You did!" Don Alvarado jerked out. "What happened?"

"He attacked us, but came off worst and crashed into the jungle. I'll tell you all about it when I see you."

Garcia drew back, pursing his lips. Here was disturbing news, and news that must be conveyed to Emanuel and Raymore without delay. As soon as Don Alvarado came out of that wireless-room, Garcia would have to offer his excuses and depart.

Meanwhile, Don Alvarado's conversation with Curtis was being brought to a close, and the link between the cabin plane was severed as the radios ceased to make contact.

In the snug interior of the plane, Curtis turned from the wireless-set and looked back through the craft's windows.

"I don't see any sign of Tommy and Skeeter," he commented, "but the sky's clouded up, and visibility isn't so good as it was."

"Don't you worry about the boys," Betty Lou told him. "They're following us all right. They weren't very far behind us the last time I caught sight of them."

The two youngsters in the open plane were a mile or so to the rear, and when they descried the island's shores their friends were still so well in advance of them that neither ship was within the other's view.

"Say, that must be Nazil down there now," Skeeter declared, as he scanned the panorama below.

Tailspin answered in the affirmative, and, after a moment's silence, Skeeter spoke again. His interest had become focused on the stronghold of Emanuel Casmetto.

"I wonder what that place is," he mentioned. "It has a landing field, but it doesn't fit Inez's description of her father's outfit. Besides, the cabin plane isn't there."

"You're right, Skeets," Tailspin rejoined, "but we've got to stop off here, all the same. We're mighty low in gasoline, and I can't take the chance of going on."

Little dreaming that he was courting danger, the young pilot turned into the wind and descended towards the landing-ground that Skeeter had pointed out, and in a little while the plane was speeding across a dusty compound which was almost entirely surrounded by abode buildings.

Scarcely had the machine come to a standstill than a number of men emerged from one of the dwellings nearby. They were wearing khaki uniforms and sun-helmets, and were armed with rifles and bayonets; and it was in no friendly manner that they sprinted across to the ship and surrounded it.

Tailspin and Skeeter sat motionless in their 'plane as the armed men covered them with their rifles. Sinister-looking fellows they were, these swartly soldiery, but the young Americans did not guess that they were the paid hirelings of Emanuel Casmetto.

One of the men spoke in Spanish, addressing some curt inquiry to the two flyers, but neither Tailspin nor Skeeter had any knowledge of that tongue and could only shake their heads to signify that they did not understand.

"Does anyone speak English here?" Tailspin demanded. "We're on our way to the hacienda of Don Alvarado Casmetto, but we're short of gas."

It was clear that none of the soldiery comprehended him, yet at the mention of Don Alvarado's name sharp glances were exchanged. Then, after a brief discussion among themselves, the group of armed men indicated by gestures that the youngsters must alight from their 'plane.

Tailspin and Skeeter had no recourse but to obey—nor did it occur to them to do otherwise, for even now they were completely ignorant of the dubious nature of their position. Therefore, they clambered out of the cockpits that they had occupied, and without a word they allowed themselves to be escorted across the compound.

They were marched towards a hacienda at the far side of the enclosure, and upon entering this residence they were conveyed to a large, well-furnished room in which two men were seated—one a dark-skinned, thick-set person of truculent expression, the other a tall man with rugged features and shrewd, narrow eyes.

The thick-set person was Emanuel Casmetto, and his companion was Raymore.

One of the soldiers spoke to Casmetto, who listened to him in silence and then, after directing a swift glance at Tailspin and Skeeter, turned to the American who had financed his establishment.

"It appears that these two strangers have made some mention of Don Alvarado," he observed in English.

Raymore started, and eyed the youngsters keenly.

"What's Don Alvarado to you?" he wanted to know.

It was Tailspin who answered him, looking at him steadily the while.

"We've come here to work for him," he explained. "He's engaged us to blaze a trail from the air for a certain pipeline that he intends to lay—"

He paused, for at that moment the door opened and a sallow man in white ducks entered the room. Striding towards Emanuel Casmetto, the inter-rupter engaged the Spaniard in close conversation for a brief spell, and then Casmetto gripped Raymore by the arm.

"A radio message from G," he ground out. "He reports that Frondo crashed to his death on Mandrogos Island! Raymore, there is no longer any doubt that the cabin 'plane which passed overhead a short time ago was the machine flown by my step-brother's partner and the two girls! Nor is there any doubt that these young countrymen of yours, who stand before us now, are the aviators whose services Don Alvarado and Curtis have enlisted. They have admitted it!"

Tailspin and Skeeter had become tense, aware at last that they were in a parlous situation. As for Raymore, his face was a study in dismay.

"Frondo—dead," he breathed. "How did it happen?"

Emanuel Casmetto switched his dark, malevolent eyes upon the two youngsters from Three Point.

"I do not know," he muttered. "You had better ask these fellows here, Raymore."

Tailspin and Skeeter held their peace, however; they had no mind to be communicative now that they realised they were in the presence of foes; and, all attempts to cross-examine them proving fruitless, Casmetto and his associate finally abandoned their inquiries into the fate of their luckless agent.

"Very well, then," Casmetto said harshly. "We will forget Frondo. The fact remains that you are conspiring with my step-brother to rob me of the oil fields of Nazil."

"We haven't conspired at all," Skeeter retorted hotly. "As for robbing you, we've reason to believe that you and this guy Raymore are pretty well up in the art of wholesale looting. Those oil fields belong to Don Alvarado, and you're the ones who are trying—"

"Silence!" Emanuel Casmetto snarled, but Tailspin promptly interposed himself between the mechanic and the Spaniard, facing up to the latter defiantly.

"Listen, you," he said, "we've got a job to do, and we aim to do it. Moreover, we happen to be American citizens, and if you think you can send out some shady aviator to murder us, and get away with it—well, you're liable to run your head right into a noose, see?"

"You show spirit, eh?" Casmetto rapped out, glaring at him. "Maybe you do not understand that I am the Law in this part of Nazil, and that no one questions my authority. American citizens— Bah! you are too far away from your country to talk in that strain."

Ho signed to the armed guards who had brought Tailspin and Skeeter from the compound, and the men closed in on the two prisoners, making it plain that any attempt to escape would be futile. Then Casmetto spoke again.

"We have a dungeon where you will have plenty of time to regret your contract with Curtis and my step-brother," he remarked with an ugly leer. "There you will be kept under lock and key until Senor Raymore and I have decided what should be done with you."

He barked an order to his hirelings, and rough hands were laid upon the captives' shoulders. A moment later the two youngsters were being hustled out of the room, whence they were marched along a dim corridor to a filthy cell built below the level of the ground.

Thrust across the threshold of this prison, Tailspin and Skeeter blundered down half a dozen worn steps to the grimy floor of the apartment, and as the door of the cell was fastened behind them they brought up short within a few feet of a gruesome object that fairly chilled the blood in their veins.

It was a human skeleton enclosed within an iron cage that hung from the dungeon's ceiling—doubtless the remains of some unhappy creature who had fallen foul of Emanuel Casmetto—and with horror in their hearts the youthful Americans recoiled from the grinning countenance which it presented to them.

Averting their glance from the hideous spectacle, they retreated to the middle of the cell and took furtive stock of the room. Dirt and grimo were everywhere, and the atmosphere was permeated with mustiness and decay, the foul air seeming to find no outlet—not even through the solitary window with which the dungeon was provided.

This window was barred with thick rods of iron, and it was situated high up in the right-hand wall, flush with the broad compound in which Tailspin and Skeeter had landed some time previously—a circumstance which they discovered when they stumbled towards the aperture for a breath of fresh air.

Tailspin and Skeeter sat motionless in their 'plane as the armed men covered them with their rifles.

They made another discovery as they raised themselves on tiptoe and pressed their faces close to the bars. Some of Emanuel Casmetto's underlings were engaged in the task of pushing their plane across to a gasoline pump at the far side of the enclosure.

"They're going to refuel her," said Skeeter.

"Yes, but not for our benefit," Tailspin rejoined grimly. "No doubt Casmetto means to make use of her. He'll probably fit her out with a machine-gun, so's she can take the place of the ship that the Eagle destroyed."

"The Eagle," Skeeter mused, pronouncing the name in a low voice. "I sure wish he was around now. Whoever that guy is, he's certainly on our side."

Tailspin bit his lip.

"Yeah," he said gloomily, "but even the Eagle couldn't get us out of this jam—"

Escape!

HALF an hour after Emanuel Casmetto had ordered the removal of the captives to the dungeon, Bill McGuire was summoned to the room in which the Spaniard and Horace Raymore were seated.

"McGuire," Casmetto told the rotund Yankee cook in peremptory tones. "There are two prisoners in the cell at the end of the corridor. After you have fetched a meal for Senor Raymore and me, you had better take them something to eat. Nothing very palatable, you understand. Bread and water will suffice."

McGuire nodded briskly, and then made his way back to his own quarters, where he prepared a repast for Casmetto and Raymore. This having been served, he next set himself to the task of providing for the occupants of the dungeon, and shortly afterwards he might have been seen tramping along the corridor that led thither.

In his plump hands he carried a tray on which two flagons of water and some slices of bread had been placed, and on reaching the door of the dungeon he exchanged a greeting with a slovenly sentinel who was squatting outside it.

The armed guard made as if to rise and open the door for him, but McGuire restrained him.

"Don't put yourself to any bother, amigo," he said in Spanish, addressing the sentry with some sarcasm. "I've got a key, anyway."

He let himself into the dungeon, and was standing at the top of the steps that led to the floor of it when he gained his first impression of the captives; and at sight of them his florid face was transformed by a look of utter amazement.

It was an expression that was reproduced on the features of Tailspin and Skeeter, for in that corpulent form at the top of the steps they recognised Bill McGuire of the "San Francisco Tribune," a newspaper man who had been in close contact with them some months before, when he had been writing a series of articles on civil aviation!

It was with one accord that the two youngsters started forward to greet him, but McGuire had the presence of mind to prevent them from speaking, and with a quick movement of his head he indicated the sentinel who was huddled in the corridor.

Tailspin and Skeeter drew back, and waited in silence until McGuire had closed the door, set down the tray of food and joined them on the lower level of the dungeon's floor.

"Mac!" Tailspin said then, speaking in a hushed voice. "What in the world are you doing here? What made you give up the newspaper racket?"

"Yeah, and what brought you to a hornet's nest like this?" Skeeter put in. "Gee, Mac, I thought you were on the staff of the 'Tribune' for life—"

McGuire glanced back over his shoulder cautiously, and then leaned closer to the two friends.

"I'm still in the newspaper racket," he whispered. "Sure, and I'm gettin' the best story that was ever written for the old 'Tribune'—a story that will one day cover the front page, boys. 'Wealthy American financier plans seizure of rich oil fields on tropic island. Supports Spanish terrorist in attempt to plunder Nazi's resources.' Can't you see those headlines?"

Tailspin and Skeeter looked at him dully, too bemused to grasp his meaning.

"Listen," McGuire continued, "you don't think I'd team up with an outfit like Raymore's and Emanuel Casmetto's, do you? No, sir, I'm here on account of an investigation that started way back in San Francisco, and, before I'm through, the whole world will know just what kind of a rat Horace P. Raymore is. But, say, how did you fellers get here?"

They gave a brief account of their adventures, and when they had finished the newspaper man stroked his fat chin thoughtfully. Then he addressed the pair of them in a solemn tone.

"I've got to get you out of this dump," he stated. "There's no tellin' what Raymore and Emanuel Casmetto might do to you. See here, when I close the door of this dungeon it'll lock automatically, but I've got a key with me, and if I give it to you, you can let yourself out."

He produced the key by which he had gained admittance to the cell, and he handed it to Tailspin, who accepted it thankfully enough, though not without some concern regarding the safety of the reporter.

"Won't Raymore and Emanuel suspect you, Mac?" the youthful airman inquired anxiously. "They've only got to find out that your key is missing, and they'll put two and two together."

"Don't worry about me," McGuire rejoined. "I'll tell 'em you must've stolen it from me while I was dishin' out your grub. But listen, wait until high noon before you make your getaway. Everybody around here will be takin' a siesta then. It gets too hot for 'em to stay awake."

A minute or two later the newspaper man stepped out of the dungeon, and as the door closed behind him Tailspin and Skeeter were left alone in the murky atmosphere of their prison, where they whiled away an hour that seemed like an eternity.

By that time the sun was at its zenith, and was beating down upon the compound and the surrounding dwellings with blistering fierceness, so that even in the dark confines of the dungeon the heat was almost unbearable.

By that time, also, the drone of a man's snoring was audible to the captives beyond the stout door of their prison, a sound which told them that the sentry in the corridor had lapsed into a deep slumber.

They waited another quarter of an hour, and then Tailspin broke the silence that had befallen upon them.

"I guess it's now or never, Skeets," he said.

"I'm ready when you are, Tommy," his mechanic answered in an undertone.

Together they moved across to the steps and climbed to the door, and a moment later Tailspin was inserting the key in the lock. Softly he turned it, and, as he drew open the door without a sound, he and his chum saw the recumbent form of the sentinel beyond the threshold, his rifle lying athwart his knees.

The two friends crept out of the cell, and, coming abreast of the sentry, Skeeter stooped to lay hold of the man's rifle. In doing so he must have disturbed the sleeper, for the fellow roused himself all at once, but, ere he could apprehend what was happening, or give vent to any outcry, Tailspin leapt on him pantherishly and dealt him a blow that scattered his wits.

Next second, the young aviator and his mechanic were hurrying along the corridor, and soon they had gained the compound, where they espied their plane standing near the gasoline pump from which it had been refueled.

There were a couple of soldiers drowsing in the shadow cast by its wings, and these were startled into wakefulness as Tailspin and Skeeter arrived beside the machine. One fell to the butt of the mechanic's borrowed rifle, however, and the other to the bunched knuckles of the pilot's right hand—and both were lying prone on the ground when the ship took off with the young Americans ensconced in the cockpits.

It was the sudden roar of the 'plane's motor that raised a general alarm in the stronghold of Emanuel Casmetto, and as the craft was still climbing steeply from the compound groups of armed men swarmed from the buildings on every hand. Then there ensued a desultory blatter of musketry, and hot lead whistled close to the ascending fugitives.

Several of the bullets ricocheted off the fuselage of the 'plane, but the occupants were unscathed, and the swift-moving ship bore them higher and yet higher till there was little to fear from the rifles of their foes.

A graver danger threatened them, however. For some of Emanuel Casmetto's hirelings had dashed across the compound to an anti-aircraft gun, and soon this was being trained upon the soaring aeroplane.

"Tommy," Skeeter gasped, "they're going to blast us out of the sky with shell-fire!"

Tailspin scarcely heard him. His head was turned towards the north, and his eyes were riveted upon an object that had appeared amongst the clouds. It was another 'plane, a 'plane of unmistakable design—and one which the two youngsters from Three Point had learned to regard with a friendly if bewildered gaze.

"The Eagle!" Tailspin ejaculated.

The mystery ship was bearing down on Emanuel Casmetto's stronghold, was above the compound before the men at the anti-aircraft gun could load the breech; and suddenly a stream of death was raking them, cutting them down where they stood.

Discharged through the propeller-shaft of the Eagle's 'plane, the rain of iron swept half the gun crew out of existence and drove the other half into a panic-stricken flight. It was a fight in which the remainder of Casmetto's hirelings joined as the withering fire spread right and left amidst them, and in the space of a few minutes the entire compound had been cleared—except for those who had fallen under the fusillade.

Ere then, Tailspin and Skeeter were flying in a south-westerly direction over the rolling panorama of Nazi, and as they looked back they saw once again the phenomenon of the smoke-screen that poured from the exhaust of the Eagle's 'plane and masked his departure. "We're safe!" breathed Tailspin. "Safe—thanks to McGuire and the Eagle."

"Yeah, and I wish I knew who the Eagle was," Skeeter declared fervently, "and why he's takin' so much interest in us."

The Three Point 'plane cruised onward, with the indicator on the wing registering a speed of well over a hundred miles an hour, and some time later its pilot and passenger descried a large settlement on the fringes of the island's seaboard.

This, beyond all doubt, was the domicile of Don Alvarado Casmetto. They recognised it from a description that Juez had given them, and as they dropped towards it they saw the cabin 'plane standing at the edge of a landing field which was overlooked by an impressive hacienda.

Five minutes later Tailspin and Skeeter were under escort of a group of soldiery once more, but this time the reception was friendly, and they were at once conducted into Don Alvarado's palatial home, where they met with a warm welcome.

Having been introduced to the Don, they proceeded to explain why they had been delayed, and their audience listened to their story in an awe-stricken silence. Then Inez's father spoke:

"You have had a sample of my stepbrother's tactics," he said slowly. "You will realise now why this once-peaceful settlement of mine is an armed camp, and why I curse the day that I ever allowed Emanuel to establish himself in the northern part of the island. Incidentally, a portion of the great oil fields lies within his domain."

"Has he developed it at all?" Tailspin inquired.

"I believe work has begun," Don Alvarado replied, "but he has spent most of his time and a great deal of Raymore's money in building fortifications. You see, there have already been outbreaks of hostility between his people and mine, and the day is fast approaching when one or the other of us must fall."

"What's the extent of these fortifications you've mentioned?" Skeeter put in. "How strong are they?"

"That I do not know," the Don answered, "but it would be advisable to find out, and you and Senor Tompkins are the ones who can do it. You can reconnoitre them from the air, and—photograph them."

"That should be easy enough," Tailspin commented. "Skeeter's packed a motion-picture camera, and we can get the whole lay-out for you to-morrow. We'll leave for the north immediately after breakfast."

This was agreed upon, and the remainder of the day was spent in a quiet and restful manner. Towards evening, however, Skeeter devoted himself to the task of overhauling his camera, and was engaged on this job when a visitor arrived at the hacienda.

The visitor was Garcia, and Garcia lingered for some time at the residence of Don Alvarado, learning during the course of his stay something of the arrangements for the morrow; and when at length he took himself off, his first concern was to communicate with Emanuel Casmetto, stepbrother of the man who trusted him.

Little did Don Alvarado know that Garcia was an enemy in the guise of a friend. Little did he know, when he went out on to the flying field the following morning, that the mission on which Tailspin and Skeeter were to depart might well be their last.

Accompanied by Curtis, Inez and Betty Lou, the Don followed the two youthful Americans across the landing ground to their 'plane, and a little while later he was calling "Adios!" to them as the craft moved off, a graceful, bird-like vessel that taxied rapidly across the level sward and rose into the air on wide wings.

Later still, Don Alvarado again heard the roar of a motor on the field, and an agitated retainer brought news to him that his daughter and Betty Lou had departed for the north in the cabin 'plane.

It was a piece of news that affected Curtis more than it did Alvarado Casmetto.

"I might have guessed something like this would happen," the American said. "Betty urged me last night to let her follow Tommy and Skeeter with that cabin 'plane, but I naturally refused. That niece of mine is going to get herself into trouble one day with her foolhardiness."

"Well, there is no reason why she should meet trouble to-day, Senor Curtis," Don Alvarado observed. "This reconnaissance of my stepbrother's fortifications should be a simple matter, especially as Emanuel will not be prepared for it."

Thus spoke the Don, and for a while he might have retained that complacency of spirit even if it had been possible for him to witness the progress of his two intrepid agents when they reached the northern tracts which were under Emanuel's sway.

Scouting above the panorama at a height of several thousand feet, Tailspin gave Skeeter ample opportunity of using his camera effectively, and again and again shots were obtained of defensive works created by Raymore and Don Alvarado's stepbrother.

It was a reconnaissance that was carried off without incident until the young aeronauts from Three Point sighted a derrick which marked an attempt by Raymore and Emanuel to here for oil.

A number of men were gathered near the derrick—holding themselves in readiness for a grim act of war, had Tailspin and Skeeter but known it. And as the Three Point 'plane flew within range there was a sudden rush towards a shrouded object that proved to be an anti-aircraft gun.

Thirty seconds later the muzzle of that weapon belched destruction, and as the thunder of the discharge went echoing through the island's hills and forests, a shell burst to the left of the two American flyers, scattering shrapnel in all directions.

Tailspin exchanged a glance with Skeeter, whose face was a study in consternation.

"Looks as if those guys down there had expected us, Skeets," he said tersely, his voice reaching the mechanic through the earphones attached to the latter's flying-helmet. "Yeah, and prepared a welcome for us, too!"

"I was 'thinkin' the same!" gasped Skeeter. "The way they turned out to man that gun—it was just as if they'd been layin' for us. Tommy, do you suppose someone from Don Alvarado's hacienda could've tipped 'em off? Do you suppose somebody back there is playin' a double game?"

It certainly seemed as if treacherous information had been conveyed to Emanuel Casmetto's party, else why should an attempt be made to wreck a passing 'plane that might have no connection with the Don's organisation?

"A spy in our camp, eh?" the Three Point aviator breathed. "Well, this is no time to figure it out, anyway. They're loading the breech again."

Tailspin promptly drew back the joystick and climbed steeply—was still climbing when a second shell exploded close at hand—and suddenly pilot and observer felt the 'plane lurch sickeningly, knew that it had been hit!

Almost simultaneously they were blinded by streaming jets of gasoline that spurted from a damaged wing-tank, and their knuckles were pressed into their tortured eyes as the craft plunged to disaster.

"THE GREAT IMPERSONATION"

He glanced at his wrist-watch. "There is plenty of time before dinner."

Seaman had got so much rubbish and debris on the north side of Dominey Hall that it was quite a task getting to the Tower. He explained that it discouraged visitors. Eventually they climbed the circular stairs of the Tower till almost level with the battlements. A heavy door was their object.

"This is an attic, full of dust," chuckled Seaman. "Come and have a look."

Three times he rapped, and then the door swung open and the two men stepped inside.

It was Du Baret, Seaman's assistant, who had admitted them. The only other person there was a footman, who was seated before a large switchboard. Dominey glanced round at everything, and then grinned his appreciation at Seaman.

"I must say you've handled this job well. Looks to me like the very latest in radio stations."

"It is," Seaman walked across and touched a switch. "This makes the radio antenna pass through the trap-door in the roof. Watch!"

Dominey saw a frame that was obviously an aerial move towards the roof, saw a trap-door open, and gasped his surprise.

"No, sir—not in day-time!" begged Du Baret.

Seaman turned back the switch.

"All right, Hugo, I know." The apparatus slid back into place. Seaman pointed to a lever. "One signal from this and the country's helpless. Either Hugo or Hansen is always on duty."

Dominey shook his head.

"But I don't understand."

"Every one of our operators has a receiving set," Seaman explained. "The instant that we are sure that England will enter the war this sends out a warning, and all the strategic military bases all over the nation are wiped out. You wonder how. Our men have their instructions and the necessary explosives."

"Where are the men?"

"In houses—offices—shops."

Dominey peered at the various gadgets.

"Should I not have a list of them, in case something happens to you?"

"I'll go over the details with you in the morning," Seaman decided. "We'll clean out my London offices and move everything here."

"A very wise move."

"By the way, Sir Everard, cultivate Lord Allison," hinted Seaman. "An old family friend of your wife and a man whom you seem to get on with very well. He is Minister of Munitions. Also get busy with that idea of standing for Parliament—think of the secrets you can unearth."

"I know that all the plants with which Lord Allison is connected are running at capacity," answered Dominey. "I hope to get the names of all these plants, strength of personnel, guards, ammunition being made, et cetera, within the next few days."

"Excellent!" Seaman was delighted, then his face became serious. "But be careful of the princess. That woman might be dangerous."

The princess was delighted to stay the week-end, and she watched Sir Everard like a cat watches a mouse, February 29th, 1936.

and her anger and jealousy grew as she noticed the attention that the adventurer bestowed on Lady Dominey. Obvious also that Leopold was trying to avoid her.

The Duke and Duchess of Devon and many distinguished guests came to Dominey Hall. Eddie Pelham, the friend of the duchess, was there, and Dominey tried unsuccessfully to palm Eddie off on the princess, but without success.

Dominey was talking to Seaman about his Parliamentary venture—well aware that Stephanie was waiting to pounce on him—when a butler informed him that a Mr. Wolff wished to see Sir Everard. Seaman gave an understanding nod, and the two men hurried to the library. A big man, obviously a foreigner, bowed as they entered.

"How are you, Wolff?" Seaman cried. "This is Sir Everard Dominey—you may speak freely."

"The neutral countries have applied to England for aid," stated Wolff.

"England can't refuse," said Sir Everard.

Seaman gave a shrug.

"I don't know—she may."

"Sir Ivan cabled me to get maps showing the points to be attacked here," continued Wolff. "I am to take it to him."

"It was completed this afternoon."

Seaman produced a long envelope. "I was expecting you."

"Thank you." Wolff placed the envelope in his pocket. "One other matter before I leave. It concerns Sir Everard. A very disquieting rumour has reached us from our representative in Africa. A native chieftain says that the Englishman is not dead."

"Not dead!" Seaman looked in consternation at Sir Everard. "Didn't you make sure?"

"He came to my camp raving drunk," rasped Dominey. "He had been deserted by all but one boy. To finish him was simple."

"Well, it must have been just a rumour," said Wolff. "Sir Ivan thought you should know." He glanced at his watch. "I suppose there isn't a car that could take me to the station—must get back to-night."

"Mr. Pelham is going back to London to-night," cried Sir Everard. "I will have him drive you to town."

When Wolff had gone the two men went back to the guests.

"That rumour worries me," muttered Seaman.

"Pure nonsense!" scoffed his confederate. "Is it not dangerous for Wolff to be carrying that map around England?"

"It means nothing to anybody who doesn't understand our plans," explained Seaman. "I alone know the names of our men."

Stephanie was standing by a table laden with glasses, and she eyed the two men narrowly as they approached. Seaman, with a word of apology, went off to dance with the duchess.

"Don't you think you could be spared to walk on the terrace?" suggested the princess.

"I'm afraid not—it's too risky—you'll excuse me."

Sir Everard left her and looked across to Lady Dominey, who smiled her welcome.

Stephanie's expression became shrewish, and after a moment's hesitation she slipped away to the study.

"Operator, get me the Lafayette Hotel in Calais," she whispered into the phone. "Quick!"

It was half an hour before the princess got through to Calais. And as a result of the conversation Dr. Trenk promised to leave for London immediately, and would come direct to Dominey Hall.

The Black Bog

WHEN the guests had retired to their rooms Sir Everard escorted Lady Dominey to her suite. He did not attempt to kiss her.

"A few weeks ago I could scarcely walk." She smiled. "Aren't you glad I'm better?"

"You know I am."

"You're so kind." Her eyes sought his. "You do care for me, don't you?"

"More than anything on earth," he reassured her.

"I know I shouldn't, but that's the way I feel about you."

His eyes were startled.

"Why shouldn't you?"

"Because I know you're not my husband," she told him. "I've suspected it for some while, but to-day I just seem to know."

"But, Eleanor, that is absurd. Why

"My husband was so reckless, wild, and helpless. You're so thoughtful and considerate. And you never kiss me. Then your moustache curls upwards. Who—"

Lady Dominey never completed the sentence, because a wailing scream pierced the stillness of the night. It came from beneath the window of the room.

In a moment Lady Dominey seemed to change. Her eyes became wide and staring, and she looked at him with horror and dread.

"It's Roger—Roger!" she whispered. "Can't you hear him?" She looked at him and shrank away. "You're covered with his blood." With that she fainted.

Sir Everard handed the unconscious Lady Dominey over to the nurse and went to his room. He was determined to clear up this mystery, and he felt that the solution lay with the Black Bog.

Very early Middleton was roused, and the two men rode down to the Black Bog. Here Sir Everard dismounted and walked along the edge of the morass.

"Middleton, look at this." He pointed. "Spirits don't leave tracks." There were marks of huge feet going into the heart of the Black Bog. "I know how to settle this one. Middleton, get some men and dig a ditch here and connect it with the stream. The ditch will drain off a great deal of the water. Get fifty drums of kerosene, run it through this end of the bog, then surround it. When I give the word we fire it."

"I'll have to pay double wages, sir."

"Pay treble if necessary," ordered his master. "Now get busy."

Dominey returned to the house to find Seaman for the first time showing signs of panic. He had got to go up to London at once. Wolff had been arrested.

"The report hasn't been confirmed yet, but we can't be too careful." Seaman held out a large envelope. "I am handing you these papers for safe keeping. There is a list of spies you may find useful—they'll do anything for money. Also the designs of the latest U boats. We may be able to trade them for some information here."

"You would betray your own country?"

"We owe allegiance to no nation," Seaman answered. "Guard these papers well."

"Rely on me," Dominey nodded. "By the way, is the list of our operatives here?"

"No, I'll give you that later—I have no time now." Seaman looked at his watch. "I must hurry. I may return to-night—that depends on Sir Ivan."

After Seaman had departed Dominey enjoyed a hearty breakfast. Middleton appeared to report that the job was in hand, and would be ready to burn by dusk. Breakfast was nearly finished when Eddie Pelham appeared.

"Hallo, Eddie, when did you get back?"

"Just arrived. Been driving for hours."

Dominey tossed across the packet. "Lock this in the desk in my study, and then get some rest."

Later in the day a dishevelled Mrs. Unthank demanded to see Sir Everard Dominey.

"You plan to burn the Black Bog?" she demanded.

"I do."

"If you go on you will not live through this night."

"Your threats don't scare me. I'll take that chance."

Mrs. Unthank reeled back.

"Everard Dominey never spoke like that. Who are you?"

He did not answer, but turned his head. A strange, unusual sound came to them. Mrs. Unthank rushed to the window.

"You fiend! You demon!" she raved. "Stop it! Stop it!"

Dr. Harrison and two of the footmen appeared—they had been waiting.

"Take care of her, doctor," Dominey ordered, and hurried from the room.

The bog was blazing furiously when Dominey joined Middleton. They walked along the wall of fire to see that every man was at an interval of seven paces. Suddenly there was a hoarse screaming. Right in the heart of the flames they saw a creature that looked like a gorilla. Screaming hoarsely, it vanished from sight.

The screaming came nearer, and it was too much for some of the superstitious workers—they fled. Through the flames dashed a misshapen, bearded creature that snarled and showed terrible teeth. Huge hands swung a great club. As Dominey and Middleton raced towards the creature it turned, and, screaming horribly, dashed off towards the Hall.

"Don't let him get away!" Middleton shouted to his men.

Dr. Harrison had succeeded in quietening to some extent the sobs and moans of Mrs. Unthank when from the great Hall came the sound of terrible screaming. The doctor was startled out of his wits, but it brought Mrs. Unthank to her feet. She rushed out of the room.

Dominey, Middleton, the local policeman, and a score of men burst into the Hall. They found Dr. Harrison bending over the unconscious figure of Middleton's daughter.

"She's only fainted," the doctor reported. "But this weal on her face shows that someone struck her or knocked her down."

"He's in here!" Dominey jumped for the stairs. "We've got to capture him before—"

He recoiled as the sound of that terrible screaming rang through the Hall, and then came the sound of a woman's cry of fear and agony. On the landing above they saw the creature with Lady Dominey in its arms, and as Dominey leaped up the stairs there came a shot.

They saw the creature scream horribly, drop Lady Dominey, and sway back against the stairs as if seeking to escape. At the very top the creature swayed and then crashed down in a huddled heap, to come to rest in a hideous, contorted shape by Sir Everard's feet. More drama was to follow. A voice from the top of the stairs spoke. It was Mrs. Unthank, and in her hand was a gun.

"I saved my son." She looked at Dominey. "I'd rather have him dead than have you get him. I know it was wrong keeping him there and taking him food—upsetting her. But he was happier that way—happier than he would have been shut up with a lot of crazy people. He loved her—I loved him. We kill the things we love." The gun slipped from her hands.

The policeman rushed forward and seized Mrs. Unthank by the arm, whilst the others stared curiously at the dead Roger.

Sir Everard left Mrs. Unthank in Dr. Harrison's charge, instructed Middleton to remove the body, and himself carried the limp form of his wife back to her room. She seemed so lifeless that he yelled for Dr. Harrison to come at once.

"After a shock like this, if she pulls through she may be perfectly normal or her case may be hopeless." He gestured towards the door. "Hear that noise—that's Mrs. Unthank. She's quite mad and raving about all that happened on the fatal night. That mystery is cleared up." He bent down. "There are signs she is coming round. I think it would be unwise for you to stay."

Sir Everard was pacing up and down outside the bed-room when a servant appeared to say that Mr. Seaman had just arrived and wished to speak to him.

To Save England

SEAMAN looked pale and worried. "Sir Ivan has left England but sent me a message. I must leave for the Continent at once. You will be in full charge here. England will declare war to-night."

"How do you know?"

"My information is always correct," Seaman pointed to the clock. "It is now eight-thirty. At nine we send our signal and carry out our plan. You know the code word?"

"Strike!" answered Dominey. "But with you gone I must know who all our men are."

Seaman produced a list. "All the names are here. Woolwich and Rosyth will be destroyed first."

"Excellent. I'll give the signal at nine." He touched a bell. "Eddie Pelham is here and running up to London on a job for me—he'll give you a lift."

"I can't see why you encourage that young ass round here," Seaman muttered. "No brains."

"Nor have a lot of other people," said Dominey. "But Eddie is a good driver. Ah, here he is. Eddie, you're taking the roadster to town—I want you to give Mr. Seaman a lift."

"I'll be ready in five minutes, Sir Everard." His eyelid seemed to twitch.

Scarce had Pelham gone when the door opened, and who should walk in but Princess Stephanie and Dr. Trenk.

"Hallo! Thought you had gone back to town this morning!" cried Seaman.

"I went back to meet Dr. Trenk," Stephanie spoke clearly. "For some while I have been suspicious of our friend here. He played the part of Sir Everard Dominey too well. Dr. Trenk will identify him."

"My dear doctor, this is a great pleasure," Dominey's voice had changed. It was harsher and had an accent.

Dr. Trenk stepped closer.

"Your accent does not deceive me," he cried. "You are not Baron Leopold von Ragastein. It is the Englishman!"

"What?" gasped the incredulous Seaman.

The princess pushed the doctor to one side.

"What did you do with Leopold?"

"Baron von Ragastein is dead," Dominey answered, and turned to Dr. Trenk. "When you discussed your plans with Von Ragastein, to do away with me, you should have chosen a house with thicker walls."

"So you tricked us!" raved Seaman, and whipped out a gun.

Crash! Dominey had swung his fist hard to the crook's jaw. Before Trenk could make trouble Dominey seized him by the shoulders and hurled him across the room. A rush to the door, and Dominey laughed as he locked the door.

Outside the house Eddie Pelham was waiting.

"Get to London headquarters quick. Tell them to round up these spies!"

The car roared away, and Dominey charged back into the house. Middleton, a number of plain-clothes detectives, and several servants appeared—they had been told to stand by in case they might be needed.

"Upstairs—my study!" Dominey shouted.

A gun crashed. Seaman had blown the lock away with his gun and escaped. Dominey knew he would make for the North Tower. The time was now ten minutes to nine.

In the study Princess Stephanie stood with her back against the desk, whilst Dr. Trenk cowered back against the window.

"Watch them!" Dominey rapped out, and was gone. "Some of you men follow me."

Dominey flung open the door that led into the North Tower.

Crack! A bullet ricocheted past his head but he did not hesitate. Up the stone stairs he charged, and saw Seaman ahead of him. He flung himself flat as the gun spoke again, but the shot had gone wide of the mark. The traitor did not wait, but moved towards the radio-room—the message "Strike" must be sent.

Near the door Dominey caught up and flung himself on the other's shoulder, but Seaman managed to wriggle free, and, bringing up the gun, fired blindly. Dominey staggered, fell and slipped down the hard stone stairs. The other laughed vindictively and swung open the door of the radio-room.

Painfully, Dominey got to his feet and staggered to the open door, clutching at his shoulder.

"Quick! Send the message!" Seaman shouted to Hansen, the footman.

From his pocket Dominey drew out a gun and, summoning his failing strength, fired at the valves on the switchboard. The tubes were shattered and the set ruined. With a snarl of fury, Seaman swung round to shoot down the man who had ruined his plans. The detectives burst into the room, a gun roared and Seaman collapsed in a heap.

With a groan Dominey sank to the floor.

"Are you hurt, sir?" cried the distressed Middleton, as he bent over the prostrate body of his master. Sir Everard groaned feebly and went limp in his arms.

One detective stood over the prostrate form of Seaman, whilst another covered the bogus servant. They were not taking any chances against these two traitors.

Dr. Harrison was summoned, and after a quick examination, reported that a bullet was embedded in Sir Everard's shoulder, and that though there was no immediate danger it was essential that an ambulance take the wounded man to London.

With the help of Eddie Pelham, who had been in the know about Sir Everard's true identity almost from the start, a whole nest of traitors and spies was arrested and enough explosive to blow up most of London was seized. The Secret Service had been keeping a close watch on Sir Ivan Brum, and with the help of the French police the millionaire owner of Internationale Munitions was arrested in Paris.

In a private ward of the big hospital Sir Everard Dominey was propped up in bed. He was reading a number of daily papers, and the headlines made him smile: "Sir Everard Dominey Exposes Internationale Munitions Ring—Sir Everard's Thrilling Exploit Rewarded."

The door opened and in stepped a very beautiful woman. Lady Dominey kissed her husband fondly and proudly—she was completely cured from Mrs. Unthank's hypnotic influence.

"Sir Gerard Hume wishes to see you, dear," whispered his wife.

Sir Gerard was brief. "The War Office needs men like you. You must hurry up and get well"—a glance at Lady Dominey. "With a nurse like this it should be a matter of minutes."

"Give me a week and I'm game for anything," laughed Sir Everard.

"A week it shall be," answered Sir Gerard Hume, and talked for a while of the war and how an offensive had been begun on a hundred-mile front. "You've done a great thing for England, Sir Everard," were his parting words.

"England has done a great thing—for me!" retorted Sir Everard, and smiled at his beautiful and happy wife.

"HEIR TO TROUBLE"

hammer in the door with lumps of rock—and Dwyer raced away to the buckboard, sprang up on to it, and snatched the reins from the driver's hands.

Motley, holding the baby, yelled to him to stop, but with bullets singing past his ears Dwyer turned the horses and sent them careering downhill.

The miners and surface workers had disappeared, the door of the shack was sagging on its hinges, and the cowpunchers were swarming round Ken whom they had released. Motley scurried over to the plunger, deposited the baby on the ground, and stood waiting.

Ken saw him. "Gimme that gun, Hank," he said, and with his chum's six-shooter in his hand advanced towards the crook.

The rest of the outfit followed him, but Tarzan had caught sight of the baby on the ground and sensed danger for his charge. Off he ran round the rocks, passing Ike Davis, who was lurking there with a rifle in his left hand, and he reached the boulder.

Motley stood over the plunger, wild-eyed and desperate.

"The game's up, Motley," said Ken sternly when he and his companions were within twenty yards of him. "You'd better come quiet!"

"Don't come any closer," roared Motley, "or I'll blow us all up! This place is undermined! Clear out!"

Ken stopped short, and as he did so he saw Tarzan streak round the boulder, pick the baby up in its clothes between his teeth, and gallop off with it back behind the rocks.

"There's nothing else for us to do, boys," he said. "Let's fall back slowly."

Reluctantly the cowpunchers backed away from the instrument of destruction and the man who crouched over it. But Ike Davis had climbed a rock, and on the top of it he rested the rifle, took aim, and, with the forefinger of his left hand, pulled the trigger.

A shot rang out and Motley, with a bullet in his back, fell forward over the plunger.

A terrific explosion followed, almost, as it seemed, under the feet of Ken and his friends. The mouth of the mine belched smoke and fragments of rock, a cloud of dust ascended, and for a few minutes everything was blotted out by a pall of blackness.

The earth was shaken by that explosion, and several of the cowpunchers fell flat upon their faces. But gradually the air cleared, and the dust and the debris settled; but Ike Davis had been shaken from his perch and had broken his neck, and John Motley was dead.

Tarzan came running round the rocks with the baby, and the baby was unharmed.

"Good work, old man," said Ken shakily. "You saved his life!"

Jane came driving up on Motley's buggy. Tired of waiting for Ken in his shack she had just started off for home when the explosion had frightened her nearly out of her wits, but it had caused her to turn in the direction of Motley's mine.

She saw Ken with the baby in his arms, and Tarzan when fussed over by the boys of the Bar-X. She stopped the buggy and sprang down from it, and she ran to Ken with outstretched hands.

"Oh, Ken," she cried in a panic, "whatever's happened? Whatever's happened? Are you hurt?"

"Not me," replied Ken grimly, "but your friend Motley's come to a bad end, and it looks like he's made a wreck of his mine!"

She looked down at the baby, and it smiled at her; she looked at Ken and caught hold of his arms.

"I've been an idiot, Ken," she said, with tears in her eyes. "Can you forgive me?"

"So far as I'm concerned," he replied, kissing her in front of all the cowpunchers, "there's nothing to forgive. But it does look uncommon like as though we might have to take a baby with us on our honeymoon, Jane!"

EXCUSE MY GLOVE

A Boxing Thriller

STARRING Len HARVEY

A bespectacled, harmless young collector of stained glass is tricked into fighting at a fair-ground boxing-booth for a purse of five guineas. It is the beginning of a ring career, which eventually leads to a fight for the cruiser-weight championship. Starring Len Harvey and Archie Pitt

A Purse of Five Guineas

"HALLO, hallo, hallo! Here we are again! Bill Adams and his bonny, bounding, boxing wonders. And when Bill Adams, former light-weight champion of the world, says they're wonders you can bet they're boxing wizards."

The scene was Banbury Fair, one evening in early May. The booth was a dilapidated one, lighted by spluttering oil lamps, and its walls were decorated with badly drawn and very faded pictures of famous boxers of the past. On the platform outside the tent stood a little man in a grey suit—much worn—and wearing a grey bowler, almost white from much washing. He was beating upon a large drum. With arms folded across their chests were his boxing wonders; squatting on the platform was a huge bulldog, as a symbol of English pluck and endurance.

Such was the boxing-booth of the famous Bill Adams. His men were billed as coming champions, but a humorist remarked that he reckoned they should be billed as "going." The thin, weedy boxer with the mournful expression was Perky Pat, the much-too-fat veteran was Hurricane Hal, whilst the other two were of no importance because they were just fair hands who stopped well and helped to make a show. The admission prices were sixpence and a shilling. The crowd was small and not very enthusiastic or eager for admission.

"Here I have a stable of as likely a bunch of lads as ever hit the squared circle," shouted Bill. "Walk up! Walk up! The world's greatest demonstration of scientific pugilism is about to start. Bill Adams, the man what never lets you down, has a bunch, with every one the March 14th, 1936.

fighting technique at their finger-tips—a knock-out in every punch."

Feeble clapping but no attempt towards entering the booth.

"Ladies and gentlemen, just to whet your appetites, I'm going to introduce to you the greatest fighter of the day." A curtain was pulled aside and on to the platform stepped a tall, fierce, unshaven rascal, who squared his mighty shoulders and scowled like a gorilla. "I have the honour to present Big Bob Ruffer, heavy-weight champion of the Navy, three years cruiser-weight champion of Brittany, the Canary Islands, Jamaica and British Somaliland." As an afterthought, he added: "And Champion of Australia."

"I come from Australia," cried a voice from the crowd. "And I thought—"

"As I was saying, the Champion of Austria," Bill cried quickly. "Ladies and gentlemen, the champ challenges any gent present who thinks he can stay three rounds. And if he does, I, personally, will pay him the magnificent sum of five guineas. What gent will have a go?"

"I will," boomed a voice, and a broad-chested man pushed his way to the front. "I'll knock his block off."

"Blimey!" Bill muttered, then spoke out of the corner of his mouth to Pat, who was holding a pair of boxing-gloves. "Give 'im the go-by."

"Gimme the gloves," boomed the man, who was a blacksmith.

"Don't let 'im have 'em," whispered Bill. "Chuck 'em to somebody soft."

Strange how a fair will lure people with the sound of its strident music of the roundabouts, the shouts of the coconut-shy owners and other stalls. A tall, peaceful youth, rather clumsy of build and wearing thick, horn-rimmed spectacles, felt the lure and somehow found himself before the boxing-booth. Pat spotted him as a mug, and tossed him the gloves, which he foolishly caught.

"Good lad!" roared Bill. "Step this way!"

Thus did Don Carter, who was down on a week's holiday, get involved in the boxing game. Before he knew what was happening he had been pushed on to the platform, and everyone was cheering—except the blacksmith, who was muttering something about a frame-up.

"But I don't want—" began the sallow youth.

"Go on!" yelled Bill to drown his words. "He won't hurt you."

"But I can't box."

Bill winked to the other boxers, and Don Carter was taken into the tent, whether he liked it or not. Quite a fair proportion of the crowd followed, and most of them had sixpennyworth, much to Bill's annoyance.

Now, a tall, handsome woman and a very pretty young girl chanced to come to Banbury Fair. Mrs. Stafford, known to most of her friends as Aunt Fanny, had a country house not many miles away, and staying with her was her niece, Ann Haydon. Fearing that eighteen-year-old Ann might be a little bored with country life she took her to the fair, and after sampling the various stalls they were making for the car when they passed the booth. Pat, at the pay box, was shouting mournfully to those that seemed loath to part with sixpence, that a titanic struggle for a purse of five guineas was about to start. A battle of giants.

"Room for a few more only," moaned Pat. "Ruffer, the champ, versus the Mystery Man. Walk up! Walk up!"

"A fight!" cried Aunt Fanny, her eyes alight. "Come on, Ann!"
 "But won't it be rough and gory?" protested the girl.
 Aunt Fanny snorted.
 "It'd better be, or I'll demand my money back. Come on!"

They were given ring-side seats. Aunt Fanny looked first at the big Ruffer, and curled her lip, then inspected the Mystery Man. Don had stripped to the waist, but looked strange wearing trousers that seemed to want to come down. She had to smile at the thick, horn-rimmed glasses.

Hurricane Harry was acting as a second and was holding Don's coat and waistcoat. Aunt Fanny saw the young challenger take out something thin and brittle from his pocket.

"That's a very old piece of church window," said the young man. "It's very valuable to me. I collect stained glass, you know."

"You think about yer business," muttered Harry. "And let's 'ave these windows as a start." He removed the spectacles.

"Now for the fight of the century," Bill Adams shouted from the centre of the ring. "A three-round contest for a purse of five guineas. Let me introduce the antagonists. On my left, Big Bob Ruffer, the champion—undefeated." Little applause, much to his disappointment. "On my right, the Mystery Man from Nowhere—the great Unknown. One hundred and sixty pounds of dynamic energy."

"Cut the tackle!" yelled a voice.
 "Such a kid against that big hulk," whispered Ann to her aunt. "It seems a shame."

"Don't be too sure," answered Mrs. Stafford. "The kid looks fit; the big palooka's full of fat and beer."

The preliminaries finished, the two men shook hands and the bout commenced with sparring tactics. Ruffer was playing with his man.

"How much in the 'ouse?" whispered Bill Adams by the ropes.

"Two pounds three shillings and a French franc," Pat answered. "I hope Ruffer—"

"Pipe down," hissed Bill, and moved away. He was also acting as referee of the fight.

Ruffer suddenly let loose a number of wild swings. Carter instinctively ducked and backed away hastily. Ruffer, leering horribly, went after him. The boxers circled the ring, Ruffer swinging wildly and Carter just managing to stay out of reach.

"What's this?" shouted the blacksmith, who had got into the tent somehow. "A walking match?"

The youngster was much lighter on his feet than the ponderous Ruffer. He continued to back away, and Ruffer at last lost patience, flung himself forward, and loosed a mighty swing. Carter ducked and Ruffer swung round like a top. It was the Mystery Man's chance and he smacked the champ hard on the ear. Ruffer staggered, let out a bellow of rage and rushed at the man who had dared to strike him. The collector of glass did not like his expression and ran, with Ruffer chasing round the ring after him.

"Run home to yer granny and let a real feller tackle him!" roared the blacksmith.

The bell sounded the end of round one. The crowd had enjoyed the fight for more reasons than one. It was the funniest fight they had ever seen, and they had seen the big ape get a sock in the ear. In their excitement several clambered up the poles of the tent for a better view.

"If I was you, I'd try and hit him," Bill Adams advised his man a little anxiously. The champ was puffing and blowing.

Don Carter, in his corner, was as fresh as a daisy. The simple youth was rather enjoying the experience, and for some extraordinary reason he had a keen desire to hit the champ in the face.

Bill Adams glanced across the ring.

"I'll advise him to wade into you," he whispered. "Then let him have it."

The champion nodded, and Bill walked across the ring to the other corner. "Listen, kid, you've got him winded. Wade into 'im this round and it's all over."

The bell went for round two. Don sprang out of his corner, rushed across the ring, and socked the astonished Ruffer in the jaw with a blow that rocked the Champion of Austria.

Ruffer staggered back, waved his arms foolishly, and then rushed at Don, who stepped to one side and landed another punch to the unshaven face. Ruffer was hurled back against the ropes, which broke, and the champion landed in Aunt Fanny's lap. Aunt Fanny, aided by the blacksmith, pushed Ruffer back into the ring. Bill rushed across and began feverishly tying up the ropes.

The champion was enraged, and he sprang forward with the intention of smashing Don Carter to pulp. Hammer and tongs they went at it, both displaying very little skill, but just a trifle more quickness and accuracy by the challenger. A left hook landed to Ruffer's chin and the Canary Island champion went down with a bang to lay still.

Bill Adams took a long time before he thought about counting.

"You shut up!" he yelled at the crowd. "Can't make meself heard. One—two—" He kicked the prone Ruffer. "Get up, you big sissy, get up. Four—I mean two—three—" He kicked Ruffer again. "Four—don't make so much noise!" This was to the shouting, jeering crowd. "Five—six—" He glanced across the ring at Pat and gave a faint nod. "Seven—eight—" Pat clanged the bell.

"Somehow," Aunt Fanny said, loudly and acidly, "I don't fancy this fight's on the level."

"What's the matter with you?" hissed

Bill Adams took the cheque and stared at it as if it were too good to be true.

Bill Adams in Ruffer's car. "We ain't got five pounds. Get that into your fat head. Listen, if you can't beat this kid keep away from him; you got to stick out the next round or we're sunk."

Don Carter was enjoying himself now. This fight racket was grand fun. Clang, it was the bell, Carter landed with a body blow that made Ruffer grunt and go into a clinch. Ruffer forgot Bill Adams' advice and charged at Carter with his remaining strength. There were a few seconds of hard fighting, and Ruffer did land a punch that must have hurt. Carter just shook his head, grinned, and came back into the fight. Don took the fight to his man and Ruffer waved his arms in a futile effort to evade the rain of blows.

He sagged back against the ropes and slid to the canvas.

It was at that precise moment that the pole of the tent decided that it could not bear four stalwart men any longer and proceeded to snap. Part of the cheap sixpenny seats were supported by cross-hairs from the main pole to smaller poles. This staging sagged, people were flung forward and a mild panic started.

Don Carter, perceiving that a nicely-dressed woman and a very pretty girl looked like being trampled upon, decided that they needed his help. He vaulted over the ropes, got between the two women and the struggling crowd. Part of the tent came down with the pole and sagged across the ring. The crowd, in a panic, burst their way through the wall of the tent by slitting it with a knife. Don Carter did not mind very much what happened because he had a protecting arm round Ann.

Bill Adams, staring in dismay, suddenly had a brain-wave. He stood in the middle of the smashed ring and yelled.

"I give the fight to the champ. The kid's disqualified for leaving the ring!"

Ruffer Vows Vengeance

ON the seat of a caravan sat two young people, Don Carter and Ann Haydon.

"They seem to have made a good old mess of that booth." Don looked across at the wreck of a tent. "You know, I feel ashamed of myself—fighting in a fair ground."

"You needn't. A clean fight is nothing to be ashamed of."

"Fighting doesn't interest me."

"What does?"

"This!" He drew out the precious relic, "Ancient stained glass."

"I adore stained glass," said Ann, but her face belied her words.

"Do you?" Don Carter had not seen her face. "I'm so glad. Now take the fifteenth century—"

A much more important scene was being enacted inside the caravan, which served as a sort of dining-room for the more important members of the fair. Bill Adams, Hurricane Harry and Perky Pat lolled about and stared morosely at Big Bob Ruffer, who was busy stuffing clothes into an ancient kit-bag. Near the oil stove sat Mrs. Stafford.

"So you're going?"

Ruffer turned on Bill Adams. "You bet I am," he snarled. "I ain't staying 'ere if you're taking on amateurs. Think I'm going to stay 'ere with you 'nting you would like to 'ave that spotted-boob working for yer—not likely. If I weren't ill I'd knock him flat. I got a reputation to take care of. You can keep your perishing show."

"Perishing show is right," sighed Bill. Big Bob Ruffer eyed them all malevolently.

"I've been wasting my time and my skill with this dumb show, Bill Adams. March 14th, 1936.

You gave me a lot of promises and ain't fulfilled any of 'em. I don't owe you nothing, but one day I'll pay you back. See if I don't!"

"I didn't fulfil 'em," Bill Adams retorted. "And why? Because you would never train—your idea of training was beer."

Big Bob Ruffer clenched his fists. "I should go if I were you," Aunt Fanny said softly. "There is an in-offensive young man not far from this caravan and I think he could deal with you very effectively. Good-evening!"

Big Bob Ruffer stamped out of the caravan. The two young people edged aside to let him pass.

"Good-evening," Don Carter said politely. "No ill feelings I trust?"

"One day I'll push your face in," threatened Ruffer, and slumped off quickly for fear the placid young man with the punch might take exception to the remark.

Inside the caravan Aunt Fanny was laying down the law.

"Why moan over that drunken waster? You've told me how your takings have been falling off for months, and how you've not dared to put Ruffer up against a good man on account of the drink. Why don't you use your brains? You've got hold of a natural fighter in that boy. Obviously he isn't keen on going back to his clerking job, and if you're wise you'll persuade him to stay with you. I know a scrapper when I see one. All he wants is training."

"If I could get hold of a real champ I'd give my right eye." Bill Adams fingered a damaged eye and winced. "Er—me left one."

"Get out of this fair-ground racket," Aunt Fanny rapped out. "Start working on that lad." From a handbag she produced a card. "Here, take this, it's my card. I'm interested in that boy." She glanced at her wrist-watch. "Gee, I must be moving. So long!"

Aunt Fanny nodded her head and grinned as she saw the two young people seated close together. Well, she would rather have Ann fall for a fighter than some of the soft young men that seemed to trail around after the girl.

"I liked your fighting," vigorously exclaimed Aunt Fanny, after she had coughed discreetly. "One day I'll hope to see you in the Albert Hall. Bill's got the place where we live—only a few miles away. Look us up. Come on, Ann!"

Vigorously she shook hands. Ann gave the youngster her hand shyly, but her eyes were very bright. Don Carter stared after them till they were lost among the crowd in the fair ground.

It was Bill Adams slapping him on the shoulder that disturbed him.

"Do you know who that was?" He waved the card about. "Mrs. Fanny Stafford. She's one of the greatest sportswomen in the country. Her old man was a cowboy millionaire. She likes the shape of you. Here, take off that coat."

Hurricane Harry, Perky Pat and Bill Adams dragged off the coat and shirt of the bewildered collector of stained glass. Bill Adams began to feel his muscles, his stomach—in fact, a general inspection.

"Not bad," cried the ex-champion. "A pound off here and there, straighten those shoulders, brace some of these flabby muscles and we might make something of you." He turned on the other two boxers. "I reckon it can be done. What do you boys think?"

"I agree with what the lady said," muttered Hurricane Harry. "He's raw, but he's a find—we might do worse."

"It's a bet!" Bill Adams shouted.

"But I don't quite follow what you're talking about," murmured Don Carter. "What are you betting about, may I ask?"

"Come inside and we'll talk it over," Bill Adams grinned, and took Don's arm. "Better not stand outside 'ere like this, or some of the folks will think you're baby."

Like a lamb Don Carter allowed himself to be led into the caravan. Thus did he embark on the career of a boxer. The fact that Ann lived in the district had a great deal to do with it.

The Fight Promoter

BILL ADAMS found a dilapidated old barn, which he managed to get at a cheap rental. Bill paid the first week's rent, and was full of excuses when the landlord demanded the money for the ensuing weeks. Eight weeks had Bill managed to stay in the barn, but he felt that he couldn't hope to stay there much longer without paying. Hurricane Harry and Perky Pat acted as sparring partners to Don Carter, and they went at their task with a will in spite of the fact they had not been paid for weeks.

With punch-bag, medicine-ball, gymnastics, sparring with Harry and Pat, and road work, Bill Adams was turning the collector of stained glass into a first-class fighter.

Very soon Don Carter was able to make rings round Hurricane Harry, and the veteran had to beg the youngster to pull his punches as his ribs weren't as good as they used to be. It was a happy life the four led, and the only cloud on the horizon was the landlord—daily that cloud grew larger and more ominous.

Queer how rumour flies, but it was known pretty soon in the boxing world that Bill Adams had left the fair-ground business and had started a training school and that he had a new lad that showed promise. Those that passed on the story scoffed at the idea of Bill Adams finding a promising fighter. But one man who heard the rumour made a note of it and decided that some afternoon he would look in on Bill Adams—it was always as well to be on the safe side. The occasion of his visit was a sunny afternoon when Bill Adams was dodging round the barn and out-houses trying to elude the landlord.

Don had a fast try-out with Hurricane Harry, whilst Pat leaned on the ring and shouted advice to which neither paid the least attention. Naturally, they did not observe the large, smooth-faced man with the bowler hat slightly at an angle and an aggressively large diamond ring on a fat finger. Such was Madigan, trainer and fight promoter.

Madigan, cigar in corner of mouth, leaned against a rickety door and watched the scrap with critical eye. Now and again he would nod his head as if approving, and when Hurricane gave in through want of breath, Madigan strolled forward.

"How do, boys?" Madigan grinned at Harry and Pat. "I'd like a private word with this gentleman, if you don't mind."

"Sure," agreed Hurricane. "I gotta give Don a rest anyway."

Madigan twirled the cigar and waited till they were alone. "My name's Madigan—you heard of me?"

"No"

That jolted Madigan for a moment, but that oily smirk was seldom far from his face.

"I'll tell you something—you're shaping well for a youngster. You got style." He took out a card. "But you'll get nowhere with Bill Adams. Why not join my string and have a real manager?"

"I don't quite get your meaning?" Don answered.

"I'm making you a proposition I don't make to any raw kid. Everybody knows me—I'm managing the coming champion. What I've done for him I can do for you."

"Are you asking me to leave Bill?" Don said sharply.

"Just that!" was the blunt reply. "Well, you're wasting your time." Don's answer was just as blunt.

Madigan shrugged his shoulders. "There's my card. If you change your mind you know where to find me. Good day."

A moment later Bill Adams came rushing into the barn. "Don, what was that crook after?"

Don smiled. "Nothing. Only told me you were a dud, and that I was wasting my time with you. If I had nothing better to do he would be pleased for me to join his string. I said 'nothing doing'!"

"One day I'll lay my fist across his kisser," Bill Adams was wrathful. "He would come nosing round when I'm dead broke."

Don started to do some skipping. "Have you pacified the landlord?"

"No!" Bill answered. "Swears he'll out me if I ain't got the brass by to-morrow noon." He scratched his head. "I think he means it this time!"

Harry and Pat made their appearance and stated that they had also seen the landlord, who had threatened to take the goods and chattels of the Adams School if he did not get his money.

"Isn't there some lad round here I could fight?" suggested Don.

"We've got to get some money," cried Bill. "And if we had some dough we could issue a challenge, but one can't fix a purse if you ain't got a cent to put in it."

"The local lad is Sailor Dan," said Hurricane. "He ain't so hot. It took him two rounds before he could knock me out."

"And that was only ten years ago," chimed in the mournful Pat.

"You could beat the Sailor easy," decided Bill Adams, looking a trifle more hopeful.

"I'd like to fight at Banbury," Don said eagerly. "They've got some grand stained-glass windows there. They say that some of the red is made from blood and—"

"I got enough trouble without you going nutty," shouted Bill. "Stained glass! You tell me how to get some dough! If only—" He broke off to snap his fingers. "Got it! Harry!"

He jumped round. "Listen—you get the kid set for a match against the Sailor—any time within the next four weeks. I'm off promoting." He fished out a card. "Mrs. Stafford said that she was interested in our Don, so I'm just going to touch her for some money."

"But supposing—" began Pat.

"Don't you worry," Bill Adams was full of assurance. "I'll just hypnotise her with my personality."

Bill got out his best suit and tie—a loud check and a yellow abomination. By bus and foot he reached the house of Mrs. Stafford and found the lady was home but engaged. Bill informed the butler that Mrs. Stafford had told him to look her up and insisted that the man take in his name.

In the lounge sat Mrs. Stafford, and she looked a pleasant figure in her neat riding kit. Curiously enough, the person with whom she was engaged was Madigan.

"I guess I've got a world's champion in Williams," boasted Madigan. "How about coming in with me? I've not done so bad for you in the past."

"Yes, we certainly made a bit on that French feather-weight until he got swollen-headed—then we lost a packet."

"This time I'm taking no chances," the man assured her. "Nothing's going to stop Williams."

"That's the trouble, Madigan," Aunt Fanny gave him a straight glance. "It's a business with you—but it's a sport with me. I don't think we exactly fit, and your venture does not—"

There was a knock and the butler entered. "Yes, James?"

"A Mister Adams to see you, madam." He saw she was puzzled.

"A Mister Bill Adams."

"Oh, show him in."

"Now I can make you a tempting proposition," argued Madigan. "Let's settle it before your fair-ground friend butts in."

Aunt Fanny did not like his tone. "Stick around—plenty of time to talk that over."

Bill Adams breezed into the room but he pulled up sharply at sight of the other visitor.

"You've met Mr. Madigan?" said Aunt Fanny.

"Yes, I've had that displeasure."

"Well, what's on your mind?"

"Mrs. Stafford, you were good enough to say you'd be interested to hear about young Don."

Aunt Fanny nodded. "Sure! How's the kid shaping?"

"He's getting better every day," muttered Bill Adams, quite aware of the sarcastic leer on Madigan's face.

"He takes to the game like a teetotaller takes to water."

"When's his first fight?"

Bill Adams twisted his hat in his hands. "Well—er—that's what I've come to see you about. I'm thinking of hiring the Banbury Town Hall and promoting a match with Sailor Lewis."

"Lewis is small time." Mrs. Stafford knew everything about the world of boxers. "But he's a scrapper—oughta give the kid a good fight."

"Say, have you gone crazy," Madigan came round to stand in front of her.

"Why waste your time listening to this cheap little fair-ground faker?"

"Would you mind if I punched him on the nose?" Bill asked.

Don came slowly out of his corner to face the rushing Sailor Lewis.

"Yes, his nose might bleed and spoil my carpet." Aunt Fanny showed signs of keen interest. "You want to match Don against—"

"He's trying to pull your ear for a touch," shouted Madigan. "He's trying to swing—"

"Be quiet!" snapped Aunt Fanny. "You weren't, I suppose? Well, my deal with you is off. You'd better go."

"Don't worry, I'll go." Madigan picked up his hat. "There's a distinct odour of old pug about this room."

"But for you, lady, I'd have slaughtered him," growled Bill when the door had closed. "One day I'm going to give him such a sock in the jaw."

"Take it easy." Aunt Fanny moved so that he could sit down beside her on the couch. "Come and tell me exactly what you want."

Bill Adams explained that he fancied Don against the Sailor, but there was one drawback—money. He required money to hire the Town Hall, and also for a deposit to the printers. Without hesitation, Mrs. Stafford agreed to finance the fight, but expressed a desire to see Don on a work-out. Bill agreed on the morrow.

Ann appeared and seemed very interested in hearing all about Don Carter. Bill told the girl what an improved fighter Don had become, and that every day he did a work-out on a certain quiet stretch of road.

"I suppose a car would make a good pace-maker?" asked Ann.

"Sure," agreed Bill, and wondered why Aunt Fanny gave her niece such a sharp glance.

Next morning Mrs. Stafford arrived at the barn good and early, and after a look round the training quarters, asked for Don. Bill answered that Don was out on his road work.

"Let's go and find him."

"Suits me," agreed Bill, who had sighted the obnoxious landlord hovering in the background.

In a quiet country lane Aunt Fanny pulled up the car and they got out to wait for the runner. At last a small sports car appeared and behind ran a sweated figure. It was Don and the driver of the small car was Ann.

"Just pure chance I met him, auntie," innocently explained the girl. "I offered to pace him."

"Pure chance." Aunt Fanny shrugged her shoulders. "Fancy trying to tell that sort of nonsense to me." She glanced at the slightly breathless runner. "Hum, you have filled out."

"Don't you think he looks grand?" cried Bill.

"Certainly looks better," agreed Aunt Fanny, and came closer. "Useful legs." She touched his arms. "Yes, pretty good development. Not bad, Bill Adams. Let's get back to your training quarters and we'll talk this over." She looked at her niece and Don. "You two can follow, and when I say follow, I mean follow."

They got to the barn, and there was the confounded landlord.

"I want to know when—"

"Go away," muttered Bill. "You're spoiling things Harry, if he won't go clock him."

Very businesslike, Aunt Fanny sat down at a table.

"Now, you propose to hire the Town Hall, advertise, and do everything to make this fight a success. You'll need some brass to promote the fight." She opened her bag. "Take this cheque. I made it out before I came here. It should be enough to meet all expenses."

Bill Adams took the cheque and stared at it as if it were too good to be true. He began to dream of hiring the Albert Hall.

March 14th, 1936.

'The Fight—and What a Finish!

THE Banbury Town Hall was packed. There were a number of small fights, but the main feature was a ten-round contest between Sailor Lewis and Don Carter.

In ringside seats were Mrs. Stafford and Ann, the former quietly confident and the other terribly worried and excited. Sitting in ringside seats on the other side of the roped square was Madigan and a fair-haired woman, handsome, but the expression was hard. Directly behind them sat Big Bob Ruffer, who had come to the Town Hall to see the man who had taken his place get a pasting.

"Fancy coming to this place." The woman looked round disdainfully. "I didn't know ploughmen could box."

"There may be a Dempsey here—you never can tell." Madigan puffed at a hugo cigar.

"You're wrong, gov'nor, if ye expect to find anything here to-night." Ruffer had heard. "You can't match a kid amateur against an old-timer like Lewis and expect to see a fight."

"What do you expect to see?" rasped Madigan.

"A blooming massacre."

"Don't be too sure." Madigan settled back in his seat. "And Lewis is past his prime."

The preliminary bouts were over, and the crowd craned their necks to see the fighters enter the ring for the next bout. They looked at the slim figure of Don Carter and compared it with the mighty tattooed sailor, and decided the youngster hadn't a chance.

"Keep away from him in the first three rounds," Bill Adams advised. "If you get a chance use yer left jab—but get him winded first. Get the idea?"

Aunt Fanny left her seat to come round to Don's corner.

"I've just taken a squint at the Sailor. Boy, he's your meat—just waiting for the skewer. Wade right into him while you're fresh, kid. Use your right hook and you'll knock him cold in the first round."

"Ere, wait a minute!" cried Bill. "I'm giving orders and—"

Aunt Fanny inspected Bill through her lorgnettes, and then glowered at his yellow tie.

"Your tie, Mr. Adams, is like an intoxicated rainbow."

Then Ann appeared to whisper shyly:

"Good luck, Don!"

"Thanks, Ann!" Don smiled at her.

"Don't you worry."

Bill Adam got rid of them.

"Listen—you ain't taking orders from no petticoats, see? You just do as I told you—stay with him for the first three rounds. Get me?"

The announcer had been talking all this while about the many famous people that were patronising the Banbury Town Hall that night, and liking the sound of his own voice would have carried on if the crowd had not made it clear that they had come to see a fight and not hear him talk.

Just before the fight started the hall manager came round to report that the takings had beaten the last record by fifty pounds, and that made Bill Adams rub his hands together.

Don Carter shook hands with his opponent, and decided that he did not like this hairy boxer with the battered nose, cauliflower ears and tattooed chest. Perhaps it would be best to take Mrs. Stafford's advice and go for his man while he was fresh.

Don waited in his corner for the gong. The gong went and Don came out of his corner not knowing what tactics the Sailor would adopt. The Sailor rushed and landed a stinging punch to Don's ribs. That shook Don, and he jumped clear. The Sailor rushed to the attack, and then Don slammed home a punch to the jaw, this he followed with a whirlwind of jabs and hooks. The bewildered Sailor Lewis vainly attempted to protect himself, but his defence was weak, and Don's blows had hurt. Before a rasping right hook to the jaw Sailor Lewis toppled backwards and crashed full length to the canvas.

The young boxer stared in amazement at his fallen foe.

"One—two—three—four—five—six—seven—eight—nine—ten. OUT!" shouted the referee.

Don Carter had won his first fight in just over one minute.

"Grand! Grand!" shouted Bill Adams, who did not mind that Don had disobeyed orders as he had won. "What a punch Don gave him!"

But the crowd were disappointed. They had come there to see a battle of giants that would last at least six of the ten rounds, and instead they had seen a scrap that had lasted a minute. Someone in the crowd shouted: "Call that a fight!" Instantly someone else cried: "Lewis didn't try!"

Big Bob Ruffer, venomous and disappointed not to see Carter bashed to pulp, realised in his evil mind that here was the chance to make trouble.

"The fight was squared!" he roared. "It's a frame-up!"

Equally turbulent and rowdy members of the crowd sided with him, and the situation became ugly.

"Ask Lewis how much he took to lie down!" bellowed Ruffer.

People began to knock over chairs and shout "Crooks! Frame up! Swindlers!" And other remarks of a very offensive nature.

The hall manager climbed into the ring and tried to restore order. The perplexed Bill Adams came and stood by his side. They shouted "Order!" but without any result.

"I'll hold you responsible, Mr. Adams, for any damage done to the hall!" cried the manager.

"Gentlemen!" Bill shouted. "The fight was perfectly fair!"

"Liar!" shouted Ruffer. "Give us our money back!"

The crowd began to chant: "We want our money back! We want our money back!"

The manager saw his beautiful hall being wrecked, and raised his hands.

"Quiet, please! We don't want any damage. Anyone who wants his money back can have it!"

"Ere, 'arf a minute!" cried Bill.

"That's my money you're giving back, you know."

"You're not in a boxing-booth now," the manager answered coldly. "If you want a bill for a new Town Hall just say so."

Madigan had managed to get out of the hall, and he took the fair-haired woman's arm.

"That was no frame-up. That knock-out was as clean as a whistle."

"He's almost in Williams' class, isn't he?"

"A few more performances like this and he'll be challenging Williams."

"Williams would kill him."

"The kid would kill Williams, you mean!" retorted Madigan.

"What are you going to do about it?"

"Lucille," Madigan chuckled. "I always believe in walking up to trouble. The sooner he meets Williams the better."

"But—"

"So whilst I get busy fixing up the fight, you're going to work on Don Carter." He squeezed her arm. "Get the idea?"

The woman gave an understanding nod.

A Call of Distress

BILL ADAMS and his family were depressed. Don had won his first fight, but as all the takings had been paid back they were worse off than before. Most of Aunt Fanny's money was gone, and with the local papers hinting at a frame-up what chance had Bill of fixing Don with another fight? In the midst of this depression arrived Aunt Fanny and Ann, with the news that Madigan had seen Carter and had offered him a fight.

"It looks like a short cut to the headlines," she told the amazed Bill.

"Sounds fishy to me," muttered Bill. "Why should Madigan want to help a young unknown to lick his man?"

"Madigan figures that he can put Carter out of the running right now, while he's inexperienced," was her answer. "Madigan could see that Don has a punch. He recognises that he is lacking in ring craft, but fears that with time Don will improve and perhaps interfere with Williams' path towards the championship. I think Don can beat Williams and I'm for accepting. If we don't, Madigan will put every obstacle in the way of Don getting any fights. Let's take a chance—a chance that I'm willing to back with money."

"Mrs. Stafford, I don't know how to thank you," Bill said hoarsely. "What can I do to repay you?"

She glanced fiercely at a red and yellow atrocity. "Go and buy yourself a new tie. So long!"

Don Carter found his road work very pleasant because often Ann made the pace in her sports car, and even if she did not pace him, she usually appeared some time during the work-out to have a chat. She was a very keen rider and often she would cut across country on the spirited mare that Aunt Fanny had given her to meet Don by arrangement.

All very pleasant and exciting because Don had hinted that if he could win the fight with Williams there was something he wanted to ask her. Naturally she wanted to know, but on these occasions he would start to talk about stained-glass windows.

One morning when Don knew that Ann would be at certain cross-roads, he arrived earlier than usual, and found a car with two people, and would have run on if a male voice had not shouted: "Hey—Carter!"

In the car was Madigan and the woman Lucille.

Now Carter was a simple fellow and one of those rare types who think that every person is honest. He had not paid much attention to what Bill and the boys had said about Madigan, and a man who could smile as pleasantly as this person in the car must be genuine—that applied to the smiling, bright-eyed Lucille.

"Carter," cried Madigan as the boy ran to the car. "Meet one of your most ardent fans. Saw you fight the other night."

"You were wonderful," Lucille said with a soulful glance.

"How do you fancy meeting Williams?" asked Madigan.

"I can hardly believe any good fortune, Mr. Madigan."

"My money's on you," murmured Lucille.

"Ha! Ha! Listen to that," boomed Madigan. "Calls herself a friend of mine and has her money on you." The smile vanished. "Young man, new blood's always welcome to the game. My man will try and beat you, but for all that I say 'Good Luck' and you'll find me the first to congratulate you if you win. Won't I, Lucille?"

Before the weight of numbers Don went down. . . .

"Honest John Madigan," she murmured, and then looked up at Don. "I'm often down these parts as I belong to a club on the river—in fact, I'm sort of secretary and hostess. The Cocktail Club. I wish you'd come round some time."

"It's awfully nice of you," muttered Don. "But, you see, I—"

"Fix him up a table for to-night," interposed Madigan. "We'll call it a date."

"I'll expect you to-night. Don't forget," murmured Lucille.

Madigan started the car. "About eight, old fellow," he shouted. "We'll expect you."

Don Carter was staring after the car when the clutter of horse's hoofs made him turn. Ann had witnessed the scene and overheard some of the conversation. Her nose was very much in the air.

"I suppose you'll go to-night." She was foolish in her anger to be sarcastic. "Why not go? It will be a short cut to the championship—training on cocktails."

"Maybe I will!" Don retorted, stung by the injustice of her words.

"Then I wish you good morning," said Ann, and put spurs to her horse.

Don completed his run in a very discontented state of mind. He tried to phone Ann but she was not at home—she was teaching him a lesson. He became so angry that at eight o'clock that night he went to the Cocktail Club and met Lucille and Madigan.

But though Lucille succeeded in separating Ann from Don, she did not make the youngster break training. She was clever enough to know that he would at once turn against her. Ann made matters worse by her haughty aloofness whenever she met Don, and no longer did she act as pace-maker.

So the time passed until at last came the day of the fight.

The fight was at nine at the Ring, and it was about tea-time that a telephone call came for Don. It was Lucille on the 'phone, and she was a good actress.

"Oh, Don, I must see you," came her voice with a sob in it.

"The fight's only a few hours away—I'm sorry," was his answer. "Won't after the fight do?"

"But the flying field's only two miles away. I really must see you before I go—you're the only friend I can trust."

"Couldn't you come here?" Don suggested. "Time's getting short, and

"Surely you can spare me a few minutes, Don?" she begged. "Meet me at the 'plane in ten minutes. Don, you must—I'm desperate—I must see you. Don, I promise to keep you only a few minutes, but I must have your advice. I can't tell you over the 'phone, but if you don't want to hear of someone jumping in the river come at once."

Don Carter ran most of the way to the flying field. He saw a small cabin 'plane and heard the motor of the machine running. The pilot was in his seat. Nearby, a man was working levelling out some rough ground. The cabin door of the 'plane was open and Lucille waved a handkerchief to him. He raced across the field.

"Oh, Don, thank heavens you've come."

"What's happened?" he asked in genuine concern.

"Get in here," she lowered her voice. "No one must see us talking. Come in and I'll tell you."

Unsuspecting a trap, Don entered the 'plane and took the seat beside Lucille. The man repairing the ground glanced round and moved swiftly towards the machine. He slammed the door, a yale key was in the handle, a turn and Don Carter was locked in the 'plane. The engine woke to life and the machine shot away.

A moment later the machine rose gracefully from the ground and began to climb.

"What's the idea?" cried Don, staring at Lucille.

"Probably giving us a free trip," laughed Lucille, and then gripped his arm. "Don, some money is missing from the club, and I think they suspect me of taking it."

She tried to hold his attention with a trumped-up story, but Don was not listening. Finally he told the pilot to turn back and land.

"Can't I've got to make Paris on time?"

"Paris?" gasped Don.
"Paris!" cried Lucille. "But isn't this Captain Strange's machine?"

"No!" snapped the pilot. "I was detailed to take two passengers to Paris, and naturally I thought you were the two. In Paris I'm meeting—"

"I don't care who you're meeting, but you get this 'plane back to town or there'll be trouble," threatened Don. "Why, that's the sea!"

"Can't we land somewhere?" begged Lucille. "Or get back to the flying field?"

"Must go on to Paris," said the pilot. "To go back is against orders—will try and land at Folkestone."

"It's all my fault," sobbed Lucille. "Maybe if we get a car when we land we'll make the Ring in time."

The pilot took nearly an hour before he could find a place to land, and then it was on the cliffs between Folkestone and Dover.

Brutal Kindness

ONE can imagine the state of mind of Bill Adams, Aunt Fanny and the rest of them when time passed and Don did not show up. All that was known was that Don had received a telephone call and Harry, who had answered the call, knew it was a woman's voice. Don had gone off and shouted to Harry that he would be back on time. They had waited down at the barn till the very last moment, and then Harry and Bill had come to town, leaving Pat behind in case Don showed up.

No sign of Don anywhere. Not a message—not a note—not a call. The officials demanded to know why Don Carter had not show up, and Bill Adams thought of every excuse he could find for the sake of gaining time. Already he had spent a small fortune in coppers phoning likely and unlikely places.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," the promoter of the boxing tournament told Bill Adams. "I'll put the other bout on. That will give you about another half hour."

"That's grand," cried Bill. "I know Don wouldn't let me down."

Aunt Fanny was round in the dressing-rooms, and her expression was very grim.

"Something's haywire about this," she affirmed. "It's not like the kid to let us down."

They heard running, hurrying steps and looked at each other hopefully. It was not Don but the promoter.

"Knock out—first round. Get your boy in the ring."

"Ho ain't here," Bill had to admit.

"Well, I'm waiting no longer," cried the promoter. "I'm putting in a substitute. You've made a fool of me, Adams, and I shan't forget it. I'll have you and this cheap boxing wonder out of the game. Thought you'd swing here another frame-up like you did at Banbury?"

March 14th, 1936.

Fifteen minutes later Bill Adams told Mrs. Stafford that whether Don turned up now or never it didn't matter, and that he might as well see them home. Suddenly the door of the dressing-room burst open and there was Don, dishevelled and out of breath. Behind him was a woman, who looked on the point of collapse—Don had almost dragged her since leaving the car.

They stared at Don and the woman in amazement.

"Am I in time?" Don began to peel off his coat.

"It was my fault," Lucille stepped into the room.

"Your fault?" rasped Aunt Fanny. "Who the heck are you?" A withering glance of scorn and she ignored the woman to look at Don. "You're too late to fight, so you might as well explain what happened. I'm sure it will be interesting."

"I was in a 'plane with this young lady," Don began, "when it suddenly took off by accident. We had got into the wrong 'plane. The pilot was bound for Paris, and finally I got the man to land me near Folkestone. The conditions were bad and it took him a terrible time, but finally we landed between Folkestone and Dover on the cliffs. We got a car into Folkestone, and as there was no train we had to hire another car—"

"Why did you go off without leaving any message a few hours before the fight?" demanded Aunt Fanny. "You should have been leaving for London, and instead you vanish and tell us you went with this person to a flying field. Why? Why?"

"That is a private matter," Don said stiffly. "She required my help and advice. She often goes flying and gets taken up by the pilots. Lucille thought it was Captain Strango's machine, and —"

Ann had walked to the door. She gave Lucille a disdainful look. "I can't stay here and listen to a tissue of lies. Either this is a frame-up or else somebody seems to have turned yellow."

Mrs. Stafford looked at her niece and hesitated. Ann walked out of the room with head held high. "I guess she's right," muttered Aunt Fanny, and hastened after her.

"It's the truth, Bill," Don said pleadingly to his trainer. "I swear it. Lucille was in trouble, and—"

"And now I'm in trouble, you're in trouble, and we're all in trouble," Bill Adams answered fiercely. "We shall be called before the Boxing Commission and wiped off the map, and no matter how many lies you can tell it ain't going to save you." He glanced at Harry. "Come on!" They went out and slammed the door.

A mocking gleam showed in Lucille's eyes, but she was sobbing when he turned to her for comfort.

In the weeks that followed Lucille seemed to be his only friend. He began to drink down at her Cocktail Club. Madigan had told Lucille that she could have as much money as she liked, but she was to keep Carter down and make him stay down until after Williams had won the championship.

A fortnight after the fight, Aunt Fanny sought out Bill Adams, and found that gentleman having a few words with the landlord's bailiff. She removed that scourge and then drew the trainer aside for a quiet talk.

"Bill, do you think Don was yellow and a double-crosser?"

"Dunno what to make of it."

"In your heart of hearts you don't think it," Aunt Fanny spoke in her crisp, assured manner. "And neither do I. Young Ann's going about with a face as long as a fiddle. Don went to see her, and she accused him of letting us all down, and the boy went away in a huff. From what I can gather, that drove him straight into the arms of this Lucille person, who apparently is on friendly terms with Madigan."

"I got an idea that rat was behind that aeroplane business," shouted Bill. "One day I'll sock that guy good and plenty."

"It is only supposition, but it means that Don might have got into that aeroplane on a sob story," stated Aunt Fanny. "And he's one of those strange imbeciles who believe everything a sobbing girl tells them. Therefore, as it might be true we must give Don another chance."

"He spends most of his time drinking at the Cocktail Club."

"I know, Bill, and this Lucille appears to have a lot of money specially allocated for keeping Don cauned." She drew up her sparse frame. "I think it's about time we took the sap out of this damo's hands, and I propose going to the Cocktail Club to-night. You will accompany me, and bring Harry and Pat."

That night they walked into the Cocktail Club and there at a table sat Lucille and Don.

"I'll do the talking!" hissed Bill. "Yes, after me!" Aunt Fanny hissed back at him.

They stalked across the dance floor and Lucille eyed them nervously. There was

On the Road to Fortune

TO Adam Larey, as he stood on the deck of the little steamer that was carrying him up the river to the mining town of Picacho, the world was very bright. For Adam was twenty-six, tall, strong, good-looking and full of the joy of youth; and under such conditions life always looks at its best. Furthermore he had plenty of money in his pocket and was on his way to join his elder brother Guerd at the mining camp. For Guerd had written to him telling him that he was foolish to be wasting his time as he was going in his steady employment, and had advised him to come straight up to Picacho where really big money was to be made. And so impressed had the younger brother been by the letter that he had packed up his things, given notice at his job, and was now on his way to the new Eldorado which he felt sure was awaiting him.

He had another even bigger cause for happiness, too, at the moment, for pretty Ruth Virey had only that day promised to be his wife, and though her father had shown no very great enthusiasm about him so far, yet the young man was not worrying about that. Ruth loved him—that was all that mattered.

As the steamer approached the quay he gazed eagerly at the little town that was ever drawing nearer. It was a long time since he had seen his elder brother, but he felt all a younger brother's gratitude towards him for the big chance offered to him.

Yet had Adam Larey been able to see his elder brother as the steamer was approaching Picacho, and been privileged to overhear his conversation with Sheriff Collishaw in the local saloon he would have most probably registered considerable amazement.

"I hope he'll turn up all right," said the sheriff as he helped himself to a drink.

Guerd Larey scowled. For he had caught the slightly sarcastic note in the other's voice, and it annoyed him. He was in his debt to the tune of fifteen hundred dollars, and he knew that Collishaw wouldn't wait much longer for it. It was for this reason that he had sent the glowing accounts of Picacho to his younger brother. He knew that Adam had been saving money, and he had planned with the sheriff when once he got him out there to sell him some dud mining claims at big prices.

"Of course he'll turn up," he retorted. "And he'll bring all his savings with him, what's more, and then you'll get your money. We shan't have any trouble with him—you never do with these young greenhorns. He reckons I've made my pile out here, and he's grateful to me for giving him the chance to do the same."

He glanced at his watch and rose to his feet.

"The boat's due to arrive very soon," he said. "Comin' down to meet him?"

Ruth, because she was a woman, couldn't help contrasting the two brothers when they met. And because she was very much in love with Adam she watched the two a little uneasily. For on her lover's side she saw straightforward, boyish warmth and delight as he greeted his elder brother. But she saw things in Guerd that aroused her suspicions instantaneously. She saw him profess equal delight at seeing Adam, but the look in his eyes told her of an interest that wasn't founded on genuine affection. She suspected him and the sheriff from that moment, though when Adam introduced them to her she merely greeted them both with a pleasant smile. "I'll be seeing you all again very soon," said Adam gaily as he waved good-bye to the girl and her parents.

As Guerd linked his arm in his younger brother's and led him away Ruth saw him exchange meaning glances with the sheriff over Adam's shoulder, and it worried her very considerably.

The Fight in the Saloon

IT was four days later, and Guerd and Collishaw were sitting in the saloon drinking. The sheriff was talking, but from the expression on Guerd's face it was not very pleasant talking.

"I tell you it's no darned good," he said savagely when the other had come to an end. "The young fool—confound him!—isn't the mug I thought he was; at any rate, as far as parting with money is concerned. I've tried him with every one of our mines, and there's nothing doing; you can take it from me."

The other coolly shifted his cigar over to the other side of his mouth.

"That's your funeral, not mine," he retorted with a slightly contemptuous smile. "You told me that as soon as this guy arrived you would pay me that fifteen hundred dollars you owe me. And I said I'd wait for it till he did arrive. Well, he has arrived, but my money hasn't, and I'm getting a bit tired of waitin', friend Guerd. If you take my tip you'll get a move on."

The other swallowed hard. There was a note in Collishaw's voice that made him uneasy.

"What in hades am I to do?" he demanded angrily. "D'you expect me to steal it from him?"

A grin came over the other's face. "As sheriff of this camp and an upholder of what's lawful and right," he said—and Guerd succced openly—"I shouldn't dream of suggestin' such things. I'm just advisin' you to get hold of fifteen hundred dollars and hand same to me pronto. How you do it's your funeral."

Guerd sat for a few moments in sullen silence. Then he spoke, lowering his voice:

"If I can get him into a game of poker—" he began, and as he stopped the other nodded quiet approval.

"Between us," he replied, "I reckon we could make it a pleasant little game—not to say a profitable one."

Both looked up at that moment as the door opened and Adam Larcy walked into the saloon. He looked in the gayest of spirits, and Guerd hailed him with every appearance of friendliness.

"Hallo, Adam, come into a fortune?" "Not exactly!" smiled the younger brother as he came over to the table. "Morning, sheriff! Congratulate me, Guerd. Ruth and I are engaged."

Guerd jumped up in a second and shook his brother warmly by the hand. "Fine hearin'," he replied. "Boys, this brother of mine's engaged and the drinks are on me!"

It was not at Adam's wish that the game of poker started. He didn't want it, and would have preferred to avoid it. But the sheriff and Guerd had both insisted on standing him numerous drinks, much against his will, and when they had suggested poker for an hour or so he yielded, rather than appear in any way churlish.

But he failed to notice one or two of the glances that were exchanged as he and the others sat down to play.

They had been playing for over an hour, and the game had gone as Guerd and Collishaw had intended it to go. That is to say, Adam was losing about four thousand dollars, and Guerd and Collishaw between them were winning precisely the same amount. And though one or two of the onlookers knew perfectly well that Adam was being cheated and were sorry for him in their rough way, they were afraid to interfere. For Collishaw being sheriff was by no means a man to fall foul of.

Adam Larcy, however, played on quietly, losing steadily, but giving not the slightest indication that he suspected anything was wrong, though actually his suspicions had been aroused for some little time, and he was far more on the alert than any of them imagined.

So though he was amazed, horrified, and boiling with indignation to think that his own brother was deliberately cheating him out of his money, he was waiting until he could catch him red-handed before he made a scene.

Guerd dealt. It was an ace-pot, and the pool was a good-sized one. Adam opened, two men threw in their hands, and Adam, Guerd and Collishaw came in. Guerd gave the required cards to both men, who studied their hands.

"I take two," announced Guerd; but his eyes were on Adam, who seemed to be deep in his hand; and he slid a couple from the bottom of the pack.

But even as he did so Adam looked up in a flash.

"Hey, you can't get away with that!" he exclaimed. "I saw you take two cards from the bottom of the pack!"

He was on his feet as he spoke, facing his brother, who had gone livid with rage. Then Guerd's fist leaped out, and Adam staggered back, but the next moment he had hurled himself at Guerd, March 14th, 1936.

and the latter crashed heavily to the floor.

Guerd lay there scowling furiously, but making no attempt to move. The others in the room had crowded round, not altogether displeased at the turn events had taken. Adam, with his hands clenched, was standing gazing down at his brother. They wondered vaguely what was going to happen, for they knew from the expression on Guerd's face that there was murder in his heart. And they knew, too, that he was a dangerous man to cross.

"You dirty rat!" went on Adam, breathing heavily. "Cheating your own brother! I fancied at the start you were playing crook stuff on me, but I could hardly believe it. So I waited to make sure if it was true. Well, I'm through with you, d'you hear?"

Guerd got up slowly to his feet, but even as Adam turned contemptuously away, the other grabbed Collishaw's gun, and the next moment the two men were struggling together. And then, as they fought for the mastery of the weapon, Adam wrenched it from his brother's hand; there was a sharp report, and Guerd staggered back and collapsed heavily to the floor and lay very still.

The Wanderer

ADAM stood gazing down dazedly at the body of his brother that lay sprawled out inertly on the floor in the deathly silence that followed. The gun was still in his hand, but for the moment all coherent thought had gone from him. Such horror as he had never known was holding him numb. Nothing had been farther from his thoughts than the killing of his brother. All he had known was that the latter was furiously trying to kill him, and he—Adam—was wrestling with him to get the gun from him.

The sheriff, who was on one knee beside the still body, looked up, and there was a world of menace in his voice when he spoke.

"He's dead—you've killed him," he said.

Adam found his voice then. "You know as well as anyone that I never tried to kill him," he replied in low tones. "I was wrestling for the gun—he drew it on me—and it went off. It was an accident."

The sheriff's eyes were merciless.

"I'm sheriff here," he said, "and I saw you accuse him of cheating. I saw you knock him down, and I saw you fling yourself at him when he took my gun to protect himself. And my view of it is that you deliberately tried to kill him. So I'm arresting you, Adam Larcy, for wilful murder!"

He rose to his feet. Adam never moved, but his brain was working rapidly. The silence of the room told him that even if they wanted to do so, no one would perhaps dare to contradict what the sheriff had said.

And other things were leaping in on him, too. The sheriff and Guerd were always together. It had been the sheriff who had suggested the game of poker, and Guerd who had immediately seconded the proposal. If the sheriff arraigned him for murder and chose to swear away his life, he would have little chance.

In a flash his mind was made up, and the gun, still in his hand, was menacing them as he backed to the door.

But it was to the sheriff he spoke.

"This is a deliberate frame-up," he exclaimed, "and all of you know it, just as you know that this man and my brother were in league together. So you're not getting me after all—see?"

In a flash he was out of the room. Horses were outside, and he leaped on the first one he saw and was riding down the street for dear life. Though before he was a hundred yards away he could hear his would-be captors in thundering pursuit.

He stood breathless and panting, shrinking behind the shed. For as he had been riding along it had come to him that he couldn't ride away, a fugitive from justice, without seeing Ruth and letting her know the truth. So as he neared her house, which stood close to two roads which led from the town, he had slipped in a moment from his horse, lashing it as he did so and watching it race away into the darkness.

Shrinking back against the shed, he heard his pursuers pull up; wondered whether they had spotted what he had done. But as he heard them start up again and dash away, he realised that his trick had succeeded.

In the little sitting-room Ruth listened to his story with dismay in her face. But there was love and sympathy there as well as she gazed into his eyes with his arms around her.

"I believe you, dear," she said simply. "I know you never meant to kill him. But what are you going to do, Adam?" "Get away into the desert," he answered. "Lose myself there—it's my only chance. One of these days—"

But at that moment voices and the tramp of feet came from the outside, and the girl clutched him frantically. In a moment she had rushed him into her bed-room.

"Go out that way," she whispered, pointing to a door on the other side. "If you can reach the stable you will find a horse there."

For one moment they elung to each other. Then, as he slipped across the room, a loud knocking came to her door. She stood perfectly still. Then, as the knocking was renewed, she spoke.

"Who's that? What d'you want?"

Her father's voice answered her. Actually he had seen the two together and had gone for the sheriff after he had overheard their conversation. He had hoped that thereby he would get a substantial reward.

"Let us in at once, Ruth!"

"What on earth d'you want?"

"Let us in at once! D'you hear me?"

"But I'm dressing, father," she expostulated.

His angry voice came back.

"I tell you to let me in at once or I'll break the door in!"

"I think you must have gone mad," she said as she fumbled with the lock.

"Where's Adam Larcy?" he demanded as he gazed round the room.

Her eyes were guileless and amazed as she met his question. Every moment she could gain was of value to her lover.

"Adam? Are you crazy, father?"

"What on earth should he be doing here?"

He strode across to the other door, and rattled it.

"Where's the key of this door?" he thundered.

"Probably on the other side," she answered coolly, knowing full well it was at that moment in her pocket. "I do wish to goodness that you wouldn't come storming into my bed-room in this extraordinary manner. If you have quite satisfied yourself that Adam isn't here, perhaps you'll be good enough to go out and let me finish my dressing in peace."

She watched them go out, listened breathlessly as she heard them tramping round the house, exploring every inch of the yard and the stables. Then she heard them come into the sitting-room once more and heard her father's voice.

"He was here and in this house, I saw 'em talking together. She's a liar, that's what she is."

But to her utter relief she heard her mother's voice.

"She's nothing of the sort. If she told you he hasn't been here you may be sure he hasn't."

As she heard them troop out of the house Ruth drew a deep breath of relief, and a prayer went up from her heart for the safety of the man she loved.

The Old-timer

A WASTELAND of sand and low scrub stretching for miles, with the hot noonday sun beating pitilessly down upon it. And one living thing only in sight—a man who staggered and stumbled along with his eyes gazing feverishly ahead as if hoping against hope that he would see some rescue or shelter from the burning heat that lay above and around.

A pitiable object, this man, doubly pitiable as the only living thing in that terrible desert. He was in his shirt-sleeves, and as he stumbled along, every now and then he would sink to the ground as if he would never rise up again. Then, after an interval, he would stagger once more to his feet, and drag himself wearily along.

"I must go on," he muttered, "I must go on! If I stay here—I shall die! I must go on! I must go on!"

And then he slid to the ground, rolled over on his face and lay very still.

Dismukes, old prospector, was crossing the desert with his mules on the way to the Death Valley, where he had his mine. A real old-timer was Dismukes, with a gnarled figure and a furrowed old face, yet with kindly old blue eyes that were gazing frowningly now over the wasteland as he halted his mules.

"Durned if that ain't a man," he muttered. "What in thunder's he doin' here and all alone? Come on, you durned coyotes"—addressing his mules—"we've got to investigate this."

But long before he reached the spot where Adam Larey lay sprawled out inertly he found himself wondering whether his investigation wouldn't be too late. For already, above, he had caught sight of the vultures hovering in the sky.

Dismukes scowled at them.

"But whatever he is, you ain't havin' him," he said.

He raised Adam up in his arms, putting his water-bottle to his lips. He was pretty far gone, he knew that; but he wasn't dead, and Dismukes had no intention of letting him die. A fine young fellow like that, he told himself, ought to be worthy of many more years of life.

Then, as Adam's eyelids fluttered at last and he began to gulp eagerly at the water, the old man spoke.

"Go easy, son," he said. "You've been dyin' for want of it, and you ain't a-goin' to die from too much of it."

Then, finally, he lifted him up into his arms as easily as if he had been a baby and set him on one of the mules.

"Now, you durned old coyotes, you've got to get a move on," he said.

"Well, son, maybe you'd like to tell me your name and what you're doin' takin' a walk out here all alone," he said when, later on, they had made camp under some trees, and Adam, refreshed by a hearty meal and suoking a pipe, had been thanking the old prospector for the kindnesses he had rendered him.

"I have sounding ungrateful, but I'd sooner not," replied the young man.

"Have it your own way," answered the other coolly. "I reckon it don't matter the hades of a lot to me. Where are you makin' for?"

"Anywhere where I shan't be known and can make enough to keep me."

The old man nodded and smoked steadily as he gazed out over the desert.

"Riders comin' across in this direction," he said laconically.

Adam sprang to his feet. Panic was in his face. Far away on the horizon he could see tiny specks.

He swung round to the old man.

"You may as well know that I'm wanted for killing a man," he said quietly. "It was accidental, but they framed it up on me, and I think they mean to kill me."

"Oh, it was accidental all right," replied the other calmly. "I was there and saw it happen. Reckon the sheriff don't love you, son."

Adam stood staring at the tiny specks that had now grown to bigger specks.

"You needn't know anything about it," he said quietly, "or they might rile up with you for harbouring me."

"Yes, I guess you're right," answered the old man.

He got up to his feet, and, picking up his spade, started shovelling away the sand vigorously.

"What are you doing?" demanded Adam.

Dismukes paused.

"Want to be strung up?" he queried.

"What d'you think?" retorted Adam bitterly.

"Well, I figured it out same way," replied the other as he bent to his digging again. "And I reckon you may just as well be buried as hung. Now, just you plug up your ears, son, and tie your coat over your head, and we'll soon fix these guys when they come nosin' here. That brother of yours only got what's been comin' to him for a mighty long time. There were lots more who had a fancy for shootin' him, though they'd have hated for it to be accidental. Catch hold of that kettle and clap it over your mouth, and with the spout stickin' just above ground you'll have a chance to breathe.

"Hop in here," he went on, indicating the grave he had just dug, "and then we'll fix you up as comfortably as we can."

He was sitting on the ground, smoking his pipe, when the riders pulled up and dismounted.

"Say, old-timer, have you seen a guy come this way—a young guy, clean-shaven, dark curly hair?"

Dismukes took his pipe from his mouth.

"I'd have kept him if I had," he replied. "I'm fond of company in this durned desert. Friend of yours?"

"Friend nothin'," retorted the other.

"We're after him. He killed Guard Larey in the saloon in Picacho yesterday morning."

"Did he, be jabbers? Then if he comes this way you bet I'll nab him. Like some coffee—I've got some good stuff?"

Both of the men assured him that they would, and he proceeded to search around for it. Dismukes was far too old a hand to let them think that he was in a hurry to get rid of them.

But after searching about for a couple of minutes a rueful expression came to his face.

"Durned if I haven't forgotten it," he said.

A quarter of an hour later, with the two men once more specks on the horizon, but this time disappearing, Adam Larey, dug out of the sand and little the worse for his interment, sat drinking coffee with the old prospector, who was making plans for the future.

Ruth and the old prospector stood facing the outlaw.

And the following day the two men set out for old Dismukes' mine in the Death Valley.

Adam to the Rescue

EVERYBODY in Tecopah and the neighbourhood knew "Big Jo's" bar. It was as popular as Big Jo herself; for the latter was as big in heart and kindness as she was in size, though the girls who worked for her—as well as the rough miners who frequented the saloon—knew quite well that you could play no tricks on Big Jo. Big-hearted she might be, and undoubtedly was, but she was a very sound judge of human nature, and such a thing as fear found no place in her make-up.

Ruth Virey had come in there one day, and, at the girl's request, Big Jo had given her a job there, for she had taken a liking to the girl at first sight, and though the latter had vouchsafed little about herself, Big Jo had sensed some tragedy and had taken her on. But though she had been with her now for nearly a year, she was still puzzled about her. She could see that she was different from the other girls—quieter, more reserved, though eminently hard-working and always willing.

So it was that when Dismukes was in the saloon one day saying that he was wanting some capable young woman up at the mine to keep house, cook and look after himself and his men, Big Jo suggested Ruth. For she knew that the old prospector would look after her like a daughter, and she fancied that it would be a far better life for the quiet, sensitive girl than the rough atmosphere of her saloon.

Ruth listened to the proposal, nodded her acquiescence. She declared herself quite willing to go on her present employer's recommendation. But she seemed to have no enthusiasm about her, and Big Jo tackled her then.

"I wish you'd tell me what all the trouble is, kid," she said. "You've been here for the thick end of a year, and you ain't no different now to what you were when you came. I don't want to butt in any, but maybe I could help you."

The other smiled faintly.

"You've been real kind to me, Jo," she replied, "but I guess there's no one can help me."

"A man?" queried Big Jo, after a pause.

The other nodded.

"I may as well tell you," she said, and proceeded to tell her story.

"So when my father and mother died," she went on, "I just started to wander around in the hope that one day I'd come across him. You see, he was innocent, Jo, but the sheriff was in league with his brother, and no one in Picaecho dared to cross the sheriff. So Adam just had to clear out, and maybe he's still in hiding. But if I could find him I'd marry him. I love him, you see, and I told him, when we parted a year ago, that I'd never marry anyone else. And I know he won't, either."

Big Jo was silent. Her experience of men was making her a bit sceptical, but she wasn't saying so.

"Well, cheer up, honey," she said. "The world's a big place, and all sorts of queer things happen in it. What d'you say to havin' a change and goin' up to this mine with old Dismukes? He's a funny old fellow, but he's white all through, and I reckon you'll have a better deal than you get here."

The next day Ruth set off for the Death Valley with the old prospector.

It was hardly an accident that brought March 14th, 1936.

Adam Larey to Big Jo's bar on the following day, for things had been happening to him and he was riding post-haste to old Dismukes at the Death Valley mine. And Tecopah lay in his way, and he had heard of Big Jo from the old prospector.

So, hitching up his horse outside, he strode into the saloon, called for a drink, and in a very few minutes was in private conversation with Big Jo.

She listened attentively to his tale, but she never doubted the truth of it. She could see that Adam was speaking the truth. He had told her that he had been robbed and captured by a band of desert outlaws, and, while a prisoner, had heard them planning a raid on old Dismukes' mine.

"I managed to escape, ma'am," he finished, "and I'm on the way there now; but I shall want help. You're a friend of Dismukes, and he saved my life."

"Wish you'd been in here yesterday," said Big Jo. "He left for the mine with one of my girls, Ruth Virey—"

But that was as far as she got, for the next moment Adam had leaped to his feet, excitement in every line of his face.

"Ruth Virey?" he almost shouted. "What's she like? Where does she come from? D'you mean to say—"

But she calmed him, told him what she knew. Though long before she'd finished he had rushed from the saloon, flung himself on his horse and was rushing over the desert at a furious speed.

Adam's brain was whirling as his horse bore him along. Wild delight and exultation were in his heart at the thought that very soon he would be seeing Ruth once more, even in spite of the knowledge that with the stigma of the crime hanging over him he could never ask her to marry him. Yet, despite his exultation a terrible dread was on him that the outlaws might reach the mine before he could.

Then suddenly he uttered a sharp exclamation, for in the distance he could see a rider approaching him at a rapid pace, though, as the latter drew near to him fear once more leaped to his heart, for he saw in a flash that it was old Dismukes' Chinese servant.

"Massa, massa," exclaimed the other, "the robbers are at the mine. They've got missie and master, and I'm riding for help, and—"

But Adam waited for no more. With a shout to the Chinaman he set spurs to his horse and was racing towards Death Valley, which lay only a few miles ahead.

In the meanwhile the old prospector and Ruth stood facing two outlaws. Ruth stood perfectly still, her calm eyes on Ben, the leader of the gang, whose gun was menacing them both. Dismukes' hands, holding his gun, were above his head.

Then Ben spoke, and there was a cruel smile on his face.

"Now then, come on, old-timer," he said. "Where have you got all your gold? Speak up, and speak quick. Otherwise you're for it."

Ruth shivered involuntarily. She had heard of Ben, knew the sinister and brutal reputation he bore. Dreadful deeds of cruelty had been whispered about him, and she was horribly afraid. She and the old prospector were seemingly all alone. There was no sign of the Chinese servant, and she wondered dully whether he had bolted precipitately or whether the rest of the robbers had got him.

Then she heard old Dismukes speaking, and a thrill surged over her at the quiet, steady indifference in his voice.

"I reckon you can find it for yourself, you white-livered skunk," he said. "I'm not telling you."

The outlaw scowled heavily. Fury was in his eyes.

"Oh, that's your tune, is it?" he snarled. "We'll soon change it for you."

He addressed the man who was at his side.

"Take this girl and lash her to a post so that she can see what's goin' on," he said brutally. "If this old fool won't speak, maybe she'll speak for him very soon. I'll deal with him."

The memory of what followed lived with Ruth for the rest of her life, for driven outside at the gun-point she soon found herself lashed securely to a post in full view of the ore-crushing machine, and her heart went down with horror as she realised what Ben was going to do. But struggle as she would when they had bound her, she knew only too well that she could never free herself. They had tied her too firmly for that.

It was a primitive ore-crushing machine. There was a deep, circular pool of raging water, fed by the river, which rushed down the mountain side; rocks were round it in the form of a low wall, and the grinding machinery was set in motion by mules which were harnessed to the creaking timbers, and walked round and round the pool.

But they harnessed old Dismukes this time, jeering at him, taunting him and raining heavy blows on him as they did so. And as the machinery began to move and the grinding of the ore sounded in the roaring pool below, Ben belaboured his helpless old victim with a chain, cursing him and abusing him as he staggered round and round.

"You won't tell us where you've hidden your gold, you old fool, won't you?" he screamed. "We'll soon see whether you'll change your mind!"

Ruth's head went down and she closed her eyes. Such agony was in her heart as she had never known. Above the roaring of the water and the grinding of the rocks below she could hear the outlaw's savage curses as he lashed at the old man.

Adam Larey did the last quarter of a mile on foot. For as he surmounted the hill and looked down on the mine he saw in a flash what was going on; and though fierce fury was in his heart he knew that only by exercising extreme caution could he hope to rescue Ruth and the old man.

Actually it only took him a few minutes to worm his way among the boulders to a point immediately above the ore-crushing machine. But even while he did so his eyes were roaming everywhere, and his hopes of success were growing every minute.

Then, suddenly he heard a footstep, and crouched among the boulders as he saw a man approaching him. But the man did not see him. His gun was in his hand and his eyes were roaming the valley left and right.

Adam held his breath. He knew that what he had to do would have to be done quickly, and he sent up a swift prayer to Heaven that there should be no mistake. Out of the corners of his eyes he could see old Dismukes below coming nearer and nearer to where he was, Ben lashing him furiously. And nearer and nearer came the unsuspecting sentry.

He leaped then, and his fist shot out, catching the man clean and true on the point of the jaw and sending him crashing down among the rocks to lie very still. Though Adam never waited to see that. In a flash he had swung round and had leaped the fifteen feet to the

The strange adventures of Mr. Blank, who fanatically assists charity through a form of blackmail. He steals some treasured possession and holds it as security until his victim sends a cheque to a specified charity. He turns detective when a man is robbed, a safe cleared, and himself involved. Starring Ellis Irving and Aileen Marson

The Two Burglaries

LONDON was at the height of the season when a series of strange and daring robberies commenced. Some heirloom would be stolen, whilst all other valuables would be ignored: then, within a few days, the unfortunate loser would receive a short note in block lettering:

"When you send a cheque for one hundred guineas to the Home for Incurables, your treasure will be faithfully returned to you.—Signed, M. BLANK."

The charities varied, so did the ransom amounts. It seemed clear that Mr. Blank knew his victims—they were always rich, mean people.

Lady Minecot was a victim in the early evening of one of her bridge parties. She was furious when she discovered that her beautiful diamond necklace had vanished from her jewel-case. She rang up the police and Detective-inspector Murray came hurrying to her mansion in Portman Square.

"It's disgraceful!" cried her ladyship. "What are you police doing?"

Murray, heavy-jowled, short and dour, put a hand up to his thick moustache. "We can't be everywhere, Lady Minecot."

"You might be somewhere sometimes!" she snapped. "This is the fourth robbery in this square alone! My diamond necklace taken—my love-liest thing!"

"Looks like that Mr. Blank again," said Murray. "He'll tell you to-night, I expect."

"But I'm most charitable!" Lady Minecot almost shrieked. "Are you suggesting—"

The telephone bell sounded and she snatched up the instrument from her desk. She listened a moment, then thrust the receiver towards the detective.

Murray listened awhile.

"Of all the confounded impudence!" He turned to the irate lady. "It's Mr. Blank," he told her. "He says that if you'll post a cheque for five hundred pounds to the Margate Sea-bathing Hospital, the necklace shall be instantly returned."

Lady Minecot collapsed into a chair.

"Did you—did you say five hundred?"

Murray, still listening in, nodded.

"He says your necklace is worth ten thousand pounds."

Lady Minecot groaned.

"Tell the scoundrel 'Yes'! And I hope the next time he's burglar—someone will shoot him!"

She wrote the cheque and gave it to her secretary, who went straight to the post with it. Murray called into the phone:

"All right—the cheque has gone. You can take my word. Inspector Murray this end. Now, where's the necklace?"

He slammed down the phone.

"He says it's with the artificial flowers in this room, your ladyship."

Lady Minecot dashed to a pedestal vase in the corner of her boudoir. She plucked out a bunch of paper roses, scattering them, plunged her hand into the vase and—drew out the necklace!

"Can't I stop the cheque?" she gasped hysterically.

"You'll be asking for further trouble if you do," growled Murray.

Just before ten o'clock that same evening the house of Lord and Lady Waring in Portman Square was visited by a gentleman in rubber shoes and a dark, tightly buttoned-up suit, who preferred to come in by the balcony window rather than by the front door.

The room he entered was Lady Waring's own especial study; it was inkily dark and the big house was silent as the grave. The burglar made his way by the light of his torch towards the wall safe, and set down his basket of tools in order to drill through the lock of the safe.

He had scarcely started when a gentle voice sounded from behind him:

"You'll never do it like that."

The burglar put down the drill. He turned about to peer through the darkness at a shadowy figure. He dimly perceived that across its nose a large patch of black silk was tightly drawn.

"Lummy, gov'nor—you startled me!" he muttered.

"Nothing like the outside alarm bells would have startled you when you opened the window," came the cool answer, "if I hadn't cut the wires. Get away from that safe."

The dark figure knelt before the safe and put clever fingers on the knob of the combination lock, twiddled the knob, gave a little pull at the safe door—and it silently came open. A gloved hand was thrust in and a drawer full of jewels was drawn forth.

"Gov'nor, you're a marvel!" The burglar flashed his torch on the sparkling gems. "Let's hop it before the mice get at us!"

"I am taking this emerald pendant," stated that steady voice. "And this being done—you are going to hop it, empty-handed, the way you entered."

"But, lummy, gov'nor, I'm Jimmy Glass, professional! You're only an amateur—doing things for a lark! I tumble to you—you're Mr. Blank!"

The Black Mask told him:

"The butler is listening at the door." Jimmy Glass picked up his bag.

March 14th, 1936.

"I'll go—because I've taken a fancy to you."

He moved towards the window. Mr. Blank heard him fumbling for the hasp. "Be careful!"

It was too late. Jimmy had knocked on an inside burglar alarm. A strident ringing of bells shattered the night. Both men made a dash for the window and dropped from the balcony into the dark garden below.

"Search Me!"

A CLEANLY-SHAVED, frank-faced young gentleman strolled into the portico of Lady Mincot's mansion. At the door was a tall, broad-shouldered man waiting entrance. He turned about.

"Hallo, Verrell—you schoolboy! Been ringing all the bells in the square?"

"A fire-alarm, I imagine," Verrell smiled. The butler had opened the door. "After you, Davidson."

They entered the house and presently were being received by their hostess.

"You're late," she informed them. "I've filled up all the places. Oh, here's Sir John and Lady McTavish—that just makes another four for bridge."

She turned to greet a thin, cadaverous Scotsman who had just entered with a lady in black, who at once gushed:

"My dear, we've brought our niece Jean with us. You don't mind?"

"You'll have to play rummy if there's five of you," Lady Mincot stated in her abrupt manner. "What's the matter now, Hopkins?"

The butler was waiting at the door. "It's the detective gentleman, my lady. He says—"

Murray had followed him in. "Sorry, Lady Mincot, but I have to trouble you. There has been a burglary at Lord Waring's, across the square, and Lady Waring's emerald pendant is missing. The burglars were disturbed by the alarm bells—and one of the pair was seen to enter this house."

"Good gracious!" Lady Mincot exclaimed. "When?"

"Within the last few minutes!" Murray was eyeing Sir John.

"I have just entered," he said haughtily. "D'you think I'm a burglar?"

"We came in together just now," spoke the big Davidson, glancing at Verrell. "Do you accuse us?"

"Or me?" cried Lady McTavish. "Or my niece Jean, downstairs, who's changing her shoes?"

"I don't accuse anyone," Murray answered them. "The fellow was in evening dress, and I've just picked up this, outside."

He held out a black silk mask. "You'd better search us," Sir John ordered icily. "Begin with me."

Murray signalled to a plain-clothes man who had quietly slipped into the room. Sir John held up his arms and the detective ran deft hands over him.

"Now me," said Davidson, smiling at them.

Verrell had seated himself at a table. He had just drawn out his handkerchief when a handsome girl came into the room behind him. Unseen, she watched him feel for and glance at a visiting-card which he took rather surprisedly from his breast-pocket.

"My turn," he said, standing up for the search.

He submitted lazily. "Give me back that card, inspector, please. I may want the address."

Murray and his man retired baffled.

The five late-comers settled down to a boisterous game of rummy. Miss Jean McTavish much interested in young Mr. March 14th, 1936.

Verrell. It was plain to her that he had something on his mind.

Three flights up a small staircase in a Bloomsbury lodging-house young Mr. Verrell toiled the next morning. He tapped at a door on which there was pinned a visiting card exactly like one he held in his hand. A voice called out: "Entray!"

Mr. Verrell entered the small room. "Professor Slavinski?"

"Wee! I am ze professeur," answered an assumed voice.

Said Mr. Verrell: "You're a liar—you're Jimmy Glass!

Where's that pendant you stole from me last night?"

"Sleight-of-hand, gov'nor—same as you read on the card I shoved in your pocket last night! Professor Slavinski, Entertainer and—Expert. Children's Parties attended at moderate fees. Here's the blinking pendant."

Verrell took the glittering thing and put it carefully into his breast-pocket.

"Thanks. They nearly had me last night," he added.

"You need a partner, gov'nor. What about taking me in? I'm fair nuts on you. The way you opened that safe was lovely!"

"I work alone, Jimmy."

"I'm just as willing to be honest as to be t'other way," said the professor earnestly. "I'll be your valet, your servant—anything you like."

Said Verrell: "Lady McTavish is giving a party to-night at her place in Audley Street. Be there at ten o'clock—to give an entertainment. Number 33."

He nodded to Jimmy and departed. In ten seconds he was back again.

"Where's that pendant—you light-fingered scoundrel!"

"Sorry, gov'nor—I just had to take it," Jimmy passed it back. "Put it in your trousers pocket this time!"

"Sir John—He's Dead!"

PROFESSOR SLAVINSKI was a great success at the McTavish party. He asked for the help of three ladies and three gentlemen in the corner of the big room where he was demonstrating—and managed to steal something from each one without their being in the slightest degree aware of the fact!

Jean McTavish was very surprised to find her dress bag denuded of its purse.

Davidson was rather annoyed at discovering a door key taken from the pocket of his white dress waistcoat. Sir John looked on and applauded loudly at the conclusion, boasting:

"But you couldn't catch me, professor!"

"You 'ave nozzing worth ze taking, hein?" grinned Jimmy, complete with a short, spade-shaped beard and a pretended Russo-French accent. "But I take madame's bracelet, yes!"

"Good gracious, my ruby bracelet's gone!" gasped Lady McTavish, staring at her bare wrist. "An heirloom—it was my grandmother's!"

"Ere it is, madame!" Jimmy made a grab in the air and appeared to catch the bracelet as it fell from the ceiling.

"Is it not wonderbar?"

He handed it to Lady McTavish with an exaggerated bow. He flashed a glance at Verrell, who crossed the room to speak low to him:

"Better go now."

"That bracelet isn't the goods, gov'nor," Jimmy breathed. "Paste imitation!"

"I guessed so. I'll get the real thing presently."

"You make that old Sir John pay handsome," counselled Jimmy. "He never gives away a penny. Tried to cut down my fee!"

Verrell went back to Jean, dancing with her as often as he could.

"Lady Waring's emerald pendant has been returned to her, I hear," he remarked casually.

"Lord Waring had to send a thousand guineas to Guy's Hospital," Jean told him. "I suppose you heard that, too?"

The "professor" was very busy at the buffet. Jean smiled at him, whispering to Verrell:

"Your friend is clever. He knew at a glance that auntie's bracelet was a fake."

Verrell was handing her champagne. "A fake, eh?"

"Yes, the real one is in the safe in Sir John's library. The safe is hidden behind a picture over the mantelpiece. Mr. Blank himself wouldn't be able to steal anything of uncle's," she added.

Verrell nodded.

"Here's Davidson come to claim you for a dance. Say you're engaged."

Jean checked him.

"You must dance with Miss Hardcastle."

Davidson came to them, murmuring low to Jean:

"Lady McTavish is asking for you."

Jean presented Verrell to the not-very-young Miss Hardcastle and watched them depart, arm-in-arm, for the ball-room.

Verrell soon invented an excuse to get away. He crept up the stairs to the library, where only the freelight flickered in the grate. All was dusky quiet. He went straight to the picture over the mantelpiece and moved it sideways. There, behind it, was a flat knob almost hidden in the carved panelling.

Verrell manipulated the knob and opened the panel. A small recess was revealed.

It was quite empty.

Verrell smiled to himself. Jean evidently suspected him and had laid a little trap. He moved noiselessly out of the room and got back to Miss Hardcastle with a glass of champagne from the buffet.

"Couldn't get served," he explained. "So sorry!"

A bare five minutes later Jean came running down the stairs, her pretty face ashy pale. She came tottering to Verrell.

"Sir John!" she gasped. "In the library. He's—dead!"

She collapsed into Verrell's arms.

A Clue?

DETECTIVE MURRAY and a policeman were conducting a preliminary investigation. Verrell and Davidson were in the card-room—most of the other guests having hastily departed. Lady Mincot, as the oldest friend of the McTavish family, was telling Murray:

"I was here playing cards with Mr. Davidson and Lord and Lady Waring," she explained, "when Mr. Verrell came to us with the dreadful news. I have sent Lady McTavish to bed—she is with her niece. Sir John has died of heart trouble, of course?"

Murray shook his head.

"Best to let everybody think so," he stated. "He was in the library collapsed on a couch. He had been shot through the back."

"You mean—murdered?" Lady Mincot stared in horror.

"Beyond doubt," Murray answered. "There is no sign of the weapon, but the house must be searched. No one should have been allowed to leave."

"But we should have heard the report," Lady Mincot tried to argue.

"Not necessarily," came the quick

A small, furtive man silently entered the hall with a revolver clutched in his hand.

answer. "The pistol used may well have had a silencer—or the noise in the house may have drowned all else—What are you doing with those cards, Mr. Verrell?"

"There's a smudge of burnt gunpowder on this one." Verrell held up a card from the back on the table.

Davidson put in:

"That card was in my hand. We were playing euhre. The mark is from the ash of a cigarette I was smoking."

Lady Mincot said:

"Mr. Davidson was winning every hand!"

Murray took the card.

"I don't know why you should think this a gunpowder smudge," he told Verrell, giving him a straight look. He added, as he flung the card aside. "The small private safe in the library has been opened and rifled of all its contents."

Next morning when Verrell called at the McTavish home he was received by Jean.

She asked him:

"Are you wise to come?"

Verrell questioned bluntly:

"Do you think I killed Sir John?"

Jean put out her hand to him.

"I know you didn't," she answered. "But Mr. Blank did take auntie's bracelet."

"No," he assured her. "Mr. Blank merely opened the safe." He added: "I'm glad you trust me, Jean."

"Don't stay," she urged. "Murray suspects you. He thought you were trying to put suspicion on Davidson last night."

As Verrell was leaving the house, he almost ran into a bespectacled, side-whiskered gentleman in a black frock coat and black trousers, who removed his tall hat with a jerky movement, muttering sepulchrally:

"Good-morning, sir—a sad business. I am the undertaker."

Late that afternoon Jimmy called at Verrell's chambers. Verrell greeted him:

"Well, undertaker, did you bury the body?"

"Now, gov'nor, none of your jokes! I had to get in the house, didn't I?" Jimmy reminded him. "And I didn't pinch a single thing—except this photo that I lifted out of Lady Mac's dressing-gown pocket."

He passed over to Verrell a carte-de-visite of a pretty brunette. Verrell turned the card over, to read in a sprawly handwriting:

"With love from Phyllis Newcombe."

Jimmy asked:

"Make anything of it?"

"Phyllis Newcombe is the cabaret girl at the Winchester." Verrell's face grew grave. "I imagine she gave this to Sir John and—his wife found it."

"You don't think Lady Mac popped him off?" Jimmy shook his head. "Gov'nor, believe me, she isn't the sort."

"We must follow this up," Verrell decided.

Detective Murray had closely interrogated all the staff at the McTavish home, with no result. The chauffeur was the only one who had given him the slightest help. He had seen, from the garage, lights in the library go up about eleven o'clock for a few minutes.

"I guessed Sir John had come up to fetch a book," he told Murray.

Miss Newcombe received two pretended policemen at her flat that night. She told them that Sir John was "just a friend" who had danced with her at the Winchester. He had asked for her photograph.

"Would you care to have one, inspector?" she smiled at Verrell.

"I would!" cried Jimmy. "Lummy, rather!"

When they were outside the flat, Verrell said:

"You gave away the whole thing!"

"Not me, gov'nor!" said Jimmy.

"There was a man's gold cigarette-case on a side table." Verrell frowned. "One I've seen before. I tried to tip you the wink to pinch it."

"I got her latch key," grinned Jimmy, "anyhow."

That night Verrell entered the McTavish mansion by the library window. He wore a buttoned-up overcoat over his dress suit and a black mask.

With the aid of a torch light he made his way to the picture, slid it back and manipulated the combination-knob lock. He felt inside the circular hole behind the small door with deft fingers until he found the secret spring he had guessed to be hidden within. A faint click rewarded him—a whole panel at the side of the fireplace slid open in its grooves.

Verrell withdrew the ruby bracelet from the safe and put it in his pocket. Then he took out some legal-looking papers.

A tense whisper came from behind him.

"Many thanks! That safe has bothered me a lot. Don't move, or I'll drill you through the back!"

Without turning, Verrell answered, in his cool way:

"Then it was your cigarette-case, Davidson?"

"I don't understand, and I don't care," came the reply. "Put those documents on the table. Now come away from the safe. Stand against the bookshelves!"

Verrell obeyed. He knew that he had a desperate man to deal with.

Total darkness held them hidden from each other. Verrell set his teeth, waiting immobile. Suddenly the lights were flashed on and Davidson's voice sounded from the passage.

"Mr. Blank, inspector. I caught him in the act. You will find he has Lady McTavish's bracelet. You'll excuse my going?"

Murray snapped a sharp command to a manservant and two uniformed policemen.

"Seize him!"

Verrell dashed aside the detective's out-tretched hand, then flung himself at the hesitating footman. As the two policemen closed in on him, Verrell grabbed at their legs and overturned

Death among the clouds! War in the sky as intrepid flyers clash with the forces of organised crime! Tailspin Tommy returns to the firmament of Fame in a smashing drama that blazes its way across the Pacific to islands of hidden wealth, of lawlessness, of savagery and cannibalism. A wonder serial of unforgettable thrills, starring Clark Williams and Noah Beery, Jun.

Read This First

Tailspin Tommy, famous civilian flyer and ace of the Three Point Aerodrome, is hired by a wealthy business man named Curtis to make aerial surveys of the oil-bearing island of Nazil, in the far tropical realms of the Pacific Ocean.

Curtis is the uncle of Betty Lou Barnes, Tailspin's sweetheart, and is in partnership with Don Alvarado Casmetto, who owns most of the island of Nazil, and whose daughter Inez has been holidaying in the United States.

The services of Skeeter Milligan, Tailspin's mechanic, are also engaged by Curtis, and the party set out in two 'planes. But word of their approach is later conveyed to Don Alvarado's unscrupulous stepbrother, Emanuel Casmetto, who seeks to oust his kinsman from Nazil, and who is backed by Raymore, a shady American financier.

Tailspin and Skeeter fall into the hands of Emanuel and Raymore, but escape with the help of Bill McGuire, a newspaper man who has obtained a job as chef at Emanuel's stronghold, solely for the purpose of investigating Raymore's activities.

The two youngsters are also assisted by a mysterious aviator who calls himself the Eagle, and who for some reason makes himself their friend and ally.

Later, while investigating a secret hangar in Emanuel's territory, Tailspin and Skeeter and Betty Lou discover a subterranean passage. But Emanuel has learned of their presence at the hangar, and it is bombed from the air by Gomez, one of his minions.

EPISODE 5.—

"The Torrent"

The Unknown Protector

EVEN as the bomb struck the hangar and shattered the building to smithereens, Betty Lou gained the comparative safety of the underground tunnel with Tailspin and Skeeter.

A hot rush of air swept down into the subterranean gallery, and dust and debris poured through the open trap-door overhead. But, unharmed, the girl and her two companions reeled along the dimly-lit passage for a short distance, then came to a halt and listened to the deep reverberations of the explosion that had just taken place.

The echoes of the blast died away, and they heard the drone of the aeroplane flown by Gomez, Emanuel Casmetto's ace. Judging from the sound of the craft's motor, the fellow had dropped to a low altitude and was circling over the clearing, doubtless viewing his grim handiwork, but gradually the engine-note became less distinct and they realised that the hostile aviator must be quitting the vicinity.

The hum of the 'plane's motor grew more and more remote, until at last it was audible no longer. Then Tailspin spoke to Betty Lou.

"I reckon the coast's clear now," he said thickly. "Get back to our ship and wait for us there, Betty. No doubt the guy that bombed the hangar thinks we've all been wiped out."

Betty gave him an anxious glance. "What are you and Skeeter going to do?" she wanted to know.

"We aim to find out where this tunnel leads to," the young airman told her. "Don't worry, we can take care of ourselves. You make your way to the 'plane, if you can get through the wreckage of the shed."

Betty Lou was reluctant to leave them, but Tailspin persuaded her to return to the steps which led up to the trap-door, and it was as she was climbing towards the tunnel's outlet that she heard a sudden commotion behind her.

She turned her head quickly, and as she did so she saw a group of armed and uniformed men swinging round a bend in the underground gallery—men who raised a sharp outcry at sight of Tailspin and Skeeter, and who rushed upon the youths before they could take to their heels.

Betty checked in dismay, and there was an expression of alarm on her pretty face as she watched the newcomers surround her friends and seize them. Next instant a furious scuffle was in progress, and in the throes of that losing battle Tailspin shouted frantically to the girl on the stairway.

"Run for it, Betty!" he yelled. "Go on, make your getaway in the 'plane!"

Betty Lou hesitated only for a moment, and then, realising that she could serve no purpose by remaining but might fetch help if she made her escape, she scrambled up the steps and pulled herself through the opening above—an opening that was now latticed by splintered planks that had fallen athwart it.

As she disappeared through the tunnel's outlet two of Emanuel Casmetto's hirelings detached themselves from the struggle in the gallery and dashed in pursuit of her. Within a few seconds they were also clambering up through the trap-door, and as they hauled themselves clear of the secret passage they found themselves amid the piled wreckage of the hangar.

Betty was stumbling and tripping over the broken timbers that lay strewn upon the ground, and the two dago soldiers gave chase determinedly. The girl blundered from the debris of the hangar with a fair start, however, and sped across the glade towards the 'plane in which she, Tailspin and Skeeter had made the trip from Don Alvarado's hacienda.

Could she reach it and take off into the air before Emanuel's men overhauled her, though? She had frenzied doubts about this, and, looking back fearfully as she ran, she beheld her pursuers behind her.

And then suddenly, out of the blue, there came deliverance—deliverance in the form of a strange, incongruous flying-machine that swooped over the trees and banked steeply to wheel above the clearing like some wide-winged bird of prey!

It was the mysterious Eagle's 'plane, and as its monstrous shadow passed over the glade its hidden machine-gun belched death through the spinning propeller-shaft.

A stream of bullets ripped a furrow in the path of Betty Lou's pursuers, and they stopped in their tracks, looking up with appalled eyes at the craft which roared above them; and, as they stood uncertainly there, the ship wheeled again to bear down on them a second time, its machine-gun threatening them with a fresh hail of lead.

The invitation to make themselves scarce was too stern to be defied. The soldiers fled in helter-skelter style, bounding like antelopes to the ruins of the hangar and regaining the entrance to the underground tunnel in record time.

They vanished through the opening, tumbling down the steps, and they were seen no more by the unknown pilot who had put them to flight, and who now soared higher with attention focused on Betty Lou.

The girl had reached Tailspin's 'plane, and was hoisting herself into the forward cockpit. Satisfied that she needed no further assistance, the Eagle waved a gloved hand to her and swung away to the north. But Betty did not take off, made no attempt to set her ship in motion.

It was not because the controls presented any difficulties to her. There was not a 'plane in existence that she could not have flown. Nor was it because of any damage caused by the bombs that Gomez had dropped, for Emanuel's aviator had been careful to avoid injuring the craft, probably reflecting that it would be a valuable acquisition for his master.

No; Betty's sole reason for delaying her take-off was the possibility of Tailspin and Skeeter breaking away from the men who had attacked them.

It was a forlorn hope, as Betty might have realised if she could have seen what was happening down in the tunnel below the ruined hangar.

The Americans had put up a terrific fight, but the odds were too great, and at the moment when Betty Lou's discomfited pursuers rejoined the party in the underground gallery, Tailspin and Skeeter were helpless in the grip of their captors.

The two men who had fled from the Eagle began to tell their story in Spanish, and their comrades listened in silence, none of them showing any desire to climb from the tunnel and brave an engagement with the unknown aviator if he were still within range. As for Tailspin and his mechanic, they could not make head or tail of the narrative, being ignorant of the language in which it was delivered, but they at least obtained the impression that Betty was safe.

A brief discussion now took place between their guards, and at the end of it the two prisoners were marched onward through the tunnel. It was a journey that occupied a considerable time, but at length the captives and their guards emerged from the subterranean passage, and Tailspin and Skeeter immediately found themselves in the neighbourhood of Emanuel Casmotto's headquarters.

Like Don Alvarado, his stepbrother, Emanuel was overlord of a settlement inhabited by a mixed population of Spaniards and half-breed islanders, and his actual stronghold stood on the outskirts of that settlement. Towards this citadel the prisoners were led, and as they were crossing the compound to the main building of the military station Bill McGuire showed up.

A look of distress appeared momentarily on the newspaper man's plump face when he recognised the young Americans, but he was quick to hide his true feelings, and spoke to Emanuel's band of soldiers heartily enough.

"I see you've got these rascals again," he said. "Well, that's fine, that's fine!"

"Si, amigo," one of the guards replied, in broken English that was flavoured with his native Spanish, "eet ees ver' fine and none weel be better pleased than Senor Emanuel. But for us, dey might have got away."

McGuire strolled on after exchanging a surreptitious glance with the captives, who were then hurried forward by the men who had taken them prisoner, and soon they were being escorted past a 'plane that stood in the middle of the compound—a 'plane that was the very craft which had bombed the hangar.

Sixty seconds later the youthful Americans were standing in a room occupied by Emanuel Casmotto, Horace Raymore and Gomez, and from the lips of one of the guards these three heard the story of the youngsters' capture.

"We set out to block up the secret tunnel as you suggested, Senor Casmotto," the narrator said, speaking in English for Raymore's benefit, "and we came across these dogs. They had escaped death by the bombs which Gomez dropped. There was a girl with them, too, but she got away—thanks to the airman who flies the ship that looks like a great eagle."

Emanuel Casmotto frowned darkly, and asked for further details. When they had been given he was silent for a while, and then Raymore spoke:

"Did you block up that tunnel?" he demanded of the man who had told the story.

"No, senor; we hurried back with our prisoners," was the reply. "But there is a cask of powder in a niche in the tunnel, and it will not take long to blow in the south entrance."

"Then you'd better see to that right away," Raymore growled. "Leave Tompkins and Milligan here in charge of four or five of your men."

Several of the guards were detailed to remain in the room with the prisoners, and the rest of the soldiery departed. When these had filed out, Emanuel Casmotto fixed his malevolent eyes upon Tailspin and Skeeter.

"So!" he barked. "You have been caught again while doing devil's work for that stepbrother of mine! Do you know what I have a mind to do? I have a mind to put the two of you to death without any more delay. It was intended that you should die when Gomez bombed the hangar—"

"Just a minute, Casmotto."

It was the voice of Raymore, and the financier laid a restraining hand on the Spaniard's arm, but ere he could say more Emanuel addressed him impatiently.

"Leave me to handle these meddling cubs, senor," he snapped. "I am in command here."

"You may command the citadel," the crooked oil magnate retorted. "But I command the money that established it. Listen, we planned to get rid of these two fellows, but it's occurred to me that they might prove useful."

Emanuel eyed him dubiously, but held his peace as Raymore turned to the captives.

"What's your price?" he queried briskly. "You know what I mean. What are Don Alvarado and Curtis paying you?"

"Don Alvarado and Curtis aren't paying us anything," Tailspin answered in a cold voice. "They made a bargain with Paul Smith, of Three Point, for our services. He's the man who employs us, and he pays us a fixed salary."

"Then I'll double your salary if you'll join up with our outfit," Raymore said. "That's a pretty good offer, I guess—especially as you'll be on the winning side if you work for me."

Skeeter flared up at the Yankee financier.

"Does your side always win?" he bit out. "I thought we got the better of you once or twice. And as for your dirty bribe, Mr. Horace P. Raymore—"

Tailspin plucked at his mechanic's sleeve. He resented the financier's proposal as much as Skeeter, but had been quick to see that it might be to their advantage if they made a pretence of appearing interested. A point-blank refusal would probably mean death.

"Quiet, Skeets," the young airman said, and then, looking at Raymore thoughtfully, he invited the crook to explain precisely what he meant.

"The situation's clear enough, isn't it?" Raymore grunted. "My partner and I control some of the richest oil-fields on this island, and with you two on our side it won't be long before we grab the rest. That is, if you agree to fight for us."

"Yes, if you fight for us and help to drive my stepbrother out of Nazil," Emanuel struck in venomously.

Tailspin appeared to consider the prospect, and, if Skeeter stared at his friend in dumb amazement at first, it gradually dawned on him that the ace from Three Point was only playing for time—whereupon the mechanic also assumed an interested expression.

"It sounds like a pretty good idea," Tailspin murmured at length, "though I guess we couldn't go back to our old jobs after this racket is finished. Supposing you give us a day or two to think it over?"

"We'll give you till to-morrow morning," the financier declared. "Meantime, you can go any place you want to inside the settlement."

"What's that?" Emanuel Casmotto cried out angrily.

"All right, all right!" Raymore exclaimed. "Don't get so hot under the collar. Let me finish, will you? I was just going to tell them that they'll be constantly attended by these guards—and that any attempt to escape would be mighty bad for their health."

With an ominous inclination of his head he dismissed Tailspin and Skeeter, and, virtually prisoners in spite of the concession that had been made to them, the youngsters turned away.

They were followed from the room by their guards, and when the door had closed behind them Raymore signed to Gomez.

"Listen," he said. "I want you to take up the bomber and scout around for that guy who calls himself the Eagle. Should you locate him, tangle with him and bring him down with your machine-gun. And another thing, if you happen to run across that girl who was with Tompkins and Milligan—force her to land her 'plane."

Gomez saluted, and hastened from the apartment. A short time afterwards he was in the compound, across which Tailspin and Skeeter and their escort were now sauntering, and a few minutes later Emanuel Casmetto's aviator might have been seen flying southward in the bomber.

It was as the big 'plane was cruising over the hinterland of jungle that a man on the edge of the forest gazed up at it curiously. The man in question was Bill McGuire, who had wandered from the settlement some time previously, and he was following the receding craft with his eyes when he suddenly heard a stealthy movement close at hand.

McGuire glanced round, and, in the instant of turning, he saw a tall figure in the kit of an airman stride from a mass of thickets near by. It was the figure of a man whose countenance was hidden behind a mask that was attached to his flying helmet, leaving nothing visible but his strong jaw—and his dark eyes, which gleamed through a pair of tinted goggles that were part of the mask.

The stranger was grasping a revolver, and, startled by his unexpected appearance, McGuire was thrown into a panic. "N-no!" he blurted. "N-no, mister! Don't shoot! I'm a—I'm a friend—whichever side ye're on!"

"It's all right, McGuire," the other said slowly. "Don't get scared. I know you're on the right side."

Somewhat reassured, Bill McGuire fingered his collar tremulously and looked at the stranger in an awed fashion.

"Who told you my name?" he faltered. "Who are you, mister?"

"Men call me the Eagle," came the deliberate reply. "Tell me, McGuire, what happened to Tailspin Tompkins and Skeeter Milligan?"

"Th-they were taken before Emanuel Casmetto and Raymore," Mac breathed. "but they haven't come to no harm yet, for I saw 'em comin' away from the compound only a few minutes back. They were surrounded by guards, but looked as if they were free to go where they pleased. I haven't figured it out yet."

There was a spell of silence, and then the Eagle spoke again.

"We must think of some way to get them out of there," he said. "Meantime, I'm going to follow the course of the bomber that passed overhead just now. I want to know where it's bound for. Listen, McGuire, my ship's in a clearing a little to the west of here, and I want you to come there with me. On the way I'll show you how you can help me."

The newspaper man accompanied him through the jungle, and as they walked amid the shadows of the trees the Eagle explained to McGuire a method of signalling which the reporter could employ in any emergency.

"I need someone like you to keep me posted," the mysterious aviator observed, "and you can always get in touch with me by the means which I've just described to you."

March 14th, 1936.

They were entering a clearing as he spoke these words, and in the centre of that clearing stood the Eagle's 'plane. Advancing towards it, the unknown airman climbed into the machine and then leaned down to address McGuire for the last time.

"Don't forget," he reminded him, "if help is needed, give me the sign. I'll look for it right here."

Standing by the 'plane, Mac nodded his assent. Then he drew aside, and sixty seconds later he was watching the strange ship as it soared skyward—watching it with a nonplussed expression on his rotund features.

A Duel in the Clouds

IN the glade where the hangar had lately stood, Betty Lou Barnes had lingered a long time in the faint hope that her friends might reappear. But at last she had been forced to conclude that they had been taken prisoner, and at the very moment when the Eagle was parting company with Bill McGuire, Betty was starting the motor of Tailspin's 'plane.

The engine was still warm, but she waited a little while to make certain that it was firing evenly and would not "stall" during the take-off. Then she opened the throttle and drove the craft across the stretch of turf until it was travelling at speed.

She now drew back the joystick, and the 'plane rose gracefully from the ground, soaring into the wind as it cleared the tree-tops and climbing swiftly towards the clouds.

And even as it climbed Betty saw another machine approaching from the north, a machine that was near enough to recognise as the bomber that had destroyed the aeroplane shed in the glade below!

With a thrill of alarm Betty swung away from it and tried to gain height, but she had become aware of her danger too late, and before she could escape, Gomez was on the tail of her ship.

Flying close behind his victim's craft, the pilot of the bomber gripped the trigger of the machine-gun with which his 'plane was equipped, and next instant the roar of engines was punctuated by the staccato blatter of that deadly weapon, hot lead belching from its muzzle in a menacing stream.

The bullets slashed past Betty's head, for Gomez was not trying to hit her, but to scare her into grounding her ship. He did not succeed, however—reckoned without the girl's nerve and spirit—and cursed under his breath as she veered away to give him the slip.

She meant to out-manoeuvre him, did she? Bah, he would show her!

This Gomez told himself resolutely, but in the grim pursuit that ensued he quickly realised that he was up against no mean pilot. Circling, soaring, diving to follow her down on the occasions when she chose to plunge, he strove to stick close to the tail of her 'plane and harass her with bursts of gunfire. Yet such was her skill with the controls that her craft might have been a fly, so rapid and confusing were its movements, and time and again she eluded him.

It was probably lucky for Gomez that her ship carried no armament, or he might have found himself in the position of defender instead of aggressor. As it was, he became savage and wrathful, and, in his chagrin and impatience, lost much of the cunning that he himself undoubtedly possessed.

Most likely, Gomez might have triumphed in the end if the affair had lasted long enough. In all probability he would have succeeded finally in his design. But while Betty Lou Barnes was still leading him a dance among the clouds, a third 'plane loomed into the desperate scene—the fantastic 'plane manned by the Eagle.

It was roaring into the engagement almost before Gomez was aware of its presence, almost before the Spaniard could swing off and take up a fighting position; and in another moment the Eagle's gun was challenging his own, and the slugs were whipping thick and fast between the combatant ships.

Betty dived out of harm's way and then straightened out to head southwards, looking back with upraised glance to watch the fierce dog-fight that was now in progress. Drawing farther from the locality at a cruising speed, she gazed wide-eyed at the two warring 'planes and saw the rival pilots making every effort to gain the upper hand.

The Eagle it was who ultimately secured positional advantage, proving himself a master in the tactics of aerial conflict, and suddenly Gomez found himself in the rôle of a hunted fugitive.

Frantically he tried to evade his foe, but could not. The Eagle was behind him, and the Spaniard could not shake him off; and he, Gomez, was under the sights of the Eagle's gun without being able to answer the fire of that weapon.

Bullets ripped along the length of his 'plane, tearing into the fuselage, into the fabric of the wings. From afar Betty saw his machine go into a sudden spin and fall earthward with fumes trailing from it—saw it drop into the heart of the jungle, where it was lost to sight amongst the trees, the fate of its pilot being in doubt.

Had Emanuel Casmetto's mission crashed to his death, or had he managed to ground his damaged ship without sustaining fatal injuries?

Betty did not know. She only knew that the Eagle was now bearing off towards the north, to vanish—as he always did—behind a dense smoke-screen thrown from his exhaust.

Betty flew on in a southerly direction, and about half an hour later she was circling above the landing field near Don Alvarado's hacienda. As she dropped lower she saw two or three figures emerge hurriedly from the Don's home, and by the time she had brought her ship to a standstill on the level sward she had recognised Don Alvarado, Inez and the planter known as Garcia.

They came running across to her and confronted her anxiously when she clambered from the 'plane.

"Senorita Betty Lou!" gasped the Don. "What happened? Where are the boys? Inez, here, told me that you had gone off with them on their reconnaissance. I have been so worried. You have been absent so long."

"Where's Uncle Ned?" Betty demanded.

"Senor Curtis has departed on a tour of Don Alvarado's oil-fields, senorita," Garcia broke in. "But tell us, where are Senor Tompkins and Senor Milligan?"

Betty Lou answered him shakily, never guessing the true reason for Garcia's eagerness to know what had occurred, never suspecting that this man, who affected to be a friend, was in reality a spy in Emanuel's pay.

"Tommy and Skeeter were captured by hostile soldiers," she panted. "I hoped they'd get away, but I waited and waited, and they never showed up."

She proceeded to relate the whole story in detail, and when she had finished, Don Alvarado ground his teeth together.

"Any hasty and ill-planned tactics must necessarily prove dangerous," he said, "but we shall have to take a chance. I'll mobilise a force and attack Emanuel's settlement and stronghold. We'll march without delay. It may be that we shall be defeated and wiped out, but we must at least make an attempt to rescue those boys!"

There was a silence, during which Garcia summed up the situation swiftly. True, it was possible that Don Alvarado's men might fail in their purpose, but there was also a likelihood that Emanuel might not be able to assemble his troops in time to meet the assault.

"Don Alvarado," the planter murmured, "before you make so rash a move, I suggest that other methods are tried first. Now I know a place where an aeroplane could be set down secretly within a mile of your stepbrother's headquarters, and I am willing enough to make an attempt at rescuing our young friends. In this matter, one man might succeed where a thousand would effect nothing."

The Don looked at him keenly.

"You—you would be prepared to take such a risk, senior?" he stammered, deeply impressed by Garcia's offer.

"I am prepared to do anything that will help your cause, Don Alvarado," the planter announced in a high-sounding tone.

He paused, and then turned his glance upon Betty.

"To carry out the plan I have in mind," he continued, "I should need an experienced pilot."

"An experienced pilot," Betty Lon declared at once. "Then you don't have to look farther than me, Senior Garcia. I'll be your pilot."

"Oh, no, Betty!" Inez Cassetto ejaculated in alarm.

"No, there is too much danger," Don Alvarado agreed. "My daughter is right, Seniorita Betty. Already you have gone through perils enough."

But the American girl was in no mood to listen to arguments. With a set expression on her pretty face she addressed Garcia stubbornly.

"When do we start?" she wanted to know.

"As soon as you like," the planter rejoined, and, despite the pleas of Don Alvarado and Inez, preparations were made for an immediate departure.

Ten minutes after Garcia had volunteered his proposal, the plane in which Betty had arrived was ascending towards the clouds again, and, wheeling northward, it was soon visible to the Don and his daughter only as a mere speck in the sky.

At a speed of more than a hundred miles an hour the machine cruised high above the panoramic savannahs and mountains of the island—onward until the more open country of the south gave place to the great belt of jungle that split the territories of the rival stepbrothers. Then suddenly Garcia spoke to Betty through the telephone tube and indicated a clearing somewhat to the east.

"There's the landing-place I had in mind," he told her. "Can you set the ship down there?"

The girl nodded, and, altering her course, she circled the glade a couple of times before swooping towards it with the engine almost silent.

The landing she made was faultless, and as the craft came to a standstill pilot and passenger climbed out, Betty looking around in a cautious fashion.

"I want you to stay here, while I work close to Emanuel's stronghold and get what you call the 'low-down,'" Garcia said to her. "Don't worry, I think I know a way of smuggling the boys out of captivity."

Betty was none too sure of the ruse Garcia intended to employ in order to bring about the release of her friends, but the man seemed so extraordinarily confident that she had implicit faith in him. Nevertheless, it would have been more to her liking if she could have accompanied him.

"Can't I go with you?" she asked.

"No, seniorita," he replied. "It is better that you should remain here and hold yourself in readiness to start the plane at a moment's notice. The boys and I may be hotly pursued."

"All right," Betty said. "You can depend on me to be here."

He left her and made his way into the trees, disappearing from view. But if Betty could have followed his movement her faith in him might have been shaken before many minutes, for as soon as he was no longer visible to her he broke into a run, and did not halt even when he emerged from the jungle and saw Emanuel Cassetto's citadel ahead of him.

A party of slovenly soldiers were straggling from the direction of the settlement, and Garcia hailed them—spoke to them rapidly in Spanish as they joined him. Then he hurried on to report to Emanuel and Raymore, while the soldiers marched in the direction of the forest with resolute steps.

A quarter of an hour later that group of uniformed men reached the clearing in which Betty Lon was waiting with the plane, and, taking the girl completely by surprise, they rushed upon her from the woods and seized her ere she could make any attempt to escape.

The Deepest Dungeon

IT was as Emanuel and Raymore were rousing themselves from an afternoon siesta in the lounge of their quarters that a sentinel entered the room and announced Garcia.

"Garcia, eh?" Raymore commented. "He must have important news for us, or he wouldn't be here. All right, show him in."

Rough hands were laid on Tailspin and Skeeter, and they were bundled out into the corridor by their guards.

March 14th, 1936.

Garcia entered the apartment a moment afterwards, and bowed to his employers as they looked at him inquiringly.

"Buenos dias, gentlemen," he greeted. "I come with tidings that will be very acceptable to you, I think. I have brought the niece of Curtis here—the Senorita Betty Lou Barnes. I left her in a clearing about a mile from here, and on my own initiative I have already sent some of your men to pick her up, Señor Emanuel."

His listeners stared at him, and Garcia went on to give them a full account of the manner in which he had tricked Betty.

"Do you not see?" he added finally. "With the senorita here as well as those Three Point flyers, you can hold a pistol to the heads of Don Alvarado and Curtis. Threaten to harm the girl and her fellow-prisoners, and Curtis is bound to persuade the Don to accept any bargain you may choose to put up. In short, amigos, you can dictate your own terms."

Emanuel and Raymore looked at each other significantly, and then the American spoke.

"Garcia, you've done a fine piece of work," he congratulated, "and if Curtis and Don Alvarado knuckle under on account of it, I'll see that a big bonus is paid to you."

"Thank you, señor," Garcia answered, his eyes kindling with avarice. "But one thing more—Don Alvarado was talking of sending an expedition here. I advised him against it, but when the Senorita Betty fails to return to his hacienda he may adopt war-like measures."

"We'll be ready for him if he does," Emanuel retorted viciously. "Yet I do not think he will try it, Garcia—not when he is informed that it might mean death to his partner's niece and the young Gringo airmen. Carai—if that stepbrother of mine were to dare—"

Emanuel stopped short, for at that instant there was a tap on the door, and once again the sentry who was on duty outside the room presented himself.

Closing the door behind him, the man hastened to Emanuel's side and spoke to him in the Spanish tongue, giving Don Alvarado's half-brother some message that caused the commander of the citadel to scowl.

"Raymore," Emanuel started, turning to the financier, "this is what comes of the leniency you showed to Tompkins and Milligan. They are outside with their guards, who have told this sentry here that the pair of them tried to escape."

Raymore drew his brows together, and then shot a glance in the direction of Garcia.

"You'd better make yourself scarce," he said. "I'm going to have a talk with those young cubs, and it wouldn't be advisable for them to see you here."

Garcia slipped into a back room, and Raymore gave instructions that the flyers from Three Point were to be brought in. A few seconds later the young Americans were hustled across the threshold by their escort, who were now carrying fixed bayonets.

Emanuel and Raymore glowered at the captives, as the pair of them were thrust into their presence.

"It seems," the financier remarked grimly, "it seems that you've come to a decision about that offer I made you. And apparently you've turned it down."

"Aw, no," Skeeter protested. "We
March 14th, 1936.

just got tired of these guys followin' us around, that's all. We haven't really come to any decision at all."

Emanuel stepped closer to him and spoke to him savagely.

"I have an idea that you and Tompkins are trying to make fools of us," he grated. "In any event, we shall treat you differently now. Because of your attempt to escape, you will both go to my deepest dungeon. Take them away, men!"

Rough hands were laid on Tailspin and Skeeter, and they were bundled out into the corridor by their guards. Then they were marched at the point of the bayonet towards the rear of the building, finally coming to a flight of steps that led down into realms of semi-darkness.

They were compelled to descend, and en route to the nether regions of the stronghold they passed cell doors that were fitted with narrow grilles. Not until they were at the lowest level which it seemed possible to reach did their armed escort call a halt, however, and then one of the men pointed to the threshold of a murky room.

"In there, Gringos!" this fellow commanded tersely. "Vaya, Carrambo!"

The Torrent

HE made a fierce gesture, but Skeeter and Tailspin lunged back, only to be propelled forward by angry and impatient exertions on the part of the guards. There ensued a brief scuffle which was foredoomed to end in defeat so far as the Americans were concerned, since the odds against them were too heavy.

Cursing, prodding at the captives with their bayonets and jabbing at them with their musket-butts, the soldiery drove them into the gloomy cell. Yet even now the prisoners had not reached their ultimate destination, for one of Emanuel's hirelings opened a trap-door in the floor, and the two youngsters were forced to make their way down the rungs of a ladder into a foul-smelling dungeon.

The ladder was drawn up as they tumbled from it, and, as it disappeared through the aperture above, the trap-door was closed with a slam and mado fast. Then came the tramp of feet as the guards retired from the apartment overhead, and Tailspin and Skeeter were left alone in the silence of their deep cell.

Neither of them uttered a word at first, but Tailspin produced some matches, and striking one after another, began to roam round the walls of the dungeon like a caged and resentful lion; and he had been prowling in this manner for several minutes when Skeeter raised his voice.

"Take a load off your feet, Tommy," he grunted. "You may as well resign yourself to spending the rest of your days in this hole. We mayn't be here long, at that. I think Emanuel and Raymore realise that we've no intention of accepting their offer."

Tailspin made no reply. He was stooping close to the wall—seemed to be examining one of the stone blocks which comprised it—and all at once he gave vent to an exclamation.

"Hey, Skeets," he rapped out, "here's a loose stone. Do you—do you think it may cover some secret outlet?"

Skeeter was by his side a moment later, and together they strove to remove the loose block of stone that Tailspin had discovered.

It was no easy task, but at last they succeeded in shifting it out of position and lowering it to the floor, and, by the light of one of the matches, they found themselves looking into a small cavity.

This was not an outlet, but they saw a lever there, and, thinking it might possibly operate some mechanism that would swing a section of the wall aside, the two of them laid hold of it.

They had to exert all their strength to force down that switch, but in the instant that they did so they had reason to regret their efforts—aye, and regret them with a vengeance.

For sure enough a portion of the wall yawned open, but not to lay bare an avenue of escape. Instead, a surging cataract of water was admitted that hurled them to the floor and swept them to the other end of the dungeon.

Gasping, pale with alarm, they struggled to their feet amidst the foaming swirl and blundered to the fatal lever that they had dragged down, and with frantic hands Tailspin reached into the niche which it occupied.

"Quick, Skeets!" he panted. "Help me with this cursed switch!"

But if they had had difficulty in forcing down the lever, the task of lifting it was one that utterly defied them. It was as if it had jammed, and, while they toiled and fought, the torrent which they had released was pouring steadily into the cell with the tumult of a mill-race.

The water rose higher; it reached their throats, their lips and their nostrils, so that at length they were forced to abandon the lever and swim to and fro between the dungeon walls for dear life.

And as they swam they shouted for help, but shouted in vain. No answering sound reached their ears except the echoes of their own cries, and they knew that they were doomed—doomed to drown like rats when they sank from sheer exhaustion, or when the rising waters met their prison's roof.

"EXCUSE MY GLOVE"

only one commissioner on duty at the club, and he was certainly not capable of handling three men, not forgetting the masculine Aunt Fanny.

"Aren't you ashamed of yourself?" cried Aunt Fanny.

"Not this child," grinned Don. "What's it to you if I am drunk? I'm yellow and I ran out of the fight. If you think that, do so! Who cares?"

"You leave here at once," Lucille jumped up. "How dare you come here and insult him? You turned him down and—"

"Shut up, or I'll turn you over and spank you," cried Aunt Fanny. "Bill, get him out of here."

Don swore he wouldn't go, so ex-champion Bill Adams had to administer the knock-out, and as Bill said afterwards it hurt him more than it hurt Don. They carried the body out of the Cocktail Club.

It took Bill and the boys two days to sober up Don Carter, and the young boxer admitted that he had been a fool to go on the booze, but he was so depressed.

"Aunt Fanny—Mrs. Stafford—is speaking to the Boxing Commission," Bill told him. "And she reckons she can get us back in the game. She has a lot of influence."

And Aunt Fanny got them back in the game and fixed up a small fight for Don Carter. The youngster tried to repay them all for their kindness by working hard, but Bill Adams, after a fortnight's work, came to see Aunt Fanny.

"His fighting spirit has gone wrong," Bill confessed. "There's no snap in his work. His punch has no pep, and even old Hurricane Harry can stand up to his. He's lost his guts. Will you have a word with the kid?"

"I've got a lass in this house in the same state," Aunt Fanny answered. "I think I can cure him."

Mrs. Stafford did not mince her words when she got Don Carter to herself. He had no go because he thought it was all finished with Ann. It deserved to be finished. Ann had placed him on a pedestal and he had flopped off, but, strange as it might seem, she was still in love with him, though pretending that the name of Don Carter meant nothing to her.

"Young man, fight back and square your shoulders," she urged. "You've got to win back your good name both in the boxing world and in her eyes. And if you climb to success you may yet win my niece. I might give my consent to her marrying a man, but not a spineless collector of stained glass."

There was a new light in Don's eyes after Aunt Fanny had gone. He won his first fight in the fifth round. A month later he gained the decision over Seaman Jones. Tiger Watson, an ex-champion, was so badly beaten that his seconds threw in the towel in the fourth round. Thus did Don Carter's name begin to be known in boxing circles, and each time he fought his name was in increasingly large letters.

During this time Williams had a fight with Danny Merlin, the champion, and after a bout of holding that went the whole way Williams got the verdict and became the new champion.

Foul Play

BIG Bob Ruffer had changed his tone in regard to Don Carter. The man still hated Bill Adams and Don, but he had to admit that the youngster could box.

Madigan found Ruffer a useful man for doing dirty jobs. For money the man would almost go as far as murder.

"Guv'nor, Carter can stop Williams in six rounds," he opined. "And yet I hear you're letting the kid have a scrap with the new champion and with the title at stake. You're not betting on Carter, are you?"

"No, and I've backed Williams rather heavily—that's why I sent for you," Madigan smiled. "With a certain bookie I have a bet of five thousand that Carter won't dare to face Williams on the actual night, and that I think he'll run like he did last time. Naturally, the bookie was willing to gamble that Carter would show up, and I have a level five thousand that he won't. A good investment."

"Investment!" sneered Ruffer. "Sounds to me you've gone crazy."

"A fortune-teller told me Carter won't show up," laughed Madigan.

"You can't pull that sob stuff again."

"No, but I can pull something else." Madigan nodded his head confidentially. "A champion can't lose his title if he has no one to fight with, and if you carry out your end, Ruffer, you get one-fifth of my investment. Have a drink, and listen."

The day of the fight loomed and Don Carter was in perfect trim. Bill Adams was confident of his man.

Don received many telegrams wishing him success, and one that arrived at mid-day caused the youngster to jump to his feet. It was from Ann. He had been told by Mrs. Stafford that Ann was reading all about his fights and even talking about him, and that if he won the championship or if he went down in a glorious defeat it was safe to say that Ann would take him back into her friendship. This telegram showed that she had forgiven him.

"Can't you look in before fight—want to wish you good luck alone—Ann."

Don crammed the telegram into his pocket. If he told Bill that he was going out there might be a scene. Best if he got a taxi and went down to Ann's place at once—he could be back in an hour. Best if he slipped out of the window and went across the fields—the training quarters were still at the barn. Little did he know that the barn was being watched. Don made for the main road that passed the barn some half mile away—Madigan had schemed that Don would get out the back way. On reaching the main road Don was pleased to see a car approaching—little did he know that the masked driver was the same man who had piloted the aeroplane. The car stopped and the driver said he would be pleased to take him to where he wanted to go.

Don jumped into the car, and instantly two men crouching there sprang on him and clubbed him into oblivion.

When Don came to his senses he opened his eyes and looked round. He was in some sort of cellar. Slowly it came back to him.

He had been tricked by a fake message. He looked at his watch. He must have been here some hours, and from the reeling pains in his head guessed the gang must have doped him. Soon time for the big fight. If he could get out of this place he could just do it.

Quickly Don looked round and saw a heavy barrel. He picked it up in his arms. He would smash down the door. Crash! The timbers shook under the impact. The door was almost broken down when it was burst open and Ruffer, followed by four or five men, charged into the cellar. Before the weight of numbers Don went down and the men pinioned his arms.

"You might as well keep cool," snarled Ruffer. "You've only got another hour and then everything will be all right. Understand?" He emphasised this with a brutal kick in the ribs.

Don gritted his teeth and feigned to go limp, then he stiffened and twisted, rolling one man off his chest. Somehow he got to his feet. A man rushed at him and zonk—that man went down like a felled ox. A man leapt on his back and Don tossed the rascal over his head to land with a thud on the stones.

They got him down and Ruffer began brutally kicking him, but the pain gave Don renewed strength, and he flung them away. A right and left settled a third man.

"Now, you skunks!" yelled Don, and waded into Ruffer and the remaining crook. He broke Ruffer's nose and crashed the other man against the wall.

Holding his side, Don staggered up the steps, and with difficulty dragged aside the broken door. He managed to get to the street and there stood the car that had brought him to this place. He turned the car and drove at a furious speed towards London.

The Fight

ONE can imagine the consternation in the Adams camp when Don Carter vanished the second time. Neither Pat and Harry nor any of Don's sparring partners had any idea what could have happened. Ann was responsible for the discovery of the disappearance. Through Aunt Fanny she had come to the barn to wish Don good luck, and she had arrived half an hour after the telegram. Aunt Fanny was summoned, and that good lady was staggered by the news.

 March 14th, 1936.

Everyone was brought before her and questioned, but no one had the slightest clue.

"He's walked out on me," wailed Bill. "Why's he done it?"

"After this is all over he'll probably trot in with a blonde alibi like last time," cried the angry Ann.

"Not so fast, young woman," cried Aunt Fanny. "I've every confidence that Don will show up at the fight. Maybe he's heard of some place with stained glass and gone there."

At last came the time when it was impossible to remain any longer at the barn. It was decided that all Don's kit should be taken to the Albert Hall, the venue of the fight, and hope desperately that he would show up.

Again a bout had to be substituted to save a riot, and there was much muttering from the vast crowd. And the manager had given five minutes before he declared Williams the winner when Don pulled up outside the hall and, getting out, staggered round to the dressing-rooms. Bill, Harry and Pat were pacing the room when Don appeared, this time more dishevelled, but alone.

"Gosh, kid, where you been?" gasped Bill. "Never mind, that'll have to wait. You got here, and that's the main thing. For the love of Mike, change quickly, Don."

"Bill, I'm afraid the fight's off," Don gasped out, and no one noticed how he clutched his side. "You see, I've br—"

The door opened and in walked Aunt Fanny and Ann.

"Mrs. Stafford, Don's showed up at last," yelled Bill. "And he says he won't fight."

"Where's the blonde this time?" sneered Ann.

"So you're a quitter," cried Aunt Fanny. "Come on, Ann, we're getting out of here."

The women swept out of the room, and with agonised eyes Don saw them go. He looked appealingly at his friends.

"Bill, I'm in no condition to fight," he pleaded.

"You were this morning when the doctor examined you," cried Bill. "What's the matter with you this time?" "You're scared of Williams!" accused Harry.

"You've gone yellow!" added Pat. "I'm not yellow, Bill." Don looked at his trainer, and saw that the little man thought so. "All right, if that's what everyone says the fight's on."

Aunt Fanny and Ann were on the point of leaving the Albert Hall when they heard that the rumour that the fight was off which had been spreading round the crowd was wrong, and that Don Carter was at that moment entering the ring. The two women hurried back to their seats.

Pat and Harry were seconds, and it was the former who saw Don vince as he climbed into the ring.

"You hurt?" Pat questioned.

"Got involved in a rough house," Don answered in a whisper. "It's my rib."

"You haven't cracked it?" gasped out Harry.

"I don't know, but I've got to go through with it," Don whispered back. "Don't let Bill know."

The loudspeaker woke to life:

"Spike Williams is about to defend his title—the challenger is Don Carter. Both men are in the pink of condition—Williams weighs twelve stone fifteen ounces. Carter weighs exactly twelve stone."

The M.C. announced:

"On my left Spike Williams, cruiser-weight champion of Great Britain, and on my right, the challenger, Don Carter, of Banbury."

March 14th, 1936.

Madigan was startled out of his placid content at sight of Carter. Those fools had failed and he had lost five thousand. He sent word to Williams to go all out for a quick knock-out—through his glasses he could see that Don's face was white and strained, and guessed that he had been in a scrap with Ruffer and the gang.

"Protect your rib with your elbow," advised Pat before the gong went.

The fighters shook hands and went back to their corners, then the gong went and the fight was on. Williams came out first, and Don rather slowly. Williams was the first to attack, he feinted and attacked with both hands. The crowd gasped when Don went into a clinch.

Williams was a shrewd fighter, and he knew by heart Carter's type of boxing and instinct told him that Don was not himself, and he was quick to see that Don kept his left hand lower than usual and well into the body. He backed away, forcing Don to lead with his left. Williams was playing to get that left away from the body, and he trapped Don into giving him an opening. Williams slipped inside with a right to the body that landed plumb on the injured rib. He saw Don vince with pain as the youngster went into a clinch.

The referee forced them to break, and before the round ended Williams had landed again to that broken rib. Don was in bad shape when he got to his corner.

"What yer guarding yer ribs for?" Bill demanded angrily.

"Was I?" panted Don. "I didn't notice it."

"If you want to know, I'll tell you." Pat placed his mouth close to Bill's ear.

"The kid's got a broken rib."

"A rib gone?" cried Bill. "Here, you ain't going in there again. I ain't going to have you crippled."

"I can take care of myself," rasped Don. "I'm going on with this fight—you keep out of it."

Aunt Fanny watched the second round with dismay and incredulity. Something was wrong. Don had never fought like this before, and she knew by his agonised expression that Williams' body blows were hurting. Don was down for a count of five and got up like a drunken man. Williams rushed in and floored Don again, and only the gong saved the challenger. The third round was even worse. Don was beaten all round the ring. Always he tried to protect his rib, and now he was getting so dazed that Williams was landing telling punches to the face. It was all the champion's fight, and when at the end of the third round Aunt Fanny saw Bill whispering and clutching a towel, she quickly left her seat to hurry to Don's corner.

"You can't fool me," she hissed at Bill. "Don's hurt."

"Busted a rib in a fight with some of Madigan's bunch," Bill told her. "I guess the only thing is to chuck it in the towel."

"I'm going on!" gasped Don.

"Brave lad," Aunt Fanny smiled at him. "Stick it. I'm going back to Ann, and she'll be shouting for you."

Don did make a better show in the fifth round, and only at the end of the round did Williams manage to land on the busted rib. Don was in a sorry state as he got to his corner. Aunt Fanny had some more advice.

"You've got to change your tactics, Don," she whispered. "It's your only chance. Lead with your right and get him guessing. I'll be something he least expects, and it'll keep him away from that rib."

Williams was taken by surprise by the right lead, and in the middle of the round Don saw his chance and landed a left hook. The champion went down, but he was not so badly hurt as he appeared. He had learnt much in the Madigan school. He was feigning grogginess. He staggered to his feet at "Seven!" and Don, his confidence restored, sprang forward, and Williams, stiffening to action, whipped a cruel blow to the damaged rib. Squirming, Don went down, and Ann sobbed to see his distress.

Aunt Fanny yelled in the uproar for Don to get up, and though he could not possibly have heard her, he was up at "Eight!" Williams forced Don back against the ropes and tried everything to knock his man unconscious. Don did manage to protect his rib, but came in for terrible punishment about the face before the gong went.

"Don, watch that slug," hissed Aunt Fanny, pushing Bill Adams to one side, "and try the same trick on him. If he can play that groggy stuff, so can you. Go on leading with your right and use your brains."

In the seventh round, after a fierce exchange of blows, Don went down, but was up at "Six!" He staggered away from the whirlwind attack. Williams went after him to get the knock-out that should settle the fight. Then, to the amazement of the crowd, Don came back to life with a vengeance. He parried a blow with his right forearm and sent in a lightning stort left hook which connected with Williams' chin. The champion went down, but got up, badly shaken, at "Eight!" and then Don gathered together all his strength. Rights and lefts battered the champion, and the crowd gasped when Don finished off the fight with another left hook. Williams took the count. Don Carter was the new cruiser-weight champion.

The crowd went nearly mad when the M.C. told them that Don Carter had won the fight in spite of fighting with a smashed rib.

Ann was one of the first to congratulate Don, but the new champion had something else to deal with first.

"Bill"—he pointed—"see that fellow with Madigan? That's the driver of the car that took me for a ride, and close behind is that crook Ruffer."

"Just as I thought—Madigan's behind this," Bill showed his teeth. "I always said that some day I'd smack that guy in the beezel!" And he hurled himself across the ring, and as he went he jabbed his hand into Don's right glove.

Madigan was trying to get through the crowd, but the masses would not let him pass. A hand gripped his shoulder and he swung round with a snarl of rage.

"Mr. Madigan!" cried Bill Adams. "Excuse my glove!" And he landed a punch that knocked the crook out for an hour.

When Madigan woke he was in gaol, and so were Ruffer and the rest of the gang.

And some weeks later Don had a chance to look at more stained glass. This time in a church. At the same time that Don married Ann, so was Aunt Fanny married to Bill Adams. That good lady said that someone had to marry him to stop him wearing those dreadful yellow ties. Poor Bill was himself managed from that very day.

ground below, and as the outlaw swung round and his hand went to his gun, Adam was on him, bearing him to the ground.

Ben was a strong man, and he had fought and conquered many in his day, but he had little chance against the fury of Adam's onslaught. Just for a moment the two fought and panted and wrestled. And then, as the outlaw broke loose and staggered back, Adam launehed himself once more, and his fist crashed into the other's face, crashed once more, and, with a scream, the other grabbed at the low wall—but too late, and with another shriek he toppled over and hurtled down into the pool.

Adam stood fighting for breath. Then, with a supreme effort, he pulled himself together and out came his knife, and in another moment the old man and Ruth were free.

Picacho

A DAM LAREY rode slowly across the desert. There was little or no happiness in his heart, even though the memory of his interview with Ruth was still fresh in his mind. For she still loved him, had told him so, and was ready to marry him and link her life with his for better or for worse.

But he had refused to let her make the sacrifice and had told her so.

"It can't be," he had said. "I've still got this shadow hanging over me, and until I can clear myself, Ruth, I can never marry you. It wouldn't be fair."

She had tried to reason with him, had begged him to stay, but he had steadfastly refused.

"There's only one way, my dear," he had said, "and I'm takin' it. It's a pretty slender chance but it is a chance. I'm ridin' for Picacho, and I'm givin' myself up. This thing's goin' to be settled once and for all."

So now he was on his way to the mining camp which only one short year ago had held such high hopes to him when he had first landed there. For he knew that now old Dismukes and Ruth were safe at last. Before he had left the mine help had arrived, all the robbers had been killed or captured, and the old prospector, in spite of his injuries, would soon be all right again.

As he came in sight of the mining camp of Picacho he set his teeth.

"I wonder what will be the end of it all?" he mused as he made his way into the town.

He pulled up before a shack where a man was working in his garden. He had been puzzled at what he had so far seen, for the once thriving camp seemed almost to be deserted and he failed to understand it.

"Say, stranger, where can I find the sheriff?" he demanded.

The other turned, straightened up, surveyed him coolly.

"Guess you don't have to find him," he replied laconically, as he opened his coat to display the badge of office. "You're lookin' at him."

But Adam's next words came out quite calmly.

"My name's Adam Larey," he said, and waited.

The other nodded.

"Glad to know yo., Adam Larey," he replied coolly. "Can I sell you a dawg? I've got some nice dawgs here. Now there's a dawg I've got—"

He walked coolly over to a shed, coming back with a dog in his arms.

"Now here's a real nice pup, Mr. Larey, and you can have him for five dollars. Of course—"

But here Adam broke in. He utterly failed to understand what was going on.

"Leave dogs alone for the moment," he said. "I'm Adam Larey, and I killed a man here a year ago and I've come to give myself up."

The old man scratched his head with a puzzled look on his face.

"Is that so, Mr. Larey?" he said. "Well, I guess it's the first I heard of it. When they made me sheriff of this town—the last one got killed—"

"Got killed?" broke in Adam quickly.

"Sure thing," replied the other. "He'd had it comin' to him for a long time, too. He wasn't popular in these parts. And who was it you happened to kill, Mr. Larey?"

"It was accidental," answered Adam steadily. "He was my brother, Guerd Larey."

"Oh, him?" said the old man carelessly. "He ain't dead. He cleared out six months ago when the gold petered out. I saw him ride out. But let me show you a dawg I've got hero that I reckon would suit you. He's a real fine dawg, and cheap, too."

He shuffled over to his shed, talking as he went.

"Now, there's a dawg as anyone would be proud to—why sufferin' cats, what's the—"

From his point of view he had good reason to ask. For as he stood there with the dog in his arms all he could see was a rider who was rushing away out of the town as fast as his horse would carry him.

And the direction he was taking was the direction in which the Death Valley lay.

The old man stood scratching his head. "Now why didn't no wait to have a look at you?" he said, as he stroked the dog's ears.

But Adam Larey, flying across the desert towards the Death Valley, with amazement, excitement, and happiness in every line of his face, could have given him an answer to the question.

feeling that the big black-haired man in the other corner was not only looking as if he had as good as won, but was feeling the same way.

He looked anxiously round at the spectators. Beautifully-dressed women, immaculately-dressed men; and all laughing and joking as they chattered eagerly and made their bets.

"I guess some of them wouldn't be quite so happy if they were in my place," he reflected.

"Now go in and win," whispered Hurley as the gong went.

"Rather," exclaimed Chick, and danced gaily into the middle of the ring.

Chick never quite knew what happened in that first round. He had a vague idea that a steel whirlwind had suddenly descended on him and there seemed to be no escape from it. He tried to cover up, to dodge away from it, but it seemed to be little good. Blows seemed to be coming from all over the place, and he could hear roars of applause from the crowd. And every time he tried to hit his man, his man somehow wasn't there to receive the blows, yet always there to hand out more. And then, all of a sudden, he realised that he was on the floor, and that the referee was holding his opponent off.

"Get up, get up!"

Chick sat up, staring dazedly about him. He seemed to hear Hurley's voice shouting at him, wondered vaguely why it was, then suddenly heard the gong and found himself being dragged back to his chair.

It was while he was sitting in his chair wondering vaguely how he would ever get through the next round that Marie appeared, and as she heard what had happened her eyes sought Chick anxiously. But Chick's eyes at the moment happened to come to rest on hers, and she smiled brave encouragement, little knowing that that was all Chick needed.

It was Pinky and the spectators who got the surprise in the next round. Pinky advanced carelessly, thinking he had the easiest task imaginable on hand; but before he quite knew what was happening, Chick had suddenly hurled himself at him like a tiger and was driving him all round the ring before he could recover from his surprise, while the amazed spectators stood up and cheered wildly, and Parker muttered curses under his breath.

"Fine, Chick, fine!" said Hurley, as his man lay panting in his seat at the conclusion of the round. "Can you do that again?"

"Oh, I've only just begun!" retorted the other, as he danced up to his feet for the third round.

It was scarcely a fight under all the required regulation rules. For an elderly lady had been installed at her own request as timekeeper, and the rounds were of slightly unequal length owing to her keen interest in the fight. But when the fourth round came up, everyone was agreed that the fight had swung round slightly. Chick was holding his own and fighting with desperation.

Three times had he been knocked down, but each time he had struggled up again and had gone in at his opponent with redoubled fury.

And then, while the two men fought, came strange diversion. For a maid had slipped quietly into the room with an agitated face to tell Marie that Jimmy was missing from his room, and Marie had screamed and fled, and the room was in a hubbub in a moment, with everyone flying for the door.

And it was at that moment that Chick turned his head, wondering what was happening, and Pinky hit him, sending him full length on the floor. For a moment or so he lay there, wondering vaguely why no warning voice rang out the seconds. Then he suddenly lifted himself, and at one glance the position flashed to him. Pinky had turned away, firm in the belief that the fight was over; and a tiny voice was whispering to Chick that Pinky had hit him just now when he was not looking.

And no missile out of a catapult launched itself straighter or more forcefully than did Chick at Pinky, who turned just one second too late.

Happy hurried Chick from the room. On the floor lay Pinky, whose seconds were endeavouring to revive him and demanding loudly that it was no fight.

"The kid's missing," urged Hurley. "We must go and search the grounds." But even as they searched outside, they heard strange noises in the big garage which they had been using as a gymnasium, and both ran swiftly towards it.

"What on earth's goin' on here?" panted Chick as they drew near, for young, excited voices were heard coming from the inside of the lighted gymnasium.

But as they reached the half-opened door, both of them pulled up with a jerk, clutching each other and stiffening into silence.

"Gosh, can you beat it?" whispered Hurley.

It would have been hard to do so. There was a ring roped off in the middle of the room, for it had been there that Hurley, Chick and Blackburn had already had many a set-to.

But it was no empty ring now. Round the ropes were four excited little figures, and inside was Jimmy Parker and another tiny boy, dressed in the regulation shorts, with diminutive boxing gloves on their hands, while they slapped viciously at each other, accompanied by cheers from the four spectators.

"Say, I reckon Mrs. Parker ought to have a sight of this," murmured Hurley. "Let's go and find her."

Together they sped away to the house.

all three on the floor. He made a dash for the light switch and shut it off.

Confusion reigned in the again pitch-dark library. When Murray could get at the switch Verrell had gone.

Escaping by the window, he made his way to Jimmy's apartments, to find his ally stamping furiously about the little room.

"Lummy, guv', you've been a time coming! I 'phoned you half an hour ago!"

"You 'phoned me—where?"

"Your rooms. Don't pretend—you answered all right!"

"The police have taken possession," Verrell decided. "One of them answered you. Did you give this address?"

"Am I a mug?" Jimmy asked, adding: "I copped a little feller coming out of Lady Mac's while I was waiting for you. I brought him here and telephoned you, holding him up with his own pistol. Then he suddenly sprang at me, knocked the gun out of my hand and hopped it!"

Verrell asked, doubtfully:

"A little man?"

"A regular little rat!" said Jimmy angrily.

"Love Will See Us Through!"

VERRELL had just found the cigarette-case in Phyllis Newcombe's seemingly deserted flat when the telephone bell rang. He heard someone in the outer hall lift the receiver from its stand—heard a man's voice answer the call.

"Thanks, Phil! That fool Murray must have missed him."

Verrell stood very still. There was no window to escape from this time. The lights flashed up and big Davidson pushed open the glassed partition which separated the hall from the lounge. He held an automatic outstretched.

"You've done it once too often, Mr. Blank Verrell!"

"Looks like it," V well replied with a shrug.

Davidson continued:

"The forged bonds you so obligingly got for me out of McTavish's safe aren't here. And Phyllis isn't coming back—she's going away with me to-night. Your body will be found to-morrow morning—so will Lady McTavish's bracelet, in one of your pockets! The papers to-morrow will headline: 'Murderer of Sir John kills himself in an actress' flat.' I shall put this gun in your dead hand after wiping off my own finger-prints."

Verrell inquired conversationally:

"I begin to understand. You borrowed money on those bonds from Sir John and he found out that they were duds. So you killed him."

"Oh, shut up! I'm going to shoot!"

A small, furtive man had silently entered the outer hall. He crouched low; Verrell had but a glimpse of him when his gun snapped out. Davidson dropped his automatic with a howl of baffled rage, clutching at a shattered arm.

Verrell sprang forward and snatched up the pistol, covering Davidson with it at the moment Murray and a posse of police came charging into the flat. They seized the little, furtive man.

"Just in time, inspector, eh?" Verrell called to the detective.

"Seems so," Murray grunted.

Jimmy's voice was heard from behind the police.

"That's the little bloke who killed Sir John. I copped him when he went back to get the doings."

The little man snarled.

"It was him!" He pointed a trembling hand at Davidson. "I only engraved the bonds. They were beautiful—beautiful. He wished to destroy them—"

"That's enough!" Murray silenced him. "You can say your piece at the Yard. Mr. Davidson, you'll have to come along." He snapped at Verrell: "And you, Mr. Blank!"

Jean pushed her way through.

"We make no charge against Mr. Verrell. I am acting for Lady McTavish."

Murray glared from one to the other. Jimmy, grinning cheerfully, crossed to Miss Newcombe's wireless set and switched it full on. The announcer's voice boomed out from the B.B.C. studio:

"The band will now play a fox-trot, 'Love Will See Us Through!'"

A Drama of the Waterfront

Starring Spencer TRACY & Jean HARLOW

He was the greatest tuna fisherman on the coast. He was fearless and hard-headed. The girl was beautiful, had a tongue like a knife, and a heart of gold. Because of his bullying and boasting he was crushed and became a hobo, and the girl went to prison because she stole to help her man. A human, pulsating drama of the waterfront, starring Spencer Tracy and Jean Harlow

A One-day Strike

IN a tumbledown shack on the Frisco waterfront lived one large family. There were three bed-rooms and an attic under the rafters. "Pops" Warner might have been called the head of the family; but, as he was mostly drunk and out of work, he did not count for much. His eldest daughter, Lil, was the manageress of the home, though one could hardly call her the boss.

Lil had a shrill voice, was very plain, but her great asset was a heart of gold. She had married Pete Hoskin when she was seventeen, and she had two children—Jimmy, who was eleven, and Rosie, aged four. They were the delight, but the worry, of her life. She had another worry, too—her sister, Hattie, who was twenty-one.

Hattie had hair that was flaxen, a body full of healthy youth, a figure that was perfect, a skin that would have been an advertisement for any beauty treatment, and perfect features. In fact, Hattie was a very beautiful girl; but that shapely jaw could become very stubborn, and the soft voice could become strident when aroused to anger.

On this summer morning Lil got her husband off to his job at a meat store, washed and helped the children to dress, and then yanked Hattie out of bed to go to her job at the fish cannery. Having been out on the binge the previous evening, Pops was allowed to remain in his room.

When she had got rid of the children, Lil came to see what progress her sister was making.

Hattie, clothed in a gaudy slip, was April 4th, 1936.

perched on the end of her bed and yawning.

"Didja have a good time at the ball?"

"Sure, I won a beauty prize." Hattie laughed. "That made some of the cats jealous."

"What will Dutch Miller say when he hears?"

"That false alarm!" sneered Hattie. "If he'd come near the place they'd have turned the hose on him."

"He's going out with the fleet this morning after tuna."

"Yeah, I know." Hattie yawned again. "I'm gonna throw my arms round his neck, put my head on his shoulder, and tell him to jump down a whale."

Lil crinkled her nose.

"Makes you feel better, don't it, honey, running a guy down when you're struck on him!"

"Who? What? Dutch Miller? I don't mean nothing to him, and he means less to me, so that makes us both happy."

"Well, in that case why do you keep his picture stuck in the mirror?" Lil pointed. "Why don't you throw it away?"

"It reminds me not to like him."

"Lil! Lil! Hat!" They heard a voice from below.

"Oh, my, that's Pete!" Lil looked all distressed. "Now, I wonder what's wrong?"

Hattie hurriedly pulled on a blouse and skirt and dashed downstairs. Pete was talking excitedly to his wife.

"Hat, the fleet ain't going out," shouted Pete. "The fishermen are gonna strike. They're milling around the docks. The cops are there."

"The cops!" Hattie cried. "Let's go. We'll miss all the fun."

The two girls, Pete and Jimmy hurried towards the docks, where they found a large crowd gathered listening to a big, unshaven, rascal who was standing on a barrel.

"Only chance of getting a better percentage on your haul. You are doing all the work, and somebody else is taking all the profits. Is that what you're working for?"

"Sounds like somebody's making a speech," whispered Lil. "Gee, I hope there ain't gonna be trouble."

In a cheap restaurant close to the waterfront a square-shouldered man sat eating at a table. He was a fearless, stubborn fellow, and not bad-looking. One could see the strength in his great hands and mighty shoulders.

A bell tinkled and a little man darted into the restaurant. Curious the friendship between these two exact opposites the wolf and the weasel.

"I'm getting worried." The little man pulled up a chair. "Listen to 'em!"

"Don't bother me, Lew," cried Dutch Miller. "I ain't had my breakfast yet."

"How can you think of eating breakfast? The guys out there are talking about going on strike. You might lose your job."

"Pah, what a hope! I should worry!"

The little man shook his head despairingly, but brightened when the bell rang and an elderly man hurried into the restaurant—a homely, keen-eyed man, and his face looked worried. He drew up a chair at the table.

"Hi, 'ya, Brains?" greeted Dutch. "Just having a little snack before we shove off."

"Don't look like we was going, Dutch," answered the man, who had got his nickname because of his powers of leadership. "Things are pretty tough out there. The men won't listen to me. They don't care whether I'm the head of the union or not."

"Don't let that mob get you. They never do nothing but yap."

"I'm worried," muttered Brains. "We ain't got dough enough in the treasury to strike. In a few weeks we'll all be starving in the streets. Nick wants the men to walk out."

"You'll never make me believe that," laughed Dutch. "I kinda reckon the boys is right to strike, and I'll bet Nick gives them a raise."

"Not on your life," Brains shook his head emphatically. "Nick Louis wants the men to walk out. He wants us to break the five-year agreement we signed so he can bring in cheap labour."

"He what?" Dutch put down his coffee-cup.

"It's a fact, but the men don't understand, and I can't make 'em listen. You know Nick and his methods."

"Why, the dirty double-crosser. He can't get away with this."

"He will if the men walk out. I think you ought to talk to them, Dutch. They'll listen to you."

"They'll listen to you all right—"

"No, you tell 'em, Dutch," piped Lew. "You can make 'em eat dirt and like it."

Dutch stood up. "If they strike, my name ain't Dutch Miller. What do you want me to say to 'em?"

"Don't let 'em play into Nick's hands," urged Brains. "Get 'em to go back to the boats and make 'em stop listening to Belcher. He's a Red if ever I saw one."

"Why, the gas-bag!" Dutch laughed sneeringly. "I'll break him in half. I'll give him what for!"

"No violence, Dutch," begged the older man. "Just talk to 'em. Appeal to their reason."

Lil and Hattie were craning their necks to hear and see when they saw a movement in the crowd. Someone was shoving and pushing his way to the fore.

"You take those boats out to-day, and our cause is lost!" roared Belcher.

"Aw, shut up and get off that barrel! Where do you think you are, Russia?" taunted Dutch Miller.

"No, I wish I was," answered Belcher.

"Well, swim over there and see how you like it!" yelled Dutch, and suddenly gave the barrel a mighty push.

Belcher lost his balance, gave a yell and toppled backwards into the dirty water of the harbour.

Police, on the outskirts of the crowd, expected trouble to start.

Dutch Miller straightened the barrel and climbed on to it. Some of the crowd were laughing at Belcher's downfall, but others were growling threateningly.

"Who put you up there?" someone shouted.

"Wait a minute," Dutch's mighty voice roared out. "I'll tell you why I'm up here. It's because you won't listen to Brains, but you ain't got the nerve not to listen to me. When we was kids we used to fight like wildcats, but if an outside gang came in we stuck together and threw 'em out. Brains says that Nick wants us to strike. Do you get that?"

There were cries of disbelief. "He wants us to strike. He thinks we're suckers," yelled Dutch. "We ain't gonna fight—and I'll sock the first guy in the puss that says we are."

"You ain't gonna sock nobody!" jeered a big man, and one of Belcher's gang. "Is that so?" sneered Dutch, and next second he was off that barrel. Wonk! His fist landed with a thud on an unshaven jaw.

One second later a glorious scrap between those for striking and those against was in full progress. Lil, Hattie and Jimmy managed to wriggle out of the scrum as the police charged into the fray.

"Come on! Break it up, break it up!" yelled the police.

Dutch Miller was about to leap on another would-be striker when a policeman gripped the two men by the shoulders.

"Let me go, bud. I'm trying to establish law and order!" argued Dutch.

"All right, wise guy," sneered the cop. "I'm locking you up."

Hattie, from the fire-escape of the cannery, had witnessed the scene between the cop and Dutch, and her nimble brain sought to find some way to save the man she scorned and yet admired. Glancing round, she spied a crate of tins, and quickly she seized one, wrapped it up in a piece of paper and tied it with a string from her apron. She dropped it neatly near the cop and the struggling Dutch.

"Watch out below! It's a bomb!" she screamed.

Policemen and fishermen scattered in all directions, and the officer holding Dutch ran the fastest.

The hesitant strikers had had enough.

and they raced towards their boats. They knew with the meeting broken up the police would not follow. One officer ventured to upwrap the bomb, and his expression when he saw it was "SEA QUEEN TUNA" was a sight.

Dutch Miller scurried towards the boats, and there he raised his hands.

"Get aboard your boats and let's get some work done."

"Nice work, Dutch," Brains was at his side. "Much obliged."

"Nothing at all—nothing at all. Any time you get a tough nut to crack just call on me. I'll be glad to oblige," Dutch cried, with pompous conceit. "Only next time you don't have to tell me what to do. I can always get the gang to do anything I want 'em to."

Standing at an open window was a swarthy fellow in a loud suit with padded shoulders. A diamond gleamed in the bright tie and another huge diamond glistened on one of the man's fingers. By his side stood a ferret-faced person whose upper lip was bared in an unpleasant grin.

"He catches my goat, that Dutch Miller," muttered Nick Louis. "He smart guy, huh? He settles my strike. Maybe some day I settle his hash."

Hattie was in the cleansing department of the cannery, and she should have gone back to work now that the trouble was over, but she told Lil that she was going round to tell the swell-headed Dutch who had saved his skin.

Apparently the Press and their cameramen had had wind of trouble among the tuna fishermen, and they had been loitering round the docks for days on the chance of a story.

Hattie found Dutch Miller standing on the side of the wharf with Pressmen interviewing and others taking his picture. A news-reel man was also in action.

"Mr. Miller, will you say something for the Metrophone News while we take your picture?"

Dutch Miller was about to leap on another would-be striker when a policeman gripped the two men by their shoulders.

"Hey, listen!" truculently Dutch interrupted. "If you want to talk percentages with anybody, talk it with me!"

"Sure—sure! I'll stand by the gangway—that should look swell." Dutch grinned. "Do I start now? Okay."

"Dutch, you were marvellous!" Hattie had pushed her way through and came to his side. Admiration was triumphant over scorn—for the moment.

"Hey, get out of this!" shouted Dutch. "Can't you see they're taking my picture?"

"If it hadn't been for me you'd have got pinched!" hissed the girl, her eyes gleaming. "That bomb was a can of fish."

"All set!" shouted the cameramen, eager to get to business.

For a moment Hattie's words had nonplussed Dutch, but he wasn't being robbed of his publicity.

"Shove off!" he shouted at her.

Hattie backed away.

"I'm gonna take a sock at you some day, Dutch Miller!" she screamed. "And it'll split that swelled head of yours wide open."

"Scram!" He glared at her, then beamed at the cameramen. "What do you want me to say, folks?"

"Oh, just a few words about how you stopped the strike."

"Sure! Well, you see, it was like this." Dutch stuck out his chest. "This guy that we work for, Nick Louis, is strictly a heel; but I was thinking things over, and I decided that this was no time for a strike."

"Listen to the big 'I am' rave," muttered Hattie.

"Well, what I have done was no more than what anybody would have done who—who used their brains in the same situation," boasted Dutch. "And I want to add that I don't—"

It was more than Hattie could endure. Near her was a barrel full of fish, and she grabbed one. She drew back her arm and flung it, and her aim was deadly. It hit Dutch right in the mouth. He lost his balance, his legs went up in the air, and, like Belcher, he fell backwards into the dirty water of the harbour.

"Now kiss him good-bye!" derided Hattie, facing the cameramen like a tigress.

Lil gripped her arm. "If you don't get back to work," hissed that practical woman, "you'll get canned!"

Trouble on the Fairy Queen

NOW Nick Louis, for all his money and his diamonds, could not obtain the one desire of his heart. He wished to marry some beautiful girl, and the most desirous of them all was Hattie Warner. But he had found that wealth would not buy him everything, and though he had dangled a purse of gold before the maiden's eyes he had not been very successful. But for that blustering fool Dutch Miller, he felt that Hattie would have agreed to marry him.

Naturally, he heard all about the girl throwing a fish at Dutch and knocking him into the harbour, and he chose the occasion to renew his suit. He sent for her, and said that it was a pity that one so good-looking and refined should waste her time in a cannery. Nick Louis would send her to a night school, and make her his private stenographer.

"No, thanks, Nick. I'll stick to the fishes," was her answer.

Then Nick had offered her a beautiful fox fur for her neck, and asked her to accompany him to an entertainment on the Fairy Queen to celebrate the famous Fourth of July. It was Hattie's chance to show Dutch what she thought about him, and she accepted.

Everybody who could scrape together some money went to the Fairy Queen that night to dance, see the entertainment and watch the fireworks. Lil and Pete were there, and they had to bring Jimmy and Rose because the two children would have got into mischief if left alone.

Nick, with Hattie on his arm, walked into the saloon of the Fairy Queen, which was a one-time luxury liner now used as a fun city, and glanced round as if he were some sort of king. Close behind him walked the man who seldom left his side—his bodyguard, Flytrap was the only name the underworld knew.

Sitting at a table with Lew and the two girls was Dutch Miller, and he laughed hoarsely when Hattie and her escort seated themselves at the next table. Hattie played with the fur round her neck, and looked across to see the effect on Dutch. All that resulted was a sullen scowl.

The liquid refreshment was beer, and the new arrivals had just been served when there came a shout for silence.

"Ladies and gentlemen, if you'll be quiet for a few minutes I'll show you the news-reel pictures of how Dutch Miller stopped the recent tuna fishermen's strike."

Dutch Miller stood up and grinned.

The film was entitled, "Hostilities Averted on West Coast," and showed shots of Nick standing on a barrel, fighting with the mob and seated in his car.

"Angry fishermen, ready to walk out for higher wages, greet owner of the Sea Queen Packing Company as he arrives at his office. However, Dutch Miller, No. 1 tuna fisherman, quickly persuades them to reconsider. Miller, a strong, silent man, offers his own modest comments on how he stops strikes." There came a pause, and then Dutch's voice: "Well, you see, it was like this. This guy that we work for, Nick Louis, is strictly a heel."

"Hey, boss," Flytrap hissed in his chief's ear, "want me to knock his block off?"

Nick shook his head and grinned unpleasantly. Then came some more boasting from Dutch, and the face-out was a fish hitting him in the mouth, sending him toppling back into the harbour.

Everyone laughed and Dutch Miller scowled round with bottom lip thrust forward aggressively.

"Let's go to the bar," he said to Lew. Dutch had to pass by Louis' table.

"So I am strictly a heel, huh?" sneered the cannery owner.

"Yeah."

"That's a nice way for you to talk about your bread-and-butter."

"Why don't you fire me?" Dutch thrust forward his chin. "I'll tell you why. Because I bring in the biggest haul of anybody in your whole fleet. You can't get along without me."

Hattie saw trouble brewing, and she quickly stood up and signalled to Nick to do the same, then she turned up her nose at Dutch.

"Come on, why waste time with this riff-raff?"

"Hey, look what's calling me riff-raff—a cheap little can-cleaner!" He looked at the fur. "Where did you get that skunk?"

"Skunk indeed!" Hattie froze. "Wise guy, you ain't never seen enough money to buy one of 'em."

Dutch pulled out a wad of notes, waved them tantalisingly in her face, and went off with his arms round the two girls. Hattie sat down again at the table, and her eyes were like a wild-cat's.

But after a while Hattie's jealousy abated a little because Dutch, who had been dancing, kept smiling over the head of his partner at her, and when Dutch lurched across and asked for a dance she did not hesitate to accept. Nick's hands clenched and unclenched, but he just smiled and inclined his head. He knew to thwart Hattie might ruin his chances.

"You dance, Nick good sport."

But Nick could not contain himself when he saw the two dancing. It was more like a hug, and Hattie had her head close to Dutch's cheek. Not an unusual form of dancing in America, but hardly wise under the nose of the man who had brought Hattie to the Sea Queen. Moreover, Dutch had the impudence to leer triumphantly at Nick. It was more than the cannery owner could stand. Followed by Flytrap, he pushed his way through the dancers and touched Hattie on the shoulder.

"Hey, is that what you call dancing?"

The hand stopped.

"Take your hands off her!" cried Dutch.

"It's your to take your hands off her!" retorted Nick, then he smiled at Hattie. "Come on, honey, we go home; this place is too crowded with cheap people."

"Hey, stop telling me what to do!" cried Hattie. "You ain't running no cannery here."

"Atta girl!" shouted Dutch. "That's the way to talk. Say, listen, big shot, a little more respect from you or I'll tie up your whole dirty waterfront."

Brains McCall pushed his way through the crowd who had gathered round in anticipation of a row.

"Pipe down, Dutch, this ain't the place," he warned.

"Lemme alone. I got a right to talk," Dutch shook off the restraining hand. "I'll bust him if he tries tricks with me."

"You're heading for trouble, Dutch," cried Brains.

"Everybody will be sober in the morning," sneered Nick. "You try to make more trouble among the men, and they spit in your eye."

"Is that so?" roared Dutch, and socked Nick Louis in the jaw.

Down went Louis like a felled ox, and out flashed a knife in the hands of Flytrap.

"Look out, Dutch!" screamed Hattie.

Dutch missed the knife-thrust by inches and aimed a vicious punch at Flytrap. There were others of Louis' men there, and they tried to get at Dutch. There were men who hated Louis as a tyrant, and they joined up with Dutch. The dance floor became a yelling, struggling mass.

Someone turned off the lights in an effort to stop the fighting, and made matters worse. Friend fought friend as well as foe. A case of fireworks was suddenly upset and set alight by a cigarette-end. Blazing fireworks added to the confusion. Lastly, there came the dreaded sounds of police sirens on the waterfront, and that stopped the fight like magic.

A firework showed Hattie struggling in a group of brawlers, and, waving his fists like battering rams, Dutch Miller rescued the girl, swept her up in his arms and made for a side door. A rush across the deck, and down a rope ladder to a small boat. On the deck of a deserted fishing schooner they found refuge.

That Dutch should have endangered himself to rescue her meant a great deal to Hattie, and she made no effort to stop him putting his arm round her trim waist. Dutch was feeling sentimental about the girl, because, but for her warning, he might have got knifed. So sentimental that he asked her to marry him.

Hattie was delighted, but the wedding date was nearly cancelled when Dutch Miller grabbed the fur from round her neck and chucked it into the harbour.

"You ain't taking nothing from that big ape." Dutch gripped her shoulder. "Not now you're marrying me."

Finally Dutch pacified the girl.

"We ain't never going to fight no more, are we?" She kissed him.

"I'll say we ain't," was his answer.

They sat and watched the fireworks. Order had apparently been restored on the Sea Queen, and the celebrations were back to normal. They stayed there till a chill came in the air, and Hattie said she must be getting home or Lil would worry.

"I may not amount to much right now, but I gotta be free when my chance comes along." Dutch told her as they walked along the deserted wharf. "I don't want no family or no brats holding me down. But with you and me it's gonna be different. Just a couple of crazy kids having a lot of fun together."

Hattie looked sharply at the man she had promised to marry, opened her mouth, and then thought better of it. Maybe Dutch would think differently about children after they were married.

Not Wanted by His Union

A MONTH later Hattie and Dutch were married. It was a hectic and lavish affair. Dutch insisted upon half the fishing fleet being present, and the liquid refreshments were not stinted.

Lew was best man, and Brains McCall made a speech wishing bride and bridegroom every good wish. It was typical of Dutch's nature that when Mrs. McCall congratulated them he should make a remark that caused those that heard it to look askance at the bride.

"Thanks, Mrs. McCall, for your good wishes," Dutch said. "I've done this wedding on a slap-up scale. It's a great break for Hattie, but she's a good little girl. She deserves it."

It was so patronising and arrogant.

There was one small incident. It happened when the happy couple were setting out on their honeymoon.

"Good-bye, Hat," Lil had sobbed.

"If anything happens you can always come home to your old sis."

"What kind of a crack is that?" Dutch had been instantly up in arms.

Lil had a temper.

"If ever you lay a hand on my sister except in kindness, Dutch Miller, you'll hear from me."

"I'm not going to stand for that sort of wisecrack!" Dutch had shouted.

"Now, I'll ask you to stop that kind of talk," Hattie's father had interfered.

"You keep your red nose out of this, you old rum hound!" was what Dutch answered, and then the party had looked like becoming rough. Hattie had interceded, and finally they had all kissed and shook hands.

Dutch was very mysterious about where they were going to live after the honeymoon, and what a surprise awaited Hattie. On getting back to town her husband took her to the high ground overlooking the harbour and walked into a fair-sized block of sea-view flats. Hattie found herself staring with wide-open eyes at a flatlet, containing bedroom, morning-room, kitchenette and a bath-room.

"Everything in here is electric," cried Dutch, like an orator. "Electric ice-box, electric stove, electric washing machine, electric irons and electric radiator. There's a radio. It's small, but I guess it will do in a pinch for the two of us."

"But with all the dough you spent on the wedding and everything, I don't see how you had enough." She looked round with eager eyes. "We won't get into debt over this, will we?"

"I bought it all on the instalment plan, and the first instalment is paid on everything," Dutch answered in lordly style. "Once a month, Hat, we'll have to pay out. Mark you, I didn't only get it for ourselves. I had to have a place where I could sorta hold meetings."

"Meetings? For what?"

"Well, the gang want action, and they want it quick. We've been stalling

"Where's Dutch?" Hattie demanded. "What's he done now?"

around here too long letting this guy Louis get away with anything."

"You're not meaning a strike?" Her hands went to her cheeks.

"Yeah, and they want me to lead it." Dutch puffed out his chest.

"What does Brains think of this?"

"He don't know nothing about it. We ain't told him yet. Brains ain't the big shot in the union any more; the guys are kicking him out and electing me leader."

Hattie was distressed.

"But, Dutch, Brains is such a swell guy."

"Sure, he's a swell guy," Dutch had to admit. "He's the greatest guy I ever knowed, but he's too soft. They need somebody with nerve. What they gotta have is a guy that's a natural-born leader, like me. It was all fixed the day before we got married. We're striking for more dough, and we'll get it. All that about cheap labour was just boloney."

"But Nick has enough money to hold out for years."

"Not against what I'll cook up for him. What ye looking so worried about?" He saw her anxious expression.

"I don't want you to be a mug and lose your job," cried Hattie.

"I can't lose my job." He laughed boisterously. "I can't lose it because I quit the day we got spliced. Yeah, and we're all walking out on Nick tomorrow; we're tying up the whole fleet."

"So you called a strike in honour of our wedding." She gave a derisive laugh. "And you call yourself a smart guy."

But Dutch Muller was not quite so clever as he imagined, though he would have been the last to admit failure. At the end of the tenth week of the strike he was still shouting that Nick Louis must give in any day. There were hunger and starvation on the waterfront, and none of the women had a good name for Dutch, and their tongues were beginning to turn the strikers against their leader.

And in that same week Nick Louis put a new fleet into action. Cheap labour and bad fishermen, but they succeeded in bringing in a certain quantity of fish. The police were ready should the strikers try any rough play.

A fortnight later Dutch Muller and Brains McCall had a parley with Nick Louis.

"These scabs you've hired ain't fishermen," spoke Brains. "Fifty per cent of the load of tuna is spoiled because they don't know how to pack it in ice after they catch it. You need the men. They're real fishermen. You've never lost a pound of tuna out of their catches."

"Maybe there is something in what you say, Brains," Louis admitted. "Nick, he always like to play fair. You and me talk percentage, and maybe I put men back to work."

"Hey, listen!" Truculently Dutch interfered—he was the leader. "If you want to talk percentages with anybody, talk it with me. I'm the guy what's running the union. You keep out of this, Brains."

"I don't care whether you're running the union or not," retaliated Brains. "Our families are starving."

"Brains"—Nick smiled and looked in sinister fashion at Dutch Muller—"you want to talk deal for men is okay with me, but you and me fix, not Miller."

"So you won't deal with me, huh?"

"Listen, Dutch." Brains gripped the younger man's arm. "If Nick wants to talk to me about settling, let him. I'll handle it."

"Oh, no, you won't!" bellowed Dutch. "Yes, I will, Dutch; it's for the men," Brains said determinedly.

"All right, I'll show you how much you will," Dutch raged. "I'm gonna call a meeting right now. This thing is gonna be run like I say."

The meeting at the Fishermen's Union was a great hurt to Dutch Miller's pride. When Brains announced that Nick Louis wanted to take them back, they turned against their new leader. They were tired of his brastling, bullying ways that had earned for them nothing but starvation. They clamoured for their old leader. It was put to the vote—Brains McCall or Dutch Miller. Only one hand was raised in support of Dutch, and that was his faithful friend, Lew.

"I don't want none of you," Dutch raved at them. "I'm walking out for good."

Dutch walked out and walked home, to find the bailiffs taking his furniture and all the treasures of their home. What Hattie had to say was terse and to the point.

News travels fast, and soon the whole Warner family had shown up, and when Pops offered to let Hattie and Dutch come and live in the attic, the big fellow only flew into a rage and ordered them out of the house. He was like a bear with a sore head.

Kindly Brains McCall appeared and asked to have a few moments alone with the young couple.

"Dutch, what's the use of getting sore?" he asked soberly. "What's done is done, and you ain't the kind to squawk. I've been talking it over with the boys, and they're willing to forget the whole business. They want you to keep your union card and stick with 'em."

"Ain't that nice of 'em?"

"You can't get along without the union," argued Brains. "Why not take the bitter with the sweet, and don't make it so hard for yourself? Come on back to work with us."

"So you want me to crawl!" sneered Dutch. "Well, I ain't no yella snake, like the rest of you."

"Don't talk like that," interposed Hattie.

"I'm a guy that calls a shovel a shovel."

"Yeah?" Hattie gave a bitter laugh. "Well, you get in wrong with the union, and you'll see what you'll be doing with that shovel. You got a screw loose, going against the union."

"Is that so?" Dutch laughed. "Well, get this. I'm out of the union for good. Red's gang want me to be their State leader in Frisco."

"Don't run before you learn to walk." Brains spoke tersely and to the point. "It's time you forgot your conceit and stopped thinking you're bigger than anybody else. You're no leader. You never was and never will be."

Then Dutch did a thing that he remembered afterwards in the long, dreary months. He smacked Brains' face.

The old man gave a slight wince but did not move.

"I watched you grow up ever since you was a little kid. And I thought as much of you as if you were my own boy. I figured you'd forget your conceit when you got older, but I guess you'll never be anything else but a swell-headed fool. I give you up."

When Brains had gone, Dutch tried to make excuses to Hattie for losing his temper with Brains.

"Can't you see, Hat? Can't you understand? I gotta make good."

"Let's start all over again," Hattie pleaded. "We'll both go back to work and—"

"I couldn't let you do that," he burst forth. "I can't let you work for me. Everybody'd be laughing at me. They'd say I'd flopped. I can't go back to the union. I gotta show 'em I was right. I'll have to go away."

"Can't you swallow your pride just for me?"

"I got to make good," he said stubbornly, then tried to smile. "And if I make good I'll send for you." Then his eyes seemed to stare at nothing. "If I don't, you'll never see me again."

"After knowing how much I love you, knowing how I'd be willing to work for you, even to starve with you, you're still gonna walk out on me." There was now a shrill note of anger in her voice.

"I gotta, Hat. I gotta. Don't you see?"

"So you gotta!" She placed her hands on her hips. "Well, if you walk out on me, you can keep going and never come back."

"All right, I'll go if that's how you feel about it," Dutch muttered, and without a backward glance he went out of the small flat that had been his joy. For the first time for years Hattie gave way to a terrible outburst of grief. But Dutch did not come back.

Prison

THE weeks passed without any news of Dutch Miller. Hattie went back to live with her own folks, and Lil did her best to comfort the sorrowing girl. Lil kept on saying that she should forget her scallywag of a husband and see her old friends again. Nick Louis wanted to see her, and was still crazy about her. At last she gave way to Lil's pleading and went to a party given by Nick. She made more noise than anybody, but it was all false gaiety.

Hattie started going about a great deal with Nick, and one day she agreed to let Nick's lawyer get out divorce papers against Dutch on the grounds of desertion. And that very night she heard a stone at her window. She rushed to open it, thinking it might be Dutch. She saw a very dirty face looking up at her. It was Lew. She scurried downstairs and opened the door to him.

"Lew, where did you come from? What's up?"

"Nothing's up. I just came ashore. I been working on a swell yacht. Thought I'd drop in and say hello!"

His eyes would not meet hers. "Guess that yacht's carrying a load of coal."

She knew he had been working on a coal barge.

"I fell down as I was coming off the wharf." Lew gave a sickly grin. "I must have got a little dirty."

She guessed why he had come. "Where's Dutch? What's he done now?"

"Dutch has been kinda sick," Lew answered. "He'd kill me if he finds out I told you. He's in a hobo camp south of Sacramento. Maybe you could lend me five bucks and I could say I earned it. I'll take it to him."

"Five bucks ain't no good to him!" Her mind was made up. "I'll get some money from Nick."

"That barracuda ain't gonna give you no money to go to Dutch," argued Lew.

"He'll do anything for me. He said he would. Now you be off before the others hear. Seram, Lew, and thanks a lot!"

Hattie pushed him out of the front door.

Round a fire sat two men—Red Belcher and Dutch Miller. Both were unshaven and haggard.

"You and me ain't gonna pull off no revolution, and you know it," growled Red. "We're rotting out our brains and insides in this dump. Miller, you're a flop if you don't get off your mind what you're thinking about all the time."

"I ain't thinking of nobody," shouted Miller. "And don't you worry about me being a flop. I'll show you, and I'll show everybody—in my own way and my own time. Now get out of here and leave me alone."

Red Belcher slouched away to sit by another fire.

It was in the dead of night when Hattie arrived at the halt station near the woods that was the hobo camp. The air was damp, chilly, and evil. She saw many fires flickering among the trees. Fearlessly she walked amongst those down-and-outs, and one hobo knew of Dutch Miller and told her roughly where he was to be found. She got lost, and, seeing a tramp kneeling by a dirty pool, turned to ask him about her husband.

"Belcher!" she gasped.

"Hullo?"

He gave her a surly scowl.

"Where's Dutch? I've been looking all over for him."

Belcher pointed.

"He's over by one of them fires."

"Is he alone?"

"No, there's a bunch of us dosing close by."

"Will you tell him I'm here?" begged Hattie.

"Tell him I gotta see him alone. I'll meet him at the passenger shed at the junction."

"All right," Belcher mumbled, and slouched away.

Hattie retraced her steps to the station. She did not know that Miller, on hearing that Hattie was at the hobo camp, had jumped to his feet and cursed. Hattie was not going to see him down and out, unshaven, ragged, and unwa-hed. Without a word he disappeared in the night.

Dutch headed for the railway junction. He was going to jump a train. He could see Hattie, but he remained hidden in the bushes till a freight train appeared and slowed. Out of cover Dutch dashed and scrambled up between two cattle trucks.

But Hattie had seen that scurrying figure, and recognised her husband. She rushed down the platform and on to the track.

"Dutch! Dutch!" she screamed. "Here I am!"

The freight train gathered speed and soon left the girl far behind. Sad and dispirited, she went back to the station. Belcher was waiting for her.

"I tried to tell him, but he left in a hurry."

"I see. I suppose he had a date with a bank president, or something," she said with irony. "Didn't he know I was trying to help him?"

Belcher's eyes glistened.

"If you got anything for him, I can get it to him. I'm gonna meet him up north day after to-morrow."

"Give him this," Hattie handed over a pile of notes. "And tell him to buy a hat if he can find himself one big enough to fit him."

A car appeared, and Belcher made himself scarce. It was the police. They had trailed Hattie to the hobo camp.

"No use playing innocent. Hat," the police officer cried, when she protested her innocence. "Nick's burning up. You'll get plenty for this."

"I'll pay him back!" Hattie cried fiercely. "I asked him for the dough, but he wouldn't give it to me. That's why I took it. I left him a note, didn't I? I had to have it."

"You'll have to explain that to Nick," the police officer answered not unkindly. "But I guess you'll get sent up."

Nick was hard-hearted. Fancy daring to steal money from him for that scoundrel of a husband! He was without mercy in his prosecution, and, as a result, Hattie was sent up for six months.

In the Soreno Valley Women's Prison a son was born to Hattie Miller, and the authorities decided that the child should be handed over to the care of Hattie's sister, Lil. Hattie wept bitterly when she parted with her baby. Lil promised that the child should be well looked after and washed every day.

"Lil, you keep mum if Dutch shows up," were her parting words. "He never wanted no kids."

"That one!" sneered Lil. "He'll never show up, the big blow-hard."

The news came to Dutch Miller that his wife was in prison, and he knew that she had stolen to try to help him. That touched him on the raw. It broke something of his pride. He returned to the waterfront, and went straight to the office of Nick Louis. If Nick would use his influence to get his wife out of prison he would do something for Nick in return—he would come back and work for him.

"Sincerely thanks, you don't work for me, Mr. Miller," Nick shook his head. "All I get from you is trouble. I don't want no more and I don't want you around."

"Well, I'm gonna be around," Dutch retorted with some of his old fire. "I'm going over to the union, and I'm gonna make them take me back, then I'll be working for you whether you like it or not."

But it was not to be. The fishermen had had enough of Dutch Miller, and, in spite of the pleading of Brains McCall, they refused to have the trouble-maker back. Dutch's shoulders were bowed indeed when he left the shack belonging to the Fishermen's Union.

"I'm okay," said Dutch, "but you'd better get them other guys to hospital!"

It took several days for Dutch to get back some measure of his conceit. The union had done it because they were seared of him. Well, who cared? He decided to go to the prison and ask to see Hattie. He was a little nervous of how she would receive him. The matron granted a private interview.

"Hallo, Hat?" he greeted her, when a door opened and his wife, garbed in neat prison froek of red-and-white print, entered and stared at him as if he were a stranger.

"So you have shown up at last?" Hattie said coldly.

Five minutes later the matron and several wardresses rushed to the room because they could hear Hattie screaming.

Sobbing and choking, Hattie pointed a finger at Dutch Miller.

"Make him get out of here, and don't ever let him come back! I'd rather stay here the rest of my life and rot than ever to see you again."

They led the sobbing Hattie away.

The Prison Break

MAISIE and Sadie, the two women who shared a cell with Hattie and worked on either side of her in the laundry, gave curious glances when their cell-mate joined them.

"Is he going to take you out?" whispered Sadie.

"Sure, he's got a fourteen-room house and three cars!" sniffed Hattie.

"What did he come up for, then?"

"Oh, nothing! He just wanted to help me break out of prison."

"Break out—how?" whispered Sadie.

"Instead of being kinda humble and decent he was all full of himself—he was going to bust the prison wide open, take me down to Mexico, where we would get along some way. I told him I wasn't giving up my good-conduct stripes to live like a couple of gypsies, and that started the row."

"Tough, kid—tough!" Maisie edged nearer. "Tell us how he aimed to get you out of the pen."

"He is in with a guy in the construction gang that's fixing the drain-pipe in the prison yard," explained Hattie. "It runs clean outside the prison wall. The first night it rained I was to sneak into the culvert, go with the water, and he was to meet me where the pipe comes out at the bottom of the hill with a car. Thinking and planning for me, he said. The dizzy dope!" She threw some dirty clothes viciously into the wash. "Aw, what's the use of kidding myself! I'll never get over it. What a sap I was, sending him away. Maybe Mexico wouldn't have been so bad, after all."

Maisie and Sadie were looking at each other in a curious manner. They were both in the pen for life for removing their husbands by violent means, and they had no desire to remain. Here was a simple way of escape.

"What do you do to forget a guy like that?" Hattie cried angrily.

"I cut his throat!" Sadie laughed.

"That didn't do no good."

Maisie and Sadie talked earnestly that night to Hattie, and for a while she would not agree to their plan to make a bid for freedom. Her man would be gone for good if she didn't go after him, they argued, and so Hattie at last agreed.

Three days later it began to rain, and it rained all that day. The women knew that near the foot of the hill a car would be waiting—Maisie had got a message out to a friend. The prison was infested with huge rats, and that morning some had been caught in a cage. At eight that evening, and when the prisoners were clearing up after their supper,

Sadie let a couple of huge rats escape in the mess-room.

"Look out!" screamed Sadie. "Rats!"

Amazing how hard-bitten women can be seared of a mouse, but one can imagine their panic with two huge rats rushing round the place. Matron, wardresses, prisoners—they all screamed in fear—they jumped on to tables and chairs.

There was an axe in the butcher's room and Maisie secured it in the panic. Everyone was rushing sound and yelling, and the three women were able to slip through the door and out into the prison yard. It was deluging with rain. They dashed across the yard and reached the man-hole cover of the drain. Maisie wielded the axe in her strong arms.

The alarm was given by the Matron and guards round the wall heard the siren go that denoted it was a prison break. The women had got the cover open when the guards saw them. Without hesitation up went their rifles. Maisie jumped down, found herself knee deep in rushing water and flung herself forward; Hattie went next, but Sadie did not follow—a bullet had hit her in the shoulder and brought her to the ground.

It seemed miles in the culvert. Hattie thought she would drown, but always she managed to get an occasional breath of air. She was bumped and bruised against the walls of the culvert, but at last she was shot out into a pool. Maisie dragged her out.

"Sadie didn't make it," Hattie gasped. "They got her."

The two women found the waiting car. In the car the two women changed into the dry clothes the driver had brought. The police did not succeed in capturing them that night.

A Desperate Encounter

DUTCH MILLER went to see Brains McCall at the latter's comfortable home. The comfort of the place made Dutch feel that somehow his ideas had been all wrong. Reluctantly he had to admit something of this to Brains, who placed an arm round his shoulder and tried to persuade him to stay to have supper with Mrs. McCall and himself. Again the stubborn pride of the man prevented him from confessing that he was starving. All he wanted was Brains to do his best to get him back into the union.

"Brains, I gotta go to work," was his confession. "I don't care what it is, even if it's the rottenest job on the waterfront. It's for Hat, Brains. I gotta get her out. It's my fault she's up there—it's me that's done that to her. Brains, I gotta make good, even if she don't love me no more."

"There's an oil tanker coming in tomorrow—they need a watchman when she's tied up in the dock. 'Tain't much, but it don't call for a union card," answered Brains. "I could put in a word for you."

So the finest tuna fisherman on the West Coast became a night watchman, and the next day started his duties. That evening, torch in hand, Dutch was pacing the wharf when suddenly he observed a curious head peering at him round a bale of merchandise. He flashed his torch.

A grotesque masked head. Dutch wondered if he were seeing things. The mask laughed and sent popped the cheeky face of young Jimmy.

"Say, you're a swell night watchman. I could have set the tanker on fire and burnt up the whole waterfront."

"Where did you get that mask?"

"I borrowed it from the guy that sells 'em."

"Yeah, you borrowed it," laughed Dutch. "You'll borrow yourself right into a reform school one of these days."

"Not me—I'm a smart guy," boasted the boy. "Say, why don't you get yourself a good job?"

"Say, what are you trying to do?" rasped Dutch. "Make a mug outta me? Go on, get out of here, go on home—before I give yer a good larrapping."

"I ain't going home, I'm gonna catch a sandab. Do sandabs run at night?"

"Yeah, sandabs and fresh kids like you."

"If I catch one I'll fry it on you. I got you hot enough. Ha, ha!" Jimmy turned and ran.

With a grin Dutch Miller resumed his pacing of the wharf, when he heard a sound that made him whip round. It was heavy footfalls and he switched on his torch. It was Red Belcher and two of his cronies of the hobo camp.

"Hi'ya, Dutch? How's everyting?"

"NOW OR NEVER"

"Lost Your Hat, Norman?"
WHEN the "Western Bound" express stopped at Springport, four men who had been lounging near the booking hall drew together. A youngish, hook-nosed fellow in a lounge suit and pulled-down soft hat spoke quietly.

"We'd best spread out again—so's we can watch the whole train," he said. "No matter what else you do—just keep our friend from getting on to it."

The speaker plucked at the coat sleeve of one of the four, adding:
 "You stay around with me, Riley—see?"

"Suits me, Braun," came the slow answer.

"You and Billy lie low," went on the man named Braun, addressing the other two. "And no gun play, Rafferty." He fixed cold, piercing eyes on them. "We don't want to annoy the cops."

"You've said it," answered the thick-set Rafferty. "Come on, boy."

He and the tough named Billy strolled over to the roadway palings. Braun and the dour Riley moved along beside the train from carriage to carriage, scampering in a casual way. They almost missed a well-built, athletic young fellow, bareheaded and clad in grey flannels, as he came lapping down from the steps of a coach to hurry along to the station bookstall.

"There he is," muttered Riley, suddenly spotting the young man. "Let's get round at the back of him."

They followed their quarry as far as the bookstall, and watched him buy a paper from the smiling girl behind the counter.

"Rafferty'll head him off from the yard gate," whispered the leader to his obedient mate Riley.

An open car drew along the yard and stopped outside the booking hall. In it were two people—a pretty, blue-eyed girl, and a young fellow in a dark suit, who was driving. He lifted his hand from the wheel with a gesture of vexation.

"I can't take this train, Audrey!"

The girl turned to stare at him.

"Why ever not?"

"I've just remembered something. I'll have to go on later."

"You are a wretch, Norman—getting me down here for nothing. You know I had a breakfast engagement!"

"I'm sorry, Audrey." The young fellow jerked into reverse and began to back out. "You drop me at the office."

His restless eyes were on the backs of the two crooks leaning against the rails. But they were too busily watching the grey-suited youth at the bookstall to give heed to the touring car which wriggled its way out of the yard, swung round, and rapidly disappeared into the busy street traffic outside the station.

The blonde girl at the bookstall was asking the flannel-clad young man:

"Can I help you, sir?"

"Why, yes—have you a good novel? Something to keep me awake?"

"What would you like?" she asked, noting his cleanly shaved, round, likeable face with approval. "Romance? Adventure?"

"Adventure, please."

Braun and Riley had sidled up to the stall and were now either side of him.

"Here's something," said the girl. "Great reading for a long train ride. Seventy-five cents—thank you."

He handed her a dollar bill, and she gave him his change.

"Twenty-five, sir."

As he turned away, Braun, leaning against the stall, fixed gimlet eyes on him.

"Just a minute, Norman—we want a talk with you. Come along with us."

The young man eyed him, hands-clasped about the book. He made no reply—he had become aware of Riley, who, right hand in his jacket pocket, was gently pressing the muzzle of a hidden gun against his ribs.

"You're not getting on to that train, Norman," Riley told him.

"What's the idea?" asked the youth. "You making a mistake?"

Braun grimaced, showing yellow teeth.

"If you know what's good for you—you'll meet us at your office."

"You're mistaking me for someone else. I'm Dick Rainey."

"Oh, yes?" sneered Braun. "What are you trying to give us? You come away where we can talk quiet."

The bookstall girl was busily serving other customers. With Riley's gun sticking into his back, there was nothing for it but to obey. The three of them moved off in the direction of the pair by the rails.

The young man who had given the name of Dick Rainey began to push the book he had bought into his pocket. Riley mistook the gesture and clutched at his fingers with his free hand, whereupon Rainey made a sudden side-step and swept his left fist with a smashing punch into Riley's chest, knocking him clean off his feet. Braun made a grab at the youngster just a split second too late. Like a flash of greased lightning Rainey was heading back for the train he had just vacated.

The two crooks by the rails closed in. The four of them made no outcry and no noise. They wished to avoid attention—not attract it. They moved at a kind of shuffling run after their man, who, seeing himself cut off from the train, made for the sidings where a freighter was standing. He took a flying leap into an open van and slammed the door close behind him just as Braun made a second grab at him, only to trip up over the metals.

"At him, Billy!" he spluttered. "Don't let him go—"

Billy, and his mate Rafferty, a couple of real toughs, had already bounded on to the freighter and were shinning up to the roof of the car. They had spotted Rainey crouching down as he hustled along the roofs of the coaches—evidently intent on getting back to the Western Bound express which was now beginning to show signs of departing.

Rainey spotted them also, and stood back a little, waiting for them. Two to one against this youngster. Billy and his friend had no qualm of fear; they clambered up the sides of the coach, planning to take him back and front.

But this was bad strategy—Rainey jumped at Billy as he came up to the roof and hit him so cleanly on the point of the jaw that Billy went back to the road with a crash—while his friend caught such a sideways smack in the face as his head appeared that he had no option but to follow his mate's downward career!

Rainey now gathered himself for a spring from the coach roof to one of the near running sheds. It was a clear nine feet distant, but this young athlete made a jump so straight and true that he landed right over his mark and—almost lost his balance!

Braun and Riley were after him now—the latter so mad that he was aiming his gun at arm's length. Braun snapped at him:

"Put that away, you fool! You'll have the cops on us!"

There was a short ladder against the wall of the running shed. Braun's sharp little eyes found it in an instant. He got to it, straightened it up, and shot up it like a monkey, but Rainey was quicker than he by a hair's breadth. The young fellow stooped to seize the ends of the ladder, one in each hand, and hurled the ladder backward with Braun clinging to it. Luckily for him Riley was there to break his fall!

Their quarry now ran up the incline of the shed roof, then down on the far side. A barrier along the platform prevented the crooks from getting round to him, but luck went against Rainey. The guard's whistle shrilled, and the engine of the Western Bound gave forth a booming note. Short, noisy puffs of smoke ascended from the black funnel, and the train began to move. Rainey ran across the lines helter-skelter, and made a desperate attempt to mount the steps of the last coach—but just couldn't reach them. The train gathered speed and left him staring after it.

He turned about to see what his enemies might be doing. They had vanished as quietly as they had come.

Braun had called them together.

"There's no other train till to-night," he told them. "He'll go back to his office, and we can round him up how and when we like. We won't have any show-down here—the cops are too plenty, and they ain't got enough to do."

Young Rainey, after making sure that the coast was clear, decided to have a look at this big town at which he had been compelled to alight. He also knew there was no train until the evening. He brushed the dirt off his hands and walked along the tracks until he was clear of the sidings. Then he vaulted a railing and found himself in a side street.

He walked along this until he came to the main thoroughfare, where he joined the crowd and moved along, ready for any sign of the gang who had failed to kidnap him. A young lady, stepping briskly past, gave him a bright look.

"Morning, Norman! Lost your hat?"

Rainey put up his hand

"Why, yes. But I've kept my head!"

The young lady hadn't waited to hear. He turned to see her tripping away. A news-vendor at the corner called to him.

"Here's your paper, sir!"

"Eh? Oh, thanks!" Rainey took the outstretched paper and put his hand in his pocket. The man shook his head.

"You've already paid me, Mr. Gray."

"Did I?" Rainey puzzled.

"Sure you did, sir. Last Monday you paid for the week."

Rainey walked along.

"Gray? Norman Gray?" he muttered to himself. "What's the idea, I wonder? Seems to me they're all mad in this burg." He shook open the newspaper, glancing at the news.

On the front page, first column, were "professional cards." Almost the first one read as follows:

"Mr. Norman Gray. Room 210, Bard Building, Main Street. Broker and Assessor."

Rainey refolded the paper.

"I'll call on this guy and get him to stand me a lunch and show me arround. It's the least he can do, I guess!"

A Quick Change

BRAUN and his gang were in Main Street on the opposite side of the road to a big building, staring upward at a couple of closed windows on the third floor.

"We'll get in and wait for him,"

Braun decided. "Come on!"

They strolled across the road and went up the stone stairs of the block. They paused outside Room 210. One of them was nursing his left hand with the fingers of the other fist.

"I got to get something for this thumb of mine," he muttered. "Seems sort of bent backward."

"You can baby it later," said Braun unfeelingly. "We got to be inside."

"How you going to crash this gate?" Riley inquired.

"Four shoulders oughter do it," Braun retorted.

"Give a knock first," Billy suggested.

"There may be a clerk there."

Braun gave him a withering look, but knocked all the same with a sharp rap of his bony knuckles.

"Come in!" called a voice. The four exchanged glances. Braun put his fingers about the door handle and cautiously turned it. The door opened as he pushed—and the four trooped in.

A round-faced, youngish man, as much like Dick Rainey as two peas might be in a pod, greeted them with a cut nod.

"Well, what is it?" he asked.

"How did you get here so soon?" asked Braun, glowering at him.

"Changing your clothes and all?"

"I've been here since nine o'clock."

"Oh, skip it!" Riley broke in irritably. "Didn't we see you down at the station trying to hop off with our rocks?"

The young fellow had risen from his seat at their entrance. He now surveyed them with a pitying look.

"Do you mutts expect me to dispose of stolen diamonds in the same town where you pinched them?" he inquired.

"We certainly do!" snapped Braun, his hooked nose curving more than ever downward. "You've got a hundred thousand dollars' worth of stuff—and we took a big chance of getting it. So we're not losing sight of you, Norman."

The young fellow shrugged his shoulders.

"If you think I'm crooked, you boys better find another fence," he stated. "And that's that."

Again they exchanged glances. Billy put in his word:

"I'll bet he's sold 'em already!"

"Sure thing!" agreed Riley, who was still nursing his thumb. "He can't show 'em to us—oh, no!"

The proprietor of Room 210 laughed mirthlessly.

"You're yellow, Tom Riley—and you think everyone else the same!"

Braun pushed forward.

"Let's see 'em!" he barked.

"O.K." The young fellow went to his safe, twiddled the combination-lock handle, opened the heavy door and stooped to draw out a small, red-leather case. He snapped it open, displaying about a score of unset large diamonds of varying sizes lying on the padded lining.

"Here they are," he said. "All big enough to be identified. It'll be suicide trying to sell these in Springfield."

"It'll be suicide for you, Gray, if you try to leave Springfield," said Braun.

"We'll give you twenty-four hours to cash these and split the doings."

"And remember," put in Rafferty, "we got our eyes on you all the time."

"And no more of your athletics like you pulled at the station," added Riley.

"I nearly busted my hand jumping about after you."

They shuffled out of the room. Norman Gray watched them go, the case of diamonds still held in his hand. When the door closed, he stooped again to the safe and pushed the case back under some loose papers. Then he straightened himself and lit a cigarette.

He sat down in his chair a moment, then got up to cross to the windows. He peeped out—to note that Riley and Billy were standing by a shop on the far side of the road. Gray's frowns made him less like Dick Rainey now, but the resemblance was still very striking, except to a close observer.

The ends of Rainey's mouth turned up, because he was always happy—Gray's mouth was inclined to a downward curve. There were thin, wrinkled lines at the corners of Gray's eyes, b-tokening sleeplessness at nights. But the two were amazingly like each other, both in face and build.

Gray was studying a time-table when again came a knock at the door of Room 210. Gray pushed the time-table into a drawer and seated himself at his desk.

"Come in!" he called irritably.

Dick Rainey's smiling face peeped round the edge of the half-opened door. His grin broadened as he announced himself.

"Well, I guessed there was someone in this town looking like me, but I didn't think it would be so close! My name's Richard Rainey—mostly called Dick."

"Mine's Norman Gray. Sit down, won't you?" Gray stared at his visitor in perplexity as he asked. "How did you know I was your double?"

"Some fellows told me when I got off the train to buy a book," Rainey chuckled. "Told me with a gun and their fists! Tough eggs they were—you sure must be pretty popular. Mr. Gray, the way your friends want to keep you in Springfield!"

"Friends, you call them!" Gray spoke bitterly. "They know I have to carry diamonds around. Planning to rob me, I guess."

"It's a good thing you weren't taking that train, then." Rainey seated himself. "Four to one isn't so amusing."

Gray nodded, still intent on Rainey's face. "You sure are like me," he allowed. "They attacked you, thinking it was me." He pushed along the cigarette-box. "Help yourself, Mr. Rainey."

Dick shook his head.

"No thanks—not so early. I'm in training, too for the Hollywood Sports."

Gray hesitated a moment more; then made up his mind.

"I'd have been out a hundred thousand bucks if they'd got my diamonds. This consignment isn't insured. And the likely buyer, Mr. Ferry, lives out in the suburbs. After your experience, well—"

He made a gesture of vexation.

"Could I help you?" asked Rainey. "I've got to be here until the next train to Los Angeles. It doesn't call at Springport till late this evening. And it's only just after breakfast now, so I've got rather a long wait for it."

"It's very kind of you," Gray tried to appear easy. "You could help—being so like me. I'll fix up a fake packet just like the case in which I've got the diamonds. You could start off with the fake along to Ferry's place—it's a big white house standing in its own grounds on Arbour Avenue, turning south out of Main Street. They'll follow you—and I'll get away with the real goods."

"And when they stick me up, I'll have the laugh," Rainey agreed with a chuckle.

"I can get round to Ferry's by a cross-country route," Gray got up from his chair to open the safe. He brought out the case of diamonds and handed it to Rainey. "Have a peep at them—they're beautiful." He pulled out a drawer and took from it another jewel-case, snapping it open. "Empty," he laughed. "That's all they'll get, if they get you!"

"Fine!" Rainey echoed his double's laugh with boyish enjoyment. "I owe them something for manhandling me the way they did." He passed back the diamonds, and Gray shut the case.

"Exactly alike, you see," he said. "Red leather and gilt." He flung a few paper fasteners into the empty case and closed it. He wrapped it round with some tissue-paper and gave it to Rainey, who thrust it into his outside right-hand pocket. "Now I'll cover this one."

The genuine case was wrapped about with tissue-paper.

With a would-be-easy laugh he placed the case inside his coat in the breast-pocket.

"Take a look out of the window," Gray went on. "You'll see my roadster down below, parked close in. Don't let anyone spot you."

"You don't think they'll start any real gun-play?" asked Rainey, going to the window.

"They're a pack of rats," Gray answered contemptuously.

Rainey stood away from the window.

"I see the car. There's no sign of the gang that tried to hustle me at the station."

"Good!" Gray unthinkingly peeled off his coat. "Here, you'd best go down in this. Leave yours here."

A moment later Rainey was clattering down the stairs of Baird Building to vault lightly into the driver's seat of Gray's car. He started up and swung out into the busy traffic.

"This Man's an Impostor!"

RAINEY had scarcely slid into third gear when Riley and Billy spotted him. There was no time to seek Braun and Rafferty, so they ran round to where the gang's fast car was parked in a side street. They leapt aboard and started the chase.

Along Main Street it was easy to keep the roadster in view, but when Rainey came to the crossing and swung round into the comparative quiet of Arbour Avenue, it was another matter altogether. Rainey trod on the gas and sped along at a good seventy miles an hour—leaving Riley's car looking like a funeral coach—for the moment. But what one could do, so could the other. Presently the two cars were streaking along at top speed, dodging cars and cutting in on others in a way that seemed utterly crazy.

If Rainey had known the way to Ferry's house he would have shaken off the crooks, but he was afraid of overshooting his mark—with the result that Riley was able to hang on to the tail of Gray's roadster until at a narrow curve with a high-rising embankment, he shot in front and forced Rainey up the bank.

With a shriek of the brakes Rainey saved the roadster from overturning.

He slid from behind the wheel to face the two who had chased him.

"Say, handsome—didn't I tell you not to try getting away?" demanded Riley as the pair got out of the car.

"Where's the fire?" asked Rainey. "You might tell me."

"None of your lip," growled Billy. "Or I'll—" He made a gesture towards his coat-pocket.

"Easy does it." Riley warned his companion. "We're on the public road. We don't want to call up the cops. Pass over them rocks, Gray."

"Take 'em and welcome," Rainey felt for the fake jewel-case. "Why—" He turned a puzzled face towards the watchful crooks. "I had them a minute ago." His hand slid over Gray's coat. "Here they are." He drew out the jewel-case from the breast-pocket, realising on the instant that, in changing their coats, he and Gray had messed up things.

"You aren't trying to slip us an empty box?" demanded Riley, quick to note that something had gone wrong.

"You don't think I'd be running away if I hadn't the real goods?" asked Rainey, thinking hard.

"I don't think anything about you," snapped Riley. "Pass 'em over—we can't loaf about here all day!"

He put out his hand for the case. Rainey took a sudden spring from the seat of the roadster and landed full on top of the eager pair, knocking them together in a heap. Then, still clutching the jewel-case in his right hand, he jumped on Billy's sprawling back and used it as a springboard for a second leap which took him clean over the roadster on to the high bank. A third leap brought him to the top of it, and before the crooks could right themselves Rainey and the diamonds had vanished.

They got up—to make a wild dash at the steep bank, sliding and slipping on the dry grass. They reached the top—to see their quarry vanishing again into a hollow. They ran across a ploughed

"I know I'm in a jam," cried Rainey, "but that girl is in a worse one. She is in deadly danger!"

field to peep over the edge, and—there was Rainey boarding a car, at the wheel of which sat a pretty girl who had drawn in for him.

"They're only round the bend!" gasped Riley. "Gosh, I ought to have remembered!"

"That's Audrey Ferry," Billy checked him. "Keep cool. We'll get back to the car and follow up. She's heading for home—maybe she was just waiting for him."

The girl in the car was glancing at Rainey.

"Well, well," she smiled. "You sure came aboard in a hurry!"

"Some fellows were trying to rob me," he panted. "Do you mind if we step along?"

"That was some jump you took," she said, accelerating. "I heard you following me up and glimpsed you in the mirror. I was never so thrilled in my life!"

"You weren't half as thrilled as I was," Rainey told her, settling down. "Are you going back to town?"

"Why, Norman, that jump must have affected you—can't you see I'm driving home?"

"Of course you are!" Rainey forced a laugh, thinking to himself: "Now, who's this, I wonder?" He added, as the girl's car flew along: "I'm a bit worried about those diamonds."

"You're bringing them to dad?" came the quick question. "Why, that's fine—I'll see them first."

"They really ought to be in a safe," Rainey drew easier breaths now, telling himself: "This is Ferry's daughter and—I'm in luck."

The girl, blue eyes studying the road ahead of them, said:

"Dad's got a safe, Norman—the very latest. You saw it only last week."

"So I did. I—I quite forgot. I guess that jump did affect me."

"You certainly don't seem all yourself," she allowed as she turned the car in at some gates. "I've got to call here. I won't be a minute. You get down and hide yourself."

She gave him a queer look.

Rainey got out of the car and stood behind it. The car couldn't be seen from the high road, nor could he see what might be passing. The girl was away at the house nearly five minutes. She greeted him with a half-smile on her return.

"They didn't follow up?"

"I didn't see them," he answered.

"Let's get along home, then." She climbed into her car.

When they drew up at the front door of a big house, Rainey ran round the bonnet to help the girl alight. Her small gloved hand rested in his in a friendly grip, and he felt that the adventure was beginning to shape up in style.

Riley and Billy were crowded together behind a pillar of the massive entrance, hidden from sight and silently intent. The front door opened, and they heard the girl greet an old manservant.

"Oh, Robert, don't let any strangers in—under any pretext. Mr. Gray was held up on his way here and almost robbed!"

"Very well, Miss Audrey."

Rainey had released that small gloved hand.

"I reckon I'd better pass over the diamonds," he said.

"Come in and we'll put them in the safe," she answered, leading the way in to the hall. Riley and Billy heard the door close and crept from their hiding-place.

"Try this window," whispered Riley. His companion tiptoed to a half-curtained window at the side of the front double doors.

April 4th, 1936.

"She's heading for the safe," Billy murmured. "But I can't see where it is. Let's break in."

"Aw, shucks!" Riley checked him. "And spoil the whole thing. We'll lay off until he leaves. It'll be a lot easier getting them from the girl."

Rainey watched the girl go to one of the family portraits hanging on the wall. It was a picture of an oldish gentleman. She stood on a chair and touched a concealed spring on the side of the heavy gold frame. The picture quietly opened outward from the frame on well-oiled hinges and revealed a small iron door let into the stone wall behind the picture itself.

She touched the small flat safe knob.

"Oh, Robert," she called to the butler.

"You do it." She sprang down from the chair. "I've forgotten the number."

The old fellow got on the chair and twiddled the combination lock. The safe door opened. The precious jewel-case was placed inside—as soon as the girl had peeped delightedly at its sparkling contents.

"Aren't they lovely?" she cried.

"I'm glad they're locked up," said Rainey devoutly.

The picture was swung back into its frame. The old butler announced:

"There's a telegram for your father, Miss Audrey. Will you open it?"

"It can wait until he returns," she decided. She turned to Rainey. "Can I offer you anything?"

"No, thanks." Dick Rainey was anxious to get away. "I'll be going along."

She again gave him that speculative glance.

"I'll run you down to where you left your car." She crossed the hall to the telephone box. "Excuse me," she called.

Taking the 'phone, she hastily dialled a number. She listened, her back turned to Rainey.

"Hallo, Norman—this is Audrey. There's a young man here—" She paused, listening again. "Mr. Gray not in?" she asked in a surprised tone. "Oh, all right! I'll call down presently. Miss Audrey Ferry speaking."

She put down the 'phone and made a sign to the old butler, who came across the hall to her.

"I've just called Mr. Gray's office, and I know he answered me," she murmured.

"Mr. Gray's here," the old fellow smiled. "He can't be in two places at the same time, Miss Audrey."

She whispered, her blue eyes on Rainey on the far side of the hall:

"This man's an impostor. He isn't Norman Gray." She checked the old butler's start of surprise with a warning shake of her head. "I'm going to play him up and see what game he's after."

She came back to Rainey.

"Ready, Norman?"

"Sure. I'll call back for your father's cheque."

"You ought to know dad isn't buying them," she said. "I can't make you out at all this morning."

"Miss Ferry—I'm not Norman Gray."

She faced him.

"I've more than guessed it. Who are you?"

"Gray got me into this because I resembled him," Rainey answered in his frank way. "If you'll run me back to my car, I'll explain everything."

She hesitated a bare moment.

"All right, I'm ready."

"You've Sold Them—But You Don't Sell Us!"

BRAUN and the other crook Rafferty had come back to their watch upon Bard Building. Braun's ferret eyes peered here and there.

"Riley and Billy have beaten it," he stated. "Why?"

"They're okay."

"Of course they are!" sneered Braun. "All the same, we'll put across the road and take a dekho on Gray."

They were stopped by the telephone girl in the hall of Bard Building.

"What is it?"

"Mr. Gray," said Braun, lifting his hat. "Room 210."

"He's speaking now," she answered, lifting her hand from the 'phone mouth-piece. "Yes, sir—I'll call up Car Rentals. You want a fast car at the side entrance? At once? All right, Mr. Gray." She nodded to the attentive Braun. "You can go up. You'll just catch him."

Braun and Rafferty lost no time. Gray heard them at the door and opened it at their call, his face a study when he noted Rafferty's hand sliding round the door gripping a gun. But he tried to be easy with them.

"Why, hallo, boys!" he cried. "Back again?"

"You won't need that fast car, Gray," spoke Braun crowding in behind Rafferty. "We're going to sell the diamonds ourselves. Put that firework away, Raff—all friends here."

"Sure!" agreed Gray. "But what about my percentage?"

"It's on," Braun told him. "But we'll do the selling, see? Easy money for you. Hand over the rocks."

"What's the idea cutting me out?" Gray tried to argue.

"Come on—come on!" snapped Braun. "Don't you see Rafferty's getting all excited with that gun? Pass 'em over."

Gray put his hand to his breast-pocket.

"Here they are. Take 'em—I'm sick to death of you fellows."

The inside pocket of his coat was empty. Then his hand slid down and felt the case in the outside pocket. He pulled it out and tossed it on his desk.

"Lucky for you," said Braun.

Rafferty wasn't satisfied.

"We'll check up on this." He tore off the tissue wrappings. The red leather and gilt case reassured him.

"Seems okay," he muttered. "We'll go."

Gray's heart stood still. He realised what he'd done. That fellow Rainey had the correct case. In the hasty changing of their coats the cases had been changed, too. He tried to keep a stiff upper lip, but Braun's rat's eyes had noted the sudden tightening of Gray's mouth.

"Maybe we'll have a peep inside," he said, taking up the case and flicking it open with deft fingers. The bright brass of the paper fasteners within read doom to Gray.

"You weren't trying to put anything over on us, Norman?" asked Braun very gently.

"I—of course not. I—I can't understand it—" The sweat stood out in beads on Gray's forehead.

Rafferty's gun was levelled at his breast.

"Where are they?"

"I—I gave them to a fellow to take to Ferry's. He's there now." Gray held himself in leash, seeking madly for a means of escape. "I'll ring him—"

"This box," Braun tapped the case. "Empty! You've sold 'em, but you don't sell us. Pass over the dibs—No, you don't!"

Gray had made a dash for the window. He had got it half-open when Rafferty fired.

Captain Klein, head of the Springport Police, lifted the 'phone from his desk at H.Q.

"Yes? Who is it?"

"Hallo, hallo!" squeaked the receiver.

"Police Department—quick!"

"Police speaking," growled Klein.

"Spit it out."

"Butler at Mr. Ferry's, Arbour Avenue, calling," came the second squeak. "Urgent! Something's very wrong at Mr. Gray's office, Bard Buildings. We can't get any reply."

Klein answered curtly:

"Don't worry! You can reckon we're there already!"

"D'you Think This is a Parlour Game?"

R AINEY came dashing up the stairs of Bard Buildings. He rapped sharply at the door of Suite 210. There was no answer.

He waited a few seconds, then rapped again, and then opened the door with the key found in the pocket of the coat Gray had lent him. He pushed in jubilantly.

"Guess I've fixed things, Gray!" he called. "The diamonds are up at Ferry's. I think it's going to be a sale."

His voice died out. Gray was lying full length on the floor, face downwards, just below the window.

Rainey stared a moment, then crossed to him.

"Say, what's the matter?" He half-turned the body over. Then very quickly stood up, face white as chalk. "They've got him!" he muttered. "Gosh!"

He was thinking quickly. Better ring up Ferry's and tell Audrey.

He lifted the 'phone.

"Operator, give me Mr. Ferry's house in Arbour Avenue, please. This is City 9607."

A few seconds later he heard the girl's voice answering:

"Hallo, hallo—who is it?"

"Dick Rainey. I'm at Gray's office, and I've found him on the floor, shot through the heart. It's the gang—they'll be after the diamonds. I'll come straight back."

Audrey's voice was heard.

"Oh, how dreadful! How awful—"

A piercing scream sounded in the receiver, then a man's rasping voice:

"Don't squawk!"

Then dead silence.

Rainey listened. He shook the 'phone. Listened again.

Not a sound.

He was at the door of Gray's chambers when he heard rapidly ascending feet. He ran out to the landing to face an inspector of police and two constables.

"Hallo, what's the hurry?"

The inspector stood squarely in Rainey's path.

"Miss Ferry! She's in danger. I heard her scream in the 'phone just now!"

"Did you? Well, Ferry's butler has just 'phoned me to look in here. I'm Inspector Klein, chief of the bureau." He made a sign to his men, who ranged up on either side of Rainey. Klein entered the suite and saw Gray's hunched-up body. "No wonder you're in a hurry!" he called back to Rainey.

"Why, I had nothing to do with that," Rainey answered hotly. "Let's go to Ferry's—"

"Bring him in!" Klein cut him short.

"You're under arrest, and anything you say now will be used against you!"

Rainey, feeling the two policemen's hands on either arm, had to obey. He gabbled out:

"I know I'm in a jam, but that girl's in a worse one! We've got to get to her. She's in deadly danger!"

"We'll check up on it," said Klein, lifting the 'phone. "Give me Mr.

Ferry's house in Arbour Avenue, sharp! Inspector Klein this end."

A tense silence followed. Then Klein asked:

"That you, Miss Ferry? Inspector Klein speaking. We've got a report that you're in danger. None at all? Thank you, I thought not. Sorry to have bothered you."

He put his hand over the 'phone mouthpiece, freezing Dick with his eyes.

"Can't you see she's being forced to lie to you?" Dick panted. "I heard her scream. I heard a man's voice—"

"The butler's."

"No! For heaven's sake, tell her if she's in danger and being forced to lie to say something with the word 'help' in it!"

Klein put down the 'phone.

"Say, d'you think this is a parlour game? Come on, take him in! Call up the Homicide Squad and the coroner."

Rainey stooped forward, pulling the two policemen with him. He suddenly somersaulted clean over their hold on his arms, freeing himself as they over-balanced and tumbled forward on their hands and knees. With a bound he was out of Suite 210 and had slammed the door upon the three of them, hooking up the night watchman's "catch" that hung outside the door.

He went bounding down the stairs four at a time, out into the road, hand-springing into Klein's hooded ear. There was a policeman's top-coat and cap in the back, "spares" that Klein always kept handy when he didn't want to appear as inspector. Rainey shuffled out of his coat—Gray's coat—and slid into the top coat like lightning.

He was at the wheel, sitting tight, peaked cap pulled down over his eyes, when Klein came tearing into the street.

"Calling all cars!" Klein roared at him. "Get to H.Q. 'quick! Escaping prisoner, six feet tall, brown hair, round face, North American, light trousers! Wanted for murder!"

"I saw him run out," grunted Rainey. "Went westward."

He started up the car and swung out, leaving Klein staring doubtfully after him.

"Atta, Girl!"

UP at the Ferry home Riley was holding Audrey Ferry by the arms, twisting them cruelly. Billy had the old butler covered with his gun.

"You've worked here a long time, hey?" asked Billy, egressing the trigger of his automatic with a loving finger.

"Y-yes, sir," quavered the old man. "You wouldn't like to see her hurt, I guess?" Billy went on coaxingly.

"Of course not, sir."

Billy nodded to his companion in crime.

"Let him see."

Audrey set her teeth, but the pain of that arm-wrenching was so intense that she couldn't repress a little cry of anguish. The old butler called frantically:

"Stop—stop! I'll open the safe!"

The four crooks were intent on the study of a red leather and gilt jewel case. . . .

Billy's smile was a fiend's.

"Okay! Step on it!"

Riley thrust the half-fainting girl into a chain, clapping a coarse hand over her mouth.

"You sit tight and say nothing!" he threatened her. "You did the telephone trick all right, and I'm not angry with you—yet!"

She had to watch while the old servant opened the picture and revealed the safe in the wall behind it. Sick and helpless, she had to see him open the safe and hand over the diamonds.

"Thanks," said Billy, still grinning. "Put everything straight, and don't either of you try out any funny stuff!"

Riley was already at the 'phone.

"Give me South 4181," he muttered into the mouthpiece, glancing at Audrey, who, slumped in her chair, seemed to have fainted in dead earnest. "That you, Braun? Riley this end. We got the rocks. You stay around until we pick you up."

He slammed down the 'phone, whipped out his penknife, and slashed the flex through and through. Then, with a nod to Billy, who had crammed the red jewel-case into his pocket, he hurried across the hall to the window by which they had entered.

The instant they had gone the old butler ran to his young mistress. She sat up, gasping and shaken, trying to think what they could do.

"You all right, Miss Audrey?" the old man asked, tremblingly.

"Get me a glass of water." Car wheels were heard grinding over the gravel drive. "See who it is. Don't open the door until you're sure."

The old fellow peered from a side window.

"It's the young gentleman who's so like Mr. Gray."

"Let him in."

Rainey came in at a rush. He had flung off the policeman's hat and coat. He called:

"You're not hurt? I'm so thankful, so glad."

"I'm glad you're here," she answered, pulling herself together. "They've got the diamonds. Robert had to give them up."

"I've got to get them back." Rainey spoke quickly. "I must. The police think I killed Gray to get those stones. I've got to catch those fellows—or go to gaol for murder!"

"I heard one of them at the 'phone calling up South 4181." As Rainey dashed to the 'phone Audrey shook her head. "No use—they've ripped it out."

"I'll check up the number at your local drug store." Rainey turned to her. "And get the address."

He hesitated, not caring to leave her. "I'll come with you," she told him, smiling a little wryly. "I—I may be useful."

"Atta, girl!" cried Rainey joyously. "It's now or never! What's life without adventure?"

Old Robert pleaded:

"You'll take care of her, sir? Adventures are all right when it's a man who's doing them."

"Don't you worry," Rainey promised him. "I'm just as keen on taking care of Miss Audrey as you." He gave her a quizzing look. "Maybe—keener."

At the Hide-out

THE police will pick you up in about two ticks," Rainey opined as they sped along Harbour Avenue. "They're wirelessing all patrols, I bet. We'll make for the nearest drug store and see who lives at South 4181."

"Just here." Audrey pointed to a row of shops up a side road off the Avenue. "Phillips and Brown." April 4th, 1936.

Rainey jumped from the car and hustled into the shop. In ten seconds he was out again.

"That number is at 4538, Ohio Avenue," he said crisply.

Audrey answered.

"I know where it is. Let me have the wheel."

"Okay!" He vaulted in beside her. "I feel quite safe with you driving, Audrey."

She didn't answer as she swung the car out into the road. She drove with the sure touch of experienced hands. Rainey, glancing at her determined profile, decided that he liked her very much. She wasn't one who'd waste time talking—she was the sort of girl who always acted promptly.

They hadn't made a mile ere the hooting of a speed cop, who had leapt to his bike in pursuit of them as they passed by, told them the hunt was up.

"What did I tell you?" laughed Rainey. "They're on to us already. Let's go!"

Audrey stepped her little foot on the accelerator, and—they went!

"Doing a trifle over the limit, what?" called Rainey to her above the rattle of the car.

"Shut up!" she snapped at him. "We've got to get there first, haven't we?"

The speed cop was outdistanced by the fast car—Inspector Klein's own especial Ford, made to move. They had the risk of being picked up by other speed cops as they hurtled along, but luck held with them, and they reached Ohio Avenue without mishap. It was situated in a busy part of Springport, near the docks, and No. 4538 turned out to be a small-fronted garage with high, flat-roofed buildings behind it.

Rainey signed for Audrey to drive past the place.

"I'll go in," he decided. "You wait around for the police. You won't have to wait long."

"I wish you'd wait, too," she said. "Going in there by yourself—"

"I'll be all right. They'll think me a ghost," he chuckled. "They'll be scared stiff."

He waved gaily to her as he ran back to the garage and entered the gloomy, forbidding, narrow front gates.

No one was about. The tunnel-like entrance opened out into a big yard where some cars were parked. Beyond this yard were bricked storehouses. Rainey strolled across to where drawn back doors had given him a glimpse of some high-piled, well-filled sacks, probably potatoes. It was evident to him that the garage proprietors merely had parking rights in a yard that served for several other businesses.

He gathered also that these warehouses were close upon the banks of the river.

The place seemed utterly deserted. It was barely two o'clock, and the hands were still at midday lunch. It seemed to Rainey that the potato sacks would give him a good hiding-place—his sharp eyes had noted that the long touring car which had tried to hold him up in Harbour Avenue was parked in the yard. He crept into the cool of the storehouse and immediately became aware of hushed voices.

These furtive whispers came from beyond the piled sacks. Rainey climbed up to the top of the pile and peered over. There they were, the whole four of them, intent on the study of a red leather and gilt jewel-case which Riley was holding out towards Rafferty.

Braun, a half-smoked cigar lax in his right hand, was arguing:

"We'll have to sell 'em as they are. There isn't time to cut 'em down."

Rainey took a flying leap from the top of the sacks, landing with both feet on Rafferty's neck. He went sprawling, but his fingers closed automatically upon the case, snapping it to. Rainey made a grab for it, as the others, startled out of their wits, went scurrying out of the shed.

"It's Gray!" squealed Braun, "It's his spook!"

The others made answering squawks—for about a couple of seconds. Then Rafferty, on his back amidst the sacks, with Rainey on top of him and Rainey's left hand clutching his coat, gasped out: "Catch!"

He flung the case high in the air over the sacks. It fell with a clatter somewhere in the semi-darkness. Braun ran back to Rafferty, his sudden fright ended, and with snarls of rage flung himself into the fierce struggle now going on betwixt Rafferty and Rainey.

Braun's yells brought Billy and Riley back to the shed. A regular scrum among the potato sacks followed; but Rainey, with a couple of well-directed punches, knocked two of the gang to the concrete floor. Then he took a flying leap upward into an open trap by which sacks had been lowered from the floor above.

"After him!" shrieked Braun, scuttling up the tumbled sacks. "Fix him with your rod!"

But Rainey had disappeared. Billy shinned up chains that hung down from the trap, his little pig's eyes full of menace. He called down:

"He's got 'em! But I'll get him!"

Rafferty grunted:

"I reckon the case fell among the sacks."

"We can't play hide-and-seek here!" Braun shouted. "And we got to settle him this time! I'm after you, Billy!"

Billy was already up the chains and had found foothold on the upper floor. Braun went after him like a monkey, but Riley and Rafferty remembered the stairway at the far end of the place. The four of them came together on the first story—to hear Rainey scuttling overhead on the roof.

Came Braun's triumphant cry:

"We've got him now!"

They ran up the iron steps that led to the roof and thrust open the skylight. They glimpsed Rainey on the parapet of the building, looking downward.

"Jump!" called Braun with a savage chuckle. "That'll suit us fine! Both your legs broken!"

Rainey, with a derisive glance at him, jumped.

But not downward. With his athlete's skill and strength and fine judgment of distance, he leapt from the parapet clean across the yawning gulf to the coping of the next building! He landed fair and square—to be instantly followed by Rafferty, who made a mess of the jump and must have gone crashing head down to his death on the cobblestones of the yard below had not Rainey managed to grab him by his right arm and his flapping coat.

Riley and Billy stood staring. They didn't dare to fire now—not with Rafferty there, where so many eyes might see. Windows overlooked them from all sides, and police whistles were shrilling fiercely in the streets below.

Rainey's right hand was seen thrusting into Rafferty's pocket.

"Gee!" crowed Braun. "He ain't got the rocks! He's feeling for 'em. Follow me, boys. I got an idea."

Riley and Billy scuttled after their leader back through the skylight, basely abandoning Rafferty.

"You aren't going to—throw me over?" Rafferty pleaded. "Guess I've broken my ankle."

Rainey jerked the gangster off the parapet.

Special Investigator Kennedy and his wonder police dog, Tarzan, are called in to investigate the persistent robbery of a warehouse. A breath-taking thriller, starring Reed Howes and Tarzan

"MILLION DOLLAR HAUL"

Hasty Tempers

OLD Boswell, head of the firm of Boswell Brothers, shippers and warehousemen, was sitting at the top of the long table in the board-room in his office on the waterside. He was a fine-looking, frank old fellow, with a clean-shaven face and a mop of grey hair. But to-day he was looking very worried.

"Gentlemen," he began to the half-dozen men seated around the table, "we have reached the limit of our insured protection against theft. The insurance companies now consider us a bad risk. It is evident that we have become victims of a well-organised gang of waterfront thieves, and, to put it in a few words, we'll have to stop these warehouse robberies or—go out of business."

A thin, tall man, sitting at his right hand, called across the table to a neat-monstached dapper fellow:

"Graham, you're in charge of the warehouses. Any suggestions?"

The answer came sharply:

"Why pick on me, Chandler? You're in control of all transportations, and I haven't a thing to say about the deals until the goods are stored."

A short, youngish man, lounging in his chair next to the first speaker, put in gently:

"The thefts occur in the warehouses. You never heard of any robberies from our ships, Graham."

"And you never heard of my department giving out any information, Tom Rodney!" snapped Graham. "Mr. Boswell says we're up against an organised gang—well, they must get a line on the shipments somewhere or somehow."

Rodney stood up.

"Are you suggesting there's any leakage in our department?"

Graham answered sneeringly:

"It can't be all luck that robberies time with the arrival of valuable shipments."

Rodney clenched his fists.

"I consider that remark a distinct reflection on Chandler and myself!"

Graham shrugged his shoulders.

"You heard what I said."

"Just a moment, boys," put in old Boswell. "Squabbling won't help us out. I know you're all keen on your departments—and that's the proper spirit. Now, remember—we've just unshipped another cargo—"

"I've done all I can to protect it," Graham broke in. "And no one knows a thing about it outside ourselves here present." He glared defiantly at Rodney; but Boswell was intent on smoothing things down.

"No one's suspected here, Graham," he stated. "I'll tell you what I've done. I asked the best insurance company for help, and they've sent down a special investigator."

"You mean a detective?" Graham inquired scornfully. "Fat lot of good he'll be!"

The hand telephone buzzed on the table in front of Boswell. He took up the instrument and listened.

"There he is, right on the minute!" He spoke into the receiver. "Send Mr. Kennedy up at once!" He pushed a box of cigars along to Graham. "Help yourself and pass them round."

While they were standing about and lighting up, the door opened. A round-faced Irishman stepped into the room with a big Alsatian dog at his heels. He took in the company at a glance as he introduced himself:

"I'm Dan Kennedy, sent along by the Employers Insurance Company."

"You're prompt, Mr. Kennedy," smiled old Boswell. "I want you to meet my associates. Mr. Graham, general manager of warehouses. Mr. Chandler of the shipping department. Mr. Rodney, next to him, is his assistant. These other gentlemen are my partners—fine dog, Mr. Kennedy."

"His name's Tarzan," Kennedy answered the compliment. "And he's my partner."

"He's friendly," said Rodney, who was patting the dog's neck.

"Dogs always know regular people," Kennedy smiled. "They're queer that way. Sit down, Tarzan."

"Let's all sit down," said Boswell. But Tarzan had come across to Graham and was sniffing at him.

Graham asked quickly:

"You're sure he's friendly?"

"Mr. Kennedy tells us dogs know regular people," said one of the partners.

Graham pushed the dog's muzzle away. "Get out! This might be a case where the man bites the dog!"

The Alsatian moved round to his master and laid down obediently at his feet. Boswell began again:

"Let's get to business. Mr. Kennedy knows our problem, and I've asked you here to listen to his opinion. Now, then, Kennedy."

The round-faced man stopped to pat his dog's head. He spoke in a very Irish accent:

"From your information and from the records, sir, I'd say at once that the robberies are inside jobs."

"What makes you think so?" Graham asked cuttingly.

"Because they seem always to time with the arrival of your shipment. It would be easy for someone in the firm to pass the word."

Boswell put up a hand.

"But, Kennedy, every one who has any inside information is right here now in this room!"

"Then I'm to understand that only those you can trust have been invited to this conference?"

"That's so." The dog had got up and was standing by a closed side door, sniffing under the crack. Kennedy rose and went to the door, sharply jerking it open. A girl with pencil and pad in her hands was just outside.

"Come in!" cried Kennedy snappily.

The girl did so, exclaiming:

"I was just going to knock."

Boswell called:

"It's Miss Sheila Mallory, my secretary. It's quite all right, Kennedy!"

The detective offered a chair.

"Perhaps you'll sit down, Miss Mallory?" He turned to Boswell. "You're sure everybody is here now?"

"Quite. And you can take it that Miss Mallory wasn't eavesdropping," Boswell told him.

Graham had risen from his chair and was cycling Kennedy with much disfavour. But the detective merely called his dog to heel.

"Come here, Tarzan! All's correct—or will be when the lady shows me her notebook."

The girl flushed to the roots of her fair hair.

"Are you suggesting that I've been taking notes?"

"Let me see the notebook," Kennedy persisted, while Graham glowered still more fiercely. Miss Mallory flung the note-pad on the table.

"I resent this," Graham cried. "I strongly resent it!"

Kennedy glanced at the notes, then faced him:

"What have you got to resent?"

"I object to your intimidating trusted employees!" Graham shouted.

"If I'm in charge, I handle things my own way," came the cool answer. "And I'll tell you something—you're all under suspicion. There's a leak somewhere, and—"

"Are you trying to say that you suspect me?" Graham roared, advancing on him with threatening fists.

Tarzan at once leapt up, putting his front paws on Graham's chest. The great dog pushed Graham backwards, gently but very firmly, until the man was against the wall, raging at him:

"Call your dog off, you!"

Kennedy commanded:

"Down, Tarzan—down!"

For a few moments there had been quite a rumpus. But Graham, free of the dog, suddenly pulled himself together.

"Sorry, Kennedy. I lost my temper. Too bad of me!"

The detective nodded agreeably.

"Okay, Mr. Graham. I did, too. I apologise, gentlemen. This dog's my partner, and sometimes he gets a bit up and doing—" He turned to them. "Am I still on the case?"

"Sure you are!" old Boswell told him. "I like your style."

"Well, then, I'll get about my business. Come on, Tarzan!" He moved to the door. "I'll make a few inquiries in the office. See you later, gentlemen."

Kennedy strode out of the room, the dog moving gracefully at his heel without another glance for any of them.

"Fine Vi'lets!"

AS Sheila Mallory came out of the yard gates for lunch she found Kennedy and his dog waiting.

April 4th, 1936.

The detective pulled at the brim of his soft hat.

"I'm very sorry for what happened this morning—" he began.

"You certainly should be!" she retorted. "Why didn't you put the handcuffs on me while you were at it?"

"You don't understand, I—"

"I don't understand?" she checked him.

"I think I do. You regard me as being some kind of accomplice with whoever's doing a dirty business at Boswell's. I suppose you have full proof of Mr. Graham's guilt as well?"

"Now, listen, Miss Mallory," said Kennedy. "I don't accuse anybody. But I have to investigate everyone."

"And everyone's guilty while you blunder around?"

"Blunder?" Kennedy was hurt. "Why, Miss Mallory—I don't blunder!"

"No?"

The detective laughed in such a pleasant way that the girl forgot her vexation.

"Yes!" she cried. "Yes, yes, yes!"

Kennedy touched her arm.

"Come and have lunch with me," he suggested. "Then we'll talk it over."

They walked across the street to an open-air café and seated themselves on high stools at the outside counter. Tarzan followed up in a slinky manner, charmed with the idea of lunch.

Kennedy asked his pretty companion:

"Why don't you put yourself in my place, Miss Mallory?"

The bartender came along as she questioned:

"And what would that make of me?"

"Hamburger sandwich," Kennedy told the bartender. "Two. Plenty mustard in mine."

"Say, Sherlock, why don't you try mustard on the Boswell case?" Sheila fired at him.

"You're not being nice to me," Kennedy complained. "How can I ask you policeman's questions while you go on this way?" He took his Hamburg sandwich and handed the girl hers. "Coffee?"

"Iced coffee." She regarded him with amused blue eyes. "Guess I'm a better detective than you."

"I'll agree you're easier to look at," said Kennedy, putting out a hand for his sandwich. "Why, where's my Hamburger?"

Tarzan was moving away, licking his lips with a long, satisfied red tongue.

"You must have ate it," said the barman. "Two iced coffees." He put down the tall, creaming glasses.

Sheila laughed outright.

"There's a mystery for you. Maybe that's the way our stores go—just when no one's looking!"

They went for a turn in Kennedy's car after lunch.

"You may as well drive me home," she said. "Then you'll know where I live and you can put on one of your men to shadow me."

"Guess I'll do that myself," Kennedy answered. "D'you like my dog?"

"Like him?" she smiled, patting Tarzan as he sat bolt upright on the car seat between them. "I love him."

"You know the old saying—love my dog, love me—"

"You've got it all wrong, Sherlock!" she teased. "Anyway, we'll skip it!"

When they reached her house she jumped out of the car.

"Dad's night watchman at Boswell," she told Kennedy. "Maybe you'd better call around this evening. Then you'll be able to question him. He's sure to be in bed just this minute—I'm only going in to see that he's okay."

"I'll wait and run you back," he offered.

Tarzan came out of the car, very sedately carrying the girl's bag which she had left on the seat.

After he had left her at Boswell's, Kennedy went along the main street of the town, thinking over the problem before him. It was one of those he had met in the board-room, for certain, who was betraying the firm. But which of them?

Could it be the girl? Odd her being at the door like that—with note-pad and pencil. He had satisfied himself that the notes on the pad were innocent enough—just shorthand pencillings of her duties for the day.

Kennedy didn't like to suspect her. But her father was night watchman—

Ahead of him he spotted Graham talking to a flower-seller who had come out of a little side shop. Kennedy paused by a delicatessen window as if studying the dainties inside. He saw Graham buy a bunch of violets, then pass on, carrying the bunch loosely in his hand.

As the detective followed him up the flower-vender called:

"Vi'lets—fine vi'lets! So fresh dey is dis morning—chust gathered!"

"How much Dutchy?"

"Ten cents. Zank you, sir!"

"Doing a good trade?" Kennedy glanced after Graham's retreating figure.

"All de chentlemens buy from me," spoke the man, with a grin. He gave Kennedy a sly look from under the peak of his ragged cap as Kennedy passed onward.

Graham seemed to have eyes at the back of his head. After a few minutes he returned to the flower-seller.

"I'll take another bunch," he said casually. As the man stooped to draw out the violets from his basket, he whispered:

"Watch your step—that fellow's a dick."

"Don't I know?" came the quick answer. "Where's de stuff to-night?"

"Number six, third compartment. Get there early and tell the boys to have a boat."

"I gotta haf a bigger cut dis time—"

"Talk to Savonne about it," Graham took the second bunch of little purple flowers and paid for them.

Kennedy had been watching from the far side of the road, wishing that he had ears long enough to listen. It seemed harmless enough, viewed from a distance, but why had Graham gone back?

"Saw me talking to the Dutchy," Kennedy decided. "I'll talk to him again, maybe. But not just now."

He went on his way; the big dog padding along softly, a pace or two in the rear.

Kennedy is Puzzled

SHEILA was getting her father's supper ready—which was breakfast to the old fellow. His "day" commenced at nightfall and ended soon after daybreak. Their home was a comfortable little lodge at the far end of the docks—Mallory liked the walk of a mile to and fro to Boswell's.

He was a quiet-spoken man, occupying his leisure with his pipe and his newspaper. Sometimes he went down to the local club for a drink and a chat with his cronies, but mostly he liked to be with his daughter in those few hours which their varying occupations afforded them.

She was telling him about Kennedy.

"You know, dad, I felt silly—stauding there when he jerked open the door. I guess it did look a bit suspicious."

"You don't mean he had the check to think that you were a crook?" questioned Mallory, frowning his brows.

"Not in so many words. But he's the sort to suspect everybody. If he comes here—mind you tell him nothing."

"Got nothing to tell," her father answered.

Sheila laid the cloth and put on knife, fork and spoon.

"Here you are, dad—fish and salad, bread-and-butter. Coffee to follow." She fussed over him, adding: "You know, dad—I sort of like his nerve."

"You better start a bottom drawer right away," chuckled Mallory. "I can see a wedding ahead. Or a detective agency!"

"Don't be silly, dad!" But Sheila blushed a little. "Hallo, who's this?"

The latch clicked up. Tarzan's black muzzle pushed itself round the outer door, his paw having thrust the door open after he had nosed up the outside latch fastening.

"If it isn't Slowfoot Sherlock's dog!" cried the girl. "I suppose the Master Mind is somewhere near." Kennedy entered, Tarzan making way for him. "Come out from behind that face—we know you!"

"What are you doing?" he demanded.

"Are you asking that as a sleuth, or personally?"

"Personally," he answered, nodding to Mallory. "I've come to invite you to lunch to-morrow. Same place."

She wrinkled her little nose at him.

"Meet my father. Dad, this is Mr. Kennedy, the world's detective."

Mallory held out his hand.

"Sit down, sir. Join me in fish and salad?"

"I'll have a cup of coffee," Kennedy glanced at the girl. "That lunch to-morrow okay?"

"You can look for me," she smiled at him. "Mind you, I won't say you'll see me. Good-bye for now—I've got an appointment."

"Graham?"

"Mind your own business!" She kissed her father, patted the dog, and hurried away, giving Kennedy a bare glance.

"The coffee's on the stove," said Mallory, getting another cup. "Make yourself at home, Mr. Kennedy."

They sat awhile talking about general things; the latest kidnapping case and President Roosevelt's New Deal. Kennedy came to the point after he had drunk his coffee.

"I'm a special investigator. What's your opinion of things at Boswell's?"

"My opinion is that Sheila's a fine girl. The best ever."

Kennedy nodded.

"What about Graham? Is he—is she —"

He didn't know how to put the question.

"Sheila hasn't gone to meet him," Mallory stated. "And Graham's okay, even if she had."

"Hot-tempered—what?"

"Who isn't in hot weather? That's a fine dog you got."

"Sure." Mallory had risen and was crossing the room to take up his coat from the back of a chair. "Tarzan," Kennedy called, "fetch the gentleman's coat!"

The big dog went straight to the chair and drew the coat off it with careful teeth. He brought it to Mallory.

"Help the gentleman on with his coat," Kennedy directed.

The dog shook out the coat and stood up behind Mallory, who, much amused, put his arms into the sleeves. Tarzan gave the collar of the coat the correct jerk as it slid on to the old man's shoulders.

"Well, well!" cried Mallory. "If that don't beat the band!"

Kennedy was very pleased with this praise of his dog.

"My partner, he is," he stated. "You're off to work soon, I guess?"

"I am."

"Taking anything with you?"

"Well, no—"

"I'll show you something," Kennedy broke in. "Give me that." He pointed to Sheila's shopping basket. Mallory handed it across, whereupon Kennedy scribbled on a leaf of his pocket-book and tore it out. "I've ordered you a Hamburger with onions," he told Mallory, who was staring at him. "That'll cost a quarter. Then a half-bottle of home brew—that's thirty cents, including five on the bottle. Here's a dollar bill." He dropped the note and money into the basket and shut down the lid, then offered the basket to the dog.

"Take this to Dave's lunch counter, where you pinched my Hamburger this morning." Tarzan harked once, then took the handle of the basket in his mouth.

"There'll be forty-five cents change," Kennedy went on. "Don't let Dave ditch you for it. Bring the lot back here to the gentleman."

Tarzan trotted to the door, Mallory opened it, and the dog went padding along the dusty street, basket in his mouth.

"He'll be back before you go on duty," Kennedy promised.

With a wave of his right hand he took his leave, Mallory staring after him with a puzzled grin on his face.

Kennedy strolled along under the night. He had plenty to think about, and was glad that the generally busy street should now be so quiet. It was lighted on only one side of the road—the warehouses fringing the river bank on his right were dead black and lifeless.

His quick eyes hadn't failed to notice the double bunch of violets in the vase on the mantelshelf in the Mallory home. But Sheila hadn't gone to meet Graham—however prettily he might have given her the flowers. Kennedy deduced this fact, despite his teasing question, from his common sense—Sheila would have worn the violets in her dress if she had been going to Graham.

Kennedy was bothered. He had talked with Chandler and Rodney, and had gone through the shipping department without getting even a hint as to the cause of the trouble at Boswell's. Graham, too, had been very agreeable this afternoon, trying to make up for his display of temper in the morning. The other partners at Boswell's had given no help—they clearly hadn't a constructive idea between them.

Mallory, the night watchman. Well, he seemed a decent enough old fellow. As for Sheila, she presented doubts—but doubts only. Kennedy was glad he hadn't given her the violets he had bought. He'd kept the bunch loose in his coat pocket—he took them out now and tossed them away.

He came to the yard gates. No sign of Tarzan at "Dave's Snack Bar." The dog was probably heading back to Mallory's. He must have gone there by some circuitous, doggy route of his own.

Kennedy retraced his steps, noting the few people with speculative eyes that he passed or overtook.

Tarzan's Shopping

TARZAN went straight to the snack bar opposite the gates and dumped the basket on the counter. The cook cried out:

"Hey, what you doing?"—when Tarzan put big front paws on the counter.

The cook lifted the basket lid and saw the note and the dollar bill and took them out.

"Dawg's called for a Hamburger with onions," he grinned. "Guess he'll eat it half-way home!"

He put the sandwich in the basket and closed the lid. Tarzan barked sharply.

"What's the matter?"

Joe was just behind and crashed down the butt of his gun on Kennedy's head.

The dog barked again, then nosed up the lid.

"Forgotten the home brew, eh?" The bottle was put in. "Okay, old son?"

Again Tarzan nosed up the lid and barked.

"Why, I'm leaving out the change!" the cook chuckled. "Did you ever see such a dawg?"

Forty-five cents in dimes and nickels were counted out and put in an envelope which was tucked under the sandwich. Tarzan put up a paw and closed down the lid of the basket, then took the handle in his mouth and dropped back to his four feet.

Tarzan headed straight for the yard gates. He had scented his master. But Kennedy wasn't there. This puzzled the dog, and he ran backwards and forwards before the closed gates very undecided what to do. At last he carried the basket to a dark corner, put it down, and returned to the gates. Backing from them, he took a flying leap over and landed in the yard. Here he began to sniff the night air, taking in full breaths of it.

Suddenly he became very quiet. Two lurking shadows nearby one of the warehouses had attracted his attention. He padded silently towards them, standing very still when his scent told him that neither of these was his master. He cocked his ears when the men began to whisper, and was sharp enough to sense that these whisperings were hostile to himself.

"Here's his dog, Joe! Shall I put a hole in him?"

"And wake the neighbourhood?" came the muttered reply. "Don't worry about the beast. Gee, it's a swell idea coming in across the docks! We can make an easy get-away."

"I don't like them little boats. Make me seasick. We oughter get more dough for this, Joe. The job's hot."

"We'll get more this time, Ed. Say, who passed you the word this time?"

"Don't talk. Just foller me. The night watch has come in."

The shadows melted away. Tarzan went back to the gates, preparing to jump them again. That Hamburger oughtn't to be wasted. Maybe his master had meant it for him—and the beer bottle for himself?

Why, of course! In his doggy mind the whole thing became clear as crystal. He jumped the gates, went back to the basket, opened it, and lifted out the sandwich.

Gee, it was good! But he had a slightly guilty feeling after he had devoured the last crumb. Supposing master hadn't quite intended things this way? Tarzan's ears folded back; he glanced right and left. He finally curled himself down by the basket and pretended to go to sleep.

Meantime, Ed and Joe had made contact with two other toughs who had come into Boswell's over the road fence. They hid themselves in a warehouse when they had opened the door with a pass-key which Ed possessed.

"I got to get these keys back," he told them. "Got to hand 'em over to-night. You boys will have to do the carting. The cases are marked with a chalk cross. Flick a torch, Bing, and let's see what there is."

A little beam of light shone out, circling here and there on the piled cases of merchandise. It rested on one on which a small blue cross had been pencilled.

"Take it, Randy," Ed ordered. "Joe, you hold the light while Bing takes the next. We got to work fast."

Two "blue-crossed" cases had been picked out from those in the warehouse and had been carried down the back April 4th, 1936.

stairs which led to the waterside, Ed having opened the door here with a second pass-key. Bing and Randy were back for more when old Mallory heard their furtive movements as he was walking round the yard.

He had come in by the side gate. He had been amused by Tarzan's tricks with his coat, but hadn't expected the dog to bring him a snack and a drink.

Mallory located the thieves in Warehouse No. 6. He crept along past the first and second bays and spotted the electric-torch flickering from somewhere within the third set of long windows. Most rashly he rapped on the door with his stick, calling loudly:

"Come out of that, whoever you are!"

A voice whispered at his ear.

"Shut up—you!"

Something hit him on the back of his neck. He fell like a log below the bay.

Ed touched him with his foot. No sound came from the old fellow. The crook stepped over his body and went in to the rest of the gang.

"Night watch," he whispered. "I koshed him. Look slippy—someone may have heard him beat."

Bing and Randy had removed a dozen cases when Kennedy crept up the stairs from the wharf side. Tarzan was at his heels, having suddenly reappeared on Kennedy's entrance at the yard gates. The dog now gave him away by uttering a low growl and leaping forward at a tallish man who appeared to be directing the operations.

As Tarzan sent this fellow sprawling over on his face, Ed made a quick pass at Kennedy, who flashed out his left and caught the gangster squarely under the chin, knocking him backwards full length. But Joe was just behind, and crashed down the butt of his gun on Kennedy's head so expertly that the detective's senses left him on the instant.

"Dowse the gim!" called Joe, stepping on the torch which the third man had let fall. "Choke off that dog, Graham!" He moved through the blackness to his chum. "Okay, Eddy?"

"I'm all right."

Ed's voice was husky and dazed, but he pulled himself together. Graham and Tarzan were struggling wildly. The dog, a little bewildered by the sudden darkness and anxious for his master, gave way as Graham punched savagely at him. With a whimpering cry Tarzan turned about, to dart behind one of the tumbled-down cases.

Graham stood up. Joe's voice came urgently:

"Help me chuck this fellow in the river, boys! He'll drown, and no one will know who's done it."

Kennedy was lifted—a dead weight. They bore him down the stairs; then, with a swinging of Joe and Ed's arms, he was flung out over the wharf side into the tideway, his body splashing noisily as it fell.

"Into the boat!" Graham snapped. "All of you!"

Bing and Randy were at the oars. "I'll get back for an alibi," Graham went on. "How many cases did you get?"

"Maybe a dozen."

"Good! Shove off. I'll meet you at Savonne's." Graham was already scuttling along the wharf. "Watch out for that signal boat."

He was swallowed up by the night. The four others pushed off the heavy tub in which they had crossed the river, the packing-cases weighing down the stern till the bows rose high out of the tide.

The sudden shock of the cold water had restored Kennedy to consciousness. He swam aimlessly for a few moments, unable to get his bearings. He heard the boat's departure and tried to swim after it. Then something was swimming beside him, making better headway than himself.

"Tarzan!"

A gulping bark answered him. The dog came alongside, trying to get a grip on his master's coat sleeve. Kennedy rolled over on his back, letting himself float. The dog got a hold and towed him against the rushing stream to where there was an iron ladder hanging downwards from the bankside to the river.

Kennedy turned over to catch at the bars of the ladder. He climbed up; then, safe, if dripping wet, he reached down a hand to help up the faithful dog who had so cleverly saved his life.

"Coffee, Sherlock?"

NEXT morning Boswell was in conference once more with his managers. He held up the morning newspaper, on the front page of which the overnight's robbery was boldly featured.

"Our loss is someone else's gain," said the old fellow, shrugging. "That's the best I can say of it. We're spread out all over this rag—made to look mighty foolish."

"We can do without this kind of publicity," Graham frowned.

"A dozen raids on our warehouse in as many months," sighed Boswell. "Pretty well a million-dollar haul."

Chandler put in: "Queer that fellow Kennedy not turning up."

Graham asked: "What about that blamed dog of his? Was it drowned?"

The door opened, and Kennedy came in. He nodded to them, then addressed himself to Graham:

"No, he wasn't drowned. Nor me. But Tarzan's under the weather to-day, and I'm working alone."

Boswell pushed along the cigar-box.

"Help yourself and take a pew. Glad you're all right."

Graham offered his petrol-lighter. "The papers are full of lies, Kennedy! They said you'd been sandbagged and that the dog was missing."

"And that the night watchman was suspected," Kennedy supplemented. "And that he threw a mock fit when he heard the signal boat putting in."

Chandler shook his head. "Mallory isn't in it." He glanced at Kennedy. "Nor his daughter."

Kennedy didn't mind this little kick. He had liked Chandler from the outset. So had Tarzan. He smoked awhile, listening to the others, then presently put in:

"Unless you take extra precautions, Mr. Boswell, the Press will soon have another chance to write you up."

"What do you suggest?" Boswell asked. "Can you suggest anything? I'm utterly mystified as to how these fellows get tipped off."

"Double your warehouse guards," Kennedy advised. "And I may have another suggestion after I've done a little more prowling around."

Graham turned to him. "Got a lead, then?"

"I fancy I'm on the trail of your robbers' roost."

"You don't tell me!" Graham cried derisively.

"I'm telling no one," Kennedy answered, rising. "Well, I'll be on my way."

He went out, puffing at his cigar. Shortly afterwards the conference broke up.

Kennedy went straight along to the Mallory home. Sheila hadn't come in at Boswell's—therefore her father had been more hurt than was supposed.

He found her getting Mallory's breakfast. The old man's head was bandaged up, and he was glaring under the bandages at the newspaper.

"Look at that!" he cried to Kennedy. "Night watch suspected." The stupidity of people thinking I'd take a beating like that—just to cover my tracks!"

"Cut your forehead?" Kennedy asked, pulling the paper away from him. "I guess you fell face forwards, same as I did. Forget it. How d'you feel in yourself?"

"Not so very bad. Sheila here has been cossetting me."

"Sure—," Kennedy gave her a stolid look. "She's a grand doctor—but she shouldn't have let you get at the newspapers. All lies. Look at me—said I was killed, and my dog, too."

Sheila asked:

"Coffee, Sherlock?"

"With you," he replied. "Blame me if we aren't always drinking coffee together! Sorry the old dog didn't bring you the sandwich, Mallory. He ate it. And I've drank the home brew and kept the change."

"You would," said Sheila.

"Listen, Vincgar. Will you take dinner with me one time at Savonne's Blue Moon Café?"

His eyes were quietly on hers as he spoke the name. She made no sign.

"Maybe. But it's a swagger place, and they don't like policemen a lot." "I'm going to dress up," he told her. "Cut you out, anyway. Okay, it's a date."

She handed him a cup of hot coffee.

"When?"

"I'll give you notice," he said. "Maybe it'll be when the next shipment is due at Boswell's. 'Bye, folks!" He turned at the door. "I'll be seeing you lunch-time, Sheila, at Dave's counter. Here's some violets I bought for you this morning from a Dutchy on Main Street. 'Bye."

"Thanks. Maybe I'll come. Maybe I won't."

After he had gone she asked her father:

"Dad, shall I meet him?"

"Of course you will," said Mallory. "You girls are funny that way, saying no and meaning yes!"

At the "Blue Moon"

KENNEDY went along to the Police Bureau in the afternoon to see some suspects picked up by the police. He took Tarzan with him, and the pair sat with the Commissioner in front of the little stage across which the men had to pass. As each man stepped out of the side room to take the stage, the facts known concerning him were read out by a policeman unseen behind a screen.

Came the harsh, official voice as a weedy-looking youth moved into view:

"Harry Smith. Gives address 1455, Lanchester Boulevard. Aged eighteen. Arrested on a charge of pocket-picking."

"It's a lie!" stated Harry Smith crisply. "I was jostled against the gentleman by a feller behind me!"

The Commissioner glanced at Kennedy, who shook his head.

"No," he whispered. "Pass along, Mr. Smith"

The next man came on the platform, neatly dressed, but very pale and ill-looking.

"James J. Thompson. Arrested for disorderly conduct late last evening. Says it was his birthday," spoke the voice.

Kennedy again shook his head, and Mr. Thompson was allowed to stagger off the stage.

The third man was of a different type. Short and small, with shifty eyes and a rat's face.

"Bert Evans, residing common lodging-house. Says he's out of work," boomed the voice. "Charged with loitering near Boswell's yard gates. Says he was only seeking work, but he was watched there off and on from nine o'clock last night till past twelve."

Tarzan had pricked up his ears. A low growl came from him.

"That's one of them," Kennedy whispered. The Commissioner looked doubtful.

"We've nothing on him. No previous record." The Commissioner asked Kennedy: "What makes you so sure?"

"My dog. He has come in contact with this fellow somewhere and knows he's a wrong 'un."

"I can't hold a man on a dog's dislike," the Commissioner decided. "He wasn't doing anything chargeable, beyond the fact that he was hanging around the gates."

"Nevertheless, get all the dope you can on him," Kennedy advised. "And let me know."

He went along to the post office and put through a call to New York, asking there for the City Hall. When he was through to the bureau, he asked to be put on to Public Safety Department. Getting that, he asked in a low voice:

"Give me Number twenty-seven."

After a minute's waiting, a woman's voice answered silkily:

"Operator twenty-seven this end. Who is it?"

"Number nineteen."

"I'm listening."

"Meet me Savonne's Blue Moon Café, Trenton, to-night. Evening dress—eight o'clock. Wear a bunch of violets. I want to get a line on a fellow who's taking out a girl I know."

"Okay!"

He put down the receiver and stepped out of the box. Tarzan, outside the box, had kept listeners-in, if any, at a respectful distance.

Kennedy, resplendent in black trousers and vest, black tie and white shirt and collar, was sitting in the lounge of the Blue Moon Café, smoking a cigarette and reading the evening paper. Presently a slim, dark young woman in a fashionably cut black satin frock under her white cloak was ushered into the lounge by the hall-porter. Kennedy rose from his chair and went across to her.

"Hallo, Rea—good of you to come. I've booked a table. What will you take while we're waiting?"

"A gimlet, Danny. You're looking very magnificent."

"All dressed up for you," he smiled. "Two gimlets, boy."

They sat sipping their lime-juice and spirit, smoking and chatting. A big palm-tree in a tub hid them from view of those crossing the lounge on their way to the super-dance. Presently the young woman asked:

"Got anything yet?"

"Hints and whispers," he told her. "This place is the H.Q. of the gang—or I'm an also ran. They came last night."

"I read it in the papers. You got slogged."

Kennedy chuckled.

"I sure did! Muzzed me out of time for a few minutes. They chucked me in the river, but the dog got me out. Watch those two—"

He flicked an eyelid towards a couple just coming in. It was Sheila and Graham. The policewoman nodded her sleek head.

"The gang will come again to-night," Kennedy went on. "Two nights running is a favourite trick with the reg'lar fellers. They guess you'll never believe they'd have the check. Now we'll go in, Rea, and behave fashionably. Order what you like best."

They sauntered into the restaurant and took seats at a tucked-away table for two. The menu was scanned and Without another sound he collapsed on the floor and lay there with closed eyes.

dinner was ordered. The head waiter brought Rea a spray of orchids:

"With the compliments of the management," he bowed.

At a swift sign from Kennedy the young policewoman unpinned a bunch of violets from her dress and took the orchids with a gracious: "Thank the management from me."

Kennedy, without looking directly at them, had noted most of the diners and dancers.

"Where's the dog?" asked Rea, settling herself to the iced grapefruit before her.

"Sitting tight and waiting my signal."

"Your girl has spotted you," she murmured presently. "She doesn't look too pleased."

"We'll dance while they're fixing the next course," Kennedy rose. "Allow me the pleasure."

The orchestra was playing a waltz, and Kennedy made no further attempt to hide himself.

"There's that fellow who has made trouble for your father," Graham sniggered. "Got a dame with him, too!"

"All right, I know," Sheila answered tartly.

"I'm pleased you like my flowers," Graham went on.

"It's a bunch Mr. Kennedy gave me," she told him. "They're faded already." She unpinned the violets and tossed them under the table.

"Good for you!" Graham approved. "He's got a nerve making up to you after practically charging you with theft. Let's dance."

They had scarcely stood up for the waltz when the head waiter came to them.

"A telephone call for you, Mr. Graham," he announced. "I have put it through to Mr. Savonne's private room."

Amusement darkened Graham's face.

"Oh, all right—I'll come!" He turned to Sheila. "Will you excuse me a minute?"

"I think I'll be getting back to father," she answered. "Thanks for the entertainment."

Graham's frown deepened.

"Very well, if that's how you feel."

He strode sharply across the dance floor and went into the lounge. Then across it to a door on the left of the entrance hall. Here he rapped three times with his knuckles. A little grating in the upper panel opened and two keen eyes glistened from behind it.

Nothing was said. The door opened and Graham went into a small lobby where a squat-faced, ugly fellow told him:

"Boss' been waiting for you!"

"I'm not late."

"Pass in and tell him so," came the sudy answer.

Graham opened an inner door and entered a narrow room which seemed full of smoke. He was hailed by a smooth-haired, stout man sitting at the head of the table, round which were half a dozen men of all ages but of one type—criminal and base.

"Hallo, Handsome—you forgotten this is our busy night?" their leader greeted Graham. "You letting dames interfere with business?"

"A man has to play around sometimes," Graham told him aggressively.

"Listen here, we didn't get the right cases yesterday. Maybe it wasn't your fault. But you know where the real stuff is. Sit down!"

April 4th, 1936.

"Good Dog—Good Dog!"

KENNEDY had noted Graham's departure. He asked Rea, who was sitting opposite him and so had a view of the lounge:

"Did you spot where he went?"

"He crossed the hall and turned to the left. A private door opened and shut."

"Thanks!" He rose from his seat. "You better stay here. I'll have to do the rest."

"You won't make it alone," she warned him. "Too many of them here are in the game. I've recognised three of our 'card indexed' gentlemen already. The head waiter's one of them. We'll try out an old stunt."

She got up sharply from the table and hurried from the restaurant—crossed the lounge at a run, coming breathlessly to the cloak-room girl.

"Give me my wrap!" she panted. "There's a man here has insulted me! Get it quickly, please!" She tossed her check ticket on the counter, and the girl went along to get her cloak.

Kennedy came lurching after Rea. "Say, what's the trouble, girlie?" he muttered huskily. "I didn't mean a thing." He put his arms about her.

"Let me go!" Rea struck at him with little clenched fists, aware that a small panel grating in the door opposite her had slid open. "Let me be, can't you? I want to go home!"

"Aw, girlie, be a good scout!" Kennedy was clumsily trying to draw Rea back to the restaurant.

"Stop it!" she cried. "Stop it!" The grating closed with a snap. The door was jerked open. A squat-faced man jumped out.

"Hey, what's all this?" he snarled. "You can't get away with that stuff here!"

Kennedy had released Rea. His left fist shot out like a cannon-ball at close range. It caught the fellow full on the point of his chin. Without another sound he collapsed on the floor and lay there with closed eyes.

"Stout girl!" Kennedy whispered. "Now, Rea, beat it to where you're staying. I'll ring you later."

The door marked private was wide open. Feeling in his pocket for his gun, Kennedy went into the little lobby and closed the door swiftly behind him. The policewoman grabbed her cloak—the girl behind the counter, losing interest in Rea's black satin frock, spotted the sprawled figure on the floor.

"Say, was it him insulted you?" she asked indignantly.

"Yes. He was tipsy."

"Topsy-topsy-turvy, I'd call it," the attendant stated with scorn. "Well, he's got what he always wants!"

Kennedy was listening at the inner door of the private room. He heard Graham's quick voice.

"Well, now, you've got all the dope.

The cases are marked with a red chalked cross this time. I saw to it myself. Warehouse five, to-night, not six. The one over the archway. Bay three—the cases are small and easy to handle. There are extra guards on duty, but that's your worry. I must be going."

"Not you," came another voice. "You're coming with us. Listen, Graham—I'll double your split—"

Kennedy broke in upon them.

"Stick 'em up!" he snapped. "I've got plenty on you birds now!"

There was dead silence for a few long moments. Then hands were raised. A stout man, sitting in a big chair, eyed Kennedy warily.

Then suddenly Kennedy's arm was knocked up—a rat-faced little chap had come in behind him. Graham shouted:

"Grab him, boys! Hold him!"

A tremendous scuffle followed—Kennedy hitting out like a prizefighter, but with much more purpose in his blows. Three of them were floored, and Graham had a cut chin before Kennedy was finally overpowered.

The stout man directed the field. At the end of the fight he ordered:

"Gag him. Now tie him up in my chair, arms to the chair-arms. Pull the rope round his knees and ankles."

It was done neatly and speedily. Again the leader barked commands:

"Put that gun away, Bert Evans. I'll send up Louis to take care of this interfering guy. Louis knows just what to do—you needn't worry a bit. We've got plenty quick work at Boswell's."

The gang slid out of the private room, and Kennedy was left to his thoughts and bruises.

He vainly tried to free himself, wishing he hadn't been quite so impetuous. The squat-faced man came in.

"Don't waste your strength, mister. If you got loose, I'd have to put a bullet in you!"

He grinned at Kennedy.

"Mighty clever, weren't you?" he went on. He crossed to one of the windows and jerked up the lower sash.

"Gee—but this place reeks of seegats! Listen, honey. I'm going to get something to drink. I feel kinder muzzy—you sure hit me in a vurry mean way."

He ambled off, closing the door behind him. Kennedy heard the key click in the lock. Then he heard another sound—an anxious little whine. Tarzan leapt in from the street through the opened window—

The dog came to his master, surprised to find him without any words of greeting. Kennedy signalled to him with his eyes, but Tarzan wasn't sure. It might be some new kind of game—his master sitting there in a chair, all corded up with a handkerchief tied across his mouth.

But he sensed that something was wrong. His brown eyes fixed an appealing gaze on Kennedy's eyes, asking what he was expected to do.

Just then Louis came back.

"Get out of here, you!" he shouted at the dog, threatening him with his great fists.

This was understandable. Tarzan crouched back snarlingly, his teeth bared. He made a flying leap at Louis, knocking him backwards with his great front paws. Low, vicious growls came from him. Louis fought him off with a desperate effort and flung him aside; then jumped back to the doorway and—bolted for his life!

Kennedy wagged his loose fingers. Tarzan got a glimmering of the idea. He ran back to his master and gnawed at the knotted rope about Kennedy's right wrist. A sharp, keen bite, then another, then a pull on the rope, and Kennedy's wrist was free!

The rest was easy. Gag plucked out of his mouth, Kennedy praised Tarzan: "Good dog! Good boy!" as he whipped off the rest of his bonds. Tarzan went back to the door, growling again, keen to head off Louis, if he dared to come back!

Kennedy stood up stiffly. His gun was lying in a corner of the room where Bert had flicked it away from him. He picked it up and called to the dog.

He climbed out over the window-sill; Tarzan taking it on one jump so soon as his master was clear.

Kennedy ran along the street to the nearest call-box. He rang up police H.Q. and got his friend the commissioner. Quickly and clearly he gave the news that the gang were at work at Boswell's.

"Meet us there," came the crisp

Death among the clouds! War in the sky as intrepid flyers clash with the forces of organised crime! Tailspin Tommy returns to the firmament of Fame in a smashing drama that blazes its way across the Pacific to islands of hidden wealth, of lawlessness, of savagery and cannibalism. A wonder serial of unforgettable thrills, starring Clark Williams and Noah Beery, Jun.

Tailspin Tommy, famous civilian flyer and ace of the Three Point Aerodrome, is hired by a wealthy business man named Curtis to make aerial surveys of the oil-bearing island of Nazil, in the far tropical realms of the Pacific Ocean.

Curtis is the uncle of Betty Lou Barnes, Tailspin's sweetheart, and is in partnership with Don Alvarado Casmetto, who owns most of the island of Nazil, and whose daughter Inez has been holidaying in the United States.

The services of Skeeter Milligan, Tailspin's mechanic, are also engaged by Curtis, and the party set out in two planes. But word of their approach is later conveyed to Don Alvarado's unscrupulous stepbrother, Emanuel Casmetto, who seeks to oust his kinsman from Nazil, and who is backed by Raymore, a shady American financier.

Tailspin and Skeeter fall into the hands of Emanuel and Raymore, but escape with the help of Bill McGuire, a newspaper man who has obtained a job as chef at Emanuel's stronghold, solely for the purpose of investigating Raymore's activities.

The two youngsters are also assisted by a mysterious aviator who calls himself the Eagle, and who, for some reason, makes himself their friend and ally.

Later they visit a new oil well which has been sunk by Don Alvarado's employees, and, while they are there, a bombing raid is attempted by one of Emanuel's hirelings, Mandro by name.

Tailspin "takes off" and wounds him after a desperate fight. Then, with his own control-stick jammed, he sees Mandro's 'plane coming straight for him!

At the Oil Well

IT was lucky for Tailspin Tompkins that he had donned a parachute before engaging Emanuel's hireling, and as he realised that a crash was inevitable he abandoned the useless control-stick of his 'plane and heaved himself over the side of the cockpit.

He plunged head first through space with a velocity that snatched his breath away, but at the count of three he tugged the release-ring of his 'chute and the package on his back unfolded itself immediately, the silk ballooning out like an enormous hood as the wind caught it and filled it.

He felt the sudden strain on his shoulders, a jerk that arrested the hair-raising impetus of his descent and swung him into an upright position, and almost in the same moment he saw his 'plane collide with Mandro's away above him.

There was a sickening impact that seemed to send a quiver through the air, an ear-splitting smash that was instantly followed by the louder blast of detonated bombs as the deadly cargoes of the two ships went off with a shattering roar. To Tailspin, drifting earthward under the fat folds of the parachute, it was as if the whole heavens reverberated to that awful expllosion, which he could only liken to some terrific thunder-peal.

The locked 'planes had disappeared in a vivid outburst of flame, and from that monstrous blotch of fire all manner of debris came hurtling—fragments of bomb-casing, fragments of wings, struts and fuselage, and twisted metal ripped from shattered engines.

Wreckage hissed past him. He himself was being tossed to and fro like a cork in an angry sea, for his parachute was reeling and swaying under the concussion that had smote it. But it finally steadied itself and carried him downward at a smoother and more even rate of progress.

He looked up again, his ears still ringing from the shock of the explosion. In the sky overhead a few faint wreaths of smoke were drifting away on the wind, but apart from these there was nothing to reveal the catastrophe that had just occurred. The machines involved in the crash had been blown to pieces, and so had Mandro.

The emissary of Emanuel Casmetto had made his last flight. . . .

Far below, in the neighbourhood of the oil-workings that Mandro had attempted to destroy, Tailspin's friends had covered their faces in horror as they had seen the 'planes dash towards each other in mutual annihilation, and it was only when the echoes of the explosion had died away that they raised their eyes once more.

They then discerned the parachute that was bearing the lone survivor towards them, and at sight of the figure which was floating from the heavens Skeeter Milligan uttered a hoarse cry.

"Yes!" Betty Lou sobbed hysterically. "But who— who? Tommy—or— Emanuel's pilot?"

It was impossible for them to tell yet, but as they calculated the approximate spot where the parachutist seemed likely to fall they broke into a staggering run, being followed by Inez, Don Alvarado and Ned Curtis.

At the same time the men who had been working on the new oil well came streaming from the various points where they had taken cover during Mandro's raid. They were led by Burke, the Irish-American foreman, and were on the scene almost as quickly as Skeeter and his companions when Tailspin eventually landed near the edge of a wood on the north side of the field.

It was with shouts of relief that Skeeter and his party recognised their friend, and eager hands helped the youthful airman to extricate himself from the harness of the parachute. Within a few seconds he was standing before his sympathisers, a little white and shaken, but able to conjure up a reassuring grin, none the less.

"Oh, Tommy," Betty found herself staying, "thank heavens you're safe!"

"Yeah, I'm safe all right," he breathed. "Gee, I was lucky to get out of it alive, though."

"And you're not even hurt?" the girl faltered.

Tailspin shook his head, but, despite his claim that he felt none the worse for his experience, he was prevailed upon to rest for a while in Burke's quarters, and here Skeeter kept him company with Inez and Betty Lou for almost an hour.

During this time, work on the new oil well was resumed, and the preparations for bringing in the expected "gusher" were very nearly complete when Curtis and Don Alvarado put in an appearance at Burke's office.

"Thanks to you, Senor Tommy, we are practically ready to 'shoot' the well," Don Alvarado announced genially.

"Thanks to me?" Tailspin echoed in a somewhat bewildered tone.

"Why, yes," the aristocratic Spaniard replied. "If it had not been for you, there would have been no well. The whole plant would have been wrecked by that agent of my devilish step-brother."

"The Don's right, Tommy," Skeeter put in fervently. "This outfit owes a lot to you. Come on, let's go and see 'em shoot the works."

Tailspin rose, and, accompanied by his mechanic and the two girls, he left Burke's quarters on the heels of Curtis and Don Alvarado. A minute later they were gathered together under the towering derrick where the Irish-American foreman was superintending operations.

"We're lowering the casing into the hole we've already drilled," Burke explained for the benefit of the newcomers. "We've reached oil-sand, and once we've got all the casing in position we'll send down a charge of explosive in the form of a big capsule. That ought to do the trick as soon as it goes off."

The last length of casing was hanging over the shaft from a pulley in the derrick, and Burke spoke to the workmen who were preparing to drop it into position.

"Swing it over a little to the right! That's it—hold it! Now down with it."

The casing began to sink into the well, and Burke turned to Don Alvarado's party again.

April 4th, 1936.

"There's the capsule I mentioned," he said, indicating a sinister-looking object that stood on the floor of the derrick. "There's enough nitro-glycerine in it to bust up a fair-sized house."

"You don't say!" Skeeter interposed, with a whistle. "Boy, I'd like to feed about a quart of that nitro to Emanuel and then drop him from a 'plane.'"

The bystanders greeted this comment with a grim laugh, and then Burke spoke again.

"We've got to be pretty careful," he observed, "because we're apt to strike a pocket where there's a tremendous amount of pressure. If that happens, there's always a chance of a gusher rising with such force that it will blow casing-rig and everything sky-high."

He was silent for a moment, and only the clanking of chains and the rattle of the pulley overhead were audible in the derrick.

"By the way, Don Alvarado," Burke continued, after he was satisfied that the final length of casing was in position, "you realise, of course, that we can't dispose of the oil we mine until the pipe line has been run to the coast?"

"Quite," the Don answered. "But Senor Curtis tells me that you can cap the well when the gusher comes up."

"Yep," the foreman agreed. "We're all ready to do that. Now, while the boys are screwing home that last piece of casing, I suggest you folks make yourselves scarce. We'll be ready to drop in that capsule then—a 'go-devil,' as we call it—and when it hits, this will be no place for you."

Don Alvarado and his companions took Burke's advice, and they were already at a safe distance from the derrick when they saw the Irish-American and his gang of miners run from under the framework of the tower.

In the meantime, numbers of hands who had not actually been engaged in the last-minute operations at the well had assembled near the spot where the Don and his party were standing. A few platoons of uniformed soldiery were also present, for in view of his stepbrother's activities Alvarado Cassetto had been compelled to meet force with force and raise a small army, and as a precautionary measure some of his troops were always on duty at the oil-field.

Across that field Burke and the men from the well were now travelling at the double, and even as they joined the rest of the onlookers there was a distant rumble that seemed to come from the very core of the earth.

Next instant black, bubbling liquid was seen to surge upward from the deserted shaft—raw petroleum that shot higher and higher into the framework of the derrick with ever-increasing force and volume, until the very peak of the tower was drenched in the ceaseless smother of that enormous column of spouting oil.

Up from the sandstone stratum four thousand feet below ground, up through the steel casing that lined the shaft it soared; mineral wealth that spelled a fortune for Curtis and Don Alvarado, and generous bonuses for all who were in their employ.

Workmen and soldiers cheered the spectacle to the echo. As for Tailspin, Betty, and Skeeter, they stood and marvelled, for the sight of a "gusher" was something new in their experience.

"It's wonderful!" Betty kept saying. "It's wonderful!"

Her uncle turned to her, smiling at her enthusiasm.

"When Tommy and Skeeter have blazed a trail, and the pipe line's been laid, we can barrel the oil at Don Alvarado's settlement and load it straight on to the tankers," he declared. "Until then, the well has got to be sealed."

Burke and some of the men were returning to the derrick by this time, anxious to close the shaft lest the gusher attained a force that might cause damage. Soon they were at the tower again, and, begrimed by the spouting oil, they started to operate a valve-wheel which fastened a powerful cap of metal over the bore, thus shutting off the flow.

"Well, that's that," Curtis said to Don Alvarado, as the gusher was checked. "And now we've got to hang fire till the pipe line has linked the oil-field to the coast."

Plan of Attack

A WEEK had elapsed, and, during that week, Emanuel Cassetto and Horace Raymore had received tidings which were by no means welcome.

In the first place they had learned that Tailspin Tompkins and Skeeter Milligan were still very much alive, contrary to the fond belief that the crooked financier and his accomplice had nursed. In the second place they had learned why Mandro had not returned with the bomber in which he had been instructed to raid Don Alvarado's oil-field, and it had been a severe blow to them when they had been told that the 'plane and their agent were no more.

The source of their information was Garcia, the shady planter who posed as the Don's friend, but who was in reality a spy in the service of Emanuel, and one morning, just seven days after the death of Mandro, Garcia might have been seen at the small township over which his secret employer held sway.

Passing through the main street with its two rows of adobe buildings, Garcia made his way to the outskirts of the settlement and reached the headquarters of Emanuel, where he was challenged by a sentinel posted at the gates of the campound.

"Officer XX," Garcia remarked to the soldier.

This was the alias by which he was commonly known at Emanuel's stronghold, only a chosen few being aware of his real name. If it had been noised abroad that a planter called Garcia was in the habit of paying frequent visits to the northern shores of Nazal, the news might have reached the ears of the Don and set him thinking.

"Officer XX?"

The sentry at the gate of the compound repeated the pseudonym and drew aside, whereupon Garcia strode past him and marched across the parade ground within.

Groups of men in uniform were lounging about the great patio, but the visitor paid no attention to them and walked straight to the hacienda of Emanuel, and here he was stopped by another sentinel.

This time he gave his correct name, for the guard was one of Emanuel's most trustworthy men, and a few seconds later Enrico Garcia was being shown into a lounge occupied by Don Alvarado's unscrupulous kinsman and Horace Raymore.

"Ah, Garcia," Emanuel Cassetto exclaimed, a gleam of interest appearing in his narrow eyes as he recognised the caller. "I had an idea you might be here to-day. Is there anything to report?"

"Yes," was the reply. "I was with Don Alvarado and Curtis last night. They tell me that Tompkins and Milligan are making good progress. Every day they may be seen flying over the territory that lies between the oil-field and the coast—bombing such obstructions as might interfere with the job of laying their pipe line—in short, clearing the ground for the engineers. If you are going to prevent Curtis and your stepbrother from making capital out of their property, you had better waste no time, Senor Emmanuel."

"You are right, Garcia," Emmanuel said thickly. "That is what I have just been telling Senor Raymore. A whole week has elapsed since that fool Mandro got himself killed, and we have done nothing—nothing."

Raymore shot an impatient glance at him.

"You know why we've been idle," he snapped. "When we learned that we'd lost our only remaining 'plane, we just had to sit tight."

"We could have attacked Don Alvarado's oil-field with our land forces," Emmanuel growled.

"With Tompkins and Milligan harassing us from the air?" the American retorted. "And the Eagle as well, maybe! Why, our men would have been scattered in no time. No, I still think we were wise to wait until the delivery of the new bomber which I ordered soon after we lost our first ship."

Emmanuel Casmetto rose from the chair in which he had been seated.

"And to-day the new bomber arrived," he said, "so I see no reason for waiting any longer."

Raymore nodded briskly.

"I agree with you on that point," he stated. "What's more, I think you can still use your land forces. We'll make this a mass attack, Casmetto. While Gomez bombs the Don's oil-well from the air, your troops can open fire from the woods on the north side of the field."

Emmanuel greeted this suggestion with approval, and the two conspirators were discussing details when Garcia interrupted them.

"One moment, gentlemen," he remarked. "You speak of Gomez, but why not give him a rest from flying and let him lead the land forces? He has not been too successful in the air lately."

"Because of that accursed aviator who calls himself the Eagle," Emmanuel broke out fiercely. "And, talking of the Eagle, Garcia, have you any idea who he is yet?"

The planter shook his head.

"No," he admitted, "and, strange as it may seem, I am convinced that Don Alvarado himself does not know, though the Eagle has helped your stepbrother's party consistently."

"You were talking of Gomez," Raymore interposed at this juncture. "You said something about giving him a rest from flying."

"Yes," rejoined Garcia. "He has not been lucky, and besides—I think you need a better man for this job, a man who could deal with the Eagle if he happened to run foul of him."

"And where can we find such a man?"

Raymore demanded.

Garcia smiled, his sallow features assuming a self-confident expression.

"You don't have to look farther than me, senor," he observed.

"You?" The American seemed astonished. "You, Garcia?"

"Oh, yes, Garcia has seen service with one of the South American Air Forces," it was Emmanuel who spoke. "Did you not know, Raymore? Let me see, you were dismissed after having a hand in an attempted revolt, Garcia, weren't you?"

"Yes," the planter said thoughtfully. "I would have been a made man if that rebellion had been a success. As it was, I was lucky to escape a firing-squad. But that's all finished with now, and I seldom talk of it. H'm, Don Alvarado and his people do not even know I can fly a 'plane."

Raymore had moved closer to him.

"Just how well can you fly?" he asked.

"I was reckoned to be the best army pilot south of the Panama Canal," Garcia answered, with some pride. "I might add that I have had actual experience of warfare, amigo, and when I think of this mysterious aviator who calls himself the Eagle—well, I am tempted to go looking for him, that's all."

"Forget the Eagle, Garcia," the Yankee said. "You're going on a bombing raid, and you're going to make good where Mandro failed. Emanuel, send for Gomez and tell him he's in charge of the land forces."

Gomez was summoned from his quarters, and, the plan of campaign having been made clear to him, he was instructed to assemble the troops in Emanuel's pay.

"Get the men into the trucks and leave at once," Raymore finished. "When you reach the woods on the north side of the Don's oil-field, wait there until you see Garcia pass overhead in the new bomber. He won't take off for an hour or two yet, of course, because the 'plane's got to undergo inspection and tests, and it will have to be equipped with ammunition and explosives."

Gomez inclined his head, and then, with a smart salute, he turned and made his way from the room. A moment later he was hastening along the corridor that led to the compound, and it was as he emerged from the hacienda that he collided with a stoutish man in the garb of a cook.

The cook was Bill McGuire, the keenest newspaper investigator who had ever come out of San Francisco, though on that tropical island of Nazil he was regarded as a harmless numskull by the majority of Emanuel Casmetto's hirelings.

"Hey!" he ejaculated, as he recovered his balance and looked at Gomez indignantly. "Hey, what's your hurry, pardner? You want to be more careful."

Gomez favoured him with a tolerant glance.

"I am in a hurry all right, companionero," he said. "The time for action has come. We are going to attack the oil-field and wipe Don Alvarado's party out of existence."

He passed on, and left Mac standing there with a startled expression on his plump features, an expression that was succeeded by a look of rapt attention when the reporter heard the notes of a bugle ring out across the compound.

The "assembly" was being called, and soon, from his vantage-point in the doorway of the hacienda, Bill McGuire witnessed the departure of a formidable contingent of armed men—truckloads of soldiery under the command of Gomez, who occupied an open car at the head of the procession.

The column moved out, and McGuire fidgeted nervously. He was clearly anxious to quit the hacienda, but he had a meal to prepare for Emanuel and Raymore, and he did not dare to arouse suspicion by abandoning his duties.

Reluctantly he directed his steps towards the kitchen and set to work, but the moment he had finished his activities as a menial he lost no time in making himself scarce.

There was an ancient car which he was permitted to use. Rain or shine, it stood in the open night and day, and Mac had to swing the crank-handle to start it; and it was as he was engaged in this task that he observed the new bomber standing some distance away.

A crew of mechanics were fussing around it, and a man in flying kit was watching them. That man was Garcia, but, though he had seen him before, Bill

He was standing on the wing of his 'plane, a revolver in his fist, and, heedless of the shots that were whistling around him, he was sniping at a platoon of Emanuel's ruffians.

McGuire did not know him by name. He noticed now, however, that the fellow was wearing a leather helmet on which two X's had been roughly stiched.

The reporter continued to turn the crank-handle of his car, and, as the engine fired at last, he scrambled into the automobile and settled himself behind the steering-wheel. Then he made for the road that led southward into the jungle, and presently the trees had swallowed the vehicle and its driver.

Two miles from Emanuel's stronghold, McGuire halted his car in a lonely clearing and gathered up a length of grimy cloth that was lying on the seat beside him. Then he climbed out of the auto and ran to the edge of the glade, where he snapped off a stout twig from one of the overhanging tree-boughs.

To this twig he fastened the length of cloth, which streamed out like some dirty, tattered banner, and now he looked up into the sky as if hoping to see something there, but he had to cool his heels for half an hour in that remote jungle clearing before he heard a sound that dispelled his agitation.

It was the note of a 'plane's motor, and he scanned the clouds expectantly. A few seconds later he beheld a strange craft flying from the west, and as he recognised it an exclamation of relief broke from his lips.

He began to wave his improvised flag, and was still signalling with it frantically when the 'plane came overhead. Nor did he lower the ragged cloth until it was clear to him that the pilot of the machine had espied him and was turning into the wind to make a landing.

The 'plane descended to the glade, sped across the turf and rolled to a standstill thirty yards from the waiting reporter, who promptly dashed towards it and confronted the ship's solitary occupant.

Only the airman's head and shoulders were visible above the edge of the cockpit, and his identity was concealed by a curious mask that was fitted with a pair of tinted goggles. He was the Eagle—the mystery flyer who had prevailed upon McGuire to act in co-operation with him—the aviator whom Emanuel Casmetto and Horace Raymore had learned to fear.

"Thank heavens you happened to show up!" Mac breathed. "You're needed badly!"

"I don't let many hours go by without checking this spot and looking out for a signal from you," the Eagle replied. "What's the trouble, anyway?"

"Emanuel is sending troops to surprise Don Alvarado at the oil-field," McGuire told him. "Can you warn the Don?"

The Eagle nodded. "I'll tip him off," he said, and was leaning forward to lay a hand on the throttle when the newspaper man stepped closer.

"Hey, feller," Mac blurted, "I guess I'm of an inquisitive turn of mind, being connected with the Press, and I hope you'll make allowances on that account. But just where do you come from? Where are your headquarters?"

"In my 'plane," was the cool response. "Then where do you get your supplies?"

The eyes behind the tinted goggles were regarding Mac in an amused fashion.

"That's my secret," the unknown airman announced.

"Yeah, I know," McGuire protested, "but don't you think I'm entitled to a certain amount of confidence? Who are April 4th, 1936.

you, and why are you helping Don Alvarado's crowd?"

The Eagle was silent for a spell, and then he addressed the reporter deliberately.

"I'm no stranger to you, McGuire," he said, "and I know I can trust you. But listen, before I show you who I am you've got to give me your Bible oath that you won't betray my identity to a soul—not even to Don Alvarado or any of his people."

Mac drew in his breath.

"I swear," he answered in low, solemn tones, and with that the Eagle raised his hand to the mask he was wearing.

Slowly he lifted the covering, and for the first time the reporter looked upon the features of the man of mystery—looked upon them and recoiled in amazement.

"You!" he gasped. "You!"

The Eagle lowered the mask again. "Remember," he admonished. "Not a word to a living soul!"

"I—I gave you my word, didn't I?" Mac faltered, and, moving aside as the Eagle signed to him to stand clear, he watched the 'plane swing round and return to the far side of the glade, whence it started to taxi over the turf at ever-increasing speed till it soared from the ground.

Gazing after it, the newspaper man saw it rise above the trees and veer southward in a long, graceful swerve, to disappear at last among the clouds.

The Battle Opens

IT was early afternoon, and, after snatching a hurried meal at the oil-field canteen, Tailspin Tompkins and Skeeter Milligan were preparing to set off in the direction of the coast and resume their task of clearing the territory through which the pipe-line was to be laid.

Theirs was a peaceful enough mission, even though hand-grenades were required to carry it out, and they had been presented with a spare 'plane that had been conveyed north from Don Alvarado's settlement to replace the one which had crashed with Mandro's ship.

They were on the point of entering the cockpits of this machine now, and the Don and his daughter were bidding them good-bye with Curtis and Betty Lou.

"We'll expect you back before dusk," Curtis was saying to the youngsters. "Don't make it any later, or we're liable to get worried about you."

"We'll be back by dusk all right," Tailspin answered. "But say, I think we'll need some more bombs. Skeets, you slip over to the arsenal just there and ask Burke to let you have a sack of 'pineapples,' will you?"

Skeeter dropped to the ground and turned in the direction that Tailspin had indicated, but before he had taken a dozen steps he became aware of a familiar drone somewhere amidst the clouds above.

The rest of the party had heard the sound, too, and as they raised their eyes to the heavens they saw a 'plane swooping towards the oil-field; a 'plane that awakened some alarm in them at first—until Tailspin gave vent to a sudden ejaculation.

"It's the Eagle!" he cried out.

The Eagle it was, and as his ship roared above the workings at a height of three or four hundred feet, a tiny parachute dropped from the craft and floated down through the air.

"He's flung out a message," Betty Lou exclaimed.

The miniature parachute sank steadily through space and came to earth midway between Tailspin's stationary 'plane and the arsenal. Consequently it was Skeeter who first reached it, and as he picked it up he saw that there was a note tied to it.

He had detached the scrap of paper and unfolded it by the time Tailspin and the others joined him, and it was in breathless accents that he read out the warning which it contained.

"Emanuel planning to attack you by land. Be on your guard against him."

He looked up and saw that the Eagle's ship was disappearing into the clouds again. Then he glanced at Don Alvarado.

"Did you hear that, sir?" he jerked. "Your stepbrother is planning an attack."

The Don ground his teeth together.

"Yes," he bit out, "but thanks to the Eagle, we shall be ready. We have troops of our own here, and the workmen will fight, too. There's ammunition in plenty at the arsenal, and rifles. Moreover, I can send for reinforcements by radio."

"This means our job of blazing the trail for that pipe-line has got to be postponed, Don Alvarado," Tailspin cut in. "Skeeter and I aren't going to miss this battle—not for anything."

Inez's father nodded, and then, along with Curtis, he hastened off to find Burke and muster every man who could handle fire-arms. Meanwhile, had Don Alvarado and his partisans but known it, the troops of Emanuel were gathered in a clearing not more than a mile from the oil-field, and about the time that preparations were being made to receive the attack a bombing 'plane lauded close to the position occupied by Gomez and his column.

Garcia stepped out of that craft as it came to a standstill, and Gomez approached him.

"I've bad news, Officer XX," the commander of the troops muttered. "Another aeroplane flew over here a few minutes ago, travelling towards the oil-field, and I recognised it as the Eagle's."

"The Eagle, eh?" Garcia rejoined, his eyes narrowing. "Well, what of it, amigo? He does not scare me."

"I don't like it," Gomez said anxiously. "There is something supernatural in the way that fellow always shows up when there is trouble."

"Bah!" scoffed Garcia. "I will soon account for him if I have the luck to run across him. Now, listen, you get your men to the edge of the woods and start shooting. I will support the attack by bombing the oil-workings from my 'plane."

Gomez nodded, and returned to the head of his column, ordering the troops to dismount from the long line of vehicles. Then he instructed them to deploy, and presently the soldiery were moving forward through the trees in scattered formation, Garcia remaining by his 'plane and watching them until they were well out of sight.

The troops continued their steady advance, and had spread out far and wide by the time that the fringe of the forest was reached; and here, crouching among the thickets, they at once became aware of the intense activity that was afoot in the vicinity of the oil-well.

Men were running to and fro between the outlying sheds—men in uniform and men in civilian clothes. Miners and

"NOW OR NEVER"

"Who has them?" he growled.
"Braun's got 'em," whined Rafferty.
"I saw him pick up the case—the dirty double-crosser!"

Rainey flung him into an angle of the roof.

"Stay there!" he ordered. "If you meddle any more, I'll have to get real angry with you!"

He took a flying jump back from the roof to the other building. The skylight had been fastened from the inside, but he went over the far edge of the roof, to slide down a stack-pipe to the ground without wasting an instant. He caught sight of Braun and the other two toughs running across a landing-stage towards some river steps where a boat was moored.

Rainey was after them like a flash. Billy, desperate now, half-turned to take a shot at him, but missed by yards. Rainey heard Braun yell at Riley, and saw that worthy deliberately thrust out an arm at Billy and push him off his feet sideways into the flowing river.

Rainey was sure now that the jewel-case was with Braun.

"The little rat will try it on the other fellow next."

He fairly leapt upon Braun just as he reached the top of the steps. A straight flash of his left fist between Braun's shoulders sped that gentleman clean down the whole flight head foremost. A hand-grip on Riley swung him round and round through the air until Riley came to rest with a hollow kind of "plonk" on the rails. A plain-clothes policeman, who had just landed from the river ahead of his party, gasped in such surprise that he stood quite still with fists still clenched and his mouth wide open!

"There's a fellow drowning!" panted Rainey. "I couldn't get him."

Other police, uniformed, came running up from their boat. Their sergeant spluttered:

"Don't apologise—he isn't dead. But he's full up of water!" He glanced down at the stunned Braun. "Have you finished with this one, mister?"

"No. He's got some stolen goods on him I'd like to have."

The sergeant stooped to Braun to run practised fingers over him. The red jewel-case was drawn out of his inside pocket.

"Yours?" asked the sergeant, handing it over to Rainey, who now saw Audrey coming towards him with another party of police, headed by a Federal officer in uniform.

"There's a fourth fellow up on the roof somewhere with a broken ankle," said Rainey. "I think his name is Rafferty."

"We've got him," stated the Federal officer crisply. "He's told us he killed Gray. So now's the moment for a little presentation."

The police ranged themselves round about Riley and Braun, who had been jerked to his feet. He had fished his cigar stump out of a pocket, and he stuck it in the corner of his mouth, watchful and alert as a weasel.

Billy didn't look too good, but he still managed a grin. Riley alone was dour and sulky. But the feel of the policeman's hand on his arm kept him satisfied to stand still.

Rainey addressed himself to Audrey: "I couldn't clear myself by letting these gentlemen hop off with the diamonds." He gave Braun and Company a glance, then turned again to the girl. "So I just had to stop them! I have much pleasure in handing the stones to you, as agreed with poor Gray."

Braun's eyelids flickered.

"I knew you weren't a ghost!"
"Sure you did!" agreed Dick. "That was why you squawked!"

Audrey had taken the jewel-case.

"Thank you, Mr. Rainey. I now pass this over to the police for safe custody. Is there anything further, captain?"

"Nothing more, Miss Ferry," spoke the Federal officer, "beyond chucking these fellows into the prison van along with their friend Rafferty. But we'll do all that. Good-afternoon, miss—pleasant journey, Mr. Rainey! Squad, take the prisoners!"

As Dick walked away with Audrey, she asked:

"Shall I drive you to the railway depot?"

"Well, no. I've an idea I'll get a job at Springport and settle down."

"I can't imagine you settling down!" she said.

"I was wondering if you'd help me," Dick hinted.

"Why, I scarcely know you," she smiled, adding demurely: "Leastways, not as well as I'd like to."

When they got back to the Ferry mansion, Mr. Ferry had returned.

"I think you must be Norman Gray," he declared, staring his hardest at Dick.

"Maybe I can take his place here," Dick answered in his brisk way. "If Audrey doesn't hate me too much?"

She put her hand in his for answer. Mr. Ferry called to the old butler:

"Robert, get us something to eat! Guess we're all mighty hungry after such a busy day. And, Robert, bring along a bottle of the old Madeira. Seems to me we've got to drink healths!"

"RIFF RAFF"

Belcher's unshaven face broke into a grin.

"Where do you think you was going?"

"Now don't get excited, Dutch," remonstrated Belcher. "We just thought you might be a little lonesome around a job like this, so I thought I'd come over and talk to you."

"We got nothing to talk about."

"I hear the union give you a pretty raw deal," Belcher said with significant meaning. "You know, I was talking to some of the boys about it, and those guys ought to go down on their knees and crawl to you to get you to come over and talk to them."

The two boys—ugly, evil-looking men—slunk forward and lined up alongside Belcher.

"Hi'ya, Dutch?" they cried.

"You remember these dudes, Dutch," said Belcher. "Joe and Ed."

"Sure—sure." Dutch had not missed the package under Red Belcher's arm and he had an idea of its nature.

"We think it's the rottenest deal," went on Red. "It's persecution, and we're all with you if you want to do anything about it."

"Well—er—well, what do you think we could do?" Dutch asked.

"Now you're talking," Belcher laughed. "Let's go on board the freighter so we can be private."

"Somebody might see us up there," Dutch answered. "Let's go over behind them bales."

"Dutch, if they ain't gonna let us work, we ain't gonna let them work," the hobo ruffian explained when they had reached the bales. "See what I mean?" He held up the paper parcel, and then tore off a corner to reveal the contents.

"That's a great idea," Dutch seemed to be delighted. "That'll blow up the whole joint. The union and all."

From behind a bale peered the small face of Jimmy. He had heard enough. No one heard his bare feet as he raced away to give warning of the attempt to destroy the waterfront. The boy went straight to the union house and found a meeting in progress.

"Hey, fellows! Hey, Brains, I just seen Red Belcher and a couple of mugs talking to Dutch," he shouted. "They gotta a bomb and they're going to blow up the whole waterfront, or something."

"I told you you couldn't trust Miller!" a man shouted at Brains

McCall. "You oughtn't to have let the guy come back."

"We'll soon find out," rasped Brains. "Come on, let's go!"

But Jimmy had been bluffed just as Belcher and his pals were tricked. Dutch Miller had no intention of allowing these thugs to blow up the wharf and set everything ablaze, but he had to lure them into confidence in himself, get their hands away from the guns that they must carry, and try some way to defeat their nefarious scheme. And Jimmy was just near the union house when Dutch acted—he hit Belcher over the head with the electric torch.

The other two men flung themselves on Dutch. They dared not fire in case it aroused the alarm. They tried every trick they knew to overcome Dutch, who fought gallantly. Ed he felled with a punch in the chest that broke a rib, and he was doing his best to throttle Joe when Belcher revived and laid grimy hands on his throat.

The three rolled about on the wharf in a squirming heap. Close by lay the paper parcel that contained the deadly bomb.

Belcher clawed his hands down Dutch Miller's face before the latter landed a neat punch definitely below the belt. The fat crook gasped and flopped out of the fight. Joe, in desperation, whipped out a gun and Dutch had to struggle to keep the man pinned to the boards. Belcher's mauling and a kick from a boot had weakened Dutch, and it was all he could do to keep Joe from turning the gun on him.

Somewhat he wrenched the gun out of the crook hobo's hands, but the effort sapped his strength and Joe managed to squirm free. A fist pounded at Dutch's stomach and the pain so maddened Dutch that it gave him a moment of titanic strength. His right came round in a swinging uppercut that put Joe out for the count.

The fishermen came pelting along the wharf with Jimmy in the lead. They found a small battlefield. Belcher and Ed lay groaning, whilst Joe sprawled out motionless, and Dutch was weakly trying to get to his feet. In his arms he held a paper parcel.

"Gee, I musta got this all wrong," gasped Jimmy.

"Are you all right, Dutch?" Brains helped the battered night-watchman to his feet.

"I'm okay, but you'd better get them guys to a hospital." Dutch managed a grin. "Here, take care of this. They are bringing you a present."

"It's a time-bomb!" someone shouted.

"Throw it away! Throw it into the water!" yelled Brains.

They carried Dutch Miller from the wharf shoulder high.

Even Policemen are Human

DUTCH MILLER collapsed on reach the union, and Brains McCall insisted upon the hero of the hour being taken to his own house. A doctor was summoned, and reported that except for cuts and bruises there was little wrong, though he added a suggestion that a good feed-up would restore the patient quicker than medicine.

As Mrs. McCall was supreme boss of the household, Dutch Miller was kept in his bed for two days, rested and fed. He was told that only on the third day would he be allowed to get up. That day was going to be a special occasion because the boys were giving Dutch a welcome-back party on the Fairy Queen.

Besides the account of the attempt to blow up the waterfront, the papers contained headlines regarding the two escaped girl convicts. So far they were still at large, but detectives were close on their trail.

Dutch Miller knew nothing of Hattie's escape for the very simple reason that Brains told his wife that it would be unwise for the big fellow to hear the news. It must be broken to him gently.

"Poor Hattie! Goodness knows what's happened to her or where she is," lamented Mrs. McCall. "She might get shot, or something, and never see Dutch again. It ain't right, Brains, keeping this from him. If ever she needed Dutch, she needs him now."

"Dutch can help her only one way," said wise old Brains. "And that's by keeping his feet on the ground. He's straightened out now, and he's got to be kept that way."

In a house close to the waterfront Lil Hoskin was facing a plain-clothes detective.

"Look here, Bert Scanlon," cried Lil. "Hat ain't here. Do you think Hat's dumb enough to come here? She's probably across the border by now. I don't know nothing about Hat, and I'll thank you not to turn my home into a cop's sitting parlour. Bert Scanlon, if you wake up my kids I'll crown you."

But Bert Scanlon had his job to do, and he informed Lil that whether she liked it or not he was going to search her home from top to bottom. He searched, but did not find Hattie.

"You ain't fooling me," the detective told Lil. "Why ain't you getting dressed for the party the boys are giving on the Fairy Queen?"

"Cos I got other things to do," shouted Lil Hoskin. "You look after my bunch of kids, and maybe I'll go."

The detective decided to go to the Fairy Queen and interview Dutch Miller. He left a man to watch Hattie's old home.

When the detective had gone Lil went to a bed-room window and opened it. Crouched on the tiles was Hattie. Lil signalled that it was safe for the girl to come out of hiding.

"I've just gotta see Dutch before they see him," Hattie clung to her sister. "I just gotta. I gotta talk to him."

Round-eyed Jimmy wriggled out of bed. That boy knew everything. Dutch was going to the party at the Fairy Queen, and would be on his way there now. Give him the word, and he would tell Dutch that Hattie wanted to see him.

"Well, find him and tell him to come here and get me," urged Hattie. "Tell him I broke gaol like he said, then we're beating it to Mexico—understand?"

"Mexico," Jimmy nodded. "Sure, I'll tell him."

"The cops are outside," warned Lil.

"I'll go out of the window and down by the outhouse," the boy decided.

"They'll never see me."

Dutch Miller and Brains McCall were about to step aboard the Fairy Queen when Bert Scanlon showed up and barred their way.

"Just a minute, Dutch. What do you know about this?"

"Search me, the guys are giving a party, and I feel like going," answered Dutch, with a grin. "Are you going, too?"

Bert laughed unpleasantly.

"I suppose you're going to tell me in a minute you don't know Hattie lammed out of gaol. Where was you to-day and yesterday? Come clean!"

"He's been at my house ever since the fight," stated Brains.

"What are you talking to me about Hattie breaking gaol for?" Dutch seemed unmoved by the news. "She means nothing to me. I told her off so long ago I forgot what she looks like."

Scanlon stood to one side, and the two men went aboard.

"I was hoping you wouldn't find out about Hat," whispered Brains. "You gotta keep your head, Dutch. Promise me you won't do anything rash tonight."

"I ain't interested," muttered Dutch, but his eyes gleamed strangely.

Bert Scanlon was suspicious of Dutch, and ordered policemen to keep a watch on the dock and the Fairy Queen.

It was a surprise to Dutch to find a draped platform and a huge crowd. He found himself reddening when the crowd shouted his name. Brains piloted him to the platform, and there was Nick with outstretched hand. Nick had been advised that if he wanted to go over well with the men it was best to forget old scores.

"Hallo, Dutch, my friend!" Nick held out his hand. "We was waiting for you, my friend. Come on, we got a big surprise for you."

"You know what this Dutch Miller has done for us all," Nick addressed the meeting. "He saved my ships, he save you your jobs, maybe he save us all our lives. Because he do this it give me gorgeous pleasure to present this big hero this one hundred dollars from Nick, Louis, his great friend. I thank you."

Dutch Miller found himself holding a bulging envelope. He blinked his eyes and grinned sheepishly—he was beyond words. How everyone cheered.

Then Brains stepped on to the platform, and he had an envelope in his hand.

"I have great pleasure in giving you this, too." He handed it to Dutch. "As an appreciation from the boys."

Dutch Miller had got his union card back.

"I don't know what to say," mumbled Dutch, when there was silence.

"Say it with a drink, Dutch!" shouted someone. "Come on, we're buying Dutch Miller a drink."

They bore Dutch in triumph to the bar.

Dutch Miller was sipping his drink and shaking hands with old friends when he felt a touch on his sleeve. He looked round, and there was Jimmy, but close behind the boy was the observant Bert Scanlon. The boy knew, and his mouth moved as if trying to give a message. Hattie was with Lil, and though Dutch glowered at the boy he had read the message.

"You're hanging around because I'm in the dough again," Dutch cried.

"You're sucking around for more nickles. Go on home—kids should be in bed. Beat it!"

Jimmy looked at the suspicious Scanlon, and decided he could do no more. He went back to report his failure.

Dutch Miller had several drinks, and then said he reckoned he would like a wash. He walked towards the wash-place with Scanlon watching him suspiciously. But Dutch did not enter the gentlemen's place, but darted into the place marked "Ladies." He locked the outer door.

Two women powdering their noses screamed at sight of Dutch, but he did not bother about them. Up went a window, and out climbed Dutch. A moment later he was down on the wharf. He could hear Bert Scanlon shouting and yelling.

Hattie was in despair. Jimmy had returned to say that Dutch would not listen. She was sitting dejectedly on the bed when there came a sound at the window, and into the room climbed Dutch Miller. Hattie flung herself into his arms.

The girl freed herself. "We can't stand here talking," she cried. "We gotta go."

Dutch hesitated. "Nick give me a hundred slugs. Look, I got me union card—the fellows gave it back to me. Kind of funny, ain't it? Hat, what are we gonna do in Mexico?"

"You ain't backing out on me!" she gasped. "Me what broke the pen!"

"Hattie, quit hollering. There's something I gotta tell you," Dutch spoke quietly. "I just want you to know that I ain't the big shot I thought I was. Belcher kept telling me I was Trotsky, or somebody; but I ain't. I know what I am now. I'm just the best fisherman on this coast." He squared his shoulders. "And I can still knock the nut off any guy who thinks he's big enough to say that I ain't. And that's all."

A police siren made them look nervously at the window.

"I ain't going away with yuh?" said Hattie.

"Well, what did you break out for?"

"Because I love you, Dutch, and I'd have followed you to Mexico or Timbuctoo, right or wrong; but now you don't wanna go to Mexico. I broke out of stir for nothing. I—"

"Quit hollering, I gotta think what's best to do," Dutch shouted. "Now I'm in swell with Nick and the boys I was figuring it were best to stay here. Nick has influence, and so has the union. Maybe the authorities—" A child began to cry. "Will you shut that kid up?"

"Don't you touch that kid!" Hattie was like a tigress. "And I'll tell you why, Dutch Miller—he's mine and yours, you big chump!"

Dutch Miller walked over to the cot and stared at his son.

"You hated kids, and I didn't dare to tell you," sobbed Hattie.

"Who said I didn't like kids?" said Dutch, who was making absurd faces at the baby. "I'm nuts about 'em! Gee, we can soon start to make him the best tuna fisherman on the coast next to me. I never seen such a good-looking kid—he kinda looks like me, don't he?" He held out his arms to his wife. "Reckon this settles the issue, Hat. We stays here and faces the music."

Down below Lil Hoskin was facing Bert Scanlon. The detective knew his quarry was upstairs.

"Oh, please, Bert, you ain't gonna—" sniffled Lil. "They made it up, Bert. She only took the money for him. You heard what they said—they ain't running away."

"But I gotta, Lil." Bert rubbed his chin nervously.

"Not now, Bert," cried Lil.

Bert Scanlon moved towards the stairs, then hesitated. The house was surrounded, and Hattie could not escape.

"Can you put me up for the night?" he asked.

"Sure!" Lil laughed happily through her tears. "Pops ain't never home. I'll put you in his room." And, to the big police detective's embarrassment, she kissed him.

Later Lil crept up to the door of the bed-room and listened. There came the faint murmur of voices. Lil smiled, and crept softly down the stairs.

"I guess they got a lot to talk over to-night," she told herself.

response. "Twenty-seven's here; we were just starting out for the Blue Moon Café. Okay, Kennedy, we'll be seeing you!"

Caught Out

AN ambulance had drawn up at Boswell's, tooting its gong urgently. Mallory hurried to open the gates wide. He ran out into the dark night, and the driver stepped down from his seat.

"Riot squad!" he told the wondering Mallory. "Extra police protection."

"Oh, sure!"

The night watchman went round to open the door of the ambulance.

Next instant he was seized from behind and a drugged handkerchief was forced over his mouth.

"Take a long breath, buddy!" were the last words he heard as his senses left him.

He was carried to a corner and flung down. Savonne, Graham and the rest of the gang had tumbled out of the big car.

The gang, dark shadows, crept after Graham. Rat-faced Bert had closed the yard gates and drawn the bolt. They caught the "extra" men, playing cards inside Warehouse 5, squatting either side of an old box, with a shaded candle stuck at their feet.

"Stiek 'em up, you two mugs!" cried Savonne from out of the darkness. "Not a hope of anyone raiding Boswell's with you two fine fellers keeping guard, eh?"

The others rushed in on the discomfited pair when their arms went up. They were gagged and tied hand and foot, then were tucked away in a dusty corner of the huge warehouse.

"Which are the cases?" asked Savonne. "We don't need to wait about."

Graham flashed a torchlight on some of the piled-up boxes.

"All those red-crossed," he muttered. "Get busy, boys!" came Savonne's quick command.

Meantime, news of the theft of the ambulance was being wirelessed all over the town. The Commissioner, with his posse of police, picked up Kennedy and the dog at the Boswell yard gate.

Kennedy told them. "The ambulance has been driven round to the docks entrance. I was just in time to see it go."

"Hop in with me!" the Commissioner invited him. "And the dog."

Their car raced round to where the ambulance had been drawn in by the front doors of a warehouse entered under an archway.

The Commissioner, with Kennedy and Tarzan, tumbled out of their car. In the dim light they could see two men by the doors, which opened a little to let two more men come out of the warehouse with boxes on their shoulders, which they flung down on seeing themselves trapped.

Tarzan leapt at them, stretching one fellow flat on his back in the roadway.

Kennedy grabbed at another, a thick-set brute who slashed at him with a knife. A straight, right-hand hook on the jaw knocked this fellow sideways into muzzy slumber.

The Commissioner got a third man all safe and sound. There was no fight in this one. But the fourth gangster jumped for the ambulance, which immediately started up and thrust itself clear of the police car and out into the highway. The second car-load of police hesitated a priceless second or so, and the ambulance shot past them ere they could challenge it or turn.

The Commissioner yelled to them and they ran to secure the three crooks.

"Take 'em to H.Q.," snapped the Commissioner. "We'll follow up the rest. Search up above for any others."

Kennedy and Tarzan jumped back after him into their car. A stern chase commenced in which—thanks to the wirelessing—the ambulance was headed off again and again. Finally, in the darkness and confusion, it took a wrong turn and crashed into a wall at seventy miles an hour.

The Commissioner called to Kennedy as he leapt from his car. Savonne and Graham, with Joe and Ed and two others of the gang, had been in the ambulance, now smashed into smithereens. Graham was dead—his neck broken; Savonne was under Joe, groaning with two broken legs. Joe and his mate had been knocked stiff. The others were a miserable, breathless lot, who surrendered without a word.

The Commissioner called again to Kennedy. Getting no answer, he went to the police car where Tarzan was sitting at his master's feet, whining mournfully.

"Why, boy, what's the matter?" gasped the policeman.

"Fellow got me with his knife," spoke Kennedy with an effort. "Didn't feel it at the time. Guess it isn't much."

The policeman took him along to the hospital. Next morning his first visitor at the ward was Sheila Mallory.

"Hallo, Danny!"

"Hallo, Sheila! Stay for lunch?"

"You're better," she decided, studying him.

She patted Tarzan's head, then fired at Kennedy.

"Say, Slowfoot, who was the girl at the café?"

"One of the operators from the C.I.D.," Kennedy answered.

Sheila nodded her head.

"That's a good thing, too!" she told him. "Yes, I'll stay for lunch!"

"THE GREAT AIR MYSTERY"

soldiers alike, all of them ready to fight for the cause of Don Alvarado, were hurrying to arms and taking up positions in preparation for an expected raid.

It was immediately clear to Gomez that he and the force under his command had been deprived of the immense advantage they might have gained if their attack had come as a complete surprise. Plainly the Don and Curtis had been put on their guard, and it was easy for Gomez to give a guess at the identity of the informer.

"We have been betrayed," he snarled to the men nearest him, "and you may be sure we have to thank the Eagle for that. Carrambo, if only we knew who that devil is, and how he finds out so much!"

He clenched his fists, and then spoke to the soldiery again, uttering terse commands.

"Let them have it!" he rapped out. "We can at least give them a taste of lead before they are thoroughly organised. After that, much will depend on Officer XX. Come on, rapid fire!"

There was a racket of musketry that shattered the silence of the woods, and as the echoes of the first volley were rolling away amongst the trees there came fresh bursts of fire from the right and left, fusillades that told Gomez the rest of his men were playing their part.

Bullets whistled across the open ground beyond the forest, bullets that swept the oil-field in a hail of death and cut men down in their tracks. In one prolonged storm of gunplay the conflict opened, and the leaden slugs flew thick and fast, rattling against the derrick of the new well, splintering the timbers of store-sheds and dwellings, ploughing through human bodies.

Scuttling figures pitched to the dust, some writhing as they fell, others falling forward and lying motionless. Confusion and panic seized numbers of the Don's followers, and might well have spread through the entire mining camp but for the heroic efforts of the Spaniard himself and the stout support he received from Curtis, Tailspin, Skeeter and Burke.

Inspired by the example that their leaders set them, the workmen and soldiery in Don Alvarado's pay were prevailed upon to keep their heads

True, there was a rush for cover, but it was no disorderly flight, and the wounded were not forgotten, murdered as the fire had become.

From sheds and bunkhouses, from canteen and derrick, the defenders began to answer the volleys of the foe. The din of the fight waxed louder as more and more rifles came into play, and, over at the smoke-hazed fringe of the woods, stricken men were seen to topple backwards or drop face downwards in the undergrowth. The casualties suffered by the Don's partisans during the first moments of the combat were being avenged.

Most of the miners and soldiers in Don Alvarado's employ had taken shelter now, and from innumerable vantage-points were waging a grim duel with the attacking force. There were a few reckless spirits, however, who seemed to scorn danger and who were still more or less exposed to the enemy's fire, and among these was Tailspin.

He was standing on the wing of his plane, a revolver in his fist, and, heedless of the shots that were whistling around him; he was sniping at a platoon of Emanuel's ruffians whose dodging heads he could just see.

Twice the slugs from his gun took effect, and then suddenly he chanced to notice Skeeter away to his right, blazing at the foe from the miserable cover afforded by a ragged bush.

That was not all. Armed with rifles, Betty Lou and Inez were crouching beside the mechanic, in peril of their lives.

Tailspin dropped from the wing of his plane and hared across to them with the bullets singing past him as he ran. A few seconds later he was throwing himself alongside Skeeter and the girls.

"Get Betty and Inez out of here!" he panted.

"They won't go!" Skeeter said tersely. "I told 'em to beat it as soon as the shootin' started—but they wouldn't."

"They wouldn't, eh?" Tailspin ground out the words and then pointed to a hut in the background. "Come on, Skeets, give me a hand."

Between them, the youngsters managed to shepherd the reluctant girls to the hut, and, blundering across the threshold with them, slammed the door.

"Do you want to get killed?" Tailspin stormed at them.

"We can shoot as well as you boys," Betty Lou retorted. "Why shouldn't we have a hand in this fight?"

"Listen, your uncle and Inez's father couldn't have seen you out there, or they'd have got themselves knocked off trying to reach you. For the love of Mike, Betty, don't act so crazy—"

"You weren't crazy yourself, by any chance," she interrupted, "standing on that wing. And what about Skeeter, with nothing but a clump of scrub for shelter?"

Tailspin attempted to make some answer, but before he could do so the sound of an aeroplane's engine reached his ears, and with a tense expression on his good-looking face he wheeled towards one of the hut's windows, half expecting to see the Eagle's ship swooping from the clouds again.

Instead he saw a craft which he did not recognise—the craft piloted by the man who was known at Emanuel Casmetto's headquarters as Officer XX—and before another thirty seconds had elapsed Tailspin knew that the aviator in charge of that machine was an enemy.

Something dropped from the plane and burst with a terrific detonation a hundred yards away. Smoke and earth, ripped with flame, surged high into the air in a mighty column.

"Another of Emanuel's bombers!" Tailspin grated. "Skeets, we've got to tackle him. Come on, we'll make a dash to the arsenal—grab a sack of grenades—then sprint across to our ship. If we can get near enough to that rat up there we can blast him out of the sky!"

They ducked out of the hut, and, exchanging an anxious glance, Betty Lou and Inez stumbled to the windows and watched them racing across the open ground towards the arsenal, with bullets from the forest whining about them.

It was as if Tailspin and Skeeter bore charmed lives. Half-way to the arsenal they ran, and never a shot so much as grazed them. Half-way to the arsenal—

And then, out of the sky, like a bolt from the blue, a second bomb from Garcia's plane hurtled to the field, and to Inez and Betty Lou it seemed to fall immediately behind the two youngsters from Three Point.

There was a deafening roar, and Tailspin and Skeeter were lost to view amidst an upheaval of dirt and debris.

The Tale of a Trooper who knew no Fear

When Tim O'Hara, as a "Mountie," was sent to the Indian River district to deal with a ruthless band of fur-raiders, his task was complicated by the fact that he had been a trapper there himself at one time, and had fallen foul of Brad Harrison—who was determined that he should fail. Starring Tim McCoy

The Way of a "Mountie"

IT was a thin trail of blood in the snow that led Trooper Tim O'Hara to the log cabin under the pine trees.

He was on his way back to Marblehead to report the death of a wrongdoer who had succumbed to fever before the law could catch up with him, and though as a "Mountie" he was disappointed that death should have robbed him of his quarry, as a saddle-worn young man he was looking forward to some sort of rest.

The men of the Royal North-West Mounted Police are famous for their endurance, their courage, their tenacity of purpose, and their resource, and Tim O'Hara was in every way worthy of the scarlet tunic and navy-blue riding breeches he wore. Though his thoughts were wandering as he rode, his keen blue eyes missed no detail of the way that led down-hill through waste and woodland.

The snow that lay upon the ground was not thick. The vagrant storm which had brought it overnight had travelled south a couple of months before its proper time, for autumn was no more than half-way to winter. But the snow made conspicuous the spots of blood upon its surface and informed Tim that some wounded horseman had ridden that way within the last hour or less. The hoof prints were plain enough to be seen, but Tim would not have followed them save for the crimson splashes that went with them.

He turned left at a half-gallop, and it was not long before he came to the cabin. But he knew before he reached it that the wounded man was a "Mountie" like himself, for to the April 11th, 1930.

front wall of the structure was affixed a board upon which was painted:

"Border Patrol. R.N.W.M.P. Do Not Trespass."

Within a yard of the door stood a brown horse from which obviously a rider had fallen in a feeble effort to dismount, and Tim believed he recognised that horse.

With a troubled expression on his clean-shaven face he heaved himself from his saddle and opened the door. Just inside, a broad-brimmed hat of brown felt had fallen sideways upon the bare boards of a deserted room fitted with bunks. He picked it up, and the name of its owner was written upon the band inside the crown: "Robert V. Rutledge."

"Bob!" he shouted in high concern. "Bob!"

There was no reply, and with the hat in his hand he pushed open the door of an inner room.

In that room there were a couple of chairs and a table, and on the table were writing materials; but sprawling forward in a chair, with his head upon a blotting-pad, was a younger man than Tim, clad in the uniform of the "Mounted." His left arm was under his pallid face, a pen had fallen from his right hand and had rolled across the table, and his eyes were closed.

Tim dived round the table and looked down at a sheet of official paper upon which the wounded man had been trying to write.

"Inspector Rutledge, Marblehead Post," he deciphered with some difficulty. "Sir, I have the honour to report an engagement with fur smugglers. Was shot by man called 'Bull' Maddigan. . . ."

True to the code of the scarlet jacket,

Bob Rutledge had used the last of his ebbing strength to scrawl those words. Tim raised the fallen head gently between his hands and frowned at a patch of crimson upon the coat of scarlet.

"Bob," he said huskily, "what happened?"

Slowly a pair of eyes as blue as his own were opened and a look of recognition crept into them.

"Tell dad," mumbled the trooper feebly, "I—did—my best."

The men of the "Mounted" are not doctors, but they are skilled in first-aid work—especially in relation to knife and bullet wounds—and all necessary appliances were in the cabin. Tim did not attempt to remove the bullet that had lodged in Bob Rutledge's ribs, to the left of his heart, but he bathed and dressed the wound expertly enough.

Thereafter he prepared a meal from tinned stuff that lined some shelves in the outer room, and later in the day he set out with his patient for Marblehead, riding close beside him and supporting him whenever he needed support.

Bob Rutledge had youth on his side, and the bullet had not pierced his lung. He spent some weeks in hospital at Marblehead, while Tim, instead of enjoying a rest, was sent off with a warrant in his pocket for the arrest of Bull Maddigan, "charged upon oath that he did, upon the 5th day of October, 1912, feloniously attack Constable Robert V. Rutledge, R.N.W.M.P., at Val Marie, in the province of Saskatchewan."

That chase proved to be one of the longest in his career, for he travelled upon a trail that was cold, and months elapsed before he knew definitely that he was catching up with his man in the snowy heights of Alberta.

Throughout the depths of winter the chase continued, and in one trading post after another Tim gleaned sufficient news of his elusive quarry to stick relentlessly upon the trail.

It was north of the Churchill River, in a snow-mantled pine-wood, that he finally sighted the wanted man, who had fled in the night from a shack near Carter Lake, on foot and without food or even snow-shoes.

Maddigan had only his rifle, and from behind a tree-trunk he used it when at last his strength was at an end and he had fallen several times. But his aim was anything but true, and Tim was swift to take cover before the outlaw could fire again.

"Lay down your rifle, Maddigan!" he shouted.

Maddigan heard but did not obey. With a snarl of defiance he ran on from the trees across an expanse of whiteness towards a denser wood.

A service revolver jettied flame, a bullet pierced the fur coat of the fugitive, who reeled and fell and rolled in the snow, and Tim moved swiftly forward on his snow-shoes to look down into the bearded face of the man he had hunted and caught at last.

"You ought to know better than to fire on the King's police, Maddigan," he said sternly. "You might kill one, but another would take his place, and another, and another. They'd be on your trail till the day you died!"

Maddigan raised himself on an elbow, breathing heavily, his left hand clutching at his right shoulder.

"Now that you've got me," he panted, "what are you going to do with me? I'm too weak to—"

His voice failed him, and Tim went down on one knee to raise him up and hold a flask of spirits to his lips.

"Here, take some brandy," he said gruffly. "It'll steady you."

Maddigan gulped, coughed a little, and groaned. Tim put away the flask.

"My job," he said, "is to get you back to Marblehead, alive if possible. That's only a shoulder wound you've got there. We'll get you patched up and be on our way."

He unfastened the outlaw's coat and shirt and bound what was merely a flesh wound with his own handkerchief.

"I'm all in," complained Maddigan. "I've got to have some rest."

"We can't stop in this cold, without a fire," said Tim, and he helped the fellow to his feet and led him back to the trees. But only a little way under the trees Maddigan tugged away from him to lean against the trunk of a fir, his head drooping till his chin touched his chest.

"I can't help it, I tell you," he muttered. "I've got to have some sleep—just a few minutes' sleep."

"Sleep?" echoed Tim. "In this cold? We'd freeze to death, and you know it."

"I don't care—I'm so tired."

"No matter how tired you are," insisted Tim, "we've got to keep moving! Here, put on my snow-shoes! We'll be in Fort Frandall in an hour or so, and you can rest there."

He removed his snow-shoes and fastened them to the moccasins of his prisoner, and together they plodded on through the snow. But considerably more than an hour had elapsed before the wood was left behind, a steep hill was descended, and they crossed a frozen lake to the Fort that Tim had mentioned.

An Unpleasant Task

SPRING had come again, and the grass was green on the prairies of Saskatchewan, when Tim returned to Marblehead. There were old friends in the barracks of the "Mounted," but he rode straight to the office of Inspector Rutledge, Bob's white-haired father, who was in command of the post.

The inspector looked up from his desk at the tall, alert figure on the other side of it as Tim saluted and stood stiffly to attention.

"So you're back!" barked the inspector.

"Yes, sir," said Tim.

"Well, according to your report, you've been six months and eleven days on this detail."

"Yes, sir," said Tim. "It's a long time, O'Hara."

"My orders were to bring Maddigan in, sir."

The inspector nodded. Although his voice was gruff his grey eyes twinkled.

"Right," he said. "While strict obedience is expected, it is none the less to be commended."

"Thank you, sir," murmured Tim.

"O'Hara, last fall you saved the life of my son Robert. Now if I were to tell you that I'd cited you for promotion, would you think I'd done it on that account?"

Tim grinned. "I'd probably think it had helped, sir," he said.

"Well, you'd be mistaken! As an officer I recommended your promotion on the strength of your record only. We have no right to personal feelings that in any way interfere with our service. Remember that, O'Hara!"

"Yes, sir," said Tim meekly.

"Now about this man Maddigan—did he give you any information about the men he works with?"

"It wasn't necessary, sir. I know him. His real name is Hartley. He hails from the Indian River."

"Indian River?" The inspector frowned reflectively, then reached over

"I tell you I didn't shoot him," declared Tim. "My guess is that he was shot by someone who was afraid he might talk."

to a wire letter-tray. "That's rather curious—I've just got a letter from the Hudson Bay Trading Post there."

He found the letter in question and glanced through it.

"It says that someone has been terrorising the trappers, forcing them to sell their furs for little or nothing. Do you know that district?"

"Very well, sir," confessed Tim. "I used to trap there before I came into the service."

"Good! Then leave at once and take such action as may be necessary."

"Yes, sir."

Tim compressed his lips. He had expected a little breathing space, a little well-earned rest, but it was not the loss of a rest that disturbed him.

"If I might offer a suggestion, sir," he ventured, "I think that any other man could do better on that detail than I could."

"What do you mean?" rapped the inspector.

"I left Indian River because I had a quarrel with a rival trapper."

"What sort of a quarrel?"

Tim drew a long breath.

"Someone stole a silver fox from his trap-line. I caught one the same morning. He swore it was his, and wanted me to give it up, or leave Indian River."

"And you left?" demanded the inspector incredulously.

Tim nodded.

"If I'd stayed," he said, "it would have meant a fight to the finish, and I couldn't very well risk that, sir, because I—well, I—er—I was in love with his sister."

"Oh, I see." Rutledge frowned at an inkpot. "But just what has all that to do with the matter in hand?"

"He'd probably make a personal issue of the matter, sir."

"It's up to you to see that he doesn't, O'Hara! While you're wearing that uniform there can be no personal issues. Now is that clear?"

"Yes, sir," said Tim, none too happily.

"Good! Then proceed to Indian River at once, and act accordingly."

"Yes, sir," Tim saluted, turned about, and went out from the office. In the passageway that led to the front door of the wooden building he encountered Bob Rutledge, completely restored to health and strength, and on his way to see his father.

"Tim O'Hara, you old fox!" Bob exclaimed delightedly, and smote him playfully in the chest with his fist.

"Hallo, Bob," said Tim. "I hoped I'd see you before I got away from Headquarters."

"Why, I didn't even know you were back! Why didn't you look me up?"

"Haven't had a chance," was the reply, "and I'm on my way out again."

"Come on over to the barracks—I've got a lot to tell you."

"Can't do it," regretted Tim. "Headed for Indian River under orders."

Bob looked boyishly crestfallen. "Say, listen, fellow," he protested, "at least give me a chance to thank you for saving my life."

"Aw, forget it."

"Not me!" cried Bob vehemently. "Nor dad, either! Oh, by the way, did he say anything about you being up for promotion?"

"Yeah," Tim nodded. "I wouldn't make any bets on it, though, if I were you, until I got back from this detail. And don't let the inspector hear you call him 'dad,' either!"

"Why not?" asked the inspector's son blankly.

"Men in uniform," retorted Tim with a reminiscent grimace, "are not supposed to indulge in personal issues. Well, so long, Bob!"

They shook hands with each other, and Tim went out to his horse while Bob went in to see his father. The inspector looked up from his papers, and there was no twinkle in his grey eyes because he did not receive the salute to which he was entitled.

"O'Hara," blurted Bob in a puzzled manner, "was just telling me something about men in uniform and personal issues. D'you know what he meant, dad?"

"Yes," snapped his father. "And the next time you call me 'dad' while you're on duty, or come into this office without saluting, you'll get three days in the guard-house!"

Bob saluted in haste and rather raggedly. The inspector opened a drawer in his desk and took some papers from it.

"That's all!" he barked.

"Yes, sir," Bob saluted again—and made himself scarce.

Warning!

THE Indian River Trading Post was situated in the Hudson's Bay Company's territory north-east of the prairie belt in a region of forests, swamps, lakes, and sudden hills, where no farming development had ever taken place. It was a little settlement of rough shacks and cabins, in which mainly trappers lived, and it was dominated by the Hudson Bay Company's depot, where the trappers sold their pelts and acquired their stores.

Some of the trappers lived in cabins they had built in the pine-woods, away from the general community, and Tim was quite near to one of these cabins, riding towards the settlement, when a crackling sound reached his ears.

He spurred his horse forward, reached a grassy clearing, and saw that a deliberate attempt had been made to set fire to the log-built home of a French-Canadian named Larue. Brushwood had been heaped against two of the walls and was blazing; but though the flames were licking at the solid logs it was evident the fire had not long been started.

Tim sprang down from the saddle and proceeded to kick the burning stuff away from the walls; and two men hidden behind trees to the left of the clearing watched his efforts with scowling eyes. Both men were armed with rifles, and one of them presently raised his weapon to his shoulder.

"What's the matter with you?" hissed his companion. "Are you crazy?"

"Why?" growled the fellow who had been about to take aim at Tim.

"You might get by with that where you come from," was the reply, "but not up here! If you ever draw on a Mountie, you're through! Let's go and warn the others!"

The rifle was lowered, and presently the two stole away under the trees, while Tim kicked the last of the burning brushwood away from the cabin and walked round to its front door.

Just inside the door, on the bare boards of a roughly furnished living-room, Anton Larue was lying on his face, and it took Tim no more than a few minutes to make sure that he was dead. A slip of paper on the back of the blood-stained jacket engaged his attention. On it was written, in pencil:

"Warning. This man refused to sell his furs at our price."

Tim folded the slip of paper and tucked it in his belt, then stooped and picked up the murdered man and carried him into an inner room, where he laid him upon a bed. There were no signs of any struggle anywhere to be seen, and he decided that the elderly trapper had been shot down in the act of opening the front door to someone who had knocked.

He was on his way out from the cabin when he heard a familiar whistle and saw a queer little figure crossing the clearing—the figure of Hank Bascom, an old acquaintance and a character.

Hank hadn't a tooth in his head, and that made his whistle different from other people's. A queer sort of cap, made partly of fur and partly of cloth, was perched on his tousled brown head; his trousers were of some plaid material and his coat was of quite a noisy pattern. He had a scrubby moustache and beard, and his chin was even more prominent than his very prominent nose.

"Well, tan my pelt!" he exclaimed, as Tim went out to him. "Tim O'Hara!"

"Hallo, Hank," said Tim.

"And in a Mountie uniform, too!"

Hank surveyed the stalwart trooper with his head on one side like a bird's. "Well, I always told your friend Harrison that you'd come back some time and make him say 'uncle'!"

"You're wrong, Hank," said Tim quietly. "I'm not back looking for trouble with Harrison."

"You ain't?" The toothless old fellow seemed thoroughly disappointed to hear it. He grounded the rifle he was carrying and rested his hand on the top of its barrel. "Then what in tarnation bring you back?"

"The trouble you fellows have been having with these fur-raiders," replied Tim. "What's it all about?"

"Aw, there ain't nothing to that," scoffed Hank. "Some fellers are tryin' to scare us trappers into selling our furs for nothing, and some of 'em are doin' it, too. But most of us are sitting tight to see what happens. To-day's the deadline. I came over to sit with old Larue, just in case something starts—but of course it won't. Where is the old musk-rat? Inside?"

"He's inside," said Tim, but raised a hand. "Wait, Hank! There's nothing you can do for him now."

"You mean to say—they've actually done for him?"

Tim nodded and produced the slip of paper from his belt.

"Now who are the men who've been threatening you?" he asked, after Hank had blinked at the warning.

"Nobody knows. They work through a helpless little skunk named Stalkey."

"Where'll I find this man Stalkey?"

"He's a timber-land agent at the settlement, but he don't know nothing."

"I think I'll go and have a talk with him, anyway," decided Tim.

"I'll go with you."

Tim walked over to his horse and swung himself into the saddle. The Indian River Trading Post was five miles away.

"Do you want to mount up behind me?" he suggested.

"What are you trying to do?" scorned Hank. "Wear me out ridin' a horse? Come on!"

Shouldering his rifle he started off across the clearing, and he seemed to have no difficulty whatever in keeping pace with the horse, though the horse cantered along the trail that led through the wood.

Beyond the wood the way lay downhill beside the river that gave the settlement its name, crossed rough grassland, and swung left to a wooden bridge over a creek that was a minor tributary of the river. Across the bridge the trail became an ill-made street, lined with shacks and cabins, and at the end of the street stood the Hudson Bay Company's depot, the biggest structure in the place, built of wood, adjoining which was a gaol.

There were quite a number of men in the depot that morning, mostly trappers, and they were discussing the situation. James Duncan, the bulky and grey-haired factor of the post, was behind the counter, listening to the conversation but taking no part in it. Bradley Harrison, a powerfully built young man with no claim to good looks, yet with some redeeming quality about his ugly, clean-shaven face, was sitting aloofly on a sack of meal, and at the counter his sister Martha had been making purchases.

Martha Harrison, one of the few feminine members of the community, kept house for her brother. She was a beautiful girl, somewhere in the early twenties, and even in a plaid skirt and a little knitted cap she looked singularly attractive—and self-reliant.

Gavin, a clean-shaven man with heavy-lidded eyes and a cleft chin, waved a hand expressively at the others.

"Well, that's how it is, men," he said gloomily. "To-day's the last day. Either we give up the furs or take the consequences."

"What are we goin' to do about it?" demanded a bearded trapper named Hawkins.

"Let us ask the factor," suggested a French-Canadian named Duquesne; and most of them streamed over to the counter, where a trapper named Jones appointed himself spokesman.

"Mr. Duncan," he said, "as factor of this place, what do you think we ought to do?"

Duncan handed Martha Harrison a parcel he had made of her purchases and pursed his lips.

"Much as I want your furs for the company," he responded judicially, "I have no right to make a decision that may cost some of you your lives."

"You think their threats are serious?" demanded Jones.

"I have no right to say," replied the factor, "because it's not my life that's in danger."

"Well, isn't there some way you can help us?"

The factor shrugged his broad shoulders.

"I've done all I can," he said slowly. "I've sent to Marblehead for the law."

That was news to all of them, and they stared at him.

"The law?" echoed several voices.

"If these fellows had listened to me," exploded Brad Harrison, "there'd be no need of the law!"

Martha Harrison put down the parcel she had picked up and swung round on him.

"Brad," she cried, "please don't get started on that again!"

"Well," growled her brother, "we should have dragged the truth out o' that little weasel Stalkey and handled things to suit ourselves."

"You couldn't do that, Harrison," protested the factor.

"What's to stop me?"

"Your own common sense, I hope. You couldn't take the law into your own hands."

"Oh, yes I could," Brad retorted. "And there's still time for it, if some of these sheep would only back me up!"

"Sheep?" howled Jones. "What d'you mean, sheep?"

"Coming from you, Harrison," rasped Gavin, "and just at this time, that sounds like a stall to me."

Brad Harrison rose truculently from the sack of meal.

"You come with me," commanded Tim, "and if anyone tries to interfere with what I'm going to do, you stop 'em with that old blunderbuss."

"What do you mean, Gavin?" he roared.

"With a reputation like yours," was the significant reply, "that might be a good way to turn suspicion away from yourself!"

"Why, you skunk!" Brad's left fist smashed into the cleft chin. Martha cried out in alarm, and two of the men grabbed hold of her brother and pulled him away, urging him to take it easy.

"Anybody else feel the same way about me as Gavin does?" he challenged fiercely, flinging off the hands that held him.

"No," chorused several voices. "No, you're all right, Brad."

"Well, if some of you want to stick with me, we'll hunt up Stalkey and wring the truth from him."

Gavin made a grimace and picked up his peaked cap, which had fallen to the floor. Duquesne gestured.

"It seems to me a ver' foolish t'ing to do," he said, "but I will stick by you, my friend."

"I'll see it through," decided Jones.

"Well, what are we waiting for?" snapped Brad. "Come on!"

He turned towards the door, and all the others save Gavin and the factor trooped after him. But just before they reached the door a little rat-like creature crossed the threshold in seeming haste, and they stopped short and gaped at him; for he was Martin Stalkey.

The Arrest of Stalkey

STALKEY stood about five feet seven inches in his boots and appeared shorter than that because he had a stoop about his sloping shoulders. He was an unpleasant-looking fellow in the middle fifties, with greying hair and a seraggy neck, and his nose was long and his face was thin. He was not a man that anyone could like, and Martha almost shivered at sight of him.

He had a slip of paper in his hand, and with no more than a furtive glance for those who were staring at him he brushed past them to the counter.

"When I opened my office this morning," he said to the factor, "I found another note that I think ought to be made public."

The factor took the proffered slip and read what was written upon it in pencil: "This note says," he announced, "War is declared. The opening gun's been fired. The rest of you have till sundown to bring in your furs."

Brad Harrison strode over to the counter and gripped Stalkey by the arm.

"What does that mean, 'the opening gun's been fired'?" he rapped.

"I don't know," muttered the little man.

"Who wrote the note? You know that, don't you?"

"No, I don't, Harrison," was the quavering reply. "I swear I don't."

"You must know! Where have you been getting the money to pay for those furs you bought?"

Stalkey did not answer that question. He shrank away from Brad, eyeing the others nervously.

"Slipped under my door it was," he said, "in a sealed envelope—and late at night."

"You're lying to me, Stalkey," thundered Brad. "And you won't get away with it! I'm going to get the truth out of you if I have to twist it out!"

"I don't know, I tell you," Stalkey protested. "And if I did they'd kill me for telling."

"You may wish you had, before I get through with you!" Brad retorted between his teeth, and he pounced on a rack of whips and seized hold of one of them and cracked its thong. "We'll see how much you know!"

Duncan, the factor, flew round the counter; Martha mad; for the door in a panic.

"You can't do this, Harrison!" cried Duncan.

"You keep out of this!" shouted Brad, and swept him aside to raise the whip.

"Get Father O'Donovan!" Duncan called after Martha. "Maybe he can stop this!"

"You stay where you are!" Brad commanded harshly. "Martha, come back here!"

But Martha flew out from the depot, stumbling over the step; and she blundered right into Tim, who was swinging himself down from the back of his horse with Hank Bascom close beside him.

"Quick!" she cried. "Inside!"

Tim turned, and she caught at her breath.

"Why, Tim!" she gasped.

"Martha!" he exclaimed.

A look of fear filled her blue eyes as he held her.

"Oh, you shouldn't have come here!" she faltered. "You mustn't stay here!"

"I've got to stay," he returned grimly. "I'm here under orders."

"But you don't know what it'll mean!"

"On account of Brad?" he asked. "I don't think I'll have any trouble with him."

Through the open doorway he heard the slash of a whip and Brad's voice:

"You don't know anything, eh? You're lying to me, Stalkey!"

"Don't, Harrison!" whimpered Stalkey's voice. "Don't, Harrison! I can't tell you—I don't know!"

"You do know, and you will tell!"

Like lightning, Tim dived into the depot, and he wrenched the whip away and flung it across the floor.

Brad Harrison whirled round on him, but dropped his fists at sight of the uniform the fraction of a second before he realised who wore it. Hank hurried in over the step with his rifle, and Martha was close behind him. Brad recovered from a momentary shock and hooked his thumbs in his belt.

"Tim O'Hara, eh?" he jeered. "So you finally figured a way you could come back to the district and get even with me? And in a Mountie uniform, too! The only thing you could hide behind that you knew would keep me from giving you what I promise you if I ever saw you again!"

Tim bore the insult with calm. Stalkey was leaning heavily against the counter; the rest of the men were looking on with tense interest—especially those who had known Tim in his trapper days.

"My coming here," Tim said in a tone of authority, "has nothing to do with our quarrel. I'm here to establish order."

"You establish order!" cried Brad with a scornful laugh. "The law must be pretty hard up when it has to depend upon a man of your kind to defend it!"

He turned to the others.

"Not so long ago," he said, flinging out an arm, "this brave officer was a trapper. He stole a fox fur off my trap line, and when I found out about it I ran him out of the district."

"That's not true!" stormed Martha. "He left because I asked him to, not because he was afraid to stay!"

"That's what he made you believe," sneered Brad. "He left because I told him to go, and he left like a whipped curl. He stayed away till he could find a means of coming back in a uniform that'd make him safe."

Tim stepped nearer to him, outwardly composed, inwardly controlling his feelings with difficulty.

"Our personal quarrels have to wait, April 11th, 1936.

Brad," he said, "till I get to the bottom of the fur-raiding in this district."

"You won't get to the bottom of it, O'Hara," Brad retorted. "I'll make it a point to see that you don't!"

"That's a foolish threat. I could put you under arrest for that, you know."

"That's just the kind of a thing you would do—use your office to square a grudge!"

"If you interfere with my work," said Tim sternly, "you'll be shielding a murderer. Anton Larue was killed this morning."

The statement caused quite a sensation amongst the trappers, and Brad Harrison seized hold of Stalkey again.

"Tell me who shot him, you rat," he roared, "or I'll—"

Tim grabbed him by the coat-collar and forced him aside.

"The law will do the questioning from now on," he snapped. "Well, Stalkey, what have you got to say?"

"Nothing," replied the ugly little fellow defiantly. "I got nothing to tell."

Tim's blue eyes bored into his shifty dark-brown ones.

"Since you're acting as agent for these raiders," said Tim, "I'll have to take you back to Marblehead for questioning. Let me have the key to the gaol, will you, Mr. Duncan? I'd better lock him up till I'm ready to start back."

Gavin and one or two of the others seemed inclined to object, but the factor went and fetched a key, and Tim marched his prisoner out from the depot and along the front of the building to the little gaol with its stout door and barred window.

Duncan went with them, and the others followed. As Tim slipped the key in the padlock the two men who had watched him in the wood edged round the side of a shack, and the one who had raised his rifle before raised it again.

"Don't, you fool!" warned his companion, a man named Horn; but the rifle cracked, and a lantern over the door of the cell was shattered, and broken glass fell upon Tim.

"Who was that?" shouted voices. "Who did that?"

Tim saw the man who had fired scampering off along the ill-made street, and almost in the same moment Hank Bascom brought his own rifle to his shoulder. But Tim knocked it down again.

"I want him alive!" he cried. "You guard Stalkey!"

He ran back to his horse, and on it went flying after the fugitive.

The Second Shot

A LITTLE way along the street, the man who had fired the shot—an ill-favoured ruffian named Randall—dodged between two of the cabins on the right into a patch of woodland that stretched between the creek and an abrupt hill.

Horn followed him at an angle, while Tim galloped after him under the trees. Randall scuttled from one massive trunk to another, and he would have fired again, but just as he was about to do so he stumbled over a spreading root and went sprawling. Tim swept up to him on his horse and his gun was out.

"Now get on your feet!" he commanded.

Horn crouched behind a bush while his former companion was compelled to walk out from under the trees back to the trading post with his hands in the air. Stalkey had been bundled into the cell by Hank, and the others gathered round it; but Tim put away his gun, dismounted, and opened the door.

"Stalkey," he said sharply, "now that I've got this man I won't hold you. But don't leave the Post in case I need you as a witness."

Stalkey shuffled out into the sunlight clapping his long, claw-like hands.

"No, sir," he said gruffly, "and thank you."

"If my friends don't get me out of this," Randall shouted, "you won't need any more witnesses! I'll tell plenty!"

Tim thrust him into the cell and padlocked the door.

"Mr. Duncan," he said, "have you got a horse I can borrow to take the prisoner in?"

"I know where I can get you one," was the reply, and the factor went off. Brad Harrison lounged against some boulders outside a shack; Stalkey drifted over to Gavin by the wall of the depot.

"If that Mountie ever gets Randall back to headquarters," he said in a low voice, "it'll be the finish for the rest of us. You heard what he said."

"How're you gonna stop him?" grunted Gavin.

"I'm not," returned Stalkey. "You are!"

"Not me," said Gavin. "You don't expect me to shoot a Mountie, do you?"

"Handle it your own way, but see to it that he don't get out with Randall."

He walked off down the street to his own cabin beyond the bridge, but several of the trappers lingered in the street while Tim hitched his horse and had a meal with the factor, who had made arrangements for a spare mount.

Horn returned to the settlement and conferred with Gavin in his own little one-roomed shack, and Gavin rode away to the woods; but Horn was on horseback outside the depot when Tim sallied forth to collect his prisoner and start on the long journey back to Marblehead.

Nearly the whole community turned out to watch his departure. Randall was brought out from the cell and made to mount the hired horse. Horn, with a pipe in his mouth, fished a tobacco-pouch from his pocket as Tim was about to swing himself up into his own saddle.

"Come back some time, O'Hara," Brad called out deviously, "when you're not in uniform."

"I can't think of anything I'd rather do," Tim paused to fling back at him.

"If you ever do," taunted Brad, "bring the price of my silver fox with you!"

Tim put a foot in the stirrup, but while he was no more than half-way to the saddle Horn flung a handful of tobacco clean in his eyes, momentarily blinding him, at the same time nudging Randall, who shot off down the street in a bid for freedom.

Tim did not know who had thrown the tobacco, and the others had not noticed exactly what had happened. He landed in the saddle and with streaming eyes saw his captive riding furiously away.

"Halt, Randall, in the king's name!" he shouted, and spurred his horse in pursuit. But Randall had the advantage of a good start, and he knew that a Mountie would not shoot if the use of firearms could be avoided. His horse clattered over the planking of the bridge and swung to the right, across the grass-land and under the pines.

Tim pounded after him, and beneath the trees began to gain rapidly upon him. But Gavin was waiting behind a massive trunk, and his rifle was ready as the fugitive swept past his hiding-place.

"Stop, Randall!" Tim bellowed again, and he drew his gun with the intention of firing a warning shot over his escaping prisoner's head. But somewhere away to the left, even as he pulled the trigger, he heard a rifle crack, and, to his consternation, he saw Randall pitch sideways from his horse and roll upon the ground at the foot of a tree.

He galloped up and dismounted, while Gavin made his way furtively back to his own horse and rode away. Randall, breathing in a painful fashion, was struggling in vain to sit up when Tim knelt beside him.

"What happened, Randall?" he inquired gruffly.

"What happened?" panted the wounded man acingly. "You know—what—happened. You shot me—you shot me in the back."

Tim put away his gun and looked round, but he could see no sign of anybody among the dense trees, and the noise of the adjacent river, swirling over stones in its rocky bed, prevented him from hearing any sound of hoofs.

He bent over his prisoner and saw that he had lapsed into unconsciousness, and he picked up the limp body, draped it over the saddle of the hired horse, and rode slowly with it back to the trading post.

The trappers were still congregated round the depot when he reached it, and it seemed to him that Hank was the only friend he had amongst them, judging by the sullen silence with which they viewed him and his wounded captive.

On the factor's instructions Randall was carried off to the cabin of Father O'Donovan, who was not merely priest to the community, but doctor as well; and then Brad spoke what was in his mind.

"Sure is nice of you, O'Hara," he said scornfully, "being concerned about his health after shooting him in the back. I thought Mounties weren't supposed to use their guns except in case of emergency?"

"I didn't shoot him," declared Tim. "I fired in the air."

"And hit him square in the back!"

"I tell you I didn't shoot him. My guess is that he was shot by someone who was afraid he might talk."

Brad addressed the others. "Any of you boys hear more than one shot?" he demanded.

"No," chorused most of the men, while Hank and the factor remained silent. Brad spat as with contempt.

"Fine officer of the law you are!" he said.

"I tell you I—"

"I don't care what you say!" Brad straightened up from the boulder against which he had been leaning. "In or out of uniform, shooting unarmed men is murder!"

Tim let go of the bridle of his horse to grip him by the shoulder.

"I've stood about all I intend to from you, Harrison!" he roared.

"Easy, Tim," urged the factor, and caught hold of his arm and drew him away. "I'm sorry this happened, Tim. It's turned all the trappers against you."

"That's what Harrison intended it to do," Tim growled.

"Hadn't I better write headquarters and ask to have you relieved?"

"And have him boast that he ran me out of the country again?" said Tim wryly. "No, thanks!"

"With everyone against you it'll be a mighty tough fight, Tim."

"I knew it would be when I came in," Tim returned with grim determination. "I'm not backing out now!"

Duncan nodded appreciatively and patted him on the back.

"Go to it!" he said gruffly, "and good luck to you."

In Stalkey's Office

A FAINT light was still on the hills, but darkness had gathered in the valley, when Tim walked down the street that evening, knocked on the door of Father O'Donovan's cabin and entered a little living-room which seemed almost to have a religious atmosphere. Hank was sitting in a chair with his rifle between his knees, but rose immediately.

"Has he regained consciousness yet?" inquired Tim.

"Yep," replied the toothless one. "He's in the bed-room. Father O'Donovan wouldn't let me stay in with him."

Evidently Father O'Donovan heard their voices, for he emerged from the inner room, a tall and almost venerable figure in his long, black robes and his snow-white hair.

"Father," said Tim, dropping his hat on a table, "my name is O'Hara. I'm the man who brought in your patient."

"I suspected as much," returned the priest gravely.

"Do you think it would be safe to have a little talk with him now?"

Very slowly and very solemnly the priest shook his head.

"He'll never speak again in this life," he said.

"Oh!" Tim looked blankly at Hank and went out with him. "Well, here I am," he said with a helpless gesture, "worse off than when I started."

"I wouldn't say that," protested Hank, rubbing his scrubby chin. "You might worm something out of Stalkey."

"Of course!" Tim exclaimed. "I'd forgotten all about him."

Hank led the way to the cabin beyond the bridge, which was Stalkey's office as well as his bachelor home, for he was supposed to do more or less of a trade in timber. But Brad Harrison was in the office with the little man he had lashed with a whip, and one might have gathered from their conversation that they were on the friendliest of terms.

Tim turned his attention to Gavin as Brad knocked Stalkey flat on his back and struck out at Horn.

"I tell you," said Brad urgently, "your only chance is to hide out for a few days, at least until you have time to get out with the furs you've collected. If you don't, O'Hara is going to find a way to make you talk."

"But where am I goin' to hide?" asked Stalkey, sucking at a pipe that had gone out. "He'll search every cabin in the district."

"Go out to my place," suggested Brad. "He wouldn't expect you there. He wouldn't dare go after you, even if he did. You write the note I suggested, and I'll fix it so that it'll look like there's been a struggle. Come on!"

There was a roll-top desk in the room, with a rack of shelves above it, affixed to the wall. There were several chairs, a filing cabinet, and a table upon which an oil-lamp burned. Stalkey wrote upon a pad at the desk while Brad overturned the chairs, emptied the drawers of the filing cabinet all about the floor, and upset the lamp.

The sound of approaching footsteps sent him hurriedly to a window, where he peered out into the gloom.

"Quick!" he exclaimed. "Here he comes!"

Out from the office the two scurried through a living-room to the back door, and they were edging round the outside wall of the building when Tim knocked at the front door and stepped, with Hank, into the disordered office.

A bracket-lamp was still alight on the wall, illuminating the apparent wreckage. Hank surveyed the scene in open-mouthed as well as open-eyed astonishment.

"Well, I'll be doggoned!" he exclaimed. "Something's happened to the poor little rabbit!"

Tim dived into the living-room, but found it deserted, looked into an untenanted bed-room, frowned at the back door—which was shut—and returned to the office. The overturned lamp on the table was examined.

"He can't have been gone more than a minute," he announced. "The oil's still running out of this lamp, and the glass chimney's still warm!"

He looked down at the papers on the floor, picking several of them up and dropping them again. His keen eyes roamed the room, while out by the creek Brad Harrison said in a whisper to Stalkey:

"Take to the woods and head for my place. I'll stay here awhile so they won't suspect anything."

Stalkey streaked off into the darkness, and Brad hovered by the bridge for some little time. In the office Hank discovered the writing-pad on the desk and blinked at a message written on its uppermost sheet:

"If Stalkey's safety means anything to you, don't crowd us."

"Hi, look what I've found!" he cried, holding up the pad. "The dirty polecats have kidnapped the poor little fellow!"

Tim took the pad and read the message, but he was not by any means convinced as to its genuineness.

"There's something about this doesn't look just right to me," he said, gazing thoughtfully about him. "One little man couldn't put up such a scrap! It's overdone!"

He looked at the pad again, and both the writing and the paper seemed familiar. He fished from his belt the slip of paper he had found that morning in Larue's cabin.

"Let's see how the writing of this note compares with the one I found on Larue," he said, and placed them side by side on the table, away from the pool of oil that was there. "The writing's the same!"

Hank joined him at the table, gripping the barrel of his rifle, gapping down at the two notes.

"Stalkey's one of the gang!" cried Tim. "This note I found on Larue is written on the same pad! Look! It's what they call sectional paper—all pale blue squares."

"Well, dog my cats!" breathed Hank, his lips working excitedly over his toothless gums. "That sure tells us all we want to know about Mister Stalkey, the little toad!"

"Yes," said Tim, "but what good does it do? He's probably on his way out of the country now, and we don't know which way to look."

He dropped heavily into the only chair that was standing upright, a picture of gloom. But Hank pursed his lips and scratched his chin.

"He ain't left the country," he presently decided. "He wouldn't go off without the furs he's collected—and it'll take figurin' to get them out. I'll bet a coon's skin against a last year's bird-nest that he's hid somewhere within shootin' distance!"

"Do you know who his friends are?" asked Tim.

"Shucks, he ain't got no friends!" scoffed Hank. "I know one way you could find him, but I calculate you wouldn't do it."

"What is it?" demanded Tim. "I'll do anything."

"Get all the trappers on his trail. They know every hide-out within fifty miles."

"There isn't one of 'em would lift a finger to help me after what happened this afternoon."

"If Brad told 'em to they would," asserted Hank confidently. "They eat out of his hand."

"I wouldn't ask Brad Harrison to help me," snorted Tim, "not even if he would!"

"Me neither," declared the artful little trapper. "But I'll betcha it'd work if you did. Of course, some folks might think it was your duty, but not me. I wouldn't ask help of a man I didn't like if every trapper on Indian River got shot!"

Tim frowned at him, deceived by the sincerity of his manner.

"Yes, you would!" he exclaimed. "So would any other man that amounted to a hoot!"

He had committed himself by those words, and he rose and thrust the pad and the slip of paper into Hank's hands.

"Here, take these!" he commanded. "Tell the factor to lock 'em in his safe. I'll see you when I get back."

Tim Pays a Call

STALKEY made his way swiftly through a wood to the left of Indian River, along a familiar and well-beaten trail, and in less than ten minutes came to a commodious and well-built cabin of logs in a clearing of considerable extent.

Mounting the porch, he knocked on the door with the butt-end of the rifle he carried, and presently Martha Harrison opened the door—and seemed anything but pleased as she recognised the visitor.

"Hallo, Martha!" said Stalkey, edging past her into a living-room which bore many traces of feminine attention. "You alone?"

"Why—er—yes," she replied reluctantly. "Brad's at the post."

"I know," said Stalkey. "He sent me out here so I could stay out of sight for a few days."

"You can't stay!" she cried, staring at him aghast. "I'm not going to let Brad get mixed up in these fur-raids just to vent his spite on Tim!"

Stalkey put his back to the door, holding his rifle in both hands, and his eyes were evil.

"What makes you think he's not already mixed up in them?" he demanded.

"I know he isn't!" she flamed. "He's headstrong, but he's honest."

"All right, let him do his own talking." The sound of galloping hoofs caused him to open the door a few inches, and he closed it again in haste. "Hide me, quick!" he exclaimed. "The Mountie's coming!"

"I'm not hiding anyone from the law!"

"Have it your own way." He swept past her into the kitchen and looked menacingly back at her. "No tricks! I'll have him covered until he leaves."

Tim, who had ridden across the clearing, hitched his horse to a rail and mounted the steps of the porch. Martha opened the front door even as he knocked at it.

"Why, Tim," she faltered, "I—"

"Is Brad here?" he asked.

"No, he isn't," she replied. "And you mustn't wait for him. If he finds you here he'll be furious."

"I hope not," said Tim grimly. "I'm here on police business."

He stepped into the living-room and closed the door, and she immediately stood between him and the kitchen, where Stalkey lurked with his rifle.

"Tim," she said, "you don't think Brad's mixed up in these raids, do you?"

"I'm certain he's not," he assured her.

"Then don't wait for him," she pleaded. "It'll only make matters worse, and they're bad enough now."

He moved nearer to her, resisting a temptation to take her in his arms, and he said earnestly:

"There's nothing you could ask of me that I wouldn't do for you as an individual. I proved that once by running away and letting people think I was yellow rather than do something that might hurt you. I didn't come here because I wanted to, but because I had to."

The front door swung wide and Brad burst in upon them.

"I've been waiting to see you, Harrison," said Tim.

"That's a lie, O'Hara!" roared Brad. "You came here to do just what you are doing—make love to Martha! You think, because you've got that uniform on, I have to stand for it; but I don't! This place is mine—you get out of it!"

"I'm here on official business," said Tim. "Stalkey got away this evening, and I'm after him. He tried to make it look like he was kidnapped, but it didn't work. What's more, he left evidence that proves he's implicated in the murder of Larue."

Instinctively Martha glanced in the direction of the kitchen, and once more she stood between Tim and the half-open door. Brad flung off his coat.

"You're not tryin' to tie me up in this, are you?" he rasped.

"No," replied Tim. "I came here to ask your help. I never did a harder thing in my life. I want you to get your trapper friends to scour the country for him. They'd do it for you when they wouldn't for me."

Brad's rather thick lips curled with scorn.

"Round up your men for you, eh?"

he snorted. "So you'll get the credit and be promoted? If I knew where the raiders were, I'd bring 'em in myself, just to show you up!"

"Brad, please!" cried Martha. "If you weren't in uniform——" threatened her brother.

"If I weren't in uniform," retorted Tim, "I wouldn't stand for some of the things I have to now. Good-bye, Martha!"

He put on his hat and went out, and Brad was watching him go, through a window near the door, when Stalkey ran out from the kitchen with the rifle in his hands and a murderous look on his ugly face.

Martha cried out in alarm, and her brother turned from the window to snatch the rifle away.

"Not so close to my cabin, you fool!" he shouted.

"He knows too much about me," growled Stalkey.

"Well, it ain't gonna help matters to have a killing to your credit, is it? We've got to work fast, if we're going to save those furs. Where did you hide 'em?"

"Why should I tell you?" challenged Stalkey. "The others don't know."

"So we can get 'em out of the way before O'Hara finds 'em."

Stalkey considered that point, while Martha looked horrified.

"If you were O'Hara," said the cunning little crook after a while, "where would you start looking?"

"There's only one place to look," asserted Brad. "In your cabin. If I didn't find 'em in it, I'd look under it."

"Well, that's where they are," said Stalkey. "There's a trap-door in the back room."

"Fine!" quoth Brad. "Before morning I'll have those pelts where O'Hara will never find 'em!"

"You can't do it, Brad!" cried Martha. "I won't let you!"

"You keep out of this!" snapped her brother. "I know what I'm doing."

"But you don't know what you're doing!" she shrieked. "Getting mixed up with murderers just because you hate Tim O'Hara!"

She ran into a bedroom and reappeared wearing a cloak; but Brad barred her way.

"I said keep out of it," he shouted at her, "and I mean it!"

"All right," she replied, "I will keep out of it. But I'm going to the Cartwrights, and I'm going to stay there until you come to your senses—or find yourself in prison with the rest of the gang!"

Brad moved aside and she went out from the cabin, slamming the door behind her; a proceeding which did not suit Stalkey at all.

"Call her back!" he cried, pointing a skinny finger. "She's liable to talk!"

"Aw, she won't talk," said Brad with confidence. "She wouldn't betray me—and she'd be in the way here, anyhow."

"If she does talk, Harrison, or you double-cross me——"

"Why should I?" Brad demanded curtly. "Ain't it enough that we're double-crossing the others? Say, and speaking of the others, you've never told me the names of the men that are working with you."

"What you don't know," retorted Stalkey, dropping the rifle on a couch, "won't hurt you, nor anybody else."

Bob Acts for the Best

TIM rode back to the settlement, put away his horse, and some little time later went out with Hank Bascom from that little trapper's shack, carrying a dark lantern. Taking care that no one saw them, they made their way round to the back of Stalkey's cabin, and there Tim posted Hank under a tree.

"You wait here in case somebody follows me," he directed.

He stole in at the back door, and in the office he extinguished the bracket-lamp on the wall, then proceeded to search the place thoroughly in the light of the lantern.

In the living-room he pulled back a rug on the floor and beneath it found what he was looking for—a trap-door. He raised the trap and climbed down a vertical ladder into a cellar; and the rays of his lantern shone upon piles of furs, stored in such a fashion that none of them touched the concrete walls.

Several times he climbed the ladder laden with pelts which he heaped on the floor of the room above, while Hank leaned against the tree-trunk out at the back of the cabin, keeping watch and munching cheese.

Nothing occurred to disturb the silence, so far as Hank was concerned, but Brad Harrison reached the front of the cabin without his knowledge and tiptoed into the office. The door into the living-room was open and a faint light moved about in there. He looked through the crack at the back of the door, and he saw that the trap was open and that Tim had just dumped a pile of pelts in a corner of the room.

Furiously he strode through the doorway, and Tim swung round with the lantern in his hand. Its light struck Brad full in the face as he hurled himself at his enemy. The lantern crashed to the boards, and in the darkness the two fought and struggled with each other.

It was a fierce battle, but Hank did not hear a sound of it, though it continued for many minutes ere fortune favoured the aggressor. Then Tim stumbled on the edge of the trap, lost his balance, clutched wildly at nothing, and pitched headlong into the cellar.

Breathing heavily, Brad climbed down the ladder and struck a match. Tim was lying on the stones below as senseless as a log of wood, and the rest was easy. Brad climbed up with the remainder of the pelts, found a rope and descended again to bind Tim's arms and legs, then climbed once more to carry the pelts away from the cabin by instalments.

Two hours elapsed, and then Hank became concerned about Tim, though nothing had aroused his suspicions. He went over to the back door and opened it, and he called into the blackness of the cabin:

"Tim! Tim, where are you?"

Naturally there was no response, and Hank became really alarmed. He passed into the living-room, and, missing the open trap by inches, trod on the lantern. Fishing a box of matches from his pocket he struck one and looked about him, and presently he lit the lantern and descended with it into the cellar.

Tim had just regained consciousness and he opened his eyes while Hank was severing his bonds.

"Are you hurt bad, Tim?" he asked anxiously. "What happened?"

Tim blinked at the lantern and at the scrubby face above it, then remembered what had happened.

"Brad," he said weakly, "I found the furs. They're upstairs."

"I didn't see no furs," declared Hank.

"Then Brad got away with them!" Tim got to his knees and tried to rise to his feet, but sank down on a rung of the ladder. "Hank, I can't make it," he muttered, "Go to Brad's cabin—see where he hides those pelts."

He held a hand to his aching head and motioned with the other; but Hank was not willing to desert him.

"I'm gonna get you over to Father O'Donovan's first," he declared in a voice that defied argument, and he propped his rifle against a wall to help Tim up the ladder, and some little time later supported him out from the cabin and over the bridge to Father O'Donovan's place up the street.

The priest was retiring for the night, but readily took charge of a new patient, and then Hank went off with his rifle to play the spy round the home of Brad Harrison.

A newly risen sun was climbing above the hills to the east and reddening the tops of the fir trees in the valley when Tim walked out from Father O'Donovan's cabin. He was feeling quite himself again and he had thoroughly enjoyed a modest meal.

"Good-bye, Father," he said gratefully, "and many thanks."

Hank, who had been standing with his back to a post of the porch for quite a while, ran to him as he walked erectly down the steps.

"Tim!" he cried excitedly. "Guess what! Brad's got Stalkey hid in his cabin!"

Father O'Donovan had closed his door and probably intended to get a little sleep. Tim walked slowly up the street with Hank.

"Brad hiding Stalkey?" he said incredulously.

"Yep!" declared Hank. "I stood outside the window, and I heard everything they said."

Tim frowned at the depot ahead; Gavin's cabin was passed.

"What about the furs?" he demanded.

"Brad ain't got 'em," was the unexpected answer. "He said you got 'em."

"Said I've got 'em?"

"Yeah." Hank mouthed his toothless gums. "He told the damndest yarn you ever heard—how you took the pelts and hid 'em, and how you was waitin' for him, and how he whipped you, and left you bound and gagged in the cellar and shut the trap-door."

"You couldn't have heard right," scoffed Tim.

"Yes, I did, too! And what's more, they're gonna leave you in the cellar all day and come back to-night and make you tell 'em where you hid the furs."

Tim considered that statement and found an explanation that fitted.

"I get it!" he exclaimed. "Brad's going to double-cross Stalkey! Going to leave him in the cabin and pull out with the furs!"

The depot was reached, and Hank rubbed his chin.

"If that's it," he commented, "you'd better work fast, brother."

"I'm on my way right now," Tim assured him, and he went round to the stables and saddled his horse. But as he led the horse out from its stall he frowned again.

"I'm all wrong, Hank," he said gloomily. "I can't arrest Brad without the furs—I can't prove anything!"

The street was deserted when they emerged from the yard of the depot, but with startling abruptness a rider came clattering over the bridge towards them, and the rider was wearing the scarlet and navy blue of a Mountie.

Tim recognised Bob Rutledge with astonishment, and that very bright young man hailed him as he rode up.

"What are you doing up so early?" he inquired, as he dismounted beside the pair. "Been out all night?"

"Just about," said Tim, and introduced Hank. "What are you doing here?"

"Dad sent me to relieve you," was the reply.

"Relieve me!" exclaimed Tim. "Oh, but I can't leave now! Harrison will think he ran me out of the country."

"Harrison?" echoed Bob. "Is that the fellow you told dad about?"

"Yes. He's torn me to shreds, knowing I can't fight back—turned the others against me—boasted I'd never finish my job up here. Don't you see, Bob, I can't go back now?"

"You've got to, Tim. Your promotion's come through!"

"My promotion!" Tim had almost forgotten about that.

"Yes, I've brought the notification for you."

An official-looking envelope was produced, but Tim would not take it.

"Promotion or no promotion," he said doggedly, "I stay right here till I arrest Harrison."

"Has he done anything he could be arrested for?" asked Bob, putting the envelope back in his pocket.

"Has he? We had a fight, last night, over some furs. He knocked me out and got away with the evidence. I've got to stay right here till I can prove my case and put him under arrest."

"There's one little item you've overlooked. Tim. You couldn't arrest him even if you had the proof against him. This is the eighteenth of the month—doesn't that mean anything to you?"

Tim shook his head.

"Doesn't mean anything to me," he said. "Dates don't mean much, except when you're writing out a report."

"Well, this one ought to. Your term of enlistment expired the day before yesterday!"

Tim's face lit up.

"Now I know I'm not going to leave!" he cried. "I'm staying right here; not as a Mountie, but as a private citizen—and the first man to hear about it is going to be Harrison!"

"Listen here, Tim," said Bob severely, "you can't throw away your career over a petty quarrel like this. Think of your future."

"You think of it," retorted Tim, turning towards his horse. "I'm in a hurry."

"All right," gritted Bob, "I will think of it. I won't let you do it. You're too good a friend."

"You can't let personal issues enter into the Service, my boy," Tim reminded him; and Bob promptly clapped a gloved hand on his shoulder.

"If that's the way you want it, O'Hara," he said stiffly. "I arrest you in the King's name!"

Hank, who had listened to the conversation with growing surprise, gaped and mouthed; Tim became annoyed.

"If you think this is a joke, Bob—"

"I don't," Bob interrupted. "You're an armed civilian looking for trouble—a menace to the community! I hope you'll come along peacefully."

Tim shrugged and permitted himself to be marched along to the cell. His Service revolver was removed from its holster and the door was slammed upon him. The padlock was unfastened and hanging from its staple, and Bob snapped it home.

"Now," he said through the bars of the little window. "I'll bring in your man Harrison, and I'll want you as a witness."

He asked as to the whereabouts of Brad's cabin, and he rode away down the street. Hank leaned against the wall of the cell, and Tim pulled off his gloves, suddenly remembering that he had not returned the key of the padlock to the factor.

He fished the key from his pocket and held it out between the bars.

"Hank," he said urgently, "take this and unlock the door."

But Hank blinked at the key and would not touch it.

"I daresn't," he protested. "You get five years for galloping!"

"And you're the fellow that said things couldn't get any worse, eh?" growled Tim, and fell to pacing savagely up and down the narrow cell.

"Personal Issues"

BRAD HARRISON was having breakfast in the kitchen of his cabin, and Stalkey—in his shirt-sleeves—was looking moodily at him when a beat of hoofs caused him to turn to the window in alarm.

"It's O'Hara!" he exclaimed, grabbing up his rifle.

Brad ran to the window, and he saw Bob Rutledge riding across the clearing.

"That's not O'Hara," he said. "It's a stranger! You get in that bed-room, and no matter what happens, don't let him see you."

Stalkey vanished into the indicated bed-room, and Brad crossed the livingroom to the front door, which he opened as Bob was mounting the steps.

"Morning," he said gruffly.

"Good-morning," returned Bob. "Your name Bradley Harrison?"

"That's right. What can I do for you?"

"I arrest you, in the King's name," was the stern reply, "on suspicion of fur-stealing!"

Brad scowled and backed into the room, and Bob followed. Stalkey, just inside the bed-room door, released the safety-catch of his rifle.

"O'Hara afraid to come out and make his own arrest?" sneered Brad.

"The man hasn't been born yet that O'Hara's afraid of," Bob retorted, gazing about the room. "Mind if I have a drink of water?"

"You're the boss." Brad went into the kitchen and returned with a dipper full of water, and Bob took it and drank.

"If you're lookin' for furs," said Brad, "you won't find any around here."

"Mind if I take a look in this room?" Bob walked out into the kitchen, glanced at the table, and moved round it to deposit the dipper in the sink.

Stalkey hastily elbowed his rifle, and as the young Mountie was passing the open door of the bed-room, he brought the butt-end down with all his might upon a head protected only by an Army hat of soft felt. Bob went down with a thud, completely knocked out, and Stalkey emerged from the bed-room.

"I could break your scrawny little neck for that!" roared Brad.

"Well, I wasn't going to have him arrest you if I could help it," said the little crook.

"Why not? You could have got me out to-night, and we'd have left with the pelts. Now, if he dies, we'll both swing for it!"

"Aw, he won't die! I just put him outa commission for the rest of the day."

"Yes," said Brad grimly, "and now we can't wait till night to go after those furs! Somebody's liable to come here and find him! Say, maybe we could use this fellow to help us, though."

Twenty minutes later Tim was still pacing up and down the cell, pausing now and then at the door to glare at Hank, who remained outside it.

"If you don't get more sociable," threatened the little trapper, "I ain't gonna stay and visit with you."

"I don't care what you do, if you're not going to let me out of this place," snapped Tim.

"I don't want to violate the—"

Hank broke off in the middle of his protest. "Great catamounts!" he exclaimed. "Look what's comin' up the street!"

Tim could not see the street from the cell, though he tried to do so.

"I don't care what it is," he growled; and then, as Hank continued to stare: "What is it?"

"Brad Harrison," replied Hank. "He's bringing in your Mountie friend, draped over a horse. Look like he's hurt."

Brad was riding his own horse and trailing Bob's, and Bob was hanging limply over the saddle. Trappers came out from their cabins, asking questions, and quite a procession followed the two horses to the depot. Tim had a glimpse of Bob as he was carried into the building, and Hank asked him what he figured had happened.

"It's quite clear what's happened,"

"BARS of HATE"

The Stolen Handbag

A YOUNG man flashed along the main thoroughfare of a big city on the West Coast of California. For weeks he had been hard at work on Government matters, and it was grand to be free for a day. He would drive out into the hills and visit some friends.

Ted Clark happened to glance up into the reflector mirror, and a low whistle escaped him. He was being tailed by a speed cop. The speedometer showed that the car was at the moment traveling between forty-five to fifty miles an hour.

With a grin the young man put down his foot and zoomed away. He slithered round the next corner, took the next turning to the left and eventually came back to the main road. But if he imagined he had shaken off the cop he was mistaken—a sound not far distant made him give another glance into the mirror.

The young man decided that this was much better fun than driving on a hot afternoon out along dusty roads, and he proceeded to have a grand time dodging round corners, doubling on his tracks, going through private roads attached to gas stations and doing everything he could to elude the persistent speed cop.

The speed officer stuck gamely to his task, and swore that he would serve a summons or burst in the attempt.

Ted came round a corner, and his eyes widened at sight of three men attacking a fourth, whilst a girl stood by and yelled at the top of her voice. Now he hated to see an unequal fight, and decided that it was up to him to play a part. A wrench on the wheel, and he swung the car across the road to charge straight at the fighting men.

The screech of his horn caused the three attackers to dart away, whilst the fourth stared in fear at the approaching car. With a screech Ted slowed his car.

"Hop on!" he yelled. The lone fighter sprang on to the running-board, Ted accelerated, and tore back on to the road.

He glanced at his passenger. A thin, mournful fellow, with dark, baleful eyes. The latter glanced at the driver nervously. Ted laughed and went down the street at sixty.

"Mister, what's your hurry?" "A cop is after me," Ted chuckled, and pointed to the mirror. "See him?" "He's gaining on us."

"We'll take him round a few more turnings and then pull up," Ted grinned. "Then you watch him laugh."

In a quiet street the driver slowed his car and permitted the speed cop to drive him into the kerb. The officer lifted his machine on to its rest and took out a notebook.

"Well, what's the alibi?" the officer said sharply.

"Well, I haven't one really," Ted smiled sweetly. "I was just trying to see if I could give you the slip."

"You did?" The officer licked his pencil. "Well, now I'm going to give you a slip. What's your name?"

"Ted Clark."

"Let's see your driver's licence." Ted fumbled and then frowned. "Sorry, officer. I left it in the office."

The officer's grin was chilsome. "Well, ain't that too bad? I suppose you'd like me to get it for you?"

"That certainly would be nice of you, officer; it isn't very far." Ted produced a card. "You'll find the City Hall close by."

The nervous person who had been rescued from the three apparently desperate characters peered over the driver's shoulder and had a surprise to read: "TED CLARK. Deputy Warden." The officer was not only surprised—he was nonplussed.

"I suppose you were on business?" He had a strong idea that the deputy had been having a joke at his expense. "You're new to this district," Ted grinned. "And I like to find out if officers are handling their jobs all right. I'll tell the chief you're okay."

Ted watched the officer as the latter replaced his summons book, mounted his machine and rode away. A movement made him look round—his passenger had got cautiously out of the car.

"Hey, wait a minute." "Thanks for the lift," the passenger answered, and stepped out smartly.

Ted Clark slipped swiftly out of his car, and with a resigned expression his passenger waited on the kerb. The latter's smile was very forced.

"What did those fellows want with you?"

"Oh, a lady's handbag." "I don't understand."

"Well they thought I was a purse-snatcher."

"Why, you look like an honest man to me," stated the deputy warden.

"I am," sniffed the stranger. "That's what gets me down."

Ted Clark clapped him heavily on the back.

"Don't let it get you down, my lad, you're not the first one." Another hearty slap. "Just square your shoulders and—"

A handbag had slipped beneath the stranger's coat and lay on the pavement. "Well—well!" The little man opened his eyes wide. "How do you suppose that got out of my coat?"

Ted Clark picked up the bag.

"I should turn you over to the police."

"It's an unfortunate habit of mine. I don't mean no harm really—me fingers kinda let me down."

"Well, let's see who the bag belongs to."

"Here, you can't do that—I'm the guy that swiped it."

Ted had to laugh.

"It's almost your property, I suppose." He opened the clasp. "I presume the lady I heard bellowing was the owner of this bag." He glanced at the other, who was looking thoroughly ashamed. "I see she was." He dived into the bag and drew out a card. "Ann Dawson. This is a lucky break for me."

"What ye mean by that, mister?"

"I've been trying to meet this Dawson damo for three months," the deputy warden answered. "I'm going to return this bag and get acquainted."

"Not so fast!" cried the bag-snatcher. "How do I know you're on the level?"

"You'd better come along and find out," chuckled Ted. "What's your name?"

"Danny Dawson. Are you really a warden?"

"Sure as I'm here." Ted pointed to his car. "You're coming with me, Danny Dawson, and it depends just how well you behave yourself where you sleep to-night. Unwittingly you've helped me, and for that I'm inclined to be lenient. Get in!"

Without any argument Danny got into the car, and Ted drove the car round to Acacia Lodge, Sea Avenue. It was a quiet suburban district of small modern villas. Outside the lodge was a small two-seater. Farther down the road was a powerful four-seater.

"There she is—getting into that car now!"—Danny pointed.

A smart, slim, dark-haired, athletic young woman had appeared from a gate and entered the powerful two-seater.

"How could you take a bag from a nice-looking girl like that?" Ted was indignant. "You certainly deserve to go to gaol!"

"It was the bag I looked at—not the girl," said Danny. "You going after her? If you catch her I'll apologise."

"Good for you. I guess—" Ted broke off sharply. The small car had turned at the first corner, and immediately the big car had roared to life and vanished in the same direction, but not before the deputy warden had glimpsed four men.

"Let's see what this is all about!" Ted Clark spoke grimly.

The Rescue

TED CLARK roared round the corner and grinned to see the big car some way ahead. It vanished round a corner.

"That car is following Miss Dawson," Ted told his companion. "But they're keeping well back as if trying to kid her. She seems to be heading towards Stanville, and there's a long stretch of arterial road between the two districts—an ideal spot for desperate men."

"What's their game?"

"That's what I propose to find out," answered Ted. "Hallo, they're stepping on it. She's got wise to 'em."

Sure enough, on the arterial road the big car roared from thirty to eighty miles an hour. The girl must have made a desperate bid to escape because it was not till the outskirts of Stanville were reached that the big car succeeded in driving her off the main road into a shallow ditch.

The big car had not bothered to see if they were being followed. Ted saw the ditching as he had been travelling almost as fast as the big car. He switched off his engine and put his foot down on the red knob that operated the free-wheel. His car glided forward and came to a rest alongside the big car. The four men were out of their car and clustering round the girl.

"Hand over that letter!" a big, thick-set fellow was shouting.

"I haven't got any letter," they heard the girl answer.

"Don't lie—you stole it from the safe."

"I don't know where it is."

"So you did take it!" the chief crook yelled. "Where is it?"

The girl was frightened by those grim faces.

"It's in my hand-bag—somebody stole it."

"That tale won't work, sister," the crook cried. "Come on and tell it to the boss."

"Leave that lady alone!" drawled a voice—Ted's.

The four men turned round as if they had been shot. They saw what appeared to be two perfectly ordinary men.

"Scram, or you'll get a punch on the nose," cried the spokesman, and turned his back.

Ted glanced at Danny and rubbed his hands together, then he stood up on the seat of his car.

"Sister, get out of that car!" came the order.

"Don't do any such thing!" shouted Ted, and when the leader spun round the intrepid deputy warden dived over the big car straight at the surprised crook. They were so surprised that they allowed Ted to land some hurtful punches before they turned on him snarling all kinds of threats.

Whereupon Danny decided it was time he joined in the fight. Though four against two, the crooks found that Ted and Danny were fighting wizards.

"Get your car started!" Ted ordered the surprised girl.

The crooks rushed. Crash! One was hurled back as if struck with a battering ram; Danny got another with a blow that was very much below the belt.

The girl started her car, and with a roar clambered it out of the shallow ditch. The car bumped back on to the main road. Her eyes lit up as she saw the strange young man pick up one of her assailants as if he were a child and fling him violently to the ground. Another staggered up and got a sock in the jaw that made her gasp as if she had stopped the mighty punch herself. Then she observed the small man doing his best to strangle a man with a very thick neck.

"Get to the lady's car!" Ted shouted to the friendly bag-snatcher. "Hurry!"

A moment later he was racing towards the small car.

"Let her rip!" he shouted as he jumped on to the running-board.

The small sports car whirled away in a cloud of dust.

The crook, who had done all the talking, staggered to his feet and nursed an aching jaw.

"Don't you guys let her get away," he yelled to the others. "Get up, you scum!" The other three staggered up looking very much the worse for wear. "I'm going to use that guy's roadster and report to the boss."

The big car tore off in pursuit of the small sports car, whilst the leader took Ted's roadster and hastened off in the opposite direction. Ten minutes later he was talking to a very tall man of foreign origin. Jim Grant, in spite of such a name, was a Mexican Pole, who lived for years in the States—Grant was not his real name. He was an evil-looking man with eyes that made people shudder at the evil lurking in their depths.

"A bunch of fools!" he shouted at his chief man. "Gilroy, why didn't you burn that letter?"

"I thought it would be better in the safe."

"That letter is enough to send us to the chair!" raved Grant. "If that Dawson girl ever gets it to the Governor her brother will go free and you know what we'll get."

"What we're going to do, boss?" asked Gilroy.

"We've got to get that letter back," Jim Grant drew out a gun. "We've got to get it back if we kill half California."

Surrounded

THE girl was eager to put as much distance as possible between herself and the crooks, and so no time was wasted in talking. Ted and Danny kept on looking back.

"Take the first fork right," Ted shouted in the girl's ear.

"Where does that lead me?" the girl demanded.

"To the place where I live!" rapped out Ted. "We can talk there. Now turn sharp right and keep going till I yell to you to stop."

At a safe distance the crooks in the big car followed.

At Ted Clark's yell, the girl pulled up before a smart, white-walled villa. The trio hurried inside and the deputy locked all the doors.

"Just in case we have any cavedroppers." He smiled at the girl. "Now, let's all go into the lounge and talk this thing over. You're wondering who we are and I want to know about your friends, so let's clear everything up. This way. My folk are away on holiday in the hills, and they've taken our only servant."

"I like your place," Danny looked round appreciatively, especially at a cabinet full of silver cups.

"I got those for athletics at school," Ted had followed the direction of his gaze. "There's a secret lock that if forced open sends two million volts through any meddlesome mike's arm. Now, lady, will you sit down and tell me what all this is about?"

"Thank you for helping me," the girl took the seat he offered. "You see I was out this morning shopping when somebody stole my hand-bag, and in that bag was an important letter."

"What kind of a bag?"

"A black one with an 'A' on it."

Ted produced the bag that Danny had stolen.

"Is this it?"

"Why, yes!" exclaimed the delighted girl. "Where did you find it?"

"I'm the one that stole it, lady," modestly explained Danny.

"Ho has a gift that way—take no notice," Ted reassured the girl, who was clutching the bag nervously. "But I don't get the connection between your bag and the three men, Miss Dawson."

"You know me?"

"I've been trying to meet you for three months," Ted admitted. "You see, I've seen you a good many times. At court—during your brother's trial. You have my deepest sympathy, Miss Dawson—I still think he's innocent."

The girl's face became drawn and haggard.

"He is—ho didn't kill that girl!" she cried. "I've got the letter that will prove Jim Grant did it." She opened her bag feverishly and then gave a sigh of relief. "Read it, please!"

Ted Clark scanned the letter. Not only was it a threatening letter to the murdered girl, but it gave time and places that proved beyond doubt that Grant had a hand in the crime.

"How in the world did you ever get this?"

"I've got it—that's the main thing," Ann was evasive. "Forty-eight hours more and it would have been too late. Will you go to the District Attorney's office with me, please? Actually I was on my way when I lost my bag. You helped me when I was planning to visit the various police stations to trace it."

"The District Attorney is out of town." Ted looked worried. "I know, because I'm a deputy warden. We'll have to get in touch with the Governor. The chances are he's at the Capitol. I'll 'phone."

"Please do!" Ann's voice shook. "I don't know what I should have done without your help."

Ted Clark got through after some delay. The Governor was away. He was informed that he was on a week-end vacation at Idlewild.

Ted hung up.

"Our luck seems to be out," he muttered. "Still, we can make it all right. Idlewild is a hunting lodge about six hours from here. I know the train service round these parts, and I'm sure there's an afternoon train we can make. In a few hours your brother will be a free man."

Danny had been strolling aimlessly round the room admiring the various objects of value, and by chance he came to the window. Being inquisitive, he pulled aside the curtain to see what sort of garden there was to the house.

"Look! Come here!" he called out.

Ted ran to the window. Two men were peering cautiously round a bush at the house. In the road was a powerful car.

"They've trailed us—maybe a whole bunch of them!" Ted pushed him away from the window. "Mustn't let them know we've spotted 'em. I'll 'phone the police."

But it was soon apparent to Ted that the 'phone was dead.

"The wires have been cut." Ted slammed down the receiver. "This is not so funny. We've got to get out of here. How are we going to do it? Suppose Danny and I take the letter and make a break—we'll get shot before we get any distance. Those crooks were following you, Miss Dawson, and they'd follow you again. If you slipped out and got away in the car they'd go after you, Danny, and I could make a get-away when the coast was clear." He shook his head. "Too dangerous! I'm not changing those thugs drilling you."

"Ted, I've got an idea," shouted Danny. "You folk have been square by me, and here's my chance to do something for you. I'm the same height and much the same build as Miss Dawson. I've done female impersonations at one or two local shows, and I'd love the chance to try my stuff out in real earnest. Let Miss Dawson change clothes with me, and I'll give them the wildest chase they ever had, leaving you two a chance to make the train."

It seemed the best chance they had, and swiftly the girl undressed behind a screen and passed her clothes to Ted, who collected Danny's clothes to bring to the girl. Finally he gave a critical look at the two of them.

"You both look pretty terrible," he admitted frankly. "Miss Dawson, you must get that collar right, and tuck that hair of yours under the hat. Pity you can't lend Danny some of it. Danny, you look like nothing on earth, but we've got to go through with it. I'll let you out through the back door and get to Miss Dawson's car. We'll get a lift some way to the station. I don't think they'll dare start shooting on account of the neighbours. Good luck, Danny! Look me up in the morning at the D.A.'s office."

From behind the curtains they watched. They saw Danny clamber over a hedge and heard men shouting. Danny sprinted towards the next house and disappeared. They saw three of Grant's men chasing over the flower-beds. Then came a terrible suspense, and Ted began to fear they had captured Danny when the bag-snatcher appeared on the other side of the road. He reached Ann Dawson's car and was away in it, as the crooks appeared. They leaped into their big car and gave chase.

"So far so good," Ted smiled at the girl. "Now for the railway station."

They caught the train for Idlewild, and thought their adventures were at an end.

Danny Up Against It

DANNY managed to cover about five miles before the big car drew alongside, and a menacing face peered over the side. A large hand with a revolver made Danny hastily apply the brakes. He buried his face in his hands.

"All right, sister! Cut out that crying," a gruff voice ordered. "Give me the letter."

Something about the way Danny sat, or the absurd angle of Ann's hat, must have made one of them suspicious, because his hands were jerked away from his face.

"It's the smart guy!"

"Where did the Dawson girl go?" a thick-set ruffian demanded.

But Danny just refused to talk. They bundled him out of the car into their own. Not long after he was standing before the tall, evil-faced Jim Grant.

"You'll talk if I break every bone in your body," threatened Grant. "Now spill it!"

"Ain't anything to spill," Danny answered. "I've always wanted to do an impersonation act, and I bluffed you mugs easily. My friends thought it was a good idea, and bet me I couldn't do it." "Stop being funny!" snarled Grant. "This means, boys, that the other two slipped away whilst you were chasing this fool. They would head for the station." He laughed unpleasantly. "That will be as far as they get. I've got Slim planted there." The 'phone bell rang. "That, maybe, is Slim. Hallo?"

Danny grinned as he saw the look of rage that appeared on Jim Grant's face.

"You mean to say they made that train—they're on their way to Idlewild? You got scared because you saw a couple of cops? One can't trust any of you fools. Go straight to the airport, and jump to it!" Grant slammed down the receiver. "Listen, you guys!" He faced Gilroy and the gang. "We've got a job to do, and if we fail it's our last! If I go to the hot seat—I'll have company. We've got to go after these two, and we gotta stop 'em. Let's get out of here."

"What about the smart guy?" demanded Gilroy.

"That's your job, Monahue." Grant looked at a big, leering fellow. "If he gives you any trouble, don't hesitate to bump him off."

Soon Danny was alone with Monahue, who nursed a large gun and grinned at him unpleasantly.

"If you get on my nerves the boss told me to bump you off," Monahue laughed hoarsely. "I think I'll take you for a ride. I can't stand your face; I don't think you got long to go, stranger. I'm gonna give the paper the once-over, read all about Dawson's last hours, and then you can say your prayers."

"You should read everything," nervously murmured Danny. "That train smash in Nevada; trouble in Europe; long-distance flight—"

"Shut up, or I'll croak you right now!" yelled Monahue. "If you want to smoke, take the chance. It's your last!"

There was silence for a while. Danny peered round cautiously. He had been pushed into a chair near a table. Monahue was two yards away, and hidden behind the daily paper, and chuckling over the comic strip. On his lap lay the gun.

Danny decided it was too risky to try to dive for the gun, and Monahue was much stronger than himself. On the table were some matches in a stand.

A sudden quick gleam came into Danny's eyes, and he took out his cigarette case. He put a cigarette in his mouth and took another peep at Monahue, then he reached forward and took a match; but he did an unusual thing with that match. He fixed the match firmly in the toe of his boot. What luck the sole was parting company with the uppers! Fixed to his satisfaction, he took another quick look round. Monahue was still reading. He drew that match-stand closer, and managed to strike the match without breaking it. Monahue still did not look round! Very quietly Danny turned and moved his leg, with the match well alight, towards the paper. Monahue was reading so intently. The match flame touched the edge of the paper—a flame appeared.

Suddenly the paper burst into flames and with a yell Monahue jumped up, hurling the gun to the floor.

"What the blue blazes!" yelled the crook. "I'll—I'll—I'll—" the words choked in his throat because his gun was now held by Danny, who was grinning unpleasantly.

"One word from you and you do the croaking!" hissed Danny.

"Don't shoot—don't shoot!" moaned Monahue. "I've got a thousand dollars April 11th, 1936.

in cash I'll give you if you'll spare me." He was in a pitiful state of fear.

Danny laughed. "I lifted them during the ride in the car. They'll come in handy, so will your clothes." The gun moved threateningly. "Take off them clothes. Then, pal, we're going for a ride."

Not many minutes later the two men were in one of Grant's cars. Monahue sat at the wheel, with Danny tickling his ribs with a gun. Their destination was the airport.

They got to the airport in time to see a big plane rise from the ground and disappear into the haze. A few discreet inquiries soon revealed that Grant and several of the gang had been on the plane, but their destination was Saugus. Danny had a good idea of the reason. The train stopped at Saugus en route for Idlewild, Grant and his men would get aboard the train, and his two new friends would be at their mercy.

Danny saw a pilot busy giving an overhaul to his machine. "I want to catch the Idlewild train. I got the cash to pay for a trip, and a bit extra if you can start at once."

"That ought to be easy. She stops at Saugus," answered the pilot. "I know that," said Danny. "But I've got to get on that train before she stops. Matter of extreme urgency."

The pilot stared at him. "You mean you want me to drop you on that train?"

"Yes."

"What are you, some kind of a daredevil?"

Danny grinned. "Well, I will be if I can get away with this one."

"If you've got the cash it's okay by me," the pilot answered. Danny took out the money he had taken from Monahue and handed over two hundred dollars. The pilot rubbed his hands. "This is my lucky day. Stranger, you've got a chance because my plane has a rope ladder—get in."

Danny climbed into the passenger's cockpit and the plane took off. Very soon they came in sight of the railroad track and the machine kept the lines in view. An hour's flying and they saw the train below them. Danny reached forward and touched the pilot's shoulder, immediately the plane began to swoop down.

"Steep grade a few miles ahead," the pilot informed his passenger. "Train has to slow—that's your place."

Danny blinked his eyes nervously as the train drew nearer and nearer—the ordeal ahead was not to his liking. The pilot knew his job and brought his machine to within a hundred feet, and waved his hand. Danny lifted the rope ladder out of the cockpit and pushed it over the side. The machine dropped lower and the pilot gave another signal—it was the moment.

Danny climbed out of the cockpit and with eyes shut went down the ladder. Several times he was nearly swept away by the rushing wind, but he managed at last to get his feet on the bottom rung and dared to open his eyes.

The train slowed to a crawl and the plane dropped as low as the pilot dared. The top of the coach was ten feet away—Danny let go. He found himself clinging to a roof ventilator with all the wind knocked out of him. For some minutes he lay there gasping and then he began gingerly to work his way along the roof. Sheer grit carried him through and then he climbed down between the coaches to the footboard.

What relief when he tugged open a carriage door.

Ted Clark was having a pleasant tête-à-tête with charming Ann Dawson when a dusty, bedraggled Danny found their compartment.

"Danny, how in the world did you get on this train?" gasped Ted.

"Never mind that—you two have to get off!" panted Danny.

"But we must reach Idlewild."

"Grant and his men are going to get on at Saugus," was the answer. "It's their last chance to stop you and they're desperate. They won't hesitate to shoot."

Actually Danny was not quite right. Grant on reaching Saugus had determined to take no risks. Gilroy and two others were to get on the train and wait their chance to get Ann and her fool of a helper. He was going on by plane to the Idlewild Hunting Lodge in case they failed. This plan meant that Grant would not be involved in any gun play.

Ted heard Danny's brief account of what had occurred, and looked perturbed.

"We'll be in Saugus in ten minutes." He fingered his chin. "Our only hope is to get off when they get on."

The exit or entrance to most American trains is at the front and end of each coach. The three, hearts beating fast, kept their heads low as the train steamed into Saugus. Luck favoured them. They saw three of the gang enter the middle of the train, so they got off from the last coach as the train started to move.

The Hold-up in the Air

TED decided that the only way to get to Idlewild was by air, and so they hired a car and raced off to the airport.

"The next plane to Idlewild leaves in four hours," said an official in answer to their inquiry. "One just took off."

"Can't you radio it back?" questioned Ted.

"Only if it were very important."

Ted took out his card. "I'm from the District Attorney's office. This is official business."

"Get your tickets in the next office," the official nodded. "You're practically on board."

Grant was the only passenger when the machine took off from Saugus, but he sat up quickly when the plane banked and changed direction. The relief pilot came out of his cabin to explain that they had received a radio call to return to port for some extra passengers. It would only be a short delay. The master crook got a shock when he saw that the three passengers were Ann Dawson, Ted Clark and Danny. He turned up his coat collar, pulled his felt hat over his eyes and took a seat at the back of the cabin.

"This is exciting." Ann's eyes were dancing as she stepped into the main cabin. "I've never been up in a plane before."

"Well, don't get nervous," laughed Ted. "You'll like it."

"It's a lucky thing for us we got this plane," muttered Danny, when they were seated, and the machine was well on the way to Idlewild.

"I'll be glad when we get this letter to the Governor," said Ann.

"You're not going to get it to the Governor!" drawled a voice.

"Jim Grant!" gasped Ann, and went very pale.

"Don't scream! Sit down!" Grant covered them with a gun. "I've got you all covered. We're gonna talk this thing over quietly."

"What's on your mind, Grant?" Ted demanded coolly.

"I'm going to take care of all of you." Grant's laughter was shrill and the eyes seemed to blaze. "They can only send me to the chair once, and after Bruce Dawson gets his, I don't care what happens."

"But my brother is innocent."

"He wasn't innocent of taking my girl away from me."

"That's a lie, and you know it," stormed Ann. "Why, she was through with you before she and Bruce fell in love."

"You killed that girl, Grant," interposed Ted. "And you planted the gun on Bruce Dawson; we can prove it."

"Not without that letter," Grant stepped forward. "Hand it over!"

"Not a chance." Ted had his hands at his side.

"Give it to me or I'll drill you where you stand!"

"Grant, you're insane," Ted spoke recklessly.

"I'll give it to him," Ann hastily intervened. She liked Ted too much to see him killed before her eyes. From her bag she took the all-important letter. "Here it is."

Jim Grant, for a moment, forgot caution in his anxiety to get the letter that meant life or death to him. He stepped forward and grabbed the letter, and the next second received an uppercut under the jaw that lifted him off his feet. Next moment the gun was wrenched from his hand.

"Grant, you're through!" mocked the deputy warden. "Stand up!"

Jim Grant got to his feet, but before the gun he could not do a thing, and had to submit to being lashed to his chair. Ted summoned the relief pilot, explained that he was a warden and that they had captured a desperate man. It was decided that the plane should return to Saugus.

Taxis were attached to the airport, and bundling his prisoner into a car, Ted gave orders to drive to the sheriff's offices. After leaving the airport the driver thought fit to explain that the sheriff was out hunting with the Governor.

"Then take us to the Idlewild Hunting Lodge," decided Ted, and turned to Ann. "We'll turn the letter over to the Governor and this man at the same time."

They arrived at the Idlewild Hunting Lodge, which was a sort of club for big-game hunters. The manager appeared.

"This man is a murderer," Ted pointed to his prisoner. "I want to turn him over to the authorities. Where's the Governor?"

"The Governor isn't here. He's out shooting."

"He and the sheriff are together?"

"Yes."

"What time do you expect him back?"

"He'll be back around sundown."

"But supposing he doesn't come back?" Ann was frightened.

"Please don't worry," Ted smiled reassuringly. "We have plenty of time." He turned to the manager. "Have you a place where we can lock this man up?"

The manager conducted them to the library, where Ted, with Danny's help, bound the prisoner securely to a chair, then they went out and locked the door behind them. Ted felt better when that was done. His next request of the manager was permission to place a letter of great importance in the safe. That done Ted ordered a quick meal before they set about finding the Governor and the sheriff.

Grant Escapes

COMING away from locking up the letter they encountered a good-looking maid, who saw Danny, and nearly fainted on the spot. Apparently Gertie and Danny had been engaged when Danny had gone away for a holiday against his will. Gertie had said that she was finished with Danny for ever, but at sight of him she held out her arms. Ted winked at Ann, and they left the two alone.

"Are you still in the old racket?" demanded Gertie.

"Honey, I'm through with all that," Danny assured her. "I'm going straight—honest to goodness I am. If you'll marry me, Gertie, I'll even give up safe-breaking."

Danny had to take Gertie off to be introduced to Ann and Ted.

"Meet my future warden," Danny laughed. "I'm going to do a life stretch."

"Congratulations!" cried Ted. "Best of luck!"

"Thank you," murmured Gertie, then she looked suspiciously at her man. "Say, what brings you to Idlewild?"

"We captured Jim Grant—he's a murderer," Danny explained. "We got him locked upstairs. The manager has sent for the police."

A bell rang and Gertie asked to be excused. They were short-handed and she had to be on duty that afternoon in the reception-hall. She met the manager, who asked her to see who was at the door.

It was Gilroy and his two men. Having failed in their mission at the station they had hastened to Idlewild Hunting Lodge according to orders.

"Is Mr. Grant here?" demanded Gilroy.

"Are you the police?" asked Gertie.

Gilroy was taken aback at her question. He looked keenly at the girl, and wondered what she meant. A voice carried to him from the dining-room—a girl's laughter. It flashed to Gilroy that this must be Ann, and that his chief must have been tricked like they had been.

"Yes, we're the police," he spoke gruffly.

"I'll show you where he is. This way, please."

The three crooks followed Gertie up

Danny stooped before the safe and within a few minutes the door swung open.

the stairs and into the library. There, bound to a chair, was Grant. They began to cut his bonds, and Gertie stared in amazement.

"Aren't you the police?" she began, but got no farther. They gagged and bound the girl and locked her in a cupboard.

"I thought you guys were never going to get here," Grant rasped out. "They got wise to our game and dodged out of that train at Saugus. Got into my plane and I was taken by surprise."

"Did Ann Dawson get to the Governor?" questioned Gilroy.

"No!" Grant shook his head. "Our only chance now is to stop him from getting back here. The execution is at seven in the morning and we've got to hold the Governor till that hour. You boys get a space gun?" They handed him a deadly automatic. "The manager pointed out the direction taken by the Governor, and we'll go get him. Come on, let's get out of here."

Their meal finished, Ann, Ted and Danny crossed the hall to set out in their search for the Governor.

"Help, help, help!"

"That's Gertie!" exclaimed Danny, and dashed up the stairs.

They found the girl in a state of collapse in the cupboard. She had managed to free her mouth from the gag. She told them how she had mistaken three men for police.

"They released Grant, and I heard them say they were going to stop the Governor from getting back here."

"This is a show-down—we need guns," Ted rapped out. "Let's call the manager and see if he can help us."

The manager said that he had two revolvers that he kept in the safe. They called out the combination to Danny, who felt just like a criminal as he worked on the lock. The manager placed himself and his car at their disposal, and not many minutes after Grant and his men had left another car was speeding through the woods.

The Fight Among the Trees

GRANT and his men had gone some distance when they sighted, from a hill a car down in the valley. The Governor and the sheriff were returning.

The murderer ordered his men to get out of the car and to stand around as if the car had broken down.

"I want the car in such a position that they have to slow," ordered Grant. "I'll wave to the Governor to stop. Have your guns ready if the old bird shows trouble."

Naturally the Governor slowed his car when he saw the other car and a man waving to him to stop. Neither he nor the sheriff had any idea that in these peaceful woods they were to be held up.

Grant came round to the driver's side. "Are you the Governor?"

"Yes."

Grant pulled out a gun.

"Then get out of the car!"

"What's the meaning of this?" spluttered the elderly sheriff.

"Never mind—you'll find out soon enough—get out!"

"How dare you!" began the Governor.

"This'll mean—"

"Get out!" snarled Grant. "I'm kinda hasty at times on the trigger."

The Governor and sheriff obeyed the curt command. Grant asked Gilroy to look in the car for some rope to secure their prisoners.

"What do you want with me?" demanded the Governor. "What are you going to do?"

April 11th, 1938.

"Keep you under cover for a few days," laughed Grant.

"For what reason?"

"Cut out the questioning," Grant scowled. "And if you value your skins don't try any funny stuff."

Grant had sent one of his men to watch the road and this man came panting up.

"Ann Dawson and three men are headed this way," he shouted. "They saw me."

"You boys scatter," Grant ordered. "Get behind the trees, and don't waste your lead." He nudged the sheriff. "You and the Governor come with me."

Ted Clark had seen the crook. The three men at once got out of the car. Ann was to remain in the car and keep down out of the way in case there was any firing. The manager had brought his own gun and they had plenty of ammunition.

They rounded a corner and ahead they saw the two cars.

"We've got to get busy," Ted looked round at Danny. "They're liable to get away. Listen!" They stood still and distinctly they heard dried twigs snapping under heavy feet. "They're around here some place. Let's separate."

Green, the manager, was detailed to take cover behind a tree and watch the road. Danny was to go to the right, whilst Ted decided to take a line from the cars.

Ted Clark had been on plenty of man hunts, and his keen ears were attuned to the least noise of movement among the trees. A crook darted out of hiding. The wretched fellow knew that the deputy warden and his friends were drawing in on him and his nerve had gone. He fired his gun wildly and dashed among the trees.

Grinly Ted pursued the man, and then he sighted Gilroy and another crook peering round a thick tree. Up went Ted's gun and neatly he drilled Gilroy through the shoulder. The other man fled. A gun barked—Danny had brought the crook low.

The third crook had had enough. He took to his heels and fled, leaving Grant alone with his two prisoners.

Behind a great bole of a tree Jim Grant made a final stand. The Governor and sheriff, whose arms were bound by the rope taken from the former's car, could only hug the ground and hope that all the bullets passed over their heads.

Ted and Danny closed in on the man they sought. They kept their aim high for fear of hitting the Governor and sheriff.

At last Jim Grant's ammunition gave out, and he would have fled, but Ted Clark's gun brought him down in a sprawled heap.

But the murderer was not badly hurt—only a shoulder wound.

As Ted came out of the trees Grant's arm holding the gun stiffened. But for the sharp eyes of the sheriff the young warden might have been killed. The cry of warning caused Ted to jump to one side and the bullet missed him. Before Grant could fire again both Ted and Danny had fired their guns. Jim Grant's crooked career had come to its end.

Gilroy and the other man were more scared than hurt, but Jim Grant was dead—a bullet had taken him through the heart.

"What's the meaning of all this?" the Governor demanded. "Who are you and who are those men?"

Ted passed over his card, then pointed to the prone figure. "Governor, that's the man who killed Jean Francis."

The Governor was amazed.

"You mean that Bruce Dawson is innocent?"

"That's exactly what I mean!" said Ted.

"I wish I could believe you. Have you any proof?"

"We've got Grant's confession," answered the deputy.

"Where is it?"

"At the Idlewild Lodge—in the safe. Could you come along with me, sir, and see this proof?" begged Ted. "Ann Dawson, the condemned man's sister, is with us, and she's sick with worry."

Back to the Idlewild Hunting Lodge went the Governor. The wounded gangsters were left in the hands of a very angry sheriff, who resented anyone daring to hold him up.

All difficulties were not quite over. The manager had the combination of the safe on a piece of paper, which he had given to Danny when the guns had been required. To everyone's horror Danny said he had destroyed it.

"I promised Gertie I'd never open another safe," Danny murmured unhappily. "I didn't want to be tempted so I threw the paper away."

"Can you open the safe without the combination?" asked the Governor.

"As easy as opening a sardine tin," admitted Danny. "But what will Gertie say?"

So Gertie was fetched. Of course he was to open the safe. Opening a safe to get out a valuable paper was an entirely different matter from safe-cracking. Danny stooped before the safe and within a few minutes the door swung open.

"This will certainly clear him." The Governor folded the paper and placed it in his pocket. "I shall leave at once for my office. I can assure you, Miss Dawson, that your brother will be a free man in a few hours. He will know almost at once the good news, but there are a few formalities that waste time. I advise you to return home and wait for him."

The kindly Governor departed.

Gertie took Danny firmly by the arm. "Mr. Green," she said to the manager, "you need a good man around this place, don't you?" The manager nodded. "Please give him a job, so I can keep my eye on him."

The manager was more than willing, and took the happy couple to his office to fix up all details.

"I had better take the Governor's advice and go home," Ann spoke hesitatingly when they were alone. "I should be there when Bruce gets back."

"Do you mind if I go with you?" asked Ted. "I think that Bruce and I should know each other."

"So do I." The girl laughed happily.

"Do you remember what you said to me on the train just before Danny arrived out of the skies?"

"Sure."

"You proposed to me." The girl blushed. "You offered me any part of the name of Ted Clark."

"But you only took Ted."

"I know, but I think I'll take the Clark any time you wish." She looked at him anxiously. "That is, if it isn't too much trouble."

"Trouble!" shouted Ted, and clasped Ann to his heart.

"GREAT GOD GOLD"

Hart Gets Out!

THE securities' room of the Wall Street Stock Exchange was having one of its busy days. It was a time of boom prices, and stocks were soaring.

Seated in a comfortable chair, watching the clerks chalk the prices up on a huge board, was John Hart. He seemed quite indifferent to the fact that others in the room were watching him disinterestedly.

Mostly he was motionless. Now and then he would lean slightly towards his broker and give a buying or selling order in low tones, but apart from that he did not seem to be taking even the mildest interest in the proceedings.

The door of the room suddenly opened, and a young man, with a grin that seemed to have been stuck permanently on his face, strolled in casually. One of the clerks saw him and waved.

"Hallo, Phil Stuart!" he called. "What about that drink you owe me?" "See you later," Phil replied, and threw himself into a chair at the back.

He was the financial reporter of the "Morning News," and every day he came to the exchange to make notes on the day's prices. But he did not very often come into the securities' room—there was not enough excitement there for him. He preferred the big general stock hall outside, where fortunes were made or lost in a few minutes, where big financiers crashed almost weekly, and where small men who had never been heard of before would suddenly leap to their feet and yell:

"Dono it! I've made a million!"

That, to Phil, was drama.

But he was a little tired of drama just now. During the last few weeks he had had rather too much of it. Hence his visit to the operators in Government securities and gilt-edged stocks, hoping he could get a story that for once was just a little different.

For some minutes he did not take any particular notice of anybody. Then he suddenly found himself staring at John Hart's back. There was something very quiet and cocksure about that back—something which merited further attention.

He shifted his place so that he could see John Hart's face. It was rugged and strong—the sort of face that inspires confidence.

He leaned over to a broker he knew slightly.

"Who's the guy with the mug like a sphinx?" he asked, indicating John.

The broker chuckled at the description.

"That's John Hart," he replied. "He's only been operating on this side for the last three months, but in that time he's cleaned up a fortune—all in small rises, too!"

"Thanks," said Phil. "I must get to know him."

There was a vacant chair on the other side of John. For the second time Phil changed his position. He watched John for a minute or two, then pulled out his card-case.

"Good morning, Mr. Hart!" he said. "Here's my card. I'm Phil Stuart, of the 'News.' I've heard a lot about you, Mr. Hart, and would be grateful if you'd give me an interview."

John turned his head slightly, glanced for the briefest of moments at Phil, then resumed his former position.

"Some other time," he said. "I'm busy."

"Suits me," replied Phil. "I'll stick around." He took another hard look at John and came to a quick decision about his character. "I've got a front-page position reserved for you, so it's worth a long wait."

A faint smile flickered for a while about the corners of John's mouth.

Front-page news! He had never been that before.

He leaned over and gave some inaudible directions to his broker, then stood up.

"Come to my office, Mr. Stuart," he said.

Phil followed him across the room and out through a door, grinning to himself the while. He was grinning because of his victory. Most stock-market operators were vain over their importance as news, and apparently John Hart was no exception.

John led the way to an office he rented in the building, and waved Phil to a chair. Phil disregarded the invitation, watching with amusement the show John was putting on for his benefit. John first went to the tape machine, frowned at something he saw on the ever-growing ribbon, then sat down at his desk and scribbled some notes on a pad. Finally he leaned back, his finger-tips together, and said:

"Well, Mr. Stuart, what is it you want to know?"

Phil fished in his pocket for paper and pencil, and got busy.

"I want your views, Mr. Hart, on the present stock-market boom."

John did his best to look thoughtful.

"Well—" he began, then stopped as Phil interrupted him.

"Of course," Phil went on, "there is no need for you to comment on the obvious. Like all big operators, you know that, following every boom, there is a crash. You know, too, that when the markets show signs of toppling, the big men of finance step aside and unload their holdings as fast as they can."

"That's true," John admitted. "I have always noticed—"

"And who is it that suffers?" Phil swept on. He wanted this interview his own way. "Why, the small investor; also known as the sucker. This sucker, following the lead of the big shots, buys to the limit of his savings, thinking that he, too, can make a fortune. But unfortunately, not having the advance market information of those he seeks to copy, he buys too late."

"Naturally——"
"And then what?" Phil was not even letting John say a single word that mattered. "Why, then the sucker has to get on holding his stocks on a falling market. He can't sell because there is no one who will buy, and he can't hold the market up because he's playing a lone hand and does not have the advantage of collective bargaining."

"I don't think I altogether agree——"
"Then does the cycle swing the other way. With prices crashing, the big men buy in again, hold for long as it suits them, then send values skyrocketing once more. In other words, Mr. Hart, when the big men want to buy there's a depression on, but when the suckers want to buy there's a boom. So it goes on—the rich preying for ever on the poor. Oh, boy, what an interview!"

John Hart sat stiffly in his chair. He was not inclined to interrupt now. As a comparative newcomer to the stock markets, he had found his money extraordinarily easy to make, but what Phil had just said had started him thinking.

Suddenly he became aware that Phil had stopped and was writing industriously.

"Then your theory is that a boom must always be followed by a crash?" he asked softly.

"Always," said Phil. "And if my advice is any good to you, you'll get out while the getting is good. If you don't you'll burn your fingers. I've seen plenty of this sort of thing in my time."

John rubbed his chin reflectively.
"When will that interview of mine be appearing?" he asked. "Not before to-morrow morning, I hope."

"No," said Phil. "It's for our morning's edition."

John got up and held out his hand.
"Well, thanks for looking me up, Mr. Stuart," he said. "Any time I can be of further assistance to you, don't fail to let me know."

Phil nodded and went out. John waited until the door shut behind him, then picked up his telephone and got through to his broker.

"Sell everything, Dan," he said. "I want every one of my holdings converted into liquid cash. But do it slowly—I don't want the market disturbed more than can be helped."

"What's happened?" asked the broker eagerly. "Have you heard something?"

"No—nothing in particular," John replied. "I feel that I need a rest, that's all."

And with a self-satisfied smile about his lips, he replaced the receiver on its hook.

A Proposition

WHEN, the next day, the interview with John Hart appeared in the "Morning News," it created little short of a sensation, and its effect upon the stock markets was instantaneous.

Brokers were flooded with selling orders—not from the big operators, but from the small investor. The selling orders grew in volume as they came in by telephone and telegram, and by early afternoon the markets were in a panic.

As might have been expected, it was April 11th, 1926.

the big operators this time who were left high and dry. In vain they banded together and pooled their gigantic resources in an effort to keep prices up—nothing could stem that overpowering flood.

By the end of the week the fight was over. The small investors, by dint of acting together, had won the big money battle, and John Hart was famous. The biggest newspapers and financial advisers in the country came to seek his advice and interview him, and when the news got round that he had come out of the crash with a tremendous fortune he became a national hero.

And John, just sat in his office and laughed.

But after a while he began to wonder what he could do with himself. It would not be safe to operate on the stock markets any more—if he did and the big men got to hear of it, they would combine into a syndicate to smash him.

Not that he was worrying about it. Ifa had enough to keep him in comfort for the remainder of his life. At the same time he was used to working hard, and this enforced idleness was beginning to irritate him.

Relief came in the form of a telephone call from a firm of lawyers with whom he had occasionally done business. It was the senior partner of the firm who got into touch with him—a man named Nitto.

"Hallo, John!" Nitto said. "I hear you're finding time hanging heavily on your hands. Want a job?"

John knew Nitto well, and Nitto's reputation was not of the best.

"What sort of a job?" he asked cautiously.

"A job that will bring you in money so big that you won't know how to spend it fast enough," Nitto replied. "Anyway, it won't hurt you to come over here and learn what the proposition is, will it?"

"That's true," said John, not particularly eagerly. "I'll be along in half an hour."

Punctually at the end of that time he turned the knob of Nitto's office door and walked in. He found the two lawyers waiting for him. Nitto was a fat, gross-looking man who always smoked cigars with much the air of a Rothschild, while his partner Simon was thin and wiry and wore horn-rimmed spectacles.

Nitto's face was wreathed in smiles as he saw John enter. He shook hands expansively and waved John to a chair.

"So you have come!" he said, and pulled a cigar out of his vest-pocket. "A smoke? No?" He put the cigar back again. "And now, my friend, to business."

John interrupted him.

"Before you say anything, Nitto," he said. "I think I ought to make it quite clear that if this proposition is at all shady, you can count me out. I won't touch anything that's dirty."

Nitto raised his hands in horror.

"John!" he said. "Do you think I would be mixed up in anything dishonest?"

John chose to ignore that question.

"Go ahead," he said. "Let's have it."

"Very well," said Nitto. "The position, John, is this—that, owing to the stock-market crash, hundreds of corporations that were prosperous a few months ago are now finding themselves in a tight corner. Creditors who would not have worried them before the crash are now pressing for their money, and—well, you know how it is. Very few firms, however rich, can lay their hands at short notice on sufficient funds to pay their debts. The reason is quite simple to understand—they cannot get in money that is owing to them. You follow?"

"I follow," John replied restlessly. "But why give me a lecture on elementary finance?"

Nitto leaned closer and lowered his voice. His partner Simon, his eyes glittering, came across the room and placed himself on the other side of John.

"You can see what is going to happen," Nitto continued. "Hundreds of those firms will pass into the hands of receivers. Well, we are going into the receivership business, and we want a man who is well known to the public—for instance, John—to take charge. He will be appointed receiver in certain selected cases, and——"

"Just a minute!" John held up his hand. "Who said he would be appointed receiver? That's a matter for the courts."

Nitto gave an oily smile. "Judge Simmons of the Industrial Court is a very great friend of mine," he said. "He will fix that." He put his hand on John's arm. "Don't you see, John, there is a fortune in it? We shall control the finances of every company that passes into our hands. The receivership fees will be tremendous. So long as the slump lasts, we shall make a hundred thousand dollars a month."

John looked at him suspiciously. "And how much does Judge Simmons get out of it?" he asked.

Nitto made a gesture of resignation. "Don't be like that, John," he said. "It's all perfectly above-board. If we don't get the receiverships, other folks will. Why let good business pass us by? And think, John—it will mean unlimited power, unlimited money. You would be one of the most important men in the world."

John's eyes narrowed. Without knowing it, Nitto had raised a shrewd thrust at his vanity.

"Power!" he repeated. "Unlimited money!" Then he shook his head. "I don't like it," he said suddenly. "Sorry, gentlemen, but I'm not coming in with you."

He started for the door. Simon rushed after him and barred the way. Nitto snatched up a document from his desk and followed.

"Think, John—think!" Simon implored. "You are throwing away the chance of a lifetime."

"And," Nitto added, "we split three ways. That means thirty-five thousand dollars a month for you, John."

John shook his head and endeavoured to thrust Simon aside. At that moment the door opened and a young man came in. He had a foxy face and hard eyes that were alight with triumph.

"Got it!" he said as he kicked the door shut behind him. "We've a fifty-one per cent control of creditors' votes. It's in the bag."

Nitto beamed and turned to John. "This is my son John," he said.

"Frank, meet Mr. John Hart."

Frank Nitto looked at John with reverential awe.

"John Hart!" he exclaimed. "Gosh, I never expected I would have the honour of meeting you, sir."

Again that touch to John's vanity. John smiled.

"Frank has been looking into the affairs of the Excelsior Hotel for us, John," Nitto explained. "It is in a bad way, and I'm afraid it's got to be wound up. That's the hotel owned by George Harper—I expect you've heard of him."

"Slightly," said John, and once more made to go. "Well, I wish you luck, Nitto."

He got no farther. The door opened again, and this time a girl came in. She was small and very lovely, with very dark, almond-shaped eyes.

Frank Nitto's face was transformed into a mask of tenderness, as he kissed her.

"Elena!" he exclaimed. "You are early."

John looked at her, and his heart seemed to stand still. He had never been particularly interested in women up to that moment, but there was something about Elena that got him.

He coughed and went up to them hopefully.

"I don't think we've met before, have we?" he said.

Frank Nitto looked up, his eyes suddenly suspicious.

"This lady is my wife, Mr. Hart," he said.

John smiled disarmingly.

"Even so, I should be honoured by making her acquaintance," he said.

"How do you do, Mrs. Nitto?"

Nitto senior came forward rubbing his hands.

"It is Mr. John Hart, the great financier, my dear," he said, and exchanged significant glances with Simon. "Frank, my boy, you had better slip over to the Industrial Court with those proxies and register them. Ask for a receivership. I will telephone Judge Simmons and tell him to give you an early hearing."

Frank nodded ill-humouredly, gave John another look, and then went out. Nitto spoke briefly on the telephone.

While he was doing so, Elena moved towards the door. She smiled invitingly at John and held out her hand.

"Good-bye, Mr. Hart," she said. "I am glad we have met. Perhaps we shall become great friends."

"Very great friends, I hope," said John. "And I expect we shall be seeing quite a lot of each other in the future."

She smiled again and went out. John watched the door close behind her and then turned briskly to Nitto and Simon.

"After thinking things over," he said. "I am going to change my mind. I'll come in with you on that proposition. Shall we shake on it?"

Nitto and Simon laughed joyously as they all shook hands.

Marcia Speaks Out

FRANK NITTO, as the one who did all the dirty work of the new firm, appeared before the Industrial Court an hour later and made a formal application for a receivership in respect of the Excelsior Hotel. He put in proxies showing that a majority of the creditors of the hotel wanted a receivership, and also put forward the name of John Hart as the receiver they wished to have appointed.

As a matter of course, Judge Simmons made the necessary order.

Frank, pleased with himself at the smooth way he had handled everything, went to the court office right away and obtained a summons—a document which called upon George Harper, as owner of the hotel, to hand over everything to John Hart. Then he went straight round to the hotel with the necessary witness, gained access to George Harper's office unexpectedly, and thrust the summons into the harassed hotel-owner's hand.

"Sorry, Mr. Harper," he said, grinning, "but these things will happen, you know."

George Harper appeared to be stunned. He stared at Frank like a man demented, and Frank, scared by the look, made a hurried exit.

Late that afternoon, newspapers were on sale in the streets carrying the story of George's Harper's suicide. Harper, unable to face the loss of something he had devoted a whole lifetime in building, had shot himself.

Frank was in his father's office when the news came through. He was terrified.

"Gosh, I never thought the old fool would do a thing like that!" he blubbered. "What's going to happen to me now? There'll be trouble, and the authorities will be after me."

Nitto senior hid a smile. He patted his son on the shoulder kindly.

"You're worrying yourself unnecessarily, Frank," he said. "The best thing you can do is to take a holiday somewhere—go to Europe, have a couple of weeks in Paris, then come back again. Everything will have blown over then."

He glanced at his partner Simon and closed one eye. "You'd better go alone, too—just in case you have to keep on the move for a while." He pulled out his pocket-book and extracted some notes. "Here, take this thousand dollars. One of the Cunard steamers leaves this afternoon."

Frank clutched at the notes gratefully.

"Thanks," he said. "I'll be on it. See Elena for me and explain, will you?"

"I will," promised Nitto senior, and Frank hurried out.

Nitto laughed. Simon, his forehead creased in a frown, came forward wonderingly.

"Why did you let the boy go?" he asked. "He can't get into any trouble just because Harper blows his brains out."

"I know," replied Nitto softly. "But Elena and John Hart are getting on so well together that it would be a pity to spoil things by having a husband around, wouldn't it? You see, my dear Simon, Elena is expensive, and once she induced John to start spending money on her, he will have to keep in with us in order to make more."

"But will John fall for her as hard as that?" Simon asked.

Nitto stuck a fat cigar into the corner of his mouth and lit it.

"What do you think?" he murmured. "Elena is clever, and John has just the kind of vanity a woman like that can use to her own advantage." He shook his head sadly. "Ah, me! Vanity is an expensive thing!"

Simon smiled then. He could see what Nitto was driving at.

"I think I'll have a cigar, too, Nitto," he said. "This is one of life's great moments."

Early the next morning, John Hart arrived at the Excelsior Hotel in order to take possession. He made himself known at the reception desk, and one of the attendants took him to the private lift which led to George Harper's suite.

As they reached the lift, its doors slid back and a girl came out. She was dressed in black, and her eyes reflected a deep sorrow. She paused for just a moment and looked at him, recognising him, then quickly she passed on.

John stared after her interestedly.

"Who is she?" he asked.

"Miss Marcia Harper, sir," replied the attendant. "Daughter of the late owner of the hotel."

John nodded and turned to the lift.

"Nice-looking girl," was his only comment. "Tough on her—all this business."

That was his first meeting with Marcia, but it was destined not to be his last.

For a whole month he did not see her again. During that time the firm of Nitto and Simon was fairly busy, and company after company began to pass into their hands. Money poured into their banking accounts in a never-ending stream—money that ought to have been paid out to creditors, but which had been side-tracked by John Hart as "receivership fees."

Big as John's fortune had been before, it grew bigger and bigger every day now. He took over a whole floor of the Excelsior Hotel, converted half of it into

"If my advice is any good to you," said Phil, "you'll get out while the getting is good."

luxurious offices, and the other half into magnificent living quarters.

Now and then Phil Stuart of the "News" came in to see him. John made a point of being great friends with Phil, because Phil used to print long articles about him—mostly flattering.

One day Phil strolled into the outer office of John's suite after a story. He paused by the desk of John's secretary and grinned down at her.

"Hallo, Gert!" he said. "The chief busy?"

Gert shook her head.

"No," she said. "Go right in."

Phil went right in, not noticing a girl sitting nearby, her mournful eyes following him dejectedly. It was Marcia.

"Well, John," he said, sitting himself on a corner of the desk, "what's the latest news? Anything big?"

John shook his head, smiling.

"No—nothing," he replied. "Two more companies passed into my hands since you were here last, but they're only small."

Phil looked at him admiringly.

"I don't know how you do it," he said. "If I didn't know you were dead straight, I'd start thinking there was something phoney in the racket."

John looked just a little uneasy.

"If there were anything phoney in it," he said, "I wouldn't be here now. You can be perfectly certain of that." He laughed. "It was a mirthless sound. 'I suppose I have a flair for acting as receiver to defunct companies—that's why the Court thinks it fit to appoint me each time.'"

There came a knock on the door. Gert entered with a card.

"That girl's outside again," she said. She's getting madder and madder. She states that unless you see her right away, she's going to bust her way in. What do I do?"

John took the card and read the name "Marcia Harper" on it.

"All right," he said. "I'll try to see her in a minute." He waited until Gert had gone, then turned to Phil. "Listen, Phil, I want you to do something for me." He handed Phil the card. "This wretched woman has been trying to get hold of me for a week now. She's the daughter of George Harper. Get rid of her for me, will you?"

Phil looked at the card curiously.

"What's eating her?" he asked.

"I don't quite know. I think she's got some crazy notion in her head that I'm responsible for her father's death. Take her out to tea somewhere and try to convince her that she's wrong. I might get some peace then."

Phil chuckled.

"Is she pretty?" he asked.

"She isn't exactly hard to look at," John replied.

"Then leave this to me." Phil flipped the brim of his hat. "I'm good at this sort of thing. And I'll charge the cats up to you. So long!"

He went out. Marcia was still sitting there. She half rose as he shut the door behind him, then dropped back again hopelessly.

He went up to her.

"Miss Harper?" he asked, and when she nodded went on—"Mr. Hart gave me word that he can't see you yet. He's too busy. But if there's anything I can do—Hi, what's the big idea?"

She swept him aside, her face white with anger. Before anyone could stop her, she had thrown open the door of John's office and was inside.

"You're going to listen to me, Mr. Hart," she cried fiercely. "I came here intending to discuss my father's estate with you, but as you haven't even the courtesy to see me willingly, I'm going to say something else. I've been making inquiries into these receiverships of yours, and I know that you're nothing but a cheap crook. And if it's the last thing I do, I'll break you!"

She turned and slammed out, leaving Phil gaping after her.

Phil made a quick recovery. Much as he liked John, he scented a story, and shot after Marcia like a whirlwind. He caught her by the lift and took off his hat.

"You're a dame with ideas," he said. "Let's have tea somewhere."

Marcia surveyed him contemptuously. "You're a friend of his, I suppose," she said.

"I'm a journalist first," replied Phil. "Where shall we go?"

Big Ambition

JOHN, unaware of what had been happening outside, returned calmly to his work. For half an hour he did not move from his chair. Then he was disturbed by someone entering through the door that led from his private suite. It was Elena!

He jumped to his feet, alarm on his face.

"Elena!" he said. "You mustn't come here! If anyone should find out, there would be the deuce to pay."

Elena laughed and came over to him. "There is the deuce to pay already," she said. "At least, there might be very soon. Frank suspects that I am interested in someone else. He has bought a gun!"

John passed his tongue over his suddenly dry lips.

"Does he suspect—me?" he asked. She shook her head. She seemed to be greatly amused by the whole situation.

"No, John," she replied, "he does not suspect you. But he is sure to find out one of these days."

John passed his fingers through his hair agitatedly.

"Heavens, what a mess!" he said. She looked at him with sudden eagerness.

"John," she whispered, "you do love me, don't you?"

"You know I do," John replied.

"Then why should all this worry you?" She smiled up into his face. "After all, Frank can easily be dealt with. All you have to do is to make lots of money quickly—then we can go away together, get a divorce, and be married. It is all perfectly simple, isn't it?"

John nodded absently.

"Yes, it is all quite simple," he replied.

She clutched hold of his arm, suddenly apprehensive.

"John, you really do care for me, don't you?" she asked. "You're not just playing with me? Because if you are—"

"No, no—I'm not playing with you. And I'll see what can be done." He looked over his shoulder apprehensively. "And now you must go. I am expecting people."

"All right," she said, reassured. "I will see you this evening, John?"

John nodded, and she went away again.

For a long time after that, John paced up and down his office, his hands behind his back, thinking. The fact of the matter was, he was tired of Elena now, and would be glad of any opportunity to get rid of her.

But to do that he would have to leave New York and go somewhere where she could never find him. He would have to do it quickly, too, because if Frank ever got to find out—well, he was the sort of emotional fool who would stop at nothing. Even murder!

John shivered, and racked his brains for a way out.

The idea came to him late in the afternoon. He had paused by the window, and a sky-sign had suddenly lit up over the way. It said—

CONTINENTAL UTILITIES

His eyes glittered. He swung away from the window and picked up his phone.

"Get me Nitto and Simon!" he shouted.

He resumed his pacing while the connection was made, then sat down again at his desk.

"Nitto?" he said. "Listen, I want you and Simon to come over here first thing to-morrow morning. Get here at nine. I have something big for you both. Understand?"

He hung up again, went to his private suite, and changed from his business-clothes into something more comfortable. Then he returned to his desk and began planning his last great coup.

Sharp to time the next day, Nitto and Simon arrived. They found John waiting for them, his expression brisk.

"Well, John, what is the big news?" Nitto asked cheerfully.

By way of reply John opened a drawer in his desk and took out two thick wads of notes. He placed them in a neat stack before Nitto and Simon.

"That is your share to date," he said. "Twenty-three thousand dollars odd—a very satisfactory return for only a few weeks' work. Incidentally, that ends our old arrangement."

Nitto's eyes narrowed.

"What do you mean—that ends our old arrangement?" he asked.

"Just what I say," said John. "Hitherto we have been splitting three ways while I have been doing all the work. In future we split only two ways. I take half; the other half you can divide up between you."

Simon's face went purple.

"You can't do a thing like this, John," he said. "It isn't ethics."

"Nor is our racket," John snapped. "It's a dirty game from top to bottom, and as I'm taking the biggest risks I'm going to have the biggest cut."

Simon turned to Nitto and spread out his hands resignedly.

"I always said we ought to have had a contract with him," he groaned. "Not that we could have enforced it in any court, but it would have at least involved the three of us so that we couldn't double-cross each other. He's got us where he wants us."

Nitto grunted, his eyes on John's face. His expression was far from pleasant.

"Well, maybe it's our fault for trusting you, John," he said. "You're ambitious, and sooner or later this was bound to happen. But before we put any more business your way we want something in black and white. I'm not grumbling at the way you're fixing things, mind—you've made for both of us far more than we anticipated—but there isn't going to be any more pinching of terms. Get it?"

John laughed. He had been wanting them to say something like that.

"Come here a minute," he said, and walked to the window. He pointed to the sky-sign. "You see that?"

"Continental Utilities," Nitto said. "Well?"

"Get that concern into my hands, and I'll sign anything you want."

Nitto gasped.

"John, you're mad," he said. "Continental Utilities! Why, it's too big. It controls power companies, railways—" goodness knows what else. It's beyond us."

"Is it?" John's eyes were gleaming. "Could it pay all its debts in liquid cash if pressed? Could it?"

"No," admitted Nitto, "I don't suppose it could. But who would press it?"

"Who would have pressed those other companies that are now under our control had we not secured creditor-proxies?" John retorted. "That is your side of the business, Nitto. Pull this off, and I'll personally guarantee each of you a cool fifty thousand dollars. Do I need to say any more?"

Nitto turned slowly to Simon, and the two lawyers stared at each other wonderingly. Then Simon suddenly snapped his fingers.

"We'll do it," he said. "Goodness knows how, but we'll do it."

John held out his hand. "When you have," he said, "bring me your agreement, and I'll sign it."

Nitto sighed wistfully. "You're a hard man, John," he muttered, "but you certainly do know how to bring in the dough. Seeing that we're completely in your hands, we can't grumble, I suppose." He chuckled ohlessly. "But we're not being caught again, John. Everything must be in black and white after this."

John saw them out and closed the door after them. Then he returned to his desk, smiling.

"There isn't going to be any after, Nitto," he murmured to himself. "But you're not going to know that—yet!"

Evidence

It was Frank Nitto who was put on to the Continental Utilities job. It was the kind of concern whose stock was mainly held by small investors, and during the weeks that followed Frank went round to these people, and by vaguely hinting that something was wrong with the concern got their signatures to the necessary proxies. Creditors, too, listened to his persuasive words, and gave their proxies also.

John during all this time had completely forgotten about Marcia and Phil Stuart. But they had not forgotten about him. And when Phil heard what Marcia had been able to find out about the receivership racket he threw his whole weight into the task of bringing it to an end.

Using the resources of his paper he did not take long to hear of the plot against Continental Utilities. Having heard, he went along to see the concern's president, a man named Dupont.

In the course of time Frank Nitto succeeded in getting sufficient proxies to be able to appear before the Industrial Court. Almost automatically Judge Simmons granted him the necessary summons, which he took back to John Hart.

The following morning John, armed with the summons, went to the Continental Utilities Corporation offices and asked to see Dupont. He was shown in at once, to find Dupont waiting for him.

John showed the summons.

"I'm sorry about this, Mr. Dupont," he said, doing his best to look it. But there was no hiding the triumph in his expression.

Dupont shrugged his shoulders. "That's all right," he said. "I'd heard something of the sort was likely to happen. If the creditors and stockholders want it that way, it's their business." He bowed. "I formally relinquish control to you."

John stared at him, puzzled. "But surely you are staying on?" he said. "I am only appointed to super-viser. You will continue in office as usual, won't you?"

Dupont shook his head.

"Quite unnecessary," he said. "My secretary has the whole situation at her finger-tips, and will tell you anything you want to know. Besides, sir, I have been my own master all my life, and am too old now to start taking orders from anyone. I wish you a very good day."

He thrust past John and went out. John laughed and went to the desk, where he pressed a button for the secretary.

He did not recognise her at first when she came in.

"Good morning," he said. "I've seen you before somewhere, I think! Haven't I, Miss—Miss—"

"Harper—Marcia Harper," was the quiet reply.

"Of course," John nodded. "You were very angry with me once, and uttered all kinds of threats, didn't you?"

Marcia nodded.

"I'm afraid I did," she said ruefully. "But I've forgotten all that now. You must forgive me, Mr. Hart, but I was upset by my father's death."

"That's all right," said John. "I'm glad to see you have taken things so sensibly, and are now getting on in the world. You have a very good job here, you know."

The bell of the house telephone went. Marcia answered it, then turned to John.

"Two gentlemen to see you, Mr. Hart," she said. "Mr. Nitto and Mr. Simon."

John frowned impatiently.

"All right—I'd better see them, I suppose," he said. "Have them come up—and while they're with me, I don't wish to be disturbed."

"Very well, Mr. Hart," she replied, and gave the necessary orders into the telephone.

John wandered across the room, lighting a cigarette and thinking about the forthcoming interview. Marcia, unnoticed by him, quietly put up the switch of the dictograph that stood on John's desk, then went out.

A moment later Nitto and Simon came in. They were in a cheerful mood—Nitto especially.

"Well, John," Nitto said, "you have got what you wanted, and I have brought along our little contract." He laughed in an oily way. "No more misunderstandings between us, eh? In future, all receiverships we get for you are on fixed terms."

Marcia, sitting at her desk in the outer office, heard every word. The dictograph, a loud-speaking telephone which is generally installed for inter-departmental use, picked up every word.

"Have you signed your copy?" John asked. "If any of us are going to sink, we all sink together."

"Here it is," said Nitto.

John signed and they exchanged copies. Then, after a few words of idle conversation, John showed the two lawyers out by a private door.

He returned to his desk and reached out towards the dictograph, intending to call Marcia in. It was then he noticed that the switch was up. He scowled at it thoughtfully, then rose and went to the door of the outer office.

"Miss Harper," he called. "Would you come in a minute?"

Marcia came in. John deliberately walked over to the window and pretended to be absorbed in lighting a cigarette.

"There are some papers that Mr. Dupont left on the desk, Miss Harper," he said. "Perhaps you'd file them away."

Marcia went to the desk and picked the papers up. She reached out towards the dictograph, intending to return the switch to its normal position, then sud-

"I'm sorry about this, Mr. Dupont," said John Hart in deep concern, but there was no hiding the gleam of triumph in his eyes.

deuly drew her hand back. Quietly she went across to the filing cabinets.

John strolled to the desk again, fully expecting the switch to be altered. When it wasn't, he got a shock. For a moment he wondered whether his sudden suspicions that Marcia had been listening had been unfounded.

It was something he couldn't be sure about.

He went to the filing cabinets and stood watching Marcia for a moment or two. Then he said:

"Miss Harper, you and I have got to be great friends. We have a great work to do together, trying to save this vast corporation from disaster. Naturally, at the moment, I am completely in the dark as to its affairs, and I look to you to explain them all to me."

"Yes, Mr. Hart," said Marcia quietly, going on with what she was doing.

"I was wondering if—" He broke off, seeing the document that was in her hand. It was the contract between him and the lawyers, and she was in the act of filing it with the other papers. In the shock of finding the dictograph switch up, he had momentarily forgotten all about it. "I'd better take charge of that," he said. "It's private."

He watched her narrowly as he took the document out of her hands, and thought he detected a tiny flicker of disappointment pass over her face.

Slowly he folded the document up and put it away in his inside pocket. Then he went on:

"I shall probably retire from active business when I have finished my work here. It is my intention to go for a trip round the world, and, of course, I should need a secretary." He moved closed to her and put a hand on her arm. "Why not come along to my place to dinner to-night and talk it over?"

She turned, her head and looked at him, her heart pounding wildly. She wanted that contract he had just signed, because with it she would be able to ruin him.

"I'd love to," she whispered softly. At that moment the door opened behind them, and Elena stood looking at them. A smile had been on her face as she came in, but when she saw them so close together it vanished. An expression of intense hatred took its place.

They sprang apart guiltily, and John was just in time to see her before the door slammed again. He passed his fingers round the inside of his collar, and laughed uneasily.

Perhaps it was just as well, he reflected. Elena would not pester him any more now. He had just come to the conclusion that Marcia was completely charming, and so far as he was concerned Elena was finished.

The Reckoning

AT seven o'clock that evening he sat in his suite waiting for Marcia to arrive. He had taken particular care that everything should be exactly right—the table appointments were the best in the Excelsior Hotel, the suite was dressed gaily with expensive flowers, and the food and wines were to be above reproach.

He heard the motor of the private lift start humming, and hurried to a mirror to straighten his tie. The lift doors slid back, and he turned with a smile of welcome on his face.

Then, abruptly, the smile died. Standing before him was Frank Nitto.

"What the devil are you doing here at this time of the day, Frank?" he snapped irritably. "I'm expecting guests, and have no desire to deal with business matters. You must leave your call for another—"

April 11th, 1936.

He broke off, suddenly frightened by the expression on Frank Nitto's face. Frank stood there like a sphinx, his right hand out of sight under his jacket.

Hastily John backed away towards the bell.

"What's the matter?" he gabbled. "What do you want?" "Stand still!"

The words whipped across the room like a pistol shot, and Frank's right hand came into view. In it was a small revolver.

John put his hands out defensively. "Stop playing the fool!" he said. "You can't come here and do things like that."

Frank advanced a couple of paces, his weapon pointed straight at John's chest.

"Your sins have found you out, Hart," he said. "Elena has told me everything. Have you anything to say before I kill you?"

John's voice became a pitiful whine. Bold as he had been when handling other people's money, he was now showing himself to be a physical coward.

"Kill me!" he muttered. "Frank, think what you're saying! If you kill me, you'll die, too. The law will see to that."

Frank shrugged his shoulders. "What do I care?" he replied. "I have nothing else to live for. Elena is already dead. Next, it will be you; then me."

John made a sudden dive for the bell. Without moving from where he stood, Frank pulled the trigger. His gun kicked, and the next instant John, his hand just underneath his heart, slid coughing into a chair.

Frank turned and walked towards the lift. Before reaching it, he stopped.

"Don't bother to inform the police," he said. "I'm going to do that myself right away."

The lift motor started whirring again. He backed into a corner behind a bureau and waited. Presently the lift doors slid back and Marcia stepped into the room. Frank laughed gently to himself, hurried into the lift unseen by her, and the next moment was gone.

Marcia walked towards John uncertainly, rather surprised that he did not get up. His face was strangely pale, and his eyes reflected pain. Yet somehow he managed to smile.

"Hallo, my dear," he said. "So you came after all!"

"Yes." She hurried over to him. "But you look ill. I'd better call a doctor."

"No, don't do that." He closed his eyes momentarily, then he opened them again. "Sit down a minute and listen."

Puzzled, she obeyed. He went on: "I want you to tell me something—truthfully, mind. Are you still trying to revenge your father's death?"

The question took her unawares. She tried to find something to say.

"I—you see—"

"All right," he interrupted. "I understand. It doesn't matter now, anyway, because I'm through with business for ever." He found himself slipping down in his chair and made an effort to pull himself together. From his pocket he took the contract he had made with Nitto and Simon. "This is what you came to get, I expect," he went on. "Take it. You're too late to do anything about me, but you'll at least be able to deal with the others who were involved."

She took the document automatically.

"Please let me do something for you," she said. "I know you must be terribly ill. Mr. Stuart is down in the lobby—he'd go for a doctor if I asked him."

John laughed. It was a dangerous thing to do, ending as it did in a fit of coughing.

"So Stuart was on your side, was he?" he said. "Tell me, are you and he—in love with each other?"

"Yes," she replied.

John nodded.

"He's a good lad," he said. "One day he'll do big things. And now, my dear, you had better go. The dinner is off. As you go through the lobby, tell the hotel manager to come up, will you?" He held out his free hand. "Good-bye—and good luck!"

Marcia took the hand and pressed it.

"Good-bye," she said, and hurried towards the lift.

But before she could even reach the lobby, John Hart was beyond human aid. His affairs had passed into the hands of the greatest Receiver of all.

Death among the clouds! War in the sky as intrepid flyers clash with the forces of organised crime! Tailspin Tommy returns to the firmament of Fame in a smashing drama that blazes its way across the Pacific to islands of hidden wealth, of lawlessness, of savagery and cannibalism. A wonder serial of unforgettable thrills, starring Clark Williams and Noah Beery, Jun.

Read This First

Tailspin Tommy, famous civilian flyer and ace of the Three Point Aerodrome, is hired by a wealthy business man named Curtis to make aerial surveys of the oil-bearing island of Nazil, in the far tropical realms of the Pacific Ocean.

Curtis is the uncle of Betty Lou Barnes, Tailspin's sweetheart, and is in partnership with Don Alvarado Casmetto, who owns most of the island of Nazil, and whose daughter Inez has been holidaying in the United States.

The services of Skeeter Milligan, Tailspin's mechanic, are also engaged by Curtis, and the party set out in two planes. But word of their approach is later conveyed to Don Alvarado's unscrupulous stepbrother, Emanuel Casmetto, who seeks to oust his kinsman from Nazil, and who is backed by Raymore, a shady American financier.

Tailspin and Skeeter fall into the hands of Emanuel and Raymore, but escape with the help of Bill McGuire, a newspaper man who has obtained a job as chef at Emanuel's stronghold, solely for the purpose of investigating Raymore's activities.

The two youngsters are also assisted by a mysterious aviator who calls himself the Eagle, and who, for some reason, makes himself their friend.

Later they visit a new oil well on Don Alvarado's property, and are present when an attack is launched by troops in the pay of Emanuel. At the same time a hostile plane shows up, equipped with bombs and manned by Garcia, a treacherous planter who has pretended to be the Don's friend.

Garcia's first bomb appears to wipe out Tailspin and Skeeter!

EPISODE 9.—

"Crossed and Double-Crossed"

Direct Hit

TO Betty Lou and Inez it seemed that the bomb from the enemy plane had burst immediately behind Tailspin and Skeeter, and sure enough, when the smoke of the explosion had cleared away, the two girls saw the prone figures of the youngsters lying huddled on the ground.

But the hole that the bomb had gouged in the earth was some considerable distance from the youthful airman and his mechanic. Actually, the missile had not fallen so close to them as Betty and Inez had imagined, and, though the concussion had swept them off their feet, they were only dazed and shaken.

With indescribable relief the girls who had taken shelter in the hut saw the two boys struggle up, and from their movements realised that they were unhurt. Then all at once, even as Tailspin and Skeeter were collecting their wits, another bomb was released by the hostile pilot in Emanuel Casmetto's plane.

It did not land anywhere near the Americans, but it struck the derrick of the new oil well that had recently been sealed by Don Alvarado's employees, scoring a direct hit that wrecked the tower and killed half a dozen miners who were grouped below the lofty structure. Into the bargain it ripped away the cap that had been clamped down over the shaft, and it ignited the petroleum that instantly gushed forth.

An immense column of angry flames leapt high into the heavens, roaring upward through the twisted ruins of the derrick, and, circling far above the oil-field, Enrico Garcia smiled a sinister smile as he surveyed the result of his grim handiwork.

Yet that smile was soon to vanish from his features, for suddenly he beheld a strange craft swooping towards him out of the clouds, a plane so distinctive in its design that there was no mistaking it.

It was the ship flown by the mysterious aviator who called himself the Eagle and who had so often proved his friendship for Don Alvarado's party! With a startling unexpectedness it had appeared once again in a moment of crisis—coming from nowhere, it seemed—and now it was racing towards Garcia at tremendous speed.

Emanuel's hireling bared his teeth and prepared for action. Confident in his own ability as a pilot, he felt no qualms, only a fierce sense of exultation. He had looked forward to an encounter with the Eagle, telling himself that he would bring the unknown ace to book and write "finis" to the man's long list of successes. And now the time was come. . . .

Meanwhile, down on the oil-field, Tailspin and Skeeter were under the fire of the enemy troops who were hidden in the woods, but as Emanuel Casmetto's forces became aware of the Eagle's presence in the sky their fusillades dwindled away.

So did the volleys of Don Alvarado's men, and there was a curious lull in the battle that had been raging in the neighbourhood of the well. True, some small amount of shooting was still kept up, but the occasional blast of a rifle only served to accentuate the tension and the quiet that had settled upon the locality.

The eyes of nearly every man, friend and foe alike, were turned heavenwards in the direction of those two 'planes up there—two 'planes whose engine-notes mingled in one deep-toned, ceaseless drone.

As for Tailspin and his mechanic, they had forgotten their previous intention of collecting hand-grenades from the oil-field arsenal and going up in their own ship to do battle with the hostile pilot. They could only stand and gaze at the enemy bomber and the craft which had challenged it.

Far overhead, a machine-gun came into play from one of the manoeuvring 'planes, its deadly chatter punctuating the hum of the motors. It was the machine-gun of the ship manned by Garcia, better known at Emanuel Casmetto's headquarters as Officer XX.

Almost in the same moment the Eagle's gun answered it with a prolonged burst of fire, discharging through the propeller-shaft of his 'plane. The fight was on, each warrior of the sky striving to rake his rival's craft with lead, each endeavouring to gain the all-important advantage of position and bring the other man fairly under his sights.

Garcia was no amateur. He had had experience in aerial combat, and handled his ship well. He was probably as skilful a pilot as ever the Eagle had met. Yet in less than five minutes Don Alvarado's mysterious ally was proving that he had the measure of his man—and Garcia, alias Officer XX, had lost the self-assurance that had marked his conduct at the beginning of the duel.

The Eagle was not only his master as an airman. He had a 'plane that out-classed the bomber which Garcia was flying. Efficient as that craft was, it seemed to lack the speed and flexibility of his opponent's, and soon the cold sweat of panic was breaking out on the Spaniard's forehead.

Five minutes ago, he had visualised the destruction of the mystery pilot. Now he was battling for his very life—desperate—"on the run"—doing all he could to keep clear of the Eagle's bullets.

It was in vain. He had imagined that he knew every trick in this stern game of dog-fighting, but the Eagle had a wider range of experience than he, and that 'plane of his was like forked lightning.

Suddenly the Eagle was behind Garcia, suddenly the wonder ship was lying close to the bomber's tail, following it like a big bird of prey in pursuit of a frantic victim. And, let loose from the machine-gun muzzle that was hidden in the propeller-shaft, a blistering hail of lead ripped along the fuselage of Garcia's ship.

A slug pierced the Spaniard's arm, and with a hoarse cry of pain he slumped in his seat. His 'plane dived, and it was only by an effort of will that he managed to lay hold of the control-stick again and steer the craft out of its headlong plunge, looking back fearfully as he did so.

Garcia's one desire now was to cry "enough" and make a landing, but he was terrified by the thought that the Eagle would chase him down with machine-gun belching murder. Garcia himself would have done that if the positions had been reversed.

The Eagle, however, was no cold-blooded slayer. He knew that Garcia had been wounded, and he could see that the man was no longer a menace. Therefore, he veered away and left Emanuel's hireling to find a landing-place.

Half-fainting from pain and loss of blood, Garcia managed to seek out the clearing where he had held a final conference with Gomez, leader of Emanuel Casmetto's troops, and before long the wounded airman was bringing his ship to a standstill beside the vehicles that had carried the column of soldiery overland. . . .

The men who had occupied those vehicles were still on the edge of the woods, whence they had opened fire on Don Alvarado's property, and, though dismayed by Garcia's defeat they believed that victory over the defenders of the oil field was still within their grasp.

The well itself was in flames. At the moment a crowd of miners in asbestos suits were rushing from one of the out-lying sheds with fire-fighting equipment. They were led by Burke, their foreman, and were determined to brave gun-play and conflagration to overcome the disaster which had been created by Garcia's last bomb.

Seeing them from the thickets on the edge of the forest, Gomez lost no time in rousing his men to action.

"Garcia's out of it, but he's done his work," he grated. "The rest is up to us! Pass the word along for a general advance. We'll sweep Don Alvarado and his crowd clean off the oil field!"

Sixty seconds later Gomez led his armed bands of soldiery from the trees in rousing style. On they came, yelling lustily, and firing from the hip as they ran, and from the shacks and store-houses where Don Alvarado and his men were ensconced there arose answering blasts of musketry, so that once again the loud tumult of battle raged across the open ground between the forest and the burning well.

The lull that had occurred during the Eagle's engagement with Garcia was at an end. The smashing uproar of countless rifle-shots filled the air and smoke gathered upon the scene—gun-smoke that merged with the black fumes which were pouring from the blazing oil well, where Burke and his party were working like Trojans.

The Irish-American and his gang of fire-fighters toiled on as if regardless of everything but the inferno they intended to quell. Meanwhile, the gun-play of their comrades in the shacks was covering them, and none but the dead and the wounded were idle. Don Alvarado himself was handling a rifle, as was Ned Curtis. Tailspin and Skeeter, out in the open, were making good use of their revolvers, and even Inez and Betty Lou were taking a hand in the action; shooting from the windows of the hut where they were installed.

Numbers of Emanuel Casmetto's hirelings bit the dust. Nevertheless, the advance continued, for the attackers could afford to suffer heavy casualties and still press home the onset with the odds overwhelmingly in their favour. It seemed, indeed, that the weaker faction which was defending the oil field must sooner or later be massacred or driven out.

But Gomez and his soldiery had reckoned without the Eagle, and all at once the mystery airman dived down on them from the clouds, flattening out when he was scarcely a hundred feet above their heads and spraying machine-gun bullets into the midst of them.

That storm of lead took heavy toll, and men fell by the dozen. The advance was checked, and the troops began to waver. Wavering, they were subjected to a fresh onfilade as the Eagle wheeled to fly over their breaking ranks again with his machine-gun chattering relentlessly.

Gomez and his men started to retreat, and the retreat developed into a panic-

In one of the cockpits they found a discarded flying helmet, and as they examined it they noticed that two crosses had been stitched to the leather.

stricken rout when the Eagle proceeded to circle above them and harass them with bombs as well as gunfire. Fleeing in abject terror, they dashed back to the woods and plunged into the depths of the undergrowth, leaving the field of battle strewn with maimed bodies.

From storehousings and dwellings came the defenders of the oil well, staring gratefully at the soaring aeroplane whose pilot had gained the day for them. Then groups of miners hastened to the aid of Burko and his gallant company, and within a quarter of an hour the fire at the shaft had been got under control and the deep bore had been "capped" again.

In the interval others of Don Alvarado's men had devoted themselves to the task of attending to the wounded, the enemy's casualties as well as their own, and it was while this work of mercy was going ahead that the Don and Curtis joined Tailspin and Skeeter.

"Have you seen the girls?" Ned Curtis panted. "Are they all right?"

"Yes, there they are," said Skeeter. "They're safe, thank heavens."

"Over there in the doorway of that hut. The two older men glanced in the direction which he had indicated, and a look of intense relief crossed their features. Then Don Alvarado raised his eyes towards the plane that was hovering high above the edge of the forest.

"It is the Eagle we must thank," he breathed. "He has saved us all. I only wish I knew who he was, and why he has chosen to befriend us."

The Eagle a Prisoner

STREAMING through the woods, Gomez and the remnants of his force reached the big clearing where they had left the vehicles which had conveyed them from Emanuel's stronghold, and it was as they blundered from the trees that they beheld Garcia standing beside his plane.

Gomez hurried across to the injured airman, and spoke in a tremulous voice.

"We thought that accursed Eagle had finished you, Officer XX," he said. "Are you badly hurt?"

"No, a flesh wound," Garcia bit out. "I shall be all right in a little while—fit enough to fly the bomber home again. What happened to you fellows?"

Gomez explained all that had occurred. His tone was that of a man who had been badly shaken, but there was a note of bitterness in it, too.

"And now there is nothing for it but to return to headquarters," he completed. "Look, my men are piling into the trucks as if they had all gone crazy. They are demoralised."

"You had better try to control them," Garcia muttered. "Meantime, I'll stay where I am until I feel up to handling my machine again. But wait, Gomez. You might leave two of your men and a first-aid kit with me. I've got to staunch this wound, or I'm liable to bleed to death."

The other acquiesced, and a short time afterwards, when Gomez led the survivors of his mobile column from the scene, Garcia was receiving medical attention from a couple of men known as José and Carlos.

The last truck in the column moved out of the clearing, and Garcia was left alone with the two soldiers who had been detailed to see to his wound. Seated with his back to the bole of a tree on the fringe of the glade, the airman grimaced and bit his lip as the orderlies treated the injury, but they had finished their work in a few minutes, and at length he rolled down his sleeve and fastened it at the cuff.

He soon felt better, and presently he made as if to rise, but in the very moment that he was pulling himself to his feet he heard the engine-note of an approaching plane, and, on looking up he saw the Eagle's ship flying towards the clearing.

For a second or two he watched it with bated breath, and then all at once he spoke tersely to José and Carlos.

"He's going to land! Quick, get under cover, both of you! This may be our chance to seize that devil!"

His companions stumbled into a clump of shrubs near by, and Garcia himself dropped flat on his face as if he had become insensible. He was still lying there in a prone attitude when the Eagle set his plane down in the clearing and swung himself from the cockpit to the ground.

As Garcia had hoped, the Eagle had failed to notice José and Carlos while he had been flying towards the glade. He had not even noticed the figure of his defeated rival, and now walked straight over to Garcia's bomber, climbing on to one of the wings and peering into the craft's two empty seats. Only when he turned to scan the clearing did he observe the body of Emanuel Casmetto's hireling.

The Eagle moved across to Garcia then, and bent over him.

"Dead or alive, you asked for what you got, old man," Garcia heard him murmur, and knew from his voice that the mysterious aviator was an American.

The Eagle stooped lower, and was in the very act of examining the Spaniard when José and Carlos sprang upon him, taking him completely by surprise and bringing him to his knees before he could offer resistance.

Garcia scrambled to his feet at once, and plucking out a revolver, covered the unknown pilot. At the same time he barked a command to the men who had felled him.

"Strip off his helmet and jacket!" he ordered.

His instructions were carried out, and the American's mask coming away with the helmet, Garcia saw the handsome, weather-beaten features of a man in the thirties; a man who was a complete stranger to him.

"So!" the Spaniard grated. "You are the Eagle, eh? Carrambo! I ought to kill you where you stand. But no, Señor Emanuel and Señor Raymore may want to ask you some questions before you are disposed of—"

He paused, and then quickly handed his revolver to José, bidding him keep a close watch on the "Americano."

"When your hand gets tired of holding the gun," he added, "let Carlos cover him. Meantime, I am going on a little journey in his plane."

"Yes, my friend, the Eagle," he said, turning to meet the steady and defiant gaze of the prisoner, "I am going to borrow your plane, together with your identity. For it has occurred to me that it would be a good idea to convince Don Alvarado beyond all doubt that I am his ally. Not that he has ever suspected me of being anything else, I might observe, but, if he thinks I am the one who has been so helpful to him, I fancy he will confide in me much more than he has done in the past."

With a glitter in his eyes the Eagle lunged towards him, only to be driven back by the gun in José's fist. Then, with a mocking smile, Garcia donned the leather jacket and the headgear that the captive had worn, carefully drawing down the mask which was attached to the helmet.

A minute later the Spaniard was in the Eagle's plane, and, although his wound was still causing him some discomfort, he made a faultless take-off that carried him high above the trees at the far side of the clearing.

Swinging southward, Garcia headed for the oil field, and during that brief flight he had an opportunity of appreciating the qualities of the machine he was handling. He had piloted many different planes, but never one with a turn of speed such as this, and, although its controls seemed a trifle strange at first, the craft became amazingly responsive to them once he had made himself familiar with them.

Arrived above the locality where the recent battle had taken place, Garcia turned into the wind and glided earthward. A little later he was bringing the ship to a standstill about a hundred yards from the wrecked oil derrick, and as it rolled to a halt he saw Don Alvarado and Curtis hurrying towards him, accompanied by Tailspin, Skeeter, Betty Lou and Inez.

They looked wildly excited, and as they came up it was clear from Don Alvarado's first words that they had recognised the plane as the one which the Eagle had flown.

"Buenos dias, señor," the Don gasped. "I—I have to thank you for your aid. But for you, my partner and I would have lost everything. Señor, I want you to know that everything I have is yours—and that is no idle statement, but a sincere expression of my gratitude."

Slowly the man in the plane raised the mask that concealed his features, and as Don Alvarado and the other bystanders beheld the countenance of their supposed ally they stared at him in astonishment.

"Señor Garcia!" Don Alvarado faltered. "My good friend!"

"Señor Garcia!" echoed his daughter Inez. "Señor Garcia! But why didn't you tell us? Why didn't you let us know you were the Eagle? Santa Maria, we didn't even know you could fly!"

Enrico Garcia smiled.

"I thought I would be of more help if Emanuel did not know I was aiding you, and, as he may have spies working for him in your camp, I decided it would be best to hide my identity even from you."

As he spoke these words he made haste to draw down the Eagle's mask again, assuming a cautious air. Then he lowered his voice guardedly.

"I have revealed myself to you now," he said, "but remember—let no one know who I am."

"You can depend on that," Tailspin broke in. "But tell me, señor, how did you pick up the trail of the dirigible—the first time we set out for Nazil?"

Garcia was quick-witted enough to give an explanation, pointing out that he had known Inez was aboard and had flown to America to keep watch and ward over her.

"I have always been devoted to Don Alvarado and anyone belonging to him, you see," he added. "I have met with such kindness from him ever since I settled here on the island of Nazil."

"And you actually flew to America, señor?" the Don interposed. "Carai, that must have been the time when you said you were going off on a cruise for your health."

Garcia fingered the scarf that was tied around his throat. He had gone for a cruise, and remembered thankfully that he had been absent from Nazil for a week or two. It was a circumstance that bore out his lying story.

"Yes, Don Alvarado," he murmured. "Er—yes, that's right. I pretended I was going for a cruise on a tramp-steamer. But tell me, how are you fixed here? Was much damage done during the fight?"

"The derrick has been smashed, as you can see," answered the Don, "and we have lost a dozen men. Poor fellows, I wish that they—"

"But the oil well?" Garcia interrupted, almost with impatience. "And all your plant?"

"The well was saved," Don Alvarado replied, "and Burke tells me that we shall soon have another derrick rigged up."

"Splendid," said Garcia, though the word was not a true expression of his thoughts. "Don Alvarado, I am happy that I have been of some service to you, and you may rest assured that I shall continue to aid you. Meanwhile, I propose to reconnoitre Emanuel's property and see what is happening there."

Thus spoke Garcia, but when he left the oil-field his destination was the clearing where the Eagle had been taken prisoner, and on arrival there in the mystery airman's plane he ordered the captive to climb into the passenger cockpit of the machine.

The Eagle was forced to obey him at the point of José's revolver, and then Garcia spoke to the two dago soldiers.

"I shall take this fellow to headquarters," he said, "and then I shall return to Don Alvarado's camp. Meanwhile, I want you men to stand guard beside my own ship until Emanuel and Raymond can send out another pilot to fly it home."

José and Carlos nodded, and a short time afterwards they were watching the Eagle's plane as it soared into the heavens again, with Garcia at the controls and the captive American in the forward cockpit.

The craft was soon out of view, but if José and Carlos could have followed its flight beyond the range of the human eye they might have witnessed an incident that spelled disaster for the man whom they knew as Officer XX.

The plane was ten miles north of the clearing in the forest when the Eagle recalled that there was a six-shooter in a pocket of the forward compartment which he occupied, and all at once Garcia found himself looking straight into the barrel of that gun.

"Bail out, feller!" the Eagle commanded grimly. "Come on, bail out! You're wearing a parachute, and you're going to use it!"

Garcia stared at him for a moment, April 11th, 1936.

and then he rose in a hesitant fashion. Next second, however, he was throwing himself towards the American, and, sprawling along the fuselage, he tried to disarm the mystery flyer.

He struck at the Eagle's wrist, but only succeeded in jarring the latter's hand so violently that the revolver went off, and suddenly Garcia was plunging into the void with blood glistening on his temple.

The bullet from the Eagle's gun had merely clipped him, yet it had scattered his wits, and as he hurtled through space with widespread hands he made no attempt to clutch the ripcord of his parachute. His mind, indeed, was still a blank when he crashed to his doom amongst the jungle trees far below.

Up in the fleecy summer clouds that were passing over the island of Nazil the Eagle took undisputed charge of the plane from which Garcia had fallen. The craft was fitted with dual control, and from the forward cockpit the American turned it in a southerly direction, intent now on making for Don Alvarado's territory.

Mistaken Identity

"I TELL you that the Eagle's name is not Garcia. I'm under oath not to reveal his true identity, but you can take it from me that he's never owned a plantation on Nazil."

The speaker was Bill McGuire, who had motored to Don Alvarado's oil-field in order to satisfy himself that Emanuel Casmetto's followers had been beaten off, and now he was in conference with Tailspin and Skeeter.

"I'm not acquainted with this fellow Garcia," he went on, "but your description of him don't tally with the Eagle. He's an impostor, that's what he is, and it's a lucky thing you happened to mention him to me."

It took him some time to convince the two youngsters that they had been fooled, and even when he had finished talking they seemed reluctant to believe that Garcia had deceived them. Nevertheless, they elected to fly northward in the hope of investigating McGuire's statement, and, after seeking out Don Alvarado and repeating all that the newspaper man had told them, they "took off" in the aeroplane that had been placed at their disposal.

Five minutes later Tailspin and Skeeter were passing over the belt of forest that separated the Don's territory from the domain of his stepbrother, and it was as they were cruising above the woods that they saw the bomber in which Garcia had raided the oil-field.

"Look!" jerked Tailspin. "There's the ship that was operating against us a while ago. See, a couple of men are hovering near it! We're going down, Skeets; but be ready to use your forty-five!"

They dived steeply, and before long their plane was coming to rest in the clearing where the bomber stood, and where José and Carlos had been left as watch-dogs.

Both the dago soldiers had lost their rifles in the rout that had followed the battle at the oil-field, but José was armed with the revolver that Garcia had given him, and he immediately opened fire on Tailspin and Skeeter. His first bullet, however, was answered by a couple of shots from the guns of the Americans, and all at once the luckless José was recoiling with a shattered head.

He and Carlos then tried to make off, but were brought to a halt by the threatening shouts of Tailspin and his mechanic, and with a sullen air they remained motionless as the newcomers alighted from their craft and approached them.

"Who does that bomber belong to?" was Tailspin's opening question.

Neither José nor Carlos seemed disposed to offer a reply, but a significant movement of the young ace's revolver helped to loosen their tongues, and little by little the two Americans obtained vital information that bore out McGuire's words.

True, there was no mention of Garcia, for José and Carlos only knew him as Officer XX. But they told of the Eagle's capture, and admitted that Officer XX had borrowed the Eagle's identity for the purpose of fooling Don Alvarado.

"Skeets," said Tailspin, turning to his mechanic, "this proves that Mac was right, and Garcia is a double-crossing spy, sure enough."

Skeeter nodded, and then he and his chum ordered the two dago soldiers to make themselves scarce, after which the youngsters moved across to the bomber.

In one of the cockpits they found a discarded flying helmet, and as they examined it they noticed that two crosses had been stitched to the leather.

"Officer XX, eh?" Tailspin commented. "Alias Garcia. Skeets, you're a punk aviator, but you're safe enough on a calm day. Do you think you could take that plane of ours back home?"

"Yeah," the other rejoined. "But what are you gonna do?"

"I'm going to take up this bomber here," Tailspin answered deliberately, "and I'm going to scout around in the sky for a double-crossing rat."

Skeeter was by no means anxious to part company with his friend, but Tailspin's mind was made up, and some sixty seconds later the young pilot from Three Point was soaring out of that clearing in the battle plane that had raided the oil-field.

Climbing high above the jungle, he wheeled towards the north, and it was as he did so that he beheld another craft sailing in his direction from a bank of misty clouds, a craft which he immediately recognised as the Eagle's.

But Tailspin did not know that its solitary occupant was the American mystery flyer. According to José and Carlos, Officer XX had planned to take the Eagle to Emanuel's stronghold and then return southward, and, unaware of what had occurred ten miles farther north, Tailspin imagined that the man in control of that ship was the traitor Garcia.

Pulling back the joystick of the bomber, the youngster from Three Point gained height rapidly. Meanwhile the Eagle's plane was coming on steadily, and it was comparatively close when Tailspin lined it up under the sights of the bomber's machine-gun.

"Garcia," he said between his clenched teeth, "you've asked for what I'm going to give you. You've betrayed the folk that believed you were a friend and this is your finish!"

Thus spoke Tailspin in grim soliloquy, unaware that he was taking aim at an ally.

As for the Eagle he had recognised the ship ahead of him as the one in Emanuel Casmetto's service, and was holding himself in readiness for action.

He did not know that its pilot was Tailspin Tommy—Tailspin, whose hand was even now on the trigger of the bomber's gun.

In another moment that weapon was belching fire and leaden death!

"FIGHTING SHADOWS"

declared Tim bitterly. "Either Harrison or Stalkey has killed Bob."

"He wouldn't bring him in if they had," objected Hank.

"Just what he would do to throw off suspicion," said Tim.

Quite a crowd of men streamed into the building, where the factor had Bob conveyed to a bed-room, and Father O'Donovan was summoned and attended to the patient, who, apart from a nasty bruise, had suffered nothing worse than mild concussion, while out in the big room by the counter Brad waited with those who questioned him.

Hank, filled with curiosity, informed Tim that he was going to find out what had happened, but Tim thrust a hand between the bars and held on to him.

"You're not going anywhere," he said fiercely, "until you unlock this door! Bob's down, and someone's got to act for the law!"

"Well, all right," surrendered Hank. "I'll probably get life for it, but maybe it'll be worth it."

So Tim was released, and outside the cell he looked down the deserted street and then at the depot.

"You come with me," he commanded, "and if anyone tries to interfere with what I'm going to do, you stop 'em with that old blunderbuss."

"Just what I was aimin' to do," asserted Hank.

They moved along to the depot, and they entered it just as Brad was saying: "All right, I'll tell you, boys. It's a long story, but I'll make it as short as I can."

"You don't have to tell them, Harrison," thundered Tim, striding forward. "I'll give them the truth."

The trappers stared, and Brad hooked his thumbs in his belt with a grimace.

"If Constable Rutledge was shot in your cabin," accused Tim, "he was shot either by you or your friend, Stalkey, whom you were hiding there!"

"Hiding Stalkey?" exclaimed several voices.

"Stalkey's not only the agent for the fur-raiders," said Tim, "he's one of them! So's Harrison!"

"I suppose you can prove that?" drawled Brad.

"I can! Last night I found the stolen furs in Stalkey's cabin. I was coming out of the cellar with them when you attacked me and knocked me out. When I came to you were gone—and so were the furs!"

"Your saying so doesn't prove anything."

"Not my word alone," agreed Tim, "but Hank Bascom went to your cabin afterwards for me, to see where you'd hidden those furs—and he found you were hiding Stalkey. Also, he overheard you say that you had gone to the cellar for the furs. Is that right, Hank?"

"That's what I heard," declared Hank, projecting his scrubby chin aggressively. "Back up, you muskrat! I gotta gun!"

"This morning," pursued Tim, "Constable Rutledge went out to this man's cabin to arrest him—and was hurt, either by him, or by Stalkey. And now, perhaps, you'll tell these trappers, Harrison, where you've hidden their furs?"

"That's what we want to know!" cried Jones, and several others echoed his words.

"Just how do you figure to make me talk?" Brad shouted defiantly at Tim. "More or less the same way you were going to make Stalkey talk!"

Duncan, the factor, came out from the room where Bob was lying in time to hear that statement, and it did not by any means meet with his approval.

"Careful, Tim!" he said warningly. "No agent of the law is allowed to force a confession by violence."

"I know that," returned Tim quite calmly, "but it so happens that I'm no longer an agent of the law. My enlistment expired just two days ago!"

A murmur of surprise ran round the group of men, but Brad proceeded joyfully to shed his coat.

"Well, what a long time I've been waiting for a chance like this!" he boomed. "And just to think that you asked for it yourself!"

Tim's hat flew across the big room and then he ripped off his tunic. The trappers made room for a fray that was to make history—and Hank climbed up on to the counter to obtain a really good view.

The two men, both fighting fit and both yearning to fight, advanced upon each other—and Tim sent Brad flourishing against some crates for a start.

He was up again almost instantly, and excitement reigned in the depot as the two exchanged blows—and snowshoes showered down from a rack upon them and sacks of flour were overturned.

For the better part of ten minutes the battle continued all about the floor of the depot, to the accompaniment of shouts of encouragement and the occasional dislodgment of all manner of wares.

A perfectly timed upper-cut had caught Brad under the chin and deposited him once more against the counter when the door was flung wide and Stalkey bounded in over the step with his rifle to his shoulder; and with him were the self-confessed members of his gang, also armed—Gavin, Horn, and another man named Johnson.

"Don't make any move!" snarled Stalkey malevolently. "Stick 'em up, all of you!"

Obediently the trappers raised their hands, and Tim and Brad suspended hostilities.

"Take 'em into the other room," directed Stalkey, "all but O'Hara and Harrison."

The trappers and the factor were driven away into a big store-room and its door was bolted. But Hank had jumped down behind the counter and hidden beneath it, and he was overlooked. Stalkey flung down his rifle, whipped a .45 Colt from his coat-pocket, and swept over to Tim as Gavin and Horn held him.

"Start talking, O'Hara, about those furs!" he rasped.

"What makes you think I know where they are?" asked Tim, and Brad strode up.

"Because I told him so," he shouted. "Just to help you remember, take this!"

Out shot his left to Tim's mouth, but he pulled his punch, and, in the act of delivering it, winked. Tim made a pass at him, read what was written in his eyes, and abruptly turned his attention to Gavin as his supposed opponent whirled round on Stalkey, smashed both fists into the ugly face of the little crook and knocked him flat upon his back, then struck out at Horn.

Johnson, the third man, was too bewildered by these swift happenings to do anything before Hank rose up behind the counter with his antiquated rifle, and by then Horn was on his knees and Gavin was staggering backwards before Tim's onslaught.

"Get up, you varmint, and stand against that wall before I start combing you out of my hair!" vociferated Hank.

"Go on, back over against that wall!" Stalkey was still lying inert upon the floor, but Gavin, Horn and Johnson were against the wall, with their hands in the air, when the door of the bedroom was opened and Bob Rutledge appeared on the scene with a bandaged head and a very white face.

"Say, you fellows," exclaimed Brad, wiping blood from his mouth and cheeks, but seemingly quite elated, "would you like to know where I hid them furs?"

"We certainly would," announced Bob, tottering forward; "but I must warn you, Harrison, that we'll use anything you say against you."

"I don't think so," chuckled Brad. "They're back there in that store-room with the men they belong to. I knew Stalkey would never think to look for them there!"

"B-but I don't understand," stammered Tim. "I thought you were working with Stalkey."

"I wasn't," said Brad. "I guess I was just tryin' to play both ends against the middle. I wanted to round up the gang myself and make you look silly."

Tim digested that admission while Brad grinned at him.

"D'you still think I stole that fox pelt?" he presently inquired.

"Well," drawled Brad, "I'm beginnin' to doubt it, but I'd sure like to know who did get it. It had the finest brush on it I ever saw on a female fox."

"Female!" echoed Tim, staring at him. "Why, you poor woodchuck, the one I had was a male!"

In the afternoon of that day there was quite a gathering of the community in the depot, and Brad and Hank sat side by side on the counter while Martha Harrison stood very near to Tim. Bob Rutledge, who had discarded his bandage for the occasion, took an official envelope from his pocket and addressed the company at large.

"I've asked you people to be here," he said, "at this formal presentation of the document that starts Constable Tim O'Hara on the way to fame, fortune and a career."

Amid the cheering that followed he walked up to Tim and held out the document, in question.

"I have the extreme honour," he stated, "to hand you this paper, which you refused like an idiot when I tried to give it to you before."

Tim accepted the paper, and Martha caught at his arm.

"What is it you're promoted to, Tim?" she asked eagerly.

"Whatever it is, Tim," said Bob, "let me be the first to congratulate you."

Tim gave one glance at the paper, then stiffened officially.

"Don't call me 'Tim,'" he barked. "And the next time you come into the presence of a superior officer without saluting it'll be three days in the guard-house! Remember, Rutledge, there's no room in the Service for personal issues—unless no one is looking!"

Bob saluted with much ceremony and turned his back; but all the others were looking as Tim took Martha in his arms and kissed her.

Victor McLaglen at Home

On a hilltop in the La Canada district, not far from Hollywood, is a ten-acre estate called "Fairhaven." It is the home of Victor McLaglen, and is at once among the most beautiful and unique in the film colony.

McLaglen, who has just finished "Klondike Lou," with Mac West, at Paramount, not only has a beautiful English-type home and garden on the estate, but an extensive collection of animals that is the marvel of Hollywood.

He has four riding horses, seven dogs, four cats, five deer, three cows, two goats, a dozen or so pheasants, several hundred birds, a flock of quail, two Mexican ant bears, and dozens of chickens, turkeys, ducks, geese and rabbits.

The actor's wife and daughter are both accomplished horsewomen, and have won numerous horse-show prizes with their superb mounts. They have a small training field with jumps of various sizes.

Victor's dogs include two huge Irish wolfhounds, named Granite and Brian, both of which have won ribbons. Each weighs more than 175 pounds. "Rowdy," a belligerent English sheep dog, a Scotty, two Spaniels and a Pekinese complete the kennels.

McLaglen has three deer, captured in Arizona, and two young fawns, bred and raised in captivity, that are tame enough to eat from his hand.

In a small building in one corner of the estate, McLaglen has built a complete gymnasium. Every possible type of athletic apparatus, plus a steam bath, light machines, cabinets and all modern trimmings, is included.

A swimming pool, tennis court and an outdoor play-room with various kinds of games complete the estate.

No Stone Was Left Unturned!

What did the Bastille look like? What did Paris of that day look like? What did the people there wear, eat, drink? Of what materials were their clothes, and how were they cut? Did the rooms have wallpaper, or were the walls bare? What pictures, if any, decorated the rooms?

Was the guillotine of 1789 different in construction from the guillotine of today? How were the tumbrils built which carried unfortunates to the place of execution? Did they have two wheels or four? Were the wheels solid or spoked? What sort of pavement was on the streets? What kind of shoes did people wear?

These were a few of the problems to be tackled before Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "A Tale of Two Cities" could be started on production. They are typical of the preparatory work involved on any production of this scale and accuracy. No wonder that a whole year of preliminary work was necessary before one set could be built and that the services of nearly 5,000 people in three nations were necessary.

Cameramen were dispatched to France and England to find ancient relics, old rooms which have not been changed in two centuries—old wallpaper, door-knobs, inns, houses. Hundreds of things were purchased and shipped to the studio to be used or duplicated. Thousands of other things were photographed, so that those who had to duplicate the items could be guided accurately. Detailed research in many fields was necessary—legal, accounting, property, wardrobe, architecture, casting, reading, music, drapery, engineering, hair-dressing, make-up, sound, and art.

Ancient Indian Tongue to be Heard in Film

A language that is almost forgotten to-day, and that never was spoken by more than a few thousand persons at any one period, will be heard on the screen for the first time in Wheeler and

Woolsey's new Radio Picture, tentatively titled "The Wild West."

The language in question is that of the Sac Fox Tribe, now almost extinct, but which formerly lived in what is now Illinois and Nebraska. Jim Thorpe, the famous Indian athlete, is a member of this group, and, playing the rôle of a medicine man in the film, delivers a long harangue in the Sac Fox tongue.

Incidentally, few of the fifty-odd other Indians in the picture understood Thorpe's speech, since most of them come from the Blackfoot, Cheyenne, Apache, Cherokee and Arapahoe tribes, which all have their own distinct languages.

Gary Cooper's Hat

Before Gary Cooper started work in his latest Paramount picture, "Peter Ibbotson," he put on a hat and then immediately took it off again.

It's a pet "superstition" of Gary's, for he says that he would part with almost anything he has except his battered old Stetson.

It's all because he is firmly convinced that this hat led him from a Montana ranch to the high peaks of Hollywood. He wore it when he went up to see the casting director of his first film. And he had to wear it because he hadn't enough money to buy another one.

So Gary has always a ritual that he goes through before he starts on a new picture.

He gets out the old Stetson, slams it on his head, and gazes into the mirror at it. Finally, he takes it off and carefully puts it away. Then he's ready to start a new picture.

Screen Villain "Killed" for 200th Time

The most frequently killed man in Hollywood will die his 200th death in "Special Investigator," Richard Dix's new starring vehicle for Radio Pictures.

Ethan Laidlaw, a Montana miner who left the copper fields of Butte for the gold field of Hollywood some fifteen years ago, has played in just 221 films to date, and in all but twenty-one of them he has met a villain's doom in the last reel.

Never has Laidlaw played a sympathetic rôle. Once, a long while ago in the silent era, he was cast for a hero's part opposite Evelyn Brent, but various difficulties arose and the picture was never made. Always he is seen as a "heavy," and he has died in every possible way that the super-active mind of a scenarist could conceive.

Playing with Broken Wrist

If grit is half the battle for screen success then Don Briggs, the young Universal player, is well on his way to cinematic fame.

This young man has played in three pictures, "The Adventures of Frank Merriwell," "Sutter's Gold," and "Love Before Breakfast," with a broken wrist, while keeping his affliction a secret from director, members of the cast and studio officials.

He broke his wrist while playing polo. Afraid that his mishap might cost him rôles that would mean advancement in his career, he decided to say nothing about it to studio executives. Three persons only were taken into his confidence. The doctor made a special splint with a knob which Briggs held in the palm of his hand; the make-up man aided in the deception, and the wardrobe man lengthened sleeves to his costumes to aid in hiding the injured member.

Briggs did the best acting of which he was capable, for he was suffering intense pain that was aggravated by strenuous bits of action required by the rôles he portrayed.

He has postponed the further playing of polo indefinitely!

Players Suspect Each Other in Mystery Film

Sharing an experience hitherto reserved for audiences only, players in "Moonlight Murder," now before the cameras at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, are completely in the dark as to which one of them is to be exposed in the final reel as the mysterious slayer of the picture!

The unusual situation has everyone, including the stage-hands, wagering on the outcome.

Director Edwin L. Marin is resisting all blandishments and saying nothing. He is the only one on the set who possesses the "solution" section of the script.

Lest any of the players fathom the baffling technique the killer employs for his homicide, Marin has taken the further precaution of scheduling the death scene for the final day of production.

NEXT WEEK'S BIG PROGRAMME!

KEN MAYNARD

IN

"WESTERN COURAGE"

As foreman of a "dude" ranch, Ken Baxter brings down upon himself the scorn of a beautiful heiress and decides that she needs taming; but in rescuing her from a worthless fortune-hunter both he and the girl fall into the clutches of a notorious outlaw—and Ken is unarmed! An unusual Western.

"SHADOWS OF THE ORIENT"

A gang of crooks are smuggling Chinamen into the United States via the Mexican border, and a detective on the Immigration Department vows to get the man behind the smugglers. Starring Regis Toomey and Esther Ralston.

"CAPPY RICKS RETURNS"

The grey-haired, irascible old veteran of San Francisco's dockland comes out of retirement to try to save the business he has passed over to his son-in-law. A stirring comedy drama, starring Robert McWade and Ray Walker.

Also

Another fine episode of the smashing serial of uncanny adventure:

"FLASH GORDON"

Starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers.

"This way," he explains, "the players have a very real sense of the disquiet and curiosity that they would feel if actually under suspicion and unaware of the killer's identity."

Chester Morris, who enacts a young detective in the picture, has thus far accused three of his colleagues of guilt. Madge Evans, who assists him in unravelling the crime, has pointed a stern finger at two. Leo Carrillo refuses to disclose his suspicions, contenting himself with accepting wagers on the outcome.

The picture is being produced by Lucien Hubbard and Ned Marin.

Bobby Watson Rebels

A one-boy revolt was staged recently by Bobby Watson, five years old, when he was handed the costume which he is to wear in the rôle of a peasant boy in Radie's "Mary of Scotland," starring Katharine Hopburn and Fredric March.

The garment is a smock-like costume, belted at the waist, but in Bobby's eyes it was a dress.

"I won't be a girl," Bobby announced, when an attendant from the wardrobe department attempted to put him into it. No amount of persuasion would induce him to wear the garment.

"It's a dress," he insisted, between sobs, "and I won't wear it."

It was at this point that John Ford, the director, stepped into the matter. He took Bobby over to the dressing-room of Donald Crisp, who Bobby knows and likes, and showed him Crisp attired in a kilt.

"Scotsmen wore skirts in those days," Crisp told the youngster.

"All right," said Bobby, "I'll wear 'em if you will."

Grand Opera at Last!

Does the British filmgoer want opera on the screen? For years this burning question has exercised the great minds of our film magnates, keeping them awake o' nights and turning their scanty locks prematurely grey.

One British producer, more courageous—or more reckless if you like—than the rest, has acquired the film rights of Puccini's "I Pagliacci," and will shortly put the operatic problem to a practical test.

But, alas! once again America has forestalled us, for within the next week or two there will be presented, positively for the first time on any screen, "Mickey's Grand Opera," co-starring Madame Clara Cluck, the world-famous coloratura soprano, and Signor Donald Duck, a tenore robusto of great power and range. M. Miki Mouse, the celebrated maestro whose brilliant conducting of the "William Tell" overture in "The Band Concert" will long be remembered, will wield the baton.

M. Mouse's business manager, Mr. Walt Disney, declines to divulge the name of the opera concerned, but declares that it is definitely not "I Pagliacci." "Signor Duck," he says, "is a tenor of considerable promise, but I am afraid he is not yet capable of tackling 'On with the Motley'—but for heaven's sake don't tell him I said so."

All Out of Step—Except One!

Gregory Ratoff discovered to his confusion that he can't keep step.

Ratoff, representing a Legionnaire in the 20th Century Fox production of "Under Two Flags," invariably led with his right foot when Director Frank Lloyd commanded a group of 600 movie soldiers to march.

Because every good soldier leads with his left, Gregory Ratoff beat a hob-nailed dissonance which was not very good for the camera and microphones.

When hard-as-rock John O'Hara, beset with troubles in the construction of a tunnel section of the Colorado River Aqueduct, orders a girl reporter out of camp, a landslide prevents her from going—and to that circumstance, in the end, he owes his life. A powerful drama, starring Victor Jory

The Board Decides

GREY-HAIRED James Whitney, president of the Whitney Construction Company, stabbed an ash-tray with the stub of his cigar and glanced at the expressionless face of the young man on his immediate right at the long board-room table. He and his companion had waited quite a while to be summoned into the presence of the chairman and members of the board of the Colorado River Aqueduct Syndicate, and the waiting had been a strain for Whitney, because he had much at stake.

In rather a frigid silence the chairman walked over to a relief map on the wall—a map of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, as well as of a considerable portion of the State of California.

"Here's the story, Whitney," he said, pointing a finger at the map. "Parker Dam completed at a cost of millions. Three hundred and fifty miles of canal, conduit and tunnel ready for use. Billions of gallons of water waiting to be turned into these pipes—and thirteen cities clamouring for it. But your portion, eighteen miles of tunnel, is tying up the entire project!"

"Mine's the most difficult section of the job," blurted Whitney. "You know that!"

"Yes," agreed the chairman, deserting the map to resume his seat at the head of the table, "but we've made concessions and given you plenty of time. You're still six months behind schedule."

"But that's on account of accidents," Whitney protested, "mishaps over which I have no control. Those things cause delay."

"You should have considered that before you undertook the contract," reported an elderly member of the board who sat opposite.

"You must realise, gentlemen," said Whitney, in a voice hoarse with anxiety, "that I'm taking the loss of millions of dollars if you turn this work over to someone else now."

"That doesn't answer the people who have subscribed two hundred and twenty million dollars to have this project completed," admonished the chairman.

"But I was one of the pioneers in this enterprise!" cried the contractor, jumping to his feet. "Fought for it for years—finally saw it go through. I've invested every cent I own in the world in my part of it, and now you want to see it swallow me up—ruin me!"

He sank back into his chair, and his obvious distress moved even the hard business-men with whom he had to deal.

"What do you want us to do?" inquired the chairman almost gently.

"I want to put John O'Hara, here, on the job," Whitney replied, indicating the young man on his right. "You all know his record, gentlemen. If there's a hard-rock man in the business to complete Whitney Tunnel, he's the one."

All eyes were turned upon John O'Hara, an engineer reputed to be as hard as the rock he bored and blasted, a master of men completely master of himself, despite his youth and good looks.

The chairman leaned forward.

"What have you to say, O'Hara?" he asked.

"I know the country down there," was the quiet reply. "If I didn't think I could handle it, I wouldn't undertake it."

"Give us a short extension of time," pleaded Whitney, and a man at the bottom of the table nodded approval.

"We all know Jim Whitney," he said, "and what he's been up against. We know O'Hara's reputation. Let's give him the extension he asks for."

There was a general murmur of assent, and the chairman waved a hand.

"All right, Jim," he said cordially; "let's see what you can do with it. But if your man O'Hara can't make better progress than the men before him, we'll have to turn the contract over to the next lowest bidder."

Whitney bowed and rose, and John O'Hara rose with him. They went out from the board-room and out from the office beyond it; but in the corridor Whitney stopped short.

"You see how things stand, son," he said slowly and impressively. "I'm depending on you to come through."

"I'll do the best I can," promised O'Hara.

"That's all I can ask for," Whitney clapped a hand on the young engineer's shoulder. "And don't forget," he added, "if you make it we'll tackle the next job as partners."

The second lowest bidder for the contract James Whitney so narrowly had retained was an unscrupulous man named Amos Mulhern, whose office was in another part of the city of Los Angeles.

Two hours after the momentous board meeting of the Colorado River Aqueduct Syndicate, Mulhern stood behind his desk in his own private room, talking to a tall and rather lean-faced man with close-set eyes and a clipped moustache, who worked for the Whitney Construction Company, but was also in the rival contractor's pay. Bill Anderson was his name.

"Well, the contract still evades us," growled Mulhern, "and our chances of getting it seem to be farther off than ever, now that Whitney's got an extension and this new engineer."

"Don't worry," returned Anderson, with smooth confidence. "It doesn't make much difference who Whitney sends down there. With this last time-limit on construction the contract's as good as in your hands."

"I'm not so sure about that, Anderson, with O'Hara on the job!"

"It's not the man, Mr. Mulhern," was the significant rejoinder. "It's the conditions he'll find when he gets there."

"But O'Hara has a knack of handling tough jobs," Mulhern reminded him.

"So had the three men before him, and I took care of 'em!"

Mulhern frowned and shook his head.

"Self-confidence is all very well, Anderson," he said gruffly, "but don't ever make the mistake of underestimating your man."

Anderson laughed unpleasantly.

"As his assistant," he declared, "he won't get any farther away from me than the other three did. I'll see to that!"

"I hope so." Mulhern shook hands. "Keep up the good work, and when you get that contract there'll be a cheque here waiting for you."

"Thanks," Anderson went to the door and opened it. "For that kind of money, I'd—" He broke off and looked out into the corridor to make sure there was no one within hearing distance, then said with an evil grin: "Well, read the papers and see how far John O'Hara's going to get!"

A telephone-bell rang as the door was closed, and Mulhern picked up the instrument on his desk.

"Hallo!" he said. "Yes? Managing editor of the 'Chronicle'? No, I haven't any statement to make—things are just as they were. Why, of course I want to see him complete the contract. Jim Whitney's a friend of mine. My being the next lowest bidder has nothing to do with it!"

"Yeah?" jeered a voice in his ear. "Says you!"

A Shock for Ann

DOWN went the telephone, and at the same moment Howard Egerton Hubbel, managing editor of the "Chronicle," slammed down the instrument into which he had fired that parting shot, and scowled at two reporters who had just entered his room on the fourth floor of a massive building in Hill Street.

"Oh, so you've got back, eh?" he rapped.

The two reporters, both young men, exchanged glances. Hubbel, an explosive person at all times, was evidently in a bad mood.

"Yeah," said one of them, Peter Davis by name, and jowly faced by nature. "Just arrived—and we've come straight in to see you."

Howard Egerton Hubbel rose to his full height of six feet one inch, and the floor supported his full weight of fourteen stone four ounces. He flung out a shirt-sleeved arm with a clenched fist on the end of it, and his voice travelled a lot farther than the glass-panelled partition which divided his office from the reporters' room outside it as he roared:

"And you two mugs call yourselves newspaper-men! Go down on an assignment like the Whitney Tunnel, live two weeks through a Federal investigation, and all you come back with is a squib announcing rumours of a new engineer in charge! D'you call that an angle?"

May 16th, 1936.

"Got as much as the investigators, Mr. Hubbel," protested Eddie Clark, the junior of the pair.

"That's the point, chief," supplemented Davis. "They closed the gates! There's no angle!"

Hubbel flung back a mane of greying hair with his left hand, as though to relieve some of his pent-up feelings.

"When a two-hundred-billion-dollar bond issue is floated to supply this city with water," he bellowed, "and somebody throws a monkey-wrench into the works, don't tell me there isn't any angle!"

"Well, accidents will happen," chirped Eddie Clark.

"Not regularly every two weeks, they don't!"

"The men down there say it's a hoodoo section," stated Peter Davis; whereupon Hubbel became more furious than ever.

"Hoodoos belong in your grandmother's cupboard with the bogey-man!" he vociferated contemptuously. "They're to frighten little girls with! All I know is there's been a disaster of one kind or another down there as regularly as there's been a change in the moon!"

He thumped the desk with his fist, and some papers flew off on to the floor and the inkpots danced.

"Now, there's one thing you fatheads seem to have forgotten," he went on. "This paper has sponsored that project from the very beginning. We owe it to our readers to tell them the truth about what's going on down there, and you want me to tell 'em that Whitney's behind schedule because of—of hoodoos! All I need on this paper is a couple of guys with sense enough to bring me in some news to print!"

The two reporters were speechless, afraid that they were about to be sacked.

"What are you standing there gaping at me for?" howled the managing editor. "Get out of here!"

They got out in haste, and Peter Davis closed the door. At a desk on the right Willie Dent, a weak-chinned young fellow in charge of the photographic side of the sports section of the paper, was placidly sucking an orange. At a desk on the left Ann Miller, of the woman's page, had been listening with interest to Hubbel's outburst.

She was a very beautiful girl, and a very efficient member of the "Chronicle" staff, though she had a languid air that often misled her victims. She looked up at the two reporters with a pair of impish and very dark blue eyes, and she said mockingly:

"That's right, tell him where to get off! He couldn't talk to me like that and get away with it!"

"Aw, he's cracked," growled Peter Davis, leaning against a filing-cabinet. "It'd be different if someone had scooped us on the yarn. Just a series of accidents, that's all."

"Yeah," chimed in Eddie Clark scornfully. "When somebody gets bumped off in a traffic accident, that guy thinks there's an international plot behind it!"

Ann sat back in her chair and crinkled her brows.

"Well, I don't know," she said thoughtfully. "The same thing can't keep right on happening."

"Who said it can't?" demanded Peter Davis. "A guy falls down and breaks his leg, but that doesn't say he can't do it again."

"Perhaps not," conceded Ann. "But if he slipped on the same piece of banana-peel he'd been an awful chump!" She smiled from one to the other. "Why don't you two guys admit that you're just not good enough to crack this particular nut?"

"Oh, I suppose you've got an angle?" snorted Davis.

"An angle?" scoffed Eddie Clark. "She's got a story! She's only holding out for the movie rights!"

"Well, it's a sure thing I wouldn't go down there like you did," she retorted. "I'm from the 'Chronicle,' buddy—what goes on?"

"I suppose you'd wear a disguise?" sneered Peter Davis.

"Sure," she drawled. "Why not? You two guys go down there to interview an engineer, and come back with a picture of him after he's been killed! Nice work! Say, old mother Hubbel let you off easy! Now, if I were running this rag, d'you know what I'd do?"

Abruptly the door behind her was opened, and Howard Egerton Hubbel stalked out from his room.

"Well, what?" he demanded, standing over her.

Quite calmly she tilted her head and looked sideways up at him, and quite calmly she replied:

"I'd send you down there."

Hubbel gulped and glared, then reached one of his swift decisions.

"Well, seeing I'm still running this rag," he retorted, "I'm sending you down!"

"Me!" she exclaimed in dismay.

"Yes, you! And you can take Dent with you."

Willie Dent sprang up, with a half-consumed orange in his hand and a horrified expression on his face.

"But there's no athletic sports down there," he objected.

Hubbel paid no attention whatever to him.

"Oh, but I'm on the Patterson trial," said Ann.

"That case goes to the jury tomorrow," rapped the managing editor. "They'll bring in a verdict in two hours. You can leave the next day."

He re-entered his room and slammed the door.

"Oh, you're going to love it down there," gurgled Peter Davis.

"It's only a hundred and twenty in the shade," said Eddie Clark.

"What shade?" Peter Davis grinned most irritatingly at Ann. "Now, you'll have to get yourself a nice, cool disguise! Why don't you go as a fan dancer?"

"How about a long beard?" suggested Eddie Clark. "You could be one of those wandering desert characters, and look for gold in them thar hills!"

"Oh, you're going to like tunnel work," mocked Peter Davis. "Happy diggings!"

Ann screwed up a sheet of paper and flung it at him as he went off with Eddie Clark. Willie Dent buried his mouth in his orange, then wiped his funny little moustache with the hack of his hand.

"What an assignment!" he groaned. "I wouldn't take it, if I were you!"

"What would you do?" inquired Ann. "Quit?"

"No, I'd resign."

"And then what?"

"Oh, Miss Ann," was the fervent reply, "I'd make a down payment on an orange ranch in Pomona." She spread out his arms. "Trees and fresh oranges, gardens with fresh vegetables, chickens with fresh eggs. What a life! Oh, you'd love it!"

"Before you go into the chorus," piped a boy behind him, "they're looking for you down in the dark-room."

Ann, left all by herself in that particular corner of the reporters' room, picked up a copy of the "Chronicle" still damp from the press. Headlines on the front page informed her that John O'Hara had taken over the post of chief engineer at the Whitney Tunnel, filling the vacancy caused by the accidental death of Robert Belton, his predecessor. She studied a picture of O'Hara, printed with the story, and made a grimace at it.

"I'll be seeing you," she said flippantly.

O'Hara Takes Charge

THE Whitney Construction Company's camp in the mountains was situated two hundred and fifty miles away from Los Angeles, beyond the Mohave desert. It occupied a rocky hollow, and the only road that led to it had been made by Whitney's men all the way from the little town of Indio.

This road curved and twisted like a snake between high banks, and crossed a tributary of the Colorado River on a trestle bridge, and the camp was not very far east of the bridge. It consisted of rows and rows of corrugated iron sheds, between which stretched narrow gauge railway lines that converged near the mouth of the tunnel in course of construction and disappeared into its depths. A power-house provided current with which the tunnel was lighted.

John O'Hara arrived in the camp unannounced, conversed for a while with a clerk in a shed fitted up as a two-roomed office, hung his hat upon a peg—and suddenly ran out to climb on to a "muck-car," because he had seen through the window of the office that a little motor truck to which several of such cars were attached was moving towards the tunnel.

A number of miners were on the open trucks, most of them stripped to the waist because of the heat, and they were wearing steel hats and iron-toed boots to protect their heads and feet from falls of rock. They stared at the bare-headed young man in a lounge suit who scrambled in amongst them, but O'Hara explained that he was the new engineer in charge, and concentrated his attention upon the tunnel as the trucks clattered into it.

For some considerable distance the walls and roof were one complete semicircle of reinforced concrete, then came a bare network of steel rods not yet covered with concrete, and after that the trucks ran under rough rock past a junction, and so to the end of the workings, where the din of pneumatic drills was almost deafening.

Perspiration was streaming down the chests and backs of the men who were working the drills, or "jackhammers," but they were about to be relieved by the men on the approaching trucks.

A swarthy little Italian was in charge of the main valve of the compressed air line, and beside him towered an enormous fellow, black-haired and heavy-browed, who was foreman of the shift, and therefore known as a "shifter." Dave Shane, to give him his name, was proud of his weight, which exceeded eighteen stone, and was a bully.

From the motor truck, as it came to a stand-still, a member of the clerical staff dropped to the ground and ran forward to Shane. He shouted something at the top of his voice, but the words were lost in the noise of the drills. Shane swung round on the little Italian.

"Hi, shut off that valve!" he bellowed, and, because the Italian did not hear, and did not immediately understand, gave him a push that sent him staggering against the wall of rock.

The compressed air was cut off by the shifter himself, the drills ceased to function, and in the almost uneasy silence that followed he turned to the messenger.

"Now what's eating you?" he demanded.

"Anderson wants to see you right away," was the reply. "It's very important. He's waiting for you down at the conduit."

"All right," said Shane, but Tony Moreno stood indignantly before the giant.

"Say, what's a-happen?" he asked.

"Why you push?"

"When I give an order," snarled Shane, "you pay attention."

"But I cannot hear you when the drills she's a-go," the Italian protested.

"Well, the next time you keep your eyes on me!"

"Well," said Tony, "the next time no push."

Shane gripped the little man fiercely by the collar of his shirt and smashed a massive fist into his face, knocking him down.

"Nobody gives me any of their lip around here, d'you understand?" roared the bully, holding on to the shirt-collar of his victim as though about to jerk him to his feet and strike again. "Next time you keep your eyes open and on me!"

Men on the muck-cars and men who had swarined down from them looked on without any attempt to interfere, but John O'Hara had seen and heard and disapproved. He strode over to the giant and in vice-like grip he held the fist that was raised to deliver another blow.

"Why don't you just kick him and save your hands?" he asked scathingly.

Shane let go of Tony, wrenched himself free, and turned on O'Hara like an infuriated bull.

"Visitors ain't allowed in here!" he roared.

"Maybe if I was his size," returned O'Hara, "you'd put me out?"

"Maybe I can put you out anyway!"

"Maybe."

Shane hit out, but the blow was neatly sidestepped, and a straight left caught him between the eyes, causing him to realise, as he recovered his balance, that his black-haired opponent was not one to be despised, despite his own strength.

He advanced more warily, but caught a clip on the side of the jaw that rocked him on his feet, and made him throw caution to the winds. The men over whom he played the tyrant were looking on, and he knew that they would enjoy his downfall, but he did not believe for a moment that the stranger could bring that about.

The stranger, however, proved to be a born fighter, and the battle that followed filled the onlookers with joy. O'Hara went down with a smack in the mouth that jarred his teeth, but he was up in an instant—and Shane paid for that blow.

"Why don't you just kick him and save your hands?" asked O'Hara scathingly.

Five times the shifter was sent reeling back against the rock, and his face became bruised and battered and his nose bled profusely. The thud of fists against flesh echoed and re-echoed along the tunnel, mingling with the murmurs of the men who had suffered from Shane's tyranny; but only Tony ever had any doubt as to the issue.

Finally, with a swift upper-cut to the chin that would have lifted the bully off his feet had he weighed a couple of stone less, O'Hara sent him flat on his back and unconscious.

A cheer rewarded him and, smoothing his tumbled hair with his hand, he addressed the men collectively.

"My name's O'Hara," he said. "I'm the new boss around here. When this shifter comes to, you can tell him I said he's through, and he's to get his pay and clear out of camp."

Tony Moreno ran up to him, beaming all over his face.

"Grazie, signor!" he cried ecstatically. "Grazie!"

"You run the air?" asked O'Hara.

"Oh, sure!" replied the Italian.

"Well, run it!"

"Oh, sure, I run it!" Tony almost danced over to the wheel-valve. "You bet your life I run it!"

O'Hara walked slowly back through the tunnel to the office, and in the inner room, which now was his, proceeded to go through a number of files. Shane, a very crestfallen giant, joined Bill Anderson outside the equipment warehouse some little time later, and gave him a more or less accurate account of what had happened.

"Huh!" snorted the assistant engineer. "Ten minutes after O'Hara comes on the job you get yourself fired! A lot of good you're gonna be to me now!"

"Maybe you can do something about it," suggested Shane.

"Maybe I can," said Anderson curtly.

"Listen," blustered Shane, "you've got to get O'Hara out of the way the same as the others, haven't you? Well, I'll take care of that guy—and like it."

"All you can do now," Anderson retorted, "is to hang around town till I need you. Go on, now. Get your dough and beat it out of camp."

Another Dismissal

HAVING allowed a sufficient interval for the shifter to collect his pay and set off across the trestle bridge in the direction of Indio, Bill Anderson sauntered along the railway track in the direction of the office, and he met O'Hara at the door.

"O'Hara?" he inquired pleasantly. "My name's Anderson. Sorry to have missed you when you arrived. Didn't expect you till to-morrow."

"That's all right," said O'Hara, viewing his assistant with appraising eyes.

"I heard about that Shane episode," ventured Anderson, stroking his little clipped moustache. "D'you mind my saying something?"

"Go ahead!"

"Well, from what I heard he had it coming to him all right; but he's a valuable tunnel man, and they're scarce around here."

"I'm afraid he wouldn't be much good to me, Anderson," returned O'Hara grimly. "I'd probably have him in the hospital most of the time."

The assistant engineer realised that it would not be profitable to pursue the subject of Shane's dismissal.

"Care to have a look round the office?" he asked.

May 16th, 1936.

"I don't work in an office," said O'Hara, who had changed into working clothes. "Let's see how the wheels go round—or why they don't!"

"Sure." Anderson fell into step with him and they went from one corrugated iron building to another. In the grindery the machines were idle, and there was not a man to be seen.

"Why isn't this place running?" demanded O'Hara sharply.

"Not enough work to keep a crew on," Anderson replied.

"Sounds impossible." O'Hara approached a bench on which a heap of drill-steels were lying. "Are these what they're using?"

"Yes."

Several of the steels were picked up, one after another, only to be tossed back again.

"This steel is full of flaws," said O'Hara disgustedly. "They're seconds! Doesn't this stuff crack under the heat?"

"That's another reason why this place isn't working," stated his companion. "No use sharpening them."

"No wonder each crew's only driving two feet instead of eight! Have you reported this?"

"They won't listen to me. Maybe you can do something about it."

"Yeah, maybe I can."

They visited the power-house and the stores, and then, on a motor-truck driven by a mechanic, they travelled into the tunnel. Some way beyond the junction O'Hara pointed downwards at a patch where the rails ran over metal plates instead of earth or rock.

"What's that?" he asked.

"That's where we had the bad cave-in last March," Anderson explained. "Ground gave way without warning, but those new steel liner plates seem to be holding all right."

Beyond the metal covering of the floor of the tunnel O'Hara saw something that made him ask abruptly:

"Who's the inspector here?"

"Swede Mulhousen," replied Anderson, with a frown. "Good man. Why?"

"Better get a new inspector. The ground along here looks as if it had been swelling for about a month. If he hasn't seen it by this time he'll never see it until there's another cave-in!"

The bad patch was passed, the noise of drilling grew louder, and the truck came to a standstill near the spot where Shane had met more than his match. Anderson motioned to Tony Moreno to turn off the compressed air, then addressed the men who turned to see why their work had been stopped.

"This is Mr. O'Hara, our new engineer," he announced. "I believe he's got a few words to say."

O'Hara stood up in the truck.

"Well, boys," he said, "making speeches isn't my business, and I don't intend to go through this routine with the other two shifts, so all I have to say you can pass on to the others. Now, to begin with, there's a lot of bunk being spread around about this being a jinx camp—a hoodoo section. Well, I don't believe in jinxes or hoodoos. I know that when accidents happen there's only one reason for them—negligence!"

Some of the men looked rather pointedly at Anderson, who was standing beside O'Hara, but he appeared to be unaware of the fact.

"It means," continued the new engineer, "that somebody's laying down on the job. Well, from now on that's all over, boys. Either you work and you work hard, or you get out! This section is months behind schedule, and we're going to make up that time. But that doesn't mean I expect the impossible. I won't ask any of you to do anything that I won't do myself. But between us we're going to lick this job!"

"Like you did Dave Shane?" one of the men inquired with a grin.

"Well, something like that," said O'Hara, and turned to Anderson.

"Where's that inspector?"

"Swede!" Anderson shouted. "Swede Mulhousen!"

A big, thick-lipped fellow hurried along the track to the truck from the direction of the junction.

"You Mulhousen?" asked O'Hara.

"Yeah," replied the man, with a note of defiance in his voice.

"There's a timber segment down the line a quarter of a mile that's ready to crack—looks as if it's been that way for about a month. Now if I see anything like that again, you're through! Get it fixed!"

"All right."

"Start the hammers, Tony," directed O'Hara, and the tunnel became filled with the noise of the drills once more.

That day O'Hara wrote to the head office of the Whitney Construction Company ordering all sorts of equipment which he deemed necessary, and it was not till late at night that he sought his own quarters—a two-roomed structure near the camp gates—and went to bed.

In company with Bill Anderson, two days later, he stopped short beside a machine for mixing concrete which had broken down. The man in charge of it was lousing against its platform, smoking a cigarette, which he threw away as O'Hara strode towards him.

"How long have you been running the mixer?" O'Hara inquired.

"Ever since this job started," was the reply. "Why?"

"Did it ever occur to you to use a little oil?" An accusing finger pointed.

"Those cables are rusted through!"

"I'm doing the best I can," grumbled the man.

"That isn't good enough!" snapped O'Hara. "Two days are going to be wasted getting that thing fixed!"

"Say what you like," Anderson interposed, "there is some sort of jinx on this section."

"Well, I'm going to run 'em out of camp one after another," retorted O'Hara. "Get your time, you, and clear out!"

"Huh?" The man in charge of the mixer gaped at him as though he could not believe his ears.

"You heard me!"

The fellow went off, scowling.

"Machines jamming," growled O'Hara, "drill-steel snapping, cave-ins! What a construction camp!"

"How're you gonna beat it, chief?" purred Anderson.

"I'll get new equipment down here if I have to build it myself!"

A clerk from the office came up to them.

"Mr. O'Hara," he said, "Mr. Billings, the company engineer, is waiting for you in your office."

"Thanks!" O'Hara made a grimace at Anderson. "Now comes the squawk about the new equipment I ordered," he said.

Ann Meets Her Match

ALONG the winding road from Indio a grey touring-car travelled swiftly between the high banks of rock, and Ann Miller was at the wheel and Willie Dent was sitting beside her.

"According to the signs," said Ann, "we ought to be there any minute."

"That means it's just as hot there," lamented Willie Dent. "Aw, gee, Ann, I wish we'd stopped at Pomona!"

The road presently narrowed and a board beside it informed those who approached that there was danger of falling rocks. Ann did not notice the board, but she stopped the car beside two men, bare to the waist, who were clearing away an overnight downfall of rock.

"Can we get through here?" she asked.

"Can't you read, lady?"

A grimy thumb was jerked in the direction of the board, and Willie read aloud:

"Dangerous but passable. Slide area. Beware of falling rocks." He looked at the man who had spoken. "What makes them fall, mister?"

"Someone's up there pushing them down on passing motorists, just for fun," said Ann with sarcasm, but the labourer took her seriously.

"No, lady, that ain't what happens at all," he corrected.

"No?" Ann raised her brows as though surprised.

"No; it's the blasting in the tunnel that keeps on shaking the hills, and the rocks that ain't solid, they slide."

A sudden noise as of subterranean thunder seemed to make even the roadway quiver.

"What was that?" asked Ann.

"Blasting," replied the man.

"Oh, let's get out of here!" cried Willie, but Ann, completely reassured, drove on.

Another bend was rounded, the trestle bridge was crossed, and the car sped in at the open gateway of the camp and pulled up outside the building labelled "Office."

With Willie close behind her, Ann entered the clerks' room and addressed the man who had informed O'Hara of the arrival of the company engineer.

"Like to see Mr. O'Hara, please," she said.

"He's busy," said the clerk, who was neither young nor impressionable.

"Sure he's busy," drawled Ann. "So am I! But for how long?"

"That's hard to say. I don't dare disturb him."

"Oh, is he asleep, or just resting?"

The clerk did not appreciate such levity.

"I'm afraid you'll just have to wait," he snapped.

"Okay!" Ann consulted her wrist-watch. "I'll wait fifteen minutes. If he's not out by then, I'll fire him!"

She dumped herself on a wooden seat against the wall, and Willie Dent sat down beside her. It was thirty-two minutes past twelve.

In the inner room O'Hara was seated at his desk and Steven Billings, the white-haired company engineer, was leaning forward in a chair with several sheets of paper in one hand and a half-smoked cigar in the other.

"But this requisition of yours," Billings complained, "calls for the outlay of thousands, O'Hara!"

"I'm sorry," O'Hara returned, "but I can't see any other way of driving the tunnel. I've made my figures as low as possible."

"Probably you don't understand our position. Now—"

"Wait a minute!" O'Hara raised a hand. "You talk about speed, and you don't know how to get it. Three men before me drove their crews almost beyond endurance, but that didn't remove hard rock—it only removed men! It's impossible to go on without that equipment!"

Billings flicked some ash from his cigar and pursed his lips.

"Well," he said slowly, "let's go over these figures of yours again and see if we can't cut them down a little."

Item by item O'Hara fought for the things he had ordered, and time passed. At twenty-five minutes past three Billings turned over the sheets of paper upon which the requisition had been made out. A few items had been struck through, a few quantities had been reduced, but, from his point of view, little had been gained by nearly three hours of argument.

"Well," he said ruefully, "that doesn't cut it down much."

"It's as far as I can go," declared O'Hara stubbornly.

"All right," Billings folded the sheets and pocketed them, then picked up his hat. "I'll get that new equipment down to you just as quick as I possibly can, O'Hara," he said, offering his hand.

In the outer office Willie Dent was nearly asleep, but Ann had become furiously.

"I tell you I'm not going to wait any longer!" she cried, bouncing over to the clerk. "Three hours! What does he think he is? A visiting celebrity, or something?"

"You heard me tell Mr. O'Hara you were here more than two hours ago," said the clerk.

"No wonder the tunnel isn't being built!" she stormed. "I thought they were dug under mountains, not over desks!"

Billings had opened the door to which O'Hara had accompanied him, and both of them heard that outburst.

"Friend of yours?" laughed the company engineer with an appreciative eye for indignant beauty. "Good-bye, Mr. O'Hara, and good luck. If anyone can put this through, you can!"

"If I don't," O'Hara assured him, "it won't be because I didn't try."

Billings went out to his car, and O'Hara walked over to Ann, who stood no higher than his shoulder.

"Your opinions on tunnel construction," he said with a wry little smile, "are very interesting, Miss—"

"Miller," she completed for him with an ingratiating, upward glance. "Ann Miller. Sorry for that outburst just now, Mr. O'Hara, but I've come such a long way through the hot sun to see you, and it looked for a while as if I wasn't going to get the chance after all."

O'Hara was not by any means blind to her beauty, and she gave him the impression of possessing brains; but he was not to be beguiled.

"What can I do for you?" he asked rather stiffly.

"You know you're a pretty famous man, don't you?"

"No, Miss Miller, I don't."

"But you are. Everyone's read of your exploits on the Gautemala bridge job and the Ecuador tunnel." She smiled seductively, but decided not to tell him she was from a newspaper. "I'm from the woman's magazine, 'Lovely Homes,' and I think in this magnificent task you're attempting there is a wonderful story that will appeal to every woman. The romance and the drama of the terrific battle you wage against the elements so that my lady may have her bath. Won't you take me in and show me around?"

It was excellently done, but it didn't appeal to O'Hara in the least degree.

"I can give it to you right now, Miss Miller," he said brusquely. "There isn't any romance in digging a tunnel. Just sweat, dirt, and hard work. The men are not blasting rocks so my lady can have a bath. They don't care when she bathed last, or when she'll bath again. They're working underground eight hours a day, under the most difficult conditions, just to support themselves and their families. That's the whole story."

"That's your story," said Ann, "but I'm not sticking to it, if you don't mind. Surely, if you're too busy, you can arrange for someone else to show me around?"

Willie wriggled his way to the camera-case and, in spite of bound wrists, tried to get hold of the flash-lamp which was lying on the floor.

May 16th, 1936.

"That's impossible!" barked O'Hara in a voice that caused Willie Dent to sit up with a jerk.

"Why?" she challenged.

"For one thing, these hard-rock men are very superstitious. They like a woman anywhere but in a tunnel." He took a steel hat from a peg. "If you'll excuse me."

"Oh, no, I won't excuse you at all!" she cried, standing between him and the open door. "I came a long way to get something, Mr. O'Hara, and I'm not going home without it!"

Her dark blue eyes were no longer languishing; they were full of spirit and determination. She was actually daring to match her will against his!

"Now, Miss Miller," he said, much as though he were addressing a rebellious child, "why don't you be a good girl and go on back instead of bothering people?"

"It doesn't look as though I'm getting very far by bothering some people!" she foamed.

"I'm sorry."

"Let me tell you something, Mr. Arrogant Bull O'Hara! When I go after a thing, I get it!" She tilted her head at him. "I'm not from any woman's magazine! Just pick up tomorrow's 'Los Angeles Chronicle,' and you'll see a little yarn about the slovenly inefficiency of the engineer in charge of this job that'll make your hair stand up curlier than it is now!"

"Miss Miller," said O'Hara curtly, "you can write anything you like, but do it in your own office."

He put the steel hat on his head, then lifted her up by the arms, set her down near the wall, and went out over the doorstep.

Ann, boiling with rage, yet, somehow, amused, roused Willie Dent from renewed slumbers.

"Wh-where are we?" he stammered, blinking at her like an owl.

"On our way back to Los Angeles," she replied, and tugged him to his feet.

The Landslide

OUTSIDE the door of a shed near the mouth of the tunnel, a powerfully built young man with no claim to good looks, yet with some redeeming quality about his ugly, clean-shaven face, was talking excitedly to Anderson as Ann and her companion climbed into the grey touring car.

"I tell you there's some dynamite missing!" he insisted. "You'd better phone into the tunnel and tell 'em to hold that blast!"

Anderson scowled at him.

"Don't try to teach me my business, Danny," he said angrily. "We're driving tunnel here. That shot's going off on time!"

"Better wait until we check with Mr. O'Hara," expostulated Danny Morgan.

"You're responsible for the dynamite," retorted Anderson. "You know how many boxes you gave them."

"I gave them the right amount. But I can't figure out where the rest of the stuff has disappeared to."

Danny Morgan's voice carried a considerable distance, and John O'Hara heard that last statement on his way to the workings, and hurried forward.

"What stuff's disappeared?" he demanded.

"Dynamite," Danny replied. "Somebody's broken into the magazine, and—"

"Well, stop the blast until we find out what happened to the rest of it!"

"Too late!" growled Danny and at that moment there was a deafening explosion in the tunnel, clouds of smoke belched out from it, and away beyond the gates of the camp one of the banks overhauling the road gave way.

May 16th, 1936.

O'Hara, alarmed for the safety of the girl he had told to go back to Los Angeles, raced to the scene of the landslide, shouting to some of the men as he went. The roadway between the gates and the bridge had become buried beneath a mass of broken rock and rubbish, and part of the bridge itself had been wrecked; but Ann had stopped the car in the nick of time within a few inches of a great boulder that had crashed down even as she braked.

She was drooping over the wheel, her face as white as chalk when O'Hara reached her. Willie Dent had pitched forward from his seat beside her and was doubled up on the floor.

"Are you all right?" asked O'Hara anxiously.

"I—I think so," stammered Ann, "but you might take care of my friend down there."

O'Hara turned to the men who had followed him.

"Danny and Swede," he directed, "get this chap out!"

Willie was lifted out from the car and carried off towards the camp. There were no lumps of rock in the car, and O'Hara was puzzled.

"What struck him?" he inquired.

"Nothing," Ann replied. "He fainted. He does that!"

She smoothed her hair with her hands and readjusted her hat.

"Your timing was very poor, Mr. O'Hara," she said impishly.

"What do you mean?" he exclaimed.

"I suppose you're going to deny that you planned that landslide to happen when I was under it?"

He liked her for that. Willie Dent had fainted, but she was no longer even shaken.

"Well," he said, suppressing a grin, "this road's the only way out, so it looks as if I'll have to put up with you for a while."

She thanked him mockingly, and the car was backed into the camp, and he escorted her to the office, where he gave instructions for a cabin near his own quarters to be prepared for her use.

Danny Morgan and Swede Mulhousen had not conveyed Willie to hospital, though the camp possessed one. They decided that he was quite uninjured, and at Danny's suggestion they deposited him on the ground beside a tool-shed, where Danny proceeded to slap his cheeks and to empty a pail of water over his face.

The treatment was rough, but effective. Willie presently sat up and stared about him. He remembered that he had been nursing a camera-case.

"Where's my camera?" he asked.

"Swede put it in the tool-shed for you," replied Danny with a flip of his hand; and Willie scrambled to his feet and tottered into the shed just in time to see a workman heaving the camera-case on to a high shelf.

"Say, that's my camera, you big—"

"What?" roared the workman, swinging round.

"N-nothing," stammered Willie.

Danny's grinning face vanished from the doorway because O'Hara had called to him. The chief engineer was with Anderson outside the shed in which explosives were stored.

"Who was the shifter in charge of that blast?" he demanded.

"Nick Pollack," replied Danny, and pointed to a motor-truck which was approaching from the tunnel. "Here he comes now."

The truck stopped, and a thin-faced man with a very long nose jumped down from it quite close to the group of three.

"Get your pay and get out of camp!" said O'Hara sternly.

"What for?" asked Pollack, with a side glance at Anderson. "What's the matter?"

"You know what's the matter! It's a lucky thing for you someone wasn't injured in that blast!"

"I don't know what you're talkin' about, chief."

"I've got a way of making myself clear," O'Hara rapped at him. "Get out of camp!"

Nick Pollack walked reluctantly off, and O'Hara turned to Danny and Anderson.

"Who holds the keys to the powder magazine?"

"Why," said Anderson, "I have one and Danny has the other."

"I'll take those keys!" O'Hara held out his hand, and the two keys were surrendered. "From now on I'll issue every stick of dynamite that goes into that tunnel!"

"All right," said Anderson sourly.

That evening Ann and Willie found their own way to the big mess-room on the eastern side of the camp. They were very hungry, and pleasant odours from the kitchen helped to guide them.

Forty or fifty men were seated on forms at long tables and were already eating. The clatter of knives and forks mingled with a buzz of conversation. Three negro waiters were moving about the room, collecting empty plates.

"Wouldn't you think they'd have been polite enough to wait for us?" said Willie, as he and Ann surveyed the scene from just inside the main doorway.

"S-s-h!" warned Ann. "Be quiet!"

Anderson, who had entered the room only a few moments before, jumped up from his seat at the top table and sped over to them.

"I don't think we've met before, Miss Miller," he said with a little bow, "but my name is Anderson. We have a place for you at our table. Will you join us?"

Ann thanked him, and they went to the table. A chair at the top of it was vacant, and Willie promptly appropriated it; but that chair was O'Hara's, and he was beckoned out of it by Anderson, who provided room on a form for Ann on his right and for Willie on his left. Four men in the immediate vicinity were introduced by name as members of the clerical staff.

"Shall I make a speech?" asked Willie.

"No," said Ann. "Just sit down."

They were served with food that was plain but good, and quite well cooked. Anderson cultivated Ann's acquaintance.

"Although this landslide means a lot of extra work," he said in a voice intended to be heard all over the room, "I'll bet there isn't a man here who's complaining."

"What's your position here, Mr. Anderson?" inquired Ann.

"Well, assistant to Mr. O'Hara, I guess," was the reply; and just then John O'Hara himself walked into the room, nodded distantly to the girl, and seated himself in the empty chair without a word.

Anderson held out a plate of bread to him and a waiter provided him with soup. Ann gave him her shoulder.

"Then you really work inside the tunnel, don't you?" she said to Anderson.

"Been at it for fifteen years all over the world."

"Must be thrilling, romantic," breathed Ann.

"Well, sometimes it's exciting. Sorry about the food—I guess it isn't exactly what you're accustomed to."

"The food," said Ann, whose soup-plate had been whisked away to make room for a plate of meat and vegetables, "is a little more interesting than some of the people."

O'Hara heard and was annoyed.

"Now, where's that plunger?" rasped Danny. "Look for it, Willie, and when you find it disconnect the wires."

"Perhaps you'd like the chef to bring in some caviar," he said rather spitefully. "Or maybe you'd prefer quail on toast?"

"Personally," retorted Ann, "I prefer good manners."

"On toast?"

Several of the men had looked round, but the advantage was not to be left with Ann. O'Hara raised his voice.

"Boys," he said, "I want to change the routine a little, and now seems as good a time as any to tell you about it. I want that road cleared as soon as possible to receive a shipment of supplies and equipment. Gangs working on both sides to the middle, and all hands out of the tunnel to rebuild the broken trestle and clean the place."

The workmen nodded and went on eating. Ann ate in silence for a while, then gave O'Hara a bewitching smile.

"You wouldn't be hurrying up the work just for my benefit, would you?" she inquired sweetly.

"That's not the only reason," O'Hara returned quite coldly. "but it helps."

"The Whitney tunnel seems to make men serious, doesn't it?" she said to Anderson; and O'Hara rose abruptly and went out.

Anderson, secretly amused, informed her that the Whitney tunnel was the toughest section of the whole aqueduct.

"What makes it so tough, as you put it?" she asked.

"Many things," he replied. "More than one can tell over a cup of coffee."

"Mr. Anderson," said she, "I'm terribly interested. Won't you show me around the camp after dinner?"

"Why, of course, if you like."

"Mr. Anderson," piped Willie, "has your chief any of those marvellous sun-kissed oranges from Pomona?"

Stopped!

DARKNESS had settled down upon the camp while the meal was in progress, but electric lamps gleamed here and there, and by their light Ann had no difficulty in finding her way to her cabin, there to wait till Anderson should call for her.

Willie fell in with Tony Moreno outside the mess-room, and the two became friendly. Tony offered to show the sports photographer of the "Chronicle" round the camp, and during their wanderings he produced a flask of whisky from which they both drank at intervals.

"Pretty good, eh?" said Tony, leaning against a bank of rock.

"Yeah," agreed Willie, and imbibed again. "What's that?"

Two dogs, chained up near the gates, were making a dismal row.

"The dogs," explained Tony, "always howl when the hoodoo she comes around."

"Hoodoo?" Willie handed him back the flask. "What's the hoodoo?"

"Sometimes," Tony informed him, "it's like-a da wolf—sometimes like-a da big-a bear." His voice sank to sepulchral depths. "Sometimes just big black shape."

"I—I'll meet you down in the tool-shed," stammered Willie. "I—I got to go to see somebody."

He lurched across the camp to Ann's cabin and banged on the door.

"Come in, Willie," she said, as he raised the latch and put his head into a plainly furnished room where she was combing her hair; and then, as Willie entered: "Why, you've been drinking!"

"Just a nip," he admitted. "Listen, we came down here to get a story and an angle on the accidents, didn't we? Well, I got it!"

"Where, out of a bottle?" she derided, putting down the comb.

"No, not out of a bottle! Tony told me all about it—Tony the Italian. He said there's a hoodoo—"

"Oh, you go and chase your hoodoos, Willie." She pushed him towards the door. "I've got something else to do."

Willie was bundled forth—and received in his face a fist in the act of knocking; Anderson's fist.

"What's the idea?" he demanded, but did not wait for an answer.

Anderson stared after him, and then Ann emerged from the cabin.

"What's the matter with him?" asked Anderson.

"Nothing," she replied. "Just a touch of the heat, that's all. I could do with a cooling system myself. Is it always this hot down here?"

"Why, this is some of our cooler weather," he laughed. "You should be down here when it's hot."

"No, I shouldn't! Shall we start on our tour?"

They strolled off together, visited the power-house and other places of interest in the camp, and after a while approached the tool-shed. Willie was in there with Tony, trying to get his camera-ease down from the high shelf by standing on the Italian's bent back. He managed to remove the heavy ease, but Tony could not support such a combined weight, and they both went down on the floor with a thud.

"No push!" exploded Tony, sitting up. "I told you no push. Hi, what you call-a dis?"

The camera-ease had burst open, and he had picked up Willie's flashlight.

"That's a flashlight, that is," said Willie, taking it from him. "I'll show you how it works."

The sudden blaze of light that shone through the windows of the shed—and almost instantly was gone again—startled Anderson. He dived in at the open doorway, switched on the ordinary lights, and glared at the two on the floor.

"What's that? What's going on?" he rasped.

"I was just showing Tony how my flash-bulb works," explained Willie; and Ann laughed.

"Maybe we'd better take him with us just to keep him out of trouble," she suggested. "Come on, Willie—and bring your camera."

She had coaxed Anderson to show her the inside of the tunnel, and Willie went with them to the entrance, carrying his camera and his flashlamp. But at the entrance Dany was on duty, and he stopped them.

"Sorry, Mr. Anderson," he said, stretching out his arms, "but I can't let you take them in the tunnel."

"Why not?" snapped the assistant engineer.

"Mr. O'Hara's orders."

Anderson told him curtly to get out of the way, but O'Hara himself strode out from the equipment warehouse.

"Wait a minute, Mr. Anderson!" he commanded. "You're not allowed to take visitors in the tunnel. You know that!"

"But——" Anderson began.

"I need you and Danny down at the road. Go on. I'll meet you there later."

Danny went off blithely enough; Anderson with a very ill grace. Willie disappeared in search of Tony, and Ann made a defiant little gesture at the man who had spoiled her plans.

"I thought I told you to stay in your cabin," he said.

"I couldn't," she pouted.

"Why not? Has someone been bothering you?"

"Oh, no, nothing like that! It's just that everyone has some sort of a kink, like watching ships go in and out of harbour, or chasing fire-engines. I'm an excavation wateher."

"Miss Miller," said O'Hara grimly, "I don't want to be any more disagreeable than I——"

"I'm sure you don't," she interrupted. "D'you know I've been fired from three jobs because I simply couldn't tear myself away from excavations. They fascinate me!"

"But you must go back to your cabin," he insisted. "You can't go running around the camp like this at night. It—it isn't safe."

"Oh!" She looked meekly up into his set face. "Then if it isn't safe, don't you think you should take me home?"

"No, I don't!"

"Ah, but you will, won't you?" She turned in the direction of her cabin, and in spite of himself he fell into step with her. He had never met a girl like her before, so fearless, so self-possessed, so determined to have her own way.

"Did that landslide set you back any?" she asked.

"About thirty-six hours."

"Don't you ever get discouraged?"

"I haven't time."

"Did it ever strike you that these delays might not be accidental?"

"I know they're not."

"Then why not report it to the company?"

"I have. Some time next week a couple of gum-shoe investigators will appear."

"By that time," said she, looking up at him, "you could pretty well take care of it yourself."

"You can't play detective and drive a tunnel at the same time," he growled.

"But you can't drive a tunnel unless someone else plays detective. You know some people—well, just take my business, for instance—if they don't like their jobs they quit."

O'Hara remarked that whether one quitted or not depended on the person and not on the business.

"That's the way. I feel about it," said she. "So now you can understand why I must get some angles on what's causing these accidents and some pictures of that hole in the mountain."

May 16th, 1936.

It was artfully contrived, but he was adamant.

"That's out!" he said crisply. "You can't go in that tunnel!"

"Then I'll either quit, or Hubbel will fire me."

"Who's Hubbel?"

"My boss."

"Well, if he thinks he can do any better, tell him to come down here and try it himself!"

"Don't you understand a woman's determination?" She tilted her head at him as they were passing a lighted window. "I'm going to get in that tunnel in spite of you!"

"If you do," he retorted quietly, "I'll have you thrown out."

The cabin was reached, and he opened the door for her and took off his steel hat.

"I'm beginning to think," said she, "that you're a pretty determined person."

"That makes us even," said he, holding out his hand with a grin. "I like you, too!"

The Cave-in

THE men of the night shift were still in the tunnel next morning when most of the others were at breakfast in the mess-room. Ann, at the top table with a cup of coffee in her hand, was talking to Anderson when a siren shrieked twice.

"It's an accident!" somebody cried, and the men sprang up from their seats and made for the doors.

O'Hara was one of the first to rush out into the sunlight, and he shouted orders. Mucking-cars were attached to a motor-truck, stretchers were whisked out from a shed beside the hospital and piled on one of the cars, men climbed on to the others, and O'Hara started the engine of the motor-truck.

The string of cars moved off along the track into the tunnel as Ann reached the tool-shed. She asked eagerly of a man at the door what had happened.

"Cave-in, miss," was the reply.

"Anybody hurt?"

"Can't say yet."

Another man came running over from a telephone to a group of miners who had been too late to travel on the train of trucks.

"Report just received," he announced, "is two dead and three injured."

"What caused it?" asked Ann.

"How do I know?" growled the fellow. "I wasn't there!"

Ann caught sight of Willie and dashed over to him.

"Where have you been?" she cried. "Listen, Willie; we've got to get in that tunnel. It's just what we came after—couldn't have been better if it had been staged for us!"

Willie got his camera and his flashlamp from the tool-shed, and he and Ann squeezed through the crowd that had gathered round the mouth of the tunnel, but a very tall man barred their way.

"Where d'you think you're going?" he challenged.

"Press," said Ann, and produced an official card issued by the "Chronicle."

"Press," said Willie, and produced a similar card. "You can't stop the Press, mister!"

"No," said the guardian of the tunnel, "but I can stop you. Beat it, both of you. Seram!"

Without the slightest ceremony he thrust them back, and they became engulfed by the crowd of none too friendly miners. Ten long minutes passed, and then the train that had entered the tunnel came clattering out from it and was switched on to a siding. Ann caught sight of several covered forms on the stretchers, and then there was a rush on the part of the miners to help carry the wounded across to the hospital.

Danny superintended; O'Hara jumped down from the motor-truck beside Anderson and Swede Mulhousen, and he gripped the inspector by the collar of his coloured shirt.

"The first day I arrived on this job," he thundered, "I noticed that spot when I went through the tunnel. Those lagging and timber segments were cracked. I told you to have them replaced!"

"Say, listen," protested Mulhousen; "a man can't be in three places at once. I was working somewhere else."

"That doesn't answer for the death of two men!"

"I can't help what happened to them."

"No?" roared O'Hara. "Then maybe you can help this!"

His left fist shot out like a sledgehammer, and the thick-lipped Swede went down on his back and sat up to nurse an aching jaw.

"Now get out!"

To murmurs of approval on the part of those who looked on, the ugly inspector rose up and shuffled away.

"I'm sorry about that, O'Hara," said Anderson, with a regretful shake of his head. "We should have fired that guy a long time ago."

Ann had witnessed the downfall of Swede Mulhousen and then had sped across the camp to O'Hara's office. She found it deserted, just as she had expected, and she put through a long-distance call on the telephone to the "Chronicle" office in Los Angeles.

O'Hara, who had seen her run and had suspected her intention, crossed the threshold while she was talking over the line to Howard Egerton Hubbel.

"Cave-in," he heard her say. "Unsafe section. Yeah, two men killed and three injured. Sheer negligence. That's the story you've been waiting for!"

Like lightning he streaked over to her, wrenched the telephone from her hand and banged it down on its plunger and held it there. Ann was furious, and shouted at him.

"Keep your shirt on, you big hruiser!" she cried. "Before I'm finished I'll have enough pictures to fill the rotogravure section!"

"You won't!" grieved O'Hara.

"You can't stop news!" she stormed.

"A story like this is bound to get out. There'll be a coroner's inquest. By tomorrow this place will be over-run with reporters, and they're going to get in!"

"Not if I can keep them out!"

"But that's just the point—you can't stop them!" She had cooled down sufficiently to give him a contemptuous smile.

"What are you going to do? Stand in front of a tunnel, stretch out your arms, and hold back fifty men with police cards?"

"Maybe."

"You know they're going to get in. Listen, I happened to be here first, so I'm lucky. Why don't you give me a break?"

He looked at her with scornful eyes, and he said bitterly:

"Two men have been killed and three injured who may not pull through, and all you're worried about is a story! Is that what newspapers do to a woman?"

That hurt almost more than anything else he could have said, and, ashamed and repentant, she went straight out from the office and across to the hospital. Willie had taken pictures of the wounded on the stretchers, but that she did not know till afterwards. She entered a big ward in which a spectacled doctor was bandaging the wrist of a man who had suffered only minor injuries.

There were a dozen beds in the ward, and in three of them men lay groaning.

Ann walked over to the doctor and asked if she could be of any assistance.

"I don't know," he responded doubtfully. "Have you had any experience in this sort of work?"

She confessed that she hadn't, but seemed so anxious to help that he told her she could clean a number of instruments which were lying on a glass-topped table.

"It isn't exactly a nice job," he said. "Oh, that's all right!" she declared. "I don't mind."

After she had left the office, John O'Hara used the telephone he had taken from her. He put through a call to the head office of the Whitney Construction Company, and Swede Mulhousen was passing by the open window when he heard something that caused him to crouch against the wall and strain his ears.

O'Hara hung up, and Mulhousen scurried off to find Anderson, who was down by the tunnel.

"I was just coming from the paymaster's office," the Swede informed him excitedly, "when I heard O'Hara talking to the main office over the telephone. He asked for a whole new crew, and it looks like he's gonna get it!"

Anderson made a scornful noise in his throat.

"A new crew won't do him any good after to-night," he said.

Five minutes later, O'Hara entered the hospital and was astonished to see Ann, with her sleeves pushed up over her elbows, scrubbing dirty instruments. He looked round at the occupants of the three beds.

"How are they, doctor?" he inquired. "Are they going to pull through all right?"

"Don't see any reason why they shouldn't," was the reply; and then O'Hara crossed over to Ann.

"You don't have to do that," he said gruffly. "I can get a man in."

"If you don't mind," said she, "I want to do it."

"Still looking for romance in a tunnel?"

"It's a tough break for you, isn't it?" He nodded.

"I've got to lick this job, Ann—that is, Miss Miller."

"Ann will do," she said softly, and added: "I'd like to help you."

"It's a man's job," he said, but not in any disparaging way. "Women can't help very much."

Danny Morgan looked in at the door, saw him standing very close to Ann, and walked over.

"Say, boss," he exclaimed, "there's some trouble down at the tracks! You'd better come down there!"

Where the rails converged near the entrance to the tunnel Swede Mulhousen was standing on a truck and holding forth to a considerable number of men who had gathered round.

"It ain't a question of how much they're paying, or an extra bonus, or nothing!" he cried. "They got to guarantee our safety! What's the good of an extra ten bucks this week if you ain't here to enjoy it the next? I say we oughta walk out—and when this tunnel is safe for a man to work in we'll come back, and not before!"

Several voices shouted approval.

"I was fired for something I couldn't help," Mulhousen went on. "And why? Because the blame for the cave-in had to be put on somebody's shoulders and I was the goat. Is that fair?"

"No," agreed some of the malcontents who were in league with Anderson; but Tony Moreno scrambled up on to the truck beside Mulhousen, and he vociferated:

"Dis man he only make-a da trouble!

Somebody cause all da accidents what is inside da tunnel, and Meester O'Hara he only try-a to stop dem, dat's all! I—"

Swede Mulhousen clapped a hand over his mouth and seized him by the throat with the other.

"I'm doin' the talkin' here!" he snarled.

"Leave him alone, Swede, and sit down!" shouted O'Hara, who had just arrived with Danny; and the captive was released, and Mulhousen got down from the truck in baffled rage as O'Hara mounted it.

"Now wait a minute, boys!" O'Hara said in a voice of command. "I wouldn't blame any of you for walking out, and I'm not offering alibis, but negligence was the reason for that cave-in—and you know as well as I do that we've got to plug up that cave-in, or the whole mountain will come pouring through it!"

He paused, and no one had a word to say. Willie had arrived with his cantera; Ann, unable to resist the instincts of a newspaper woman when there was any sort of story about, had run out from the hospital and joined him.

"Now when I first came here on this job," O'Hara went on, "I told you boys I wouldn't ask you to do anything that I wouldn't do myself. Well, I won't. But there's work to be done now, in the tunnel as well as on the road. I need a crew to go with me into that tunnel!"

"We'll go!" chorused the majority of the men, and O'Hara swung round on Mulhousen.

"I told you to leave camp!" he rapped. "Maybe you didn't quite get the idea—clear out!"

The Swede swaggered off towards the gates. A string of muck-cars were couple up, and the men swarmed on to them. O'Hara and Danny climbed into the motor-truck, and Ann pointed to an empty muck-car at the tail-end of the train.

"D'you think it's going to be safe in there?" whispered Willie.

"Of course," she replied.

They boarded the car and crouched down in it, but just as Danny started the train the man who had refused to let them enter the tunnel reached over from the next car and tugged at a lever.

The muck-car tilted sideways, and Ann and Willie were shot out on to the track.

"What happened?" howled Willie, sitting up and staring after the disappearing train.

"They let us off at Pomona," said Ann.

A Murderous Plot!

IT was quiet enough in the camp throughout the rest of the day, but there was activity in the tunnel and out on the road beyond the gates. Ann paid a visit to the road just before dusk, and she saw that the trestle bridge had been repaired and that the toilers in the roadway, working like niggers, had already cleared a passage wide enough for a car.

She was in her cabin, after dinner that evening, and she was packing a suitcase, when Willie banged at the door and burst in upon her.

"Ann!" he cried.

"You seem excited, Willie," she said. "I suppose you're going to tell me the road is open and we can go back to Los Angeles. I knew that an hour ago!"

"Not that," said Willie. "Tony and I have been doing a little snooping."

"Where? In a bottle again?"

"No," Willie was sober and in earnest. "Listen, we saw Anderson out behind the conduit. He and the three men O'Hara fired were holding a conference, and it wasn't any peace conference either! I couldn't get close enough to hear exactly what they were saying, but I did hear something about a meeting at the tunnel to-night."

"Why, Willie," exclaimed Ann, staring at him, "maybe you've stumbled on something. It might be the angle we've been looking for!"

"I think we ought to tell O'Hara."

She shook her head at that.

"No," she said definitely. "He'd pass it up and think I was looking for an excuse to stay here a little longer."

"But we've got to do something," insisted Willie. "We'll have to leave to-night!"

The giant seized the hand that held the gun and jerked it backwards over O'Hara's shoulder.

"You wait here till I come back."

She went out from the cabin and across the camp to the spot where the grey touring car was standing under sheets of corrugated iron supported on posts. It was almost on the edge of a bank above the river.

She reached over the side of the car to the dashboard and the self-starter buzzed, while away at the other end of the camp O'Hara knocked at the door of the cabin she had left, and entered it to find only Willie in the outer room.

"Where's Miss Miller?" he asked.

"Why, she just stepped outside," Willie replied. "Told me to wait."

"Where'd she go?"

That Willie did not know, so O'Hara waited, too; and in a little while Ann returned, a trifle breathless because she had been running.

"Oh," she said banteringly, "farewell committee of one, I suppose?"

"Something like that," returned O'Hara.

"Well, no use waiting. Willie, will you get the car?"

Willie obediently disappeared; Ann fastened her suitcase.

"I can't seem to realise I'm leaving," she said with a hint of irony. "This place has been just like home to me."

O'Hara did not want her to stay, yet somehow he did not want her to go.

"You know I'm sorry for the way I've acted, once or twice," he blurted. "Will you accept my apology?"

"I'll think about it," she said.

"Thanks. It's nice to have you leave with something to think about. I'm going to try to get up to Los Angeles next week, and—"

"My office is on the fourth floor of the 'Chronicle' Building," she cut in. "But don't you dare to come up!"

The door flew wide and Willie rushed in upon them.

"Say, what do you think's happened?" he gasped. "The car's gone over the embankment!"

"Why, that's impossible!" cried Ann.

"But it did!" howled Willie. "You can see for yourself! It's down in the river!"

"I'll take a look," decided O'Hara, and he ran out.

Ann went to a window and pressed her nose against its glass.

"Now how do you suppose that happened?" she said, watching O'Hara as he moved swiftly away into the darkness.

"I don't know." Willie had his suspicions, though he did not voice them. "I had the emergency brake on—I even had it in gear!"

Ann turned about and smiled at him.

"You don't think Mr. O'Hara did this just to keep me here, do you?" she asked.

"No, I don't," he replied emphatically. "Say, Ann, you're not falling for that guy, are you? You don't belong in a racket like this! Why don't you let me make the down payment on the orange ranch in Pomona, and—"

"At a time like this you stop to talk about an orange ranch?" she chided. "Come on!"

She caught hold of his arm and hurried him out from the cabin in the direction of the tunnel.

"That O'Hara's not the sort of guy for you," he declared, keeping pace with her because he had no option. "He's just a stiff, playing around with a lot of mountains!"

"I'll be the judge of what kind of man John O'Hara is," she retorted. "Come on, we've got things to do! There goes Anderson!"

A motor-truck had just come out from the tunnel and Anderson was driving it. He applied the brakes, a few feet from the tool-shed, and jumped down on the track with something in his left hand much the shape of a petrol can. He entered the tool-shed, and Ann and Willie scurried round some stationary trucks to the side of the building and crouched there.

Inside the shed the man who had been in charge of the concrete-mixer, until O'Hara had summarily dismissed him, was waiting with Swede Mulhousen. Anderson dumped the canister-like object on the earthen floor.

"Hi, fellows," he said in a voice that reached the alert ears of Ann and Willie, "get this plunger connected with the telephone wire. Step on it!"

Joe, late of the concrete-mixer, picked up the plunger. His companion lurched forward, and Anderson viewed him suspiciously.

"You're drunk!" he stated accusingly.

"He's all right, chief," said Joe; and the two proceeded to connect the canister to the wires of a wall-telephone.

"Nick and Shane," stated Anderson, "are coming in from the East Morengo entrance to the branch tunnel. I'm going to the junction to see if they've got the powder all set."

He went out from the shed, climbed back into the motor-truck, and went off on it back into the tunnel. Willie, crouching beside Ann, shivered.

"You know I'm not crazy about this," he whispered. "I heard somebody say the tunnel goes for miles, and there are miles of mountain on top of it! We're not going in there, are we?"

Ann pulled his car.

"Why, Willie, you're actually cold," she rebuked.

"I wish I was in Pomona," shuddered Willie.

Wires of Destruction

MOST of the debris blocking the tunnel as a result of the cave-in had been cleared away before O'Hara visited Ann's cabin, but a gang of men were still working hard to make the roof and floor secure in that particular section.

The sound of their activities, however, was quite faint at the junction, and there Nick Pollack and Dave Shane were running wires along the ground towards a telephone attached to the rough wall of rock.

Anderson stopped the motor-truck a few yards away from them and sprang down from it, completely unaware of the fact that Ann and Willie had sped along the track in the wake of the truck and were not very far behind it when he addressed his two accomplices.

"Powder all set?" he asked.

"Enough to blow the top of the mountain off," Nick Pollack assured him. "Come and look!"

He and Anderson went farther along the tunnel, while Shane completed the job of joining wires from the charge to the wires of the telephone and then concealed the charge wires beneath earth and bits of rock. Ann and Willie reached the truck, climbed into the back of it without a sound, and crouched watchfully out of sight.

Anderson came back with Shane to Pollack.

"Anybody see you come in?" he asked.

"No," said Shane. "Where's the plunger?"

"Joe and Swede have got it in the tool-shed."

Ann crawled from the back of the motor-truck into its driving-seat without being seen.

"Now here's the lay-out," explained Anderson. "When we're all set I'll get O'Hara on the 'phone and tell him there's been a big accident at the cave-in. We know how far it is from the entrance of the tunnel to the cave-in, don't we?"

"Sure," agreed Shane, "but there's a lot of guys still working there."

"Can't help about them," returned Anderson callously. "We've got to get O'Hara, and that'll be easy. We know how fast he can travel. We'll time the explosion to catch him just as he reaches the men."

"The motor of the truck was running. Ann switched into reverse."

"We've got to warn O'Hara!" she said.

The three men looked round in alarmed astonishment as the truck began to move. They saw Ann driving and Willie standing up beside her. Shane flew, caught up, and gripped the side of the truck with the intention of heaving himself aboard. But Willie stamped on his knuckles, and he let go and fell.

"I got him!" cried Willie triumphantly.

"Good work," said Ann.

Anderson had made no attempt at pursuit.

"They won't get very far!" he snarled, and on the telephone he rang up the tool-shed and spoke to Joe, explaining in as few words as possible what had happened. "Get 'em when they come out and hold 'em," he directed. "We'll be right along."

He hung up, and with Nick Pollack reached Shane just as that angry giant had risen to his feet, sucking damaged knuckles.

"When I get hold of the little rat that did this to me," exploded the sufferer, "I'll wring his blamed neck!"

"Come on!" cried Anderson impatiently. "They'll both be in the tool-shed by the time we get out—I've 'phoned Joe."

The truck rattled along through the tunnel and out from it under the stars. Ann stopped it by the equipment warehouse, and she and Willie got down on to the track.

"We've got to find Mr. O'Hara," she said—and then Joe and Mulhousen pounced on them from either side, and they were dragged off to the tool-shed, struggling violently but in vain.

"You can't do this to me!" howled Willie. "What's the matter with you? You can't do this!"

Swede, gripping him by the throat, forced him backwards against some shelving, half-choking him. Joe, not caring to treat Ann too roughly, found her more than a handful.

"You big bully, let me go!" she screamed, and kicked because her hands were held.

In at the door came the three who had been compelled to walk back from the junction, and Dave Shane snatched Ann from her captor, held her arms with one hand and clapped the other over her mouth.

"Too bad you had to get mixed up in this," Anderson said to her. "Nick, get some rope and tie 'em up!"

The prisoners' wrists were bound behind their backs and both were roped about the knees. Handkerchiefs were tied over their mouths, and they were dumped in a sitting position near one of the walls.

"I'm going to get O'Hara on the 'phone," said Anderson. "Put those lights out!"

The shed was plunged into darkness, except for such light as came through the windows, and Anderson rang up the office.

O'Hara was in his room there, and Danny Morgan was with him because

A Western range ace, with guitar and six-gun, solves a murder mystery and captures a blonde cyclone. Starring Gene Autry

"The SAGEBRUSH TROUBADOUR"

The Horse and Guitar String

TWO troubadour cowboys rode at a leisurely pace along the trail. The tall, powerful, smiling young fellow on the glorious white horse was Gene Autry, and the thick-set, clumsy, cheerful fellow on the mettlesome brown mare was "Frog" Millhouse.

On a lazy and dispirited mule were a number of musical instruments. On a squat grey horse, which had an extraordinarily shaped back, were their own personal kit. As they rode Frog twanged upon a guitar whilst Gene did the singing.

"Way out West in Texas,
That's where I long to be Riding on the prairie
With a good hoss under me.
Three long years I bummed around.
My heart is sad and blue.
I'm going back to the woolly West,
Where your friends are always true."

Here the two men sang the chorus:

"Way out West in Texas,
Where the atmosphere is light,
You roll up in your blanket
On the prairie every night.
Where the rattlesnakes and the old horn toads,
They sleep right by your side."

This is the verse that Frog contributed:

"Way out West in Texas,
When they round up in the spring
You'll hear me sing this little song
While riding on the range.
Your Broadway lights appeal to you,
But moonlight suits me fine.
I'll settle down in Texas,
And I'll leave my blues behind."

The song at an end, Frog Millhouse cleared his throat preparatory to singing a Western comedy number, but there came a nasty twang, and he realised that one of the strings of his instrument had snapped.

"You got a guitar-string?" he asked.
"There's a box of them in the pack."
"Couldn't you lend me that one in your pocket?" Frog yawned. "Just for a little while—I won't lose it."

"I'm not taking the chance of you losing it," Gene shook his head, and took out a neatly rolled piece of gut. "What would we use for evidence? This string's going to put a rope round somebody's neck—when we find the guitar it belongs to."

"Whose neck, and what guitar?"
"It's our job to find out." Gene pocketed the string, and stared towards the horizon. "The trail may be a long one, but we'll never give up. I've a hunch, Frog, we got plenty of hard work ahead."

Whether the music did not soothe Frog's brown mare and had a ruffling effect on the creature one cannot say, but it is a fact that soon after the song they parted company. The mare did a bronco-busting act and deposited Frog on the hard, stony trail. It was little consolation that his partner laughed.

"Now you've got to admit you can't handle that horse!" cried Gene. "Stay there—I'll go get him."

But the brown mare was a mover, and after going two miles or more Gene abandoned the chase. He returned to find Frog rubbing himself tenderly.

"She got away from me," Gene had to admit. "That hoss sure hated your company, for she went like the wind. She must have dodged down one of the many canyons that abound here, and as we ain't got time to organise a search you'll have to ride the swayback."

"That ain't no horse—that's a nightmare!" muttered Frog, looking gloomily at the old grey horse.

"Well, that hoss may be a nightmare, and it's sure going to give someone bad dreams," grimly answered Gene. "Don't forget that's the animal that old man Martin was riding the day he was murdered."

"And you want me to ride it, like I was old man Martin's ghost!" Frog shivered. "Guess as my hoss got away from you there ain't nothing else for it. I never thought this old rocking-chair would ever get me. I only hope I don't get seasick."

An hour later they came to a rough but well-worn trail, and Gene glanced round at his companion.

"We should hit town before night-fall." He studied a map. "This must be the trail from the railroad halt. We should reach Sandy Hook in a couple of hours provided you don't fall off the swayback or put its feet down a gopher hole."

"You can well laugh," growled Frog. "You're sitting pretty on Champion, whilst I gotta ride this—". He turned. "Say, pal, did I hear anything?"

Gene bent his head.
"You sure did. It's a coach or some sort of wagon—and they seem in a hurry."

Over the crest of the hill came a four-horse coach. A girl was in the driver's seat and the horses were going at a full gallop. For a moment Gene thought the horses had gained the mastery and that an accident was inevitable, until he heard the girl shouting encouragement—they weren't going fast enough for her.

Peering out of the coach window was a head, and the owner did not seem too happy because the vehicle was rolling and swaying through the pace and the unevenness of the trail.

Frog Millhouse hurriedly removed himself and mule from the trail, but Gene only moved Champion a little to the side as he expected the girl would slow.

"Get off the road, you limpets!" came her shout.

And Gene had to touch Champion with a spur or else the horses would have charged into him. An old man cackled derisively from the coach window as the vehicle whirled past. That infuriated Gene, and he went after the coach like the wind.

The girl urged her horses to their utmost, but Champion had a reputation for speed, and soon the white stallion was alongside the coach. The girl gave Gene a defiant grin.

"I wanna speak to you, young woman!" bellowed Gene.

"I'm in a hurry!" she shouted back.

"Bye!"

She might be a pleasant-faced, attractive young woman, but she couldn't defy the Sagebrush Troubadour in this manner. He urged Champion closer to the coach, kicked his feet clear of the stirrups and then shot out a hand to grip a rail. His strong hand got a firm hold, the muscles stiffened for the task, and then he swung himself from the saddle to the driver's box.

The girl was amazed to find the man beside her, and she was still more amazed when strong fingers took the reins from her hands. Though furious, she had to admire the man's courage, and it was obvious that he could handle horses.

The coach lured round a corner, and the girl gasped because she realised that at the mad pace she had been going it would have been impossible to have made the turn. Gene had been checking the horses, and he just managed to turn with one wheel kicking stones over the edge. The girl looked at the drop of a hundred feet into a gully and gulped—it would have been a nasty accident. She had been away so long she had forgotten this danger spot.

Gene swung the horses away off the trail and up an incline—that took all the exuberance out of the leaders. A foot lurch down on the brakes and the coach lurched to a stop.

"I oughta turn you across my knee and spank you!"

Blue eyes opened wide.

"You don't dare!"

"Don't I?" Gene gritted out, and next moment she was across his knee. She struggled and kicked, but she got a spanking. With a grin Gene let her go, and she would have smacked his face but for the glint in his eyes. She didn't want another spanking, because this young giant had a heavy hand.

The old boy had got out of the coach and was staring up at Gene in truculent fashion.

"Say, what's the idea practising your circus stunts on my stage-coach?" he demanded.

"You ought to know better than to let this crazy girl drive your stage!" Gene replied sternly.

The driver showed tobacco-stained teeth in an angry snarl.

"If I wanta let Miss Martin drive this coach, that's my business."

Gene studied the girl with interest.

"Are you Miss Joan Martin?"

"Yes!" she snapped at him. "And you'd better not be in this country when I tell my Uncle John that you—you dared to strike me."

Gene chuckled.

"Well, it hurt me more than it did you. Take my tip and let Hank take the coach into town."

May 16th, 1936.

He jumped lightly from the coach into the saddle of Champion, who had kept close to the coach.

"My name ain't Hank!" The driver climbed to the box seat. He pointed at the swayback, who had just jolted off the trail into the scene. "Where'd you get that old critter?"

"Ain't he a dandy?" grinned Frog. "He's a genuine thoroughbred, and can move like the wind." He doffed his sombrero to the girl. "You look kinda warm, missee."

The young lady was flushed with anger, and not because of the heat of the sun. She nudged the old man.

"Will you please get started?"

The coach was turned, whilst Gene and Frog watched.

"How far is it to the next town?" Gene asked, because he wanted to delay the girl.

"You follow the road and you'll find out!" retorted the driver. "We ain't got any welcome for hombres like you."

The girl looked at Gene as if he were dirt, but she could not face the merry twinkle in his grey eyes. The coach bumped back on to the trail and vanished in a cloud of dust.

With chin cupped in his right hand Gene sat back in the saddle and shook his head.

"She's a pretty nice girl, ain't she?" demanded Frog. "What ye shaking your head about?"

"She's old man Martin's granddaughter, and we've got work to do at the Martin ranch. What a swell reception we're going to get."

"Well, that just proves that you shouldn't spank girls before you're introduced to them."

Gene gave a wry grin.

"Frog, does anything peculiar strike you about this meeting? Can you tell me how I know she's been out of this country for quite a while?"

"That's sure got me beat."

"She didn't recognise her grandfather's horse." Gene pointed to the swayback. "Well, we'd better get back to the trail. Wonder what'll happen when that dame sees we've shown up in Sandy Hook."

"She won't want to kiss you," retorted Frog. "Can you tell me how I know that?"

Old Man Martin's Will

SANDY HOOK was a fair-sized cowtown on the Mexican Border.

There were a number of big ranches, and one or two mines that kept the place pretty busy.

On this sunny, warm afternoon most people were indoors having a siesta, but a greasy Mexican in the picturesque attire of his people, if somewhat worn, lounged against a bullock cart. The clatter of hoofs made him look up as the coach came into the square. Instantly the man was on his feet and running across the road to the saloon.

Leaning against the bar was a tall big-built middle-aged man. The expression was ugly and discontented.

"Senor Martin, the stage-coach—she has come with Senorita Joan."

"Thanks, Pablo." The man swallowed his drink. "Why couldn't the little fool have stayed East another month?"

Martin hurried across the square and was there to help the girl alight from the box. He was all smiles.

"Howdy, Joan?" he inquired pleasantly. "It sure is good to have you back home again."

"Oh, it's nice to be back, Uncle John." She kissed him. Then her pretty face clouded. "Tell me about—about granddad."

"Well—" He hesitated. "It ain't a very nice business, Joan, and—" Quick footfalls made him turn.

A short, wiry young cowpuncher was striding quickly towards them. John Martin scowled.

"If it ain't Joan Martin!" cried the newcomer.

"Hallo, Lon?" The girl held out her hand.

"The East certainly has changed you some," he said ardently. "You've grown up—you're prettier."

"Thank you!" Her smile was a little forced. Lon Danvers was a young man who had paid her marked attention before she went to New York for her finishing education, and she did not like him very much.

"I reckon I'll have to start calling on you, Joan," Lon said boldly. "With serious intentions."

John Martin scowled at him.

"Save your courting talk for later, Lon—we've got to see Lawyer Nolan now."

Martin took the girl's arm and moved away. Lon Danvers' eyes narrowed as he watched them go. He saw them enter the lawyer's office, and then he acted strangely. By a circuitous route he came to the lawyer's office and bending down, crept round till he was beneath Lawyer Nolan's window. He could hear everything that was being said.

Lawyer Nolan was a sleek, pale-faced person. He jumped up from his chair and held out both his hands when John Martin brought the girl into his office.

"Why, it's our little Joan!" he cried. "I hardly know you. Welcome home."

The girl sat down in the chair the lawyer offered.

"Mr Nolan, I want to know how granddad was killed?"

The listener outside the window strained nearer to hear the answer.

"Your grandfather was murdered by someone unknown, who throttled him with a guitar string."

"Oh!" The girl could not check her little cry of horror.

"Probably murder wasn't intended," John Martin suggested. "They may have tried to worm some secret out of the old man."

"Secret?"

Nolan nodded his head.

"He's right, Joan," he sighed sadly.

"Why, your grandfather had secrets he didn't even confide in me—his lawyer."

"He was a smart man," said John Martin.

The girl did not miss the sneer in her uncle's voice. The lawyer and her uncle could not be very good friends. She felt that as Uncle John was her poor dear dead father's only brother she ought to like him more, but he was so morose. She had not cared very much about him even when her father was alive, and though three years had passed, he seemed just as overbearing as of old. Her mother had died when she was very small, and her father when she was fourteen. Granddad had been such a dear, and when she was seventeen had sent her to New York. She had been thinking about returning to the West when the tragic news of the old man's death had reached her. She had left New York the next morning.

"I have the will of the late John Martin in my safe," the lawyer said with his oily smile. "Would you care to hear it?"

"Of course, we'd like to hear it," answered Martin.

Nolan unlocked his safe and produced a blue document. He smiled at Joan, cleared his throat, and began:

"To my only remaining son, John

Next moment she was across his knee, and, in spite of her struggles, she got a spanking.

Martin, I leave the sum of five thousand dollars." The lawyer looked at Martin, who seemed very angry. "Not a very large amount, is it?"

"The mean old——" Martin eeked himself. Carry on. Maybe he mentions me again."

"He does!" The lawyer grinned and turned back to the document. "To my granddaughter, Joan Martin, I bequeath all the balance of my property, both real and personal. But in the event of her death the entire estate shall go to my only remaining son, John Martin." He paused to look at his two eager listeners. "In the event of the deaths of both my granddaughter and my son, then my entire estate shall go to my good friend and legal adviser, Henry Nolan."

Martin's lip curled. "You'd sorta be lucky, wouldn't you, Henry, if anything happened to Joan and me?"

The lawyer replaced the will in his safe before turning to smile in his mocking, sinister way at Martin.

"And you'd be a rich man, John, if any harm came to Joan."

"How can you men joke about such things?" Joan demanded, her cheeks flushed with indignation.

"We're sorry, Joan!" both men cried together.

"Liars!" muttered the listener outside the window, and, bent double, he crawled away because the seraping of a chair told him that the interview with the lawyer was at an end, and he had no desire to be caught eavesdropping.

The Demand for the Swayback

GENE AUTRY and Frog Millhouse came at last in sight of the town of Sandy Hook. Gene reined in his horse.

"Now, remember, we've got to use our eyes and ears and yet make folks think we're dumb and simple."

Frog scratched his unruly thatch of hair.

"Well, acting dumb is going to be pretty hard for me."

Gene laughed heartily, much to his companion's disgust.

"We're just wandering cowboy minstrels," he said at last. "Going from town to town picking up jobs by playing and singing."

Soon after entering the town they sighted a tumbledown place that announced that cheap stabling could be had there. They hitched their animals to a rail, and hammered at a door. A big, lazy person appeared.

"Howdy?" Gene smiled in his friendliest fashion.

"How ya?" yawned the man. "I'm Hank Polk."

"My name is Gene Autry, and this funny-looking galoot here is my partner, Frog Millhouse."

"Howdy?"

"How about a little food for our animals?"

"Oh, sure!" yawned Hank.

"We'll be laying around here for a few days," said Gene. "Do you know of any parties or weddings that will be needing a two-man orchestra?"

"Well, no," Hank grimed. "The boys hung a Chinaman yesterday, but they'll be burying him without music." He studied Gene's horse, looked at the mule, and then for the first time seemed to notice the swayback. "Say, there's an old lady that wants me to get her a gentle buggy horse. How about trading that horse of your pard's for a good fast one?"

Gene gave the man a searching glance. There was a curious gleam in Hank's eyes.

"Well, I don't think——" Gene said slowly.

The other quickly interrupted. "I'll even throw in a good saddle."

"I'll have to consider it." Gene winked slyly at Frog.

"I'll give you free feed," Hank urged.

"Why, man, if that ain't a bargain I don't know one."

A man was running along the dust street. Lon Danvers had been sneaking away from the lawyer's window when he had sighted the newcomers.

"Hey, wait!" Lon shouted.

Gene whistled softly to himself.

"Boys," Lon Danvers panted out. "I'll give you a good horse and a hundred dollars for that swayback!"

Hank Polk clenched his fists.

"You stay out of this, Lon. This is my deal."

"I'll make it a horse and two hundred dollars." Lon ignored Hank and looked at Gene.

"Two-fifty!" shouted Hank.

"Three hundred!"

"Four hundred!"

"I'll make it five hundred dollars!" hoarsely cried Lon.

"Six hundred!"

"Seven hundred!"

"Eight hundred!" yelled Hank.

"Hey, wait a minute!" interrupted Gene. "What's the great idea?"

The two bidders glared at Gene, who seemed vastly amused by the whole affair.

Meanwhile someone else had spotted the swayback. The Mexican half-breed, Pablo. This greasy fellow raced across the square. John Martin and the lawyer were alone, because Joan had gone into the only store to make some purchases.

"Senor," Pablo gasped out to Martin, "two strangers have the old swayback. Hank Polk and Lon Denvers are trying to buy it."

The news seemed to startle the two men. Martin turned to his Mexican foreman.

"All right, I'll fix it."

With long strides he set off across the square, and, hearing footsteps behind him, turned to find that the lawyer was there.

"Well, where are you going?"

Nolan gave an unpleasant grin.

"The same place as you are, and for the same reason."

Martin scowled, but with a resigned slung of his shoulders allowed the lawyer to catch him up. The two men walked rapidly towards the stable.

Gene Autry listened with interest to these two men arguing over the horse and whose right it was to buy the creature. Any moment he expected them to come to blows. From the side-carrier of the mule he took out a Spanish guitar.

"What kind of a horse would you give me for this?" he asked.

"I don't use no guitar," answered Hank.

"I don't like music," replied Lon.

"How about trading that horse?"

Gene gave a decisive shake of his head.

"We can't trade that horse. A fellow said he belonged to Frank Martin—said Martin'd pay a good reward for him."

"Martin is dead!" Lon answered at once.

"And a good job, too," cried Hank. "The old skinflut. He beat me out of a big bill he owed me."

"So that's how you feel about it, eh?" Instantly Lon had turned. "Maybe you're the one who—"

"Maybe you'd better keep quiet," interrupted Hank, and turned to Gene. "He didn't like the old man because he said no darned storekeeper could marry his granddaughter."

"So you're the owner of the store," remarked Gene, eager to encourage these two to talk. He had already picked up quite a lot of information. Frantic signals from Frog made him glance round. Two men—one tall and the other short—were hastening down the street.

"Strangers," John Martin called out. "That horse belongs to me. I'm John Martin."

"Just a moment," Nolan held up his hand. "As the lawyer settling this estate. I'll take charge of this horse."

"Hold on, there," truculently spoke Hank Polk. "I claim that nag for the money old Martin owed me."

Lon went to peer at the swayback. "Well, if it comes to that, possession is nine points of the law, and I don't see any brand on him." He slipped a hand down to his gun-holster.

"One moment, folks!" Gene raised his voice. "I found this horse, and I'm not surrendering it to anyone until ownership is proved. You fellows settle it among yourselves, or we'll let the sheriff decide." He noticed uneasy glances at mention of the sheriff. He walked across and touched his bewildered companion. "Come on, Frog, let's go find some place to eat. We'll talk about stabling, Hank, when we get back. See you gentlemen later."

Four disgruntled men watched Gene and Frog move leisurely down the street.

Hank turned on Lon. "If you hadn't butted in I'd have got that horse."

"Ain't that too bad?" sneered the other.

"John," Nolan touched the tall man's sleeve. "As a lawyer I wish to point out that none of us can legally claim that horse."

"Well?"

"The sheriff, if consulted, would naturally say it was Joan's property," the lawyer said in his soft, oily manner.

"There's no need to put it to the sheriff. Can't we get together over this business?"

"You're quite right." The lawyer took the tall man's arm. "Let's get away from these two—don't want them in our schemes. I've got something figured out."

"What's your plan?" asked Martin, when they were out of earshot of the two squabblers.

May 16th, 1936.

The lawyer lowered his voice to a whisper.

An Invitation

THE two friends walked in silence till they had almost reached the square. Frog was the first to speak.

"You're not really aiming to see the sheriff?"

"That'd spoil all our plans," laughed Gene. "I want to force their hands. I had a hunch that as soon as we struck town with that old swayback in tow things would start humming. You'll see—they'll make the next move."

"Well, it beats me," mumbled Frog. "Either that old boss has been grazing in the mint or swallowed the Crown Jewels. Say, why do you suppose everybody wants to buy that old swayback?"

Gene looked grim. "When we find that out, we'll know why old man Martin was murdered—and maybe who did it."

They walked on and reached the square. They were in time to see Joan Martin come out of the store and look round for her uncle. She moved from the veranda shelter of the store to take a good look at the square and must have caught her foot in a loose board, for she stumbled and dropped her bag, scattering its contents.

Gene Autry hastened across to assist her. The girl was about to stoop to retrieve her possessions when Gene appeared on the scene and forestalled her.

"Lipstick, comb, mirror, and powder," he murmured politely, as he handed back her fallen possessions.

"Thank you!" Joan replied, and then her eyes opened wide as she recognised the man who had spanked her such a short while before.

"You're quite welcome," Gene bowed ironically. "Nice weather we're having—but a little chilly."

Her looks were more than chilly—they should have frozen. The girl gave a haughty toss of her head, and walked quickly away. It was a relief to see her uncle and the lawyer on the opposite side of the square. She hastened to them.

"Joan," John Martin spoke very seriously. "I want you to give a dance to-night. A homecoming celebration." He pointed across the square. "And you can ask those fellows to furnish the music."

"No, no, I couldn't do that, with grandfather dead—murdered!"

"Joan, I must get that big man out to the ranch, and hold him there."

"Why?" Joan demanded, mystified.

"Because we suspect him of murdering your grandfather."

"I don't believe it," Joan had decided that the man who had handed out that humiliating rebuke was an impudent fellow, but not a murderer.

"He plays the guitar," Martin was enacting the crafty plan suggested by the lawyer. "You remember the guitar string. And he has shown up with the horse your grandfather was riding the day he was murdered."

"Well, why don't you notify the sheriff?" suggested the girl.

"Not yet." Martin gave a decisive shake of his head. "I want to question him—watch him—before making such a grave accusation."

The girl's expression became hard.

"I'd do anything to find out who murdered granddad. All right, I'll ask them." She looked at her uncle. "Tell me what I've got to say."

"They're talking about us," Gene told Frog. "We'll just stick around and see what comes of it."

"You're right, pal," hissed Frog.

"They're stepping across the street, and I'll wager my last cent we're their meat."

Martin, Nolan and the girl approached, and Gene drew his own conclusions from the fact that the girl was smiling—very forced.

"Mr. Autry, I'm giving a dance—a masquerade—to-night," she stated.

"Could you furnish the music?"

"Why sure, that's our business," Gene smiled as if delighted.

"I'm glad you fellows can do this for my niece," John Martin chimed in.

"Say, why not come along to the ranch with us right now and have dinner there?"

"Suits us," agreed the troubadour.

"Well, let's get going," suggested Martin.

"I'll ride along with you," the lawyer said with a meaning glance at Martin. "Guess as Joan's lawyer I should be at this masquerade."

"If you could wait here a few minutes we'll gather together our traps," Gene looked at the girl. "We've only got to go across the square—we won't be long." "We'll wait," Martin answered for his niece.

When they were the other side of the square Gene gave a quiet chuckle and Frog glanced at him in surprise.

"I told you they'd make the next move," Gene gave an ominous nod. "I don't trust Joan's uncle or that fawning lawyer. I wonder what they aim to spring on us at the ranch. The sooner we get there, Frog, the sooner we'll find out."

One Mystery Partly Solved

THEY collected their possessions, and mounted on Champion and the swayback hastened across the square to join the others. Joan rode in a buckboard with the greasy Pablo driving, whilst Martin and Nolan rode behind on well-broken-in mustangs.

They had gone about a mile when Martin suggested that Autry sing them one of his Western prairie songs. Gene smiled and signalled to Frog to get out a guitar.

"I'd love to wed a girl I met

In a stage coach on the prairie.

I'd love to say to-day's the day

When you and I will marry.

But I must find a girl that's sweet.

You see the point, of course.

If frown she must, I think it just

To stay in love with my horse."

Joan glanced round and met the mocking grin of the singing troubadour, and she knew that she was the motive of the song.

"Please drive faster, Pablo," she spoke sharply.

A cunning gleam came for a split second into the man's eyes, and then was gone. Pablo urged the horses to a gallop, and Joan for a while grinned as the buckboard drew farther and farther away. But Gene had sharp eyes, and he urged his horse into a canter. There seemed a peculiar wobble to one of the back wheels of the buckboard. Suddenly he urged his horse to a gallop because he was now certain that the wheel was likely to come off at any moment.

The trail was narrow and on one side was a nasty drop into a rocky ravine. Champion seemed to understand and stretched himself out into a swift gallop.

Pablo heard the thunder of hoofs behind and urged his horses on. The buckboard swayed dangerously. The Mexican cursed and swore as if the horses were out of control, and all the while he was ready to leap for safety when the wheel collapsed.

Joan clung on for dear life and just when she expected the next moment was going to be her last Gene drew level. It was at that moment that the wheel came off the axle, and Pablo leapt. But the buckboard with Joan did not crash over the edge because Gene's strong arm had reached out and lifted the girl from the buckboard on to the pommel of his saddle.

Pablo rolled over and over down the incline to crash into a great mass of mesquite. When he staggered to his feet it was to see the smashed buckboard nearby—it was smashed to pieces. The horses had been fortunate in that the shafts had snapped and they had managed to keep to the trail. But what made the Mexican so livid was to see on the trail above him the girl safely held in Gene's arms.

Out flashed Pablo's gun and he fired, but his aim was not quite deadly enough—it drilled a neat hole in Gene's sombrero. The troubadour slid the girl to the ground and whipped out his six-gun. Pablo dropped his gun as if it were red hot. He came out of the mesquite and began talking with a lot of gestures and looking round, then he dived back into the mesquite and held aloft the gun.

"Pablo's gun dropped from his holster and went off by accident," explained Martin.

"Well, if that was an accident," Gene said caustically. "I hope he aims at me next time. You all right, Miss Martin?"

"Yes, thank you." The girl looked searchingly at him as if she did not know what to believe. "I'm quite all right."

"Good!" Gene seemed unperturbed with his narrow escape from death. "Better take my horse, Miss Martin. I can manage with one of the buckboard broncs."

They reached the Martin ranch without further incident. The place was on the phone and Joan at once got busy sending out invitations, whilst the servants prepared the large ranch-house for the festivities.

Gene and Frog found a comfortable stable for the swayback. It was Pablo who supplied the padlock and key.

"Is this the only key?"

"Si, senor."

"Frog," Gene said when the Mexican had gone, "I don't trust that greaser. You stay here and watch the swayback. I've got some investigating to do."

Gene prowled round the ranch and the corral and found nothing that gave him any clue. It was near the ranch-house that he saw an old guitar on a rustic chair, and nearby on a table a powerful magnifying glass. He was busy examining the strings when he saw Pablo peering at him covertly, and briskly he called the Mexican across. Pablo came unwillingly.

"Did you ever see a guitar string through a magnifying glass?" Gene watched the man closely.

"No, senor," Pablo replied. "That is old Senor Martin's reading-glass. He was very near-sighted."

"He used this glass to read by?"

"Si, senor, but not very well because Senor Martin was almost blind."

A startled look, quickly suppressed, and then Gene dismissed the Mexican with a casual gesture. He hastened round to the stable, where Frog was nearly asleep.

"Wake up and give me the key."

"What's up?"

"I just learned something. Old man Martin was almost blind."

"That don't mean a thing to me," muttered Frog.

"He must have depended on that old horse to find the way whenever he rode him." He unpadlocked the stable. "I'm going to take the horse out and let it show me its secret. I want you to remain on guard as if the swayback were still here. Don't let anyone know I've taken him."

The conspirators led the old horse out of the stable. No one saw them, and when Gene was safely on his way Frog returned to his post. As there was nothing to guard he decided that it was his chance to enjoy a siesta.

Turning the Tables

IN the sitting-room of the Martin ranch four angry men faced each other, and each suspected the other of trying a double-cross. Hank Polk and Lon Danvers had come out to the ranch and stated very frankly that they did not trust Martin or the lawyer, and as they were themselves very interested in the swayback they did not intend to be ticked out of their rights. They all argued about who had the greatest right, and in the end decided to divide everything into quarter shares.

"Let's take this swayback right now," shouted Hank. "Before this Austry feller gets away with it or finds out its secret."

"Suppose I refuse," cried Martin, who was still rebellious about letting in anyone else. "Why should I cut you in on this horse business?"

"Because if you don't, we'll tell Joan the truth," sneered Lon. "The horse belongs to her, anyway."

"They've got you," said Nolan, and grinned slyly.

"Well, let's get the horse." Martin made his decision. "There's enough of us here to do it."

Frog Millhouse woke up and tried to prevent them entering the stable, and managed to knock the lawyer down before his arms were pinioned. Then the lock was broken and the fact that the swayback was gone was discovered.

"Where's your pardner and the horse?" Martin yelled at Frog.

"I don't know," was the answer, and no manner of threats would make Frog Millhouse talk. It was the lawyer who suggested searching the prisoner, and in one pocket they found a guitar string, and that gave the crafty Nolan an idea.

"A guitar string?" He looked at the others.

The two bidders glared at Gene, who seemed vastly amused by the whole affair.

"Yeah, and it's like the one that choked old Martin!" shouted Danvers. "And he came here riding the dead man's horse," added Hank.

Nolan nodded his head ominously. "Boys, guess you've got the same notion as me. This man should be handed over to the sheriff."

"I'll get Pablo to telephono the sheriff to come right over," Martin decided, and turned on Frog. "There's enough evidence against you to hang you for murder."

"Better get some rope and tie him up," suggested Nolan. "He's a slippery customer."

A horseman rode quietly up to the ranch and his quick ears heard the sound of several voices near the old stable. His horse made no sound as Gene urged the intelligent animal round some store buildings to a position where a view of the barn could be obtained. A slight whistle of surprise escaped his lips as he saw Frog with his hands above his head and Martin cowering him with a gun. The other men were bunched together with shoulders stooped forward, as if longing to leap at Frog's neck; hurrying towards the scene was Pablo with a length of rope.

Gene took a rope from the saddle of Champion and looked at it thoughtfully. He reckoned he could do it.

The clutter of hoofs made the conspirators whip round, but as their hands went to their hips a loop came sailing through the air. It was a perfect throw, and as the men got to their guns the whirlwind Champion had flashed past and the loop was jerked taut. Martin, who might have fired, had not guessed what the horseman planned until it was too late.

Pablo and the lawyer were not caught in the ring, but Frog dealt with them. One blow floored the lawyer and then the big fellow got a strangle grip on the half-breed's throat.

Martin, Hank and Lon were swept off their feet and dragged some distance before Gene freed the rope from the pommel of his saddle. The discomfited rascals found themselves looking at a gun held by a steady hand.

"Look here," began Martin. "You can't—"

The gun twitched significantly. "Cut it!" snapped Gene. "I don't want to hear a word from you thugs."

Gene and Frog used the rope that Pablo had brought to bind the five men securely together, then at the point of the gun they were marched into the empty stable and flung on the straw.

"That'll keep 'em quiet for a bit," Gene smiled as he stared down at their squirming captives.

"They've sent for the sheriff," whispered Frog.

"Then get a horse quick—jump to it!" Gene pushed his companion as a gesture to hurry. He gave the captives' bonds a quick examination. "I'll see you at the dance to-night, gentlemen." He went out and lashed the broken loek with rope.

Frog appeared with a big brown mare, and the two friends galloped towards the lulls.

"Do you really mean to be at that dance to-night?" asked Frog after they had gone some distance, and sighed when Gene gave a curt nod. "You'd walk into certain death just to see that girl."

"She's in danger," Gene was serious now. "That buckboard wheel coming off was no accident, nor was the shot that nearly got me. My hunch is that the same man who murdered her grandfather is trying to get rid of the girl. And that's why we've got to go to the dance to-night."

May 18th, 1936.

"Pal, we'll be there," Frog cried boisterously, though he felt far from cheerful. "But I'm gonna be shakier than a hula-dancer."

The Masquerade Dance

THE sheriff was not able to show up at the Martin ranch until the evening, and he was surprised to find the place all lit up with small coloured lanterns, buckboards and ancient cars filled the corral, and there was the sound of many voices. Briefly the lawyer explained that the dance was being held because they suspected the troubadours of complicity in the murder of old man Martin. They had thought it best to tell Joan their suspicions. That afternoon Autry and Millhouse had acted in their true colours, had held up the ranch, thrown them into a dirty stable and made off for the hills.

"From what you tell me this Autry seems the guilty man," the sheriff agreed.

"Yes, his partner wouldn't have the brains or the nerve," added Nolan.

"Autry's got nerve," Martin told the sheriff. "He said he'd be at the dance to-night."

"Do you think he really means it?"

"Sure, sheriff," Lon spoke venomously. "I've seen him staring at Joan—he'll try to see her again."

The sheriff made a quick decision. "I'll deputise you men. With my own two deputies we can tackle these two ruffians. Are you all armed?" He saw that they were. "Good! Don't forget he's a desperate character."

Martin drew Hank Polk and Lon Donvers to one side.

"You two will have to furnish the music. You won't be as good as Autry and his pard, but do your best. Make plenty of noise."

"Okay, but I want to have a dance with Joan," said Lon.

"Later," Martin agreed. "Now keep a sharp look out for Autry and his pard among the dancers. It's a masquerade and they might try to make it. Nolan and I will watch the front door. The sheriff will be outside, and Pablo will be helping the sheriff. And if they come we've got 'em just where we want 'em."

The dance proceeded merrily. Every guest was in fancy dress and masked—the only people that looked out of place were the sheriff's two deputies, who eyed everyone suspiciously. Lon and Hank were doing the same, but they saw no sign of the troubadours. Little did they know that the men they were looking for were within a few feet of them. Gene and Frog had made the ranch without being seen and had crept round to the big mess-room that had been cleared for the dance. Lon and Hank were on a platform and behind them was an open window. Lou gave Gene his chance when he announced a short interval. The dancers filed off to another room for refreshments, and the deputies went with them.

Two hands came through the window and seized Lon and Hank as they were preparing to leave the platform. In spite of their struggles they were yanked through the window and back to the same barn.

"We're only borrowing your costumes for a while, boys," announced Gene. "Take 'em off, and move to it quickly."

Two minutes later Gene wore the clothes of a Mexican caballero and Frog the striped outfit of a convict. Lon and Hank were securely bound.

"I didn't fix the other bonds overnight," Gene told them, "because I didn't want you mugs to stay tied up for long, but if you can untie those knots, you're clever. See you later."

Martin came into the mess-room to tell the band to get going, and was surprised to find the platform empty. He looked at Nolan, and both men were about to call out when Gene and Frog climbed in through the window. Frog felt that his mask was terribly small.

The lawyer grinned. "They must have gone out for a smoke."

Frog picked up a concertina and Gene took a guitar. They played a liting waltz, to which Gene harmonised this charming verse:

"My prayer for to-night
'Neath the heavens so bright
Is the plea to our Maker above.
May I always dwell in the land that I love.
May the Joshua trees and the warm desert breeze
And the rolling white sand to my eyes
Be a haven of rest in the heart of the West
Till I go to my home in the skies."

The dance went on and the guests clapped their approval because the band seemed to have improved a hundred-fold since the interval. Gene grinned when he heard the sheriff say to all the deputies that he was of the opinion that the troubadours were afraid to show up.

The band took a rest, and Gene saw Joan with her partner sitting out in an alcove. He heard her partner make some excuse and leave her. Gene wished he could go across and speak. Suddenly he saw something flicker at the open window behind the girl. Just like this, claw-like fingers.

Gene impulsively crossed the room and looked out of the window, whilst the girl stared at him in some surprise.

"Did you hear anything behind you just now?"

"No."

"I would have sworn I saw someone."

The girl stood up and peered at him.

"You're not Lon. You're Gene Autry. Why are you here?"

"Because I promised to play for you."

"But the sheriff—Uncle John—they all believe that you're the—" She hesitated.

"But you don't believe them, do you?" he questioned gently.

"I don't know what to believe."

Gene noticed that the room was filling and that Nolan had entered. The lawyer was too lynx-eyed for his liking.

"Dance with me—will you?"

They glided round the room, and Nolan watched them covertly. He had not known that Lon Danvers could dance so skillfully.

As they danced Gene was whispering in her ear.

"Here's something you should know. Your grandfather discovered a very valuable gold mine. Being almost blind, the only way he could get to the mine was—"

"On the swayback," interrupted Joan. "Granddad depended so much on that wise old horse."

"Quite right. But he was killed before the claim was recorded."

"I see"—the girl nodded her head—"so that's why everyone wants the swayback—to guide them to the gold."

"Yes," answered Gene, and saw Nolan watching him. "But don't say anything of what I've just told you—just yet."

"But you—you shouldn't be here." Her eyes were wide with fear. "You're in terrible danger."

"Don't worry about me. I'm concerned about you." He glanced round because the music had stopped. "Frog had managed two pieces on his own and was looking despairingly towards him. "I must go. Not a word to anybody, Joan, and watch out for danger."

Gene went back to the platform, and at once the people in the room began to dance to a stirring fox-trot.

"They're going to be unmasking soon," Frog said out of the corner of his mouth.

"We can't leave until—" Gene broke off abruptly. He had been playing a concertina, and had decided to change to a guitar. He noticed that one string of the guitar was missing. "Who's been handling this instrument?"

"I didn't see anybody touch it," Frog answered. "But a lot of folk have been crowding round."

Gene said no more for a while. Everyone kept applauding, and mechanically he went on playing. Joan had worn the dress of a Spanish señorita, and he had recognised her in spite of the mask, and he realised with a sense of dismay that she was not among the dancers.

"Joan's not here." He looked at Frog. "Sing, play—do anything, but entertain them."

"I'll do my best."

Gene paused at the entrance of the room to look back. Frog was singing one of his famous comic songs, and by the way the guests were laughing, it was going over well. He was safe for five or ten minutes. Nowhere could he find a sign of Joan on the veranda, so he wandered towards the corral. He saw something white and hastened forward, and to his surprise a shadow moved away from the whiteness and was gone. Then the white shadow seemed to fall.

It was Joan that Gene lifted to her feet, and round her neck was tightly twisted a guitar string. Swiftly he loosened it, and to his joy he heard her breathing. A moment later the white-faced girl opened her eyes, she gave a cry of joy at seeing Gene, and clung to him.

"What happened?"

"I stepped outside for a moment for some air," she explained in a faltering voice. "Someone grabbed me, and then it felt as if my neck was being cut in half."

"Lucky I showed up," growled Gene. "The skunk saw me and slid. You mustn't wander around here alone—you're in danger."

"But who would want to harm me?"

"The same man that killed your grandfather," Gene took her arm. "We must get back to the dance before I'm missed. Please, Joan, don't go outside again."

"But I don't understand why you—"

He touched his lips.

"I will explain everything later, but you must trust me."

"I do." He thrilled to the slight pressure on his arm.

Gene got back to the platform to find Frog Millhouse perspiring freely. The eyes behind the mask seemed to flicker. Gene noticed that not only was the sheriff near the platform, but so were Martin, Nolan and the deputies.

"Our playing ain't quite the same as the other guys," hissed Frog as Gene picked up a concertina. "I reckon they've rumbled us. Sing 'em something, Gene."

So Gene sang his best, but he did not miss the little grins that passed between Martin and Nolan or the significant nudges that the deputies gave each other. Gene finished his song and would have started another if Martin had not stepped on to the platform and raised a hand for silence.

"Just a minute, everybody!" he shouted, and waited till he had their attention. "There's a reason why we've waited so long to unmask. It was because two desperate men boasted that they'd be here—we waited till we were sure we had them trapped. Now, everybody, unmask—at once!"

The guests hesitated. It was unpleasant to think that two desperate men might be in this room and that any second guns might be roaring. Best not to keep the mask on too long or else they might come under suspicion. Men and women removed their masks—they looked at each other for signs of a strange face. They did not think for the moment of the band till they saw the dramatic manner in which Martin was pointing, then a gasp went up as they realised the significance of his gesture—the two troubadours were still masked.

Gene was determined to fight for his liberty, and was wondering what he should do when there came a welcome interruption.

The sheriff and deputies had drawn their guns, but for certain reasons Gene and Frog had no desire to shoot it out, and yet the plans to capture the real murderer would be spoilt if they revealed their true identity. The interruption came in the persons of Hank Polk and Lon Danvers.

These two had wriggled and squirmed until Lon had managed to get to his feet; by rubbing his bound wrists against a nail he had eventually worn through the thick strands. Lon had cut his companion free, and the two men had rushed towards the mess-room, and they entered by the open window behind the band platform.

Dishevelled and attired only in their underwear, they presented a comic sight, and naturally everyone's attention was drawn to them as they scrambled into the room.

"There they are!" hoarsely shouted Lon, pointing at the masked troubadours. "They took our clothes!"

"So you're the treacherous cur that downed old man Martin?" rasped the sheriff.

But for valuable seconds the attention of the sheriff and the deputies had been distracted, and Gene acted. His gun flashed out and roared. The great oil lamp that lit the room was smashed and the place was plunged in darkness. A chair was whipped up by Gene and sailed through the air to catch the sheriff full in the chest. That worthy upholder of the law was flung back into the arms of his deputies, who dropped their guns, and Martin got a sock in the jaw that made him yell with anger and fright. Frog was quick to copy the action of Gene, and a drum caught Nolan full in the chest. Lon and Hank, blinking their eyes and trying to see, were suddenly flung violently to one side.

Out through the window went Gene and Frog. The deputies' guns blazed a few seconds too late. People flung themselves down for fear of being hit, whilst the sheriff yelled for everyone to cut out the gun-play—he was afraid that friend, not foe, might get hurt.

The sheriff produced an electric torch and ran to the open window. His torch revealed two scurrying figures.

"Get your horses, boys!" the sheriff yelled. "We got to follow them. The moon will be up soon and they can't get away."

The deputies and cowboys, eager to round-up the desperadoes, forced their way out of the room and ran to their horses. They heard the clatter of hoofs. Hurriedly everyone got to saddle and took up the pursuit with the sheriff in the lead.

Martin's Treachery

THE blow that Martin took was severe, and it was some minutes before he was able to regain his feet. Dimly he knew that the sheriff and the deputies had gone after the two troubadours. He determined to get a horse and join in the chase.

As he reeled from the room he was accosted by an excited Pablo.

"Senor, the swayback! I've found out where they hid it."

That news cleared Martin's aching head like magic.

"You have the swayback? Good work, Pablo. When everyone has gone bring it to me at the stable."

"Si, senor."

"Uncle John, you've no right!" a clear voice cried. "What are you planning to do with the swayback?"

It was an angry, puzzled Joan.

Seeking someone in whom she could confide her worries, she had inquired for her uncle and heard that he had been seen staggering from the dance-room. She had gone after him, and had overheard his conversation with the half-breed.

Martin's face contorted with rage.

"Don't interfere in my affairs."

"But I will interfere. That swayback is as much mine as anybody's, and I demand to know what you're going to do."

"A certain mine belongs to whoever locates and records it," Martin told her. "And as I reckon I have the best right to the mine I ain't letting a chit of a girl interfere." He jumped forward and seized her. "I'm locking you up until I've recorded my claim."

The girl struggled fiercely, but his arms were very strong. Pablo swung open the door of a shed and Martin staggered inside with the girl. Roughly he flung her to the ground, and then rushed out, barring the door after him.

Joan beat fiercely on the walls, but this shed was some distance from the ranch. She had never liked her uncle very much, and now she realised his true nature. She shouted for help, but the thick wooden planking seemed to deaden her cries.

Gene and Frog were well mounted and had a good start, but Gene had no intention of being driven out of the neighbourhood. They came to a wide, but shallow stream, and the water left no trail marks. The sheriff and his deputies came to the stream and were baffled to know which way the two troubadours had gone.

"We'll head for the spot where Martin was murdered," the sheriff decided. "I reckon they know the whereabouts of the mine and if they're headed that way they'll have to pass where we lie hidden in the trees."

When the troubadours realised that they were no longer being pursued Gene turned Champion towards the hills. In a clearing Gene reined in his horse and pointed towards the distant town of Sandy Hook.

"Do just what I told you and don't let anyone stop you."

"I'm on my way," grinned Frog. "I'll ride like the wind, pal. I got everything by heart, and you can bet your saddle it's as good as done. I'll be seeing you." He dug spurs into the brown mare and disappeared among the trees.

Gene turned Champion in the direction of the Martin ranch, and after half an hour's brisk riding could see the place like a grey haze in the moonlight. He dismounted near the stables and went forward on foot. The place seemed very quiet. There were a few lights in the ranch-house, and he guessed the Mexican staff were still awake. The guests had departed after the dance had been broken up.

"Gene! Gene! Gene!"

Where had the voice of Joan come from?—it sounded like a call of distress. He turned and the call came again. An arm fluttered from a small grating, and a few seconds later his powerful body was crashing against the wood-work of the door. It burst with a crash, and then Joan was in his arms.

"Gene, Gene, thank heaven you came back."

"Who locked you in here?" he demanded fiercely.

"My uncle. He and Pablo rode off with the swayback."

"I thought that uncle of yours was a treacherous hound," Gene snapped out.

"Will you take me to his room, please?"

"Why?"

"Don't ask questions now." He spoke sharply. "Please do as I ask."

In John Martin's room he found a guitar. "There is one string missing!" He looked at her significantly.

"Oh, you don't think my uncle is the one who killed granddad?"

"I'm not saying." Gene put back the guitar. "Right now I've got to ride. You stiek inside this ranch, and don't go out. I warned you before you were in danger. Stay here, Joan, till I get back. Adios!"

Gene rushed from the ranch, and the girl ran out after him. She saw him vault into the saddle of Champion and urge the white horse into a gallop.

"I'm not staying around here to be murdered," the girl muttered. "I'm going to find out what all this mystery means." Her eyes lit up at sight of the buckboard with its two sleepy horses. Pablo must have left them there in case any of the guests needed driving back to town. She scrambled on to the seat and picked up a long whip.

Crack! The horses woke to life. At a furious gallop Joan drove the buckboard in pursuit of Gene Autry.

A Troublesome Girl

THE sheriff and his deputies took up their position on the crest of a hill that overlooked the valley where old man Martin's body had been found. A guitar string drawn tight round the throat had been the cause of death.

Having been enrolled as deputies Lon and Hank were in the posse, and they were quick to notice that neither Martin nor Nolan was there.

"Nolan was with us when we set out after those two hombres," hissed Lon. "Reckon he must have slipped away when sheriff said we were to make for this gulch. Looks kinda queer to me."

"Lawyer Nolan is a crafty twister," Hank said with a scowl. "He and Martin are a fine pair—I wouldn't trust either of those guys. Seems to me we should do something, Lon. Maybe they've located the mine. What do you opine we should do?"

"Slip away from the posse," Lon said with his mouth close to the other's ear. "We'll get farther up the valley, and if that don't tell us anything I'm all for hitting the trail back to the ranch. I'll feel happier when I see either Nolan or Martin."

The two seekers after the Martin gold mine managed to get away from the posse in the half-light. At four would come the dawn, and though the moon had gone there was a grey light that heralded the rising of the sun.

They had not been gone long before the sheriff sighted a lone rider, and was surprised to recognise it as the deputy he had left in charge back at Sandy Hook. This man had ridden out because of a strange missive that had been brought to him. The note was signed by Gene Autry and had been flung through a window by Frog Millhouse. It gave directions on how to find the gold mine, and told the sheriff that, if he wanted to know the murderer of old Martin, he should go with the posse to the mine when dawn was breaking. The printed heading of the paper made the sheriff whistle his surprise, and he gave the necessary orders.

Gene Autry had not gone more than a mile when he turned in his saddle. He had fancied that he was being followed. After going on some distance he turned again to listen, and this time was certain. He took cover in some pines. The rumble of wheels and the pounding of hoofs, and along the trail came the buckboard with Joan.

Joan was determined to catch up with Gene and she was driving the horses at a furious pace. Gene had to admire the girl's audacity. She flashed by, and with a grin Gene set out in pursuit.

It soon became apparent that the horses had got out of control. The ground was full of stones, hillocks, small streams and undulating ground that caused the buckboard to sway and lurch in an alarming manner.

Champion seemed to understand and exerted himself to overtake the run-aways. The buckboard got on to a slope and the pace increased. Every moment Gene expected to see the girl sent flying.

Heedless of danger to himself Gene urged the wonder horse to his utmost capacity. He drew alongside and with cool daring reached out to grip the iron rail on the driver's box. A similar exploit to the one when he had first made this girl's acquaintance, but this time far more hazardous. He got a grip and kicked himself free of his stirrups, and next moment was dangling with his feet almost touching the ground. The buckboard rocketed drunkenly, and with a great effort he pulled himself on to the seat beside Joan.

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

The entire world is in a state of terror. The Earth is threatened with total destruction by the planet Mongo, which, rushing through the void, is controlled by the Emperor Ming, ruler of a strange race of people living on that unknown planet, and a man who has probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

In America, a scientist known as Dr. Zarkov maintains that he can save the Earth from disaster, and by means of a rocket ship which he has invented he attempts to blaze a trail through the stratosphere.

He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart.

The attempt is successful. Travelling through millions of miles of space, the rocket ship sets down the adventurers on the forbidding planet of Mongo, where they are taken prisoners by some of Ming's guards.

Ming spares Zarkov, thinking he might prove useful. He also spares Dale, marvelling at her loveliness. But he orders Flash to die, and the young American is thrown into a room where he fights three barbarians.

Flash overcomes the wild men, but Ming now condemns him to a worse fate, heedless of the angry protests of his daughter, Aura, who has become interested in Flash.

Aura tries to rescue him. In doing so she shares his peril and, as the floor yawns beneath them, Flash and the daughter of Ming are plunged—to what?

EPISODE 2.—
"The Tunnel of Terror"

The Net

IN the instant that she dropped out of sight with Flash Gordon, a ringing scream burst from the lips of the Princess Aura, and it was a scream which was echoed by Dale Arden as, held fast in the grip of Ming's guards, she saw her fiancé and the emperor's daughter plunging into the darkness.

And Ming himself uttered a great cry, for he had never intended that Aura should suffer the same fate to which he had condemned the young Earth man.

It was to the sinister monarch's credit that, despite the suddenness and the unexpectedness with which the situation had arisen, he did not lose his presence of mind.

"Torch!" he shrieked. "The net! Quick—save my daughter!"

The captain of his bodyguard sprang to action as the emperor's command resounded through the council-chamber. With a bound he reached the switch-board on the wall, where the hand of a dying man had drawn down the lever that had hurled Flash and Aura from view, and with a desperate gesture he tugged at a second lever there.

Torch was not a moment too soon. Already Aura and Flash Gordon had plunged far down into the abysmal gloom, but as the captain of the bodyguard threw that switch a grating of some light but strong material whipped across the pit, just about thirty feet from its base.

Into this framework of wire Flash and Aura fell, and it trembled quivering as it received them. Then three other bodies landed beside them—the figures of the barbarians over whom the youthful American had triumphed.

Slowly Flash Gordon and the daughter of Ming aroused themselves and, looking up, they saw the heads and shoulders of several men far above them at the distant summit of the pit. Immediately afterwards Aura heard one of those men cry out:

"They are safe, your Majesty! They are in the net! We can just see them!"

"Then go down by way of the underground galleries and make prisoners of them both," came the answering voice of Ming.

The heads of the soldiers disappeared. Meanwhile, Flash had struggled to his feet and, amazed by the fact that he was safe and sound, he balanced himself on the trembling meshes of the net and offered Aura a helping hand.

"Are you all right?" he gasped.

"Yes," she panted. "I am unhurt. The spring in the net broke our fall. My father must have ordered one of his men to move the switch that operates it."

"A lucky thing for us, too," the American began fervently, and then stopped dead as he heard a queer, grunting sound beneath him.

He peered down through the tracery of wires on which he was standing and, in the dim light below, he beheld a pool of stagnant water, and suddenly, in that stagnant water, he discerned the loathsome forms of half a dozen ghastly reptiles—reptiles of a kind unknown in the world from which he and Dale and Zarkov had come.

They were rearing themselves out of the slimy pool, their staring eyes upturned towards the net, and their cruel, hungry jaws wide open to reveal gleaming rows of teeth.

"What are they?" Flash breathed in horror.

"The dragons of death," Aura told him with a shudder. "They would have torn us to pieces if we had struck the water. Listen, you must get out of here before the guards reach us. There should be a secret door close to us."

She moved past the bodies of the three wild men who had fallen with them from the room above, and who were obviously insensible, and presently Flash realised that she was questing to and fro around the walls of the pit. Then all at once, when she was at the far side of the net, he heard the creak of hinges and saw a great block of stone swinging aside to disclose a broad passage-way.

Aura beckoned to him, and he followed her through the aperture into a gallery that was faintly illuminated by subdued lights. Down this gallery they hastened, and they must have travelled a distance of a hundred yards when the tramp of feet reached their ears.

"The guards!" hissed Aura, and promptly dragged him into a corridor leading off to the right.

Skulking there, they heard the guards troop by, and gained a fleeting impression of Torch marching at the head of them. Then they waited until the footsteps of the soldiery had receded and, as silence fell again, the daughter of Ming conducted her companion back into the main gallery.

"Hurry!" she said. "They will soon discover that we are no longer in the net!"

They broke into a run, heading in the direction whence Torch and the guards had approached, but before long Aura was leading the way out of the main gallery and turning into another side-passage—one that branched off to the left, this time.

They started along this. It sloped downward in a fairly acute gradient, so that it was almost difficult to keep their feet, and at intervals there were steep flights of steps which had to be descended. It became increasingly clear to Flash that this route certainly would not lead them back to the palace. On the contrary he could have imagined that it was penetrating to the very core of this weird and fearsome planet of Mongo.

"Where are you taking me?" he demanded of Aura, after a lapse of several minutes. "I want to return to your father's stronghold. I want to find out what he's doing with Dr. Zarkov and Dale—particularly Dale."

"No doubt he is holding them captives;" the princess rejoined, and then, after a slight pause:

"You like the Earth woman, don't you?" she added.

There was a hint of spitefulness in her voice as she made the comment, and for an instant her olive-skinned face was like that of a perverse and wilful child. But Flash did not notice her manner.

"Dale Arden is my fiancée," he told her. "We were planning to get married—but the danger that threatened our world put all such thoughts out of our minds. Do you know what marriage means, you who belong to this other planet? Do the men of Mongo take wives?"

"Yes," she answered slowly. "I think we are much like the Earth people. We have our loves—and our hates. But come, you must trust in me, for I alone can help you now."

He had no choice but to proceed, and together they pushed on until at last they saw the light of day before them. A few seconds later they were stumbling out into the open, and, looking around him in bewilderment, Flash found that they had emerged from a cavern-mouth at the very foot of the mountain on which Ming's city was built.

From away above them came the peculiar discord of sounds which issue from a metropolis where human activities are in progress. But those sounds seemed far off and remote, for the lower slopes of the mountain were barren, and the plain on which Flash and Aura now stood was desolate and forlorn.

There was no life here—unless, perhaps, there were monsters basking amidst the great rocks which abounded—monsters such as those which Flash, Dale and Zarkov had seen when they had first landed on the planet.

Flash shivered slightly at the thought of those brutes, and then gave a start as Aura touched him on the arm. Glancing at her, he discovered that she was pointing to a curious-looking craft which was standing amongst the rocks nearby.

He had not observed it when he had hurriedly scanned the surroundings a moment before. It appeared to be some kind of rocket ship, similar in many respects to Zarkov's, but with a nose that tapered into a keen point.

It was clear that it was empty, and, leading him across to it, Aura opened a door in the side of it and passed into the interior of the machine. He accompanied her, and as he stepped through the doorway she spoke to him quietly.

"You will be safe in here until I have talked with my father," she said.

"No," he retorted. "If you're going back to the palace I'm returning with you. I must find out what's happened to Dale."

Aura laid a hand on his arm.

"You could do no good," she told him. "Your presence would only do harm. My father is a strange man, and I am the only one who has any influence with him. Perhaps I can appease the wrath that you so foolishly aroused in him by your defiance. I cannot promise, but I will try."

Flash looked down at her somewhat shamefacedly.

"You must think me ungrateful," he said. "If it hadn't been for you, I wouldn't be alive now. I appreciate that—but just the same, I can't stay here without making any effort to reach Dale."

"I insist that you stay here," Aura replied. "And listen, if any of my father's men should come this way you must be prepared to take flight in this ship immediately. Look, I will show you how to control it."

She managed to convince him that her influence with her father was likely to prove far more effective than any reckless scheme that he could put into practice, and then she spent the next two or three minutes in explaining the mechanism of the rocket ship to him.

She also pointed out that the craft was equipped for fighting, and indicated a lever by which explosives that were lodged in a compartment of the vessel could be dropped on a foe; and by the time she had left him Flash Gordon possessed a fairly adequate knowledge of that rocket ship.

From the windows of it he watched her make her way towards the cavern whence they had emerged a little while previously, and after she had vanished from sight he turned to make a fresh inspection of the craft's interior.

It was as he was carrying out this inspection that he came upon a locker which contained some articles of clothing such as the people of Mongo wore—a pair of dark trunks made of some stuff that resembled wool, an embroidered tunic, a hide belt studded with metal buttons, and a pair of high boots.

He decided to change into these garments, reasoning that he would appear less conspicuous in them than in the tell-tale apparel of a son of the Earth.

While Flash was donning the clothes that he had found in the rocket ship, the Princess Aura was moving along the steep subterranean gallery by which she had conducted him to the plain, and as she passed through the ascending cavern a slight smile seemed to play about her lips.

And once, as she was climbing one of the many flights of steps, she gave tongue to her secret thoughts in a low, soliloquising voice.

"Never have I seen anyone like the Earth man," she mused. "So fair and so strong, so pleasing to the eyes. My father may do as he will with the girl, but he shall not harm the Earth man—"

The Lion Men

UP in the council-chamber of the palace, the Emperor Ming was awaiting the return of Torch and those of the guards who had hastened to the nether regions below his stronghold, and, while he waited, he glanced often at Dale and Zarkov.

"She is beautiful, is she not?" he said once to Zarkov, motioning to Dale with a thin hand and leering as he spoke.

The doctor made no answer, and presently Ming turned to the maidens of his court, now gathered around the lovely girl who had come amongst them from the distant planet known as the Earth.

"It is common knowledge," he remarked, "that I have wished to marry again ever since the death of Aura's mother. But until now there has been no one on whom I have looked with favour."

He had spoken in English, and on hearing his words Dale Arden paled. Then suddenly Dr. Zarkov strained forward in the arms of two soldiers who were grasping him.

"Your Majesty!" he exclaimed in a voice that shook. "You cannot mean—"

"That the Earth girl would be my choice of wife?" Ming interrupted, glancing at him swiftly. "Why not? It would be a great honour for her!"

"But you know nothing of her!" Zarkov cried. "And she is in love with Gordon!"

Ming's lids narrowed.

"I behold her loveliness," he said. "That is enough for me. As for this insolent Earth man whom you call Gordon, he is no more. You heard me instruct Torch to remove my daughter from the net and then withdraw it, so that Gordon would be cast to the dragons of death!"

Dale screamed out at that, and began to sob distractedly, whereupon Ming turned his sinister eyes upon her.

"Do not weep for a dead man, my pretty one," he said in a callous tone. "You will have a living emperor to comfort you."

Then, signing to the women of his court, he rapped out a brusque command.

"Take her to your quarters in the palace," he ordered. "See that she is attired in the wedding gown of a princess of Mongo. And summon the high priest. I wish to speak with him."

The maidens of the palace laid hands on Dale, and the struggling, grief-stricken girl was hurried from the council chamber, disappearing through the great doorway in the far wall.

When she had been removed, Ming looked at the men who were holding Zarkov.

"Torch should have returned by now," he muttered. "Listen, one of you remain here and tell him to report to me in the laboratory. Tell the High Priest that he may also come to me there. The rest of you follow me with the scientist from the Earth—"

"No, wait," he added on an afterthought. "Before we take him to the laboratory, see that he is fitted out with more suitable garments, such as one of my servitors might wear."

He paused, and eyed the learned American quizzically.

"Dr. Zarkov," he said, with the hint of a sneer in his voice. "I think that was how you called yourself, was it not? Dr. Zarkov, you will permit me to remark that those Earth clothes are offensive and incongruous to me, and, since you are to work with us, you must look like one of us."

Zarkov was consequently forced to change—not into a costly robe like the one that draped Ming's skinny frame, but into a kind of uniform which, had he but known it, was similar to an outfit that Flash Gordon was donning at this very moment, down in a rocket ship on the plain.

Having dressed himself in the clothes of a citizen of Ming's capital, Zarkov was conducted through the palace to a spacious apartment which he recognized at once as a laboratory, not very different from his own laboratory in America, but much more lavish, and fitted out with a great deal of apparatus that was new to him.

In the presence of the guards Ming proceeded to describe the equipment to Zarkov, and for the moment the doctor forgot his loathing for the heartless monarch of this strange planet—this emperor, as he termed himself, who had delved deep into the mysteries of science, and vested himself with an amazing power, which he could only see fit to use as a means of furthering his own mad ambitions.

For the moment Zarkov even forgot Dale and Flash, impressed as he was by the scientific wonders which Ming was now revealing to him.

The laboratory presented a spectacle of mechanised energy and electrical activity. Strange appliances crackled and sparkled on every hand, and mighty dynamos hummed ceaselessly. Before each and every unit of apparatus Ming paused to give an explanation of its purpose, and the alert, trained mind of Zarkov was quick to grasp the nature of those innumerable devices.

At last they halted in front of a great telescope, and Ming indicated it with a twisted smile.

"You may see your world through those lenses with startling clearness," he said. "Your world to which we are hurtling through the void. Strange, is it not, Zarkov, that a planet can travel through the firmament at an incredible rate, and yet seem motionless to those who live upon it? Aye, and stranger still that I am the one who is guiding its course—by the instruments in this room!"

Zarkov was gazing through the telescope, and the Emperor Ming regarded him coolly.

"Aye, watch your world, Zarkov," he continued. "Minute by minute you can see the outlines of its continents grow more distinct while it turns on its axis. We are rushing nearer—nearer—"

"But we are near enough for my purpose even now, Zarkov; and see, I have but to touch a switch and the onward momentum of the planet Mongo is checked."

He had turned to a massive control-board close by, and was drawing down a lever there.

"That is all," he murmured. "We feel nothing. Our senses register no change. But Mongo has ceased to rush towards the Earth. Look through that telescope again an hour hence—a day hence—a year hence, if you like. Mongo will be no nearer to your world."

Zarkov drew in his breath. If Ming were to be believed, then he had just seen him perform a miracle.

"Now tell me," the emperor said, "how does my workshop compare with those on Earth?"

"There is no comparison!" Zarkov exclaimed. "This—this is a scientist's paradise. The control of radio-active energy here is great enough to dominate the entire firmament, the entire universe!"

"To conquer the entire universe," Ming put in viciously, exultantly. "And that I intend to do with your aid, Zarkov. For, odd as it may seem, I need you. You can forge the last link in the chain of my ambitions—you, who had made a discovery that has hitherto escaped me—you, who can teach me how to build ships that can fly through space from planet to planet!"

Zarkov made no response, but kept his thoughts to himself. He was no coward—he merely realised that he alone stood any hope of saving the peoples of the Earth from this power-drunk fanatic's designs. He must pretend to bow before Ming's will, and bide his time.

Thus did the doctor reflect, and then

Flash seized him by the throat, and simultaneously Thun pressed his sword against the wretch's body.

all at once the door of the laboratory was opened and Torch appeared.

"Your Majesty," the captain of the bodyguard reported tensely, "the Earth man Gordon has escaped. We found no trace of him or of the Princess Aura on the net—only the three barbarians, whom we cast to the dragons. And we have searched the passages in vain, your Majesty."

It was heartening news for Zarkov, but not for Ming, whose eyes blazed venomously.

"My daughter will return," he barked. "We shall learn where this man Gordon is then."

He dismissed Torch, and it was as the latter was making his way from the laboratory that an elderly man in striking raiment crossed the threshold.

The newcomer was the High Priest, and, bowing gravely to the emperor, he spoke in a sepulchral tone:

"I have just learned of your Majesty's desire to wed the Earth girl," he said, "but the maidens of the court ask me to inform you that she refuses to become your bride, and I do not have to remind your Majesty that the gods frown upon a marriage in which either the man or woman is an unwilling participant."

Ming scowled, and fingered his dark beard.

"We could use the hypnotic machine," he muttered at length. "The machine which reduces the mind to a passive state and leaves the victim submissive to the will of others. The Earth girl would not be in a position then to anger the gods by expressing unwillingness. You see, my friend, science can overcome all things—even the human emotions."

The High Priest bowed again, and departed from the laboratory, and Ming turned to note that Zarkov was eyeing him bitterly.

"You do not seem to be in favour of my plans regarding the Earth girl," he observed, as he saw the doctor's expression.

Zarkov attempted to make some reply, but before he could do so there was a scuffle of feet in the doorway of the workshop, and a seared-looking soldier burst into the room.

"Your Majesty," the fellow panted, "the ships of the Lion Men are approaching in the sky! Four of them, your Majesty! They are coming to attack us!"

Ming's sallow face changed colour, and, striding to the windows of the laboratory, he peered forth to see four machines of the gyro type cruising towards his mountain citadel.

He swung around as Zarkov joined him.

"They must have learned that my fleet was absent on an expedition into the distant country of the barbarians!" he said harshly. "They would not have dared to attack otherwise."

"Who are these enemies of yours?" Zarkov demanded.

"The Lion Men, as they call themselves!" Ming snarled. "They are a people on Mongo who have long stood in my path. Now they send four emissaries to strike at me when I am unprepared. These four ships can do great damage—they can wreck my entire palace—my entire city—they can smash this workshop to atoms. My laboratory! My laboratory!"

The four gyro-ships were approaching swiftly. In sixty seconds they were above the mountain metropolis; above the palace; and suddenly there was a reverberating explosion as some deadly missile fell within a short distance of Ming's stronghold.

It was followed by another and another, and the walls of the laboratory trembled. In the meantime the Emperor

Ming was wringing his hands and acting like a man bereft of his senses, and he seemed in an extremity of despair when Zarkov clutched him all at once by the arm.

"Look!" the doctor exclaimed, pointing through the windows to the boulder-strewn plain away at the foot of the mountain.

From that distant plain a bullet-shaped craft had soared unexpectedly, was speeding now to engage the machines of the Lion Men. Like a meteor it soared, and, though the occupants of the gyro-ships tried to gain height so that they might meet its onset, the lone vessel rapidly outstripped them in altitude.

Then it swooped down upon the helicopters of the Lion Men, and in another instant a desperate duel was in progress high amid the clouds.

"It is one of my own rocket-ships!" Ming cried. "A gallant pilot—single-handed—has come to my aid!"

"A brave man," Zarkov commented feelingly.

"Yes," the emperor jerked, "and he will be royally rewarded if he lives through this fight."

It would have amazed them both if they could have discovered that the gallant pilot of the rocket-ship was none other than—Flash Gordon!

The Claws of the Monster

IT was fortunate for Flash Gordon that he had paid heed to Aura's instructions when she had told him how to control the rocket-ship, and it was fortunate for him, too, that the capabilities of the craft were far superior to those of the helicopters flown by the Lion Men.

Diving upon one of the hostile machines, he pulled the switch that sprung the trap containing those explosives which the rocket-ship was carrying. An object resembling a bomb was promptly released, and there was a burst of fire as it struck its mark.

It did not wreck the enemy vessel, but crippled it, and the helicopter veered away. Next moment Flash was challenging another of his adversaries, all of whom were endeavouring to close in on him.

Glittering fingers of light shot from the gyro-ships, searchingly, and Flash guessed that ray-guns were included in the equipment of those machines. Remembering what he had seen of such ray-guns in Mongo already, he did his utmost to keep his craft clear of them—at the same time singling out one of his antagonists for retaliation.

The flexibility of the rocket-ship was his salvation. Within the space of a minute he had damaged another of the helicopters so severely that it, too, was forced to retire from the combat, and it had not gone far on its way when a third gyro was making off like a wounded bird.

With three of the raiders departing in the direction whence they had come, Flash concentrated his attention on the remaining vessel, whose pilot seemed undaunted by the fate of his comrades, for he was still trying to bring the American under the sights of his ray-gun.

Flash managed to outwit him, and, soaring high, put the rocket-ship into a dive and swooped over his opponent's craft. But this time when he tugged at the bomb-release switch there was no result, and he realised with dismay that he had used his last missile.

Meanwhile his dive had carried him beyond and below his enemy's helicopter, and, wheeling, he saw a death-ray strike out from the gyro-ship. It passed above him, but he knew that it would soon find its target, and in desperation he sent his machine straight at the foe, determined that if he were to die he would first make sure that the raider did no further damage to Ming's palace.

With the rocket-ship coming towards him the pilot of the other craft lost his head, however, and made an attempt to swerve.

He only succeeded in turning broad-side-on to the rocket-ship, and there was a grinding shock as the keen nose of the latter pierced the tough shell of the gyro. Then both machines began to fall, the propeller of the gyro still spinning and its motor still giving the vessel a tendency to remain in the air, though the weight of the machine that was embedded in its metal plates was dragging it down.

Locked together, the two ships descended slowly through the void, and, drifting high over the roofs of the Emperor Ming's city, they finally sank upon an expanse of level terrain away on the other side of the mountain.

As the vessels grounded, Flash Gordon stumbled out of the rocket-ship, bruised in every limb and badly shaken. Yet, dazed as he was, he was aware of a figure crawling from the buckled gyro—the figure of a man whose hair was like a lion's mane and whose chin was hidden behind the tangled locks of a great beard.

His back and chest were encased in armour, and, oddly enough, he was clutching a heavy sword, a weapon that seemed almost incongruous in his hand, considering the craft from which he had emerged and the ray-gun with which it had been equipped.

Yet that sword was capable of dealing death, and with upraised blade the bearded man rushed at Flash impetuously.

The young American was unarmed, and his brain was by no means clear. But somehow he managed to collect his wits, and, leaping aside even as his antagonist came within striking distance, he dodged the swing of the sword. Then, in the moment that the fellow was blundering past him, Flash whipped his bunched knuckles into action and caught him with a punch that sent him sprawling in the dust.

The sword slid from the bearded man's grasp, and with a swift movement Flash seized it, lifting it from the ground and standing over his foe, who lay where he had fallen and looked up at the American with an expression of dumb resignation in his eyes.

"Get on your feet," said Flash.

His vanquished opponent stared at him, and then, after a brief silence, he rose with an effort and spoke to the younger man in English.

"Why do you not slay me?"

"I have no quarrel with you," Flash replied. "I saw you pass over the mountain and start to bomb Ming's stronghold, so I attacked you. But I fought only to save two friends of mine who are prisoners in that palace."

"Then—you are not an ally of Ming's?"

Flash shook his head, and proceeded to explain how he and Dale Arden and Zarkov had come to Mongo, and how he had fared at Ming's hands; and when he had finished his story the bearded man looked at him keenly.

"I am Thun, Prince of the Lion Men," he said. "Ming is also my enemy. And since you have spared my life, Earth Man, I will help you free the prisoners of whom you speak."

Flash hesitated.

"I promised to await the Princess Aura at a cavern on the far side of the mountain," he breathed. "But she may

"TOO TOUGH TO KILL"

O'Hara had sent for him, disturbed by the complete disappearance of Ann and Willie.

"I haven't seen 'em around," Danny declared.

"Well, where the devil can they be?" growled O'Hara. "I left 'em in Miss Miller's cabin."

"I guess it'll be a relief to have that girl out of the way, won't it?" suggested Danny; but O'Hara was not prepared to admit that.

"If all of us were as interested in doing our work as that girl is," he said, "we'd get somewhere around here."

The telephone bell rang, and Danny answered the call.

"What?" he exclaimed. "Wait a minute!" He held out the instrument. "There's been an accident at the cave-in!"

O'Hara spoke to Anderson.

"I'll be there right away," he said when he had heard the schemer's story, and down went the telephone. But before he went out with Danny he took two automatics from a locked drawer of his desk, and he handed one to Danny and pocketed the other.

In the tool-shed Swede Mulhousen was left in charge of Ann and Willie, and Anderson went out with the others.

"Be quiet," he said to them, "and keep out of sight until O'Hara has gone by."

Mulhousen sat on an upturned box under the shelf to which Willie's camera-case had been restored. He looked at the two prisoners, yawned, and produced a flask of spirits from a pocket.

"Here's looking at you," he said ironically, and drank deep.

It had seemed very dark in the shed when first the lights were switched off, but Ann and Willie could see each other quite clearly now. Swede Mulhousen closed his eyes and leaned back against the wall, and Ann knocked her head against Willie's face to draw his attention to the fact that there were several heavy things on the shelf over their custodian's head, as well as the camera-case.

The shelf was supported by wholly inadequate brackets and a prop of wood. Willie, following with his eyes the direction of Ann's persistent nods, understood at last. He rolled over and over across the floor and suddenly struck out with his bound feet at the prop.

The prop fell, the shelf gave way—and down cascaded half a dozen boxes of tools and the camera-case, mostly on Swede Mulhousen's bent head. He fell forward on his face unconscious, and Willie wriggled his way to the camera-case and in spite of bound wrists tried to get hold of his flash-lamp which was lying on the floor.

At the third attempt he succeeded, and just as O'Hara was passing the shed with Danny a vivid flash of light startled them.

"See what that is," directed O'Hara, and jumped on to the motor-truck Ann had used and drove it on into the tunnel.

Danny entered the tool-shed; Anderson and his companions ran out from the equipment warehouse.

"It's O'Hara all right!" Anderson proclaimed with evil satisfaction. "We'll time him!"

They went back into the warehouse, and they did not see the lights go on in the tool-shed as Danny entered it. But Danny saw Ann, sitting on the floor bound and gagged, and he saw Willie drop the flash-lamp.

Swiftly removing the handkerchief from the girl's mouth he set her on her feet to unfasten the ropes.

"They're going to kill him!" she exclaimed, as soon as she could find her voice.

"Who?" asked Danny. "Anderson?"

"No—O'Hara! They're going to blow up the tunnel from here, somehow! We've got to stop him before he gets too far inside it!"

"If they're gonna do it from here," said Danny, unfastening the last of the knots in the rope that bound her legs, "there must be a plunger around." He glanced all about the shed. "Where is it?"

"I don't know." She turned towards the door.

"Where are you going?" he asked.

"I'm going after him!"

"You can't do that!" He caught hold of her arm. "It's suicide! The only chance you've got to stop him is to telephone one of the stations along the line."

"I'll try that," she promised, and then he let go of her and she ran out.

A motor-truck was on a siding, a little way south of the shed. She set the points for the line that went into the tunnel and then she climbed on to the truck and set it going.

Anderson, in the equipment warehouse, looked at his watch.

"We'll give him three more minutes," he decided; and at that moment the sound of a truck on the rails sent him and his companions crowding round a window.

"It's the girl!" exclaimed Joe in amazement.

"Let her go," said Anderson.

"Couldn't have fastened her up very tight, Nick, but it'll save us a lot of trouble. Come on, let's get on that plunger!"

They streamed out from the warehouse; but Danny and Willie were waiting for them at the side of the tool-shed, and Danny had an automatic in his hand.

"Stay where you are!" he commanded harshly, striding towards them; and the four stopped short in dismay. "Start reaching, all of you! Stick 'em up!"

Up went four pairs of hands, and their owners were driven backwards into the shed, where Willie switched on the lights again.

"Now where's that plunger?" rasped Danny.

"I don't know what you're talking about," blustered Anderson.

"Look for it, Willie," said Danny.

"When you find it, disconnect the wires."

Willie searched all over the shed, but he could not find the plunger.

"Here, take this," said Danny, "and keep them covered. I'll find it."

He handed over the automatic, and Willie held it none too steadily. He was not used to firearms.

"You're crazy!" exploded Anderson, watching Danny as he prowled about the shed.

"Maybe I am," said Danny, and came to the telephone and looked down at a bare wire on the floor in front of it. Anderson made a movement, but Willie immediately cried out:

"No, you don't! Start reaching for the stars, or something!"

On the floor near the bare wire was what appeared to be an empty box, upside down. Danny stooped and raised it—and underneath was the plunger.

He flung away the box and ripped two wires from the terminals on the canister-like contrivance. But behind Willie's back Swede Mulhousen had sat up and was staring at the upraised hands of his fellow conspirators.

The telephone bell rang. Ann had reached the first wall-instrument in the tunnel and was trying to get O'Hara at the junction. Mulhousen rose up, lurched forward, and knocked the automatic out of Willie's hand.

Anderson and Shane promptly rushed at Danny, who sprang up to defend himself. Mulhousen struck out at Willie, but over-reached himself and went sprawling, and Nick Pollack tried to grab the little sports photographer, only to receive a jolt in the jaw that surprised him. Willie was not quite the weakling he looked.

Ann Gets Her Man!

AT the junction, O'Hara stopped the truck he was driving and jumped down from it because the telephone bell was ringing. To his astonishment it was Ann's voice he heard as he put the receiver to his ear.

She told him of all that had happened, and she said frantically:

"You've got to get out of there! They're liable to blow up the place any minute!"

O'Hara looked along the tunnel for wires, or any sign of a charge, but could see neither. But he could not doubt Ann's story.

"Listen," he said, "there are men at the cave-in. I've got to get them out."

"You haven't time," she protested. "You don't understand! You're going to be killed any minute!"

"Ann," said O'Hara, "you get out of the tunnel—I'm going ahead!"

He slammed the receiver back on its prongs, climbed on to the truck, and drove on to the scene of the cave-in.

There were nearly twenty men at work there, until he stopped them, and it was impossible for them all to crowd on to one motor-truck. On its side lay a muck-car which had been knocked off the rails by the fall of rock in the morning and was half-buried under rubbish.

"Our only chance to get out of here alive," he cried, "is to get this car back on the track! Come on, boys, come on!"

They were all working feverishly to get the muck-car clear and back on the rails when a rumble of wheels grew louder and louder, and they turned to see Ann speeding towards them on a motor-truck. O'Hara flew to meet her.

"I told you to get out of this tunnel!" he cried in horror as she applied the brakes.

"But I had to come after you," she said with a little twisted smile of defiance.

"Well, at least you've given us a chance to get out of here alive!" He beckoned to the men. "Come on!" he shouted urgently. "Half of you on each truck—quick!"

The men needed no second bidding; they scrambled on to the two trucks, and Ann sent hers rattling back through the tunnel, and O'Hara followed on his.

The region of bare rock was left behind, the junction was passed, and the concreted section was reached, while in the tool-shed Danny fought desperately against overwhelming odds, and Willie was knocked down again and again, only to rise for further punishment.

Several times Anderson tried to find the automatic, but it had fallen behind some sacks of cement. Mulhousen tried to find it, but was knocked completely out by a shovel Willie brought down upon his head. Danny, at last, was held powerless against a wall by Joe and Shane, and Willie was sent spinning against a crate by Anderson, who yelled to Nick Pollack to connect the wires to the plunger.

The wires were connected, and Anderson tightened the terminals.

"There, that's got it!" he cried. "Let her go!"

Down went the lever, and somewhere in the distance there followed an explosion that seemed to make the very air in the shed vibrate. Dense clouds of smoke issued from the mouth of the tunnel as Anderson looked out. But with the smoke came two motor-trucks, crowded with men, and Anderson dived back into the shed as he saw O'Hara leap down from the second truck.

"He's not dead! He's here!" he howled. "Get him!"

Shane let go of Danny, and as O'Hara burst in at the door with an automatic in his hand the giant seized the hand that held the gun and jerked it backwards over O'Hara's shoulder. But with his left hand Danny gripped the hand that had wrested the gun away, and with his right hand he secured the weapon.

O'Hara whirled round and his assailant went down like a log. Danny handed back the automatic.

"Thanks," said O'Hara, and he drove the rest of the crooks into a corner with their hands above their heads. "Call the police at Indio, Danny, and tell 'em to get down here right away!"

Danny obeyed only too readily. Willie, a dishevelled wreck, tottered forward holding a hand to his head.

"I-I held 'em back as long as I could," he stammered.

"Good boy, Willie," said O'Hara. "Where's the girl? Are you fit enough to go and find her?"

Willie went out from the shed, very weak at the knees, and he staggered across the camp to the office because he was quite sure he would find Ann there.

He was not mistaken. She was in O'Hara's room, sitting on his desk with his telephone in her hands, ringing up the "Los Angeles Chronicle."

O'Hara was in the city of Los Angeles sooner than he had expected to be, because he had to attend the trial of Amos Mulhern and Bill Anderson.

Mulhern was charged with tampering with the Whitney Tunnel construction; Anderson confessed to attempted murder. Mulhern was sentenced to five years' imprisonment, Anderson to twenty-five.

Swede Mulhousen, Nick Pollack, Dave Shane, and Joe Gibbons received severe sentences for their part in the murder plot, and Ann herself wrote the story that appeared in the "Chronicle" of John O'Hara's promotion to partnership with James Whitney.

She was at her desk, the morning after the jury had given their verdict, when O'Hara walked into the reporters' room with his hat in his hand and a smile on his face. Whether she had expected him, or not, it was lunch-time and her hat was on her head. She stood up and made a face at him.

"I thought I told you not to come up here when I gave you my address," she said. "Besides, you're late! I ought to have gone to lunch ten minutes ago!"

O'Hara's smile broadened.

"There's an excavation down the street," he lied. "I simply couldn't tear myself away."

"Any steel reinforcements, or timber segments to lean on?" asked Ann brightly.

"Sure."

"Then what are we waiting for?"

"They went out from the reporters' room arm-in-arm."

"THE SAGEBRUSH TROUBADOUR"

Gene took the reins from her numbed fingers and exerted all his strength. There seemed a sheer drop ahead and he strove to turn the runaways. He succeeded, but it was too much for the buckboard. An axle snapped, the buckboard sagged and one corner ploughed its way into the soft ground. The man got a grip of the girl and next second they went hurtling through the air.

Over and over they rolled with Gene striving with one free hand and his feet to check their pace. A hillock brought them up with a jolt that nearly broke his back. Winded and bruised they lay huddled close together—from a distance seemingly dead.

"Why don't you stay home where you belong?" Gene gasped out, as the girl gave a faint moan.

Her eyes opened and she flashed him an indignant glance.

"I would have made it if you hadn't tried that circus act. You try spanking me and see what you get."

The pounding of hoofs made Gene turn his head, and he saw two horsemen some distance away.

"Lie still and feign you're out," whispered Gene. "And you will get spanked if you don't do as I say."

It was Lon and Hank. They had seen the whole incident from their look-out on the hillside. They dismounted and stared down at the prone figures.

"Knocked out," Lon chuckled. "Dunno what this means. Maybe this pesky killer was going to kidnap Joan. We'll bind him."

"And share the reward," suggested the crafty Hank.

But they got a surprise when they laid hands on Gene, for he came unexpectedly to life. Hank was tossed over his head and Lon got a punch in the ribs that robbed that young adventurer of all his breath. They got to their feet to find themselves staring down the barrel of a gun.

"Keep your hands in the air," drawled Gene. Neatly he frisked them of their guns and tossed them away.

"Do your worst," defiantly cried Lon. "We ain't scared of you. You don't kill us like you did old Martin."

"You two are after Martin's gold mine, aren't you?" questioned Gene.

They looked at him suspiciously.

"What if we are?" growled Hank.

"Well, I'm not you'll be pleased to hear," Gene grinned. "You've known for a long time that Martin had found gold and you've been snooping around trying to find it, but without success. You must have learnt about the mine when you came to the ranch to see Joan, and either you told Hank or he found out some way."

"Martin owed me a bill and——" began Hank.

Gene silenced him by turning the gun in his direction.

"We're not interested, but for your information I'll tell you how to find the mine." He gave them explicit instructions. "And if you want to go and look at the mine," he concluded, as he pouched his gun. "we won't stop you."

Lon and Hank raced for their horses, sprang into the saddle and were gone.

Joan got up slowly from the ground. "My mine!" she said with heavy sarcasm. "This mine isn't recorded, and those two cheap chisellers can now take the mine for themselves."

"Perhaps!" Gene laughed tantalizingly, and whistled. Champion trotted towards them.

"What kind of game are you playing?" she demanded after he had helped her into the saddle. "Who are you?"

"Contain your curiosity for just a while longer." Gene jumped up behind her. "And then you'll know who murdered your grandfather."

The Gold Mine

JOHN MARTIN and Pablo led the J swayback as far as the spot where old Martin had been murdered and then released the curious-shaped animal. The swayback trudged stolidly towards the hills, and dawn was nigh when they came to what seemed barren rock. It was Pablo who forced his way through a clump of mesquite and shouted that there was an opening in the cliff face.

Martin noticed an old barrow and other signs that once human hands had been at work. He felt that Martin's gold mine was as good as his. He flashed a torch and entered a shallow tunnel.

After going a short distance the two men found themselves in an inner cavern. Plenty of signs of human occupation but no signs of gold. The place was musty and thick with cobwebs. There were a number of shovels and picks in one corner, an old table and a broken chair, but no sacks of gold dust.

"There's no gold here," cried Martin. "Senior, there must be," answered the half-breed. "Look, there is a door."

Martin forced open a rickety door and passed into a smaller cavern. Again there were a chair and a table, picks and shovels, sieves, and bags that were full of cement. Rough boarding was on the floor, but there was no sign of any other door.

"It's the old man's headquarters right enough," cried Martin. "But where's the mine?"

"Senior, look!" Pablo pointed at a trapdoor and a ring. "I think, senior, that there is your mine."

"Help me lift the trap." Martin rushed forward, and they had just succeeded in lifting up the heavy wooden trap when both men stiffened. They had heard a sound.

Martin whipped out a gun. Into the room came a dusty, perspiring Nolan.

"Tried to double-cross me, did you?" he snarled at them. "But I fooled you. I followed you all the way from the ranch."

"I found this mine first and you're too late," sneered Martin. "For once you ain't been so clever. Don't make a move, Nolan, or I'll drill you full of lead. You're staying here with Pablo whilst I ride into town and record——"

The words died away on his lips because he had heard voices. A moment later came the sound of heavy footfalls. Martin's face was ugly as Lon and Hank appeared.

"Looking for something?" he drawled.

"So you beat us to it!" raged Lon. "Still you ain't recorded your claim yet, and we'll make town before you do."

"Oh, no, you don't," Martin shook his head. "You guys are keeping Lawyer Nolan company down in the mine. Make the most of it because you won't be invited into my mine again."

All this while Nolan had been edging nearer and nearer to Martin. Suddenly he rushed and knocked up the gun hand. There was an explosion that brought down stones from the roof. Lon and Hank jumped forward, and in a moment it was a fight of three against two.

Almost leisurely Gene and the girl rode towards the mine. Joan had tried questioning, but the big man refused to give any explanation. When they reached the mine Gene pointed to the horses and the swayback.

"I think most of our friends have arrived." He pointed to a ridge. "See those specks. That's the sheriff and his posse. We're going to have such a pleasant little party."

"But if the sheriff catches you here you'll be arrested."

"I don't think so. Come, Joan, let's go inside and see how everyone is getting along." He pushed back the mesquite so the girl could pass. Then he bent his shoulders to enter the mine. They came into the first cave.

"What's going on in there?" demanded Joan. "It sounds like men fighting."

"Probably fighting over who shall have the mine," Gene drew out a gun. "Let's go and join the fight."

Very quietly they entered the inner room and found Martin and Pablo getting the worst of the fight.

"Folks!" Gene bellowed, and that stopped the fight. Five angry, suspicious men glared at Gene and Joan, but they didn't try anything because of the gun that the big fellow carried.

"Guess this is where we have a little pow-wow," drawled Gene, and with his gun indicated the various sacks. "Be seated—make yourselves comfortable."

That gun made them obey his orders. "You killed Martin!" accused Hank Polk.

"We'll find that out when the sheriff shows up," answered Gene. "Unless my ears mistake me that's the sheriff and his men."

When the sheriff and his deputies rushed in he found Gene calmly holding up five cowed men. His gaze was bewildered, and questioning.

"Take a seat, sheriff," Gene requested. "I got some talking to do." He waited until they had taken up various positions. "I'll begin by telling you I'm a Ranger—assigned to the Martin murder case. Now, Mr. Nolan, as a lawyer associated with the late Mr. Martin, suppose you tell us the reason the killer or killers might have had for the murder."

Nolan's small, beady eyes flickered nervously. "Well, it's probable that the murderer only wished to torture Mr. Martin—to make him tell where the mine was. But the victim was weak—half blind, and he died. The killer got frightened—and he fled—without removing the tell-tale guitar string."

"Now anyone here could have had a motive for the crime," Gene looked all round the gathering. "As a matter of fact, the killer is here right now!"

"Ain't you a smart detective," sneered Lon.

"The killer wasn't very smart, Lon." Gene took from his pocket the fatal guitar string. "This string shows that it was played with a pick—very unusual in this part of the country. Hank Polk plays a guitar, and so do you, Lon Danvers—and you both use picks." Gene produced a small pick. "On this little stick are the fingerprints of the murderer. My fellow ranger, Frog, is a fingerprint expert. At the ranch he got the fingerprints of all you suspects. These fingerprints were compared and prove conclusively who killed Martin. The man was—"

"You'll never take me alive," Nolan snouted hoarsely as he leapt to his feet.

Before anyone realised quite what the lawyer planned to do he was climbing down through the open trapdoor. Joan wondered why Gene did not use his gun. All heard a scuffling, and then to the surprise of all except Gene, the lawyer scrambled back into the room and stared round like a cornered rat. A moment later up bobbed the head and shoulders of a convict—it was the grinning face of Frog Millhouse. Gene put a protecting arm round the girl, whilst the other arm gripped Nolan.

"Sheriff, that's the man that killed old man Martin." Gene indicated the lawyer. "Arrest him!"

The sheriff produced handcuffs and snapped them over Nolan's wrists. He drew out his gun. "So you're the treacherous car that downed old man Martin? I always thought you was a rattlesnake."

Lon walked across to the open trapdoor.

"How did you happen to be hiding in the mine tunnel?"

Frog grinned.

"That was Gene Antry's plan. He knew where this place was—he followed the swayback up here yesterday. Any more questions, pard?"

There were none. The sheriff took charge. He eyed the sockers after the Martin gold mine severely.

"Guess it would be wise if you men hit the trail. I'd like a talk with you, Antry."

Only three people remained at the mine—Joan, Gene and Frog.

The last-named scratched his head.

"I heard you say something about me being a famous fingerprint expert—how come I got such a reputation?"

"You haven't," Gene laughed. "That was a bluff to force the guilty man to show his hand."

"I suppose you know that Uncle John, Hank and Lon are racing for town," spoke Joan. "The mine belongs to the one that first records it."

Frog chuckled and winked at his partner.

"Well, ma'am, them hombres are sure gonna be embarrassed when they hit town. You see, Gene had one of the Rangers record the mine in your name yesterday."

Then did Joan fully appreciate what Gene Antry had done for her, and her eyes shone with gratitude. Gene gazed fondly at the girl and took her unresisting hands in his own large ones. Frog Millhouse produced his guitar and began to strum, and the birds were silent as Gene Antry began to sing:

"I'd love to wed a girl I met

In a stagecoach on the prairie.

I'd love to say to-day's the day

When you and I will marry.

But I must find a girl that's sweet,

You see the point, of course—

If frown she must, I think it just

To stay in love with my horse!"

But Joan Martin was not frowning.

"FLASH GORDON"

not have been successful, and I'm anxious to find out what's happened."

"Then follow me," Thun told him. "I know something of Ming's palace, for we were not always enemies. There is a secret passage on this side of the mountain, too, and it will take us to his stronghold, though we must exercise great caution."

Thus it was under the guidance of this prince of the Lion Men that Flash Gordon found his way back to the palace of the Emperor Ming, and about half an hour after their encounter on the plain he and Thun might have been seen stealing along a corridor in the sinister monarch's imposing residence.

It was as they turned an angle of this corridor that they came face to face with two men who were hurrying in the opposite direction.

One was a member of Ming's body-guard, and Thun instantly threatened him with his sword, which Flash had returned to him. In the same moment the American leapt towards the other man who had appeared with the emperor's hincing, but stopped short as he recognised Zarkov.

"Flash!" the doctor ejaculated. "Where did you come from?"

The younger man gave him a brief account of his adventures, Thun keeping a watch on Ming's retainer in the meantime, and only taking his eyes off the latter when Flash presented Zarkov.

"Thank heavens you are alive, Flash, anyway," the doctor said at length. "And listen, I have something to tell you. The Earth will not be destroyed—no clash of planets will take place for the progress of Mongo towards the world has been checked."

"Good," his fellow-countryman rejoined in a heartfelt tone. "But I want to hear about Dale. Where is she?"

A look of distress crossed Zarkov's features at mention of the girl's name.

"Ming intends to make her his bride," he answered huskily, "and has placed her in a trance for that purpose. I saw her a little while ago. She was like a creature in a dream. That fiend! He ordered me to be present at the ceremony, and I was on my way there with this soldier when you came face to face with us!"

Flash was staring at him in horror, and for a minute or more he seemed unable to speak. Then he clutched the doctor by the arm.

"Zarkov, we can't let him get away with this!" he cried out. "We've got to stop him! We've got to! Where is this ceremony to take place?"

"In an underground room below the palace," the older man rejoined. "I believe a flight of steps at the end of this corridor leads down to it. Ming and his court are already there—and I understand the Princess Aura is there, too, acting as one of Dale's hand-maidens. Apparently she returned some time ago, but would not say where you were hiding."

Flash ground his teeth together. "Never mind the Princess Aura," he rapped out. "It's Dale we've got to think of. Come on, we're going to break up that ceremony."

He turned in a hot-headed fashion but Thun laid a hand on his arm.

"Wait, my friend," he commanded. "You would be killed on sight by Ming's guards. Your only hope is to take everyone in that room by surprise, and, re-ing your Earth girl, escape before they have recovered. But first let your friend Zarkov proceed to the ceremony. Ming may send men to look for him if he delays much longer."

Flash persuaded Zarkov to depart, and Thun and the young American were left alone with the trembling and silent creature whom the prince of the Lion Men was threatening with his sword.

"What's your plan," Flash demanded of Thun, "if you have one in mind?"

"I know that there is a secret entrance to the room where the weddings of Ming's court take place," was the reply. "I cannot tell you how to reach that secret entrance, but this man here will show us the way, and assuredly we can launch a surprise from it—a surprise that may well leave the emperor and his guests completely dumbfounded. At least, I am willing to take the risk with you, Earth man, for you spared my life down there on the plain."

Flash turned towards the soldier who was cowering before Thun.

"You know the way to this secret entrance?" he queried sharply.

"Yes," the man panted, "but I'll not take you there!"

Flash seized him by the throat, and simultaneously Thun pressed his sword against the wretch's body. In a few seconds the captive was gasping out an appeal for mercy.

"Listen," he stammered, "listen, I will take you to the tunnel that leads to the secret entrance Thun has spoken of. But I will not go into the tunnel with you, for it is the lair of a monster. That tunnel—is the lair of a monster."

Flash threw the man from him contemptuously, ordering him to act as their guide and waste no time in doing so. Whatever this fellow might babble concerning monsters, the young American was resolved to do all in his power to prevent Ming from carrying out his design.

With hesitant steps the soldier began to move towards a gallery that was an off-shoot of the corridor in which they had been standing, and Flash and Thun followed him, warning him that he would pay for any treachery with his life.

Slowly and warily they moved on, and at length they descended into a realm of vaults below the palace. Through several of these vaults they passed, and then they came to a halt before a heavy door of timber.

"The tunnel is beyond that door," their guide said querulously. "It will take you to a secret panel behind the statue of the god Taos, in the wedding-room—"

He stopped, for at that instant a dim, booming sound was heard, a sound like the stroke of a gong somewhere in the distance.

"What was that?" Flash muttered. It was Thun who answered him.

"A signal from the wedding-room. It means that the ceremony is about to begin!"

Flash Gordon's face seemed to tighten, and, wheeling upon the door which their abject guide had indicated, he unfastened the bolts that held it and dragged it open.

Even as he did so he heard a shout behind him, and turned to see two figures hurrying through the vaults. They were the figures of two of Ming's underlings, who must have had occasion to come down to those subterranean regions for some reason or other, and who had unluckily caught sight of the intruders near the tunnel door.

One of the newcomers was unarmed, but the other was grasping a weapon which both Thun and Flash recognised as a ray-gun.

The guards advanced, and the man who had guided Flash and his ally to the vaults stepped forward to join them, blurting out a feverish account of the manner in which he had been taken prisoner. But before he was half-way through his narrative Thun had leapt upon the soldier with the ray-gun, striking the deadly instrument from his hand.

Next second a furious scuffle was in progress, a scuffle into which Flash was about to hurl himself when he became aware of a movement behind him.

Involuntarily he looked over his shoulder, and the blood froze in his veins at the spectacle which met his eyes—at the hideous, ghoulish thing which suddenly loomed up amid the shadows of the tunnel, with slaving beak and baleful eyes, with awful claws that seized his body in a vice-like grip and swept him from his feet!

So Director Lloyd—a true diplomat, by the by—settled the problem in an unilitary way. He instructed the 600 soldiers to keep step with Ratoff—and the expedient bore results.

"Under Two Flags," the most ambitious of the series of pictures which Darryl F. Zanuck is to produce personally, is cast with Ronald Colman, Claudette Colbert and Victor McLaglen in the principal rôles.

Playing "L"

The technicians of Capitol Films invented an amusing new game during the production of "Love in Exile," which co-stars Clive Brook and Helen Vinson with such talented support as Mary Carlisle, Ronald Squire, Cecil Ramage, Will Fyffe, and Tamara Desni.

From their perches high above the studio floor the technicians made daily notes of the number of times a player ruined a "take" by "fluffing" dialogue or forgetting movements or gestures.

At six o'clock each evening a learner-motorist's "L" sign was fastened on the dressing-room door of the unfortunate player who had made most mistakes during the day.

The cast thoroughly enjoyed the joke—an atmosphere of good humour helps the making of a comedy film tremendously—but neither words nor wealth could extract from anyone the name of the most frequent Learner.

Her Narrow Escape

Tutta Rolf, the Swedish film actress who is playing the leading rôle opposite her husband, Jack Donohue, in the new Fox-British production, "Rhythm in the Air," is an expert swimmer.

It was her ability at swimming and her powers of endurance that saved her life on one occasion.

On her first visit to Hollywood, she was washed overboard from the steamer during a midwinter gale in the Bay of Biscay. For nearly an hour she fought death in the icy water, as the huge waves buffeted her about.

Finally, a lifeboat which had been put over from the ship picked her up, exhausted. During her struggle she calmly divested herself of her hampering skirt, coat, blouse and slippers, and was attired only in some scanty lingerie when she was hauled into the lifeboat.

The crew of the lifeboat which effected the rescue were awarded Carnegie Life Saving Medals as a result of this episode.

WESTERN COURAGE

As foreman of a "dude" ranch, Ken Baxter brings down upon himself the scorn of a beautiful heiress and decides that she needs taming; but in rescuing her from a worthless fortune-hunter both he and the girl fall into the clutches of a notorious outlaw—and Ken is unarmed! An unusual Western, starring Ken Maynard

WESTERN COURAGE

The Way of the West

THE train that had stopped at the little station of Sandy Fork long enough only for three passengers to descend from it, in company with their luggage, had become a mere speck in the southern distance. The Californian sun blazed down upon the bare platform, and the heat was intense.

All around was magnificent scenery, but there was not a human habitation in sight, and the only other human being—who was stationmaster, booking-clerk and signalman—had disappeared into his office.

According to their various natures the three passengers reacted to their discomfort. They were husband, wife, and daughter.

Henry Hanley, a millionaire whose bulk and greying brown hair suggested that he was half-way through the fifties, sat placidly on a brass-bound trunk with his back to the wall of the wooden structure which provided shelter for merchandise and for cattle, but not for wealthy holiday-makers.

Mrs. Hanley, a tallish and handsome woman considerably younger than her husband, prowled restlessly up and down the platform, and became hotter than ever as a result of her exertions.

Gloria Hanley, the spoiled daughter of these two, dumped herself on a suitcase within a few yards of her male parent and gnawed her enamelled finger-nails. She was a beautiful girl, but a petulant one, brought up in luxury and accustomed to having her own way.

Ten minutes passed, and then the auburn-haired prowler advanced to open the brass-bound box as to battle "Well, Henry Hanley," she exploded, "I hope you're satisfied!"

The millionaire merely grinned.
May 23rd, 1936.

"Why we ever had to come to a 'dude' ranch, I can't understand!" complained Gloria.

"You know very well why we came here," retorted her mother. "It was your father's idea! And here we are, without a soul to meet us, marooned in this broiling heat, without shelter, without water!"

"But not without words," said Mr. Hanley. "Besides, this is my vacation, and I—" In the distance he heard the sound of wheels and he broke off to look along the dusty road that paralleled the railway-track for a while, then curved away from it and disappeared downhill. "Here comes someone now!"

A buckboard drawn by two horses had breasted the hill and was approaching the station at leisure. Mrs. Hanley frowned in its direction.

"The very idea!" she exclaimed. "The least they could do is to hurry!"

"I've often thought that about you, my dear," purred her husband, "when I'm waiting for you to get dressed."

Driving the buckboard, or, to be more accurate, permitting the horses to pull it, was a bright-eyed and stalwart young fellow dressed in typical cowboy fashion, complete with gun-belt; and beside him lolled another cowpuncher, lean of face and of body, whose name was Herbert Dawkins, but who was known—quite appropriately—as Slim.

"Looks like we're a mite late, Ken," said Slim, viewing the three figures on the platform with a broad grin.

"Looks like it," agreed the holder of the reins.

The station was reached, the buckboard was stopped, and Slim proceeded to gather up the luggage on the platform while his companion tipped his cow-hat and greeted the three passengers collectively.

"Howdy, folks?" he said pleasantly.

"Are you the Hanleys?"

Mrs. Hanley bridled, but her husband rose instantly from the brass-bound trunk.

"Yes," he replied. "I'm Henry Hanley."

"I'm Ken Baxter, foreman of the Rancho Vista."

Hanley introduced his wife and daughter; Slim deposited suitcases and hat-boxes in the back of the buckboard.

"I'm not in the habit of being kept waiting," said Mrs. Hanley severely.

"Why weren't you here on time?"

"Why, the horses, ma'am," replied Ken. "I didn't want to get 'em overheated."

"I suppose it never occurred to you that my daughter and I might also get overheated?"

"Oh yes, ma'am," drawled Ken.

"I'm terribly sorry about that, but you see, in these parts, between horses and humans, we always favour the horses."

He went off to help Slim with the brass-bound trunk before Mrs. Hanley could utter another word.

"I'm going to like that bird!" quoth her husband delightedly.

The luggage was stowed away, chiefly under seats, and the Hanleys walked out to the buckboard.

"Hope we don't lose any o' this lot," remarked Ken. "Quite a few! All aboard, folks!"

Mrs. Hanley decided to ride in the back, and Slim helped her up into a seat.

"Any objection to my riding in front?" inquired Mr. Hanley.

Ken assured him that there was no objection at all; but Gloria had decided that she was going to sit beside the driver.

"Dutiful husbands should ride with their wives," she said. "I'll take the front seat."

"Some people like to ride in the front," said Ken, with a wink for Slim, "and some in the back. You can't always tell."

"I'm used to being helped," snapped Gloria.

"Oh, yes, ma'am." Ken lifted her up as though she were a feather, and dumped her in the front seat with a thud that sent her hat awry. "Oh, excuse me—I'm sorry. Slide over, now, will you?"

Indignantly she moved to the other end of the seat and straightened her hat. Her father had climbed into the back beside his wife, and Slim was perched on the brass-bound trunk. Ken took his seat and picked up the reins.

"All set?" he inquired over his shoulder.

"Yeah, let her go, Ken," responded Slim.

"We're off!"

He gave the reins a tug and the horses set off at a brisk pace. The station was left behind, the hill was descended. At the foot of it the road twisted between wire fences for a while, then lush pasture-land gave place to wooded patches and another downhill stretch.

Mrs. Hanley became aware that Slim had drawn a gun and was toying with it. She eyed him nervously and squeezed nearer to her husband. There came a sharp bend in the road and then a wall of rock on the right. At the wall of rock Slim fired the gun, and Mrs. Hanley jumped in her seat as though she herself had been shot.

"Slim, what're you doing back there?" shouted Ken.

"I was just practising," Slim shouted back.

The horses had trebled their speed and Ken was apparently tugging at the reins. Gloria took a cigarette-case and a lighter from her handbag and a cigarette from the case.

"Would you mind slowing down while I light this cigarette?" she asked in a voice that made the request practically a command.

"I'm sorry, miss," replied Ken. "I would if I could. The team's running away!"

"What?" she shrilled.

Faster and faster went the horses, and the buckboard swayed alarmingly round bends and corners. Gloria dropped the cigarette and held on to the back of the seat. Her mother, convinced that her last hour had come, clung to her husband and gritted her teeth in a determination not to shriek.

Down a steep hill tore the horses, as though utterly out of control, and then raced upwards, under trees. A gateway loomed up on the left—the gateway of a drive leading to a picturesque building of white adobe, Spanish style, with arches and balconies and a broad terrace above steps.

Mother and daughter were far too agitated to notice the building, but they could not fail to notice a crowd of people round the gateway, for as the horses miraculously slackened speed a fall score of voices chorused loudly:

"Welcome to Rancho Vista! How'd you enjoy the ride?"

The horses came to a standstill, just beyond the crowd, and Slim heaved himself from the buckboard to hold their heads. Ken descended.

"End o' the trail, folks!" he announced. "Everybody out!"

He grabbed hold of Gloria and set her down on her feet.

"I'm sorry I scared you, miss," he said, beaming at her. "It was all framed for a joke, but they actually got away from me."

"Oh, you didn't frighten me!" she snapped at him.

"Well, you'll get a chance to laugh at the others to-morrow."

"I won't laugh at the others," she retorted, "because I don't like practical jokes."

"Or practical jokers!" cried Mrs. Hanley, scrambling off the buckboard unaided.

"Most people around here don't mind, Mrs. Hanley," said Ken, quite unrepentantly. "Come on, Slim, let's get the baggage off of here."

"Well, I never!" The millionaire's wife, treated by a mere foreman as though she had ceased to exist, marched in at the gateway with her daughter.

The crowd of holiday-makers, having enjoyed the spectacular arrival of the new guests, had melted away into the very pleasant grounds of the ranch-house. At the foot of the steps that led up to the terrace Henry Hanley was talking to the proprietor of the place, an elderly man of military bearing who looked far more of a gentleman than a rancher.

"This is Colonel Austin," said Hanley, as his wife and daughter reached the steps. "He's the owner of the ranch."

Mrs. Hanley was gracious because the colonel was courtly. Gloria knew that "dude" ranches were run with all the comfort of hotels for the benefit of people who wanted to see the Wild West under the most agreeable conditions, but had fully expected to meet a rancher, unshaven, wearing guns, and chewing tobacco. Grey-haired Colonel Austin was wearing a tweed coat of excellent quality, riding breeches and boots such as gentlemen wear, and a half-smoked cigar was in his left hand.

"I'll show you to your quarters," he said. "I think I can make you comfortable. Will you come this way, please?"

They followed him up the steps, across the terrace on which some of the guests were lounging, and into the house. Out in the roadway Ken and Slim dealt with the luggage.

"That gal's sure easy to look at, ain't she?" remarked Slim.

"She's that all right," agreed Ken. "Kinda reminds me of a wild horse, though—plumb worthless till you tame it down. You know, I'm about half-tempted to do the job myself."

"Well, o' course," said Slim, "you've tamed a lot o' wild horses, Ken!"

The Fortune-hunter

HALF an hour after their arrival the new guests descended from their rooms into the stone-flagged hall of the ranch-house. They had breakfasted on the train in which they had spent the better part of three days, and it was still an hour short of noon.

Mrs. Hanley had changed into a lace-trimmed frock, but Gloria and her father had put on riding kit, both of them keen for exercise. A girl on the terrace was playing a mandoline as they wandered out through the doorway. A young man in a very loud sports coat, a chequered waistcoat and particularly baggy trousers, was leaning against iron railings under one of the numerous arches, apparently with no object whatever in view, but nevertheless keeping a watchful eye on the doorway.

He was tall, well-built, and exuded self-conceit. His hair was as black as Ken's, his eyes were brown and none too honest; his name was Eric Simpson.

"Gloria!" he cried, as Gloria appeared with her parents.

"Eric!" cried Gloria, and sped over to him. "Well, what in the world are you doing here?"

Henry Hanley scowled, and turned in manifest annoyance to his wife.

"How did that nitwit get here?" he demanded suspiciously.

"Nitwit?" Mrs. Hanley tossed her auburn head. "Are you sure that term doesn't apply to you, Henry? You drag us to this place to break up their romance, only to throw Gloria right back into his arms again!"

Gloria, very close to Eric Simpson, whispered:

"Eric, how did you manage to get here ahead of us?"

"I took a plane when I got your wire," he replied in a very low voice. "Thought it would keep your father from being suspicious if I was already here when you arrived."

She nodded approvingly and marched him to her parents.

"Oh, mother," she gushed, "can you imagine finding Eric here?"

Mrs. Hanley shook hands with the young man and informed him that she was glad to see him. Henry Hanley was glumly silent.

"I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw Gloria and you and Mr. Hanley," declared the "nitwit."

"Humph!" grunted Mr. Hanley incredulously, and Gloria said hastily:

"Oh, we—that is father and I—were just going for a ride. Won't you join us, Eric?"

"Why can't he stay here with your mother?" asked Hanley with marked aversion. "She's just dying for a bridge partner."

"Oh, that'll be lovely, Eric," said Mrs. Hanley, whose abiding passion in the social circles of far-away Boston was bridge; and Eric, not daring to disappoint a valuable ally, declared that there was nothing he enjoyed more than a good game of contract.

"Come on, Gloria," said Hanley masterfully, "let's mingle with the horses."

Eric accepted his fate with a good enough grace, but he called out:

"Oh, say, Gloria, there's a garden party to-night. May I have the first dance?"

"You certainly may," she assured him. "Good-bye till then."

She waved a hand and went off with her father down the steps and round the white-walled building to the stables. Corrals, at the Rancho Vista, were kept for cattle—and cattle were kept mainly to provide meat and milk for the guests. The stables would have done credit to a racing establishment.

Several cowboys were in the yard, and Ken was leading a splendid white horse out from one of the stalls—a stall marked "Private."

"There's Ken now!" exclaimed Mr. Hanley. "Let's claim him for our guide!"

Ken saw them crossing the yard, and he shouted to the cowboys:

"You'd better saddle up about three more. We're goin' to have a lot o' ridin' this morning."

"Hallo, Ken," greeted Hanley.

"How about having you for our guide?"

"Fine," replied Ken, tightening the girths of the saddle he had placed on the white horse.

"Oh, what a beauty!" cried Gloria.

"I'll take this one—it's my horse from now on! Don't let anybody else ride him while I'm staying here!"

"I'm sorry, miss," said Ken, "but this is my horse. No one but me's ever rode him, and—"

"But you'll let me ride him, won't you?"

"No," said Ken quite definitely "I'm sorry."

Her blue eyes blazed at him and she tossed her head.

"Then I'll buy the beast!" she stormed. "How much is he worth?"

"I don't know as you could buy him," drawled Ken.

"And why not? My father could buy this ranch and then forget about it!"

"Well, you may be right about the ranch, but this is my personal horse, and I ain't aimin' to sell him."

"Oh, I see! And—and you wouldn't even allow me to ride him?"

Ken shook his head.

"I'm sorry, Miss Hanley."

She founced out of the yard with her proud little chin in the air, and Ken said wryly to her father:

"Looks like she ain't gonna ride!"

"Ken," said the millionaire warmly, "you're a man after my own heart. I wish I could say 'no' to her once in a while."

"I'm afraid it's too late for that now." Ken gazed thoughtfully after the retreating figure and saw a harmless flower severed from its stem by a riding-crop. "She sure does need a good taming, though."

"Yes," agreed Hanley, and patted the neck of the white horse. "Magnificent animal—what's his name?"

"Tarzan," Ken informed him. "Ready to go for that ride now?"

Mr. Hanley was ready, and a brown horse was ready for him.

"Get mounted and we'll go," said Ken, swinging himself up on to Tarzan's back with easy grace. "I think you'll like that little pony—does quite a nice fox-trot."

Mr. Hanley mounted the brown horse neatly enough, in spite of his weight, and the two cantered out from the yard. They covered a good twenty miles of picturesque country before lunch-time, and their liking for one another increased with every mile.

The rest of the day passed uneventfully. Mrs. Hanley rested during the afternoon in her own room; her husband dozed in a wicker chair on the terrace; Gloria and others played the cowboy game of quoits with horseshoes.

Eric Simpson had his first dance with Gloria, and then Colonel Austin, master of ceremonies, announced an old-fashioned waltz and secured Mrs. Hanley for partner. Eric surrendered Gloria to her father because a dark-haired girl had beckoned to him from the bottom of the steps.

He followed the girl along a paved path to a wooden seat set against some shrubs, passing Slim, who had the curiosity to follow. The dark-haired girl was older than Gloria and of quite a different type, but she possessed good looks.

"You might at least give me one dance," she said complainingly, as Eric reached the seat and sank down on it beside her.

"Listen, dear," he returned, "I can't afford to have the Hanleys see me with you—it might spoil our chances. We've got to work this carefully."

Slim had not ventured near enough to hear more than the murmur of their voices. He hastened back to beckon frantically to Ken, who presently put down his violin and joined him under a chestnut-tree.

"Come and look," Slim whispered excitedly; and together they passed round to the other side of the shrubbery, where Ken pulled some branches aside to get a view of the two on the seat.

"You're not fooling me," he heard a jealous feminine voice declare, "you're crazy about that Hanley girl!"

"Oh, don't be silly," rebuked Eric Simpson. "If we didn't need the money I couldn't stand her for five minutes!"

"If I thought that you—"

"Well, don't think!"

Ken did not see Eric take the dark-haired girl in his arms, but he heard him kiss her and saw him as he rose to his feet.

"Listen, darling, I've got to get back," said the schemer. "I'll see you later on."

He went swiftly along the path towards the lawn in front of the house, never dreaming that the shrubbery sheltered two spies. The girl, whose name was Betty Johns, walked off in the opposite direction.

"Hanley was right," said Ken, rubbing his chin. "That bird is a four-flusher all right!"

"Yep," agreed Slim. "What're you goin' to do about it?"

"I don't know for sure—but I'm a-goin' to horn in, somehow or other."

The waltz came to an end as they reached the chestnut-tree, and Colonel Austin released Mrs. Hanley to clap his hands and shout:

"Listen, folks! Next on the programme is a tag dance. Strike her up, boys!"

Males sought partners. Mr. Hanley bore down on his wife, but she said:

"No, this is Eric's dance—I promised him."

"Aw, come on," insisted her husband. "Let him out in later."

Eric appeared at that moment, smiled at Mrs. Hanley, and swept on to Gloria. He whisked her away from a young man who was on the point of asking her to dance with him, and numerous couples began to circulate in a slow fox-trot.

"Here's where I horn in," Ken informed Slim, and he threaded his way to Eric and Gloria, thumped Eric in the back, and took possession of his partner.

Eric glared, but Gloria did not protest. After all, Ken was a handsome fellow, and for all she knew it might be the custom, at dude ranches, for the foreman to dance with the guests.

She found that he was an excellent dancer, even in riding-boots and spurs.

"I ain't aimin' to butt into your affairs," he said after a while, "but you ought to be mighty careful who you go around with."

"One has little chance to choose," she retorted, "during a tag dance!"

He took that with a grin, piloting her away from the crowd.

"Please," he said earnestly, "let's sit this dance out, will you?"

He took silence for consent and stopped at a bench on the edge of one of the paths. Gloria sat down and looked up at him.

"Well, Mr. Cowboy," she said, "what's on your mind?"

"Seems like all we ever do is quarrel," said Ken.

"I know, but you always start it!"

"I'm just tryin' to help you. All kinds of people come here, you know, some good and some bad."

"I'm perfectly capable of taking care of myself," she informed him tartly, "anywhere and any time."

"Maybe so," he returned in a voice that expressed doubt, "but maybe some of these people who seem to be so interesting around here are just fortune-hunters after your money."

"I know who you mean," she said with spirit, "and I still believe him to be a gentleman." She stood up. "Oh, let's dance before we start to quarrel again!"

"All right," said Ken; but Eric Simpson came striding over and thumped him in the back.

"According to the rules," he proclaimed, "the rest of the dance is mine."

"Of course," said Ken with a mocking bow.

Ken Becomes a Guest

THE Rancho Vista comprised several miles of hill and dale, though it was nothing like the size it had been when in the possession of former owners who raised cattle for the stockyards. Half-way down a grassy hill, two miles south of the ranch-house, a natural shelf of sand had been converted into a promenade fringed with trees and provided with seats.

This promenade would probably have been more popular with Colonel Austin's paying guests had it been less distant, for from it one obtained an enchanting view of rolling pasture-land, wooded hollows, winding trails, and a silver thread of a river, with majestic hills in the background.

Eric and Gloria rode down to the promenade after luncheon on the day following the dance, and they tethered their horses to a tree and sat facing the scenery. But it was not of the scenery that they talked.

"Why go on like this?" asked Eric plaintively. "You know your father will never give his consent."

"I do know," said Gloria, "but what can we do?"

"Why not elope?"

A voice behind them made them jump. "I'm sorry, folks, I didn't know you were here."

It was Ken, and he was lying, for he had sighted them from the top of the hill and had deliberately ridden down it.

"Do you always travel up and down this lovely boulevard?" demanded Gloria angrily as she sprang to her feet.

"No, miss," replied Ken, dropping lightly from Tarzan's broad back and producing a spanner from his pocket, "but that fence needed fixin', and I thought I might just as well do it now."

He indicated the wire fence, supported by posts, which divided the lower part of the hill from the promenade.

"Don't let us keep you," said Gloria.

"I won't," said Ken, and he walked over to a post and proceeded to tighten one of the wires.

He was far too near for Eric to continue to talk about an elopement, and Gloria looked indignantly round at him.

"Oh, and while you're at it," she said, as one speaking to a servant, "fix that broken stirrup on my saddle so I can ride back."

Ken turned in her direction with an irritating grin.

"Seeing as how I distinctly remember you said you could take care of yourself any time or any place," he drawled, "I guess you'll be able to take care of a little detail like that."

Gloria clenched her fists.

"How I'd love to hit him!" she said between her teeth.

"I know what I'd like to do!" snorted Eric.

"Did you say something, mister?" inquired Ken.

Eric knew better than to speak; but Gloria spoke.

"I still believe I can take care of myself in any situation, Mr. Cowboy!" she cried; and with that she ran over to the white horse, put a foot into a stirrup, and hoisted herself into the saddle. "Go on, boy!"

Tarzan set off uphill, obediently enough.

"Hi, come back here!" shouted Ken; but Gloria urged the purloined steed to greater effort.

Ken could have stopped him instantly with a curious whistle, but instead he ran over to one of the horses under the tree, unfastened it, mounted it, and set off in pursuit. Eric, with less dexterity, released and mounted the other horse and followed.

At the top of the hill a sandy road curved towards the ranch-house between fields, dipped down amongst some rocks, and rose again to wind upon the flat into the drive near the gateway. Gloria, on Tarzan, flew along the road, but Ken cut across the grass on a brown horse with a broken stirrup, shot down behind the rocks, and induced his mount to take a rail fence in its stride at the top of the rise.

He reached the roadway close behind Gloria, and in full view of a number of guests on the terrace of the ranch-house caught up with her and whisked her clean out of the saddle on to his knees.

Mrs. Hanley, who had run out from the house with her husband to see what all the excitement was about, gasped at that exhibition of horsemanship; but something even more spectacular was to come. Ken dumped Gloria on the saddle between his knees and hurled himself off the brown horse on to Tarzan, who was running alongside fully expecting his master to perform that trick of the old-time pony-express riders.

"Did you see that?" cried Colonel Austin, who had a very high opinion of his foreman.

"Oh boy, what a rider!" exclaimed a male guest.

"My daughter!" shrieked Mrs. Hanley.

Side by side the two horses reached the drive and the entrance to the stable-yard. Gloria would have ridden on to the steps of the terrace, but Ken caught hold of her bridle.

"Now just a minute, young lady," he rapped, and stopping both horses, dismounted, and pulled her down beside him.

"You know your horse is not a bit like you!" she said angrily. "He doesn't seem to object at all if somebody rides him! And please remember, Mr. Practical Joker, that I don't allow cow-punchers to man-handle me!"

"You had no right stealin' my horse and ridin' him off the way you did," Ken retorted.

"Huh!" she snapped finger and thumb in his face.

Down the steps from the terrace flocked the guests, and out from the stable-yard streamed members of the outfit.

"Colonel Austin," said Mrs. Hanley wrathfully, "I demand this man's apology and his immediate dismissal!"

The colonel drew a long breath.

"I'm sorry, Ken," he said with a wink which only his foreman saw, "but you'll have to go for a while."

"From what I saw of this thing," declared Henry Hanley with some heat, "it's my daughter who owes the apology!"

His wife glared at him.

"Surely, Colonel Austin," she burst out, "you wouldn't let anyone influence you in this matter?"

"Well, frankly, Mrs. Hanley, I'd be awfully sorry to lose Ken," was the reply.

"I distinctly heard you dismiss him a moment ago—or was that merely for my benefit?"

Ken smiled reassuringly at her.

"Don't worry, lady," he said cheerfully, "the colonel's dismissal goes. I'm off the pay-roll." He reached into a pocket of his red shirt and fished out a roll of notes. "I think I'll stick around, though, for a while," he went on, "as a guest."

He peeled off a twenty-dollar note.

"This'll pay my way for a few days," he said, enjoying the utter discomfiture of Mrs. Hanley. "Well, take it, colonel—or ain't I good enough to be a guest?"

The colonel nodded and took the note, and Ken was thrusting the roll back into his pocket when Eric Simpson rode up, dismounted awkwardly, and stalked furiously towards him.

"You'll answer to me for this!" he shouted.

"Suits me all right," drawled Ken.

"I guess there ain't any objections to guests fighting among one another. I figured it'd take you too long to become a cowboy, so I decided to become a guest."

Eric was flabbergasted. He wanted to show off in front of Gloria and the others, and he had thought it would be easy enough to put a hired man in his place; but this talk of being a guest and of guests fighting was not at all to his liking.

"It's easy enough to be insulting when you're carrying two guns on your hips!" he sneered.

"Oh, I'll take care o' that all right." Ken unfastened his belt and let it fall upon the turf. "Got any more excuses, hombre?"

"Well, I—I'm not in the habit of fighting in front of ladies."

"Just what I thought!" quoth Mr. Hanley, in a particularly loud and scornful voice. "Yellow clean through!"

"I'll make you take that back!" howled Eric, swinging round on him; but Ken jerked him back again.

"Your fight's with me, mister," he said grimly.

"Take your hands off me!"

Ken dropped the gloved hand that was on his shoulder, but tapped him on the nose with the other. Gloria caught hold of Ken's arm, trying to pull him away, and Eric saw what he thought was his opportunity and struck out with both fists.

Empty air was all that he hit, however. Gloria staggered back against her father as Ken's arm was suddenly wrenched from her grip, and Eric Simpson sprawled on the grass with a pain between his eyes.

He scrambled up, boiling with rage, and he hurled himself at Ken; but a thump in the mouth that jarred several teeth and made his lips bleed taught him caution. He began to spar defensively, waiting for an opening that never presented itself.

Ken played with him, even accepted occasional punches to encourage him to his undoing, and Colonel Austin and Slowly and painfully Eric Simpson raised himself on one arm, and feebly he extended the other in token of surrender.

Henry Hanley watched with undisguised delight while Mrs. Hanley shuddered and Betty Johns bit her lip. Gloria was not at all sure, in her heart, which of the two contestants she really favoured, but she shouted encouragement to Eric.

The battle swayed from the edge of the lawn to a tree against the trunk of which the back of Eric's head thudded. He lost his hat in a literal sense and his head in a figurative one. With a bellow such as some wild animal might make, he rushed at Ken, and one lucky blow that caught the cowboy in the neck spun him sideways; but a left hook caught the fortune-hunter under the jaw, and a straight right that followed it knocked him flat and dazed upon the lawn a full five yards away from the tree.

Ken stood waiting for him to rise and renew the combat, but there was no fight left in him. Slowly and painfully he raised himself on one arm and feebly he extended the other in token of surrender.

"I wish you'd never brought me here!" fumed Mrs. Hanley, but her husband paid no attention whatever to her outburst.

"Just what he needed, Ken!" he cried jubilantly.

Ken walked off across the grass: Gloria ran, to her vanquished suitor, who rose unsteadily to his feet and held his aching jaw.

"Gloria," he said hoarsely, "let's get away from here and ride over to Fairville for the rest of the afternoon."

"All right," she nodded. "Let's go and get some fresh horses."

Betty Johns retreated sulkily to the ranch-house, and the other guests drifted away in quest of fresh diversion.

Gloria Changes Her Mind

UNDER some trees on the far side of the lawn Ken sat on a bench, stretched his long legs, and rubbed that portion of his neck which had come into violent contact with Eric Simpson's fist. Henry Hanley found him there, and sat down beside him.

"I really don't know how all this business started," said the millionaire, "but I suspect my daughter had a hand in it. I'd like to make up, in a measure, for what she's causing you to lose."

He took his wallet from his coat-pocket and a whole sheaf of notes from the wallet; but Ken would not accept the notes.

"Money ain't never goin' to make up for your girl's actions," he said quietly. "Fact is, it's your money that's spoiled her—that and her good looks."

"You're right," Hanley agreed with a grimace, "but what can I do?"

"There ain't much you can do yourself, I guess," said Ken, "but that girl needs taming!"

"Well, if you can tame her," said Hanley, folding the notes and putting them away, "it would suit me fine for you to do it."

Some little time later Ken entered the stable-yard to get Tarzan, who had been put away in his stall, and was astonished to be greeted with mocking bows on the part of half a dozen cowboys there assembled.

"How d'you do, Mr. Baxter?" inquired Slim, the ringleader, with a flourish of his hat.

"What's the idea?" demanded Ken.

"Well," Slim replied, "the idea is that we've got orders to treat all the guests with the utmost respect, and you're a guest, ain't you, sir?"

"Sure, I'm a guest." Ken drew himself erect and motioned to them all to bow again, which they did. "But I wouldn't trust one of you mavericks as a guide, or let you cinch a saddle on any horse I was ridin'!"

May 23rd, 1936.

He dropped his pose.

"Listen, boys," he confided, "I'm gonna get on my pony and breeze out of here before one o' those dudes ropes me into a bridge game or a cup o' tea! So long!"

He sauntered past them and round a long hitching-rail to the stall Tarzan occupied, and he opened the door of the stall.

"Come on, old man," he called. "We're going places. Come on!"

Tarzan emerged with promptitude, and Ken was re-saddling him when a cowboy named Luke Wilton entered the yard and walked over to him.

"Hi, Ken," he said, "just a minute! I wanta pay you back that five bucks I owe you. Here, take it out of this twenty."

Ken completed the saddling process and stared at the twenty-dollar note in Luke's hand.

"Where'd you get all that money?" he asked. "Stick up a bank?"

"Easier'n that," laughed the cowboy. "That there Mr. Simpson give it to me—and just for showin' him the trail to Fairville!"

Ken's brows came down and his grey eyes narrowed.

"What did he want to go there for?" he inquired.

"You can search me," returned Luke with a guffaw, "but he was mighty anxious to learn if there was a minister there."

"Did he go alone?"

"No, siree! That there Hanley girl's with him. Hi, whassa matter?"

Ken had mounted Tarzan in haste and was galloping out from the yard without any apparent desire to collect the five dollars that were owing to him.

"Hi, what's the hurry?" bellowed Luke; but Ken did not even look back.

Out from the yard he flew, and out from the drive into the roadway, where he turned in the direction of the railway station at Sandy Fork, because the town of Fairville was situated in a valley a good ten miles beyond it.

The station was passed before he caught sight of Eric Simpson and Gloria, riding side by side under over-arching trees. They were moving at a leisurely pace, and the pounding of Tarzan's hoofs reached the alert ears of the fortune-hunter, who had been fearing all the time that they might be followed.

To provide for that contingency he had borrowed a rifle from Luke Wilton, on the pretext that he might get a chance to shoot some rabbits, and abruptly he stopped his horse, grabbed up the rifle, and slewed round in the saddle.

"What's the matter?" cried Gloria, as he raised the rifle to his shoulder and took aim.

"It's Ken Baxter!" he snarled. "He'll never butt in on me again!"

With a sweep of her arm Gloria knocked the rifle aside even as he pulled the trigger, so that a bullet whizzed harmlessly into a tree several yards away from Ken, who had ducked low in the saddle.

Eric gave one scared glance at him as he straightened up and spurred forward, then galloped off as fast as he could induce his mount to go.

"Eric!" shouted Gloria.

But Eric paid no attention whatever to her, concerned only for the safety of his own skin, and Ken caught up with her, swept an arm round her waist, and lifted her off her own horse on to his right knee without the slightest slackening of speed.

"Eric, help me!" she screamed.

"Eric, help me!"

Eric looked back, but rode on.

"Well," said Ken cheerfully, "he don't seem to be too anxious to rescue you, miss!"

"I guess father was right, after all," she lamented.

Heavy clouds had come up across the sky against the wind. The sun vanished behind the clouds, and a sudden flash of lightning caused Gloria to fling an arm round Ken's neck and caused her own horse to belt. Tarzan merely quivered.

"Whoa! Whoa there!" shouted Ken; but the riderless horse was streaking for home, and Tarzan could not possibly equal its speed with a double burden on his back.

"Now we're in for it!" growled Ken as thunder echoed and re-echoed among the hills. "Only one horse between us, and a bad storm about to break!"

"Take me back to the ranch at once," shivered Gloria; but Ken shot off in a different direction altogether.

"I'm taking you up to a line shack in Creek Canyon," he informed her.

"You wouldn't dare!" she cried.

But Ken did dare, and he held on his course, which led downhill, away from the road and between walls of rock.

"We've got no time to make the ranch," he informed her. "It's the nearest shelter. I'm afraid we're in for a soakin', the way it is. Come on, boy, come on!"

The air became ominously still and the darkness of night enveloped them, split every few minutes by vivid lightning. Thunder rattled and banged, and down came a deluge of rain. They were practically wet through by the time they reached a cabin set against the cliff-like wall of a narrow canyon.

Right up to the door of the cabin Ken rode, and set Gloria down on its stoop.

"There you are, miss," he said, dismounting beside her and opening the door. "I'll have a fire goin' in just a minute. Tarzan, stable up in the lean-to."

Tarzan trotted away, evidently quite familiar with the premises, and Ken followed Gloria into darkness and slammed the door. Rain lashed against the windows of a big room, very roughly furnished, and a peal of thunder crashed—as it seemed—right over the roof.

Ken lit a lamp that stood on a table, took off his cow-hat and shook it, then dropped it on a wooden chair and went over to a fireplace. There was brushwood on the hearth and there were logs beside the hearth. He made a fire which soon was blazing up the chimney.

Gloria looked disconsolately about her. She was very wet, but she liked her new surroundings not at all. There were a few chairs in the room and a couple of stools, but there was no comfort anywhere. A cupboard stood against one of the board walls, and there was a door in another wall. On the mantelpiece stood a storm-lantern and a bottle with a bit of candle in its neck. There was not a scrap of carpet on the floor.

Ken looked round from the fireplace at her discontented face.

"Better come over here and absorb some of this heat," he suggested.

"I'm not staying!" she snapped. "Take me back to the ranch immediately!"

Thunder made conversation impossible for half a minute or so, then Ken stated definitely:

"I'm not taking you back to the ranch during this storm. You'd better make yourself comfortable."

"You don't seem to realise what you're doing!"

"I know what I'm doing, all right."

he assured her, and turned away from the fire to unfasten his belt and drop it on the table. "I'm not taking you back to the ranch till this rain stops. In the meanwhile I'm right anxious to find out what kind of a cook you are."

He walked across the room to the cupboard and opened it to take out a basin and a box of eggs, and immediately she pounced on the belt, snatched out the two guns, and swept over to him.

"Perhaps these will persuade you to take me back!" she cried.

Ken grinned at her. She was holding the guns in a very businesslike fashion, but they were heavy .45's, and they looked too big for her little fists.

"You'll be havin' a lot o' work to do around here," he said quite calmly, "so put 'em down afore your hands get too tired."

"You seem to forget," she bit back at him, "that I'm giving the orders from now on!"

An outburst of celestial artillery made her jump, and Ken's grin broadened.

"You can't give orders with them, miss," he said. "They're not loaded."

With a very crestfallen expression on her face she surrendered the guns to him as he held out his hands for them.

"Thanks," he drawled, and thrust one into his pocket and opened the other to take out and display one of six very live cartridges. "Sorry to have tricked you, Miss Hanley, but if you're goin' to act like that I guess I'd better put 'em back on!"

She watched him with furious eyes as he put the cartridge back in its chamber, restored the belt to his person and the two long-barrelled .45's to their holsters. The storm raged, but he knew quite well that it was not as yet at its height.

"In the meantime," said he, "if you're still bent on going, that door ain't locked."

"A night alone in the storm would be a pleasure, compared to a night here with you!" she retorted, and darted over to the door.

Ken watched with amusement while she opened the door and went out and slammed it violently behind her.

A terrific flash of lightning nearly blinded her on the stoop, and the rain was heavier than ever. Thunder seemed to rend the very firmament, and, scared nearly out of her wits, she dived back into the cabin and leaned, half-crying, against the door she was glad to use as a shield against the elements.

"Back so soon?" mocked Ken.

"There was a rattlesnake out there," she faltered.

"First time I ever knew rattlesnakes liked wet weather!"

"That's it," she whimpered, "gloat over my helplessness."

"Helplessness?" echoed Ken. "I still remember you told me you could take care of yourself."

"If—if you'll cover up the windows"—she shuddered after another blaze of lightning had been followed by a bombardment of thunder—"I'll try to help with the food."

"That's the spirit," approved Ken. "Sure I will."

He fixed some sacking over the window-panes, and at least most of the lightning was shut out.

"Now is that better?" he asked when he had completed his task.

She nodded, appeared to be grateful. "I don't think I've had very much practice with cooking," she confessed, "but—"

"Aw, it's never too late to learn," he cut in. "Come on! Here, take these!"

Ken turned and blinked at her, the coffee-pot in one hand, the cup in the other. "What're you gonna do now, you little fool?" he challenged.

He handed her the basin and the box of eggs, but she asked helplessly what she was to do with them.

"We'll stir up some old-fashioned flap-jacks," he replied. "Come over to the table with 'em—I'll show you."

Unwelcome Visitors

ERIC SIMPSON rode back to the ranch-house through the storm because there was no longer any point in going on to Fairville, and he had seen Ken ride off with Gloria in quite a different direction.

He left the horse in the drive, scuttled up the steps to the terrace, and burst into the hall to the accompaniment of a deafening clap of thunder.

Some of the colonel's guests were congregated there, others ran out from various rooms and gathered round him as he halted at the foot of the stairs, dripping water. They had expected Gloria to be with him, and they plied him with questions.

Mrs. Hanley nearly fainted when she heard the story he had to tell—a story from which he omitted all reference to the rifle he had used. Mr. Hanley seemed strangely calm, but then, he had had a long conversation with Ken and placed implicit trust in that young man. Eric swung round on Colonel Austin.

"Why don't you and your men go and rescue Miss Hanley?" he cried. "There's no telling what the crazy cowboy will do with her!"

"You should have thought of that," returned the colonel sternly, "before you ever let Ken take her from you!"

"What could I do?" howled Eric. "He had his gun pointed straight at me!"

"If I loved a girl," said Henry Hanley witheringly, "I'd rather die than let some other man take her from me."

Eric Simpson appeared to be too upset to realise that he had played a very sorry part in the affair, even according to his own version of it.

"But why don't you do something?" he bawled.

"There's nothing we can do till the storm lets up," declared the colonel.

Mrs. Hanley tottered away to a chesterfield and sank down on it with her hands over her ears as the crack of thunder that had driven Gloria back into the cabin echoed and re-echoed among the hills. Eric drew Mr. Hanley aside.

"Why don't you offer a large reward?" he suggested. "Perhaps that would serve to get them started."

"That's a good idea, Eric," approved Hanley, "but to tell you the truth, I'm unable to do it. You see, unfortunately, I'm broke."

"Broke?" Eric stared at him aghast.

"Yes, but of course, that won't make any difference to you. Now you're a wealthy man, and you want to make Gloria your wife. Why don't you offer the reward—say, five thousand dollars?"

"Y—yes," stammered Eric, "I—I believe I will. But excuse me a moment though, will you? I simply must change out of these wet things."

"Wait a minute!" Hanley caught hold of his arm as he was making for the stairs. "Announce the reward first." He raised his voice. "Listen, folks, Mr. Simpson wants to offer a reward!"

There was no escape from it, so Eric, avoiding the indignant eyes of Betty Johns, called out:

"Yes! I offer five thousand dollars for the return of Miss Hanley, safe and sound, and the capture of her abductor, dead or alive!"

Mrs. Hanley heard that, in spite of the hands that covered her ears, and as Eric ascended the stairs she flitted over to Colonel Austin.

"Oh, that dear boy!" she cried. "I knew he'd do what he could to save her!"

"Five thousand is a heap of money," returned the colonel gruffly, "but it won't stop this storm. We'll still have to wait, reward or no reward."

Henry Hanley smiled to himself and drifted off into the drawing-room; the guests argued amongst themselves as to the wisdom, or otherwise, of the decision. Betty Johns waited in the background for a while, then climbed the stairs.

On the floor above she opened a door without knocking and looked into a bed-room where Eric Simpson was conveying shirts and collars from the drawers of a dressing-table to a suitcase he had opened upon a bed. She entered the room.

"What's the big idea?" she asked stormily.

Eric made a face at her. "Hanley's just told me he's broke," he said, "and in order to save my face I had to promise that reward for Gloria's return. Now I'm beating it before someone calls my bluff."

"But you're not going without me," she challenged. "What about the storm?"

"Never mind the storm," he growled. "Beat it and pack—and make it snappy! We've got to get out of here!"

All through the night the storm raged with unabated fury, and the rain was streaming down when two wet and thoroughly unhappy people boarded a train for San Francisco which the stationmaster at Sandy Fork had been prevailed upon to stop for them. But Gloria, after a preliminary period of restlessness, slept quite soundly upon a very hard bed in the inner room of the cabin in Crook Canyon, behind a bolted door, and Ken—who was used to hard-lying—slept equally well upon the boards of the outer room with only the sacking from the windows to cover him.

Gloria, initiated into some of the mysteries of cooking over-night, made more flap-jacks for breakfast—Ken prepared the coffee. The line shack seemed to possess everything one really needed in the way of food, though it was mostly in tins and bottles, and not the sort of fare to which Gloria was accustomed.

Ken's flap-jack was badly burned and he pushed his plate away after he had eaten very little of it. Gloria, who had hardly touched her own, sprang up indignantly.

"I suppose you don't like my cooking?" she cried.

"It's nothing to brag about," said Ken. "Maybe you can do better washing the dishes."

She had never washed dishes in her life, and she had no intention of starting to do so that very dark and very wet morning. She snatched up cups and saucers and plates, one after another, and hurled them to the floor, while Ken sat grinning at her.

"That for your old dishes!" she cried as the floor became littered with broken crockery and her temper rose. "Now nobody will have to wash them!"

"There's some more over there," said Ken, with a jerk of his thumb, "and more still in the cupboard. Break 'em all, if you want to—I'm used to eatin' out of a pan. Don't know how it'll appeal to your jaded appetite, though."

She flounced over to the fireplace, where logs were blazing, and stood there with her hand on the mantelpiece and her chin in her hand. Ken rose up with his own cup and saucer—which she had not dared to destroy—and went to a stove on which a metal coffee-pot was standing.

He picked up the coffee-pot, and with it was about to refill the cup when she streaked up behind him and whipped his two guns from his belt.

"Maybe these will shake your calm!" she cried.

He turned and blinked at her, the coffee-pot in one hand, the cup in the other.

"What're you gonna do now, you little fool?" he challenged.

For answer, she flung the guns into the heart of the blazing logs, and with a cry of dismay he ran to the fireplace, caught up a poker, and kuckt to rake them out upon the hearth.

"I hope nothin' ever happens to make you regret this," he said grimly. "Next to a horse, a man's best friend is his gun in this country."

Gloria, ashamed of the damage she had wrought, but not in the least degree prepared to admit it, vanished into the bed-room and slammed the door. Ken looked down at the guns he had retrieved, but knew that they were too hot to handle and probably were ruined. He got to his feet and blew out the bit of candle in the bottle on the mantelpiece.

Dawn had broken several hours before, but it was still as dark as night outside the cabin, and rain was lashing against the window-panes. He walked over to the table and turned down the flame of the lamp because it was smoking.

A sudden banging on the front door startled him, and he went hurriedly to the door of the bed-room.

"Miss Gloria," he said uneasily, opening it a few inches so that he need not shout, "there's someone knocking. You'd better stay there till I come for you. No tellin' who it might be."

Gloria was sulkily silent, but he hoped she would do as he had suggested, and he closed the door and went and opened the front one.

Three men stepped in over the threshold; one of them a brown-haired feisty two inches taller than himself, clean-shaven, and curiously ugly, wearing a tweed jacket and striped trousers which were sodden; behind him came a lanky ruffian with a squint, and a little man scrubby with chin. They were all wearing guns.

"I hope you will pardon us, friend," said the leader in a soft and rather educated voice, "but the storm forced us to look for shelter."

A pleasant smile accompanied the words, but Ken offered no welcome.

"Where are you headed for?" he asked gruffly.

"Gorgo Pass," was the reply. "I was afraid we couldn't make it in this kind of weather."

The left hand of the outlaw was thrust against Ken's cheek and jaw, forcing his head sideways, and a clenched fist was drawn back to strike.

"Fairville lies just this side of the Green Horn," said Ken. "The mountain'll shelter you the whole way from here."

"Unfortunately, I've reasons for wishing to avoid Fairville. I hope our little stay won't inconvenience you?"

"All right," said Ken. "I—I only hesitated because—well, you see, my wife—she's a bit—er—demented."

"You have my sympathy, sir."

"Sometimes she has a notion I ain't her husband," Ken went on more glibly.

"Wants to be rescued from me, and things like that. If you just won't pay any attention to her."

"You can depend on me."

"Thanks," Ken was considerably relieved. "You see, my wife's liable to go into tantrums most any time. I hope you'll overlook it if she stays in her room. I don't want to embarrass you with her—er—her nervousness. Well, get out of your wet slickers and warm up there by the fire, won't you? I'll look in on the missus and see if she's all right."

The three gathered round the fire and Ken went to the door of the bedroom. He would have rapped on it with his knuckles, but the unwelcome visitors were watching him, so he raised the latch and walked straight in.

Gloria was lying on the bed in her riding clothes, and he gathered from the expression on her face as he went over to her that she had just deposited herself there after listening to the conversation.

"I'm sorry I couldn't knock," he said. "I'm sorry I had to lie about you. But that smooth-spoken hombre out there is Ed la Crosse. I recognised him from his high-falutin' lingo. He's the most feared outlaw in the West. Whatever you do—"

"What is this," broke in Gloria scornfully, "another one of your tricks?"

"No," he replied in a very serious voice, "and I wouldn't be worried now, if you hadn't ruined my guns. As it is we've gotta be careful, for there's no tellin' what he may do. Understand?"

Gloria sat up and eyed him with suspicion, despite his earnestness.

"Are you certain it isn't someone come to rescue me?" she asked.

"For whatever I've done I'm sorry," he said, "but whatever you do, stay here."

The Way of an Outlaw

BY the fireplace in the other room Ed la Crosse had stooped and picked up the two .45s. left on the hearth; but they were back in their former position when Ken emerged from the bedroom.

"I hope your wife's feeling better," said the outlaw solicitously.

"She is, thanks," returned Ken. "By the way, we're none too flush on grub, but I'll do the best I can for you."

"That's kind of you," said La Crosse. "We could stand some sort of a meal."

Gloria had deserted the bed for the door. She opened it a bare inch and listened, while Ken mixed more batter in a basin and poured some of it into a frying-pan over the stove.

"This isn't goin' to be very much," he said, "but it'll be better than my wife could do."

Gloria heard and was filled with indignation. She took a little note-book from a pocket of her riding-breeches and a pencil from the back of it, and on one of the sheets she wrote a note which she tore out and folded.

Ken was stooping over the frying-pan, cooking a second flap-jack, when she peeped round the edge of the door, and his bent back was towards her. She thrust out a hand with the note prominently displayed in it.

"FLASH GORDON"

Starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers.

"Coming along pretty good," announced Ken. "Won't be so many minutes now."

"It smells very enticing, my friend," said La Crosse, and then his lanky henchman noticed the hand at the door and drew the outlaw's attention to it with his eyes.

La Crosse, who was on his feet, backed slowly towards the hand and secured the note. He opened it out and read it, then strolled back to the fireplace, took out a cigarette, and twisted the tiny sheet of paper into a spill which he lit at the flames.

Ken carried the two flap-jacks over to the table on a metal plate.

"Sorry we're short of crocks," he remarked, and pointed significantly to the fragments on the floor. "Bit o' trouble before you arrived."

La Crosse and his companions proceeded to demolish the food.

"We'll be leaving as soon as the storm lets up," said La Crosse, and Ken went to one of the windows. The clouds had broken, and here and there were patches of blue sky. Rain was dripping from the eaves, but there was no longer any deluge.

"Looks like it's stopped now," he said. "About rained out, I guess!" He opened the window. "Yeah, the storm is over!"

"For us, yes," said La Crosse and sprang up with a six-shooter in his hand. "For you it is just beginning! Kindly raise your hands!"

Ken turned from the window and stared as though he could not believe his eyes.

"What's the idea?" he exclaimed.

"Get 'em up there high!" rasped the outlaw; and then, as Ken's hands were raised above his head, reverted to his customary mode of speech. "The idea's a very chivalrous one, my dear sir. We're about to rescue a lady in distress!"

Ken made a sudden rush at him, risking a bullet, but the two henchmen pounced, and his arms were locked in theirs.

"Violence, my dear fellow," drawled La Crosse, "must always be discouraged. Tie him up tightly, comrades!"

He reached down a larfat from a nail in the wall and tossed it to the two men who had forced Ken into a sitting position on the floor, then went to the bedroom and tapped on it.

Gloria walked out and smiled at him as he bowed.

"Permit me, lovely lady," he said, "your rescuer."

"Thank you," Gloria tossed her head at Ken, who was being bound hand and foot. "Looks as though I can play a practical joke just as well as you can!" she cried.

"Gloria," said Ken hoarsely, "you're playing right into their hands! That's La Crosse! He's wanted for murder, and worse!"

"Ah, my friend," jeered the outlaw, "so you know me, eh?" He smiled reassuringly at Gloria. "It seems rather ungentlemanly," he said to her, "to contradict a man who is temporarily helpless, but I'm afraid he's subject to hallucinations, Miss Hanley."

"Such as being my husband, for instance!" said she.

La Crosse put on his hat because his men had finished their labours and the sun was shining.

"We may as well get started," he said. "Rusty, will you get the horses, please?"

The lanky fellow with the squint eyes, thus addressed, went out from the cabin.

"Come, Miss Hanley," said La Crosse; but Gloria looked down at Ken with an unexpected feeling of compassion for him in his plight.

"Aren't we taking him?" she asked.

"Well, that would be very inconvenient, I think," returned the outlaw.

"You see, we have only sufficient horses for ourselves—our three and the white one we found in the lean-to."

"Don't go with them, Gloria," pleaded Ken. "You don't realise what you're doing!"

"I'm afraid the young lady has already made up her mind," purred La Crosse.

"I don't think we should leave him that way," protested Gloria.

"Oh, there's nothing to fear. It will be for but a very short time he will remain like this."

"Well," said Gloria doubtfully, "if you're certain he'll be perfectly safe—"

"Oh, absolutely!" Ed la Crosse turned to the scrubby-faced little man.

"Batt, will you see that the gentleman is made comfortable? Miss Hanley, the horses are at the door and your parents must be frantic."

Gloria went out with La Crosse, who helped her into the saddle of a black horse and himself mounted Tarzan. Batt made Ken "comfortable" by sending him flat on his back with a kick in the chest and went off grinning.

The door was slammed and the sound of hoofs died away across the canyon. Ken struggled with his bonds, but his hands were fastened behind his back and the rope would not give.

From where he lay he could see the lamp on the table, still alight. Slowly, and with much effort, he managed to roll over and over upon the floor till he was near enough to the table to heave a shoulder against one of its legs.

The table tilted, and finally went over with a crash; the glass container of the lamp was smashed and a pool of oil from it caught fire. It had been Ken's intention to sever the rope about his wrists in the flame of the lamp, but the blazing pool defied him to roll near it.

The table began to burn, and Ken watched it helplessly till it became a flaming mass and the heat caused him to wriggle and twist towards the door away from it. The boards of the floor became involved in the conflagration; the room was filled with smoke and fire.

Ed la Crosse, with Gloria and his two henchmen, had crossed the canyon and started to climb a trail that zigzagged upwards amongst outcroppings of rock at the foot of Green Horn Mountain; but Tarzan, who bore his rider placidly enough at first, began to sense that something was wrong because his master had not appeared.

Abruptly he started rearing and plunging, and La Crosse could not control him, despite good horsemanship.

"What's the matter?" bellowed the outlaw, jerking viciously at the bridle. "Hold still!"

But Tarzan would not hold still. Like some bucking bronco, but far more artfully, he rose up on his hind legs, dived down on his forelegs and kicked his heels in the air, only to rear up again with incredible swiftness. La Crosse was flung out of the saddle and scrambled to his feet to see the white horse flying towards the canyon.

"Shall I go after him, boss?" asked Rusty.

"No, never mind," growled the outlaw. "I'll ride double with Miss Hanley."

He mounted the black horse behind Gloria, who was beginning to have serious misgivings, but did not dare to give expression to them, and the uphill journey was continued.

Tarzan raced back to the cabin in the canyon to see flame and smoke belching from its heat-broken windows. He struck at the door with a hoof and whinnied loudly.

"Tarzan!" cried Ken from the other side of the door, gasping for breath. "Come on, boy, break it down! Tarzan!"

Tarzan stood up on his hind legs and beat at the door till the latch gave way. Acid smoke belled out at him as the door flew wide, but he did not hesitate. He heard his master's voice, and that voice mattered to him more than any other sound in the world.

"Here, Tarzan, here!" called Ken chokingly. "Here, pick it up!"

Into the raging inferno clattered the white horse, and with his teeth he caught hold of the rope that fettered Ken and dragged him out over the step and the steep into the sunlight.

Ken filled his lungs with clean air. "Untie me, boy!" he said. "Drag it, boy! That's the stuff!"

Tarzan applied his teeth to the rope that held Ken's wrists, and in a very little while the wrists were free.

"Good work, old man!" approved Ken, and he fished out a clasp-knife and cut through the rest of his bonds, then got to his feet and climbed into the saddle. "Come on, old boy, we gotta trail 'em!"

Saved!

THE moment the storm had abated, Colonel Austin had gathered the members of his outfit together in the stable-yard, and all his horses were got ready for an organised search-party.

Those of the male guests who cared to take part in it were with him, but the ladies were left behind. Henry Hanley decided to ride with the owner of the ranch, who consulted Luke Wilton.

"What about the line shack?" suggested the colonel.

"That's just about where Ken would have headed for," agreed the cowpuncher.

"All right." The colonel mounted his horse. "Have some of the boys go that way with these gentlemen. I'll light off with the rest in the direction of Gorgo Pass, in case he went for one of those caves up there. Get 'em started, Luke!"

Luke rode out from the yard with three of the hands and eight or nine excited guests. Five cowboys and Henry Hanley remained, on horseback, with the colonel.

"Let's ride," said he; and while the first party screamed off along the road that led past Sandy Fork, he led the way down past the hillside promenade towards Green Horn and the pass that ran through the foothills of that mountain.

Gloria, at a bend in the zigzag trail that led up to that pass, looked back over the valley far below. She was in strange territory, and she did not recognise any of her surroundings.

"Aren't we going the wrong way?" she asked nervously.

"There are two roads," replied the man who shared the saddle with her.

"Are you sure?"

La Crosse did not reply to that question. He and his companions had stopped to let their horses take breath, and the sound of another horse climbing the trail had reached his ears.

"Say, there's somebody coming!" he exclaimed. "You two ride back and find out who it is. Miss Hanley and I will continue up the pass."

Rusty and Batt turned their horses and went down past a shoulder of rock which hid them from the oncoming rider.

At a second bend below, Batt and Rusty rode in amongst some boulders of limestone and looked down. They saw Ken rounding a sharp turn on the white horse that had run away, and Rusty took aim at him with a six-shooter and fired twice.

Ken fell from his saddle, and Tarzan stopped short.

"Let's go get his horse," suggested Batt as their victim lay motionless in the dust.

"You go," said Rusty, and put away his gun. "I'll take the news to the boss."

"All right." Batt rode down to Tarzan and dismounted; but Ken was only shamming. He had not even been grazed by either bullet, and as the scrub-faced little ruffian tried to grab hold of a horse that eluded him, he scrambled to his feet and rushed at him.

Down went Batt with two hands at his throat and the weight of Ken's body on top of him, then his gun was taken from its holster and the butt of it was brought down with a thud upon his head.

Ken left the fellow to recover from that blow at leisure, pocketed the gun, and went off on Tarzan. Rusty, meanwhile, had caught up with La Crosse.

"Did you discover who was following us?" inquired the outlaw.

"There ain't nobody following us now, boss," responded the lanky one significantly.

"Good!" La Crosse looked back because he heard more hoof-beats. "Who's that?"

"That's only Batt," said Rusty.

They rode on; but presently La Crosse looked back again, and this time he glimpsed a rider on a white horse climbing the corkscrew trail.

"I thought you said that was Batt!" he exploded. "Go on back, and this time don't miss him!"

Rusty turned his horse and drew his six-shooter. He reached a corner and there once more dismounted amongst rocks and waited. Ken came within range and the six-shooter barked; but the aim was not true. A bullet sang past Ken's left ear, and before another could be fired he was too low in the saddle to present much of a target, and the gun he had taken from Batt was out and ready.

Tarzan swept upwards and Rusty exposed himself to shoot again. Two guns set erect in the saddle again, for his would-be murderer had fallen on his face with his arms outflung.

Colonel Austin and his party were by this time among the foothills.

"Shots!" exclaimed the colonel. "Up Gorgo Pass way! Come on, boys!"

Ken passed the spot where Rusty had fallen, urging Tarzan to greater effort; but the noise of fire-arms had dismayed La Crosse, and he stopped his horse by a narrow opening among the boulders on his right, slid to the ground, and pulled Gloria from the saddle.

"Where are you taking me?" she cried as he bundled her into the opening.

"Up those rocks!" he snapped.

"No!" she shrieked, and tried to break away from him.

"You do as I say!" He thrust her before him. "Come on! Get up there! Come on!"

She tried to dodge past him, but the way was too narrow for that. He gripped her by the shoulder in a fashion that bruised her flesh, and she was compelled to clamber up the steep cleft.

Ken reached the opening, saw the black horse standing beside it and looked up. At the same moment Gloria looked down.

"Ken!" she screamed. "Ken!"

Ken was out of the saddle in an instant and climbing the rocky way. But La Crosse swung round, holding Gloria in front of him as a shield, and fired over her shoulder at the pursuer.

Ken dived behind a rock and fired back, but he was too afraid of hitting the girl to hit the outlaw, who disappeared with his captive between more rocks and climbed again.

From behind another and higher mass of limestone La Crosse used his gun again, but Ken had plenty of cover and used it without staying his upward progress. Again and again La Crosse fired at him from various vantage points till both his guns were empty. Just above, now, was a great flat bluff which, on its farther side, overhung Gorgo Pass, and he made for that bluff.

Ken, among the litter of rocks, saw him move aside from Gloria without letting go of her arm, and he took a step forward to fire. But he caught his right foot in a crevice and stumbled. His right hand struck against a rock

"SHADOWS OF THE ORIENT"

Silenced

"CALLING X-26—calling X-26—
X-26—calling X-26—calling X-26—"

A swarthy, thin-lipped man sat before a wireless set and droned out the call, whilst a short, thick-set man with the face of a pugilist sucked nervously at a cigarette.

"Go on calling!" snapped out the latter. "They're after him, Rod."

Rod, the operator, went on calling, and then there came a buzz.

"That's Dawson, Spud."

The ex-pugilist went to the microphone.

"Watch out, Flash," he said. "Patrol 'plane scouting. Try to land and save the load."

An aeroplane was flying high over the sea, and Flash Dawson, after receiving the warning from Spud Nolan, leaned over the side of the 'plane to glance downwards. He could see no sign of any machine below. His glasses showed no sign of a patrol ahead, but when he looked back his eyes narrowed—that was that speck that glittered in a fleecy cloud?

Flash revved up his engine, and after a while took another covert glance along the fuselage and saw that the 'plane was closer. Out came the glasses, and Flash knew that an immigration 'plane was tailing him. If he were caught with this load it meant at least five years behind bars. He looked at the lever by his side and hesitated. Another glance back showed that the patrol 'plane was gaining rapidly. He dived for a bank of clouds, and, when safely hidden, he gripped the lever and pulled it slowly back.

A trap-door in the under-carriage opened. Flash Dawson shuddered, and quickly closed the trap-door.

The patrol 'plane forced Dawson to land, and, after an examination, the pilot was allowed to proceed on his way over the Mexican border into the United States. He landed at the Borderville Air Port and took a car into the prosperous town of Portland. He left the car in a main thoroughfare, and, glancing round to see if he were followed, made his way to the foreign quarter.

The shop window of Chin Shieu was full of Oriental treasures and antiques, but Dawson did not enter by the main doorway; he knocked three times at a side entrance, a shutter flew back, and then the door was opened.

In a room full of ancient carpets, Ming vases, cases of jewellery, Chinese suits of armour and other treasures, were two men. The sleek Oriental in the dark European clothes was Chin Shieu. The man in the perfect dinner jacket was James Moss, collector. He was engrossed in the examination of a jade necklace when a panel slid back and Flash Dawson was shown into the room by two Chinese servants.

"Hi, Chin," greeted Flash, "you got some dough for me?"

Chin Shieu jumped up from his chair by the large mahogany table.

"I have bad report from you?" His face was contorted with savage anger.

Flash shook his bullet head and showed his teeth in a nervous grin.

"Sorry, Chin, but there was no chance for me to land that load, and I wasn't going to let them catch me with it."

"And you expect me to pay you for murdering my countrymen?"

"Say, what is this? You mean I don't get my dough?"

"Not a cent!" sneered the Chinaman.

"All right, then, you get another flyer," shouted Flash Dawson. "But I'm not through."

The panelling closed and Dawson had gone. James Moss had all this while paid no attention to the conversation—he was too engrossed, so it seemed, in the necklace. The panel moved again and a half-caste Chinaman slid into the room. He received an order in Chinese to follow Flash Dawson and find out where he went—to act accordingly.

Flash left the antique shop and entered a small all-night restaurant next door, where there was a telephone. He inserted a coin and dialed a number.

Inspector Sullivan had been in the service of the Immigration Department for many years, and he was very angry when the telephone by his bedside rang at two in the morning. He grabbed the 'phone.

"Hallo! Hallo! Yes, yes, this is Inspector Sullivan. What the devil do you want at this hour of the morning?"

"If you'll come down to Chinatown," came a husky voice at the other end.

"I'll show you how to get that whole smuggling ring."

Sullivan was awake at once.

"What's that? Who's speaking?"

"Never mind who it is—this is the goods. If you'll rush down to the Canton House I'll lead you to the chief of that ring."

"Yes, all right," snapped out Sullivan. "Where'll I meet you? Hallo—hallo—hallo—hallo!" The 'phone was dead. At last the inspector got the operator. "Trace that call. Get me Market 44—quick!"

It seemed hours before a voice spoke. "This is Sullivan," he bellowed. "Get the raid squad to the Canton House. I'll meet you there."

Flash Dawson had not finished his conversation because the half-caste had fired through the window of the telephone booth. The tongue of Flash Dawson had been silenced!

The Raid

CHIN SHIEU was a bland and cunning rascal. His antiques and curios were just a blind to prevent people knowing the real nature of his business. At the back of his shop were a number of elaborately appointed rooms that were devoted to gambling for moderate and high stakes. There were rooms where the man of the street could buy his chips and have a modest gamble, and there were rooms where a person could lose a thousand dollars in a few seconds.

In this room that night were gathered a motley throng. Wealthy foreigners, Chinese merchants and a sprinkling of American Society folk. Viola Avery was there—a pretty but a very wilful young woman. She was the only daughter of a very sedate judge, and, having lost her mother when quite young, had been allowed to do much as she liked ever since. The judge had had to lay down the law recently, as some of her exploits were more than his patience could stand—the notoriety did not do him very much good. Though petted and spoiled, Viola was quite a nice girl at heart.

Viola had heard about the gambling-rooms behind Chin Shieu's antique shop, and had insisted that Oscar, one of her many young admirers, should escort her there. Oscar, poor lad, knew that, if he said "No," then he would be right out of favour and some other fellow would get the chance. But there are limits to a man's patience. They had arrived just before eleven in a party, and now everyone wanted to go home with the exception of Viola.

Viola was enjoying the thrill of gambling because it was one of the things that would have made the judge lose most of his few remaining hairs. Also she had been winning about five hundred hucks and now she was down two hundred. She was staying till she got that back.

"Vi, for the last time, will you go home with us now?"

The judge's stubborn daughter smiled. "No!"

So Oscar and his friends bado her good-night and good luck. She got her two hundred huck and should have gone home, but gambling is hard to leave. Her luck might be in, and she wanted a new car. Her allowance was all gone; here was her great chance.

At that precise moment Hong Chow, who had shot down Flash Dawson, was whispering to his august master that he "Think flyer 'phone inspectors; think police come quick." Chin Shieu at once gave orders that the Chinese sheltering under his roof be told to get out before the police arrived.

Viola had just lost the two hundred and had decided on doubling her stakes when a Chinaman shuffled up to the dealer and whispered in his ear. At May 23rd, 1936.

once things began to happen. Money and counters vanished, the table became an innocent affair with a cloth and a bowl of flowers. The girl wondered what was amiss; she did not like the way people were hurrying from the room and why there was so much whispering. A door opened and a number of dirty-looking Chinese rushed in and hurried across the room, to disappear through some curtains. A feeling of panic gripped her, and then she gasped—faintly she heard the sound of a police siren.

It was a raid!

All the Chinese had gone by the time the police arrived. They had special orders on how to get out of the place quickly and where to hide in cases of emergency. But the public did not know the quick ways out of Chin Shieu's gambling dive, and they got in each other's way. They began to pour out into the street as the police jumped from their cars.

"Get back—get back, everybody get back! Let no one get away!" bellowed old Sullivan. "Everybody back inside. Oh, would you?" This to a man who had tried to slip past—that same man was a hospital case.

Viola tried to get through the crowd, but some of Sullivan's men stopped her. The old inspector twisted his lined face into a ferocious scowl.

"Where do you think you're going, young lady?"

"Take your hands off me!" Viola said indignantly to the police officers.

"You're staying here with the rest of them."

"But I'm Viola Avery." The girl was distressed. "If my father learns I've been here in this raid, I'll be in an awful jam."

"You're in an awful jam now," sneered the inspector.

From a curtained recess James Moss watched the little scene. He had been waiting a chance to get away without being caught, and now he saw a perfect way of achieving that end.

Sullivan's eyes narrowed suspiciously as the elegantly attired Moss appeared out of the shadows. The inspector gripped the girl's arm and placed a restraining hand on the newcomer.

"I beg your pardon, inspector," drawled Moss, "but this young lady is Viola Avery."

"Did I say she wasn't?"

"But you don't understand," Moss spoke patiently. "She's Judge Avery's daughter."

Sullivan was startled.

"Federal Judge Avery?"

"None other."

"Why didn't she say so in the first place?" The inspector signalled his men to stand back. "How was I to know?"

"Miss Avery came here to see Chin Shieu's antiques, and I had the honour to be her escort." He gave a warning pressure to her arm, which he had taken. "Then it will be all right if we proceed, inspector?" Sullivan rubbed his chin as if uncertain, and then signalled that they could pass. "Thank you, inspector. I shall remind the judge of your kindness."

Sullivan watched them walk away arm-in-arm, and he rubbed his chin harder still. He had a kind of feeling that a bluff had been put over, and that made him mad. His irritation was further increased when they found no sign of any smuggled Chinese. There were a number of Chinamen there, but these all had signed permits. He tried to bully Chin Shieu.

"Where have you got these Chinamen hidden?"

"No understand, Honourable Inspector," bleated Chin Shieu.

A detective came up and nudged the inspector. "They got those Chinks away in a truck."

"Somebody tipped them the works," Sullivan rasped. "I told you a man 'phoned me. See any sign of him?"

"Yeah!" The detective gave a grim smile. "We found him outside the 'phono booth in the restaurant two doors up the street—stone dead. They shot the squealer. Of course, the Chink that runs that cats don't know a thing."

"I'll check up on them," muttered the discomfited Sullivan. "We'll hold all this bunch for investigation. Maybe some of them can tell us something."

But Inspector Sullivan went back to bed having learnt precisely nothing.

The Knight-errant

ON leaving the premises of Chin Shieu, Moss hailed a taxi and held open the door for Viola Avery to enter. He told the driver to make for Main Street.

"I thought it best to get out of there before that inspector changed his mind," laughed Moss, as he sat down beside her. "You can give the address as soon as we get back to civilisation."

"Thank you, Sir Walter Raleigh!" Viola stared admiringly at the handsome stranger. "You certainly saved me from the morning papers' mud."

"The pleasure was all mine!" Moss smiled back gallantly and courteously. "Tell me, what were you doing in Chinatown at this hour of the morning?"

"Watching little buttons move from one pile to another."

He whistled softly.

"Fan-tan, eh?"

"Yes. Were you at it, too?"

He shook his head.

"Oh, heavens, no! I was searching for some unusual curio. I like to go to those sort of places when I'm not likely to be disturbed." He laughed. "This time I got a disturbing I didn't expect."

"So you collect curios—how strange!" Viola was fascinated by this mysterious person.

"It's a disease with me." He shrugged his shoulders and took out a gold case. "Cigarette?" She accepted it, and he flicked a lighter. "I must confess that Orientals have a peculiar irresistible fascination for me."

"You arouse my curiosity."

"I, or my collection?" he asked, with a mocking grin.

"Your collection, of course!" laughed Viola.

"I was afraid of that." He leaned back. "Well, anyway, I'd be delighted to have you see my collection. By the way, I'm having a cocktail party tomorrow evening—just a few people. Won't you come?" He saw that she was hesitating. "Why don't you bring your father? I'd be honoured to meet him. I shall be terribly disappointed if you don't come. I've got some treasures in my collection that have amazing stories attached to them, jewels that I think you'd like, and some marvellous paintings."

"Now I understand why you were able to sway that inspector so easily." Her smile was tantalising. "You are very persuasive."

Moss gave a sigh of content.

"Then you will come?" And he smiled when she nodded. For a second it seemed to the girl that this man's eyes had narrowed, and that there was a touch of the Oriental about him.

Superseded

CAPTAIN GRAVES, one of the chiefs of the Immigration Department, sent for Sullivan and stared at him disapprovingly.

"You haven't been very successful in this case, Sullivan."

Sullivan gave his chief a quick glance, then looked at the wall.

"Well, chief, things kinda ran badly last night. You see—"

"I know all about last night," interrupted Graves. "No need to go through all that again. I'm not censuring your failure, but we must break up that ring and stop this smuggling of Chinamen. I believe your methods are antiquated, and I'm going to try out one of the younger school. Sullivan, you will turn your case over to Baxter and become his partner."

"I'm to be under Baxter?" gasped the inspector. "Why, he's only a kid! I've been in the service twenty-four years now, and—"

"That's just what's the matter with you. I believe you'll learn something from Baxter's methods." The captain pressed a bell. "Where you've failed he may succeed."

A spruce, upright, smiling young man entered the room.

"You called me, sir?"

"Yes, come in, Baxter," Graves nodded. "I'm switching Sullivan to you—work together. Study this case and see what you can do. Better get busy."

Old Sullivan was in a very surly frame of mind as he left the chief's room and went into the outer office. He glowered at the younger man.

"I don't know what this department's coming to. If it wasn't that I'd be eligible for a pension next year I'd resign right now."

Baxter smiled in a friendly though jubilant manner. "Don't take it so hard, Sullivan," he said. "You and I should make a good team. Come on, let's get down to it. Take a chair and let's talk this case over." He stared at some notes he had made. "Did you question Miss Avery?"

"Well—er—no."
"How do you know it was Miss Avery? Anybody else could have used her name."

"I know my business, young man!" Sullivan exclaimed angrily. "I can tell when anybody's trying to hoodlum me. Besides, I got her purse." He produced a sequin bag. "It is obviously her bag. We found it at Canton House after she'd gone."

"That still doesn't prove it was Miss Avery," coolly stated Baxter. "Anyone could have found or stolen Miss Avery's bag, and used it. There are master minds behind this racket, Sullivan, and they're up to all the tricks. I'll ring the lady." He looked at a card taken from the bag and dialed a number.

It chanced that Viola was having breakfast with her father, and was looking nervously at the account of the raid. If her name got into the affair her allowance would be stopped and her father might send her into a convent or do something equally drastic. The butler appeared with a portable telephone. An inspector from the immigration office was on the 'phone. She saw her father peer over the top of his paper.

"Yes, this is Viola Avery. What, I—in a raid! Of course not, how preposterous! You have my purse? I've had one stolen. That must explain how you found it. You'd like me to identify it? Very well, I'll come round."

Viola Avery saw her father lay down his paper, wipe his spectacles, and push back his chair. She knew she was going to be questioned. She fled before he had the chance to say a word.

In the immigration office young Baxter looked at the older man.

"There you are, Sullivan. The real Viola Avery knows nothing about it.

People who use fictitious names are the sort that play a big part in this smuggling. There was a man with the woman and you did not ask his name. No wonder old Gravey was a trifle riled with you. He reckoned you did right to let Judge Avery's daughter get away, but he'll be sore when he finds it was some other dame."

They were still discussing the case when one of the staff entered and informed them that Miss Avery was outside.

"She's been quick," grinned Baxter. "Okay, show her in."

Sullivan jumped to his feet. "Why, that's the girl—she's the one that was in the raid."

"Take a seat, Miss Avery," Baxter rose and offered her a chair. "You've come after this purse?"

"Yes!" The beautiful young woman stared at him anxiously.

"Why did you lie to me over the 'phone?"

"Well, you see, I had to. At the time it would have been unpleasant to tell the truth." She smiled. "I was having breakfast with my father—the judge. She studied a tiny wrist-watch. "I must be getting back. I hadn't properly finished my breakfast."

"Have you a car?" questioned Baxter.

"No, why?" She opened her eyes in surprise at his question.

"Then I shall drive you home." He gave a twisted grin. "I wouldn't think of depriving you of your breakfast, but there are things I must learn, and we can talk on the way."

"How pleasant!" Viola was haughty. "A sort of inquisition."

"Call it that if you wish." Baxter took his hat from a peg and turned to his new assistant. "Sullivan, you go down to the morgue and see what you can find on that body. I'll meet you there."

Sullivan saw Baxter open the door of the office and saw the two young people leave.

"What a way to conduct an inquiry," he sneered. "If it wasn't for that pension I would resign."

Baxter conducted the judge's daughter to a serviceable, high-powered two-seater car. They drove for some distance in silence.

"When are you starting this third degree?" the girl frowned at him. "What are you waiting for?"

"Just thinking what I should ask you." He gave her a very imperious, casual look. "You lied because of your father?"

"Yes, if father finds out he'll have about seventeen fits," she answered. "Especially if he finds out I was down there alone."

"Alone?"

"That man wasn't my escort, just a chance acquaintance."

"Tell me about him—I'm interested."

"This man was a perfect gentleman. Her look was significant. "Which is more than can be said of some people."

"Because you're a judge's daughter you think I should let you have your purse, aid and abet in keeping the fact that you were foolish to go to a gambling hell from the Press and your father, and not dare to force my obnoxious presence upon you." He smiled sarcastically.

"I'm sorry, but I have my duty to perform. Also this person may have been a perfect gentleman, but gentleman can be criminals."

"Not this one. Ever hear of a curio collector committing crimes? Why, they're always the victims."

"What does this gentleman collect?"

"He possesses one of the most valuable collections of Oriental curios in the States. This afternoon at the cocktail hour I shall be privileged to gaze upon the one and only imperial robe of the Ming dynasty. I suppose a man who owns such treasures would naturally be a criminal."

The inspector gripped the girl's arm and placed a restraining hand on the newcomer.

"Improbable, but not impossible. His name and address?"

"I didn't like to ask him."

Baxter did not speak for some minutes.

"Judge Avery is a very astute man. I presume that my telephone call may have been overheard by him. Might he not put two and two together?"

"Yes, and make five. I've got to think of something to tell him when I get back."

"I tell you what I'll do," Baxter beamed at her. "I'll come in with you and say you were out with me last night, or I can fix some excuse for that bag being in the Canton House. In return you take me along to this cocktail party, and we'll see your escort's collection."

"I'll not have you snooping around a gentleman's home. Besides, I'm quite capable of telling father a tale."

"I bet you are." He turned off in a wide thoroughfare. "Very nearly home, Miss Avery. So you don't know his name and address, but you know where this cocktail party is being held. Where is it being held?"

"Why, Sherlock Holmes, you find out."

"I will—I'll meet you there." Neatly he brought the car to the kerb, and opened the door.

"If you try to shadow me I'll get my father—" she began.

"Your father will have seventeen fits if you do." He raised his hat and got back into his car. "I'll see you at the party. Good-bye!" With a derisive grin he drove away and left the girl staring after the car.

Clues

BAXTER drove straight to the mortuary, where he found Sullivan looking disgustedly at some blood-stained attire.

"Not a thing," Sullivan told his new chief. "No chance of identification. They were taking no chances."

"We must learn this man's identity."

"We might put the corpse through a third degree and see if he'll talk to us," sneered Sullivan. "He wouldn't even whisper to me."

"Maybe you didn't use the right kind of language," Baxter was looking at the clothing. "You missed this for a start. See that pin-point design that's shaped like a pair of wings? Doesn't it speak to you?"

"Either I'm stone deaf, or it's talking awfully low."

Baxter held up a garment.

"Hey, smell that. Doesn't that tell you anything?"

"Not a thing," Sullivan answered. "And you're not kidding me that it means a thing to you."

"I'm trying to prove that dead men do tell tales," Baxter was very patient. "That pin-point shows that a pair of wings was sewed on these overalls. This man must have been an aviator. But these wings being removed show that at one time the man was permanently grounded, but the oil spots and the smell of this jacket show that he's been working at his trade recently."

"Wait a minute. Why couldn't this flyer have been an automobile driver?"

"Did you ever see a car-driver leave marks like this?" Baxter pointed. "See that line inside his knees? That's from gripping a stick when occasionally he has to use his hands for something else. See these gloves—one practically new, and the other much used? Motor-drivers use both hands, but flyers use only one. This guy was left-handed."

"Sounds pretty good," Sullivan had to admit. "But it don't tell you his name."

"That's what you're going to find out," Baxter chuckled. "Take a picture May 23rd, 1936."

of the stiff, and check it with all permanently grounded flyers. You should be able to identify him that way. I'll meet you at the office later."

"Hey, where you going?"

"To a cocktail party."

"Cocktail party!" growled Sullivan, when he was alone. "And he leaves me to do all the work."

It was a surprise to Viola Avery to arrive at the cocktail party to find among the distinguished guests a Mr. Keeler—in other words, Mr. Tony Baxter of the Immigration Department. Moss had to talk to his guests so that Baxter had a moment alone with the girl.

"I am a maniac on Oriental lore," he explained with a grin. "I came especially to see a Ming robe. Most collectors are terribly vain. All I had to do was to call and contend he had a fake robe. He instantly invited me over to gloat over my discomfiture. As regards the address—you spoke it to a taxi-driver on leaving your house. It was 'phoned to me at once. I arranged for your taxi to be delayed a few minutes, and now you know how I'm here."

"He will find out you are a fraud."

Baxter shook his head and pointed to a figure.

"This little Buddha was smuggled from a Lasha monastery probably at the cost of hundreds of lives. Artistically it is priceless, actually it is worth about fifteen thousand dollars. You see, Miss Avery, it's part of my job to be well-versed." His gaze was admiring. "Say, did anybody ever tell you how lovely you are?"

"Am I supposed to be flattered by that remark?"

"Why, you should be insulted!" The bold young man seemed quite at his ease. "How about dinner one night?"

A slow, tantalising smile showed for a moment.

"I might—it all depends to the answer to one question: Do you still suspect the gentleman?"

"Well, even a curio collector might have a dual personality. You have heard of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde?"

"Yes, you remind me of him," sweetly murmured the girl, and walked away as she saw Moss coming towards them.

But Baxter was not ruffled. Without actually saying so he made it quite clear to James Moss that he knew Judge Avery's daughter quite well, and the girl was not the sort to betray him, though her eyes did their best to wither him with scorn. That failing, she did her best to flirt with Moss.

Viola Avery had her own machine and a pilot's licence, but her father had locked up her 'plane because she would loop the loop and take daring risks. She had had over three hundred hours' solo, and she was dying to fly again, and when she heard that James Moss had a 'plane she begged him to let her fly it. Moss smiled and said he valued his friendship with Viola Avery too much to risk losing it by incurring the judge's wrath. He might be barred from calling. When Viola left so did Baxter.

"You're a very silly girl if you don't stay clear of Mr. Moss, his home and his 'planes. It's my honest opinion that—"

"Did I ask for your opinion?"

"A little wisdom wouldn't harm you." He hailed a taxi and held the door open. "Don't be alarmed; I'm not inflicting myself on you any more—for the moment." He bowed, and then had the impertinence to wink.

Baxter then went back to the Immigration Department, where he found Sullivan waiting for him. The old inspector was strutting about like a peacock.

"I've been looking over that corpse and I got his name. It was easy for me. His name's James Dawson, better known as Flash. Permanently grounded for taking up a 'plane while grounded. I got an address, but a year old."

Down they went to Baxter's car and out to the address. A year since Dawson had been there, but they found where he had gone. So from address to address went the two men until they came to the cheap lodgings where Flash had resided prior to his death. They turned his rooms upside-down, but they found nothing that gave them any assistance among letters and personal belongings, but there was a paragraph in a paper marked in blue pencil that interested Baxter.

"Aviator wanted," he read out. "Must be young, healthy, fearless, ready to take a chance. Good pay. Box 264, 'Morning Record.'" He folded the paper. "That's fine."

"What's fine?" demanded Sullivan.

"Why, you big Lummo, don't you see the connection?" Baxter sighed.

"No, I'll have to tell you. Fearless, ready to take a chance hints at a racket. Now listen if my deduction isn't correct. Dawson 'phoned you to tip you off about the smuggling. How could he have known who the chief was unless he was working with him? Isn't it natural to suppose he got this job by answering this advertisement?"

"Why should Dawson want to turn informer?"

"Don't know. Might have been a million reasons, none of which concerns us, though I'll wager dough and revenge play their part. The thing we're interested in is catching that gang."

From his pocket he drew out that day's paper, and turned to the advertisement page.

"Look at this. The day after Dawson is killed, the same advert reappears in the paper. Do you call that a coincidence?"

"What do you call it?"

"A lucky break for us," chortled Baxter. "I'm going to answer that advert and see what happens."

Into the Lion's Den

THE next morning saw Sullivan and Baxter down by the river quarter of the town. They left their car in a side street and proceeded on foot till they came to a number of warehouses, factories and store yards. They halted close to an old shed, and Sullivan peered cautiously round the corner.

"Well, that's the place."

"Better keep this for me," Baxter was wearing blue overalls, had not shaved and looked rather dirty. "I guess this outfit will pass me by these mugs. I may need a little time. It's hard to tell what might happen."

Sullivan shivered.

"You'd better let me go along with you."

"They know you as well as you know them," grinned Baxter. "They don't know me."

Inside a shed sat a number of men—Spud Nolan's gang. Spud himself was there, and the gang were watching him because he had been reading from a letter.

"Tricky Thomas?" Spud glanced round. "Anybody know him?"

A number of them had heard the name but never remembered actually coming in contact with him. Three raps on the door caused each man to slip a hand to his pocket. The latch clicked, and Tony Baxter stepped into the shed.

"What do you want?" Nolan demanded menacingly.

"I guess you're the man I want to see—about that letter," Baxter indicated the letter in Nolan's hand.

"Whateha talking about, fellow?" snarled the suspicious Nolan.

"That's all right, buddy," Baxter gave a knowing grin. "You don't have to put on any act for me. I'm Tricky Thomas, the guy that wrote it."

"How'd you get here?"

"I followed that dumb cluck you sent over to the newspaper office to fetch the letter. A fool way to get a flyer if you ask me. Suppose some dick had smelt that advert and had come poking around?"

"I guess we can look after anyone who wants to poke his nose into our business," Nolan leered unpleasantly.

"I guess you're right," Baxter said as he glanced at the tough characters sprawling around the room. "What about that job? Is it still open?"

"Yes, that is, if you're Tricky Thomas of the McDown bunch."

"Here's my old pilot's licence and some junk to prove I'm Tricky Thomas," Baxter produced a number of papers from his pocket. "Now what's the racket, and how much do I get?"

"Chinamen. You get two-fifty dollars a load."

"Two fifty?" cried Baxter. "What is this—charity work?"

"The last flyer dropped his load and we had to cut the prices."

"I'm not dropping anything, and I'll tell you what I'll do. Three hundred dollars and I'll play ball."

Nolan hesitated for only a moment.

"All right, that's a deal, but get this, Tricky, no cargo no dough."

"Okay, I'll take it. All right, when and where?"

"I'll tell you when after I have checked up on you," Nolan handed back the papers. "One of the boys goes over the Border with you and you land the load at our field in Mercer Canyon." He went to a 'phone and dialed a number. "Spud talking. What 'plane you got ready? Is X-26 ready?"

"Sure!" came the answer of the mechanic in charge of the 'planes that were housed in an old factory. "You got a flyer?"

"Yeah, we got a flyer," spoke Nolan. "Tricky Thomas. You know him?"

Baxter covertly watched Nolan's face. "I thought that whole McDown outfit went up for a stretch," the mechanic replied. "Better make sure you ain't got a 'phoney, Spud!"

Baxter saw that quick look that Spud Nolan gave him before concluding his call.

"What'd you say if I told you Tricky's up the river?" Nolan had whipped out a gun, and so had all the others.

"I'd say you were cracked," Baxter looked contemptuous and sneering. "I'm not up the river because I skipped bail. That's why I need ready dough and a hideout. Say, do I look like a sucker? Would I be fool enough to stick my neck in here if I wasn't right?"

Spud put away his gun and rubbed his cheek. He was uncertain. One of the gang spoke:

"What'll we do about him, Spud?"

"I don't know. We need a flyer awful bad. I'll 'phone Steve again." He got through to the mechanic. "Spud speaking again. This guy swears he's Tricky Thomas and that he skipped bail. Do you know anybody who could identify Tricky Thomas of the McDown gang? You do? Then get him and bring him over here." He hung up. "Sorry, Tricky, but I can't take a chance. Rod, you and Tiger take him downstairs and hold him till Steve shows up with this other guy. I'll go over and see what the chief wants me to do."

There was no alternative for Baxter but to obey, and with a resigned shrug of his shoulders he made no protest when two of the gang indicated a wooden staircase down into the basement. But he knew he was in a tight corner.

Impetuous Viola is Tricked

JAMES MOSS, garbed in a silk mandarin's cloak, was reclining on a divan when a servant announced that Spud Nolan wished to see him.

"I had to come, Chief. I'm in a jam."

"I told you that you must keep away from me," Moss sat up angrily. "It is dangerous for us to be seen together."

"No one knows of this hide-out of yours by the river," answered Nolan. "Beside, Chief, I had to see you. I can't get a flyer, and there's that load over the Border."

"Has no one answered the advertisement?"

"Yeah, one did, but he may be a phoney. I got to wait for a check-up on him. I got him across the way with the boys. Says he's Tricky Thomas, but I ain't taking chances—got a pal of Steve's coming across. If this guy ain't Thomas then I'm done, and the boys are grumbling because they ain't had any dough."

"We must collect that load," decided Moss, "and time's pressing." He buried his face in his hands, and when he looked up there was a smile on the bold, reckless face. "I've got a hunch that may work." He turned to the 'phone and dialed a number. "Oh, hallo, Miss Avery! This is James Moss. I'm terribly sorry, but I'm afraid I'll be unable to keep my engagement to-day. I've been called away on some urgent business at my ranch, so urgent, in fact, that I must fly there at once."

"Fly to your ranch?" Viola's voice was shrill with excitement. "Oh, how thrilling! Say, why couldn't I go along?"

"I'm sorry, Miss Avery, but under the circumstances I'm afraid you can't. I might be unavoidably detained, then you'd be forced to fly the ship back alone."

"But that would be glorious! Oh, do be an angel, and let me come. Please!"

"All right, I can't refuse you. But not a word to a soul, understand?" Moss grinned across at Nolan as he spoke. "I wouldn't want your father to be angry with me about you. How soon could you be ready to leave? You can leave at once—that's fine. I'll come right over." He listened for a bit, then, with a curt "Good-bye," hung up.

"I've got a flyer, Spud," Moss announced. "I'll go down and let this flyer come back alone. Her father's a judge, so we're in clover. Best get going, Spud. Have a truck down at the field ready for a pick-up."

Old Sullivan had seen Nolan depart and he saw the man hurry back. The inspector noticed that a man lounged round the entrance to the building—evidently a watcher. How had young Baxter fared in that den of crooks?

Nolan went into the basement, and Baxter sighed with relief to see it was the gang-leader. If it had been Steve

It was lucky for the inspector that the three gangsters did not look up.

and the other man the position would have been desperate.

"I want you two to stick around here till they show up," ordered Nolan. "I'm taking the other boys with me. We're landing a load pretty soon, and I got to go."

"I thought you said you didn't have another flyer?" Baxter asked.

"The Chief just got another one," Nolan answered, then looked significantly at the two guards. "Red outside will watch for Steve. If the mug he brings along fails to identify this guy, let him have it. You know what to do with the body."

Sullivan was wondering what he should do when he saw three of the gang emerge, and it was a rude shock to realise they were coming in his direction. Desperately he glanced round for some place to hide. If he ran he might make a getaway, but that would make it awkward for Baxter. A telegraph-pole attracted his attention—it had steps fixed in the wood for line operators to use when making repairs. The inspector clambered up the pole.

Nolan and two of his gang passed close to the pole, and luckily for Sullivan never looked up.

"If that guy ain't Tricky Thomas, he's in a tough spot," muttered one of the gang as they passed.

"Suffering cats!" gurgled Sullivan when they were out of hearing. "I gotta get that young pup outta this jam." He climbed down the pole. "Maybe I should wait a while longer." He took up his old position.

In the Nick of Time

TONY BAXTER smoked a cigarette and eyed his two guardians warily.

So far he had had no chance to make a break for it. His bluff had been called, and if he wanted to see another day he had to get out of this place before Steve showed up.

The Tiger went upstairs to get some cigarettes and that gave Tony his chance. Rod was half asleep in his chair with the gun held limply in his hand. A dive forward and the gun was wrenched away, a full-bodied punch to the jaw and Rod went flat on his back. The Tiger heard the fall and then his pard's yell.

Tony got to cover behind a packing-case. The Tiger sought refuge behind an iron furnace. The guns roared and bullets whined dangerously close. Rod on the floor sat up, and his evil face became suffused with rage as he felt his aching jaw. He looked round and saw a heavy balk of timber; he crawled to it, then crawled towards the crate behind which Baxter was hiding.

Meanwhile, Sullivan had seen four men approaching, and one he recognised. Even he could guess the reason of these men being here—to identify Tricky Thomas. Sullivan made a bee-line for the nearest call-box.

"I just saw Steve Garlow go in with some of his tough mugs," he reported to the captain. "I'm not going to wait any longer."

"Right, Sullivan," came the voice of Graves. "I'll send men down there right away. They're standing by—with you in five minutes."

Tony Baxter was peering round the crate to get a chance at the gunman when the balk of timber crashed down on his head.

"Don't shoot, Tiger, I got him!" yelled Rod. "Guess I'm going to give it to him now."

The ferocious, scarred rascal that was the Tiger came out of hiding.

"Wait a minute, Rod," he cautioned. "We know this ain't Tricky Thomas, or he wouldn't have pulled this, but May 23rd, 1930.

you ain't running this show. Spud Nolan gave us orders. We'll tie this mug up and wait for Steve to get here."

"All right," Rod agreed reluctantly. "Throw me that rope."

They dragged the limp body of Baxter from behind the crate and bound him to a chair. A pail of water caused the young man to open his eyes. He found himself staring into two cruel, leering faces.

"I'm going upstairs to look for Steve," Tiger stated. "Think you can handle him?"

"Yeah, I'll take care of him," snarled Rod. "If he as much as moves an eyelid I'll blow his brains out."

Tiger went upstairs and had not been there more than a few minutes when there came a rap at the door. Red entered, Steve and two other men close at his heels.

"Here's Steve," said Red. "Better take 'em down below." He went out, closing the door behind him, and resumed his job as watcher.

Steve Garlow went down into the cellar, and the two gangsters went with him. They turned the lights so that a good view could be had of Baxter's face. The man who had been called to do the check-up whispered in Steve Garlow's ear. That rascal grinned unpleasantly.

"Boys, my buddy here says that if this is Tricky Thomas, then he's King Kong."

"A phoney, huh?" The Tiger's expression was fiendish. "Keep your eye on him, Rod, whilst I see the boys outa here."

A number of plain-clothes men were peering round a building as the door opened and out came Steve Garlow and his two gangsters.

Then Sullivan gave the signal, and four plain-clothes men rushed forward. "Get their guns, and get the whole bunch round to the cars," Sullivan ordered. "One move from you, Red, and I'll drill you. Stand away from that door."

Sullivan and two of his men rushed into the building. They saw the cellar and the stairs. The detective walked to the bottom.

"This place is surrounded," he shouted. "No one has a chance to make a get-away, and unless you're crazy, any mug here should ditch any fire-arms and hold his hands high."

Rod turned his evil gaze on Baxter, but even that callous rascal hesitated. If he killed this police spy it would mean the chair, because he hadn't a chance of shooting his way to safety. He flung his gun on the table.

Sullivan whipped out a knife and severed Baxter's bonds.

Baxter smiled at the older man. "Thanks a lot. Guess I'd better listen to some of your ideas after this."

"Never mind about that," Sullivan shook his head. "All in the day's work. What did you find out?"

"Listen, they've got a 'plane, number X-26," Baxter was himself again. "It's due in with a load right now."

"Where?"

"Mercer Canyon," was the answer. "They've got a ground crew there for the pick-up. Now you rush over there with the men. I'll take off in my 'plane and cruise around in case somebody warns them and they try to skip it."

The Hostage

MOSS drove round in a magnificent car and picked up Viola Avery.

He was full of compliments and attentions. They drove out to a flying field, which he explained belonged to a private company in which he was in terested. A large machine was ready. Moss was himself a skilled pilot, but to the girl he pretended to know very little about flying. He never dreamt of soiling his own hands by flying Chinamen into the States.

After an uneventful flight Moss indicated some buildings below and told the girl that this was his ranch. Viola had expected to find something more important than a number of shacks. She made a perfect landing.

"Well, here we are," cried Moss, as he helped her to alight. "Not much of a ranch, but it serves my purpose."

From the ranch-house came a big, broad-shouldered, weather-tanned man. His open shirt and wide sombrero seemed so typical to Viola. She was not surprised to learn that Mr. Lufkin was the ranch foreman.

"Now, will you please excuse me," Moss said after some general conversation about cattle and crops. "I have some business to attend to. Lufkin, I will turn Miss Avery over to you. I suggest that Chang, our Chinese cook, brew you a pot of tea. I shan't be very long."

Quite unsuspecting, Viola allowed Lufkin to conduct her to the ranch-house and a comfortable room, where a sleek, young Chinaman bowed to her and assured her that he was famous for his tea. The foreman talked for some while of life on the open range.

Viola would have been surprised if she had followed Moss. The rogue went to one of the sheds, knocked twice and an elderly Chinaman appeared and gave a slight bow.

"Where's my letter for this load?" "One moment. Before I give letter for you take Chinamen, you must leave hostage with me."

"I don't understand, Yung Yau." "Hostage to insure my countrymen," the Chinaman explained. "Last time they die."

Moss tried to laugh. "You don't need a hostage with me. This load will go through without any accident. I might fly it through myself. Will that satisfy you?"

Yung Yau shook his head. "No hostage—no Chinamen."

The smuggler thought for a moment. "All right, I'll leave you a hostage. How about the young lady who came with me?"

Yung Yau nodded quickly. "Lady all right, make good hostage."

A letter was produced and it was inscribed with a number of quaint characters and sentences. Solemnly it was torn in half, and one half was handed to Moss. Then a group of Chinamen hurried from the hut towards the machine. There was a closed cabin behind the passenger cockpit—Viola had not noticed it.

Viola got rather tired of discussing ranch-life, and Lufkin said he would go out to see how Mr. Moss was getting on. The girl had her tea and time passed. She went across to the window, but trees hid the machine from view.

"I guess I'd better go," she told the Chinese cook. "Someone has started her up for me, though the machine doesn't need a warm up. I guess Mr. Moss is ready to leave."

"You no go," said the Chinaman. "You our hostage."

"Hostage?" Her eyes opened wide in surprise. "What do you mean?"

"I mean you stay here. If Chinamen die, you no go home."

A cold fear gripped Viola. She remembered Baxter's warning. The young Chinaman was smiling at her in a most sinister manner. She knew well

"CAPPY RICKS RETURNS"

A Long-distance Call

IN the brand-new office of the Ricks Lumber Company, Incorporated, two harassed gentlemen were studying an act of the legislature just in from the printers. One, a tight-lipped, oldish man with toothbrush moustache under his thin nose, was glaring at the other, a largish, younger man with a clean-shaven, much-worried face.

"If we ring him up at the farm, he'll come snorting back here by the next express—full of cuss-words for both of us!"

"Don't I know it!" muttered the much-worried one. "But he's got to be told." He tapped the official paper. "If it gets the Governor's signature, it's the law—and red shingles for roofs are things of the past!"

"And the Ricks Lumber Company can shut up shop, Peasley!"

"You've said it, Skinner."

For a long minute they continued to glare at each other. Then Skinner, bristling his moustache with vexation, stated the thought in both their minds.

"He'll say it's our fault!"

Clean-shaven Peasley nodded. "But how were we to know that Blake was behind the bill—Ossy Blake and his snide lawyer Winton?"

"They've certainly rung it on you, Matt Peasley."

"On me?" Peasley flushed up. "And on you, Tom Skinner!"

"You're his son-in-law—and you ought to have been looking!"

Peasley grabbed up the telephone.

"I've got it!" he cried, settling down at the desk. "I'll ring up the farm and ask Florry how she's getting along. Cappy will certainly bounce in on a long-distance call, and then—"

"And then?" broke in Skinner with heavy sarcasm.

"Then you'll tell him about the dirty trick Ossy has played us."

"I certainly won't!"

"But see here, Tom—we're both in it. Cappy will blame you for letting this bill get so far. You're the older man."

"Rot!" Skinner snapped. "You're afraid of old Cappy! Gimme the 'phone!"

At Wildwood Farm, way up country, life was jogging along very pleasantly for old Captain Ricks, retired from the big business he had built up with his own hands until it had become the finest lumber company in the state. For the last five years he had lived at ease, helping with the lambs and smoking cigars and pottering round the acres with a gun and the dogs—sitting in his special chair in the stone-flagged kitchen at nights, talking of old times with the farm-hands; his pretty daughter Florence always running down from 'Frisco every third or fourth week to tell him the news of the great city and of the growing prosperity of the firm.

"Matt's a good boy," old Cappy would allow, his crab-apple face smoothing out into a large smile. "He's got no brains, Florry—but he's straight. That's why I let him marry you. Then there's old Skinner Skinfint—well, he don't let grass grow under his box-calf shoes! And Bill Peck, a salesman I trained myself. Yeah—the Ricks Lumber Co. is bound to keep moving on and on!"

Florry, fresh-faced and very likeable, agreed. She was staying a long spell this time, helping with the spring lambing. Her father, dressed in his oldest clothes, was feeding milk to a tiny lamb from a baby's bottle, his face puckered up with interest.

"Takes it beautiful, doesn't he?" he grinned. "Thinks I'm his mother!"

Just then the telephone-bell buzzed. Florry went to the instrument in the hall, and old Cappy cocked his ears.

"Who is it, Flo?" he called.

"It's Skinner, dad," she called back. "Ringing you from 'Frisco? Why, what's come to him, spending all that on a 'phone call?"

The old boy put the tiny lamb away in a cot by his side and came trooping into the hall. His daughter was saying "yes" and "sure" and "I'm fine, thanks—" when Cappy snatched away the receiver from her.

"There's something wrong," he prophesied. "That you, Tom Skinner? Yeah, it's Cappy this end. What's that?"

His smiles faded into a frown.

"You telling me you've let Blake get in a fast one on us? A bill to stop houses being roofed with red shingles? Why, you doddering dodo—what you been doing? Doing nothing, I guess! An act of the legislature sneaked through the house by Lawyer Winton? Well, of all the mutts, mugs, and dithering idiots—if you and Peasley aren't the prize samples! I'll be along by this afternoon's express!"

"Where's Bill Peck?"

BURTON, the new outside clerk at the Ricks office, was busy at his shining mahogany desk. A rough-looking old fellow in a tweed suit and a nautical cap came barging into the office, and, pushing open the swing-door of the counter, made a bee-line for the private room of the partners.

"Hey!" called Burton, swinging round, his hatchet face scandalised. "You got an appointment?"

The old man stopped dead in his tracks.

"Who are you?" he snapped.

"Comes to that," Burton snapped back, "who are you?"

"Listen, you dude! I'm Cappy Ricks, who owns this joint, look, stock and barrel! Is Skinner inside?"

"Mr. Skinner's in conference," Burton's voice lost its sharpness. "I'll announce you, Mr. Ricks."

"I'll announce myself." Cappy pushed open the door and burst in like a hurricane on his partners. "Morning, you two! Who's the sharp lad outside?"

"Oh, good-morning—good-morning!" Skinner tried to be genial. "Glad to see you. That's Burton, our confidential clerk." He offered his seat at the desk. "Matt and I were just considering—"

"Considering? I'll bet you were!" Cappy fixed beady eyes on Peasley. "Brain storms coming on, hey?"

"How's Florry, pop?" asked his son-in-law mildly.

"Never mind Florry—she's my girl and takes care of herself! Now then, what's all this hokum about Ossy Blake?"

Skinner, with a nasty look at Peasley, put the morning's newspaper before the old man.

Cappy read the head-lined news, mouth awry. A bill had been prepared by the state, prohibiting the use of all inflammable material for house roofing. The bill would become law as soon as it had been signed by the Governor of California, who was away at Washington attending the Senate.

"When's he coming back?" Cappy demanded, already making mental plans to defeat the bill.

"Fifteen days from now," said Peasley. "I'm glad Florry's all right, pop."

Cappy crumpled up the paper.

"Gimme the telephone!" He snatched up the instrument and grabbed off the receiver.

"Operator, quick!" he shouted. "You've got to dial the number you want," said Skinner. "Allow me"—he drew the 'phone away. "Who d'you want?"

"T. Osgood Blake." Cappy watched the dialing. "Some new-fangled idea, what?" He glared round the brand-new office. "Gosh—what you fellers been doing here? White paint and tin fittings." He got up from the chromium chair: "This bird cage don't look a bit too safe to me!"

"We have to keep up-to-date, pop," Peasley explained.

"Have you kept up with Ossy Blake?" demanded Cappy. "I guess he's left you way up in the hills! Got him? Let me talk to him." He took back the 'phone. "That you, Ossy? Cappy this end. Lovely spring morning—what's this bill you've been shoving through with Winton?"

Far-off crackling laughter was heard by the anxious Skinner and Peasley. Then Cappy's voice:

"Oh, yeah? Red shingles is prohibited for roofs, hey? What's going in their place?"

Sudden fury showed in his weather-beaten old face.

"Why you—you old crow! Only patent roofing made by the Blake Company? Of all the dirty, shabby tricks—going to cut me out and yourself in? Not on your life, Ossy—no, sir! What's that?"

He listened dumbly for a moment or two, then banged the receiver on to its hooks.

"Did you hear, you fellers?" he asked hoarsely. "He says I'm old! He says I've let the parade go by!" Cappy's eyes flashed sparks. "Where's Bill Peck? I want him!"

The two junior partners exchanged very worried glances. Then Skinner said, awkwardly:

"Peek's—er—gone. Turned us down."

Cappy swung round to face him.

"Whaffor?"

"He—er—wanted more money."

"And you wouldn't give it?"

"Cappy, the business has got to be run on business lines."

"Fetch Bill Peck back here!" roared the old chap, thoroughly worked up.

"This minute!"

Peasley put in, in his mild way:

"Bill's gone to Honolulu on a cruise."

Cappy snapped:

"What's the name of the ship?"

"Southern Star."

"Send a wireless to him to come right back. I'll meet him on the quay at five o'clock to-morrow!"

"It can't be done," said Skinner.

"I'll wireless him—but it's a waste of money."

"Bet you five hundred that Bill's there," cried Cappy. "Come on, skin-flint—back your fancy!"

"It's taking easy money, Cappy." A smile was creasing out those tight lips.

"Another five hundred you lose!"

The old war horse snorted.

"It's a bet," said Skinner. "Have a cigar?"

"Sure I'll have one of my own cigars." Cappy helped himself from the box on the desk.

Skinner got out his petrol-lighter and offered it to Cappy, who took it with a dubious glance. He flicked at it and nothing happened. "Can't ever make these blamed things work!"

Skinner took it back, deftly flicked up a flame, and Cappy smoked. "Keep the lighter," said Skinner in a moment of generosity. "A clever fellow like you will soon learn the knack."

Bill Comes Back

ON the Southern Star, well out from Frisco harbour, a pleasant young man in flannels was stretched out in a deck-chair, eyes half shut, his attitude one of complete peace with the world. A crowd of girls in bath-wraps came scuttling up to him.

"Bill Peck," clamoured their blonde leader, "come out of it! A morning like this calls for a game of water polo!"

"Never swim on vacation," spoke Bill, lazily. "Can't swim."

At once a babel broke out, checked by the arrival of a steward. "Radio for Mr. Peck!" he stated, hand out for a tip.

Mr. Peck opened his eyes.

"That's me." He took the flimsy paper. "Jumping Gechosoplat!" His eyes had caught the signature. "It's the voice of duty, girls! I gotta go home!"

Again a babel, but Peck rose up and pushed a way through the pretty crowd. He went up to the bridge, calling to the captain.

"Cap'n, I got to go back. Reverse engines!"

The ship's chief officer waved a hand at him.

"Don't be funny! Next stop's Honolulu!"

Bill was beginning a protest when he spotted a cargo boat crossing the Southern Star's course. He flung off his flannel coat, and, running to the side, took a clean header into the sea. The captain rang his bell angrily, giving quick orders. The cry went round the decks—"Man overboard!"

Bill was seen trudging lustily for the cargo boat. The blonde said bitterly: "And he told us he couldn't swim!"

Bill was seen by the cargo boat's crew. They stopped and picked him up.

"Good!" spluttered Bill, knocking the water out of his eyes. "I wanner go back to 'Frisco."

The mate of the small, solid ship shook his head.

"Jest out from 'Frisco, buddy. Back there in three days."

A Japanese "fisher" was chugging near by—evidently headed for port. Bill said "thanks awfully"—and took another dive!

The Japs were more obliging, but their boat was full of fish—over which Bill had to straddle his legs.

"Take cloes," offered the polite Oriental in charge. "Lend macintosh."

So Bill stripped off his wet flannels and got himself into a very fishy macintosh. The perfume of fish was terrific, and Bill felt inclined to heave his heart up. But the Southern Star was under steam again, leaving him every minute. The wireless operator on board the cruising liner flashed the news to San Francisco.

"Madman swimming fifty miles homo to port! Name of Bill Peck, Ricks, Lumber Company."

Bill arrived at the quayside at ten minutes before five that afternoon.

"Gimme my clothes," he called to the polite Jap.

"Throw overboard," smiled the little man. "No darn good. All shrank up!"

So Bill Peck climbed up to the quayside in a filthy old macintosh, covered with fish scales and smelling like rank sardines!

A small crowd of Pressmen were waiting for him. They had picked up the radio and were out for a "scoop."

At almost the same moment a steam pinnace had run in to land a very pretty girl, who was busy greeting her father and a tallish, cynical-looking man.

"Look!" cried the very pretty girl pointing a little hand. "Newspaper boys come hot-foot to snap little Barbara Blake for the front page! Isn't that just too sweet! Let's make ourselves beautiful!"

But the newspaper boys totally ignored her. They shouted, "We want Bill!" and rushed at him and surrounded him.

"Let's have the story!" they hooted.

"Why did you do it? Was it a bet? Who's who—and what's it all about? Gee willikins, but how you smell!"

Bill pushed them aside.

"Sorry, boys—I gotta date. Five o'clock—to meet my boss. There he is, Cappy Ricks—and he don't like being kept waiting!"

The very pretty girl put herself in his way as he prepared to charge down the quayside towards Cappy and Skinner.

"Who are you?" she demanded.

"Taking all the high spots?"

"I'm Bill," he told her. "I'm a fishmonger!"

"You certainly smell that way," she retorted, lifting her little nose. "And you aren't over-dressed a lot. But I'd like to know—"

"Some other time," Bill interrupted her. "I've swum the Pacific to meet Cappy Ricks. And he's just poison if he's kept waiting!"

She stood aside. Bill gave her a second look. She was pretty! His heart gave a thump under the fishy macintosh. But her small nose was still up in the air as she walked back to join her friends.

Cappy received Bill, watch in hand. "You were nearly late!" he stated. "But it isn't five o'clock yet and I win my bet. That's a thousand dollars you owe me, Skinner!"

He hurried Bill into a taxi. "I'll say you smack of the sea, Bill!" he declared. "But we'll soon get you going in a new suit and shirt. There's quick word ahead of us."

"What you say, Mr. Ricks," smiled Bill, "goes!"

The very pretty girl was talking with her father and the cynical one.

"He's Bill," she told them. "And he's a fishmonger. And he's meeting Cappy Ricks."

Her father, a sly looking, round-faced, clean-shaved old lad, corrected her.

"That's Ricks' go-getter," he said. "There's mischief ahead, Winton."

Winton snapped his fingers. "They can't do a thing! The bill slides through in fifteen days!"

Said Barbara, thoughtfully: "A boy who'll swim the Pacific just to get going—is a danger and a menace! You leave me to deal with him, dad."

Winton Makes a Sporting Offer

A COUNCIL of war was being held in the Ricks' office. Bill, having grasped the situation, gave his advice.

"We gotta get up a petition to the Governor to have the bill put to a plebiscite vote of all the householders in the State. We gotta get fifty thousand signatures."

"In fifteen days?" asked Skinner. "Don't talk rot!"

"It's certainly a tall order," agreed Peasley.

"If it's to be done," said old Cappy,

"Bill will do it. I'll start him in an office in the main thoroughfare, and he can draw all the cash he wants."

"In reason," Skinner qualified.

"In and out of reason!" cried Cappy.

"If this bill goes through, all the lumber men in California are bust!"

So Bill was installed in a neat office and began to prepare for a huge campaign. He had to cover nearly a hundred and sixty thousand square miles and talk to everyone who owned a house. And all in less than a fortnight!

Within two days of his settling down, a young lady called at the new office. The office boy showed her into Bill's room.

"Why, if it isn't Miss Impudence!" "I'm looking for a job, Mister Bill."

"Peck," Bill corrected. "Bill Peck. Sit down. What can you do?"

"Typing, shorthand, organising—getting rid of people you don't want to see. Keep accounts; punctual; don't mind work; generally cheerful," she told him all in a breath. "Fair wages—paid promptly. References A 1."

"You're engaged," declared Bill. "What name?"

"Smith. Barbara Smith." There was a little hesitation, but Bill was so busy looking at her twinkling brown eyes that he didn't trouble to take notice. She opened her bag and brought out a typed reference as to character from the minister of a church. Bill read it through.

"He calls you just 'Barbara,'" said Bill. "Doesn't say 'Miss Smith.'"

"Great friend of my father's," she explained. "Most everyone calls me Barbara."

"Okay." Bill regarded her with pleased eyes. "Listen, Barbara, this is what we have to do."

Half-way through the morning there was another caller. A sly-looking gentleman with affable manners. Barbara showed him in.

"Mr. Winton to see you."

Bill rose up.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Winton?"

"Just a sociable call, Mr. Peck. It's about this roofing business. You've got an all-time job getting signatures for your petition. Now, there's a Women's Federation Society meeting in the Cloth Hall this afternoon—delegates from all over the State—ladies with pretty powerful influence."

Winton took the cigarette Bill was silently offering. "Thanks, I got a light. Well, now, what say you and me go down and address them? I'm for the new Act; you're against it. You put your views forward first and I'll follow with mine. A sporting offer—all fair and friendly."

Barbara Smith sat at her desk, saying nothing. Bill glanced at her, then glanced away. He said:

"This seems very kind of you, Winton."

"Not at all. The Act was drafted by me, and naturally—"

"Naturally Ossy Blake was behind you," said Bill. "He wants to put over his patent roofings and cut out red shingles."

Winton shrugged padded shoulders.

"Progress, Mr. Peck! Safety for the householder."

"And all the work and money for Ossy and you?"

Winton smiled a little.

"Maybe. But I'm suggesting that you talk to the ladies and say your piece first. The one who gets the Women's Federation vote is going to win."

Winton again glanced at Barbara, but she was busy with the piles of blank petition forms on her desk.

Bill made up his mind.

Cappy read the headlined news, his mouth awry.

"Okay, Winton! You let me talk first—and you won't have to say one single word!"

"Who'll Sign the Petition Now?"

THE Cloth Hall was crowded with delegates from all over the State.

They had settled most of their business and had got down to the Roofing Act. Bill was on the platform, full of confidence. He had made a good speech and the women were nodding to each other in approval. Samples of red shingle and the new patent "non-flam" Blake roofing—a small slip of pliable asbestos—had been passed round the audience for inspection. Cappy Ricks was seated in the front row, with Florry Peasley on his right and a round-faced old fellow on his left. Just behind them sat Skinner and Matt Peasley.

Skinner whispered in Cappy's ear: "They've got us in a jam. This is where Peck is clean bowled!"

Cappy didn't answer. He was offering a cigar to his neighbour on the left.

"Here you are, Ossy."

"Thanks," grinned T. Osgood Blake. "I got one."

So Cappy stuck the cigar in his mouth and felt for his matches. Florry whispered:

"Use your new lighter, dad—it'll please Mr. Skinner."

Cappy fished out the petrol lighter from his vest pocket. The strip of Blake Patent Roofing was lying on his lap. Cappy fumbled and flicked at the lighter in vain.

"Allow me!" said Ossy Blake, producing a match.

"Never could work these dratted things," Cappy grunted. "Thanks."

Winton had come down to the edge of the platform.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, you have heard a very eloquent and persuasive speech from Mr. Peck. He certainly knows how to put it over. I'm no speech-maker—I'm here just to demonstrate the splendid qualities of the Blake Patent Roofing. What's the one thing you ladies dread on putting the kiddies to bed and telling them good-night? You know well enough—it's the awful, terrible risk of fire!"

T. Osgood Blake turned to wink at Cappy.

"You hear, Ricks? You get the idea?"

Cappy puffed at his cigar. "I'm listening," he growled.

Skinner fidgeted—and Bill began to see he had walked into a trap.

"Yes, ladies, fire is the terrible thing that hangs every night over the peaceful homestead," Winton went on. "Anything may start it! Your house becomes a raging inferno and you lose everything. Red shingle wood is inflammable—no one can dispute it. Whereas the Blake Patent Roofing absolutely defies fire. I will now prove it to you—Mr. Peck is sportsman enough to help me, I know. He will hold the little strip of Patent Roofing and I will apply a lighted wax taper to it, and—you'll all see for yourselves."

Skinner breathed heavily. Matt Peasley looked frightened. Bill frowned. Barbara Smith, on the platform with him, sighed deeply. She had already learned to like Bill.

"If Mr. Ricks will pass up the sample of Patent Roofing which I observe is lying on his lap," said Winton very sweetly, "the test shall be made. I have here a taper." He struck a match and lit it. "Now, Mr. Peck, your kind assistance."

The strip of asbestos was handed up by Cappy. Osgood Blake was all smiles. May 23rd, 1936.

The taper glowed with a little bead of smoky golden light. Bill took a hold of the strip and set his teeth—confound Winton and all his tricks!

"Now, ladies, just watch!" cried the lawyer, sure of his triumph. "I can hold this taper to Blake's Patent Roofing for all time if necessary—and not even a smoulder of fire!"

He applied the light. High-explosive sparks shot up with most startling puffs. The Patent Roofing burned merrily with crackling blue and yellow flames and dense clouds of sooty smoke!

Blake's face was a study—so was Cappy's. Bill nearly dropped the strip, but managed to hold on. Winton gasped, his small eyes pin-points of rage. Barbara seemed surprised, but kept cool in the midst of all the instant commotion.

"Who'll sign my petition now?" shouted Bill jubilantly. "Come on—come on! Walk up, folks! Red shingles and old-time beauty for ever!"

He flung down the flaming strip of asbestos and trampled on it; then jumped off the platform to mount a chair near a table where he had piled his blank forms for the petition against the Act. He handed them out right and left, Barbara facing him with the queerest kind of a smile.

"We pay canvassers ten dollars for every filled-up sheet of signatures and addresses!" chortled Bill. "Two-fifty names on each sheet! Money down when the completed sheets are handed in! No time to lose, ladies and gents! All set now for the old, well-tried-out red shingle roof!"

Gangster Methods

ALONE together in their office, Barbara Smith asked Bill:

"How did you do it?"

"Do what?"

"Make that fool-proof asbestos burn like paper!"

Bill's expressive face was quizzical.

"Fool-proof, hey? How d'you know?"

"Winton had that piece specially made for the test."

"Who told you?"

"I—I guessed it," she answered, not so readily. "It's what he would do. Now let me in."

"My child," said Bill paternally, "there are things you mustn't ask. Anyway, I can't answer 'em. Blame me if I know how it happened—but happen it did!"

"Funny that Mr. Ricks didn't seem the least bit surprised," Barbara hinted.

"He's a great feller," said Bill. "He never lets on whether he's surprised or disappointed. Now we'll get along with our work—we've got to send two good, reliable men to Los Angeles to pay out for the signatures as they come in there. We'll fix up the town lot here."

For a day or two all went well. Then town collectors began to come back to Bill with stories that they had been set on by toughs, who had taken away their sheets and torn them up as soon as they had got them full.

"Gangster methods," said Bill. "We'll have to do something."

"Tell the police?" queried Barbara.

"Not on your life!" cried Bill. "They'd find a hundred ways to hinder us!"

He sent the collectors round the towns in pairs, disguised as tallymen, book salesmen, Hoover sellers. This worked for some days; then, instead of one tough appearing suddenly from round the corner and brow-beating the collector, small gangs turned up and the collectors were knocked out and their labours frustrated.

One of the Press "story-getters" called in at Bill's office the morning after a nasty little affair up at Berkeley, in which Bill's collectors had been properly beaten up. This Pressman had given Barbara a glance when she had received him and had seemed suddenly shy when she had settled down at her desk in Bill's room.

"Sorry about that affair at Berkeley, Mr. Peck."

"We got the signatures all right," Bill answered him. "My boys had had the gumption to post 'em on. And I don't forget it—paid 'em double and gave 'em a bonus!"

"Sure," agreed the Pressman. He again glanced at Barbara. "See you alone a minute, Mr. Peck?"

Barbara rose up before Bill could stop her. She smiled at their visitor as he opened the door for her.

As soon as she had gone the Pressman stepped close to Bill to whisper:

"What's she working here for—against her poppy?"

"I don't get you," said Bill.

"Well, then you have the enemy in your own camp," the young man said in a puzzled air. "You know that Ossy Blake and Winton are behind the thugs who beat up your boys and frighten your girls?"

"Sure I know it. But I can't prove it."

"It's odd that Miss Blake should be in with you, Mr. Peck, isn't it?"

"That isn't Miss Blake. That's Miss Smith."

The Pressman persisted.

"She's Barbara Blake. I'll bring you a cutting and picture from our paper when she had her twenty-first birthday last year."

Bill shook his head.

"You're mistaken—absolutely. She's Miss Smith."

His visitor contented himself with:

"One does make mistakes sometimes—even in our trade. So-long, Mr. Peck. I've got to call on Mr. Ricks. See you later."

He came back that afternoon to pass Bill a folded-in copy of an old issue of the "Frisco Herald."

"Something you asked for, Mr. Peck." He paused a moment. "D'you know what a journalist is?" He didn't wait for a reply. "A journalist is a Pressman out of a job. So don't you give me away. We shan't say anything now about Berkeley. 'Bye."

Bill opened the paper when Barbara was away for tea. On an inside page was her picture, with the caption: "Miss Barbara Blake comes to Years of Discretion. But we guess she was born so."

Bill sat staring at the picture. Barbara knew every move of the collectors: where they'd be almost at every hour of the day, who they were and how they were disguised. He meant to have it out with her; but, queerly enough, she didn't come back to the office from her tea.

Bill went along to the home address she had given him. It was an "accommodation shop," where one can have letters addressed.

When he got back to the office he found old Cappy waiting for him.

"How's it going, Bill? There's only two more days before the Governor gets back."

Cappy had a longish, loose brown-paper parcel lying across his knees.

"Everything's lovely!" Bill beamed at him. "We got the Act busted! Signatures pouring in! We've just been doing a count—fifteen thousand from the city alone! Then there's all the south to come in—thousand upon thousand! I'm expecting 'em to-night—that's why I came back."

"We pay canvassers two dollars for every filled-up sheet of signatures and addresses!" chortled Bill.

"Well, well, isn't that fine?" smiled Cappy. "I thought, maybe—oh, never mind! We old fogies get the wind up sometimes." His voice took a serious note. "You see, Bill, this Act means ruin to the lumbermen—blank ruin. So spare no expense."

Bill nodded.
"But I won't waste a cent—not one! Have a cigar?"

He passed the box. Cappy helped himself. Bill flicked a flame in his petrol lighter.

"It's amazing how you do that, Bill." Cappy puffed at his cigar. "I never can get the knack of it."

Bill studied those keen old eyes under their bushy brows.

"No?" he questioned.

"I tried hard at the women's meeting the other day," Cappy went on. "Sorter made me feel foolish to see Ossy so cute with it. But it warn't any kind of use; my fingers seem all thumbs when I try out one of these fool things. Gimme a lucifer match every time."

Said Bill.

"Spilled out the petrol, didn't you? Into your lap?"

Cappy solemnly winked an eye.

"Let's change the subject. This parcel here—" He passed it across to Bill. "There was a Japanese feller got up a petition for lower dock dues or something. Then didn't use it, because he died. Fifty thousand genuine signatures and addresses there, Bill"—he gestured towards the parcel. "I thought, maybe—"

"You aren't suggesting we should use them, Cappy?" Bill stared. "Why, Cappy, that would be the very last thing—"

"Wait a minute, Bill—don't get all het up! I got these signatures cheap. Nobody wanted 'em, and it seemed a pity to waste good stuff."

"Take them away!" Bill was firm. "They're no manner of use to me."

"Okay, Bill." Cappy wasn't in the least put out. He adjusted his cap at its usual jaunty angle, then took up the brown-paper parcel; then dropped his cigar.

Stooping for the cigar, he slid the parcel under the big chair in which he had been sitting.

He straightened up.

"Now, Bill, about these signatures coming in from the South to-night? Don't you think you ought to have a bodyguard here?"

Bill shook his head.

"Why, what ever for? Can't I look after myself? I've got three reliable fellows bringing them to me, and, once those forms are here, Cappy, they're as good as on the Governor's desk in his office. Besides, I can do a spot of boxing myself."

Again Cappy said:

"Okay, Bill." Then, glancing round, he asked: "Where's Barbara?"

Bill's smile faded out.

"She—she's gone. Got cold feet over the job."

"Nice girl, Bill." Bill didn't answer.

"I liked her," Cappy continued.

"Maybe she'll come back?"

"Not she." Bill spoke in miserable conviction. "I—oh, let's change the subject, as you said just now!"

"I must be going, Bill. Skinner's raising the skies about your expenses. But don't mind him—I riled him a lot giving that outside clerk the sack."

"Burton? Why, what ever for? Burton's all right."

"I didn't cotton on to him, Bill. Well, so-long!"

Cappy ambled off. Bill went back to his counting and scheduling the forms he had received that day. He packed them up and took them down to the bank for safe custody. Then returned to the office to sit down and wait for the arrival of the signatures from Los Angeles and the South.

Time ticked on slowly.

Presently Bill spotted the brown-paper parcel under the chair. He was drawing it out when a knock came at the door.

Barbara walked in.

"Hallo!" Bill gruffed at her.

"I've come back," she stated, rather unnecessarily.

"Have you, now?" Bill wouldn't look at her. "I've got some signatures here to be counted." He put Cappy's parcel on the desk and began to untie the string.

"They've come early, then?" Barbara's pretty face lit up. "I'm so glad! Wait till I get off my hat and coat and we'll slip into them. Gee, what a lot! It'll take us all night."

"I don't think so," said Bill grimly. "I guess I hear somebody who'll maybe help us. Come in!"

His sharp ears had caught furtive sounds outside the door. Almost as he spoke, the door was pushed open and a heavy-jawed Irishman stepped in—

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

The entire world is in a state of terror. The Earth is threatened with total destruction by the planet Mongo, which, rushing through the void, is controlled by the Emperor Ming, ruler of a strange race of people living on that unknown planet, and a man who has probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

In America, a scientist known as Dr. Zarkov maintains that he can save the Earth from disaster, and by means of a rocket ship which he has invented he attempts to blaze a trail through the stratosphere.

He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart.

The attempt is successful. Travelling through millions of miles of space, the rocket ships sets down the adventurers on the forbidding planet of Mongo, where they are taken prisoners by some of Ming's guards.

Ming spares Zarkov and Dale, but Flash is condemned to death, and is only saved by the intervention of Aura, the emperor's daughter, who helps him to escape.

Later, Flash meets with Thun, prince of a nation at war with Ming. Accompanied by Thun, he returns secretly to Ming's palace, and learns that the movement of the planet Mongo towards the Earth has been arrested.

He also discovers that Ming intends to force Dale Arden to marry him, and while attempting to prevent the ceremony the young American is seized in the claws of a ghastly monster!

EPISODE 3:—

"Captured by Shark Men"

The Jaws of Death

IT was in vain that Flash Gordon struggled to escape from the talons of the hideous brute which had clutched him. For all his magnificent strength, he could not break the grip of the claws that had fastened upon his body, and, dragged into the gloom of the tunnel, he was lifted from his feet as if he had been a child.

Writhing, he saw the loathsome head of the creature in whose grasp he had been seized, a dragon-like head swaying upon a thick, fleshy neck. He saw its glittering eyes and the yawning cavity of its mouth, from which deep-toned growls were issuing. He saw the gleam of terrible fangs as he was drawn slowly but surely towards those jaws of death.

Meanwhile, Thun had scattered the three guards with whom he had been in mortal combat, and, standing above their prone figures like some bearded Titan, he waited for them to rise again and renew the fight.

He was unaware of Flash Gordon's peril—scarcely realised, indeed, that the young stranger from the Earth had not figured in the scuffle with Ming's underlings. But suddenly, as Thun stood there, over his fallen adversaries in menacing attitude, he heard the ugly sounds that were coming from the throat of the monster which had snared the American in its talons; and in the same instant the voice of Flash reached his ears in a strangled cry for aid.

"Thun! Help. Thun! Help!"

The Prince of the Lion Men wheeled and stared into the tunnel to behold his companion's plight, to see the dreaded claws of the foul brute lifting him towards its cruel teeth. It was a spectacle that brought a hoarse exclamation from Thun's bearded lips, and one that might well have paralysed many a man with horror.

Not Thun, however. With a swift presence of mind he bethought himself of the ray-gun that he had struck from the hand of the foremost guard a few seconds before, and, pouncing on this, he snatched up the weapon and levelled it at the evil jaws to which Flash was being carried.

He pressed the trigger, and a blistering stream of fire leapt from the muzzle of the gun, a stream of fire that seared into the monster's throat and withered the life from its huge body in one brief moment of time.

The beast crumpled to the floor of the tunnel, and its victim fell with it, then rolled free as the grip of the creature's talons relaxed. Almost simultaneously Thun's attention was diverted by movements on the part of the three soldiers whom he had knocked to the flagstones, and as he swung round again he discovered them in the act of scrambling to their feet.

One glimpse of the ray-gun in Thun's hand was enough for those men. Turning tail, they dashed off through the vaults in a panic, and, after starting forward as if to pursue them, the Prince of the Lion Men checked himself and moved back to the tunnel in which Flash was lying.

He assisted the young American to rise, and spoke to him tersely.

"Are you hurt?" he panted.

"No," Flash answered, drawing in his breath. "No, I'm all right, thanks to you. Gee, I'll say that ray-gun came in handy!"

He looked at the great, huddled carcass of the monster which had come so near to devouring him, and a shudder passed through his stalwart frame. Then he braced himself and caught Thun by the arm.

"Quick!" he gasped. "To the chapel! We haven't a moment to lose if we're going to stop that ceremony!"

"We shall not be able to return this way," Thun said to him. "Those guards who fled just now will bring reinforcements."

"Then we'll have to find some other means of escape," the younger man retorted. "But first we've got to rescue Dale Arden. Come on."

Together they pushed forward through the gloom of the tunnel, and they had travelled some fifty or sixty paces when they found themselves confronted by a massive door.

The chanting of many voices reached them through that door, voices raised in some strange anthem that was doubtless a feature of the marriage ceremonies on Mongo.

Flash glanced at Thun, and the latter whispered a comment.

"The wedding has begun," he said, "but we are not yet too late. When the hymn ends, three strokes on the sacred gong of the god Taos will complete the rites. We must act before those strokes resound, or Ming and your sweetheart will be man and wife in the eyes of all Mongo's peoples."

"This door!" Flash rapped out. "It's locked, Thun! We've got to force it!"

By way of response the Prince of the Lion Men thrust him to one side and directed the ray-gun at the lock of the door, and a moment later a tongue of vulcan-fire had destroyed that lock, reducing the metal of it to a molten fluid that dripped to the floor.

The mighty door swung open on its hinges, and beyond it Flash and Thun saw the figure of a ponderous idol wrought in stone, an idol that seemed to dominate a room in which a number of people were gathered.

Between the two intruders and this idol stood a man who was posted beside a burnished gong, one arm upraised and a hammer in his fist. He was waiting to strike the notes that would seal the ceremony which was in progress, waiting for the moment when the swelling anthem of the choir should draw to a close.

It was this man who first clapped eyes on Flash and Thun as they advanced from the doorway of the secret tunnel, and with a startled expression on his face he blundered towards them, lifting the hammer of the gong high above his head in a threatening gesture.

Flash was too quick for him. Springing at the man, he dealt him a blow that crashed home against his jaw, and the fellow hurtled backwards against the idol of the god Taos, that heathen deity which Ming and his followers worshipped.

For all its colossal proportions, the idol was top-heavy, and the impact of the man's body shook it from its base. It tilted, swayed forward, and there was an outcry from the assembly in the chapel, an outcry that interrupted the singing of the choir. Then there arose a sharp scuffle of feet as the figure of the deity plunged to the floor.

It descended with a shock that sent a tremor through the paving of the room, and there was a splintering of masonry as the idol broke into a dozen fragments. And then, only then, did Flash and Thun gain a clear impression of the chapel into which they had found their way.

In the middle of the vaulted room stood the Emperor Ming and Dale Arden, the girl still under the influence of the hypnotic spell by means of which her consent to the marriage had been obtained. Beside them was the high priest who had been officiating at the ceremony, and close at hand was Dr. Zarkov, an unwilling witness. The remainder of the company was made up of the choir, a small group of soldiery commanded by Torch, captain of the royal bodyguard, and the women of the Court, among whom was Ming's daughter Aura.

One and all were staring in horror at the shattered effigy of the god Taos—all, at least, with the exception of Zarkov and Dale, for Dale seemed in a state of oblivion and Zarkov had eyes only for Flash and Thun, whose presence now filled him with hope.

Such was the scene upon which Flash and the Prince of the Lion Men gazed as they moved fairly into the chapel. Then, while Thun covered Ming and his adherents with the ray-gun, the young American stepped to Dale's side and gathered her in his arms.

Ming seemed to rouse himself from the stupor into which he and his followers had been thrown by the fall of the idol.

"Stop!" he snarled. "You shall not take that girl!"

He attempted to restrain the American, but was balked by Thun and the deadly weapon in the Lion Man's hand, and drew back a pace as the muzzle of that weapon threatened his breast. A moment later Flash and Thun were retreating across the chapel to a postern in the far wall, the younger man clasping Dale, and his bearded ally keeping a watchful eye on their foes.

They reached the postern and Flash kicked it open. A dimly lit passage lay before him.

"I don't know where this will lead us, Thun," he ground out, "but we'll take a chance. If anyone tries to follow us, let them have it with that ray-gun!"

They ducked into the corridor, Flash supporting Dale in his arms, Thun stumbling after him with head turned in the direction of the chapel.

Deep Down

FOR several seconds a blank silence reigned in the chapel following the disappearance of Flash, Dale and Thun, a silence during which Ming's partisans continued to stare in awe and dismay at the wrecked idol of their heathen deity.

Then the emperor found his voice, and, wheeling upon Torch, he bit out a savage command.

"To the control-room," he ordered through his clenched teeth. "The Earth man and Prince Thun shall not escape with the girl. That corridor will take them over the water-trap, and you have but to throw the switch that operates it. Quick, to the control-room!"

Torch seemed still to be in a confused state of mind.

"To the control-room, your Majesty?" he faltered.

"Yes, you fool," Ming answered harshly. "Throw the switch that operates the water-trap. The instant they set foot on that trap it will then give way and plunge them into the sea-caves of King Kala's realm, and does Kala not pay homage to me?"

The captain of the royal bodyguard understood now.

"Shall I send a message to Kala, King of the Shark Men, your Majesty?" he asked.

"Of course," was the reply. "Tell him to dispatch some of his minions to seize the Earth girl and her companions. Tell him to hold the girl prisoner, but to put Gordon and Prince Thun to death."

His daughter Aura clutched him by the arm as she heard this, and voiced a cry of protest.

"No, father!" she exclaimed. "You must spare the Earth man—for my sake!"

"Silence!" Ming snapped, eyeing her furiously. "You have already tried my patience to the limit by your accursed interference."

He turned to the captain of his guard once more and spoke to him imperiously.

"Obey my instructions," he said.

Motioning to the other soldiers to accompany him on this mission, Torch hastened from the chapel, but the tramp of the men's departing footsteps had scarcely died out of earshot when Aura swung away from her father and darted towards the passage into which Flash, Dale and Thun had vanished a little while before.

"Aura!" Ming shouted angrily. "Come back!"

The girl paid no heed, and in another instant she was gone from view, leaving the emperor to fume over the wilfulness of her nature. Then all at once Ming felt a hand pluck at his sleeve, and looked round to see Zarkov at his elbow.

"Your Majesty," the doctor begged, "I appeal to you to countermand your orders regarding Flash Gordon. I know he is headstrong, but he is in love with Dale Arden—"

"Your plea is useless," the emperor cut in. "Gordon must die, and I intend to wed the Earth woman whose loveliness is like the light of the sun."

"Your Majesty!" It was the voice of the high priest, a voice that rose on a note of distress. "Your Majesty, that wedding must not take place. Already it has brought about the destruction of the image of Taos."

"Gordon was responsible for that," Ming retorted, "not I."

The high priest made a gesture of remonstrance. He was obviously one of the few men about the palace who dared to reason with Ming.

"The catastrophe would not have occurred if you had not desired this match with the Earth girl," he said. "See, the image of Taos lies shattered, and I warn you that the spirit of Taos will take vengeance upon us all unless you appease it by giving up all thought of marrying the woman of your choice."

Ming was clearly impressed, and Zarkov marvelled to see the play of conflicting emotions on his sinister features. It was difficult to believe that a man so far advanced in the sphere of scientific research should yet remain a prey to superstition and a worshipper of heathen deities.

Such was the case, however, and, though the wish to take Dale Arden for his wife had become more than a freakish fancy with Ming, he was powerfully affected by the high priest's words.

When he spoke again there was a hint of uncertainty in his tone.

"We shall see," he muttered. "We shall see. Perhaps the god Taos will be appeased by the sacrifice of Gordon and Prince Thun."

He wondered darkly if the two men who he had named had fallen into his snare yet.

Had it been possible for him to see Flash and his bearded ally at that moment he would have discovered that they were still some considerable distance from the water-trap, which by this time had been set in readiness for them by the movement of a lever in a remote control-room up in the palace.

Oblivious of the danger towards which they were making their way, Flash and Thun were hurrying down a long flight of stone steps, and the American was carrying Dale Arden in his arms, for in her trance-like condition she had seemed incapable of rapid movement.

They had already descended many flights of steps in this manner, and now Thun spoke in hopeful accents.

"We are passing through the very core of the mountain on which Ming's city stands," he said. "I believe this underground route will take us to the plain."

"If it does, we may be able to reach Zarkov's rocket ship and fly it to the territory of your people, Prince Thun," Flash rejoined. "We'll be safe there, won't we?"

"Yes," was the reply. "But what of your friend Zarkov?"

Flash pursed his lips.

"Zarkov won't come to any harm," he stated confidently, "not while Ming thinks he can make use of him in his laboratory. If Zarkov had been in any doubt about that he'd have followed us."

"Why did he not follow us?" demanded Thun. "Surely he does not wish to serve Ming?"

"No, but if you ask me, he wants to stick close to the emperor and watch his every move. Ming plans to conquer the Earth, from which I came, and Zarkov is only biding his time to foil him in his mad ambitions."

They had now reached the foot of the steps which they had been descending, and calculated that they must be near the base of the mountain. Indeed, it seemed to them that a current of cool, fresh air was playing against their cheeks, and it was with feelings of expectation that they pushed forward along a twisting tunnel to which the last flight of stairs had brought them.

Thirty seconds later they rounded a bend in that tunnel and came face to face with two armoured men who were leaning against the rock wall of the subterranean gallery—two of Ming's hirelings who were apparently on sentry duty there.

Those men knew nothing of what had transpired in the palace, but they instantly recognised Thun as a foe, and before the latter could make use of the ray-gun which he was grasping they flung themselves upon him with loud cries.

There was a violent scuffle, and Flash made haste to set Dale Arden on her feet and turn to Thun's aid. Even as he did so he saw one of Ming's soldiers sprawl to the floor with blood streaming from his temple, the wits dashed out of him by a blow from the butt of the ray-gun.

Next moment Thun was grappling savagely with the remaining sentinel, and, tripping him, bearing him to the ground, the bearded Prince of the Lion Men called to Flash in a strident voice.

"Go!" he shouted. "Take the Earth girl out of here! I can handle this fellow!"

There was no doubt of Thun's ability to master the struggling wretch with whom he was now fighting, and Flash wheeled towards Dale. It was then that he realised a change had come over the May 23rd, 1936.

girl, for the blank expression on her lovely face had given way to a bewildered look, and she was passing her hand across her forehead like one awakening from a dream.

She was recovering from the hypnotic spell under which she had been placed, and all at once she recognised her fiancé and reeled into his arms.

"Flash!" she moaned. "Oh, Flash, where am I? What happened? They—they told me that you were dead, and that I was to marry the Emperor Ming! I tried to resist them, but they strapped me to some strange and awful machine, and I—I don't remember any more."

Flash caught her about the waist, and, throwing a glance over his shoulder to satisfy himself that Thun needed no help, he stumbled ahead with her and explained as briefly as he could the incidents which had led up to her rescue from Ming's clutches.

He was still giving her an account of all that had happened when they turned another curve in the gallery and saw the light of day some sixty or seventy paces in front of them.

"The plain, Dale," Flash ejaculated. "We've only to get to Zarkov's ship, and we can reach the territory of the Lion Men. They're Prince Thun's people, and Thun is my friend."

They were blundering onward as he spoke, and they were half-way to the outlet of the tunnel when the floor beneath them suddenly gave way, casting them into a yawning pit that seemed abysmal in its depth.

Down they plunged, and from the lips of Dale Arden there issued a shriek of terror. It was a shriek that rang in the ears of Thun as he rounded the bend of the tunnel, fresh from his combat with the two sentries, the second of whom he had left more dead than alive.

Thun gained an impression of Flash and Dale hurtling through the cavity in the tunnel's floor, and, charging to the edge of the pit, he saw them falling away from him until their bodies were lost in the gloom. And then, from somewhere far below, there came the sound of a heavy splash.

Meanwhile that section of the floor which had given way under the feet of the young couple was slowly rising into place again, and, operating on silent hinges, it at last swung back to its normal position, so that if Thun had not witnessed the fate of his companions he would never have suspected the existence of the trap.

The Prince of the Lion Men stood there with clenched fists, and with a look of bitterness in his sombre eyes. How long he remained thus he never knew, but he was finally aroused by the patter of footfalls behind him, and he spun round in readiness to meet an attack.

It was a girl who was approaching him, however, and presently he made out the figure of Aura, daughter of the Emperor Ming. He lowered his hands then and waited for her to come up.

"You have made short work of two of my father's men, Thun," she said. "Where are the others?"

"Why do you want to know?" the Prince of the Lion Men ground out.

Aura looked at him appealingly. "I do not hold with my father's ways, Thun," she told him. "At least, not when they concern the blond stranger known as Gordon. Tell me where he is."

For answer Thun pointed to the floor, and Aura understood the gesture.

"The water-trap," she breathed. "Then my father's plan has been successful. They are in the hands of Kala's Shark Men by now."

Thun stared at her, and there was a silence. Then Aura spoke again.

"Listen," she said, "the girl will be spared, but Gordon will meet his doom, unless—unless it is possible for us to save him. We can try, Thun—you and I. It seems that we both admire him."

The bearded Lion Man squared his powerful shoulders.

"To-day Flash Gordon gave me my life," he rejoined. "For that I am willing to risk it in his service."

"Then follow me," Aura declared. "I know how we can reach the stronghold of Kala, deep down amongst the sea-caves."

She beckoned to him, and, after a momentary hesitation, Thun followed her from the vicinity of the trap that had cast Flash and Dale into the unknown depths.

Kala, Monarch of the Underworld

FAR below the tunnel from which they had plunged, Flash Gordon and Dale Arden were floundering wildly in the murky waters of an immense cavern.

It took Dale Arden several minutes to recover from the shock of her fall, and she was still beating the water with her arms when Flash swam close to her and caught hold of her protectively.

His presence beside her and his firm embrace served to reassure her to some extent, and she became calmer. Then she realised that he was speaking.

"Dale," he said, "this water is tainted with salt. I know, because I took about a gallon of it down my throat when I hit the stuff. Ugh! It tasted pretty foul, I can tell you."

"You don't have to tell me," she panted. "I've swallowed quite a lot of it myself. But, Flash, if this is brine water the cave must lead to the sea."

"Yeah? I don't remember getting a sight of any sea when we landed on this planet with Dr. Zarkov. Anyhow, if there is a sea, which way does it lie, and how far is it?"

They were treading water now to keep themselves afloat, and they began to look about them searchingly. Nor was it difficult to take stock of their surroundings, for the great cavern was not pitch black, the rock walls seeming to be phosphorescent in character and throwing out an uncanny twilight.

It was in this twilight that they suddenly detected movements some little distance away, and, each a prey to uneasy thoughts, they strained their eyes in an attempt to discover what these movements meant.

Then all at once Dale gave vent to a startled exclamation.

"Flash!" she gasped. "I can see men—and they're swimming towards us!"

She was right, for even as she spoke Flash himself made out three or four human heads moving through the water in their direction, the heads of men who were wearing tight-fitting skull-caps, and whose bare arms rose and dipped in long, powerful strokes.

"Come on, Dale!" Flash rapped out. "We're not taking any chances with those fellows."

They turned and began to swim with all the speed and strength at their command, but, though Flash might have kept ahead of the mysterious swimmers who had appeared in the cavern, Dale was no match for them, and was overtaken before she had travelled fifty yards.

Flash saw the foremost pursuers lay hold of her, and, regardless of his own safety, he swam back to her assistance. By the time he reached her half a dozen of the enemy were on the scene, and the tough American was immediately engaged by those who were not grappling with his fiancée

Two of them dived for his legs, and two more seized him around the body. Struggling, he was dragged down—managed to kick free and come to the surface, but was promptly clutched again and pulled below the water a second time.

He fought desperately, yet in vain. If only he had had these men on firm ground he could have given them a taste of Anglo-Saxon medicine, scattered them with the bunched knuckles that had stood him in such good stead on many another occasion. But he could not hit out at them under water, and he was at a terrific disadvantage.

The brine seemed to be almost a natural element to these foes of his, too. No doubt they could drown just as other men could drown, but their lungs could apparently withstand the strain of suspended respiration far longer than those of the normal human being, for they were still fresh enough when Flash was at the last gasp.

The American was limp in their hands when they brought him to the surface and proceeded to swim back with him in the direction whence they had come. As for Dale, she was already some distance away, a helpless and drooping figure in the grip of a pair of stalwart captors.

Onward swam the men in the skull-caps, drawing their prisoners with them, and neither Flash nor Dale had any distinct knowledge of what was taking place until they found themselves beside a strange craft that bore some resemblance to a submarine.

They were carried into the interior of this vessel, and when at length they were in full possession of their wits again they were standing in a long, tapering control chamber.

They had a better opportunity now of studying their captors, four of whom were holding Flash tightly, the other two being concerned in looking after

Dale. Stripped to the waist, they were men of powerful frame, these denizens of an underworld realm, almost as splendidly proportioned as the blond young giant who was now in their clutches together with his sweetheart.

Flash looked at them through his fair, tangled locks.

"Who are you?" he demanded. "Who are you, and—and what do you want with us?"

He was answered by one of the men who were grasping Dale.

"We are servants of Kala, King of the Shark Men. You are the Earth people whom we have been ordered to take before him."

Without another word the speaker left Dale Arden's side and moved forward to a control-board. A few seconds later a tremor ran through the ship, and next moment it was gliding far down beneath the water.

The craft dived for twenty fathoms, and then, levelling itself, nosed its way onward within a few feet of the cavern's bed, a rocky bed which was visible through windows in the hull of the vessel. Staring out through those windows with fear-stricken gaze, Dale Arden caught glimpses of uncanny forms moving clear of the submarine's course—aquatic creatures such as she had never seen before—and once a shiver passed through her as she beheld a monstrous thing dragging itself off into the murk, an evil brute with many tentacles, reminding her of a giant octopus.

Flash did not see it, for his attention was riveted on the man at the controls, and he was watching his every action, reflecting that a knowledge of this craft might yet prove valuable.

He was still watching the control-board when the submarine swung slowly round and set its nose against a massive door built in the rock wall of the cavern.

The man in charge of the submarine now leaned forward and spoke into a mouthpiece. What he was saying Flash could not tell, but apparently he was communicating with someone beyond that under-water door by radio-telephone, for in a few seconds the door rose like a shutter to admit the vessel into a spacious chamber, which was flooded from ceiling to floor.

Once the ship had passed through, the man at the control-board again spoke into the 'phone. The door behind the craft was then closed, and, shortly afterwards, Flash realised that the water in the chamber which the vessel had entered was being pumped out by some hidden mechanism.

Within the space of a few minutes the entire room had been drained and the submarine was resting on the dry bed of its lair; and now Flash and Dale were marched out of the ship by their captors and forced towards a postern in the farthest wall of the chamber.

This was opened, and they passed through into a veritable labyrinth of corridors. By a route which they felt they could never have retraced without a guide they were hurried onward in a silence that was never once broken by the men who had seized them.

And then at last the party turned into a gallery that brought them to a spacious room in which a cloaked figure was seated upon a throne, the figure of a man who had obviously been awaiting the prisoners, for at sight of them his eyes gleamed with satisfaction.

The throne was set upon a dais that was approached by a short flight of wide steps, and the captives were led to the foot of these, whereupon the man who occupied the throne looked at the two Americans long and interestedly.

Returning his gaze, Flash and Dale could not help reflecting that his appearance was at least favourable by comparison with Ming's. His face lacked the soul-chilling sinisterness of the emperor's—a broad and swarthy face, this—cunning, perhaps, and cruel,

With the eyes of Dale Arden and the guards riveted upon them Flash and Kala fought like the gladiators of old.

but less evil than the face of the monarch whose city dominated the highest peak of Mongo.

At length he spoke, addressing himself to Dale. His voice was slow, deliberate.

"You are the Earth girl whose name is Arden," he said. "His Supreme Intelligence, Ming the Merciless, has ordered that you be returned to him."

Flash strained forward in the arms of those who held him.

"For what reason?" he grated.

The man in the cloak turned his glance on him and eyed him narrowly.

"One does not question the orders of Ming, Earth man," he observed. "They are obeyed."

"Yes," Flash retorted contemptuously, "obeyed by you and other puppets!"

The words seemed to whip a deeper shade of colour into the other man's face, and his hands closed hard on the arms of the throne on which he was seated.

"Dog of an Earthling," he rasped. "do you know that I am Kala, King of the Shark Men? Kala the Strong? Aye, Kala the Strong—strong enough to break you between my two hands!"

"Kala the Puppet," Flash scoffed in defiant mood. "You call yourself king, you call yourself strong. You boast that you could break me between your hands. But do you know what I'd call a man like you, who sits there and talks in that strain to a prisoner who is helpless? I'd call him a braggart and a coward!"

Dale was looking on in alarm, fully expecting that Flash would be struck down there and then for the taunts he had thrown at this monarch of the underworld.

"Tell your men to turn me loose," Flash challenged, "and we'll soon see if you can make good that boast of yours!"

Kala glared at him for a space, and then, with a quick gesture, he cast aside his cloak.

"Set the Earth man free!" he ordered the guards who were clutching Flash.

The young American was released, and, scarcely giving him time to prepare himself for action, Kala flung himself upon him and caught him in a vice-like grip. And, thus taken at a disadvantage, Flash was brought to the floor in a sprawling heap with his adversary atop of him.

He had soon recovered himself, however, and though Kala had clapped a hold on his right arm and seemed intent on fracturing the limb, the athletic Yankee managed to elude his grasp by a sudden twist.

Both men rolled apart, and both scrambled to their feet almost simultaneously. Next second Kala was bounding towards Flash again, but this time he was met by an upper-cut that lifted him clean off his balance and knocked him to the foot of the dais, from the steps of which Dale and the guards were watching the encounter with bated breath.

Kala roused himself, and with an oath he rushed at his young antagonist furiously, attempting to bear him down. But instead he found himself seized in a wrestling hold that he had never before experienced, though it would have been familiar enough to any instructor of ju-jitsu in the gymnasiums of the Earth.

Kala was thrown, and, pouncing on him before he could pick himself up, Flash snared him with another hold that rendered him powerless, so that after a few seconds of strain the man had to choose between crying "Enough!" or suffering a broken leg.

He gasped out a surrender, and his opponent's hands relaxed. A moment later Flash was rising from him, but as he did so he saw two or three of the vanquished monarch's guards moving forward threateningly.

They were checked by Kala, who struggled to his feet and waved them off.

"Back!" the King of the Shark Men said thickly. "Leave the Earthling to me. He may know how to wrestle, but we shall see how he fares with the knife. Lend him a dagger, one of you!"

A blade was thrust into Flash's hand, and once more he hardly had time to put himself on the defensive before Kala launched an attack—Kala, who whipped his own dagger from its sheath and leaped at the younger man pantherishly.

It was only by a rapid side-step that Flash avoided a deadly lunge from the knife in the monarch's fist, and then the pair of them closed in mortal combat, each striving might and main for the advantage.

With the eyes of Dale Arden and the guards riveted upon them, Flash and Kala fought like the gladiators of old, but once again it was the American who proved himself the master. Preventing Kala from striking by exerting a steady and agonising pressure on the man's wrist, he succeeded in bringing the point of his own dagger nearer and nearer to the swarthy throat of the underworld potentate, despite the latter's efforts to force his hand aside.

And at last the King of the Shark Men crumpled under the strain—was at his foe's mercy—must have died under a single thrust of Flash Gordon's knife if the youngster had been out for blood.

As it was, Flash let the blade fall to the floor and stepped back without a word, and then, after looking at him in silence for a moment, Kala spoke in a husky voice:

"I salute you, Earthling," he breathed. "You are the first man who has ever defeated me in hand-to-hand fight."

He turned to his guards and eyed them meaningly.

"Let the son of the Earth be treated as my guest," he said. "Let him occupy the room adjoining this one."

The Shark Men started, and exchanged glances. Then two of them approached Flash and took him by the arms.

"Just a minute," he protested. "Kala, what about Dale?"

"We shall discuss the Earth girl later," was the reply. "Meanwhile, enjoy my hospitality, my friend."

The men who had stepped towards Flash were drawing him across the room, and, reluctant as he was to be separated from Dale, he suddenly found himself beside a door. Next instant that door had been flung open by one of his escort, and ere he could see what lay beyond it, the American was thrust through the aperture.

There were steps leading down from the doorway, and he tripped and fell—but not to the floor of a guest-room. It was into six feet of water that he plunged, into an apartment half flooded with brine, and as he sank through that water he saw something lurking near by, a monstrous thing of many tentacles, a thing that bestirred itself ominously as he tried to flounder away from it!

"WESTERN COURAGE"

and the six-shooter was knocked out of it and disappeared down the crevice.

Unarmed but determined, he clambered higher, and from the fact that La Cross did not use his guns again he judged them to be empty. Throwing caution to the winds, he reached the foot of the bluff on a shelf of rock and jumped from it clean on to the outlaw, bearing him down against a boulder.

Together they rolled and fought, while Gloria watched and feared the issue. Together they rose up, and, in rising, La Cross had the advantage, for Ken slipped and fell against a boulder. The left hand of the outlaw was thrust against his cheek and jaw, forcing his head sideways, and a clenched fist was drawn back to strike when Ken desperately jerked up his left knee and sent his opponent staggering sideways.

Again they rushed at one another, hammered with their fists, and, fighting furiously, reached the great flat mass of rock high over the pass.

Gloria followed them. She saw Ken fall and roll to the very edge of the cliff, and she cried out in horror, for his body disappeared, though his hands clung.

Colonel Austin, with Mr. Hanley and the five cowboys, had reached the mouth of the pass, far beneath the great overhanging bluff, and they had reined their horses to watch the battle up against the sky-line. They saw Ken roll over the edge of the precipice and hang there by his hands, trying to pull himself up again; and they saw La Crosse standing over him and stamping on his hands.

Again and again La Crosse stamped on those clinging hands, but he could use only one foot at a time, and somehow Ken managed to retain his hold for what seemed to him to be agonising centuries.

And then suddenly Tarzan, who had climbed amongst the rocks in search of his master, came streaking across the bluff and saw what was happening.

Roaring with rage and baring his teeth, he hore down on the outlaw, who turned about too late to save himself. Up went two powerful hoofs; down they came with violence—and La Crosse was sent reeling backwards to fall nearly a thousand feet to his death.

Ken, breathless and nearly exhausted, managed to drag himself up on to the rock and lay there panting, while Gloria knelt beside him in speechless relief.

Down at the mouth of the pass, Colonel Austin shouted to the others to follow him; but they were less than half-way up the zigzag trail when Ken got to his feet, more or less himself again, and went to Tarzan.

"Thanks, old man," he said with emotion and infinite gratitude.

The white horse neighed with pleasure and rubbed his long nose against a very strained face; and then Gloria went to Ken with outstretched hands.

"It was all my fault," she said contritely. "I'm sorry for everything, Ken—even for riding your horse. I won't do it again."

Ken took hold of the outstretched hands and summoned a grin.

"Well, maybe," he said, "we could ride double."

"I'd love to!" declared Gloria.

"CAPPY RICKS RETURNS"

carrying a gun in his right fist. Behind him were six others, the scum of the big city.

"Mister," spoke their leader, covering Bill with the automatic. "Let's do this peaceable. Them papers has gotter be torn up, see? You and the young lady jest sit quiet—and then nothink else will happen!"

Cappy to the Rescue

CAPPY had gone down to the docks to revisit one of his old haunts. He entered a little quayside inn and asked the bartender for a drink, adding:

"And I want Menzel."
"He's in the parlour, Mr. Ricks, I'll fetch him."

The bartender returned with a huge, bearded giant of a Swede, clad in an old blue jersey and immense slacks. He held out a fist like a leg of mutton to Cappy, then slapped him on the back.

"Well, say, what's brought you along?"

Cappy confided:
"A little spot of bother up at a friend's office."

"Far away?"
"Down town. I got a car at the corner."

The bartender had dashed out to the yard. He called to a long slab of a boy.
"Jack, Menzel's got a job with Cappy Ricks!"

The boy dropped his wood-chopping and turned down his shirt-sleeves. When Cappy and big Menzel walked out purposefully from the inn, the bartender and the "slab" fell into step close behind them. Two gentlemen in grimy dungarees going the other way turned sharply about and also fell into line.

Cappy led the squad of five stalwarts up the stairs to Bill's office.

"The door's locked," Menzel muttered in his beard, after trying the handle.

Murmurs and mutterings could be heard. Then a sudden loud smack. Then a shrill scream. Then wild cries and heavy smashings, as tables, chairs and desks were overturned. Menzel battered in the door with one mighty blow of his huge fist. Cappy and his party charged into a scene of indescribable confusion and uproar.

The floor was strewn with torn-up papers. Barbara was slumped in a chair by the window. Bill was engaged in fighting five toughs at once. A pistol lay on the floor—Cappy kicked it out of the way.

He then flung himself into the fray—only to be sent spinning into a tottering bookcase by the leader of the gangsters. Menzel promptly swept two of the crooks off Bill's back with one single irresistible blow.

The leader seized a big flower-vase and banged it down on Menzel's curly pate. The vase shivered into atoms, but the Swede didn't even blink. He brought his fist down like a sledgehammer on his assailant's head and—down he went!

Scraps of torn paper flying everywhere; dust and battered-in hats and shirt-collars which had been wrenched off! Squeals and yells came from Cappy, high above the din—he had now thrust his right hand into a brass pot and was striking out at the gangsters at every chance. The slab, the bartender, and the dungaree gentlemen rendered yeoman service in hauling out the breathless bodies of the dazed crooks and blinging them down the stone stairs outside the door.

In five minutes Bill's office had been cleared of the riff-raff, and the conquerors were able to gaze upon the scene of desolation and destruction. Menzel wiped beads of perspiration off his brow.

"Seems like you're going to start a paperchase, mister," he said to the panting Bill.

"The signatures from the South!" gasped Cappy, pulling his hand out of the brass pot.

Bill, despite a cut chin and many bruises, managed a wink.

"It's lucky the Japanese gent don't want 'em," he grinned.

Cappy gripped Bill by the hand:

"You and Barbara come round to my office first thing in the morning!"

But Barbara had disappeared.

"The young lady went away," volunteered the chatty bartender. "Seemed in a kinder hurry."

While they were looking for her a police-sergeant and squad solemnly trooped up the stairs with three men carrying a large wooden box.

"The signatures from the South," said one of the three men in answer to Bill's questioning gaze. "Hundreds of thousands of them! Thought it best to bring 'em here under the sergeant's escort."

"I'll stay and count them, Cappy," said Bill. But again the man in charge spoke:

"All done, sir, at Los Angeles. To save time. Shall we take them to the bank now we've reported?"

"I'll go with you," Bill decided. "I feel in need of a little fresh air."

Cappy Clears the Sky

NEXT morning, Bill, brushed up and in his best suit walked into the office of the Ricks Lumber Company at unimpaired, unchallenged by any Burton.

Skinner and Matt Peasley were there with Mrs. Peasley.

"Everything fine, Bill," Cappy smiled at him. "The signatures are at the City Hall, and the Governor's granted a plebiscite of the State. You can reckon the Roofing Act is done for." He stretched out a warm hand. "Congratulations, my boy, on a grand bit of work! You're back here on your old job at double the salary."

"Thank you, sir. I'm very grateful. But—"

"No buts, Bill! Skinner, tell him you're glad to see him. Matt, slap him on the back! Florry, give him a kiss!"

Bill stood up to them, saying:

"Thank you, Skinner—much obliged, Matt. Thank you, Mrs. Peasley." Then his usually cheery face set in gloom.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"WESTERN COURAGE"—Ken Baxter, Ken Maynard; Gloria Hanley, Geneva Mitchell; Henry Hanley, Charles French; Mrs. Hanley, Betty Blythe; Eric Simpson, Cornelius Keeffe; Ed la Crosse, Ward Bond; Colonel Austin, Captain E. H. Calvert; Betty Johns, Reneo Whitney.

"SHADOWS OF THE ORIENT"—Viola Arvey, Esther Ralston; Tony Baxter; Regis Toomey; James Moss, Sidney Blackmer; Sullivan, J. Farrell MacDonald.

"I'm going to Canada, folks. I—I can't stay around here."

"Is that so?" said Cappy. "Leave Bill to me a minute, people. I got to talk straight to him." He gave his daughter a nod. "When I ring, Florry!"

As soon as they were alone, Cappy asked Bill, in a kind of puzzled wonder: "What's on your mind?"

"It's Barbara. I—I-I sort of liked her, too."

"Did you, Bill?" Cappy was all sympathy. "Just too bad, wasn't it?"

"I didn't dream she'd sell us out. I didn't even dream she was Blake's girl. I fell over for her, Cappy—I was a prize mutt! She had me on a dog lead—then went along telling Winton everything I did. She came in with all that lot of thugs at her heels last night."

Bill was staring out of the window, seeing nothing but a grey, cloudy sky. Cappy felt for the bell button with his gnarled old hand.

"Bill, you've got her all wrong. She didn't even dream that those fellers were going to march in and tear up the Jap's signatures." She didn't know a word about 'em.

"Working in my room," Bill grunted. "Calling herself Miss Smith—making me like her!"

"She started out to help her dad, Bill. That's only right, hey? Then she saw how things were shaping—and she came to me. Yes, sir—she did! But I'd found out for myself that Burton was whisking all the news across to Ossy and Winton. That was why I sacked him."

Bill's frowns departed. The grey skies were changing into sunlight.

"Why, Cappy, you don't mean—"

The door opened. Barbara, looking prettier than ever, came in.

"Did you ring, sir?" she asked Cappy in a shy voice.

Cappy jerked a thumb towards Bill. "It's him. He don't want to stay in 'Frisko any more. Tell him good-bye, Barb."

A minute later Cappy was ringing up Blake's office.

"That you, Ossy? Cappy this end. Lovely morning, what?"

Receiver to his ear, his old face all a-grin, Cappy went on:

"Can you hear anything going on just behind me? Two young fools arranging to get married. Barbara—tell your poppy."

Barbara wriggled away from Bill to call breathlessly into the mouthpiece of the 'phone:

"Hallo, dad—Bill and I are going to Honolulu for a honeymoon. Cheer-o, dad!"

Cappy took the loudly crackling 'phone:

"No go, Ossy! The Act's dead as mutton! Shingles hold the day! Too bad Winton's boys got dusted down last night—after tearing up the wrong papers so hard. Yes, Ossy, that's so—they weren't our signatures at all—just a lot of duds I got ready in case— You're getting old, Ossy, you know! The parade's passing you by! But you can come along to the wedding. Twelve o'clock at this office. 'Bye, Ossy! I'll be seeing you!"

He helped himself to a cigar. Took out of his vest pocket his petrol-lighter. Flicked it at it—and it flamed up. He regarded the little blue point of light with delighted surprise.

"Folks, I've done it at last!" he crowed. "What d'you know about that!"

But Bill and Barbara were too busy to take any notice!

"SHADOWS OF THE ORIENT"

enough that the raid on the Canton House had not only been for gambling, but for smuggled Chinese. It was Baxter's job to stop this smuggling, and it was obvious that he suspected Moss.

Viola dashed to the door—it was locked. The Chinaman came towards her. She picked up a chair and hurled it straight through a window, and she was on the sill before the Chinuk had recovered from his surprise. She raced across the field towards the 'plane.

It chanced that no one was watching the machine.

Moss was arguing about prices with Yung Yau when the Chinese cook burst in upon them.

"Lady go. Look, lady gone!"

He waved his arms.

Moss saw the machine taxiing across the ground, and saw it take off to climb skywards.

"Give me back the letter!" cried Yung Yau.

"I can't give you back the letter, you fool!" angrily shouted Moss. "The load's gone." He turned to his foreman. "Lufkin, get that other 'plane out. We've got to get that girl before she lands that load of Chinamen. Hurry—hurry!"

But the machine had to be fuelled, and valuable minutes passed before Moss took off. From his pocket he took out a deadly pistol, and his face was contorted with baffled fury.

Baxter was also in the air and was cruising round Mercer Canyon on the look-out for any suspicious machines. Down below the machine was being watched by Sullivan and his men.

Viola returned by the same route that she had taken, but as she came in sight of Mercer Canyon she realised that to land here might be foolish. If Moss were a crook he would have informed his men at the flying field, and when she landed they would seize her. Far best to fly on and land at the aerodrome.

Baxter sighted the 'plane and was certain that here was the 'plane carrying the Chinamen, and when Viola passed the field he reckoned that the pilot had sighted his machine and guessed he was a patrol, and was trying a get-away. Baxter grinned and dived earthwards.

Viola realised this machine was very interested in the machine she was flying. She had no idea it was a patrol, and foolishly tried to rev up her engine. It was an unpleasant shock when machine-gun bullets whistled round her and she saw a white-helmeted figure signalling her to go down.

After that a lot of amazing things happened. No sooner had she landed than two car-loads of men came at a furious pace across the field. Out jumped Sullivan and his boys. They gave her one look, and then gathered round the machine. She saw sliding doors and a number of frightened, luddled figures. She had smuggled Chinamen across the Border. The other machine landed, and she gasped to see the pilot was Tony Baxter.

"Tony!"

"Viola!" He was startled. "I might have killed you. What are you doing flying this 'plane?"

"I didn't know there was anyone in there." She pointed towards the Chinamen. "I just took the 'plane to get away from Moss. He was going to leave me over the Border. How was I to know? I just went because it was a chance to fly."

"You wouldn't take my tip, you silly nitwit." Sadly he shook his head.

"You had to have your thrill."

"I'm sorry."

"Sorry? What good is that going to do?" Baxter cried gruffly. "Don't you realise you're implicated in this now. I've got to arrest you."

Sullivan thought the young man was being unnecessarily harsh. He missed the twinkle in the younger man's eyes.

The sound of a 'plane made Baxter gaze skywards, and out came powerful glasses.

"A similar bus to X-26," he muttered. "Perhaps Moss or one of his men followed me," suggested Viola. "There were several hangars at that ranch."

"Well, I will soon find out."

Baxter snited the words by dashing back to his machine.

Those on the ground witnessed the greatest thrill imaginable—a fight in the air. The glasses showed Baxter that the pilot was Moss, and he signalled the other to go down. Moss flew close, and then tried to empty his gun at the immigration inspector. At that distance shooting with a revolver was not easy, and Baxter was not hit. Rat-tat-tat! went his machine-gun, and he went after Moss like a demon. The rogue twisted and turned and then tried to escape, but the Government machine was faster, more modern, and armed. His bullets connected with the petrol-tank, and Moss was forced down in flames.

Moss staggered out of the blazing wreck, and when Baxter landed nearby he tried to shoot the young inspector. Baxter wrenched the gun away, and Moss sagged limply—a bullet had smashed his right shoulder.

Sullivan appeared, and that worthy was holding a long strip of parchment covered with quaint characters—it was the half of a letter, and had been found on one of the smuggled Chinamen.

"Baxter, if we could only find the half of this we'd have all the evidence we need," he shouted.

And on James Moss they found the other half of the letter.

"They match," chorled Sullivan.

"I suppose you won't resign now?" teased Baxter.

"Maybe I'll think it over," Sullivan muttered, then pointed to the girl, whom they had brought in one of the cars to the scene of the crash. "What you going to do with this girl?"

"Well, there's nothing I can do but take her with me," Baxter seemed quite gloomy. "Give me your hand-cuffs." Sullivan handed them over. The girl looked for once in her life quite cowed and frightened. "I hate to do this, Viola."

Sullivan saw Baxter clip one cuff over the girl's wrist and then slip the other cuff on his own wrist. Baxter took the girl's arm and urged her towards his machine. Sullivan scratched his head.

"What'll I tell Graves about this?" he demanded.

Baxter grinned round.

"Tell him I eloped with the secret agent that helped me solve the case. I shouldn't hand in your resignation for a fortnight, because I'll be away all that time on a honeymoon."

Sullivan blinked his eyes—the young female prisoner had flung herself into her captor's arms.

RONALD

Colman in

“A TALE OF TWO CITIES”

A gripping story of a browbeaten waster of a lawyer's clerk and how he redeemed himself by a superb sacrifice. All the thrills and horrors of the terrible French Revolution, starring Ronald Colman

Lucie Manette

MR. LORRY, when arrived at the Royal George in Dover, and unwrapped of his mufflers and overcoat, appeared as a very orderly old gentleman. He was neat, cleanly shaved and carefully dressed. He wore a brown suit with knee breeches and a flapped waistcoat, and on his head he sported a little crisp brown wig. He ordered his dinner and had just finished it when a rattling of wheels in the courtyard heralded a new arrival.

A minute later the waiter came to his table to say that a young lady was asking to see him.

He went to the apartment which the young lady had reserved. It was a large, dark room lighted by two candles, and, for a moment, Mr. Lorry did not see the girl, in a riding cloak, holding her hat in her hands, who was steadily regarding him from a pair of very blue eyes.

"Be seated, sir," she said in a gentle voice. "You are from Telson's Bank?"

"I am," Mr. Lorry now saw her plainly, with her fair hair and pretty face. She looked about seventeen, her eyebrows were almost knitted together in a queer little perplexity as she went on:

"I am told, sir, that some discovery has been made in connection with my poor father, so long dead."

"That is so," Mr. Lorry remained standing. "I am to take you to Paris. I am very proud of the privilege."

She came close to him, still searching his kindly old face. "Are you quite a stranger to me, sir?"

"Am I not, Miss Manette?"

She shook her fair curls.

"I do not know." She became suddehly agitated. "You have something to tell me. Please—please do so quickly."

Mr. Lorry sat down.

"I wish to speak of a—of a customer of Telson's in Paris. A doctor of repute. I was at the French house at the time he—he disappeared, and his affairs were entirely in my hands—"

"You are telling me of my father," spoke the girl hurriedly. "I began to think it was you who brought me to England when an orphan of barely three years—" She checked herself to ask: "Am I right?"

"It was I," Mr. Lorry agreed. "Now, my dear child, pray control yourself. I have good news. That is to say, not bad news." He felt some difficulty now. "Your father's disappearance when you were a baby—"

"Disappearance, sir?" She dropped to her knees before him. "Twice you have used that word!"

"Don't kneel to me, my dear. Your father was thrown into prison. It was thought the Bastille— But, courage, my child, he has been released. We are going to Paris to fetch him. There, now—all is told!"

"Alive?" The word came from her as a cry from the heart. She sank softly to the floor.

"Good gracious! Miss Manette—Lucie, my child! Don't go on like this! Your father is recalled to life!"

A wild-looking woman, dressed in red, in a tight-fitting fashion and gifted with a head of fiery red hair, rushed into the room. She brushed Mr. Lorry aside and flung herself down beside the girl.

"Go and get things!" bawled this extraordinary person. "Don't stand staring at me, you in brown! G&G' smelling-salts, cold water, vinegar!"

But Lucie Manette had already come to. She allowed the red-haired one to lift her and carry her to a chair. She opened her blue eyes to smile faintly.

"I think she's all right," Mr. Lorry ventured.

"My darling pretty!" cried the red one. "No thanks to you in brown! My ladybird, my beloved!"

"I hope," said Mr. Lorry, "that you accompany Miss Manette to Paris?"

"Is it likely I'd leave her to you?" came the snapped answer. "Yes, I'm coming—thank you for nothing! I'm her companion. I'm Miss Pross!" She brought out the name with such fearful emphasis that poor Mr. Lorry quite quailed.

The Shoemaker

A LARGE cask of wine had dropped from a cart and had burst its hoops. It lay on the stones just outside the wine-shop, with the red wine pouring forth. Everyone on the instant, in that narrow, unsavoury little street of the Ward of St. Antoine, in Paris, left their business, or their idleness, to rush to drink the spilled juice of the grape.

Noise and laughter and scrambling! Some flung themselves flat and lapped up the red pools like dogs. Others tried to scoop it up in their hands.

One fellow dipped his finger in a puddle of it and then scrawled the word "BLOOD" on a wall near by.

The master of the wine-shop, a big fellow in dull green clothes and yellow waistcoat, came away from the door where he had been standing. He spoke to the joker.

"What do you write there, my Gaspard? Is this the place for such jesting? Is there—no other place"—he lowered his voice—"in which to write such things?"

He swept his great hand across the noxious word, obliterating it. He went back to his shop, where his wife sat knitting behind the counter.

There was character in the face of this woman. She said no word, but her husband's attention was drawn to two persons in the crowded little shop, sitting together at a table. An elderly gentleman and a girl.

The wine-shop keeper took no notice of them, but moved along to where three men sat at dominoes in a corner. "How goes it, Jacques Defarge?" asked one of them. "Is the spilt wine all swallowed?"

"Every drop, Jacques," answered Defarge.

"It is not often," spoke the second of the three, "that these poor, miserable ones know the taste of bread, let alone wine."

"It is so, Jacques," Defarge returned.

The third man laughed as he pushed the double six into position. "Ah, so much the worse! Am I right, Jacques?"

"You are right, Jacques," agreed Defarge. "I wish you gentlemen to meet my wife."

The three named Jacques accompanied the fourth Jacques—M'sieur Defarge—to speak with madame, who greeted them with great calmness of spirit and never dropped one stitch of her knitting whilst they conversed in low tones with her.

The elderly gentleman came across from his table to Defarge.

"I wish a word with you," he whispered.

Defarge stepped to an inner door and opened it. The elderly gentleman whispered again. Almost at the first words Defarge started and became deeply attentive. At the end of the whispers, he answered:

"I will take you to him."

The elderly gentleman signalled to the girl.

Defarge told her:

"It is very high—many steps. We will go slowly."

"Is he alone?" she breathed.

"Who should be with him?" answered Defarge. "You are his daughter, I imagine? Yes? I am his old servant, Jacques Defarge. Step carefully." He led the way up a tortuous flight of stairs.

At the top landing they paused. Defarge unlocked and opened a door.

"It is better that I go in first."

A faint hammering had stopped on the opening of the door. Lucie glimpsed an old man with a ragged white beard, a hollow, dead face and exceedingly bright eyes. He was sitting before a trestle-board with a shoe in one hand and a hammer in the other. His clothes were in rags—he put up the hand that held the shoe and one could almost see the light from the window through it.

"Visitors," said Defarge. "Tell the gentleman what you are making."

"A lady's walking shoe," came a faint voice. "It is the latest style." He turned towards Lorry. "Did you ask my name? It is One Hundred and Five, North Tower." He put the shoe and hammer on the trestle-board.

"Doctor Manette," said Lorry earnestly. "Don't you remember me?"

The brightly vacant eyes turned to him, then away. Lorry asked again:

"Surely you remember me? You remember this man, Defarge, your old servant? You recollect the Bank, Telson's, where we used to meet?"

Defarge put a hand on his arm.

"Hush! Let her speak with him."

Lucie had come forward. She knelt down before the wreck of a man whose memory was gone. She put one arm about him and he spoke in a kind of dying sigh.

"Who are you?" He touched her hair. "It is the same," he muttered. "But how is it possible?" He felt for a little soiled paper in his broken pocket and brought it out. Opened it and showed her a few brittle hairs. "She had laid her head on my shoulder that night when I was taken away—and these hairs were on my sleeve."

Lucie's tears fell fast. But she held him safely. His eyes rested on hers and he knew her for herself, when she whispered brokenly:

"Father, dearest father—I have come to take you home!"

"Only a Child Killed—"

THE Marquis de St. Evremond was a very fine gentleman indeed. A high-and-mighty gentleman who considered all others, with the solitary exception of His Majesty King Louis, to be as dirt beneath his noble feet. He was just now returning from a reception at the King's Palace of the Tuileries to his country house at Versailles, and monsieur le marquis was in a deuce of a hurry.

His gilded chariot of four horses and two postilions was racketing along the narrow streets of the Ward of St. Antoine with a supreme disregard of those mean folk on foot who were in the street about their usual business. With a rattle and clatter the chariot was dashing down a particularly narrow street when, just by a wine-shop, a little boy ran out of a house into the road.

A loud cry followed a sickening jolt of the wheels. The chariot stopped and monsieur le marquis looked out of the window.

"What has gone wrong?" he asked languidly.

A shortish fellow in a red nightcap had caught up a small bundle from amongst the feet of the four horses, now very restive and inclined to bolt. This fellow in a nightcap laid the small bundle on the kerb and began howling like a wild animal.

"Pardon, m'sieur le marquis," spoke a submissive man from those in a crowd round the chariot. "It is Gaspard. It is his child."

The man in a nightcap started up, his ugly face distorted by rage and grief. "Killed!" he screamed. "My little one! Dead! Dead!"

Those in the crowd regarded monsieur le marquis with eyes which told him nothing. He regarded them as if they had been rats come out of a drain.

"It is extraordinary," he said, "that you people cannot take care of yourselves and your children. How do I know what harm you have done to my horses?" He drew out his purse and took a gold coin from it. "See—give him that." He tossed the money at the man in a nightcap.

A thick-set fellow had come out of the wine-shop. He tried to comfort the heart-broken father who was still crying, "Dead—dead!"

"Better dead, my Gaspard," said the man from the wine-shop. "than to live in this misery which seems never ending."

The marquis sank back in his seat and called to the driver:

"Go on—waste no more time!"

An hour late for his dinner, he arrived at his country house. A tall, dark, handsome young fellow was talking on the steps of the château to a thin, tired, elderly man. M'sieur le marquis greeted them.

"Ah, Gabelle, you see I am arrived at last! A tiresome matter on the road delayed me." To the dark young man he said: "And you, nephew Charles—you are from London?"

"You have had your bottle, Sydney!" said Mr. Stryver, pointing accusingly at him with the stem of his pipe.

"Yesterday. I return at once."
"M'sieur le marquis pinched his lips together.

"May one ask why?"

"I cannot endure to see the unhappiness and injustice which surround us, sir. The needless misery—I believe our name to be the most detested one in the whole of France."

"Detestation of the high is the involuntary homage of the low," smiled his uncle. "Continue, dear Charles—Gabelle and I are most interested. By the way, Gabelle, has a gentleman from England called for me?"

Gabelle answered deferentially.
"Yes, sir. But he did not give his name."

"I will see him. Good-bye, then, nephew. May you find things more to your peculiar fancy in England. I cannot stop talking with you—it is too cold."

"I came to tell you that I renounce all rights in this property," said the young man. "I am going to work in a country for which I can have respect. Where men try, at least, to be fair to their fellows."

He climbed into the saddle of his horse and rode off under the growing mists.

"Do not be harsh in judgment upon him, sir," Gabelle said. "He is young."

"He is a fool," said m'sieur le marquis. "And you are his tutor!"

In the waiting-room in the château a sly-looking, hook-nosed man was standing. He bowed low to monsieur on his entry.

"Barsad," said the marquis "Follow my nephew to England. See that he is arrested under one of their absurd laws. Give evidence—I wish him laid by for a season. He will call himself Darnay, I expect—his mother's maiden name. You can draw on M'sieur Gabelle for a hundred English pounds. Don't stop to chatter—go!"

On Trial

IT was early spring in King's Bench Walk in the Temple in London. At the small hostelry at the west gates of the Temple a young man was sleeping in a chair beside the newly lighted fire in the bar parlour. He was unkempt, untidy and yawning prodigiously when the man at the tavern came to him.

"Ten o'clock, sir. Past ten o'clock."
"Eh?" yawned the young man, sitting up. "Ten o'clock at night?"

"Morning, Mr. Carton. You told me to call you."

The tavern-keeper stirred the fire, making as much noise as he could. Mr. Carton stood the racket awhile; then suddenly got up, flung on his shabby old hat and walked out. He slouched into the Temple Gardens and rather aimlessly wandered along to the chambers of his employer, Mr. King's Counsel Stryver. He entered and flung himself at once into a chair by the fire.

Mr. Stryver came to him from his private room.

"You are late, Sydney."

"A little. Nothing worth mentioning."

"You have had your bottle, Sydney," continued the portly Mr. Stryver, pointing accusingly at him with the stem of the pipe in his fat hand.

"Two, my dear fellow. Possibly three."

"There's a treason case on this morning at the Bailey," said Stryver with reproach in his booming voice. "The Attorney-General is prosecuting."

"Him?" said Carton. "Oh, him?"

"A strong case, Sydney. Have you prepared our defence?"

May 30th, 1936.

"Give me the papers," yawned Carton. Stryver, frowning horribly, did so. The disgruntled young man glanced at them. "Information laid against Charles Darnay, Frenchman, accused of treason at the instance of John Barsad, gentleman, and supported by one Roger Cly." He lifted his eyes to Mr. Stryver. "I don't like these names. Barsad and Cly—you can tell at once that they are scoundrels. Whereas Darnay"—he shrugged—"an agreeable, if scarcely French, name."

"It is actually d'Aulnais," came the answer. "His mother's name. He calls himself Darnay."

Carton grinned at him.

"Leave me alone for an hour," he said, spreading the papers out before him. "Get me a drink. Have one yourself."

"Something hot?"

"Hot and strong," said Carton, studying the papers before him.

"You drink too much," grumbled his employer.

"So do you," Carton retorted. "If any man can drink too much, which I doubt." He added, lazily: "I fancy I know Barsad—a tavern acquaintance. I'll look him up."

In the Court at the Old Bailey, at five minutes to twelve, Mr. Stryver was there in wig and gown, sitting at his desk. Sprawling in a seat next to him was Sydney Carton, gown awry on his shoulders, his wig more or less in place over his tumbled hair. His good looks were sadly marred by his general untidiness as he stared unseeingly at the high, dirty ceiling of the Court. His hands were thrust deep in his breeches pockets.

In the dock, handsome and upright, stood Charles Darnay, guarded by two warders. In the seats reserved for witnesses were prominently two men—one a sly-looking, hook-nosed person, the other a low fellow with beetling brows and unwashed face. Not so prominently were four others—an elderly, white-haired gentleman with bright eyes, but now no beard. A sweet-faced fair girl sat next to him, dressed in a fine, neat manner—next to her, a brown-suited old gentleman. Next to him, a strong-featured, red-haired woman who surveyed the whole Court, including the Lord Chief Justice, with utter contempt.

The case against the prisoner was outlined in fiery words by the Solicitor-General. It appeared that the prisoner was a "false traitor to our serene and illustrious and noble prince, our gracious King, George the Third—and that, by traitorous comings and goings between the dominions of our said serene and illustrious King and the Court of the French Louis, had been able to reveal to the said Louis what forces our said illustrious, etc., had in preparation to send to Canada and to North America."

Mr. John Barsad, gentleman, was called. He had seen the prisoner handling papers to a Frenchman.

Mr. Stryver rose, but Mr. Carton plucked at his gown:

"No questions yet!" he whispered.

Mr. Roger Cly was called and stated, with great volubility, that he had been in service with the prisoner and, in arranging his clothes, had found lists of names of officers and gentlemen in the King's service. He had felt it his duty to bring this information before the Court. He was a true Briton and hoped he had done the right thing.

Carton whispered to Stryver, who rose to cross-examine.

"Have you ever been charged with theft?" he asked Cly very sweetly.

"Me, sir? No, sir!"

"I have a note here that you were convicted last year of stealing a silver teapot," said Stryver, still sweetly.

"It was a mustard pot! And it was only plated."

"Thank you," said Stryver. "That's all!"

Mr. Jarvis Lorry was called and gave evidence that he had seen the prisoner on a packet ship on a certain night in the last November. He added:

"I was travelling with two companions. A gentleman and a lady. They are here."

"Thank you. I call Miss Lucie Manette."

The fair girl rose in her place and, with a piteous glance at the prisoner, stepped forward to take Mr. Lorry's place in the witness-box.

"Miss Manette, have you seen the prisoner before? You have? You are the lady referred to by Mr. Lorry?"

"Most unhappily, I am!"

The judge took a large pinch of snuff. "Answer the questions—don't remark upon them!"

"Miss Manette, did you have any conversation with the prisoner?"

"When he came on board he noticed that my father"—Lucie turned to rest her blue eyes on Dr. Manette—"was much fatigued and ill. I had made a bed for him on the deck—that he might have the air. There were no other passengers but we four—my father, my companion, and Mr. Lorry. And this gentleman."

"Do you mean the prisoner?" demanded the judge. "If so—say so!"

"The prisoner was so good as to advise me how I could shelter my dear father from the cold wind. He arranged the bed for me. He expressed great gentleness and kindness for my father's weak state—"

"Let me interrupt you a moment," said the Solicitor-General. "Had the prisoner come aboard alone?"

"There were two French gentlemen with him. They only stayed a few minutes on the ship."

"There were papers handed about? Like these?" He held up some documents.

"I didn't see anything of the kind. The gentleman—prisoner, I mean—was most kind to us. Most considerate—"

Her voice broke. "I hope I may not be doing him harm to-day."

"Did he not speak about America?"

"He tried to explain to me how the quarrel between England and the Colonies had arisen. He added, in a joking way, that perhaps George Washington, one day, might have as great a name in history as King George the Third. There was no harm in saying so—it was only a joke."

"A joke?" The astute lawyer glanced at the jury. "A joke, gentlemen—you hear?"

Dr. Manette was called. He had little to say. He had no remembrance.

"My mind is a blank," he told the judge. "I had been in prison in the Bastille for eighteen long years. I employed myself in making shoes, but I am a properly qualified doctor of medicine. I am practising again in Soho."

Mr. Stryver, prompted by Carton, rose again.

"I would like your Lordship's permission to recall Mr. Barsad."

Barsad came back to the witness-box rather doubtfully. Stryver's first question was not very encouraging:

"Ever been kicked downstairs?"

"Never! I received a kick at the top of a staircase and—fell down of my own accord."

"Ever borrow any money from the prisoner?"

Gabelle stared out over the parched countryside—he thought he was alone.

"Yes."

"Repaid him?"

"I'm going to."

Stryver boomed suddenly:

"You are quite sure the prisoner is the man you saw treacherously handing a Frenchman these alleged lists of His Majesty's Forces in America?"

"Positive."

Stryver turned to Carton.

"Stand up, Mr. Carton, please. Take off your wig—thank you. Now stand beside the dock. Mr. Barsad, look well at these two men. Are they not very like each other?"

Allowing for Carton's careless and slovenly appearance, they were so like each other that an audible gasp of astonishment went round the Court. Stryver thundered:

"Now, Mr. Barsad—are you still positive it was the prisoner?"

"I—well, no. That is to say—not quite so positive."

"Thank you. You can sit down!"

The jury retired. Ten minutes later they brought in a verdict of "Not Guilty." The judge helped himself to snuff and dismissed the prisoner.

In the well of the Court they gathered round Charles Darnay to congratulate him—Lucie, Sydney Carton, Mr. Stryver—and Miss Pross. This red-haired lady expressed the general feeling somewhat crudely:

"You're a lucky young man! If they'd found you guilty, you would have been put on a hurdle and then half hanged, then you'd have been taken down still alive—and cut into four pieces!"

"So they tell me," said Darnay quietly. "And I am all the more obliged to my friend here." He gave Stryver a grateful glance.

"You can thank this one," said Stryver, with a hand on Carton's shoulder. "He prepared the defence—though how he came to notice you two were so alike beats me! Looking at you now, well—it isn't so striking."

"I had to play a game of skittles with

Mr. Barsad," stated Carton in a whimsical way. "I had to find out a few things. It involved a certain quantity of mulled ale." He had been covertly regarding Lucie: "The idea that you were like me, Darnay, came as an inspiration. I hope Miss Manette thinks no worse of me?"

"I am deeply thankful to you, sir," she answered.

Dr. Manette had come to them. He put his hand on Lucie's arm.

"I would like to go home," he muttered. "I feel dazed here—uncanny—afraid."

Lucie drew his hand into hers.

"Come, dearest, I am more than ready." She turned to Carton. "I hope you will call upon us, sir, at our address in Soho. Mr. Stryver is aware of it. You also, sir," she added to Stryver.

"I will," boomed the King's Counsel. "A very great pleasure!"

Mr. Lorry was talking to a red-faced man in a corner of the Court.

"Jerry Cruncher, take this message." He had written on a card the one word, "Acquitted!"

Sydney Carton and Darnay left the Court together.

"Let's go and celebrate," Carton proposed.

"I hardly seem to belong to this world again," said Darnay.

"You are glad to belong to it?" Carton drew him away. "As for me, my greatest desire is to forget that I belong to it."

He led Darnay down Ludgate Hill into Fleet Street; thence up a covered way into a tavern. Here, in a little private room, they dined together. After dinner, throughout which Carton drank a whole bottle of Burgundy, the young lawyer asked, rather sneeringly:

"My double—why don't you give your toast?"

"What toast?"

"It's on the tip of your tongue!"

Darnay raised his glass.

"You are right." He stood up.

"Lucie Manette!"

Carton didn't rise.

"Lucie Manette," he repeated. He drank deeply; then flung his empty glass across the room, shattering it to fragments against the wall. "Waiter, another glass!" he shouted, drunkenly.

Footsteps!

THE lodgings of Doctor Manette were on a street corner not far from Soho Square. On the afternoon of a certain Sunday, Mr. Lorry walked from the sunny streets of Clerkenwell, where he lived, to visit the doctor. Miss Pross was at home—Lucie and her father were walking out.

Miss Pross welcomed Mr. Lorry in her especial manner.

"It's you—is it?"

"I believe so," said Mr. Lorry. "May I come in?"

Miss Pross had just been cleaning the house down—she showed Lorry all the improvements she had effected. In the doctor's bed-room, in a corner, stood the disused shoe-maker's board and his box of tools, much as they had stood in that fifth-floor room over the wine-shop in that mean suburb of St. Antoine, Paris.

"I wonder that he keeps these reminders of his sufferings," said Mr. Lorry.

"Why wonder!" came the quick inquiry. "Pooh!"

Mr. Lorry changed the subject.

"And how are you in health?"

"Nothing to boast about," said Miss Pross. "I'm much worried. I don't want dozens of people, not at all worthy of my ladybird, calling and calling here!"

"Dozens?" questioned Mr. Lorry.

"Hundreds," emphasised Miss Pross. "But perhaps they keep the doctor from thinking too much about himself. I'm always afraid he may relapse."

Mr. Lorry agreed with a shake of his brown wig.

"I often wonder that Manette, unquestionably innocent of any crime, should never mention the name of the enemy who so brutally brought about his punishment."

"He's afraid of the whole subject," said Miss Pross. "Touch ever so lightly upon that string—and he always changes for the worse. Sometimes I hear him in the night, pacing the room—up and down, up and down. Does he think then of his long imprisonment? You know he does," she went on accusingly. "So don't argue!"

"I wasn't going to," said Mr. Lorry. "Ah, I hear the front door—they have returned."

"Yes," said Miss Pross. "And now the thousands of visitors will appear—like leaves in autumn!"

But the only visitor was Mr. Charles Darnay—and he seemed most modest and charming.

They had an early dinner; then afterwards went into the garden. Miss Pross and Mr. Lorry brought chairs, and they sat under the shade of an old plane tree. It was oppressively hot, as if a storm was brewing.

Darnay talked about London, asking Lucie if she had seen this and that place. He asked if they had visited the Tower of London.

"I have been there," he added with a grim smile. "I saw it very much from the inside! I was told a strange story while I was waiting trial." He shuddered a little, despite the heat. "Some workmen, whilst making alterations, came upon an old dungeon built up and forgotten for many years. The stones were covered with inscriptions cut by prisoners who had languished there—dates, names, wild, unhappy prayers. Below one inscription—'D.I.G.—dig,' they examined the floor, and in the trodden earth, beneath a stone, was found a mildewed paper which once had borne writing. It may have been the last will of some poor creature—"

"Father!" cried Lucie, breaking in. "What is the matter? You are ill!"

Manette had started up, his hand to his head. His manner and looks terrified them. He recovered himself almost at once.

"It is raining," he stuttered. "Don't you feel it? Large drops—a storm. . . . Let us go in."

They returned to the parlour, and Miss Pross made tea. Sydney Carton came in, but no dozens and hundreds of people as yet! Mr. Lorry kept looking for them.

"The rain is falling," spoke Manette. "But it comes slowly."

"It comes surely," said Carton.

They listened, all of them, to the hurry in the streets—of people speeding to shelter before the storm should break. This corner house was a corner for echoes. Footsteps coming and going—yet never a footfall there.

"A multitude," said Darnay, "and yet a solitude."

"Sometimes I have sat here of an evening," said Lucie, "until I have fancied, while listening, that all these echoes are echoes of the footsteps that are coming and going in all our lives."

"There's a big crowd coming into our lives then," Carton smiled.

"A foolish fancy," Lucie went on. "I only yield to it when I am alone."

"I take all those echoes into my life," said Carton. "I ask no questions and make no stipulations. If there are great crowds bearing down upon us, I take them all to myself! I will see them."

Lightning flashed as he spoke, followed by a crash of thunder.

"And I will hear them!" he laughed scornfully. "Whether they come like that—fast, fierce, and furious!"

The rush and roar of the storm silenced him. No voice could be heard in it.

Late that night Jerry Cruncher, with his lantern, was escorting Mr. Lorry to his home in Clerkenwell. Mr. Lorry, May 30th, 1936.

mindful of footpads, always had Jerry to call for him and light him on his way.

"What a night!" said Mr. Lorry. "Almost enough to bring the dead out of their graves!"

"I never see a night what would do that," Jerry declared.

Carton and Darnay had walked with them to the main road. All four stopped at a corner.

"Good-night, Mr. Carton!" said Lorry. "Good-night, Mr. Darnay! Shall we ever see such a night again together?"

Perhaps! Perhaps see a great crowd of enemies, with hideous rush and roar, bearing down upon them!

"Tell Me Your Secrets When I Ask"

A YEAR had gone by. Mr. Charles Darnay had become a clerk in Telson's Bank. In the evenings he taught French to young people in the neighbourhood of Soho.

It was the close of a summer day, when he knew Lucie to be out walking with Miss Pross, that he called on Dr. Manette. He found the old gentleman sitting in his armchair by an open window.

Manette was a very different man. He looked well and strong, and the removal of that shaggy beard had added years of youth to him. He greeted Darnay with heartiness.

"Charles, I rejoice to see you. I am all alone."

"Doctor, I want a few words with you. I knew that Lucie would be out—"

"Bring a chair close to me, Charles," said Manette gently. "Is it Lucie you wish to speak about?"

"I love her, doctor. I dearly love her."

"I believe you, Charles. I do you that justice." Manette's manner had become constrained. "Yes, I believe you."

Manette's voice was low when he asked:

"Have you spoken to her?"

"No, sir. I—I think she knows. I hope she knows. I have dared to hope." Darnay took a firm tone. "I came to you, sir, to ask that I may speak to her. I must tell you, first, about myself. Like you, I am an exile—a voluntary exile from France—driven from it by the injustice and unkindness towards their fellows which I have seen perpetrated there by the high and the rich. I am working hard in this land of my adoption, and I am, in a small way, succeeding."

"Do you seek any promise from me?" asked Manette.

"I do," Charles answered. "Without you I would have no hope. I understand that Lucie will never leave you. Her father comes before everyone—everything."

"I do not know what my daughter thinks," said Manette.

"You don't think there is someone else?" cried Charles in alarm.

"You have seen Mr. Carton here"—Manette's manner became more easy—"also the important Mr. Stryver. But I will not tease you, Charles, although I have seen that Lucie likes young Carton. She is grateful to him. Can you guess why? I fancy you can. But this is idle talk. What do you wish of me?"

"Your help, sir. I will tell you who I am, and why I left Versailles—"

"Stop!" cried Manette sharply. "Stop!"

"I must have no secrets from you," Darnay was saying, when Manette laid cold hands upon his as they sat together.

The old man spoke with trembling passion:

"Tell me your secrets when I ask—not now! If your suit with Lucie prosper, you shall tell me on your wedding morning. I don't want to know." His voice shook. "No, no, never!"

It was as if he put something horrible from him. His eyes were bright and burning.

"Leave me now. I think you may hope. . . . I will not stand in your way. . . . Promise me you will speak no word of who you may be to Lucie?"

"I promise."

"God bless you and keep you, Charles!"

When Lucie returned, she heard a sound of hammering in her father's bedroom. She crept upstairs and peeped in, unseen. Manette was at his bench, making shoes.

The marriage day was shining, the sun was warm and kindly. They were waiting, the beautiful, fair-haired bride, and Miss Pross in a new, very stiff and starched frock, and Mr. Jarvis Lorry. Charles and the doctor were having a little confidential talk behind closed doors.

"This is a great and happy day," said Mr. Lorry. "Don't cry, Miss Pross."

"I am not crying!" snapped the red-haired one. "You are!"

"I? Oh, really, no!"

"I saw you," Miss Pross denounced him. "And after such a present as you've sent! Silver plate—not a fork nor a spoon in the whole collection that I didn't cry over last night when I unpacked them."

"Did you now?" said Mr. Lorry, much gratified. "Ah, dear, dear me! To think I might have been married any time these fifty years!"

"You were a bachelor in your cradle," rejoined Miss Pross. "You couldn't help yourself."

The parlour door opened and the doctor came out with Charles Darnay. The doctor was deathly pale, but he was composed and steady. He offered his arm to Lucie.

"Come, my darling. I am going to give you to him."

Lucie clung to her father a little hysterically. But the sun was shining and Charles was gazing upon her with such love and tenderness. Nothing but happiness ahead.

A quiet marriage at the little church, soon over. Then back to the little house in Soho. Lucie whispered to her husband:

"Was Sydney there? I didn't see him."

"I saw no one but you," said Charles. They were happy, all of them. Presently the young couple, radiant as the sun itself, drove away. Manette waved to them from the doorstep until their carriage was out of sight. Then he went up to his room. Mr. Lorry went back to Telson's for an hour or two; then came back, a little uneasy in mind.

Miss Pross met him at the door with a face of woe.

"Listen, listen!" she wept. "Do you hear?"

A low sound of hammering tolled like a midnight bell through the quiet house. "What's that?" Mr. Lorry gasped.

"What's to be told to my ladybird?" asked Miss Pross. "He's—he's making shoes again!"

Mr. Lorry ran past her up the stairs. He opened the bedroom door—to see Manette hard at work at his bench. He looked down as Lorry entered.

"A young lady's walking shoe," he muttered. "The latest style."

"Manette!" cried Lorry firmly.

"Look at me! Think again—that is not your duty. You are a doctor—put aside those things."

The shoemaker stared at him. "My duty?" he questioned in a puzzled way. "Do you mean there is someone ill and needing me?"

"Yes," spoke Lorry. "I need you. I am very ill!"

Manette flung down his tools. "My dear old friend—why didn't you tell me!"

His madness passed from him. He was once again the kind, clever doctor. Lorry submitted himself to stethoscope and a severe medical examination.

"Dear, dear!" sighed Manette professionally. "I must prescribe a tonic." He thought a moment or two. "I know—let's go for a walk in the air!"

"With all my heart!" Lorry agreed. "A walk—why not?"

"This from Jacques!"

It was a hot, airless July night in 1789. The heat brooded like a shroud over all France and made more stifling still the narrow streets of Paris, especially those of the sordid suburb of St. Antoine. In the little wine-shop kept by M'sieur and Madame Defarge there was much coming and going, much furtive whispering between one and another of the patrons. In their especial corner sat the three men named Jacques; for ever, seemingly, playing dominoes.

Madame Defarge knitted from morning to night, serene and watchful. She was tireless at her knitting, and laid aside each garment with care when it was finished. She had beside her a cut rose in a vase of water. Sometimes she lifted this flower from its vase and placed it in her dark hair.

Whenever she did this, the wine-shop emptied itself of its customers, save that one to whom she wished to speak. Some messenger from one of the many hot-beds of unrest which were springing up all over France.

Monsieur Gabelle, secretary to Monsieur le Marquis de St. Evremond at the château at Versailles, was a man borne down by cares. He ventured to speak plainly to the guests at one of the marquis' receptions. He dared to warn them that there were dark clouds gathering. He had been laughed at, sneered at, and told by m'sieur le marquis to mind his own business.

"Which, after all, is my business, Gabelle," m'sieur concluded. "You are oppressed with the system under which we live? My friend, I find the system very good." He glanced round the luxurious room in which they were talking—m'sieur le marquis in his gold-and-brocade chair; Gabelle standing, as a servant should, before him. "I will die, my dear, stupid Gabelle, in the system under which my family has always lived."

"There will come trouble," Gabelle told him. "Great trouble. It is impossible to remain unaware of it. The people are living in misery. They are starving whilst we revel and waste meat and bread. They are living in hovels unfit for pigs, whilst we—"

"Live in some degree of comfort." St. Evremond finished for him. "Do you intend to give up your position?"

Gabelle was silent.

"It is said," continued his master carelessly, "that England is a refuge for many. You remember a compatriot who has found a refuge there. A doctor?"

"I do."

"With his daughter," went on St. Evremond. "He spent many years in prison. Gabelle, you may also remember, for interfering with my plans. But you are fatigued—let us go to bed. Ring for my valet."

In his bed-room, the valet come and gone, m'sieur le marquis prepared for sleep. He rang for Gabelle when he had got himself leisurely into the great golden bed. Gabelle, grave and sick at heart, came again to him.

"A shadow seemed to pass my window," said Evremond. "Perhaps it was my fancy, but I would like you to step out to the balcony and make sure there are no shadows. It is very warm to-night, Gabelle—you must see that my room is properly aired each day."

Gabelle went to the balcony, with its quaint, gargoyled stone faces against the creeper-clad walls. If there was another gargoyled living face there, it was hidden in the gloom as he stared out over the parched countryside. The sky was blue-black with heat. A dull silence prevailed everywhere.

Down in the miserable village was complete darkness.

"They cannot afford to buy even a farthing candle!" Gabelle told himself bitterly. "They are hungry, naked, suffering—they are hating us with all the dreadful strength of their weakness."

He returned to his master. "There is nothing, sir, but the coming of a storm."

"How fortunate, my dear Gabelle, that we are so safe from storms," spoke Evremond sleepily. "Good-night—I look to the pleasure of seeing you again in the morning."

Gabelle tiptoed out of the great bedroom.

Shadows gathered, deepening the night. The curtains at the open window moved softly. A still deeper shadow came out of them—it held a dagger in its hand; it crept towards the golden bed. It paused for a moment to make sure that m'sieur le marquis was lying on his side asleep. It felt for his breast, then, as m'sieur stirred a little, the dagger was struck home straight into the arrogant heart beneath the lace-covered breast.

A choking cry was unheard in the sudden boom of thunder that rolled up along the fields and gardens.

Round the hilt of the dagger was a frill of paper. On it was scrawled:

"Drive him fast to his tomb! This from Jacques the Fifth!"

"You'll never pull this off!" Barsad muttered.

Taking the Bastille

THE murder of St. Evremond was a warning. But the approaching footsteps of a deeply embittered people found no echo in the mincing measures of the minut. A week went by—Gaspard (Jacques the Fifth) was caught and hanged by the neck on a gibbet outside the Bastille, and allowed to swing there, naked and dead, under the scorching sun.

Foreign soldiers were brought in to quell any risings of the people.

Said Madame Defarge, always knitting:

"Starving people might wait a long time before fighting French soldiers, but against hired foreigners—" She shrugged her shoulders. "Any day, any hour!"

A huge woman, with wild, streaming black hair, cackled a high, shrill laugh:

"Say, any minute!" she cried. "As sure as they call me La Vengeance—any moment!"

A sly, hook-nosed gentleman entered the wine shop. Madame Defarge saw him without turning her head. She carelessly picked up the cut rose in the vase and twined it in her hair. One by one the customers went out, La Vengeance last of all.

"Cognac," spoke the hook-nosed one. "The best you have."

Madame served him.

"You come from England, m'sieur?"

"I? Oh—well, yes. I am John Barsad—half-French." Defarge had entered the shop. "And this is M'sieur Jacques Defarge?"

Defarge shook his great head.

"You mistake. My name is not Jacques."

"I'm sorry, m'sieur. My business here is in regard to the late Marquis de St. Evremond. The heir to the title is residing in England—he is a clerk in a bank."

Madame Defarge questioned slyly:

"He will soon reside at the château at Versailles, no doubt?"

"It was burned to the ground last night," said Barsad, swigging at his brandy-and-water. "Another glass, please. The gentleman is married to the pretty daughter of Dr. Manette—you remember the doctor?"

"Do I?" Madame had to think. Just then a company of foreign soldiers came marching by. Barsad ran out to join them, forgetting his drink. Madame Defarge glanced at her husband and removed the rose from her hair.

The wine shop filled up. The three domino men—called Jacques One, Two, and Three—came in together. Their leader called sharply to Defarge:

"It is come, Jacques! The people wait your command!"

Defarge flung off his apron.

"Keep near to me, Jacques Three!" he cried. "And do you, Jacques One and Two, separate and put yourselves at the head of as many patriots as you can. Where is my wife?"

Madame reappeared from the parlour as he spoke.

"Here you see me," she answered. "I do not knit to-day. I go with you, for the moment. Presently I will lead the women."

Dense crowds of people had poured into the narrow street. All were armed with sticks, axes, bars of iron, pikes—any weapon they could find. A tremendous, never-ceasing roar rose from their throats, briefly silenced when Defarge came to the door of his shop.

As a whirlpool has a centre, so all the raging circled round him.

"Patriots and friends!" cried Defarge. "We are ready! My comrades will serve out arms—all that I have been able to collect—"

Yells of triumph rent the torrid air.

"We will make history this fourteenth day of July!" went on Defarge. "Come forward all those who can handle a musket and shoot straight!"

A scene of wild confusion followed, but soon Defarge was marching at the head of a living sea, rising wave upon wave. Alarm bells were ringing, drums were beating—but the sea of long-oppressed, furious people was thundering loudest of all.

"To the Bastille!" Defarge shouted.

They came flooding the square before the grim, gaunt battlemented building. They swept the foreign soldiers away like chaff before the wind. They began to shoot at the guards seen on the roof as these hurriedly fired down upon them, trying to pick out the leaders.

Deep ditch, double drawbridges, massive stone walls, eight great towers, cannons on the battlements—fire and smoke and the ceaseless roaring of an unchained mad monster—the common people of the city! An hour of riot and confusion; then Defarge was seen on a ladder, axe in hand, with Jacques Three, ascending under a hail of bullets, to the chains which held the main drawbridge. A lull came whilst thousands upon thousands of eyes watched their dauntless leaders.

The strokes of the axes resounded on the coupling links of the great chains; a ceaseless firing came from the roof of the doomed building—then came a sudden, mighty rush and a crash as the drawbridge fell brokenly across the ditch!

Defarge dropped down to lead his army.

But yells and cries told him of something amiss. French troops had come charging into the square. The mob fell back before them, sullenly.

The soldiers formed into double ranks, with muskets at the "present." They faced the mob.

"About!" shrieked their captain. The soldiers faced the Bastille, muskets elevated to sweep the battlements.

"Fire!"

On the instant with this salvo, the cheers of the people rent the smoke-laden burning air.

"The soldiers are with us!" came the cry.

Unheralded, un hoped for, Frenchmen in uniform had joined the Frenchmen in rags. Rebellion had turned to Revolution!

Defarge was swept into the Bastille at the head of as motley and ferocious a mob as the world has ever seen. A white flag fluttered from one of the eight great towers. The Bastille had fallen!

"Release the prisoners!" screamed a voice. At once it was taken up by ten thousand throats. "Release the prisoners!"

Billow upon billow of that mighty sea swept over the prison. When the foremost billows had passed, Defarge laid his hand upon the breast of one of the trembling warders.

"The North Tower!" he hissed. "Cell 105!"

"There is no one there," quavered the man.

"Kill him!" spoke Jacques Three.

The terrified man put up a hand.

"I will take you to the cell!"

"Quickly, then!" They came up many stairs to a small prison—four blackened walls with a rusted iron ring in one of them. Defarge's fierce eyes scanned the place. "Here, Jacques—"

He pointed to some cut-in words on a brick at the side of the small fireplace. "See 'A. M.'—Alexandre Manette! See also 'A poor physician.' Lend me your crowbar."

Defarge loosened the brick on which the initials had been cut, forcing the crowbar through into the chimney. Something fluttered to the hearth—Defarge snatched it up and thrust it into his pocket.

"Collect straw and wood and fire the place," Defarge commanded. "We will burn this den of infamy to the ground!"

The Bastille was soon blazing from end to end. Eight great towers fell in, one by one, as night came to make the scenes in Paris more dreadful still. All the great houses had been sacked; the shops had been pillaged; hundreds of the hated "aristocrats" had been caught and hacked to death. Thousands had been herded like sheep for slaughter in the civil prisons, to wait a trial where the verdict of "Guilty" was already pronounced.

A Cry of Despair

IN Telson's Bank the staff were very busy. Nobles and rich folk from France had come flying post haste to London. They crowded into Telson's to get money, freely mortgaging their estates. Telson junior (aged seventy), called on Mr. King's Counsel Stryver for advice.

Mr. Stryver, accompanied as ever, by his "brain"—Mr. Sydney Carton—gave forth the beginnings of his opinion in the private room at the bank.

"These aristocrats are fools," Stryver was booming. "They aren't firm enough! They should hang a few of these rascals to lamp-posts—let 'em swing—and that's all the revolution there would be!"

"The time may come," said Carton gently, "when George Washington will be a better remembered Englishman than George the Third."

"Eh?" Stryver turned to him.

"What's that?"

"Your kind of talk lost us the American colonies," said Carton. He turned to Telson junior, a mild, bald little man. "You business fellows read nothing but ledgers. You're badly informed. This revolution has got to be spelled in capital letters. I wouldn't lend these runaway French nobles one single penny. Their estates are already gone beyond recall."

"Exactly what I was going to say," declared Stryver. "My considered opinion!"

Telson junior rang for Mr. Lorry.

"The bank will advance no more money on properties in Paris or France," Telson junior stated. "Inform the cashiers, Mr. Lorry, if you please."

In the bank, Darnay was sorting letters just in from abroad. Amongst them was one addressed to himself under the title "Marquis de St. Evremond." It was from his old tutor, Gabelle. It ran:

"M'sieur. I have been seized and brought to Paris on a charge of treason. I am to be summoned before the Tribunal of the People, and shall lose my head unless I have your immediate personal assistance. I am confined in the prison of the "Abbaye" in Paris—it is in vain that I tell them I have never collected, nor ever sent you any rent moneys. I do not know how or where to address this cry of utter despair—but Citizen Defarge, who is now a great power, states that you are employed in the bank of Messrs. Telson, and that you alone can save me. So I write to you, m'sieur, praying that this may reach you before I am destroyed. Your afflicted old friend—GABELLE.”

 “14th Sept., 1789.”

Darnay acted without hesitating one moment. He applied for leave or absence from the bank and sent Jerry Cruncher to book him a seat in the Dover coach.

He asked Lorry to break the news of his departure to Lucie—and to their little one, Lucie the second, now aged nine years, and as pretty as her pretty mother.

“I must go,” Darnay told his friend. “It seems that Gabelle, my old tutor, has been arrested on a charge that he has sent moneys out of the country to me. He is in danger of death. I shall return within the week.”

“I am going to Paris next month,” Lorry interrupted him. “I am to take over our Paris branch. Can I not clear your friend? I do not like the idea of you going there alone, Charles.”

“There is no danger for me,” Darnay answered, “any more than for you. Gabelle is in great danger—not a moment is to be lost.”

Gabelle was already past all hope. He had been urged to write the letter by Madame Defarge, and had been stabbed through the back before the ink had dried on the page!

Lorry, strange misgivings beneath his brown tunic, saw Darnay off by coach. He went with Carton to the house in Soho where the young couple lived with Dr. Manette and Miss Pross—now governess to the little Lucie.

Carton, as a privileged person, went upstairs to where Lucie was playing with her child. Lorry stayed below, talking with the doctor. He told him that Darnay had gone to Paris.

Manette started up, his face white as ashes.

“But they will kill him!” he cried. “Let us go after him before it is too late!”

“They will not harm Charles,” said Lorry. “He is of the people—like themselves.”

“He is the Marquis de St. Evremond,” Manette broke in, his eyes burning bright. “I should have told you—I promised to tell Lucie on her wedding-day! But I could not—the name is one of hatred to me. Hatred and fear. It was his uncle who caused me to spend those terrible years in the Bastille.”

“Gracious heaven!” Lorry gasped. “Oh, my dear friend, why—why did you not speak before!” He wrung his old hands. “We must go to Dover and bring him back. Pray with all your soul we may not be too late!”

Manette had recovered himself.

“We will follow him, if he has already left Dover. As a victim of the aristocrats I shall be welcome in France. I can save him!” He added in a choking voice: “How strange that I, who suffered so at the hands of an Evremond, must go now to save one of that name!”

The Tribunal

THEY were executing fifty to sixty aristocrats every morning in the square, before the ruins of the Bastille.

The Tribunal was sitting on a raised platform in a hall near by. A statue of Justice was a prominent figure behind them. A jury of patriots sat on the left hand of the judge, a sinister fellow upon whose head was a huge black plumed cap. He called the names of the prisoners, reading them from a list before him.

“Former Count d’Estournelles!” he read out.

A tall, handsome man was thrust forward from the little crowd by the door leading from the charge-room. He advanced firmly to the cleared space before the Tribunal—a motley gang drawn from the very dregs of the people.

“You are charged with treason against the common safety, former Count d’Estournelles,” spoke the judge. “Have you anything to say?”

“Nothing that I could say would make any impression on you,” came the quiet answer. “I prefer the dignity of silence.”

The judge turned to the jury. “You hear, comrades—he prefers the dignity of silence!”

A roar of laughter followed. “Vote!” called the judge when the cruel laughter had ended.

Shouts of “Guilty! Guilty!” came from them.

The judge waved a dirty hand to the guards.

“Death within forty-eight hours! Take him away!”

The count was hustled across the court to another door. A young girl was brought in. Madame Defarge, sitting below the judge, ceased her knitting to stare at the poor, trembling child. The judge bent his black brows upon the girl.

“What is your profession?” he demanded.

“I am a seamstress, citizen,” came the faint answer.

“You are accused of consorting with one, Pierre Coty, a traitor, who has paid the penalty.”

“He was my friend, citizen. I grew up with him.”

“You should not have such friends, Jeanne Fontaine.” He turned to the jury. “Vote—vote!”

With one accord they shouted “Guilty!”

The judge waved her on. “Death within forty-eight hours!”

The poor girl uttered a piteous cry, but the guards quickly surrounded her and hustled her away. Madame Defarge resumed her knitting; the judge was handed up some bread and cheese on a plate. He began to eat, spluttering mouthfuls of food betwixt his teeth.

“The Marquis de St. Evremond—called Darnay!”

Charles was thrust forward. He advanced boldly to the Tribunal.

“You are suspected as an enemy to the Republic,” said the judge, breaking off a hunk of bread.

“I deny it,” said Charles. “I am a friend of the people.”

Sitting in a space reserved for prisoners' witnesses were Lucie, Dr. Manette, and Mr. Lorry. Lucie was drying her tears—the fate of the poor little seamstress had affected her deeply.

“You are also accused under this decree which forbids the return of all aristocrat emigrants.” The judge read from his paper.

“I am not an emigrant, nor an aristocrat,” Darnay answered. “I gave up my titles years ago. I felt I would rather live on my own industry than on the overburdened people.”

Madame Defarge called out:

“A lot he cares about that! Away with him!”

The judge asked:

“Tell us why you came back to France.”

“I came to save a friend of the people—one who is unjustly accused. I hope that is not criminal in the eyes of the Republic?”

The jury whispered together, nodding their red-capped heads. They were impressed with this reply.

“What is the name of this friend?” the judge asked.

“Citizen Gabelle.”

“Call him,” the judge ordered. The ragged ushers raised a shout of “Gabelle! Gabelle! Citizen Gabelle!” There was no reply.

“He is evidently not here,” the judge stated. “That is strange—the man he came to save is not here. Have you any other witness?”

Darnay had been surprised and confused by the non-appearance of Gabelle. He began to fear he had been trapped. “Dr. Manette will speak for me,” he answered.

Manette stepped down to the cleared space. He stood bravely before the jury.

“Citizens, you all know of my long imprisonment in the Bastille. How I was released by my good friends and yours, Jacques and Thérèse Defarge. I know the prisoner well—I know where his sympathies are. They are with you, the people. They always were. He is a true citizen—what better proof can I give you than, when he asked my daughter's consent in marriage, I gave my consent gladly?”

The jury again whispered together, nodding their approval. Manette continued earnestly:

“My daughter's happiness is in the hands of the prisoner. I have suffered enough from my enemies. From you, citizens, to whom I owe my liberty"—he half turned towards Jacques and Madame Defarge—"may I not ask a final blessing? To enjoy that liberty which you have given me?"
 May 30th, 1936.

The jury were all ready to vote "Not Guilty" when Madame Defarge flung down her knitting and sprang to her feet.

"Stop!" she shrieked. "I accuse the man St. Evremond, called Darnay! One of a family of tyrants who have bitterly oppressed the people! I bring witnesses!"

"Name them," spoke the judge.

"My husband. Myself. And—Dr. Manette!"

Manette cried:

"I protest. It is a lie! I do not denounce this man!"

Madame Defarge had plucked a faded crumpled paper from the bosom of her dress.

"How can you say so when it is here! Let me read." She opened the paper. "Listen, all! For what the St. Evremonds have made me suffer, for all that they have made the people suffer, I, Alexandre Manette, in this hour of my unbearable agony, do denounce the whole family of St. Evremond, them and their descendants, to the last of their race. This was written in the Bastille by Dr. Manette in serapings of soot and charcoal, mixed with his own blood!"

Manette stared at her aghast.

"Number 105," he slowly muttered. "I had forgotten." He reeled and would have fallen, if one of the ragged warders had not rushed to support him.

Madame Defarge went on.

"It tells of how, as a young doctor, he had been summoned to the bedside of a girl, dying through the merciless oppression of the Marquis de St. Evremond! It tells how her young brother was slain when he tried to rescue her. It describes the agonies of those two innocent children. That boy is dead—that girl is dead. All that family have died through the cruelty of the St. Evremonds! All but one—a sister. She was hidden from them—and she lived. She lives to-day. I am that sister, and I demand the life of the last of that black brood. I demand it!"

"But this prisoner," cried Manette, "he had nothing to do with it."

The judge held up his hand.

"Vote, citizens!"

Yells of "Guilty!" rose from the throats of all. "Guilty!"

The judge scarcely waited for silence. "Death within forty-eight hours!"

Carton Comes to Them

IN a room over Telson's Bank, in the Rue St. Honore, they were gathered together in utter despair. Lucie, old Lorry, Dr. Manette, Miss Pross and little Lucie, who was playing with a dreadful toy, something given to her by a woman in the streets. It was a little wooden model of the guillotine:

Manette, old and shaking, faltered:

"There is yet a chance. I will go to Citizen Danton, the head of the Revolution. I will implore him to save Charles."

"Dear father," whispered Lucie. "Heaven be with you!"

A few minutes later came a knock at the door. Sydney Carton entered. He had heard the dread news. He kissed the cold hand Lucie extended to him.

"You come in a sad hour, Sydney," she murmured, checking her sobs. May 30th, 1936.

"Forgive me if I go to my room. I cannot help my tears."

Carton came to the little girl and saw the toy. He took it gently from her.

"Go to your mother, dear. Comfort her." He turned to Lorry when the child with Miss Pross had gone. "When is the—the execution to take place?" he asked Lorry.

"To-morrow morning."

"You are leaving Paris?"

"I am taking her away. Nothing can be done."

Carton made no comment on this. He only asked:

"Do you know if Barsad is in Paris?"

"He has gone over to them, of course," Lorry answered fretfully. "I am not interested in him."

"I am much interested," Carton stated. "Especially if he should be connected with the prison of La Force, where Darnay is held."

"He is an officer there."

"You all have your permits to leave Paris?" Carton asked.

"We have." Lorry heard footsteps and ran to the door. Manette entered, his eyes very bright. He advanced into the room, ignoring both Lorry and Carton. Lucie came out from her bed-room.

"Father, have you seen Danton already?" she cried, running to him in hope.

"How can I make my shoes if you don't give me any thread?" he answered dully.

Lucie lifted drowning eyes to Carton. Lorry whispered to her:

"It is of no use. He doesn't even hear you. I'll take him to his room."

Carton drew near to Lucie when they were alone. She murmured:

"If only I could see Charles again. But once—!" She clutched at Carton's hand. "I can't even do that!"

He gently pressed her icy fingers. Lorry came back.

"Your father is calling for you, Lucie."

He led her away, then returned to Carton, who had helped himself to wine from a decanter. Lorry frowned as he said:

"That is all you can do!"

Carton shrugged.

"It helps me to think. You all have permits to leave this city? Miss Pross, Lucie and her child, Manette, yourself? That man of yours—Jerry?"

"I've told you so!"

"Lucie is in great danger. So is the little one. The doctor is suspected, too. Therese Defarge, that tigress, has sworn to exterminate them all. I hear Lucie went to the wine-shop to-day to make a vain appeal to her. Folly—utter madness! Defarge will have your permits cancelled." He felt in his pocket. "Here's mine—take it!"

Lorry did so.

"Why do you give me this?"

"At eight to-night have the carriage ready. Leave immediately my place is occupied. Drive away without delay or any argument." He added, in a changed voice: "Yours is a long life to look back upon, Mr. Lorry."

"I'm seventy-eight. Nobody will weep for me."

"Not Lucie? Ah, you know she will! If you had gained neither love, nor even respect, it would be a bitter thought." He took up Lorry's big overcoat. "May I borrow this? Thanks. Don't let anything change your plans. Go, on the instant my place is occupied in the carriage."

He filled his glass and drained it, took up the big, loose coat, and swaggered out of the room.

He went to the prison of La Force and waited about the great forbidding doorway. Many came and went; but Carton, clad in Lorry's coat, only lounged and watched.

At last Barsad, very official now, came forth.

"Hey, old friend—you work late!" Carton called to him.

Barsad stared suspiciously.

"It's you, Mr. Carton. What are you doing here?"

"I want an interview with Darnay."

"What good will that do?" Barsad questioned.

Carton whispered low to the spy:

"You cannot refuse me! How long would your head stay on your shoulders if I told the Committee of Public Safety that you were once in St. Evremond's service?"

"Hush! Don't whisper it even!" Barsad's hook nose went a dirty white. "You can see him. I'll come with you. But it's quite hopeless."

They went into the prison together. A gaoler came forward.

"You return, Citizen Barsad?"

"With a friend, Citizen Victor. Which is the Evremond cell?"

"Third on the left, citizen. Ten minutes—no more."

They walked together in the semi-darkness.

"Wait here," said Carton.

He rapped on the door of cell twenty-three and entered, whilst Barsad stood uneasily outside.

Darnay, sitting at a table beneath a heavily barred window, sprang up.

"Carton—of all people!"

"I bring you a request from Lucie. She begs you to do exactly as I say."

"Dear fellow, it is useless to attempt any form of escape."

Carton drew near to him.

"Don't waste time, Charles. Take this pencil and paper—and write."

Darnay wonderingly did so. He sat at the table on the rickety chair. Carton dictated:

"The time has come to prove what I once told you. That I would give everything to save a life you loved. This is no subject for regret or grief." He looked over Darnay's shoulder. "Hurry, hurry!"

"There's something smelling queer—" Darnay was saying, when Carton suddenly clapped a handkerchief over his face.

Darnay struggled up, but Carton held on to him. They swayed and struggled together; then softly Darnay collapsed and fell into his friend's arms. Carton laid him down on the straw bed.

He flung off the big overcoat and, with quick hands, stripped Darnay of his outer clothes. He tore off his own, he put them on Darnay—now senseless under the narcotic with which the handkerchief had been saturated. He dressed himself in Darnay's cast-off clothes. He combed back his hair into the fashion in which Darnay wore it. Barsad was at the door.

"Time's up!" he whispered. He stared from one to the other. He shook his head. "You'll never pull this off," he muttered.

"Do as you're told. Get him to Telson's Bank by eight."

He lifted Darnay to his feet and put Lorry's coat around him. Darnay was like a drunken man. He wound an arm about Barsad's shoulders.

"There's got to be someone here!"

Barsad spoke in terror.

Carton answered:

"I shall be here."

He picked up Darnay's unfinished letter and thrust it into the pocket of the big coat. He forced his hat down over Darnay's ruffled hair.

A young detective finds a blood-stained coat and knows that the owner is wanted for the murder of the District Attorney. He trails the killer, and then gets a shock to find it is his father whom he thought dead. What shall he do? A stirring drama, starring Ray Walker

"The LAST ASSIGNMENT"

The Blood-stained Coat

"WHO is this bearded man?" The speaker was a thin, elderly man. He sat before a hugo desk in an imposing barn of a room and stared at the headlines of that morning's paper. Looking over his shoulder was a thick-set young man.

The headlines announced that the District Attorney had been shot down in cold blood the previous evening as he was leaving his offices. In the semi-light several people had sighted the killer, but except that the man was broad of shoulder and had a dark beard, none could give a description.

John Russell, head of the Criminal Investigation Department of the city, glanced round at Bob Norton, one of the smartest detectives on his staff.

"All the papers and incriminating evidence against Krane vanished with the D.A.'s dispatch-case, and Krane should have come up for trial to-day," Russell stated. "Enough evidence had been collected to put Krane and his murdering gang of counterfeiter away for life, now all that we can hope for is a week's adjournment of the case, and at the end of the week, if there is still no evidence, Krane's twisty attorney will be screaming about damages for his client."

"The boys have combed the city," answered Bob. "Every dive has been searched, and they can't get a line on this bearded man."

"Bob, I want you to take up the case." Russell looked shrewdly at the young detective. "For more reasons than one. Firstly, because I think you're one of the best men on the force, and secondly because I should like to see you gain promotion. Two thousand dollars reward goes with the capture of the bearded man, and that would make a pleasant wedding present."

Bob grinned.

"Thank you, chief. Mighty nice of you to give me this chance. I finished that dope-smuggling case last night, and I'm free to start right away. When I say right away, I would like to look up Marie for a chat. I've been out of town on this dope case for over a week."

"Get all the facts from Hendricks, decide how you'll tackle the case, and spend the evening with Marie if nothing urgent occurs," suggested the kindly chief. "Best of luck, Bob."

Bob Horton thought himself a very lucky young fellow. He was engaged to marry Chief Russell's daughter, Marie. The chief had been a great friend of Bob's mother, and when the latter had died while the boy was still at college, he had treated him almost like his own son. Bob had been enrolled as a member of the force, and at the age of twenty was the chief's right-hand man. No wonder he whistled merrily as he went off to seek Hendricks.

That dour-faced detective scowled when informed that Bob was now on the case. Hendricks did not like Horton, and the chief reason was Marie. With ill grace he gave his rival the most important facts of the case.

"If you think you can find this bearded mystery then you're welcome," sneered Hendricks. "Every hide-out in this city has been searched, but this guy has gone to earth—if I can't find him I'm darn sure you can't."

"I can but try." Bob refused to be drawn into a quarrel. "I might get a lucky break and pick up some clue."

"Not this year!" was the other's jeering comment.

Bob grinned and made no answer; he had little time for Hendricks. After studying the evidence and deciding that there was little he could do that day, Bob went off to his comfortable apartments. After a clean up, he rang Marie and told her that he was coming round.

"Maybe we could go to a show or a dance this evening?" he suggested over the phone. "Any rate, I'm going to look round at the cleaners and collect that dinner suit I left before I went out of town. I'll get it on the way to your place. Gee, I'm looking forward to seeing you, Marie!"

On leaving his apartments, he drove his powerful two-seater car across town to a busy little thoroughfare in the foreign quarter. The quick-clean laundry had never given him cause to grumble. He nodded to the man in charge and tossed over a ticket.

Lounging against the counter he gazed idly around. There were dozens of suits, overcoats, and other garments arranged on hangers, and he wondered how many there could be. He lit a cigarette as the man seemed unable to trace his suit and, for the first time, noticed a bundle of clothing lying on the counter. Absently he fingered the dark material, and for something better to do pulled the coat towards him.

There was a dark stain on one elbow. Instantly Bob Horton was roused. One touch of the dark patch on this brown suit told him it was blood.

May 30th, 1936.

Blood on both sleeves. He examined the inside of the sleeves and noticed that the lining was not stained. The owner of this coat had come in contact with some wounded, badly bleeding body. The D.A. had bled profusely, and the bearded man, in wrenching away the dispatch-case, must have come in contact with the body—probably had searched the pockets of his victim.

"Here's your suit, sir." The laundry man's voice disturbed him. "Got placed in the reserved section."

"Where did you get this coat?" snapped Horton, his eyes alight.

"Delivered about an hour ago, sir. It's an urgent job."

"I'll bet it is." Bob produced a badge that proclaimed his calling. "Just spill all you know about this suit."

"Brought in this morning by a woman," explained the laundry man. "As far as I recollect she runs some sort of an apartment house—I've got the address. This suit belongs to one of her lodgers. She told me of the blood-stains, and that her lodger had helped someone badly hurt in a car smash."

"That's possible," decided Horton. "Give me the address and I'll call round. Better keep my suit—I'll call back for it."

It was an apartment house, and he was shown in to see a Mrs. Gordon, who showed symptoms of a breakdown when she saw the badge—the police always gave her a turn. Bob Horton decided that at some time she might have run foul of the law. If necessary, he would inquire into her record.

"No harm's coming to you, Mrs. Gordon, if you answer a few simple questions," he told her. "You took a suit to the cleaners this morning for one of your lodgers. Describe what occurred and what this lodger is like."

Mrs. Gordon told the same tale of the car smash and her guest's eagerness to have the suit cleaned. He was an elderly, broad-shouldered man, and had a beard. He seldom went out, and always at night, coming home at all hours of the morning. Horton became more and more certain that by luck he had found the murderer of the District Attorney. It was a thrill to hear Mrs. Gordon say that her lodger was in his own room on the next floor.

Horton went to the phone and got through to headquarters and his chief. The latter answered that he would instruct Hendricks and two car-loads of police to go at once to the lodging-house.

Mrs. Gordon gasped when Bob Horton took out a revolver from his pocket.

"I'm going up there to see this lodger with the beard," the detective said. "I reckon he's the guy we want for the murder of the D.A. When the boys get here, tell them where I've gone."

Very quietly he went up the stairs and tiptoed down the corridor to Room No. 24.

A Terrible Choice

VERY cautiously Bob Horton turned the handle of the door and gave the faintest of pushes—the door was not locked. He listened with an ear against the panelling and could hear gurgling water. The lodger might be in the bath-room attached to the room. Soon he had pushed the door sufficiently far open to glance into one side of the room. The gurgling water was mixed with splashing sounds.

Noislessly he entered the room with his gun ready for any trouble. There was no one—the lodger was in the bath-room. He edged over the carpet till he could glance round the open bath-room door. A man in his shirt-sleeves was standing before a mirror, and in his hand was a razor.

May 30th, 1936.

Bob made no sound as he watched the man shaving off a thick, stubbly black beard. The task was complete, and the detective edged nearer the door to gain a glimpse of the man, and it was then that the suspect, looking into the mirror, saw the face of a man depicted there. He whipped round.

"Stiek 'em up!" shouted Bob. "One move from—Dad!"

Bob Horton found himself looking at the father whom he thought dead.

The elder man stared intently, almost eagerly—a half-smile on his lips—and then he saw the gun. His face hardened.

"Well?"

"You were reported killed!" Bob gasped out. "Why have you never let us know? It's five years since—"

"I made a prison break," said the father, his mouth twisted in a smile. "Got into a boat and tried to escape. The boat upset and the three gaolbirds in it drowned. One of the bodies was supposed to be me, but I hid in the marshes and got away." He laughed. "And I'm not such a fool as to imagine that you would have been pleased to see your convict father. Besides, Bob, it was best for your sake that I remain dead."

"Don't say that, dad," argued Bob. "You could make a clean start."

"After a gaol break?" He gave a sneering laugh. "What a hope! If they had caught me I would have been back in the pen for five years. And just suppose I hadn't made a break and I'd served my sentence. Would people have rushed forward to give me a job? No, they'd have spurned me as if I were a mangy cur. Once you've gone over to the wrong side of the street it's mighty hard to get back."

Bob had to admit to himself that this was true. His father had been a big man in engineering at one time, had lost his money in wild speculation, and helped himself to trust funds on a gamble on gold-mining shares. The mine was barren and Horton senior went to prison. After serving a year he had been the ringleader in a prison break.

"How did you trace me?"

The question brought the younger man back to realities. He stared at his father with dread.

Bob hesitated, then squared his shoulders:

"You were shaving off a beard in there—why?"

"I thought a beard didn't suit me." Horton could not face his son's eyes. "Made me look too old."

"You sent Mrs. Gordon round to the cleaners with a suit," Bob persisted. "It was blood-stained. What's your explanation?"

"I told Mrs. Gordon that—"

"I've heard that tale, and I don't believe it!" rapped out the son. "I might have, if it hadn't been for that beard. The D.A. was shot and the papers concerning the Krane case vanished. Before the crash came you were very friendly with that cheap crook. Did you kill the D.A.?"

"Yes."

Now Jim Horton faced his son squarely.

"You murdered him?"

Horton bowed his head.

"I was driven to it. For the last five years I've been working for Krane and haven't had the nerve to break from his clutches. I've wanted to give myself up, kill myself and end it all, but I've been a coward. But I'm glad now the law has got me—it'll be the end of a living hell."

"But you killed a man in cold blood!"

"He was responsible for my five-year sentence," raged the father. "He was a man who would use false evidence and try any dirty trick to win his case. Krane swore that if I did this he would never bother me again, but fate, son, had other ideas."

The sound of a siren made Bob start nervously.

"The police! I warned them I had trailed a likely suspect."

Jim Horton shrugged his shoulders.

"I forgot for the moment that you were one of the force's brightest detectives. Truly an irony of fate that a son should take in his own father. Horton's a common name; I won't let them know you are my son. You'll get the credit for arresting the murderer of the D.A. and—"

"Be quiet, father!" raved Bob. "I can't do it. You're my own flesh and blood. I believe all you say about the D.A., but if he had been the grandest of men, and you had murdered a hundred people, I couldn't do this to you. You've got to escape."

"Too late, son," Horton smiled. "The police-cars are outside."

"The fire-escape and the roof!" quickly cried Bob. "Get out through the bath-room, and I'll pretend you got away from me. There are several other fire-escapes, and I'm sure it is a long, flat roof. Make a break for it. I hope you make it, but I'd rather you made an attempt than have to take you in to certain death. If they get you, dad—well, I'll be mighty sorry, but I want you to do your best to escape and then clear right out, and, even if you starve, go straight. I'll always help you."

"Your mother's child." Jim Horton smiled proudly. "I get your reasoning, Bob. I'll try it."

The door was bolted, and Hendricks and his men had to break it down. They were surprised to find Bob Horton, whose hair was disarranged and on the ground lay his gun.

"He slugged me," he muttered. "Made a getaway."

They rushed into the bath-room, and someone sighted a figure on the fire-escape. The detectives rushed up to the roof, and Bob Horton went with them.

Bob sighted his father lurking by a chimney stack. He fired his gun when the others weren't looking and shouted that he had seen a bearded man going down one of the fire-escapes. They fell for the trap, and left the roof clear for the killer to escape down one of the other fire-escapes.

Hendricks was seething in his remarks, and said that Bob wasn't capable of looking after a lot of school kids.

The Frame-up

THE next morning Chief Russell sent for Bob. He stated that he had had a report from Hendricks, and that it did not read too well regarding Bob's share in the affair.

"I can't imagine you letting this man get away!" the chief cried. "Nor can I understand you imagining you saw someone escaping from the roof."

"That wasn't imagination!" cried Bob. "I did see the killer!"

"Hendricks said that if that were so they would have seen the man when they made for the fire-escape."

"There were lots of rooms near the escape." Bob could not face his chief. "Probably he dived into one of them." He shuffled his feet. From his pocket he took his badge. "Guess, chief, I'd better turn this in. I resign."

Chief Russell was astounded. He read Bob a long lecture on not being able to stand a reprimand. Every good detective made a mistake or slip some time.

"Where did you get this coat?" snapped Horton.

"You've been overworking and need a break." The chief patted his shoulder. "Forget all about it, Bob. Now Marie expects you at her party to-night. You're going to come to that, and then I'm to insist that you take a vacation. Some place where you can forget all about crime and cops."

"But, chief, I got a reason for resigning!" cried Bob. "I didn't bring that man in because—"

"Not another word, or you'll be a mental case," firmly interrupted the chief. He looked at a watch. "I've got an appointment. See you at Marie's party to-night, and I'll talk to you then about your vacation."

"But, chief, I got to talk to you."

"Not now—some other time." The chief led him to the door. "Go and see Marie—take it easy."

Bob went to the party, but he was quite the most dismal person there. He could think of nothing but his father. Wondering what had happened to him and what he himself should do, Hendricks was at the party, and chuckled and hoped that Bob had quarrelled with Marie. Hendricks was enjoying this party, and once or twice he patted his pocket where a pocket-book rustled pleasantly. A little graft for doing a job that was a pleasure. Someone wanted Bob Horton "fixed," and it gave Hendricks keen joy to get paid for doing it.

Cheerful Charlie Brandon, a newcomer to the force and a great friend of Bob's, also noticed his friend's pre-occupation and was bold enough to draw Marie's attention to the fact.

"You don't think I haven't noticed, do you?" Marie said with heavy sarcasm. "I can't get a word out of him. Everyone thinks we've quarrelled and we haven't. I'm afraid some blonde must have taken him from me."

"Piffle!" exclaimed Charles. "That I don't believe for a second. Something's worrying Bob, and I do know one thing—the escape of D.A.'s assassin rattled him badly. Go and have a talk with him, Marie."

In the conservatory Marie had a surprise. Bob told her that he must break off their engagement.

"You love someone else?"

"There will never be anyone but you!" he cried fiercely. "But I—I—I cannot marry you."

"It's because you let this crook killer escape?" accused the girl. "Oh, Bob, as if I care."

Bob told her that he was thinking of leaving the force and going to South America on a ranch. He was no good as a policeman. Bob was busy telling a lot of untruths when a maid appeared and stated that Mr. Horton was wanted on the 'phone. With a curt apology to Marie he rushed away—he could not have kept the pretence up much longer.

A strange voice spoke to Bob and said that if he wished to help his father he should come at once to a certain address. Bob grabbed his hat and left the house.

Five minutes later Hendricks was called to the 'phone. The same voice spoke.

"I've just fixed young Horton. Hasten round to 715, Forty Street, and be on the watch."

Grimming unpleasantly Hendricks got his hat and went out of the house.

Bob found the place easily enough. A one-room basement in the worst part of the town. He rapped at a door, which opened after a face had peered through a grill. He entered to find himself face to face with a dark-skinned, evil-looking man, whom he knew to be Krane.

"You 'phoned me?" accused Bob.

"I did," Krane grinned unpleasantly. "You see, I've known for some time you were Jim Horton's son and had my mind to use you if such an occasion rose. I never thought one would, but now that you've blundered into your father and helped him to escape I think I can make use of you."

"You're wasting your breath, Krane."

"Oh, no, I'm not," jeered the crook. "I've got quite a lot on you. You assisted your father to escape, and I might talk. That would get you axed from the force, but it would also mean the chair for your old man. Do all that I ask you and I'll see your father makes his get-away."

"You wouldn't dare open your ugly mouth," retorted Bob. "If you told the cops that my father killed the D.A. it would be almost as good as a confession that you were behind the crime. But for you my father would have never got mixed up in this racket. Now, if you've finished with threats I'd like to see my father."

"He isn't here," Krane muttered surlily. "He left this message. There's an address inside." He swung open the door. "Go and read what the poor old fool has to say by a street lamp, not in my place. I don't want to see either you or your father again."

Bob's fists clenched. Fighting would do no good. He went out of the place and up to the street, and by a lamp opened the envelope. He drew out a large wad of notes.

A mocking, jeering laugh made him jerk round—Hendricks stood there, rocking with hoarse mirth.

"Taking a bribe—graft, eh?" jeered the detective. "Chief Russell will thank me that his daughter never married a double-crosser."

Father and Son Defy the Law

HENDRICKS did not waste time in reporting the matter to the chief, and Bob was not surprised to get a summons to report at his chief's house. Bob was glad in a way, because the events of last night had given him the answer to his problems. He was shown into the chief's library and study. He found his benefactor seated at his desk.

"Exactly what is the matter with you?" inquired the chief. "This tale of Hendricks that you were taking graft I can't imagine for one moment to be true, but you have been behaving in a manner that I can't understand. You let the bearded man slip through your hands, you saw him on the roof, you don't talk and look sullen, at my daughter's party you break off your engagement for no apparent reason and rush out of the house without even having the decency to say 'Good-night.' Then to cap everything I get this amazing story from Hendricks that he sees you coming away from Krane with a wad of notes. What is the explanation?"

"I was doing my best to tell you, chief, last time I was before you," Bob replied. "But before I explain why I wanted to resign I wish to say that last night was a frame-up. I have broken up several of Krane's dirty schemes and it was just a mean attempt to get one back. An effort to get me out of the force. Bad luck for me to be seen by Hendricks opening an envelope that contained nothing but money, especially as I had expected something entirely different."

"A letter from Krane?"

"No, sir, a letter from my father."

"Your father? What connection has Krane with your father?" The chief was amazed. "Besides, you know that your father was drowned when—"

"He made his escape by hiding in the marshes," Bob interrupted. "But if you want my explanation, chief, I'd like to tell it in my own way."

"Go ahead!"

"By means of a blood-stained coat I traced the killer of the District Attorney," Bob began. "It led me to a house owned by a Mrs. Gordon, and from her description of a lodger, whose name she knew as Wilson, I guessed it was the bearded man. I phoned my discovery and you instructed Hendricks to take two car loads of police to this lodging-house at once. I told you over the wire that I would get this lodger. It was my intention to hold him prisoner till the police showed up. I found his room, and hearing the sound of running water decided he was in the bath-room. The door was not locked. I entered the room, and found that my surmise was correct; I tiptoed across the room and was able to look into the bath-room." He hesitated.

"Go on—go on!" impatiently cried the chief.

"I could not see much of his face as his head was bent, but I could see what he was doing—he had almost finished shaving off a black beard." Bob squared his shoulders for the part that was most difficult. "In the mirror he caught sight of me, and as he turned my gun was ready. I found myself face to face with my own father."

"Your own father!" gasped Chief Russell. "But, Bob, that's impossible—"

"I told you, chief, that he hid in the marshes." Bob turned away in shame and anguish. "All these years I've thought he was drowned and then suddenly to come face to face when I'm searching for a bearded man!"

"The wrong bearded man, of course?" Russell questioned sharply.

Slowly Bob shook his head.

"No, chief, the right bearded man. He admitted having killed the District Attorney in order to free himself from the clutches of Krane. My father made no attempt to escape, but I couldn't arrest him. It was impossible for me to jeopardise my father's life, so I fixed it so that he was able to escape. I couldn't take him in to certain death."

Russell's face had hardened,
May 30th, 1936.

"Duty must always come first, and you have betrayed the oath you took when you joined the force."

"Chief, I don't care what I swore, but duty to a father has to come first with me," cried Bob in ringing tones. "Now you know why I wanted to resign."

"You have disobeyed the rules and regulations and covenants." Chief Russell stood up and his voice was stern. "You have broken your oath. Do you imagine that I would have allowed anything to make me break my solemn word—"

"It wasn't your father, chief."

"That'll be enough from you!" the chief shouted. "You know the penalty for aiding and abetting a dangerous criminal to escape. I place you under arrest and you will be brought up before the Court in the morning. It distresses me to have to arrest and charge someone whom I regarded almost as a son, but you have betrayed the confidence I placed in you. I have my duty to perform even if you don't seem to realise yours."

In the tenseness of such a situation it is not surprising that neither the chief nor Bob had heard the door open slowly, nor had they observed a broad-shouldered man slip quietly into the room.

With blazing eyes Jim Horton heard Chief Russell condemning his own son for his dastardly conduct in letting a murderer escape. He would be arrested and charged with complicity in the crime.

But as Chief Russell turned to his desk to summon detectives to take Bob away to the detention cells he heard a harsh laugh, and looking up found himself covered by a gun.

"One move to that 'phone or to summon assistance and you're a dead man," cried Jim Horton. "Keep your hands about your waist."

Bob was so astounded to see his father in the chief's house that for a moment he could not find his voice.

"Father, why are you here?" he demanded at last.

"I came here to give myself up," grimly answered Jim Horton. "I may have been a poor specimen of a father, but I haven't sunk so low that I'm going to stand by and see my son gaoled because he had the guts to chuck up everything to stand by a wrong 'un. To stand by a father, who had done him nothing but evil, and because of that to sacrifice his own career, his happiness—everything. And you dare to sneer at him, Russell, for putting his father before your cursed Law. You would even have him arrested and flung into a prison like a common criminal. Well, you're doing no such thing."

"You're only making matters worse for yourself, Horton," cried the chief. "Your son has broken his oath and—"

"Shut up!" rapped out the elder man. "I don't want to hear a lot of talk that don't mean a thing to me. Your snivelling, sanctimonious mind would drive my son into being branded by prison bars, but whilst I live you're not getting the chance. I'm getting out of here and Bob's coming with me, and if you make an effort to stop us I'll drill you without the least hesitation or compunction."

Bob Horton stared from one to the other in uncertainty. He felt it was the turning point in his life. Chief Russell represented the powers of good, whilst in his father were the powers of evil, and yet that reasoning seemed to be wrong. His father had been willing to give up his liberty for the sake of his son. That was a deed that required nerve and sacrifice. He, himself, had made a clean breast of everything to Chief Russell. His eyes narrowed. Chief Russell had been too harsh in blaming him for letting the killer of the D.A. escape. He stepped closer to his father's side.

Anxious to speak to her father about Bob's strange conduct of the previous evening Marie hastened downstairs to speak to him before he set out for headquarters. A strange sight met her eyes. A man was holding up her father, and behind the stranger stood Bob.

"You're Marie Russell, aren't you?" snapped out Jim Horton.

"Who are you?" Then her hand went to her lips as she saw the resemblance.

"He's my father, Marie," spoke Bob.

"It'll mean a long sentence for you, Bob Horton," the chief cried. "You know what it'll mean for aiding and abetting a criminal."

"You were arresting me for that very crime in any case," Bob spoke bitterly. "Nothing you can say will change me from the determination to stand by my father."

Jim Horton smiled proudly at his son and gave a significant gesture. Father and son backed to the door.

"If you raise the alarm before we're out of this house you know what I'll do," the old man threatened. "The same fate will be yours as came to that worthless skunk of a D.A."

Bob Horton opened a door and peered round it.

"Okay, dad," he whispered, and before the door closed behind him his eyes gazed beseechingly at Marie as if craving forgiveness.

In Krane's Power

FATHER and son succeeded in making good their escape, but they knew that in a very short while the entire police force would be searching for them. Jim Horton had decided that their only chance was to make for Krane's hide-out. When the hue and cry had eased up then Krane would help them get out of town. Knowing the treacherous nature of this murderous crook, Bob was not so optimistic. Still, he followed his father's directions, and about half a mile from the hide-out they abandoned their car to take one parked from the next street. In time they reached some tan yards and factory buildings. Jim whispered that Krane had his hide-out in some old offices.

They walked past a number of sheds and every moment Bob expected to hear the dread sound of a police siren. They came to a door and the elder man rapped four times. A shutter flew back.

The door opened and Jim Horton beckoned his son to follow. The ex-detective found himself in a bare room. There were a table and a number of old chairs.

"What's the idea coming here?"

Bob peered at the big, heavy-jowled man and recognised him as Baker, whom the police wanted for several hold-ups. He watched the crook's face as his father explained all that had happened and how he hoped that Krane would help them to make a get-away when the hue and cry had abated.

Baker whipped out a gun.

"Stick 'em up—both of you!" he snarled.

"But—" began Jim Horton.

"If you and your precious son want to live another second stick up your hands!" They had no option but to obey. He frisked them for guns and then stood back. "Krane will be here soon, and he can decide what's best to be done with you two mugs. If you think you're going to get a welcome then it's a shock that's coming to you. We've got enough trouble with the cops without you two causing us a lot more. Line up against the wall, and if you flicker an eyelash I'll start shooting. Help you to make a get-away—what a hope you've got!"

"You dare talk to me this way after all I've done for you two skunks," yelled the older man. "You treacherous—"

"Don't waste time arguing with him," cautioned Bob. "Take it easy till Krane shows up."

Directly the two Hortons had gone, the chief got busy and within five minutes every police car in the city knew by radio the news of the escape. The chief got out his car in order to assist in the search, and as he was about to drive away Marie jumped into the spare seat.

"I'm coming with you," Marie cried. She had much of her father's stubbornness in her nature. "I am determined to go with you, so it is useless, father, to argue. Besides, I want to know what all this means."

"Bob is a scoundrel," raved the chief. "He is helping a murderer to escape justice."

"Supposing I had killed someone, what would you do about me?" questioned the girl.

"That would be ridiculous!" answered the chief, and relaxed into silence.

The chief was thinking of the extraordinary situation that had arisen, and wondering whether he had been over-harsh with Bob when suddenly he observed the driver of an open car.

"That's Krane," he exclaimed. "Now that the case against him has practically fallen through he thinks he can go about openly." He turned to his daughter. "I'm going to trail him just on the slim chance it might lead to something. You'd better get out, and get a car home."

"I'm coming with you," Marie stuck out her determined little chin. "Better get going or you'll miss him."

The trail led them to the tar yards. Krane parked his car against the kerb, got out, looked all round to see if anyone were watching him, and disappeared down a narrow lane. He never saw the chief. The latter gave orders for Marie to remain in the car whilst he went to investigate.

Krane came to the hide-out, which he also used as a counterfeit den, and, knocking four times, the door was opened. The chief saw those four raps and decided to wait for a few minutes to see if the crook would reappear.

When Krane saw the two men that Baker was keeping covered with a gun, he whistled softly, and his evil face hardened to a cruel leer.

"We got the news with our radio," Krane said slowly. "We pick up all police calls, and know all that's afoot, but when we heard you two had held up the chief we didn't think you'd have the nerve to come here."

"Nerve!" exploded old Horton. "Where else should we come? Aren't we all in this together?"

"You may be, but we ain't!" sneered Krane. "We don't know a thing about the D.A. or why you shot him. Now you're here we'll have to entertain you. Kinda glad you two called because it saves us having to go after you."

"What do you mean by that?" asked Bob.

Krane frowned, then smiled.

"Well, the cops are gonna find you two in some alleyway, and they'll be mighty mystified how you got there, but you won't be able to tell 'em. I give you one guess why you won't be able to talk."

"You callous coyote!" shouted the elder Horton. "So this is how you keep a promise!"

Krane drew out his gun and his expression was murderous. Bob jumped in front of his father, and faced the gangster fearlessly.

"You've got enough against you as it is, Krane, without any more of your foul work. Killing us isn't going to help you—it'll only send you all the quicker to the chair."

"I'll take 'em for a ride, boss," cried

Baker. "They've got too much on us."

"They can wait," Krane fingered his bristly chin. "I ain't figured out yet whether Bob Horton mightn't be useful as a hostage. They might be more useful alive, and—"

Four raps at the door startled them. "Open up, Krane!" It was the voice of the chief. "I want a talk with you."

"Baker take 'em into the next room," hissed Krane. "One sound from either of you two mugs and Baker gives you the works."

When Russell stalked in there was nobody there except the smirking Krane. "Kinda nice of you to drop in," he drawled.

"Won't be so nice when I'm through," the chief retorted in his fearless manner. "Jim Horton's confessed to the shooting of the D.A., and we know who was behind Horton."

"Looks to me as if town's getting a bit hot for me, chief," mocked the counterfeiter. "Ain't you kinda indiscreet to come here without any of the body-guard?"

"I'm not scared of any of you rats!"

A girl's cry and the sound of scuffling made Krane whip round, then came four raps. Krane pulled back the grill, then swung open the door. It was Marie that was dragged into the room by a burly ruffian.

"Found her nosing round this joint," said the man.

"Your daughter, chief," Krane looked at the now perturbed officer in speculative manner. "Say, this is real kind. I had a hunch I could use you to get out of this burg, now I'm sure of it. You're the kind of old fool that would rather be shot than help a guy, but you would help if your daughter's life were in danger. If you want her to see the day through you'll escort us out of town, chief. Refuse and it'll be just too bad."

Every word of this conversation had carried to the Hortons. Baker, unable to conceal his curiosity, had an car

"If you raise the alarm before we're out of this house, you know what I'll do!" Jim Horton threatened.

against the door, as if he did not want to miss a single word. He did not see Bob Horton edge towards him until a fist caught him below the belt with sickening force. He doubled up with a groan and his gun dropped from his hands.

As Bob tried to wrench open the door Baker gripped him round the legs and brought him down.

The scuffle was heard in the next room, and for a moment Krane's vigilance relaxed and he swung round uncertain what to do. The other crook swung open the door and was at once seized by Jim Horton. The crook struggled to turn his gun on the older man, but it was twisted from his hands.

Krane leapt forward to get at the Hortons, and Marie saw her chance. She darted to the door and swung it open. Krane turned too late, and with a curse brought up his gun. The door slammed. The girl was at the end of the alley by the time he got it open. He started out in pursuit, and then realised the folly of such an attempt.

From the first telephone booth Marie got through to police headquarters and screamed for help. But in spite of her fears she was able to tell the police where Krane had his hide-out.

A Fight to a Finish

KRANE dashed back into his den, and his face was contorted with rage.

Chief Russell had been uncertain how to act. The instinct to protect his daughter urged him to chase out after her and Krane, but his conscience told him that he should take a part in the struggle ensuing in the next room. He was still undecided when Krane reappeared, and the chief whipped up a chair in self-defence. Crash! Krane had fired, and with a smothered cry the chair crashed to the floor—the bullet had smashed the chief's right wrist.

Jim Horton had succeeded in getting a stranglehold on his man and throttling him into oblivion. The sound of the shot drew him to the open door. He saw the murderous gleam in Krane's eyes.

"When the cops get here," snarled the crook, "all they'll find will be the bodies of you and the Hortons. Fools that try and thwart me always get what they deserve. Your daughter has signed your death warrant, Russell!"

Horton turned his head. His son and Baker were evenly matched, and their struggle could wait for a minute while Jim Horton thought how to save the chief from this murderer's hands. There seemed only one way, and he charged straight at Krane.

Whether Krane had intended to kill the chief in cold blood or was just trying a bluff no one will ever know, but he was quick enough to the trigger when Horton senior attacked him.

Chief Russell saw Horton sway, clutch at his left side and drop in a heap.

The shot must have given Baker an extra lease of strength, for he managed to break free from Bob's grip and land a punch that winded the younger man. He staggered into the next room.

"We gotta get away from here!" Krane shouted. "Before those cursed—" He broke off as there came to their ears the distant sound of a police siren. "Come on!"

Keeping the chief covered, the two crooks opened the door and were gone. They did not worry themselves over the fate of their companion.

Bob Horton, still dizzy from the blow, appeared from the other room, and the first thing he saw was the prone figure of his father.

"Dad!" he cried in fear. He knelt by the still figure and lifted the body to a sitting position.

May 30th, 1936.

Jim Horton's eyes opened, and he smiled to see his son. "Better this way, Bob."

Chief Russell, holding his bleeding wrist, looked down at the man he wanted for murder.

"He saved my life." He spoke as if he could not comprehend this fact.

Jim Horton smiled again.

"A worthless life, chief, is best at its end. If you think you owe me anything, keep my son the right side of the street."

Bob knew that his father's wound was going to prove fatal, and he was stirred by a desire for vengeance. The murderer of his father should not escape. Feebly his father's hand gripped his, and then a spasm of pain wiped away the smile. Jim Horton stiffened in his son's arms.

"Chief"—Bob Horton gently let his father's body sink to the floor—"I'm going after that skunk Krane, and I'll get him if I go to the end of the earth."

Bob Horton dashed out of the place and made for the car. Baker saw him, and whipped out a gun before Krane could stop him. The bullet caught the ex-detective in the shoulder, but that did not stop him. Somehow he managed to get into the car and start it up. Krane's car flashed away, and after him went Bob Horton.

Back in the Force

GINGERLY Bob felt his shoulder, and winced as he touched the wound. The bullet was pretty deep, but there did not seem a great deal of bleeding, and he had to keep that going till he had overtaken Krane. Quite what he planned to do when he got close enough was a problem, because Bob was unarmed.

Bob kept his quarry in sight, and then realised that by choosing side streets the crooks were getting to the outskirts of the city, and that he was growing weaker and weaker with every mile. He remembered then the siren on his car. His father was dead, and nothing seemed to matter to Bob save that these two fiends must be brought to justice. What did it matter if he himself were put into prison if his father's death were avenged?

Krane and Baker got a shock when the siren sounded some hundred yards behind them. They gave a startled look back. It was clear to these men that Bob was out to get them or have them caught.

Baker took out his gun and nudged Krane, who nodded. The gun spat out its leaden missiles, but Horton was almost out of range.

All the while the cursed siren screamed its message. A patrol saw the two speeding cars flash past, and recognised both crooks and Bob Horton. He got in touch with headquarters, and at once every car in the city was given the direction taken by the participants in this grim road chase.

Krane and Baker heard a new note to the siren, and saw behind Horton another speeding police car. A moment later the volume increased, and they guessed others had joined in the chase. Krane became desperate, and began to take chances at cross-roads.

The speedometer needle went from sixty to seventy, and the car approached a cross-road at close on eighty when a big lorry came right across their track. Krane tried to swerve inside, and the tyres burst as they touched the kerb. The car skidded, twisted round, caught the back of the lorry, and then smashed straight into a brick wall.

Bob Horton brought his car to a stop and clambered with difficulty out of it.

The two men with the lorry were crawling out of their overturned vehicle, and, except for a bad shaking, seemed none the worse; but Krane and Baker had not been so fortunate. Their car was a jumbled mass of scrap iron, partly buried in a brick wall and on its side.

Police cars arrived on the scene and got busy on the wreckage, and it was some while before they got the two crooks from beneath the wreckage. They had paid the price.

Hendricks came across to where Bob Horton stood.

"The chief wants a word with you, Horton."

"If you're thinking of using handcuffs use my right wrist," answered Bob. "I guess my left arm isn't so good."

"I'll drive you back in your car," Hendricks answered. "I guess I owe you an apology, Horton. I had a hunch you'd let your man escape and that you pulled a bluff on that roof, but I guess I'd have done just the same if it had been my father."

A week later Bob Horton was allowed out of the hospital, and, much bandaged, had another interview with his chief.

"I'm not the sort of person that admits to making a mistake," announced Chief Russell. "But when Krane threatened my daughter's life in order to get a free pass out of town, it opened my eyes to the fact that a man can be driven against his will. I know then that I had not realised the terrible predicament with which you were faced. But when Krane threatened my girl, and I had to decide whether I must act up to the law or help these murderers to escape justice in order that my daughter should live, I knew that I would make any sacrifice, break any vow, to help her." He gave Horton a quizzical glance. "Natural, Bob, that is in confidence. When you came to see me after the smash I told you that everything would be all right, and sent you off to hospital."

"How can you make everything all right, chief?"

"One can pull strings," Russell smiled. "With the death of Krane and Baker that little gang is finished. We've got the brains, and that's all that matters. The death of the D.A. is not likely to cause a great deal of sorrow." He glanced at the young man. "I am afraid he was not very popular. Therefore the trial of someone who is now at rest will do no good. As far as the annals of this crime are concerned it is registered that the D.A. was shot when held up, and that he would not have been shot if he had not tried to wrest away the gun. The fact that your father saved my life enabled me to alter the charge sheets. And now, Bob, there is someone who is eager to see you and to give you something, which you will please me and all the department by accepting."

"Thank you, chief!" Bob's voice was hoarse. "I appreciate a lot what you've done for me."

The chief pressed a button, and it was Marie who answered the summons. She held out her arms to Bob, and with his one sound arm he drew her close.

"Make the presentation," prompted the chief.

Bob's eyes were misty as she held up his badge of office. She kissed him, and pushed the badge into his coat-pocket.

The chief stood up.

"I have some important business in the next office." He coughed. "I will leave you two to discuss your own affairs. I rather favour a midsummer wedding."

The chief was smiling as he quietly closed the door of his office.

From saddle to dress clothes—a punch-packed drama of the West, starring that ace of cowboys—Hoot Gibson

Father and Son

AT Kansas City Fair a rodeo was in full swing and old John Gibson was keenly watching the various performers in their antics on the backs—or rather on and off the backs—of their spirited mounts.

His weather-beaten old face was alive with pleasure when he noted one of the riders expertly holding on to his bucking bronc, despite every effort on the part of the horse to throw him. The animal tried every trick the equine mind could compass to unseat this stockily built young fellow who rode without spurs or saddle—only just a bare bridle and short reins and a pair of clever hands, strong legs, and a cool head.

"That's the winner of the prize saddle," said Gibson to those about him in the grand stand. "He's a rider—Number Forty-nine—what's his name?"

"Neil Craig," answered Septimus Smith—another of the judges, glancing towards old Gibson with a half smile.

"Never heard of him," came the snapped comment. "Don't you agree that he's easily the best?"

"Sure I do," said Smith. "And so does Davis, hey—Davis?"

"My vote goes for Craig," spoke the third judge briefly.

At the end of the show the prize-winners came along for old Gibson's handshake and their prizes. He had a good word for each and a smile—until Craig stepped up to claim the prize saddle for the best all-round display. Old Gibson glared under his bushy eyebrows when the young fellow stood before him on the platform in riding kit and brown shirt—with coiled rope and big hat in his left hand.

"Why, you—" Gibson checked himself with an effort. "So it's you, huh?"

"Yes, judge, I'm Neil Craig."

Number Forty-nine stood straight and square before them.

Gibson was speechless as he scanned the frank face and steady mouth and laughing eyes of Number Forty-nine.

"Aren't you going to give him the saddle?" prompted Davis.

"Hey? What? Oh, yes, of course." Gibson took the gaily decorated saddle from its place on the prize bench. "Here you are," he growled. "First prize." He thrust it towards Craig. "Take it—you've won it!"

"Thank you, judge—I'm obliged." Craig put the saddle under his free arm. "I'll be going. Thank you!"

Old Gibson shouted after him. "Report to me at my office, nine o'clock to-morrow!"

The two other judges exchanged glances. Davis winked solemnly at Smith—but their clean-shaven faces were masks when Gibson shot one of his stares at them.

"Neil Craig," he muttered furiously. "I'll Neil Craig him!"

"Serve him right if you were to cut him off with a shilling," spoke Davis without even the hint of a smile.

Old Gibson flamed up. "When I want your advice, Davis, what to do with my only son," he roared. "I'll ask for it!"

Number Forty-nine went along the rapidly thinning stand until he came to a couple waiting for him—a dark girl as like him as any sister can be like a brother—and a largish nosed young gentleman in a blue serge suit.

"Gee, Neil—you were great!" chortled the young gentleman. "Gwen and me nigh had fits when you rode that buck jumper! I guess we ought to celebrate." He pulled a flat bottle out of one of his side pockets.

"Put that away, Bert Randall," Gwen

Gibson said, much in her father's peremptory manner. "Or I don't ever speak to you again!"

"She's right, Bert," said Forty-nine.

"Well, well—well!" lamented Randall, putting back the flat bottle. "Aren't we all getting Sunday schoolish! Where's the funeral?"

"You'll be there right enough," grinned Forty-nine. "If you keep on parking hoodlum whisky!"

At the office of Gibson & Company, old Gibson was listening with impatience to his head clerk the next morning.

"Yes, yes—I know all about it!" he replied testily. "Ride's a horse like he was born to it. A great fellow at cow-punching—throws a rope like a Red Indian—got a left that would stop a steam engine! But what good's all that?"

"Maybe you speak too sharp to him, Mr. Gibson."

"Me? Why, I don't speak sharp to anybody!" cried old Gibson, thoroughly surprised. "I'm the easiest man to get on with anywhere in this city! What's the time?"

"Five minutes to nine, Mr. Gibson." "He'll be here directly. I'll be mild as milk—although I feel like kicking him in the pants!"

The office door opened to admit Gwen Gibson.

"Hallo, dad?" "Hallo—what d'you want?"

"I want you to go slow with Neil. Give him a chance. Hold your temper."

Old Gibson gazed at his daughter. "Why, Gwen—Harry here will tell you I'm so gentle that it seems always like spring when I'm around. Isn't it, Harry?"

"Sure!" agreed the head clerk. "Well, I'll be getting on with the day's work."

Left alone with her father, Gwen put an arm round his neck as he seated himself at his desk. "You and Neil are alike as two peas," she smiled. "All ready to pop at a second's notice. Now, listen—let him say his piece and—hold your temper."

"Got Randall outside?" grunted old Gibson.

"Yes. I did bring him along."

"Can you handle him the way you're trying to handle me?"

"I'm getting him down to one drink a day."

"I bet that's a long one," said her father. "Here's nine o'clock—hop off! I'll talk to Neil alone."

Gwen Gibson, shrugging pretty shoulders, went back to the corridor.

Number Forty-nine—otherwise Neil Craig, otherwise Neil Gibson—was chatting with Bert Randall.

"Now, Neil," said Gwen, "dad's all honey this morning—so mind you hold your temper."

"I never let go of it, Gwen," spoke Neil aggrievedly. "Folks say I'm just too easy-going. You and Bert wait for me—I want to take you down town."

He nodded to Randall, gave Gwen a brotherly pat on the shoulder—then strode into the office where his father met him with:

"Morning, Neil—what the blazes d'you mean calling yourself Craig? Isn't Gibson good enough for you?"

"I thought you mightn't like me figuring in the rodeo as old Gibson's son—"

"Old? Old? Now, listen to me! I'm young enough to give you a jolly good hiding yet, Neil Gibson! And I'll tell you something else—I won't have you loafing around cow-punching and horse lifting—"

"I never lifted a horse in my life!" roared Neil, banging his fist on the desk. "And if you weren't my father—"

"You're an absolute waster—that's what you are! You're work-shy—you're a born-tired! You and your precious buddy Randall are a couple of finger-posts showing the wrong way to everywhere! If you had a spark of sense in you—you'd do something!" Old Gibson was furious, his brow black as thunder. "Yes, sir—if you wanted to show me you've any sense, you'd go to my cattle ranch down West and do your cow-punching there. But not you—you prefer loafing round and putting my name in the mud—"

Neil Gibson banged the desk again, making the inkpot jump its contents all over the clean blotter.

"Stop right there! I won't be your son! I'll be Neil Craig for keeps! I won't take a penny piece from you! I'll—I'll—" He snapped his fingers loudly under his father's nose. "Good-bye—and I mean it!"

He pulled his hat down over his blazing eyes and turned about, thrusting open the office door with a blow of his fist. Gwen and her beau had gone below to the hall—Neil went clattering down the stone steps.

"Bye, Gwen! See you later, Bert!"

His sister called after him, but he didn't even hear.

"A waster, eh? Born-tired?" he muttered. "Gee, I'll show him! I'll show the world!"

"A Talking Sausage!"

THAT night, young Randall was having his daily "one" at his favourite café. Clad in evening dress and sitting at a small table with two boon companions, he had, speared on a fork, a small cold fried sausage.

"You're telling me," said Randall, addressing the sausage. "That you ain't a hot dog. Well, I know it. I know a lotter things about you. You ain't so young as you used to be—and everybody knows that, too." He turned to his two friends, one of whom had his head on the table while the other was leaning back in his chair gazing into vacancy. "You fellers hear what this hamberger's saying? No, you ain't able to listen. George!" he bellowed to the shirt-sleeved waiter. "Come right over here—someone wants to tell you something!"

George, big and burly, came to the table. The sleeping fellow at the table sat up, while the other man tried to look intelligent.

"George," said Randall, "look well upon this sausage." He held it out. "He's one of last week's also rans."

"Now, sir, please don't hinder me. This is my busy time," said George.

Neil Gibson came along from his seat. He was slightly flustered, but completely clear in his mind.

"George," he admonished, wagging a forefinger at the waiter. "This is serious. Bert wouldn't play a joke on you."

"He tried to trip me up just now," said George. "Put out his feet when I was hurrying with a tray of glasses."

"It was this hamberger who did it," stated Randall. "I saw him do it. Deliberate. He up and he put out his foot. He's a nasty piece of work. You oughter chain him up in the backyard. He's—he's dangerous!"

George shook off Neil's hand from his shoulder.

"Now, gentlemen, please! I got a lot of work to do."

"This hamberger's saying he don't like you, George." Bert fixed owlish eyes on the irate man. "He's saying you don't treat him right. He's telling me you want to start something. But he's going to start first—"

Bert snatched the sausage off the fork and flung it at George, who promptly ducked. The sausage went flying across the room over the bar-tender's white-capped head and landed amongst a row of bottles on a shelf. For a tense second the bottles swayed to and fro—then the whole shelf of them crashed down behind the bar-tender. Almost simultaneously George's hand flicked a resounding smack on Bert's face.

Neil jumped into the fight—so did the two gentlemen at the table. Other gentlemen, sitting around, also came into it—the pure love of the thing. Plates flew about, tables turned over, chairs were smashed shivering, bottles fell off shelves as flying plates caught them. A scrambling, kicking heap of gentlemen, young and old, presently littered the sawdusty floor.

George, battered and bruised, yelled for the manager. Bert, under the impression that he had got George, was struggling wildly in the arms of Neil. Broken tables and chairs lay about the room almost as picturesquely as the several more or less conscious young gentlemen.

"Shut it!" grunted Neil. "You fat-headed ass!"

"Lemme get at you," raved Bert, flinging up an arm. "Lemme hit you just once!"

The manager, with a rally of George and several attendants, charged out of a side room and fell upon Neil and Bert. Fists whirled again and the uproar recommenced. Five minutes of stiff battle followed, in which Neil and his friend Bert were overpowered and hammered practically senseless.

"Get 'em out of here quick!" ordered the manager. "We'll have the cops on us!"

George and three others hurried Neil and Bert out into the yard which backed on to the railway sidings. A freighter was just starting—Neil and Bert were shot into an empty oil tank and left to sleep it off. The gentlemen lying about on the floor of the café were hastily gathered up, dusted down, and put into unbroken chairs at righted tables. The wreckage was cleared—all was normal when, ten minutes later, a sergeant of police looked in.

"Thought I heard a bit of a rumpus going on?" he said inquiringly.

"All peaceful here, sergeant," answered George, concealing a black eye with his left hand. "Must have been them engines shunting trucks in the sidings."

Signed on at Ware's Ranch

BERT and Neil woke up next morning inside a stationary, very smelly, oil tank.

"Let's get out," said Neil. "I've an idea we aren't where we started from last night."

They climbed out of the tank. The freighter was just preparing to leave a countryside halt. The little station-shed was labelled "Marlowe"—which didn't convey anything to either of them—except that it wasn't Kansas City.

Their dress clothes were torn, dirty, and smeared with oil. Their faces were unwashed and their hair was on end. Their heads ached—and they hadn't any hats to protect them from the blazing sun.

A group of cowboys were gathered at the halt, lounging on the shady side of the shed. They gazed in sudden silence at the two scarecrows emerging from the oil tank.

A thin, hatchety-faced fellow in a once white sombrero put up a hand.

"Boys," he said in an awe-struck tone, "I'm seeing things. Get me ice water, quick!"

Neil had jumped down to the tracks. Bert followed in a kind of blind stumble just as the freighter, with a reverberating jerk, resumed its way. The two chums marched up to the staring cowboys.

"What's Marlowe?" Neil demanded of the hatchety-faced one. "And why?"

The hatchety-face relaxed slightly.

"Buddy," he answered, "it's a halt for Rainbow's End—a place where fellers ain't got time to answer fool questions."

"No?" questioned Neil, temper rising at once.

"No!" replied the other, spitting past his ear by a bare inch.

Neil fixed him with glassy eyes.

"Are you trying to start something?" he asked.

"Maybe," came the retort.

Neil's answer was a straight left to the man's chin. He went down like a clean-bowled ninepin. Next instant the little station was the scene of a cheerful free and easy fight in which Bert more than took his part. They were all in it; hitting and going down and springing up again; punching and dodging and thoroughly enjoying themselves when, above the din and commotion, a quick, high voice was heard calling:

"Stop at once—all of you!"

A tallish, fair-haired young woman was on the platform. Her dark eyes were stern.

"Get up, Butch!" she ordered. "And everybody keep quiet while Butch tells me the meaning of all this."

Hatchet-face saluted and stood to attention. The other boys drew back—Neil and Bert dusted themselves down.

"We was stretching out a hand of welcome to these two dudes," Butch stated. "Kinder friendly, Miss Ann."

"That's right," agreed Neil. "Sort of house-warming. We've just arrived." The girl drew nearer to him.

"And who are you?" she asked. "I'm Sir Walter Raleigh," Neil smiled, liking the haughty look in the girl's dark eyes. "And this is the Duke of Wellington."

Bert gave Miss Ann a large smile. "Present and correct," he told her. For a long moment the girl studied them, turn by turn.

"And what are you doing here?" "Looking for a job," said Neil. "What can you do?" she questioned.

"Most anything," Bert answered cheerfully. "I can ride a horse or rope a steer," Neil added.

A heavy-jowled man had lumbered up from the fields and stood behind the girl scowlingly.

"These loafers giving you any trouble, Miss Ware?" he inquired.

"They want work," she told him. "Maybo they'll be useful while we're branding the stock. Sign them on, Dorgan." She indicated Neil with a careless gesture. "This one's named Rowley—his friend is called Duke. Take them along to the cook-house and give them breakfast, a change of clothes—and a wash."

Dorgan eyed the chums sourly. "C'm on!" he rasped. "And you other fellers git busy—stead of lazing round here!"

Washing Dishes

A SWIM in the river which bordered the ranch made new men of Neil and Bert. They ate their breakfast with zest and managed to shake down very well with the other hands.

Butch, who had been so up and doing when they had arrived, was very friendly now.

All the boys seemed a good lot—except Dorgan, the foreman, a natural bully and boaster.

Butch told Neil that the girl was running the ranch; her father, old Adam Ware, having to lay up with a bad patch of gout.

"And that ain't the only trouble," confided Butch. "Place is mortgaged pretty heavy—and Adam is asking the bank for five hundred to carry on till we sell stock. But the bank won't give him another bean."

"Why not?" Neil asked. "If there's plenty of security—as there seems to be—what's the matter with the bank?"

Butch winked an eye towards Dorgan, sitting alone in the cookhouse at the far end. "He knows what's the matter. It's that feller Stark who's got the ranch south-west of this one."

"Stark?" Neil fancied he had heard the name. He was trying to remember when Butch's next words made it all clear.

"Gibson and Stark," said Butch grumpily. "Gibson's the sleeping partner in Kansas City. Don't ever come near the place—leaves it all to Stark, who's just a dirty dog!"

He spat in contempt. Neil watched a chance to tell Bert the interesting news.

"Next door here is our property—Gibson and Stark's ranch. One of the places dad always wanted me to visit. And Gibson and Stark are trying to crowd out this place and double their holding."

"Well, why shouldn't they?" Bert demanded.

"I'm surprised at you, Bert Randall," Neil answered. "Thinking such a fool thing when that girl saved your life only this morning."

"If you helped your dad to get this farm on the cheap—wouldn't he be pleased?" Bert wanted to know.

"He would not," said Neil. "Dad's got a whole heap of faults—but he's straight as a die. I'm going to stay here and help old man Ware. And so are you."

"It's the girl you're going to help," said Bert.

"You trying to start something?" asked Neil aggressively. "Why, I didn't hardly look at her!"

Dorgan came lurching along the cook-house.

"Quit talking, you two! We start down at the corral in half an hour." He eyed Bert. "You're to go to the sink and wash dishes."

"Me wash dishes?" gasped Bert.

"And wait at table," said Dorgan. "Anything you drop—you'll pay for."

The morning passed off very well for Neil. His skill with the horses and the steers soon made him popular with the boys. But Bert fell foul of the Italian cook just about dinner-time.

"What for you playa with dem dishes?" Toni demanded, when Bert started spinning three soap plates in the air and deftly catching them.

"Drying 'em," said Bert, adding a fourth to the trio.

"You putta dem down!" cried Toni.

"Not so good that way of drying tings!"

"Watch me!" said Bert, adding a fifth soap plate to the crockery he was juggling with. Toni made a flick at him with his dish cloth and the spin came to a disastrous end.

Bert surveyed the breakage, then picked up the china tureen. He sent it in a kind of boomerang whirl at Toni, who promptly ducked. The large basin cracked against the kitchen window, smashed a way through, and went whizzing outward just as Dorgan was coming along.

Dorgan was bullying one of the men and didn't have time to duck. The tureen crashed on the side of his bullet head.

Dorgan made a sudden dash for cover. Toni had responded with a plate which very neatly followed the soup basin. Next instant a battle royal was raging in the kitchen, in which Bert's voice,

Bert was struggling wildly in the arms of Neil. . . .

could be heard inquiringly, above the snashes and crashes of breaking china:

"Starting something, eh?"

The boys, headed by Neil, made a charge through the hut into the kitchen. Neil flung himself between Toni and Bert, who both had missiles poised for a "kill."

"Hey, wait a minute!" roared Neil. "What's this—a mad-batter's tea-party?"

Dorgan, at the back of the crowd, said nastily:

"I'll settle with these fellers, Rowley. You stand aside!"

Bert immediately put down the dish with which he had been intending to finish off the little Italian. A sweet smile wreathed itself under his large nose.

"Suits me!"

"We'll have dinner first," growled Dorgan. "Then I'll wallop the two of you together. Get going!"

Neil winked at Bert.

"Clear up this mess, Duke," he counselled. "This wasn't the way you won Waterloo! Feed the troops—that's the motto."

"He tried to killa me!" wept Toni.

After a quick meal the boys went out to see the promised fight. But Toni wasn't at all eager.

"I cooka da supper," he argued.

Dorgan gave him a clout that sent the little man flying across the room.

"I'll take his place," Neil offered.

Dorgan glared at him under heavy brows.

"Come on!"

They went out into the yard. Dorgan wanted to lay into Bert first, but Neil smilingly checked him.

"We haven't got time," he stated. "Too much to do."

"Stand out of my way!" roared Dorgan, infuriated by Bert's grin.

He made to fling Neil aside, but Neil was waiting for him. He caught the bully's wrist and, with a ju-jitsu trick, doubled up Dorgan's arm behind his back. The fellow gave a yelp of pain as he vainly struggled to free himself.

Neil held the big arm in position.

"Say you're a naughty boy!" he ordered. "And then we'll forget all about it!"

The men stood around astonished. They had expected Dorgan to half-kill these two dudes. But Rowley, as they called him, cool and smiling, was holding their foreman, bent double, as easily as one could hold a little child!

"Say you're a naughty boy?" Neil repeated.

"Lemme—lemme go!"

"Naughty boy!"

"Oh, yes!" The pain of his doubled-up arm was acute.

Neil let go. Dorgan drew in a deep breath of rage and hate.

"I'm quitting!" he spat out. "You men best foller me over to Stark's. There isn't a week's wages here."

He strode out of the yard amid the silence of the boys.

Refusal

IN the parlour of the Ware ranch, old Adam was lying on a sofa, right leg bandaged up. His daughter was standing behind the couch. Her father was trying to hide a letter from her.

"Tell me what they say," Ann requested.

"Why, Ann, it's nothing to worry about," her father tried to soothe her. "Seems the bank is a bit pressed for money and can't give us another cent just now. But in the fall—"

"In the fall's too late," she answered. "And the bank pressed for money?"

Her voice had scorn in it. "Stark is

May 30th, 1936.

behind this—he wants to buy us out, and he has told the bank what to do."

"If this foot of mine weren't so bad," grunted old Adam, "I'd be stumping off to Kansas City and tell Gibson what's going on." He turned his head towards the girl. "What's all this about Dorgan?"

"He's gone over to the enemy," came her answer. "To Gibson and Stark's ranch. The boys were going to walk out with him, but Rowley—the new hand—stopped them, I've asked Rowley to be foreman in Dorgan's place."

Old Adam noted the change in her tone.

"You falling for this Rowley? What's he like? Who is he? Quick work, Ann!"

"Don't be so foolish, dad." But Ann couldn't quite stop her colour rising. "Why, I don't even know him."

She went to the parlour door to call sharply:

"Rowley—my father wants a word with you!"

Neil came into the room.

"Howdy, Mr. Ware? I'm your new foreman."

Old Ware sat up as straight as he could. His eyes focused on Neil. "I didn't appoint you, Rowley."

"Miss Ann fixed all that," Neil announced. "So we'll pass along to other matters. My friend Duke wants to invest some money in a good concern. Rainbow's End has taken his fancy—he hasn't a lot of dough, but he has enough put by to keep things busy till the stock is sold."

"It sounds too good to be true," grunted old Adam. But Neil's smile was so infectious that he couldn't keep a stiff lip. "All right, Rowley—it's not for me to refuse help when help is needed. You're appointed. Show him what to do, Ann."

Neil just glanced at her.

"I know what to do all right! First thing is to get back to the corral while Duke gets a telegram through from Marlowe Halt to his folk."

He strode out of the parlour.

"Bit masterful?" old Adam queried. Ann nodded.

"I'll keep him in order."

The door opened to admit a sleek-looking man, cleanly shaved and fiftyish. He spoke in a hearty voice.

"Why, Ware—I'm sorry to see you laid by like this," he said. "My secretary, Williams, was telling me the bad news only this morning."

"You came to see if it was true?" Ann questioned.

"Hoping it wasn't," he corrected her. "My secretary is one of those college fellows—too clever by half." He stood by old Ware, looking down on him. "Not worried about anything, Adam?"

"Only my foot, Stark. Sit down and tell us your real business."

Stark shook his iron-grey head as he took off his slouch hat.

"You're right in a way—it wasn't merely to ask about your gout that brought me along. Dorgan has quit Rainbow's End and wants me to give him a job. I don't like doing things underhand, Adam."

"We don't mind," Ann put in. "We've got a new man already."

"I met him in the yard," said Stark. "Seems okay at first glance. Any references?"

"The best kind," said Ann. "Excuse me, please—I must attend to the house."

When she had gone, Stark addressed old Ware in the pleasantest manner:

"I was wondering whether you'd care to sell the ranch? Seeing the way things are—you being laid by and Dorgan leaving you all at a moment's notice."

Ware raised quiet eyes to those of his visitor.

"Did you stop my request to the bank?"

Stark was all puzzlement.

"You don't mean the bank won't give you help? It's just too bad! But this being so—hadn't you best take our offer of five thousand dollars?"

"I'm not selling," said Ware. "Bye—shut the door after you!"

Stark gave him an ugly look.

"You'll be sorry, Adam!"

He strode out of the house, leaving the door wide. Crossing the yard to his buggy he encountered Neil.

"You're the new foreman, I hear. I'm Stark."

Neil nodded.

"I guessed so."

Stark studied him closely.

"Seems to me I've seen you somewhere?"

"I think not."

"Someone like you?"

"No."

Stark's smile faded.

"Okay!" He climbed into his seat.

He drove away without another word. When he reached the Gibson-Stark ranch he jumped down from the buggy, calling sharply:

"Dorgan—where are you?"

Beetle-browed Dorgan was in the hall. He came to the door to let Stark in. The two eyed each other.

"He won't sell," Stark announced, adding fiercely: "But I'll make him!"

"I'll tell you why," Dorgan muttered with a glance round. "Come inside."

When they were in Stark's little office, Dorgan closed the door. "Ware's got help from one of those dudes. Fellow they call Duke. He's getting a wad of notes for Ware. He's going up to Marlowe Town bank to fetch 'em."

Stark waited, smiling thinly.

"I guess I'll bring him here first," Dorgan went on. "That is, if you'll come with me?"

"Sure I'll come with you."

Dorgan didn't smile.

"Let's go."

"If you're selling me another pup, Dorgan—ground out Stark."

"Didn't I keep you posted about Rainbow's End all the while I was there?"

"Maybe you told me a lot of lies," Stark retorted.

Dorgan shrugged heavy shoulders.

"Shall I go back and tell 'em you're rounding up their cattle and getting 'em branded G and S?"

The two conspirators faced each other, both ugly enough now. But Stark's lips creased into his oily smile.

"Aw, Dorgan—don't mind me!" he said quietly. "I got a bit riled with Adam just now and I haven't worked it off!"

Stark Gets Busy

BERT found the old ranch car stuck fast when he came out of the Marlowe bank with his savings.

A very pleasant gentleman, who was passing by, pulled up his runabout.

"Anything wrong?" he inquired.

"Looks like someone's been monkeying with her," said Bert, fiddling at the gears. "She won't go."

The pleasant gentleman got out of his car and helped Bert awhile. But there wasn't even the hint of a kick in the old bus.

"Tell the garage man down the road to send up for her," advised the stranger. "Where do you want to go?"

"Rainbow's End."

"I'll run you there. I'm going to Gibson and Stark's ranch next to it. Jump in."

Bert seated himself beside this friend in need. They called at the garage lower down Marlowe Main Street, then tooted along the road and out into the country. A man hailed them from the roadside presently, asking for a lift.

It was Dorgan. Bert didn't like the look of things, but fear never entered his heart. He had sublime confidence in himself. Dorgan was allowed to climb into the dickey seat. The pleasant stranger didn't seem to know Dorgan at all. He went on chatting to Bert about President Roosevelt's New Deal and how it was working—proving himself a most interesting companion until they came to a side turning.

"A short cut," said the stranger, accelerating the runabout.

It was a very winding short cut, and it brought them to a farmhouse set near the road.

"Come on in," invited the stranger. "I live here."

"Are you Stark?" Bert asked.

"Sure, I'm Stark. Come in."

Dorgan had got out of the dickey. He stood lowering at Bert, who was thinking rapidly. He decided to get out—Stark was an oldish man, and Bert felt equal to the pair of them.

But he wasn't equal to Stark—who suddenly started up the little car and swung it round so sharply that Bert took a broadside smack from it. Dorgan pounced on him as he stumbled—and his gorilla arms went about him. Stark bounced out of the car and hit Bert a swipe on the back of the neck with the butt of a six-gun that temporarily put him to sleep.

They carried him bodily into the house and dumped him into a chair in a little side room.

"I'll trouble you for those dollar bills, Mister Duke," said Stark when Bert opened his eyes.

Dorgan a d d e d raspingly:

"And don't keep us waiting!"

Bert's dizziness was passing, but he guessed he had better play for time. There might be others in the house. He went all limp and wet.

"O k a y," he mumbled. "I don't know what you're up to—but I reckon it's something dirty."

Stark merely smiled as he reached out a hand for the wad of notes which Bert had lugged out of his breast-pocket.

"Ware owes me money and won't pay," Stark stated in even tones. "So I'm helping myself. You'll find he won't argue when you get back to Rainbow's End."

Dorgan added: "When he gets back!"

"Mister Duke will prefer to stay as my visitor," Stark decided. "I'll lock the door—to keep out anybody who might want to hurt him."

The notes duly locked away in Stark's safe in the wall, they went out together, leaving Bert with closed eyes and breathing through his large nose as if about to do a fade out. But soon after he heard the key grate in the lock; he got up and crept to the little barred window. Stark and Dorgan were getting back into the car. It went chugging away down the road.

Bert was considering his next step when he saw a pale, thin, young man step furtively out of the hall into the garden. He came sidling along to the window as Bert drew back.

"They've gone to the corral," whispered the young man.

Bert opened the small lattice-pane in the iron-framed window.

"Lemme out!" he demanded.

"I can't. Stark's got the key and they'll be back before we can do anything. I'm Williams—they've gone to the corral to brand the cattle they've stolen from Rainbow's End."

Bert nodded.

"How d'you stand in the deal, Williams?"

"Nowhere. I'm quitting here. If I can't work square—I don't work at all. I've wired Gibson to come over."

"You don't have to wire him. He's over at Rainbow's End right now."

The pale, thin youth stared in at Bert's face, dimly seen through the small window.

"You're crazy—Mr. Gibson hasn't been here in years!"

"You telling me?" cried Bert, ready to jump through the brick wall at him. "Neil and me came along together."

Williams opened his mouth in a gasp of understanding.

"I get you! Rowley is old Gibson's son!"

Bert flapped a hand at him.

"Forget it! I oughtn't to have told anybody."

Williams glanced fearfully around.

"They'll be back in a few moments."

I'll go across to Adam Ware's ranch and get Rowley."

Bert thought hard.

"Wait a minute! You know the safe combination?"

"Yes. Two-three-seven-one-five."

Bert was already at the wall safe. He twiddled the knob and got the door open. Next instant the wad of notes was being passed out of the window to Williams.

"Take those to Neil—Rowley, I mean—and tell him Duke's here, waiting to start something with Dorgan. If you want to be in at the finish, you'd best hurry!"

Starting Something

NEIL was doctoring Ann's little terrier dog. He had got hurt while Butch & Co. were rounding up the cattle. Ann was very concerned for her pet, and was at the shed door watching Neil's dexterous fingers as he felt around the broken foreleg.

Barker—as they called him—let out a yelp.

"You're hurting him!" cried Ann.

"Don't stand there doing nothing!" Neil snapped at her. "Get me a basin of cold water."

She glared at him, then decided to obey.

As soon as he had begun to bathe the injured paw, Neil called:

"Hop about! Get me a bandage and a stick for a splint."

"All right—all right!" Ann busied herself once more. Neil bound up the leg carefully.

"Now put him in his basket in the kitchen," Neil ordered. "And stay by to see he don't get out. Okay, Barker, old man—uncle's your doctor!"

Ann took the little dog in her arms.

"Am I allowed to give him his dinner?" she asked sarcastically.

"Sure you are. That's what girls are for—to give folk dinners."

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

The entire world is in a state of terror. The Earth is threatened with total destruction by the planet Mongo, which, rushing through the void, is controlled by the Emperor Ming, ruler of a strange race of people living on that unknown planet, and a man who has probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

In America, a scientist known as Dr. Zarkov maintains that he can save the Earth from disaster, and by means of a rocket ship which he has invented he attempts to blaze a trail through the stratosphere.

He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart.

The attempt is successful. Travelling through millions of miles of space, the rocket ship sets down the adventurers on the forbidding planet of Mongo, where they are taken prisoners by some of Ming's guards, and conveyed to the emperor's palace.

Ming spares Zarkov and Dale, but Flash is condemned to death, and is only saved by the intervention of Aura, the emperor's daughter, who helps him to escape.

Later, Flash meets with Thun, prince of a nation at war with Ming. Accompanied by Thun, he returns secretly to Ming's palace, and learns that the movement of the planet Mongo towards the Earth has been arrested.

Flash and Thun rescue Dale, but the American and his fiancée fall into the hands of Kala, a puppet of Ming, who rules an under-water domain, and the

EPISODE 4:—

"Battling the Sea Beast"

American is thrown to a giant sea beast resembling an octopus!

In the Toils

THE instant Flash was hurled into the tank-room Dale Arden realised that Kala's apparent friendliness had been a cruel sham, and with an exclamation of alarm she ran to the door through which the young American had been thrust.

Even as she reached that door it was closed by the two men who had disposed of Flash, and the girl found herself looking up at their evil, grinning faces.

"What have you done with him?" she cried in an impassioned tone. "What have you done with him?"

She tried to push them aside and grip the handle of the door, but they quickly seized her, and were holding her powerless when Kala strolled across to them.

"What have you done with Flash?" Dale repeated frantically. "What have you done with him?"

Kala leered at her, his flat, swarthy face the picture of malevolence. Then he glanced at the men who were clutching her.

"She desires to know the fate of her lover," he remarked complacently. "Come, let her see for herself."

He moved towards a circular window that was set into the wall of the council chamber, and his vassals dragged Dale after him. A moment later she was standing beside Kala at the window, and as she stared through its thick pane of glass a scream of abject horror broke from her lips.

For she was gazing now into a room built on a lower level than the council chamber, a room half-filled with water, the tank-room into which her lover had been cast; and there, before her eyes, she saw Flash struggling to escape the tentacles of the ghastly sea beast that was imprisoned in the flooded compartment.

He had been clutched around the body by the simous feelers of the brute, and though his head was at present above the surface of the water, he was being dragged down, down—to suffer terrible agonies by the crushing embrace of the sea beast's tentacles, and to find relief only in death by suffocation.

The anguished girl at the window beheld his distorted face as he fought his vain battle, beheld the loathsome, fleshy coils that were wrapped around his writhing figure, beheld the shimmering form of the monster that lay below the water with the vacuoles of its gross body holding it fast to the floor. And in a frenzy of distress she turned to Kala and cried out to him appealingly:

"Spare him!" she implored. "Don't let him die! Save him, for pity's sake. I'll do anything—anything you ask—if only you'll save him."

He shook his head.

"It is Ming who has condemned him, not I—"

He paused, for at that moment his attention was diverted from the window by an insistent buzzing that came from a control-board upon the left-hand wall of the council chamber.

Above that wall was a small, translucent panel which could have been likened to a miniature cinematograph screen, and upon it the image of a man's head and shoulders had begun to take shape.

The image had been thrown on the screen by some process akin to television, and as the picture grew clearer the sinister face of the Emperor Ming became recognisable.

A voice issued from the panel. It was the unmistakable voice of the emperor, speaking from his distant palace on Mongo's highest peak and demanding audience with Kala, his puppet ruler of the realm below the sea.

Kala hastened across to the screen and spoke up into it.

"Your Majesty," he said, "I have taken the Earth people prisoners, as you commanded. The girl will be returned to you. The man, even as I talk to you, is near to death."

"And Prince Thun?" came the voice of Ming. "What of him?"

"Prince Thun?"

"Yes, yes. He was with the Earth girl and her lover. Was that not made clear to you?"

"We saw no sign of Thun, your Majesty," Kala mumbled. "Only the two strangers from the Earth."

The face on the screen assumed an ugly expression of annoyance, and then, after a brief interval, Ming's voice reached Kala's ears again.

"Thun must have escaped the trap that threw the Earth people into your clutches," he ground out. "Well, his time will come, nevertheless. Meanwhile, do not let the girl Dale Arden out of your sight. And listen, Kala, I have reason to believe that my daughter Aura is on her way to your domain."

"Your daughter Aura?"

"Yes," was the curt reply. "She is interested in the Earth man, Gordon—would save him, if she could. If she reaches your palace make her a prisoner, and return her to me together with Dale Arden."

"Your instructions will be obeyed, your Majesty," Kala answered submissively, and then the vision on the screen slowly faded from view, leaving the panel blank once more.

Kala turned now, and was about to retrace his steps to the window through which Dale and the guards were watching Flash Gordon's struggles, when a young woman entered the council chamber by the main doorway, a dark-haired and dusky-skinned woman who was one of the hand-maidens of the underworld monarch's court.

"Ah, greetings, Zona," Kala observed. "You have arrived at an opportune time. I have a guest here who needs a chaperon."

He turned to indicate Dale, and as he did so he realised that the Earth girl was in a half-fainting condition, overwhelmed as she was by the grim spectacle which she was being forced to witness.

Kala strode towards his guards, all six of whom were by this time assembled round the window.

"You may go," he told the men. "Zona will look after our fair captive."

The guards departed from the council chamber, and Zona approached the window, laying a firm hand on Dale and peering through into the tank-room with Kala.

Her hard, cold features remained impassive at what she saw—Flash snared in the tentacles of the sea beast, going under as those sinuous arms pulled him down. Rising once more as by some superhuman effort, he managed to resist their relentless drag.

Thus the battle proceeded, but, though Flash Gordon's head broke water time after time, always he was drawn beneath the surface again; and soon enough it was clear that his strength was giving out, that he could not last much longer, that his desperate struggles were waning, waning.

Sagging in the grasp of the woman Zona, unable to watch the plight of her lover, Dale Arden looked at Kala imploringly.

"Save him!" she faltered. "Save him!"

"Your pleas are useless," he rejoined in callous accents. "Ming ordered him to die, and, even if the emperor had not so commanded, I should have shown Gordon no mercy. No man may pit his strength against Kala—and live."

He glanced through the window again, and saw that the one-sided combat between Flash and the monster was almost at an end. The young American was sinking below the surface in the grip of the tentacles, and it was obvious from the feeble movements of his hands and the hopeless look on his countenance that he could not prolong his fight for life.

"The Earth man has given us good sport," Kala remarked, "but the entertainment has very nearly reached its close. He is being dragged down for the last time, to rise no more."

There was an expression of brutal satisfaction on the man's face as he spoke those words, and the heartless tone of his voice seemed to bore into Dale's numbed mind even as the last shreds of consciousness were leaving her. And then, suddenly, in the very instant that she was willing in Zona's grasp, another voice struck upon her ears.

"Not a move, King Kala, or you die!"

The Nick of Time

IT was the voice of Aura which had rung through the council chamber of Kala's underworld palace—Aura, who had led Thun safely and secretly to the submarine realm of her father's ally in the hope of rescuing Flash Gordon from death.

Hearing that voice, Dale roused herself with an effort and stared in the direction whence it had come, and in the doorway of the spacious apartment she beheld Ming's daughter and the bearded stalwart who had befriended Flash.

There was a ray-gun in Thun's hand. It was trained on the astonished Kala, and, keeping the latter covered, the Prince of the Lion Men now advanced with Aura until he was only a few paces from the spot where Dale Arden and her two captors were standing.

"Give no alarm, Kala," Ming's daughter warned, "or Thun will blast the life from your body. What have you done with the Earth man—Gordon?"

Kala's face was a sickly hue, but he strove to speak in a tone of firmness and determination.

"Your father has ordered Flash Gordon's death," he said. "He has also ordered that you be returned to him, Princess Aura—a prisoner."

The emperor's daughter eyed him scornfully for a moment, and then glanced at the window through which Kala, Dale and Zona had witnessed the plight of Flash. In another second Aura had thrust her way past the monarch of the underworld, calling upon Thun to keep a strict watch on him as she did so.

One glance through the circular window was enough to drain every vestige of colour from Aura's cheeks, and for a brief interval she seemed too horrified to utter a sound. Next moment, however, she was wheeling round to confront Kala menacingly.

"Stop that fight in there," she rapped out, "at once!"

Kala raised his eyebrows.

"How can it be stopped?" he retorted. "Do you think one can give commands to a sea beast?"

"You know as well as I do how that fight can be stopped!" Aura flung at him. "Somewhere in this very room there is a switch that drains the water from the sea beast's lair. Drain that water, Kala, and the monster is rendered powerless. Do I have to waste words in reminding you of this?"

The king of the underworld glared at her and attempted to offer a show of defiance, but Thun promptly moved a step closer to him.

"The switch, Kala!" the Prince of the Lion Men barked. "If Flash Gordon dies, then your doom is also sealed!"

The other recoiled in alarm as the ray-gun was levelled threateningly, and it was with some haste that he stumbled towards the opposite wall, where he touched some hidden spring that raised a cunning shutter.

Behind that shutter was the switch that Aura had mentioned, and, breathing hard, Kala forced it down. Meanwhile, Ming's daughter was gazing through the window of the tank-room, and it was with a hopeful expression in her eyes that Dale Arden wrenched away from Zona and joined the dark-haired princess.

Aura gave Dale a cold, sidelong glance which showed more plainly than words could have done that she was not interested in the Earth girl, and that it was only on Flash's account that she had helped Thun to stage a rescue. Then she looked through the window again, and ere long she was satisfied that the turn of the lever which Kala had been forced to operate was producing the desired effect.

The level of the water in the tank-room was falling. Rapidly it subsided, draining away through some outlet that the switch had opened, and, as it left, the body of the sea beast uncovered, so the strength of that monster seemed to dwindle—even as Aura had prophesied.

Deprived of the natural element in which it existed, the giant creature became an enfeebled and helpless thing. The mighty grip of its tentacles relaxed, the sinuous limbs sagging to the floor and out of their terrific embrace reeled the bruised figure of its victim, to sink down in a state of utter exhaustion.

Aura turned now from the window of the tank-room and sped to the door through which Flash had been hurled some time before. Dale followed her, and was close upon her heels when the other girl unlocked the door and entered the chamber wherein the condemned man had so nearly met his death.

Thun, in the meantime, was watching Kala and Zona, and was quick to hold them at bay when the two of them attempted to make separate dashes for the main doorway of the council-room. Springing back, he prevented their escape and forced them to retreat, and they were cringing before him when Aura and Dale reappeared.

The two girls were supporting Flash, who seemed scarcely able to drag one leg after another, but in a little while, the big fellow showed signs of recovering, and managed to stammer out a few words of appreciation to Aura and Thun.

"I—I don't know how you got here," he panted, "but I guess you showed up—just in time. That big baby in there sure had me down for the count. I'm—mighty grateful."

Thun spoke to him—without taking his eyes off Kala and Zona, however.

"Are you able to walk, Flash?" he asked tersely.

"Give me a couple of minutes and I'll do more than walk," the American answered. "I'll—break that guy Kala in pieces—for giving me that giant octopus as a playmate."

Prince Thun smiled a twisted smile. "Nothing would give me greater pleasure than to see you break Kala into pieces," he said. "But there is no time for that, Flash. We have yet to make our way from his domain, and we cannot afford to delay."

"You are right, Thun." It was Aura's voice. "You are right, and we may find it more difficult to leave this realm than to enter it. If we return by the way we came we will only find ourselves back amongst the galleries below my father's palace."

"You fear your father, Aura?" Thun muttered.

The girl shook her head.

"I do not fear him on my own account," she said. "But I fear for the safety of Flash. Until I can prevail upon the emperor to pardon him and spare him, Flash must not fall into his hands."

"Then what is your plan, Aura?" Dale interposed tremulously.

Ming's daughter directed a chilling glance at her.

"My plan is to make for the dry docks where Kala's under-water ships are housed," she replied. "We can make our escape in one of those ships and cruise through the caverns to the open sea. When we gain the surface, Thun can take care of you and Flash, and I will return to my father's palace."

"Do you know how to reach the dry docks from here, Aura?" asked Thun.

The princess inclined her head.

"Yes, I know how to reach them. But we may have to fight our way to them if we run foul of any of Kala's men."

Kala had been listening attentively to the conversation, and now he growled a comment.

"You will never succeed in your design," he said, "and as for you, Thun, I warn you that you will regret this invasion of my realm!"

"If there are any regrets," the Prince of the Lion Men retorted grimly, "you will not live to gloat over them. Should any of your guards try to stop us, Kala, yours will be the first life that I shall take. Meanwhile, you and Zona are going with us as hostages. We do not intend to give you an opportunity of raising an alarm."

He motioned to Aura to lead the way from the council chamber, and, first satisfying herself that the coast was clear, Ming's daughter stole out across the threshold of the room, with the others following her in single file—Thun bringing up the rear and menacing Kala and Zona with the ray-gun.

They passed slowly and cautiously along the wide corridor by which Flash Gordon and Dale Arden had been dragged to the council chamber some time before, and presently they might have been seen turning into another gallery. Ere a quarter of an hour had elapsed they had travelled for a considerable distance through the network of underground tunnels which honeycombed Kala's domain, and counted themselves lucky in not meeting with a soul.

Aura seemed to know every foot of that labyrinth, and, moving a few yards in advance of her companions, she proved an invaluable guide, never once showing any sign of uncertainty or hesitation. But suddenly, just as she reached an angle of one of the corridors, she came to an abrupt halt and signed to the rest of the party to remain where they were.

Flash and the others paused, and Thun made a significant gesture with the ray-gun to remind Kala and Zona that they would court destruction if they attempted any outcry, for it was clear to him that the Princess Aura must have seen someone ahead.

In another second or two Aura had retreated to where her companions and the hostages were standing.

"The control-room is beyond that corner," she whispered. "We must pass through it to get to the dry docks, and one of Kala's men is on duty at the great switchboard—the switchboard that generates the air for this submarine realm and gives the outer barriers the necessary resistance to hold back the sea water of the caverns."

Flash looked at her keenly.

"You mean—one man stands between us and freedom?" he queried. "I guess I can handle him all right. Thun, you stay right here and see that Kala and Zona don't give any trouble. Dale, you help Thun to keep an eye on them."

"Do you think you can handle the man in the control-room, Flash?" Dale asked him anxiously.

"Sure," he answered. "I'll admit I had a tough time with that giant octopus, but I'm all right now."

With a confident expression on his handsome features he advanced towards the angle of the corridor, and Aura elected to accompany him. A moment later they had reached the entrance of the control-room, and, staring through the doorway, they riveted their attention on the man at the switchboard.

"Leave him to me, Aura," Flash breathed, and then he crept across the threshold and began to steal upon Kala's minion from behind.

He was within two or three paces of the man when the latter chanced to turn his head, as if warned of his danger by some instinct that could not be defined, and at sight of Flash he uttered a hoarse exclamation.

Next instant he had snatched up a ray-pistol that was lying close at hand, but before he could train it on Flash the American was upon him, striking the weapon from the fellow's grasp and seizing him by the throat.

And now there ensued a desperate scuffle, a scuffle that Aura watched with bated breath. Back and forth the two men rocked, fighting like demons in their efforts to gain the mastery, for if Kala's hireling had been taken almost by surprise, he had been quick to recover himself and show resistance.

He was a man of powerful frame, too, and at first he seemed to be a match for the American, who was still suffering from his battle with the octopus in spite of the reassuring statement he had made to Dale Arden. Yet, even if his strength had been impaired by the ordeal in the tank-room, Flash possessed the will to win, and gradually he took the upper hand again.

At last he managed to throw his antagonist, and from the doorway Aura saw the pair of them roll across the floor. Then she became aware that the guard's ray-pistol was lying near them, and that Kala's minion was trying to reach out for it.

The girl dashed across the room and picked up the weapon before the man's fingers could close on it, and with the pistol safely in her grip, she drew back to the threshold. A moment afterwards she was watching Flash as he pounded his adversary with clenched fist.

Crouching astride the guard's prone body, Flash drove his bunched knuckles into the fellow's jaw again and again, until at length the wretch lay insensible. Only then did the young American rise to his feet, and, panting from his exertions, he staggered towards Aura. "That ought to keep him quiet for a while," he gasped. "Now to reach those dry docks you spoke of, Aura. We—"

He checked, for at that very second there was a commotion in the gallery that led to the control-room, and, exchanging a startled glance with Ming's daughter, he lurched out through the doorway with her.

There, in the gallery, he beheld a scene that caused him to grit his teeth and steel himself for further fight. For he saw Thun struggling in the arms of two of Kala's men, who must have been passing that way and come upon the bearded Lion Man unawares.

They were now grappling fiercely with Thun, while Kala and Zona held Dale and prevented her from going to his aid.

Flash started forward with a shout on his lips, but with a swift movement Aura caught him by the arm and pulled him into the control-room again. Then, before he realised what was in her mind, she wheeled in the direction of the great switchboard and levelled the ray-pistol at it.

A stream of flame burst from the muzzle of the weapon and played across the dials and levers of that massive instrument-board, and all at once there was an ugly crackling of sparks that flew to right and left in successive showers. Simultaneously, the casing of the switchboard seemed to buckle and split, and fragments of intricate machinery rattled to the floor.

Flash gazed at Aura dully as she lowered her hand.

"What's the idea?" he demanded.

"Why did you do that?"

"Did I not tell you," she answered, "that this board controls the generators which provide air, and which also sustain the pressure that keeps water out of Kala's domain?"

"Then why destroy it?" cried Flash.

"Because by doing so our chances of escape are increased! In the panic that must now spread through this whole realm we can get to the dry docks without much fear of hindrance, and once we are inside one of Kala's submarine ships we shall be safe from the fate that will overtake his city!"

She clutched Flash by the arm.

"Come," she went on urgently. "We just have time to reach our goal—a submarine ship that will carry us to the open sea when the outer barriers give way. But we must hurry, we must hurry!"

He stood his ground as she attempted to draw him towards another doorway at the far side of the control-room.

"You're forgetting Dale and Thun!" he jerked.

"You must not think of them now," she exclaimed impatiently. "There is no time to lose. Every moment is precious to us. A delay of seconds, and we may never reach dry docks. Flash, it is yourself you must consider. I can save you—and hide you till I am able to make my father see reason—"

The handsome American tore away from her. His face had gone pale, and there was a wild light in his eyes.

"I'm not leaving Thun and Dale!" he ground out.

"Flash!" Aura called distractedly. "Don't go back. The noise of that fight will soon bring more of Kala's men. Worse still, the air in the galleries will be exhausted within a few minutes, and the water will burst down the harriers—"

But Flash was not listening. Already he had bounded forth in the corridor where Thun had been surprised, and in headlong style he charged to the rescue of his ally, throwing an arm round one of Kala's underlings and dragging the man aside—then landing him a terrific punch that hurled the fellow against the wall of the passage.

The back of the guard's head came into violent contact with that wall, and, uttering a hollow groan, he slumped to the floor in a heap. Then Kala himself tried to take a hand in the affray, but blundered into an upper-cut that knocked him clean off his balance.

In the meantime, Thun was disposing of the remaining guard, whom he now had little difficulty in handling, and when Flash turned from the prostrate form of Kala it was to see the Lion Man's opponent going down beneath a blow from the butt of the prince's ray-gun.

At the same instant he saw Zona running off along the corridor, doubtless to give the alarm and bring reinforcements to the spot, but before she had gone far she appeared to falter—to reel against the wall—and to raise her fingers to her throat as if an unseen hand were strangling her.

It was then that Flash became aware of a change that had taken place in the atmosphere of the gallery; found himself breathing hard, not so much because of his recent exertions, but because there seemed to be a lack of air.

He looked at Thun, and then at Dale, who was standing nearby. Both of them were open-mouthed and clutching at their throats.

"Flash," Dale gasped, "Flash, what's happening? I—I can't breathe. I'm—choking."

It was Aura who answered her; Aura, who had moved from the doorway of the control-room. Her features were pale, and yet strangely calm.

"I have wrecked the switchboard that governs the air generators and the pressure that keeps the water at bay," she said simply. "Kala's realm is doomed. It is only a question of seconds now."

Flash caught her by the wrist. "You spoke of the submarine ships," he panted. "If we can get away in one of them—"

"Too late!" she interrupted. "Too late! Before we reached the dry docks we should die for want of air, or else drown in the flood-waters that will soon pour through these galleries. No, Flash, our only chance has gone. You delayed in order that you might help your friends. That delay has cost you your life, and cost me mine."

"You could have made your escape alone," he said, speaking with difficulty.

"Why didn't you?"

"Because, like you, I am not afraid to die."

She stopped and looked at Kala, who was struggling up from the floor. He had heard what had passed between her and Flash, and his complexion was grey as he tottered to the door of the control-room and gaped at the damaged switchboard.

"Aura!" he babbled. "It is true! You have sealed our destruction! We are lost—all lost!"

From afar there came a vague tumult, as of men and women crying out in tones of abject despair, and the distant clamour told Kala that his people in all parts of the subterranean realm were beginning to realise from the shortage of air that something was wrong.

For an interval he stood there with a distracted expression on his countenance, and then all at once a faint gleam of hope awakened in his eyes.

"Ming can save us," he said hoarsely.

"From his palace he controls duplicate machines that can supply us with oxygen and raise enough pressure to hold back the flood-waters. Ming can save us—" if only we can get a signal to him—if only we can get a distress signal through to him!"

He made for the switchboard, and Flash and Dale followed him, accompanied by Aura and Thun. By now all of them were fighting for breath, and beads of perspiration were streaming down their faces. They were suffocating, and in their plight all hostility was forgotten. For the moment, at least, their common peril had united them—this puppet monarch Kala and the quartet who had held him hostage.

Four pairs of eyes watched Kala as he fumbled with a switch on the damaged control-board.

"Unless the mechanism has been completely wrecked, we may be able to make contact with Ming's palace by the visual rays," he groaned. "We can but try. We can but try—"

Despair

LITTLE did Kala know it, but, while he was attempting to communicate with Ming, a man in the emperor's laboratory was endeavouring to send out signals on a much more ambitious scale.

That man was Dr. Zarkov, and he had spent an hour or two of experimental research in the amazing workshop of the potentate who was virtually holding him a captive. In the privacy of this room he had delved deep into the emperor's secrets, partly to keep his mind from speculating on the fate of his friends, partly to discover if he could make use of the vital apparatus which the laboratory contained.

He was now standing before a transmitting set that was far in advance of any broadcasting equipment known to his fellow-scientists of the Earth, and by means of it he was sending out a call which he hoped might reach some station on that distant globe.

"Dr. Zarkov speaking from Mongo," he repeated again and again, as he manipulated the dials on the transmitting set. "Dr. Zarkov speaking from Mongo—the planet Mongo!"

He was still repeating his call in the hope that it would be picked up when he

A moment later they had reached the entrance of the control-room, and, staring through the doorway, they riveted their attention on the man at the switchboard.

heard footsteps outside the door of the laboratory, and he at once made haste to switch off the transmitting set and devote his attention to a machine in which he had interested himself an hour or so previously.

He had scarcely taken up his position beside that particular appliance when the robed figure of the Emperor Ming entered the room.

Down sweeping the floor, the sinister monarch moved towards Zarkov and eyed him shrewdly, a crooked smile playing around his thin-lipped mouth.

"Well, my friend," Ming said, "have you improved upon any of my inventions here? Remember, I spared your life because I believed you might be useful to me, but if you do not show me results then I shall be compelled—to get rid of you."

Zarkov clenched his hands spasmodically.

"Before we discuss scientific matters, your Majesty," he rejoined in a steady tone, "may I ask what has become of my friends from the Earth?"

Ming smiled again.

"Unless I am much mistaken," he remarked, "Kala has already disposed of Flash Gordon. As for the lovely Dale Arden, she is probably on her way to my palace here even now. But come, Zarkov, tell me of your work in the laboratory."

The doctor gave him a bitter glance, and was silent for a space. Then he indicated the appliance by which he was standing.

"Shortly before you came in I was examining this apparatus, your Majesty," he observed, "and I think I can improve upon it by introducing a new ray which I discovered about a month ago."

"A new ray?" Ming echoed, with interest. "Will it be of help in furthering my plans to become ruler of the entire Universe—ruler of Mongo, of the Earth, of all Creation?"

"It may," Zarkov conceded reluctantly. "It is a variation of the ray you have been using, but, being of a higher frequency, it is more flexible. If you can follow me, it is built up from the negative side rather than the positive."

Ming was listening to him with a keen expression on his thin, evil features.

"Tell me more about this ray," he said, but before the doctor could proceed there was an interruption.

A man in armour appeared on the threshold of the laboratory. He was Torch, captain of Ming's hodyguard, and it was with an anxious look in his eyes that he came forward to salute the emperor.

"Your Majesty," he reported, "someone is trying to communicate with us from Kala's domain, but we can make nothing of the message. I think something must be very wrong indeed down there."

Ming frowned, and then, bidding Zarkov follow him, he hastened from the laboratory with Torch and quickly made his way along the gallery that led to the throne-room.

Here a number of his guards were assembled, their eyes upturned towards a luminous panel that was built into the wall; and on this panel, or screen, several indistinct shadows were visible—obviously the shapes of four or five human beings, though the impressions were so blurred as to be unrecognisable.

A voice was issuing from the screen, a voice as indefinite as the group of shadows, a voice that uttered inarticulate sounds which were a mere jumble of broken syllables, defying comprehension.

Ming thrust his way through the party of soldiers and stared at the panel. Joining him, Zarkov realised that he was gazing upon some form of television which either was in an experimental state or else functioning inaccurately.

Ming stood silent for fully a minute, watching the screen, listening to the voice that babbled from it. Then he glanced at Torch.

"That voice is Kala's," he rapped out. "There is no mistaking it. But I cannot make out a word of what he is saying. What has happened to this apparatus? It has never failed us before."

He reached for a switch under the screen and turned it slowly. For a moment there was no result, the shadowy forms on the panel above him still remaining indistinct and Kala's voice becoming no less incoherent. But suddenly, just for the space of a second, the scene grew clearer.

"Look!" cried Torch.

Kala's head and shoulders became visible on the screen, and, in the background, the faces of Thun, Flash, Dale and Aura were revealed—faces which, like Kala's, were distorted with suffering.

Only for an instant did the picture remain thus well defined, only for an instant did the watchers in Ming's throne-room see the vision of those five human beings as clearly as they might have done if they had actually been standing before them in the doomed realms far below the base of the mountain.

In that same instant of time a single word trembled audibly from the screen in Kala's voice:

"Destruction—"

Then swiftly the vision faded again into shadowy incompleteness, and once more the tones of Ming's ally were rendered inarticulate.

Thoroughly alarmed now, Ming persevered savagely with the switch that he had been turning, but to no purpose.

"Destruction!" he hissed through his gritted teeth. "Destruction! What did Kala mean by that?"

It was a question that none in the throne-room could answer, for none who stood there knew that the air in the galleries and chambers of Kala's domain was fast giving out, that the relentless waters in the deep caverns were pressing in upon the safety-barriers with a force which the toughest metal could not have withstood.

Soon those barrier-doors would buckle under the strain. Air pressure had provided them with the power to resist the tides that swept the caverns, but now that the air supply was gone they would fall before the might of Nature, and Kala's kingdom would be flooded from end to end.

Twenty thousand feet below the palace of Ming, the abject Kala turned from the switchboard at which he had been making his forlorn attempts to contact the emperor. His face seemed to have fallen in, his eyes were hollow with despair and his hands were clawing at his throat as he fought for breath.

"I cannot—make them—understand," he groaned. "I cannot make them—understand."

He looked haggardly at the two men and the two girls who stood beside him. Thun and Aura had lurched against the wall and were leaning there weakly. Flash was supporting Dale in his arms, endeavouring to comfort her and encourage her, though his voice was dry and cracked.

Death was closing upon them all, slowly, agonisingly. Death by suffocation. . . .

"RAINBOW'S END"

"Thank you, Mister Craig!"

Neil gave her a sideways look.

"Hallo, hallo! Didn't I tell you I was Sir Walter Raleigh?"

"I heard Duke call you Craig—but maybe I'm still wrong. Your evening shirt, which I've washed for you, is initialed N. G. No good, I reckon."

Butch came running up.

"Oh, Rowley—we're four hundred beeves short. Someone's rustled 'em in the night!"

"Four hundred?" gasped Ann. "Why, how can that be? Four hundred?"

"They're gone!" spoke Butch ruefully.

Almost on his heels came a young fellow on a panting, lathered bronc. He swung down out of the saddle.

"Which is Rowley?" he cried. "I want him—Duke's held up in Stark's house."

"I'm Rowley," said Neil with another glance at Ann.

"Here's some money for you—from Duke. I'm Williams." The young fellow thrust a roll of dollar bills at Neil. "I'm Stark's secretary—least-ways, I was. I've quit. He isn't square—he's branding a whole lot of beeves just come in from goodness knows where. He didn't buy them from you, did he?"

He addressed Ann, who was holding the small dog almost too tightly in her agitation. It whined a little.

"Now who's hurting him?" cried Neil.

"Never mind—take him inside."

Williams, quite forgetting, asked:

"You're Neil Gibson, aren't you? I've worried for your father to come— Oh, sorry!"

Neil had given him a black look.

"Now that everybody has been introduced," he snapped, "perhaps you'll put that poor dog in his basket, Ann Ware!"

Ann turned away without a word and went across to the house.

"I'll take your bronc," Neil told Williams. "You stay with Butch—I'm going to talk to Stark."

He swung himself into the saddle and was gone in a flash.

"We'll follow!" called Butch, scenting a fight. But Neil hadn't heard.

He rode like the wind to the Gibson-Stark ranch, while Ann told herself: "He's gone—and he won't come back!"

Meantime, Dorgan had returned and had unlocked the door of Bert's prison. Bert was peacefully dozing in a chair. Next thing that caught Dorgan's attention was the open door of the wall safe. He crossed the room in a couple of strides—a glance showed him the notes had gone.

He swung round on Bert.

"Tip 'em up!" he roared, grabbing Bert by the collar.

Bert awoke with well-acted surprise.

"Why, Dorgan—you come back all by your little self?"

"Gimme them dollar bills!"

"Sorry. They're at Rainbow's End—where they belong."

Bert stood up, yawning. He gently but firmly removed Dorgan's hand from his coat-collar; then, with a sudden back-handed swing of his right, he got Dorgan fair and square under the chin, shutting his snarling mouth with a click that told of breaking teeth. Dorgan went over backwards with a crash—only to spring up in a split second. He made a mad bull rush at Bert, who stepped aside nimbly and slobbered him again, this time under the left ear.

Dorgan closed in on Bert with sledge-hammer fist at Bert's large nose. For a moment stars danced before Bert's eyes; then he had closed with his bulky opponent, and the pair were rolling together on the floor, punching at each other with grim determination.

It was a great fight. Sometimes Bert looked like winning, then Dorgan would recover and come at him again. They fought all across the room and out into the hall, Bert seeking to get a real smasher at his foe.

But Dorgan knew the house, and at last got Bert up against the closed kitchen door. Here they got themselves locked together in a breathless embrace, pushing and jabbing and thrusting at each other until suddenly the door-latch gave way and flew open, when both of them went headlong over the couple of steps down from the hall floor to the kitchen level. While they were picking themselves up, the door-spring shot back the door.

Dorgan, head lowered like a goat's, butted at Bert's stomach. Bert stepped aside, slid over some grease on the floor and went sprawling. Dorgan butted straight into the refrigerator, then, with a gasp, went down and stayed down.

When Neil reached the ranch the front door was open. He leapt off the brone and strode into the house. Stark was in the hall, standing very still, as if listening. There was no sound of life until Neil barked at him:

"What have you done to my buddy?" Stark turned cold eyes upon him.

"Get out of my house!"

Neil didn't waste breath. He hit Stark in the face, knocking him sideways. Stark was no coward, and was at Neil on the instant, in such a cold fury of rage that he bore Neil right before him to the doorstep, Neil having all he could do to ward off the storm of blows which Stark showered on him.

Neil didn't want to hurt a man much older than himself, so he waited his chance to get Stark in a clinch. Then he ran him backwards into the hall, and, lifting him right off his feet, flung him into a chair, where he fell with a crash that shook the house.

"Now then!" stormed Neil. "Tell me about this!" He thrust an open letter into Stark's hand.

Footsteps were heard outside. Two people had sprung from a car. Into the hall came hurrying old John Gibson, followed by Ann Ware.

Gibson senior pointed a finger at the recumbent Stark, as he snapped at Neil:

"What d'you think you're doing with my partner?"

"Asking him a plain question," said Neil, face all frowns.

"Is that the way gentlemen ask questions?" asked Gibson senior.

"Don't mind him," said Stark. "He's no one. Only a mad fellow from Rainbow's End who thinks he's Napoleon."

"Sir Walter Raleigh," Ann corrected gently.

"Listen here," spoke Neil, controlling himself. "Stark has been stealing Adam Ware's cattle and branding them as yours and his. And he has been double-crossing you! See that letter he don't dare to read? It was written by the Marlowe bank-manager at Stark's instigation. It's the bank's refusal to help Ware, who's one of the very best!"

"You're a liar!" Stark snarled. "I didn't have a thing to do with the sending of this." He flung the letter contemptuously on the floor.

Old Gibson turned on him,

"Do you tell me my son's a liar, James William Stark? Come on outside!"

He lugged Stark up from the chair and rushed him out into the yard. Sounds like a bull-fight followed immediately.

"Stop them!" Ann pleaded. "Not on your life!" said Neil. "I'll have ten dollars to one with you on dad!"

But somebody else had got out of the car on seeing old Gibson hammering away at Stark. Gwen Gibson, flustered and indignant.

"Hold your temper, father," she cried, "or I'll have to set about the pair of you two wicked old men!"

Bert emerged from the kitchen, nose swollen, one eye fast blackening.

"That you, Gwen?" he called cheerfully. "You starting something?"

Stark tried to trim his sails.

"I can explain everything, Mr. Gibson."

Neil calmly put an arm about Ann's waist as Gwen Gibson came hurrying towards her battered Bert, followed by old Gibson and the discomfited Stark.

"What have they been doing to you, darling?" Gwen almost wept, her threats forgotten as she clung to Bert.

"I fell over a couple of steps," he answered, always cheerful. "So did the other fellow. He's still counting 'em."

"Oh, Gwen," called Neil. "I want you to meet your sister-in-law that's going to be."

He pushed Ann forward a little way, but didn't let her go.

"And, dad, I'm foreman at Rainbow's End, the next ranch to this. What say we kick Stark out and run the two ranches together?"

"Suits me," growled Gibson senior, fixing Stark with a glance that said, "Now, don't you put up any difficulties, hear me?" He next studied Ann's blushing face. "Do you really want to hook up with this good-for-nothing son of mine?"

"I'll risk it," said Ann.

"We'll have a double wedding," grinned Bert. "It'll save a lot of expense and bother."

"Okay," agreed old John Gibson in his dour fashion. "Hop it, Stark—you aren't invited!"

"A TALE OF TWO CITIES"

"You remember how alike we are. Good-bye!"

Barsad, wondering, impressed despite himself, almost carried Darnay out of the cell. Carton seated himself at the table below the window.

A gaoler, passing along, came to Barsad.

"Fainted, eh? I noticed he staggered as he came in. Let me help you, Citizen Barsad. We'll put him in the cart outside. Funny how it affects some people—saying good-bye! Weak-minded, I call it!"

Escape—and Sacrifice

THE coach was at the side door of Telson's Bank, in the Rue St. Honoré. Lucie and Mr. Lorry were in their places, a muffled figure between them. Dr. Manette and little Lucie sat opposite, holding each other by the hand. Miss Pross and Jerry Cruncher were to follow in a small trap with the luggage. "Don't wait," called Lorry to the driver.

The coach drove away into the thickening darkness of the evening.

Miss Pross was coming down to join Jerry, when she remembered a small bag left in Manette's room. She returned for it. On coming back to the landing she met Madame Defarge ascending the stairs at a run. At once Miss Pross placed herself in front of the door of Manette's room.

"Let me pass!" ordered Madame Defarge. "She is there—that wife of St. Evremont. Let me pass—in the name of the Republic!"

Miss Pross didn't understand a word, but she understood that this woman was an enemy.

"No!" she shouted.

"Pig and imbecile!" cried Madame Defarge. "Get away from that door—or I kill you!"

Miss Pross shook her head. Madame Defarge sprang forward and Miss Pross clutched at her round the waist. The two women, furious with each other, rolled over and over on the floor.

"No!" panted Miss Pross. "You shan't! I know what you're after. . . . My ladybird—but you won't get her! . . . Oh, no, you don't!"

Madame Defarge was trying to get at a pistol hidden in her skirt pocket. Miss Pross, strong as a lioness, rolled her enemy all over the floor. But Madame Defarge got at the pistol—Miss Pross saw what it was, struck upward at it—struck out—a flash, and a crash, and a piercing scream!

Then she felt Madame Defarge heavy and limp upon her breast. Miss Pross threw her off and got up, dazed and horrified. She gave but a glance at the twitching shape of Madame Defarge, then went rushing headlong down the stairs to Jerry Cruncher.

"They've gone," he said. "I thought you was never coming!"

"I don't hear you," Miss Pross chattered. "I don't hear a sound. There was a crash—and then a stillness."

"Come on!" urged Jerry. "Sooner we're out of this town the better I'll like it!"

In the place of execution there is a vast crowd on the next morning. The guillotine stands in the centre, a dreadful thing erect upon a low platform. Drummers stand to attention; the tumbrels roll up towards this platform with their pitiful burden. In the front seats on a staging opposite the guillotine sit many women, some of them knitting. La Vengeance is there, but she does not knit. She laughs shrilly as each victim ascends, under a roll of the drums, the steps of the scaffold. She calls presently:

"Where is Thérèse? Who has seen her? Why is she not in her place?"

In the great hall of La Force the prisoners are being shepherded into sixes to go forth and take their places in the tumbrels.

"Twenty-two! Twenty-three!" comes the hoarse call.

Sydney Carton, in Darnay's clothes, sits in a corner in the hall. The little seamstress, Number Twenty-two, stares at him.

"Hush!" Carton whispers.

She mutters:

"You are going to die in his place? Why?"

"He is my friend."

The little girl puts out her hand.

"How brave you are! Will you hold my hand? I am so afraid. . . . I am so weak—so very afraid."

"I'll hold you," answers Carton in a suddenly breaking voice, "to the last!"

So they go forth from La Force to take their places in the tumbrel, hand in hand. So they hold on to each other, the strong one whispering:

"Courage, my child! Keep steady! I will hold you to the last."

So they reach the centre of the vast, mad, blood-drunk crowd, and stand, hand in hand, at the foot of the steps. A roll of drums is heard, a voice cries from somewhere:

"Jeanne Fontaine, seamstress! Number Twenty-two!"

The little girl lifts her cheek to Carton's kiss. They loosen their fingers. He murmurs:

"Keep your eyes on me. Mind nothing else."

She tries to answer, but they are dragging her towards the steps. She ascends them. . . . The drums roll. . . . There is a sudden thudding crash. . . .

"Number Twenty-three! Charles, former Marquis de St. Evremond!"

Carton goes up the steps. There is a wolf's howl of rage and hate from the frenzied crowd. The drums roll—there comes the crash of the descending knife of the guillotine.

One can almost hear the last thoughts of this man who has given his life to save, for Lucie's sake, the life of the one dearest to her.

"It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done. It is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

The drums roll—Number Twenty-four has been called. . . .

They Met at Last in "Absolute Quiet"

Louis Hayward and Wallace Ford were friends in England, then Ford moved away to Canada and then to the United States.

When Hayward went to Hollywood, a year ago, under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, his first thought was to get in touch with his old-time pal, Ford. They were never able to manage a meeting.

Finally, Ford was cast in "Absolute Quiet," at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, and the first person he saw on the set was his old friend, Hayward.

Ford is to play the rôle of Jack the desperado. His long list of screen successes includes an important rôle in "The Informer."

In addition to Hayward and Ford, Ann Loring, Stuart Erwin, Irene Herve, Lionel Atwill, J. Carol Naish, Robert Livingston, Edwin Maxwell and Bernadene Hayes are featured in the picture, which is being directed by George Seitz and produced by John W. Considine junior.

Finding a Cantor Story

At least six months of preparation are necessary for the making of a Cantor film, and "Strike Me Pink," his latest frolic for Samuel Goldwyn, was no exception.

Always the chief difficulty is the finding of a suitable story. The search for Cantor material is continuous and unending. While the studio is shooting this year's offering the Goldwyn literary scouts in Hollywood and New York are wading through stacks of manuscripts. Produced and unproduced plays, books, magazines and foreign material are searched for the germ of an idea for next year's film.

No single mind is ever responsible for the completed script of a Cantor picture. Four to eight people are likely to be implicated before the job is completed. Frank Butler wrote the adaption of "Strike Me Pink," and Francis Martin and Walter DeLear the screen play.

Many more, including Cantor and Director Norman Taurog, laboured on the dialogues and gags. Several weeks before the picture goes before the camera, Cantor makes a tour of theatres for the purpose of testing dialogue and laughs.

"Strike Me Pink" occupied ten weeks' actual shooting time and cost Goldwyn over £350,000.

Boles Nearly Snapped Up

A major sequence of "A Message to Garcia" required that John Boles and Wallace Berry, co-starred in the film, crawl through an alligator-infested swamp, reproduced faithfully on the studio set. A number of alligators were hired from an alligator farm.

In order that realism be maintained, it was necessary to disturb the reptiles in their long winter sleep, then in progress.

"To do this," explained E. B. Fish, in charge of the reptiles, "it will be necessary to raise the temperature of the water in the set to about seventy-five degrees. At that temperature, they will be active, but not dangerous."

An interested audience of film-folk watched as Fish caused an old fire-engine to be backed up to the swamp and a steam-line connected. After several hours he pronounced the temperature correct, and the alligators were introduced into the swamp. They promptly came to life and began to crawl around.

The steam-line was left connected to maintain the temperature.

As cameras began to grind, Beery and Boles began to crawl through the swamp, the alligators manoeuvring slowly around them. All had gone well for a few minutes when Boles suddenly heard a resounding snap behind him, while a cry of alarm went up from the camera, and sound crew.

Turning, Boles saw the yawning jaws of one of the reptiles. The first snap had missed, and he was preparing again for a nice dish of Boles for lunch.

The alligator expert hurriedly entered the swamp with his prodding pole and shoved the alligator away.

Investigation revealed that the reptile had found an extra warm spot, close to where the steam-line entered the swamp, and the temperature, many degrees above the seventy-five intended, had fully awakened him.

"Of course," Mr. Fish explained to the badly jolted Boles, "you really can't blame the alligator. They've been practically asleep for two months, and have built up quite an appetite. I've seldom before seen one attempt to bite a human being."

Non-suited

"When giving directions on the set to erectors, carpenters and other helpers on a film set, care should always be taken that one's instructions are clear, precise and readily understood."

If ever he writes a textbook on the procedure for his arduous vocation, F. G. (Bill) Bangs, assistant-director of the "Two on a Doorstep," the new Paramount British production at Elstree, will probably commence the opening chapter with something like the foregoing.

As a rule, Bill can usually make himself fairly well understood, but an incident which occurred recently, during the filming of "Two on a Doorstep," a greyhound-racing story in which Anthony Hankey, Harold French, and Kay Hammond have the leading rôles, has caused him to reflect that one can never be too precise.

In one of the scenes Harold French, who is supposed to be a bailiff's man enjoying the involuntary hospitality of Kay Hammond and Anthony Hankey, is given a shake-down for the night on a settee in the drawing-room. All Mr. French had to do in this scene was to wear a suit of silk pyjamas and make himself comfortable on the settee. His gents' D.B. lounge, shirt, collar, tie, braces and etceteras were draped gracefully over a chair. When the scene was in readiness Lawrence Huntington, the director, decided that the heap of disembodied clothes rather spoil the picture.

"Take the clothes away!" shouted Mr. Bangs, but his voice was drowned by the hammers of the carpenters working on the set.

"The clothes. The clothes. Lose the clothes!" appealed Mr. Bangs, a little louder this time, and the clothes vanished.

About half an hour later, Anthony Hankey was in an affecting scene with Kay Hammond when a wild and dishevelled, semi-nude figure straggled without warning across the set.

"What's the idea of ruining the scene?" wailed Anthony Hankey and Miss Hammond in concert.

The distraught, pyjama'd figure drifted by unheeding.

"I want my clothes! I want my clothes!" it mumbled piteously as it plodded wearily on.

Actors' Raw-meat Diet

Before they took part in the hunting-scene in the Forest of Arden, during the filming of "As You Like It," twelve of the actors had a snack of one pound of raw meat apiece, washed down by copious draughts of water.

They were Great Danes, from Ripley, Surrey, beautiful fawn-coloured animals as big as ponies and weighing between nine and ten stone each. Champion Joan is the prize animal, while Bernard has sired more fawn champions than any other dog in the country.

An expert declares that these dogs are descendants of the original boar hounds June 6th, 1936.

"THE LONE WOLF RETURNS"

Evading the police after a jewel robbery, Michael Lanyard, alias the "Lone Wolf," mingles with the guests of an heiress next door named Marcia Stewart. He falls in love with the girl and resolves to go straight; but other jewel thieves involve him in the theft of Marcia's emeralds—and a very clever detective is called in to run him down. A gay, yet thrilling, mystery drama

"EXCLUSIVE STORY"

Fighting a villainous gang of crooks with headlines instead of bullets! A drama of the power of the Press. Starring Franchot Tone, Madge Evans and Stuart Erwin.

of Shakespeare's days, and are therefore correctly cast for their part.

The hounds behaved perfectly and thoroughly enjoyed their acting experience. They strained at the leash and led the hunting party through the woods without once "blowing up" (screen jargon for making a mistake) or causing a re-take.

The "Drapery" Man

An important but little known studio-worker is the man responsible for the design and selection of curtains, tapestries and other draperies for the various settings. Appropriately enough, he is referred to as the "drapery" man. Frank Pondelak, the man in charge of this department in the Selznick film, "Little Lord Fauntleroy," was one of the most famous "drapery" men in Austria. Shortly before the war, at the request of Emperor Franz Josef, he supervised the selection and hanging of all draperies in the Kaiserhof in Vienna. He first undertook film work with Jesse Lasky, over fifteen years ago.

Johnny Downs a Tray

Johnny Downs, appearing in "Everybody's Old Man," now being made by Twentieth Century-Fox, in Hollywood, got the opportunity to satisfy a long-repressed ambition.

He had to drop a fully loaded cocktail tray—glasses, shaker and all—for a scene in which he unexpectedly sees Norman Foster kissing Rochello Hudson.

"It's a pleasure," Downs informed James Flood, the director. "I've always wanted to drop a tray, just for the fun of it—and now I'm going to get paid for doing it."

"All right," said Flood, "but just let it drop. Don't give it a push."

To his delight, Johnny had to drop the tray twice, the second time for a close-up.

Once a Criminal—?

Ralf Harolde, as nasty a scoundrel as was ever typed a villain in Hollywood, who is currently menacing Claire Trevor and Brian Donlevy in "Human Cargo" at Twentieth Century-Fox, has a plan all figured out how to achieve at least one sympathetic screen rôle before he retires.

"Just for the fun of it—just to say that I've done it," explains Ralf, "I'm saving my money, and some day I'm going to produce a picture myself. Unless, of course, someone saves me the trouble and gives me a sympathetic rôle meanwhile."

Harolde doesn't want to play a dashing, romantic lead—he doesn't want to play a rib-tickling comedy rôle—all he wants to do is NOT to be a villain for one picture. Harolde had been a leading man on the New York stage for several years when he was picked out of the production of the "The Front Page" for a gangster's rôle in a Hollywood production. Since then he has done nothing but "heavies." He has been killed in most of his films, and always to the relief of the audience.

"I don't mind dying in a picture," says Ralf. "But I'd like to be given the opportunity to die just once under circumstances which would permit the audience to be at least indifferent about my death, instead of being glad about it."

Taboos for Stars

Daily, new taboos are handed to the film players, to remain in effect as long as they are actually at work in productions.

Clark Gable was forbidden to drive his high-powered car more than forty-five miles an hour, and forbidden to shave during the last two weeks of "San Francisco."

When Larry Donovan and Budge Edwards were asked by an attorney to provide a girl to impersonate—for a few days—an heiress whose life is in danger, they decline the commission; but Budge's beautiful secretary, Helen Bradford, insists on playing the part of the heiress, and so the three become involved in perilous adventure. Starring Robert Allen, with Florence Rice and Ward Bond

GUARD THAT GIRL

A Partner for Budge

IT was only too evident that the financial standing of Edwards Detective Agency was in a hopeless condition. Budge Edwards, its sole proprietor—nobody ever called him George, although that was his proper name—frowned ruefully at the statement he had just completed on a scribbling-pad.

One hundred and fifty dollars were overdue for rent of the two-roomed office in unfashionable Third Avenue; one hundred and five dollars were owing to Helen Bradford for salary; and forty-eight dollars sixty-two cents were owing to the "New York Times" for the insertion of "Want Ads."

Three hundred and three dollars and sixty-two cents in debt—and Budge had precisely three dollars twenty-five cents in his pockets, and nothing at all in the bank!

He flung down his pencil and lifted up his voice.

"Helen!"

From the outer office a golden-haired girl appeared with promptitude. She was graceful, beautiful and efficient, and she looked distinctly businesslike in a neat costume with a black bow at the neck. Budge tore from the scribbling-pad the sheet upon which he had been labouring and looked up at her as she stood beside his desk.

"How many cases have we handled in this last three months?" he asked gruffly.

"Two," she replied, "but only one of them paid us."

"Well, I've been figuring."

"What?" she challenged, her blue eyes studying his troubled, clean-shaven face which at the best of times could not be called handsome yet somehow was attractive.

"This"—he handed her the slip of paper. "Now don't you think you'd better quit?"

She glanced through the figures and handed back the slip.

"No," she said definitely.

"Well, I do. This agency is about to fold up!"

Even that statement she received with calm.

"What are you going to do?" she inquired.

"I'm going to get a job and pay off those debts."

"What doing?"

"Oh, police work of some kind. I guess."

A sound as of someone opening the door between the outer office and the corridor beyond it reached his ears, and he sat upright.

"Say, look busy," he urged swiftly. "It might be a customer!"

Helen moved across the room, and he straightened his tie and called loudly after her:

"Oh, Miss Bradford, 'phone the Hill-mark Bank and tell them the information they require will be ready by noon tomorrow."

Helen reached the door, but a young man had already invaded the outer office—a good-looking young man in a dark lounge suit with a soft-felt hat on the side of his head and a parcel and a book under his left arm. He grinned at Helen and swept past her into Budge's presence.

"Nice act!" he said approvingly. "Shame you wasted it!"

"Oh," growled Budge, "it's you!"

The invader's name was Larry Donovan, and he was a friend, not a client. He greeted Helen, removing his hat, and he greeted Budge, who complained:

"You gave us heart failure—though you were a client!"

"So I gathered!" laughed Larry. "Well, anyway, I bring gifts." He held out the book. "A novel for Helen."

"Thanks," said she, accepting the volume, "but I really haven't much time to read."

Larry laughed again at that, and walked across the carpet to a German sheep dog, lying watchfully at full length. He opened out the parcel and produced from it a massive aitch-bone.

"You didn't think I was going to forget you, did you, Lobo?" he said. "There you are, old fellow!"

The bone was deposited on the carpet in front of the dog's pointed nose, but Lobo was well trained and did not touch it. Instead, he looked up at his master.

Helen went out with the book.

"All right, boy," said Budge, "you can have it."

Sharp teeth immediately attacked the bone, and Larry wandered over to the desk.

"How did you get away this early?" asked Budge. "Did the bank go bust?"

"No," Larry quietly replied. "I quit."

"Pretty soft!" Budge looked at his watch. "Quits work for the day at one-fifteen!"

"Not for the day, boy," corrected Larry. "For good."

Brown eyes stared at him.

"You on the level?" demanded their owner.

"Absolutely."

"What's the matter? Did you have a fight with your dad?"

"No, with myself."

"Who won?"

"The bank—it got rid of me."

"All right," growled Budge, "we'll begin at the beginning. Why did you quit working at your father's bank?"

Larry drifted away to a window and looked down into Third Avenue.

"For three reasons," he said after a while, and jabbed a finger against a dusty pane to punctuate those reasons. "First, because I didn't like the work; second, because I'd never be any good at it; and third, because I was being promoted too fast."

"That's a goofy reason," quoth Budge, referring to the last of the three.

"No, it isn't, Budge." Larry returned to the desk. "Listen, I'm Lawrence Donovan, junior, and because of that I'm promoted over the heads of men who've worked eight and ten years for advancement. It isn't fair, and I don't like it."

Budge nodded understandingly, if not altogether approvingly.

"Is your dad sore?" he asked.

"Disappointed," said Larry, "but he understands."

"Got any plans?"

"Sure. I'm going to loaf around this office with you until I find a nice lively business to go into."

"Sorry," said Budge, "but you can't do that."

"Why not?"

"After to-day, no office." Budge handed him the little slip of paper. "It adds up to this, Larry. To-night we present the janitor with the key and our blessings."

"Wrong again, my thick-headed buffalo," said Larry and dropped the slip on the desk to take out a wallet from which he extracted a number of notes. "I have here my life savings—three hundred and forty-one dollars. That leaves approximately thirty-seven bucks for a mild party to-night. I said 'mild'—not 'wild.'"

The notes descended upon the blotting-pad, but Budge rejected them.

"Nothing doing!" he declared. "I've flopped at this business. Let me retire from it gracefully, will you?"

"No," protested Larry, "you can't close this office. I've got to have a place to loaf. Pick up that money!"

"No!"

"I always did say you were part mule. Why not sell me an interest in the business?"

"There isn't any business. You know that!"

"Yes, but there could be."

"How?"

"By simply taking one word out of your advertisement and off the front door out there. Have it read 'any ease' instead of 'any honest ease.'"

He went over to the door of the room and opened it. Helen was sitting at her own little desk in the outer office, looking at the book he had given her.

"Come in here a minute, Helen," he said; and as she rose and obeyed he proclaimed dramatically, "You're a witness! I've just bought an interest in the business!"

"What?" she exclaimed in astonishment.

"Say, how much of an interest?" Larry demanded of Budge, who replied slowly:

"Well, if you must be a sap, a half-interest."

"A half-interest," repeated Larry. "The firm is now Edwards and Donovan. Say, do I get my name on the door?"

"Oh, sure, in capital letters," jeered Budge and turned to Helen. "He wants a place to loaf. Here, take this money, June 6th, 1936.

pay the back rent, send a money order to the 'Times,' and the rest is yours."

Helen picked up the money, and then picked up the brown paper in which Lobo's witch-bone had been wrapped.

"We are now solvent," added Budge.

"And we have thirty-seven bucks left for a party to-night," Larry informed Helen, "and you're the guest of honour."

"Invitation accepted," she said with a little bow, and went out with the dog.

"Swell girl!" remarked Larry as the door was closed.

"The best," declared Budge.

"You interested?"

"No, but you are!"

"What makes you say that?"

Budge laughed derisively.

"Look here," he said, "I may be dumb, but I'm not blind. Why do you think I let you waste that three hundred bucks?"

"Because you know the firm needs new blood—somebody with ideas," retorted Larry.

"All right, but you're not fooling me."

"Oh, a detective, eh?" said Larry.

A Dangerous Case

HELEN went down to the ground floor to pay the rent and to the nearest post-office in Third Avenue to obtain the money order, taking Lobo with her. While she was gone an elderly man with grey hair, a lined face, and a stoop climbed the stairs to the third floor and entered the deserted outer office.

He was carrying an overcoat on his arm, although the day was warm, and there was an old-fashioned cut about his clothes which was accentuated by the wing collar and bow he affected.

Finding nobody in the outer office he tapped on the door of the inner room, opened it, and looked in upon Budge and Larry.

"I beg your pardon, gentlemen," he said in a cultured voice that made them jump because they had not heard the tap. "Which one of you is Mr. Edwards?"

"Why, I'm Edwards," replied Budge.

"This is Mr. Donovan, my partner. Won't you sit down?"

The visitor deposited his coat and hat on one chair and pulled up another to the side of the desk, viewing the two partners in appraising silence.

"Well, what can we do for you?" asked Larry.

"I take it for granted," said the visitor cautiously, "that anything I say here is confidential?"

"Oh, absolutely, sir," affirmed Budge.

"Most of our business is confidential," declared Larry.

"My name is Seranton."

The name was strange to Budge, but not to Larry.

"Joshua Seranton, isn't it?" he suggested—and received a sharp and rather suspicious glance.

"That's correct," admitted the visitor. "I'm an attorney and trustee for the estate of the late Carl Hudson, my closest friend, who died some fifteen years ago and left a daughter, Estelle, who was five years old at that time."

It seemed to Budge that the pause which followed this statement had to be filled, so he filled it.

"Is she sole heiress to the estate?" he inquired.

"According to the will," nodded Joshua Seranton, "she is the sole heiress, inheriting almost three million dollars on her twenty-first birthday—to be exact, at ten o'clock on Thursday night."

A calendar on the desk recorded the fact that it was Monday, the 22nd of April.

"Is she lost, or something?" asked Budge.

"No," was the reply, "but for her own safety I've kept her hidden ever since her father's death."

"Why?"

"Because of a foolish oversight in the drafting of his will. He made no provision for the disposition of his fortune if his daughter failed to reach the age of twenty-one and claim her inheritance."

"Who is next in line?" asked Larry.

"Five relatives would have sound legal claim if anything should happen to her."

"Why do you need us?" asked Budge.

Helen, who had just returned from the post-office, opened the door in time to hear that question and she neither advanced nor retreated. It seemed that the new partnership had begun with a case.

The lawyer, unaware of her presence, replied gravely:

"I concealed Estelle in Europe for many years. The Hudson relatives have continually tried to discover her whereabouts. They have even doubted her existence. So I have agreed to produce her at my office to-morrow, and that means Estelle Hudson will be known by sight and in a vulnerable position for almost three days."

Budge saw Helen at the door but appeared not to notice her.

"You want us to guard this young lady," he suggested. "Is that it?"

"More than that!" was the emphatic and surprising answer. "I want you to procure a girl who will impersonate Estelle Hudson from to-morrow until Thursday night at ten o'clock, at which time I will bring forth the real heiress to claim her heritage in safety. You may guard the girl you choose in your own way. Her safety is your problem; but the risk is great, and I do not wish to minimize it."

Budge drew a long breath and glanced sideways at Larry.

"Why are you so sure that somebody will strike at her?" he challenged.

"Someone has already struck!" Joshua Seranton leaned forward in his chair.

"I intended to send Estelle to the Hudson estate at Piermont. I hired a guard, posing as a chauffeur, and a woman to assist him, in the guise of a maid. I sent them on ahead to look the ground over. Their car was wrecked and burned. I'm convinced it was not an accident."

"Any evidence?"

"Nothing tangible," the lawyer admitted. "But I'm sure enough of the danger to feel justified in offering you a fee of ten thousand dollars for the service I require."

"How soon must you have an answer?"

"Immediately."

Budge turned to his partner.

"What do you think of it, Larry?"

"I don't like it."

"Ten thousand dollars," said Seranton, "is a lot of money."

"I know it is," returned Larry quietly, "and we sure could use it. But I certainly don't like the idea of putting some girl on the spot—setting her up like a duck in a shooting gallery!"

Budge concurred with that point of view, and he said in a tone of finality:

"I'm sorry, Mr. Seranton, but we can't handle it."

Helen stepped into the room and slammed the door behind her, attracting the attention of all three.

"I overheard Mr. Seranton's proposition," she said, advancing towards the desk, "and I don't think you should turn it down."

The lawyer rose to his feet, eyeing her with interest. Budge frowned.

"You don't understand, Helen!" he exclaimed. "Oh—er—Mr. Scranton, this is Miss Bradford. She's—"

"A member of our organisation," Larry completed for him.

"How d'you do?" murmured the lawyer.

"Budge," said Helen, "I understand the situation perfectly, and I'm willing to take Estelle Hudson's place for as long as is necessary."

"Oh, you can't do it!" exploded Larry.

"We won't let you!" declared Budge. "If you two can't keep me from getting hurt for a few days," retorted Helen, "I don't think much of you!" She smiled at the lawyer. "Is my appearance satisfactory, Mr. Scranton?"

"Perfectly," he assured her.

"Then it's settled."

"Listen, Helen," protested Larry, "this isn't an ordinary case. There are three million dollars at stake."

"And ten thousand for us," she reminded him. "If you and Budge don't agree, and Mr. Scranton is agreeable, I'll do it without your protection!"

"That threat made an end of argument. "All right," growled Budge, "you win! We'll take the case, Mr. Scranton. Give us the details."

The lawyer, beaming with satisfaction, stated that he would provide a car and a trustworthy maid who spoke French fluently.

"One of you had better pose as a chauffeur," he suggested.

"That's my spot," decided Budge, who was an ardent motorist.

"Fine! Then Mr. Donovan can be a friend Miss Hudson met in Europe."

"Fiancé," amended Larry with undisguised eagerness.

"Perhaps that would be better," said Scranton thoughtfully, and took out a wallet. "Here is an advance for suitable wardrobes. Get the best."

Notes showered upon the desk to the tune of several hundred dollars.

"The maid will report here at noon to-morrow. Her name is Jeanne Martin. You will meet the Hudson relatives at my office at one. Here is my card with the address."

"Have you any particular suspects?" inquired Budge.

"No, but most of them seem capable." Scranton took a folded sheet of paper from the wallet and put the wallet away. "Here is a complete list, in case you wish to investigate any of them."

He picked up his hat and overcoat and offered his hand to Helen while Budge studied the list.

"Thank you, my dear," he said warmly. "I sincerely hope that all my suspicions are unfounded. Oh, Mr. Edwards, you can pick up a sedan at the Jensen Motor Company and it will be charged to me. Good day."

After he had gone Budge gathered up the notes.

"Larry, you worked in a bank," he said. "Is this money real?"

Larry examined the notes, one by one, and pronounced them all to be genuine.

"D'you think he's nuts?"

"No," said Larry, "but I still don't like the set-up."

"I could do without the fiancé part of it," stated Helen with a toss of her golden head.

"Yeah," Larry responded, "but that gives me a chance to stick very close to you."

"Well, don't overdo it!"

"Hi," interposed Budge. "we'd better get busy—we got things to buy! I'll pick up a uniform and get that sedan."

"Right," said Helen. "I'm going shopping."

"And I'll go with Helen," said Larry; but Budge caught hold of his arm.

"Oh, no!" he barked. "You take this list over to Johnny Monohan at the 'Tribune' office. Tell him I sent you, and I want him to find out all he can about these Hudson relatives."

Larry accepted the list of names with none too good a grace. Helen thought of something else.

"How about Lobo while we're away?" she asked.

"He goes along as your dog," Budge promptly decided. "He's more protection than any six men I know."

Helen departed with some of the notes.

"If anything happens to her," quoth Larry fiercely, "I'll shoot every Hudson in the 'phone book!"

"And I'll help you," Budge declared. "Now get started. Take Monohan some cigars, but don't get good ones."

The Hudson Clan

LARRY, arrayed in a smart lounge suit, arrived at the office in Third Avenue, a little before noon, next morning, to find Helen in sole possession of the inner room. She was wearing a brand-new frock that looked expensive, with a fur-trimmed coat over it, and a fashionable little hat was perched sideways on her golden head.

On the floor stood a quantity of luggage—cabin-trunks, suitcases, and hat boxes. But none of the luggage looked new, and every piece of it was plastered with labels bearing the names of European hotels and railway stations. Larry, having surveyed Helen with admiring eyes, examined the luggage.

"Pretty smart of Budge," he commented, "to dig up all those stickers for the bags."

"In this kind of work," Helen informed him, "every little detail is important."

"I'll remember that." He gazed again at her rather flushed face. "Boy, you certainly look like three million dollars!"

"That," she returned calmly, "is also one of the details."

"I wasn't referring to the clothes—" he began; and then a slender slip of a girl ventured in upon them and said timidly:

"Miss Hudson?"

Larry, by no means satisfied, asked Reynolds what he was doing there. "Taking a walk," was the surly reply, "until that beast attacked me."

"Yes," Helen replied.
"I'm Jeanne Martin. Mr. Seranton sent me."

The newcomer, who was brown-haired, was dressed as a personal maid very well might be dressed—quietly and in dark clothes. She had a piquant little face and a very straight nose, and her eyes were as blue as Helen's. She held out an envelope addressed to that young lady, who extracted from it a brief letter of introduction signed by Joshua Seranton.

"We were expecting you, Jeanne," she said pleasantly. "We'll be leaving in a few minutes. You understand, of course, that this isn't an ordinary job?"

"Yes, I understand," replied the girl. "I'm to act as your maid, and Mr. Seranton explained that there might be danger."

The outer door was opened again, and Budge appeared. He stood six feet two inches in his socks, but he looked taller than ever in the uniform of a chauffeur.

"Your car's ready, Miss Hudson," he announced, touching his peaked cap for the benefit of the strange maid.

"All right," said Helen. "Jeanne, this is Edwards, my driver."

Budge beamed at the girl, who reached barely to his shoulder, and picked up some of the luggage. Down at the kerb, in the street below, a roomy and high-powered dark green sedan was standing, and when all the luggage had been stowed away in it Larry sat beside Helen in the back, and Budge helped Jeanne up into the front seat beside Lobo.

A grey coupé had drawn up close behind the sedan, and the man at its wheel had taken full stock of the four as they crossed the pavement. He was rather an unpleasant-looking fellow with beady brown eyes, thick lips, and a receding chin, and a little moustache did not improve his appearance. Budge passed between the two cars to get to the driving-seat, but he did not even notice the watcher.

He drove up-town to the office of Joshua Seranton, which was situated in Broadway not very far from Riverside Park, while in the big private room of that attorney-at-law the relatives of Estelle Hudson gradually assembled.

Aunt Catherine Manderville and her daughter Sarah were the first to arrive. Aunt Catherine was a middle-aged widow whose hair was turning white and whose tongue was even sharper than her features; her daughter was rather a mannish type of woman, who dressed as severely as she did her hair, wore spectacles, and looked tragic.

Next came Dr. Silas Hudson, brother of Estelle's father, who also wore spectacles and was understood to be a trifle eccentric but a clever physician.

Close on his heels came an enormously fat cousin, named Elwood Hudson, who was far younger than he looked and inclined to gabble; and then William Hudson, another cousin, arrived with his blonde wife Elaine.

Joshua Seranton stood behind his desk, gave a little cough, and addressed them collectively.

"You are all relatives of the late Carl Hudson," he said, "and in a minor degree interested in the disposition of his estate. Through your attorney, Mr. Kaufman, you have threatened undesirable publicity which makes it necessary for me to produce Estelle Hudson here to-day. I am prepared to do that at exactly one o'clock."

"Joshua," rapped Aunt Catherine, "you sound like a judge! Well, where is she?"

"Yes, where is she?" echoed William
June 6th, 1936.

Hudson, taking out his watch. "It's one o'clock now."

There came a rap at the door and Seranton's secretary entered to announce that Miss Hudson had arrived.

"Have her come in, please," directed the lawyer; and Helen presently entered with Larry, feeling none too comfortable under the concentrated gaze of so many pairs of eyes.

"You are very punctual, my dear," said Seranton, hurrying over to her. "This is Miss Estelle Hudson and her fiancé, Mr. Donovan." He led Helen across to Aunt Catherine and her daughter Sarah, who were sitting close together, and introduced them.

"They've been caring for the Hudson estate at Piermont," he said, "where you will live."

"We've been there so long," said Aunt Catherine in her curiously hard voice, "we feel like it was our own."

"I hope my coming back won't change that feeling, Aunt Catherine," murmured Helen.

"Well, my dear, you'll try to make you comfortable. You've turned out pretty—too pretty for a Hudson! Most women in our family look like Sarah, here!"

Helen smiled at Sarah, who made no response whatever, and was introduced to Silas Hudson, who greeted her formally.

"William Hudson, your first cousin," said Seranton.

"And my wife, Elaine," added that youngish man rather stiffly.

"We've waited a long time to meet you, Miss Hudson," remarked the blonde wife in a languid voice.

"I'm glad to have finally come home," said Helen.

"I hope you won't have reason to regret it!"

It seemed to Larry that there was a menace in the words, but Helen appeared not to notice. She was introduced to Elwood Hudson, who shook hands with her effusively.

"Well, well, well," he gabbled, "you were worth waiting for! Aunt Catherine was wrong—you're not pretty; you're beautiful! I—I'm bidding for a chance to take you around and show you the town. I know all the places, too. You see, my connection at the store—"

"He sells drapery and rugs," interrupted Aunt Catherine tartly. "The only places he knows are cafeterias."

Elwood Hudson sat down and gulped indignantly. Seranton conducted Helen and Larry to chairs, then retreated behind his desk.

"Miss Estelle," he said, adopting the manner Aunt Catherine had criticised as that of a judge, "will be twenty-one years of age at ten o'clock on Thursday night of this week, when, according to the terms of her father's will, the bulk of his estate will be transferred to her, and other beneficiaries will be informed of the amount of their legacies. You are all requested to be at the Hudson estate at that time. Thank you very much."

"Better not come till after dinner," said Aunt Catherine acidly. "Don't want the place cluttered up with you!"

The members of the Hudson clan began to drift away; first William and his wife, then Elwood, and then Silas. Budge and Jeanne were sitting on a bench in the outer office, with Lobo between them, and the doctor stopped on his way out to look at the dog.

"Trained?" he inquired.

"Yes, sir," replied Budge. "Police-trained in Germany, as a guard."

"Hum! Looks intelligent."

Aunt Catherine had walked with her daughter to the door.

"I'll ride out with Estelle," she said.

"You go back in our car."

"I'd rather you didn't!" returned Sarah vehemently.

"Why not?" snapped her mother.

"Stop being tragic!"

Sarah went dismally out from the office, and Aunt Catherine returned to the desk where Joshua Seranton was saying good-bye to Helen and Larry.

"I'll try and see you before Thursday, my dear," he said to Helen. "If you wish anything in the meantime, 'phone me."

"We'll take care of her, Joshua," said Aunt Catherine sharply. "I'm riding back with you, Estelle. Give us a chance to know each other." She made a grimace at Larry. "I'm not sure I'm going to like him!"

"But you will, though!" laughed Larry.

"What makes you think so?"

"Because I'm convinced I'm going to be very fond of you, Aunt Catherine."

"You'll be a novelty if you do!" retorted the dame. "Come on, Estelle."

Arrival

IN the dark green sedan, Larry occupied a seat in the back between Helen and Aunt Catherine, and Lobo sat bolt upright between Jeanne and Budge in the front. The car travelled smoothly, the city of New York was left behind, and the residential district of Yonkers gave place to country roads fringed with trees.

"Mr. Seranton was telling us about a car turning over and burning," remarked Larry as the crest of a hill was reached and he caught a glimpse of the Hudson River, sparkling in the afternoon sunshine, far below on the left. "Was it on this road?"

"We passed the place about a mile back," replied Aunt Catherine.

"I understand the chauffeur was killed in the accident."

"He wasn't a chauffeur and it wasn't an accident! The man was a detective and it was murder!"

"Are you sure?" asked Larry.

"I can't prove it."

"But why was he killed?" asked Helen.

"Because someone thought the woman riding in the car was you!"

Helen shivered slightly, and the subject was not pursued. In the front seat Jeanne Martin was fondling Lobo, who seemed to be pleased with her attentions.

"You like dogs?" suggested Budge.

"I like this one," said Jeanne.

"He's lucky!" quoth Budge, who had long since decided that the girl was nice to know.

Half an hour afterwards, on Aunt Catherine's instructions, the green sedan deserted the roadway for a winding drive, swept past trim lawns and borders gay with flowers, and was brought to a standstill by Budge at the foot of stone steps leading up to the front door of a big brownstone mansion.

An elderly butler opened the door and bowed beside it as Aunt Catherine mounted the steps with Helen and Larry.

"This is Campbell, my butler," she said. "He knew you when you were a small girl, Estelle."

A spacious hall was entered. A broad staircase stretched up from it to the floor above, and three shallow stairs led down to the principal rooms. At the foot of these stairs four servants were standing in a row—two females, two males. Aunt Catherine viewed them with scornful eyes.

"What's this?" she exclaimed. "Who lined you up like a lodge parade?"

"Miss Sarah thought it'd be a nice way for us to meet Miss Estelle," replied a middle-aged and plumpish woman at the left end of the row.

"Oh, she did, did she?" scoffed Aunt Catherine. "Well, this is Miss Estelle, and this is her fiancé, Mr. Donovan. Since you want to play soldiers, march up here and meet her. Norah, supposed to be a cook!"

The middle-aged and plumpish woman mounted the stairs and curtsied.

"It's a great pleasure you give us in coming—" she began in a quavering voice.

"No speeches!" interrupted Aunt Catherine severely. "Just nod and go about your business. Annie, her daughter."

The cook retreated; a rather untidy girl took her place and bobbed.

"Does general housework," said Aunt Catherine. "Practically useless! Joseph, my driver."

The man who took the maid's place was thin and elderly, and his cheeks were sunken.

"Had him since we used horses and buggies," said Aunt Catherine. "That's what he should be driving now! Reynolds!"

Joseph exchanged places with the long-featured and weak-chinned man who had watched from behind the wheel of a grey coupé in Third Avenue that morning, but who was now wearing a green apron.

"Hired him as a gardener," said Aunt Catherine. "Hope he is one!"

The servants disappeared about their duties.

"I imagine you'd like to see your room," Aunt Catherine said to Helen, leading the way to the staircase. "I'm giving you your father's room—I'll show you."

Helen followed her with Larry; but half-way up the stairs she leaned over the banisters to instruct the butler to help with the luggage, and the cook reappeared from the direction of the kitchen to inquire what time dinner should be served.

"Well, what time do we usually have it?" rapped her mistress. "Seven, of course."

Norah turned about and almost collided with Sarah, who had emerged from the drawing-room and was staring up at Helen.

"Oh, you scairt me!" exclaimed the cook.

"She's beautiful, isn't she?" said Sarah with venom in her voice. "Do you think mother likes her?"

"Why not?"

"Well, I don't!" was the fierce rejoinder. "I hate her!"

"Oh, now, Miss Sarah," the cook protested, "don't be talking like that. I—I must be getting the dinner."

She hastened back to the kitchen, and just then the front-door bell rang and Sarah reached the door before the butler and opened it—to stare at Elwood Hudson, who crossed the threshold encumbered with a golf-bag and a heavy suitcase.

Aunt Catherine looked down over the banisters from the landing above.

"Sarah, who was that?" she demanded.

"It's Cousin Elwood, mother," her daughter replied.

"You didn't let him in, did you? If you did, get rid of him!"

Elwood waddled forward and looked up.

"Oh, oh, auntie," he protested, "you know you're always glad to have me."

"You heard what I said at Joshua's office!" retorted Aunt Catherine.

"Yes, I did," responded the bulky intruder shamelessly, "and I understood. You meant that for the others."

Helen's luggage, and Larry's, was conveyed to their respective rooms; the green sedan was put away in a garage, and Elwood's two-seater was housed beside it.

Budge and Jeanne were both in the large meal-room of the servants' quarters, about three hours later, when Reynolds sauntered in from the grounds with a cigar in his hand. He had discarded his green apron and with it his air of servility. He asked for a match, and he gazed suspiciously from one to the other as he lit the cigar.

"You're the new driver, eh?" he said to Budge. "Been a chauffeur long?"

"Too long," drawled Budge.

"Drove for a lot of people, I suppose, and got good references?"

"Good enough to satisfy Scranton and Miss Hudson!"

That was a rebuke, but Reynolds did not seem to mind it.

"Did you hear what happened to the other fellow they hired to drive for her?" he asked.

"Sure."

"Better keep your eyes open!"

"Thanks for the tip," retorted Budge. "But I never sleep—at the wheel!"

The First Arrow

IN the dining-room that evening, after the coffee stage had been reached, Elwood Hudson—who had eaten plentifully and with relish—beamed all over his fat face at Aunt Catherine, seated primly in a high-backed chair at the top of the table.

"Auntie," he said, "the dinner was delicious."

"Hope it disagrees with you!" snapped his unintentional hostess, and he looked across at Helen.

"I suppose you'll be returning to Europe when the estate is settled, Cousin Estelle?" he queried.

"I doubt it very much," Helen replied.

Lobo, who was lying on a rug by the fireplace, suddenly sprang up with a growl, streaked across the room to an open french window, and jumped the rail of a terrace outside it. A startled cry rang out in the darkness of the grounds, and Larry was instantly on his feet.

"What is it?" gasped Aunt Catherine as he whipped a six-shooter from a pocket of his dinner-jacket.

"A couple more minutes of that wire," said Budge, "and they'd have finished him. He's got a bad smash on his head, too!"

"Somebody outside," he answered, and strode forth on to the terrace. "Whoever you are, you'd better stand still out there!"

He vaulted the rail and came to a tall figure shrinking away from the snarling dog against some bushes.

"All right," he said sternly, "step out into the light!"

Aunt Catherine appeared on the terrace.

"Oh, it's only Reynolds, the gardener!" she exclaimed as the tall figure moved forward and stood revealed in the light from the dining-room.

Budge came running round the house and caught hold of Lobo. Larry, by no means satisfied, asked Reynolds what he was doing there.

"Taking a walk," was the surly reply, "until that beast attacked me." "You must have sneaked up, or he wouldn't have gone for you!"

Reynolds exhibited a half-consumed cigar.

"A man doesn't sneak with a lighted cigar in his face, does he?" he countered.

"No harm done," said Aunt Catherine. "Come on, Larry! We'll play some bridge."

Larry put away his gun and mounted the steps of the terrace. Reynolds scowled at Budge.

"You'd better keep him tied up," he rasped. "Something might happen to him."

"He can take care of himself," said Budge.

The gardener walked off along the path towards the front of the house, and Jeanne came running round from the back.

"What was it?" she asked anxiously.

"Nothing," returned Budge. "I guess Lobo doesn't like Reynolds."

"Neither do I," she confessed.

Sarah Hudson took no part in the game of bridge in the drawing-room, but sat on a chesterfield knitting. Larry had Helen for partner; Aunt Catherine had Elwood, whose bidding was erratic. For a little over two hours they played, and then Aunt Catherine folded her arms.

"Well, I hate to go to bed this early," she said, "but I can't stand any more of Elwood in one night! What do we owe?"

Larry totalled the score. "Just thirty-eight dollars," he announced.

"Huh!" Aunt Catherine gazed witheringly at her partner.

On a lawn facing the drawing-room windows there was a wooden seat. Budge was sitting on it with Jeanne beside him and Lobo was lying at his feet. They had been there practically ever since the incident with Reynolds.

"Miss Hudson will want me," Jeanne said abruptly, and stood up. "Good-night—and thanks a lot."

"Thanks for what?" asked Budge, holding the little hand she offered.

"For letting me sit out here and talk with you," she replied.

"Letting you?" Budge chuckled. "Don't be silly, you're doing me a favour!"

"I'd like to ask you something," she said earnestly. "Do you think Miss Hudson's really in danger?"

"Oh, probably not. We don't know yet."

"I hope she isn't—she's so nice." The little hand was removed from the big one that squeezed it. "You'll be careful, won't you?"

"Oh, sure."

They said good-night again, and then the girl tripped away into the house.

June 6th, 1936.

Budge dropped back on the seat, and Lobo made little complaining noises.

"So you're jealous, eh?" said Budge, patting the sleek head. "Well, maybe you've got a right to be, boy. Come on, let's you and I scout around a little."

The bridge party had deserted the card-table; Sarah had retired for the night, and Aunt Catherine was waiting to go, but Elwood caressed his double chin and hovered, studying Larry.

"You know, Mr. Donovan," he said, "I've seen your face somewhere, but I can't quite place—"

"Certainly you have, you idiot!" interrupted Aunt Catherine. "To-day in Joshua's office! Come on! Don't you suppose engaged people ever want to be alone?"

She marched him off with her to the stairs, and Larry promptly slipped his arm round Helen's waist.

"Must you do that?" she demured.

"Oh, absolutely," he assured her.

"We're engaged!"

"Supposed to be," she corrected.

"Got to be realistic, anyway. Can't tell who might be watching."

"Funny you should say that," said she. "I've had a feeling that someone is watching, several times—someone I couldn't see."

"Oh, that's nerves," Larry pronounced reassuringly. "To-day's been a strain."

"Perhaps I'm just tired." She tried to shake off a feeling of foreboding. "I think I'll go to my room now."

"I'll walk up with you," he decided.

The butler was in the hall and watched them ascend the stairs together. Jeanne was on the landing, with a little tray in her hand, and she flitted ahead of them and opened the door of the room that had been Helen's father's and switched on the lights.

"What time do you think you'll have breakfast?" asked Larry.

"Oh, about nine o'clock," Helen replied.

"I guess I can get up that early! Now you get some sleep—and don't worry. Budge and I are going to take turns watching outside. Good-night, dear."

She dismissed the maid and entered the bed-room, but as she closed the door something whizzed past her head, and the metal barb of a long arrow buried its point in the woodwork.

She caught at her breath, then opened the door in haste.

"Larry," she called, "come in here a minute!"

Larry came racing back from the stairs, and Jeanne followed. Helen pointed to the arrow.

"Have you searched the room?" asked Larry.

"No."

Out came his gun, and he looked round the well-appointed bed-room. Curtains were drawn over the windows, but no one was concealed behind them.

The door of a wardrobe cupboard was locked and the key was in the lock, but he opened the door and made sure that no one was in among the frocks Jeanne had hung upon a rail earlier in the evening. He went back to the two girls, who were staring at the arrow.

"Well, whoever put that there isn't here now," he growled.

"Pretty, isn't it?" said Helen.

"Murderous!" He tugged the arrow from the woodwork. It was of the type used by natives for hunting big game. "A good bow would drive that clean through a horse!"

A piece of paper was rolled round the shaft of the arrow and held there by a thin rubber band. He snapped the band and opened out the piece of paper. On it, in block letters, was written:

"Give up your inheritance. The third arrow will kill."

Helen read it over his shoulder and took the piece of paper from him and gave it to Jeanne.

"It's only fair that you should see this," she said. "Well, what's the next move, Larry?"

"To get out of here!" he gritted.

But Helen shook her head.

"I wouldn't do that, and you know it," she said doggedly.

"All right then," Larry took the note from Jeanne. "We won't say anything about this for the present. Keep this door locked! Budge and I will see that nobody gets near the windows."

"Miss Hudson," ventured Jeanne, "perhaps you'd like me to stay here with you to-night. I could sleep on the chaise longue."

A long chair, comfortable as any sofa, stood quite close to the bed. Helen glanced at it.

"You aren't afraid?" she asked.

"No," declared Jeanne. "Please let me."

"I'd appreciate it very much," confessed Helen gratefully.

Larry went off with the arrow and the note, but he did not descend the stairs until he had heard the key turned in the lock of the door. Sarah Hudson peeped out from her room farther along a broad corridor, and her dark eyes watched him till he had disappeared from sight.

The Second Arrow

OUT in the grounds, Budge circled the house with Lobo at his heels.

He passed the garage and the back door, passed the terrace, eastern side of the house, and was turning a corner when Lobo, with a sudden growl, flew ahead into a shrubbery.

Budge heard a snarl of rage, a strange swishing sound, hurried footsteps, and with a six-shooter in his hand, plunged through the bushes ahead. In the faint light of the stars he glimpsed Lobo, motionless on the ground and the figure of a man scurrying off along the drive.

He fired, and the figure swung round and fired back, twice. Larry heard the first shot as he reached the hall, and he got the front door open and jumped the steps outside it before the second shot was fired. He saw the dark figure whirl about, and he heaved himself at Budge's legs and brought him to the ground with a thud just as the second shot rang out.

Two bullets sang harmlessly over them as they sprawled together on the gravel, and for a while they were winded. Then Budge sat up.

"Lucky thing you dropped me with that tackle of yours," he said.

"I wasn't sure it was you," said Larry, getting to his feet. "What happened?"

"I don't know, but I think he got Lobo."

They ran together back to the bushes, while in the house Aunt Catherine hammered on the door of Helen's room, her hair in curlers and an old-fashioned horse-pistol in her hand. She was in her night-clothes and an ugly dressing-gown.

"Estelle, are you all right in there?" she cried.

"Yes, Aunt Catherine," Helen called back.

She and Jeanne had undressed for bed, but they had slipped on wraps at the sound of the shots. Helen opened the door and Aunt Catherine invaded the room.

"What was that?" she demanded.

"Shots out in the grounds I think" replied Helen.

Budge and Larry had found Lobo lying on his side with a loop of wire round his neck, and the other end of the wire was attached to a pole. Budge loosened the loop and removed it, but Lobo remained inert.

"Think he'll be all right?" asked Larry.

"He's still breathing," replied Budge gruffly. "A couple more minutes of that wire and they'd have finished him. He's got a bad smash on his head here, too!"

Larry looked up at the windows of Helen's room.

"You'd better get him to a vet," he suggested. "There's probably one in the village."

A car had slid silently out from the drive into the road beyond the gates and had turned left. From the other direction Reynolds entered the drive on a bicycle while Budge was carrying the unconscious dog to the sedan in the garage; but the gardener deserted the gravelled way for the grass and pedalled round to the back door where Sarah Hudson was waiting, and handed him a note.

Budge saw the two at the door as he backed out from the garage, but he was too concerned about Lobo to trouble his head about them just then. He drove off as fast as he could go to Piermont.

When he returned from that village, Larry was where he had left him, examining the wire which had very nearly choked the dog, and the pole to which the wire was attached. He had found a label on the pole, which read: "Jackson's Garden Tools"; and he had also found a piece of cloth, evidently torn from a trouser-leg.

The two sat together on a stone bench and talked.

"Johnny Monohan," commented Budge, "says that Elwood Hudson seems silly but is no fool."

"He also says that Dr. Silas Hudson's only diversion is archery," Larry reminded him. "He's an expert."

"All the more reason why he wouldn't use an arrow for a warning," decided Budge.

"A rake-handle was used on Lobo—and Reynolds is a gardener."

"Yeah," said Budge, rubbing his chin which was already beginning to need a shave. "You know, that fellow puzzles me. I don't understand Sarah Hudson sneaking out of the house to hand him a note. But then again, look what's just happened! I take Lobo to the village and I see William Hudson and that blonde wife of his going into the drug-store! They're supposed to be in town!"

"Think I ought to call up that fellow Scranton?" asked Larry.

Budge shrugged broad shoulders.

"It's our headache," he said, "but, boy, we sure could use Philo Vance."

"Yeah," said Larry wryly, "he'd fit this piece of cloth into somebody's trousers before morning—in a book!"

"Lobo almost got a piece of him, didn't he?" said Budge. "Next time he will—any time and any place they meet!"

Larry thrust the piece of cloth into a pocket.

"How long did the vet say he'd be laid up?" he asked eagerly.

"Only for a day or so," Budge replied. "Why?"

"Number three!" growled Larry. "And they meant it!" cried Helen. "Jeanne was sleeping there, but she jumped over to protect me."

"I've got an idea! We'll let everybody around here think he's dead!"

"It's a good idea," approved Budge. "All right, Larry. I'll take this stuff up to my room and lock it up. You go to bed—I'll watch the rest of the night."

Dawn was not far away and Larry felt none too warm in his thin dinner-jacket suit, but he protested that they were supposed to be taking turns.

"I can sleep in the daytime, you can't," said Budge. "Go on, now. Beat it!"

"Okay," Larry stood up. "Boy, you sure named it when you called this job a headache! You know, I think I will phone Mr. Joshua Scranton and spoil his night's sleep."

"Suit yourself."

The rest of the night passed uneventfully, but in the morning Larry descended to breakfast after all the others were seated at table because he had overslept. He received ironical greetings, and walked round to Helen.

"Good-morning, darling," he said in the approved style of a lover. "Did you sleep well?"

"Sleep?" snorted Aunt Catherine. "With the garden turned into a shooting gallery?"

"How's Lobo?" asked Helen. "The vet couldn't save him," Larry lied regretfully. "I'm awfully sorry, darling."
