"Well, don't stand there like a wooden Indian!" snapped Aunt Catherine. "Sit down and have your coffee!"

Larry seated himself beside Helen and the meal progressed. Elwood asked if anybody would care to join him at golf.

"Nobody in their right mind!" Aunt Catherine said crushingly.

"I was going to suggest a swim," said Larry, and Helen declared that she would like a swim.

"Well, wait till an hour after eating," said Aunt Catherine. "You'll get cramp if you don't!"

When breakfast was over, Sarah went off with the professed intention of writing letters. Elwood attired himself in a particularly noisy-patterned suit of plus-fours and disappeared with his golf-bag, and for over half an hour Helen and Larry wandered about the extensive grounds before they changed into bathing things and met again on a wooden pier beside a backwater of the Hudson River which wound in and out of the estate.

Jeanne was in attendance on Helen, but she had not brought the jug of wine and glasses that stood on a glass-topped table at the edge of the pier.

"Thirsty?" asked Helen, filling one of the glasses from the jug.

"No," said Larry, "and I don't think you are, either." He took the glass from her hand. "This may be all right, but we're not taking any chances."

The wine was tossed into the water, and he marched Helen off to a spring-board.

"Ladies first," he said.

"And maybe you think I can't!" retorted Helen, and dived gracefully into the stream and struck out for the opposite bank.

Larry dived after her, and they were swimming together when Budge sauntered up to Jeanne on the pier. Considering the fact that he had been up all night, he looked remarkably fresh and fit.

"Nice-looking team, eh?" he said. "Good swimmers, too—both of 'em."

"Yes," agreed Jeanne. "How are you to-day?"

"A little sleepy," confessed Budge, "but outside of that I'm okay."

"I'm awfully sorry about last night. I was terribly frightened when I heard the shots. I thought perhaps you'd been hurt."

"Well, you were almost right," said Budge, "but I'm sure glad to hear you say that, because I—well—er—I mean it's mighty nice of you to worry about me like that."

They wandered off to a seat against the rough-cast wall of a boat-house. Above their heads was a narrow window, almost like a transom over a door, only there was no door. Unnoticed by them this window was opened, slowly and noiselessly, as Helen and Larry clambered up out of the water on to the pier.

"What really happened last night?" asked Helen.

"Enough to convince me that Seranton's suspicions are correct," Larry replied. "How about a boat-ride? We can talk safely out there."

A skiff was tied to the pier, and they got into it, wet as they were, and Larry took the oars and pulled out into mid-stream.

"We could walk along the shore there, and still watch them," suggested Budge, and he and Jeanne rose and walked towards the bank.

Through the narrow window sped an arrow with such violence that its metal head went clean through the side of the skiff close to Helen, and Larry broke off in the middle of a sentence to yell to Budge.

"They're coming in!" exclaimed Jeanne.

"Something's wrong," decided Budge.

They ran to the pier and waited for the boat.

"What happened?" asked Budge, as Larry helped Helen up on to the pier and followed her.

"That!" said Larry, and handed him the arrow.

It was precisely like the one that had imbedded itself in the bed-room door the night before, and a piece of paper was rolled round its shaft. Budge snapped the rubber band that held the paper and they all read this very brief warning, written in block letters like the previous one.

"Number two. Last warning. Third will kill."

"Where did it come from?" asked Budge.

"Somewhere near the house, I think," returned Larry, and they all looked in that direction. Sarah was walking towards the garage with Reynolds, and Reynolds was holding a long package.

"You and Jeanne catch up with them, and find out what's in that parcel," said Larry.

Budge handed him his own gun and went off with the maid.

"You come over with me where there's some protection," Larry said to Helen, and he led her across to the seat Budge and Jeanne had occupied. The narrow window was closed.

"Now you've got to listen to me," he went on masterfully, "because you're going to give this thing up and get out of here to-day!"

"You're wrong, Larry," she declared obstinately. "I won't do that!"

The window above their heads was opened again, slowly, soundlessly.

"Sweetheart," pleaded Larry, "if somebody can deliver arrows numbers one and two where and when they like, what's to stop number three? You've got to get away now!"

"You know what's at stake," Helen reminded him.

"I don't care what's at stake, nickels or millions! You're leaving with me!"

"What right have you to dictate to me?" she rebelled.

"The best right in the world," he said, "I love you!"

"Larry, you know I care." She put a hand on his shoulder. "But I'm going to see this thing through, and you're June 6th, 1936.

going to help me. I'll stay in the house from now on, if you think it's safer."

"I do," he said, abandoning argument. "There's thirty-six hours to go, but it's to-night I'm most afraid of."

"How can anyone reach me at night?" she countered. "The windows locked, the doors locked, and you and Budge on guard outside the house?"

"To-night," decided Larry, "Budge watches out there, but I'm staying right close to your door. For the last time, Helen, will you give it up?"

"No," she answered stubbornly.

The Secret Way

HE went with her into the house, and after they were both dressed he put the second arrow in a drawer of the dressing-chest in her room. They heard the sound of a car in the drive, and then the voice of Elwood.

"Elwood back from golf, eh?" said Larry. "I think I'll find out if he's really been playing."

"How can you tell?" asked Helen.

"By his clubs."

He went out on to the stairs and looked down into the hall. The butler had admitted the golfer, but Aunt Catherine had sailed out from one of the rooms.

"Well, I suppose you broke the course record—for conversation!" she decided.

"No, auntie," said Elwood, "what I really had was a seventy-nine, but Willie—"

"Willie?"

"Oh, yes, I forgot to mention it. He and Elame are staying in the village. I played with them."

"I wouldn't talk about that!" snapped Aunt Catherine.

"Oh, I'm not so stupid as you imagine."

The butler approached with the player's golf-bag.

"Your clubs, sir," he said. "You left them in the car."

Elwood took the bag; Larry went on down the stairs and greeted him.

"Hallo," said Elwood. "Told the caddy to clean these clubs before I left, but I don't suppose he did." He reached a hand into the bag, but withdrew it with an agonised "Ouch!"

"What did you do?" asked Larry.

"Mmm!" Elwood sucked a wounded finger. "It's something sharp in there!"

Larry took the bag from him and fished out from it an arrow similar to the other two arrows, but with no message rolled round its shaft. Aunt Catherine had gone off, but the butler stared.

"Did you play golf with this?" demanded Larry dryly.

"Certainly not!" Elwood viewed the arrow with round eyes. "I can't understand how it got in the bag! What is it?"

"It's a big-game-hunting arrow, capable of killing a bear. They aren't common."

Elwood did not seem to notice the note of accusation in Larry's voice.

"Someone must have put it in my bag by mistake," he said. "They have a range at the club."

"Archers don't use this type of arrow on targets!"

"Well, it cut my finger," complained Elwood. "and probably scratched some of my clubs. If somebody put it in there for a joke I can't see the humour of it. Well, you'll have to excuse me—I must get some iodine for this wound."

He lumbered up the stairs, taking his golf-bag with him, and Larry presently ascended to Helen's room with the arrow and compared it with the one he had put away in the drawer.

"Identical!" he said. "Now I'll compare this with No. 1, that Budge has."

"Well, where did this third one come from?" asked Helen.

"I'll tell you later. You keep this door locked."

He went off to the garage and climbed some stairs to a room above it which had been allotted to Budge. Budge himself had just entered.

"Oh, that parcel," he said, "was one Sarah had given Reynolds to post—at least, that was his story, and it was certainly addressed to someone in New York. Say, what are you doing with those arrows?"

"Where's the one we found in the door?"

"Locked up in that steel cabinet with the other exhibits. Where did you get two?"

Larry explained, and was handed the key of the locker; but when the tall door was opened there was no sign of any arrow inside.

"It was there this morning," said Budge blankly. "And so was the rake-handle and that first note."

"Boy," said Larry grimly, "from now on I'm not letting Helen out of my sight, except to sleep—and then I'm watching the door!"

"And if I see anyone sneaking around to-night," declared Budge, "I'll shoot first and find out who it is after they've fallen!"

"You'll probably get Reynolds at the first shot!" Larry handed back the gun he had borrowed. "Now put those arrows where nobody will find them."

Helen stayed indoors throughout the rest of the day, which passed without incident. Bridge followed dinner, and in the region of half-past ten Aunt Catherine decided on bed.

Jeanne slept on the chaise longue in Helen's room, and Larry set a chair outside the locked door, but found that sitting on it induced drowsiness, and paced up and down the corridor. Occasionally he looked out of a window, and in the faint light of a newly risen moon saw Budge on duty in the grounds.

Helen slept peacefully in her bed, but Jeanne was restless on the chaise longue. One of the curtains had not been drawn completely across a french window which opened on to a little balcony, and as the moonlight strengthened objects in the room became visible.

Suddenly a portion of the panelling near the fireplace moved outwards, a gloved hand came round it, and Jeanne, roused by a creaking sound, gave a shriek as she turned her head and saw an arrow projecting from the opening.

Helen awakened and sat bolt upright.

"What is it? What is it?" she cried.

Jeanne flung aside coverlet and sheets and heaved herself from the chaise-longue on to the bed to protect Helen with her body.

"The wall!" she gasped. "That panel!"

They heard the twang of a bow-string, the whir of an arrow in flight, and then the wall was complete again and Larry was banging at the door.

"Helen! Helen!" he shouted. "Let me in!"

Jeanne slid from the bed and switched on the lights, then hurriedly she and Helen donned wraps, and Helen opened the door. Larry rushed in, his gun in one hand and an electric torch in the other. He saw the arrow, sticking in the padded side of the chaise longue, and he flew to the french window, opened it, and stepped out on to the balcony.

Budge was near the slubbery below, and he hailed him.

"If anyone comes out of the house," he yelled, "drop him!"

He went back to the terrified girls, and he looked down at the arrow. No slip of paper was rolled round the shaft of this one.

"Number three!" he growled.
"And they meant it!" cried Helen.
"Jeanne was sleeping there, but she jumped over to protect me."
"Lucky she did!"

In at the open door stalked Aunt Catherine, complete with curlers, old-fashioned dressing-gown, and horse-pistol. Behind her came Sarah, fully dressed, and Elwood in a very jazzy dressing-gown over pyjamas, carrying a golf club as weapon.

"What's going on in here?" demanded Aunt Catherine sharply.

"Nothing," replied Larry, "but it was almost a murder! There must be a secret panel in this wall! D'you know how it works?"

Aunt Catherine disclaimed all knowledge of secret panels and commanded Sarah and Elwood to go to bed. They disappeared with reluctance while Larry searched everywhere for a hidden spring, and after a few minutes Aunt Catherine left him to his task, closing the door behind her.

Larry's groping fingers encountered a tiny lever, concealed in the moulding of a panel, and a section of the woodwork opened outwards like a door. He pulled it wider, and the light of his torch shone down a steep stairway no more than eighteen inches wide.

"Larry," pleaded Helen nervously, "don't go down that stairway, please!"

"Why not?" he asked gruffly.

"He may still be hiding there!"

"I hope he is!" Larry shook off her detaining hand and dived through the opening, the torch in his left hand, the gun in his right.

In the Den

AT the bottom of the narrow stairs was what looked like a blank wall; but the light of the torch shone on a metal catch, and Larry raised the catch and pushed. The wall, which was really a masked door, swung outwards, and he found himself in a large room, close beside an elaborate mantelpiece.

He had never seen the room before, but with the aid of the torch he picked out panelled walls, bookshelves reaching from floor to ceiling, a costly rug upon a drugget-covered floor, furniture, including a carved desk, and a french window which was wide open.

On his right, as he stood looking about him, was a door which evidently communicated with the hall, and every muscle in his body became tense as he heard the handle of that door turned.

But it was Aunt Catherine who entered the room, switching on the lights as she did so, and seemingly not in the least surprised to find him there.

"So you found out how to work that thing, eh?" she said, advancing towards him with a little grimace. "I guess our friend got away."

"I thought you didn't know about the stairway?" challenged Larry.

"I didn't," she replied, "but I guessed it led down here. Carl Hudson probably had it built so that he could get from his den to his bed-room without using the hall. He was just as crazy as the rest of the family."

"I see," said Larry, though by no means convinced. "Is this room used now?"

"No." She shook her head. "We keep it locked—I don't know why it wasn't."

"Well, that window isn't locked, either!" He strode over to the french window and out on to the terrace beyond it. Budge was on the lawn and he hailed him.

"See anyone come out of here?" he shouted.

"No," Budge returned; and then Aunt Catherine appeared in the doorway.

"Young man," she commanded, "come in here a minute!"

Budge put away his gun, mounted to the terrace, and followed Larry and the dame into the room which had been Carl Hudson's den.

"What agency do you work for?" she rapped.

"I—I don't understand," stammered Budge.

"Oh, stop acting dumb! I know you're a detective, or supposed to be one, and that he's in on it, too!"

"Why, Aunt Catherine—" began Larry; but she cut him short.

"Don't try to fool me!" she cried. "He's too good a driver to be a professional chauffeur, and you might as well admit it!"

Silently Budge produced a professional card which she snatched from him.

"Edwards Detective Agency," she read aloud. "'Any honest case,' Hu! Surprised Joshua hired you! He thinks most honest men are idiots! Are you Edwards?"

"Yes," Budge admitted sheepishly. "I suppose you saw all the precious relatives at Joshua's office?"

"I watched them come out, yes."

"Well, who's trying to kill this girl?"

"I'd like to ask your gardener some questions."

"Reynolds?" She tossed her head. "Bosh, he's my man! Hired him myself! He's a detective, and a darned good one!"

That was a shock for Larry and for Budge, and they had not recovered from it when the voice of Reynolds rang out from the drive:

"All right, stand there unless you want me to shoot a piece out of your backbone!"

Aunt Catherine swept out on to the terrace.

"What is it, Reynolds?" she called out.

"A prowler I caught," was the reply.

"Bring him in here!"

Reynolds drove a man before him up the steps on to the terrace, jabbing a six-shooter into his back, and just inside the french window the man stood revealed as Dr. Silas Hudson, a scared but distinctly guilty expression on his flabby face.

"Silas!" exclaimed Aunt Catherine. "What was he doing here?"

"I don't know," confessed Reynolds, "but he parked his car on the edge of the grounds, sneaked up here, saw the lights on, and settled down to wait. So I jumped him."

Silas had nothing to say; he looked not altogether unlike a hunted animal.

"He couldn't have shot the arrow, then," remarked Larry.

"Another arrow?" Reynolds looked astonished.

"How do you know about the arrows?" barked Budge.

"I found one in your locker. The note with it told its own story. I put back everything except the wire from the rake handle, a little while ago."

The doctor staggered up with his hands on the arms of the chair, and his face was ghastly.

"Thanks," said Budge; and then Aunt Catherine faced the captured doctor.

"Silas, what were you doing here?" she demanded.

Silas moistened his lips with his tongue.

"There are three German medical books on the shelves of this room," he said, "that are priceless. They're rotting in the dust when they could be of use to humanity. I meant to take them."

Budge made a scornful noise in his throat, but Aunt Catherine said:

"All right, get 'em and get out! And be here to-morrow night before ten o'clock!"

Silas Hudson went eagerly over to the book-shelves and from one of them greedily removed three volumes with which he returned to the french window.

"You're not going to let him go, are you?" howled Reynolds.

"Certainly I am," replied Aunt Catherine; but the detective caught hold of the doctor and stared at the books.

"Anybody here read German?" he asked plaintively.

"I do," said Larry, and he walked over and read the titles on the backs of the books. "The histories of one thousand cancer cases, by Von Dresen of Vienna. Well, I hope they help you, doctor."

Silas went off across the terrace with the books, but Reynolds was still dissatisfied.

"You know you're making a mistake," he complained. "He's mixed up in this!"

"Ridiculous!" fumed Aunt Catherine. "I know Silas Hudson. He'd kill five people for those three books, but money wouldn't tempt him."

"Just the same," decided Reynolds, "I'm gonna tail him to his ear and make sure he goes."

He went off across the terrace, and Aunt Catherine tilted her head at Budge.

"Well, Mr. Detective Edwards," she said challengingly, "who do you like now?"

"I'm not satisfied with Reynolds yet," Budge replied slowly. "I don't like Elwood particularly."

"Nobody likes Elwood," she retorted. "Here's a tip! When you solve all this mystery, you'll find Willie Hudson and his slinky blonde wife with their fingers in the pie!"

"They've been staying in the village the last few days," remarked Larry.

"Oh, you know that, too? I suppose you'll be suspecting me next?" She glanced in at the dark, secret way, then turned towards the hall. "Good grief. I'll bet those girls are having fits upstairs!" she exclaimed. "I'll go tell 'em the show's over for to-night—and I hope it is!"

"Tell them I'm sleeping down here in case anyone tries to reach those stairs," said Larry.

"Smart idea," she approved. "Good-night."

"Do you really suspect the old girl?" asked Budge, after she had gone.

"Well, not of shooting the arrows," Larry replied, "but she knows a lot more than we think. You'd better watch the upper floor, Budge—Reynolds will take care of the grounds, I guess. I'll ring Scranton and tell him what's happened."

Budge nodded and departed; Larry went to a telephone which was on the desk and put through a call to the lawyer's house in White Plains, about ten miles away. But Joshua Scranton, he was told by a servant, had not returned from a theatre.

"Well, ask him to 'phone Mr. Donovan, at the Hudson estate, the moment he gets in, will you?" said Larry.

Reynolds entered the room from the terrace as he hung up.

"I had a talk with Dr. Silas," he announced, "and I guess he's in the clear. I'd be glad to work with you fellows, though—we may be pointing in the same direction."

"Maybe," said Larry, and looked at his wrist-watch. "We'll work together, by all means."

The erstwhile gardener went out at the french window and Larry closed it. It was very quiet in the room as he sat waiting for the telephone bell to ring, and a creaking sound in the secret way brought him to his feet with his gun in his hand. Someone was descending the narrow stairway.

"All right," he said loudly, "step out into the room!"

The panel that was really a door was pushed more widely open, and he pocketed the gun in haste, for it was Helen who walked out into the room, carrying an eiderdown quilt.

"I just wanted to bring you a cover and to tell you of my suspicions," she said. "I'm afraid of Sarah."

"Sarah?" he echoed, taking the quilt from her and dropping it on a chair.

"Yes, the way she looks at me. The cook told Jeanne that she was jilted in her only love affair. She's hated the world and herself ever since. She's mad about her mother and insanely jealous of her, and Aunt Catherine's been very nice to me."

"Hmm!" mused Larry. "She's a powerful woman with strength enough to handle a bow. She may feel that you're taking this home away from her, too. We'll keep an eye on her. Anyway, I guess the excitement's over for to-night."

"Oh, I hope so!" said Helen. "And you will be careful, won't you?"

The telephone bell rang, making both of them jump.

"That's Scranton," said Larry. "I put through a call for him. Good-night, dear."

He kissed her and she went back through the secret way while he went to the telephone. Scranton was on the other end of the line, and he listened to all the things Larry had to tell him without interrupting. Then:

"Mr. Donovan," he said gravely, "I can't think of anyone except Catherine and myself who would know that panel existed. Sarah might, possibly. Please don't take the slightest chance. You're dealing with a very resourceful person."

"We're finding that out!" said Larry.

The Winged Death

BUDGE, in his echauffeur's uniform, entered the den next morning to find Larry reclining in his shirt-sleeves on two chairs, one of which was set against the secret door. The eider-down quilt covered him; his dinner-jacket lay on a club-kerb beside the fireplace. Budge tapped him on the shoulder, and he sat up with a start.

"Did you rest well, Mr. Donovan?"

"Don't be funny!" yawned Larry.

"I've got a crick in my neck!"

"You've got a visitor at the window, too!" said Budge.

It was Reynolds at the french window, and Larry admitted him.

"I just thought I'd tell you," said the detective, "that I'd be in the village most of the day. I can't very well 'phone from here, and I'm tracing that clue I told you about."

"Right," said Larry. "If anything breaks, I'll 'phone a message to the post office."

Reynolds went back to his bicycle, which he had left in the drive, and Larry fastened his collar, and was tying his dress-bow, when the door from the hall was opened and Jeanne entered the room.

"Miss Hudson's ready for breakfast," she announced, "and is waiting for Mr. Donovan."

"She'll have to wait a bit longer," chuckled Budge. "Now that you've got that bow tied, Larry, you can go upstairs and change all your clothes!"

Larry went off with a rueful expression on his face, and Budge stretched his arms and yawned prodigiously.

"Up all night again?" asked Jeanne sympathetically.

"Uhuh! But we're on the last lap. Ten o'clock to-night, and my job'll be finished!"

"Mine, too," said she, and sighed. "I'll be sorry."

"Well, I won't!" he growled. "It's creepy! A gun would be different, but those arrows— No sound! And the feeling that any minute one might stick through somebody like a spit through a roast beef!"

She shivered.

"I'll be glad the danger's over," she said, "but I'll be sorry that we won't see each other any more."

"Who says we won't?" he blurted.

"Well, you'll be going back to town, and I may stay here—if Miss Hudson wants me."

He gazed at her wistfully, rather at a loss for words.

"Say, Jeanne, d'you like being a maid?" he asked abruptly.

"Not very well," she admitted. "Why?"

"Well, I thought maybe there was something else you'd rather be. A— a wife, for instance."

"Whose wife?" she asked smilingly.

"Mine!"

"I'd like that much better," she demurely assured him—and found herself in his arms.

There were no more shocks that day between breakfast and dinner. In the drawing-room, after the evening meal was over, the butler set the card-table for an inevitable game of bridge; and in the servants' sitting-room Budge was in the act of switching on a wireless set when Reynolds returned from the village.

"Not much of a programme to-night," the detective said, leaning over Budge.

The cook and her daughter Annie were in the room, as well as Jeanne, but they did not see a folded piece of paper change hands.

"You try it," said Budge. "I can't get anything."

He went off into the kitchen and opened out the piece of paper. On it was written in pencil:

"Get word to Donovan that I'll know by 9.30. Waiting for a telegram."

Aunt Catherine and her flock were on the way from the dining-room to the drawing-room when the bell of the telephone in the hall rang. The butler hurried to the instrument; the others stopped short.

"It's for you, madam," said the butler. "Mr. William— he seems excited."

"Probably misplaced his blonde wife," commented Aunt Catherine, taking the telephone from him. "Put out two new packs of cards, Campbell."

The butler returned to the drawing-room.

"Hallo, Willie, what is it?" Aunt Catherine said into the transmitter. "You did?" Her voice ascended several tones. "Where? It isn't serious? You

"SUICIDE SQUAD"

A Bright-eyed Youth

LARRY'S late, isn't he?" remarked Mrs. Dawson, and a smile appeared and her shrewd old eyes twinkled as she saw the effect of her simple remark. Tim, her husband, rustled his paper angrily; Ed Melville, a big, heavy-looking young man, curled his lip in a cynical smile; Mary, her daughter, smiled happily and a trifle dreamily; Mickey, her twelve-year-old son, rushed over to the window and peered out anxiously for sign of the young man who was keeping dinner waiting on the occasion of Mary's twentieth birthday.

Mrs. Dawson having received no answer, which did not worry her very much, returned to the kitchen, where she reigned supreme. Tim Dawson lowered his paper, fingered his big moustache, glowered at the birthday-eake, and went back to his paper. Ed gave a resigned sigh and gazed with pitying eyes at the very attractive Mary Dawson. Mary was busy sewing and she did not hear the sigh or see the pitying gaze; if she had she would have probably thought Ed was suffering from indigestion, and rushed off to get him some tablets. Mickey tried to push his head through the glass in his efforts to see down the street.

The telephone-bell shrilled. "That may be Larry," cried Mickey. "Won't it be dreadful if he can't come."

"Why in heaven's name should it be dreadful?" His father jerked down his paper. "Dinner's ten minutes late as it is, and—answer that 'phone, someone."

Mary took the call, and Ed scowled when he saw how her eyes lit up and she smiled.

"Oh, is that you, Larry? Where are you ringing from?" Pause. "Oh, I know the place. You're finished for the day and you're be right along? How soon?" Another pause. "Five minutes? That will be quite all right, for dinner isn't ready quite. 'Bye, Larry."

"Hurray!" shouted Mickey, who adored Larry.

"Not so much noise," thundered his father. "How the dickens can I read with all this noise going on? Mother!"

Mrs. Dawson poked her head round the kitchen door.

"Did someone call me?"

"Have we got to wait for Larry Johnson until it's dark?" he demanded.

"Yes, dear," was all Mrs. Dawson answered, but it settled all arguments. Her husband rustled the paper angrily and buried himself in it. Ed looked unhappily at Mary, who was going round the table and seeing that everything was in its correct place. Mickey sniffed, not because he had a cold, but because roast beef and roast potatoes are enough to make any boy sniff—especially cooked by such a mistress of culinary art as Mrs. Dawson.

Honk, honk, honk!

At once, Mickey, who had abandoned his position at the window to see how his silk-worms were getting on, rushed across the room. It was a race between him and his sister who got there first.

"It's Larry!" he shouted. "Dad, it's Larry!"

"Who cares?" muttered his father, with more rustling of paper.

Ed Melville rawned, but shut his mouth quickly because Mary had nearly caught him.

The two young people waved.

Larry Johnson grinned merrily and waved back. He was a slim young fellow with a cheeky smile and the merriest of laughs. He slammed the door of the taxi that he had been driving for hire, and made for the apartment-house steps.

"Mother, Larry's here!" Mary called out.

"At last we can have dinner," growled her father.

Mrs. Dawson reappeared.

"Did you say Larry was here?" She saw her daughter nod her fair head. "I'm glad the boy could come. Wouldn't have been a party without him."

Tim Dawson opened his mouth to say something, thought better of it, and read the racing news for the third time. A violent hammering and ringing made him lay down his paper and open his mouth to shout his wrath, when Mrs. Dawson came out of the kitchen and was all smiles. He shook his head gloomily.

Larry Johnson bounced into the room. His eyes were sparkling, his face was one great grin, and he looked full of the joy of life.

He kissed Mrs. Dawson, who said: "Oh, my!" and then kissed Mary who made no complaint.

"A small present." Larry fished out a packet. "It's nothing good, but I thought it would suit you."

"Oh, Larry!" She had to kiss him again.

"When are we going to have dinner?" cried old Dawson, who could contain himself no longer.

"You put on your coat and brush your hair," ordered Mrs. Dawson. "Then we can make a start."

"Many happy returns of the day, old dear." Larry completely ignored everyone. "Gee, I like that dress."

"Mother helped me make it."

Then Larry beamed at Mrs. Dawson. "You're a wonder—don't know how you do it and manage to look so young."

"Pah!" snorted Pa Dawson, and went off to brush his hair.

"Mickey!" Larry dived in his pocket and brought out a paper bag. "Some aniseed balls."

"If you eat one of those before your dinner I don't know what I'll do to you," said Mrs. Dawson, then she smiled at Larry. "You spoil that boy."

Ed Melville shook his head enviously. Some people certainly had the technique. They could put it over. Fancy a kid staring goggle-eyed at a young man who gave him a few cents' worth of aniseed balls, or a girl that went into raptures over a necklace that came from some ten-cent store! The flowers that he had brought had cost two dollars, but he would have got just as hearty thanks with a bunch of daisies.

Mrs. Dawson, her daughter and her son approved of Larry Johnson. They were on his side every time. But Tim Dawson thought Larry was a lazy, harum-scarum, no-good young man, and he had a certain good excuse for that opinion. If Larry had been in one job in the last six months, he had been in a dozen. Moreover, he was not very keen that his daughter should marry a taxi-driver, when such a splendid fellow as Ed Melville of the Suicide Squad was head over heels in love with her. Ed Melville disliked Larry and would willingly have punched him on the jaw, but Larry's slimmess was deceptive, and it annoyed Ed to think that his rival might go so far as to punch him back.

Mrs. Dawson brought in the beef and roast potatoes, and that settled all arguments for the time being.

A New Recruit

AS repasts go, it was a successful meal. Ed Melville did not enjoy it very much because Mary had eyes only for one person. Tim Dawson enjoyed the meal reluctantly. He would like to have found something to complain about, but that beef was just wonderful. Larry Johnson always had a ruffling effect on his temper, because no matter how sarcastic one might be it had no effect. Larry just grinned and made some completely asinine rejoinder. Moreover, old Tim was a little apprehensive, because of late his wife, who had the sweetest of natures but an iron determination, had talked vaguely of Larry wanting to join the fire-fighters, or Suicide Squad. Mrs. Dawson had so far been vague, but the old man felt it was the beginning of a campaign to get him to sign papers on the lad's behalf, and that he vowed would be something he would never do.

A violent honking caused Larry to go to the window. It was a furo. With mumbled apologies he went downstairs, and returned some minutes later to say that he had settled that problem. He was off duty and wasn't doing business—actually, he was not off duty. The customer was a little merry, and Larry had got rid of him by threatening physical force.

Ed Melville contributed very little to the conversation, though he tried his best to be pleasant to Mary, and didn't do himself any good when he decided Larry's statement that he had done a certain journey of sixty miles in a few minutes over an hour.

The meal concluded, Larry asked Mary to go out to the pictures, and before Tim could make any opposition his wife had said it would be quite all right. Tim decided he must speak to his wife, and though a fearless fire-fighter he did not fancy the task. The young people were ready to leave when there came more honking.

Larry looked out of the window and saw a man peering round the car.

"I'll teach that guy to come nosing round my bus!" he cried.

The man seemed to be examining the clock when Larry appeared. The man's back was to Larry, and that was unfortunate for Larry, who, on the spur of the moment, administered a kick in the pants.

"What the dickens do you think you're doing?" began Larry. "That's my—er—I'm sorry—" He tailed off because he was staring into the flushed, angry face on one of the taxi-company inspectors. "I didn't know it was you."

"A pity for you," shouted the inspector. "I came along here an hour ago, and this cab hasn't moved from the kerb since then. Not the first time you've done this sort of thing. The other Saturday you took this cab out to a baseball match for a customer, and though not hired, you stayed to see the match through, and last Tuesday you faked a breakdown so you could go on the spree." Larry looked uncomfortable, because he had gone to the pictures on that occasion with Mary. "And now you've acted in a way that leaves only one course open. You're fired!"

"You can't do this."

"Oh, can't I?" The inspector took out his pocket-book and some money.

"This is your share of what little you've earned, and you're discharged." He climbed into the driver's seat.

"One moment," shouted Larry as the inspector started up the engine. "Are you plying for hire in this cab now?"

"I am."

"Good!" Larry swung open the taxi door and pushed Mary inside. "All right, my man, drive me to the Odcon, and be quick about it!"

That night, when Mr. and Mrs. Dawson had retired, the good lady stated definitely that as Larry had left the taxi company, which was no sort of job for a nice young man, she would like her husband to get the lad into the fire-fighting force.

"No!" her husband shouted.

"Larry has nerve and doesn't know what fear is," countered Mrs. Dawson. "Just the type of man you want. I can't understand—nor can Mary—what objection you can possibly have."

"I'll tell you"—he wrenched off a collar—"Larry's all talk. He's just a harum-scarum ne'er-do-well. It's the riot squad he should join. He'd be late for parades, turning up at the wrong fire, breaking his neck on ladders and undermining all the good work that has taken me years. I insist upon discipline, and I can't see that pup obeying rules and regulations."

"He isn't a pup, Tim." She fixed a steely eye on her husband. "I know he would obey all the rules and regulations."

"Why can't Mary fall for a chap like Ed Melville?" said her husband. "There's a fine fellow for you. Doesn't drink, smokes very little, and a devout admirer of Mary's. Saves his money, and I know has a nice sun put by. A steady-going lad and just the sort I'd like our Mary to marry." He paused for breath. "Larry has just lost his latest job in the same sort of way he's lost all the others. He hasn't got a cent in the world, and my daughter's not marrying a pauper."

"When you married me, Tim Dawson, you were out of work."

That was a body blow.

The argument started about eleven at night. Still arguing, they got into bed at midnight. At one they put out the light, but the argument was still raging. Several times Tim said he wished to go to sleep, but Mrs. Dawson had a shrill voice at times—and a sharp elbow. She wanted Larry Johnson to have a chance. At three in the morning her husband capitulated.

"All right"—he sat up in bed—"get Larry Johnson to fill in the papers and I'll sign them. And if he don't obey the rules and regulations I'll fire him and finish with him for good. Now for goodness' sake, woman, let me sleep."

"Thank you, Tim." Mrs. Dawson relaxed with a smile.

Tim Dawson lay there thinking what an idiot he had been. No, a thousand times no, he would not sign Larry's papers.

"Nellie, I'm not going—" he began, and then in the faint light noticed his wife's eyes were closed. A gentle snore made him purse his lips. It was asking for trouble to wake his wife once she was asleep. He resigned himself to defeat and the softening effects of slumber.

His First Fire Call

LARRY JOHNSON'S papers were signed, approved and passed. He came through the medical examination, much to Ed Melville's disappointment, and was sent to an instructional course. Here he endured a fortnight's intensive training.

Now, Mrs. Dawson had had a quiet talk with Larry, and he vowed that in return for the kindness that she had shown him he would stick to his job, no matter how tough it might prove.

It was tough. They were got out of bed at all hours of the day and night, taught all about the driving, control and mechanism of fire-engines, shown the right and wrong way of handling the hose, given ladder work, tested for giddiness on heights, and made to jump many yards down into nets. Much to Ed Melville's disgust, Larry was quite the best pupil and the most fearless. He was passed as fit for service and drafted to Number Five Station, which was commanded by Captain Tim Dawson.

"Keep your eye on Larry," the old man told Ed Melville. "Just because he's a personal friend, no favouritism to be shown. Report to me on his progress, and see he doesn't get into any mischief." He shot a glance at the younger man. "I don't trust that young gentleman any farther than I can see him, so I think it would be best if we kept him on work which will not allow him to do something foolish. You understand?"

"Certainly, captain." Ed Melville answered with a grin. When by himself, Ed rubbed his hands together.

Ed Melville proceeded to make life just as unpleasant for Larry Johnson as he could. It gave his small-minded nature intense satisfaction. He obeyed the captain's orders to the last letter.

Larry, not being dumb, had a strong idea why Melville was making his life hot, and though several times he very nearly lost his temper, he just managed to check himself in time. Answering back a superior would have meant instant dismissal. What Larry objected to most were the menial, insignificant tasks allocated to him. All day long he seemed to be polishing brass and cleaning fire-engines. Melville was always snooping round, trying to catch him out for breaking some rule or regulation. Several times he was on the mat for minor offences.

Every time there was a fire call Larry was detailed to remain at the station as a messenger, to answer telephone calls and prepare to rush out with the salvage lorry. At one fire he did get a call for a new hose, as the one in use was almost burnt through. Larry got to the fire, three miles away, in about five minutes, and instead of getting praise, was reprimanded by Captain Dawson for endangering people's lives by driving too fast through the streets.

Larry had a great friend in "Snap" Wilson, a free-lance Press cameraman who earned a living by getting pictures of fires, smashes, accidents, fights, and anything exciting. He assured Larry that on the first chance that occurred he would get his picture into the papers.

"You do something big, and I'll get your picture doing it," stated Snap. "That's the way to gain promotion."

"You're right," agreed Larry. "I don't want to be a run-around all my life, nor do I want to spend about twenty years waiting for promotion. If I can only get a break I'll show 'em."

Larry had been at the station a month when he nearly had a fight with Melville. Larry was taking Mary to a big dance, and as he was about to go off duty Melville sent for him to detail him for night duty. Captain Dawson wanted a man and Larry was the man Melville selected. Then Larry rang up to explain to Mary why he could not go, and found that Melville had been on the 'phone to her—as Larry could not go, might he take her? Melville nearly got socked for that, but the youngster remembered his promise to Mrs. Dawson.

There was an epidemic of influenza in the district, and several men were down sick when Captain Dawson got a call to a big grain-store fire. As they were short of drivers, Larry was in charge of a fire-escape.

They reached the fire and Larry was all set to play his part when Captain Dawson rushed up to him.

"You stay here and guard the escape," he ordered. "We may need you or we may not, but if you do get the call, jump to it."

There was not going to be any publicity in this fire.

With bored gaze Larry stared at the fire. A lot of smoke and a certain amount of flame, but it should be subdued pretty easily. He yawned as Snap came up and suggested a picture of him standing by the machine.

"Take one if you like." Larry shrugged his shoulders. "It may come in useful when they do give me a break."

He was chatting dully with Snap when he observed two men get out of a yellow car, glance round and then hurry up the steps into a big building. He yawned and stared at the fire, still smoking and looked like going on smoking. He turned and saw the two men come out of the building. One darted down the steps, whilst the other stood by the swing doors.

Larry frowned in perplexity. The men seemed to strike a jarring note. The first man started the car and gave an imperious gesture to his companion standing by the door. This man came slowly down the steps and kept on looking round. Larry noticed that he was carrying a bulky case. On reaching the car he placed the bag on the back seat, ran round and got in beside the driver.

"What's that building over there?" Larry asked his friend.

"I think it's a bank," Snap answered.

"Is it?" Larry was on the alert. "Those two guys were acting kinda queer. I wonder—" He did not continue because the swing doors had discharged two or three black-coated figures, whereupon there came an explosion and the sound of tinkling glass. The figures dived back through the swing doors and the yellow car sped away.

"It's a bank stick-up," yelled Larry, and clambered into the driver's seat of the fire-escape.

Captain Tim Dawson rubbed his eyes when the escape went charging down the street at a terrific speed.

A Bold Capture

LARRY JOHNSON drove the escape with skill and daring, and Snap, who had jumped aboard on the chance of a scoop, thought his last hour had come when the cumbersome vehicle skidded round corners at forty miles an hour.

The people of the city were amazed to see the escape charging through the streets, and they thought the driver must have gone mad. There had been a hold-up at the bank, and already every police car had had the information.

Every time the two men in the yellow car looked round they saw behind them the huge escape. Rather foolishly they did not dream that they were being followed until the escape began to gain on them. There was something about the intent look of the driver that urged them to go all out, but the escape had plenty of power. By now the police knew all about the yellow car being pursued by a fire-escape, and sirens were screaming all over the city.

The crooks swung down a side street and tried to dodge Larry, but that young fellow manœuvred the escape in an amazing manner. Desperately the crooks made for their hide-out, which was a ramshackle apartment-house. They left their car and darted inside the place with their loot.

Out leaped Larry, and fearlessly he rushed for the front door. He opened it and at once two guns blazed, but he had jumped back in time.

An officer on a fast motor-cycle arrived.

"Are you after two crooks?" hissed Larry.

"Yeah. Held up the State bank and got away in a yellow car," was the answer.

"They're in there," cried Larry. "You watch this door and leave the rest to me."

He raced round to a fire-escape, sped up the iron stairs and clambered in at a window. Cautiously he crossed an empty room and found himself in a passage. He came to the stairs and tiptoed down them towards the first floor. At the top of the stairs stood two men with their guns ready for anyone foolish enough to try a rush.

Larry crept down and then dived on their backs. The impact flung both men to the ground. They were not hurt very much, but badly winded. One man moaned, and Larry hit him hard in the jaw. The other crook reached for his gun.

When the police-officer ventured up the stairs he found one crook lying sprawled on the floor and another taking a bad hiding from a fierce-eyed fireman. The officer covered the sprawled crook as the latter showed signs of wanting to get up. Larry gripped the other crook by both wrists and tossed him over his shoulder on to his companion. That ended the fight, and the two rascals were taken away in handcuffs.

Before they departed for gaol, Snap took pictures of the police-officer, Larry and the two bank-robbers.

Larry, deciding that perhaps it would be as well to get back to the scene of the fire, sped back through the streets. The fire was nearly out, but Captain Tim Dawson was burning up.

"Where have you been?"

"Two guys held up the Stato bank and tried to get away with a lot of dough," Larry grinned expectantly. "They shot at the bank officials and made a getaway. They would have done it but for me. I went after them and forced them to take refuge in a building. I got 'em, chief—they're safe in gaol now."

"And you feel mighty pleased with yourself, I suppose?" Tim Dawson seemed even angrier, much to Larry's surprise. "You might have endangered hundreds of lives."

"Me? How?"

"That escape is meant for rescuing people and not for wild-goose chases through the streets!" yelled Captain Dawson. "What does a bank or its money mean when human lives are at stake?"

"I didn't know any lives were at stake."

"They weren't, thank goodness!" The captain was purple in the face. "But suppose there had been people trapped in that grain store. They would have died because the escape was not there. Does that penetrate your thick skull?"

When the evening papers came out with the picture of Larry and the two crooks and a glowing account of a fire-fighter's heroic bravery, then old Dawson nearly choked. On the morrow he ordered a parade, and made Larry Johnson stand out in front of the other men. Ed Melville had a twisted grin on his smug features.

Captain Dawson cleared his throat and read out certain rules and regulations in regard to disregard of orders.

"If a man gets an order to go into a flaming building he does his best to carry out that order. If a man is placed in charge of a fire-escape and to await orders he must be ready for those orders, not suddenly decide to go racing through the streets after a couple of crooks."

"If you wish for my resignation, captain, you can have it," Larry answered.

Ed Melville leaned forward hopefully.

"I do not wish for your resignation.

But I reprimand you for disobedience of orders," replied the captain. "You will lose three weeks' good conduct—"

An orderly had entered. "What is it?"

"Captain Wilson from headquarters, chief."

One of the biggest men in the fire-fighting establishment. Captain Dawson hurried away to greet this person of importance. Captain Wilson insisted upon speaking to the men, and after a few words about their fine work, asked for Larry Johnson to step forward.

"I am proud of what you did yesterday," was the big man's astounding opening remark. "The Promotion Board have instructed me to express their gratification for your bravery and presence of mind, and, as a reward, to give you a good-conduct stripe."

Ed Melville's face went a sickly yellow, whilst Captain Dawson nearly choked.

Larry Johnson stepped back into the ranks with a self-satisfied smirk on his face. The afternoon editions had pictures of him with the stripe on his sleeve.

There was only one drawback to his elation—the chilly reception given to him by Mary when he called that same evening.

"I know it was very brave, but all this publicity is wrong," she told him. "It's praise you don't deserve."

"Why not?" he wanted to know.

"Well, you deserted your post," she replied. "If you were in the army and on sentry-go and you cleared off they would have shot you."

"Thanks very much!" cried Larry, and there was very nearly a row. Maybe there would have been one if good-natured Mrs. Dawson had not poured oil on troubled waters.

In the next few weeks there were several fire-calls, and Larry stuck rigidly to his duties, though he was still convinced that quick-action methods and publicity were the sure way to promotion. Then came the second publicity outburst.

Now, to give Larry his due, he did not think of the publicity at the time; afterwards, perhaps, but at the time it was just the saving of human life. It happened this way.

There had been a district call to a big hotel, where there had been an explosion in the basement thought to be caused through a leakage of gas. At any rate, the basement was on fire and choking black fumes were pouring from manholes and cellars. Already the fire had penetrated to the first floor, and the whole hotel was in danger.

As per usual, Larry was detailed to play a minor part. Captain Dawson ordered him to look after the life-line. The fire-fighters had to don gas-masks and go down into the smoke-filled basement, and the leader held the end of a thin wire line. This was on a small wheel or drum, and it was Larry's job to stand near the entrance to the basement and pay out this life-line.

All went well until the fire spread and burst through brackets supporting a live cable connected to a power plant in the next building. The cable fell into the street, which was crowded with people, and the end of the wire at once began to "earth," causing it to dance and whip about like an electric eel. Anyone coming in contact with the squirming cable would get a shock that was certain to prove fatal.

The crowd tried to back away, but there was such a congestion of people and held-up traffic that there was a solid jam. The cable squirmed to within a few feet of a mass of screaming people, mostly children, and then squirmed away again.

"Hold this!" Larry cried to Snap, who was hovering round taking pictures. He handed the drum of the life-line.

Larry glanced round and whipped out a knife. He cut a good length from a roll of stout rope and advanced on the squirming cable. People watched him, and thought he must be struck dead. Several times the cable gave a spasmodic jerk and nearly got him. But he persisted, and at last got a rope under the cable, a quick knot and the live cable was a prisoner.

The crowd cheered madly. He waved his hand to them and lashed the cable to some railings. Someone rushed off to get the electric company to turn off the power, which should have been thought of before.

Suddenly the grin faded from Larry's face as he saw Snap taking pictures of him.

"I got you roping the cable," Snap said in awed tones. "It'll make a superb picture."

"How about that life-line?" gasped Larry.

When Snap put a shaky hand to his mouth, Larry knew there was trouble ahead. He charged over to the basement, and the smoke was pouring out thicker than ever, but there was no sign of the drum. He saw Snap, and seized the cameraman in a vicious grip.

"What did you do with that drum?"

"I didn't think it was of very much importance, and there was such a scoop with that wire, so I dropped it," weakly murmured Snap. "Was it important?"

"You mane chump!" yelled Larry, and looked at the smoke clouds in horror.

He was about to hurl himself into the smoke when a figure stumbled out. A moment later came another figure, and then two men supporting a third who had been overcome by the fumes.

Snap took some pictures, and then hastened away to get them to the papers. If he had waited he would have seen his friend get a bad reprimand for his bravery.

"This ain't the time or place to tell you what I think of you!" Dawson said angrily. "I'll deal with you in the morning."

Ed Melville, who had been a spectator of this little scene, had difficulty in concealing his jubilation. Larry would not have a chance of getting old Dawson to give his consent to their marriage after this.

In the morning Larry was again had up before the whole company. This time Captain Dawson did not spare the unfortunate victim of his wrath. Publicly he stripped Larry of his good-conduct stripe for disobedience of orders and endangering the lives of his fellow-men. He had sent his own account of the affair to Captain Wilson and condemned Larry Johnson as someone who thought of nothing else but cheap publicity.

That was true to a certain extent, but it was harsh action all the same, and though Captain Dawson was a fine old man this treatment was prompted by his distrust of Larry. Ed Melville encouraged this distrust. The captain felt he was doing the right thing.

Not a murmur did Larry make nor a word say in his own defence. The hardest part was Mary's unfriendly attitude. She would consider only her father's and Ed's version of the incident, and he was too proud to say that it was because of the number of lives in danger that he had deserted his post. It ended with a quarrel and Larry having the last word.

"Everyone says I'm wrong, and maybe I was wrong, but I should do just the same again if it occurred to-morrow. You tell your father that, and then he'll have just the excuse he wants for firing me. Good-night."

His Rival in Danger

IT did nothing to restore peace that the papers had much to say in praise of Larry's action. Snap wanted permission to tell the whole story of the treatment Larry had received from Dawson on account of the live cable, but that young man stuck out his jaw and threatened to punch Snap's head if he did.

The quarrel between Mary and Larry was patched up, but there wasn't the same friendly relationship as of old. He knew that Mary was disappointed in him, and it made him bad-tempered to find that Ed Melville was round at the Dawson's house nearly every day. He was getting used to being detailed for duty about an hour before an appointment with Mary.

"Snap," he confided to his friend, "if you knew the trouble I have to check myself from socking that palooka you'd sympathise with me. There ain't a day that passes without he does something to rile me."

"I think Captain Dawson is an old fool."

"I'll sock you if you talk that way," threatened Larry. "You I can sock and get away with it. Ed I can't. Captain Dawson is one of the old school, and unfortunately I don't seem to meet with his approval. But I like him even if he don't like me."

On the Monday of the thirteenth week—thirteen can be unlucky—there came a general call. A big factory fire. The whole building was ablaze, and on either side were warehouses packed full of inflammable goods. A number of hands were trapped on the roof of the factory.

The fire broke out some few minutes before midnight. The alarm went, and everyone was out of bed like a flash. A dive into clothes and down the slippery pole from the dormitories into the station. Open swung the great doors and out raced the two engines with the men finishing their dressing as the machines tore through the dark streets.

As usual, Larry Johnson was driving the spare fire-escape.

The sky had a great red patch, and they could tell by this that it was a tremendous fire.

Captain Dawson was proud to find that his engines were the first on the scene. The hoses got busy. A fire-escape was run up to the roof and a number of factory hands rescued by fire chute.

Larry's own escape was called into use, and that young man begged for the chance to go up the ladder. Captain Dawson told him to stand on one side. A number of people were saved, but several were badly injured and burnt.

Larry reckoned if he had been allowed to go up the ladder these people would have been rescued quicker and with less injury. He did not voice that opinion, but his eyes narrowed and his hands clenched, when he found he was the only one not required to take an active part in the fire. He was detailed to pay out a life-line.

Once he saw a ladder was blazing, and rushed up to inform Captain Dawson, and got harsh words for his pains.

"Get back to your post!" thundered Dawson.

"Nothing I do seems to be right," Larry grumbled to himself.

It had been decided that the fire must be attacked from the other side, and that the best way to get there was through the cellars. The fire had started on the second floor and worked down to the first. So far the cellars were immune but full of smoke and fumes. Captain Dawson led the party of masked firemen, and Larry had to pay out the line.

"Pay out the line, and don't try any other act," warned Captain Dawson, as he helped one of his fire raisers don a gas outfit. "This man and others are dependent on you."

Soon afterwards Dawson donned an outfit and dived below. Larry vowed that nothing would move him from his post.

Ed Melville was left in charge, and ran about shouting orders and looking important. An outer wall looked in danger of falling, and Ed Melville decided to get to the roof of an engine-house that was attached to the side of the factory. If the wall fell valuable dynamo would be damaged.

Larry had climbed on to the driver's seat of the escape and was disconsolately staring at the blaze when he saw Ed clamber up the short ladder to the engine-room roof. But Larry from his vantage-point observed something that no one else could possibly see—a number of bricks that crashed down from above and floored Ed Melville. Larry jumped up—then remembered the life-line that he was holding.

Everyone else was busy. Other fire-engines were arriving, but there was not a soul whom Larry could get. Ed Melville did not rise. A few more bricks crashed down, and it looked as if the wall would not last long.

Larry leapt down, and he fixed the

"This isn't the time or place to tell you what I think of you," Captain Dawson said angrily. "I'll deal with you in the morning!"

stick of the drum into a notch. This allowed the drum to pay out as if he were holding it.

There was no idea of publicity, because for once Snap was taking pictures near the worst of the fire. All animosity was forgotten. It was just a human being whose life was in danger. He even looked round to find someone whom he could tell what he was doing. Surely they could not blame him for trying to save one of the chief men of No. 5 Station.

Up the ladder went Larry and on to the roof. It was dark, and for a moment he could see nothing; then he sighted the sprawled figure of Ed Melville. A rumbling above made him look upwards. Was the wall giving? He gripped Melville by the shoulders, and the hurt fire-raiser opened his eyes and knew it was his rival. Just in time Larry dragged Ed clear, because a moment later a whole mass of brick and rubble crashed down on the spot where he had lain.

One brick caught Larry a glancing blow, and but for the helmet he wore might have knocked him out. He lay prone wondering how much of the wall were coming down, and fighting the wave of blackness that gripped him. He struggled to his feet and swayed dizzily. Everything seemed whirling round. It cleared, and he stared around for Melville. He found him, and managed to sling him across his powerful shoulders. With his burden he staggered to the edge of the parapet.

It was no easy task holding that great weight across his shoulders and getting over the parapet to the ladder. More of the wall came crashing down, and through an aperture burst red angry flames. Slowly Larry climbed down, and all the while Melville groaned weakly.

The ground at last, and Larry thought he was safe. A brick whistled past his head, and he glanced up quickly. The wall seemed to be sagging outwards.

He gathered his strength and staggered away from the danger. With a roar the wall caved outwards and crashed down on the power house, squashing the building almost flat. But Larry had got clear with his burden, and gasped as he realised what a touch-and-go they had had with death. It gave him a certain amount of grim satisfaction to know that Ed Melville owed his life to a breach of the rules.

Larry placed the limp body against a wheel of the escape and went to see how the life-line was doing. The drum had gone. He could not believe his eyes. The line must have paid out, and the strain of someone pulling on it had jerked it from its precarious hold.

The fire was gaining in intensity, and the smoke from the basement was twice as thick.

Captain Dawson and the others might be trapped. The fire had a sound grip of the ground floor, and with the girders and floors crashing down from above might give under the strain. He got out another life-line, tied the end to a wheel of the escape, and, holding the drum, without bothering about his gas and smoke apparatus, he dived down into the choking fumes.

He managed to get beneath the smoke, which was thick near the ceiling of the basement. It was choking enough as it was, but he wrapped a handkerchief over his face and nostrils, and that enabled him to breathe better. He set out to search for Captain Dawson.

A part of the ceiling crashed down and just missed his head. The heat was intense, and in one place the ceiling was on fire. It was but a matter of minutes before the whole building collapsed. He vowed he would rather die there than give up the search. He found them at last. A group of despairing men, completely lost. They had pulled on the life-line, and just when they thought they were getting near the exit the line had gone slack, and Captain Dawson, in the lead, had stared through his goggles at an empty drum.

Larry gave the new drum to the captain. He helped to carry a badly hurt fireman. Slowly the party followed the life-line. A roar and part of the flooring collapsed. Out came the axe from his belt, and he helped to hack away the smouldering debris. A new danger was scalding water that poured through the aperture, but they got past the danger, and Larry could have shouted his relief when they reached a room that he recognised.

His senses were reeling, but grim determination kept him going. They climbed up some steps and were out of the smoke. It was only then that Larry Johnson collapsed in a heap.

Snap rushed forward with his camera as they lifted Larry to his feet, and he got a picture. Someone from the window of a nearby building had seen Larry dive into the smoke, and this time Snap thought he had a story that must make his pal famous. It was the final straw in Larry's downfall. If Snap had stayed he might have had his eyes opened by the captain's first remarks on removing his gas-mask.

"The third and final time, Larry Johnson!" he shouted hoarsely. "Whatever your reason it won't be good enough. To-night you nearly cost me my life and the lives of six others. By a miracle we've escaped. To-morrow you're quitting the force for ever."

Ed Melville, clinging to the side of the escape, heard every word, but he said nothing in Larry Johnson's defence.

Forced to Resign

LARRY felt like braining Snap when he picked up the morning paper and found that enterprising picture fiend had been busy. There was a paragraph about Larry penetrating into the smoke and fumes without a gas-helmet and leading his comrades to security. Naturally, there was no mention of the fact that he had saved Ed Melville's life.

This time Larry felt sure everything would be all right. He had a strong idea that Captain Dawson was mad with him about leaving the life-line, but all would be forgiven when Ed revealed the reason. The only fly in the ointment that Larry could see was the publicity stunt of that idiot Snap.

Perhaps it would be as well to ring up Mary and find out if everything were all right.

Mary answered his call.

"Larry Johnson," came her voice, and there was a break in it. "You're nothing more or less than a publicity hound. You don't care a cent about endangering the lives of your fellow-men as long as you get your picture in the paper. Here you are all lauded up for something for which you deserve no credit. Praised for deserting your post, for not doing your duty properly, and for risking the lives of others needlessly."

"But, Mary, surely Ed—"

She swept on ruthlessly.

"You left your job to pose against a background of flame and get yourself splashed all over the front pages as a hero. A hero—why you're nothing but a sham and a fraud!"

"Didn't Ed tell you why I left that life-line?"

"Ed has no idea where you went to," stated Mary. "And like father, like all of us, thinks you're a disgrace to the station."

"So you think I'm a disgrace, do you?" Larry was quick to anger.

"I do, and I never want to speak to you again," Mary sobbed. "Mother got you your chance and all you've done is to bring disgrace on us."

"I suppose Ed's with you and backing you up," shouted Larry. "I expect that mealy mouthed microbe is asking you to have done with me for ever. You'd believe anything he says rather than listen to me."

"Stop calling Ed names. Dad says he's a grand fire-fighter. He doesn't want his picture in the papers. He didn't call you names; in fact, he asked dad to give you another chance. He stood up for you."

"That was nice of him. I'll adopt him as a brother."

"I think you're mean and spiteful," Mary cried. "Just because your attempt to win glory by false pretences has failed you're vengeful. This is the end, Larry Johnson."

"That suits me." Larry was so angry that he did not control his tongue. "But I'll tell you one thing which you can believe or not as you please. I didn't get that picture and paragraph put in the papers, and if I'd known Snap had done it I would have tried to stop it. I admit I left the life-line and endangered the lives of your father and the rest of the boys, but I ain't got a thing on my conscience for doing it. But knowing what I know now about a certain person I wouldn't act in the same way if the same situation were to happen again to-night. You don't understand what that means, and I don't suppose you ever will."

"Why don't you make some sort of excuse instead of shouting at me over the 'phone?"

"Because I'm not sorry," he yelled. "You believe anything they like to say against me, and that hurts me more than anything else. I don't want anything to do with a girl that thinks I'm nothing but a cheap swanker. Kiss Ed for me!" He slammed down the receiver.

That morning the whole station was summoned to hear what Captain Dawson had to say to Larry Johnson.

Tight-lipped Larry stood there and his lips curled as he looked at Ed Melville, who had his head in bandages. He grinned sardonically when Captain Dawson made praising remarks about Ed's bravery and devotion to duty.

"You think yourself a hero for rushing into the smoke without a gas helmet," Dawson shouted at Johnson. "Just the kind of fool thing you would do. Other men would have been overcome, and it's lucky for us that you didn't, because if you had we should have perished because of your vain desire to see your own face in the pictures."

Larry grinned mirthlessly at Ed Melville, who looked hastily away.

"Have you nothing to say in your own defence?" demanded the captain.

"What I did last night I would do again," Larry faced him squarely, then looked at Ed meaningly. "I don't know why I would, in fact a little while back I thought the opposite, but now I'm positive I would again leave the life-line, and chance the lives of all of you."

He stared round. "I can see the look of horror you feel at my words, and it leaves me cold. Everyone here thinks I have broken every rule and regulation and that I'm not fit to be a member of this unit—well, go on thinking." He took off his badge. "I'm through with your old fire-brigade. You'd like to kick me out as a disgrace, but I'm not giving you the chance. I'm resigning. I'm not ashamed of what I did. I can look any one of you in the eye, but I'm mighty sure one guy here couldn't look me in the eye."

"So you have no shame, Larry Johnson!" sneered Captain Dawson. "You're owning yourself beaten. I knew you'd be a failure, and you've run true to type. You don't understand discipline, and you never will. I shall accept your resignation."

"Even if you didn't I wouldn't stay another moment." Larry flamed up. "And don't any of you guys come in my taxi because I'll take you for a ride you won't forget."

Defiantly he glowered at the amazed fire-station before stalking out of the room. By evening he was back on the road as a taxi-driver.

The Excursion-steamer Explosion

CAPTAIN TIM DAWSON went about with a heavy frown on his homely features. His conscience was troubling him. He had been told quite frankly by his wife that Larry Johnson had not been given a proper chance.

"It seems to me that you and Ed spent all your time trying to pick holes in everything that boy did. You even turned Mary against him."

"You don't like Ed, do you?"

Mrs. Dawson gave her husband a straight look

"I don't dislike Ed, but I don't think he has the nerve or brain of Larry Johnson. Larry tried to make good by doing something heroic and getting a boost from Snap and the Press."

"We don't want that sort in the brigade."

"But what he did wanted a lot of pluck. He wasn't thinking about publicity when he went after those bank-robbers," argued his wife. "True, he made too much of it after the event. Then came the first life-line incident. He imperilled a lot of lives, but he saved a good many by securing that live cable. Supposing he had not acted as he had a lot of bystanders and children might have been killed and hurt—people might have termed him a coward—but the fire-fighters would have been safe. Yes, it wasn't anything like this last fire, for there wasn't much chance of you people getting hurt. So, Tim, if he had done your notion of duty, folk might have died—he did his notion and no one died."

"And what did he do?" blustered Tim. "Stuck out his chest and rushed round to get his picture taken for the papers. Public Hero Number One!"

"Maybe his friend Snap was more to blame than Larry." Mrs. Dawson folded her arms over her ample figure. "Now with regard to this last affair. Once more Larry fails you. You admit that he was very courageous in diving into the smoke and fumes and that hut for him it would have been the finish for all of you. Now—"

"But—"

"I'm talking, Tim Dawson. Knowing what had happened the last time he deserted his post don't you think Larry must have had a very big reason for falling the third time?"

"What do you mean by that, my dear?"

"I don't know," she admitted. "Except that I think there must have been a very vital reason. He hasn't given any reason. No one seems to have asked him where he went, though all of you were ready to suggest the very worst you could imagine. You told me of the defiant attitude he took, and you called it impudent cheek. You mentioned that Larry said he could look anyone in the eye, and that's why I feel there's more behind this than you know. Larry may be all you say about him, but I know he's honest and straight."

"Pay out the life-line, and don't try any other act!" warned Captain Dawson.

"I might find out what he was doing?" Tim scratched his head. "I could write to him."

"And you wouldn't get an answer. He's proud. I'm the only one in this household save Mickey who's spoken to him. We didn't say a word, but the way he looked at me made me feel certain that Larry doesn't feel ashamed, and if he had done something wrong that night his face would have told me. I know that boy better than most of you. Mickey told me something that Larry said when I wasn't with them. He said: "Mickey, I was a fool on two occasions. A news hound after cheap publicity. But on the third occasion, pal, it was a very different matter. But that's just something between you and me." He asked after Mary and then went off whistling jauntily."

"How does Mary feel about it?"

"All the colour has gone out of her cheeks. She's listless and sleeps badly. She smiles a wan sort of grin," Mrs. Dawson sniffed. "Otherwise she's grand."

"She wants a change," decided her father. "A sea outing will do her a world of good. Captain Dixon of the Pleasure Steamer Company tells me that he'll be delighted if Mary and Mickey will take a trip as his guests the next time he's taking out a ship. He's taking out the Blue Star to-morrow."

It was decided that Mary and Mickey should go for the excursion, and it chanced that Larry had dropped a fare at the docks when he saw them alight from a motor-bus. Larry left his taxi and dodged behind some merchandise to watch them. This was the first time he had seen his sweetheart for three weeks. How he missed her! Captain Dawson had brought them in order to introduce them to Captain Dixon. The latter's words carried to the listener.

"Your pop's brought you two mighty early." A booming laugh. "He always was a one for punctuality. We sail with the tide and that ain't full for nigh on two hours. But you two get aboard and make yourselves at home in the saloon. Plenty of papers and hooks there to amuse you."

Larry saw the two old friends go off to a neighbouring saloon to renew their acquaintanceship and saw the two young people go on board the ship. When they had disappeared down a gangway Larry sauntered back to his taxi, where he leaned against a door and stared moodily at the ground. Should he lower his pride and go aboard to speak to her? He was debating this point when there came a terrific explosion.

Startled, he whipped round. A cloud of smoke was coming from the Blue Star. The explosion had been on board. There came a strange rumbling and then a huge cloud of steam seemed to burst from all parts of the ship.

"Boilers have burst!" Larry muttered in a whisper.

To his horror he saw the stern of the ship give a lurch and she rolled away from the dock-side. Two rope hawsers snapped as if they were string, and the pleasure steamer slid over on her side.

Waking from his trance, Larry rushed forward. Two wire hawsers as tight as violin strings, still held, and seemed to be keeping the ship from turning turtle. He dived into a telephone booth and got through to the station. Melville answered.

"Larry Johnson speaking!" the youngster gasped out in anguished tones. "The Blue Star has had a boiler explosion and she's lying on her side. May turn turtle any moment. Mary and Mickey are on board. Get the boys here. Bring a diving suit—it may be needed. Don't forget the acetylene torches and the compressed-air cylinders. Hurry—there's not a second to waste."

Larry rushed out of the booth back to the dock. A number of people had already collected and were staring in amazement at the capsized ship. From a porthole several people managed to wriggle through. One man suddenly appeared in the harbour. They were all helped ashore.

One of the saved was an officer.

"The boiler burst and must have blown a hole in the side. The water rushed in and blew the other boiler. Wilson was trapped, but managed to dive deep. There were only a few men on board, and they seem to have escaped. The three firemen are beyond hope." He told this to a police officer.

"How about the passengers?" demanded Larry.

"I think there are five and a stewardess," was the answer. "The stewardess had taken them to the saloon."

"Well, don't stand there talking," yelled Larry. "Do something."

The two captains had heard the explosion. Captain Dawson went white as death when he heard the news. Captain Dixon stared at his ship as if this were some dreadful nightmare. The clanging of bells and the screech of a siren told Larry that Number Five Station had answered his call.

A Fight Against Time

IT was Larry who took command of the situation. He rushed up to the dazed Captain Dixon.

"What are the chances for anyone trapped in the saloon?"

"I think they'll be alive," Captain Dixon answered. "The water is never very deep in this dock even at high tide. She can't turn turtle because of the funnels and the bridge, which must be touching the bottom. But the tide's coming in and it'll rise another two feet."

"Suppose she does turn, what then?"

"Pretty hard to cut through the steel hull even though the plates aren't very thick. There'll be an air-lock in that saloon, but the air will get used up."

"Can't you do something, Larry?" Old Dawson appealed to the youngster.

"Standing here talking won't help."

"Get the boys here with the acetylene torches and the rest of the kit!" ordered Larry. "Hurry, chief!" He turned to Captain Dixon. "If I get through that porthole can I reach the saloon?"

"Two bulkhead doors." The captain shook his head, then his eyes lightened. "If you could get through that porthole you might do something." He pointed.

"There are bulkheads on either side of that porthole and that's keeping the ship partly floating. If one of these firemen could get to that bulkhead he might also be able to reach the second bulkhead. You would have to use a torch to open those doors."

"If he got to the saloon could he get them back the same way?"

"With the rising of the tide she'll start to fill—I doubt it," was the captain's opinion. "But a torch would burn through the plates in no time."

Captain Dawson and a white-faced Ed Melville had listened to Larry talking to the captain. They were powerless to think or act for themselves.

"Get me one of those torches and be prepared to pay out a lot of tube," Larry shouted at them. "I'm going to get to that saloon and burn a hole from the inside. Captain Dixon will show you the best place on the outside. You can tell from the heat where I am operating. Let's go!"

June 6th, 1926.

They gave Larry the torch, and once through the porthole he lit it. The power of the compressed air made it possible for the flame to keep alight under water. Through knee-deep water he reached the first bulkhead, but by the time he had burnt through the bolts the water was up to his waist. The door gave and he was swept through. He fought his way to the second bulkhead. The ship was giving curious shudders that filled him with alarm. The second bulkhead went and he was through.

Several cries for help gave him heart. They were alive. Up till then those in the saloon had been dry because of the bulkhead, but now the water rushed in and they thought it was the end. Luckily the funnels were still resting on the bottom. He waded into the saloon.

Mary thought it was a ghost when Larry appeared, and with a sob of joy she held out her arms to him. Brave Mickey even managed a grin. The stewardess, completely unnerved, wanted to cling to him as well.

"Stand away, woman, or I'll frizzle you with this," warned Larry, pointing the torch at her. He glanced round and saw two members of the crew. "Try and keep my tube from getting kinked," he ordered.

Scarcely had Larry turned his flame on the plates and the whole saloon seemed to go upside down. They lost their balance and found themselves floundering under the water, but Larry clung to the torch. He came up spluttering. The ship was beginning to roll over—he must find another place to burn through. By some miracle the lights had remained on, but now they went out and the only light was the acetylene torch. Larry produced a special type of torch and gave it to Mickey to hold.

The flame began to blacken the plates. Amazing how it burnt into them as if they were no more than tough wood.

Melville and the others working on the hull had nearly been flung into the harbour when the Blue Star lurched. They thought that Larry and the trapped passengers were doomed. The captain saw histers appearing in the grey paint, and they knew Larry was not yet beaten.

"If she completely turns turtle what will happen?" old Dawson asked his friend.

"Don't think about it, Tim!" cried Dixon. "Get those boys busy on those plates. You've got to get through before she does turn turtle."

No word was said by those trapped, and they watched spellbound as Larry tackled those plates. Luck had favoured them in that the tube had not fouled or kinked. Once the flame did give a splutter, but it was nothing.

There came a rapping from above, and they knew that the others were working to save them. Larry rapped back. The plates began to melt under the burning force of the acetylene torch. Larry asked one of the crew to find him something heavy. They swam to him with an iron crowbar that they had secured before Larry had appeared—they had been futilely trying to smash a hole in the ship's side with it. The crowbar proved useful now. Two hard punches and the plates began to give.

How their hearts lifted as they saw a chink of daylight. Then the plates gave. A neat square had been cut out of the side of the ship. Willing hands bent down, and Larry helped Mickey up. The youngster was dragged through.

Captain Dawson blubbered like a child at the sight of his son. Then came the stewardess.

The Blue Star gave a convulsive lurch. "Hurry—hurry!" shouted everyone. One of the crew became panicky and pushed Mary out of the light. He scrambled through the opening. Larry and the other man lifted Mary, and she was dragged to safety. Larry gestured to the member of the crew, and wisely the man did not waste time in argument.

The ship began to turn as Larry scrambled through the square hole.

"Get off her before she turns," Larry bellowed at his late comrades. "Tim okay!"

Larry was scrambled over the side of the ship as she rolled over and he was flung into the water. Mary gave a scream of anguish as he vanished, but he came up grinning and swam to the hull.

"Gee, that guy's got a nerve!" muttered someone in the crowd.

"That's my pal!" cried Mickey.

On reaching the keel, Larry managed to stand up, and Snap appeared from somewhere with his camera. Instantly Larry's face became distorted with rage.

"I'll break every bone in your body if you start taking pictures!" he yelled. "You get to blazes out of this!" He hurled himself at the rope that someone chucked down. "Pull me up—I wanna murder that guy!"

But Snap had taken a picture and had fled by the time Larry got to the dock-side. A great cheer went up from the vast crowd that had gathered, but the thing that mattered most to him was the timid smile of Mary Dawson.

"Larry," she cried, and held out her arms to him. "Forgive me, Larry!"

The crowd nearly went mad with romantic delight when they saw the hero clasp the heroine in his arms. They cheered themselves hoarse.

"Your Helmet, Larry!"

ED MELVILLE hesitated, then, plucking up courage, walked across to Mary and Larry.

"I'd like to wish you two the best of luck." He glanced at Larry, then looked away. "You've got the right man, Mary. It was my life he saved that last time."

"You, Ed?" questioned Mary.

"I can explain everything," quickly interposed Larry, who was disposed to be generous. "You see Ed at risk of his own life went on to the roof of a building and a high wall threatened to crash down at any moment. He wanted to see how long that wall would last. Bits of masonry and brick kept crashing down and one laid Ed flat. I was the only person to see it, and so I parked the life-line on the escape to go and see what had happened. Didn't think I'd be away more than a few seconds. Some bricks laid me out, so it was some while before I got back to the escape, and the life-line had worked loose."

Mary looked at Ed.

"Why didn't you tell me this before? Why didn't you say anything at the inquiry?"

"Well, Mary, you see—"

"His memory went." Larry winked, and Mary did not see it. "Your memory's only just come back, hasn't it, Ed?"

"Yeah, that's right," Ed smiled his relief. "Everything since that night has been hazy. I knew I went up a ladder to a roof, and all I remembered after that was lying against the escape with a lump as big as a rock on my head."

"I'm glad your memory came back." Mary spoke a little sharply.

"It's very common." Larry grinned. "I knew my old pal Ed Melville wouldn't let me down. Thank you, Ed. If you get any more trouble with your head I should see a doctor at once. Don't you agree, Mary?"

Ed smirked uncomfortably and held out his hand.

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

The entire world is in a state of terror. The Earth is threatened with total destruction by the planet Mongo, which, rushing through the void, is controlled by the Emperor Ming, ruler of a strange race of people living on that unknown planet, and a man who has probed the fundamental secrets of Nature.

In America, a scientist known as Dr. Zarkov maintains that he can save the Earth from disaster, and by means of a rocket ship which he has invented he attempts to blaze a trail through the stratosphere.

He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart.

The attempt is successful. Travelling through millions of miles of space, the rocket ship sets down the adventurers on the forbidding planet of Mongo, where they are taken prisoners by some of Ming's guards, and conveyed to the emperor's palace.

Ming spares Zarkov and Dale, but Flash is condemned to death, and is only saved by the intervention of Aura, the emperor's daughter, who helps him to escape.

Later, Flash meets with Thun, prince of a nation at war with Ming. Accompanied by Thun, he returns secretly to Ming's palace, and learns that the movement of the planet Mongo towards the Earth has been arrested.

They rescue Dale, but together they fall into the hands of Kala, an ally of Ming, who rules an under-water domain. Then, during an attempted escape, Aura wrecks the machines which supply air to Kala's realm and which also keep out the sea.

The Open Sea

THEY were gathered about the damaged switchboard—Dale in a half-fainting condition, her body limp in Flash Gordon's arms—Thun and Aura leaning weakly against the wall—Kala on his knees, babbling like a man demented.

The air supply had almost gone, and it was only a question of seconds before the pressure of the water in the distant caverns broke down the barriers and poured through the galleries, to flood them from end to end.

It seemed that Kala's realm was doomed and that all living things within this strange kingdom must soon breathe their last.

Kala himself had given up all hope. He had failed to contact Ming, the only one who could have saved them from destruction, and he was meeting death like an arrant coward, with tremulous and unmanly cries—cries that gradually trailed away into silence as his senses left him.

He fell forward on his face and lay motionless at the feet of Aura and Thun, who stared at him dully for a moment, their hands clutching at their throats as they fought for breath. Then all at once Aura stumbled to the control switch of the damaged apparatus by means of which Kala had tried to acquaint Ming of their peril.

There seemed little prospect of succeeding where Kala had failed, yet the girl made a last, forlorn attempt to avert the consequences of her own headstrong action.

She was responsible for all that had happened, she was responsible for the threat of disaster that overshadowed Kala's domain, and now she strove to undo the harm she had wrought.

If only she could make her father understand their plight! From his distant mountain palace he could rescue them by setting in motion the duplicate machines that would feed air into these deep corridors and vaults. From his far stronghold he could provide them with the means to breathe and live, and at the same time supply the force which would hold the sea waters at bay.

Up in the throne-room of Ming's palace, twenty thousand feet above Kala's kingdom, Aura's father was standing in front of the television screen that had partially recorded the scene in progress away below.

Hazy, shifting figures were visible on the panel, and a voice was issuing from it, uttering words that were altogether too indistinct and confused to be understood.

"That's not Kala speaking now," said Zarkov, who was at Ming's elbow. "It's a woman's voice."

"It is my daughter's voice," the emperor rejoined tersely. "What can be wrong? It is impossible to make out what she is saying. What can have happened to this accursed apparatus? It has never failed us before."

It was at that very instant that the vision on the screen became clear again, and once more the watchers in the throne-room obtained a well-defined impression of Aura, Thun, Flash and Dale—and of Kala, too, who lay prone and insensible.

And this time the impression remained clear for an interval of about half a minute. By some lucky chance it stood out in strong relief for thirty precious seconds, and, as the picture sharpened in outline, so the voice of Aura was rendered more audible.

The girl's efforts with the control switch had met with success, and she was aware of it immediately. For down in the vault which she and her companions were occupying there was a screen similar to the one in Ming's throne-room, a screen which had also registered the haziest impressions but which now showed plainly the figures of the emperor, Dr. Zarkov and the group of soldiers who were with them.

"Father!" Aura cried out. "Father you must save us—you must save us! You alone have the power!"

"Save you from what?" came the tones of Ming. "Quick, tell me what has happened!"

His daughter answered him with an effort. She was finding it increasingly difficult to speak because of the lack of air.

"The generators have been wrecked, father!" she panted. "We can scarcely breathe, and the water in the caverns will tear down the barriers at any minute—at any minute!"

The vision on the screen began to fade. The apparatus was failing again. But it had served its purpose, and Aura knew from the look of dismay which she saw on her father's countenance that she had not appealed to him in vain.

Much as he resented her interference with his plans, she was the only one human being for whom he had any true affection. Besides, there was Dale Arden, whose loveliness had aroused in him a desire to make her his consort. And there was Kala, King of the Shark Men, his allies.

No, Aura had not appealed to her father in vain.

She turned from the switchboard and looked at her companions. Like herself, they seemed at the last gasp, but ere long a change was to come over them—a change brought about by a sudden, cooling breeze that swept soothingly through the deep realms of Kala's dominion.

It played against the faces of those who stood in the control-room; life-giving air with which they filled their aching lungs. It revived them and caused them to look at one another with relief in their eyes, and even Dale managed to arouse herself, though she had been on the verge of losing consciousness.

"We are saved!" Aura gasped. "My father has saved us—by the auxiliary generators in his palace."

"And the flood waters?" Flash Gordon demanded huskily.

"They will not break through now," was the reply.

A silence fell upon the two men and the two girls, a silence during which they heard a faint commotion in the distance. It reached their ears through the network of galleries that honey-combed the domain of the Shark Men, and they guessed from it that the suffocating population of Kala's realm had become aware that they had been saved from destruction by some means or other.

There was a note of joy in that faint commotion, but to Flash and Thun it spelled danger, for they knew that they would have short shrift if they fell into the hands of Kala's minions.

Kala himself still lay motionless on the floor, together with the guard whom Flash had knocked out a short time before. There was nothing to fear from them, but doubtless other foes would soon appear on the scene, and in ever-increasing numbers, too.

"We must get away from here," Thun said all at once. "Aura, we are in your hands."

"Yes, and you can depend on me," Ming's daughter rejoined. "We can reach the dry-docks now and make our escape in one of Kala's under-water ships. Come."

She led them to a doorway at the far side of the control-room, and they followed her into a broad gallery that was illuminated by strange lights. Onwards they hastened, and had not gone far when they heard an outcry somewhere behind them.

"Some of Kala's people have reached the control-room," Aura hazarded swiftly. "When Kala recovers he will send them in pursuit of us."

"Aye, and there may be foes between us and the dry docks, for all we know," Thun said. "Pray heaven that the gods are on our side."

"Gods or no gods," Flash retorted, "we'll do our best to make it tough on anybody that tries to stop us!"

They pushed ahead at a more rapid pace, running until they were panting from their exertions, and, fortunately for them, they met with no resistance, though once they stumbled across the bodies of three or four men who had obviously fallen insensible when the air supply had failed, and who had not yet come round.

A few minutes after they had passed these men they turned into a corridor that was flanked on one side by a number of heavy doors, and Aura opened one of them by a touch on a switch.

Shutter-like, it rose to reveal a spacious chamber in which a submarine ship was housed—possibly the very craft that had conveyed Flash and Dale to Kala's realm.

"Generally, the whole operation of allowing the vessels to pass in or out these dry docks is controlled from the main switchboard," Aura explained. "But, fortunately for us, there are other means at our disposal. First we must flood that compartment, and it can be done from the inside."

They entered the dock, and Aura stepped to a panel in the wall and pressed several buttons thereon. The door which had admitted them immediately closed down again, and at the same time water began to find its way into the chamber by two ports just above the level of the floor.

The princess and her companions quickly gained the interior of the submarine and sealed its conning-tower, and they had not long to wait before the dock was completely flooded. Then Aura moved towards the nose of the ship.

"I'm not sure if I can handle this vessel," Aura murmured, "but I'll do my best."

"Maybe I can help," Flash struck in. "I kept my eyes peeled when Dale and I were brought here in one of these contraptions."

Between them they managed to start the motor of the craft, and turned the submarine so that it faced a door in the far wall.

"Now forward," Aura commanded. "There is an invisible ray in front of us. It was thrown across the width of the dock when I pressed one of the buttons on the panel a minute or two ago. When we pass into that ray and break it, the outer barrier will rise."

The ship moved ahead, and, sure enough, the metal door in its path suddenly began to lift. A few seconds later the vessel was passing out into the immense caves, and as it slipped clear of the dock the great barrier sank behind it into its normal position.

With Aura at the helm the submarine stole through the murky waters of the caverns, the uncanny shapes of sea monsters floating past its windows, and for a long time it continued to make good progress through those flooded, underground realms. Then, after the lapse of an hour or two, it seemed to the occupants of the vessel that the gloom outside the windows was becoming less opaque.

"We shall soon be through to the open sea," declared Aura.

Less than a minute afterwards they were cruising out of that labyrinth of caves, and the nose of the craft was then raised. Swiftly the ship climbed, and presently it was breaking the surface to admit the refreshing light of day through its windows.

Before them Flash and his party saw a wide expanse of sea, but astern was a lonely shore strewn with boulders. It was in the direction of this shore that they turned, and when at length the submarine grounded in shallow water Flash was the first to climb out of it via the conning-tower.

He was followed by Thun and Dale, and, wading on to dry land, they looked about them curiously.

"How desolate!" Dale murmured.

"Desolate, but safe," Flash answered. "We must be miles from Ming's palace. Look, far away in the hinterland, you can just make out the peak of a mountain. That must be the mountain on which the emperor's city stands."

Attack from the Sky

ENGROSSED in a study of their surroundings, Dale and the two men beside her were unaware that Aura had not yet emerged from the submarine, and two or three minutes must have passed before they realised that she had still to disembark.

Thun called the princess by name then, and in a little while she climbed into view, splashing through the surf to join them.

"What have you been doing?" Thun demanded.

"Sending a message to my father by the ship's radio," she answered simply. "I told him where we had landed."

Thun's bearded countenance seemed to darken.

"You—told him where we were?" he grated. "You told Ming?"

"Calm yourself," Aura replied. "He will send some of his men here, but by the time they reach this spot you can be far away. I shall remain, but you can take Flash and the Earth woman to your father, the King of the Lion Men."

Thun was reassured.

"It is well," he said, "and we had better start at once. Flash and Dale Arden will be safe in my father's domain, which we can reach—"

He stopped short, for while he had been speaking he had chance to raise his head, and suddenly he had discerned something in the sky, something that caused a gleam of anxiety to appear in his eyes.

As they observed his expression the others followed the direction of his gaze, and they saw what at first appeared to be a covey of large birds flying towards them along the shore.

They watched them curiously, and then, as the oncoming group drew nearer, it dawned upon the stunned minds of Flash and Dale that these were not birds of the air, but men—men on whom Nature had bestowed the amazing gift of flight—men who were formed on the likeness of other human beings, but who possessed great, powerful wings as well as mortal limbs.

Flash Gordon and his fiancée were thunderstruck, and if they had not encountered so many marvels upon this planet of Mongo, they could not have believed their eyes. As it was, they stood there wondering if they were the victims of some freakish prank of the imagination—until a shout from Thun broke in upon their stupefied thoughts.

"King Vultan's Hawk Men!" he ejaculated.

"Allies of my father!" gasped Aura. Flash roused himself and shot a swift glance at her.

"Allies of your father!" he cried. "That means trouble for us. They may have heard that Dale and Thun and I are wanted by Ming. We'd better run for it."

"It would be useless to run," Aura told him quickly. "You could never outstrip them."

The American squared his broad shoulders and thrust out his jaw resolutely.

"Then we'll fight them!" he rapped out. "Aura, what did you do with that ray-pistol?"

It had been left in the submarine, and there was no time to obtain it, for the Hawk Men were almost overhead now and were swooping. Six of them, Flash counted, helmeted and wearing hauburks, or coats of mail; and each of them armed with a spear.

Flash was empty-handed, must rely on his fists. Thun carried a ray-gun, though, and it might prove invaluable in beating off an attack.

The Hawk Men were dropping out of the sky. As they bore down with widespread wings their shadows darkened the spot where Flash and his companions were standing. Then, soundlessly, the weapon in Thun's grasp sent up a death-dealing stream of fire.

The foremost assailant was struck, and his body seemed to wither in mid-air. Uttering a strangled scream he crashed lifelessly at Thun's feet, and lay there in a heap with wings faintly quivering.

The others veered away to the right, but as they swerved one of them hurled his spear at Thun, and it struck the bearded Lion Man a glancing blow on the temple.

Lucky it was for Thun that the missile was hurriedly aimed, or it might have crashed through his brain. Instead, it ripped a superficial wound in his scalp and brought him to his knees in a dazed condition.

The ray-gun fell from the bearded prince's fingers. Flash made a dive for it, but with incredible rapidity the Hawk Men again altered their course, and two of them closed with him, their wings folding on their backs the instant they touched ground.

Two more seized Thun, beat the senses out of him with their clenched fists, and then, lifting him between them, soared into the sky as swiftly as they had descended. In the meantime, Flash was battling like a madman against the pair of winged stalwarts who had engaged him, but, fiercely as he fought, he was aware of the fate that had overtaken Thun—and aware, too, that the fifth Hawk Man had singled out Dale and was struggling with her.

He tried to break away from his antagonists and go to his sweetheart's rescue, but before he could wrench himself free Dale had fainted, and, a dead weight in her captor's arms, she was borne up into the heavens to be carried off in the same manner as Thun.

Too late, Flash cast his enemies from him, and gazed in mingled horror and despair at the departing men who were flying heavenward with his friends. Then he was compelled to defend himself once more against a fresh onslaught by the two warriors who had been left to deal with him.

They were still carrying their spears, and one of them made a lunge at him, but he side-stepped the thrust and grabbed the shaft of the weapon, wresting it from the fellow's clutch and using it in retaliation.

He handled it as he might have done a staff, and caught its owner a sweeping blow that took him on the side of the head and sent him to the dust. In that same instant, however, the remaining Hawk Man sprang close and prepared to drive his spear through the American's body.

Flash had no chance to put himself on his guard, and but for Aura he must have met his doom there and then—Aura, who had been ignored by the winged raiders, but who had now snatched up the ray-gun that had fallen from Thun's hand.

She discharged it, and was not a split second too soon in drawing trigger, for the finger of fire that leapt from its muzzle struck Flash Gordon's opponent even as the man was bringing his arm forward to send the spear through the American's heart.

The wretch crumpled as if a blistering fork of lightning had smote him down, and a moment later Aura accounted for the warrior whom Flash had just felled, for out of the corner of her eye she had seen that man arousing himself to renew the combat single-handed.

High above, the other Hawk Men were hovering over the scene with their

"We're making for King Vultan's city," said Flash. "You told me we could reach it by rocket ship—and, by thunder, that's what we're going to do!"

captives. It was plain that they had believed their comrades could overcome Flash, and, though they knew otherwise now, they made no effort to descend to the shore again. Undoubtedly they feared the ray-gun that had slain their fellows, and after some hesitation they flew off with their prisoners, disappearing from view within a few minutes.

Helpless, Flash watched them with anguished eyes until they had vanished from his sight, and then, as he stood there, he felt the touch of Aura's hand on his arm.

"I saved your life, Flash," she said. "At least you can be thankful for that."

He looked at her, and, though he knew that he should express gratitude, yet there was bitterness in his voice as he spoke.

"I may owe you my life," he told her, "but you could have helped Dale and Thun."

"Dale Arden?" she retorted. "Dale Arden and Prince Thun? What are they to me? You are the one who interests me, and you alone."

Flash ground his teeth together. "Where are those Hawk Men taking them?" he bit out. "We've got to follow them!"

"Follow them?" she echoed in a faintly mocking tone. "How shall we follow them? One cannot reach King Vultan's city except by a rocket ship, and we have no rocket ship here."

"You mean—King Vultan's city is built on some inaccessible mountain?"

She shook her head. "No," she replied startlingly. "I mean that King Vultan's city is suspended in the sky. It has no contact with the surface of this planet. It cannot be reached except by his own Hawk Men—or by rocket ship."

Flash stared at her incredulously. For a moment he could not bring himself to believe that she was in earnest, even though he had come across so much that had amazed him in this strange new world.

"You must be mad!" he breathed. "What you say is impossible!"

"What I have told you is the truth, Flash," she answered deliberately. "On this planet of Mongo there are wonders which are doubtless beyond the wildest dreams of Earth people. You yourself have beheld many of them, but there are others in store for you, Flash. Yes, others in store for you."

Zarkov Finds a Friend

AWARE only that Dale, Flash, and Thun had been saved from the disaster which had threatened to overwhelm Kala's realm, Zarkov had returned to Ming's laboratory on the emperor's instructions and had tricked to occupy his mind with the remarkable apparatus which that workshop contained.

He found it difficult to concentrate on the scientific marvels there, however, for he could not dismiss Flash Gordon and his companions from his thoughts.

True, the imminent danger that had come so near to sealing their doom had been averted by the last-minute efforts of Ming. But there was small consolation in knowing this, for if they were delivered into the emperor's hands what would the future hold for them?

What else but death for Flash and Thun—and, for Dale, an enforced and hateful marriage?

Alone in the laboratory, Zarkov sat brooding upon these gloomy reflections, and he had been contemplating the cheerless prospect for some considerable time when all at once he heard the door open and softly close.

He looked round, and saw that a man in helmet and cuirass had entered the room—a big, handsome man in the thirties, clean-shaven except for a well-trimmed moustache.

Zarkov recalled that he had seen the fellow several times about the palace, but he had never paid any particular heed to him, and it came as a surprise to him when the man approached him quietly and spoke in a voice that was full of significance.

"You are concerned about your friends, doctor," the stranger said.

Zarkov favoured him with an inquiring glance.

"Who are you?" he asked. The big fellow drew himself to his full height, and a glitter seemed to play in his bold eyes as he answered the doctor's question.

"I am Prince Barin, the true ruler of this territory," he declared. "When I was a child I was deprived of my heritage by Ming the Merciless, who killed my father. I have grown up to hate Ming, but have been forced to bend the knee to him. Believe me, it has not been easy to hide my feelings, and always in my heart I have prayed that one day I might be avenged. And now, Zarkov, you have come amongst us—you, a man of the Earth, and by all accounts a scientist of genius—one who is almost the equal of Ming himself."

He paused, and there was a spell of silence, during which the doctor contemplated the younger man shrewdly. Then Barin spoke again.

"It dawned on me suddenly, like an inspiration," he said, "that you might help me to overthrow the usurper who slew my father."

"I help you?" Zarkov echoed the words in a tone that held little enthusiasm. "And what should I gain by that?"

"First of all you will gain the safety of your friends," replied Barin. "Do you know that they have escaped from Kala and are on the shores of the Great Sea? It is the truth, doctor, for a short time ago Ming received a communication to that effect from his daughter Aura. And now Ming awaits the return of his fleet of rocket ships from an expedition to the country of the barbarians. When that fleet arrives here he will send men to seize Thun, Gordon, and the Arden girl—unless we can get there and carry them off to the domain of Prince Thun's father."

"How are we to do that?" "By means of your own rocket ship," Barin told him, "the craft that brought you from the Earth."

Zarkov bit his lip. "My rocket ship is on the plain," he said, "and I could never reach it. I would be stopped by Ming's guards if I attempted to leave the palace."

Prince Barin laid a hand on his arm and addressed him rapidly.

"You would not be stopped if I acted as your guide," he stated. "I could take you out of here by the secret passages that lead down through the mountain. And I'll do it, Zarkov, in exchange for the allegiance of you and your friends."

The doctor made no response for a few seconds. Then he rose slowly from the chair on which he had been sitting, and looked Barin full in the face.

"I welcome your suggestion," he said, "but, in all fairness to you, I don't see that my friends and I can be of much aid to you against Ming."

"Zarkov, you can be of the greatest assistance," was the rejoinder. "Your genius as a scientist may well prove invaluable, especially if I can persuade Thun's father to take up my cause—which I believe he will do, for he is Ming's greatest enemy."

The possibilities of the situation seemed to become clearer in the doctor's mind now, and it did not take him long to make a decision.

"Very well, Prince Barin," he said all at once. "I am your man, and here's my hand on it."

They gripped, eyeing each other solemnly as they did so. Then Barin signed to Zarkov to follow him, and together they slipped out of the laboratory, first making sure that no one was in the corridor beyond the doorway.

Five minutes later the two men were in the passages beneath the palace, and with unflinching tread Barin conducted Zarkov down the successive flights of stairs that connected these subterranean galleries.

They travelled at a good pace, now hurrying along the dimly lighted tunnels, now descending the winding staircases until Zarkov judged that they must be many thousands of feet beneath the mountain metropolis of the Emperor Ming. And then at last, after what had seemed an eternity, they saw the gleam of sunshine ahead of them.

They hastened forward, and stepped into the light of day to find themselves amidst a cluster of huge rocks that partially concealed the cave-mouth from which they had emerged. A moment later Barin was leading the way through the tumbled boulders, and Zarkov followed him with some timidity, for he had not forgotten that it was in this very neighbourhood that he had seen two of the prehistoric monsters which inhabited Mongo.

If they encountered any such brutes now, they would be lost. For Zarkov was unarmed, and Barin carried only a sword, which he had drawn from its sheath some time before and was grasping in his right hand.

Yet they met with no grim and ghastly creatures of the plain as they passed among the rocks, and presently they stumbled on to the open ground where the doctor's rocket ship was standing.

They entered the vessel by the door in its side, and Zarkov moved to the controls. Then he turned to speak to Barin.

"I'll handle the ship," he said, "but you must lay the course for me."

The other nodded, and a few seconds later the craft was on the move, soaring high into the heavens with her motor operating at full speed. Then, when the ship had attained an altitude of several thousand feet, Barin indicated the direction in which Zarkov should steer.

Astern they could see the mountain peak that was dominated by Ming's citadel, but so rapid was their progress that this was soon dimmed by distance, and it was almost lost to view when they finally beheld a blue expanse of ocean in front of them.

"We are near the coast!" exclaimed Barin. "Drop lower, Zarkov, and fly along the shore."

The doctor obeyed, and they were cruising at a much-reduced rate over the rock-strewn seashore when they suddenly espied two human figures on the ground below, the figures of Flash Gordon and the Princess Aura.

Zarkov effected a landing not far from the spot where Flash and Aura stood, and the rocket ship had no sooner come to rest than the doctor and Barin stepped down from it. In another instant the scientist and his youthful fellow-countryman were face to face.

"Flash," Zarkov jerked out, "where are Dale and Thun?"

"They were captured by bird men," and Elaine will still be able to make it? Oh!"

Down went the instrument and she turned to the others.

"That's too bad," she said. "Willie and Elaine were on their way out here when their car was wrecked. Willie maintains that it wasn't an accident!"

"They weren't injured?" asked Larry.

"Not badly enough to keep them away. They're coming along in a taxi."

Budge appeared from the servants' quarters and approached Larry. At the same moment the front-door bell rang, and Aunt Catherine waved the butler back into the drawing-room and went to it herself.

"Reynolds slipped me this note," confided Budge. "I'm going to the village—you know why. I'll be back by nine-thirty."

"Check with me when you get back," said Larry; and then the front door was opened and Dr. Silas crossed the threshold.

"Well, Silas," said Aunt Catherine tartly, "I see you've found the right door this time! Come in—all set for bridge. Even your bad play will be a relief after Elwood's!"

Budge had gone, but Jeanne was in the hall because Helen had asked her to stay close beside her after dinner. The whole party entered the drawing-room, and four of them sat down at the card-table. Sarah retreated to the chesterfield; Elwood stood behind Aunt Catherine's chair, and after a while that outspoken dame swung round upon him with indignation.

"Must you snort at the back of my neck like that?" she rapped.

"Auntie," said Elwood plaintively, "if I annoy you I'll take a walk. Coming, Sarah?"

Sarah rose, and they went out from the room together and out from the house. Budge had driven away to the village in the green sedan to collect Lobo, and at the house of the veterinary surgeon he received a rapturous welcome from the dog, who had recovered completely from the murderous attack upon him.

At nine-thirty, or thereabouts, a messenger disturbed the bridge-party with a telegram for Reynolds, but the butler directed him to the garage, over which the supposed gardener had a room adjoining Budge's. The boy had no occasion to climb the stairs, however, for Reynolds was in the yard.

The telegram was delivered to him, and after the boy had ridden away on his cycle the detective tore open the envelope and read the message it contained in the light of a lamp over the open garage doors.

On the edge of the drive, a dozen yards away, a bush moved slightly and out from its foliage shot an arrow. With a choking gasp Reynolds pitched forward on his face, the metal barb of the arrow buried in his back.

A few minutes later the green sedan swung in at the gates of the drive and progressed along the gravelled way to the entrance to the yard. There it came to a standstill, and Budge switched off its lights and jumped down from behind its wheel.

Lobo would have followed him, but was commanded to stay in the car, and Budge entered the yard to reach the back door of the house. Near the garage he caught sight of the prone form of Reynolds on the ground and ran to him.

Five minutes afterwards a taxicab from the village drew up outside the front door of the house, and William Hudson and his wife descended from it. William Hudson was arranging with the driver to wait, when a black coupé streaked up from the gates and Joshua Seranton got down from it with an overcoat over his arm and a leather brief-case in his hand.

"So you two have got here?" he said. "It's a wonder!" returned Elaine rather shrilly. "Our car was driven off the road!"

"An accident?" inquired Seranton.

"We don't think so!"

The subject was not pursued, because just then Elwood and Sarah arrived from the direction of the backwater.

"Shall we go in?" suggested Seranton.

The butler admitted them, and Sarah took the lawyer's overcoat and hat. At the sound of their voices Aunt Catherine emerged from the drawing-room, and the others trooped after her.

"Well, Joshua," said Aunt Catherine, "I see you got here without an accident!"

"Yes, fortunately," he replied, and turned to Helen. "Ah, my dear, I'm glad you're all right." He smiled at Larry. "You've taken good care of her, Mr. Donovan. Well, we're all here now, and, in deference to Carl Hudson's memory, I'd like to suggest that we hold our meeting in his den."

"Hold it in the yard, if you want to!" said Aunt Catherine testily. "Let's get it started and over—we're in the middle of a bridge game!"

She led the way to the den and opened the door, but Larry and Helen lingered in the hall.

"When is he going to explain about me?" whispered Helen.

"I don't know," Larry whispered back.

"He came alone! Where is she?"

"We'll find out soon enough."

Budge stepped out from the kitchen. Larry and Helen were alone in the hall, and he called to Larry, who went with him into the drawing-room.

"Reynolds is dead," he said tersely. "Shot in the back with an arrow!"

Larry compressed his lips.

"You'd better call the police," he decided. "We won't tell the others yet. Have you got Lobo?"

"In the car."

"Good! Wait outside the french window of the den till I give you the signal."

"All right," said Budge grimly. "Watch your step in there. Have you got your gun?"

"Sure," returned Larry, and he went back to Helen, who had just been joined by Jeanne.

"What is it?" Helen asked anxiously. "A message from Reynolds?"

"Yes." Larry thought it advisable not to tell her the truth. "We'd better go in."

The Murderer Unmasked!

JOSHUA SCRANTON had deposited his brief-case on the desk in the den and was standing behind the desk. Dr. Silas Hudson had dropped into an armchair near him, and Elwood was leaning against the bookshelves. The others had seated themselves about the room, with the exception of Aunt Catherine, who stood by the fireplace with her hands clasped together.

The lawyer glanced swiftly at Helen and Larry as they entered the room with Jeanne, then unfastened the straps of the brief-case.

"I guess we all know why we're here," he said, adjusting his pince-nez. "So we'd better get to—"

"Just a minute, Joshua," Aunt Catherine interrupted. "I'd like to get one thing straight. It's my understanding that Estelle Hudson should be present!"

"That's quite true," agreed the lawyer.

"Well," Aunt Catherine pointed a finger at Helen, "I like this girl very well, but I'm convinced she's an impostor!"

"That's also quite true," Seranton admitted while the members of the Hudson family stared, "but the real Estelle Hudson is present." He smiled across at Jeanne. "You may step forward, now, my dear."

Jeanne moved modestly from Helen's side into the middle of the room, and she bore the startled scrutiny of the family of which she was a member without the slightest embarrassment.

"The substitution," Seranton resumed smoothly, "was made for Estelle's protection, but she refused to sanction it unless she could be present and at least share the danger."

Jeanne—or Estelle, as she really was—flushed.

"She certainly has done that!" cried Helen.

"Miss Bradford," said the lawyer, "you and Mr. Donovan have done your work well, and it is finished. You have fully earned the large sum agreed upon."

"Not yet," said Larry quietly. "It isn't ten o'clock."

Joshua Seranton took out his watch, looked at it, and laid it on the desk.

"Not quite," he confirmed, "but it is only a matter of minutes." He sat down in the chair behind the desk. "At exactly ten o'clock I will read the terms of Carl Hudson's will."

With alarming abruptness the lights in the room went out and there was a sudden thudding sound. Somebody screamed and frightened voices cried: "What is it?" "What happened?"

"Open the hall door, quick!" shouted Larry, who had whipped out his gun.

The door was opened, and light streamed in from the hall, silhouetting the figure of the butler.

"Campbell," said Aunt Catherine sternly, "look at the fuses! Hurry!"

The butler vanished; Larry stood back in the shadows with his gun.

"I can see everybody in the room," he said in a very grim voice, "and I'll shoot the first person that moves!"

"Is anybody killed?" quavered Elwood.

"No," retorted Larry, "but you will be if you don't stay just where you are!"

Several long minutes elapsed, and then as abruptly as they had gone out the lights came on again. Joshua Seranton pointed a quivering finger at the paneling just over Estelle's head. The point of a long-bladed hunting-knife was buried in the woodwork.

"The secret panel!" he cried, shifting his finger to indicate the wall beside the fireplace. "It came from there!"

"No," said Larry definitely. "I nailed that door on the inside to-day. That knife was flung by somebody in this room! Aunt Catherine, open the french windows and call Edwards!"

"Without the slightest hesitation Aunt Catherine obeyed, and Budge walked into the room with Lobo on a lead, but stopped behind a chair. At almost the same moment the butler reappeared from the hall.

"It was a fuse, madam," he reported, "and I repaired it."

"Step into the room, Campbell," commanded Larry, "and close that door."

The door was closed and the butler stood nervously against it. Lobo was hidden by the chair.

"Edwards and I," said Larry, "came out here as detectives. I guess we're not very good ones, but we do know a sure way to find out the person who just tried to kill Miss Hudson, and who murdered Reynolds. All right, Budge!"

While Aunt Catherine gasped at the news that her own private detective had been killed, Budge stepped forward with Lobo—and several of those present stared blankly at the dog they had understood to be dead.

"The guilty person also tried to kill this dog," Larry went on, "and he'll know that person! Go on, Budge!"

Budge led the dog towards Aunt Catherine, but she was not afraid of him.

"Hallo, big fellow," she said, and patted his head. "Glad they didn't get you."

Helen greeted Lobo as an old friend, and he pawed her; but Elwood exhibited signs of panic as the dog came sniffing towards him.

"Stand still," said Larry. "If you're innocent he won't hurt you."

William Hudson cringed away from the dog, but Lobo displayed no interest in him, or in his blonde wife. At Sarah Hudson he growled, but only in dislike; and then Budge led him towards Silas Hudson, and with a snarl Lobo strained so furiously at the lead that Budge lost his balance and dropped on his knees.

The doctor staggered up with his hands on the arms of the chair and his face was ghastly.

"Silas!" exclaimed Aunt Catherine in a shocked voice.

But it was not Silas the dog was trying to reach; it was Joshua Seranton, and not even Budge could hold him. Up on to the desk he leapt, and his fangs were at the lawyer's throat when Budge grabbed hold of his collar and dragged him back.

Seranton, wild-eyed and trembling all over, reached a hand into his brief-case; but Larry sprang forward and jabbed his six-shooter between his ribs.

"Better take it easy, Seranton!" he rasped.

The sirens of two police-cars shrieked in the drive, and the lawyer buried his face in his hands.

"They're coming for you, Seranton!" said Larry.

In the drawing-room, after the police had departed with their prisoner, Larry said with a little sigh of relief:

"Well, our job's finished! I do think, though, that one of you might have mentioned the fact that Seranton was Carl Hudson's brother-in-law, and, therefore, almost as entitled to inherit as any of you in the event of Estelle's death! He might have murdered the lot of you in turn!"

"What made you first suspicion him?" inquired Aunt Catherine.

"The third arrow," replied Larry. "It was directed at Jeanne—or Miss Hudson—June 6th, 1936.

son, as we now know her to be. Because of that I guessed who she was and figured he was the only one who knew it. Then I timed him until he answered my telephone call last night. By driving fast, he could just make it."

"And he picked you," commented Aunt Catherine with a scornful laugh, "because he thought you were dumb!"

"Reynolds knew, too," said Larry. "The wire used on the dog was a fine aeroplane cable, and he traced its purchase to Seranton. That's why Reynolds was killed!"

"Well—well—well, how did he turn out the lights?" stuttered Elwood.

"By running a paper clip into the desk-light socket and blow out the fuse. He knew the room well, and he had his knife ready in his brief-case—along with the revolver I didn't give him time to pull."

Budge came in from the drive.

"They found the bow and some more arrows locked in Seranton's coupé," he announced. "Looks like a cinch case!"

Jeanne—otherwise Estelle—rose up from the chesterfield on which she had been listening.

"There are a few things I'd like to say," she announced. "First, I want to thank you all for helping me, and to apologise for having entertained certain suspicious."

Budge, with an expression of utter dismay on his face, whispered to Larry:

"Is Jeanne—I mean—er—is she the real heiress?"

"Sure," replied Larry. "Didn't you know that?"

"And I just proposed to her this morning!"

"What did she say?"

"Never mind." Budge was thoroughly upset. "I'll see you in town later. Come on, Lobo!"

He went out from the room with the dog while Estelle was still speaking.

"Aunt Catherine and Sarah," she said, "this is your home for always."

"My dear!" exclaimed Aunt Catherine, and there were sudden tears in her eyes.

"Uncle Silas, the books in the den are all yours. Larry, I can't pay for what you've done with money, but whatever Mr. Seranton offered you I'd like to double. Why, where's Budge?"

"Gone," replied Larry. "He seemed to be in a terrible hurry to get back to town."

"Oh!" Without another word for anyone she flew from the room across the hall and stumbled down the steps from the front door.

Budge had commandeered William Hudson's taxi-cab and bundled Lobo into it. He had given the driver instructions, and he had got into the cab with the dog, and he was slamming the door when Estelle shouted frantically:

"Wait!"

The driver removed his hand from the self-starter as she rushed round to the other door, opened it, and scrambled breathlessly in beside Lobo.

Budge gaped at her.

"Jeanne—I—er—I mean Miss Hudson," he stammered, "I—I told him to go clear back to town."

Estelle smiled serenely.

"Lobo," she said, "I wonder if you'd mind?"

Evidently Lobo did not mind, for he immediately jumped down from the seat so that she could nestle against her diffident lover.

"Best of luck!" Larry took the proffered hand, and so did Mary. Ed, glad to escape, left them.

Captain Tim Dawson hastened forward as soon as Ed had gone. He looked just a little uncomfortable.

"Guess I owe the lives of my two kids to you, Larry."

"All in the day's work, chief."

"Do you know what Ed's just told me?" cried Mary. "It was Ed that Larry saved that last time. Ed got knocked out by some falling bricks and Larry got him to safety. That was why the life-line was left unattended."

"Why the dickens didn't you say so?" gasped old Dawson.

"Guess I was a bit stubborn and proud," answered Larry. "I thought Ed would have said something, but then I wasn't to know he had lost his memory on account of the wallop he got from those bricks."

"Do you mean Ed had forgotten you saved his life?" Captain Dawson could not credit his ears.

"Sure, you read about it every day in the papers," Larry said, with a sly grin. "When he saw me crawling out of the Blue Star it all came back to him with a rush. Funny, isn't it?"

"I should call it more than funny," muttered old Dawson.

Larry had discarded his taxi-cab helmet, and someone anxious to be pleasant to the hero of the moment found it and brought it to him. Larry put it on his head.

Tim Dawson went back to his men and to talk with Captain Dixon about his ship. When he was through he found that Mary was still there with Larry, with Mickey hopping round trying to get a word in now and again.

"Here, this won't do." Tim Dawson strode back to them.

"You're both wet through, so off you get, Mickey, and that goes for you, too, Mary!" he cried. "Larry will be round to supper this evening, so tell your mother to have something special. I'd like a word with you, son, before you go."

"What is it, chief?" Captain Dawson held out his hand.

"I'm always willing to own when I'm wrong, and I sure made a big mistake about you, Larry." He gripped the younger man's hand. "Now that head-wear kinda offends my eye." He stepped back to cast a critical eye at Larry. "We never fired you, and we never accepted your resignation, so what'd you mean by wearing that thing?" He took off his helmet. "This is what you're going to wear in future."

Larry grinned as the big helmet nearly slid over his ears.

"Thank you, chief!" His grin faded. "There's Snap—I believe he took a picture. What'll I do about it?"

"Nothing, son." Tim Dawson took his arm. "If the papers do get your picture I'll not complain. And if Snap calls round to-morrow he can have one of you in your uniform with two good-conduct stripes. Now you get into that old cab and get out of those wet togs. Mind you show up prompt at seven."

"He'll make a grand son-in-law." Tim Dawson muttered happily to himself as he watched Larry Johnson jump into his cab and drive away.

"FLASH GORDON"

was the hoarse reply. "Winged men, doctor—"

"Hawk Men!" Barin interrupted, looking at the bodies of the three warriors who had been killed by the ray-gun. "Followers of King Vultan, Ming's ally."

Flash looked at him, and then shot a questioning glance at Zarkov, who proceeded to introduce the big fellow.

"This is Prince Barin, Flash," he said. "He came to me as a friend and sympathiser. He has good reason to dislike Ming, and hopes to overthrow the emperor."

Aura had been listening attentively, and now spoke for the first time.

"So, Barin!" she rapped out. "You would plot against my father!"

"Against the man who has wronged me, Aura," Barin retorted. "I hold no grudge against you, his daughter, but—"

She broke in on him sharply, at the same time covering him with the weapon she held in her hand.

"Prince Barin," she said threateningly, "you and Zarkov are going to take Flash Gordon to the safety of the Lion Men's realm. Then you will return with me to my father's stronghold."

"No!" It was Flash who spoke, and as he uttered the word he snatched the ray-gun from Aura's grasp and gripped her by the arms. "No, we're making for King Vultan's city. You told me we could reach it by rocket ship—and, by thunder, that's what we're going to do!"

The girl stared at him in dismay.

"You do not know what you are saying," she cried. "What could you do against King Vultan? He would kill you!"

"I'd rather die than leave Dale and Thun at the mercy of one of your father's satellites," Flash ground out. "Zarkov, you'll help me, won't you?"

"And I, too," Barin interposed, as the doctor gave ready response to his young friend's query. "I have an idea that Vultan may not be so well disposed to Ming as he professes to be. Perhaps I may be able to gain his goodwill if I have the opportunity of talking to him."

"Then let's be on our way," Flash declared. "Aura, you had better stay here. Ultimately, your father's men will pick you up."

The girl hesitated, and then, as the three men began to move towards the rocket ship, she hurried after them.

"I'm going with you," she announced with emphasis. "I think Barin's hopes are likely to prove false, and, if they do, then you will have need of me."

Thirty seconds later Zarkov's ship was in the air again, carrying Flash Gordon and his companions high above the seaboard of Ming's domain.

Brought Down

AT sight of King Vultan's city, floating above the clouds, the eyes of earthly mortals might have widened in sheer wonder—yes, and registered an expression that would have betrayed incredulity.

They would have seen it as a conglomeration of stately palaces and homes built upon a vast platform of stone that hung suspended in space, poised there by anti-gravitational forces which were unknown to scientists in that world whence Dale Arden, Flash Gordon and Dr. Zarkov had come.

It was to one of the palaces in this amazing sky city that Dale Arden had been taken, and on recovering from the swoon that had robbed her of her senses she found herself lying on a couch in a spacious room.

A strange, gilded throne stood against one wall of the room, but Dale scarcely noticed it, for as she opened her eyes she became aware of a gross figure bending over her, the figure of an enormous man dressed like some Viking of old.

There were other men standing nearby—winged men, like the bloated person who was stooping above Dale with a leer on his ugly face, and who now addressed her in a deep, lusty voice.

"Ah, my fair guest awakes!" he said with a chuckle.

Dale struggled into a sitting posture, and there was terror in her gaze as she looked at him.

"Who are you?" she panted. "Who are you?"

"I, my dear?" the massive creature rejoined. "I am Vultan, King of the Hawk Men. And you are Dale Arden, the Earth girl, eh? Yes, news travels fast on Mongo. We have heard of you and your friends Gordon and Zarkov."

"Flash—where is he?" Dale cried out in alarm. "Where is he? And where is Thun?"

King Vultan fingered his heavy jaw.

"Thun has been put to work in the atom furnaces which generate the forces that keep this city in the void, my pretty one," he said. "As for Gordon, he fought too well, and it seems that he was able to avoid capture with the aid of the Emperor Ming's daughter."

He paused, noticing the relief with which Dale received the news that Flash was safe. Then he stroked her arm.

"You are very fair," he observed, moistening his thick lips. "I hear that Ming was much attracted by you, and now that I see you, I can well understand his interest in you. H'm, I understand it so well that I doubt if I can bring myself to give you up to him."

He pawed her arm again with his heavy, brutal hand, but frowned as she recoiled from him.

"What?" he grunted. "You do not like King Vultan?"

She tried to speak, but fear stifled her voice, and when she made no answer he drew back with a sly grin and pressed a button on the wall. Instantly a panel slid aside, and to Dale's horror a brutish form was revealed, an animal whose hirsute body resembled that of a bear, and who shambled forth into the room with an awkward gait, uttering savage growls as it did so.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"GUARD THAT GIRL."—Larry Donovan, Robert Allen; Helen Bradford, Florence Rice; Budge Edwards, Ward Bond; Joshua Scranton, Wyrley Birch; Jeanne Martin, Barbara Kent; Reynolds, Arthur Hohl; Aunt Catherine, Elizabeth Risdon; Sarah Hulson, Nana Bryant; Dr. Silas Hulson, Thurston Hall; Elwood Hulson, Bert Roach; Lobo, Himself.

"Perhaps you would prefer my pet," Vultan said to Dale. "I call him Urso. Come here, Urso!"

The monster's baleful eyes turned slowly upon the King of the Sky City, and as if in response to a familiar voice, it moved obediently enough towards the burly monarch, approaching in its shuffling fashion and coming to a halt by his side.

As the lion-tamer dominates the beasts of the circus arena and holds them in restraint, so King Vultan seemed to render this creature meek and docile by means of some hypnotic spell. Yet Dale sensed the latent ferocity of the animal, and looked on it in the utmost terror as its master stroked its fearsome muzzle.

King Vultan glanced round, and suddenly grasping the stricken girl by the wrist, he tried to draw her towards the beast.

"Come, my pretty one," he said with a leer. "Come, make friends with Urso!"

"No, no!" screamed Dale. "Take him away! Take him away!"

A hoarse laugh escaped Vultan, but with a word of command he sent that strange brute back to its cell and closed the panel again. Then he turned to the girl once more and was about to make some comment when a messenger hurried into the room.

"Your Majesty!" the newcomer ejaculated. "An unknown rocket ship approaches. It is not one of Ming's craft."

Vultan looked at the man quickly.

"Not one of Ming's craft?" he echoed, his brow darkening. "Then it must be an enemy. Run no risks. Bring it down with the ray of destruction."

The messenger saluted and departed in haste, and if it had been possible for Dale to have followed him she would have seen him mount a spiral stairway that led to a turret of Vultan's palace.

On a platform at the summit of that tower a group of Hawk Men were assembled. They were gathered around a machine that might have been a searchlight, and their attention was riveted upon a vessel that was flying swiftly towards the sky city.

"Bring down that ship!" said the messenger who had come from the throne-room. "His Majesty's orders!"

The men on the turret bestirred themselves, but, rapid as their movements were, the oncoming vessel was circling above the palace before they could bring into play the apparatus around which they were ministered.

Suddenly, from this machine, a thin beam of light seared upward through the void, a quivering finger that passed close to the ship which had appeared over the stronghold.

The craft was the rocket ship containing Zarkov, Flash, Barin and Aura, and, gazing upon the miraculous city that hung below them in the sky, the two Americans were not immediately aware of the sinister ray that had reached up towards them. But Prince Barin and Ming's daughter saw it, and with loud cries they tried to warn Zarkov of the danger.

"Turn back!" shouted Barin. "If that beam makes contact with the ship the motors will be paralysed!"

He spoke too late, for even as he uttered the words the course of the ray was changed—and in the instant that it touched its target the vessel checked, faltered, and then plunged like a stricken bird!

The News Reels

Spencer Tracy, in the same picture, had to forgo polo for five weeks.

James Stewart was "grounded"—warned that he could not fly an aeroplane while he was working.

Freddie Bartholomew appeared at the studio on a motor-cycle. It was promptly confiscated upon orders from studio executives. Freddie represents too large an investment to risk a broken arm or leg.

Mickey Rooney has strict instructions that, when he is working, he must not play football or baseball or engage in dangerous sports. In the midst of a production last year he broke an arm while tohogganing.

Jean Hersholt has instructions never to shave his moustache, though he may grow whiskers. Charles Butterworth faces a permanent ban against smiling or laughing in front of the camera. He is more valuable on the screen as a "poker-faced" comedian.

Nat Pendleton, former world's amateur champion wrestler, is forbidden to wrestle professionally. He has often challenged other wrestlers, but studio executives have always stepped in, just on time to prevent trouble.

When Charles Laughton was working in "Mutiny on the Bounty," he had an agreement with Director Frank Lloyd not to gain an ounce of weight. He kept a masseur constantly with him to that end.

Richard Dix Completes His Sixty-first Starring Part

Richard Dix has just completed his sixty-first starring picture, "Special Investigator," which also is his twentieth starring feature for one studio—Radio Pictures.

With this he must establish some sort of a record.

Dix, who passed through the transition from silent films to talkies with increased popularity, has played almost every conceivable type—aviator, engineer, cowboy, doctor, football star, author, convict, soldier of fortune, diplomat. He has also been indirectly responsible for the mantle of stardom later draped on many brilliant young actresses who were his leading ladies.

In "Special Investigator," Dix adds to his collection of rôles by portraying for the first time a Federal agent, a "G-man," to use the publicly accepted term. He also has a new leading lady in the person of Margaret Callahan, a clever Irish-American actress.

Smoke Got In Her Eyes

Acting a difficult close-up while technical aides just out of range blow cigarette, cigar, and pipe smoke in her face, is not Mary Ellis' idea of a pleasant experience.

But she had to put up with it for the sake of realism in a scene for Walter Wanger's Paramount production, "Fatal Lady."

The action required the star to sing a number in an Apache café in Paris. Because the haze from the crowded background did not drift in front of the lens to suit cameraman Leon Shamroy, he stood as near to Miss Ellis as possible with ten other men, and they all puffed smoke in her face.

Not to be Shorn

Two thousand sheep will wear their winter coats a few weeks longer than usual because Twentieth Century-Fox is going to make "Ramona" in colour.

Weather and location requirements for colour will not permit filming of the picture until May and June, far past the usual shearing-tune. There is an important shearing sequence in "Ramona," but not even Hollywood would attempt to photograph shorn sheep being shorn again.

So Henry King, who will direct a cast headed by Loretta Young as "Ramona," has hired two thousand unshorn sheep for the picture.

Montgomery Gets a Complete Book of Clippings from Fan

Robert Montgomery has just received 150,000 presents in one, from a single fan.

It was a huge scrap-book containing Press clippings about the Metro-

Goldwyn-Mayer actor from his first appearance in "So this is College," up to his current picture, "Suicide Club."

The fan, a young girl from Ohio, who asked that her name be kept secret, offered to "trade" Montgomery the book for an autographed picture. The picture, autographed and framed, was on its way to Ohio by air-mail special delivery within a few hours.

The girl, in her letter, added that she had formed a trading society all over the world to get the clippings from magazines and papers. She conducted her "trading society" by sending a clipping of a player to a person in another country in return for one of Montgomery.

She had planned to keep the book, but when she learned that the actor's scrap-book, which he started when he arrived in Hollywood, had been destroyed by fire, she decided to sacrifice her treasure.

World's Speed Records Sought for Motion-picture Scenes

Hopeful of shattering a world's speed record for motion pictures, automobile technicians in Hollywood have built a high-speed racing-car that may revolutionise automobile designs.

The racer, christened "The Falcon," is twenty-six feet and two inches in length, is powered with a 675-horse-power motor, and is capable of a speed of 180 miles per hour.

Originally, the car was designed by Arnold Gillespie and built by Harlan Fenger and Lou Moore, former champions of the roaring speedway, for scenes in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's picture, "Speed."

In the speed tests for the picture, "The Falcon" performed so satisfactorily that Producer Lucien Hubbard and Director Edwin L. Martin have given Fenger and Moore permission to use the car in attempting to shatter the world's twenty-four-hour speed record on the Utah salt-beds upon completion of the picture.

The record was established on the salt-beds last September by Captain George Eyston of England, when he reached an average speed of 140 miles per hour for the twenty-four-hour run.

Eleanor Powell Writing a Book on Tap Dancing

Eleanor Powell is educating her fingers to tell other people how to educate their toes.

The girl who became the World's Dancing Sweetheart after her sensational work in "Broadway Melody of 1936" is writing a book on dancing.

She has received thousands of letters from men, women and children asking her various questions about tap dancing, so she has decided to answer all of the letters in the form of a book.

The book is also to contain many illustrations from her picture and will show toe as well as tap dancing.

Writing has always been one of Miss Powell's hobbies, but this is the first time in her life that she has had the chance to write a book.

Gaston Glass Returns to Screen

Fighting his way back in an attempt to regain some of the laurels that once were his in an industry that formerly paid him a four-figure salary each week, Gaston Glass has completed his fifth consecutive rôle since his return to the screen a few months ago.

Glass was once leading man to Sarah Bernhardt, and later enjoyed great success as a star of the silent screen.

His most recent films are the Katharine Hepburn picture, "Mary of Scotland," "Under Two Flags," in which Ronald Colman plays the leading male rôle, the Carole Lombard-Fred MacMurray Paramount picture "The Princess Comes Across," "A House Divided," and now comes his latest, "Fatal Lady," the Walter Wanger production for Paramount release, which has Mary Ellis as its star.

Blackmail!

Eddie Cantor, whose latest picture, "Strike Me Pink," has been such a success, is convulsing Hollywood with a story about a minor operation which he underwent a short time ago. The surgeon who operated used a local anaesthetic, and Eddie was therefore able to carry on a conversation with him. About half-way through the proceedings the surgeon asked his patient if he would consent to appear at a concert in aid of the hospital.

"You mean when I get well?" queried Eddie.

"I mean if you get well," solemnly replied the surgeon.

Eddie did get well (he never was in any real danger) and the concert was a big success.

Mob Storms Prison

One thousand men, women and children rioted a little while ago in a small town nestled within the walls of the big Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio, climaxing their lawlessness by burning to the ground a prison in which a kidnap suspect was being guarded.

A battery of cameras recorded the spectacular scene, which marks the dra- June 20th, 1936.

IN

"SECRET AGENT"

An English officer is sent to Switzerland to trace a spy who is forming a link between Germany and Turkey. A strange being, "The General," and a beautiful girl are sent by the Government to help him to destroy this secret agent. A story full of thrills.

"THE OREGON TRAIL"

It was renegade treachery that had caused Colonel Delmont's death. That was why his son rode the vengeance trail and braved a hundred perils to track down the veteran cavalrman's slayers. A swift-moving epic of the old frontier days, starring John Wayne and Ann Rutherford.

"THE RETURN OF JIMMY VALENTINE"

A daring young reporter sets out to discover the identity of the once notorious Jimmy Valentine, but through his investigations he lands an even more notorious crook and his gangsters in prison. A thrilling drama, starring Roger Pryor and Charlotte Henry.

matic climax of "Fury," co-starring Sylvia Sidney and Spencer Tracy, under the direction of Fritz Lang.

A three-story prison, complete in every detail, was constructed for the attack. Surrounding the building, as authentic background, were two streets lined with typical small-town business structures. A large park occupied the square in front of the prison.

Innumerable small touches lent added life to the entire three-acre set: automobiles, trucks, and even large passenger buses moved through the streets; smoke drifted from the chimneys; hotel guests stared uneasily from windows and a second-floor balcony.

And then the mob stormed the prison in what observers pronounced one of the most vivid examples of mass action ever filmed in Hollywood.

A strong cast in the new film includes Eric Linden, Bruce Cabot, Walter Abel, Frank Albertson, Walter Brennan, Edward Ellis, Fred Burton, Howard Hickman, Edwin Maxwell and Morgan Wallace. Joseph Mankiewicz is the producer.

A Ten-year-old Fight

Myrna Loy and Warner Baxter roared their applause the other day at the boxing match between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney.

They were doing it all for their new film "To Mary—With Love," and the fight they saw, which took place ten years ago, was being "back-projected"—a bit of movie magic now an important part of picture-making.

Back-projection is the process of filming players against a moving background. It is possible, by this method, to reproduce any important event of the past fifteen years and play modern actors and actresses against it.

John Cromwell, the director of "To Mary—With Love," decided to include the famous fight in the film.

The process department procured a copy of the newsreel in which the fight appeared.

A special camera projected it on to a screen, and a hundred feet or so in front of that screen the players and a thousand extras saw re-enacted an event that had transpired a decade ago.

A second camera, the one used in production, "shot" this group of boxing fans and principals, while, in the background, Tunney expertly dodged the vicious onslaught of an enraged Dempsey.

William Powell Takes Up Canoe-boat Sailing

Canoe sailing, the trickiest variety of nautical sport, is the latest pastime to be adopted by Hollywood's screen players. Robert Armstrong is its sponsor. He is forming a racing club in the film colony. James Cagney is one of the charter members, and William Powell is the latest recruit.

Armstrong himself is being taught the finer points of the exciting sport by his uncle, Ralph Armstrong, who chances to be its world's champion. Because he is visiting California, Ralph Armstrong will not defend his world's title for the first time in several seasons when the annual championships are held on the St. Lawrence river.

The Balboa Yacht Club is headquarters for the screen canoe sailors. The fragile craft can match the speed of cup-defending yachts of the larger classes, according to Robert Armstrong. They require the most expert handling, and novices must be prepared for plenty of duckings.

As a detective, Pete McCaffrey was daring enough in tackling crooks, but that was because he did not know fear. A bullet that caused his eyes to be bandaged for a week reduced him to quivering cowardice—and then the girl who loved him stung him into facing the guns of a gang with true valour, because he was afraid. A gripping drama, starring Preston Foster

A Sensational Capture

DETECTIVE - SERGEANT PETER McCAFFREY was playing on a pin-table just inside the doorway of the lunch-room, but he was not achieving any great score because he was looking more often at a mirror on the wall than at the little metal balls he shot at intervals from the trigger of the machine.

The mirror reflected a portion of the roadway outside the lunch-room and some of the houses on the other side of the street—old-fashioned houses, stone-fronted, with steep steps leading up to their front doors over basement entrances.

The detective was a young man and a tall one; clean-shaven and good-looking. He might very well have passed for an ordinary customer with time to kill; but his blue eyes narrowed and glinted as he saw in the mirror a black car draw up outside one of the houses opposite; for the black car had a wide door at the back of it, instead of the usual side doors, and the driver and another man—both dressed sombrely in black—descended from the front seat to open the back door and pull out a long wicker basket.

Few of the pedestrians in Second Avenue paid any attention to the car, or to the men with the basket, for quite frequently in New York City the dead are conveyed in wicker shells to the "funeral parlours" of undertakers. But McCaffrey was more than interested. With the aid of the mirror on the wall he watched the two men carry the basket up the front steps of the house and disappear into it with their burden.

Into the lunch-room from the street stepped Matt O'Brien, Press photographer on the staff of the "Daily Star," his camera slung over his left shoulder; and with him was a slim and very bright-eyed girl in a check costume. But so intent was McCaffrey on what was happening across the way that he did not notice either of them till O'Brien stopped short and spoke.

"How're you, flatfoot?" he inquired breezily.

"If I thought you could read," retorted the detective, "I'd write you a letter and tell you."

"If I thought you could write," returned O'Brien, "I'd learn how!" He grinned at the girl who was with him. "What'd you think of that? You ain't met the pride of the force yet, have you?"

"No," she replied, "but I'd like to." "This is Pete McCaffrey," O'Brien introduced with a flip of his hand, "an honest dick—to hear him tell it! This is Sally Rogers."

"How do you do?" murmured the girl; and McCaffrey detached his gaze from the mirror to bestow a casual glance upon her. She was beautiful, in her own dark and slender fashion, but beauty had no appeal for him at the moment.

"How are you?" he almost grunted.

"Sally's just started on the 'Star,'" O'Brien informed him. "She's from Kansas City."

"Welcome to America," said the detective dryly.

That, doubtless, was intended as an insult to Kansas City, but Sally Rogers appeared not to understand it. She touched O'Brien on the arm.

"How about our coffee and rolls?" she asked.

"Cup of coffee, detective?" suggested O'Brien.

"No, thanks," replied the preoccupied sleuth. "It keeps me awake."

"Nothing could do that," jeered the photographer; and then he and Sally drifted away to a long counter and climbed on to adjacent stools.

Out from the house across the street came the two men in black who had entered it, and they carried the long basket down the steps in a slow and careful manner that suggested it now contained something heavy. To the astonishment of several people who were entering the lunch-room, McCaffrey whipped a six-shooter from his hip-pocket.

"Get out of the way!" he shouted, and forced a passage to the pavement and flew across the roadway, escaping the front wheels of a motor-van by inches.

The men in black were about to stow their burden in the sable car as he drew near them.

"Drop that basket!" he bellowed. "Come on, drop it!"

They gaped at him and at the gun in his hand, and they lowered the basket to the asphalt. Startled passers-by stopped and increased in numbers.

"Get over there!" rasped McCaffrey. "Get over there!"

The undertaker's men backed hurriedly on to the pavement, well away from their vehicle; the gathering crowd of men and women were driven from the immediate vicinity of the basket.

"Over there!" yelled McCaffrey. "Over! Over!"

Suddenly a woman gave vent to a piercing scream, and men shouted. The lid of the basket had been heaved sideways and a very live corpse was sitting up in the thing itself—a dark-haired fellow in dark clothes, who was holding a long-barrelled six-shooter.

Out from the basket he scrambled to his feet, his gash of a mouth twisted in a murderous fashion as he levelled the gun at the detective.

But McCaffrey was on him like lightning, bearing him back against the car, and the hand that held the gun was forced backwards as in a vice before the trigger could be pulled.

Shots rang out and bullets sang through the air, to the accompaniment of screams and cries, but no one was hit by the bullets. It was the man who had been in the basket that suffered. McCaffrey hit him in the face with the butt of his own gun again and again before it was sent spinning.

Matt O'Brien and Sally Rogers witnessed the battle that followed from the doorway of the lunch-room; the more timorous members of the crowd ran off, and a patrolman came running up.

McCaffrey lost his hat as well as his gun, but he would not let go of his captive. Fighting and struggling with equal desperation the two swayed to the kerb, stumbled against it, and crashed down upon the pavement.

For a few moments they lay there, clawing at one another, panting for breath, then struggled up together. The detective, jerking his left hand free, delivered a swift uppercut to an ugly jaw that sent its owner flat on his back, and he stamped on a hand that was trying to take aim with the six-shooter it still held.

The hand relaxed, the weapon was kicked into the gutter, and McCaffrey dumped himself astride his prisoner, fished out a pair of handcuffs, and, in spite of fierce resistance, manacled a pair of wrists.

Matt O'Brien came rushing across from the lunch-room, with Sally Rogers close behind him, and as McCaffrey stood up and tugged his captive to his feet, the photographer focused his camera on the battered and dishevelled pair.

"Hold it, Mac!" he cried.

McCaffrey looked round and the shutter of the camera clicked. The crowd closed in; a mounted policeman slid from the saddle of his horse and thrust his way to the detective's side.

"I called the wagon, sarge," he announced.

"Okay," said McCaffrey. "My hat and gun, and his gun, too, are around here somewhere. Hang on to him!"

The officer grabbed hold of the handcuffed man, but at that moment a patrolman arrived with the detective's hat and the two guns. O'Brien took another picture.

"You've never met my pal, have you?" said McCaffrey, brushing his hat with the sleeve of his coat. "This is Lefty Berger. You know, Public Enemy Number— What is your number, Lefty?"

"Whatever it is," snarled the crook, "you ain't got it!"

"Not a bad rehearsal, though, is it?"

Behind the muslin curtains of a window on the first floor of the house Berger had left in a basket a stockily built fellow with a slouch hat pulled down over his eyes had snatched an automatic from a shoulder-holster under his coat as though with the intention of shooting through the glass at the detective down below.

"Why, you dumb, flatfooted—" he began wrathfully.

"Are you crazy?" snapped another man who was standing behind him—a tall man, lean of face, with a weak chin but a high forehead. "D'you want to bring them in here?"

Tony Ricci, a member of Berger's gang, put the automatic back in its holster, but glared accusingly at the speaker.

"Who tipped the cops, Martin?" he rasped.

"How should I know?" shrugged Martin. "I'm a lawyer, not a fortune-teller. Listen, Ricci, I planned this whole thing, didn't I? It was all my idea, wasn't it, to get him safely out of town? Can I help it if some dumb cop—" He broke off, as though more than half-scared by Ricci's threatening attitude. "Do you think I'd double-cross Berger?" he asked plaintively.

"Tain't what I think that counts," Ricci retorted. "It's what Berger's gonna think!"

Sirens shrieked in the street, and a police patrol wagon scattered the crowd. From a car behind it policemen descended.

"How do I get out of here?" Ricci demanded. "It's your house!"

"Come on," said Martin. "There's a very useful back way."

Salute!

MATT O'BRIEN, with his camera slung over his shoulder, rejoined Sally Rogers, who was watching Berger being marched towards the patrol wagon.

"Let's grab a cab," he said. "I've gotta rush these negatives to the office."

"You go ahead," said she, "but flash the office first for me. I'm staying here to find out what this is all about."

O'Brien nodded and squeezed his way through the crowd to find a taxi-cab. Sally stood beside the open door of the patrol wagon as Berger was bundled into it.

"Go on, get in there!" McCaffrey commanded. "And all the way in!"

Sally put a hand on the rail and a foot on the step as though to follow the crook, but the detective caught hold of her arm.

"Wait a minute!" he cried. "Where d'you think you're going?"

"You wouldn't do a girl out of a story, would you?" she asked sweetly.

"Come on, sister," barked the sergeant in charge of the wagon, "get down!"

She got down, but with her big hazel eyes on McCaffrey she said scornfully.

"What's the matter with you New York coppers? Don't you like to see your names in print?"

That was one back for the insult to Kansas City, and McCaffrey grinned.

"Let her on," he said to the sergeant, and Sally thanked him and entered the vehicle.

Berger had dumped himself sulkily on a seat. McCaffrey dropped down beside him and crossed his long legs. Sally sat opposite, and the door was closed and fastened. The sergeant walked round to the front of the wagon and climbed up beside the uniformed driver, who sounded his siren and started the engine.

"This is certainly a swell show," said Sally appreciatively, as the crowd was left behind, "and you're a swell guy to do this for me."

"That's okay," returned McCaffrey in an airy manner. "It was all for you. I hired Berger, here, special—just for this morning." He dug an elbow between the ribs of the crook. "Say 'hallo,' mug!"

Berger looked evilly at the girl, but did not open his mouth.

"I've heard of you," she remarked conversationally.

"That's funny," snarled the prisoner. "I never heard of you."

"Say 'hallo'!" insisted McCaffrey.

"Hi!"

"There you are." The detective flipped a hand. "All done by kindness."

"How did you know he was in the basket?" asked Sally.

"Me?" McCaffrey laughed. "Oh, I'm a mind-reader."

"You ain't got a mind to read with!" scoffed Berger. "Somebody blew!"

"Pipe down, now," rapped his captor, "or I'll slap you down!"

There was silence in the patrol wagon for a minute or two, then Sally inquired:

"Is this the Lefty Berger who escaped from Sing-Sing?"

"That wasn't an escape," McCaffrey facetiously assured her. "He just came down to say 'hallo' to a couple of his pals. Didn't you, Lefty?"

Berger closed his eyes.

"You certainly have plenty of nerve, Mr. Caffrey," said Sally, and the tribute was not insincere.

"Detective-Sergeant to you, honey," returned the gratified detective. "So you think I did all right, eh?"

"I certainly do," she replied emphatically.

"What are you doin' to-night?"

"Why, nothing that I know of."

"Fine! I'm not doin' anything either. How about dinner?"

"I wouldn't mind," she decided. "In fact, I'd like it."

"It's a date! Meet me at Chung's chop suey house, Fifty-Eighth and Seventh, at eight o'clock."

Sally looked distinctly disappointed, and he asked what was the matter.

"Nothing," she replied slowly, "only I thought you said 'dinner.'"

The patrol wagon travelled across town by way of Madison Square and Broadway to West Forty-Seventh Street, wherein police headquarters of the Eighteenth Precinct are situated. But Sally was dropped off at the corner of West Fortieth Street so that she could hurry along to the "Star" office and write her story of the sensational arrest.

William ("Lefty") Berger was personally conducted behind bars by McCaffrey, who said, as he unfastened the handcuffs and restored them to his own person:

"There you are, sweetheart. Just like being home again!"

"Yeah?" was the surly response.

"Well, I ain't gonna stay any longer than I did the last time."

Several plain-clothes men were in the corridor, and as McCaffrey turned away from the cells they fell into step with him.

"Nice work, Mac," said one of them.

"How did you get him?"

"I'm a detective."

"What did the chief say?" inquired a round-faced little man named Casey.

"Nothing yet," McCaffrey replied boastfully, "but I'm liable to walk out of his office a captain. What d'you think of that?"

The big general-room outside Inspector Richard John Curran's office was reached, and there more plain-clothes men were congregated.

"How about your autograph, Mac?" asked one of them with jocularly tinged with envy.

"No autographs," McCaffrey retorted, "but if you want a couple of souvenirs you can go back to where I got Berger and pick up some of his teeth."

"Still slappin' 'em around, eh?" drawled Casey.

"And why not?"

The inspector's clerk emerged from the inspector's office,

"All right, McCaffrey," he said. "Well, boys, there it is," McCaffrey said to the others. "And to show you I'm a right guy, I'm gonna leave the door open so you can all get an earful." He opened the door, but looked back to add: "And listen, when I come out of there, you guys salute!"

Inspector Curran, a man in the early forties and something of a martinet, was seated at his desk with a sheet of paper in his hand. He had a bull neck and a pair of fierce grey eyes.

"Good morning, inspector," said McCaffrey.

"Sit down!"

A curt reception, but then Curran was usually curt. McCaffrey deposited himself in a chair and angled for praise.

"Well, we didn't do such a bad day's work on just a sinker and a cup of coffee, did we, inspector?" he said.

"We?" barked Curran.

"Me and Walsh. It's there in the report."

The sheet of paper Curran was holding was flung down upon the desk and Curran smote it with his hand.

"No," he said with sarcasm, "you and Walsh did fine—especially since Walsh's wife 'phoned in that he was sick and couldn't report to-day!"

McCaffrey stared.

"Danny Walsh sick?" he exclaimed.

"Not according to your report!"

"Well, anyhow, I made a good job of it, didn't I?"

"You made such a good job of it," rapped Curran, "that for two cents I'd send you back to pounding a beat!"

"What d'you mean?" McCaffrey asked blankly. "We've been after Berger for a month, haven't we?"

"Sure we've been after Berger." The inspector rose up in wrath. "And what's more important, we've been after his whole mob, too. But you had to do a single-o! You had to make a one-man job of it!"

"D'you think it was any push-over, taking Berger?"

"I'm not talking about that. You're a brave guy, all right, and if it ever sinks into your head that you've got a department behind you, you'll make a great copper. When you got that tip on Berger you had plenty of time. Why didn't you 'phone it in?"

"Why, I thought—"

"You can't think with your knuckles. I've told you that fifty times. I'm tired of trying to pound it into your thick head."

In the outer room McCaffrey's colleagues were gurgling with delight; the door had not been left open for nothing.

"Bravery is no fault," Curran went on scathingly, "but bravery without brainwork is no good on the police force. Now do you understand that, once for all?"

"Yes, sir," said McCaffrey meekly.

"Well, hereafter see that you keep Walsh out of your reports when he isn't with you."

"Yes, sir."

"And that's all!"

Mae rammed his hat on his head, stood up and squared his shoulders and walked out from the room. The inspector's clerk and five plain-clothes men were waiting for him.

"On your dogs, men!" commanded Casey as he appeared. "Salute!"

With grinning faces on either side of him and to the accompaniment of mock salutes, McCaffrey made his way unhappily to the street.

In the Rain

AT her own desk in the reporters' room on the fifth floor of the "Star" Building, Sally Rogers had begun to type her version of Berger's arrest when George Dayton Morgan, the news editor, strode out from his den and looked down at the sheet of paper in her typewriter.

"The brilliant work of Detective-Sergeant McCaffrey," she had written, "led to the arrest this morning of William 'Lefty' Berger, who escaped—"

"Just a minute." The news editor ripped the sheet of paper from the machine. "Where did you get this?"

"I was there," Sally replied. "I saw it."

"Well, forget it!" The sheet of paper was screwed into a ball and tossed into a yawning waste-paper basket.

"McCaffrey's lucky he's still on the Force after the boner he pulled."

"Boner?" Sally looked up indignantly.

"Yes, boner!" snapped Morgan.

"Gimme something like this: 'The stupidity and bull-headedness of Detective-Sergeant McCaffrey, member of Inspector Curran's squad, acting on an underworld tip, to-day resulted in the capture of William 'Lefty' Berger and the escape of the entire Berger mob.'"

Sally's hazel eyes widened.

"Where did you get that?" she asked rebelliously.

"Wilson just 'phoned it in from the Press-room at headquarters."

"Well, why don't you get Wilson to write it?" she flamed. "I think it was the bravest thing I ever saw, and there was certainly nothing bull-headed or stupid about a man wading in single-handed."

George Dayton Morgan, like most news editors, was an irascible man, and he certainly was not going to be dictated to by a girl reporter newly on the staff.

"Wait a minute!" he bellowed. "You're not a dramatic critic, you're just a reporter. You can tell 'em what a great guy McCaffrey is when you write his obituary. Come on, get busy!"

So Sally, much against her will, typed quite a different story, and in a special edition of the "Star" the story appeared on the front page under a banner headline: "Detective's boner spoils wholesale capture of Berger mob."

Detective-Sergeant Michael Casey acquired a copy of the paper from a newsboy in West Forty-Seventh Street, and he attached it to the bulletin board with drawing-pins and infinite satisfaction.

Other members of the squad gathered round and read the headline.

"Will he do a burn on that?" chuckled one of them.

"Poor old Peter the Great!" mourned Casey, and caught sight of McCaffrey advancing along the corridor. "Salute!"

McCaffrey resented very strongly this repetition of the morning's insult.

"Go on, be funny!" he snapped.

"What's the matter, kid?" inquired a plain-clothes colleague. "Can't you take it?"

"I'm takin' it, ain't I?" growled Mac, and then Casey pointed to the bulletin board.

"How does it feel to be famous, Mac?" he jeered.

"How would you like a smack in the nose?"

McCaffrey stepped over to the board, and he read the headline. His blue eyes blazed.

"So that's the way it is, eh?" he bellowed, and tore the paper from the board and went off with it.

"Is he frying?" exulted a detective who looked like a comedian.

Nearly bursting with suppressed rage McCaffrey made straight for the office of the "Star," and on the fifth floor he reached Sally's desk and flung the offending newspaper upon it.

"This morning, when I let you ride in the wagon," he shouted at her, "I was a hero. Now I'm a heel."

Sally tried to explain, but he would not listen to her.

"I don't want any eyewash!" he exploded. "When I landed the guy it was: 'Oh, Mr. Caffrey, that's just wonderful!' From now on you keep your nose outa my business, understand? And if you know what's good for you—"

"Wait a minute, will you?" she interrupted angrily. "I don't make the news. I just write it."

"Yeah?" He thrust his face into hers. "Well, I make it, see? And for my dough you don't have to write it."

"Yes, but for my dough I do!" she retorted.

Matt O'Brien wandered in at an adjacent door and leaned against a filing cabinet.

"What's the matter, Mac?" he asked.

"I'm being made a sap of," snorted McCaffrey, "that's what's the matter!"

"Umph!" grunted the photographer. "That isn't news."

"He doesn't like the yarn," said Sally.

"Funny." O'Brien made a grimace. "That's the first complaint we've had to-day."

Mac swept over to him, prodded him in the chest.

"Listen, Out-o'-Focus," he said threuteningly, "you keep out of this."

"Now, sergeant, keep calm," admonished the photographer.

"I'm plenty calm," raged Mac, "but I'm telling you this—if you were a man I'd tear you apart!"

"He is a man," said Sally.

O'Brien promptly made himself scarce, and McCaffrey vented his ill-temper on the newspaper by tearing it to shreds. He was on his way to the door when Sally called after him:

"What about our date to-night?"

"What about it?" he rapped at her over his shoulder, and was gone.

There had been a touch of spring in the air of New York City that morning, but during the afternoon the sky clouded over, and by seven o'clock it was raining heavily.

At a quarter to eight Sally stood under a lanip-post in Seventh Avenue, near the corner of Fifty-Eight Street, and looked about her. Rain was streaming off the umbrella she held over her head and was dripping from the macintosh that covered her costume. On the other side of the street the lights of Chung's chop-suey house beckoned, but there was no sign of Peter McCaffrey.

She waited another five minutes, splashed by passing cars, then entered a shop devoted to the sale of watches and clocks. Timepieces of all sorts and sizes stood on shelves and showcase, but Sally was seeking shelter from the downpour without losing sight of Chung's premises.

"Can I do something for you?" inquired an assistant behind a counter.

"Yes," said she. "Which one of these is right?"

"That one," was the smiling reply, and a clock on the wall was indicated.

Ten minutes to eight.

"Thanks," she murmured. "Mind if I wait here a minute?"

"Help yourself."

She helped herself to the extent of a full half-hour, and then through the glass panel of the shop door she saw McCaffrey at the corner with the collar of his macintosh turned up about his June 20th, 1936.

ears and the brim of his hat pulled down over his eyes.

She went out from the shop, opened her umbrella, and holding it well down in front of her walked towards him. The umbrella smote him in the chest.

"Why don't you look—" he began; and then the umbrella was lowered and they stared at one another in apparent astonishment.

"Why, Sarge, what are you doing here?" she exclaimed.

"I'm on a case," he replied. "What do I look like I'm doing?"

"You look like you're taking a shower to me."

"Do I? What are you doing here?"

"Me? Oh—er—I'm on a story!"

"Yeah? Well, now that we've both finished lying to each other, let's have that chop suey!"

He took her arm and marched her along to Chung's establishment, which seemed to both of them a perfectly delightful place after the wet street. In a little alcove screened by bead curtains they sat at a bamboo table and were waited on by a slippered yellow man.

"What made you so sure that I'd turn up to-night?" asked Sally.

"You did, didn't you?" challenged McCaffrey.

"All right," she said, "I asked for that. But I had a reason. I wanted to straighten you out on that Berger story."

"Okay, forget it." He grinned sheepishly. "I'm sorry I bawled you out."

"Do you always bawl out your lady friends that way?"

"I don't go in much for women."

"No?" She frowned at him. "What do I look like, an animal cracker?"

"Now don't get tough," he enjoined.

"No kiddin', I think I'm gonna like you."

"Not really?"

"I meant it! How would you like to be my girl?"

"Can I have every other Thursday off?"

"Stop clowning, I'm serious!" He fidgeted with his collar and added: "It's not so much for me, it's Mrs. Walsh."

"Mrs. Walsh?" she echoed, crinkling her brows.

"Danny's wife. You know Danny Walsh is my partner. I live with them. She's a swell dame, and she's done plenty for me, too. But a couple o' years now she's been beefing that I oughta have a girl, and—well, you look like you wash behind the ears. It might just as well be you."

Sally, instead of being insulted, was considerably amused.

"But maybe Mrs. Walsh won't like me," she purred.

"I'll fix that!" he declared in his masterful way.

"That'll be just ducky," she informed him.

A Foolish Boast

IN the living-room of a comparatively cheap but comfortably furnished flat in East Ninety-Ninth Street early next morning, Peter McCaffrey sat down to breakfast in his shirt-sleeves at a round table, poured himself some coffee, and shouted at the top of his voice:

"Danny! Danny!"

The door of a bed-room was opened, and Detective-Sergeant Danny Walsh appeared in dressing-gown and slippers. He was at least fifteen years older than McCaffrey, lean of face and inclined to baldness. An old sock was fastened round his throat with a safety-pin, and he coughed as he sat down at the table.

"Well, what ails you?" demanded Mac.

"The old lady thinks I've got tonsillitis," Danny replied in a very hoarse voice.

"Yeah? And what is it?"

"Sore throat."

"You sure picked a swell time for it all right!"

"Is it my fault I got sick?" grumbled Danny. "Listen, I gotta temperature."

"Yeah," scoffed Mac, "about ten below—in the feet!"

"You never had it, I suppose?"

"You suppose right, and what's more I'm never gonna get it!"

"I know," said Danny with a cough.

"That's why you made the sucker play you did takin' Berger single-handed."

"You knew I had the tip."

"Sure I did."

"Then what were you doin', sitting up here with a sock around your neck that oughta be on your foot?"

"I'm careful. I used to be like you till one night on a call I stopped a knife with my ribs, a forty-five slug with my leg, and another one with my shoulder, and got over it."

"Just a careful cop, eh?" jeered Mac.

"The only guys in this racket of ours that get hurt are the careful guys. Remember I told you that, Danny."

Danny decided that argument was not merely useless but painful when one was suffering from tonsillitis. He shook his head and drank some of the coffee Mac had poured out for him.

The front door was opened with a key, and a woman of enormous bulk sailed into the room with a bottle in her hand. She was Danny's wife, grey-haired, double-chinned, a managing sort of woman in a figured frock and an apron. "I had to go to three places," she complained, "before I could get a simple little thing like cough mixture."

"I don't need no medicine," growled her husband.

"You're sick, ain't you?" derided Mac, and Mrs. Walsh turned on him for that.

"Who made the coffee?" she asked tartly.

"I did," said Mac.

She sipped from Danny's cup and made a face.

"Ugh! I might have known it would taste like that if I didn't make it!" she said with housewifely scorn. "What you need is a good wife!"

McCaffrey looked up at her with his mouth full of bacon she had fried before setting forth on her errand.

"What would you say if I told you I've got a girl?"

"What do you want a girl for?" wheezed Danny.

"To make a man out of him, the same as I've made a man out of you," his wife retorted. "What kind of a girl, Mac?"

"Just a girl," replied that detective.

"What kinda girls are there?"

"Married ones and single ones," said Danny—and received a rap on the bald part of his head for that pleasantry with a spoon by Mrs. Walsh.

"There's the right kind and the wrong kind," she stated severely, and took the cork from the bottle of cough mixture and poured a dose into the spoon.

"The girl I've got's a nice number," declared Mac.

"I'll believe it when I see it! Come on, Danny, take your medicine!"

With the utmost reluctance Danny swallowed the contents of the spoon and gulped some coffee to take the taste out of his mouth. McCaffrey rose and transferred himself to a couch, where he lit a cigarette.

"I'm taking Berger up the river this afternoon," he announced. "I think the trip would do you good."

"He's going to stay right here," retorted Mrs. Walsh, "where I can take care of his throat."

"Take care of it?" snorted Mac. "If I was you, I'd cut it!"

The New York State prison known as Sing Sing is some way up the Hudson River from the city. That afternoon, in the absence of Danny Walsh, Detective-Sergeant Michael Casey was handcuffed to Lefty Berger, and in one of the carriages of a train that puffed out from Grand Central Station he dozed beside the ugly crook while Mac sat opposite with a newspaper in his hands.

The city had been left some way behind when a man in a grey suit entered the carriage from an adjoining one and sauntered slowly along the central aisle. Berger looked up at him as he passed and evidently received some sort of signal, for a few moments later he leaned forward and said:

"Hi, what's the chance of getting a smoke?"

McCaffrey roused Casey by giving him a kick on the ankle.

"He wants a smoke," he said as the little detective sat up with a start.

It was not a smoking carriage they were in, so Casey went with the prisoner to the lavatory at the end of it. He gave him a cigarette from a packet of his own.

"Mind if I wash my hands first?" asked Berger.

"No, help yourself." Casey went with him to a basin and half-filled it with water. "Go ahead."

"Ain't you even gonna take 'em off for that?"

The little detective shook his head. "Might be too much trouble to get 'em back on again," he growled.

Berger shrugged his shoulders and proceeded to wash his hands, which was not a very easy matter with one of them manacled. Several times Casey's right hand was dragged into the water; but Casey himself looked out of the adjacent window at the fleeting landscape.

The towels were in a rack above the basin. Berger reached up to one of them with his left hand and his fingers closed on a gun which had been hidden in it. The train was approaching a level-crossing and a bell was clanging. Casey was still looking out of the window, and he did not see the gun.

A shot rang out, and the detective fell to the floor with a bullet in his lungs. Berger knelt beside him, found the key of the handcuffs, and unlocked them. A few seconds later he was in an unoccupied carriage, smashing the glass out of a window with a heavy spittoon from the floor.

The bell was still clanging because the gates of the level-crossing had not been opened; the train was slowing almost to a standstill. Berger climbed out of the window and dropped from it on to the track.

His escape was not discovered till too late, and at half-past seven that evening McCaffrey stood unhappily before Inspector Curran in that officer's room.

"You draw a five-day suspension. McCaffrey, without pay," said Curran sternly. "That ought to give you a little time to think things over, and maybe it'll do you some good."

"Yes, sir." Mac took his gun from his pocket and his badge from under the lapel of his coat and laid them on the desk.

"That's all!"

As he went out and closed the door, newspaper reporters swarmed round him clamouring for details of Berger's escape.

"I've got nothing to say!" he roared at them. "Go on, now—beat it!"

"Don't take it out on me!" howled one of the men he thrust from his path; and Matt O'Brien interposed.

"Listen, Mac," he said persuasively, "don't be so hard-boiled. These guys are only doing their jobs. Why don't you tell 'em something?"

"Yeah, why don't you?" chorused the rest.

"Okay," yielded Mac. "Okay, I'll loosen up. What's the date?"

"April the tenth," they informed him. "All right. Here's something you can make a lot of. I'll have Berger back in the can in thirty days—and you can quote me!"

A foolish boast, and one that he was to regret; but the reporters liked it.

A Shock for Martin

SALLY was in a taxicab, with her head out of the window, when he descended the steps outside headquarters of the 18th Precinct, and she called to him.

"Well, aren't you glad to see me?" she asked as he crossed the pavement to her with a very gloomy face.

"Sure," he replied. "Don't I look it? You're a nice number."

"Nice nothing!" she retorted. "I've got to get a story. Come on, get in!"

He got in, and he sat beside her. "I thought there was a catch in it," he grumbled.

"I'm awfully sorry about your tough break, Mac," she said sympathetically. "Don't be sorry about me," said he.

"Be sorry for Casey."

"It might have been you!"

"Well, don't start buyin' flowers for me yet. I'm gonna do a lot of damage around here before I go out."

"Sure you are," she encouraged. "Everything's going to come out all right. When did you eat last?"

Thus reminded that he had been without food since somewhere in the region of noon, Mac suggested chop suey.

"Chop suey!" quoth Sally with scorn. "What you need is a little real food inside you! Look, why not stop and get some things on the way and have a nice quiet little meal at my place? After dinner, you can tell me all about it."

"Why not?" The prospect pleased him. "A good home-cooked spread wouldn't go so bad."

The driver was told to stop at the first delicatessen shop in Ninth Avenue, which

To the accompaniment of mock salutes McCaffrey made his way unhappily to the street.

suggested that the "spread" was not to be cooked at home after all. Sally's little self-contained flat was on the third floor of a drab building in Ninth Avenue, facing the elevated railway, and the shop outside which the taxicab drew up was not very far from it.

Mac went with Sally into the shop and was surprised at the number of purchases she made.

"Anything else?" inquired the proprietor of the place, after packages had accumulated on the glass-topped counter. "Oh, yes," said Sally. "A bottle of milk!"

"Say, is this just a meal?" demanded Mac.

"You'll eat it, and you'll like it," said she.

The bill came to just four dollars, which Mac paid, and the packages were loaded into his arms except for a bottle of pickles he stowed in a pocket and the bottle of milk which he carried in his left hand by the neck.

"You go ahead and put 'em in the cab," said Sally at the door. "I've forgotten something."

She sped back to the counter, after she had opened the door for him, and he was about to cross the pavement when a dark blue saloon came racing along the street and guns blazed from it.

The bottle of milk was shattered, leaving only the neck in Mac's hand, and three of the parcels fell as he backed hastily into the doorway. The blue saloon vanished round a corner and Sally appeared in a panic.

"Why, sarge, they might have killed you!" she gasped.

"I'll bet they thought of that!" gritted Mac. "Just look at this!"

He held up the broken neck of the bottle.

"Don't stand there!" implored Sally. "I'm not gonna stand here," he assured her, and flung the useless bottle-neck into the gutter. "I'm gonna get another bottle of milk!"

In the living-room of her flat, about three-quarters of an hour later, Mac lit a cigarette while she gathered up empty plates and dishes.

"Now don't you feel better?" she asked.

"Sure," he replied contentedly. "Haven't got a toothpick, have you?"

"Where I come from," she rebuked him, "they don't use toothpicks."

"What's the matter, don't they have any teeth where you come from?"

"Uhuhu!" She reached across him for a vegetable-dish. "But they also have table manners."

He thought over that statement while she conveyed the crockery to the kitchenette; but when she returned to him it was an entirely different subject that was in her mind.

"How do you know those were Berger's men that shot at you?" she asked.

"Well," he drawled, "I've got an idea they don't like me."

"Don't you ever take anything seriously?"

"Sometimes." He looked up at her with an appreciative grin. "How about a kiss, baby?"

She removed the tablecloth without answering.

"Don't you want to kiss me?"

"No."

"Then why didn't you say so?" he laughed.

They parted good friends, not very long afterwards, and Sally rang up the "Star" with a story that made headlines.

In the five days of Mac's suspension she saw a good deal of him; and the more she saw of him the more she liked him, in spite of his tremendous self-conceit.

He called for her in a police car just before she left the office on the day he returned to duty, and he drove to the house in Second Avenue outside which he had captured Lefty Berger, leaving her in the car while he ascended the steps and rang the door-bell.

A black woman-servant admitted him to the hall, but barred his way to the stairs.

"Well, is he in, or isn't he in?" demanded Mac.

"Yes, he's in," replied the negress. "I done told you he's in, but for three whole days he's sick in bed."

"That's all right, I got nice bedside manners!"

John Martin appeared at the top of the stairs, clad in pyjamas and dressing-gown, and looking very far from fit.

"What's the trouble, Molly?" he called out, and, seeing Mac in the hall, descended to him. "What is it you want?"

"I want Berger," was the curt reply.

"Berger?" The crook lawyer's jaw dropped and his fever-shot eyes rounded.

"You got Berger!"

"I had Berger!" corrected Mac.

"What are you saying?"

"Don't you read the papers?" Mac whipped a copy of the "Star" from his coat pocket and held it out.

"Berger escaped!" faltered Martin.

"B-but how could he escape? I thought he was on the way to Sing Sing."

"So did we," gritted Mac. "Where's he headin' for?"

"I don't know!" declared the lawyer in a terrified voice. "How should I know? Listen to me, Mac, he mustn't escape, do you hear me! You've got to get him!"

The newspaper fell from a shaky hand.

"Listen, McCaffrey, I'll give you a grand—I'll give you five grand!"

"I've got to get him without your five grand," snapped Mac.

"But you don't understand! Berger thinks I double-crossed him. My life ain't worth a nickel with him loose! If you don't get him—"

"If this is an act you're putting on," Mac interrupted, "it smells!"

He turned away to the front door and opened it.

"Where are you going?" Martin cried in dismay. "What are you going to do?"

"I'm gonna get an ice-cream soda," jeered Mac, and went out and slammed the door.

Sally was waiting anxiously in the police car, but all he said as he climbed in beside her at the wheel was:

"Where to, baby?"

"Anywhere you like," she replied.

"What did Martin have to say?"

"Oh, Martin?" The car started, and a radio set in it was switched on. "Oh, he said—he said he didn't like the seashore because it was too near the ocean."

"Stop kidding, Mac," expostulated Sally. "This is my job. I've got to turn in something."

A voice from the loudspeaker made her jump.

"New York Police Department," it said, "calling car twenty-seven."

"What did Martin say?" she insisted.

"Wait a minute, wait a minute," urged Mac. "Car twenty-seven, that's Danny!"

"But Mac—"

"Wait!"

"Thirty-eighth and Sixth Avenue," the voice went on. "Thirty-eighth and Sixth. Investigate ringing of burglar alarm. That's the Drover's Savings Bank, Thirty-eighth and Sixth Avenue. Hurry! That is all!"

"A Scared Cop"

DANNY WALSH was on duty in a radio police car that night, and he, and a plain-clothes man with him, were already outside the bank premises when Mac drove up and jumped down on to the pavement.

"You stay there," he said to Sally, and mounted the steps of a broad-columned entrance. "It's me, Danny! What's up?"

Danny turned back from a glass-pannelled door through which he had been peering.

"I don't know," he replied. "The bell ain't ringing, but there oughta be a light in there."

The plain-clothes man was sent off to watch the back of the building, and Mac and Danny went to the glass-pannelled door together. It was unfastened, but as Mac went to open it a gun jettied the dark interior with flame, and he jumped aside just as a bullet shattered a pane of glass close to where his head had been.

"That's all I wanted to know," he said grimly.

"Whew, that was close!" breathed Danny.

"We're goin' in after them."

"Don't be dumb! Let's figure this out first!"

"You don't expect 'em to come out to you, do you?" scoffed Mac. "Cover me; I'm goin' in!"

He went to draw his gun, but suddenly remembered he hadn't got it with him. That made no difference to his determination, however, because Danny had a gun. He went down on his hands and knees and crawled to the door.

"You ready?" he whispered.

"Go ahead," returned Danny.

More shots rang out as the door was opened, but they whizzed harmlessly over Mac's head as he crawled inside, and Danny fired back. He reached a column and stood behind it; then Danny entered the bank, to the accompaniment of more shots, and Mac knew that one of the men was against a partition inside the counter, and that the other was crouching behind a desk.

He dropped to the floor and crawled towards the counter. A bullet sang past his left ear as he reached it; another one almost scorched his cheek as he clambered up and exposed himself. Danny fired twice in rapid succession, and then Mac hurled himself upon the fellow by the partition, bore him to the floor and handcuffed him.

He reached for his hat, which had fallen from his head in the struggle, and he looked about him. The darkness had seemed intense when first he had entered the bank, but his eyes had become accustomed to it by now, and a street lamp was shining in at one of the windows. He saw that the man who had been crouching behind the desk was lying on his face, motionless.

"Get up!" he rasped at his captive, and, as the command was obeyed, dragged him across the floor to his confederate and found that the confederate was dead.

"Well, he ain't gonna cost the State anything," he remarked. "You're lucky! You'd have been lyin' right alongside of him if I'd had my gun! Come on!"

Out from behind the counter he dragged his prisoner, and he called out triumphantly:

"We got 'em both, Danny!"

"That's—great—Mac," responded

feble voice from across the big room; and Mac immediately opened one side of the handcuffs to fasten his prisoner to a brass grille on the counter, so that he could go and find his colleague.

Danny was slumped against a wall with his chin on his chest.

"You got hit!" exclaimed Mac, catching hold of his arm. "You got hit!"

"In the middle," faltered Danny.

There was a telephone for the use of customers not very far away. Mac dived into the box and dialed the operator.

"Send a police ambulance to the Drover's Bank right away," he directed, and went back to Danny.

"I knew you'd get hit," he said miserably. "I told you you would! Why didn't you sail in like I did? Why didn't you listen to me? You're too careful—you've always been too careful. That's the trouble! I told you to wade in! I've been tellin' you that ever since I've known you!"

"Sure," murmured Danny, "I know, Mac—but I guess we don't figure the same."

"What's that gotta do with it?" complained Mac. "If you're gonna be a cop you've gotta be a fightin' cop. It's the careful guys that get hurt! I've told you, and I've told you, and I've told you! Now look at you! You've got plugged—plugged because you stood out there like a target, waitin' for 'em!"

Danny held a hand to his stomach and sagged forward, and Mac, in high concern, held him up.

"Does it hurt much, Danny?" he asked gently.

"Gettin' plugged like this ain't so bad," muttered Danny. "It's getting a slug in the wrong place. You know, bein' crippled, spendin' the rest of your life with somebody washin' you and dressin' you, and pushin' you around."

"But Danny," said Mac, "when you're afraid—"

"Who's afraid?" Danny interrupted, a cold perspiration streaming from his brow and his face all twisted with agony. "You think you're brave, but you'll never be brave, Mac, till you've been scared—and bein' scared ain't bein' yellow."

"I didn't say you were yellow, Danny," protested Mac.

The police ambulance arrived and Danny was taken off to hospital; a patrol wagon was summoned, and the uninjured crook was taken off to gaol. About an hour afterwards, Mac opened the front door of the flat in East Ninety-ninth Street, and Sally was with him.

"Is that Danny?" Mrs. Walsh called out from the sitting-room, where she was darning a pair of her husband's socks.

"No, it's me!" Mac marched into the room. "This is Sally Rogers, the girl I was telling you about."

Mrs. Walsh approved of Sally at first glance and put her arms round her shoulders.

"I'm so glad to see you," she said warmly. "It's about time he brought you around."

Tears flooded Sally's eyes and Mac turned away to the window. Mrs. Walsh looked from one to the other in bewilderment.

"Is anything wrong?" she asked.

"Danny's dead!" blurted Mac. "He stopped a slug down at the Drover's Bank."

"Mac!" Sally cried in a horrified voice; but Mrs. Walsh seemed stunned. She stared at Mac as he strode about the room, then bowed her head and buried her face in her hands

He knelt with the note in his hand beside the fallen messenger, and he shook the chin he had assaulted with his fist.

"I warned him!" raged Mac. "I warned the guy a hundred times, but he wouldn't listen! He had to play it careful, but you can't give a crook an even break. I told him he'd get it! I told him time after time, you gotta get the other guy before he gets you. You gotta sail in! 'It ain't gettin' slugged,' he kept tellin' me, 'it's gettin' hurt.' That's what he was afraid of—gettin' hurt!"

Mrs. Walsh sank into a chair and Sally leaned over her. But Mac continued to stalk back and forth like a caged animal, giving vent to his own feelings without a thought for the feelings of a woman rendered speechless with grief.

"Now look where he is because he wouldn't listen! It happens every time! A scared cop is a dead cop!"

"Shut up!" Sally blazed at him. "Get out! Go on, get out!"

He stared at her in blank astonishment, and then Mrs. Walsh began to sob and he went hurriedly out from the room.

In Broad Daylight

APRIL passed; May came. The thirty days that Mac had given himself in which to recapture Lefty Berger expired on the tenth of May, but the convict was still at large a week after that date.

The boastful detective was on his way out from police headquarters on the morning of the twentieth when a man stopped him on the steps.

"McCaffrey?"

"Yeah."

"Here's a message for you."

Mac accepted the envelope which was offered to him, and the man who had delivered it rushed down the steps and disappeared before it was opened. Inside was a newspaper cutting with the headline, "I'll have Berger back in gaol in thirty days," and over the headline was written in red ink: "Don't make me laugh!—B."

Mack hadn't any idea whom "B." might be, but he was furious. He thrust the cutting into a pocket and went off to a lunch-room round the corner in Broadway, where he perched on a stool and ordered a sup of coffee.

In a mirror behind the counter he caught sight of Sally, seated at a table. It was the first time he had seen her since the night of Danny's death, and he immediately descended from the stool and went over to her.

"Remember me?" he asked.

She looked up at him—and at the hat upon his head.

"I don't remember the face," she said, "but the bad manners are familiar."

Off came the hat.

"Mind if I sit down?"

"I wouldn't mind if you fell down!" she retorted.

He seated himself beside her and a fat waiter immediately approached the table, but was ignored.

"Still sore, eh?" he suggested.

"I never was sore," she declared.

"Then why didn't you answer your telephone? I've been calling you for the last four weeks!"

"I had nothing to say."

"You could listen, though, couldn't you? I had plenty to say."

The waiter coughed to attract attention.

"What do you want?" Mac rapped at him.

"That's what I'm supposed to ask you," the man replied with a grin.

"I don't want anything! Beat it!"

Sally's empty cup and saucer were placed upon an empty plate and the waiter went off with them. Sally rose. "Been frightening any more widows lately?" she asked pointedly.

"Haven't had any time," he replied, getting to his feet and walking with ner towards the pay-desk. "I've been too busy trailing Tony Ricci."

"Ricci?" she echoed. "What good will that do you? I thought it was Berger you were after."

"He's a Berger's man, and one of these days he's gonna lead me right smack to him."

"Won't that be fun?"

"Berger won't think so."

She paid her own bill and she walked out from the lunch-room in a manner that discouraged him from accompanying her.

On the tenth of June a perfect stranger stopped him in the street, asked him if his name was McCaffrey, and handed him an envelope. At the same moment a newsboy pestered him to buy a paper, and the stranger vanished into a big office building.

Mac opened the envelope with misgivings which were justified. Inside it was a calendar page for the month of June, with a red circle round the date!

That day he had an interview with Inspector Curran because the inspector had sent for him.

"I've got twenty different stools working in twenty different places," he asserted, "but Berger might just as well have dropped off the face of the map."

"What about Ricci?" asked Curran. "I've done everything but sleep with him."

"If only you hadn't promised to have Berger back up the river in thirty days," said Curran bitterly, "the papers wouldn't be jumping on us now!"

"He's gotta show up one of these days," growled Mac, "and when he does it's gonna be just too bad for him."

"And if it isn't soon," retorted the inspector, "it's going to be just too bad for us! All right!"

About a week later McCaffrey trailed Tony Ricci to a telegraph office on the east side of the city and waited in an adjacent doorway till the swarthy crook came out and went off in a car. Then, full of high hopes, he entered the office, displayed his badge to the girl behind the counter, and demanded to see the message which had just been dispatched.

The telegraph form was produced for his inspection. On it was written:

"Detective-Sergeant McCaffrey,
Police Headquarters, 18th Precinct,
City.

"Thirty days hath September, April,
June and November.—Ricci."

He went back to West Forty-seventh Street in the worst of tempers, and he was mounting the steps outside headquarters when a black-browed man stopped him.

"Know where I'll find McCaffrey?"

An envelope was in the man's hand, and that was more than enough to infuriate the already discomfited detective.

"Right here!" he roared, and struck out with his left fist to such purpose that the man fell backwards down the steps to the pavement and sprawled there.

Mac sped down to him and picked up the envelope which had dropped on a flagstone. He ripped it open while a patrolman and pedestrians gathered round.

"Smart guy, eh?" he snarled. "This time you'll wait for an answer!"

A folded sheet of paper was extracted from the envelope, but the expression of wrath on Mac's face changed to one of utter consternation as he opened it out and read:

June 20th, 1936.

"Meet me in the lunch-room on Second Avenue. I'm hungry.—SALLY."

He knelt with the note in his hand beside the fallen messenger, and he shook the chin he had assaulted with his fist.

"Hi, fella!" he said remorsefully. "Look, look! Honest I didn't mean to do that! Honest I didn't!"

Within half an hour he was seated beside Sally at a table in the lunch-room where he had made her acquaintance and was overjoyed to find her quite friendly again. They had a meal together and talked.

"You sure like coffee," commented Sally, after he had had his cup refilled for the third time.

"I must," he returned, "or I wouldn't drink so much hot water just to get a little of it."

Matt O'Brien entered the lunch-room with his camera slung over his shoulder, saw them, and seated himself at their table.

"How are you, flatfoot?" he said.

"What d'you know?"

"Everything," replied Mac, who was none too pleased at his arrival. "What do you want me to tell you?"

"Where's Berger? You're the guy that said you'd have him back in thirty days!"

Mac grabbed up a bowl of sugar with the intention of tossing its contents into the grinning face of the photographer; but he put the bowl down again and sprang to his feet as shots rang out in the street, followed by screams.

Out from the lunch-room he flew and across the roadway, with Sally and Matt O'Brien close behind him. On the opposite pavement a crowd was gathering round a man in dark clothes who lay with his head on the second step of the house whence Lefty Berger had been carried in a basket.

"It's Martin!" Mac exclaimed, and he dropped on his knees beside the prone form and felt at a wrist in which there was no pulse.

"It—it was de feller in de car," said an excited man who was standing against the railings of the area with a small boy beside him. "We saw de whole thing, me and Tommy. Golly, it was just like in dem detective magazines!"

Mac looked up at the speaker, obviously a Swede, thin of face but by no means lean of body.

"You saw it, eh?"

"Sure I did," was the emphatic reply. "Me and Tommy, we was just walking down de street when dis car came by."

"How many men were in it?" demanded Mac.

"Dere wasn't anybody else in de car—only de driver."

"All right."

Mac stood up, and he drove the crowd back so that O'Brien could take photographs of the eye-witness and his small son. Sally took out a notebook and asked questions.

The name of the Swede, she ascertained, was William Anderson, and he lived at Tatum Place, in the Bronx. Police officers arrived, an ambulance was summoned to convey the dead body of the lawyer to the mortuary, and Sally and O'Brien took a taxicab to the office of the "Star."

The Lie Detector

THAT evening, in his own home, William Anderson proudly displayed to his very plain wife and his aged mother a picture of himself and his offspring on the front page of the "Star," a picture which was captioned:

"William Anderson, accountant, and his nine-year-old son Tommy, of 1,824, Tatum Place, eye-witnesses in the fatal shooting of John Martin, noted criminal lawyer."

"It's a wonder you didn't get shot!" shuddered Mrs. Anderson.

"Sure it is," agreed her spouse proudly. "Gosh, bullets was flying around just like another World War, wasn't it, Tommy? Mamma, I bet you never t'ought we'd get our names in de paper dat way, and our pictures, too."

"It's awful!" said Grandma Anderson.

Her daughter-in-law suggested that another copy of the paper should be obtained and sent to a certain Cousin Eric.

"I t'ought o' dat," said Anderson, "and I bought a couple."

He went out from the living-room into the lounge hall and returned with nearly a quire of "Stars" which he stacked upon a table.

"A couple!" quoth Grandma Anderson, viewing the pile.

"Well, it ain't every day we get our pictures in de paper."

A telephone-bell rang and Mrs. Anderson went to the instrument, which reposed on a sideboard.

"Hallo, yes?" she said. "Well, this is Mrs. Anderson. Yes, I'm Mr. Anderson's wife."

Anderson swept over to her.

"Who is it?" he asked eagerly.

"Who is it?"

"Will you give me a chance to hear?" she silenced him. "What? No, I was just talking to my husband. Now what is it? Tell him what?" Her eyes widened and her face paled. "He'd better keep his mouth shut? You—you mean you'd kill him?"

"Kill me!" gasped William Anderson. "Who—who is dis?"

With a very shaky hand his wife replaced the instrument.

"He wouldn't give me any name," she faltered. "He just said you mustn't tell the police anything at all about seeing Martin get shot, or something'll happen to you. Why did you have to say anything? Suppose they was to do something to us."

William Anderson became terrified. "B-but, you see, dey asked me so quick, I—I already told dem I saw it," he stammered. "What can I do?"

His wife considered that point.

"Ain't a person liable to forget?" she asked. "D'you want to get us all killed? If the police talk to you again say you don't remember. Understand? You don't remember."

"I don't remember," repeated her husband, like one learning a lesson.

He repeated the phrase again next morning at headquarters. Inspector Curran had sent for him, and he sat very uncomfortably in a chair facing that officer with plain-clothes men all around him.

"What d'you mean, you don't remember?" rapped Mac. "You knew all about it yesterday."

"Are you keeping quiet because you're afraid to talk?" asked Curran shrewdly.

"Honest, I don't remember," protested Anderson. "You see, I—I don't see so good. It's my eyes—"

"You're an accountant, and your eyes are no good, eh?" scoffed Mac. "Yesterday you told me in the presence of this patrolman that you saw the guy who did the shooting as he went by in the car. What does he look like?"

"I don't remember," persisted Anderson.

One after another the inspector laid six cards on the desk in front of him, and on each of the cards were side-face and full-face photographs of criminals, including Lefty Berger.

"Do you recognise any of these?" he asked.

Anderson said "No" to all of them, and it seemed to Curran that he was most emphatic about the last one.

"You're lying!" he accused.
 "I'm not lying," Anderson averred.
 "I'm telling you I don't recognise any of dem."

At a signal from Curran two of the plain-clothes men pushed forward a little wheel-table on which a curious instrument stood.

"Did you ever hear of a lie instrument?" thundered Curran.

Anderson shook his head and gazed apprehensively at the instrument.

"Take off your coat and roll up your right sleeve."

The unhappy man obeyed and sat down again, whereupon an attachment such as is used for taking blood-pressure was fastened to his arm and a flex was passed round his body over his heart.

"You may lie to us," said the inspector, "but you can't lie to that."

A dial on the machine was turned and the sound of a high-frequency current rose to a shrill hum. Curran pointed to a chart beside the dial and to a recording needle above it.

"When you tell a lie," he said, "your pulse quickens and this needle shows it on the chart. All right, we know that one of these six men shot Martin, and we also know by your own admission that you saw him. Now, do you recognise this man?"

"No," Anderson replied, and the needle of the machine did not deviate in the least from a straight line it traced upon the chart.

The other five cards of photographs produced equally negative results, though perspiration stood in beads upon the Swede's brow.

"Take it off!" said Curran, and the band was removed, the flex was removed, and the lie detector was wheeled away.

"Very well, Anderson," Curran said sternly, "if you won't help us we can't make you, but I just want to tell you this. The citizens of this city are quick to complain about the slow work of the police, but the police are slow only because of people like you. Instead of helping justice you hinder it because you're a coward. It isn't that you don't remember; you won't remember. You're scared."

He sat down and waved his hand in dismissal.

"All right, you can go now. When we want you again we'll send for you."

Anderson did not stop to put on his coat. He grabbed it and his hat, and he went out from the room as fast as his legs could carry him. The other officers were dismissed save Mac, and the inspector said to him disappointedly:

"Well, it couldn't have been Berger!"

"No?" returned that detective sceptically. "Well, I wouldn't give you a dime for a dozen of your lie detectors. Martin told me Berger was after him. I know it was Berger."

"Then why don't you bring him in?"

"I often wonder!"

A clerk entered with two photographic prints which he placed on the desk before the inspector. They looked precisely similar, but actually they were micro-photographic enlargements of two separate bullets.

"That," said the clerk, pointing to one of them, "is the bullet that killed Martin. It was fired from the same gun as this one, which is the bullet with which Berger killed Casey."

"From the same gun, eh?" exclaimed Mac. "So it wasn't Berger, eh? I told you those lie detectors are no good. Why, if a guy's a good liar—"

"Wait a minute, wait a minute!" interrupted Curran with a sudden inspiration. "There's nothing wrong with that lie detector. Use your head. How long is it since you saw Berger?"

"The night he escaped," Mac replied. "Two months ago."

"This bullet says 'Berger,' but when Anderson saw Berger's picture nothing happened. D'you know why? Because Berger has had his appearance changed. Who says the lie detector doesn't work? Anderson didn't recognise these photos. Nobody knows what Berger looks like now, nobody but his own mob and that little rat Anderson."

"Then Anderson's got to talk!" howled Mac.

"Listen, McCaffrey," said Curran, "there'll be no more of that."

When Mac went off duty that evening he carried with him a number of matt bromide prints of Berger, enlarged for him by the photographic department from the record cards. He took them home with him, spread them out on a chesterfield and with a pencil made various alterations to Berger's face, adding a moustache in one print, an imperial in another, and so forth.

Sally called by appointment at eight o'clock, but instead of getting ready to take her out to dinner he continued with his self-appointed task.

She sat on the arm of the chesterfield for over half an hour without a word from him, then rose with an air of determination and picked up her coat and handbag.

He looked round as she opened the door, but she went straight out to the stairs, and he called after her in vain. He rushed out from the flat, and down in the hall he caught up with her.

"All right," said the inspector, "we know that one of these six men shot Martin, and we also know by your own admission that you saw him. Now do you recognise this man?"

"Where you goin'?" he asked. "Thought we were going to have some dinner together. What's the matter? Don't you feel good?"

She looked him straight in the eye, and she said coldly:

"For the first time in a long while, Mac, I guess I don't feel at all, or rather, I'm beginning to feel sorry I've made such a fool of myself."

"What're you talkin' about?" he asked in a puzzled sort of way.

"We're wasting our time, Mac," she replied. "I'm wasting mine, and you're wasting yours. I had it all figured out once before—that night Danny Walsh died, but I didn't have sense enough to realise it. You don't go in for mush or sentiment or heart, Mac, and that's why this is no good."

"Now wait a minute!" howled Mac, but she went on relentlessly:

"At first I thought it was your job, this being an eternal policeman—a two-legged bloodhound. But it isn't; it's your nature, and you can't change that. But women are funny animals, Mac. You see, women are full of mush and sentiment, and they overlook a lot, but all of a sudden they can't overlook any more, and then they up and out—just like I'm doing now."

"Aw," said he rudely, thrusting his hands in his pockets, "what you need is a powder."

She opened the front door, and when she was out on the top step she slammed it behind her.

In the Dark

SOME little time later Mac travelled up into the Bronx in the police car he usually drove, and he found the Andersons' house in Tatum Place without any great difficulty. It was a frame building of no great size but with quite a pretentious porch, and it stood in its own neat little garden wall well back from the road.

William Anderson opened the front door to him, and he would have shut it in his face had he not been denied the opportunity. Mac had called to question the small boy Tommy, and question him he did, in the presence of his indignant parents and his equally indignant grandmother.

"Come on now, think hard," he insisted. "What did the guy with the gun look like?"

"The cowboys," piped the youngster. "What would that child know about it?" stormed Grandma Anderson.

"How can you expect a kid his age to remember?" William Anderson demanded plaintively.

"Bad memories run in your family, don't they?" sneered Mac, and turned to the boy again. "D'you know what happens to kids when they tell lies?"

"Let go o' me!" whimpered the youngster.

"All right," said Mac grimly, "that's that. Get your hat, Anderson, and his, too."

"But Tommy shouldn't go out this time of night," complained the old lady. "It's past his bedtime now."

"When I want information from you," Mac retorted, "I'll ask for it. He's going down to headquarters."

On the other side of Tatum Place, as Mac went out from the house with Anderson and the boy, a dark blue saloon was standing. Tony Ricci was in it with another member of Berger's gang, and they were watching the house. There were two men in the front seat.

"What's the idea of takin' the kid?" growled Ricci's companion.

"Forget the kid," returned the swarthy crook. "He don't know what day it is."

June 20th, 1936.

"If he gives that guy the works once more—"

"Shut up!" hissed Ricci.

Anderson and Tommy were driven down to headquarters, but Mac got no farther with them than the switchboard in the outer office, for there the officer on duty informed him that someone had just been trying to get him on the telephone.

"Male or female?" asked Mac, foolish enough to think that Sally might have relented.

"Well, it sounded like a man to me," was the reply, "but it could have been a woman with a bass voice. They said to tell you not to worry, they had Anderson's mother, and you could tell it to the guy that was with you."

"My mother?" gasped Anderson.

"How long ago?" demanded Mac.

"I said just before you came in," replied the officer at the switchboard.

"Berger's got her!" decided Mac. "Come on."

Back to the house in Tatum Place McCaffery drove as fast as traffic and traffic lights permitted. The dark blue saloon had not moved, but Tony Ricci was on the sidewalk now, peering round the back of it and a six-shooter was in his hand.

Anderson was out of the police car the instant it stopped, and Tommy jumped down after him. They were running along the garden path when Mac descended from the wheel, jumped a low hedge, and ran across a lawn to catch up with them. He heard a shot, felt something hit him in the forehead, and went down with a thud upon the turf.

Anderson looked back from the porch, and his wife came running out from the house; Tommy screamed. On the other side of the road Tony Ricci scrambled into the blue saloon and the hum of its engine died away in the distance.

Mae tried to raise himself as Anderson stooped over him, but sank down again with a groan.

"Are you hurt?" asked the Swede foolishly.

"I feel fine," gritted Mac. "Get an ambulance."

"But my mother—how about my mother?"

"Get an ambulance."

Mrs. Anderson telephoned for an ambulance, and Mac was swept off to hospital in it. He was kept in a dark ward for two days, and then was taken home with a bandage not merely over the wound in his forehead, but over his eyes as well.

For three days Mrs. Walsh suffered almost as much from his temporary blindness as he did himself, for he was afraid to be left alone even for a few minutes.

In the evening of the fifth day after Ricci had shot him Danny's widow said several uncomplimentary things about Sally as she cleared away the remains of a meal.

"She's a fine sort of a girl!" she fumed. "You shot, and her not coming near you to see how you are. I knew you'd pick out some lightheaded fool who wouldn't give a snap of the fingers whether you lived or died."

Mae remained silent in his chair. His pride would not permit him to explain the true circumstances.

"Well, aren't you goin' to say something?" she snapped at him, sweeping towards the kitchen door with a loaded tray.

"Where you goin'?" he cried out.

"I'm only carrying these dishes into the kitchen," she replied. "Don't be so jumpy."

"How would you be," he demanded,

"if you were sittin' here with your eyes tied up, not knowing what's going on?"

"Well, the doctor says you've got to stay there and not remove the bandage," she reminded him. "If you'd been shot a fraction of an inch lower—"

"Stop it, will you?" he burst out. "Why do you keep harping on that all the time?"

The doorbell rang, and he leaned forward, listening intently as she put down the tray and went to answer its summons. Sally was outside.

"Oh, come in," said Mrs. Walsh.

"Why, we were just talking about you."

"Who is it?" bellowed Mac.

"It's me—Sally," replied Sally, entering the room. "How do you feel?"

Mae relaxed in his chair.

"Fine," he said with sarcasm.

"I didn't know it was this bad," she murmured sympathetically.

"Oh, it came near to being a lot worse," said Mrs. Walsh. "I'm so glad you've come. I haven't got a thing in the place for breakfast, and he won't let me step a foot out of this room."

"You go ahead," urged Sally. "I'll stay here until you come back."

"I won't be any time at all."

The tray was conveyed to the kitchen and Mrs. Walsh shed her apron, put on a hat, and went off to make some purchases.

"I thought you were all washed up with me," said Mae after a while.

"Who said I wasn't?" Sally retorted.

"I know," he drawled. "You just came around because you hate me."

"Listen to me, Mister Detective-Sergeant," said she severely, "we've been through all that before. Why don't you just put it down to the fact that I want to be friendly—that I want to help?"

"I sure would like to be able to figure you out!"

"If you'd just figure yourself out," she informed him, "you'd have no trouble understanding me."

"Huh!" he grunted. "Got a cigarette?"

She had no cigarettes with her, and a box on the mantelpiece to which he directed her was empty.

"I'll go out and get you some," she said.

"No, never mind!" he cried. "Stay here, will you?"

"But it's only down to the corner, sarge. I'll be back in just a minute. Take it easy."

"Take it easy?" he howled. "Take it easy? That's all right for you to say. You've never been like this! Suppose somebody was to take a crack at me, what could I do? I tell you it's like having your hands tied! Anybody could do anything to you!"

"But nobody's going to do anything to you," she said soothingly. "Now pull yourself together—I won't be a minute."

She patted him on the shoulder, picked up her handbag, and went out. He heard the front door being opened and closed, and he sat bolt upright in his chair with every muscle tense.

The flat was so quiet that the ticking of the clock on the mantelpiece beat into his ears. The window of the living-room was open, because the night was warm, and outside the window was a well on to which the windows of other flats opened. Across the well somebody raised a creaking sash, and Mac sprang up in alarm and whipped a gun from a pocket of his dressing-gown.

"Say something!" he shouted wildly.

"Why don't you say something? Say something, d'you hear?"

He blundered against a little table, and

The shooting of this girl was so wonderful that the manager of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show signed her up. Toby Walker, the rifle champion of the world, was with the show and his arrogant, boastful ways made him far from popular. Eventually, Annie wrests the title from him and Toby starts on the down grade. In a contest he wounds her and is fired by an irate Colonel Cody—they thought it was revenge! A smashing drama, starring Barbara Stanwyck

The Two Champions

THIS story goes way back to 1885, when Cineinatti was just a smallish town composed mostly of wooden buildings, and the MacIvor Hotel was its only decent place for a night's lodging.

Outside Lem Jordan's store a bill-poster was busy fixing a large notice. It proclaimed that "the Great Toby Walker, World's Champion Shot," would give a shooting display at the Bijou Theatre during the week of August 13th.

On the steps of the store stood the sheriff, Lem Jordan and several of their cronies. All were staring curiously and expectantly at a slip of a girl who was gazing solemnly at the poster. Thick brown curls tumbled from beneath a funny old felt hat; her ealico dress was worn and faded—and yet this girl was remarkably attractive. Her smile was so bright and happy.

Seated on an old wagon, which was loaded with stores, were an elderly woman and two youngsters—a boy and a girl. They were the young woman's mother and her sister and brother. They were just as absorbed as the men in watching. The opinion of Annie Oakley was valued even though she was no more than twenty years of age.

"Gosh, ma—ain't he prime?" Annie exclaimed. "He's the greatest shooter in the whole world."

"All right, buddy"—Lem Jordan waved to the bill-poster—"you can leave it up."

If Annie had ordered that notice to be torn down and trampled in the dust it would have been done. Shooting meant so much in Annie's life. For five years Annie had supported her widowed mother, Susan and Wesley by her skill with a gun. The gun she had inherited from her father had made Annie famous. She supplied countless tables with a delicacy—quail. Every bird Annie brought down with a single shot. Annie had driven up to Lem's store with six dozen fine quail when the bill-poster had started his task. The decision of whether it should remain had been left with the girl.

Lem paid for the quail, and then the girl and her family drove away. The men watched the old wagon till it was out of sight.

"I'll wager that gal could knock the eye out of a bumblebee at fifty yards," muttered the sheriff.

"Yeah!" Old Lem nodded his head. "Them quail she shoots don't know what hits 'em. Slap in the head every time. She's a regular little wonder."

The Challenge

I N the saloon of the MacIvor Hotel there were a great number of men.

Most of them were members of the sporting fraternity. They wore the latest style in morning coats and many wore tall hats.

Little MacIvor—he of the bushy eyebrows, drooping whiskers and canny disposition—came bustling out of the kitchen. He had just been to see that his black chef was roasting correctly the quail that Annie had shot. There was to be quite a banquet that night at his hotel, for the great Toby Walker was residing under its roof.

In the saloon it was not very hard to find out which was Toby Walker. He leaned against the bar with an air of patronage and self-importance. Toby was a tall and very handsome man, but his enormous conceit and arrogance had made him far from popular. That did not worry Toby very much, for everyone had to step to one side and knuckle down to a person so important as himself. He was the greatest shot in the world, and, in Toby's opinion, quite as important a person as the King of England.

Whilst Toby's clothes were of a loud pattern, those of the slim, clear-eyed and clever man standing near his side were of modest black. But those clothes were of good cloth and well cut, and the wearer of a commanding appearance that almost amounted to good looks. Jeff Hogarth was a very important person. He was the manager of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show, and that very morning he had succeeded in signing up the crack sharpshooter.

"Well, Toby Walker," Hogarth raised his glass. "Here's to a new member of Buffalo Bill's happy family." Toby grinned.

"Guess you've done a good day's work, Jeff."

"Yes, I think so," came the answer. The brown eyes studied the big man speculatively. "Colonel Cody and I don't sign up any second-raters, only champions."

A somewhat inebriated sportsman chanced to overhear the last remark, and swayed towards the saloon bar. Hogarth laughed and managed to save the drunk from falling.

"So you're a champion shooter, huh?" the sportsman leered. "I don't believe it. Bet I could beat you myself."

Toby Walker was amused.

"Well, money talks, captain. Why not make a contest with me?"

The sportsman was not quite so drunk as to accept the challenge. He gave a sheepish grin and swayed in Hogarth's arms. But some of the others joined into the conversation and asked Toby Walker if he were prepared to lay any odds on himself.

"Three to one," was the champion's reply. "And you gentlemen can name your own targets and distance."

It was disappointment to the champion that no one accepted these odds. It was in saloons, where drink flowed freely, that he usually lured some fool sportsman into making a challenge for some considerable sum of money, which he always won with the greatest of ease.

"Ain't there one sport in this one-eyed town?" Toby said with a curl of the lips. "I'll give you four to one."

Old MacIvor paused, and into the shrewd, canny eyes there came a sudden gleam.

"Could you make it five to one, Mr. Walker?"

"Mac, you keep outa this," chuckled the champion. "We ain't betting marbles. This is for money."

The proprietor smiled.

"Well, I believe I've got someone who might make it interesting for you."

"How about a little bet of a hundred dollars, to make it more interesting?"

"Hundred dollars?" MacIvor shook his head. "I don't think that would interest me. But two hundred might."

"It's a bet!" Toby cried, and grinned triumphantly. Some more easy money was coming his way. "But you'll have to see my new boss here to arrange the details."

It was arranged that the contest should take place the following morning at the Gun Club. MacIvor, in a moment of extraordinary generosity, invited the sportsmen to have drinks on the house, and when he saw how many crowded round the bar, wanted to make it "beers all round." When everyone had gone, the proprietor wondered if he had done a foolish thing. He hastened to the telephone, which, in his words, was a "new-fangled instrument of torture," and managed, after some while, to get through to Lem Jordan's store.

"Hallo, Lem. I want you to get hold of that quail-shooter. The one that sells you the birds you send up here. I've got a shooting match—a shooting match for him. Get him, and I'll give you thirty dollars. What's his name?" The 'phone was very bad and Mac was a little deaf. "What's that? Oakley. It's Oakley—Andy Oakley? All right, Lem, have him here in the morning." He was about to ring off when he thought of something. "Oh, Lem, Lem—make certain sure he's sober."

The Shooting Match

THERE was a big crowd at the shooting club on the morrow, and Toby Walker, resplendent in an ornate garment of white buckskin and a stonemason to match, strutted about like a peacock. He told someone that he was shooting against a rube from the hills by the name of Oakley, but doubtful if this person would put in an appearance.

June 20th, 1936.

Old Mac was feeling rather sorry he had made the wager.

"Anyone that can hit quail in the head with single ball can shoot for my money," he cried, but his smile was rather pathetic.

Just when Walker announced that he could not wait all day, a girl in aingham frock came and touched old MacIvor on the sleeve.

"Are you looking for me? My name is Oakley."

"Oakley?" questioned the hotel proprietor. "Where's your father?"

"Why, he's dead."

Mac gave a startled grunt.

"Then where is your brother?"

Annie pointed to a small, rather plump youth.

"This is my brother." She indicated a young girl. "And this is my sister, Susan."

"I expect it's your cousin or uncle I want," Mac muttered. "You see, I'm looking for Andy Oakley, who's been supplying me with game."

Annie laughed.

"I guess you've made a mistake, mister. Not Andy Oakley—but Annie. It's me you sent for."

"A girl!" His eyes nearly protruded from his head.

Mac made quite a scene. He cried that it was someone's idea of a joke, and that the contest was off. Jeff Hogarth heard old Mac arguing and came over to see what the trouble was, and he laughed heartily when he found this slip of a girl was the champion that Mac thought could beat the one and only Toby Walker. But he became quite serious when Annie indignantly stated that she wanted to back herself for forty dollars, and that this was not her money, but that of Sheriff Briggs and Lem Jordan. Though her clothes were so old and quaint, she made a pleasing picture, and Jeff took a great fancy to her.

"Miss Oakley," he assured her, "you're going to have your chance. You shall shoot against Toby Walker." "Toby Walker!" Now it was Annie's turn to have a surprise. She had thought she had to shoot against some local sportsman, but the idea of competing against this champion terrified her. "It's not because I'm scared to shoot against him," she explained to Jeff. "But it don't seem right, somehow."

"You wouldn't have a chance, girl," cried Mac. "I ain't scared he can beat me!" flared Annie.

"We're going through with the contest," decided Jeff. "Mac made a wager with Mister Walker, and all these sportsmen have gathered here to see the fun. I shall be the first to congratulate you if you win, Miss Oakley. I am sure you will put up a great show against Toby."

Toby Walker had been talking boastfully of his shooting exploits, and there were many eager to listen to this great personage. Jeff Hogarth had to push his way through a small crowd to get to the man he had just signed for Buffalo Bill's Show.

"All set, Toby!"

"Ah, so this rube's shown up at last," grinned Toby.

"If you'll take your place by the table with the guns I'll send the challenger out to you." A slight smile twitched Jeff's sensitive lips.

Toby Walker sauntered across to the table, and, just to show off, began to pick up his guns and strike a pose with them. Just to give the people something to think about and his challenger a sinking feeling, he fired a number of shots at small bottles and broke the tops off. Everyone cheered loudly.

Just to give the people something to think about and his challenger a sinking feeling, he fired a number of shots at small bottles and broke the tops off. Everyone cheered loudly.

Annie, carrying her father's gun, came nervously towards the table. She eyed the guns admiringly, and was so impressed that she put down her weapon to pick up one of Toby's.

Toby turned and saw her.

"Hey, don't meddle with those guns!"

"I'm sorry, mister." She smiled in friendly fashion. "But whenever I see a gun, I always feel I must handle it."

A sarcastic grin appeared on the man's face. He adopted a patronising attitude.

"What's a kid like you know about guns?"

Annie picked up her father's musket. "I got one here—it went clean through the Civil War."

He roared with laughter.

"Don't tell me you shoot with a thing like that."

"Of course I do!" Her eyes flashed indignation.

"Well, you hang around"—he peered down the barrel of a gun—"and then you'll see some shooting that is shooting."

Jeff Hogarth came up and touched Toby on the shoulder. He was grinning as he indicated the girl.

"Meet your opponent, Miss Annie Oakley."

"What do you mean?" gasped Toby, and, seeing the Scottish proprietor behind Hogarth, pushed forward to grip him by the arm. "Hey, Mac, is this your idea of a joke?"

"It ain't funny to me," Mac said dismally.

"You can't expect me to shoot against a half-baked kid, and a girl at that?" angrily shouted Toby.

"He's right, Mister MacIvor." Annie seemed amused. "He'd look awful silly if I beat him in front of all these folks."

"Beat me! Why, you—" Toby controlled himself with an effort. "Get those targets ready."

"Make him earn his money, Annie," whispered Jeff.

A bracket with a number of bottles was set up. The size of the bottles varied, with the largest on the left and a minute specimen on the right.

"As the challenger, you shoot first," Steele, the president of the gun club and the referee for this match, explained to the girl. "Start with the end target. Clear the range, boys."

Up went her gun and she smashed the smallest bottle. That made Toby Walker blink.

"You started at the wrong end," corrected Steele.

"I like starting with the hardest first," Annie answered. "Will you set it up again, please?"

Annie broke those bottles at thirty yards range as if they were as easy to shoot as large balloons. Then Toby Walker had a similar target, and broke all his bottles. The crowd roared its approval. They made the bottles smaller and farther away. All the bottles were broken again.

"This is too easy," cried Walker. "Give us something to shoot at."

"Certainly," answered Steele. "We'll use moving targets if it's agreeable with Miss Oakley."

"Well, I never shot a quail while it was sitting down," was Annie's reply, and it made Toby Walker glare at her. She was so calm and assured.

"You'll shoot alternatively," decided the referee. "The first one to miss will lose the contest. Is that all right with you?" He looked at Annie.

"Yes."

"And you, Mr. Walker?"

"Fine."

"And you, Mr. MacIvor?"

"It's fine with me," the Scotsman nodded.

"Just call 'Ready!'" added Steele, "and the boys will release a clay pigeon from the pits. You shoot first, Miss Oakley."

"Ready!" called the girl.

"Throw!" ordered Steele.

The clay pigeon was catapulted up into the air; up went Annie's gun. Crack! The target was smashed into small pieces.

"A hit!" called the referee.

"Good shot!" grudgingly muttered Toby Walker.

Then it was Walker's turn to shoot, and he hit the pigeon without any difficulty. The pigeons shot out at all angles, but they seemed to present no difficulty to these two crack shots. The excitement became intense when each had scored a dozen hits in succession. Toby Walker was not looking so debonair and sure of himself. He kept on staring at Annie as if he could not believe it possible that a girl with an old musket could be hitting these elusive targets.

When each had scored a hit for thirty-six successive efforts, the referee called a halt and ordered the boys in the pits to try to release the pigeons so that the shooting became harder. It made no difference to Annie and Toby Walker.

It was rather fun battling against this handsome Toby Walker, but after a while Annie felt worried and upset. In the short rest she overheard several people talking to Hogarth and saying that he had signed up the wrong person. She heard Jeff Hogarth answer that Colonel Cody would not care to have a man in his outfit that had been beaten by a girl. Then Mrs. Oakley did not pour oil on troubled waters.

"Honey, I hope you ain't going to be the cause of that young man losing his position. They do say he's just signed a big contract."

All this was troubling Annie as the match progressed. She glanced at Walker as he was firing and she saw that now his face looked lined. Though Annie admired Toby and thought him the most attractive man she had ever met, she was quite aware that the sportsmen at the Gun Club did not like him very much, as they shouted themselves hoarse every time she brought down the clay pigeons.

The score was forty-nine all and the grey look on Walker's face decided her. She could go on shooting quail all her life, and this match meant so little to her.

"Ready!" called Annie.

"Throw!" cried Steele.

Annie fired and the crowd gasped—it was a miss! Toby Walker squared his shoulders and glanced round triumphantly. The clapping was poor when he registered a hit and victory.

"Sister, don't take it too much to heart." Magnanimously he held out his hand. "You gave me about as good a match as anybody does."

"Thanks, Mr. Walker."

"You know, you've got possibilities. Too bad I won't be around to give you a few pointers." He laughed aggressively and too loudly.

Jeff Hogarth's eyes narrowed and he looked at Walker with an angry gleam in his brown eyes. He saw the girl with her mother and the two younger children get into the old wagon and drive away. Suddenly Jeff snapped his fingers and, ignoring Walker's invitation to come and have a drink, raced off to his own buggy.

Annie was very quiet on the drive away from the club. She pulled up outside Lem Jordan's store, gave her mother a look that was full of meaning, and went into the store. She had to break the news that she had been beaten and lost their money.

Sheriff Briggs, Lem Jordan and their cronies were there and discussing the match. How their Annie had fired shot for shot against the champion and then missed the easiest target of all. They grinned at her a welcome.

"Folks, I'm gonna pay you folks back the money I lost if it takes a whole winter's shooting."

"Aw, forget it, Annie," cried the sheriff. "You done the best you could."

"That's just it—I didn't," Annie lunged her head. "I missed the last shot a purpose."

"You missed it a purpose?" reiterated Lem.

"I—I couldn't beat that feller," Annie made a sound like a sniff. "I didn't have the heart. He was—he was just too pretty."

They had nothing to say. They never argued with Annie. If Annie chose to miss then there was nothing more to be said about it. She sighed and went out of Lem's store.

"Hallo, Miss Oakley."

Annie looked up with a start to find the kindly natured manager standing there, hat in hand.

"Hallo?"

Up went her gun and she smashed the smallest bottle.

"Miss Oakley, you know, in all the excitement I completely forgot to get that bet of yours covered, and when I remembered, I had to chase all this way to find you."

Annie's face was wreathed in smiles. "Honest—you didn't bet the money?"

"No, I didn't. Here it is." He handed her some notes.

"Gee, now I can pay back the boys." "Oh, just a minute." He stayed her with a touch on the arm. "There is something else I want to see you about." He turned and addressed the older woman. "Mrs. Oakley, this daughter of yours is one of the finest shots I've ever seen."

"We're mighty proud of her," Mrs. Oakley beamed.

"And we'd be mighty proud to have her with the Buffalo Bill Show," stated Jeff Hogarth.

"Buffalo Bill?" both women gasped. "Why, yes," Jeff smiled. "I'm a partner of Colonel Cody's."

"I hope you ain't suggesting that Annie go galavantin' around the country with a lot of cowboys and wild Indians," Mrs. Oakley looked horrified.

"What would ma and the kids do without me?" Annie questioned.

"Oh, we'd pay you good money, and just think of it, Annie Oakley in the greatest shooting act in the country, billed right next to Toby Walker."

Jeff watched her closely. He was an astute man of affairs, and had not missed the admiring glances that Annie had given to the champion.

Annie clapped her hands. "You don't mean he's going to be there?"

"Every day for the next two years, rain or shine."

"Mister," Annie held out her hand, and laughed happily, "it's a deal."

Buffalo Bill

IN the tent before a large table covered with papers sat one of the most amazing men the world has ever known. Colonel Cody, or as most people know him—Buffalo Bill. The greatest scout and pioneer of the West, the most fearless man of the age and now the owner of the most famous of Wild West Shows.

Buffalo Bill was tall, powerfully built and his eyes gleamed like those of an eagle. Frank of face and loud of voice, but the colonel was genuine. A great friend but a deadly enemy. His raven hair hung over his shoulders and a tufted beard sprouted from his chin. He stared at the man perched on the edge of his table with a far from friendly gaze.

"Reckon the first thing you'd better know about this outfit is how I figure on running it. This is a real Wild West Show, with he-men doing the things they did on the plains. Now if you're carrying any sleight of hand up your sleeve, you'd better forget it. I want the real, genuine article or nothing."

"That's what you're getting, colonel. And naturally I expect to get billed at the top."

Colonel Cody smiled in a manner that was quite ferocious.

"I don't suppose you'd mind, Walker, if we put Buffalo Bill's name on the posters, too?"

It was like water off a duck's back. "Oh, I think that would be all right," Toby laughed in his braggardly way. "Guess I'll go along to my tent if that's all you want. Thanks for the friendly chat, colonel."

Scarce had Toby Walker gone to his quarters than Jeff Hogarth arrived and with him a very nervous Annie Oakley.

June 20th, 1936.

"Now you wait right here while I break the news to the colonel," advised Jeff.

"I hope he'll like me." "Can't help it," chuckled Jeff.

Cody looked up and grinned to see his manager and partner.

"Well, you old horse thief, 'bout time you showed up."

"I'm sorry. I was a little delayed, Bill."

"I should think you would be. Probably ashamed to show your face after sending me that New York buckaroo."

"Toby Walker?" Hogarth questioned, and grinned when the colonel nodded. "Why, he's the greatest shot on earth, with the exception maybe of a gun-slinger I've just signed up."

"Another one?" Cody frowned. "What's his name?"

"Annie!" "Annie!"

"Annie!" Buffalo Bill shot to his feet. "What in tarnation thunder do you think we're running around here, a darned burlesque?"

"Now calm yourself, Bill," Hogarth gestured for the big man to sit down. "Annie Oakley's as good a shot as anyone I ever saw."

"Did I hear someone call my name?" said a gentle voice.

"Colonel Cody, meet Miss Annie Oakley," Jeff introduced.

"Well, dog my cats," exploded Cody. "How do, little missy?"

"Howdy?" "And Bill, she shoots as pretty as she looks."

"Maybe so." The colonel gave her an appraising glance. "But I never knowed any woman could shoot good enough to join this outfit."

"They say you're a mighty fine shot yourself, Mr. Buffalo Bill. How much you got says I can't beat you?"

"Bust my nuttuns," guffawed the scout approvingly. "How much you got says I can."

"Now, hold on you two," Jeff interposed. "With a woman who can outshoot most men she would soon be the greatest attraction in your show."

An ominous shake of the head. "Supposing she be a grand shot, how would it look on the billing? Buffalo Bill's blood-curling Wild West Show with the dainty Annie Oakley."

He looked at his manager. "And how will the boys take it—having a woman in the show?"

"Let's call 'em out and we'll talk to them right now," cried Jeff.

Buffalo Bill had more than two hundred men working for him. Cowboys, fighters, acrobats, athletes, Indians, carpenters, stable-hands, and all sorts. They looked at Annie Oakley askance and muttered among themselves that Buffalo Bill must be getting soft. But Annie smiled at them all so fearlessly that they hesitated to make any protest, and when she came into the big mess tent and took her place by the colonel's side they glanced at each other questioningly. As girls went she did not seem a bad sort of baggage. Time to voice their disapproval later, and needless to say within a week there wasn't a man who wouldn't have gone out of his way to help Annie. She became almost a saint to those hard-bitten men.

Annie at that first meal met a fat, jovial little man with side-whiskers and bright, twinkling eyes. Ned Buntline, the show's Press agent and campaign organizer.

Toby Walker, hearing that dinner was served, came in and got a surprise to find Annie in the company. When he heard that she had been signed on he opened his mouth to say a few scathing remarks, but the eyes of the girl were upon him. Toby cooled off at once and managed to secure a seat next to Annie.

"Good luck, kid," he whispered. "Any time you want any advice or help you come to me."

"Ned," Jeff spoke across the table to Buntline. "It's up to you to put Miss Oakley across."

"You might even write her into those dime novels you write about the colonel here," suggested Toby Walker.

"A good idea, if it's all right with the colonel," Ned agreed. "How's this for a start. 'When she was a wee mite, Bill here saved her from Chief Sitting Bull's Redskins.'"

"Sitting Bull?" exploded Cody. "Sitting Bull's a valuable asset to any book," argued Buntline. "I happened to know that old Bull's in Washington, calling on the great white father." He turned to Hogarth.

"We've got to grab him, Jeff."

"It would be a great way to start our season," nodded Jeff. "Especially if we got him out for the opening night."

The colonel made the knives and forks rattle as he crashed down his fist.

"Not to see the show—to join the show!" he thundered.

"Why drag in a dirty Sioux to mess up a good outfit?" Toby sneered. "He might forget himself and try another massacre."

"I'm certain Mr. Bull's learnt some manners since he chased up General Custer," said Annie in her frank way. "I think he would be a great draw to the show, colonel."

"Then somehow, Ned, you've got to lure that old Redskin into my outfit," decided Cody. "Besides folks'll pay good money to see him."

Toby Walker laughed harshly. "Out in the woods maybe, but as long as you play these eastern spots, Toby Walker's the lad who'll pack your arena."

"It seems to me, buddy, that we ain't got to worry about the gal," one of the men whispered to his neighbour. "I think it's this bragging upstart that's going to get me riled. They say he learnt his shooting in the Bowery. We'll send him back there if he ain't mighty careful."

"A Bowery cowboy," answered his companion. "That brone's begging to be busted."

Colonel Cody had taken a great fancy to Annie, and he ordered that her tent be placed near his and Jeff Hogarth's. Toby Walker had to move his tent to another part of the big field. The big shot would have argued, but a watchman told him sharply that those were the colonel's orders. Still he did manage to have a few words with her before she retired.

"I guess you thought I was sorta fresh coming up to Cincinnati to shoot against you?"

"Why, no, kid," he answered in his most lordly manner. "What put that idea into your head?"

"I don't know. You being Toby Walker and famous and all that. I must say you shoot mighty well."

"I'm the greatest ever!" cried Toby, sticking out his chest.

"I gave you a bit of a scare." Her eyes were twinkling.

"I beat you in the end, though I have to admit you lasted longer than I expected."

"I could have gone on shooting those absurd pigeons till doomsday. Didn't occur to you that it was quite a simple target that I missed?"

"What are you hinting at?" he demanded.

Annie came quite close to him. "I let you beat me," she laughed gaily. "Good-night, Toby."

Toby Walker walked away fingering his big chin and thinking over what Annie had said. He stopped abruptly outside his tent. "Dang me, but I do believe she missed that pigeon on purpose." Then he gave a little chuckle. "But if she had not missed then she couldn't have lasted very much longer. I was bound to have beaten her in the long run. No man's got a chance against me, certainly not a slip of a girl. Still, I gotta admit she's got nerve, and she certainly has the looks."

How Sitting Bull Was Won

FOR all his boasting and bragging Toby Walker not only knew how to shoot but he knew how to put his stuff across. Colonel Cody watched both Toby and Annie at work, and he went to talk the matter over with his manager.

"Afraid she doesn't know how to sell it, Jeff."

"She hasn't had a chance yet. Anyway, you don't see her missing, do you?"

"No, but she's just a shooting machine—no colour to her work." The colonel laid a sympathetic hand on Jeff's shoulder. "I'll be as sorry as you are, but I don't think she'll make the grade."

That she did make the grade was due entirely to Toby Walker. Success had gone to his head and made him a conceited boaster. And yet so sweet was the nature of Annie Oakley that he could not feel any antagonism against this girl. Almost against his will he felt compelled to help her, because like Buffalo Bill and Jeff he had watched her work-out. What she lacked was showmanship. If he taught her a few tricks he would win her gratitude, and maybe put out of joint the nose of Jeff Hogarth.

So Toby Walker showed her some of his tricks. How to shoot a number of holes in wood forming the outline of a familiar face—that of Buffalo Bill. Up till now Annie had only had two ideas about targets—quail and clay pigeons. Shooting a picture was something she had never thought about. He showed her how to shoot a cigarette from a bracket, and after a while she could shoot that cigarette out of a man's mouth. It was Toby who taught her to throw three targets up in the air, jump over a table, grab up a gun and hit the targets before they reached the ground. She learnt how to shoot a coin from a man's hand.

"You shoot as good as I can," Toby actually admitted to her. "All you need is good showmanship and some cute clothes."

Annie was quite small on the bill of events and very nervous the first time she did her shooting act. She did her shooting very well and received quite a lot of applause, though nothing like the deafening cheers that went to Toby Walker.

The Wild West Show came eventually to Washington, and Ned Buntline succeeded in getting Sitting Bull and an Indian interpreter to the opening performance.

Tiers of seats surrounded the sandy arena, and there were five thousand people there that day. The show opened with some daring, spectacular riding, followed by a musical ride, bull-dogging steers and some clever roping. One of the great scenes was the attack by Redskins on a prairie schooner and the audience would go nearly mad with excitement when the Indians did their famous circle of death round the schooners. What a cheer when cavalry rode up in the nick of time to save the pioneers being massacred!

Ned Buntline was not finding it easy

He swung a mighty punch to Dan's jaw that hurled the man from the tepee.

with Sitting Bull. The huge Indian, garbed in civilized attire, sat with arms folded, and with stolid gaze looked at the show. Nothing made the famous Indian register a spark of interest.

Rain-in-the-Face, the interpreter, explained that Sitting Bull would go home if the show did not improve. His eyes narrowed a little when Toby Walker was announced as being the next item. Ned Buntline watched the Indian closely when Toby Walker shot a two-bit piece out of a man's fingers. Sitting Bull spoke quickly to his interpreter in the Indian tongue.

"White man doing all right hitting fifty-cent piece," translated Rain-in-the-Face. "But he could have hit ten-cent piece. Show not bad for pale-face."

Later they announced: "Miss Annie Oakley, one of the world's greatest shots," and when Annie rode in on a huge piebald horse then did Sitting Bull actually turn his head.

Toby Walker had taught the girl to throw up two targets, but Annie was out to help that day. She had five targets shot into the air, and after leaping the table succeeded in hitting every target before they could reach the ground. She was dressed in a dark, close-fitting riding suit with a black stetson. She made a picturesque sight standing out there in the sun and shooting so calmly at all these difficult targets.

Ned Buntline for the first time saw a real healthy gleam of interest in Sitting Bull's expression, and when Annie's act was over the old Indian went nearly mad with excitement. He rushed down the gangway and clambered into the arena, and wobbled—he had grown rather fat—across the ring to where Annie Oakley was standing by the side of Toby Walker and Colonel Cody. Sitting Bull began to jabber away and wave his hands at Annie.

At last he was pacified and Rain-in-the-Face translated what Sitting Bull had said. He had christened her "E-pow-now," or Little Sure Shot, and that if Colonel Cody would do that event every day he would join the show. "Chief, it's a bargain!" cried Ned Buntline.

Sitting Bull did a lot more of the sign language and Rain-in-the-Face explained solemnly that Sitting Bull would consider himself greatly honoured if Annie would be his squaw.

"Considering his great hatred of the white people, that's the greatest compliment he could pay you," laughed Jeff Hogarth.

"Well, I guess he'll be unlucky. Chief Sitting Bull, I expect, has about a dozen squaws as it is," Annie smiled. "Rain-in-the-Face, tell Sitting Bull that I should like to be counted as one of his friends."

The fortnight at Washington was most successful. The story of how Annie Oakley had been the cause of persuading the Redskin to join the show had been spread by Ned Buntline, and Annie was given a marvellous reception. Toby Walker, with a bitter smile playing round the corners of his mouth, listened to the applause. She was getting as much cheering as he received now. It gave him a certain amount of satisfaction to know that all the tricks she knew he had taught her. It seemed that Toby Walker had made a rod for his own back.

Rivalry

NED BUNTLINE had decided that Annie Oakley must appear in one of his books on the exploits of the great Buffalo Bill. On a train journey three months after Annie had joined the show he read out to a crowded saloon coach a special paragraph entitled "Buffalo Bill's Ward." "Buffalo Bill's trusty rifle barked and another Redskin bit the dust. Riding like the wind he swept from the ground the beautiful girl, last survivor of the ill-fated wagon train. He spurred his mustang to greater speed, sending leaden messages of death into the ranks of the foe, but the Redskins with fiendish screams still pursued him. Little did the doughty plainsman realise that this tiny prairie primrose was one day to blossom into womanhood's fairest flower—Annie Oakley."

"Ned, you're a genius!" cried the colonel, when he had recovered from his laughter. "Fifty thousand people will be wanting to see her after reading that. You know what I'm going to do?" He gazed proudly at the girl. "I'm gonna bill her right up, name for name, with Toby Walker."

"Oh, but, colonel—" Annie gave Walker an anxious glance.

"So I'm to be aceed out of my own act, huh?" sneered Walker.

"Listen, Walker"—Hogarth spoke angrily because he did not like the champion—"Colonel Cody and I are still running this outfit. Since you're asking for it I may as well tell you something. When it comes to draw, you're not quite the biggest thing out."

"And no wonder, with everybody else getting the limelights," Toby retorted. "Fancy taking a green kid and billing her up even with me."

"Oh, Mr. Walker, you know I wouldn't do anything to hurt your chances."

"You hurt my chances?" he derided. "Not you or anybody else with this troupe. I'll still be headlining when the rest of you are working in livery barns."

"Just one big happy family," murmured Buntline. Suddenly the fat little man jumped to his feet. "Just a minute—just a minute, colonel. I see gold in this squabble. I can see it on the billboards. Toby Walker versus Annie Oakley—male against female. A gigantic battle of the sexes for the rifle championship of the world."

"Ned, you're the cleverest hoss-thief in history." Cody slapped his Press agent heartily on the back. "It's a dandy. Durned if this don't call for a drink all round."

Some time later noticing Toby sitting at a table all by himself Annie went and joined him.

"I'm sorry, Toby. If it wasn't for you I wouldn't be with this show."

"Don't take it personal, kid." His hands went out and gripped hers.

"Business is business. Besides, I enjoy a brush with those guys once in a while. Don't you worry. You're aces with me."

It was in Chicago that Ned Buntline had huge bills printed that announced that Toby Walker would compete with Annie Oakley for the rifle championship of the world.

June 20th, 1933.

Crowds came to watch the struggle. All kinds of targets were used, and points allotted. Clay pigeons, bottles, coins, ringed targets, firing over shoulder and using a mirror, trick shooting and even shooting from a galloping horse.

At first Toby Walker was ahead, then Annie crept up and drew level. At the end of a week Toby was still just a few points ahead, but on the tenth day Annie was in smashing form and for the first time gained the lead. The remarkable ovation given her by the crowd upset Toby Walker very much, and that night he drank far too much so that on the morrow his nerves were all ragged. Annie went further ahead. At the end of the second week Annie was proclaimed the new rifle champion of the world.

Annie sought out Toby on that last Saturday night. He offered her his arm and they left the big tent to stroll along the bank of a river. The moon shone down on them and the stars twinkled merrily.

"Mad, Toby?"

"No, Annie." He spoke very quietly. "Gee, it's a funny world! Once you used to think I was so gosh-durn grand, and now you've got me beat. If it were anyone else but you I'd be so mad I'd want to kill someone. You know why I'm glad you beat me? I got a fool tongue that runs away with me. I say things I regret, and though I may have been kinda rude to you I've loved you ever since that first day you missed that clay pigeon a purpose."

"Oh, Toby, I'm so happy!" Her eyes were shining.

Toby kissed her, then freed his arms. "Look, honey, we can't let anyone know we're struck on each other. It's good show business if we act as if we're enemies. People pay to see us battle, kid. I don't care no more who wins those matches. I know you can beat me, and I'm proud of you. Never thought I'd see the day when I could stand that; but now—"

"Toby, I'm gonna tell everybody how wonderful you really are."

He shook his head.

"No, honey, we gotta give the folks who think we hate each other a run for their money. Now remember, you hate me."

Annie flung her arms round his neck and kissed him.

"Mister, I hate you like blazes!" she cried happily.

The Drunken Gunman

SO the weeks passed. Sometimes Toby Walker would win, but the majority of victories went to Annie. The bitter enmity that seemed to exist between the two brought crowds to the Wild West Show. Even Buffalo Bill and the majority of his people thought that they were enemies. Only two people knew differently. Jeff Hogarth and Sitting Bull.

Jeff Hogarth loved Annie Oakley. Jeff was a fine manager and one of the kindest of men. One cannot blame him for his dislike of Toby Walker, who was even more loud-mouthed than before his defeat by Annie. Perhaps Jeff, being far-sighted, read that look in the girl's eyes when she smiled at Toby. Naturally, it made him wild to think that Annie could have any soft feelings for a man who seemed to be rude and insulting to her every hour of the day. Perhaps he may have guessed that these two were not such bad friends as they seemed.

Often to get away from prying eyes they would wander among the Indian tepees and squat down on each side of old Sitting Bull. That wise old Redskin nodded his head.

One day Annie asked Toby what Sitting Bull was saying and what he meant by the signs with his fingers.

"Sitting Bull say that two can live in tepee cheap as one," Toby explained with a grin. "He suggest that we live in a tepee and that we have plenty papoose."

"When we've saved enough money and our act ain't the star feature of the colonel's Wild West Show, we might have a pow-wow with Sitting Bull," Annie answered. "Tell him that, Toby."

That night Toby whispered to Annie that he reckoned they had been far too friendly of late, and that it would be advisable for him to act in his most unpleasant manner towards her. So if he said anything she didn't like she was not to take any notice.

The trouble with Toby Walker was that his unpleasantness was so extreme. He said a few biting remarks about life in a Wild West Show at dinner that night, and naturally Colonel Cody took the bait.

"If you can't say something decent, Walker, just don't say nothing at all."

"I just told Annie a thing or two. I'm getting sick and tired of pulling my shots just to make her look good."

"Pulling your shots!" scoffed Jeff.

"What a cheap, low-down remark!"

The colonel banged the table. "Walker, one of these days somebody's gonna bust that gas-bag you call your head."

"Better cowboys than you have tried it, colonel," jeered Walker.

"Why, you low-down, yapping Bowery pup!" exploded the colonel. "I'd like to ram my fist down your throat!"

"You'd like to, colonel!" mocked Toby. "Why, I'd bite your hand off."

As the colonel looked like having a fit Toby decided it would be as well if he went for a walk to let the matter cool. He winked slyly at Annie as he passed, and she gave a disapproving shake of the head. There were times when she would like to have put Toby across her knee and spank him.

Toby decided that he would go to have a chat with Sitting Bull. Though Bowery-bred, Toby had taken the trouble to learn the Indian dialect, and had a fair knowledge of sign language.

Sitting Bull was delighted to see him.

Three men approached the tents or tepees of the Indian people, and one, a thick-set, bearded rascal, had a ferocious, evil face. His two companions were furtive, hang-dog fellows, and all seemed the worse for strong spirit.

"Where'd you keep them Indians?" demanded their leader of one of the show people.

"The Indian village is right over there," was the reply. "In fact, if you hurry, you'll find Sitting Bull at home."

"What ye going to do, Dan?" asked one of the men, when they were alone.

"They'll dig Sitting Bull a new home when I get through with him," leered Dan.

"Why don't you forget it, Dan?" one asked. "The Indian war is all over."

"Lemme alone!" came the snarling retort. "I ain't forgetting I had a brother with Custer at Little Big Horn."

Arm-in-arm the three men made their way to the Indian village. Furtively they slunk past tents, where solemn-faced Indians and their squaws sat feeding. There was a clearing in the centre of the tepees, and they guessed that the gaudily bedecked tepee was that of Sitting Bull. In the half-light they saw the famous Redskin.

"That's him, Dan."

Sitting Bull saw the men, and he did not like being stared at by drunken white men, so he got to his feet and went into his tepee. Toby Walker was there and examining some tomahawks owned by Sitting Bull. The great chief wished him to accept one as a token of friendship.

Dan pushed his companions away and strode forward.

"Now, you Sioux snake, I'm paying you off for one of Custer's boys!" He drew out a gun.

Toby Walker looked round at the sound of that harsh voice, and to his surprise a hand appeared holding a gun. It was pointed straight at Sitting Bull, who thought that the hunting grounds were very close. Toby leapt forward and grabbed the gun wrist.

Dan fought like a demon, and snarling fearful oaths tried to turn the gun on Toby. The weapon exploded close to Toby's eyes, and for a moment he thought he was blinded.

Sitting Bull rushed out of the tepee. "There is a big fight going on!" he shouted to his people in Sioux language. "One man is fighting for us. Come and chase them away."

Dan's two friends rushed at Sitting Bull and knocked him down. Two Indian braves rushed to the rescue, and soon a glorious fight was in full swing.

Toby clung on to his man, and then his vision seemed to clear. He swung a mighty punch to Dan's jaw that hurled the man from the tepee. Dan scrambled up and got another sock in the jaw.

The three creators of trouble had had enough, and they turned and ran with a number of yelling braves trailing after them.

Toby helped Sitting Bull to his feet, and the Sioux stared anxiously at the man who had saved his life. He touched his own eyes, and understanding the gesture Toby gingerly felt his face. Everything seemed very tender, and the right eye was very painful.

"Gosh, I wouldn't a wanted that blast much closer to my peepers," Toby muttered.

"Sitting Bull never forget," the Sioux cried in his native tongue. "One day Sitting Bull pay debt."

The next morning Toby Walker found his right eye was still troublesome, so he sought out an eye specialist, who made a thorough examination.

"Young man, it is not as bad as it might have been," was the verdict. "You're suffering from a form of corneal opacity. A compressed condition of the optic membranes, but don't worry. You'll be able to see reasonably well. Come and see me again to-morrow. In the meantime, go easy with those eyes."

"Will they get better?"

"The sight won't be as good as it was, especially the right eye," stated the specialist. "Though in time you may be completely cured. It will never be very bad—just a little out of focus. What business are you in?"

"I'm Toby Walker."

"That doesn't answer my question."

"I can see you're not a patron of the theatre, doc," laughed Toby. "I'm an actor."

"Well, you'll be able to go on with your work all right. It's lucky you're not a bookkeeper." The specialist little knew what Toby's sight meant. "You're lucky to be able to see at all."

"I'll say I'm lucky!" Toby spoke and laughed harshly.

Annie is Wounded

TOPY WALKER went back to the show, and taking a gun sneaked away to a practice-ground. He found that objects were blurred and he had several misses. There was only one thing to be done—he must tell

Colonel Cody that he was no longer capable of going through with his act.

The chief people in the show were residing as a special treat at an hotel, and there Toby sought out the colonel. The latter was nowhere about, but as Walker wished to see him urgently a servant went in search of Buffalo Bill.

Whilst he was hanging about in the lobby old Lem Jordan and Sheriff Higgs showed up. They had made a special trip to town to see their heroine shooting against Toby Walker.

"Well, Mr. Walker, I reckon you ain't findin' it so easy to win these days!" mocked old Lem.

"You're right. I am sure you'll see her at her best to-night."

"And how about you, Mr. Walker?" "Annie's a show all by herself," Toby admitted. "She doesn't need me at all. Maybe having a match gives the public a thrill, but—"

"You ain't getting cold feet, are you?" Lem Jordan said with an obvious sneer.

Unfortunately, Annie chanced to come into the lobby and overhear—she saw the angry flush that mantled Walker's cheeks.

"You mustn't mind my old friends, Toby." She laid a hand on his arm. "They're up here from down home to see me do my act. I want to put up a real good show for their benefit. We aren't going to disappoint them, are we?"

"Well, Annie, I— A heavy foot-fall made Toby glance round. There in the doorway stood Colonel Cody.

"Well, Walker, what's on your mind?"

"I—I'm sorry I bothered you, colonel. I guess what I wanted to say—has just sort of slipped my memory." Walker could not face the colonel's angry glance. "I'm sorry," he added, and hastened from the lobby.

Thus in order not to disappoint

Annie's friends Toby Walker decided to shoot and do his best. Perhaps it was folly and stubborn pride, but mostly it was because Annie wanted to put up a good show.

His shooting was very bad that night, and several times Jeff Hogarth gave the colonel a significant glance. Annie won easily, and though she smiled when the result was declared she was not happy. Why had Toby shot so terribly?

The applause was so deafening that the announcer bellowed forth that there would be an encore and would any gentleman in the audience like to have Miss Oakley shoot a cigarette from his mouth at thirty paces? One is not surprised to learn that there were no volunteers. Three times the announcer bellowed, but all in vain. The crowd shifted uncomfortably in their seats. Then Toby Walker stepped forward and told the announcer he would do it.

"Ladies and gentlemen," the announcer cried through his megaphone. "Proving chivalry is not dead Mr. Toby Walker will show his faith in the marksmanship of his fair opponent."

What a cheer when Annie shot the lighted cigarette from Toby's mouth. The girl was so grateful for his bravery and for helping her out of a difficult position that she decided she must do something in return. She whispered in the announcer's ear.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the courage of the fair sex is a match to that of the male. The little lady will now permit Mr. Toby Walker to shoot a twenty-five cent-piece from her hand at the same distance—thirty paces."

Toby Walker rushed up to the announcer.

"Since when did you take over my routines?" he demanded angrily.

"Why, I only thought—"

"Take him away!" ground out Buffalo Bill. "Out of my sight with the scum!"

"You're paid to jabber, not to think. My contract don't call for carrying out your half-wit brainstorms."

The announcer thought that here was the chance to get even with the man no one liked.

"I'm sorry, friends, but Mr Walker seems indisposed to accept the challenge."

Instantly there came whistles and hoots from the crowd.

"He's scared he'll miss!" "He's yellow!" "The great coward!" "Can't take a licking!" "Lost his nerve!" and other pithy remarks.

Jeff Hogarth rushed up to Walker.

"What's the matter with you? Trying to start a stampede?"

"You're chicken-livered!" someone yelled.

"He could do it easy!" taunted another voice. "Just trying to queer Miss Oakley's act."

Toby Walker swung round with eyes flashing and fists clenched.

"He's got a yellow streak down his back a yard wide!" a man yelled, and shook a large fist.

"I'll show them I'm not a coward," raged Toby and grabbed up a gun. He acted on the impulse of the moment.

Out in the arena stood Annie Oakley. The girl champion was puzzled by Toby's behaviour, but so glad he was going through with the trick. She wondered if this were part of his campaign for people to think they hated each other.

Toby strained his eyes to see her hand and the coin. He lowered the gun and blinked his eyes—a growl of disapproval came from the crowd. Quickly he jerked up the gun and tried again. Ah, now he could see her fingers, but the coin seemed to be jumping about, he prayed that luck might favour him, and pulled the trigger.

Hundreds saw the girl wince and then saw blood on her fingers and wrist. They jumped to their feet yelling hoarsely as they realised that Toby Walker had hit Annie Oakley.

"Walker!" shouted Colonel Cody.

"I ought to kill you right here!"

Jeff Hogarth rushed to the girl's side.

"Take it easy, honey. We'll have a doctor here for you in a few seconds."

She bit her lips.

"I'm all right, Jeff."

"Bring on the next act!" thundered Colonel Cody. He turned on the once rifle champion.

"Walker, I'm giving you ten minutes to pack up and get off the grounds."

"Honest, colonel, I tried—"

"Cut out the lies and get out of here!" the colonel raved. "You're through with this outfit."

"That suits me fine," Toby Walker blazed back. His temper was easily aroused. "But first I'm gonna see Annie."

Toby would have rushed forward, but at a signal from Cody eager men seized the ex-champion by the arms.

"She don't want no part of you!" Cody pointed. "Take him away—out of my sight with the scum."

"This is my fault," Jeff was saying to Annie. "I should have thrown him out a long time ago."

"He didn't mean to do it," sobbed the distressed, unhappy Annie. "I know he didn't."

"Oh, yes, he did. He deliberately hit you in the shooting-hand."

"He wouldn't try to hurt anybody," she retorted. "You don't understand him." She tried to get past Jeff. "I've got to see him."

"You can't, dear. You must see the doctor," counselled Jeff. "If we don't get Walker out of this they'll lynch him."

June 20th, 1936.

The crowd were trying to climb out of the seats to get into the arena, but Cody was not having any rioting in his show. He yelled for his men to get Walker out of the place and to hurry. Curtains swung back and a whole bunch of screaming Redskins charged into the arena—the crowd's attention was distracted.

Later that evening a little crowd were collected in Annie's room at the hotel. They watched the doctor fixing bandages to Annie's hand. They were waiting for his verdict.

The doctor straightened his back.

"Don't alarm yourself, Colonel Cody and gentlemen. There are no tendrons severed. Miss Oakley will be all right, but she must not use this hand for two or three weeks."

When everyone had gone save the colonel and Jeff the girl gazed at them piteously.

"Please stop fussing over me, and tell me where Toby is."

"Honey, you mustn't have any more truck with that rascal," cried Colonel Cody.

"He didn't mean to do it," she stormed. "You don't understand him. None of you do. You never gave him a chance from the first day you saw him. He's better than the whole bunch of you put together." She burst into tears.

Cody winked at Hogarth, and spoke soothingly as if to a child.

"Don't you worry, little missy. We're going to have you as right as rain in a few days. Good-night, Annie."

"Try and sleep, dear," counselled Jeff. "You've got to believe in the people who really love you, and the sooner you forget about him the better. Try and sleep. Good-night."

Toby Walker gained access to the hotel and tried to see Annie, but Jeff Hogarth and several men barred his way. He had done enough evil. If he valued his life he would get out of town, or else they would not answer for the consequences.

"Annie's happiness is all that matters to me and to everybody in this show except you," Jeff Hogarth told the unfortunate Toby Walker. "You have nothing to offer, save a selfish swelled head and a future that's behind you."

Toby Walker had been struggling to get free, but now he seemed to go limp.

"Maybe you're right. Guess I'd better clear out."

Later that night Annie was startled from her melancholy brooding by vigorous rapping on the door and the voice of Colonel Cody. Listlessly she called for him to enter. Jeff was with him and both men were wildly excited.

"Kid, we've got great news, and you're gonna be the first to hear it," yelled Colonel Cody. "Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show with the one and only Annie Oakley is breaking camp for a tour of Europe. We're going to hold a party downstairs. Could you come for a little while?"

Annie did not smile but looked at them with tragic, lonely gaze.

"Would you mind very much if I didn't come to your party?"

The two men looked at her, then looked at each other, and they knew the reason for her sadness. With mumbled words of apology they closed her door and left her to her thoughts.

Europe

THE Wild West Show was a great success in Europe. The ruling heads of all countries came to see Buffalo Bill's show, and most of them insisted that the shooting Annie Oakley be presented to them. Thus Annie met people like the Czar and Czarina, Crown Prince Wilhelm of Germany, and many members of the English Royal family. Wherever she went she was given a marvellous time.

Toby Walker's name was never mentioned, and Jeff Hogarth thought that Annie had banished the swell-head from her memory. He learned otherwise when he proposed to her.

"I love you all, Colonel Cody, Mr Buntline, Buck, Jim, Sam and especially a man named Jeff Hogarth. You're first on the list, Jeff," Annie told him quietly. "You're my greatest friend, Jeff. I always want you to remain my friend. I would not make you a good wife. I shall never marry."

Jeff Hogarth saw two tears trickling down her cheeks and knew then that Toby Walker had not been banished.

One of the greatest deeds ever attempted by Annie Oakley was the shooting of a cigarette from the mouth of the Crown Prince of Germany. Her hand never faltered.

The weeks became months and everybody was glad that in two weeks' time the show would be on its way back to New York. Everyone was home-sick. Jeff Hogarth spent much of his time trying to keep Annie cheerful, because she did not seem her usual, cheerful self.

"Cheer up, Annie, we'll soon be home."

Annie looked at him and did not smile.

"I'm leaving the show when we get to New York."

"Annie!"

"I'm not happy, Jeff."

"It's still Toby, isn't it?" He read the answer in her eyes. "I guess it's human nature to fight for anything we love, isn't it, Annie?"

"I guess so, but we don't always win." Her smile was sad.

"No, we don't always win," Jeff answered, and from his pocket took out a cutting. "Here's something I should have given you a long time ago."

The headlines of the "New York Clipper" confronted her startled gaze.

"REPORT ANNIE OAKLEY SHOOTING WAS ACCIDENTAL"

"Doctor divulges Toby Walker was nearly blinded in saving Sitting Bull from assassins. Walker still missing."

Swiftly she read through the paragraph and Hogarth watched her in misery.

"I know what you must be thinking of me," he whispered when she had finished.

"I'm only thinking one thing, Jeff," was her answer. "We've got to find him."

"We will!" Jeff vowed in his gratitude for being forgiven.

Sitting Bull Pays His Deb:

DOWN in the Bowery of New York was a shooting gallery, and a notice proclaimed that "Rifle lessons were given by a former world's champion."

It was Toby Walker. He leaned back in his chair and stared at a picture of Annie Oakley that he had cut out and pasted on the wall. All the while the barker of the shooting gallery shouted to an almost-empty street.

"Say, Charlie," a leering, half-witted lout leaned on the rifle counter, "if de champ is so good how come he don't never do no shooting?"

The barker scowled and hissed his answer.

"It's de lamps—de lamps." He touched his eyes.

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

A strange planet, hitherto unknown, has shifted from its orbit and loomed into the view of the peoples of the Earth. It is the planet Mongo, and its overlord is Ming, a sinister figure who has probed the secrets of Nature.

Dr. Zarkov, an American scientist, sets out in a rocket ship to penetrate the stratosphere. He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart, but they reach the new planet only to be seized by Ming.

Flash and Dale escape with the aid of Aura, Ming's daughter, who is attracted by Flash. They are also assisted by Thun, a prince whose father rules a territory on Mongo which has not yet been subdued by Ming. Dale and Thun, however, are captured and carried off by winged men in the pay of King Vultan, who dominates an amazing sky-city poised thousands of feet above the surface of the planet.

Meanwhile, Zarkov finds an ally in Parin, rightful heir to the throne that Ming occupies. They locate Flash and Aura, and in Zarkov's rocket ship they make for King Vultan's sky-city in the hope of rescuing Dale Arden and Thun.

They are taken prisoners, and because he incites Vultan's slaves to mutiny Flash is condemned to electrocution.

In the Laboratory

AS Dale cried out, Vultan turned his attention from the limp form of Flash Gordon, strapped to the metal frame through which the ever-increasing current of electricity was being passed. And seeing her start forward with a look of anguish on her lovely face he promptly seized her by the wrist.

"Shattering Doom"

"Spare him!" Dale screamed. "Spare him, I implore you!"

"So you do care for the Earth man, eh?" Vultan rumbled. "You were only pretending when you told me that he meant nothing to you."

Distracted as she was, Dale remembered Aura's words of counsel, recalling how Ming's daughter had impressed upon her the conviction that Vultan would surely kill Flash if he felt that the latter held too high a place in her affections.

"Your Majesty, I'm not in love with him," she lied tremulously: "but he's a human being, and I can't bear to see him tortured."

Vultan smiled again.

"In that case, my pretty one, you need not watch," he declared in a hearty tone. "You have my permission to retire."

As he spoke the words he beckoned to one of his guards and told the man to conduct Dale back to the audience chamber.

The soldier took Dale by the arm and drew her towards the doorway. Hesitating, she tried to speak, to beg Vultan to relieve his victim, but her brain became numb as she realized that Flash was motionless now. The current was still passing through the frame to which he was suspended, but he was no longer writhing under its cruel effects. He had sagged in his thongs, and it seemed as if the end had come—it seemed as if Flash Gordon were no more.

A sob escaped Dale, and then the scene swam before her eyes. She swayed heavily against the soldier who had caught hold of her, and was in a semi-conscious condition as she was led from the room.

Vultan watched her departure, and was still staring in the direction of the doorway when the voice of Aura broke in upon his thoughts.

"Your Majesty, I demand the release of the Earth man! I am the one who cares for him, and I demand his release. I know he has defied you, but what purpose will be served by killing him? You need slaves for your atom furnaces, don't you? Well, then, he's of more value to you alive than dead."

Vultan slid his cunning eyes upon her and observed how pale and strained she looked. There was an expression of amusement on his own face, though at the same time it was clear that her argument had not fallen on deaf ears.

"Is it possible that the daughter of the Emperor Ming has lost her heart to Gordon?" he asked with a grin.

"I admit it, Vultan," Aura rejoined, a faint flush stealing into her cheeks.

The ruler of the sky-city chuckled. Then his ugly, bloated features underwent a change, and in curt accents he addressed the man at the switchboard.

"Turn off the current!" he ordered.

The man at the switchboard let go of the lever he had been handling, and the drone of the dynamos ceased abruptly. Next, Vultan commanded the rest of his guards to cut Flash down, and while they were engaged in this task he turned to Aura again.

"It is not for your sake that I spare him," he said. "But you were right when you pointed out that he was of more use to me alive than dead. He'll go back to the furnaces, and this time I'll see that he makes no trouble there."

Aura did not answer him—hurried past him and elbowed her way through the guards who had released Flash.

The American was a dead weight in their arms, and it was with an anxious movement that Ming's daughter laid a hand on his heart.

"He is alive, Vultan," she announced presently. "No thanks to you."

"Take him to Doctor Zarkov in the laboratory," Vultan grunted. "There is a machine there that will revive him quickly, and my men will show the doctor how it operates. Meanwhile, I go to see how my beautiful Earth girl is faring."

Flash was carried out of the room by the guards, and Aura followed them to Vultan's laboratory, where she found Zarkov engrossed in some complicated scientific experiment. The doctor looked round as they entered, however, and at sight of Flash the colour drained from his face.

"What happened?" he exclaimed in alarm.

It was one of the guards who explained the situation to him, and then the young American was borne across to a kind of stretcher which was supported on a steel trestle, and which closely resembled an operating-table.

Flash having been laid on this, an appliance known as an electro-stimulator was brought into play, and after the lapse of some ten or fifteen minutes the figure on the stretcher began to show signs of life.

"He's coming round," said Zarkov hopefully.

Flash opened his eyes a few seconds afterwards and looked about him in a dazed fashion, whereupon Zarkov and Aura proceeded to talk to him reassuringly, but he was still in a confused state of mind when a messenger came into the laboratory and touched the doctor on the shoulder.

"His Majesty requires your presence in the audience chamber," the newcomer told Zarkov.

The doctor turned submissively and accompanied the messenger from the room, and a little while after he had gone Flash managed to rouse himself from the stretcher and set his feet on the floor.

"Are you all right, Flash?" Aura asked him in concern.

"Sure," he said. "I'm—I'm all right now. But tell me, where's Dale? What happened to her?"

Aura frowned slightly.

"Dale?" she retorted. "Why do you ask for her? That heartless creature. She does not care what becomes of you, so long as she is safe. Even now she is making up to Vultan in the audience room, currying favour with him."

Thus spoke Aura, jealous of Flash's interest in the other girl, but if she imagined she could poison his mind against Dale she was mistaken.

"I don't believe you," he declared. "For some reason you dislike Dale, don't you? You can't deny it. You've been pretty decent so far as I'm concerned, but for Dale you wouldn't raise a helping hand."

"Perhaps you are right," Ming's daughter replied. "But has Dale Arden ever helped you? I was the one who saved you just now, Flash. If I hadn't interceded for you, Vultan would have killed you."

Flash looked at her steadily for a moment. Then he bit his lip.

"You've saved my life more than once, Aura, and I'm grateful to you," he said. "What's more, I hope that we'll always be friends—"

"Just—friends?" she interrupted.

If he had never suspected her infatuation for him before, those two words made it known to him now, and at first he was tongue-tied. But presently he found his voice.

"Aura," he told her simply, "I belong to the Earth. Some day I hope to return to my own planet—and when I do—Dale Arden goes with me."

There was nothing more to say, and, even if there had been, the discussion could not have been prolonged. For at that instant Flash was tapped on the arm by one of the Hawk Men who had been standing nearby.

"Come," the soldier growled, "you seem sound enough again, and we've heard enough of this talk. You're to be taken back to the atom furnaces."

Flash turned his eyes upon the man, and for the space of several seconds he regarded him steadfastly. Then all at once he whipped his bunched knuckles into action and felled the soldier with a smashing right to the jaw.

"Nobody's taking me back to that hell-pit!" he ground out.

There was an outcry, and the other guards who were present closed in on the American. But with flying fists he scattered them to right and left, sending two of them asprawl as he bounded for the door.

Charging out of the laboratory, he dashed along the corridor that led from the workshop to the audience chamber, and as he gained the threshold of that room he was met by a sentry who was posted there.

In a realm where the ray-gun and other scientific instruments of death were all too common it seemed odd that out-of-date weapons of war should also be encountered. Yet many of the Vultan's followers were armed with pikes, and the sentinel at the doorway of the audience chamber was thus equipped.

At sight of Flash the guard tried to bar his path by threatening him with the spearhead, but like a panther the American leapt on him and wrested the pike from his grasp. Then he struck him down with the shaft, and next moment he was stepping over the sentry's body and bursting into the throne-room.

Vultan was there, standing at the foot of the dais with Zarkov, Dale Arden and the messenger who had fetched the doctor from the laboratory; but, before any of them was aware of his presence Flash was beside them.

Vultan's courier attempted to grapple with the intruder, only to be laid flat on his back by a swinging blow of the pike. Then, while Dale and Zarkov looked on tensely, Flash swung round on the amazed Vultan himself.

The burly monarch recoiled, but the American followed him, spearhead levelled at the big man's chest.

"Now, my fine, fat king," he blazed, "unless you release my friends immediately I'll run this weapon through your hulking body!"

Vultan looked scared, but his courage was restored as he saw a group of his minions loom up in the doorway of the room. Foremost among them were the guards whom Flash had scattered in the laboratory, and they had given chase, raising the alarm and collecting reinforcements on the way to the audience chamber.

Dale saw them, too, and uttered a warning cry.

"Flash! Look out!"

Her fiancé wheeled, and at sight of his foes he flung his spear at them, wounding one of the men in the leg. Then he sprang on to the dais, and stood there in warlike attitude, awaiting an onset.

One of the guards snatched up the pike that he had thrown, and hurled it with all his might. In the nick of time Flash jerked himself aside, and the missile stuck quivering in the back of the great throne. An instant later the band of soldiers was sweeping across the room in a body.

Flash met the first of them with an upper-cut that rocked the fellow to the heels, then caught him up in his muscular arms and pitched him into the thick of his comrades. Several of them were bowled over, and in the resulting confusion the American jumped from the dais and laid hold of a heavy stool that had been knocked over during the guards' rush towards the throne.

Dale and Zarkov were watching with bated breath. Close beside them, Vultan was bellowing at his men to fall upon Flash and overpower him, and to the accompaniment of their royal master's oaths the soldiery recovered themselves and surged to the attack again.

Flash swung the stool with crushing force, smashing it down on the helmeted heads of his antagonists again and again. One man then another was brought grovelling to the knees, but with a titanic blow the stool broke in the American's hand, and then those of the enemy who were still standing closed in on him like a pack of wolves.

He fought them with his bare fists, and there was not one of them but felt the weight of his punches. Yet the odds against him were too great, and at last he was pinioned and rendered helpless.

Vultan began to move about the room, arousing with lusty kicks those of his minions who had been knocked to the floor. Then he stamped across to the spot where Flash was struggling in the grip of the men who had finally made him prisoner.

"To the furnace chamber with him!" Vultan roared.

Flash was dragged away, Zarkov gently but firmly restraining Dale when she attempted to intervene, and as the captive disappeared from view Vultan turned to speak to the elderly scientist.

"Zarkov," he said, "I was giving you certain instructions regarding that very rascal when he burst in upon us. You understood them, I suppose?"

"Yes, your Majesty," the doctor muttered.

"Very well, then. See that they are carried out."

Zarkov turned, with the air of a man who disliked the task that had been thrust on him, but who had no choice in the matter, and, accompanied by the messenger who had summoned him to the throne-room, he walked slowly back to the laboratory.

Here he procured some copper wire, after which he was conducted by Vultan's courier to the dreaded furnace-chamber—that sweltering vault where enslaved wretches toiled day and night to generate the amazing power which held the sky-city in suspension above the clouds.

Flash was already there, and had been put to work tending the furnaces together with Thun, Barin and seven or eight other unfortunates. Near at hand stood the brutal guards who saw to it that there was no shirking on the part of the captives, and more Hawk Men were at their posts beside the many instruments that the room contained.

At a little distance from the furnaces was the low wall of lead that afforded a shelter for such of the slaves as were resting. These Zarkov and Vultan's courier passed by, and, after a brief consultation with an officer who appeared to be in charge of the whole room, they crossed to a switchboard that was bolted to a strong pillar.

To this switchboard Zarkov attached the copper wire he had brought from the laboratory, and then, in company with the officer and the courier, he moved over to the furnaces where Flash and his comrades were toiling.

The heat there was terrific, and as he watched the prisoners hurling fuel into the flaming vents, Zarkov could have groaned aloud in pity for them, knowing as he did that the fuel they were shoveling was pitch-blende containing deposits of radium.

Radium, a substance invaluable to medicine when used judiciously, but possessing deadly properties that could rot away men's lives if they were exposed to it for any length of time.

Radium, which had been put to a new use here—providing the atomic, gravity-resisting forces that supported Vultan's city in the sky—and taking toll of the slaves who handled it.

Zarkov's heavy-hearted reflections were interrupted by the officer who was in charge of the furnace-room. The latter had stepped forward to touch Flash on the shoulder, and with a bitter glance at him the American drew back.

There was a clanking of chains as he moved, for he had been fettered.

Zarkov looked at Flash sympathetically, and then, pursing his lips, stooped to fasten the loose end of the copper wire to one of the links in the prisoner's shackles.

"What's this for, doctor?" Flash murmured, realising only too well that Zarkov had no liking for the task on which he was engaged.

It was the officer in charge of the room, and not Zarkov, who answered him.

"This is his Majesty's way of dealing with an unruly slave," the officer snapped. "That wire has been attached to a high-voltage circuit, and if you should give us any more trouble, my friend, a switch will be thrown and you will be instantly electrocuted. Bear that in mind."

He watched Zarkov fixing the wire, and satisfied himself that all was in order. Then, after dismissing the scientist and Vultan's courier, he ordered Flash back to work.

For a moment the young American stood still, the muscles of his cheeks flexing ominously. But the Hawk Men directed a no less ominous glance at the switchboard to which the copper wire was attached, and with gritted teeth Flash returned to the furnace he had been tending.

The Coming of Ming

SEVERAL days had passed, and they had been spent variously by each individual member of the little party which had fallen into King Vultan's hands.

Dale had managed to avoid Vultan's attentions by making out that she was ill, and, confined to the quarters that had been set aside for her, she had spent the time in a state of constant dread and fear.

Aura in the meanwhile had lost no opportunity of reminding Vultan that her father would come to her rescue as soon as he could assemble his fleet of rocket ships. But the threat had produced little effect on the monarch of the sky-city, whose mind was chiefly taken up with Zarkov's efforts to find a substitute for the dwindling supply of radium.

As for Flash, Barin and Thun, they had been kept working night and day to the crack of whips, with brief interludes during which their particular shift was allowed to rest.

They had seen one man die from the effects of tending the furnaces, and there were others who looked as if they must soon take the same road. And the three friends wondered how long it would be before they, too, fell victims to the fatal influence of the radium fuel.

Then one morning King Vultan summoned Zarkov to the audience chamber and, as the scientist appeared, the monarch of the sky-city eyed him quizzingly.

"Well, doctor," he said in his loud, guttural voice, "I want a report on the work you did yesterday. How are your experiments going? Have you found that substitute yet?"

There was a curious, secretive expression on Zarkov's face, but he spoke in a tone of protest.

"You must give me time, your Majesty," he expostulated. "The question of a substitute for the power that supports your city is not one that can be solved in a moment. Indeed, it may never be solved. We may be striving after the impossible."

"Impossible?" Vultan rumbled. "Leave that word out of it. It's a word I don't like."

Zarkov shrugged his shoulders, and there was a spell of silence. Then Vultan spoke again thoughtfully:

"No, doctor," he growled, "I think the theories of my own experts are not far off the mark, but there's something lacking. They just haven't struck the right chord. One vital element is missing, and I am hoping that you can discover that element and succeed where others have failed."

He paused, and:

"I suppose," he ventured, "that you are working along the lines adopted by my experts? You received all the data amassed by them in their researches?"

"Yes, your Majesty," Zarkov replied, "and those data have been of great help to me. Like you, I am earnestly hoping that I can build up on them and achieve our aim."

Vultan nodded slowly, and was about to make some comment when there was a sudden outcry in the corridors of the palace. Then all at once came the patter of footsteps, and Aura hurried into the throne-room with a look of intense excitement on her regal features.

"King Vultan!" she exclaimed, confronting the monarch of the sky-city. "King Vultan, your day is done! A number of my father's rocket ships have been sighted, and are bearing down on your city!"

Vultan's ponderous features betrayed no sign of alarm, but there was consternation on the faces of some of his vassals who blundered into the audience chamber at that moment.

"Your Majesty!" one of them panted. "The rocket ships of the Emperor Ming! Shall we man the turrets and bring them down with the destroying rays?"

"No," Vultan rejoined coolly, "let them make a landing. They will not dare to attack us from the air while Ming's daughter is a hostage in our hands, and once they make a descent we shall have them at a disadvantage."

In the nick of time Flash jerked himself aside, and the missile struck quivering in the back of the great throne.

He proceeded to lay his plans accordingly, and then he instructed one of his minions to fetch Dale Arden from her quarters; and it was as the girl was brought before him that Ming's fleet of rocket ships was seen swooping towards the great forecourt of the palace.

No opposition was offered to the warriors who emerged from them. Indeed, scarcely a Hawk Man was visible, and even in Vultan's audience chamber there was no indication that any hostile preparations had been set afoot. The king of the sky-city had actually dismissed his personal bodyguards, and was alone in the room with Aura, Dale and Zarkov.

They waited in silence, Aura wondering what Vultan's intentions might be, for when he had given his chief henchmen their orders he had spoken in an undertone, and she had been unable to catch what he had said.

Presently the sound of footfalls reached the ears of the party in the audience chamber, and a few seconds later a man in armour appeared on the threshold, a man whom Aura immediately recognised as her father's lieutenant, Torch.

Very stiffly, and with a good deal of formality, Torch saluted Vultan and spoke in a loud, clear voice.

"His Imperial Majesty," he announced, "Ming, Emperor of the Universe!"

There was a pause, and then the familiar figure of Aura's father entered the room, clad in a brilliant gown, over which he wore a cloak trimmed with white fur. His lean face was impassive, and as he looked at those who had been awaiting him, only the gleam in his eyes gave any hint of his feelings.

Aura stepped towards him, her lips slightly parted. But he bestowed on her a mere cursory glance, and before she could speak he moved past her to accost Vultan.

A detachment of armed men followed him into the apartment. There was a mere handful of them, from which Vultan gathered that the majority of the emperor's troops had been left in the courtyard, and while the monarch of the sky-city was deliberating upon this circumstance, Ming broke the silence which had succeeded Torch's announcement.

"I presume my visit is not entirely unexpected, Vultan," he observed ironically.

The king of the Hawk Men regarded him with a smug expression on his bloated countenance.

"No, not entirely unexpected, mighty potentate," he rejoined. "But if we had been informed of the exact time of your arrival a banquet would have been prepared."

Ming's eyes were riveted upon Vultan, and the light in them seemed to match the glitter of the jewelled rings that adorned his fingers.

"I do not dine with unruly subordinates," he said slowly. "I came not for pleasure, Vultan—but to punish."

"Subordinates, Ming?" Vultan echoed scoffingly. "Did I hear you call me a subordinate? By thunder, you have too high an opinion of yourself."

"I think I am in a position to convince you that you are mistaken," the emperor declared. "But to come to the point, Vultan; I demand a full apology for your behaviour. You have displeased me and defied me by holding my daughter a prisoner, and by refusing to surrender the bride of my choice—Dale Arden there."

Vultan grinned at him.

"Well," he said, "and what if I have defied your imperial Majesty?"

The last three words were pronounced June 20th, 1938.

in a tone of insolent mockery that brought a faint flush of colour to Ming's fleshless cheeks.

"You heard me demand an apology," he rapped out. "What is more, I warn you that unless Barin, Thun and the Earth man, Gordon, are delivered up to me—together with Dale Arden and my daughter—"

It was at this point that Vultan interrupted him.

"One moment," he said gruffly. "Before your Majesty makes any idle threats, you had better consider your own situation."

"What?" Ming exclaimed in a voice of rage. "You dare to threaten your emperor?"

For answer Vultan clapped his hands, and almost instantly a pair of tall doors on the right of the room were flung open. At the same time a band of Hawk Men strode into view, equipped with ray-guns, which they levelled at Ming and his party.

"Perhaps we had better talk things over," Vultan remarked with a chuckle. "But let me remind your Majesty that if there is to be any trouble, you may not live to see the end of it."

There was a silence, a silence that was fraught with tension, and it was as if all who stood in that room had been turned to stone. Then Zarkov made a movement, one which escaped the attention of everyone else in the audience chamber, since nobody had any eyes for him.

Zarkov had a plan in mind. It was a plan which he had evolved that very morning, after he had stumbled upon a momentous discovery as a result of his experiments in the sky-city's laboratory.

A little while ago he had told Vultan that he had yet to find a substitute for the radium fuel which supported his realm among the clouds. He had lied, for, working along the same lines as Vultan's own experts, he had succeeded where they had failed—had traced the missing element which had so far eluded them.

And he had realised that by means of this vital discovery he might obtain freedom and safe conduct for his friends if he played his cards in the right manner.

He had resolved to bide his time, but it seemed to him now that there was not a second to be lost. There was no telling what turn the quarrel between Ming and Vultan might take, and if Ming should triumph, the doctor's plan might come to nothing. Yes, he must act without delay.

Quietly he edged towards the main doorway of the audience chamber, and, unobserved, he managed to back out of the apartment. Then he turned and hurried along the corridor that led to the furnace-room.

About a minute afterwards he was descending the flight of steps at the end of the corridor, and, pausing before the massive door at the foot of those steps, he took out a watch and studied the hands.

He had made it his business to find out the times of the day during which Flash Gordon's particular shift was at work. A glance at his watch told him that Flash and his comrades of the same relay ought to be resting at present, but would be summoned to go on duty again very soon.

Cautiously Zarkov opened the door at which he had arrived, and he was immediately aware of the heat and the clamour in the room beyond. Peering through, he saw Vultan's minions at their accustomed places, either beside the instrument boards or in the neighbourhood of the glowing furnaces.

Closer to the furnaces were the slaves who were engaged upon the task of throwing fuel into the vents.

Flash, Barin and Thun were not amongst these. As Zarkov had calculated, they and the other members of their shift were resting behind the shelter of the low wall of lead, where weary slaves were allowed brief respite from their labours and from the heat.

No one saw Zarkov steal into the furnace-room and close the door behind him. No one saw him creep across to the lead wall and seek out Flash Gordon. Even Flash was unaware of his presence until he felt a hand touch his shoulder, and raised his bowed head to discover the doctor by his side.

"Zarkov!" the younger man ejaculated huskily.

The scientist lifted a finger to his lips in a gesture that enjoined silence, and at the same time he looked about him anxiously, fearing that Flash may have attracted attention by his involuntary exclamation. But only Thun and Barin had heard—Thun and Barin, who were seated near by.

Flash stared at Zarkov questioningly. So did his two companions and fellow-sufferers. Then the doctor spoke in a guarded voice.

"Flash," he whispered, "for the last few days I have been striving to find a substitute for the radium fuel here, and I want you to be the first to know that I have succeeded."

His friend did not seem to comprehend him at first; then suddenly he clutched Zarkov by the arm.

"Doctor," he gasped, "you mean—you mean there won't be any more slaving and toiling at these furnaces? You mean—Vultan will release us?"

Zarkov bit his lip.

"That's something we can't depend on," he said, "and therefore I haven't told Vultan anything yet. But you're right in so far that there won't be any need to man the furnaces in the future. At this very moment there's a device in the laboratory which will provide the forces necessary to hold this city in a state of suspension—a device that was constructed in the main by Vultan's own experts, but perfected by myself."

"Go on," Flash breathed.

Zarkov proceeded to give him some idea of the principle of the astounding machine in the laboratory. Then he told of Ming's arrival on the scene, and finished up by outlining the plan he had in mind.

"I want you to understand that much depends on you, Flash," he said. "It will be up to you to wreck the gear in this chamber here, so that Vultan's city will be faced with complete destruction—unless he accepts our terms. And he'll accept all right, when he knows that I alone can save him."

"What exactly do you want me to do?" the other demanded.

"I'll show you," Zarkov replied. "First give me the shovel that's lying beside you."

The shovel was placed in his hands, and the doctor then unfastened the copper wire that was attached to Flash Gordon's shackles. This wire he transferred to the shovel, binding it to the steel socket in which the wooden haft of the implement was fixed.

"Now," Zarkov continued, "you can stage a revolt without fear of being electrocuted, for when the lever on the switchboard is thrown, the current will go straight to the metal portion of the shovel instead of to the links in your chains."

"And as long as I keep hold of the wooden handle I'll be okay," Flash an electric-light bulb which was lying on it fell to the floor and burst with a loud report. He was convinced, then, that someone was in the room and had fired at him, and his tortured nerves went all to pieces.

"Shoot, you rat!" he shrieked, and the gun he held blazed again and again, shattering vases and the glass of pictures on the walls. "You dirty rat, why don't you shoot?"

The trigger of his gun clicked on an empty chamber because he had fired all six cartridges, and he was standing by the overturned table, gibbering as though he had gone completely off his head, when Sally opened the front door and saw him.

"Mac!" she cried in dismay. "Mac, what's happened?"

"I can't stand it, I tell you!" he whimpered. "I can't stand it! This bein' in the dark, not knowin' who may be aimin' a gun at you—who might be lyin' in wait for you, and—"

"Don't go on so, sarge, please!" she pleaded. "There's nothing to be scared of!"

He laughed hysterically.

"Who's scared!" he screeched. "I ain't scared! I've never been scared in my life! It's just this—this not knowin'—not knowin' who may be standing right alongside of you—who may be waitin' in the next room."

"Sure," said Sally, taking hold of his arm. "I know you're not scared, Mac, but come and sit down."

She led him back to his chair, and he sank down in it, trembling all over.

"There," she soothed. "Why, in a couple of days the bandage will be off, and everything will be all right."

"Yeah, in a couple o' days," he said wretchedly. "In a couple o' days."

The Way of a Girl

IT was in the evening of the day on which the bandage was removed that William Anderson and his wife called at the "Star" office and insisted on seeing George Dayton Morgan, the news editor. Not a word had been heard of Grandma Anderson since she had been kidnapped by Berger's gang, and her son was convinced that the newspaper was to blame.

Sally was present at the interview.

"I know just how you feel, Mrs. Anderson," Morgan said, "but it isn't up to me, or to Miss Rogers here. Every other sheet in town is doing just about what we're doing with the story. You can't blame us."

"If you'd only stop it," quavered William Anderson, "dey'd bring my mother back."

"But don't you understand?" said Morgan. "We don't make the news, we simply report it. We get our information from the police department."

A telephone bell rang, and Sally picked up one of the instruments on the news editor's desk.

"It's for you," she said.

Morgan took the telephone from her.

"Yeah?" he barked. "What? The La Plant warehouse, Twenty-Sixth and Ninth? The watchman, eh? They got one of them? Okay."

He slammed down the instrument, scribbled on a pad, and held out the slip of paper he tore from it.

"Here," he said to Sally, "take O'Brien and get down there!" He jabbed at the speaking-key of a dictograph. "Get me Curley! Be with you in just a minute, Mrs. Anderson. Oh, Curley? What are we carrying on the Anderson kidnaping case to-morrow? Well, never mind—send me the galleys. Yeah!"

He saw that Sally was putting on her hat without any great haste.

"Well, get going!" he rapped at her.

"What d'you think we're running here, a weekly?"

"A sweat-shop, if you ask me," Sally retorted.

"Nobody did ask you!"

With a toss of her head Sally went off to collect Matt O'Brien, and they travelled together in a taxi-cab to a big and dingy building on the corner of Twenty-Sixth Street and Ninth Avenue, O'Brien carrying his camera and a flashlight, Sally with a Press pass pinned to her hat.

The warehouse was in darkness, except for the thin rays of electric torches held by police officers who had invaded the premises. Sally and O'Brien crossed a yard and ventured in at a big doorway.

"Anything over there?" called a voice.

"Nothing over here," replied another voice.

A plain-clothes man just inside the doorway shouted irascibly:

"How about those lights?"

"Nothing doing," replied an invisible officer. "They cut the wires!"

Sally stepped up to the plain-clothes man.

"Give me a break, will you, officer?" she said. "I'm from the 'Star.'"

"Better make it snappy," he replied with a nod. "The inspector will be here any minute."

On the concrete floor, less than a yard away, a man was lying on his back and breathing in a fashion that suggested he had only a very few minutes left of life. She went down on her knees beside him, and O'Brien crouched beside her.

"Tell me how it happened, won't you?" she said gently. "Won't you tell me?"

A pair of glassy brown eyes stared up at her.

"Why, I know you!" she exclaimed.

"You're Ricci—one of Berger's men, aren't you? Who shot you?"

The brown eyes continued to stare, but Tony Ricci did not speak.

"Why waste time asking him riddles?" growled O'Brien. "The watchman shot him, of course!"

Sally shook her head; bent lower.

"Who shot you, Ricci?" she asked.

"It was one of your own mob gave it to you in the back—Berger, wasn't it?" Ricci's bloodless lips moved at last.

"He did—this—to me."

"Of course he did," said Sally, and it seemed as though Ricci took her word for it in his extremity.

"All right—if I'm—gonna kick off—let the cops—get him."

"Where is he?"

O'Brien did not hear the answer, but Sally heard it because she put her left ear close to the mouth of the dying man to catch mumbled words.

In less than five minutes she was in a telephone-box, speaking to Mac, and O'Brien was behind her. Mac was in the living-room of the flat in East Ninety-Ninth Street. His eyes were perfectly all right, and the wound in his forehead was practically healed, but his nerves were in none too good a shape.

"The department?" cried Sally scornfully. "Are you crazy? I said I've got a tip on where the Berger mob are holding Anderson's mother. If you call the department now, every sheet in town will have it!"

"But you don't expect me to do it single-handed, do you?" Mac objected.

"Listen," she retorted, "you've been talking about where you're going to do to Berger when you got the chance. Well, here is your chance. What's the matter with you, Mac?"

"Nothing wrong," he answered, "but what do you think they've got a department for?"

"But, Mac," she protested, "it's my tip, and I want a two-hour break on it. I thought this would be a big chance for you!"

Matt O'Brien thrust his head over her shoulder to peer into the mouthpiece:

"Say, what's the matter, sarge? You ain't scared, are you?"

"Is it bein' scared not to want to get shot full of holes?" bawled Mac. "I know what I'm doin'!"

"All right," said Sally scathingly, "you know what you're doing, and I know what I'm going to do!"

"Listen, will you? I'll be up at Anderson's house in a squad car as soon as I can."

"Well, if there's a squad with you," threatened Sally, "you won't find me!"

From the telephone-box she and O'Brien went out into Twenty-Sixth Street, and in Ninth Avenue they caught a train on the Elevated Railway which carried them up into the Bronx.

There was no sign of Mac when they reached Tatum Place, and it proved none too pleasant an ordeal to wait for him in the lounge-hall of the Andersons' house, for the Swede could hardly contain himself after he had heard Sally's story. Endlessly he paced back and forth between the front door and the stairs till at last Matt O'Brien cried out at him:

"Will you light somewhere? You're giving me the jitters!"

"Then why don't you take me to my mother?" Anderson stopped to glare at him. "You know where she is!"

"Listen, will you?" returned O'Brien impatiently. "Haven't we told you McCaffrey's on his way here?"

"McCaffrey, McCaffrey! He's made enough trouble! I don't need McCaffrey—it's my mother I want! Don't you understand? I'm not afraid!"

"Nobody said you were," returned the photographer.

"Then come on! We've got to go!"

Anderson flung out a hand at Sally. "She knows where my mother is. Come on!"

He bounded across to the door and opened it—only to be pushed back by Mac, who had been about to ring the bell.

"Here, wait a minute!" said Mac.

"What's the hurry?"

"She knows where my mother is!"

Anderson shouted. "Don't you understand?"

"Sure, I understand," was the reply, "but take it easy. I'll 'phone the department and have the place surrounded, then we can play the whole thing safe."

"Nothing doing!" declared Sally.

"What d'you want to get this guy all het up for?" Mac demanded, swinging round on her.

"We've got to go!" bellowed Anderson. "I don't care how many dere are, I'll kill dem all! We've got to go!"

"We're going to go," said Sally with determination, and she moved towards the open door.

"Will you stop foolin' around?" Mac shouted at her. "I'm 'phoning the department right now. Where's the place?"

"You find it," Sally retorted. "Come on!"

She went out with Anderson and O'Brien, leaving Mae behind with Mrs. Anderson. But Mac, after a momentary hesitation, ran after them.

"You're all crazy!" he cried. "You haven't got a chance against that whole mob! Get in my car!"

Sally, without a word, got in the back of the car, and O'Brien scrambled in after her. Anderson sat in the front, and Mac took the wheel and started the engine.

"Step on it, Mac!" urged O'Brien, and Sally shouted directions.

The Final Encounter

UP through Tremont the car sped noisily through quiet roads, and houses had become few and far between when Sally called out:

"Swing to the right at the next turn!"

Anderson, who had worked himself into a state of frenzy, burst into speech again.

"If dey've hurt my mother I'll kill dem!" he bellowed. "I tell you I'll kill dem!"

"You'll kill them?" scoffed Mac. "Why, you poor runt, they'll slap you down like—"

"Are you driving, or making a speech?" inquired O'Brien derisively.

Cross roads were reached and the car turned into the one on the right, and presently was running beneath trees.

"This must be the wooded stretch he meant," said O'Brien to Sally.

"Yes," she agreed, and leaned forward to instruct Mac to stop at the next bend.

The wood was left behind, and the car climbed a hill past a long rail fence to the gateway of a drive. Mac braked just beyond the gateway, and switched off the lights, and they all descended and entered the drive on foot. Trees fringed the gravelled way, and there was no moon.

"It's as black as the inside of your hat!" complained Mac, after they had gone a dozen yards.

"What d'you want, a spotlight?" jibed O'Brien.

Another dozen yards, and then the dark bulk of a house became visible some distance ahead.

"Look, that might be it!" O'Brien said.

"It is," decided Sally. "All right, you wanted Berger, Mac—he's in there!"

"I tell you you're all crazy," Mac expostulated. "You don't know whether there are five, fifty, or a hundred of them in there!"

"There's only one way to find out," retorted Sally. "Get going, sarge!"

They came to the last of the trees and looked across an unkept lawn at the house. It had seemed in darkness before, but now they could see little chinks of light which suggested that the windows were shuttered.

"S-s-s-h!" hissed Anderson. "Listen!"

A shutter swung back and a window was opened. The sound of a gramophone mingled with the sound of voices.

"They're in there!" said Anderson. "What are we waiting for?"

"Keep quiet!" admonished O'Brien.

"I tell you you're all wrong," growled Mac. "We ought to send for—"

"Send for nobody!" cried Anderson. "I'm going!"

He started off across the grass, cutting off a sweep of the drive, and Mac shouted incantiously:

"Come back here, you fool!"

"Shut up!" snapped O'Brien.

"He's committing suicide," declared Mac hoarsely. "They'll kill him, sure!"

The words were barely out of his June 20th, 1936.

mouth when two shots rang out and Anderson staggered a few steps and pitched forward off the grass on to the drive. A third shot ploughed up the gravel close by his head, but he crawled on hands and knees towards a wide porch.

"Where's McCaffrey?" shouted a voice from behind the shutters of one of the upstairs windows—the voice of Berger—and that challenge, combined with the desperate courage of an unarmed man, stung Mac into action. Out came his gun, and he raced across the grass in spite of a rain of bullets that sent Sally and O'Brien scurrying to shelter behind tree-trunks.

Once only Mac stumbled on his way to the porch, but that was over a rabbit-hole. He reached the porch and found Anderson lying awkwardly on the top step, a certain target for more bullets if he remained there.

He dragged him up and half-carried him to comparative safety in a corner of the porch, then kicked at the front door and jumped aside as bullets riddled its glass panels.

For a few minutes he remained flat with the wall of the house, knowing that some of the enemy must be either in the hall or on the stairs, then down he went on hands and knees, edged his way to the door, and reached a hand in at a broken panel to pull back the latch.

A bullet grazed his knuckles, but with his shoulder he pushed the door slightly open. The hall was in darkness. He crept back to the wall and stood up.

"Here I come, Berger!" he shouted.

"Come on!" rasped that crook, who was leaning over the banisters at the top of the stairs. "I'm waiting!"

With a sudden dash Mac was inside the hall and blazing away with his gun. A shirt-sleeved ruffian in a doorway collapsed with a groan, but a man on the half-landing fired at Mac, and Mac fell.

More jets of flame, more loud reports, and then the man on the half-landing reached over the rail to peer down into the darkness. Mac, who had flung himself flat to mislead the enemy, took aim at him and fired.

The banisters gave way beneath a sudden weight and the man pitched headlong into the hall amid a shower of woodwork.

From the top of the staircase Berger fired once, and then there was silence. Slowly Mac got to his feet, and still more slowly he moved round the walls to the stairs and mounted them, pausing on every tread.

He reached the landing and the doorway of an unlighted room. Berger had retreated to the room with the open window, and lights blazed in there. Grandma Anderson, bound and gagged, was in an armchair. Berger had grown a moustache as black as his hair.

"Where are you, Berger?" Mac shouted.

"I'll give you three guesses!" the escaped convict shouted back.

"Why don't you come out and show yourself, loud-mouth?"

"Come and get me!"

Mac leaned against the architrave of the door with his gun ready, while in the other room Berger waited for him. Long minutes passed, and then Berger shouted again.

"What's the matter, flatfoot? Ain't you comin' in?"

Mac did not reply. He was reasonably certain by now that there were no other members of the gang in the house, and he knew that silence on his part would be bad for Berger's nerves. Five minutes elapsed, then:

"What'd you want?" taunted Berger.

"Another thirty days?"

Still Mac was silent; but he was not inactive. Swiftly he opened his gun and took out two cartridges, though he had reloaded down in the hall.

"What are you waiting for, tough guy?" shouted Berger. "You wanted me—well, here I am!"

Mac closed the magazine of his gun and pulled the trigger twice on empty chambers. Berger, who was listening for the slightest sound behind the other door, heard the two clicks with infinite satisfaction. He tugged the door open and strode forth to shoot down his enemy.

But the instant he appeared Mac pulled the trigger of his gun again, this time upon a live cartridge, and his aim was true. Berger fell flat on his face with a bullet in his heart.

Mac stooped and rolled him over, then put away his gun and walked into the lighted room.

"Hallo, grandma, how are you?" he said, and he unfastened the gag and removed her bonds.

The terrified old lady seemed to be incapable of speech; but an agitated voice came from the stairs, up which Anderson was crawling.

"McCaffrey! McCaffrey! McCaffrey!"

Police sirens shrieked in the distance as Mac put an arm round Grandma Anderson and led her out to the landing. Matt O'Brien, because Sally had insisted, had driven off to the nearest house and telephoned to headquarters.

"Take it easy now," Mac said to William Anderson. "Here's your mother, and she's all right. They didn't hurt her."

Anderson scrambled joyously up on to the landing, and his mother sat down on the floor beside him.

"Mr. McCaffrey, you got my mother," said Anderson. "I don't know how to thank you."

"Forget it," growled Mac. "You got her!"

• • • • •

The police arrived, but by that time Mac had switched on the lights in the hall. Sally and O'Brien followed a white-haired captain into the house.

"You all right, Mac?" asked the captain.

"Yeah, I'm all right," replied Mac.

"How many were there?"

"Three. Two here—and Berger's upstairs."

"Nice work, sarge," said O'Brien.

On the way back to the city Sally sat beside Mac in the front of the car.

"Gee!" she said proudly. "You'll be the biggest thing in town, Mac! It's terrific. Just wait till the papers hit the street!"

"Yeah?" said Mac. "Well, I was scared yellow."

"Yellow nothing!" she cried joyously.

"This is the first time since I've known you that you've sounded like a human being!"

"So you have to be yellow to be a human being, eh?" he inquired wryly.

"No, Mac," she corrected, "you have to be human to be human. I knew what was wrong with you all along. You'd never been hurt! That was why you didn't know what being scared was like. I—I could almost kiss the guy that gave you that wound in your forehead!"

Mac stopped the car under a lamp and grinned at her.

"You couldn't, maybe, kiss the guy that got it, could you?" he asked.

"I think maybe I could," she replied with a smile.

And she did.

interposed. "All right, doctor, what next?"

Zarkov leaned nearer to him.

"As I inferred," he said, "you are to make trouble with the guards. Then, when the switch is thrown, fling your electrified shovel into the nearest furnace. As you do that, however, you must leap for this wall, behind which you will be safe."

"Why, what will happen when I pitch the shovel into the furnace?"

"There will be an explosion that will shatter the furnaces," was the reply. "Then, in the space of a few minutes, as soon as the gravity-resisting rays have lost their power, this whole city will show signs of collapse. That will be the moment when I shall offer Vultan the salvation of his realm in return for our freedom."

It seemed a desperate project, yet Zarkov was certain that it would accomplish its purpose, and when at length he prepared to take his leave, Flash was fully as confident as the older man.

He watched Zarkov return secretly to the door and let himself out of the furnace-room. Then he turned to Thun and Barin, who had listened attentively to all that the doctor had said.

"Pass on the word to the rest of the slaves," Flash muttered. "They've got to be prepared, for I don't want any of the poor devils to suffer when those stoke-holes are hurst wide open."

Barin and Thun did his bidding, and an air of tension and subdued excitement was spreading amidst the wretched throng when a number of the guards turned the corner of the lead wall and summoned the men of Flash's shift.

"Next relay!" they shouted stridently, following up their words with brutal cuts from the long whips they were carrying. "On your feet, you lazy curs! Next relay!"

Flash and his comrades of the same group struggled from their haunches and blundered round the wall to the furnaces, where they relieved the slaves who had already been toiling there, and soon the members of the new shift were hard at work.

A minute or two elapsed, and then Barin spoke to Flash as the pair of them were easting fuel into the furnace vents.

"Vultan's men haven't seen the wire," he whispered, "but I wouldn't delay too long if—"

He never finished the sentence, ending on a sharp cry of pain as a whip slashed through the air and raised a weal upon his back.

"No chattering!" one of the guards snarled. "You're here for work, not talk!"

Flash wheeled, incensed by the look of anguish that he had seen on his companion's face, and as he clapped eyes on the man who had struck Barin, he swung his shovel above his head.

"You've used that whip for the last time, Hawk Man!" he blurted, and next second he was flinging himself at the inhuman bully.

The guard tried to throw up his hand to defend himself, but the shovel descended with a force that broke his arm, then crashed down on his helmet and spread-eagled him on the floor.

There was a chorus of angry shouts, and several of the other guards blundered towards Flash, only to recoil before a storm of blows that laid two more of them low. Then, all at once, a voice became audible above the clamour, the voice of the officer in charge of the room.

"Keep back from him! Keep back from the Earth man! I'll handle him once and for all!"

Flash turned in the direction whence that voice had come, and he saw the officer at the switchboard that was bolted to the pillar. Already the fatal lever was in the superintendent's grasp, and there was a malevolent expression on the man's face.

"We need slaves!" the officer called out harshly. "But not the Earth man's kind. He's more trouble than he's worth."

He pulled the switch hard down, and expected to see Flash Gordon fall lifeless in his tracks. Instead, he saw him standing there unharmed, a tall, strapping figure with head held high and with a fixed, mirthless grin.

And then, staring at the copper wire, he saw that it was bound to the socket of the American's shovel, and not to the links of his fetters.

It was even as the officer became aware of this circumstance that Flash yelled a warning to his comrades in bondage.

"Run for the wall, men!" he roared. "Get to cover!"

There was a stampede as Thun, Barin and the rest of the working-party dashed for the safety of the lead wall, to swarm across it in a trice and fling themselves down beside the slaves who were already cowering there.

In the moment that the last two of them disappeared, Flash spun towards the furnaces and hurled the electrified shovel into the nearest vent. Then, catlike, he bounded for the parapet behind which his fellow-captives were mustered in full force.

The shovel had plunged into the nearest stoke-hole, and the current which it carried with it via the copper wire—that current wrought the disaster that Zarkov had prophesied. For in the very instant that Flash gained the lead wall there was a terrific, ear-splitting report, and the whole room was swept by a sheet of flame.

"ANNIE OAKLEY"

Two small boys were there—all kids love a shooting gallery. Suddenly one of them saw the cutting that Toby had pasted on the wall.

"Hullee gee, Annie Oakley!" he gasped.

"Gosh!" came from his companion. "And Buffalo Bill Show's coming here next Monday."

"Mister," cried the first boy. "Do you know Annie Oakley?"

Toby Walker smiled a twisted grin. "Sure, son, I knew her way back when—"

"Sure, and he knew 'em all," mocked the lout. "Annie Oakley, Sarah Bernhardt, the king of England, the Sultan of Siam, the—" The lout broke off and ran because the expression on Toby Walker's face was far from friendly.

But when the gallery was closing down Toby glanced again at the cutting and read about the visit of Buffalo Bill's Wild West Show. Up till then he had vowed he would not go, but it would be wonderful to see Annie Oakley again. Yes, no matter how much the sight of her would affect him, he must go!

Toby Walker found his way to the show and picked out a pay-box where the man in charge was a stranger to him. There he paid for a seat in one of the back rows—the best he could get, for the place was packed.

The announcer appeared: "Introducing a group of Sioux Indians; next Crow Indians—Cherokees—Cheyenne—Blackfeet—and last Navajo." Yelling gaudy figures on horseback dashed round the arena, and found their allotted places. "Cowboys from Wyoming and Montana Mexicans from old Mexico—Russian Cossacks from the Steppes—the South American Gauchos and a troupe of United States Cavalry." The various bands rushed into the arena to take their places for the opening scene. "And now introducing Colonel W. F. Cody—Buffalo Bill!"

Toby had to smile as the familiar figure took his place at the head of the various bands of horsemen. He grinned again when a bulky figure appeared on a white horse and waved a tomahawk it was Sitting Bull in full war paint. Sitting Bull climbed his horse up some stairs to a terrace overlooking the arena—it was his job to pose there as motionless as possible whilst the Redskins were doing their famous attack on a wagon train.

But Toby became very alert when a figure in blue appeared and rode across the arena to the sound of deafening cheers.

"Ladies and gentlemen," it was the mighty voice of Cody. "It is my pleasure personally to introduce that little lady who has played before all the crowned heads of Europe. The greatest shooting star the world has ever seen—Annie Oakley!"

Toby Walker was unable on account of his eyes to see Annie properly, so he borrowed a pair of glasses. She looked more beautiful than ever. He wondered vaguely why Annie kept turning in the saddle and peering at the crowds. Once she looked in his direction and instinctively he ducked down—she could not recognise him at that distance.

The announcer got busy.

"We present that world-famous thrilling spectacle—the Indian attack on the Deadwood Stage. Featuring the one and only Sitting Bull." The Indian chief let out a war whoop and raised his tomahawk.
June 20th, 1936.

But whilst his graves were tearing round and round the Deadwood coach, Sitting Bull was not paying very much attention, for he had seen a man in the crowd that looked like Toby Walker. He shaded his eyes, and then someone moved so that he could see clearly. It was Toby Walker.

Toby Walker saw Sitting Bull leave his terrace and guide his horse down the stairway to the arena. He wondered why the Great Chief should race his animal across the arena in his direction. Sitting Bull sprang from his horse and clambered over the barrier.

"Toby!" he yelled.

Toby Walker dived underneath the back canvas, for he knew that the Indian had seen him. But Sitting Bull was not to be denied. Muttering and waving his tomahawk, he forced his way through tier upon tier of surprised spectators, and so fierce did he look that all hastened to get out of his way. Several women screamed, but Sitting Bull just showed his teeth.

The one-time champion crawled under the tent and ran, but when he looked back he saw a befeathered figure emerging. Toby took to his heels.

Sitting Bull was now on the trail and not to be shaken off. He guessed that Toby would try to elude him so he stalked after him bent double. He hid behind bushes and tents, but gradually gained, and did it so well that when Toby reached a lighted thoroughfare he thought he had eluded pursuit. His run became a walk. Taking cover in doorsteps, behind lamp-posts and corners came Sitting Bull.

Thus Sitting Bull saw Toby Walker enter the cheap rifle range, and he grinned. With his tomahawk he blazed a wooden post to mark the place. Now he must go back and tell Annie; he must hasten lest Toby fly away.

Sitting Bull saw a hansom-cab and decided that here was a means of returning quickly to the show. He waved his tomahawk at the driver to signify he required a lift. The driver mistook the gesture and thought his scalp was in danger; he climbed down from his box and, yelling for the police, took to his heels.

The Indian could not bother to understand the ways of some white people. He climbed up to the box-seat, and next moment the hansom was tearing down the street at a pace it had never travelled before.

Colonel Cody stared proudly round at the cheering crowds and at his many performers. The evening had been one of his greatest triumphs. Vaguely he wondered why Sitting Bull had disappeared among the crowd. Almost the stage was set for the last spectacle. Lines of riders from all countries of the world would charge down in lines, to halt and give him the salute before riding from the arena. The colonel blinked his eyes.

The first line of horsemen were charging towards him, but they were being led by an ancient hansom-cab. On the box-seat sat Sitting Bull.

The crowd roared at the unexpected incident. It was a combination of the past and the present, and they thought it was a comedy stunt introduced by the colonel. They were overcome with mirth. Not so the colonel. He scowled and turned to Jeff Hogarth, who was mounted on a big brown horse. Annie, mounted on a piebald mare, and holding a flag of the United States, was amazed.

Sitting Bull swung his chariot out of the line and tore across to Annie.

"Annie, I found Toby!" he cried.

"Chief, where is he?"

"Come quick—I will take you." With his tomahawk he indicate the hansom-cab.

Colonel Cody and Jeff Hogarth were amazed when they saw Annie jump down from her horse and climb into the passenger seat of the hansom. She swung open the folding flaps and then Sitting Bull applied his whip, and as the riders of all nations charged from the arena the Indian brought up the rear in a manner that brought thousands cheering to their feet.

Straight through the horsemen of all nations Sitting Bull drove the old horse. Out through the gates past the startled attendants on to the high road. The old horse went at a gallop towards the Boverly of New York.

Annie suddenly realised that she had brought her gun with her in the excitement of the moment.

The rifle range was deserted save for the barker, the half-witted lout and the same two gutter children.

"Gee, Toby, did you honestly know Annie Oakley?" one of the boys asked in an awed voice.

Toby laughed softly.

"Did I know her?"

"Huh!" sneered the lout. "Did he know her!"

Toby scowled, then ignored the poor wretch.

"Six shots for a dime," he began to call out. "Step up and try your luck. Try your luck, lads."

The lads shook their heads sadly.

"But, Toby, we ain't got no dime," said the boldest.

His smile was kindly.

"All right, here you are." He loaded a gun. "You kids can have six shots a piece, but hurry up before the boss gets back. Let's see you hit something for a change."

The targets began to move and the first boy fired his six shots and didn't get one hit. Then the second boy began to shoot, and with a grin Toby stared at the clean targets.

There was a long row of clay pipes on a bracket. Bang—bang—bang. Three of the pipes were smashed to pieces. Bang—bang—bang—bang—bang—bang—six of the pipes vanished. Toby, the kids and the lout stared as if they were dreaming. A ringing laugh made all jerk round.

On the other side of the road was a hansom-cab and on the box-seat a grinning Indian brave, but no one bothered to look at Sitting Bull. It was the little lady in the dark buckskin suit and breeches, with a wide sombrero on her brown curls.

"Annie!" Toby shouted.

"Toby!" came her joyful answer.

"Gosh!" cried the lout and the kids.

"It's her!"

Toby Walker clasped his dear one close to his heart, and then over her shoulder he laughed at the lout and the kids.

"Did I know Annie Oakley?" he shouted.

“SECRET AGENT”

An English officer is sent to Switzerland to trace a spy who is forming a link between Germany and Turkey. A strange being, "The General," and a beautiful girl are sent by the Government to help him destroy this secret agent. A story full of thrills, starring Madeleine Carroll, Peter Lorre, Robert Young and John Gielgud

The Living Dead

EDGAR BRODIE, the brilliant young novelist, was dead. He had joined the ranks, obtained a commission for distinguished conduct in action, and then came home on leave—only to die of a chill in his bed.

All this one could have read in the paper the day after his death. Now, strange as it may sound, Edgar Brodie read the account of his own death soon after landing in England. Here is the real insight into the Edgar Brodie mystery.

Edgar Brodie went to Havre to take ship back to England on a week's leave. On going aboard he was conducted to a special cabin, handed a letter and locked in a cabin. The letter was brief and stated that Lieutenant Edgar Brodie must not attempt to leave the cabin during the short trip. A full explanation would be given to him on landing.

At Dover he was met by two red-taped officers, who informed Brodie that he must go to the War Office at once. A special car was waiting to drive him to London. Naturally, he asked for an explanation of this strange action. He was given a newspaper and conducted to the car, the saloon door of which was at once locked.

There was a small light in the car, and by the flame Brodie saw that a paragraph had been marked with blue pencil. With bulging eyes he read the account of his own death.

He was not likely to forget that drive back to town, because the Germans would chose that night for an air-raid. Eventually, after many hours, the enclosed car crossed Westminster Bridge. Brodie was glad to reach the security of the War Office, as the raid was now almost overhead. What with the sound of exploding bombs and the crash of guns, it was like an inferno. He was conducted to a room, where he found waiting for him a distinguished general.

The general did not waste time but got at once to the point.

"You have read the obituary notice of your death, and being an author, probably think it is very badly done," the general smiled. "I trust that we got all the names of your books right."

"Every one, and in the right order," answered Brodie.

"You wrote a number of clever detective stories in which spies and international agents have played a part," continued the general. "And we decided that you were just the man for a very difficult job. We know that you have no important living relatives, so that it was easy for you to come home on leave and die of a chill. I am sorry we could not think of anything more original than a chill."

"You have killed me because you wish me to undertake a dangerous mission under another name?" questioned Brodie.

"Yes!" The general smiled in his pleasant way. "Your face is fairly well known. When we do get a new man it wouldn't do for him to be recognised on the job as Edgar Brodie. In Switzerland you'll be Mr. Richard Ashenden, a neutral gentleman of independent means."

"Switzerland? Haven't you an agent there?"

"Plenty, but the one who was conducting this particular matter is no longer on the case." The general drummed on his desk with his fingers. "He was unfortunately found in one of the lakes with a bullet through his forehead. You're taking his place."

"I'm going to have a pleasant leave, sir."

"Carry out this commission and you can have all the leave you require. We have chosen you because we think you are brave and that you have brains. There's a German agent in Geneva—one of the best men they've got—waiting for orders to slip off to Arabia. He is a sort of link between Germany and Turkey. If he goes he may upset some very big plans of ours—plans, which if they succeed, may knock the Turk right out of the War. It is your job to stop him getting through."

"When do I start?"

"It is now midnight, and you leave at nine in the morning. Everything in the matter of luggage has been provided for you. You will sleep here to-night. You'll receive assistance, of course."

"I'm relieved to hear that," Brodie grinned.

The general leaned forward.

"This agent must be found. We have no idea what he is like or where he is staying. We don't even know his name. It's up to you to locate him."

"And the population of Geneva is about a hundred and seventy thousand," the young officer said with grim humour.

"Slightly more," the general answered. "That makes it easier for you—you won't be so conspicuous yourself. The Swiss police are getting a bit peevish about the way their country has been turned into an international spy centre. If they catch you playing your hand too openly, you may find yourself in prison for the rest of the war."

"Supposing I do locate this German needle in a Swiss haystack, how am I going to prevent him going to Turkey?" asked the man who was now Ashenden. "I can't denounce him to the police, can I? I should only be giving myself away."

"I mentioned before that you would receive assistance." The general handed over a packet of papers. "Here is your passport and some papers dealing with the life of Ashenden—actually there was an Ashenden, who died in France. You should read these before you retire for the night. Also glance at this secret code-book, which you must learn to memorise."

"Thank you, sir," Ashenden took the packet. "When do I meet my assistant?"

"He is a Mexican—we call him the Hairless Mexican."

"Why?"

"Because he has a peculiar moon-shaped face, large eyes and very thick curly hair." The general laughed. "Some people say it is a wig. You had better address him as 'general.' He isn't a general, and, as a matter of fact, I fancy the Mexican police might be pretty glad to get hold of him—but he'll appreciate being called a general. He is very susceptible to flattery. But for all his strange looks and mannerisms you'll find him invaluable and indispensable."

"What can he do that I can't do myself?"

The general gave Ashenden a quick glance.

"Let me remind you of something. Whatever happens, this man at Geneva has got to be prevented from going east."

"Even if he has to go west instead?"

"Exactly. What's the life of one man in a war like this? You have served on the Western Front and should know."

Ashenden frowned.

"But killing a person in cold blood is different."

"Fortunately the Hairless Mexican won't think so. You can safely leave the disposal of the German agent to him."

"Supposing I make a mess of this job?" Ashenden questioned. "Suppose Mr. Richard Ashenden slips up somewhere. What then?"

"That's simple, Edgar Brodie, the novelist will stay dead," the general answered sharply. "Except for the Mexican, you will be practically on your own. If you fall into the hands of the Swiss, or the Germans get you, we shall know about it, but we shall not do anything to help you. It is impossible for one country to try and protect a spy or an agent to any extent. Now I am sure you would like to meet your assistant." He opened the door and called "General," but there came no response. He shut the door. "The general will be down in the cellars."

"Because of the air-raid?"

"Oh, no," the real general chuckled softly. "He is not afraid of danger. He has probably gone to the cellar because it happens that for some reason he considers my secretary is quite an attractive woman. He imagines he is in love with her. He brings her absurd bunches of flowers and shouts Spanish love-songs at her. He quite frightens her, but he is really very gentle to women, but—" He paused. "Not so soft where enemies are concerned. Let us explore the cellar, Mr. Ashenden."

In the cellars of Whitehall Ashenden met the Hairless Mexican. The general's secretary was a rather plain, thin girl, and the attentions of the Mexican worried her. She had an idea he might draw a knife and cut her throat if she didn't marry him. The Mexican was waving his arms about in an elegant appeal when the general and Ashenden appeared.

"Thank goodness you've turned up, sir," cried the girl. "He has been most difficult to-night."

"You get to bed, Mary, the raid's over now," laughed the general.

The Mexican kissed his hand and then grinned from ear to ear. Ashenden thought he had never seen such a strange little man.

"You are Senor Ashenden." The Hairless Mexican bowed deeply. "I am honoured, senor, to work for you."

"You two are working in a cause that means much to England," the general said with emphasis. "You, Ashenden, will start in the morning, but your assistant will start later and go by a different route. You will meet in Switzerland at a certain hotel. The packet I gave you, Ashenden, contains your orders. And remember, gentlemen, this agent must never get to Turkey."

"The senor find him." The Mexican grinned from ear to ear. "And then I do the rest." He gave a significant gesture of a throat being cut. "I think we have very good times in Switzerland."

Madame Ashenden

ASHENDEN made an uneventful journey to Switzerland and made his way to the hotel, where he knew that special agents of the Government had engaged a suite for him. At the reception counter of the hotel he filled in a number of forms, and was informed that 234 and 235 were on the second floor, sitting-room and bed-room.

"Thanks," murmured Ashenden, and then, with the Englishman's inherent love of cleanliness: "Is there a private bath?"

"Certainly, monsieur," answered the clerk. "Madame Ashenden has insisted on a private bath."

They made their way to the bell-tower and peered down.

The man pushed the piece of paper into a box.

"Who?"

"Madame, your wife, monsieur—she has arrived yesterday. Were you not expecting her so soon?"

Ashenden pulled himself together and grinned.

"No—not quite so soon. It is a pleasant surprise for me."

Very much puzzled, Ashenden hastened upstairs and found Number 234. He slipped his hand into his pocket and took out a gun. This Mrs. Ashenden might be an enemy spy who had got wise to his game, and he could not afford to take chances. He slipped the gun into his pocket after seeing that it was loaded. He decided to walk in casually and if necessary fire through his jacket pocket if held up. Very quietly he opened the door and slid into the room.

Before him was the back of a large armchair, and he could just see the top of a man's head. From the bath-room came the sound of a woman singing softly and the splash of water.

"Isn't it time you were through with that bath?" The words came from the man in the chair.

"I'm almost finished."

"Good news. What'll we do to-morrow?"

"Why 'we'?"

"Oh, darling, aren't you coming out with me? Didn't you promise?"

"Why don't you leave me alone, wretch?" came from the bath-room. "I'm a respectable married woman, and I've only known you twenty-four hours."

"In forty-eight you'll know me twice as well." The figure rose up out of the chair, and Ashenden saw that the speaker was young and good-looking. "And by the end of the week—" Ashenden had been seen. "You looking for anybody around here?"

"Only my wife."

"And by the end of the week, what?" came the woman's query.

"A divorce—it looks like," chuckled the handsome young man. "You're Mr. Ashenden?"

"Guilty." Ashenden was on the alert.

Suddenly the woman appeared and Ashenden saw her. She was slim, very fair and most attractive. She was wearing a white dressing-gown, and was wiping her chin with a towel. She gave a start at seeing Ashenden, and then rushed across the room with arms held open.

"Darling!" she cried. "I'm so glad you got here at last."

Next moment her arms were round his neck and she had kissed him.

"Angel!" He managed to hug her. "They told me downstairs you'd arrived. How wonderful you're looking. I hope you haven't been too lonely?" He gave the young man a significant glance.

"Oh, no," the woman laughed, "this gentleman and I got acquainted in the lounge. Mr. Robert Marvin, meet my husband."

The two men shook hands.

"And now I guess it's time the triangle retired from the family circle." Marvin saluted them with a friendly wave of his hand. "Exit me, completely baffled."

The young man departed and Ashenden glanced at the woman, whom he realised could not be more than twenty-four or five.

"I wasn't expecting you until this evening."

"So I gathered."

"Jealous?" she teased.

"Jealous?" He snorted with righteous indignation. "My good girl, there's no need to act a part now. Kindly tell me who you are, and what your name is, and why you are passing yourself off as my wife."

"My name is Elsa Carrington. R. sent for me and told me I was to come out here—to join my husband, Mr. Richard Ashenden."

"So that old blacknurd R. has unloaded a wife on me." Ashenden heartily cursed that interfering general in Whitehall. "You have papers to prove this?"

She produced a passport and insisted that he show his. Then she gave him a code letter from the general in Whitehall. R. informed Ashenden that he had made him a married man to round off his new character, and that his wife came of good fighting stock. She had taken on the job because she was anxious to serve her country in any way and did not mind danger.

Satisfied, Ashenden suggested that she go back into the bed-room and put on some clothes. She called him when she had donned most of her clothing, and he talked to her whilst she proceeded to attend to the care of her face. He told her of the object of his visit to Geneva, and that he expected to hear very soon from his assistant, who was a Mexican.

There came a knock at the door and into the room walked the "general." Mrs. Ashenden did not seem pleased.

"That man spent all yesterday following me around the hotel," she said indignantly, "and making eyes at me."

The general was not at all pleased when he found that the Government had fixed up Ashenden with a beautiful wife and sent no beautiful woman for him.

"Ashenden was a married man," explained the Englishman. "This girl is part of my disguise—a sort of extra camouflage."

"Verree clever—verree ingenioso," muttered the Mexican, and suddenly grinned. "Then maybe the senorita dine with mo this evening at the Casino?"

"General, we're here on important business," Ashenden spoke severely. "There's to be no love-making or funny business of any kind while we're on this job. If we take risks we're sunk. The Swiss police aren't fools. Do you want to spend the rest of the War in a Swiss prison? We've got to get busy. I have instructions from R. to go to a little church up the Lagenthal Valley. There's a German agent there—an organist—who's playing the old game—working for both sides. He's ready to talk if we pay him enough." "Am I coming, too?" asked Elsa. "You stay and hold the fort." Ashenden commanded. "There may be a 'phone call from Zurich."

In a narrow street in the town was a little sweet-shop, and a little old man entered and bought some chocolate. The proprietor winked an eye and handed him a large packet. The old man went outside and in a quiet alley opened the packet and threw the chocolate away. The silver paper he held up to the light, and he read there a message in secret code.

It would have been a nasty shock to Mr. and Mrs. Ashenden and the general if they could have deciphered that message:

"INFORM BERLIN EDGAR BRODIE, DECEASED NOVELIST, ARRIVED GENEVA TO-DAY AS RICHARD ASHENDEN."

A Button in a Dead Hand

ON the following morning Ashenden, who had spent an uncomfortable night on a divan in the sitting-room, and the general set out from the hotel for the Lagenthal Valley. The great white-capped Alps towered majestically above them. They did not hurry because they did not wish in any way to rouse suspicion. They rested for a while at an inn and drank beer. Naturally, the general did his best to get off with madame's charming daughter, and with difficulty Ashenden got him once more on the tramp towards the distant church.

At last they reached the church. There was not a soul in sight as they opened a rusty gate and made their way to the entrance. They could hear the drone of the organ. They glanced round to see if they were observed before passing into the church.

One sustained chord was being played on the organ.

"Carramba!" whispered the Mexican.

"There will be two men—the man who is blowing the organ and the player, yes, no?"

"Not likely—everything is electric here," Ashenden whispered back. "We'll light three candles at that side altar; he'll see us through his mirror."

The sustained chord continued.

They stared towards the bent figure at the organ. The same drowning sound made the two men glance at each other. For five minutes the men stood before the altar. The sustained chord continued.

"Vainous, I stand this no more!" hissed the general, and drew out a particularly wicked-looking knife. "Let us go looking for ourselves."

They tiptoed across the church over the stone flags towards the organist. They saw the man's bowed shoulders. Why did he play the same chord the whole time? Ashenden coughed, and the man did not look round. The general moved forward and made towards the left side of the organist. Ashenden moved to the right. Both men were ready should the organist be playing tricks with them. The Mexican touched the organist on the shoulder and the latter's hand left the keys. There was a deathly silence. The Mexican and Ashenden saw the figure of the organist topple from its seat and crash to the ground.

Round the neck of the organist was a steel wire.

"Strangled!" gasped Ashenden.

The Mexican nodded.

"Someone very much did not want us to speak with him." He dropped beside the dead man and forced open a clenched fist. "Look!" From the dead man's hand rolled a button of the leather ball type.

"The owner of that must be the man who killed him," Ashenden whispered, and then turned. "Shush, someone is coming!"

They made their way to the bell-tower, and peering down saw a man whom they guessed must be a sort of sexton tidying up the place, and heard his yell when coming upon the body of the organist. The sexton decided that the huge bell should be tolled, and Ashenden and the general were nearly deafened by the din. Through slats in the roof they saw the villagers hastening towards the church.

"It looks as if we shall have to stay here for hours," Ashenden yelled in the general's ear.

It was lucky for them that the villagers did not think to search the belfry, and hours later they escaped. They got back to Geneva, and Ashenden was not pleased to find a curt note from Elsa saying that she was tired of waiting for him and had gone to the casino with Marvin.

So Ashenden and the general put on dinner jackets and went across to the casino. The Englishman felt a twinge of jealousy as he saw Elsa. Her evening dress was a marvellous affair of white brocade, and her hair was set in the latest fashion. She was enjoying herself with Marvin, whom Ashenden presumed was some care-free American over in Switzerland for a holiday or to get as near to the war as possible so that he could be a hero back in the States. She saw Ashenden and hastened over to him.

Elsa kissed him on the cheek.

"Darling, I got rather bored, so I came along here with Mr. Marvin—you don't mind, darling, do you?"

"I'm glad you've turned up to take this dull wife of yours off my hands," chortled the irrepressible, always laughing young American.

Marvin strolled away to make a bet on the tables.

"How did you get on? Any results?" Elsa asked.

Ashenden produced the button.

"The sum total of the day's work." He lowered his voice. "Someone strangled the organist; we were too late. Smile, Elsa, smile. Marvin's coming back."

There was a slight scene in the casino because a thin, gaunt Englishman by the name of Caypor came into the casino with his German wife and a small dachshund. Dogs were against the rules. It was the general who drew Ashenden's attention to the fact that a button of the leather ball type was missing from Caypor's coat. They glanced significantly at each other when they heard him telling someone that he was a keen mountaineer and that that afternoon he had been in the Lagenthal Valley.

The general took out a flask of brandy and drank greedily, whilst Marvin watched him avidly.

Caypor and his wife were staying in the same hotel, and the general found out that the Englishman was planning to leave very soon for some unknown destination.

Caypor always seemed to be whispering to his German wife and Ashenden was certain that here was the secret agent and the man who had murdered the organist. Somehow he managed to scrape acquaintance with Caypor on the excuse that he was crazy about mountaineering.

It was a hateful task to Ashenden, but Caypor was an enemy to England and moreover the link between Germany and Turkey. With the help of the general he persuaded Caypor to act as guide on a mountaineering trip. Half-way up Ashenden became so sick that he could not continue and staggered across to a nearby observatory where the astronomer in charge permitted him to use the telescope. On the opposite mountain side he could see two dots—they were approaching a perilous ledge. Only one dot was there a few minutes later.

Some hours later a white-faced Ashenden and quite complacent general were on their way back to Geneva.

"How did the police inquiry turn out?"

"Perfectamente. Un accident," the general grinned. "Very—very sad, but could not be avoided. The poor gentlemen!"

Elsa was not so gay when those two men returned from their fell mission. She was realising what this adventure that was to be full of danger and thrill was sordid and terrifying. She did not blame Ashenden for doing what was his duty, and she was glad when he told her that he had been unable to go through with it, and that it was the Mexican who had sent Caypor hurtling to his doom.

A telegram was brought to Ashenden at lunch the next day.

"It's from R. I'll have to decode it," he told Elsa, and begged to be excused.

Elsa sat there and stared at the general with horror and revulsion. How could he sit there looking at some comic French paper and laugh? Then Ashenden came back and she saw at once that something was wrong. The general noticed, for he put down his paper. Ashenden spread out the decoded message.

"Englishman not your man. Look elsewhere. Impress urgency. Hurry."

"Oh, how terrible!" Elsa sobbed; and then with failing hope she turned to Ashenden. "But the button—"

It was the Mexican who answered, and he laughed a trifle shakily.

"It seems these buttons is not so uncommon as you and I think. The wrong man. Now we have to find the right—and all for the same money."

"I can't go on with this!" Ashenden cried. "I couldn't risk murdering another innocent man."

Duty Must Come First

ELSA CARRINGTON and Edgar Brodie were in love with each other. They decided that they could not go on with this masquerade of Mr. and Mrs. Ashenden, that they would inform R. that they were resigning, return to England, Elsa to take up nursing and Edgar to go back June 27th, 1936.

to the Western Front. They would marry, and Fate would decide if Edgar should pass through the perils of the war unscathed.

The decision to resign they reached two days after the death of Caypor. They were not feeling quite so terrible about the Englishman's death. Caypor should have been fighting for England and not skulking in Switzerland, and thus they tried to ease their conscience. They told Marvin that they would shortly be returning to America—their passports were those of American citizens. That bright young man had said that he would be leaving the pleasant surroundings of Geneva, and told them that he was a journalist seeking copy. He did not know where his paper planned to send him—probably Greece.

Elsa and her bogus husband were busy writing the letter of resignation to R. when there came a tapping at their door. It was the Mexican.

"Hallo, general," greeted Ashenden. "Where have you been? They told me last night when I inquired where you were that you had gone out. I've been wanting to see you. Elsa and I have just made a decision. We're going home to-morrow." He held up the letter. "I've resigned."

The Mexican general did not smile. He stared at them curiously, and they found their gaze shifting before the man's strange look.

"Your pardon with me, but I do not understand this thing." He spoke softly. "In the time of war this word resign I think it does not exist. Always, of course, there is the running away, but resign on the front of enemy, it is impossible. Suppose whole army say this thing?"

"I wouldn't say it if I were in the front line," argued Ashenden. "That sort of fighting is clean."

"And when Senor R. does not accept this resigning—of course he does not—then what you do, please?"

"We'll be on the way before he can stop us," Ashenden cried. "R.'ll easily find a couple better than us. It isn't even as if we were doing any good."

"We can do very big goods." The Mexican spoke with obvious significance.

"What do you mean?" Ashenden demanded.

"This is why I am coming to you this minute. There is the new clues, the most big thing yet; it will lead direct to the man. The real man; this time there is no making mistakes." His eyes were appealing. "You think I enjoy climb mountain to kill man for nothings. You think I have no heart. Give me, please, the break. Promise if I make this time sure you stay here and see me through. Duty, senor, should come first."

"Pah, duty!" scoffed Ashenden, but he fidgeted uncomfortably. "What is this clue?"

"You come with me and I tell you. You make for me good advice."

"All right," Ashenden stood up. "I'll listen to this clue, and give you good advice, but I'm through. I'll be back in a few minutes, Elsa."

The Mexican took Ashenden along the corridor in the direction of his room. Outside he stopped and looked round to see if he could be overheard.

"Last night I go to the cafés, not feel so good, and someone she smile at me. I buy her drink and we much talk," the general whispered. "We make a little discussion about money matters. She tells me about her boy friend—her fiancé. This boy friend he work in factory, here in Geneva, where they are making the chocolates."

"But I don't see how—" began Ashenden.

"Shush, you listen." The Mexican clutched his arm. "This boy friend is dispatching clerk on the top floor. But he make the big money—make four times the big money as make other dispatching clerk. This chocolate factory—it is more than chocolate factory—it is—how do I say—the German post-office."

"A clearing-house for information?" questioned Ashenden.

"Yes, but very, very secrets. The manager of this factory, he don't know nothing. Only one or two of the work-peoples in secrets."

"The boy friend is one?"

"Certain sure," the Mexican grinned. "Yesterday a message come through—a message for somebody waiting here for it. Boy friend tell girl friend, she tell me. She say he know the man. And for small sum she get him talk."

"Why should she do that?"

"Little fool want get married. For five thousand francs he tell us who this man be." The general pointed to his door. "I bring Lilli here to see you, senor. You talk nice, senor, and hold the money near her nose. The greedy little peeg she make boy friend talk for the money."

"I'd better have a talk with her," Ashenden decided. "I can give her a thousand on account and the rest later."

In the bed-room was a pretty girl. Covetous little eyes stared at the two men eagerly. Ashenden assured her that he would pay her young man five thousand francs if she would bring him to the hotel.

"He cannot come here, Mein Herr." Lilli shook her head. "It is too dangerous. The police. Always they look for spies."

"She's right, senor," the general had to admit, and then he grinned. "Better not he come to me. I go to him."

"Where?" asked Ashenden.

"At the factory," answered Lilli.

"She is right," the Mexican decided. "In the crowd we have more safe. I get the permit for visit factory. It is famous place. Then I meet into this brave boy friend, her Pete, by accidents. You give him the money and he tell me plenty. I go order car."

Within half an hour the general and Ashenden were on the way to the chocolate factory. They had obtained the necessary permit.

"Pete know the name of man fer whom we look so much and the route he take to East." The general showed a small note. "Lilli she give me this to make contractings with Pete."

"I hope we're not embarking on a wild-goose chase," Ashenden frowned uneasily. "Sounds too easy to me."

The Real Spy

MARVIN was sprawled on his bed in his luxurious room. He was busy writing a humorous farewell message to Elsa. There was a knock at his door, and the funny little old man who had bought the chocolate shuffled into the room.

"Sie sind beide weg im Auto."

"Sprechen sie lieber kein deutsch." Marvin sat up in bed. "It is safer to speak English. Where did they ask the chauffeur to take them?"

"To the chocolate factory."

Marvin whistled. "Will you walk into my parlour said the spider to the fly. Well, it's their funeral."

It was renegade treachery that had caused Colonel Delmont's death. That was why his son rode the vengeance trail and braved a hundred perils to track down the veteran cavalryman's slayers. A swift-moving epic of the old Frontier days, starring John Wayne and Ann Rutherford

The Expedition

IT was late autumn of the year 1830, and the brown and russet tints of the leaves had changed the aspect of the Wyoming forests. There was a certain crispness in the air, too, refreshing after the torrid heat of summer, but heralding the approach of winter's rigours.

That year there had been a good deal of trouble up and down the frontier, what with the forays of hostile Redskins and the activities of renegade white men who preyed on immigrant wagon-trains bound for distant Oregon. At the Wyoming settlement of Fort Laramie, civilisation's last outpost on the fringe of the Indian country, the cavalry detachment which maintained law and order among the Rockies had been kept pretty busy on account of alarms and excursions.

With the autumn there had come a lull, however, and it seemed as if Uncle Sam's troopers had finally subdued the warrior braves and the murderous bandits who had made the colonisation of the Far West so hazardous a venture.

Therefore it could not have been said that the ravages of Redskins and renegades were responsible for the conference of sober-faced military men which took place at the fort during the close of that particular month of September.

General Ferguson, in command at Laramie, was the central figure at that conference, and with but two exceptions the other men present were officers serving under him—the exception being Clem Harris, a trader of some repute, and Lafe Bentin, a scout who knew the Indian country as he did the palm of his hand.

"Gentlemen," General Ferguson was saying earnestly, "the news has just reached us that the last wagon-train which passed through here on the way to Oregon has met with disaster at the Snake River Crossing. In short, the direct route to Oregon, known as the Union Pass trail, has witnessed yet another tragedy."

There was a pause, and then Ferguson went on speaking.

"As you know," he stated, "the difficult Union Pass trail has been the cause of many, many calamities—not brought about so much by marauding Indians or freebooters as by the arduous nature of the country itself. Pioneers drowning in floods, dying of starvation on barren prairies, perishing of thirst in blazing deserts. Yes, gentlemen, heavy toll has been taken of those brave spirits who have tried to reach the great North-West, and so a new trail to Oregon must be found."

There was a silence, during which the general turned his keen grey eyes on Clem Harris, the trader.

"In these circumstances," he continued, "I am inclined to look favourably on a suggestion which our friend here has put up. Perhaps you will be good enough to repeat that suggestion to my officers, Mr. Harris."

The trader cleared his throat. He was a thick-set man of ruddy complexion, very heavy about the shoulders, and with a bulldog jaw that seemed to indicate determination.

"Mr. Benton, my scout, tells me that there is a pass to the south that would enable Americans to enter Oregon through California," he declared.

"Yes, siree," Lafe Benton struck in with emphasis, toying with his wide-brimmed Stetson as he spoke. "I kin guide yuh to it, and from California upwards to Oregon it's an easy route."

"Aren't you forgetting," said one of General Ferguson's subordinates, "that California is not yet United States territory, but belongs to Mexico?"

"That's true enough, sir," rejoined Harris. "But the Californians would not object to us travelling peacefully through their land. My proposal is that a troop of cavalry escorts me via this southern pass to the boundary line of Mexican territory, where I can fend for myself and work my day up to Oregon to transact business there.

"The dangers of this southern route," he added in an explanatory tone, "are confined to the country between here and the California line. Now the soldiers who travelled with me would not only afford me protection, but could later fortify the trail against Redskins for the benefit of the wagon-trains which would use this route after we had blazed it, as it were."

The suggestion put up by Harris began to look more promising to the assemblage of officers. At first the idea had seemed a little wild to them, but they could see now why their commander had given it consideration.

"And this southern trail which you mention, Mr. Harris," someone inquired, "it definitely presents less difficulty than the Union Pass route?"

"Ask Mr. Benton," said Harris. "He claims to know every inch of it."

Lafo Benton drew the back of his hand across his mouth. He was a big, loose-limbed fellow, whose face was burned to a deep tan.

"It sure is a clear-cut trail," he announced, "and any man that used it would have a pleasure trip compared to what he'd have to go through on the Union Pass route. The only trouble is Injuns, the tribes down that way not havin' been put in their place like the ones up hereabouts."

General Ferguson addressed the company again.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I am going to accept Mr. Harris' proposal; but in view of the dangers which may be encountered from hostile Redskins I shall have to depend on one of you to volunteer as leader of the expedition."

The words were no sooner uttered than a young man holding the rank of captain stepped forward. Over six feet tall, and built in proportion, he was a strikingly handsome specimen of his race, with light-brown hair, resolute features, and eyes that possessed a devil-may-care expression.

"I'd like the assignment, sir," he remarked.

General Ferguson looked at him appreciatively, but shook his head.

"I'm sorry, Captain Delmont," he murmured, handing the younger man a dispatch that was lying on his desk. "But I am reserving your services for a mission which this document will explain. Therefore I must call upon someone else."

"Perhaps the general will permit me to volunteer."

The speaker was a man of some fifty years, a veteran of the army, yet still a fine, soldierly figure, and bearing a certain family resemblance to the youthful cavalryman whose offer had just been rejected. He was, in fact, Captain Delmont's father.

"Thank you, Colonel Delmont," General Ferguson said. "You can consider yourself in charge of the expedition, and I'd like you to arrange for an early departure. That will be all, gentlemen."

Thus dismissed, the officers filed out through the door of the general's quarters, the Delmonts being the last to depart.

"Sorry you weren't assigned, John," father said to son, as they were crossing the threshold. "I believe you're disappointed, at that."

"Aw, that's all right, dad," Captain John Delmont answered cheerfully. "It's in the family, anyway."

They passed out of the room, and now Ferguson was left alone with Harris and Benton.

"By-the-by, Mr. Harris," the general asked, "what will you require in the way of equipment?"

"Why, I'd say plenty of rifles, ammunition and food supplies," the trader replied heartily. "And a field-gun, general. Yep, a field-gun would be pretty useful."

"I'll see to it," the cavalry commander assured him, and a few seconds later the trader and his scout were also quitting the room.

Once out of earshot of the sentry who was posted at the door of Ferguson's quarters, Benton spoke to Harris in an undertone. He was grinning—a crafty and malevolent grin that might have caused the general some uneasiness had he been able to see it.

"It went over better than I expected," said Benton.

Harris nodded. There was an unpleasant glitter in his eyes.

"I've been planning this for a long time, Lafe," he muttered. "By thunder, there's no tellin' where we might finish up when we hit California. We've picked a spot where we can build a stronghold that will stand off an army. We'll have a field-gun—the only piece o' cannon that country has ever seen. And we'll make ourselves masters of the whole section there."

"Yeah?" the scout chuckled. "Well, you take the land. Me an' the boys will be satisfied with the loot."

"And there'll be plenty of it," quoth Harris. "Now you know what to do, Lafe. Get Markey—tell him that everything's okay and that he's to round up the boys an' meet the column at Soda Springs. Tell him to pull off the job just as we planned it."

Benton gave him a sly wink that held a wealth of meaning, and then took himself off. Harris remained at the fort, and a little while later might have been seen mingling with a knot of officers, who fell into conversation with him at once.

They liked Harris, had always liked him, finding him good company. He had an engaging way with him, and, taken at his face value, he seemed a downright and hearty sort of person. Little did they know that this trader of good repute was in reality the head of a powerful band of outlaws, and that under his veneer of good fellowship the true nature of the man was revoltingly cruel and cunning and ruthless.

THE journey from Laramie, in Wyoming, to Soda Springs, situated in the territory now known as Utah, was one that took many days, and a full fortnight had elapsed since the conference at the fort when a considerable gang of desperadoes mustered there.

They were the men in the pay of Harris and were led by Markey, an ill-favoured ruffian who acted as the bogus trader's lieutenant.

Their camping-ground was among the rocks that were scattered in profusion around Soda Springs, and here they awaited the approach of the expedition commanded by Colonel Delmont; here they whiled away the time for twenty-four hours, taking it in turns to keep a look-out towards the north-east, and in their waking moments discussing the project that Harris had in mind.

It was at the end of twenty-four hours, and a new day had dawned chillingly with a hint of snow in the air, when the Delmont column was sighted on the trail, Harris and Benton riding a little to the fore.

News of the expedition's approach had no sooner been conveyed to him that Markey prepared for an ambushade, planting a handful of his men within gunshot range of the Springs.

"You fellows know your job," he said to these renegades. "As soon as the blue-coats dismount and come ahead, get your horses and beat it. Meantime, the rest of us will be in hiding away to the left there, and we'll bear down on the wagons at the right moment. The whole thing oughta be easy."

"Tom," he added, turning to a lynx-eyed rogue known as Richards, "you'll stay put when we make our dash, an' you'll pick up Harris with a spare horse. Is that clear?"

Richards nodded briskly, and the main body of the crooks then cantered off to the position that they were to occupy, parting with those who were to engage in the task of drawing off the soldiers.

A quarter of an hour later the Delmont column pulled slowly into the immediate neighbourhood of Soda Springs. It was a column that consisted of a field-gun and ammunition limber, a number of wagons laden to the canvas with stores and equipment, and a troop of blue-uniformed cavalrymen for escort.

As it came within range a shot split the quiet of the lonely, rock-bound hills that overlooked the Springs. It was fired by one of the small party of men who had been detailed by Markey to decoy the soldiery, and it was immediately followed by a desultory volley from the same source.

The leaden slugs whistled amongst the troopers of the column, and so unexpected was the fusillade that for an instant or two the military detachment was thrown into confusion. At the outset, indeed, Harris and Benton alone seemed to keep their heads—as well they might, since they knew that they had nothing to fear.

"Get down off your horses and take cover!" yelled Harris.

He was obeyed, for the order was not countermanded by Colonel Delmont. Why should it have been? Delmont himself realised that it was the only course to take, and set an example by swinging himself out of the saddle and drawing his revolver.

The men of his detachment dropped to the ground. Then the drivers of the wagons and the artillerymen on the gun limber followed suit, and next second a heavy fire was being opened upon the cluster of boulders from which the outburst of shooting had come.

As for Harris and Benton, they had made it their business to single out a bugler who was attached to the troop, and, after there had been a brief exchange of shots with the concealed desperadoes, the trader and his ally slipped across to that soldier.

"Sound the charge!" Harris rapped out.

The bugler hesitated, but Harris seemed to imply that the command had originally come from Colonel Delmont, and in another moment the brassy notes of the trumpet were resounding above the blatter of military carbines.

Quick to respond, the cavalrymen leapt to their feet and dashed forward through the rocks, cheering as they ran. At the same time Harris and Benton detected movements away ahead, movements which told them that the handful of renegades who had blazed at the troopers were making off.

Scout and trader hung back as the soldiers pressed onward, and then, unnoticed, they turned aside and raced hot-foot between the scattered boulders to a copiece about a hundred yards to the west.

Before they reached that copiece a formidable band of horsemen spurred out of it and swept down the line of wagons which had been left unattended by Delmont and his troop.

Skulking among the rocks with Benton, Harris watched Markey and the gang stampeaded the wagon-teams expertly, and heard a fresh uproar of shooting as the betrayed soldiery became aware of what was taking place in their rear. But, inveigled into that fatal and useless charge by one whom they had trusted, Colonel Delmont and his men were already a fair distance from the Springs, and without suffer ing a single casualty the renegades escaped with their booty—a whole column of prairie schooners packed with stores and munitions of war, to say nothing of a field-gun of the latest pattern and a hundred cavalry mounts fully accoutred.

"Good work, Markey," Harris soliloquised under his breath, and then in company with Benton he hurried on until he reached the coppie from which the foray had been launched.

Here he found Tom Richards awaiting him with a couples of ponies, and he made haste to climb astride one of the animals.

"All right, Tom, let's go," he grunted to Richards. "Barton, you go back and report to Delmont. As long as you're the one to break the bad news to him, he'll believe your story. But remember, nobody must reach the fort with word of the raid until I have time to get well out of the country."

"Don't worry about that," the scout rejoined. "Colonel Delmont and his troop are as good as lost right now. And you and me and all the rest of the boys will meet later—in California."

With a nod Harris wheeled and galloped off in a westerly direction, Richards accompanying him. As for Benton, he sneaked back under cover of the rocks until he was within sight of the cavalry detachment which had been so cunningly tricked.

The soldiers had returned to the Springs, and were standing around with the air of men who were baffled and helpless. Colonel Delmont and a couple of junior officers were in earnest conversation beside a solitary wagon which had been overlooked by Markey and his cronies.

Such was the scene that Benton now beheld, and after permitting himself a covert smile he stepped boldly from amidst the rocks and advanced towards the colonel.

"Did yuh get any of those rats who opened fire on us, sir?" he asked.

"No," Delmont breathed. "They ran to their horses and sheered off as we charged. They were only decoys, Benton, for while our backs were turned some more of the scoundrels bore down on the wagons and got away with everything—everything except this prairie schooner here, which contains nothing but our tents and a small quantity of provisions."

"How much grub is there in that wagon?" Benton queried.

"Enough to keep us alive for a week or two on short rations," was the reply. "After that we're finished."

"Finished is right," Benton muttered with well-feigned gloom. "There ain't no game in this tract of country, and we're hun'reds of miles from anywhere."

Colonel Delmont was silent for a space, and then, looking about him:

"What happened to Harris?" he demanded.

"I was goin' to tell you about that," Benton said with a frown. "It sure looks like he had something to do with the whole thing, sir. I saw him strike off, and, followin' him up, was just in time to spot him ridin' away with one o' them renegades."

The colonel's brow darkened as this evidence of the trader's villainy was made known to him, and, standing there, he cursed the day that Harris had talked General Ferguson into accepting his proposal to blaze a new trail. It was clear enough to him now that the man had only been working for his own ends, seeking to gain profit and plunder from the U.S. Government.

"Benton," he said huskily, "we can't turn back, and it's equally in vain to go forward. We would die on the march for want of supplies."

"There's a horse harnessed to that wagon there, sir," Benton stated. "I could make the fort alone on it.

travellin' light—and could be back here with a relief party afore the heavy snow starts."

It was a suggestion to which the colonel readily agreed, and, the horse being taken out of the shafts of the wagon, Benton swung himself astride the animal's back. He was then provided with some food, sufficient to last him on his long journey to Fort Laramie, and as he was preparing to set out Delmont moved close to him.

"Remember, Benton," he said slowly, "the lives of my men are in your hands."

"I understand, sir," the scout answered, and a moment later he was clapping his heels to the flanks of his mount.

The soldiers who had pinned their faith on him watched him galloping in the direction whence they had come, watched him until a fold in the landscape hid him from their view. It was only then, had they but known it, that Lafe Benton changed his course, swinging aside from the north-east trail and affecting a detour that enabled him to skirt Soda Springs and head for the west—and California.

Special Assignment

SOME weeks later, on the old Union Pass trail that led to Laramie and then wound away across a thousand miles of the toughest territory in the West, a wagon-train of immigrants might have been seen in the throes of a combat with Nature.

The wagon-train in question was fording a tributary of the Platte River, but the torrent, swollen with recent falls of sleet and snow, was rendering the passage a difficult and even desperate venture.

Despite this, the crossing was made without a hitch until the last prairie schooner was fifty yards from the west bank, when the vehicle suddenly cap-

"I'm sorry, Captain Delmont," the general murmured, handing the younger man a dispatch that was lying on his desk. "But I am reserving your services for a mission which this document will explain."

sized and plunged its occupants into the water.

The occupants were a woman and a small girl of some seven or eight years, and as the flood swallowed them an outcry arose from those of the immigrants who had already gained dry ground.

Even as those shouts of alarm went up three horsemen charged into the water in a determined and spontaneous attempt to rescue the woman and the girl. They were not connected in any way with the wagon-train. They were soldiers who had chanced to arrive at the ford while the column of pioneers had been engaged in traversing it, and one of them was none other than young Captain Delmont, bound for Laramie after executing a mission in the south-east.

It was for the young girl that John Delmont made, leaving his two comrades to succour the woman, and, though a few moments of tense anxiety ensued, the gallant blue-coats finally succeeded in bringing the imperilled couple ashore.

John was the first to reach the bank, and amid the acclamations of the onlookers there he handed a drenched and weeping child to an elderly, white-faced man who was waiting with open arms.

"I—I don't know how to thank you, sir," this man said to him in a voice that trembled with emotion. "My name is Ridgley, and I'm leader of this train. This is my little daughter Sis. She was riding up on a spare wagon with her Aunt Minnie there."

John glanced at the drooping form of "Aunt Minnie," who was being carried out of the river by his comrades, two staunch troopers who were known as Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke. They seemed to be at loggerheads over her, Red and Tim, as if each were anxious to claim the credit for rescuing her, and John could not help smiling, for he knew that these two fellows under his command considered themselves first-class "lady-killers."

Aunt Minnie, in the meanwhile, was plainly in a fainting condition, and it was not until she had been placed on dry land that she revived. And then, as she lifted her head, Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke saw her features fair and square for the first time.

They released her with one accord. For the face that they beheld was not what they had expected. It was the plain, unbeauteous face of a typical spinster, middle-aged, but possessed of kittenish ways that became apparent as she recovered her wits.

"Oh!" she squealed. "Oh, I've been saved—and by a soldier! Oh, tell me, which of you was the brave man who rescued me?"

She looked as if she were about to favour her deliverer with a kiss, whichever one should prove to be the deserving party, and involuntarily the two troopers recoiled.

Red, long and lean and carrot-headed, made haste to point at Tim. The latter, short and plump, was equally quick to indicate his laiky comrade.

"Ho did!" they exclaimed in one voice.

Their captain, John Delmont, was watching their discomfiture, and was covering his mouth with his hand to hide a grin when old man Ridgley spoke to him again.

"May I present my other daughter, sir?" the leader of the wagon-train said. "I reckon she'd like to thank you for what you did as well, an', maybe she can do it better than me."

John turned to discover a girl of nineteen or twenty standing beside Ridgley, a girl whose loveliness took his breath away; a small, dainty brunette, trim of figure, with a creamy complexion and a pair of large, smiling eyes.

He was scarcely aware of the words of gratitude that she addressed to him—only he knew that they came mighty prettily from her lips. Then her voice trailed off on a note of inquiry, and he realised that she was waiting for him to tell her his name.

"John," he found himself saying. "Captain John Delmont."

"My name is Ann," she murmured, and blushing lowered her glance as he continued to gaze at her in admiration.

John soon learned that the Ridgley wagon-train was bound for Oregon, and, in consequence, he proposed that he and his two subordinates should ride with it as far as Laramie. It was a suggestion that was welcomed by Ann and her father, as well as by little Sis, who was on the way to recovering from her ordeal and already seemed to be developing a sort of hero-worship for the tall officer who had saved her from the river.

During the next three days, therefore, John Delmont had ample opportunity of making the better acquaintance of the Ridgleys, and, if Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke were hard put to it to avoid the skittish attentions of Minnie, their captain at least found the time passing quickly enough in the company of Ann.

It was round about ten o'clock on a chill, dreary morning that the column of immigrants sighted Fort Laramie, and, as they intended to push right ahead until weather conditions should force them to camp for the winter months, John was compelled to take a regretful farewell of them there and then.

"Well, captain," old man Ridgley said as he shook hands with him, "I want to thank you again for what you and your men did at the crossing of the Platte."

"That's all right, Mr. Ridgley," John told him heartily. "I'm glad to have met you, for making a friend in this country means a lot to anyone. You never know when we might run across each other again. I only hope we do."

His parting with Ann was somewhat different. Though he had only known her a few days he felt that he would never forget her, and it gave him a queer pang when he reflected that he was perhaps bidding her "goodbye," never to see her any more. He could have wished with all his heart that he were not a soldier, but a pioneer bound for Oregon, and he had a pretty shrewd idea that she was wishing the same.

Part they must, however, and a short time afterwards Captain John Delmont was reporting to General Ferguson in the latter's quarters at the fort.

The general congratulated him on the success of the mission that he had conducted in the east, and added that he considered John and Troopers Conway and O'Rourke were entitled to a long furlough.

"Thank you, sir," the younger man replied, and then, after a slight pause: "Have you heard anything of my father?" he asked.

General Ferguson shook his head slowly, frowning as he did so.

"Not a word," he said, "and I confess to being worried, my boy, for we've been a long time without news of the colonel and his command. But at this time of the year I'm afraid that no search party could get through the mountains."

John bit his lip. The lack of tidings from his father had troubled him sorely, and he was desperately anxious to learn if all was well with him.

"I'd like to try it, sir," he announced, and at that the general rose from his chair.

"I wouldn't ask any man to go," he stated, laying a hand on the captain's shoulder. "But I'll gladly give you my permission, and, as I believe Conway and O'Rourke to be very much attached to you, they are at liberty to travel with you if they so desire."

This John would not hear of, preferring to undertake the hazardous journey alone without risk to the lives of other men. But on the day that he prepared for departure he was accosted by Red and Tim.

Like their officer, they had discarded their uniforms and were dressed in buckskin. They had also obtained horses and a couple of pack-mules.

"Where do you think you're going?" John demanded.

"Well, it's like this, you see, cap'n," began Tim, acting as spokesman, "Red and me got a furlough from the old man, and we—we—"

"We're gonna spend it kikin' around the mountains," Red struck in hurriedly.

John looked at the two of them. He was not deceived by their words.

"Boys," he said, "it's fine of you to want to go along with me, but I can't let you."

"But you can't stop us," O'Rourke blurted, whereupon Red caught him by the arm.

"Now wait a minute, Tim—wait a minute. Obey Cap'n Delmont's orders. Ef he wants to go alone, that's his privilege."

"But," the carrot-headed trooper went on significantly, "any time he feels like company, all he'll have ter do is whistle, an' we'll be right behind him."

John heaved a sigh that seemed to spell defeat. He could see quite plainly that no amount of argument on his part would prevent these faithful comrades from following him.

"All right, boys," he said in a resigned tone, "you win."

Thus Captain Delmont set out upon his journey with the companionship of two cheerful worthies to help him on his way, and in the days that followed they might have been seen riding in a south-westerly direction over the prairie flats, with the bitter winds of early winter playing against their faces.

It was fair enough going so long as they were on the plains. The real test came when they reached the mountain country, where the passes were blocked by snow-drifts, and where they were compelled to take the edge of ice-bound precipices that threatened doom to men and beasts if a false step were made.

From snatches of conversation that Harris and Benton had let fall at the fort during the month of September, John had some idea of the trail that they had intended to follow, and from his experiences on that journey he was prepared to admit that it was a trail superior to the Union Pass route in many respects.

He could see quite well that in the summer months it would present very much fewer difficulties than those to be encountered farther north.

Yet with the mountains in the grip of winter it was a death-trap, a trail of a thousand perils, where a man might meet his end in the teeth of fierce blizzards, or under the impact of crushing avalanches, or at the foot of some abyss into which a fatal slip had plunged him.

For weeks John Delmont and his two comrades matched their strength and their endurance against raw nature in those pitiless mountain realms, braving the fury of the elements, surviving the manifold dangers that beset them, pressing onward between late dawn and early dusk, camping at nights in such sheltered places as they could find.

Many times they lost their way, and then days would be spent in wandering around, till John could pick up some landmark which he remembered from Benton's description of the south trail.

But at last they came into a country of rock-strewn foothills, and forty-eight hours later they reached Soda Springs.

It was a locality that had undergone a complete change of aspect since the day when Colonel Delmont and his troop had been abandoned there. No longer was the barren ground visible, but was hidden by a mantle of snow several feet in depth, the very boulders being submerged in the drifts.

Bleak was the scene, and John and his companions might well have passed on if Red Conway had not suddenly perceived a tent-pole protruding from the thick, icy carpet that had buried the earth.

In another thirty seconds captain and troopers were digging out that tent whose pole had been discerned, and under the stiff canvas they found the poor remains of two men who had belonged to Colonel Delmont's ill-fated expedition, two men whose tragic appearance told of death by cold and starvation.

Later still, beneath a tent not far away, the searchers discovered the frozen and lifeless body of the colonel himself, and out of respect for their young officer's feelings Red and Tim went back to the horses, leaving the captain alone with his grief.

An hour afterwards John Delmont joined them. There was anguish in his looks, but somewhere in his eyes there was a strange and awful glint that seemed to speak of an emotion darker and more violent than sorrow.

He was holding in his hands a small notebook, which Red and Tim presently realised to be his father's diary.

"They were jumped by renegades," John said in a low, tense voice. "Lost their winter's rations—lost everything. And Harris was seen riding away with one of the desperadoes after the attack."

"Harris!" breathed Red Conway. "The dirty coyote! What else does the diary say, cap'n?"

"There's just one more entry," was the answer. "'I am sending Benton back for help.'"

Red and Tim exchanged glances.

"Benton never reached the fort," Tim muttered. "The point is, did he try?"

"I—don't—know." John uttered the words heavily.

"Anything may have happened to him. But if he didn't try to make Laramie, he must have known that dad and his troop would get snowed in here, and would freeze and starve to death."

There was a long silence, which Tim was the first to break.

"What's our next move, cap'n?" he asked gently.

"It's no use going back the way we came," John said. "We'll cut across to the Union Pass trail, and see if we can pick up news of Benton."

Towards California

FIVE days later John and his comrades reached the Union Pass trail, and after a tough journey of many hours through the narrow gulches of an outcrop of the Rocky Mountain chain they came in sight of a broad, sheltered valley.

In that valley they beheld a big corral of wagons, and ere they approached much nearer they realised that they were bearing down on Ridgley's column of immigrants, who must have wintered in this particular locality.

In another few minutes John and his two followers were presenting themselves to the leader of the train and his daughters, Ann and Sis, and it was a meeting that afforded pleasure to all concerned.

"Well, well," old man Ridgley declared, as he wrung John by the hand, "of all people I never expected to see you here."

"How've you been getting along, Mr. Ridgley?" the young officer asked him.

"Pretty fair," was the reply. "But we're sure gettin' impatient over the delay. We're waitin' for the winter snows to melt on Union Pass."

"We've come from the pass," Red Conway put in. "Snow's lub-deep there, Mister Ridgley. You could never make it with yer outfit."

The elderly pioneer looked solemn at this.

"That's bad news," he muttered, "bad news. We can't stay here much longer—we've jist gotta push on and strike country where there's game. Our grub's runnin' pretty low, you see."

A silence ensued, a silence during which John Delmont fell to thinking. Supposing he offered to seek out Benton's route to Oregon via California and lead the wagon-train onward! He would be doing Ridgley and his immigrants a service, and at the same time he might run across the man for whom he was looking. After all, he could not be sure that Benton had struck across to the Union Pass route.

"Mr. Ridgley," he said suddenly, "I don't suppose you've met up with a long, raw-boned fellow between Laramie and this valley, have you? Benton was his name, and he was a scout."

Ridgley answered that he and his party had encountered no strangers of any description, either white men or red.

"All right, then," John announced, "I'll tell you something. There's supposed to be a trail to the south, which, taking it from start to finish, is a heap easier than the Union Pass road. We've traced it as far as a place called Soda Springs, and from there I've only got the haziest notion of it. But my friends and I would be glad to push ahead of you and seek it out, sending up smoke signals from time to time to guide you."

Ridgley appeared interested, and John went on to tell him of his own movements during the past few weeks. When he had finished his story the older man fingered his chin thoughtfully.

"But to get back to Soda Springs we'd still have to make our way through Union Pass, wouldn't we?" he murmured. "That's how you came here at last."

"Yes," John acknowledged. "That was our quickest route. I think, however, that there's another course we could have taken—a little longer, but more suitable for wagons. We'll start looking for it as soon as we've had a meal, if you like."

Locked in mortal combat, the three of them fought like furies, Benton inspired by a dread of the gallows.

He and Red and Tim had provisions of their own, and were prepared to fend for themselves. But Ridgley insisted that they should enjoy a repast cooked by womanly hands, of which there was no lack in his train of pioneers, so that a short time afterwards the three soldiers were sitting down to a feast near one of the wagons.

It was about eleven in the morning when the captain and his two subordinates set forth in quest of a route that would take the wagon-train safely through the mountains, and during the days that followed they devoted themselves to this task steadfastly, with a fervour that was inspired by the knowledge that the column's food supply was running fairly short.

Often they were balked, fetching up into blind canyons or gullies which the snow rendered impassable for heavy vehicles such as prairie schooners. But perseverance was rewarded, and day by day they struggled onward through the lonesome fastnesses, frequently lighting fires with damp timber that sent clouds of smoke into the heavens and beckoned the Ridgley column.

They were usually a good many miles in advance of the immigrants, and always waited until they had made fair headway before kindling their signal-beacons. By means of these signals the wagon-train was able to keep track of the three soldiers, and at last Soda Springs was reached.

The worst of the journey was over, yet there was a long road ahead, and one that had to be scouted from sunrise to sunset. But John and his comrades did their work well, and with the warmth of a new season melting the snows and brightening the vast landscapes of the West the travellers found themselves nearing the Californian border.

They were by this time in a country that abounded with game, and all anxiety over the question of supplies had long since vanished. Meanwhile, John, Tim, and Red were still riding in advance of the column during the day time and reconnoitring the ground, waiting for their friends to come up with them whenever the dusk began to fall, camping with them for the night and then pressing forward again the first thing in the morning.

For his own part John experienced a keen satisfaction that mounted as the days wore on. He was not only helping the Ridgley wagon-train, he was blazing a trail that would prove a boon and a blessing to any other immigrants who came after them. And as for the hostile tribes of Redskins to whom Benton had referred, not a single brave had crossed the column's path.

From the satisfaction that John Delmont so obviously betrayed it might have been imagined that he had forgotten his father's killers. But Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke knew that this was not so.

There were times when they noticed a far-away look in his grey eyes, and they were well aware that he had merely shelved his personal feelings. He had hoped that he might come across some trace of Harris and his gang on this route to California, and if this hope did not look like being fulfilled he still cherished the expectation that some day he would get wind of them and strike.

Then one day there occurred an incident that brought his father's death sharply to the forefront of his mind.

He was some miles ahead of the Ridgley wagon-train with Red and Tim, and they had come upon a shallow reach of the lazy Humboldt River, beyond which lay the territory of California, then in Mexican hands.

"Ridgley and his people can cross over here," John said, "and for you and me, boys, I guess it's the end of the trail. We can at least congratulate ourselves on having traced and mapped out a new route to Oregon, which my dad would have done before us if he hadn't been—"

He did not finish the sentence, and there was a long silence. Then Red spoke up.

"Better fix a smoke-signal to guide the column here, hadn't we, cap'n?" he suggested. "How about buildin' a fire on that bluff a little way downstream?"

John nodded, and the three of them rode towards the cliff that Red had indicated. Here they gathered some brushwood and lit a beacon, knowing that the clouds of vapour from it would soon be seen from afar by Ridgley and his band of hardy pioneers.

It was not only the immigrants who descried the dark clouds that rose from that beacon, however. For the smoke was seen by two horsemen who were much nearer at hand, two men who were passing through a tract of chaparral a short distance to the north, two men who were none other than Tom Richards and Lafe Benton.

"Hey, look!" jerked Benton, pointing out the smoke of the beacon and watching it with the practised eye of a scout. "A signal, and no Injun signal at that. Them clouds is risin' straight and clear. The Injuns blanket 'em, and make 'em talk, as yuh might say."

Richards gave him a sharp glance. "You don't suppose it might be the cavalry on our trail?" he queried uneasily.

For answer Benton motioned to him to dismount, swinging himself to the ground as he did so, and soon the pair of them had tethered their horses and were sneaking in the direction of the bluff.

They climbed a rock-strewn slope to the plateau above, and from the shelter of a cluster of boulders they saw the burning beacon and the figures of John, Tim and Red, who were in the saddles of their ponies and had taken up a position on the very edge of the cliff where it beetled over the quiet, flowing river.

"They ain't cavalrymen, anyways," whispered Tom Richards, noting the civilian attire that the three riders were wearing.

"That's where you're wrong," hissed Benton, drawing his revolver. "That young feller in the middle is Colonel Delmont's son. Come on, let 'em have it!"

The words were punctuated by the hollow of his gun, and a shot whipped John Delmont's Stetson from his head. Next second Tom Richard's iron was belching flame, and the report of it was accompanied almost immediately by another blast from the weapon in Benton's fist.

The sudden volley of leaden slugs had taken the three soldiers by surprise, and though the hurried aim of the would-be assassins left them unscathed, they would certainly have met their doom by a second fusillade but for John's presence of mind.

He had the wit to throw himself from his horse, at the same time clutching Tim and Red to drag them with him, and in headlong fashion the three of them plunged down to the river below, striking the water with a great splash.

They rose to the surface again, Red and Tim spluttering and looking at John in bewilderment as he dragged them out of sight beneath the overhanging bluff.

There he told them to keep quiet, and they waited, up to their necks in water. Meanwhile, Benton and Richards were crossing the plateau above, but they had been a little way off when they had opened fire, and a quarter of a minute must have elapsed before they reached the edge of the cliff.

The rogues looked down to see the hats of their supposed victims floating on the surface of the river. Of the men who had worn those hats there was not a sign, and little dreaming that every word he uttered was heard by John and the two troopers, Tom Richards vouchsafed a gruff comment.

"We got 'em all right, Benton," he said. "Let's pick up their horses and pull outa here."

Benton nodded, and the pair of them secured the mounts from which John Delmont and his comrades had fallen. Then they made their way back to the chaparral where they had left their own ponies, and not long afterwards they crossed the Humboldt River via the ford farther upstream.

John, Red and Tim had worked round to a shelving strip of sand and were lying amongst a belt of tall reeds by then. From this vantage point they watched Benton and Richards gain the Californian bank and ride off at smart pace.

"If only we could give 'em a taste o' lead!" groaned Tim. "But after that duckin' we took our shootin' irons are about as deadly as three water-pistols."

"Yeah, an' what's more we can't foller them skunks," Red bit out, "sein' as how they've swiped our hosses."

John said nothing. He at least knew that Benton was a traitor now—aye, and knew that he must look for the man in Mexican territory. And following the departing gangsters with his eyes, he reflected that he and Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke would be passing into California with the Ridgley wagon-train after all.

Away on the other side of the river Benton and Richards were heading for a range of hills that were visible in the distance, and about an hour and a half later they could have been seen approaching the mouth of a narrow, boxed-in canyon.

The mouth of that ravine was guarded by a massive stockade of tree-logs that had been hewn down and planed. There was a big gate in the stockade, which was opened by a couple of sentinels and then promptly closed again as Benton and his accomplice rode through.

Within the stockade was a group of crude dwellings, nesting under the right-hand wall of the canyon, and standing prominently upon a terrace half-way up the rocky ascent was the field-gun that had belonged to Colonel Delmont's command.

In front of the cabins below the piece of artillery a crowd of men were assembled, many of them clad in military uniforms, and amongst them were Clem Harris and Markey, who were sharing out the spoils of a recent raid, but who postponed this task as Lafe Benton and Tom Richards showed up.

"Hallo, fellers," said Harris, "where'd you get those spare mustangs?"

Benton proceeded to explain, and when he had finished his narrative there was a silence. Then Richards spoke.

"We bumped off young Delmont an' the guys that was with him, boss," he growled. "But do you suppose they were signallin' to a bunch of cavalry from that bluff?"

"What if they were?" Harris retorted suddenly. "The U.S. authorities can't touch us in Mexican territory. They daren't violate international laws by sendin' troops across the line."

This seemed to satisfy those of his men who had shown signs of disquiet, and Harris went on in a confident tone.

"We've got no cause to worry, boys," he announced. "We're sittin' pretty. What did I tell you when I first put up this proposition? Was I right, or wasn't I?"

"You were doggone right, boss," Markey struck in. "The loot we've already grabbed is proof o' that. Half a dozen big haciendas frisked of money, jewels and plate, and hardly a man among us that's lost a drop o' blood doin' it."

"Yeah, an' the Dons think the U.S. cavalry are responsible," laughed Harris, looking round at the blue tunics which a considerable number of his followers were wearing. "Boys, I reckon it was a great idea to rig you out in them spare uniforms we found in Colonel Delmont's wagons."

The Vigilantes

THE Ridgley wagon-train had reached the Humboldt, and after learning of the attempted assassination of John and his two comrades, Ann's father had elected to lead his column across the river and camp for the night in Californian territory.

The following morning, an hour or two after sunrise, the aroma of cooking was rising into the air from the bivouac fires of the immigrants, and it was as breakfast was being eaten that a party of horsemen have into sight.

They were Spaniards, and as John and Ridgley and several other men of the column moved out of the encampment to accost them the riders drew their ponies to a standstill.

"No nearer, Gringo Americans!" one of them called in broken English, flourishing a pistol as he spoke. "No nearer, or we shoot."

John and his companions halted in an uncertain fashion, and after a brief silence the tall cavalry officer called out inquiringly:

"What's the meaning of this, senor?" he demanded. "Who may you be?"

"I am Pedro Forrenza, leader of Californian vigilantes," was the curt reply. "We learned that a wagon-train of Americans had pitched camp here, and we are warning you to turn back to your own country, or there will be trouble."

"But we come in peace," John protested, whereupon Pedro Forrenza uttered a word in his own tongue that sounded very much like an oath.

"Peace!" he scoffed. "There is no peace from Americans! Not when they come here to rob us and to kill us! Not when they send soldiers to plunder us and slay us!"

John Delmont looked at him in amazement, unable to believe his ears.

"Soldiers?" he exclaimed. "My Government has sent no soldiers to California."

There ensued a lengthy argument, which was conducted with considerable heat by the leader of the Spaniards, a black-haired, swarthy little man of fierce manners. But at length John prevailed upon him to take him to the nearest town, where, according to Forrenza, the commandant of the district was in residence—one Don Miguel de Cordoba.

train at the camp, John borrowed a couple of saddle-horses from one of the immigrants and departed with the Californians, determined to get at the root of their hostility towards the American nation.

Half an hour later he was still little the wiser, for to all his questions Pedro Forrenza remarked that he would hear the full facts from the lips of Don Miguel himself. But suddenly, as they were approaching a range of low foothills, another band of horsemen debouched unexpectedly from a wooded valley ahead.

They were tricked out in the uniform of U.S. cavalrymen, and for the instant John was taken aback. Then all at once he recognised the figure of Benton riding a short distance in advance of them, and in that same moment there was an outburst of gunfire from the Spaniards and the bogus troopers alike.

The encounter had taken both parties by surprise, and in that respect therefore the advantage lay with neither. But Benton's men were superior in numbers, and, seeing this, John Delmont quickly took command of the situation.

There was an arroyo nearby, a dry river-bed that afforded cover, and with a shrewdness to which he owed his military training the captain realised that from this vantage-point the Spaniards could fight their foes on more level terms.

Yelling to Forrenza and his partisans to follow him, he charged down into the arroyo with Red Conway close behind him, and some quality in his voice must have moved the Dons to imitate the example shown them, for they came streaming after the young captain and his subordinate like so many sheep.

Then, in blind response to the Yankee officer's instructions, they flung themselves from their mounts and lined the bank of dry river-bed, opening up a hot fire upon the advancing desperadoes.

The combat was short and sharp, for, exposed to an enfilade that they could not return with any serious effect, Benton and his disguised bandits were speedily thrown into confusion, and scarce sixty seconds elapsed before they were turning tail and galloping off in the direction whence they had come, several of them swaying uncertainly in the saddle.

From the rim of the arroyo John watched their flight, and was gazing after them when he became aware of Pedro Forrenza plucking at his sleeve.

The man's dark eyes were alight with enthusiasm. The antagonism and suspicion with which he had formerly regarded the American cavalry officer were no longer apparent in his manner.

"Senor, this is the first time we have routed those villains," Forrenza cried, "and it is to you that we are indebted for that. You have helped us against your own people—"

"My own people?" John interrupted grimly. "I don't look on those scum as my fellow-countrymen, Forrenza. I think I understand the whole position now, and I'll be mighty glad to have a little talk with your commandant, for I believe I can convince him that you Californians have been under a misapprehension."

He turned and stared in the direction of Benton and his accomplices again. These were now disappearing into the wooded valley at full gallop, and indeed they did not slacken their pace until they were far into the hills and bearing down on the stronghold which they and the rest of the Harris gang had made for themselves.

Once inside the stockade Benton lost no time in reporting to his chief, and Harris heard him out in a truculent silence.

"So you didn't get Delmont on that bluff, after all, eh?" he muttered, when the scout had finished. "And now he's in tow with the Californians."

He turned to Richards, who was standing close by, and he spoke to him sharply.

"Tom," he said. "I don't like the looks o' this. You've played spy for us afore, so rig yourself out as a greaser and hit the breeze for town. See what you can find out."

A few minutes afterwards, attired in Mexican clothes that had been filched from some hacienda, Tom Richards dashed out of the fort on horseback and spurred through the hills until he picked up a trail that led to a small Spanish township known as San Fernando.

Arrived there, he made straight for the house of the commandant, outside which a group of horses stood tethered, and on mingling with a crowd of inquisitive bystanders who were gathered around the open doorway of the dwelling he was able to see what was going on within.

John Delmont and Red Conway were face to face with the commandant Don Miguel, Forrenza's vigilantes being assembled around them, and Don Miguel was talking in an impassioned tone.

"Senor," he was saying to John, "we Californians have been neglected by the Mexican Government. They seem to have too many affairs on their hands to answer our pleas and send troops to us. That is why we have been compelled to arm ourselves and form a band of vigi-lantes, some of whom you see here—and I tell you now that we shall fight to the death against these gringo marauders."

"And I am willing to help you, Don Miguel," John Delmont announced, "if in return you will permit my friends to travel through California to Oregon in peace."

"What!" the Don exclaimed. "You, who claim to be an officer of the United States cavalry—you would aid us against your own soldiers?"

"They're not soldiers," John told him. "They're renegades in stolen uniforms. Listen, Don Miguel, I'm as anxious to wipe them out as you are, and I can guarantee that every man of the Ridgley wagon-train will ride against them if you will join forces with us."

Forrenza stepped forward at that, and addressed the commandant respectfully.

"I think this man is a friend, senior," he declared, indicating the young American. "Have I not said that he enabled us to put some of our foes to flight a little while ago?"

This statement seemed to decide Don Miguel, and, turning, he informed John that he was willing to combine with the immigrants in an effort to crush the Harris gang.

"We shall send out word that every vigilante is to report here immediately," he added, "and, when your friends have joined us, we shall attack in full force."

"Then you know where those marauders are to be located?" John asked.

"Yes," came the response. "Their lair is in the hills. We have attempted an onset before, but were driven off. You see, Senior Capitan, they are strong in numbers and have a strong position. Moreover, they possess an artillery piece, which played great havoc amongst us."

John swung round upon Red Conway. "Go back to the wagon-train and round up every man there," he ordered. "And tell 'em I said to come a-running."

Red hurriedly took his leave, and thirty seconds later he was riding out of San Fernando with the wind whipping against his lean, leathery face. At a speed which taxed his pony to the utmost he clattered over the trail that led to the Humboldt River, and was completely unaware, as he galloped along the ribbon of road, that a lone horseman was following him at an equally rapid pace.

The lone horseman was Tom Richards, and, once out of sight and sound of the town, the gangster drew rein and plucked a rifle from a gun-bucket that hung against his mustang's flank.

Taking careful aim, he tensed himself for the kick of the weapon and pulled the trigger. There was a spurt of fire and a racking blast, and a split second afterwards he saw his victim throw up his hands and dive from the saddle.

Richards thrust his rifle back into its sheath and swung aside from the trail to spur direct towards the hills, vanishing presently over a low ridge matted with scrub.

If he had been less anxious to report back to Harris, however, and had delayed long enough to ride a few hundred yards down the trail and examine Red Conway, he would have discovered that his marksmanship had not been so effective as he had imagined. For although there was blood on Red's scalp, the bullet from Richards' gun had merely creased him, and in five minutes the tough soldier was on his feet again.

His horse was chewing mesquite nearby, and, staggering across to the animal, Red pulled himself on to its back and rode forward once more, looking pretty sorry for himself, but none the less determined to carry out the "Cap'n's" instructions.

Mass Attack

GAINING the improvised fort where Harris and the gang were installed, Tom Richards fidgeted impatiently while the big gate was unfastened by the men who were standing sentry behind it. Then he passed through and brought his horse to a standstill in front of his commandant, who was awaiting him with a look of expectation on his heavy countenance.

"Well, what did you find out?" Harris wanted to know.

"Young Delmont is in San Fernando," Richards answered, "and he's gonna move against us with the Californias. He ain't got no cavalry with him, but he sent a messenger to round up a bunch of Yankee immigrants camped on the Humboldt River. I stopped that messenger."

The gang-leader's eyes had narrowed while he had been listening.

"Good work, Tom," he said. "But we've gotta get rid of Delmont, too. I reckon we're entitled to feel pretty sure of ourselves—only, I'd like it better if I knew a trained soldier wasn't leadin' the attack. Listen, Tom, wassupin' you go right back an' tell the captain that the man you shot is up here—hurt."

He went on to explain a plan that had occurred to him, and, when the scheme had been outlined, Richards glanced at him dubiously.

"D'you think Delmont will fall for it?" he grunted.

"It's worth tryin'," Harris rejoined. Half an hour later Tom Richards was in San Fernando again, and this time he hastened to Don Miguel's quarters like one who had important tidings to divulge, thrusting his way into the commandant's presence and confronting John Delmont.

"Senior, your messenger to the wagon-train—he get hurt!"

Richards spoke in an assumed accent that was a perfect imitation of a Spaniard's whose knowledge of English was uncertain.

"Red—hurt?" John exclaimed.

"Where is he?"

"Yankee scum, they take him to their fort. You come alone, I show you the way."

"Alone? Why do you want me to come alone?"

Richards leaned forward and spoke in an earnest tone.

"Because they hold your friend hostage, and if you make onset they keel him," he said. "But I know a secret way into their stronghold which one man might use. Mebbe you reach your friend and smuggle him out—then come back and raise forces to attack. Si?"

John had not recognised Richards as the man who had been concerned with Benton in the attempted assassination on the bluff. Yet there was something about the fellow's eager friendliness that struck him as false, and after a moment the captain drew aside with Forrenza and Don Miguel.

"This may be a trap," he murmured. "As soon as all your men are mustered here, come after me. And in case anything has really happened to my friend, send another messenger to the Ridgley wagon-train and tell the immigrants to join you before the fort. The man you send can act as their guide."

Forrenza and Don Miguel assuring him that his instructions would be obeyed to the letter, John consented to accompany Richards from San Fernando, and could not help noticing the glint of anticipation in the counterfeit Spaniard's eyes as he mounted his horse outside the commandant's house.

About that same time, if John had only known it, preparations for a murderous attempt on his life were afoot at Harris' stronghold, the gang-leader consulting with Markey over that momentous question.

It was finally arranged that Benton and one or two other sharpshooters should post themselves at the stockade and await the coming of Richards and the captain, drilling the latter on sight.

"Tom will bring Delmont round into the mouth of the canyon sudden-like," Harris explained to the marksmen. "The way I fixed things, they'll come into view by those rocks out there. The minute they do, give it to young Delmont—afore he has time to realise that he's right in front of the fort, see?"

There was a chorus of assent, and then Harris spoke again.

"Remember, Tom is in Mexican clothes," he said. "Don't get the wrong man."

"No fear o' that," laughed Benton, and he and his accomplices went to their places at the stockade.

They were still on the watch there when, three-quarters of an hour after receiving their instructions, they saw a couple of horsemen come trotting round the cluster of rocks that Harris had pointed out.

They were Tom Richards and John, and the instant he beheld them Life Benton gave vent to a terse exclamation.

"The one in buckskin!" he rapped out, and hard on the words his rifle belched death.

Three more shots rang out as his comrades in crime drew trigger, and each one of those shots sealed a man's doom. For, while the horseman in the attire of a Spanish-Californian turned back into the shelter of the boulders, the rider in buckskin rose high in his stirrups and then pitched lifelessly to the dust with two bullets in his heart and two more in his brain.

But the man who had fallen was not John Delmont. He was Tom Richards, who had been held up by John and forced to change clothes with him before they had left San Fernando a mile behind them!

And now John Delmont was safely under cover of the rocks, thanking his lucky stars that he had hit upon so happy an inspiration, or his worst fears would have been realised and himself laid low in a gory, stricken heap.

From the rocks he peered cautiously forth and took quick stock of the Harris stronghold, and as he did so he saw clearly that, although it looked well-nigh impregnable, a man with the necessary courage and sureness of foot might work his way up and round to one or the other of the canyon's rims.

And then, with the same skill and nerve, he might descend the steep, craggy slopes until he was on the very bed of the ravine.

Thus reflecting, the young cavalry officer wheeled round, and in the very instant that he turned he saw a cloud of horsemen sweeping across the plain behind him.

They were the vigilantes and the pioneers of the wagon train, bearing down on the locality sooner than he had expected, and at the head of them he descried the figures of Ridley, Forrenza, Tim O'Rourke and Red Conway, the last with his brow swathed in bandages.

John pulled up sharply at sight of them, and once again his attention veered to the fort. A moment later he was dismounting from his horse, and, stripping off the Mexican jacket he was wearing, he donned a sparo buckskin tunic that was packed behind his saddle.

This he did for fear his own friends

The RETURN OF JIMMY VALENTINE

Big-Money Contest

"Aw, say," protested Pinky McGinnis, squatted among the wastepaper-baskets, "what's the big idea? Didn't you say, Gary, that you were going to train me for a newspaper reporter?"

Gary Howard, star reporter of "The Record," leaned back in his chair and fitted another paper-clip to his catapult. Again, after taking careful aim, he let fly at the hat on his pal's head—ping! "Got it!" announced Gary.

He adjusted his shirt-sleeves and set his own slouch hat at a more jaunty angle. But there was no one to applaud. His colleagues in the reporters'-room were rapping out their stuff on the office typewriters at machine-gun speed. Only Gary and his chum, Mac, who had recently joined the staff, were relaxing.

"Well, I'll allow you were on the target that time," grunted Mac, examining his headgear. "Reckon you're William Tell, maybe. Training me to be your sidekicker—the sap who stands by with the apples on his dome? Now listen! I joined this rag because you promised to learn me the newspaper business."

Gary nodded. "Sure! Take it easy," he said. "I'll make a reporter out of you, Mac. You'll come around with me, and if you make good, maybe I'll get the chief to promote you to the Society column."

A grin spread over Mac's broad face. "Society column?" he echoed. "Gee! D'you mean I'll be able to meet all the class dames in Chicago? Sure, I'll buy me a new suit." "Don't rush to it, buddy," Gary advised. "There's another job you've got to help on first. When I got you on to the pay-roll of this news-sheet it was because you told me that you used to hang around with Tony Scapelli's gang. Scapelli's the worst crime boss around town, and the cops can't get a line on him. Now we've got to get the low-down on Tony Scapelli."

Mac pulled a wry face. "Forget this guy, Gary," he pleaded. "The only thing you and me are likely to get on that game is a couple of lead slugs and a slap-up funeral apiece. I don't want to see none of those gangsters again. Now maybe, if you turned me loose among those Society dames—"

"Hey, Gary!" A brusque voice rose above the clatter of typewriters, and caused the conversation to come to an abrupt end. "The Record's" advertising manager, Johnson, was beckoning from the door of the chief editor's office.

Gary rose and winked at his pal. "Maybe the chief wants to give me a raise," he remarked.

Kelly, the editor of "The Record," sat at a broad desk of the inner office. Duplicate telephones were near at hand, and a disorder of papers was spread over the desk. His expression and attitude did not suggest that he had sent for his subordinate to break any joyful news. Kelly, in fact, was running his fingers through his silver grey hair and gnawing savagely at his unlighted cheroot. On Gary's entrance he looked up with a frown from an account-book which displayed the recent circulation figures.

"Huh!" he grunted. "That was a swell yarn you put over on yesterday's murder."

He spoke grudgingly, but Gary cheered up at once. Unlike some of his seniors on the staff, he was a born optimist.

"Well, I guess it was a pretty swell kind of crime, chief," he returned. "Do I get a bonus?"

In the brief pause the air of the inner office seemed to chill off several degrees.

"Bonus?" echoed Kelly. "You can think yourself darn lucky if you don't get your pay cut in half."

Gary seated himself on the edge of the desk. He looked from the editor to the advertising manager. Each wore a frozen expression, and Gary realised that his remark about the bonus had been particularly ill-timed.

"What's biting you, chief?" he inquired. "Have we gone bankrupt?"

It was the advertising man, Johnson, who responded.

"Not yet," he said, "but we will if the landslide doesn't stop. We've just dropped another thirty thousand dollar advertising account."

Gary whistled. "That's tough!" he muttered. "I heard one of the guys in the reporters'-room saying that the advertising accounts had been falling off. Which has gone this time?"

"The Dentone Tooth-paste ads," grunted Johnson. "That firm is using all their spare cash for advertising on the radio. They're hitching up their puffs with the Jimmy Valentine crime playlets they're plugging over the air."

Gary helped himself to a number of the chief's paper-clips. They would come in handy as ammunition for his catapult.

"Can't say I blame the Dentone people," he commented. "You've got to remember that Jimmy Valentine is a real man, though he's kind of faded out of any unlawful rackets. Gosh, what a fellow he was in the old days! He was the smartest safe-cracker in the country—and there was the old Robin Hood touch about him, too. He never used a gun, nor even would sliam a cop. They say he was sure a great-hearted guy who was ever ready to pass over some of the booty to any under-dog in need."

Johnson: grunted impatiently.

"Those radio folks know how to trade on Jimmy Valentine's reputation, anyhow," he admitted. "They've been writing up some of his life story in the form of plays and broadcasting 'em all over the States."

"And how!" enthused Gary. "When ever the Jimmy Valentine stuff is on the air, I switch on to listen-in. I don't wonder the Dentone people prefer to link their ads with that dope, rather than dish out their dough for the cut-and-dried ads tuckered away on the inside pages of this news-sheet."

The editor, who had been tapping his teeth with a blue pencil, sat up stiffly.

"Something's got to be done," he announced. "We've got to find some kind of link to induce the Dentone people to buy space again in 'The Record,' but we can't do the kind of stuff they can over the radio. We don't want any story like 'Who Put the Poison in the Tooth-paste?' to try and attract 'em. Now you're a smart guy, Gary—sometimes. Maybe I could put you in the way of earning a bonus."

"Aah! How come, chief?"

"We want an idea," Kelly replied. "We're groping around for a good stunt to get back that Dentone account and some of the other advertisers who've quit 'The Record' lately. Johnson and I don't seem to catch on to anything at the moment. What's your suggestion?"

A far-away, thoughtful look came into Gary's eyes. Mechanically his hand wandered to his pocket, and he took out his catapult and slowly fitted a paper-clip in the elastic. He began to focus on the chief's hat hanging on the peg, but remembered himself in time and hastily restored the weapon.

"How d'you like this for a stunt?" he exclaimed suddenly. "Let's handle Jimmy Valentine ourselves. Start a campaign. Where is the real Jimmy Valentine? Announce that 'The Record' offers five thousand bucks to the man, woman, or child who finds Jimmy Valentine and reports here at the office."

The editor flung his unlighted cheroot in the wastepaper-basket, and the advertising manager sniffed loudly.

"What a brain!" Johnson said sarcastically. "Just another newspaper contest—and we thought you were bright!"

"Wait a minute," interposed Gary. "These radio people are just putting over playlets about Jimmy Valentine, which are fiction written up for the studio. Now supposing, for the sake of the reward, some guy actually lights on the ex-crackman himself? Why, we could sign up Valentine for a series of feature articles, and could sell some of the stuff to the radio people at our own price. You bet, too, that the Dentone representative would come rushing around to buy advertising space in the paper next to our revelations of the famous crackman's private life, revealed for the first time. Why, it would be the biggest scoop since Perry climbed the North Pole!"

"Humph! There may be something in it, after all," muttered Kelly. "Five thousand dollars should prove a good inducement for folks to keep their eyes open for Valentine."

June 27th, 1936.

"So I should say," smiled Gary. "Why, for five thousand bucks I'd go out and find Santa Claus himself, and round-up all his reindeer, too!"

For the first time a twinkle came into Kelly's eyes.

"Right!" he said. "Never mind trying to trace Tony Scapelli, like you've been doing lately. We'll put over this competition, and it's more important for us to get this stuff about Jimmy Valentine. You and Mac can get outside for twelve days—that's the limit—and you can find Valentine and let us have any stories about him you can rake out in the meantime. If you succeed, Gary, there'll be a thousand-dollar bonus for you."

While the editor and advertising manager discussed the details of the forthcoming contest, Gary left the inner office and returned to the reporters' room.

"Hey, Mac," he said, thumping Pinky McGinnis on the back, "we've got a new stunt on. Do you happen to have a picture of Valentine?"

Mac scratched his head. "Why, sure," he said. "There's one along at my digs in Twenty-seventh Street. He's an old fellow with a pointed beard, and he's got a kind of bright, golden ring around the top of his head."

"You dumb-bell!" grinned Gary. "That's St. Valentine. I'm not talking about the picture on your calendar at home. I want to get a photo of Jimmy Valentine, the crackman who used to open bank safes like they were sardine-boxes. Let's turn up the files. The accounts about him must have been in the papers just before the War."

A search through the old newspaper files soon revealed an account of a robbery at the First National Bank. It further stated in print that the police were looking for Jimmy Valentine, Augie Miller, and other crooks.

"Augie Miller?" exclaimed Mac.

"Yeah, he was a pal of Jimmy's."

"Did you know him, Mac?"

"Sure," nodded Mac. "Him and me were taken prisoners together during the War."

"Didn't know that," remarked Gary with interest. "Where were you both taken?"

"To Sing Sing Prison," returned Mac.

Gary thumped him playfully over the head.

"Cut out that kind of crack," he warned. "Augie Miller used to be a pal of Jimmy Valentine's. Maybe we could get a line on Valentine himself through him. Do you happen to know where Miller can be found?"

"He's got a pool saloon down-town," Mac replied. "But see here, Gary, I don't want to go getting mixed up with any of these old-time pals."

"We're going to see Augie Miller," decided Gary. "Let's go!"

The Trail to Riverside

GARY HOWARD, accompanied by Pinky McGinnis, set forth on his quest in high heart. He, the star reporter of "The Record," had many a time rooted out valuable information which had gained a scoop for his newspaper. His skill as a news-hound, however, was not shared by Mac, much though that ex-crook hoped to eliminate his feats one day. The main value of Mac to Gary was the former's knowledge of criminal rackets and criminals. For in crime lay some of the most dramatic news, from a newspaper's point of view.

Finding Augie Miller was easy, but getting him to talk was harder than cracking a bank safe. Crime was a chapter which had closed in Miller's life, and he was unwilling to turn back the pages.

There were no customers in the pool saloon at that hour, and Gary refused to be beaten. Finally, he extracted the reason why Miller preferred to remain dumb about Jimmy Valentine and the past. He had been a close friend of Caesar Scapelli, father of Tony Scapelli, the most feared gangster in the States.

"You'd better lay off this Jimmy Valentine," Miller warned, "or you may be bringing a nest o' hornets around your ears. I can't help you any. Old Caesar Scapelli was more mixed up with him than ever I was."

"I'll look up Caesar Scapelli," snapped Gary.

"Oh, yeah?" sneered Miller. "Well, you'd better take a shovel. He's six foot deep in the ground under a prison wall. He went to the 'hot seat.'"

"Electrocuted?"

Miller nodded.

"Before they switched on the current," he remarked, "this Caesar Scapelli claimed that Jimmy Valentine had framed him so that he took the rap in his stead."

"Aw, that was a lie!" exclaimed Mac. "No one will ever get me to believe that Jimmy Valentine double-crossed a pal."

"Believe it or not," retorted Miller, "but that's what Caesar Scapelli gave out. Anyway, Tony Scapelli believes it—believes that Jimmy Valentine sent his old man to the hot seat. So if I were you guys, I'd keep my nose out o' things. It wouldn't surprise me that Tony has got his gunmen out, helping in this search for Valentine—and all he wants out of it is revenge."

No nearer to finding the ex-crook than they were before, Gary and Mac entered the car and drove southward out of town. The needle of the speedometer flickered round the dial; the road seemed to slash under the wheels like a broad grey ribbon being unwound at terrific pace. The telegraph poles flickered back in pairs—and Pinky McGinnis screwed up his eyes.

"Why don't you go out to Salt Lake Flats to do this, bud?" he spluttered.

"You go off down there to Utah to break the world's record. I'll stay around Chicago and read about it in the newspapers."

"We're in a hurry, Mac," Gary announced rather needlessly. "An idea's hit me."

His pal clutched the side of the car.

"Oooh! That bunch of trees nearly hit the old flivver! Where are you heading for?"

"The state penitentiary."

"That so?" gasped Mac. "I thought you were heading for a cemetery."

"My idea is this," remarked Gary, swinging the car round a bend on two wheels. "That guy Jimmy Valentine served a sentence many years ago in the state prison. Now if we go to the pen we'll see Colonel Ed. Keeley, the warden, who looked after him. From the warden we might get a line of Valentine's whereabouts. Pity you didn't think of that when we left the office. We ought to have got to the pen sooner."

"Strikes me," groaned Mac, again watching the flying procession of telegraph posts, "that we're gettin' there soon all right!"

The grey walls and gaunt buildings of the state penitentiary loomed out of the plain ahead. At the main gates Gary showed his Press badge and asked to see Warden Keeley. He and Mac, however, had a long wait in an ante-room before they were ushered through the prison yard and various corridors to the warden's private office.

No one was better liked or more ro-spected in the state than Colonel Keeley. He was just, sincere, and capable, and had a vast experience of prison routine and of criminals themselves. Many a man who had been "sent down" for a stretch and believed that the whole world was against him, learned gradually to regain his self-respect through the warden's help and sympathy.

He liked Gary personally, but distrusted journalists generally. Always he was on his guard, and when Gary cleverly pumped him with the object of finding out if he still kept in touch with Jimmy Valentine, he quickly got on the defensive.

"See here, Gary," he said quietly, "I don't know whose bright brain thought of this stunt for 'The Record,' but you'll not get anything from me except this: It's twenty years since Jimmy Valentine served a term in the pen. Since those distant days, I've watched him fight his way back honestly to an honourable position in society. To-day he's the head of a happy family—a respected and prosperous man. You don't want to ruin him just for the sake of a cheap publicity stunt?"

Gary shrugged his shoulders.

"It sounds, warden," he remarked, "like you keep in pretty close touch with that old-timer."

The warden turned a disapproving eye on Mac, who was eating salted peanuts by the simple expedient of upturning a paper bag over his mouth.

"I'll admit, Gary," he said, "that I saw him a short while ago."

Gary looked shrewdly at him.

"Fine! How d'you find Baltimore otherwise?"

Colonel Keeley smiled.

"You don't trap me into talking," he said. "It wasn't in Baltimore where I saw him, and I'm not saying where it was either. I pride myself that I'm Valentine's friend. You news-hounds wouldn't understand that."

"Aw, don't think too bad of us, colonel," pleaded Gary. "My paper isn't out to do him any harm. We'll make him a rich man."

The warden rose, thus indicating that the interview was over.

"You can take it from me, Gary Howard," he stated, "that Valentine is comfortably off, and doesn't want to get richer by any yelping publicity stunt of your news-sheet. For his family's sake, he just wants to live a quiet life with the dead past buried for ever. Good-day!"

There was nothing to do but to make an exit with as good grace as possible. They had drawn a blank, except that the popular belief was confirmed that the notorious ex-crook was still alive.

A lady approached along the corridor, and Gary was about to step aside to make room for her to pass when his face lighted in a smile. He recognised her as the warden's wife.

"Mrs. Keeley!" he murmured. "This is an unexpected pleasure. You're looking splendid. Just shows what a little trip will do."

"Why," smiled Mrs. Keeley, "did the warden tell you we'd been away?"

"He mentioned that a short time ago he went to see an old friend of his. Chicago, wasn't it?"

"No," returned Mrs. Keeley; "it was to Riverside, Indiana."

Gary strove to hide the triumph he felt.

"That's a detail the warden forgot to mention," he purred. "Gosh, I'm sure glad to have met you!"

Within five minutes he was at the wheel of the car, with Mac at his side, roaring full out for the border between the States of Illinois and Indiana.

"We're getting warm, Mac," he whooped. "I'm almost certain that the warden has been keeping in touch with Jimmy Valentine around Riverside way. We'll put up at the Traymore Hotel, and set about unearthing that guy. Don't forget that old Kelly promised me a thousand bucks, and you're in on it."

None of the hustle of Chicago was reflected in the pleasant Indiana town thirty miles over the border. The pine-clad hills and clear-water rivers made peaceful surroundings for the large town, which numbered many retired people in the population.

To this pleasant spot came Gary Howard and his sidekicker, Pinky McGinnis, the dust of Chicago still on their clothes and their veins still throbbing with the vital hustle of that great city. To Gary's mind, Riverside was just a small town that could do with a kick out of its pleasant lethargy—and he, star reporter of "The Record," was the smart guy to give it that kick!

He and Mac booked their rooms at the Traymore and began investigations, but nothing transpired for a couple of days to give them any hope that they were getting "warmer" on their hunt.

But there was no doubt that the "Where is Jimmy Valentine?" contest had caught on. The radio had kept people everywhere reminded of the crook whose amazing safe-cracking exploits were still discussed with admiration, even by the best modern cracksmen. "The Record" reminded readers that the most ingenious combination locks in the land had not resisted Valentine's sensitive fingers.

The offered reward of 5,000 dollars set amateur sleuths everywhere making inquiries about the ex-crook who had disappeared from all his former haunts. Thousands of new readers bought the newspaper to get the particulars of the competition, and to keep informed of the latest developments in the country-wide hunt for Jimmy Valentine.

From Chicago Editor Kelly demanded copy from Gary to tickle the palate of his growing public. And Gary turned in peppy accounts of how he and Mac had visited the pen which long ago was Valentine's home, and had picked up clues that had set them racing over the Indiana border.

Other newspaper editors pricked their ears. "The Record's" contest had made Valentine front page news again. A mob of reporters descended on Riverside, booked at the Traymore, and tried hard to snatch news crumbs which fell from Gary's table.

"Huh!" he grunted. "That was a swell yarn you put over on yesterday's murder!"

Then, on the evening of the second day, while Gary and Mae were having a brush-up in their room before going down to dinner, the clerk 'phoned up to say that there were two lady visitors who "wished to see Mr. Howard."

"Two!" smirked Mac, patting down his quiff of hair. "I reckon I'd better stay right beside you."

"Please yourself," Gary smiled. "But don't take that bag of peanuts down with you."

A page-boy in the hotel foyer indicated the visitors, and both Gary and Mac felt a quickened interest. One was a fair girl of outstanding beauty, dressed becomingly in a smart pearl-grey costume and wearing a silver-fox fur round her slim shoulders. Her companion was dark, with frizzy hair and full red lips that mado Mac forget about the peanuts for which he was fumbling in his pocket.

"Good-evening!" Gary said. "You sent up a message for me?"

The fair girl looked appraisingly at him.

"So you're Mr. Gary Howard," she murmured; "The Record's" star reporter? My name is Madeline Davis—Midge to my friends. This is my friend, Kitty Dale. I've read you're searching Riverside for Jimmy Valentine."

"With a toothcomb," Gary smiled. "But this fellow Pinky McGinnis and I have got to snatch some cats and get back on the job. You won't mind me saying, Miss Davis, that time is valuable to us. Now how can I help you?"

"You see, Mr. Howard," the girl said, "we've called on behalf of the Riverside Orphans' Home."

Gary drew himself up.

"Sorry," he said firmly. "I'm not adopting any orphans to-day, thank you."

"Don't go, please! You see, Mr. Howard, we want to win that five-thousand-dollar prize to hand over to the Orphans' Fund. We'd appreciate it awfully if you could help us."

"Sorry," repeated Gary. "There are a few thousand folks who want our help to win that five thousand bucks."

The girl laid a hand on his arm.

"Wait," she pleaded. "You also want to find Jimmy Valentine, and perhaps I can help you to a clue. I know a man right here in Riverside who knew Jimmy Valentine well."

"That so? Who is he?"

"Perhaps you don't believe me," said Midge. "Well, there's a dance at the Country Club to-night, and he'll be there. If you'll come along I'll point him out."

"Thanks for the invite," said Gary. "Guess it doesn't sound too hopeful to me. I'm much too busy."

"Too busy even to be polite, Mr. Howard," retorted Midge, her eyes flashing with annoyance. "Perhaps being a reporter accounts for that. Come on, Kitty!"

"Aw, Kitty!" exclaimed Mac, stepping forward. "Hold hard a minute. Don't you happen to know any guy who's going to be at the dance to-night? Sure, I'll hike along and—"

The dark girl cast back a rather helpless glance at him as her fair-haired friend ushered her quickly through the hotel's revolving doors into the street.

"Hang!" muttered Gary. "Maybe I'm a juggins, but there's been to many folks telling me that they know somebody who knows Jimmy Valentine June 27th, 1936.

or his wife's uncle's aunt, that I didn't stop to think. I guess, Mac, I'll go along to that Country Club after all."

The Avenger on the Trail!

TEN minutes after Gary had set off alone for the Country Club a powerful car purred to a halt in the hotel garage. Three men alighted and entered the Traymore, followed by a porter loaded with their suitcases.

The smallest of the trio stepped briskly to the clerk's desk. His movements were almost feline in their ease, and held a suggestion of wiry muscles and great strength. A slouch hat was set at a jaunty angle on his black curly hair, and his dark eyes shrewdly surveyed the guests in the hotel foyer before he addressed the reception clerk. His two square-jawed companions stood aside, as if not wishing to make themselves too conspicuous.

"I want a suite of rooms for myself and friends," announced the newcomer. "We'd like to be on the same floor as Mr. Howard of 'The Record'—next to him, if possible."

"You're reporter friends of his, I suppose?" the clerk smiled. "We've got a number of newspapermen staying here now. You can have Suite 425—that's right next to him."

"Bully!"

The visitor signed his name as Jonathan Organ in the register, and his friends as Theodore Smith and Marcus Bean. Then he inquired:

"Is Mr. Howard in his room, by any chance?"

"No, sir. He's at the Country Club. Shall I tell him to 'phone your suite when he returns?"

"On no account," said the dark haired man. "You see, we're friendly rivals. We want to surprise him."

A page-boy ushered the trio into the lift and escorted them to the suite next to Gary Howard's.

When the door of the living-room was closed they stood looking round with approval. From a room on the left came the sound of a voice singing flatly.

"Hear that, boys?" smiled the small man. "That's Pinky McGinnis. Many's the time I've heard him sing flat notes. Guess he'd sing flatter still if he knew that Tony Scapelli was here!"

He referred to himself by his real name, and his two companions chuckled their appreciation. Louie Costello and Nick Lueas were the most relentless gunmen of his gang, and had been chosen specially for the work to be done in Riverside. In the whole gang there was only one who was quicker on the draw and more deadly in aim than themselves—the dark, curly-haired Tony Scapelli himself!

"These walls are kinda thin, boss," remarked Louie. "We ought to be able to hear what goes on next door. Howard's a smart guy. He's got red-hot clues, if you can believe all he writes in 'The Record.' I've a hunch, Tony, you'll soon get your answer to the question 'Where's Valentine?'"

Tony Scapelli swung round, his black eyes smouldering.

"Get this!" he snarled. "We're not down here on any holiday. Get it out of your minds that there's any joke in this business. That Chicago news-sheet wants to find Valentine. So do I. But it's not to give him a fat contract to write up his life story."

"We understand that, boss," Nick nodded.

"When I find Valentine," said Scapelli grimly. "I'll write 'the end' to his life story—with this."

He tapped his hip-pocket, where a 13-shot automatic pistol rested flatly.

"You can rely on us," Louie said. "We'll tail Howard every minute of the day for you. But you know, Tony, I was never sure that Valentine double-crossed your old man."

"Well, I know he did," rasped Scapelli, neatly slinging his hat to a peg. "I talked to my old man in the death-house the day before—before he died. I've got his word for it. He said 'Kid, some day you're gonna grow up, and some day you're gonna find Valentine. Kill him like a rat!' That's what I promised my old man to do, and when Valentine's found, I'm gonna plug him full of hot lead. Now get into that electrician's rig-out of yours, Nick, ready to fix a wire to Howard's room, so we can listen-in to every call he makes or receives."

"Okay, boss"

The three crooks were prepared to play a waiting game. But they had not long to wait before Pinky McGinnis left the next suite and went down by the elevator. Garbed in overalls and a peaked cap, in case anyone of the hotel staff should see him, Nick entered the next room by a skeleton key and put in half an hour of useful work. By the time he had finished there was a hidden wire that tapped Gary's 'phone and extended into the living room of the suite booked by Tony Scapelli, gangster and killer.

There was no need to stay upstairs for the time being, for Gary's suite was empty. So Tony and his two henchmen went down to the foyer.

Suddenly a smile lighted Tony Scapelli's swarthy face. Standing by a potted palm was a broad-shouldered man who had "house detective" written all over his face and body.

"Gosh! If it ain't Ed Callahan!" the gangster grinned. "He was the nut who had the dick's job once at that Thirteenth Street hotel in Detroit."

He and the other two gunmen walked up to the detective, and Scapelli politely asked for a light for his cigar. Callahan responded with equal politeness, lit the gangster's cigar for him, and chatted for some minutes with the three men.

"Excuse me, gentlemen," he murmured; "I've got a bit of work on here. See that kid? He's a new page-boy, and I reckon he's crooked. We don't want no crooks around a respectable hotel."

"Sure, I should say not," agreed Scapelli.

"I'd bet a level dollar," confided Callahan, "that that kid who's just come out of the office has pinched some stamps. See the way he's got that right fist of his closed? You want to be observant on a job of my kind, gentlemen."

Stepping forward, Callahan tapped the page-boy on the shoulder and in a casual way told him to open his right hand. The boy, who knew that the husky had watched him before, gave a slight wink and opened his fist. Out flew a bluebottle, which buzzed into Callahan's face and so startled him that he fell back against the potted palm. With a laugh, the page-boy darted into the elevator.

"Say, you want to watch that kid," chuckled Tony Scapelli. "He's started young trying to outwit dicks."

The three gangsters settled down on a settee where they could see the revolving outer doors without being conspicuous themselves.

Puffing his cheeks, Callahan turned away. The boy had made him lose face with the new arrivals, and he felt mighty sore until he suddenly recognised Pinky McGinnis walking towards the clerk's desk.

"Shut your trap," rasped Scapelli, "and open the safe!"

"Hallo, Mae!" he exclaimed. "Didn't know you were staying here." Mac drew away into an alcove, followed by the burly hotel detective.

"Phew!" he breathed. "You kinda startled me, Ed. When did they last turn you loose from the pen?"

"Sh'ish!" warned Callahan. "That's all past history. I'm running straight now, Mac—got a job here as detective."

A grin spread over Mac's broad face. "Can you beat that!" he chuckled. "Well, they say 'set a crook to catch a crook.'"

"That's enough, Pinky McGinnis," growled Callahan. "I tell you I'm running straight. But this is a respectable hotel. We have gents here of the class of those three I've just been talking to, and I know you to be a wrong 'un. You were once in the same pen with me."

"Aw, you've got me wrong, Ed," Mac pleaded. "I've gone straight, too."

The burly detective looked suspiciously at him.

"That'll take a bit of believing," he retorted. "You've gone straight! I like that! You, a guy who would lose a football game while playing for his own prison side!"

"See here, Ed. I never sold that game!"

"Well, you fumbled the ball and let 'em through to score," accused Callahan. "To think that a lot of short-term lags should beat us!"

He went off and Mac settled himself down in an armchair to wait for Gary. It was after midnight when he came in and found Mae asleep in the chair. He went across and shook his assistant into wakefulness.

"Let's get up to the room, Mae" whispered Gary. "I've seen that girl called Midge, and I've found out something. She's the daughter of Mr. Davis, the banker."

"Aw, never mind the girl," said Mac, rubbing his wrist. "Where's Jimmy Valentine?"

"Buddy, we shan't be long in finding him!" Gary told him exuberantly. "I've found out this, too. The chauffeur employed by Mr. Davis is none other than 'Red' Dolan, who was Jimmy Valentine's greatest pal in the old days. I'll bet he knows where Valentine is hiding. Anyhow, we're going to follow up that clue."

The two pals went up to their room for a night's sleep. Neither saw the three men who quietly entered the suite next to theirs.

The Gunmen Step In!

UNAWARE that his next-door neighbour in the hotel was Tony Scapelli, Gary Howard walked briskly down to the reception clerk's desk on the following morning. No idea was in his mind that Scapelli, whom he had previously tried to find on behalf of his newspaper, was within five hundred miles. Even less did he guess that all his conversation with Mac had been overheard by an enemy, owing to a small hole having been made in the wall between the rooms. And he was equally unaware that one of the killer's henchmen was shadowing him.

The clerk handed out one letter, and Gary avoided a number of rival reporters who tried to pump him for copy to send to their papers. Finding a quiet corner of the lounge, he opened the letter which was typed even to the signature—a signature that made him sit up sharply. The name was "Jimmy Valentine!"

It was a letter begging him to give up the hunt, urging that the ex-convict had found a quiet retreat and that publicity would only bring trouble on innocent people.

Gary shrugged his shoulders and put the letter in his pocket. He was drawing pay from "The Record," and his duty was to find Jimmy Valentine and try to get his life-story. That was the job which his editor had set him, the job he believed he must see through, whatever the cost.

Thanks to his pretty visitor, Midge Davis, he had obtained a useful clue. The chauffeur at the Davis home was none other than Red Dolan, who, it was said, was Jimmy Valentine's best friend in the bad old days. What more likely than that Red was keeping in touch with his greatest pal?

Having an invitation from Midge, he engaged a taxi and drove out to the Davis' home in the best residential quarter of Riverside. There he was received warmly by Midge, who gaily introduced him to her mother and father.

"I'm pleased to meet you, Mr. Howard," Mr. Davis said cordially. "I'm afraid I don't know much about newspaper offices."

"Nor I about banks, Mr. Davis," smiled Gary, "except that a bank once folded up with all my dad's money in it, and—well, that's kinda clouded my viewpoint."

They laughed, but looked serious when Gary asked if he might have a word with the chauffeur.

"I'm sorry," Mr. Davis said, "but he's gone away."

"It's frightful luck," Midge said. "It wouldn't surprise me, Gary, that Red Dolan is really Jimmy Valentine himself. Dad and mother laugh at me, but a crook's liable to use any old name for his own purposes."

"The whole things seems fantastic to me," said Mr. Davis. "Personally, I think it's a pity, Midge, that you've taken any interest whatever in this newspaper competition. It's just a publicity stunt, and it can't do any good to anyone."

"But supposing I won the money?" Midge exclaimed, clasping his hand. "I'd turn every cent of it over to the orphans' homo. Wouldn't it do some good then?"

"Frankly," her father said, "I don't like the idea at all. The way I figure it, my dear, is that it's a cruel thing to rake up a man's past that is long dead and buried."

There was an awkward pause, broken by Gary, who mentioned that there was some copy he had to send to his newspaper.

"Does there happen to be a typewriter here?" he inquired.

"There's one in the study," Midge said. "We'll leave you for a time to get on with any work, but you must be ready for lunch."

"I'll sure be ready for that," Gary laughed.

Left to himself in the study, Gary set to work. He stayed to lunch, and waited till the evening in the hope that something might be heard of the missing chauffeur. At last, in the dusk, he returned to the Traymore Hotel, Midge having promised to get in touch with him if anything else of interest turned up.

He dined with Mac, and afterwards left his colleague talking with Callahan, the house detective, in the foyer. He had not been in the living-room of his suite for ten minutes when there was a knock on the door, and he stared in surprise when he found that his visitor was Midge.

"Hallo!" he exclaimed. "Why didn't you get yourself announced, and I'd have come downstairs?"

The girl stood with her back against the door.

"Because," she said, "I had to see you as quickly as possible. Red Dolan is back. He drove me over here in the car. But he's not Jimmy Valentine, as I thought."

"Sit down," Gary said. "So you've found that out, Midge? Well, so have I. I know the real Jimmy Valentine. He typed me a note, and I've discovered who owns the typewriter it was done on."

"Our typewriter at home?" exclaimed Midge, ignoring the proffered chair. "You came in our home, and, by a trick, you got the use of that typewriter. It was my father's."

Gary spoke in a low tone.

"Yes," he said; "I know."

"So Jimmy Valentine has been found?" Midge said bitterly. "He is my own father!"

"Yes."

The girl walked to within a hand's touch of him.

"I knew before I came here," she said quietly. "Dad himself told me. Oh, how I wish he had told me before! My own father is the man you've had all this hue-and-cry about. He has been running straight for years. It was for the sake of mother and me that he wished to remain quietly in retirement. Gary, you must let him alone. He's paid heavily for past mistakes. I beg of you not to rake up the past in your newspaper. For his own sake, if not for ours, forget him—forget that you have ever found Jimmy Valentine!"

Her eyes were bright with tears, and she spoke quickly and breathlessly from the emotion which swayed her.

Gary took her by the shoulders. "Look here, Midge," he said. "my story has nothing but praise for your dad. People will have more respect for him than ever."

"You think so? And what respect do you think I'll have for you?"

"I don't blame you," Gary said. "I'm sorry the way things have turned out. But my boss sent me to find
June 27th, 1936.

Valentine, not to fall in love with his daughter."

Midge laughed unmusically. Then, suddenly, both spun round as the door opened.

"Scapelli!" Gary gasped.

The gunman and his two henchmen walked into the room. The door was kicked shut behind him. The black muzzle of a six-gun peered out of Tony Scapelli's jacket pocket, a grim threat of the sudden death which the killer had meted out to many in his time.

"So you've found Valentine?" Scapelli smiled. "We've been camped next door and listening-in. Well, I want to make the personal acquaintance of Jimmy Valentine. He was a pal of my father's. I guess, between us, we've got to fix up a meeting with him."

"What's the big idea, Scapelli?" Gary demanded. "Five thousand bucks is only chicken-feed to you. You don't want the prize-money for finding Valentine."

"I don't," said Tony Scapelli grimly. "But you've got to 'phone through to this girl's father. We've heard you say that he's Valentine. He'll pay you off well to keep that story out of the papers. There'll be big money for you and big money for us, too, because this meeting has got to be down at his bank."

"Gary," exclaimed Midge, "don't do it!"

Taking her arm, Gary drew her gently aside. His eyes were riveted on that coal-black muzzle that winked death at him from Scapelli's pocket.

"Grab that 'phone!" Scapelli ordered. There was a drawn look about Gary's lips as his hand lifted off the receiver. He heard the girl's contemptuous sigh, but took no further heed of her. Whatever Midge thought of him, he must obey the gangster and hope for a future chance of turning the tables.

At the pistol point he got through to the Davis' home and gave the message to the banker himself.

"Is that you, Mr. Davis? This is Gary Howard speaking—er—about Jimmy Valentine. If you want to keep a certain story out of the newspaper to-morrow morning, you'll meet me at your bank in thirty minutes."

Blackmail! That was what Mr. Davis, alias Jimmy Valentine, imagined was at the root of this suggested meeting. He agreed to the rendezvous at the side door of the bank, and rang off abruptly.

"Good!" snapped Tony Scapelli, after Gary had hung up. "You'll stay here, Miss Davis, in charge of one of my friends. No harm will come to you if you behave like a sensible girl. I won't answer for consequences to you or your dad if you make any sort of a fuss. Come on, Howard! You've got to come with me and Louie."

The three went down to the hotel foyer. They were precisely five minutes too late to see Pinky McGinnis and Callahan get in a car with Red Dolan and go speeding off in the direction of Chicago. They remained in ignorance that Red Dolan, in the attempt to save his friend's name, had himself confessed to being Jimmy Valentine. So Mac and Callahan had hurried him off to the newspaper office to collect the reward.

The World's Best Cracksmen

A LARGE saloon car drew up in the heavy shadows of the side-street that bordered Riverside's largest bank. Out of it stepped Gary Howard, to greet Mr. Davis, the manager, who came from an arched doorway.

"Well, my young friend," the banker remarked, "I have kept the rendezvous."

His hat was drawn down over his forehead to screen his face from an electric light at the corner of the street. Only when he looked up did he see that two other men were preparing to get out of the car at Gary's heels. He gave a start of surprise, and then stood stiffly, as if frozen to the sidewalk, when the first of Gary's two companions spoke quietly.

"You don't remember me, Valentine. My name is Louie—Louie Costello. This is Tony Scapelli."

"You knew my old man, Valentine," sneered Scapelli, stepping forward. "He told me a whole heap about you. Now get inside that bank, or you're dead mutton!"

With a hopeless gesture, Midge's father went to the side door of the bank and opened it.

"So this is who you've brought here, Howard?" he said with withering contempt. "Where is my daughter?"

"Back at the hotel," Gary answered, "with one of Tony's men called Nick. She's okay."

The two gangsters followed him and the ex-cracksmen banker into the bank and shut the door.

"Yeah, your gel's all right, Valentine," rasped Tony Scapelli. "If you want her to stay that way, you've gotta do what I tell you. We've got a story about you that you don't want printed. Well, you're going to buy it."

The men faced one another in the bank, where one or two electric lights gave illumination.

"What's your price?" Mr. Davis demanded.

"Open the safe," Scapelli said. Cold perspiration broke out on the ex-cracksmen's forehead. He had won back an honourable name. He was the custodian of this bank, with a fortune of other people's money in the great safe.

"You—you can't expect that of me," he muttered. "I—I couldn't even open it if I wanted to. The cashier is the only one who knows the combination."

Scapelli urged him towards the great safe by a gesture of the gun.

"Get that safe open!" he snarled. "Quit stalling! Else something mighty unpleasant is going to happen to that kid of yours."

"Open it!" Gary panted. "They say that Jimmy Valentine could open any safe that was ever made, without knowing the combination."

Again Mr. Davis threw a withering glance in his direction.

"So this is why you played up to my daughter," he muttered; "to blackmail me and to betray your own newspaper!"

"Shut your trap," rasped Scapelli, "and open the safe!"

The banker appeared a beaten man. He stooped by the safe and fumbled over the combination. In vain Gary looked round, seeking some way out of this situation without bringing instant death to himself and to Midge's father.

"It's no good," Mr. Davis said, rising. "I can't feel the tumblers like I used to."

Keeping the gun pointed at him, Scapelli spoke to his henchman.

"Givo him that sandpaper you brought, Louie. My old man told me how you used to use this, Valentine."

With a sigh, Valentine accepted the sandpaper and lightly rubbed it over his finger-tips, with the object of making them more sensitive. Again he turned to the safe, and began to read off the numbers of the combination, while Louie wrote them down.

The gangsters became more engrossed in the numbers slowly announced by the ex-cracksmen, whose expert fingers had

Beyond the stratosphere to a new world where science marches hand in hand with savagery. Follow the adventures of a young American on the strange planet of Mongo, realm of monsters and domain of the War-Lord Ming. An unforgettable serial of thrills and suspense, starring Buster Crabbe and Jean Rogers

Read This First

A strange planet, hitherto unknown, has shifted from its orbit and loomed into the view of the peoples of the Earth. It is the planet Mongo, and its overlord is Ming, a sinister figure who had probed the secrets of Nature.

Dr. Zarkov, an American scientist, sets out in a rocket ship to penetrate the stratosphere. He is accompanied by Flash Gordon, son of an astronomer, and by Dale Arden, Flash's sweetheart, but they reach the new planet only to be seized by Ming.

Flash and Dale escape with the aid of Aura, Ming's daughter, who is attracted by Flash. They are also assisted by Thun, a prince whose father rules a territory on Mongo which has not yet been subdued by Ming. Dale and Thun, however, are captured and carried off by winged men in the pay of King Vultan, who dominates an amazing sky-city poised thousands of feet above the surface of the planet.

Meanwhile, Zarkov finds an ally in Barin, rightful heir to the throne that Ming occupies. They locate Flash and Aura, and in Zarkov's rocket-ship they make for King Vultan's sky-city in the hope of rescuing Dale Arden and Thun.

They are captured by Vultan, and together with Thun, Flash and Barin are condemned to a life of slavery at the radium furnaces which support the sky-city. But just as Ming arrives at the palace and confronts Vultan, Flash and his comrades destroy the furnaces with the co-operation of Zarkov.

EPISODE 8:—

"Tournament of Death"

City of Doom

IN the very instant that the explosion took place Flash Gordon cleared the lead wall, and as he dropped amongst the slaves who were crouching behind the shelter of the parapet he heard fragments of the furnace-casings go whistling over his head.

The great room was filled with the echoes of the blast, and as those reverberations slowly died away the silence that ensued was uncanny. Then all at once bedlam broke loose as the prisoners swarmed from their pen to see their guards lying prostrate about the floor of the wrecked chamber, some of them apparently lifeless, others stirring feebly.

Yelling with triumph, the majority of the slaves made for the doors of the chamber in a body, and though Flash tried to arrest the stampede his efforts were in vain. He only succeeded in restraining Thun and Barin, and in company with them watched the mob swarming out of the room.

"Fools!" the young American ground out. "Crazy fools! My plan was to stick together and arm ourselves, then seize the palace. We'd have been able to help Zarkov pull off his coup without a hitch if we'd done that. As it is, those dumb idiots will scatter in all directions, and be slaughtered like sheep as soon as Vultan's troops recover from the first alarm and face up to the situation."

"Then all is lost, Flash?" Thun panted.

The younger man clenched his teeth. "Maybe not," he rejoined. "Maybe Zarkov can win through, if the three of us stand fast with him. Listen, Barin, you head for the laboratory and tell the doctor that the atom furnaces have been destroyed. Thun and I will make for the throne-room and hold Ming and Vultan powerless—if we can!"

Pausing only to equip themselves with swords, which they drew from the sheaths of three stricken guards who lay nearby, Flash and his comrades dashed out of the furnace chamber and raced up the steps that led to the corridor above.

Once in that corridor they separated, Barin hurrying in the direction of the laboratory, Flash and Thun making straight for King Vultan's audience room with determined mien.

"The next few minutes will decide the fate of everyone in this city, Thun!" Flash said thickly. "According to Zarkov, it will remain in space for a little while even though the atom furnaces have been shattered. Then as the rays that support it gradually fade out the whole fabric of Vultan's metropolis will begin to crumble, and will hurtle to disaster on the plains of Mongo."

Thun made no response other than a nod of his leonine head, and they pressed onward at top speed, meeting June 27th, 1936.

with no one until they were within a short distance of the throne-room.

There was not a slave in sight. The mob of liberated bondsmen had vanished and not a trace of them remained, though from afar there came a vague commotion which suggested to Thun and Flash that some of them had fallen foul of the soldiery who garrisoned the palace.

And then suddenly even as the American and his friend turned a bend in the corridor they came face to face with three of Vultan's retainers who had doubtless been dispatched from the throne-room to investigate the explosion in the furnace chamber.

The three Hawk Men were armed, but the unlooked-for appearance of Flash and Thun took them by surprise, and they scarce had time to defend themselves before their stalwart foes were upon them, attacking with the sword.

There was a rasp and a clangour of steel, a medley of exclamations and a tumult of blows delivered at full force, a scuffling of feet as Vultan's vassals were borne back by the fury of an irresistible onset.

One Hawk Man went down under a sweeping cut of the blade in Flash's hand, and another fell to Thun. The third, trying to lunge at Thun ere the latter could put himself on his guard again, was balked by Flash as the American struck up his sword, and a moment later was sinking to the floor with the blood streaming from a deep gash in his leg.

The affray had lasted thirty seconds. In another thirty two vengeful figures were bursting across the threshold of King Vultan's audience chamber.

They were the figures of Flash Gordon and Prince Thun, and they took in the scene at a glance. There stood Ming's lieutenant, Torch, and a group of the emperor's soldiery. Nearer at hand was a small party of Vultan's minions armed with ray-guns. Ming and Vultan himself were on the dais in front of the throne, together with Dale Arden and Aura.

A little while ago they had made a tableau suggestive of hostility, but Ming and Vultan and their respective hirlings had forgotten their rivalry in a common anxiety, an anxiety that had leapt to every countenance when the explosion in the furnace-room had reached their ears.

Such was the scene into which Flash and Thun bullocked their way in so unexpected a manner that the American had rushed to the dais, and his ally had pounced on one of Vultan's men and seized a ray-gun before any of the occupants of the apartment could make a move.

With a ray-gun in his possession Thun covered the soldiery who were present, Ming's retainers and the Hawk Men alike. Meanwhile, Flash had gained the dais, and at point of sword he threatened Vultan and the emperor. "Let either of you move and I'll run this through you!" he blazed.

There was no question of resistance, for the American was in deadly earnest, and both those potentates of Mongo knew that one reckless act might seal their doom. Indeed, Flash Gordon was so incensed by the sufferings he had undergone at the hands of each of them that it seemed for a moment as if he were sorely tempted to do them some hurt here and now, whether they chose to defy him or not.

Thus it appeared to Dale Arden, at least, and though she had no reason to intercede for Vultan or Ming, the very thought of bloodshed turned her sick.

June 27th, 1936.

That was why she caught her sweetheart's arm involuntarily.

"Flash!" she cried. "Don't! Don't kill them, Flash!"

Her champion looked round at her, and it was a movement that cost him dear, for in allowing his attention to be diverted he gave his enemies their chance, a chance that the burly Vultan was quick to seize.

The King of the Hawk Men suddenly closed with Flash, clutching him from behind, holding him in a vice-like grip. With a shout the American tried to wrench himself free, but as a result of the scuffle Thun wheeled towards the dais, and on the instant the vassals of Ming and Vultan swarmed upon him.

He was overwhelmed and disarmed by force of numbers, and immediately he had been rendered powerless half a dozen of the soldiery rushed to the aid of Vultan. In the space of a few seconds Flash had also been made prisoner, despite the fierceness with which he fought, and despite Dale's efforts to help him and undo the harm for which she had been innocently responsible.

The tables were turned with a vengeance, and Flash and Thun having been secured, Vultan looked ominously from one to the other. Then he slid his eyes upon Ming.

"Perhaps your Majesty will consent to shelve our quarrel for the time being," he said. "For I think the two of us may be of the same mind in regard to these troublesome rascals."

Ming's face was a study in malevolence.

"The ray-guns of your men will make short work of them," he announced harshly. "I propose that they be executed without delay."

Vultan signified his agreement with a nod, and addressed a curt word of command to his minions, whereupon Flash and Thun were pinned against the wall. Then while Ming's retainers drew aside the Hawk Men who were present took up a position in the middle of the room, each of them with a lethal weapon trained upon the unfortunate captives.

"Now," growled Vultan, raising his arm, "prepare to fire. When I let my hand fall you will blast the lives from the bodies of our two meddling interlopers!"

He had scarcely finished speaking when Dale Arden was before him, her lovely features distraught with anguish, her eyes filled with an expression of abject appeal.

"No, no, you must not!" she sobbed. "Spare them! If there's any pity in your heart, spare them! But for me, Flash might have struck you down just now. Remember that, Vultan. Remember that!"

The King of the Hawk Men leered down at her.

"I'm not forgetting it, my pretty one," he told her. "Neither am I forgetting that I might have died by the hand of your precious Flash. No, my fair guest from the Earth, Gordon and Thun have condemned themselves, and nothing you can say will save them."

Dale reeled in a stricken fashion. She saw herself as the one who had brought her fiancé and his friend to this pass. But for her womanish aversion to the sight of bloodshed, but for her thoughtless interference Flash and Thun might still have been in command of the situation.

And had she but known it, Flash could never have slain Vultan or Ming in cold blood, no matter what justification he might have had in doing so.

A mist seemed to gather before Dale, a mist through which she could only see Vultan's grinning countenance. Then all at once she heard the voice of Aura, remonstrating with the Emperor Ming.

"Father," the princess was saying violently, "you and Vultan cannot do this! I won't allow it—I won't allow it!"

"Hold your peace, daughter," came the angry reply. "Do not try my patience too far or it may be that I shall forget that you are my own flesh and blood. Vultan, let us have done with this execution."

The King of the Hawk Men inclined his big head, and then still with upraised arm he turned towards the firing party.

The First Tremors

WHILE Flash and Thun had been making for the throne-room where they were finally to come face to face with death, Prince Barin had been hastening in the direction of Vultan's laboratory as fast as his legs would carry him.

As he rushed into that strange workshop he found Dr. Zarkov standing before an instrument board at the far side of the apartment, examining with intent gaze a dial on which a needle was quivering spasmodically.

"Zarkov," Barin ejaculated, as he hurried across to the scientist, "the atom furnaces have been blown up."

The doctor looked at him and smiled.

"Yes, I know," he remarked complacently. "This gauge reveals the strength of the beams which support the city in the sky, and the needle is falling steadily. It will soon be time for me to act."

"The moment is already at hand, Zarkov!" Barin panted. "Flash and Thun have gone to the audience chamber to confront Vultan and Ming. You must co-operate with us at once." Zarkov had started, and now his face changed colour.

"Flash and Thun—in the audience chamber?" he faltered. "That was a foolish move. Why didn't they come here, instead of running unnecessary risks?"

He took one glance at a ponderous machine that stood nearby, a machine equipped with many switches and dials. It was the appliance on which he had been working for the past few days, and which he had been striving to perfect in order to gain a hold upon Vultan.

"There is the machine that will save us all, Barin," he said grimly. "I alone know how to operate it, and therefore we hold the key to the situation. But in the meantime Flash and Thun must be our first concern. Come!"

Together they departed from the laboratory, and travelling at the double they made their way through the palace corridors until they reached the threshold of the throne-room, where the pair of them came to an abrupt standstill.

They saw Flash and Thun bracing themselves to meet destruction. They saw the firing-party of Hawk Men with ray-guns levelled at the two prisoners menacingly. They saw the onlookers, silent but for Dale Arden, who was sobbing hysterically, and they saw Vultan, with hand on the point of falling to his side in a fatal gesture.

"Stop!" cried Zarkov, and his voice rang clear and loud through that apartment of doom.

All heads were turned in his direction, and with Barin at his heels he stumbled across to the dais and confronted Vultan.

"Your Majesty," he rapped out, "are you aware that the atom furnaces have been destroyed by your slaves? Are you aware that the rays which hold your city above the clouds are failing?"

The King of the Hawk Men glared at him, but a hint of uneasiness dawned in his eyes, and it was a look that crept likewise into the scrutiny which Ming was directing at Zarkov. For both Vultan and the self-styled Emperor of the Universe remembered the explosion that had come to their ears from afar.

"Your sky-city is doomed," Dr. Zarkov went on deliberately. "It will not be long before it goes hurtling to the plains of Mongo, destroying you and your people. There is not even time for the population to be warned, and to evacuate it."

"Wait! You and such of your Hawk Men as are present here may save yourselves, Vultan—by making your escape through the windows and taking to your wings. I grant you that. But your people will be caught unawares and overwhelmed by crumbling masses of masonry, and even if you live, Vultan, you will be a king in name only—a king without a realm, and with only a handful of followers."

Vultan's bloated features had gradually become pale. As for Ming, he was like a ghost, for he realised that if Zarkov were speaking the truth he was among those who were foredoomed—he, the Emperor of the Universe, who was no Hawk Man with the precious gift of wings to carry him instantly from this death-trap.

"Zarkov!" Vultan found his voice, and spoke to the doctor huskily. "Zarkov, you may be trying to fool me, but if you are not—if you are not, then I'll warrant Gordon and Thun and Prince Barin there are the ones who have brought this calamity upon my city!"

"Yes," the scientist acknowledged, "and you may rightly imagine that I myself may have had something to do with it. But I can save your city, Vultan—and save it I will, in return for the lives and liberty of my friends."

He paused, and regarded the burly monarch steadfastly.

"Let all of us go free," he said, "and your kingdom survives. Refuse my offer—and it falls—even though I and my companions perish with it."

"How can you save the city?"

"Didn't you set me to the task of perfecting an invention that your experts had launched but failed to complete, Vultan? An invention that would take the place of the process that has been in use? Well, I have accomplished the task."

Zarkov uttered the last sentence in a triumphant vein, and then, moving a step nearer, he laid an admonishing hand on Vultan's arm.

"You had better make your choice quickly," he advised. "Are you to remain a king, or are you to become a creature dependent upon charity for your existence? You have but to give me your oath that my friends and I shall go free. And while we are on the subject of that oath, Vultan, I have noticed during the time I have been here that you are a strict devotee of the god Taos, whom the nations of Mongo worship. If you accept my bargain, it must be on his name that you swear to abide by it."

Vultan was moistening his lips now.

"This may be some trick," he muttered. "How do I know that the city is really in danger? I—"

And then he stopped, for at that very instant a vital tremor passed through the room in which they were standing, a tremor that shook roof and walls and floor, a tremor that was repeated until thin streams of plaster had begun to fall from above.

"There's your answer, Vultan!" Zarkov jerked. "Quick, there's not a second to lose! Give me your word, Vultan! Give me your word, if you'd save your kingdom! Swear by all that you believe to be holy!"

Alarm was written upon every face as Zarkov spoke those words, and there was no longer any doubt in the minds of his listeners that the realm of the Hawk Men was in peril of collapse.

"I swear!" King Vultan gasped. "I swear, Zarkov—on the name of the god Taos! I swear that you, Gordon, Barin, Thun, the Earth girl—all of you—will go free if you save my city!"

The doctor wheeled and sped across the room, and was blindly followed by the others, even by Flash and Thun, to whom Vultan and Ming paid not the slightest heed now. In a body the whole party swarmed out into the corridor and rushed after Zarkov towards the laboratory, with the flagstones quivering under their feet as they ran and the walls and the ceilings raining dust upon them.

From distant points in that wondrous metropolis of the skies—from the outer limits of the city, to be more exact—there came the dim thunder of tumbling stones. Vultan's realm was breaking up on the extreme fringes, where the rays had apparently first shown signs of weakening.

It was a terrifying sound that was accompanied by a remote commotion of voices as panic spread like wildfire through a stricken populace.

Zarkov and his party ran on, and soon they were in the laboratory, the doctor springing to the machine that he had pointed out to Prince Barin a little while before. And, crowding around him, the onlookers watched him touch the switches of that machine with sure, confident hands.

There was a humming of dynamos, and lights gleamed behind the semi-transparent dials of the apparatus. Quickly the drone of electricity swelled louder, and as it rose in pitch so the floor of the laboratory seemed to become steady, the walls and ceilings to cease their trembling.

The King of the Hawk Men suddenly closed with Flash, clutching him from behind, holding him in a vice-like grip. June 27th, 1936.

Vultan staggered to the windows of the room and looked out across a courtyard that was dotted with the figures of Ming's troops, who were standing in fearful attitudes about their rocket ships as if uncertain how to act. Beyond the wall of the courtyard the King of the Hawk Men could see the roofs and spires of his city, which had been tottering as if on the verge of destruction a few seconds previously, but which was now riding safely in space.

Vultan turned to Zarkov.

"You have kept your word, doctor," he said hoarsely.

"And now you must keep yours," the scientist replied. "My friends go free!"

"No! I forbid it!"

The voice was Ming's, and as Zarkov and Vultan looked at him quickly they saw that his eyes were glittering like diamonds.

"You forget, Ming, that I have sworn by Taos," Vultan observed, "and such a promise is not to be lightly broken."

The emperor advanced a pace nearer to him.

"My friend," he said, "you and I have been at loggerheads, but it seems foolish that we should turn your realm to a shambles by pitting our soldiers against one another. You remind me that you have given a promise. Let me remind you that it was given under pressure."

"But a promise is a promise," Vultan retorted, "and when the spirit of Taos has been summoned as a witness to it—"

"Very well," Ming interrupted impatiently. "You have given a promise, and so far as you are concerned these people go free. But I took no oath, Vultan, and therefore it is no affair of yours if I take charge of them, is it?"

Vultan's glance narrowed at that. The rebellious spirit shown by Flash, Barin and Thun was still rankling in his mind, and in reality he was reluctant to see them escape unpunished. Consequently Ming's proposal did not strike him as unfavourable, providing him as it did with a loophole.

"There is something in what you say, your Majesty," he drawled.

A cry of rage broke from Zarkov's lips as he heard Vultan's words, and suddenly he wheeled towards the machine that had saved the city.

"You can't get away with this!" he shouted. "I can still bring destruction upon us all—"

But Ming had divined his intention, and with a sharp word of command he directed his personal bodyguards to stop the doctor, an order that was promptly carried out by two or three of them. Then he instructed the rest of his minions to seize Flash and Barin and Thun, and although this was not accomplished without a desperate mêlée the American and his comrades were at length overpowered.

"King Vultan," Ming then inquired, facing round on the monarch of the sky-city and addressing him blandly. "Have I your permission to deal with my captives in your palace?"

Vultan grinned at him.

"Why not?" he rejoined. "I have washed my hands of them. They are free—to be dealt with as you think fit."

"Then my first request is that they shall be placed in separate dungeons," said the emperor, "for the time being."

King Vultan shrugged his shoulders to imply the business was no concern of his, whereupon Ming beckoned to the captain of his bodyguard.

"Torch," he announced, "see that the prisoners are taken to King Vultan's dungeons. Also, conduct my daughter and the Earth girl to the throne-room, where I shall join them in due course."

Flash, Zarkov, Barin and Thun were June 27th, 1936.

removed, the four of them struggling violently in the arms of their guards. Then Aura and Dale were led forcibly from the laboratory, the former pale with resentment, the latter almost distracted by this fresh change in the fortunes of her sweetheart and his companions.

Left alone in the presence of Vultan and his group of Hawk Men, Ming was silent for a minute or two. But finally he looked at the burly king of the sky-city and smiled a thin-lipped smile.

"We are friends again, Vultan?" he said.

"If you'll let bygones be bygones," the other replied. "At least we've no cause to quarrel now—not even over the Earth girl, for I gave her up along with the others."

"I have Zarkov to thank for that," Ming commented with a chuckle. "And you to thank for giving me the use of your palace, Vultan. But perhaps I can provide you with a little sport by way of return. Doubtless you are wondering what I am going to do with my captives, eh?"

The bigger man nodded.

"I confess I'm interested," he admitted bluffly.

"Well, Zarkov is to live," said Ming. "I rate him too valuable to die. As for the others—Gordon, Barin and Thun—I have a little plan in mind that should prove amusing, very amusing."

The Duel

LESS than half an hour after he had been lodged within a dungeon on one of the lower floors of Vultan's palace, Flash Gordon received as a visitor no less a personage than the Emperor Ming.

The sinister potentate entered the cell with Torch and several of his bodyguards, who took up defensive attitudes about their royal master as they saw the look that Flash bestowed on him.

Protected by his vassals, Ming eyed the prisoner calmly enough.

"Gordon," he remarked, "I am going to give you a chance. A chance to live and to marry the bride of your choice."

Flash stared across the dungeon at the Emperor, wondering what process of thought was going on behind that domed forehead. The man's countenance was utterly impassive.

"I have seen you with a blade in your hand," Ming went on. "Very well, then, you shall figure in a tournament of death. I have a swordsman at my disposal who is reckoned to be passing skilful, and you shall fight him. I may add that it will be a fight to a finish, and that it has got to end with one of you lying lifeless at the other's feet. No quarter must be shown."

Flash gritted his teeth and made no response for a little while. Then he spoke in a curt tone.

"All right," he said. "The idea of killing a man is not to my fancy, Ming, but the death of one of your hired assassins shouldn't lie too heavily on my conscience. That is, if I should happen to come out the victor."

The emperor smiled.

"It remains to be seen," he observed. "But in case you should survive, Gordon, it is only right that you should know you will have a second opponent to deal with on the same terms. Slay him, and you will then be given your liberty—and your bride."

"I see," Flash muttered grimly. "To win Dale Arden and my freedom I have to wade through blood. Not a pleasant reflection, Ming."

"There is but one condition that I make," the emperor continued, ignoring the American's comment. "You must fight in a mask."

"Why?" Flash demanded.

"It is not for you to question me," Ming retorted. "Are you willing to undertake the combat?"

"Yes," the younger man ground out, "I'm willing and ready."

At that Torch signed to a couple of the guards, and one of them stepped forward to help Flash don a tunic of mail. The other man placed a black hood over the young American's head, a cowl that possessed two slits for his eyes, and when this had been done a sword was placed in his hand and he was led from the cell.

He was taken to a large room, and on arrival there he found a considerable number of people assembled in the apartment, Vultan and some of his Hawk Men being prominent amongst them, as well as Dale Arden, the Princess Aura and Zarkov.

Flash picked out the familiar faces at a glance, and then his eyes fell upon a stalwart figure standing between two of Ming's retainers at the far side of the room. Like Flash himself, this man was grasping a sword, and like Flash he was wearing a hood that concealed his features.

"Let the duel commence," came the voice of the Emperor Ming.

The men who stood beside Flash Gordon's opponent moved aside, and at the same time the tall American was thrust in the direction of that other figure in the cowl.

Step by step the duellists advanced into the centre of the apartment with outstretched blades, and then, as steel touched steel, they began to circle warily, each taking the measure of his foe.

It was the unknown sword-man who made the first lunge, a lunge that followed swiftly upon a clever feint that almost deceived Flash. But the American sprang back and escaped his antagonist's sword-point by an ace, quickly putting himself on his guard again.

He realised there and then that Ming had not overrated the skill of his champion. That swift passage of arms had told Flash that the man, whoever he might be, was a master in the art of fencing, and he was thankful that he himself had counted the sport amongst his recreations at Columbia University.

They came together again, as warily as before, and a second time the unknown swordsman tried to spit Flash. But the American foiled him with a rapid parry and drove with the point in return, only to be balked by the dexterity with which his enemy recovered a defensive posture.

Both were playing a cautious game, but gradually the pace of the duel quickened till it became thrust and parry, thrust and parry, with the tempers of the men rising as the contest grew fiercer and more desperate. Blade rasped on blade, or struck sparks one from the other; the shifting feet of the two adversaries scuffled ceaselessly upon the floor as they manoeuvred hither and thither.

The fight continued, unrelaxing in its vigour, the issue impossible to foretell. As yet neither man had shown any marked superiority, and if on occasion one seemed to press on more hotly than the other he was soon back on the defensive, retreating before an assault as furious as that which he had just launched himself.

And then, as the fateful minutes wore on, a change became apparent in the progress of the combat, a change that was soon obvious to the most inexperienced observer present. One of the swordsmen was tiring, was beginning to

"I will tell Gustave at the factory to be on the look-out," said the old man. "And I will have the police telephoned anonymously as soon as they arrive."

"And get them arrested?" Marvin nodded his approval. "The police may not fall for it."

"They'll fall for it all right. They are tired of Switzerland being used as an international spy centre."

"Supposing Ashenden does find out who I am?"

The bearded old man permitted himself a smile.

"It won't matter if he does. You'll be on your way to Arabia, and he'll be inside a Swiss prison."

Marvin rang a bell and a valet appeared.

"How long have I got?"

"About twenty minutes, sir."

"Well, good-bye," Marvin turned to his ally. "I'll mail you a cheque from New York on delivery of the goods."

The bearded old man shuffled to the door.

"I always deliver the goods, sir."

Ten minutes later Marvin was at the reception office paying his bill. He was about to hand over the letter for Elsa to the clerk when there was a touch on his arm. He jerked round to find Elsa at his side. He noted at once that she wore a grey travelling coat and skirt, and that behind her was a page-boy with a large suitcase.

"You're leaving now?" Elsa said. He noticed that the girl looked very pale and distressed.

"Sure. This is the end," He managed a smile. "This letter was for you. I've had a hurry call back home, and if I don't check out now, it's good-bye to seeing the rest of Europe this trip. My paper says I've got to get a jerk into things."

"Where are you going?"

Marvin gave her a glance from narrowed eyes.

"Greece first, I guess." He glanced at his watch.

"Take me with you."

"Here, say that again!"

"I mean it!" Elsa cried. "I'm leaving here, anyhow." She pointed to the suitcase.

"But how about your husband?" he demanded. "You don't say you're through with him—leaving him?"

"Yes, through with him—finished!" She spoke passionately. "May I come? He won't mind—he has other amusements. Don't ask me to explain any more. I promise not to get in your way, or interfere in anything you want to do. Just get me away from this place."

Marvin gazed at her speculatively, and a queer smile twitched his lips. She was very beautiful, and in Arabia she would be so completely at his mercy.

"Very well, I'll take you," he cried. "Let's go!"

The Chocolate Factory

ON showing their permits at the factory a guide in white overalls proceeded to take them round and do his best to stuff them full of various kinds of chocolates. The roar of machinery made the guide below information about the various gadgets. Ashenden and the Mexican nodded politely, but all the while they were looking round for Lilli's boy friend. Lilli had told them Pete's department and described him—also Pete would be on the watch.

It was while they were in the packing department that the general noticed a man watching them closely. The general pretended not to notice, and saw the man write something on a piece of paper. Boxes of chocolates were passing on an endless band, and as the general came nearer the man pushed the piece of paper into a box. The general decided that he should read that note.

The general in a nonchalant manner strolled towards the packer, and saw the man give him a furtive glance. Now he was sure he should read that note. He strolled after the endless band. It would not do to run. The box was some distance ahead. He almost caught up when the band vanished into a hole in the wall—it meant that the box had been carried to another floor. Up some spiral stairs hastened the general, and there he found the band again.

Ashenden, guessing that something was wrong, persuaded the guide to go in the same direction.

The band carried the box along past benches full of busy workers, and it was impossible for him to snatch the note. The box vanished through a hole in the wall, and the general, bending down, saw the box in a kind of sorting-room. Then he saw hands take the note from the box and begin to read it.

The message in the note was brief:

"Two English spies here. 'Phone police anonymously."

Rather worried, the general joined Ashenden, who looked at him inquiringly. The general shrugged his shoulders. Some few minutes later a portly gentleman appeared, and the guide said it was the manager. The manager stated that he would personally show them round—they were a little surprised. But the general guessed the reason for the manager's effusiveness when he chanced to look out of a window. A police car with four or five police in it had come to a standstill in the yard below.

Someone had betrayed them to the police as spies. The general knew that the note had been a warning or order for someone to fetch the police. He glanced round quickly, and saw that Ashenden was listening to the manager.

His quick wit showed him a slender chance. He picked up a chocolate from a tray and at once choked. It was a violent fit of choking, and the manager and Ashenden thought the general was going blue in the face.

"Water—water!" gasped the general.

The manager hastened away, and that gave the general his chance.

"Trouble—get quick out!" he hissed. "Police!"

The manager brought water, which the general gulped and then grinned his thanks. Ashenden glanced round and saw the fire-alarm. The general was still spluttering so that Ashenden was not observed by the manager or the guide, and he succeeded in edging across the room to the alarm. The general turned and guessed Ashenden's purpose—he began to cough very loudly. Ashenden broke the glass with his coat and pressed the alarm signal. He heard sirens sounding all over the factory.

The white-coated factory workers had instructions that on the alarm signal they must leave their work at once and get out of the factory. Other workers had instructions to man the fire-engine, whilst foremen saw that there was no panic.

Thus the police on charging into the factory were met by a solid mass of white-coated workers, through whom it was impossible to pass.

The manager had not observed Ashenden's trick and had rushed away.

The general pointed to an emergency exit. They were making for it when a white-coated figure appeared in the deserted room, and they were prepared for a fight when the man shouted "Lilli!" They waited for him.

"I am Pete," he panted out. "Lilli, my friend. She come see me, say you pay me well, that you bring the money."

Ashenden gave the man a searching glance, and was satisfied it was Pete. He dived his hand into his pocket and brought out a number of notes. Five of a thousand francs each he handed to Pete. That young man's eyes glittered avidly. In turn he handed them a piece of crumpled paper, on which words were written in German.

Ashenden gasped as he translated their meaning: "Baron Stecker. Travel Damascus through Nish. Call himself Robert Marvin."

"Under noses all the time!" snarled the general.

"We must get out of here and 'phone Elsa," Ashenden cried, all his ideas of resignation forgotten. "I must tell her to try and hold him."

Sounds of voices made them turn.

"That'll be the police," the general muttered.

"Ach!" cried Pete. "They find me out!"

"I save you," the general cried, and suddenly whipped up a crashing blow to the other's jaw. Pete sagged limply on to a mixing machine and lay still.

Ashenden made for the emergency door and held it open for his partner. Together they rushed down some stairs three at a time. The police and officials followed them a few minutes later. They reached the yard in safety. Here were crowds of workers all jabbering excitedly because no one knew why the alarm had gone. Casually the two English agents walked through the crowd towards the gates. They were close to the gates when they heard shouts of "spies!" behind them. Now was the time to run. They charged past the gates before anyone could stop them, and thanked their lucky stars that they had told their driver to wait.

They bundled into the car. When clear of the factory and safe from pursuit Ashenden got out of the car to put through a phone call to the hotel. He hastened back to the car.

"Too late!"

"He go?" asked the general.

"Yes—and Elsa, too." Ashenden suddenly snapped his fingers. "I've got it—she's on to it. Found out who he was and gone with him. We've got to catch up." He sank back against the ancient leather. "Seems Elsa was three jumps ahead of us all the time."

At the post office they sent a special code message to R.

When the general received their message he called two of his staff officers and they went to stand before a huge map of Europe.

"Ashenden is on the right man's track at last," General R. said, and pointed. "This German agent has left the hotel for the station and will follow this route to Damascus. He might get away from Ashenden, and we can't afford to take chances. Won't be easy once across that boundary, so I think we must enlist the aid of the Flying Corps. So if Marvin does elude Ashenden he won't be very much better off."

The Train of Doom

ASHENDEN and the general found the midday train had gone, but by car and other trains they set out after the other's special. Through Switzerland they raced and half over Europe until they caught up at Nish in Serbia. They had done the last hundred miles by car. They arrived at the station to find the train due to leave in a few minutes.

The place was packed with refugees of all standards of life. They had some difficulty in getting to the platform, but there luck was with them for they saw Elsa standing by a bookstall. Ashenden hurried forward, and she was so intent on a book that she did not hear him till he touched her shoulder.

"Having a good trip?"

She turned, and the look of happy astonishment slowly faded.

"I'm not coming back to Geneva."

"Geneva?" He laughed. "There's no need. My dear, why must you take such risks? Why couldn't you have told me what you were going to do?"

Elsa saw the grinning Mexican, and she shuddered.

"What's he doing here? What have you brought him for?"

"Buenos tardes, senora." The general bowed. "Permit I make the compliments. How you are the great actress. So frighten—so timid for the blood-shedding—and all the time you steal the whole show."

"What's he talking about?" There was a note of hysteria in Elsa's voice. She looked appealingly at Ashenden.

"Look here, what's wrong? Didn't you expect us to follow you?"

"I came here to get away from you," was her whispered answer.

"But Dios Mios!" cried the amazed general. "You have not come here with this Von Stecker?"

"With whom?"

"This Baron von Stecker—the man for who we all the time look."

"I never heard of him," Elsa answered. "I came with Marvin." She knew she must try to make some explanation to Ashenden.

"I had no one else, you see. I knew you would not resign, and as I could not go on with this butchery I asked Marvin to take me with him to Athens—"

"Where?" Ashenden spoke sharply. "He meant Constantinople. Where is Marvin now?"

"In the station. He has gone to make sure of the luggage while they change the engine. But why do you ask? Why do you look so strange? And what did you mean by Con—"

"At this station one can get into a waiting train that is bound for Constantinople," Ashenden told her. "The general and I think he has left the Athens train and bluffed you. Marvin is the Baron von Stecker, my dear Elsa."

At first she would not believe it. Marvin had been so good and so kind that it must be impossible. She knew he was in the Athens train. They went to the compartment, but Marvin was not there. They went to the train bound for Constantinople and they saw their man.

"You see, Elsa, we were right," Ashenden took the girl's arm. "You must stay here till I come back. There's a British Red Cross unit somewhere in the town. Go to them."

There came a warning whistle from the train.

"I'm coming with you," Elsa decided, and as there was no time for argument they clambered aboard the train.

They were fortunate to find an empty first-class compartment.

"We mustn't waste time," Ashenden whispered to his confederate. "We shall be out of neutral territory soon, in Turkey, and then the boot will be on the other leg."

Elsa barred the door.

"You aren't going to kill him!"

"For heaven's sake don't try to stop us!" Ashenden's nerves were on edge.

"It's got to be done, and to be done June 27th, 1936.

at once. We'll be in enemy territory in a few minutes. We're almost at the frontier now. I've got to do my duty."

"But I can't let you murder a man in cold blood!" she cried. "Why—" She broke off as there came the clanking of brakes.

It was the frontier. The platform of the station was packed with Bulgarian and Turkish troops. At an order from their officers they swarmed into the train. A number of soldiers clambered to the roof of the train and machine-guns were handed up to them.

Elsa did not know what to do. She could not let Ashenden and the general kill Marvin, and yet she could not betray them. In her uncertainty she stood by the open door and stared down the corridor as if expecting to find some answer to her problem. Her eyes dilated, for she saw Marvin coming towards her.

"Elsa! Why are you on this train?"

Ashenden and the general drew up their legs and huddled on the seats close to the drawn blinds.

"Because I'm going to Constantinople."

"Why?" Marvin demanded harshly. He glanced over her head into the carriage. "Are you alone?"

"Yes."

Marvin was satisfied by her answer, but he was not satisfied with the fact she was on the train. "Follow me!"

When they had gone Ashenden and the Mexican gave a gasp of relief. Ashenden had feared Elsa might betray them. The train after much clanking got under way again, and then the two men quietly left their carriage and went in search of Baron von Stecker.

The Smash

ELSA had no alternative but to accompany Marvin to his reserved compartment, where he closed the door and made her sit down facing him. He took out a gun.

"I hate to do this, but I've got to protect myself. What are you doing on this train?"

"I've told you."

"That won't wash," he said with a nasty smile. "You're here on business—old man R.'s business. You're in the spy racket, too."

"I don't know what you're talking about."

"Lay off!" He gave a sneering laugh. "I can place you now. The lovely, neglected wife, and I like a sap fell for it. I was actually sorry for you. But I'm sorer now!" His laugh made her blood run cold. "Do you realise where you are. In my territory—enemy country!"

She was too frightened to speak.

"And where are your two friends?"

he sneered. "On the train somewhere?"

"How could they get into this train?"

"That's their headache, not mine. But if they have, they're dead men."

Marvin rose. "I'll have the train searched, and—"

He broke off to move his head sideways. He was listening. It sounded like the drone of aeroplanes. Crash, crash! Explosions! Aircraft were bombing the train. The machine-guns on the roof of the train began to spit out leaden missiles.

The door slid back, and into the compartment stepped Ashenden and the Mexican. The Mexican pulled down the blinds. Ashenden kept Marvin covered with his revolver.

"Drop that gun!"

Marvin tossed the gun on to the seat and smiled blandly.

"Well, gentlemen, what is your pleasure?"

"My friend, you are giving us long time big troubles. It too bad you not tell us in Geneva," muttered the general, who had produced a nasty-looking knife. "Save us all this wild-geese chases."

"I had other business to attend to first."

"In Lagenthal Church, for instance!" cried Ashenden.

Marvin shrugged his shoulders.

"Unfortunately. The seamy side of war."

The general came a step nearer.

"And now it is for you the turn."

"And when does the shooting start?" The German had courage.

"Too noisy, my friend." The general fingered his knife. "Ashenden, please take this ladies outside only a memento —I call you quick baek."

It was more than the distraught Elsa could bear. She snatched up Marvin's gun and pointed it at the Mexican.

Elsa glared with an insane light in her beautiful eyes at Ashenden.

"I'd sooner see you both dead than let you go through with this."

"Elsa," Ashenden tried to speak calmly. "You realise that if this man goes through it is the end of us in the East."

"What's that to me?"

"It's one life against the life of thousands!"

"What do I care?" Her voice broke hysterically. "I won't let you kill him —I won't let you kill him!"

All this while the machine-guns had been blazing away at the vague outlines of the aeroplanes, which were so difficult to see in the dusk. The bombs were pitching dangerously close to the line, and as Elsa swore that Marvin should not die one machine scored a direct hit on the track right in the path of the express.

The engine plunged into a crater formed by the bomb. The coaches were telescoped and piled on top of each other in dreadful confusion at the bottom of a steep embankment. The wreckage at once caught fire.

Elsa remembered nothing until she woke to hear her name being called. She found herself pinned down by a smashed door. Ashenden, blood streaming from a cut in his forehead, got her own. On all sides people were screaming and groaning.

Elsa looked wildly round at the tragedy. The coaches were beginning to blaze. It was terrible. So this was war! Now it was before her in all its grim reality. Her eyes dilated as she beheld the general again. So he had escaped? Then she saw Marvin. Only his head and shoulders protruded from the wreckage. There was a terrible wound on the head, and the eyes seemed glazed.

"He is dying," Ashenden whispered. "It is the best way out. Fate has been kind to us."

From his pocket the general took out a flask of brandy and drank greedily, whilst Marvin watched him avidly. Compassion seized the bloodthirsty Mexican, and he placed the brandy within reach. He would give the German the chance of a quick way out. He touched Marvin, and the German looked at him. The general placed the revolver by the side of the brandy before he turned away—

History tells us of Allenby's smashing victory against the Turks, but way back in England Mr. and Mrs. Ashenden could never read about the war in the East without thinking of the terrible fate of Baron von Stecker.

"THE OREGON TRAIL"

should catch a glimpse of him and mistake him for Richards. If they thought he was Richards, they would naturally drill him on sight, for Red's presence among the immigrants must have shown the vigilantes that the story told by the bogus Spaniard at Don Miguel's house had been false.

With determination in every line of his countenance John now began to work his way round to the right-hand side of the canyon, taking advantage of every scrap of cover. It was a long, hard climb, and before he had completed it a desultory outburst of gun-play had shattered the quiet of the hills.

It was accompanied by a tumultuous outcry, and then the shooting rapidly developed into a continuous, rolling fire, and the sounds of battle swelled louder and still louder.

The attacking force of Californians and Yankee immigrants had stormed into the gangsters' view. The fight was on.

By this time John was near the summit of a high plateau to the right of the canyon. A few more strides and he gained that summit—sped across to the edge of the ravine, and looked down to command a survey of all that was in progress below.

Behind the stockade, the desperadoes were assembled in great numbers and were pouring murderous fusillades into the attackers. The hot lead raked vigilantes and pioneers in a ceaseless hail, bringing down men and beasts, breaking up the onset. It was apparent to John at a glance that, for all their headstrong bravery, his friends had little prospect of winning the day, and were more likely to be shot to pieces in front of the formidable barrier which they were trying to rush.

All at once there was a terrific detonation immediately beneath the spot where John stood, and, peering over the rim of the canyon, he espied the field gun that was planted on the terrace half-way down.

It had hurled a shell that burst in the midst of the attacking horsemen, and a dozen of them were blasted into eternity. A few more death-dealing missiles from that piece of cannon, and the conflict would surely be at an end.

Clenching his teeth, John started to descend the crags. There were two men in charge of the gun below him—Harris and Markey—and they had charged the breach with a second shell when the young cavalry officer dropped upon them like a bolt from the blue.

Markey ho struck in the back, bundling him forward over the brink of the terrace, so that he fell crashing to the roofs of the dwellings underneath and tumbled, finally, to the ground. Then the captain spun round towards Harris, pouncing on the gang-leader as the man was tugging a revolver from his holster.

With all his strength he drove his bunched knuckles to the point of the renegade's jaw, and Harris went the way of his lieutenant. Next moment John had leapt to the artillery piece, and, lowering the barrel, he fired straight at the stockade gate.

The shell exploded at the base of the timber barrier, ripped the massive gate to smithereens, and tore a gap in the ranks of the villainous defenders; and, quick to profit by the damage done to the stronghold, Forrenza's vigilantes and their American allies surged forward with loud cheers.

From aloft John Delmont saw the Californians and the immigrants running amok with vengeance in their hearts. From aloft he saw Red Conway and Tim O'Rourke spring from their mounts to grapple with the familiar figure of Benton—saw Tim go down before a smashing punch and leave Red to cope with the ruffian, who seemed possessed of a desperate madman's strength.

Swiftly John scrambled down through the rocks, and fifteen seconds later he was lending Red a hand against the powerful scout. Locked in mortal combat, the three of them fought like furies, Benton inspired by a dread of the gallows. But at last the rogue was borne to the ground and overpowered, and, as he ceased to resist them, John and Red realised that victory had attended their friends on all sides.

A week had elapsed, and the Californians had dealt out stern justice to those of the renegades who had survived the battle at the fort. They had also expressed their gratitude to Ridgley and his party by giving the immigrants full permission to pass across their lands.

Thus, upon a certain spring morning, the wagon train began to move from the banks of the Humboldt River and resume its journey to Oregon. But there was one member of the Ridgley family who did not travel with it, and that one was Ann—for she had accepted a proposal of marriage from Captain John Delmont and was to return with him to Laramie in the company of Tim and Red.

"I can't help feeling like a deserter, John," she said, as they were watching the column of prairie-schooners pull out. "But dad insisted that I should go the road that my heart wanted to take me, and that road was your road, dear."

lost none of their cunning. A stealthy backward step by Gary passed unnoticed by them. His alert eyes had seen the alarm switches on a desk a few feet away; but could he get to them before the gunmen realised his object? Again he stepped backward.

"Hey! Stay where you are!" exploded Scapelli. "Keep him covered, Louie. Got all the numbers? Good!"

"He gave a triumphant chuckle. "Call yourself a newshound?" he jeered, addressing Gary again. "Sure, I've been playing you for a rap the whole time! What d'you think I brought you down here for? For an alibi—jest that. 'Valentine robs his own bank to bribe crooked reporter.' What a story for the news-sheets tomorrow! No one will know that I've taken a hand at all. I'll say it'll be a scoop story for someone. But not you, Gary Howard! You won't be alive to write it!"

Gary stood pale-faced before the desk, then one of his hands suddenly struck against a switch—

Trrrrrrrring!

Bells rang noisily in the bank, and an electric shock ran up Scapelli's arm which was touching the steel safe.

Crack! Louie's gun spat flame and lead. The bullet smacked thickly into a wall, missing Gary's head by inches.

Instantly Gary lashed out with his boot and kicked Louie's gun from his grasp. "Look after Scapelli!" he yelled.

Mr. Davis was doing that already! By a dexterous wrench he sent the gang-leader's gun spinning from his grip. His left came round in a sizzling hook that connected full with the avenger's jaw. Scapelli crumpled in a heap.

Within two minutes a dozen armed policemen poured into the bank. The handcuffs were snapped on the wrists of Tony Scapelli and Louie Costello. A squad raced off to rescue Midge and effect the capture of Nick Lucas.

The attempted safe robbery at Riverside was Gary's scoop story for "The Record" on the following morning. But it took second place to Mac's first stint in journalism—"The Return of Jimmy Valentine." For Red Dolan, to save the Davis family from scandal, asserted that Jimmy Valentine was just another alias of his own! Nor did the Scapelli gang contradict the statement. They knew that Dolan was the only man who could bear witness to some of their worst crimes. So they kept close as clams, and reckoned themselves lucky to get off with fifteen years in "the pen."

On account of the scoop story of the bank robbery and Gary's personal part in the capture of the gang, Kelly, the chief editor, came over handsomely with a thousand-dollar bonus.

"Gee! That'll help some!" smiled Gary on receipt of it. "I'll soon be spending it on a honeymoon, chief."

"That so?" grunted Kelly. "Maybe you'll give me a knock-down to the future Mrs. Howard some time? What's her name?"

"Seeing you're a pal of mine," grinned Gary, "you can call her 'Midge.'"

give way before his antagonist in a manner that showed he was losing grip of himself.

It was not Flash who was weakening, but Ming's champion, and the young American was as quick to realise that fact as anyone in the room. He himself had begun to feel the first signs of physical strain, but the instant he knew that his foe was in a still worse plight he was inspired by a vision of triumph and fought the more hardily.

Relentlessly Flash assailed his opponent, and fatigue and desperation seemed to sap the fellow of all his cunning as a swordsman—till suddenly the blade was whipped clean out of his hand.

The weapon clattered to the floor. With a muffled cry its owner jumped away; tripped and fell; scrambled up again to discover that his cowl had shifted upon his head and that he could not see; tore off the covering so that he might at least attempt to close with Flash and defend himself with his bare hands.

And then—and then Flash Gordon staggered back, amazed and confounded. For the face that he now beheld was the face of a man whom he had called "friend."

"Barin! Prince Barin!" he shouted, and the name was echoed in startled accents by Dale Arden, Zarkov, and Aura.

"Prince Barin!"

It was now the turn of Flash to remove his hood, and at sight of the American's countenance Barin stood in a thunderstruck silence. Then at last he found his voice, a voice that trembled with emotion.

"Flash!" he panted. "Flash, I didn't know it was you! Ming came to me in my cell—promised me my freedom and the hand of his daughter if I should fight and conquer his two best swordsmen."

He paused and looked at Aura, who had started at his words.

"Yes, Aura," he said to her. "Your father promised me your hand. He has not been so blind as you—knows how much I have always cared for you."

There was a pause, during which the princess turned away, and then Flash whipped round towards Ming, where he stood surrounded by his retainers.

"I get it!" he blazed. "If I'd killed Barin you'd have matched me with Thun, and whichever one of us had lived would have had the blood of his friends on his hands! That's how you'd have taken out your spite on us, you foul snake! By setting us to kill one another, and then showing the survivor the dead bodies of his friends! A pretty way of ridding yourself of two of your enemies, and leaving the third to suffer the torture of conscience for the rest of his life!"

Ming smiled at him, displeased as he was by the discovery of his cruel plan.

"At least one of you would have lived," he observed. "As it is, all three of you will die now. Torch, fetch Thun from the dungeons."

His henchman departed with one or two of the guards, the rest of whom proceeded to close in on Flash and Barin. But Barin was quick to recover his sword, and, each with a good three feet of steel in his grasp, neither he nor Flash were to be taken without a fight.

By the time that Thun was brought from the dungeons Flash and Barin had been subdued by weight of numbers, and then, with the prisoners ranged side by side in the grip of their captors, King Vultan strolled across to Ming.

"Well, your Imperial Majesty," he said, "you have failed in your first scheme, but no doubt you have another merry idea in mind, or you would have let your men put an end to Gordon and Prince Barin just now."

"Your guess is right, my friend," Ming replied. "They shall die in single combat with a certain pet of yours—first Gordon, and then Barin, and lastly Thun."

Vultan looked at him keenly. "A pet of mine?" he echoed in a rumbling tone. "You mean—Urso?"

"No," Ming scoffed. "One much more formidable than Urso. I mean the ape-creature which I have seen in your private arena during former visits to your palace. You have no objection, Vultan, have you?"

The burly king of the Hawk Men had begun to finger his fat chin.

"No," he said. "No, you may do as you please. But—I like to see a rascal have a chance, and none of those three will have any chance against the ape."

Ming smiled his bleak, sinister smile. "They shall have their chance," he murmured. "Each of them will be given a dagger before he is sent into the arena. Meanwhile, Vultan, perhaps you will be good enough to have one of your men show Torch the mechanism that raises the door of your pet's lair."

With a shrug Vultan signed to a member of his household, and Torch was escorted from the room. As he disappeared on his villainous mission, his master glanced at the guards who were holding Flash Gordon.

"Into the arena with him!" he ordered. "And remember the dagger."

In response to Ming's command, the soldiers who were clutching Flash proceeded to force him towards the left-hand wall of the apartment, and for the first time the American noticed that this contained a row of open windows. There was also a narrow door in that wall, and, struggling, he was hustled across to it and thrown down a flight of steps on to which it opened.

He fell to the floor of a room that was built on a much lower level than the one where he and Barin had fought their duel, and as he picked himself up he heard something clatter on the stairs.

Slowly, mechanically, Flash lifted the knife that had been flung to him, and then he turned to take stock of the chamber into which he had been launched so unceremoniously—a spacious, octagonal chamber, with walls that were bare and sombre except where that row of windows overlooked it from the upper apartment.

As he raised his glance Flash saw that those windows were now lined with the faces of Ming and Vultan and their separate vassals, all of them stamped with an expression of mockery. But he saw, too, the faces of Dale Arden, of Zarkov, of Barin and Thun and Aura—gazing down at him with horror and anxiety.

It was on Dale that his eyes came finally to rest, and as he caught sight of the tears that were on her cheeks he tried to call out to her reassuringly; was still trying to frame words of hope and courage when she uttered a piercing shriek that went to his heart.

"Flash!" she screamed. "Behind you!"

He sprang around, in time to gain an impression of a hideous brute that came shambling through an opening in the far wall, a creature that was like some monstrous ape, but possessed of a cruel tusk above its snout.

A secret panel had admitted it to the arena, and as it moved out of the gloom of its den it seemed to blink uncertainly. Then it caught sight of Flash Gordon, and with a snarl it charged at him!

Handy With 'Em

Jack Lambert, who has an important rôle in "House Broken," a new Paramount British production just completed at Elstree, believes in keeping fit. A keen amateur boxer, Mr. Lambert for three years held the light-heavyweight championship of the Territorial Army and was also amateur light-heavyweight champion of the West of Scotland.

Other of Mr. Lambert's hobbies are golf and swimming.

"In my opinion," says Mr. Lambert, "young men can achieve film success only by looking after their health and physique, and I believe there is definitely a place for young people on the screen. Personally, I enjoy acting with other young players such as Mary Lawson, Emid Stamp-Taylor, and Louis Borell, who appear with me in 'House Broken.'"

Mr. Lambert, who served in the Navy during the War, has the breezy manner usually associated with the Senior Service.

Star Hears Own Voice from 12,000 Miles Away

Barbara Stanwyck had the unique experience of hearing her own voice from "down under" the other side of the earth, 12,000 miles away from Hollywood.

It happened this way: J. Roy Hunt, the cameraman on Radio's feature screen production, "The Bride Walks Out," in which Miss Stanwyck is starred, is an amateur radio fan, and has constructed one of the most powerful short wave sending and receiving sets in America.

Miss Stanwyck became interested in the set, and Hunt invited her to his home to demonstrate it to her. They talked to persons in South America and Hawaii, and finally tuned-in on a Radio Picture distributor in Sydney, Australia.

He told Miss Stanwyck that her screen success, "Annie Oakley," was playing at his theatre, and asked her to wait until he got the theatre on the telephone. The film was being shown on the screen at the time, so the sound was relayed over the phone to the radio set and broadcast from far-away Australia to Miss Stanwyck in Hollywood.

One Man's Luck . . .

The set was a lumber camp mess hall at the Samuel Goldwyn studios, where the Edna Ferber story "Come and Get It" is being filmed. It was the first day of shooting.

The scene called for Walter Brennan (remember "Old Atrocity" in "Barbary Coast"?) to leap into Edward Arnold's arms and wrap his legs around the Arnold torso in a demonstration of joy at meeting an old friend once again.

Director Howard Hawks said "Cameras!" Brennan, playing the part of a Swede, yelled "Yumpin' Yimminy!" duly "yumped" at the bulky Arnold and did his leg-wrapping act as August 29th, 1936.

"FRISCO KID"

When Bat Morgan is robbed and shanghaied in a water-front dive, but manages to escape, he sets out to fight the underworld of San Francisco at its own game and by his wits and wiles eventually becomes king of the notorious Barbary Coast—only to fall foul of the Vigilantes, who sentence him to death. A vivid drama of the "flaming 'fifties."

"THE HOUSE WITH A THOUSAND CANDLES"

A young diplomat is sent to Geneva with a secret dispatch, but on the way is doped and robbed of the message. In the House of a Thousand Candles he becomes involved with a master spy. A gripping yarn, starring Phillips Holmes.

required by the script. But the lines he spoke were his own.

"Jumping polecats," cried Brennan, "my ankle's broken! What's that on your hip?"

"Sorry," apologised Arnold, fishing a horseshoe from his hip-pocket. "I always carry this with me for luck on the first day."

Risking the Film Star's Neck

The dictionary defines an actor as "a doer; a theatrical performer; a player." The definition would be complete if the dictionary had added the following: "One who takes chances, risks; takes internal and external hurts."

For one scene in Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "Suicide Club," Montgomery had to practise tight-rope walking for two weeks and then took the chance of falling twelve feet to the floor—which he almost did a number of times.

Louis Hayward's case covers the "internal hurt" part of the added definition. For a sequence in the same picture he ate more than three dozen cream-tarts. Sid Silvers created a record in "Broadway Melody of 1936," when he consumed forty-eight doughnuts, half of which he had to dip into coffee.

Jean Harlow's experience in "Riff-Raff," when she had to plunge into a water viaduct and come out ten feet from the opening; Wallace Beery's case in "O'Shaughnessy's Boy," when he put his head between the fangs of a tiger; and Jean Parker's adventures in the wilds, where she braved dangers for months with a full-grown buck and puma for scenes in "Sequoia," would all come under this amended definition of an actor or actress.

Actor Frank Morgan also did his share of suffering for a scene in "Suicide Club." Although it will last only a minute or two in the final release of the picture, he had to spend an entire day in an 1880 tin bath—filled at various times with hot, cold, and lukewarm water.

Extra!

Garbo has bought a new motor-car!

For ten years the studio gatemen have been familiar with the Swedish star's car—a battered, black, faded sedan—and they have always passed it through the gate with a nod to her chauffeur.

A shiny, black, seven-passenger, new limousine with a spick-and-span uniformed chauffeur whizzed into the studio gate. The gateman had never seen the car or chauffeur before. One of the officers jumped to the running-board to stop the strange car. The chauffeur rolled his eyes towards the rear.

The car was permitted to pass, while the officer scratched his puzzled head. Garbo had used her old car and the same chauffeur for ten years, with a new set of tyres and a wind-screen wiper as the only additions in that time.

This first visit was to confer with Adrian on her costumes and with Irving G. Thalberg on production plans for "Camille," in which she will have Robert Taylor as her Armand.

Meanwhile, who is driving one of the most famous cars in the world—the antiquated Garbo chariot that he or she probably acquired from some second-hand dealer?

Miracle Man

As a result of shock on top of overwork, Tony Halliday, a brilliant young surgeon, loses his memory. After a period of aimless wandering he obtains a job in a steel mill, where accidents are suspiciously frequent, and with the aid of a girl discovers a plot to wreck the plant—and regains his lost identity. Starring Ralph Bellamy

An Unexpected Patient

THE trim nurse at the desk in the hallway of the Mitchell Memorial Hospital looked up from the telephone into which she had been speaking as Tony Halliday came towards her from the direction of a theatre in which he had been performing an operation.

He was a brilliant young surgeon, but at the moment he looked a very tired young man. His step was alert enough, but his clean-shaven face was drawn, and the shadows under his keen blue eyes were accentuated by the white overalls in which he was enveloped.

"Dr. Halliday," said the nurse, "Miss Andrews is on the phone for you."

"Thanks," said he, "I'll take it in my office."

He passed on along a wide corridor to the room that was his by virtue of his position as chief of staff at the hospital, and he sat on the edge of a desk in it to take the call that was switched through to him.

"Hallo!" he said. "Oh, hallo, sweet! Have I still got a fiancée?"

"An awfully long-suffering one," replied the girl on the other end of the line—a beautiful girl named Carol Andrews, who was lying on a chesterfield in the drawing-room of her Long Island home. "Your patients do pick the most inconsiderate moments for their relapses!"

Tony grinned wryly into the instrument he held. He imagined her to be speaking from a fashionable restaurant in Fifth Avenue, where he should have joined her for lunch a full hour before.

"I'll make it as quickly as I can, dear," he promised.

"It's too late now," she informed him with a note of petulance in her voice. "Ralph brought me home. He happened to be there, and I was just mad enough with you for not turning up to have a really wonderful time."

A little laugh sounded in his ear.

"Sorry, darling," she said penitently, "that was beastly of me! It wasn't any fun at all, without you."

Tony passed his right hand over his aching brow and his wavy brown hair.

"Just about one more week, dear," he said, "and we'll start making up for all this."

"I'll believe that," she returned, "when we're half-way to Europe. I can't picture you taking time off to marry any girl, much less take her on a honeymoon."

"But I'm not marrying any girl," he countered, emphasising the "any"; "I'm marrying somebody very special! Now, listen, sweet. Wagner's to start taking over my patients first thing in the morning. What do you say to luncheon and a trip to the Marriage Licence Bureau with me about one tomorrow?"

She waved her free hand in the air. "That sounds practically perfect," she declared with enthusiasm. "Remember it's a date!"

"As if I could forget!" said Tony fervently.

In addition to his onerous duties at the hospital, Tony had a private practice, and from two o'clock till four o'clock every day—except Sundays—he was supposed to be available for consultations in his suite of rooms on the third floor of a white-walled building in West Fifty-eighth Street.

As it was long past two o'clock when he put down the telephone and shed his overalls, and as he had an appointment for two-thirty with Dr. George Wagner, he set out for those rooms without troubling about food.

Wagner, an elderly man in tweeds, was waiting for him when he arrived, chatting with an efficient nurse who was also secretary and receptionist; and Tony marched him into his consulting-room, where he opened his books and went into details for the benefit of the friend and fellow-surgeon who was to act as his deputy.

"That's about all, I guess, George," he said at last, dropping wearily into an armchair that many of his patients had occupied. "Don't let Mrs. Boyce-Whittington drive you nuts. She doesn't want a doctor; she wants an audience."

"I'm glad you're pulling out of this for three months, Tony," said Wagner, who had been eyeing him shrewdly. "A man can't keep up the pace you've been going. You've been nearer to a complete collapse than you may realise."

"Nonsense," protested Tony. "I'm as fit as ever I was."

"Except that you never get any sleep, scarcely take time off the job to eat, and your nerves are all shot to pieces."

"Wait till you've heard about the Boyce-Whittington kidneys for three months, and you'll find yourself just one jump ahead of a complete collapse."

Wagner shrugged his broad shoulders.

"Well, you're marrying the right girl, anyway," he said. "Carol isn't the sort of person to put up with that sort of routine. She'll make you live like a human being."

"I'm glad we agree on one point, at least," said Tony.

"What's that?"

"That I'm marrying the right girl."

Wagner rose and picked up his hat.

"Well, I'll have to run along," he said.

"See you later at the hospital," returned Tony.

Ten minutes after Wagner had left the building, a youngster was knocked down by a car at the corner of Ninth Avenue as he was darting across the thoroughfare in front of his mother, an Italian woman.

A policeman picked him up, and, with the distracted mother beside him and a crowd following, carried the unconscious little fellow along the pavement of West Fifty-eighth Street. In the doorway of the white-walled building he encountered the proprietor of a drug store that adjoined it.

"Are you a doctor?" he asked.

"No," replied the druggist, standing hurriedly aside. "Right upstairs, officer—third floor."

A man who had witnessed the accident squeezed through the crowd into the hall.

"Here's his cap," he said.

The Italian woman took the cap and tottered up the stairs after the policeman, uttering lamentations in her own language, and the third floor was reached just as Tony walked out from his room and spoke to his nurse-secretary.

"You can reach me at the hospital at four," he said, "and if any patient lets out a peep in the meanwhile, try knock-out drops!"

The door of the reception-room swung wide and the policeman entered, carrying the injured child.

"Where's the doctor?" he cried. "Oh, there you are! An accident, doc—looks bad."

"My hambino!" wailed the Italian woman, wringing her hands. "Oh, madre mia, my bambino!"

Tony opened the door of his surgery.

"In there," he said to the policeman, and to the nurse: "Take charge."

The woman was stopped from following her offspring and was induced to sit down. Behind the closed door of the surgery Tony undressed the little black-haired sufferer and examined him, while the policeman stood looking on with notebook and pencil ready.

"Crushed chest," Tony informed him. "Broken ribs pressing against the right lung."

The policeman wrote in his book and put it away, then accompanied Tony into the reception-room, where the Italian woman immediately sprang to her feet, crying hysterically:

"Oh, my boy, he's not going to die? Oh, please save my bambino, signor!"

"We're going to try," said Tony gently, "but we must operate. Do you understand?"

"Si, si, I understand. Oh, madre mia, save my boy! Oh, please!"

"You sit over there and try not to worry," urged Tony, and the policeman led the weeping woman to a couch.

"I'll need you," Tony said to the nurse. "Get Dr. Wagner's nurse to come over and look after her. Can you stick around till she gets here, officer? It's only a couple of blocks away."

"I'll stick," nodded the policeman. "Now, come on, mother, you sit down and don't worry."

A Fatal Clot

A MOTOR-AMBULANCE drew up outside the front steps of the Mitchell Memorial Hospital in West Hundred-and-Twentieth Street, and the white-coated driver and the interne beside him jumped down from the driving-seat to open the rear doors and take out a stretcher upon which a girl was lying.

August 29th 1936.

John Ira Mitchell, multi-millionaire, who had endowed the hospital and given it his name, had raced the ambulance in his own powerful saloon because the girl on the stretcher was his daughter, and he was standing on the steps in a fine state of nerves.

"Take care!" he shouted. "She's in pain! Don't joggle that stretcher!"

"We're moving as gently as possible, Mr. Mitchell," the interne protested, as he and the driver mounted the steps with the stretcher between them.

In the hallway the gates of a lift were open and a trolley was waiting. The stretcher was placed on the trolley, the trolley was run into the lift, and the cage ascended. The white-haired superintendent of the hospital came hurrying towards Mitchell.

"Dr. Wagner's on his way up now," he said. "As soon as they've taken a blood count—"

"Wagner?" fumed Mitchell. "Where's Halliday?"

"He's tied up in his office. An emergency case."

"Emergency be hanged! My daughter's critically ill!"

"But he's operating, Mr. Mitchell."

"Tell him to get another doctor on it. His place is here! I'll tell him myself!"

He stalked across to the desk at which the trim nurse was seated, and on one of the telephones that stood there dialed a number. Wagner's nurse, a middle-aged and spectacled woman, had arrived at Tony's rooms some little time before, and it was she who answered the call.

"Dr. Halliday is operating on a child hurt in a street accident," she said rather stiffly. "I've already explained that to the superintendent."

"You tell him it's John Mitchell's child that needs him here," snapped the millionaire.

The name made a difference.

"Just a moment," said the nurse, and she ventured into the surgery.

The Italian woman looked at her piteously as she emerged from it, and for her she had good news.

"He's going to be all right," she said, and returned to the telephone. "I'm sorry, but Dr. Halliday can't leave his patient. In about an hour, I'm afraid."

"An hour?" howled Mitchell. "That's a fine message for him to send me at a time like this!"

He slammed down the instrument just as Dr. Wagner came to him across the hallway.

"Did you get Dr. Halliday?" Wagner inquired.

"They told me he'd be held up for an hour or so!" was the angry response.

"I wouldn't advise waiting for him, Mr. Mitchell."

The surgeon's voice was grave, and Mitchell became alarmed.

"Is she that bad?" he gasped.

"An immediate operation is indicated. The two house doctors attending her are of the same opinion."

Mitchell gnawed his finger-nails.

"I won't have it!" he exploded. "Do everything you can to make her easy, but wait for Halliday. I endow this hospital, and Halliday's made chief of staff. My money pays his salary, and he lets my daughter lie here suffering—maybe dying—while he takes care of some stranger's brat!"

"I'm afraid there's nothing else he could do, under the circumstances, Mr. Mitchell," defended Wagner. "The ethics of the—"

"Don't talk to me about ethics!" stormed the millionaire. "Do something!"

The superintendent crossed the hallway from his office.

"I've telephoned the police department," he said, "to have an escort ready immediately he leaves his office. The traffic will be held up for him."

"Good," said Mitchell.

Less than an hour later Tony walked out from his surgery, putting on his coat, and the Italian woman flew to him.

"Oh, signor," she cried, "my boy—he's gonna live?"

"He'll pull through all right," Tony assured her, and without listening to her excited babble of gratitude, he rushed out to the stairs.

Down in the street a police-car was waiting for him with an escort of speed-cops on their motor-cycles. Tony put on his hat in the car as it swept up Broadway, and the hospital was reached without a moment's delay anywhere. Mitchell was on the top of the steps, mopping his brow with a handkerchief.

"So you've come at last!" he cried, and followed Tony into the cage of a lift. "Halliday, if anything happens to my daughter as a result of this delay—"

"Sorry, Mr. Mitchell."

The matron was waiting in the corridor on the second floor as they stepped out from the lift.

"Is the patient ready?" asked Tony.

"Quite ready," she replied.

Tony disappeared into an operating theatre, and the matron induced the frantic father to enter a waiting-room where he paced round and round a table, the prey to wild misgivings. After what seemed to him an eternity of anguish, Tony appeared in the doorway, clad from head to foot in white.

"Tell me!" implored Mitchell in a voice that cracked.

"She's doing nicely," said Tony, and caught him as he swayed. "Here, here, here! That's no way to act! She's going to be all right."

"It—it's just the terrific strain," muttered Mitchell, tears streaming down his face as he sank into the chair to which he was piloted. "Her suffering—like—this!"

"Don't think any more about it," urged Tony. "Now you try and get some rest yourself."

The millionaire lay back in the chair, limp and exhausted.

"Thank heaven you weren't too late!" he mumbled.

One of the house surgeons put his head into the room.

"Dr. Halliday!" he called, and Tony swung round.

"What is it?"

"Embolus."

The word was unknown to Mitchell, but it was a dread word to Tony, who knew that a clot had ended the life he had tried to save. John Ira Mitchell saw the expression on his face and asked a question without uttering it.

"We did everything humanly possible," said Tony.

"Everything hut come when you were desperately needed!" bellowed the millionaire, bounding up from the chair completely beside himself. "There might have been a chance to save her if you'd come sooner! It was her life against that of some charity brat—and you let my child die!"

The Final Blow

THERE was a meeting of the management committee in the board-room of the hospital next morning—a meeting which had been convoked some days before, but which took on a different complexion in view of a letter received from John Ira Mitchell.

The house doctors were present, and also the visiting surgeons. The superintendent presided; the secretary sat on his left and Tony on his right. The attorney who acted for the hospital in an advisory capacity occupied a chair at the bottom of the long table, and it was he who broached the matter which had become the most important one on the agenda.

"The autopsy," he said, "bears out the report of the attending physician that the death of Miss Mitchell was due to thrombosis resulting from an embolus, or clot, that reached the brain. One of those things, gentlemen, which can happen any day and cannot be controlled."

"What's unfortunate, in this instance," commented a doctor, "is that it had to be John Mitchell's child, suffering from acute appendicitis."

"But his charge of negligence was totally unfounded!" declared Wagner with some heat.

"Mitchell's contention," said the superintendent, with a glance for Tony, "is that the charity case should have been turned over to another surgeon."

"In the midst of an operation?" challenged Wagner.

The superintendent took off his spectacles to polish them with a handkerchief.

"Naturally, gentlemen," he said, "I'm not suggesting that Dr. Halliday should have made any distinction between the two parties."

"I'd have filed charges against him myself if he had!" cried Wagner indignantly.

The secretary looked up from a mass of papers in front of him.

"This isn't getting us anywhere, gentlemen," he demurred. "This meeting was called, primarily, because we are facing a sixty-thousand-dollar deficit!"

"And in the past," said a doctor, "we've always been able to look to Mitchell when funds gave out."

Tony, who hitherto had listened in silence, decided that it was time for him to speak.

"Gentlemen," he said quietly. "I think I've grasped the full significance of these proceedings. We're in a bad spot, financially, and my resignation would help to ease the situation."

"Well," admitted the superintendent hesitatingly, "it—it would certainly clear the air for me." He looked round the table. "Not that any of us disagrees with your handling of the case, you understand," he added.

Tony stood up. His face was white and strained, but it was evident that he had reached a decision.

"Very well, gentlemen," he said, "you have my resignation as chief of staff. I don't feel that I can do my best work in a place where my decision is going to be questioned in matters of this kind."

"Don't be a fool, Tony!" expostulated Wagner. "Just because a man endows a hospital, and helps it out with occasional subscriptions, doesn't give him the right to dictate in matters of life and death!"

"Save it, George," said Tony. "My mind's made up."

He walked away from the table to the door, and Wagner was so disgusted at the attitude of the others that he cried out at them:

"You're acting like a bunch of old women!"

From the hospital Tony went straight to the home of Carol Andrews. He had seen her the night before and had told her about the death of John Mitchell's little daughter, and now he banked on her sympathy and understanding concerning his resignation.

He heard her playing the piano as he handed his hat and coat to the butler in the hall, and he hurried to her in the drawing-room.

"Hallo, Carol!" she greeted him as he entered.

"Hallo, Carol!" He walked over and sat down beside her on the long stool.

She kissed him, and noticed how haggard he was.

"You look tired!" she exclaimed.

"Why, you look as though you'd seen a ghost!"

"Why not?" said he. "I've just come from my own wake!"

"What happened?"

"In the midst of the proceedings the corpse came up for air—and got it! There was a meeting this morning, you know."

"They—they didn't—"

"No," he interrupted, "I beat them to it and resigned. It was rather a bad session. Mitchell, poor devil, was very unfair in his charges. I can't blame him."

"Poor Tony, you must be feeling sunk!" said she. "All your plans and hopes centred around that hospital, didn't they?"

"Not all of them," he corrected, and put his arm round her and kissed her again. "I've still got more good luck than any one guy deserves. Carol, when we get back from Europe I'm going to do what I've always wanted to do—work with Hohler at the City Clinic."

She raised her brows at him.

"That won't offer much of a future will it?" she asked.

"I'm afraid, darling," he confessed, "we'll only just about get along for a while."

"But what about your private practice?"

"Well, you see most of my private patients came to me through Mitchell, and without him behind me it may be rather hard sledding. But I've wanted to give up all that for a long time. The Children's Clinic—that's where I belong."

She stood up, biting her lip.

"You don't seem to be taking me into your plans at all!" she complained.

"Oh, how can you say that, sweetheart?" he protested, looking up at her in dismay.

"You really haven't taken me into your plans for some time, Tony," she went on, "and I've resented it."

She moved away from him, but he caught hold of her hand and pulled her back.

"What do you mean?" he asked hoarsely.

"This deal you've just got from the hospital," she said bitterly. "You've been asking for it for a long time, with that stubborn code of yours—those silly ideas about charity patients, and your duty to them. You might at least give those who can pay an even break. After all, Mitchell was your benefactor. He put you where you are to-day. Tony, don't you think he might feel differently, later on, about having you back at the hospital?"

Tony looked horrified at the suggestion behind that question.

"You couldn't ask me to do a thing like that!" he exclaimed.

"I could if you loved me."

He let go of her hand and rose to his feet.

"Carol," he said, staring at her, "suddenly I don't seem to know you any more."

"I'm sorry, Tony." Her face was averted. "You're rather a stranger yourself these days. The man I became engaged to had a brilliant future."

"I see," he gritted, and as she walked away from him he followed her and swung her round. "What are you trying to tell me?"

"Simply that I couldn't love a failure," she replied slowly. "I'm just not cut out for it. If you're looking for some loyal, thrifty, self-sacrificing little helpmate, Tony, I'm afraid you've put your money on the wrong girl."

His eyes were tortured and his face was whiter than ever.

"An accident, doc," said the policeman; and the Italian woman cried imploringly: "Oh, please save my bambino, signor!"

"Yes," he said in a very low voice. "I'm afraid I have." And with that he went out from the room and closed the door behind him.

What became of him for two whole days after he had left the house nobody ever knew. He did not go near the expensive Park Avenue flat in which he lived, nor did he visit the rooms in which he conducted his private practice. But a little before noon on the third day he walked into the hospital and made straight for the office that had been his.

Wagner was at the desk when he entered, and immediately sprang up and led him over to an armchair.

"You've had us worried," he said gruffly. "Where have you been the last forty-eight hours?"

Tony put a hand to his brow as though trying to remember.

"Just taking a walk," he said vaguely. Wagner eyed him with concern. His shoes were not dusty; his face was smoothly shaven, though it looked considerably thinner; but his eyes were those of a haunted man.

"Look here, Tony," said Wagner gravely, "what's come over you? You look like anything but a man who's about to be married!"

"Married?" Tony echoed with a laugh that jarred. "Oh, that's all off!"

"Oh, so that's it?" Wagner reached down to grip a limp hand. "I'm sorry, old man—I didn't know. Well, that just about makes a grand slam of tough luck, doesn't it?"

"Huh?" Tony shook off the hand. "Oh, I'm all right. Forget it!"

But Wagner shook his head. "Now listen to me, Tony," he said urgently. "What you need is a complete change of scenery, and the sooner the better. Why not just hop a boat to Europe?"

"Europe?" The word awakened bitter memories, and Tony repeated it as though it were the name of a poison.

"Well, then, anywhere," suggested Wagner hastily. "Say the South Seas."

"That's where all the failures go, isn't it?"

"Snap out of it, Tony!" "That's what I'm trying to do, but it's going to take me a day or two to get my bearings. I'm a dub!" He rammed his hat on his head and stood up. "You're right about everything, George. I'm going home to pack. Lucky I've got you to look after things for me."

He went out from the room, but in the hallway everything seemed suddenly to become unreal to him. He swayed a little on his feet, pushed his hat on the back of his head, and, holding his throbbing temples, stared vacantly at the nurse behind the desk.

"Are you ill, doctor?" she asked.

"I'm all right," he replied.

He looked anything but all right, and his manner was strange.

"Are you leaving for the day?" she inquired.

"Yes," he nodded. "I've got to get back to the hospital."

"Hospital?"

"There's a sixty-thousand-dollar deficit."

He went out to the steps like one in a daze, and as soon as he had disappeared she ran to the room he had just left.

"Dr. Wagner!" she cried.

"Yes?" Wagner looked up from the chair in which he had seated himself.

"Did Dr. Halliday seem all right to you?"

"Why?"

"He made the most peculiar remark to me—something about a sixty thousand deficit at the hospital—said he'd have to get there, just as if he didn't know where he was. It seemed to me as though he were out of his head!"

August 29th, 1936.

Tony Becomes "John Davis"

TONY wandered aimlessly along the pavement of West Hundred-and-Twentieth Street and came to Fifth Avenue by Mount Morris Park. He stepped off the kerb without any regard whatever for the stream of traffic flowing in each direction, and he was very nearly knocked down by a car that was braked in haste.

Another car ran into the one that had stopped so abruptly; a policeman on point duty blew his whistle, stopping all the traffic, and yelled and beckoned to Tony.

"Hi, you!" Tony turned and stared, and the policeman swept over to him.

"Say, where d'you think you're at?" he rasped.

"I—I'm sorry, officer," said Tony dully.

"Well, go on then!"

Tony reached the opposite pavement and the traffic was waved on again. He stood gazing vacantly about him till a disengaged taxicab crawled along the kerb to him.

"Taxi?" shouted the driver. "Taxi, mister?"

Tony blinked, but made no response. He stared at the driver as though trying to recognise him. He heard the grinding of brakes, he saw the man descend, and he felt a hand on his arm.

"Cab?" He surrendered himself to the driver, who opened a door and helped him into a seat.

"Where to?" asked the driver.

"What?" said Tony.

"Where do you want to go?"

"Why, I—I don't seem to remember," muttered the unintentional fare. "I—I mean to say—er—just drive around."

The door was slammed, the driver resumed his seat at the wheel, and the taxicab joined the down-town stream of traffic.

Exactly what happened after that was a blank to Tony until several days later, when under a hedge in a field he came upon two tramps sitting round a fire they had made. An appetising odour reached his nostrils from an old tin can suspended over the fire, and he sauntered towards the tramps with his hands in his pockets.

His face was grimy and unshaven, his lounge suit was smothered in dust, and he looked ill.

"Hungry, bo?" inquired one of the tramps, stirring the contents of the can with a stick.

"I—I haven't eaten for days," said Tony.

"Where you from?" asked the other tramp.

"Why, I—I—" Tony's knees gave way, and he fell sideways on to the turf, but managed with an effort to sit up. The scrubby-faced fellow who was superintending the cooking operations removed the can from the fire and presented it to him in company with a spoon that was none too clean.

"Dip in," he said sympathetically.

That day a detective from police headquarters, in New York City, called on George Wagner at the Mitchell Memorial Hospital, and with him was the driver of the taxicab. Tony's strange disappearance had alarmed his friend and deputy, who had enlisted the aid of the police to find him; but only the driver had been found.

The detective exhibited a considerable sum of money in notes which had been taken from the driver, and the driver told his own story.

"So—so I drove him around town for a couple of hours," he said, "and suddenly he gets sore and decides he wants to get away from New York. That—that was why he stopped my cab. So I took him out through New Jersey right through into Pennsylvania."

"A long journey," commented the detective sarcastically.

"Yeah, it was," agreed the taxi-driver. "and I can tell you I got worried, thinkin' the guy was nuts, or maybe he didn't have enough dough to pay. So I stops the cab and talks to him about that. But he ups and flashes a big wad of lettuce at me, and he says, 'Keep goin'!' So I keeps goin', and finally dumps him out near Easton."

"You mean you made him get out?" suggested Wagner.

"Yeah," the driver admitted. "I had to be gettin' back home, my wife expectin' a baby."

"And he paid you off with a roll like this?" scoffed the detective, flourishing the notes in his face.

"So help me!" declared the driver vehemently, "he give me the whole roll and says 'Keep the change!'"

"What did he do then?" asked Wagner.

"Well, he started walkin' towards the railroad tracks, and that's the last I see of him."

"A likely sort o' yarn!" sneered the detective; but Wagner said:

"I'm afraid it is. He's a sick man—I ought never to have let him go that morning. We've got to find him!"

The taxi-driver was permitted to depart with the money Tony had given him; the New York police communicated with the police of Pennsylvania, but to no purpose. Tony seemed, to those who sought him, to have vanished off the face of the earth.

As a matter of fact, he had wandered by easy stages from Easton towards the industrial city of Scranton, obtaining odd jobs here and there in return for food, and sleeping at night in sheds and open fields.

Not very far from a big steel works that dominated the landscape, a plump housewife took pity on him when he begged at her door and set him to chopping wood in the yard for a meal. He toiled for several hours with an axe, in shirt and trousers, his mind a blank up to the moment he had encountered the two tramps, and he had not nearly completed his task when the woman went out to him with a tray.

"Here's something for you to eat," she said.

Tony threw down the axe to take the tray from her. He set it down on the stump of a tree, and she watched him while he drank tea and devoured doughnuts.

"I hear they're taking on men over at the Crocker Mill," she remarked.

"Mill?" He stared at her, wondering what sort of mill she meant, and she pointed to the steel works from which a smudge of slate-grey smoke rose into the sky and jets of flame appeared at intervals.

"I should think a big, strapping fellow like you would like to work steady," she said.

Tony nodded, and while he was chopping the rest of the wood he thought over her words. A regular job—that was what he needed.

Next morning, with other men, he went in at the gates of the Crocker Steel Works, crossed a vast yard in which the office buildings were situated, and took his place in a queue outside a shed-like structure. One by one the men in front of him reached an open window, inside which a burly agent was perched on a stool at a bench littered with papers, and some of the men were given employment and some were rejected.

Tony's turn came, and the agent viewed him critically.

"You don't look like a steel man," he said gruffly but not unpleasantly.

"I want work," said Tony, "any kind of work."

"A greener, 'ch? What's your name?"

"I—I don't—" Tony was on the point of confessing that he did not know his own name when he caught sight of a calendar on the wall of the agent's office, and on the spur of the moment adopted the name upon it. "Davis," he said. "John Davis."

"John Davis," repeated the agent, and he wrote the name in a book and handed Tony a metal disc bearing a number. "Report to the scrap yard."

"Where is that?" asked Tony.

Instead of answering, the agent hailed a passing clerk, who came to the window.

"Jinmy," he said, "take this guy down to the scrap yard foreman. He's short a hand."

Tony followed his guide out of one yard into another, past blast furnaces fed by men stripped to the waist, past rolling-mills where steam-hammers thudded juice out of metal, and stepped over narrow-gauge rails into an untidy region where a huge lifting-magnet was transferring scrap-iron from railway trucks to a pile already mountainous.

The foreman of the scrap yard, a full-faced, unpleasant-looking fellow, in a leather jacket and gloves, strode forward.

"Mac sent him over," said the clerk.

"Yeah?" The foreman surveyed Tony from head to foot and spat contemptuously on the ground. "Thanks for nothing!"

Off went the clerk with a grin, and Tony bore a second scrutiny.

"Those your working clothes?" demanded the foreman.

Tony nodded. His lounge suit had become shabby in the course of his wanderings, but it was far too good for rough work among rusty iron.

"All right," said the foreman grimly. "Come along—I'll show you how to wrastle scrap-iron!"

A Surprise for Dr. Miller

THE superintendent of the Crocker Steel Works, an elderly man with greying hair, whose name was Ernest Koenig, leaned back in his chair and looked across the desk in his private office at the troubled face of a shock-headed melter who stood before him. His goggles pushed up over his forehead.

Joe Kosovic was a fine steel man and an experienced one; a giant of a fellow who spoke English badly because he was a Slav by birth, but who was highly intelligent.

"Number six," he said, tugging at his flowing moustache as though to help himself with the language he had never completely mastered. "she was just gettin' ready for tap out a heat, boss, when the seal break. I run and fix, but hot steel, he come out too fast!"

"This is the third serious accident to your crew in two weeks, Kosovic," said the superintendent sternly. "You know you're responsible."

"I check everything," protested Joe. "I don't know how go wrong!"

Koenig turned to a broad-faced and curly headed man in dark clothes, who was standing with his hands on his hips in the middle of the room with a sneer on his lips.

"Well, Brant," he said, "you're

"What's the matter with your hands?" roared the foreman, and Tony in a dazed sort of fashion, replied: "I—I might injure them."

safety agent. What have you got to say?"

"Take my word for it, E. K.," Brant replied, "there's negligence at the bottom of every one of these accidents."

Joe Kosovic's blue eyes flamed at him. He had never liked the man whose duty it was to play the part of detective around the plant and to see that all safety measures were enforced.

"Listen, Meester Koenig," he pleaded with outstretched hands, "feefteen years I work dis mill. First brake shed, den furnace helper, now melters boss. Long time never any accident."

"Yes, yes, I know all that," said the superintendent.

"You ought to," quoth Brant maliciously. "He gave you the same song and dance last week when that crane dropped a ladle!"

Koenig liked that remark almost as little as Joe did. He frowned at the speaker and folded his arms.

"Joe," he said, "I'm going to give you one more chance. Go back to your job and turn out steel like you used to."

Joe was elated.

"Thank you, Meester Koenig," he said and moved swiftly towards the door. "Thank you. I show you dis time. You betcha!"

"You don't find steel men like that every day," remarked the superintendent, after the melter boss had gone. "That fellow was born in an open hearth."

"Yeah," drawled Brant, and went out from the office to roam the plant.

Tony, by this time, had discarded coat and waistcoat and was at work under a gantry in the scrap yard, attaching the hooks of a travelling-crane to charging-boxes filled with scrap, which were then lifted on to a train of steel tubs bound for the furnaces.

His hands became smothered with red rust from the iron and black grease from the chain, and after a while he neglected his task to gaze at them ruefully.

"Hi, you, wake up there!" bellowed the foreman.

The chain of the crane came swinging within a few feet of Tony's face, and he caught hold of the hooks and attached them in haste to a charging-box. But one of the hooks was not properly fastened, and as the box ascended one end of it dropped and struck against the side of the tub. A shower of scrap descended noisily, and the foreman stalked round the train of tubs to the offender.

"What the blazes are you doin'?" he roared.

Tony, in a dazed sort of fashion, held out his hands.

"I can't—" he began, staring at them. "It—it's my hands."

"What's the matter with your hands?"

"I—I might injure them."

Brant arrived on the scene in time to hear that, and he laughed ironically.

"Have a heart, Ed," he said. "Can't you see? The guy's just had a manicure!"

That was fuel to the foreman's wrath. "Get out of here!" he thundered.

"Go to the shanty and get your slip! You're fired!"

Tony turned away, put on his waistcoat and picked up his coat. He seemed bewildered, and he started off in the wrong direction.

"This way, stupid!" cried Brant, and caught hold of his arm and pointed across the yard.

Tony wandered away towards the front yard, carrying his coat.

"A cream-puff in a steel mill!" said Brant contemptuously.

In the furnace building, Joe Kosovic was back at work superintending a gang of men who were tapping out a heat of steel. A great ladle, brimming with molten metal swung across on its crane towards the waiting moulds, and helmeted workers guided it with long rods.

Joe gave a signal to the man on the crane, who pulled a lever, and the ladle tilted. Down poured a melted mass, but as it struck the sand of the first mould there was an explosion, a blinding flash, and semi-fluid steel and sparks jetted in all directions.

The melters jumped back, many of them screaming with pain, and amidst that spray of death, those who escaped injury rushed to the doors.

A siren screeched across the yards; men came running with stretchers towards the furnace building, and, as the molten metal ceased to spatter, those who had been burned were carried out on the stretchers towards the hospital in the second yard from the gates.

Tony was crossing that yard, and excited men were streaming into it from all parts of the vast plant, when he looked round and saw the bearers of the stretchers.

"Gangway, there! Gangway!" shouted a voice, and he was thrust aside near the entrance to the hospital by those who had gathered round it.

The familiar sight of the stretchers, combined with the equally familiar and sickly sweet odour of chloroform which was wafted out to him from the doorway, seemed to stir in Tony's brain something that had been dormant.

"Let me through, please!" he cried, forcing his way to the steps. "I can help here!"

He entered the wide hallway just as the last of the stretchers was being conveyed into a ward. He brushed ahead of it into the ward, and to the astonishment of a white-robed orderly, who was helping to transfer the injured men from the stretchers to beds, he flung down his coat and waistcoat and made for a wash-basin in which he began to scrub his hands.

"What is it?" he asked sharply over his shoulder.

"Slag burns," the orderly replied, staring blankly at him.

"Get me a hypo of morphine!"

The orderly's eyes widened at that tone of authority.

"Dr. Miller is on his way—" he began.

"Do as I say!" rapped Tony. "And some tannic acid and a roll of bandage."

Without another word of protest the orderly began to collect the specified articles and to deposit them on a dressing-trolley.

Half an hour later, Joshua Miller, the portly official doctor to the Crocker Steel Works, bustled into the ward to gape in astonishment at bandaged men in beds, and at a perfect stranger who was bending over Joe Kosovic, the most badly burned of them all. Miller readjusted his horn-rimmed spectacles as though he could hardly believe the evidence of his own eyes.

"What's happened here?" he exclaimed.

Tony looked up. He had bound Joe's head and chest and had nearly finished binding Joe's right hand.

"Third degree burns," he said quietly, knowing instinctively that the elderly white-haired man who addressed him was a doctor. "I've put on tannic applications."

Dr. Miller went from bed to bed, examining the patients, and Tony was resuming his waistcoat by the time he sat down on Joe Kosovic's bed and felt that giant's pulse.

August 29th, 1936.

"And a very good job, too," he approved. "You know a thing or two about medicine, young fellow. What went wrong this time, Joe?"

Joe was too sleepy from the effect of morphine to reply.

"You'll be all right," said the doctor, and he rose and went to Tony. "I haven't seen you around here before!"

Tony had picked up his hat and coat, but a strange thing had happened to him. He knew his own identity, now, but he had no idea what had happened to him since his mind went blank. A feeling of weakness assailed him, and he dropped on to a chair and held his aching head with his left hand, staring up into the pleasant face of the doctor.

"Would you mind telling me where I am?" he faltered.

"What's that?" Miller was obviously astounded.

"I got into a taxi a while ago, and I don't seem to have any recollection of getting out of it."

That was still more puzzling. Miller surveyed the hollow-eyed young man with some concern.

"Are you sure you weren't hurt, too?" he asked.

"Hurt?" Tony shook his head—and wished that he hadn't. "Oh, I'm all right. I just can't seem to remember how I got here."

"You must have been working in the mill when the accident happened."

"Must I? For some reason or other I feel terribly tired. Is it always this noisy around here?"

Dr. Miller nodded.

"Twenty-four hours a day," he said.

"You're in the Crocker Steel Works, near Scranton. They never shut down."

"Scranton?" echoed Tony. "Scranton, Pennsylvania?"

Again the doctor nodded.

"Where did you think you were?" he asked.

"I thought I was in New York."

Miller went straight to a cabinet, and from bottles on its shelves mixed a draught in a tumbler.

"Here, drink this," he said. "You're either suffering from amnesia, or the hang-over of the century."

Tony swallowed the draught, after he had sniffed at it and recognised its tonic constituents. The doctor watched him indulgently.

"What I want to know," he said with a smile, "is whether you can put on surgical dressings like that when you're sober?"

"Why?" asked Tony.

"I could use someone like you around here. How long have you been practising medicine?"

Tony decided, in the circumstances, that it would be unwise to reveal his newly remembered identity.

"Well," he said slowly, "I had a smattering of it at school."

"I see," mused Miller. "Well, a little experience of the sort you'd get around this mill, and you might develop into a first-rate doctor."

"Thanks," said Tony. "I'll take the job."

"Too Many Accidents"

AS John Davis, a rejected worker from the scrap yard, Tony became assistant to Dr. Joshua Miller that same day, and by the time Joe Kosovic was fit enough to resume his duties had become quite friendly with the melter boss.

Miller, meanwhile, had increased his admiration for the skill the young man displayed in dealing with accidents that were all too frequent. He asked no questions about his protégé's past, but was content that loss of memory and an act of Providence should have provided him with a helper upon whom he could rely in almost any sort of emergency.

Tony, an entirely different being from the unkempt wanderer who had sought employment in the Crocker Steel Works a fortnight before, took up his abode in a boarding-house about a mile away from the mill. He found the work congenial enough, and, still bitter about the way Carol Andrews had treated him, was content—at all events for the time being—to throw in his lot with the steel workers.

Joe Kosovic was still wearing a patch of cotton-wool over the right side of his forehead when he invaded the superintendent's office one morning in his working clothes.

"Hallo, Meester Koenig!" he said brightly.

"Hallo, Joe!" Koenig looked him up and down. "Ready to go back on the job again, eh?"

"You betcha!" boomed the giant. "By gollies, I happy lak anyting to go back to work."

"I've got bad news for you."

"Bad news? What's der matter, Meester Koenig?"

"There's been one accident too many on your shift," was the reply.

"But I tell you all about what go wrong when you come to me in der hospital."

"That didn't put things right, Joe! No, I thought you were a steel man, but I guess I was wrong."

Joe became thoroughly upset.

"But, Meester—Meester Koenig!" he gulped. "I—I—"

"No use!" The superintendent waved a hand. "I've got to send you back to the pick and shovel gang."

"Meester!" cried Joe in a horrified voice.

"I'm sorry."

That evening, in the dusk, Tony walked out from the gates of the steel works only a few minutes after Joe, and in the roadway caught up with him.

"Well, Joe," he said, "and how did the first day back on the job go?"

"Ach!" growled the giant disgustedly.

"Why, what's the matter?"

"It just make me sick, doctor! Joe Kosovic, best steel man any place, have to push wheelbarrow same like old woman!"

Tony fell into step with him. The boarding-house for which he himself was bound was situated some little way beyond the frame house in which the melter lived.

"It's tough, Joe," he said sympathetically, "but you ought to take it easy for a while, you know."

"Me?" Joe smote his massive chest with his fist. "Any time Joe Kosovic have to take it easy, I dink dey carry him out feet first!"

He talked of the accidents that had led to his degradation.

"I tell you," he said, "nine year I work open hearth and dree four accidents. Now plenty of trouble all der time. By golly, I no understand!"

Joe's house was reached—one of a long row of houses, all very much alike, with unfenced gardens back and front—and a girl came running out to them, bareheaded, dressed in a gaily patterned frock.

"Dad," she exclaimed, "what's wrong?"

"Plenty!" complained Joe. "Today I go back work in yard like a greener, pushing a wheelbarrow! Too many accidents!"

"But that's not fair!" she cried. "You weren't to blame!"

"Sure no fair," he agreed heavily. "Someding funny go on by mill, I tell you!"

"Don't worry about it, dad," she urged, reaching up to put her hands on his shoulders. "The old mill isn't worth it. Besides, you need a rest."

"That's right," confirmed Tony. She turned to look at the stranger, and she liked his smile.

"Oh, Gerta," said Joe, "I want you should meet Doc Davis! Very good friend of mine."

Tony and the girl shook hands. She stood no higher than his chin, but he judged her to be about twenty, and a young woman with a mind of her own. "She American," Joe informed him proudly, "born in dis country. Speak very good English—just like her father."

He gurgled at that little joke and sniffed at the open doorway.

"Chicken paprika for supper, eh?" he boomed. "What you say, doe? You come inside with us and have a good meal, not like in boarding-house."

"Thanks very much," murmured Tony, "but I'm afraid I—I'd better be getting along."

"The doctor's afraid of my cooking, dad," laughed Gerta.

"Well," surrendered Tony, "after that I have no option."

He went with them into the house, and he thoroughly enjoyed the meal he shared with them. Joe was a widower, but his daughter was an excellent housewife. In the light of a shaded lamp he glanced across the table at her several times, and he found himself comparing her with Carol Andrews. She was quite as beautiful as that luxury-loving girl, but in an altogether different fashion. She was fairer, slighter, and her eyes were blue.

She became conscious of his gaze, and she smiled at him.

"It was very nice of you," she said, "to take such good care of dad in hospital."

"I'm depending on you to finish the job," he returned. "And make him stop worrying, too!"

Joe, who had been frowning over his plate, suddenly exclaimed

"By gollies, I got it! Somebody by mill feex it so dat furnace break."

"Not another word about the mill to-night!" commanded Gerta. "You eat your dinner!"

"All der time she boss me just like dat," Joe confided to his guest with a chuckle. "Just like she boss der little children she teach in der mill-town school. What you t'ink of my Gerta, eh? Ever seen a more pretty girl?"

"Oh, dad!" cried Gerta, covered with blushes.

"If I have," said Tony emphatically, "I don't remember where."

He became a fairly frequent visitor to the house after that evening, just at first on Joe's invitation, but afterwards entirely of his own accord.

Meanwhile, more accidents occurred at the mills, and the workers became restive. Tony, sauntering across the scrapyard one morning, came upon Joe pushing his wheelbarrow, and Joe stopped to speak, but the foreman pounced on him.

"What's the matter?" he rasped. "Don't you like the work?"

"Sure," replied Joe meekly.

"Well, go ahead!"

The foreman had no word for Tony, but Brant followed him from the yard at a distance. Outside a blast furnace he saw a man mounting a ladder to a covered platform to feed pig-iron and scrap into a huge bucket-like convertor, and he was watching him when a rung at the top of the ladder appeared to give way, and the workman, grabbing frantically at thin air, pitched headlong to the ground.

Tony was one of the first to reach the fallen man, and he was kneeling beside him when a siren shrieked and stretcher-bearers came hastening to the spot. No bones were broken, but the man was suffering from concussion. He was conveyed to the hospital, and there Tony dealt with him, wondering how on earth a rung of a steel ladder could have snapped under a comparatively light weight.

During the lunch hour that day he came upon a crowd of workers in the yard between the rolling mills and the blast furnaces, listening to a thin-faced man who was addressing them from the top of a truck.

More than half of the men who toiled in the heat of the mills were Slavs, and Tony could not understand a word the speaker uttered, though his vehemence was manifest enough.

He heard the voice of Brant beside him, and swung round.

"How are you, doc?" inquired the safety agent, with just a suggestion of a sneer in his deep, unpleasant voice. "How do you like the steel mills by now?"

Tony did not reply to that question. He jerked his head in the direction of the crowd, and he said:

"What's all the excitement?"

"Oh," Brant replied with a shrug, "some superstitious workman trying to start trouble!"

"What about?"

Brant shouted to one of the listening men:

"Hi, what's he talkin' about?"

The man, obviously a foreigner, walked over.

"He say workmen better quit," he explained. "Too many accidents. This mill bad luck."

"Bad luck" is all bunk!" snapped Brant, and waved the man away.

"Their own dumb carelessness!"

"In every case?" challenged Tony.

"Why, sure. I'm safety and personnel agent—I investigate all these accidents. But you can't talk to these lunk-heads, they don't savvy English." "Poor devils," quoth Tony, and looked across at the speaker on the truck, who seemed to be eloquent enough in his own language and to be holding the attention of those who understood him. "Why can't the mill make stricter safety rules?"

That question seemed to irritate Brant.

"Say, now, just what would you suggest?" he drawled, projecting his under-lip.

"I don't know," said Tony. "You might begin by investigating all the workmen."

"Well, now, that ain't such a bad idea!" Brant grinned mockingly. "I think myself we ought to investigate every greener that never saw the inside of a steel mill before. Find out just where they came from, eh?"

He walked off with a toss of his head, and Tony looked rather blankly after him.

The Runaway

ON a very sunny Sunday, about a fortnight afterwards, Tony and Gerta left the smoke and dinginess of the mill-town behind them and climbed into the hills, Tony carrying a luncheon-basket which Gerta had packed. The country round about Scranton is of great natural beauty, and under the trees by a mountain stream where they picnicked even the belching chimney-stacks in the valley far below looked picturesque.

It was a memorable day for both of them. They fed on cold chicken and ham, and they broke the wish-bone with becoming solemnity.

"I've got it!" said Gerta.

Tony sprawled on the turf with his hands beneath his head.

"What did you wish for?" he inquired. "A Paris gown, or a handsome millionaire with a yacht?"

"What is it?" Tony asked sharply over his shoulder. "Slag burns," the orderly replied, staring blankly at him.

She looked across the landscape and then down at him.

"I wished," said she, "that every day could be a Sunday."

"That's funny," he laughed. "So did I!"

"But you weren't entitled to a wish," she reminded him.

"I wished just that, all the same."

Late in the afternoon they repacked the basket, but they lingered in the delectable spot they had chosen till the sun sank towards the mountains in the west and a red glow was over everything.

"Did you ever see such a beautiful sunset?" breathed Gerta, her back against a gnarled trunk, her face all lit up.

"No," said Tony. "It's made to order, just to top off this picnic. On a day like this even the Crocker Mills look less like an inferno than usual."

"They're always beautiful and thrilling," she declared.

"Spoken like a true daughter of the mills!"

"Yes," she sighed, "but since all this trouble began, and they've been so unfair to dad, there are days when I hate it all. Sometimes I'd like to get ever so far away from this town."

"There are times," said Tony, with a sigh to match hers, "when you feel that way about other places, too."

She studied his thoughtful face for a while.

"Was she very beautiful?" she asked suddenly.

"Who?"

Tony looked up at her, surprised at the accuracy with which she had read what was in his mind.

"The girl who made you feel that way about other places," she replied.

"I don't know," he said. "It's hard to remember."

"I'm sorry. I shouldn't have asked that."

"Oh, that's all right!" He summoned a smile. "I meant it's hard to remember whether any other woman is beautiful—when I'm with you."

"You don't have to say that just because you like my cooking," she said, leaning over him and wagging a finger in his face.

"You're lovely, Gerta!" He removed his hands from under his head to fling them round her neck, and he pulled her face down to his and kissed her on the lips. "It's been a wonderful day," he said. "I'll never forget it!"

"Neither will I!" she assured him happily.

Darkness was gathering in the valley when they reached it and came to the first of the houses of the mill-town. They turned a corner, and Gerta pounced on a small boy who was about to pass them. He was no more than nine or ten years old, and he was carrying a bundle.

"Why, Danny," she cried, catching hold of him, "where do you think you're going at this hour, and all alone?"

"You let me go!" stormed the youngster, trying to break away from her. "I'm in a hurry!"

"Wait a minute, Danny," she insisted. "Where are you going?"

"I'm gonna go away," shrilled the hoy, "and nobody's gonna stop me! You let go o' my arm!"

Tony intervened. Danny had begun to kick, and that was not to be tolerated.

"Here, that's enough of that, young man!" he reprimanded sternly, and he held the struggling child in a grip that could not be resisted. "Who is this tough customer?"

"He's one of my first-graders," Gerta stated. "You were going to run away August 29th, 1936."

again, weren't you, Danny? What'll your father say?"

"I don't care what he says!" retorted the boy. "He wouldn't take me to the picture show, and I ain't coming back ever!"

"Oh, yes, you are!" said Gerta firmly. "You're going home right now!"

"Why, you were headed for Canada, young man," said Tony. "It's cold up there—and you'd be pretty darned hungry this time to-morrow night."

"Oh, I get plenty o' stuff to eat!" piped Danny, and he produced a stick of liquorice from a pocket and began to bite at it.

Tony laughed, and so did Gerta.

"Well, it's home for you, young fellow," said Tony masterfully, "liquorice and all." He turned to Gerta. "Where does he live?"

"Near Slovak Hall," she replied. "It's quite a way from here."

"Want me to carry you?" asked Tony.

"What d'you think I am?" cried Danny indignantly. "A baby?"

"All right, then," laughed Tony, "let me see you walk. Come on—march!"

Yielding to superior force, the boy began to mark time on the pavement like a soldier, then strutted forward between his captors. But Tony was carrying him in his arms, and Gerta was carrying the basket long before they came to a wooden house with a porch and a meagre little front garden a mile and a half away from the spot where the runaway had been encountered.

"This is the house," said Gerta.

Danny was fast asleep, but Gerta's knock on the door of the house roused him. To Tony's surprise, the man who opened the door was Brant, and Brant scowled at him as he descended the steps from the porch.

"I told that kid of mine not to go to a movie to-night," he snapped.

"You had a nerve to take him!"

"He hasn't been to any movies," said Tony. "We picked him up on the far side of the town, headed for the great open spaces."

Brant viewed his yawning offspring and the bundle Tony also held.

"He wasn't running away again?" he said questioningly to Gerta.

"No," Tony replied for her. "Just lost his way, I guess." He deposited Danny on the porch. "There you are," he said. "A good night's sleep will make a new man out of you, Danny."

Danny grinned and held out a hand for the bundle.

"It's lucky Miss Kosovie knew where he lived," said Tony. "Well, good-night, Brant!"

Brant looked thoroughly ashamed of his outburst.

"I'm sure I'm much obliged to you both," he said, and sat down on the steps and lifted his small son on to his knees. "Good-night—and thanks again."

Tony went off with Gerta, and the safety agent ruffled the small boy's hair in quite an affectionate manner.

"Listen, Danny," he said, "you mustn't do this sort of thing, you know. We'll go to the movies to-morrow night. You and I have got to stick together, eh? We haven't got any mother to look after us, have we?"

"No," said Danny, "if we had I bet she'd take me to the movies. What did she go and die for?"

"Never mind about that," said Brant. "I'll take you to the movies to-morrow night."

Danny Plays a Game

NEXT morning, in the office of the superintendent of the Crocker Steel Works, there was a meeting of the directors which Brant attended. An insurance company had given notice that it would not settle any more claims in respect of accidents which had become far too numerous to be genuine.

"If the company persists in this attitude," lamented the superintendent, "it'll close the mill. We can't operate under common law—we should lose every case—and without the protection of State compensation limits one or two lawsuits would finish us."

"Yeah, that's right," agreed Brant. "Provided there isn't a general walk-out first," growled one of the directors. "The men are getting panicky."

"We've never had a run of accidents like this in the history of the mill," complained another director.

"I'm beginning to wonder if they are accidents," said the superintendent. "They look more as though they've been deliberately planned—the work of someone trying to gum things up around here!"

"You mean someone among our own workmen?" asked Ebenezer Crocker, the white-haired president of the firm.

"It would have to be."

"Oh, bunk!" exploded Brant. "This mill means bread and butter to the men. Who'd want to wreck it?"

"Well," said Koenig, "someone taking orders from the Irvington Steel outfit, for instance. They've been trying to buy these works for a year, but we've declined all their offers."

Ebenezer Crocker looked horrified at the inference the members of the board were left to draw from that statement.

"You don't suppose they'd go so far as to—" he began.

"Irvington Steel," interrupted one of the directors, "would go to any length to wreck us, or get us in a hole so that we'd have to sell out cheap!"

The superintendent nodded agreement.

"Brant," he said, "it's your job to find out who's doing it."

"All right, E. K.," responded Brant. "I'll be on my toes. But you people are letting your imagination run away with you."

"Imagination, eh?" bridled Koenig. "We had five accidents last week alone!"

Brant did not take his small son to the cinema that night. Instead, he made a pretence of working at a table in the sitting-room of his house until ten o'clock, when a tap at the window sent him to the back door. Three men were waiting outside, all of them steel workers, all foreigners, and one of them was the thin-faced agitator who had urged a crowd of employees to quit their jobs.

Brant admitted them, after satisfying himself that there was nobody else about, and he conducted them to the sitting-room, and provided them with chairs and drinks. He produced a wad of notes which he shared among them.

"How's that for easy money, eh?" he said. "Now here's the set-up for to-morrow night—the rolling-mills. They'll be closing down for a roll change—and no slip-ups this time!" He turned to the thin-faced man. "Slevsky, you're on the night shift, it's up to you. The crane that lifts the hot billets from the racks."

Slevsky nodded.

"And listen," Brant went on, "there's a nice little bonus from Irvington for each of you just as soon as the Crocker Steel Works are out of business. They won't continue to make steel if they can't get workmen's insurance."

The door that opened into the lobby was not quite shut. It swung wide, and Danny burst into the room in his night-clothes.

"Aw, gee," he cried complainingly, "you said you couldn't take me to the pictures because you had to work, and

Out shot Tony's left in a swift uppercut to Brant's jaw, filling his mouth with blood from a bitten tongue.

you ain't working—you're just talking!"

Brant stalked angrily over to him. "I told you to stay out of here!" he barked. "Now go back to bed! Go on! Go on!"

On the following afternoon, Gerta walked out from the main entrance of the little mill-town school with a girl who taught the infants.

"Well, good-bye, Anna," she said on the pavement beyond the gate of the playground.

"You'll be at the dance to-night, won't you?" said the other.

"I guess so," Gerta replied. "Dad looks forward to these dances so. He wouldn't miss one for anything."

"He wouldn't, eh? How about that new young man of yours?"

Gerta flushed.

"Who do you mean?" she asked.

"Dr. Davis?"

"Who else?" laughed Anna. "Everyone knows you're dizzy in the head about him!"

"Anna, how can you say such a thing?"

"Ha, ha!" mocked Anna. "See you to-night, then—and mind you bring him, too!"

They parted company, and Gerta was walking along by the fence of the playground in the direction of her own home when a brick came flying over it and fell at her feet.

Immediately she went back to the gate and entered the playground. A number of boys were in it, clustered round a sort of see-saw arrangement consisting of a plank of wood on a log, beside which lay a heap of bricks and brickbats.

"Who threw that brick over the fence?" she asked sternly.

"I did," confessed Danny Brant, almost with pride.

"Don't you know you could kill someone that way?"

"We were just playing a game," said Danny.

"What kind of a game?"

"Steel mill."

"Well, you don't have to go dropping bricks on people, do you?"

"Sure you do," Danny replied.

"That's the way you play it. You see, here's the crane in the rolling mill, and these bricks are melted steel. They weigh tons and tons. Then you do something that fixes the crane wrong, and the bricks fall on somebody, and they can't get insurance. See?"

Gerta looked at the contrivance, and she looked at Danny.

"Tell me all that again," she said tensely.

"Aw, gee, you wouldn't understand," he demurred with juvenile superiority.

"You can't explain anything like that to women!"

She gripped him by the shoulder.

"Danny, where did you learn to play a game like that?" she demanded.

"Who taught you?"

A stubborn expression swept over the youngster's face, and he shook his head.

"I won't tell you!" he defied her.

She made the children restore the plank to a wood-sled, and she forbade them to play any such game again.

Then, considerably disturbed by the incident she made straight for the boarding-house where Tony lived.

Several men were lounging on its wide porch, and she asked one of them if he could tell her where she could find Dr. Davis.

"I t'ink him inside," replied the man, who was a Slav. "I go call him."

He disappeared into the house and presently returned with Tony, who was delighted as well as surprised to see her.

"Hallo, there!" he cried, and descended the steps.

"Hallo, Tony!" she returned in a worried manner. "I want to see you about something very important. I—cr—" which was hideous. There was one comfortable armchair in the room, and he led her over to it.

"Thank you," she said. "I want to tell you about Danny Brant. I caught him playing a new game in the school ground this afternoon. He had rigged things up to represent the rolling mill, and when I scolded him for dropping bricks over the fence with it, he said that was the right way to play steel mill—you fixed it so the crane would break and drop things on people, then they couldn't get insurance."

"Danny, eh?" Tony rubbed his chin and frowned at a threadbare carpet.

"Doesn't seem possible that Brant could be involved in this!"

"I can't believe it, either," said Gerta, "but I thought you should know. I wouldn't dare tell dad—he's so bitter about his job."

"Well," decided Tony, "there isn't much we can do until we're sure."

"I hate to think of what the mill-workers will do if they find out," she said.

"They'd go crazy," he declared.

"They'd start killing right and left. There's one thing I can do, and I'll do it right away. I'll get them to take double precautions at the rolling mills, and if anything happens in the next few days we'll know that Brant is at the bottom of it all."

He patted her reassuringly on the arm and took his hat from a peg.

"I'll see you at the dance to-night," he said. "Don't worry your pretty head too much about what may be nothing after all."

An Interrupted Dance

THE Slovak Hall was a brick building of considerable size provided by the Crocker Steel Works as a place of recreation for their employees, and from September to May a dance was held there every Tuesday night.

The main room was gay with paper chains, streamers, and balloons, and couples were already dancing on the polished floor, when Joe Kosovic arrived, dressed in a tweed suit for the occasion and suffering the discomfort of a stiff collar. He found his daughter sitting out the dance on a chair against the wall, and he bore down on her bristling with indignation.

"Gerta," he said, "dat Doc Davis, he no come, huh?"

"He said he'll be here," she replied mildly; but Joe was not satisfied with that.

"What's der matter wid dat fellow?" he growled. "I got most pretty girl any place!"

Several of the other girls, thus disparaged, showed their annoyance in their glances.

"Please, dad!" implored Gerta; but Joe was not easily to be silenced.

"I t'ink you like heem pretty well, eh?" he boomed.

"S-s-s-sh!" she hissed, and just then Brant came up.

"How about a dance, Gerta?" he suggested, offering his arm.

Gerta had no desire whatever to dance with a man she half suspected of being responsible for all the trouble at the steel works, but she did not want to make her aversion too apparent.

"Aw, come on!" he said.

She stood up, and she had started to waltz with him when Tony entered the hall, looked round it, and waved a greeting. She stopped short and released herself from Brant, and Tony made his way to her.

"I thought you'd come," she said gladly.

"I've just got back from the hospital," said Tony, his eyes on Brant. "There's been another accident."

The waltz, at that moment, came to an end. The dancers heard the dread word "accident," and gathered round.

"What was it?" asked Gerta.

"An electric crane broke while it was lifting a heavy load," Tony replied, still watching Brant. "It fell and caught one of the workmen. I'm not even sure we can save him."

"That's awful," said Brant. "Where did it happen?"

Tony stepped a foot or so nearer to him, and his face was set.

"Don't you know?" he challenged.

"Say, what d'you mean by that crack?" Brant blazed at him. "Nobody could be as dumb as you've been around this town, and if you don't watch your step you're gonna get in plenty of trouble!"

"You mean something might fall on me?" suggested Tony.

"Why, you—" Brant clenched his fists as though to strike, but Gerta slipped hastily between the two men.

"You keep outa this!" Brant shouted at her, and she was thrust aside with such violence that she stumbled against a bystander who prevented her from falling. Out shot Tony's left in a swift upper-cut to Brant's jaw, filling his mouth with blood from a bitten tongue, and down went the agent with a crash.

He was up again in an instant, and he rushed furiously at the man who had laid him low. Joe Kosovic pulled his daughter away; the others hurriedly made room for the fight that was inevitable.

Tony stopped Brant's rush with a straight left that sent him reeling against a table. The safety agent was not popular with the steelworkers, and in any case they would not have dreamed of stopping a scrap. They shouted encouragement to Tony, who needed none; they jeered at Brant as he rose and struck out with both fists.

In spite of his weight and strength, the crook proved no match for his lithe August 29th, 1936.

opponent. Now and again he got in a blow under Tony's guard, but he himself suffered severely. His mouth became torn against his teeth, blood streamed from his battered face, and finally, amid derisive yells from the male onlookers, he received a jolt to the point of the jaw that lifted him off his feet and sent him backwards against a wall, whence he slid to the floor.

He sat there dazed for a while; then rose in baffled rage, but kept well away from Tony.

"Now listen, you guys," he bellowed, "this is your fight, not mine. I tell you that's the fellow who's the cause of all your accidents! How long have you had trouble at the mill? Ever since he's been there!"

The last statement was more or less true, and Slavonic feeling was turned suddenly against Tony. A number of the steelworkers advanced menacingly towards him.

"Now get this, all of you!" he said, facing them. "I'm trying to help you. Somebody is behind all this trouble, and you'll find out who it is at the right time."

He turned towards the door, but a powerful Czech who was one of Brant's accomplices barred his way.

"Jus' a minute!" he roared.

"There's an injured man over at the mill hospital," said Tony. "I've got to get back there to take care of him."

"You talk wit' us first!" cried the fellow, and he grabbed hold of Tony's collar. But Joe Kosovic bounded forward, swung the Czech round, and knocked him flat on his back.

"Are you all crazy?" he cried. "Der doctor here, he's friend of mine. He friend of every man here. Any man wants to fight him got to fight me, Joe Kosovic, first!"

He started to take off his coat. "Come on!" he challenged wrathfully. "I take on ten men, all at same time!"

In all probability he could have justified that boast, for he was the biggest man in the hall and a veritable Hercules for strength. But he was not given the opportunity.

"No, no!" cried the steelworkers; and Joe's rage melted away in a grin. Back went his coat, and the grin was bestowed upon Tony.

"All right, doc," he said, "I t'ink you can go back to hospital now, eh?"

"Thanks, Joe!" Tony murmured gratefully, and he walked out from the hall. But Gerta flew after him, stopped him on the steps.

"I'm afraid to let you go," she faltered.

"Don't worry about me," he said reassuringly. "The District Attorney should be on his way here by now."

She went back into the hall to find her father in full control.

"Play music!" he was shouting from the middle of the polished floor. "Come on, everybody, dance! Dance while you are young!"

The band struck up a lively fox-trot, and the floor became crowded with dancing couples. Brant sneaked out at a side door and hurried off to his house. He climbed the stairs to Danny's bedroom after he had washed his face, and he wakened the youngster, who sat up blinking.

"Listen, Danny," he said anxiously, "listen to me. Did you talk to anyone about what you heard last night?"

"Huh?" Danny rubbed his eyes with his knuckles and stared at his father.

"When you heard us talking about the mill—did you tell anyone about it?"

"No, pop, I didn't. Honest!"

"Are you sure?"

Danny nodded emphatically.

"Yes, sure, pop. My teacher wanted to know, but I wouldn't tell her."

Brant gulped.

"You mean Gerta?" he demanded sharply.

"Uhuh."

For several long minutes Brant sat on the edge of the bed, his lips compressed, his brain active. Then slowly he rose and looked down at the boy.

"Listen to me, Danny," he said. "I'm going out for a while. When I come back we're leaving here. You get up and dress yourself and wait for me. You understand?"

"Where you goin' pop?" asked the boy. "Can I go with you?"

"No," snapped Brant. "You stay here and keep quiet. You'll probably land us all in gaol yet!"

He strode out from the room, and Danny heard his heavy footsteps on the stairs and he heard the front door slam. He slid out of bed, ran to a window and raised the sash. His father was almost running up the road.

"Wait for me, pop!" he shouted, with his head out of the window. "Wait for me! I don't want to go to gaol!"

"I'm Halliday!"

SLEVSKY lived in a little one-story wooden shack half a mile nearer the steel works than the boarding-house where Tony resided. He was having his supper when Brant rapped at the front door, and he went to it with his mouth full.

"Come in," he said, viewing his visitor in manifest surprise, and led the way into an untidy room and rescated himself at a table upon which a sheet of newspaper served as a cloth. "Have some coffee?"

Brant shook his head and sat down in a chair.

"Slevsky," he said, "I've come to tell you that the last job's got to be done to-night. They're closing in on us!"

Slevsky drank from a cup, eyeing the agitated safety agent over the rim of it. "Der south furnace, eh?" he suggested.

"Yeah," said Brant, "and there mustn't be any slip-up. You'll find the acetylene cylinder leaning against the fence in the backyard where we burned up that scrap. Watch your chance, and slip it in one of those charging cars that's on its way to the furnace."

Slevsky muttered something in his own language which Brant did not understand.

"In five minutes the Crocker Steel Works will be scattered all over Pennsylvania—and we can clear out. Right?"

Slevsky shook his head and put down the cup.

"Not me!" he growled.

"Say, what d'you mean?" exclaimed Brant. "You promised to do one more job!"

"Not to blow up der whole of der furnace building and everyone in it!" Brant jumped up from the chair.

"You don't get your split, and I don't get mine," he said, banging his fist on the table, "until the job's finished!"

"Up to now," retorted Slevsky, "we take all of der risk and you get most of der money. You finish der dirty work!"

"Say, what are you trying to do?" howled Brant. "Walk out on me, you dirty ape?"

Slevsky sat bolt upright, and his hand went to a belt where he kept a knife. Brant had made a mistake in calling the Slav names, and he knew it. He went out from the room and out from the shack without another word, and he made his way swiftly towards the steel

Guardian of the Golden Gate, San Francisco stands to-day as a queen of seaports, but perhaps she dreams of the city she was—splendid, sensuous, vulgar and magnificent. This thrilling drama of the Barbary Coast starts on December 31st, 1905, and ends on April 18th, 1906, the day when San Francisco perished by earthquake and fire. Starring Clark Gable, Jeanette MacDonald and Spencer Tracy

A City of Corruption

IT was December 31st, 1905, and San Francisco had gone mad. The streets were thronged with people shouting, singing, and rejoicing. Many of the big wine merchants were handing out their cheapest brands of wine in bucketfuls to the clamouring mob; fat restaurant proprietors flung wide their doors; saloon-keepers invited all and sundry to drink at their expense; the tramcars proclaimed that those who chose could ride free of charge; and like mad people the crowd sobbed, laughed and sang for very joy.

Striding along a crowded street came a tall, weather-tanned, handsome man. He wore dress clothes, an opera hat was on the side of his head, and a black silk cloak, lined with white, was over his shoulders. He rested on his ebony stick, near the big square, to stare round with a hard, mocking yet amused gaze. To him they were just puppets in the game of life.

Blackie Norton had been born and bred on the Barbary Coast, and by sheer strength of will, determination, and hard work had made himself a power. At the age of thirty he owned the Paradise Club, the biggest gambling joint and place of amusement in San Francisco. He believed in himself but not in God.

Though Blackie traded on the corrupt vices of the people his gambling tables were straight, his drink was not doped fire water, and every man and woman in his service worshipped and feared him. In these crowded streets people were continually shouting his name and shaking his hand. In the city itself, away from that section known as the Barbary Coast, he was known by all and sundry.

"Fire! Fire!" came the shout as the clanging of bells was heard.

Blackie's face hardened when a somewhat ancient fire-engine dashed past and one of the men yelled that the fire was down on the Barbary Coast. He clambered on the next horse-drawn fire-truck that had to pull up because of the crowd, and was conveyed to the scene.

It was not his place, but his eyes gazed anxiously upwards at two white figures that screamed frantically from a second-story window. He went up to the officer in charge of one engine and shouted that the only way to save them was the sheet. The wooden building was ablaze and there was no escape through those leaping tongues of flame.

Someone shouted that it was the two children of the proprietor of this cheap lodging-house that were trapped.

The firemen got out their sheet and took up a position beneath the window. "Jump!" yelled the crowd.

The two children hesitated. A red light appeared behind them, and the crowd knew the flames had burst through the floor. The girl jumped first and was safely caught, and that inspired her young brother to take the leap.

Blackie grinned when he heard that both were safe and that there was no one else trapped in the blaze. He pushed his way through the crowd to go to his own palace of fun. He almost knocked down a young woman who was carrying a heavy Gladstone bag and walking along with head bowed. He mumbled his apologies and went on his way.

That triumphant, mocking grin came to that handsome face when the lights of the Paradise showed up. By the noise the place must be crowded. The people of San Francisco regarded the Paradise as the grandest of the many places of amusement. It catered for all classes.

Blackie entered his vast saloon and saw that everyone was gay; he entered the gambling-rooms and found them crowded with well-dressed men and women, and was on his way to his own private box, that overlooked the stage at the north end of the main saloon, when a round-faced, almond-eyed man slid quietly to his side.

"The world and his wife are here to-night, Blackie."

"You've said it, Babe." Blackie gave his manager an approving slap on the back. "Good work."

"I hear there has been a fire on the Coast."

"Yeah, one of those rickety wooden joints," answered his boss. "Those places are a disgrace. Two kids daru near got trapped."

"Blackie, a young woman looked in. Says she can sing and dance—mostly sing," smiled Babe. "Mary Blake's a swell-looker. Got style about her. Care to look her over?"

"Sure, send her along."

Blackie Norton went to his box and watched some of the acts. His girls were the best-lookers in the city, and could they dance? He chuckled as someone threw an egg at Mat, his comedy dancer. Mat was a fine fellow, but a rotten comedian, and it was only that peculiar generous streak in Blackie's nature that stopped him from firing the Irishman. A sound made him turn, and he saw the girl.

Blackie didn't know it, but it was the girl with the Gladstone bag that he had nearly knocked down in the crowd. "You sing?"

Great frightened eyes stared from a pretty face at him. Speechless the girl nodded. The biggest orchestra of its kind in the city began to play a popular waltz.

"Sing that?" Blackie snapped out.

The girl gave a gasp, smiled nervously, moistened her lips, and made a wheezing, half-formed note. She swallowed and began again. Blackie looked up. The girl had a richness to her tone that was pleasing, though she had a way of faltering that was irritating.

After a while he gestured for the girl to stop singing, and with anxious eyes she watched him as he got up to tower over her, for Blackie Norton was a big man. He reached out and pinched her arm, and she recoiled.

"Um. A bit skinny," he muttered. "Take off that hat." She obeyed, and he nodded. "Yeah, hair's all right. Very well, you can sign on at seventy-five a week."

"You're engaging me?"

"Sure!" grinned Blackie, and then his eyes opened wide, for the girl had slithered to the floor in a dead faint.

Blackie was not a doctor, but he knew when a person was starving. He carried Mary to his grand rooms over the Paradise, and soon Mary was enjoying the first square meal in weeks. He learnt that she had been lodging in the house that had caught fire. Except for the clothes she wore, and the contents of the hand-bag, she had lost everything.

"Why did you come to 'Frisco?"

"My father was a clergyman and he died some years ago," Mary answered simply, and wondered why Blackie's lips twitched. "I could not succeed with my singing in New York, so mother helped me with the fare to this city."

Daughter of a parson, mother in New York. He did not believe it for a moment. He asked her the price of the fare, and was surprised to get a correct answer. Blackie frowned because this clear-skinned girl seemed somehow different. The expression in her eyes puzzled him, and when he heard her lock the door of the study that he had placed at her disposal he knew it had been fear. A shrug of his shoulders and the proprietor of the Paradise dismissed her from his thoughts.

Next morning, if one had looked into the gymnasium that Blackie had built for rehearsals and for his staff to keep physically fit, there could have been witnessed a gruelling fight. Blackie Norton, dancing round and trying to slam a wiry, sandy-haired man with muscles that stood out like whipcord.

"Blackie, this is the first scrap you've had with me in weeks," the sandy-haired boxer said with a broad grin. "And you don't seem so good to me. Suppose you drank too much last night, seeing in the New Year."

"One of these days I'm going to give you such a poke in the eye!" wheezed Blackie, and rained blows on the other.

But the sandy-haired fellow was a boxer, and he side-stepped all these fierce blows.

"You're out of condition, my lad. Stale. You're puffing like a walrus."

August 29th, 1936.

"You're all in yourself," panted Blackie. "You couldn't knock me flat if you tried."

The sandy-haired fellow became a whirlwind. Bonk! Slam! Wallop! Blackie Norton found himself reclining on the canvas nursing an aching jaw. He looked up at the victor and grinned.

"For twenty years I've been allowing you to slam me around. I can't think why I do it."

"And I can never understand why I should get so much pleasure in knocking you down, though maybe I'd prefer to knock a little sense into you. Well, I've got my service, so I'll be changing."

Blackie Norton, garbed in a silk dressing-gown, was climbing out of the ring when the door of the gymnasium opened and four of the most important members of the Barbary Coast appeared.

"Hallo, boys, you're up early. Happy New Year!"

"Blackie, it would be a happy New Year if we thought there were going to be no more shows like last night. You heard that Dutch Herman's place was burnt out, and the houses on either side are almost destroyed. You heard about it?" The speaker was a big, clean-shaven man.

"I saw it—two kids had to jump for their lives," answered Norton. "Seems to have got under your hide, Kelly."

"It's got under mine and the rest of us!" shouted Kelly. "All those places are dry and rotten. They're death-traps in a fire and the sanitary arrangements are a disgrace—they should be pulled down. Did you take a look at the fire-engine, Blackie?"

"Looked like a hearse to me."

"That's all it's fit for!" shouted an elderly man. "They're old, out of date, and inefficient. One of them lost a wheel and another had a hose full of holes. The fire-escapes were too short, and by the mercy of Providence there was no loss of life. But there has been, Blackie, and we want someone to fight our case. Have these old houses rebuilt and get some new fire-engines. Blackie, we want you to stand for supervisor for the Barbary Coast."

It was a very great honour that these people had offered to Blackie Norton, but that young man was not going to let them see he was elated at the prospect. He discussed the matter in a half-hearted, casual manner.

A clergyman appeared. It was the sandy-haired boxer. Father Jim Mullin at once joined in the conversation.

"Blackie, you're an evil-doer in my eyes, but I reckon they might do worse and get you as supervisor. You couldn't be worse at it than you are with your boxing."

"Gentlemen, after the praise from Father Mullin and his entreaties to stand for this position, I feel I should think it over. Gentlemen"—Blackie pushed open the door—"let us adjourn this discussion to the saloon."

The deputation grinned their approval. They knew that Blackie would stand for supervisor, and that with luck they would celebrate the nomination with champagne.

Jack Burley

LATER that day, Norton chanced to come into the Paradise and hear someone singing. Ah, that would be his new girl. He listened, and decided that it was pretty good.

The old music-master known as the "Professor," who now had charge of the Paradise band, beamed at Blackie

Norton and said excitedly that Miss Blake had a lovely voice.

"Sounds all right to me, but I don't want any of those mournful dirges," the owner said in his crisp, harsh manner. "I want something with some go in it. I've got a swell wardrobe, and when you're through with that practice come and see me."

"Yes, Mr. Norton," Mary whispered. "What sort of a dress do you want me to wear, because—"

Blackie chuckled. "Don't fret yourself. It's so long it don't even show your ankles."

That night Mary Blake, wearing a delightful dress of the Victorian period and a high-brimmed bonnet, sang for the first time to a 'Frisco audience. And she was terribly nervous, but the encouraging nods of the Professor helped her, and after a while she managed to smile. The Professor got a signal from Blackie—the song wasn't lively enough. Mary then began to sing "San Francisco," and Blackie's eyes lit up. It was one of the very latest musical productions, and he had thought the music and scales too hard for any of his singers. It sounded grand from Mary Blake. The Paradise roared its approval.

"Babe," Blackie told his manager. "Go and give that girl a two-year contract—she's worth it."

A week after Blackie's nomination the Paradise received two visitors. The bullet-jawed, hard-eyed man with the shrewd, twinkling eyes was Jack Burley. The little man with him with the immense forehead, bald head and hooked nose was a famous composer. The time was ten at night, and Mary Blake was due to make her appearance in a few minutes.

Blackie gave Burley a sharp glance as the two men were shown into his box.

"Hallo, Burley, don't often see you this way."

"Just dropped in." Burley spoke in short, crisp tones. "Norton, I'd like you to meet Signor Baldini."

The men all shook hands, and Norton asked for the waiter to bring them a bottle of the best champagne. He knew there were reasons for this visit by Burley, and had a strong idea that if he had to guess he would not be far wrong. But he gave no hint that this visit was other than a friendly call.

"I hear you're standing as supervisor," Burley muttered after a while.

Norton grinned—one guess had been right.

"Sure—sure."

"Like to take some advice?"

"Sure—sure."

"I shouldn't, if I were you," Burley's jaw was more protruding than usual, though he was smiling and his eyes twinkling. "That's the advice of a friend."

"Burley, there are many things that want straightening up down on the Coast," answered Blackie. "House property is the chief one. Tumble-down places all jammed together in filthy, narrow, gas-lit streets. We had a fire the other night and it's a miracle a whole street wasn't wiped out. And talking of fires brings me to a second point. The fire system in this grand city is antiquated."

"You know I've got property on the Coast?"

"I know, and I reckon most of it should be pulled down." Norton stared fixedly back at Burley. "All you think about is making money down on the Coast to pour into that comic Opera House of yours on Park Avenue."

Burley turned away, then looked suddenly at Norton with narrowed eyes.

"All the more reason for warning you to lay off standing for supervisor." He relaxed in his chair. "I got influence in this city—I can pull strings."

"Have another glass of wine," drawled Norton. "And thanks for the advice." He pointed towards the stage. "Reckon you'll enjoy this next act. Mary Blake, a new singer."

The curtain went up and Mary appeared. Signor Baldini turned eagerly to the stage, and so did Burley. Another of Norton's guesses had been correct. They had heard of the new singing star of the Paradise.

Mary sang a lilting tune with a rollicking chorus. The crowds applauding vigorously and fairly bellowed the chorus. They yelled for more. Blackie Norton tried hard to hide his triumphant grin. Strange what a feeling of pride he had in hearing his patrons clapping the star that he had found. The Professor glanced round and Blackie signalled for an encore.

The satisfied smirk on Blackie's face turned to a bewildered frown. This was funny sort of music. No pep in it. All violin and piano. Then Mary began to sing. It was a language that bewildered him at first, then he sat up with a jerk—Mary was singing in French.

He was about to signal to the Professor to stop this nonsense when he noticed the rapt attention on Signor Baldini's face. Great guns, did they like this sort of stuff? He glanced at the vast assembly. Everyone seemed to be staring at the stage with his mouth open. Again Blackie raised his hand, and then hesitated. Once or twice Mary glanced nervously across at the box. The applause at the end was deafening.

"Sniperb!" babbled Signor Baldini, clapping like a madman. "Not for years have I heard such a voice. Mr. Norton, the girl has a glorious voice. Her top notes are divine."

"What an opera star!" growled Burley. "She'd be a sensation in 'Faust.'" He fished out a card from his waistcoat pocket. "Waiter!" he called out, and a servant came to the side of the box. "Give that to Miss Blake, please, and say that Signor Baldini and myself would be charmed if she could honour us with her company in this box as soon as she is free."

The waiter glanced at Blackie, who gave an indifferent nod. Actually Blackie was boiling with anger at Burley's cool effrontery.

A few minutes later there was a faint knock at the door, and Norton called out "Come in!" It was Mary Blake, and she still wore the picturesque dress that the owner of the Paradise had bought for her at a big figure. With curled lips Blackie noted the hero-worship in Mary's eyes when she was introduced to Signor Baldini. Never had she imagined that it would be her fortune to meet so famous a singer. She was effusive with Burley and told him that San Francisco must be grateful for the wonderful productions at the Tivoli.

"Blackie"—Burley turned and stared at the other man in his domineering, aggressive way—"Miss Blake is just the singer that Signor Baldini has been wanting. We are putting on a number of operas in a few weeks' time, and I want Miss Blake to be the star." He turned to the girl. "If that is agreeable to you, Miss Blake?"

"I should love to sing in Signor Baldini's operatic programme," said Mary, her eyes sparkling with joy.

Blackie Norton did not say anything very much, but sat back and listened whilst the two men and the girl started to discuss these operas and the parts she should play.

Blackie Norton was dancing round the ring, trying to hit a wiry, sandy-haired man with muscles that stood out like whipcord.

"You wish to leave the Paradise?" interposed Blackie.

Mary Blake glanced at him in alarm because there was a harshness in his voice.

"It is a chance I have wanted all my life," she answered. "I have sung in the chorus many times in New York, but never have I had the opportunity to play a part. I'm thrilled."

"And you wish to leave the Paradise?" he repeated.

"Well—er—if you don't mind," stammered Mary.

"Look here, Norton, Miss Blake has a voice that only one person in a million has, and you can't wait her to stay down in a place like—in surroundings like this."

"Why don't you say what you mean, Burley?" sneered Norton. "You want to take her away from the foul atmosphere of the Paradise to the heavenly aroma of the Tivoli. What my feelings on the matter are don't appear to count."

"You can't keep her here, Norton," rasped Burley.

"Oh, can't I?" Blackie smiled. "Well, I happen to possess a two-year contract."

"I'll buy it off you. Two, three, four thousand dollars—name your price."

Norton stood up.

"You could offer me a million and my answer would still be 'Nothing doing.'"

"I can be a good friend but a bad enemy," Burley's eyes narrowed.

"So you've hinted before." Norton glanced significantly towards the door.

"I hate to detain you gentlemen."

"I'm sorry, Miss Blake," Burley held out his hand to the girl. "I'm afraid I can do nothing. Our hands are tied."

The girl smiled pathetically, bit her lip and suddenly ran out of the door. Blackie grinned and held open the door.

"Signor Baldini, guess we'll be getting back to that dinner engagement." Burley's eyes glowered at the man he had always hated. "Maybe I'll get the chance to pay you back for this one day, Blackie."

Won and Lost

MARY BLAKE was fascinated by the power and charm of Blackie Norton, and yet she feared him because a man who ran a place like the Paradise must be ruthless. Yet it was hard to explain why the artistes and the staff of the Paradise worshipped this man. Mat, who was the comedy act, was always growling and complaining, and yet one had but to say one word against Blackie to see what he thought of his master. The grandest man on the Barbary Coast. The girls who sang and danced would have given anything for the attentions he bestowed on the new girl, and Mary Blake realised that because of this she was not very popular.

From Father Mullin she learnt something of the true character of the man. She saw a lot of the priest, because Blackie, for some strange whim, had insisted that the girl sing in the choir on service days and on Sundays.

"Blackie and I were horn and bred on the Coast," Father Mullin told her. "As we grew up we became inseparable chums. There was a gang, and Blackie was the leader. He never knew the word 'fear,' and it would take too long to tell of our exploits. Time passed, and we got work on the waterfront, but I saved my money whilst Blackie spent his. I was anxious to better myself, and I managed to save enough to go to college. San Francisco was and is a corrupt city, and it was my ambition to try in my small way to help the city of which I was so proud. I took Holy Orders and came back to find Blackie running a gambling joint. Making money out of other poor fools' folly, and yet, Miss Blake, that gambling was always on the level.

"Blackie has pampered and battered on the weaknesses of the unwise and the rich, and thinks that if he didn't make money this way, someone else would, and as his gambling, his saloon, the drinks he supplies, his entertainments are always on the level, he reckons he's doing San Francisco a good turn. Nothing unseemly in his shows, no person allowed to get drunk, and no slave wages for his people. He doesn't believe in religion, and yet he gave this mission hall its glorious organ. He would want to knock my head off if he knew I had told you. He bought and paid for this hall, but not a soul knows that but you and I. A mixture of good and evil is Blackie Norton, and if only he could be brought to the right side of the street he would make a grand man."

Burley came to the Paradise to make another bid for Mary Blake, and Norton had the girl come to his office. There he told the girl frankly that if she wanted to leave him he would tear up the contract to please her. Mary was surprised and asked if he wanted her to go to the opera, and his answer was an emphatic "No!" Mary smiled happily, and, to Burley's amazement, said she would remain at the Paradise.

Unfortunately Blackie Norton was to win and lose Mary Blake. Her story that her father had been in the Church he did not believe. He believed that all men and women were liars. He told her that if ever she wanted to go to the opera house she was free to go. He was so kind and considerate to her that she knew she was falling in love with him. One day she promised to marry him.

It was then that Blackie made his big mistake. Overjoyed at his good fortune, he ordered that everyone at the Paradise should have champagne with him. He told everyone his good fortune and proclaimed that Mary should become the Queen of the Barbary Coast. He would laden her with jewels and give her fine clothes. But Mary wanted just to be a wife, not a queen. Pomp and splendour were not for her, and, in her misery, she went to Father Mullin. He condemned the actions of Blackie, and that night Mary Blake left the Paradise to see Jack Burley. She left a simple note stating she realised they could never be happy together, and that Blackie was too much wedded to his Paradise Club. She wanted to be a wife, not a display board.

For days Blackie Norton raged, and it was inadvisable for anyone to go near him. News came to him that Burley was opening with "Faust," with Mary Blake as one of the stars. Blackie took out Mary's contract and an ugly expression appeared on his handsome face.

It amused his cynical humour to buy up a great number of seats for the opening night and to dress up a great number of his people in fine clothes. They were to go to the opera house and behave themselves unless he gave the order for them to do otherwise. He secured a box, and, attired in faultless evening attire, went there, accompanied by the Babe and a burly, untidy man who chewed popcorn.

Naturally Jack Burley was warned of the presence of his enemy, and one can imagine his concern when he heard that Norton was accompanied by a sheriff's deputy. Just after the curtain had gone up Burley came to the box and asked Norton to step outside. In his blurt way Burley asked what he was doing at the theatre and why the sheriff's man.

August 23th, 1926.

"You seem to have forgotten that two-year contract, Burley," sneered Blackie. "I have a writ that entitles me to take Mary Blake off your stage whenever I think fit." He grinned. "I may do it to-night. Who knows?"

"You'd ruin her career for your own selfish ends?"

"No one walks out on Blackie Norton and gets away with it."

"I'll get an injunction from Davis."

Norton smiled.

"Davis is away on a fishing trip. I lent him my own yacht for a few days. Burley, I've got this fixed, and you can't do a thing. Maybe I'll sit through the first act."

Blackie Norton went back to his box and winked at the Babe.

"You should have seen Burley's face," he chuckled. "I thought I would never stop laughing."

But Norton stopped his chatter when Mary came on the stage. Never had he seen her look so beautiful. She sang and her voice enthralled him. He tried to break the spell of her singing to look at the audience. They were spell-bound by the liquid notes that flowed so freely from this lovely girl. Even the hard-boiled folk of the Barbary Coast seemed under the spell of her singing.

"Sings kinda pretty, don't she?" whispered Babe. "Seems kinda shameful to spoil her act."

Norton scowled at his henchman and moved uncomfortably.

"Shall I go and serve the writ?" muttered the sheriff's man. "High time that dumb dame was stopped doing that squawking act."

"I'll tell you when," snapped Norton.

All the while Jack Burley sat in his box sweating with fear that any minute Norton would act and stop the greatest success the Tivoli had ever known.

In the last act Babe nudged his boss and gave a significant gesture. The sheriff's man had slipped out of the box. He was tired of waiting and he was going to serve that writ. Norton got round to the back as the man was trying to get past two scene-shifters on to the stage. Norton settled the matter in the way he knew best. He clouted the sheriff's deputy under the jaw with a punch that knocked the big man out for half an hour. There and then Blackie tore up the writ.

They met in her dressing-room, and Blackie's heart beat fast at the glad expression on Mary's face.

"I felt I had to try and make good, Blackie. You do forgive me?"

"Say, who am I to hold out against these three thousand mugs who went goofy over you? Say, I never caught this opera racket up till now. It was a fine show. Do you know I was proud of you to-night, Mary?"

When Father Mullin came round to congratulate the girl on her success he had to do a double act.

"You've got the best of everything, Blackie." Mullin gave the friend of his youth a hearty handshake. "May you both be very happy."

But Jack Burley did not offer his congratulations when he came to the dressing-room. His face was a thundercloud at the news. In his domineering way he had decided that Mary Blake was not only going to be the star of the opera, but his bride. He made a number of sneering remarks about dragging Mary into the gutter, but ceased when Blackie squared up to him with clenched fists. It was Mary who stepped between the two angry men.

She loved Blackie Norton, and it was her rightful place to be by his side. She thanked Burley for his kindness to her, and said that after they were married she would persuade her husband to let her sing again at the opera house.

But Blackie Norton had not learnt his lesson, and he was too sure of himself. He should have married Mary the very next day, but he told her it must be postponed till after his election as supervisor. In the meantime he would bill her as "The Colorado Nightingale" and draw all San Francisco to the Paradise to hear her sing.

On the opening night Blackie was in his office and helping a rather pale Mary don a long black cloak, when Father Mullin was shown in.

"What's wrong?" Blackie knew that scowling expression on the priest's face was not friendly.

"Are you out of your mind?" demanded Mullin. He pulled open Mary's cloak. "Fancy showing Mary to that mob outside in that sort of garb. Your wife to be and wearing tights." "I'm making her the Queen of the Coast."

"You're not going to exploit this girl," cried the priest.

"I love him, Father," Mary cried.

"It isn't love to let him drag you down to his level," was the angry retort. He turned on Blackie. "You can't take a woman in marriage and then sell her to your public."

Blackie Norton, for the first time in years, did a thing that as soon as it was done he regretted bitterly. He struck Mullin in the mouth with his clenched fist.

The priest sagged back against the door and blood streamed slowly from a cut lip, but his eyes never wavered from Blackie's face.

"She's not going out there."

"Get out there!" Blackie swung round on Mary. She faced him fearlessly. "Do you hear me?"

"You brute! You inhuman beast!" she cried, a trifle hysterically.

That maddened Blackie so much that his face went a mottled red. "You leave with him and you're never coming back!"

Father Mullin opened the door. Mary Blake went with him. Blackie Norton was alone.

A minute later there was a pounding on the door and Mat burst into the room.

"Hey, Blackie! Hey, Blackie!" he shouted. "It's Burley—he's giving the joint the works."

Jack Burley had availed himself of the Johnston anti-gambling law, which the grafters of San Francisco had so far discreetly winked at, in order to be revenged on Blackie Norton.

With a twisted smile Blackie Norton watched the police smash up his gambling tables. He laughed. What did anything matter now?

The Chicken Ball

MARY BLAKE looked upon Jack Burley with awe and respect. Any man who spent most of his money on promoting opera must be a good man. To her simple, generous soul it never occurred to her that the money had been obtained from prohibitive rents on the Barbary Coast and various other forms of graft.

It was Mrs. Burley who persuaded Mary to make her home with them and to marry her son. She admitted that she had lived all her life in San Francisco and that she started her business career as a washerwoman. She had married Burley, a good solid man, and they had one son.

"They call this the wickedest city in the world," said old Mrs. Burley. "And it's a bitter shame, for deep down underneath all our evil and sin we've got right here in San Francisco the finest set of humans that was ever rounded up in one spot. They had to have wild adventure in their hearts to set out for here in the first place, and that's why they're so full of untamed devilry now. But we can't go on like this. Sinful and blasphemous. That's why I want my boy to marry a good woman like yourself, Mary Blake."

Mrs. Burley did not know that at that moment her hero of a son was engaged in planning further drastic action against Blackie Norton. Burley had Mary once more within his grasp, and he was out to smash his rival so that there was no chance of losing Mary again.

On the night before the Chicken Ball the police again raided the Paradise. This time Burley had dug up some old law against drinking, and he had all the judges of San Francisco in his pay. What matter if he did lose thousands of dollars rent from the Barbary Coast and joints such as the Paradise as long as he secured Mary Blake as his wife?

Blackie Norton knew that this would mean a five thousand dollar fine and perhaps a year in gaol. What did it matter? Then Blackie remembered the Chicken Ball. He spoke to the captain who had made the raid.

"I'd like to help you, Blackie," admitted the captain. "You know the boys and I don't like doing this, but we gotta obey orders. You had a grand chance of winning that ten thousand dollars at the Chicken Ball, and I'm going to help you. You want to rustle up bail and get your entertainers out. Okay by me, but you must be at the station by six in the morning."

But Jack Burley had thought of everything. The whole of the entertainers and the staff of the Paradise had been arrested without the option of bail. Then, on top of everything, Blackie got a message that the men who wanted him to stand as supervisor had backed out—they had been warned that their business would suffer in the same way.

Jack Burley was at the Chicken Ball, and Mary was with him. The two other guests at the table were Judge Corrigan and his wife. Burley's chin stuck out arrogantly as he glanced round at the crowded theatre. Soon he would be the biggest man in San Francisco, and in a very few days Mary would be his wife. It was just when success was within his grasp that two things intervened to bring his castle tumbling to the ground like a pack of cards. The first was a woman, and the second an earthquake.

Della Bailey was one of the hostesses of the Paradise. She had been a singer and a dancer, but she was not so young, and, out of the kindness of his heart, Blackie Norton had pensioned her off. Only occasionally did she go to the Paradise, and then mostly as a guest. She was at the Chicken Ball, and seeing Mary sitting there in all her finery made the older woman's eyes blaze. She picked up a chair and sat down at the Burley table.

"Hallo, Della!" Mary smiled a little uneasily. "I'm glad to see you again." "You won't be for long." Della spoke clearly and plainly. "I just dropped over to tell you what I think of you. I haven't seen you since you walked out on the best man in San Francisco to marry the town's Number One rodent."

"I think you'd better go, Della," snarled Burley.

"Oh, no, I've got a few things to say first! Now, in case you folks don't know, I'll tell you that this snake here has just had a padlock put on the Paradise and thrown all of Blackie Norton's performers in quod. That's what Blackie got for picking this phoney up out of the gutter and giving her a chance." Her blazing eyes turned on Burley. "Sit still and hear me out, you rat! Don't think I want to breathe the air near you any longer than I have to. Blackie was fighting to get decent conditions on the Coast, but you smashed him. You, who live on the Barbary Coast and who own most of it. The dirtiest double-crosser that ever breathed!" Della stood up and looked at the white-faced Mary. "I reckon you two are just admirably suited. You're cheap. You're marrying him for his money. Well, I hope you and your crook husband have a life of purgatory!" She laughed sneeringly. "I knew your Jack Burley rather well once. You ask him."

"Is Blackie in prison?" asked Mary. "No, but he will be mighty soon," sneered Della. "He's given me jewels and money, and I'm to use that to keep those that stood by him at the Paradise from poverty. That's the guy you treated like dirt and gave the air for a skunk like Burley. Good-evening!"

Mary Blake stared after Della as if she could not realise all that she had heard. Her elusions in Jack Burley were shattered. San Francisco was certainly a place of corruption.

"I'll get a warrant for that woman's arrest!" rasped Burley. "She can't lie about me, defame my character, and —"

"I know she did not lie!"

Mary faced him.

The curtain went up on the first act. Mary watched the stage, but she saw nothing of the show. Act after act followed to receive its share of applause.

"Ladies and gentlemen, the last entry of the evening was supposed to have been from Mr. Blackie Norton's Paradise, but as it is now forty-three in the morning and the performers have failed to arrive, we'll close the show without them," announced the chairman of the ball. "We will select the winners—"

"Mr. Duane!" Mary had stood up. "I'm representing the Paradise for Mr. Norton."

"Mary, I forbid you to go up there!" Burley was on his feet.

Before the withering look of scorn Burley stepped back, and Mary walked towards the stage. The crowd craned their necks and many whispered excitedly at this unexpected incident.

Mr. Duane helped her up the steps to the stage.

"Play 'San Francisco,'" Mary instructed the orchestra leader.

The crowd applauded and then was silent.

"San Francisco, open your Golden Gate

You let no stranger wait
Who's knockin'—who's knockin'

"I should love to sing in Signor Baldini's operatic programme," said Mary, her eyes sparkling with joy.

Outside your door.
San Francisco, here comes your wandering one,
And I'm sayin', and I'm sayin'
That I'm gonna wander no more!
Other places—other places
Only make me love you best
Tell me—tell me
You're the heart of the Golden
West!"

Mary sang superbly, and it brought the place to its feet. They yelled the chorus in delirious abandon. She had to sing every verse, and they insisted upon singing the chorus four or five times.

Della, when Mary had gone on the stage, had hastened outside to see if she could find Blackie. He had been to the ball and gone away to see if he could raise any money; he had promised to return for Della. The woman met him outside and told him a big surprise awaited him. Thus Blackie Norton was present to hear Mary sing the last verse and to hear the thunderous applause.

By the handclapping of the crowd, so was the competition judged. When Mary stepped forward the people yelled themselves hoarse.

Two attendants appeared with a large silver cup, which Mr. Duane took from them.

"The appearance of Miss Blake for the Paradise was as much a surprise to me as it was to you. However, I congratulate you upon your choice, and present the award to Miss Blake for Mr. Blackie Norton, with my congratulations."

Mary had just taken the cup when a voice bellowed:

"Wait a minute!" And Blackie himself pushed through the crowd. He climbed on to the stage, and his face was contorted with fury. "There's a mistake here, Mr. Duane. I never told this woman she could appear for me." He snatched the cup away from the frightened girl. "I don't need this kind of dough."

He flung the cup on the stage.

Mary held out her hands piteously to Blackie Norton, but he paid no heed. He jumped down from the stage and forced his way through the crowd towards the exit.

Burley saw that he might still win, and hastened to the stage with Mary's cloak.

"Shall I take you home, dear?" he urged.

The chairman, to prevent an awkward scene, signalled to the orchestra leader to play something. The time was ten minutes past five. The band burst into a rollicking melody as Burley began to guide the half-fainting Mary towards the exit.

Suddenly the whole place seemed to rock and sway. It was five-thirteen—San Francisco's doom was at hand!

Buried Alive

THE whole building seemed to quiver and shake as if giant hands had gripped the walls and were trying to shake them down. Glasses rolled from tables and smashed on the floor. The orchestra stopped, and everyone stared round with aghast faces.

"What was that?" whispered Mary.

Before Burley could answer the rumbling started again, but with increased violence. A huge chandelier with many lighted candles began to sway backwards and forwards. Suddenly it fell, and one poor wretch was pinned beneath the debris. As several started forward to his rescue there came a terrible rendering sound, and one of the walls cracked open, bricks and dust showering down. The floor began to sway and lift as if controlled by some gigantic wave. People were flung off their feet. Women screamed in fear and stark terror. A balcony on which were several hundred people seemed to concertina, collapsed with a roar, and the masses hurled down amidst broken masonry, beams, girders, and bricks. Many were buried alive.

It was an earthquake.

Burley swept up Mary in his arms. At all costs they must get out of this place before it crashed down on their heads.

Blind panic seized everyone, and men and women fought and screamed in their efforts to get to the exit.

Blackie Norton had reached the main street when the earthquake started. The tremor was so violent that he was flung into the gutter. As he staggered to his feet the whole of the street seemed to open. Yawning chasms appeared everywhere. A man disappeared with a scream of terror. Something crashed down into the street—part of a heavy stone balcony.

Earth tremors had been felt before, and Blackie knew that this was an earthquake. Instinct told him that it had only just started. Mary was in that building. As people came swarming out he tried to fight his way back. People punched and clawed at him.

All the while the earth was quivering and shaking, and above the sound of falling walls was a terrible rumbling that seemed to come from the bowels of the earth.

At last a battered and bruised Blackie was back in the great hall. Over the heads of the surging people he sighted Mary in Burley's arms. She saw him.

"Blackie!" she screamed.

He tried to get to her, but was swept back by a mad rush of fear-demented people. He was swept back into the street. Vigorously he smashed people from his path and tried to force his way back. A sudden, terrible roaring sound, and someone yelled hoarsely: "The roof! The roof!" Tons of masonry, glass, beams, girders, and a domed pinnacle poured down, sweeping everything in their path, tearing away floors as if they were made of straw, crashing down on those people still in the building. Not one escaped alive. Only the four walls remained of the vast hall, which but a few minutes before had been one of the city's show places.

A fresh tremor shook the doomed city. The four walls crashed inwards. The glass-protected entrance collapsed, and it was in the debris of an ornate, wooden archway that Blackie was trapped. Part of a door fell on top of him, so that the woodwork protected his body to some extent from the rain of bricks.

Winded, almost unconscious, stifled with dust, he lay there sprawled out, unable to move.

In those early hours of the morning demon terror gripped the mighty city of San Francisco. Walls of buildings collapsed, sides of houses were ripped away, lamp-posts collapsed in the streets, great chasms appeared everywhere, churches made of stone crumpled up, water mains burst, and telegraph-poles crashed down, adding to the confusion.

Very slowly his senses returned to Blackie Norton. He endeavoured to move, and found that his shoulders were free, but his legs pinned. With his hands he strove to push the bricks and debris away from him. The dust made him splutter and choke. The effort made his head ache and throb. He squirmed and writhed, and was able to move his legs a little. He managed to get his hands down his sides and move some more bricks. He could now move his body, but his feet seemed caught; he managed to get a grip on the door, and literally pulled himself forward. Bricks fell down on his head, but he paid no heed. Cool air came down to him, and he felt that freedom was not far distant. He clambered out of the hole and stood there swaying. His dress clothes were torn, his white shirt was foul with dirt, his trousers were ripped and torn, and blood had clotted on his face from head wounds.

Blackie shook himself and staggered out into the street. The place seemed deserted. There was a faint light. All around sounded sudden crashes, and he knew toppling walls were still falling. Then he heard distant screams and shouts of terror. There seemed for a moment a lull in the earthquake, but even as he thought this there came another violent tremor, and, hearing a cracking noise, looked up in time to see a whole side of a house bulging outwards. He ran, and just got clear in time.

Another lull, and Blackie came back to the spot where he had been buried alive and escaped so miraculously. He looked grimly at the pile of debris that had been once the famous Lyric Hall, where but a short while ago Mary had been singing. What had happened to Mary? A cry made him whip round, and next moment he was dragging away some woodwork. From beneath he dragged forth one of the waiters. The man had also been saved by a door, and was little the worse for his terrifying experience.

"Thanks—thanks, Mr. Norton!" the man gasped.

"You think you can walk?"

"Yeah, I can make it."

Norton pointed.

"Then get away from here to an open space while there's time. One moment"—as the man stumbled away. "Do you know if Mary Blake got out all right?"

"I didn't see her," was the answer.

Here and there lay still, lifeless bodies, and Norton shuddered at the sight. Two more men and a badly hurt woman he dragged from the wreckage. He found a distracted husband trying to drag his wife from beneath a pile of bricks.

"Connie's still alive. I can hear her breathing," the fellow shouted hoarsely.

Another man came tearing up to them.

"Here it comes again. You'll get killed! Come on, get out of here!"

The earth shook, more chasms opened in the streets, and more buildings came crashing down. A huge block of stone missed Blackie by inches, and he clutched at the half-demented husband. Poor Connie had to be left to her fate.

When that tremor had passed, back came Blackie Norton. He found the man on his bended knees, and praying.

"I have been a sinner! Oh, Lord, forgive me!"

"Have you seen Mary Blake?"

"Leave me alone!" the man screamed.

Baffled, Blackie continued his search. He found a girl standing staring at the ruins of a place that had once been her home.

"Have you seen Mary Blake? Or Jack Burley?"

She stared at him with eyes that seemed lifeless and pointed with a listless hand.

Beneath a huge beam he found Jack Burley. His enemy was dead. But where was Mary? Then he peered down, and saw in that dim light that Burley was clutching something. It was part of Mary's dress. Under some bricks he found part of her evening cloak. She must be buried under the wreckage of this wall.

Like a madman he began to fling bricks right and left. Some men appeared, and he shouted to them to help him, but they paid no heed.

The earthquake had its final tremor, and the chasms in the street gaped wider so that cars and traps and debris fell into these cracks that were hundreds of feet deep. But still Blackie Norton tore at that pile of bricks.

Live wires came crashing down into the streets and ignited a broken gas-main. In a flash there was an explosion and flames were running madly in all directions. There were sudden explosions as the flames spread. The buildings and houses that were so full of timber seemed to catch alight at once.

The fire that followed the earthquake was far more terrible.

The Fire

WITH drooping shoulders and blackened visage Blackie Norton walked amidst the ruins of San Francisco. Here and there were blazing houses, but he stared at them dully and listlessly.

Two fire-engines clanked by, the horses' feet pounding on the road in a mad gallop. A salvagc cart followed in their wake. Blackie came upon them later grouped round a fire-hydrant.

"My house is on fire!" a man was shouting. "Four blocks down on Folson Street!"

"Can't you do something?" asked Blackie.

"It's no use, brother," muttered one of the firemen. "The water-main's broken. There's no water to fight the fire."

Blackie made his way to the Grenoble Hotel and there he found a bellboy helping a crippled woman and an old man down the stairs.

"Mary Blake lived here."

"She lived here, but she hasn't been since the 'quake," was the answered. "We're getting everyone out of here. The fire's creeping this way."

With dulled indifference Blackie saw a man and a woman rush down the stairs with two children in their arms. The children were screaming in their panic.

"Let's get out of here!" yelled the man frantically.

Blackie left the hotel to resume a search that he feared was futile. From a terrace he was able to look down on the city. It seemed to be blazing from east to west. It was a weird and terrible spectacle. He stared down into the street and saw droves of people scurrying towards the hills, carrying all that they could save. He went down towards the fire, and shuddered at sight of a man hanging from a beam. On his chest was the dire warning—"Shot for Looting."

In a street he found a man arguing with a party of Marines.

"Why can't you do something about saving the rest of my building instead of destroying it?"

"I can't help it, mister, that's in the path of the fire," answered an officer.

"That's my building you're going to dynamite. I've worked half my life for it."

"We're doing it to save other buildings. We haven't any water," was the reply. "It's the only way we have of stopping the fire. We're dynamiting from here all the way to Nob Hill."

The officer turned. "All right, men, let her go."

A Marine pressed down a plunger. There was a mighty explosion two hundred yards away and a huge building collapsed with a roar.

Nob Hill. That was where aristocrats like Burley had lived. Perhaps Mary was with Mrs. Burley. She had not been under that pile of bricks and masonry. He had torn his hands to shreds to prove that. In gardens blackened with ashes he came upon a dazed old woman who was being helped along by a man who was obviously one of her servants.

"Mrs. Burley, have you seen Mary Blake?"

"She was with my son," Mrs. Burley said in quavering accents. She looked at him fixetly. "He's dead, isn't he? Well, it's heaven's will."

Blackie bowed his head before such resignation.

An officer rushed up. "You'll have to move on, Mrs. Burley—we're dynamiting."

Blackie stood there and stared at the beautiful house that Burley senior had built and which had only been shaken by the quake.

"Are the wires all set?" shouted a voice.

"All set!" was the response.

"Fire!"

The Burley mansion seemed to split in twain. The walls were blown out, and then the roof collapsed in a cloud of black smoke. There were rumblings and crashings, and when the dust and smoke drifted away there remained but an unseemly and unsightly pile of broken brick.

"My son was born there," sobbed Mrs. Burley, and yet had time to appreciate the grief of this big man. "Never mind, Blackie Norton. It's heaven's help we both need now. Good-bye."

Under beetling brows Blackie stared after the bent figure. Heaven's help—what drivel!

When he attempted to go back to the Lyric Hall an armed Marine stopped him with fixed bayonet. No one could go that way. Blackie saw the streets and broken houses blown to pieces.

"It's no use, brother," muttered one of the firemen. "The water-main's broken. There's no water to fight the fire!"

"Mary! Mary! My darling!" a voice shouted, and hopefully Blackie turned.

It was some other Mary, and his hands sank limply to his sides. He asked a Marine if he had seen a red-headed girl in a white evening dress.

A shake of the head.
"Heaven help you to find her, brother."

Heaven made him think of Father Mullin, and he found that the mission-hall no longer existed. A soldier informed him that Mullin was alive and doing rescue work at some stables near the Green Park. He came to the stables and found a Red Cross nurse, who passed him inside.

Everywhere were rough beds full of groaning, badly hurt men, women and children.

"How are you, Blackie?" A weak voice called.

There on a rough stretcher lay Mat. His head was all bandaged and he was trying to grin. An elderly nurse was at his side.

"Hallo, Mat, how are you?"

"I'll pull through; I'll be all right."

Blackie looked at the nurse, who gently shook her head.

"Hey, Blackie," spoke the dying man. "I hear that Mary went on for you at the Chicken Ball. I guess we were wrong about her—she's a great kid."

"You're right, Mat."

Blackie glanced at the nurse.

"Don't leave him."

From bed to bed went Blackie Norton, but he did not find Mary Blake. He was on the point of leaving when he heard a voice that he recognised and turned to see Father Mullin trying to soothe a frightened child. On tiptoe he edged closer, and a nurse whispered that the child was all right but badly burned.

Father Mullin looked up and saw him.

"Hallo, Blackie."

"Hallo, Tim."

Father Mullin got up from the bed and came towards Blackie. It was the first time the two men had met since the quarrel. The priest held out his hand, and Blackie gripped it eagerly.

"That map of yours needs some attention."

"No, no, no, I'm all right." Blackie hesitated because he dreaded to ask the question. With a stutter he stammered forth: "You haven't seen Mary, have you?"

"So you haven't found her yet?" Mullin gave a twisted grin. "You can't want her for Paradise—that's gone."

"I wasn't thinking of the Paradise, Tim. What's happened to-day has changed my whole outlook." Blackie put his hand to his aching head. "I met poor old Mrs. Burley. She knew her son was dead. 'It's heaven's help we need.' She said that to me. I know I do need heaven's help."

The gaze of Father Mullin was searching. He gripped Blackie's arm.

"Come with me."

"Where are you taking me?"

Father Mullin smiled.

"Mug, I'm gonna take you to Mary."

Blackie Norton could scarce believe his ears. He stared at Father Mullin like a man bereft of his senses.

He must not hope for too much.

"Is—is she all right?"

Mullin nodded.

"Yes, she's all right." He beckoned. "Come with me, friend."

"The Fire's Out!"

BLACKIE NORTON stumbled out of the stables that had been turned into a relief hospital, and followed Father Mullin.

They came to a grassy hill that was covered with tents, carriages, and rough shelters. There were thousands of refugees here. Soldiers and Marines were maintaining order and discipline.

"You folks will have to be vaccinated," a soldier was telling a batch of new arrivals. "It's for your own good. You must go to the hospital tent."

A sign from the Father passed them through, and they went up the hill. Then Blackie heard a voice singing, and the words carried clearly on the still air. It was the hour after dawn.

"Nearer my God to Thee—Nearer to Thee—E'en tho' it be a Cross—that raiseth me."

Blackie Norton's head turned as if he wished to hear more clearly. Surely that was a voice he knew? With eager stride he hastened after the priest.

Father Mullin stopped, and Norton saw a small group of women clustered round a tent. In their midst was Mary, whilst on the ground two women bent anxiously over two small figures. Blackie could see that the figures were two children. The singing ceased, and then one of the women gave a cry of anguish. She was led away weeping, and someone covered one of the children.

"This poor mite will live," someone whispered.

EPISODE 4—

"THE PHANTOM RIDES"

Read This First

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way into the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delancy, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Later, Mary's father is killed, and Buck is charged with the crime. He convinces Mary of his innocence and hands her a wallet which belonged to her father and which contains the map of a hidden gold mine.

Three outlaws attempt to take the wallet from her. She is fleeing from them in a wagon when Buck comes to her aid, but the vehicle plunges into a river, carrying the girl and the Ranger with it.

Now Read On

The Outlaws Snared

SWALLOWED by the flood-waters of the Pecos, Buck and Mary sank far down, but at last they felt themselves rising again, and after what seemed a cruel eternity their heads broke the surface.

Gasping, Buck looked about him, and as he saw Mary nearby he struck out for her and lent her a supporting arm. Then all at once he noticed the ponies that had carried the wagon over the bluff.

There was no sign of the buggy itself. No doubt it was resting now on the bed of the river. But the animals which had been harnessed to it had apparently broken the traces, and at the moment they were making for the opposite shore.

Scarcely had Buck observed them than he became aware that the two sturdy "plugs" were not the only horses in the water, for closer at hand were two others—his own brone Silver, and the mustang that had belonged to the gangster known as Mort.

It dawned on him immediately that these creatures, galloping in the wake of the buggy, had automatically followed it over the cliff, and in view of the powerful surge of the river it was fortunate for the Ranger and his companion that they had done so.

"Quick, Miss Mary!" Buck jerked out. "Grab that outlaw's pony!"

The animal in question was passing within reach as he shouted the words, and the girl clutched a trailing stirrup-leather as it swam by. A moment later Buck was swerving towards Silver, and he managed to grip the brone by the tail, hanging on for dear life as the mount forged its way across the river in the direction of the far bank.

The outlaw's mustang to which Mary had attached herself was pursuing the same course, and ere long both horses gained dry land, whereupon they were released by the man and the girl who had clung to them so desperately.

Joining Mary, Buck helped her up the bank, and then, leaning against the bole of a dead tree, the pair of them turned to scan the bluff from which they had plunged a little while before.

Dirk and Blackie were silhouetted there against the sky-line, each seated tensely in his saddle, and the luckless Mort was with them, fuming over the loss of his horse and nursing his unshaven jaw, which was swollen by the blow that Buck had dealt him some five minutes previously.

"We certainly put one over on those three hombres," Buck Grant said to Mary. "You've still got that wallet, haven't you?"

"Yes, right here," she answered, tapping a fob-pocket in her skirt.

"Okay, let's get out of here!" Buck declared. "You take that outlaw's brone. I'll see you safely to your ranch."

Silver and the pony that belonged to Mort had halted a few yards from the bank, and, climbing astride the animals, the Ranger and his companion rode off at a good speed, for they knew full well that there was a ford higher upstream—a ford which they would have had to cross if they had not been hurled into the river, and one which Dirk and Blackie could negotiate if they chose to take up the pursuit.

And, indeed, Dirk and Blackie had no intention of abandoning their efforts to secure the chart that was in Mary Grayson's possession.

Watching the flight of Buck and the girl from the bluff on the other side of the water, Dirk spoke in an ugly tone of voice.

"I ain't riskin' my neck by jumpin' off this cliff," he snarled. "The only thing we can do is to head for Buffalo Crossing and pick up the Hidden Valley trail where it leads due north o' the river."

"That crossin' is a mile upstream," Blackie protested. "By the time we make it, Grant and the girl will have a long start on us and we'll never overtake 'em."

Mort interposed a comment.

"I wouldn't be so sure o' that," he growled. "That horse o' mine is a sulker when anybody but me is ridin' him, an' the Grayson girl will find out that he won't keep up a gallop for long with her in the saddle. You fellers better git goin'. Remember the boss wants that wallet. I'll hoof it back to the hide-out."

Without further discussion Dirk and Blackie swung round to spur along the rim of the bluffs, and they were about three-quarters of a mile from the point where they had left Mort, when the ground began to level out. A minute later they were descending a shelving bank to splash rapidly through the shallows of a ford which linked the south section of the Hidden Valley trail with its northern counterpart.

Reaching the other side of the Pecos, the two outlaws gored the flanks of their mustangs with spur-rows and drove the anguished beasts at full stretch along the road, and it was as they were pounding over a low ridge that they espied Buck and Mary ahead of them.

The girl and her protector were a considerable distance away, and the instant they became aware that they were being pursued they urged their horses forward at a quickened pace. But presently Dirk and Blackie realised that the claim Mort had made in regard to his bronc was by no means false, for it soon became apparent that the creature was not answering to the sharp touch of Mary's heels.

Buck realised this, too, and, looking back, saw that the outlaws were gaining fast. Holding Silver in check, he dropped behind Mary to cover her for fear there were any shooting, and he was still taking the dust of her pony's hoofs when the trail penetrated a belt of woodland.

Man and girl entered the forest, and, as the trees concealed them from the view of the pursuers, Buck pressed alongside his companion again.

"You'll have to make Hidden Valley Ranch alone, Miss Mary!" he rapped out.

"What do you mean?" she panted.

"I'm going to fix those two fellers so they won't play tag with you any more on this particular trip," he rejoined grinning. "Don't worry, I can handle 'em. Keep goin', and don't stop till you get home."

He swerved off into a thicket of brushwood and left her to gallop onward, a bend in the road carrying her out of sight in the space of a few seconds. Then, while the laggardly thud of her horse's feet gradually died away, he held himself in readiness for the approach of Dirk and Blackie.

He had not long to wait. Entering the wood, they came racing along the rail in headlong style, and in the shelter of the thicket Buck coolly detached a lariat from his saddle-peg. Then, even as the gangsters were sweeping past him, he spun the lasso above his head and sent the noose snaking through the air.

It dropped neatly over the two hard-riding desperadoes, and they were caught in the tightening snare of it. Another instant and the rawhide rope sprang taut, and, whipped out of their saddles, Dirk and Blackie hit the earth with a shock that knocked the breath out of their bodies.

With a supreme nonchalance Buck cantered out of the brushwood and slackened the noose of his lariat with a deft hitch, allowing the crooks to roll free. But long before they had recovered themselves, and long before they rose slowly and abjectly to their feet, he was idly training the barrel of his six-gun upon the two of them.

"Take a tip from me and separate yourselves from your gats," he drawled. "But mind you get rid of 'em quick, without tryin' to use 'em."

The outlaws were glowering at him now, and at first they hesitated to obey his command, but a significant gesture of his six-gun convinced them that discretion was the better part of valour, and sullenly enough they took out their forty-fives and threw them on the ground.

"Well, that's fine," said Buck. "And next you're gonna separate yourselves from your duds."

Dirk and Blackie gaped at him for a brief interval, and then hot resentment showed on their villainous features.

"Come on, you heard me!" Buck ordered curtly. "Let me have your duds. Get in that thicket where I've just come from and throw 'em out to me. D'you hear what I say, or do I have to make myself plain by pumpin' a few slugs around your feet?"

The threat stampeded the rogues into the brushwood, where Buck watched them keenly as they proceeded to discard their clothing. Then one after another in swift succession shirts and belts and breeches were tossed out to the ranger.

He caught each garment adroitly as it came, and flung the apparel high into the branches of a tree nearby, where the clothing dangled well out of reach; and finally, when his victims had stripped to their underwear, he picked up their shooting-irons and threw the weapons far into the heart of the forest.

"So-long, fellers," he called at last, and riding away, drove their loitering ponies from the scene as he went.

Fifteen seconds after he had departed Blackie and Dirk crept ignominiously from the thicket in their pants and vests. There was no one to see them, but if they had been in the main street of Maverick City they could not have looked more distressed or more infuriated.

"Curse him!" Blackie ground out. "I'd rather he'd turned us over to the sheriff than left us like this."

"Turnin' us over to the sheriff was one thing he couldn't do!" Dirk blazed. "Not with a murder charge hangin' over his own head. Yeah, an' that ain't the only thing that's hangin' him. Before I'm through I'll make Grant eat lead for playin' this trick on us!"

Blackie looked up into the branches of the nearest tree.

"Come on," he said sourly. "We gotta get our clo'es."

It took them a quarter of an hour to recover their garments and their self-respect, and the feat was not accomplished without a good many failures and a good deal of barking of shins and skinning of hands. But at long last they secured their clothing and dressed themselves, and after a further delay they managed to find their guns.

Gloomily they tramped out of the forest then, and they must have walked a couple of miles before they saw their horses, which Buck had abandoned in the vicinity of Buffalo Crossing. By that time, of course, it was futile to think of resuming their pursuit of Mary Grayson, and railing bitterly against the man who had frustrated them they hauled themselves into the saddles of their broncs and made for their lair in the hills.

Low Meredith

HALF an hour after she had parted company with Buck, Mary Grayson rode up to the veranda of the Hidden Valley ranch-house, and as she arrived there she found Helen Moore in conversation with two of the hands.

One of the cowboys was Spooky, the other was the puncher known as Lew Meredith, and the first-named was amusing Helen with some anecdotes of life on the range when the girl from the East became aware of her friend's approach.

"Why, Mary," she exclaimed, observing the newcomer's bedraggled appearance, "what happened? Where's the buckboard?"

Mary proceeded to give an account of the adventure that had befallen her, and when she had finished her story she turned to Spooky and Meredith.

"Are any of the boys about?" she asked them.

"No, ma'am," Spooky rejoined. "They're off lookin' for some strays." Mary had now dismounted from the pony that had carried her to the ranch, and she handed the little cowboy its bridle.

"Well, never mind," she said. "I'll see them when they get back. But listen, Spooky, I want you to take special care of this horse in the meantime. Put it in the corral. It belongs to one of the outlaws who chased me, and it may be valuable evidence."

Spooky took charge of the bronc and led the creature away. As for Lew Meredith, he remained with the girls, and was still lingering beside them when Helen spoke to her friend earnestly.

"You know, Mary," she declared, "I don't think it's safe for you to be carryin' that wallet around with you. Why don't you take it to Maverick and deposit it in the bank there?"

The other girl pursed her lips, and then nodded slowly.

"Maybe you're right," she agreed. "I'll hand it over to the bank manager the next time I'm in town."

Lew Meredith offered a suggestion. His manner was that of one who was anxious to be helpful, though there was a queer glint in his narrow eyes.

"If there's anything important in that wallet, Miss Mary," he volunteered, "maybe I could tote it into Maverick for you right away. My horse is all ready saddled."

"No thanks, Lew," Mary rejoined. "I'm afraid I couldn't trust that wallet to anyone, for it's my responsibility, and mine alone. Don't worry, I'll put it in father's safe for the time being, and it will be all right there—"

She paused, and then as if on an after-thought:

"I'll tell you what you could do, though," she went on. "You could ride to Maverick and send the sheriff out here. I'd like him to see that outlaw's horse as soon as possible."

Lew Meredith saluted her briskly and strode off to the bunkhouse, where his pony was tethered to a hitch-rail, and as he was mounting the bronc he saw Spooky coming away from a small corral not far away.

In accordance with Mary's instructions, Spooky had penned the animal which had brought her home, and now he was returning to the ranch-house to report that he had carried out her wishes.

Lew watched him until the coast was clear, and then rode quietly over to the little corral, which was hidden from the view of anyone at the Grayson residence by an intervening grove of trees.

Reaching his objective, Lew Meredith opened the gate and fetched the captive bronc out of the enclosure, after which he closed the corral again and proceeded to spur in the direction of a tangled mass of chaparral thickets, leading the other horse by the rein.

"Come on, Woozy," he said grimly. "We ain't gonna have you turnin' State's evidence against us."

He passed into the thickets, and by the time he had won his way on to open ground he was a considerable distance from the Hidden Valley outfit. And then, pressing onward at top speed, he headed due south across the range with the outlaw's pony galloping by his side.

It was not the town of Maverick that was Lew Meredith's destination, but a lonely cabin tucked away in the hills, and on arrival there he fastened his own bronc and the other mustang to a rack outside the dwelling. Then he entered the building and passed into a room whose curtained windows admitted only a faint glimmer of daylight.

In the shadowy interior of that room a band of men were gathered, and Dirk, Mort and Blackie were among them—together with Gabe and Roscoe, the two desperados who had been responsible for the killing of old man Grayson. It was towards an indistinct figure seated at the far side of the apartment that Lew Meredith turned, however; the figure of the gang's mysterious leader.

"I've brung Mort's horse, boss," the Hidden Valley cowboy announced. "The Grayson gal was gonna hold it as evidence, and she thinks I'm on my way to bring out the sheriff to have a look at it."

The unknown leader of the outlaws gave vent to a grunt of satisfaction.

"Good work, Lew," he muttered. "I reckon you're about the only man I can depend on in this whole bunch. I've just been tellin' them what a fine lot they are—frightened by the Phantom and bulldozed by that nester Grant."

His hirelings moved uncomfortably in their chairs, and Roscoe spoke up in a tone of protest.

"Me and Gabe got rid of Grayson for you, didn't we?" he expostulated. "And you said that with him outa the way you could buy or scare his daughter off the Hidden Valley Ranch, boss."

"Yes," the head of the gang retorted, "but you missed the thing I needed most—the chart to Grayson's gold-diggin's. Our business is to grab that chart, for, apart from anything else, we'll never be able to oust Mary Grayson from the Hidden Valley Ranch if she gets possession of her father's mine."

"But why make such a play against the Grayson outfit, boss?" Dirk cut in. "If we clean up all the other ranches an' homesteads in this section we may not need Hidden Valley."

"That's where you're wrong," his chief answered fiercely. "Hidden Valley Ranch is the keystone for the new railroad that's comin' in here—the logical site for their machine-shops."

He was silent for a spell, and then returned to the subject of the chart he was so anxious to secure.

"Now maybe you fellers can understand just why I want Hidden Valley," he grated. "Yeah, you can understand all right, hut none o' you can tell me whether that wallet is in the hands of Mary Grayson or Buck Grant—or whether it's at the bottom of the Pecos river."

"I can tell you where it is, boss," Lew Meredith interposed quietly.

The figure of the gang-leader swung towards him.

"Yeah?" he jerked. "Then where is it?"

"In the safe at the ranch," was the answer. "And, with all the experience he's had, I figure Dirk here can open that ole iron box like it was a can of sardines."

The head of the outlaw band glanced at Dirk, and then focused his attention on Meredith again, and, though the gloom concealed the expression his dim-sen features, his first words made it clear that the tidings which he had just received had put him in a better frame of mind.

"Lew," he stated, "you're beginnin' to rate pretty high with me. So that wallet's in the safe, is it? All right, Dirk will have a chance to prove how smart is he at crackin' a crib."

"Better pull the job to-night, boss," Lew said. "The Grayson gal intends to take the wallet to the bank in Maverick the first time she's in town."

"You hear that, Dirk?" the gang-leader rapped out. "To-night you'll ride with the boys, and leave 'em somewhere near the Hidden Valley Ranch, so as they'll be handy in case o' trouble. Then you'll sneak into the house alone and do your stuff. If you have to run for it after you've got the wallet, the gang will cover your escape."

"Meantime, Lew," he added to Meredith, "you'd better do as Mary Grayson told you and take the sheriff out to Hidden Valley to see that horse which ain't there any longer. And watch out that nobody at the ranch suspects you're in with us. I'd hate to lose a man that's as useful to me as you are."

Lew assured him that he would give no one any cause to doubt his integrity as a ranch-hand, and a little while later he left the outlaw hide-out and made off through the hills at a rapid pace, never drawing rein until he gained the town of Maverick and the office of Sheriff Mark.

Here he repeated the story that Mary had told when she had shown up at the Hidden Valley outfit, and before long the sheriff was accompanying him northward to the girl's home, which they reached about sundown.

Mary was waiting for the representative of the law, and came down from the veranda as he and Lew Meredith halted in front of the house.

"Evenin', Miss Mary," Sheriff Mark greeted. "I'm shore glad you made your escape from them there outlaws that Meredith has been tellin' me about, though I can't help mentionin' that you wouldn't have been attacked if you'd turned over that wallet to me."

"If you hadn't talked so much about that wallet, sheriff," Mary replied cuttingly, "nobody would ever have known that I was carrying it."

Maverick's guardian of the peace was somewhat discomfited by this remark, but he soon recovered himself.

"Well, I mean to have the pocket-book now," he said. "The papers in it constitute material evidence in a major crime."

"Oh, Sheriff Mark, don't try to use such big words," the girl rejoined impatiently. "The wallet's in the safe, and I intend to keep it there until tomorrow, when I shall ride into town and deposit it at the bank."

"Now, Miss Mary, listen to me," the sheriff began, but he was interrupted just then by Spooky, who came hurrying up with a startled look on his weather-beaten face.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," the little cowboy said, "but that outlaw horse you wanted the sheriff to see—it's gone."

With a swift gesture Dirk plucked his six-gun from its holster and spun round towards the threshold.

"Gone?" Mary echoed. "What do you mean?"

"Well, it broke outa the corral without leavin' a forwardin' address," Spooky answered ruefully.

It was a piece of news which bewildered and distressed the girl, and which caused Lew Meredith to smile a covert smile that none of the others noticed. As for the sheriff, he frowned disgustedly and then took up the subject of the wallet again, but when he finally departed, that pocket-book was still reposing in the ranch-house safe, and he was forced to consider that his journey to Hidden Valley had been a pure waste of time.

Soon after the sheriff had gone, Spooky wandered off to the bunkhouse, and it was as he was lounging in the vicinity of this building that he suddenly heard a low whistle which drew his attention to a deep thicket nearby.

Peering in that direction, he was able to detect a familiar figure amidst the vegetation, and, recognising Buck Grant, he looked hurriedly about him and then gave a reassuring sign that brought the big fellow out of his hiding-place.

Buck advanced into the open, leading his bronc Silver by the rein, and he joined Spooky at a hitch-rail beside which the little Ranger was standing.

"Nobody around?" Buck queried.

"The boys are out lookin' for strays," Spooky answered, "and they ain't got back yet. A ranch-hand by the name of Lew Meredith is the only one here, but I left him over at the house with Mary Grayson. We'd better talk fast, though, in case he strolls over this way and sees us together."

"All right," his comrade said. "What do you know, anyhow?"

"Mary Grayson has put the wallet in her father's safe," Spooky informed him. "To-morrow she aims to lodge it at the bank in town."

Buck nodded approvingly.

"Fine," he stated. "That wallet will be safer in the bank than anywhere."

"Yeah, but it won't be in the bank till to-morrow," was Spooky's reply. "An' a lot can happen in a single night."

Buck's eyes narrowed shrewdly, and he gripped the hitch-rail by which he and his partner had taken up their positions.

"Don't worry about to-night," he said. "I'll be on the watch."

"As Buck Grant, the nester?" his friend queried.

"No, as the Phantom Rider," the big fellow announced. "I've got the white cloak and the silk scarf hidden under old Silver's saddle."

A few seconds later he was retracing his steps into the brushwood with his pony, keeping the empty bunkhouse between him and the main building of the Hidden Valley outfit.

Under Cover of Night

DARKNESS had descended upon the Grayson Ranch, and from the neighbourhood of the bunkhouse came the strains of music as the boys who had returned from their quest for strays crooned old-time melodies of the cow-camps.

There was something sweet and sad about the songs that they were singing, for they had chosen out of their repertoire such ballads as were in keeping with the recent bereavement that Mary Grayson had suffered. And indeed, as she sat on the steps of her home with Helen Moore, Mary found it strangely soothing to listen to the music that came floating through the night air to her ears.

August 29th, 1936.

Little did Mary Grayson know it, but she and Helen were not the only ones who were listening approvingly to the voices of the ranch-hands. For, out in the brushwood not more than a couple of hundred yards away, the mysterious figure of a cloaked and masked horseman was also enjoying the lilting choruses that the punchers were rendering in the bunkhouse.

It was the figure of Buck Grant, alias the Phantom Rider, but, although he was diverted by the impromptu entertainment that the Hidden Valley cow-boys were providing, he had not forgotten the purpose which had been in his mind when he had concealed himself in the thickets.

He was there to keep watch and ward over the ranch-house, lest the presence of the wallet that had belonged to old Grayson should tempt those outlaws who were so eager to obtain it; and, as proof of Buck's vigilance, he was quick to notice the plodding of hoofs that suddenly marked the approach of a man on horseback.

From the shelter of the brushwood Buck saw the newcomer a minute or so afterwards, and recognised him in spite of the gloom.

This was no desperado creeping up on the ranch, at any rate. The man was Harvey Delaney, prosperous cattleman, and he was headed straight for the porch steps on which Mary and Helen were seated.

Buck watched him dismount in front of the girls and join them, and in a little while he noticed the three of them stroll off in the direction of the bunkhouse, the better to hear the songs that were being sung there. And it was soon after Delaney and his fair companions had paused in the vicinity of the men's quarters that the big Ranger's keen ears again detected the sound of horses' footsteps.

It was a sound which no one at the ranch could possibly have heard, but it was audible enough to Buck, and presently he realised that a troop of men had halted in the brushwood not very far from him, for he became aware of a steady murmur of voices.

Leaving his pony tethered and hoping that the animal would remain silent, Buck stole through the thickets until he perceived a group of shadowy forms mustered in a small glade. Then he distinguished the voice of the man whom he knew as Dirk.

"All right, fellers," Dirk was saying. "You wait here and keep under cover. But if I ain't back in fifteen minutes, you know what to do."

There was a growl of assent, and, turning, Dirk crept away on foot, taking a course that would bring him to the back of the Hidden Valley ranch-house; and as he saw him sneak off through the vegetation, Buck noiselessly effected a wide detour to skirt the clearing in which the rogue had separated from his accomplices.

With extreme caution the Ranger worked towards the fringe of the brush, and as he reached the open ground he espied the figure of Dirk ahead of him.

The man had already gained the ranch-house and was letting himself in by the back door. He disappeared, and Buck at once proceeded to traverse the expanse of open ground at the double, crouching as he ran.

He, too, reached the back door of the ranch-house, and glanced across the threshold into a trim kitchen. This was empty, and, entering it, the disguised Ranger tiptoed through to a sumptuous hall in which a light was burning brightly.

The hall was also empty, but Buck heard faint movements that seemed to come from beyond the half-open door of a room on the right, the jingle of a spur, and a curious clicking sound that was undoubtedly caused by the "tumblers" of a combination-lock falling into place.

Buck stepped to the half-open door and slowly drew it wider. Yet careful as he was, the hinges creaked, and Dirk took the alarm immediately.

He was stooping at a safe in the room Buck had approached, and his skilful fingers and his attuned ear had solved the secret of the receptacle's locking device. He had actually opened the door of the safe when the creak of hinges behind him warned him that he was not alone and brought him to his feet.

With a swift gesture Dirk plucked his six-gun from its holster and spun round towards the threshold, took a step forward, then paused tensely. Almost in that same instant his interrupter showed himself, and in a flash Dirk beheld the white-robed, masked figure of the mysterious rider of Justice who was known to the outlaws of Benson County as the Phantom.

A hoarse exclamation escaped the gangster, and simultaneously his revolver belched flame and lead. But his aim was hurried, and the bullet missed by a hair's-breadth, the hot whiff of it scorching Buck's temple.

A split second later the Ranger's gun roared a blustering challenge and a slug clipped the lobe of Dirk's ear. It was enough for the thief, and he bounded to the left, out of sight of the doorway. Then with the fear of death upon him, he dived clean through an unpraised window, tumbled to the ground, picked himself up and raced like a hare for the brushwood.

As for Buck, he charged into the room as Dirk was quitting it, and at a glance he saw the open safe. Another moment and he was beside it, and on looking into it he described the wallet which had belonged to old man Grayson.

Buck decided there and then to take charge of it and make certain that it was deposited out of reach of the crooks who were after it. Snatching it up, he thrust it into his pocket, and was wheeling from the safe when he heard a commotion at the front of the ranch-house.

"You two girls keep back!" came the voice of Harvey Delaney. "Keep back. I tell you, or you may get hurt! I'll handle this!"

Buck had no mind to be identified as the Phantom, and unhesitatingly he sprang to the window through which Dirk had made his exit. Scrambling through it, he dropped over the sill and took to his heels, sprinting over the ground that the fleeing outlaw had already covered.

He was running as hard as his legs would carry him when Delaney burst into the room where the safe stood—Delaney, with Mary and Helen close behind him, for the girls had ignored the neighbouring raucher's appeals to remain outside.

As she entered the room Mary saw at once that the safe was open, and, stumbling across to it, she rummaged amongst its contents. Then she whipped round and cried out in a dismayed tone:

"The wallet! It's been stolen!"

Helen Moore flung an arm in the direction of the aperture through which Buck had escaped, and Dirk before him.

"The window!" she gasped, and suddenly she and Mary and Harvey Delaney were rushing over to it.

They espied a white-robed figure heading for the brushwood thickets, and Delaney gave vent to a smothered oath.

"The Phantom Rider!" he jerked out, and with the words he lifted a forty-five that was in his fist and blazed at Buck's receding form.

The bullet went wide, and as the cattleman was taking aim a second time a crowd of the boys from the bunk-house stampeded into the room, loudly demanding to know what the trouble was.

"The Phantom Rider!" Delancy shouted in response. "He's stolen something from Miss Mary's safe!"

He glanced along the barrel of his six-shooter again, but ere he could draw trigger Mary caught him by the wrist.

"Wait!" she panted. "Wait! They say that the Phantom is on the side of the law!"

"But, Mary, he can't be!" Delancy protested. "He's just robbed—"

"No, maybe he hasn't," the girl broke in. "Look, there's someone away in front of him. Perhaps that's the thief, and the Phantom is chasing him."

Her intervention possibly saved Buck from falling a victim to Harvey Delancy's gun. As it was, the Ranger gained the cover of the thickets about a quarter of a minute behind Dirk, who was still going at top speed and who now threshed his way towards the glade where he had left his confederates.

Dirk met the other gangsters unexpectedly, for they had moved from the clearing and were advancing to investigate the shooting they had heard.

"Dirk!" one of them ejaculated, and the fugitive recognised the voice of Blackie. "Dirk, what happened? Did yuh get the wallet?"

"No!" was the hoarse reply. "I cracked the crib, but the Phantom Rider jumped me!"

"The Phantom Rider!" another of the crooks blurted.

"Yeah, he's after me!" Dirk rasped. "Maybe he got the wallet. Anyway, he's gonna run right into our hands."

But Dirk was wrong, for even as he made that prophecy he heard a stamping of hoofs away to the right, and a moment afterwards there came the sound of someone galloping off through the thickets.

"There's your Phantom!" yelled Blackie. "Gonna run right into our hands, was he? I reckon not; but we'll get him all the same. Come on, men! Come on."

Dirk threw himself astride the saddle and promptly joined in the pursuit that was launched by his comrades. Kicking at the flanks of their ponies, the whole gang streamed through the brush in headlong fashion, with the leafy twigs of the high shrubs slashing against beasts and riders.

They could hear their quarry bursting away through the vegetation somewhere before them, and they took the same course in their wild hue and cry, till at last they swept forth on to the slope of a ridge and caught sight of the Phantom up above them.

His white brone was struggling towards the summit of the acclivity, and the outlaws raised a clamour that was punctuated by a stentorian command from Dirk.

"Give him lead, boys!" he shouted. "Don't let him cross that ridge! There's a five-mile stretch o' brush on the other side of it, and if he reaches that we've as good as lost him!"

The crooks drew their guns, and with their mounts scrambling up the slope they directed a murderous fusillade at the cloaked figure of their foe. Wickedly the jets of flame stabbed the gloom, and the blattering roar of the six-shooters echoed and re-echoed through the night as they sent their death-dealing missiles winging on their way. But it was as if the Phantom bore a charmed life, for although the bullets must have sung around him as thickly as hail his brone continued to carry him towards the crest of the ridge.

Higher and higher Silver climbed, slithering on the steep ascent, panting with his exertions, but gamely responding to the words of encouragement that his master was breathing in his alert ears. Then, turning in the saddle, Buck blazed a shot or two at the band of ruffians who were swarming up in his tracks, and despite the fact that he aimed more or less at random, one of his slugs snatched away the sombrero of a man named Keeler.

Another bullet struck splinters from a boulder in front of Dirk's mustang, and the animal swerving in fright, its rider was thrown heavily. But the fellow picked himself up, swung himself into the saddle again and cursed his accomplices as he saw that they had checked.

"You all right, Dirk?" sang out Blackie. "Of course I am," was the snarling rejoinder. "Keep after the Phantom! Keep firin' at him! Don't let him cross the ridge!"

Even as Dirk spoke those words Buck Grant was within a few yards of the slope's summit, and in a final gallant effort Silver bore him to the skyline. And now the big ranger saw the ground running stiffly away from him to an immense tract of underwood intersected by a labyrinthine

"DANGEROUS INTRIGUE"

works. Since Slevsky would not help him, he must do the thing himself.

Danny, meanwhile, had dressed in a panic and had left the house to run after his father. He saw no sign of him anywhere, and he became convinced that he had gone to the steel works, so kept on in that direction.

He came to the gates, breathless and frightened, and he dived in at them. It was a dark night, and there was no moon, but the jets of flame from the blast furnaces lit up the yards in an uncanny fashion that enabled him to find his way.

He came to the sidings, where trucks of scrap were being shunted from the railway lines into the scrapyards, and on the other side of the rails he saw a man he took to be his father.

"Hi, pop!" he shrilled, and rushed forward.

The man was a watchman, and he turned in time to see the youngster catch one of his feet in some points and fall. Heavily laden trucks were clattering towards the points.

"Hi, look out!" yelled the watchman; but he yelled in vain.

The trucks passed the points and banged into other trucks on the siding; and two shunters and the watchman scurried round to a little, crumpled figure beside the track.

Tony was seated at a desk in the outer room of the hospital when Dr. Miller emerged from the ward in which he had been attending to the injured workman.

"I've got everything well in hand," said the white-haired doctor. "Why don't you run along—go back to the dance?"

Tony looked up with a shrug. "I wasn't such a social success at the dance," he replied, "and I want to look through these accident reports. The District Attorney may want to go over them."

"Hm!" grunted Miller; and then, in at the doorway, came the watchman Danny had mistaken for his father, and the watchman was carrying Danny in his arms.

"Where shall I put him?" he asked. Tony sprang up, and one glance at the pallid face of the unconscious child was enough.

"It's Danny!" he exclaimed. "Brant's child!"

"Bring him in here," said Miller; and Danny was conveyed into the operating theatre, while a couple of miles away in Slovak Hall Gerta obtained her cloak from a dressing-room and threaded her way among the dancers to the door.

Joe Kosovic was out on the steps, smoking a pipe, and he stared at her.

"What are you doing out here, Gerta?" he asked, taking hold of her arm. "Come inside and dance."

"No, dad," she protested with a little shiver. "I just know that something's happened at the hospital."

"Aw, stop worrying!" he urged. "I can't!" she declared. "Oh, dad, I think we ought to go over there!"

"All right," he surrendered. "No happiness till you find out what you all wrong, eh?"

They set off together for the steel works.

Brant, all unaware of the accident which had befallen his small son, had reached the scrapyards without being seen; but the acetylene cylinder for which he sought was no longer leaning against the fence where he had left it, and he groped about in the flame-pierced gloom, trying to find it without revealing his presence to the men over on the sidings.

Danny, by this time, had been undressed and was lying on an operating-table in a state of merciful oblivion.

"We'd better get the boy's father here," said Dr. Miller gravely, after he and Tony had ascertained the extent of Danny's injuries. "I don't want the responsibility of what we have to do."

"Amputate?" asked Tony.

"We must," was the reply.

"No!" said Tony quite definitely. "No, not that! You can't do it, doctor! You can't leave him a cripple—helpless—with no chance in life!"

Miller frowned at him.

"But the boy's legs are crushed," he said. "The tendons are torn. There's nothing else we can do."

Gerta and her father had entered the hallway of the hospital. The door of the operating theatre was ajar, and they heard the voices of the two men inside it. Gerta crept across to the door, peered round it, and returned agitatedly to her father.

"It's Danny," she said in a low voice. "He's hurt!"

"Bad?" asked Joe.

"I'm afraid so."

In the theatre, Tony had dared to disagree with Miller concerning the need of amputating Danny's legs, and Miller had become quite annoyed at his obstinacy.

"That'll do, Davis!" he said stiffly. "I know what I'm talking about!"

"So do I," said Tony. "An intravenous infusion of saline, along with inhalation of carbon-dioxide, to combat the shock, and those tendons can be carefully repaired."

"An operation," retorted Miller, "that only a few surgeons could perform—Bergner, Rand, Halliday, or—"

"I'm Halliday," said Tony. "Let's get on with it!"

The Only Way

BRANT had found the cylinder of acetylene at last. He hoisted it to his shoulder and carried it stealthily across the yard to a string of tubs that were moving slowly towards the south furnace, loaded with charging-boxes full of scrap iron.

In amongst the scrap of one of the boxes he thrust the cylinder and walked beside the tub to cover it over with rusty bits of iron. The charging boxes, after mounting a slope, would be tilted into the furnaces as the tubs passed their yawning mouths, and Brant was satisfied. In a little over five minutes there would be an explosion that would destroy all the blast furnaces and probably most of the Crocker Steel Works.

He was hurrying towards the gates and safety when he encountered the watchman, who cried out at sight of him:

"Brant, your boy Danny's hurt!"

"Danny?" Brant stopped short. "What happened to him?"

"Knocked down by a truck," was the reply. "I just took him to the hospital."

Brant, white as a sheet, raced across to the hospital, stared wildly at Gerta and her father as he entered it, and burst into the theatre where Tony was operating.

"We've got to get him out of here!" he cried hoarsely.

Tony did not even look up from his task; but Dr. Miller looked up, and he said:

"He can't be moved."

"There's goin' to be an explosion!" Brant howled.

Tony took no notice; he was performing an operation that needed all his attention, all his skill. But he heard.

"Are you out of your mind, Brant?" rapped Miller.

"You gotta listen to me, I tell you —"

"Your boy can't be moved! He has only a bare chance as it is!"

"He's got a chance?"

Brant's face was almost as white as that of the boy on the table, and a cold sweat was on his forehead.

"He has," said Miller.

Out from the theatre rushed Brant, and out from the hospital.

"Joe," said Miller from the doorway of the theatre, "run over and turn in the alarm."

Across the yards Brant tore like a madman. He reached the slope up which the steel tubs were bobbing on their way to the furnaces, and with the shriek of the warning siren in his ears he overtook the tubs and searched in frantic haste for the charging-box into which he had plunged the cylinder of acetylene.

Tub after tub, box after box, he examined. Blood flowed from torn hands, the sweat of fear dripped from his face. He raced upwards past the moving train to a tub that had almost reached the mouth of a furnace. The heat up there on the platform that carried the rails was intense; it singed his hair and his eyebrows, it made him gasp for breath. But he found the cylinder, and with all his might he tugged at it.

It came forth in his hands just as the scrap went hurtling down into the furnace, but he lost his balance in the act of recovering it, and, staggering backwards, fell over the edge of the platform to the concrete floor thirty feet below.

The explosion that followed completely destroyed two furnaces and shook all the buildings in the plant, shattering windows and causing plaster to fall even from the inner walls of the hospital. But the siren had sounded in time to warn the steel workers, and only Brant was killed—blown to bits like the furnaces and buried under a lava of molten metal.

The lights failed in the operating theatre; but Dr. Miller knew where there was an oil-lamp, and Gerta held the lamp while he and Tony dealt with the rest of Danny's tendons.

By the time Danny was well enough to sit up in bed, the furnaces had been rebuilt, Slevsky and Brant's other accomplice had been sent to prison, and Joe Kosovic was once more melter boss at the steel works.

Danny had been adopted by Joe, and at the earliest possible moment had been removed from the hospital to his home and provided with a bed-room of his own. He was propped up against the pillows one afternoon when Dr. George Wagner arrived from New York in a high-powered limousine to see Tony, whose identity had been revealed to the world at large by the newspapers.

Gerta left the two doctors together in the sitting-room and went up to Danny's room, but at the window she looked down at the limousine that she was very much afraid was going to whisk Tony away out of her life.

"Are you crying?" asked Danny suddenly.

"Of course not," she replied from the window.

"Well, what's the matter with your eyes, then?"

"TWO-FISTED"

The Man Who Missed the Train

ON the station platform waiting for the train, Chick Moran, boxer, sat on his suitcase calmly eating peanuts out of a bag and looking as if he hadn't a care in the world. By his side stood his manager, Hap Hurley, and from the expression on his face as he talked, you might have imagined that his one desire in life was murder—slow, gloating, deliberate, torturing murder—with Chick Moran as the subject.

Actually the pair were old friends, and it had been that which had induced Hurley to become manager for Chick. Chick, he thought, showed some promise as a boxer and might possibly do big things one day; though it was only later that he had come to the realisation of the fact that "showing promise" was as far as Chick Moran ever got or was ever likely to get.

He paused for breath—and possibly for a fresh supply of adjectives. For there were very few known ones that he had omitted in his peroration.

"And all you do"—the tones of his voice would have made an Arctic night feel like the hot-room of a Turkish bath—"is to go on eating peanuts. Peanuts!"

"But they're good for trainin', Hap," urged Chick as he dug farther into the bag. "They're full of vita—vita—vita-graphs."

The manager's eyes sought the heavens while he fought vainly for suitable words.

"If I had a machine-gun here it wouldn't be them things you'd be full of."

"Don't be sore, Hap," pleaded the other. "I don't quite know what happened in that fight last night. That guy was sort of too quick for me, and—"

"Too quick for you? If a snail came charging down on you, you couldn't get out of its way. Well, if you lose to-night I'm through—through, d'you get it?"

"I shan't lose to-night, Chick. I've got that fight in my pocket. We'll clean up the money all right and—"

"Oh, forget it," replied the other wearily. "I know the words and chorus of that tune by heart. Here comes the train. Come on!"

Without even bothering to look round he walked slowly up the platform. As he climbed up into the car and the train started to move forward he spoke to his partner again.

"And just get this straight, Chick. If you—"

But that was as far as he got as he turned round. All he could do was to gasp. For there was no Chick Moran on his heels as he had believed, and it only needed one quick glance as the train gathered speed to see his man rushing along the platform, clutching a large new bag of peanuts in one hand, while with the other he waved and gesticulated in a vain endeavour to stop the train.

"Now if that isn't rotten bad luck!"

Chick Moran pulled up watching the train disappearing round the bend. He picked up his ticket which Hurley had flung at him while he had yelled to him to catch the next train, and walked slowly back along the platform. The hands of the station clock pointed to 5.15, and the stationmaster was busy with chalk on the board that directed travellers.

"Just missed that train, worse luck," said Chick cheerfully. "When's the next?"

"Five-thirty-five," said the other laconically.

"Fine!" murmured Chick. "Just twenty minutes to wait."

The stationmaster favoured him with one brief glance.

"To-morrow afternoon," he said as he turned away.

The taxi-driver outside the station gazed stolidly in front of him entirely unmoved by Chick's impassioned appeal.

"Twenty-five dollars," he said for the third time. "And I want the money now."

"But I tell you I haven't got it on me. My manager's waitin' for me the other end, and he'll pay you—I swear he will."

The other regarded him blandly. He was a large man of aggressive build and trident appearance.

"He won't," he said stolidly, "because I shan't be there."

"But I've got to get there before this evening," pleaded the desperate Chick, "and there isn't a train until to-morrow. How am I to get there?"

"Nice day for a walk," rejoined the other. "I'm told that the roads are swell."

Chick made a last vain, desperate effort. With all the persuasive powers he possessed he drew a word picture of the fight in which he had to take part, the consummate ease with which he was going to win, and the fifty dollars that were accruing to him when he had done so.

The taximan listened and nodded. Then he picked up an outside in spanners that lay beside him on the seat and fingered it thoughtfully.

"If the money ain't there," he said, "I'm bashin' you over the head with this. And when I bashes I don't 'arf ba-h, let me tell you. Still want me to drive you?"

Chick shivered involuntarily. The expression on the other's face suggested that if he had to carry out his threat he, Chick, would have no further interest in boxing for the remainder of his life. But he thought of Hurley at the other end, and that decided him.

"You won't want that, I can promise you," he said, trying his best to force a reassuring smile. "The money will be waitin' for you at the other end—it will, indeed, if you'll only take me."

"Get in," said the other laconically.

A Break in the Clouds

OUTSIDE the big boxing-hall Hap Hurley paced up and down on the pavement, muttering strange oaths under his breath as he kept on glancing at his watch. For the latter was showing it to be close on the hour of ten o'clock. And Hap Hurley knew only too well that five brief minutes stood between him and utter ruin.

He turned as he heard a footstep behind him. It was the manager of the hall, and his face was by no means pleasant to look upon.

"Where's your man, Hurley?"

The latter shrugged his shoulders.

"Ask me an easier one," he retorted.

"He should be here any minute."

The other closed his watch with a snap.

"It's ten o'clock," he said meaningly.

"Your man isn't here. I want fifty dollars' forfeit money according to our agreement. If you take my tip—"

"I don't want any, thanks!" snapped the other as he drew a wad of notes from his pocket, the last remaining money he had in the world. "When I want you to teach me my business I'll call and see you."

The manager of the hall turned away, but Hurley stood staring down the street. At the moment he realised the utter futility of mere words for the expression of one's thoughts.

For nearly half an hour he stood there. He was through with Chick Moran once and for all, but he had no intention of walking quietly out on him without a word. Chick Moran had let him down once more, and he chuckled grimly as he clenched his fists and thought of what he was going to do.

And then suddenly a taxi hove in sight, a taxi that, like some badly mauled animal, limped helplessly along on three good wheels and a busted tyre. And Chick's head was out of the window urging the driver on to further efforts.

With another mirthless chuckle, Hurley strode forward to meet his friend.

He stood listening grimly, waiting for Chick to stop talking. For the latter was going into a long explanation of how there had been no train until the following day, and rather than let him down he had been compelled to hire a taxi and drive all the way. And it had been only owing to an unfortunate series of burst tyres that they had between them failed to reach the hall in time.

"So you see it wasn't my fault, Hap," he finished. "It was just sheer bad luck."

"And it was mighty good of this chap to bring me along, wasn't it, Hap?" he added hurriedly, for the taxi-driver had dismounted, and Chick saw to his alarm that he was casting thoughtful eyes on the big spanner.

"Mighty good," replied Hurley.

"It's cost twenty-seven dollars on the clock," went on Chick a little anxiously.

"Is that so? Then I should pay him and get rid of him."

The other blinked.

"But—but—I haven't got any money. I told him you'd pay him."

Hurley glared at him in the ominous silence that followed. Chick was taking his suitcase through the window, but the taxi-driver was holding up the spanner, and there was an ominous look in his eyes.

"Do I get paid?" he demanded. "Or do I—"

"Oh, you'll get paid all right!" exclaimed Chick quickly. "My friend—"

But he stopped short at that. A man in evening dress had suddenly appeared, lurching along the pavement.

"Taxi!" he exclaimed. "I want you, taxi!"

March 14th, 1935.

He approached the trio with the friendliness of the hopelessly drunk.

"Don't want—to butt in—but—want a taxi. If I can drop you anywhere—"

Hurley took immediate charge of the situation. He saw a gift straight from Heaven, and he intended to use it.

"That's all right, old son!" he said jovially. "The driver's just going to change the wheel. He won't be a moment."

He turned to the taxi-driver, who was still fingering the spanner as if longing to use it.

"Be quick and change that wheel," he said with a fine air of authority.

"My friends are waitin'."

The newcomer laid his hand gratefully on Hurley's shoulder.

"Good—hic—fellow, you are," he said. "You and your pal—hic—are coming in to grub with me."

Hurley winked at Moran. He had an idea that the clouds were inclined to break at last. But Moran's face worried him. He was looking like a man facing a miracle.

"Take that asinine look off your face," he said under his breath. "I'll run this show."

"Where to, gov'nor?" asked the taxi-driver.

"Home."

"And where may that be?"

Moran and Hurley had got into the taxi. The man in evening dress gazed at the driver more in sorrow than in anger.

"You—hic—called yourself a—taxi-driver—and you don't know where I live? Just you drive—hic—straight ahead—and I'll stop you where I want to go."

He lurched into the cab and they started, but they had barely gone twenty yards down the street before he shouted for the driver to stop outside a big house with wrought-iron gates.

"This is my house," he said as he staggered out. "And you ought to have known it without my having—to—tell you. How much?"

"There's thirty dollars on the clock, gov'nor, but—"

The other broke in quickly. Moran and Hurley were holding their breaths.

"Darn cheap, too, I call it," he said thickly, as he handed the man a fifty-dollar bill. "And you can—keep the—change."

But Hurley sprang forward here. He had not the smallest objection to seeing the stranger pay for Moran's taxi ride, but it hurt him distinctly to see the taxi-driver get away with a twenty-dollar tip.

"Here, I say—" he began; but the other interrupted him with a finely dignified air as he held up his hand.

"You're not—going to pay," he said. "It can't—be done. It's—its my taxi."

He lurched up to the gates, but Hurley and Moran just stood watching him in perplexity. They saw a huge house in front of them, and it crossed both their minds that to go in there with their drunken companion was merely inviting further trouble.

"We can't go in with him, Hap," whispered Moran. "They'll throw us out, and—"

But diversion came here, for even while they were talking two rough, furtive-looking figures had slipped from behind an adjacent tree while the man in dress clothes was fumbling with the gate, and were creeping stealthily up behind him.

"Here, we can't stand for this," said Hurley. "Come on, Chick!"

It was a curious scene. The man in dress clothes was the only unconcerned one in the party. He leaned against the gate with a fatuous smile on his face as if he was watching a play that had been staged solely for his benefit.

But it didn't last long. Moran and Hurley, unhampered by rules and restrictions, launched themselves at their task with a will. And the two toughs were only too glad to beat a very hurried retreat.

"Jolly fine show, that!" exclaimed the man in dress clothes with drunken approval. "And now you're coming right in—to—grub with me. No, I won't—hic—listen to any arguments. In you—hic—come!"

The New Butler and Footman

IN the spacious pantry of the house Hurley and Moran sat at the table an hour later, having just finished the finest meal that either of them had known for months.

Sitting on the sofa with his head in his hands, but by this time comparatively sober, sat their host, Clint Blackburn.

He straightened himself up with an effort and surveyed them with a rueful smile on his face.

"Just tell me exactly who you chaps are and what's happened," he said.

"I've got a hazy recollection of meeting you outside. There was a fight of some sort, wasn't there? I seem to remember it."

There certainly had been. Hurley told him all about it.

"Then you insisted on us comin' in here, sir, and so we did. And you've given us a darned fine meal, and we're very grateful for it, too. He's a boxer"—pointing to Moran—"and I'm his manager, but we've had a bit of a tough break and—"

He proceeded to relate to Clint a slightly altered version of their recent misfortunes while the other listened with obvious interest.

"I wish you could take me in hand and make a boxer of me," he said. "I wasn't too bad when I left college, but at the moment—"

He paused, shrugged his shoulders despairingly. Hurley signed to his companion to let him do the talking.

"We could train you all right," he said, "and maybe make a job of it, too. But you'll have to cut the drink right out."

"And if I swear to do that," exclaimed the other eagerly, "will you two stay here and train me? I'll pay you well for it."

Moran's eyes bulged with delight, but it was Hurley who answered, calmly and coolly as if he were accustomed to handle such offers every day of his life—and to refuse most of them.

"Well, sir," he said, "I think my friend and I might consider it."

Clint sprang to his feet.

"Then it's a deal!" he exclaimed. "And we'll soon—"

But the words faded from his lips, for Hurley and Moran had risen to their feet, and their eyes were on the open door. In it stood a very beautiful girl in a silk wrap who was gazing at them with a puzzled expression in her eyes. But as Clint turned sharply her eyes moved to him, and now reproach was in them.

"Oh, Clint! Again?" she queried sorrowfully.

She turned to Hurley and Moran, who were shuffling awkwardly on their feet.

"I suppose you two men have brought him home?" she said quietly. "It was very kind of you. I thank you."

There was quiet dismissal in her voice, and once more they moved uneasily. Both had a feeling that they had had a glimpse of paradise, but that it was going to be no more than a glimpse.

Clint Blackburn, however, broke in quickly:

"They've done more than bring me home, sis," he said. "I'm going on the wagon from now onwards, and they're both going to stay here and help me. They're in the boxing world, and they're going to train me to get really fit. Now come and let me explain things to you, sis. You hang on here, you two. I'll be back in a jiffy."

Moran looked anxiously at his companion as brother and sister left the room.

"D'you think it's goin' to be all right, Hap?" he asked anxiously.

"Not if you butt in," retorted the other, who was still smarting under the memories of the earlier part of the evening.

Outside in the hall brother and sister talked together, the latter explaining the situation, while the former listened with a smile touching her lips. She was very fond of her brother in spite of all his failings, and she was willing to listen to any proposition that might save him from his weakness. In addition to which she knew that she would welcome two extra men in the house. Her gambler husband, with whom she had now refused to live, was constantly calling and making scenes; all the servants were giving notice except her maid, and she was in constant terror that her husband would kidnap her boy whom she adored. He had already threatened to do it, and she knew he would not hesitate about it out of sheer spite.

"If they will help to steady you up, dear," she said at length, "I'll be only too glad for them to stay here. They both looked to me to be decent sort of fellows."

"Well, we could give 'em a trial, sis, and see how they go."

But they both swung round as a fair-haired young girl in a dressing-gown came flying down the stairs.

"Madam," she exclaimed breathlessly, "Master Jimmy's not in his room. His bed is empty, and—"

Panic in a second, then, as on Clint's advice, all three rushed for the pantry to enlist the services of the two new men. But they all three pulled up with a jerk on the threshold. For there, sitting on the table in his pyjamas, his curly head all tousled and his big eyes shining with childish interest, sat a small boy. And on each side of him sat Chick Moran and Hap Hurley, far too busy and far too interested even to notice the trio who had appeared in the doorway.

Sue Parker took her child in her arms. Her face was wreathed in smiles as Jimmy told her excitedly how the two men were going to teach him how to box. Moran was making sheep's eyes at Marie, who was smiling and blushing; Hurley was apologising for the fright they had unwittingly caused.

Then Sue Parker, who had seemed to deliberate, addressed her brother.

"Clint," she said, "I've got an idea. Why shouldn't we make these two men our new butler and footman, as well as your trainers?"

"By Jove, that's a brain-wave, sis. What d'you say, you two?"

But Hurley's face showed quite plainly what he was prepared to say to the brain-wave. He looked as pleased as a Scotsman who has been inadvertently landed with a bad half-crown.

"Afraid you can count me out, ma'am," he said with disgusted emphasis. "I can fight, but I'm not butling for anyone."

"But, Hurley," urged Blackburn, "a butler holds a very important position in a house."

"He's welcome to it, sir," replied the other. "But I ain't."

"He wears splendid clothes, too," chimed in Sue, "and orders all the other servants about as he pleases—"

"What's that?" interrupted Hurley.

She repeated the inducement. Hurley, for the first time seemed to be considering the proposition.

"What about him?" he asked suspiciously, pointing to Moran.

"He's the footman and takes his orders from you," she smiled. "And both of you train my brother and act as body-guard for this boy of mine in case anyone tries to kidnap him."

"And he takes his orders from me?" queried Hurley with a new light suddenly appearing in his eyes.

"He does," she answered, while a worried look flitted to Moran's face.

"Right, I'm butler from now onwards," replied Hurley as he pushed out his chest.

He drew himself up and turned to Moran.

"Now you," he said, "wash up them dishes at once, and do it quick!"

A Brush with Parker

HAP HURLEY stalked gravely across the hall to the front door, giving an extra hitch to his morning coat as he did so. He had been three days in his new butling capacity and was beginning to like it. And the fact that he could now order the luckless Chick about as and when he pleased was giving life a new zest. For though he still had a sneaking affection for his friend he held it his duty to give him a lesson for past delinquencies.

He threw open the door. Before him stood a well-dressed man with a sullen, suspicious face that aroused Hap's immediate dislike, and as the other made to enter he interposed his own body.

"One moment, please," he said. "Who d'you want to see?"

The new-comer glared at him like an infuriated bull.

"D'you know who I am?" he demanded angrily. "My name's Parker."

He was evidently expecting the new butler to wilt, but the new butler, to his amazement, merely regarded him as something that was littering the doorstep. He wasn't to know that the new butler had been told quite a lot about him, mostly to his detriment; nor that the new butler looked upon Sue Parker as something for whom he would readily lay down his life.

"Do I get paid?" he demanded, "or do I—"

"Oh, so you're Parker, are you? Well, who d'you want to see?"

Parker literally fought for breath and words. He would almost have flung himself at Hurley, so furious was he, only there was that in the butler's eyes which suggested to him that he might not come off too well in the encounter.

"How dare you talk to me like this?" he stormed. "Let me pass at once or it will be the worse for you. I want to see Mrs. Parker."

But Hurley didn't move.

"And supposin' that by some chance Mrs. Parker wants to see you," he replied, "which I reckon is extremely unlikely—you shall."

With which he coolly slammed the door in his visitor's face and walked away in search of his mistress.

But he came back in a few moments. "The mistress will see you," he said, and stalked across to the drawing-room with Parker fuming at his heels.

He stood waiting inside the room as Parker flung out a furious question at his wife.

"Who is this man, and what d'you mean by having such a fellow here?" he demanded.

"I engage my own servants and you don't," she replied calmly.

She turned to Hurley, who was standing quietly at the side.

"You can leave us now, Hurley," she said with a smile. "I shall be quite all right."

"Quite sure, ma'am?"

"Quite, Hurley, thank you."

"I shan't be far away if you want me, ma'am," he replied as he left the room.

A quarter of an hour later, hearing angry voices in the hall, he came quickly on the scene. There he found Moran and Parker in heated discussion. Near them stood Marie, flushed and obviously scared.

Moran addressed Hurley eagerly.

"Let me slosh him one, Hap," he pleaded. "I caught him tryin' to kiss Marie, and I was just goin' to—"

But Hurley stayed him with a dignified gesture of his hand. His position as butler demanded that this scene should be handled in a proper manner.

"Get me this gentleman's hat, Moran," he said.

"But, Hap—"

"Get me his hat, I said."

"If you think I'm leaving," stormed Parker as Moran appeared with the required hat. "you're jolly well mistaken."

It was an impressive scene. Moran stood there holding the hat, with that in his eyes which suggested that if it wasn't taken quickly other measures might follow rapidly. On the other side stood Hurley with the expression on his face that a master assumes when he is compelled to chastise an obstreperous boy.

"I should go if I were you, Parker," he murmured blandly.

"But if you don't want to," said Moran, "we should just love to throw you out."

"And we most certainly will," chanted Hurley.

With a furious oath Parker snatched the hat from Hurley's hand. He was uncomfortably aware of the fact that both men meant what they said.

"I'll be even with you two, and don't forget it," he snarled as he strode across the hall.

"And don't slam the door, please, Parker," said Hurley smoothly, "because the mistress doesn't like it."

A Fight Has Been Arranged

THERE was a dinner-party at the Parker mansion a week later, and among the guests was a wealthy old man of the name of Masou, who recognised Chick Moran the moment he saw him. He had seen him fight and knew his exact value—neither did he rate it highly.

But he saw a chance of having some fun, and he jumped to it, as he always did. During the course of the evening, he approached Clint Blackburn and led the discussion gently to Moran.

"I've seen that man of yours fight," he said, "and he's quite useful. I wonder how he'd go with my chauffeur. He rather fancyes himself with the gloves. What about making an exhibition match in this drawing-room for next week? I'll risk some money on my chap for a bit of sport, if you like to back yours."

"Well, I'll have to ask my chap if he'll fight, first of all," smiled Blackburn. "Half a minute."

He came back soon afterwards.

"He's on," he replied.

Mason walked away, chuckling to himself. Only he was aware of the fact that his chauffeur was one Pinky Duff, famous ex-heavyweight champion. It struck him that it would be really amusing to watch some of the onlookers, and more particularly Moran when the fight was taking place. He wouldn't make big bets on his man himself, because that wouldn't look too good when the joke was discovered. But it wouldn't be at all a bad idea to pass the word round to one or two of his friends. If they chose to make bets on his information that would be nothing to do with him.

He met Parker the following day in the golf-club bar, and the latter immediately hailed him.

"Here, Mason," he exclaimed, "who's this chap you're putting up next week to fight the new footman at my house?"

Mason grinned.

"Your house?" he queried. "I thought—"

"Well, my wife's house if you like. It's all the same. I particularly want to know."

He did, too. The moment the news had come to him his anger had flamed up anew. It had been the footman and the butler who had treated him so unceremoniously on his last visit to the house, and he was anxious to get level with them.

"If you want to make some money," said Mason cryptically "you'll back my man."

"Who is he?"

Mason whispered in his ear, and a look of amazement came to the other's face.

"Straight?" he queried.

"Sure," replied Mason.

At that moment Clint Blackburn walked into the room, and going up to the bar, ordered a drink. Then he turned to the room.

"Drinks are on me," he said jovially.

"I've just dono the fourteenth hole in one."

His eyes at that moment came to rest on Parker, and they narrowed fractionally.

"Of course, I am not included in the invitation?" said Parker with a slight sneer.

"I said everyone," replied Blackburn coldly.

"I hear you're giving an exhibition of boxing at my wife's house," went on the other. "Am I lucky enough to be invited?"

"You can come if you choose—and if you behave yourself."

"Thanks so much," drawled Parker. "Anxious to back your man?"

He waited anxiously for the reply. He had been leading Blackburn up to it, and he saw him colour up now.

"Certainly," replied Blackburn coldly.

"What d'you want?"

"Say five thousand dollars," replied the other. "I'm not betting big."

Blackburn's eyes narrowed. He saw that he had walked deliberately into the trap. But in front of the rest of the room he realised that it would be impossible to withdraw.

"That's a bet," he said quietly as he turned away to the bar.

He never intended to have more than one drink when he came in, but he was to find that escape was impossible. And the one drink quickly became two, and the two mounted up to a dozen or so. And by that time he had forgotten his promises to Hurley, his sister, and had drifted into the stage in which Hurley and Moran had found him on that memorable night near his house. And by that time Parker had become quite a good chap and he had increased his bet with him to ten thousand dollars.

And it was while he was repeating it and swearing eternal friendship with Parker that Hurley came into the room in search for him.

"Hallo, Hap, old fellow," exclaimed Blackburn in tipsy joviality. "Come and have l'il drink. You know Parker—hic—don't you? Jolly good chap, Parker. Just bet me—ten thousand dollars—'gainst Moran—darn fool!"

As he staggered up from his chair, Hurley's eyes went round the room. He saw in a glance that except for Parker and the man behind the bar it was empty. And as Blackburn advanced, grinning fatuously at him, his fist went out and Blackburn sagged to the floor and lay still.

Hurley addressed Parker.

"And your dose will come later, Parker," he said meaningly.

He picked up the unconscious Blackburn as if he had been a child, and walked with him out of the bar.

The Fight

CHICK MORAN was his usual cocksuro self an hour before the fight was due to take place, but his eyes positively bulged when Hap interrupted him in the middle of his recital as to what he was going to do to Mason's chauffeur.

"Pinky Duff?" he gasped incredulously. "Why, Hap, you're jokin'!"

"I'm not. I'm speaking the plain truth," snapped the other, "and that isn't the worst of it, either. Clint Blackburn has bet ten thousand dollars on you."

"Bet ten thousand dollars on me to beat Pinky Duff?" almost screamed Chick. "Why, he's crazy—he's crazy!"

"He was crazy drunk if that's what you mean," retorted the other contemptuously. "But it was that guy Parker who made him do it. We'd better get the fight called off, Chick. I can easily do it."

But Chick ignored the suggestion.

"Isn't Parker the guy I found tryin' to kiss Marie?" he asked.

"That's the chap—the dirty crook." Chick Moran swelled his chest out and patted it.

"Oh, it is, is it?" he replied. "Then the fight's goin' on, Hap Hurley."

His companion stared at him incredulously.

"D'you really mean it, Chick?" he queried.

"I sure do big boy. And if that guy Parker thinks he's going to get Clint's money it will be over my dead body. And now I'm goin' to get ready to knock the stuffin' out of Pinky Duff."

All the same, as he sat in his corner later on with Hap giving him final instructions while the referee introduced the combatants, he began to regret his boasting. He had an uncomfortable

She wiped her eyes and walked over to the bed.

"I've just been peeling onions for your dinner," she said.

"Oh!" Danny was not by any means convinced. "Why is Dr. Davis going away?"

"Because his name isn't Dr. Davis," she told him. "It's Dr. Halliday."

"What did that man come to see him about?"

"I don't know, Danny."

"You can hear through the crack of the door if you go down and listen good."

"I don't think that would be very polite," she said reprovingly. "Do you?"

Tony and Wagner were smoking cigarettes in the sitting-room.

"I saw Carol just before I left," said Wagner. "I think she—well, she seems to feel differently now about you."

"Does she?" said Tony, blowing a smoke-ring and poking his finger through it.

"Yes. So does New York, as a matter of fact. You're going to find yourself something of a celebrity when you get back."

Tony deserted the easy-chair in which he had been sitting.

"I don't think I'm going back, George," he said quietly, and that made Wagner stare.

"Surely you're joking!" he exclaimed. "You can't bury yourself in a place like this! Think of your work—your plans—the children's clinic."

"Strange as it may seem," said Tony, "they have children in this town, and there should be a clinic for them."

"But you've got too much to give the world, Tony!" Wagner expostulated. "Your future's all before you, man!"

"My future's right here, George," corrected Tony with a smile, "in a bedroom upstairs. If you'll wait a minute I'll put the matter up to her."

He went out from the room, and he called Gerta down to him in the little hall. Five long minutes passed, and then Wagner opened the door.

Tony was standing at the foot of the stairs, and Gerta was in his arms.

"SAN FRANCISCO"

Mary began to sing one of the psalms that Father Mullin had taught her, and gradually the volume increased as those women followed in Mary's wake. Father Mullin sang and Blackie found words coming to his lips—he was singing a religious song.

Father Mullin sank on his knees. "My friends, let us pray."

Blackie Norton knelt, and Mary Blake, seeing him, came and knelt by his side.

When Father Mullin stood up, then did Mary help Blackie to his feet. For moments they stared at each other, and then she was in his arms. Father Mullin gave a satisfied little nod. Though the earthquake and fire had done terrific havoc the city had been purged. Perhaps a new and better race of people would rebuild the city. There would be very few Blackie Nortons.

Shouting made everyone glance round, and a small boy panted up to the little group.

"The fire's out!"

"The fire's out!" cried everyone, and there was a surge forward to see if the glad news was true.

From the hillside people stared down at the blackened ruins. Black, dismal and terrible was the spectacle, but only here and there showed black clouds of drifting smoke where the fire still smouldered.

"We'll build a new San Francisco!" a voice cried.

"A new San Francisco!" went up the cry, and ragged cheers swept through the masses.

"Hallelujah!" a woman cried.

Mary, her arm locked tight in Blackie Norton's, began to sing, and the whole hillside took up the refrain:

"Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord—

He has trampled out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored.

He has loosed the fateful lightning of his terrific swift sword.

His truth is marching on.

He has sounded forth the trumpet That shall never call retreat.

He is sitting out the soul of men Before His Judgment seat.

Oh, be swift my soul to answer And be jubilant my feet.

Our God is marching on.

Glory, Glory, Hallelujah—"

In a mass the people began to stream down the hill towards the ruins of San Francisco, and in the front ranks marched two men, who were linked together by a girl's arms—Father Mullins, Blackie Norton, and Mary. And as they marched forward, their expressions radiant with new hope, it seemed as if the blackened ruins faded slowly, and in their place sprang up great white buildings that seemed to tower towards the skies.

It was the vision of San Francisco as she is to-day. The guardian of the Golden Gate—a queen among seaports—industrious, mature, and respectable.

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

maze of paths where he might easily throw his enemies off the scent.

There it lay below him, an inviting panorama of dusky thickets that spelled safety. A breakneck dash down the sharp gradient and he would be well under cover when the outlaws won the top of the ridge.

But in the moment that Buck had reached the crown of the hill he had been silhouetted clearly against the starlit heavens—a distinct target for the guns of Dirk and his confederates—and the pack of desperadoes were not slow to take advantage of that circumstance.

A smashing volley rang out, and the bullets zipped viciously about the cloaked figure on the hilltop; and suddenly it was as if someone had caught him a sharp blow on the side of the head; suddenly he pitched forward over his horse's neck.

The lurch of his body took the animal out of its stride as it was going over the peak of the ridge. It missed its footing and fell, and next second man and beast were rolling madly down the far side of the hill to crash into the deep thickets at the base of the incline.

On the north slope of the ridge a cheer went up from the throats of the exultant gangsters.

"Got him!" Dirk whooped. "Got him, fellers! And now to find out who he is!"

The outlaws spurred at the flanks of their ponies with the howls of their spurs, and the brones struggled towards the crest of the hill with loose stones and rubble sliding from under their iron-shod feet. A few seconds later they gained the summit of the promontory, and there Dirk and his comrades drew rein for a moment.

They looked down the long steep slope that fell away to the brushwood thickets below and they at once beheld the figure of their hated foe. He had parted company with his horse, and both were plunging in headlong fashion through the tough scrub that matted the hillside. A trail of dust rose in their wake, and to the watching gangsters it seemed that neither man nor beast could escape serious injury in the form of broken limbs, so violent and rapid was their descent.

"There goes the Phantom Rider!" Dirk commented with a leer. "There goes the hombre that figured he could spoil our play. The Phantom Rider, eh? Well, I reckon he'll ride no more."

From the crest of the ridge the band of outlaws saw their fallen enemy and his horse roll into the thickets at the foot of the slope. Then Dirk spoke again.

"All right, boys," he said. "Let's get down there. We're gonna make sure of him!"

to fulfil the order, and then sits back impatiently awaiting results.

Paul's latest gadget is a super wind-machine, which has brought joy to the sound recorder's heart. Without creaks or squeaks, which are the bane of the sound department, the machine causes the wind to sigh softly amid the white pines in "Come and Get It," and to howl with fury in an 80-mile-an-hour gale over the decks of a replica of the Queen Mary, in a sequence in "Dodsworth."

Give Paul enough wood, sand, cement, and odds and ends, and he will show you the end of the world and make you believe you are seeing it.

Power in Hollywood

The amount of electricity required to keep an electric iron hot for more than two centuries—209 years, to be exact—just about sufficed for lighting and power on the sound stage of "To Mary—With Love." According to the studio accountant, the electricity used in making this particular film would meet the demands of all the vacuum-cleaners, radios, toasters, reading-lamps, door-bells, flat-irons and refrigerators in 1,100 homes for a full month.

Judging from "To Mary—With Love," the electrical industry on the West Coast has a good customer in the motion-picture industry. Every time they trained cameras and microphones on a close-up of Myrna Loy, who appears opposite Warner Baxter in the picture, it cost about £12. For rôles requiring less make-up the bill was slightly less. Accordingly, the accountant found that women players consume more electricity in the process of filming than men.

Although "To Mary—With Love" was not unusually costly in this respect, requiring a mere 1,832,832 kilowatt-hours, it did make use of some special lighting and camera effects in the filming of sequences from the actual fight between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney in Philadelphia in 1926, and the reception to Colonel Charles Lindbergh upon his return from Paris in 1927. The pictorial records of these events were fused with the main action of the story, through a process known to technicians as "rear projection."

In the old days, before sound came to the screen, only lighting figured in the electricity consumption. But, to-day, sound-recording and photo-electric cells and motors for mobile apparatus has increased that consumption many times over. Electricity operates cameras, runs the sound-recording plant, illuminates tents, make-up tables, interiors and even some exteriors—to help the sun along—and feeds soldering-irons, water-pumps, heaters, wind-machines, stoves, and refrigerators.

Snoops—Screen Star

Elstree's latest film find, Snoops, was taken along to the London Pavilion recently to see himself on the screen for the first time. He attended the preview of "Two's Company," the B. & D. Soskin comedy in which he plays an important rôle in support of the stars, Ned Sparks and Gordon Harker.

Judging by his reactions, he was not very impressed by his performance in the picture, for he spent most of the time curled up in his mistress' lap. To avoid confusion, it should be explained that Snoops is a very tiny Papillon dog. The only time he showed any enthusiasm was when he heard his image barking on the screen. Then he sat up, looked around and growled ominously at his neighbours. But the effort was too much, and he relapsed into a deep, untroubled sleep.

Like many another star, Snoops was discovered by accident. His mistress, Miss Marjorie Wells, is a telephone operator at the British and Dominions Elstree studios, and it is to her that Snoops owes his big chance. An important scene in the film shows Ned Sparks smuggling a dog through the Customs by putting it in his coat pocket. The puzzle was to find a dog small enough.

The obvious thing to do, of course, was to telephone kennels and pet stores. The production manager spent the morning doing this, but without result. The doggy establishments were very sorry, but pocket models were out of stock; how about a nice Alsatian? This might have gone on for days, but fortunately Miss Wells succumbed to the temptation of indulging in a little eavesdropping (even the best operators do it, you know) and discovered what the bother was all about. Naturally, she drew attention to her own midget pet, with the result that Snoops was cast for the part.

Leo the Lionised

Leo Carillo, who is playing a supporting rôle to Nino Martini in the Pickford-Lasky production, "The World is Mine," paid a visit to the Papago Indian school while on location at Tucson, Arizona.

Imagine his surprise when he asked an eight-year-old his name and drew the reply:

"Little Leo Carrilo, sir!"

The actor's pride took a tumble, however, when he made inquiries, and was told that all youngsters in the village had dropped their Indian names in

Shooting the Stars with Real Bullets is this Man's Job

Bob Landers is a Hollywood "prop" man with a unique hobby—shooting at the stars with real bullets and making them like it.

His main job is rounding up the thousand and one things needed on sets for the filming of pictures. But when realism in scenes requiring fire-arms is demanded, Landers drops his prop work, oils up one of his numerous rifles, shotguns or pistols, and goes into action.

He's having the busiest period of his career during the filming of the Walter Wanger Paramount production, "Fatal Lady," in which there are several murders before a mystery killer's identity is discovered.

On the screen, of course, a member of the cast is supposed to fire the shots, but when they're filming the scenes, Landers is the marksman.

He stood out of camera range twenty feet from Mary Ellis and put a bullet in the wall an inch from her head. He shot a glass out of John Halliday's hand, and put a bullet through Walter Pidgeon's hat—with the actor under it.

The most dangerous feat, from Norman Foster's standpoint, was shattering a mirror while the actor was shaving in front of it. Foster had to have a few pieces of glass picked out of his face, and he says he wouldn't care to repeat the stunt, even though he has every confidence in Landers as a sharpshooter.

A few years ago Landers, then prop man for Mary Pickford, shot dishes out of her hands for scenes in "Secrets."

Marksmanship has been a lifetime hobby with Landers, who was a machine-gunner during the War.

Goldwyn Picks a Scot

David Niven, Samuel Goldwyn's young discovery and the reported fiancé of Merle Oberon, has been cast for an important rôle in Samuel Goldwyn's next production, "Dodsworth," in which Walter Huston and Ruth Chatterton are co-starred.

Niven has had an adventurous life. Born in Scotland, the son of the late Lady Comyn-Platt, he was trained for the Army and became a lieutenant in the Highland Light Infantry. Promotion was slow and excitement scarce, so he resigned and made his way to Canada to become a lumberjack. Trees offered a certain stubborn resistance to his hewing, and so he turned to fishing.

From then on there was no holding him. In turn he became journalist, delivery boy for a Chinese laundry, commercial traveller, gun-runner in Cuba, horse-race promoter. Then he made his way to Hollywood: A chance meeting with Samuel Goldwyn at a party started him on a screen career. His most important part, so far, was as Miriam Hopkins' caddish brother-in-law in "Splendour."

Because a firm has decided to exploit a cheap, poor-quality cloth, the chairman, who is an honest, upright man, is forced into retirement. For a hobby he buys a dry-cleaning establishment and finds himself up against a gang of grafters. He settles them in his own way. Starring Guy Kibbee

Out of Date

A CAR pulled up before the offices of the biggest cloth mill west of Boston. A sleek man ran round to open the door, and with great concern helped an elderly man to alight. The latter did not seem pleased with the attention and pushed the man away. He removed his soft hat and rubbed his few remaining locks as he stared from angry grey eyes at a poster that proclaimed that Woolex was the greatest discovery in weaving of this century.

"Harrison, stop fussing round me like an old hen!" He pointed to the big poster. "It's about time I came back if that thing means what I think it does. Come on, Harrison, we've got work to do."

On the arm of his valet Julius Trent walked towards the main offices of the mighty mill that he had founded over thirty years ago. For the first time in his life Trent had taken a holiday and gone for a cruise round the world. Frankly, he had hated every moment of it, but his doctor had told him that he was on the verge of a breakdown through overworking. Reluctantly he had been compelled to go on this cruise with his wife and his twenty-year-old daughter Betty. Worst of all, the doctor forbade any attempt at business or he would not be responsible for his patient's length of life.

Unfortunately there is such a thing as a radio, and programmes of music and entertainment are provided by various companies and businesses as an advertisement. Thus did Julius Trent learn that the Trent Weaving Company were producing an amazing cloth known as Woolex, and he informed his family that doctor's orders or not he was going home.

Julius Trent had been away from his mill five months to the day, and he was still far from a fit man. The colour in his face was more the flush of anger than of good health.

Another shock waited him inside. Herman Andrews, who had been only a deputy manager, was ensconced in his old room. It was not the same room. There were pictures on the walls, great pile carpets, divans, huge chairs and a desk that must have cost a fortune. Andrews, a big, florid man, who oozed confidence and self-satisfaction, was pleased to welcome Julius Trent back at the mill.

"About time I did come back," snapped old Trent. "Somebody seems bent on ruining the business."

"You're mistaken, Trent," Andrews shook his head in a patronising way. "Since you've been away I've improved your business over thirty per cent. I wish you could have heard our broadcast last night."

"I've heard several of 'em—that's why I'm back. Are you responsible for Woolex, Andrews?"

"I take full responsibility for Woolex," answered Andrews, and pressed a button three times. "Woolex is not my invention, and I will now introduce you to Mr. Rosewater, our stylist and director of fashions. Mr. Rosewater came to me with a sample of a material, and realising its possibilities we conducted a number of experiments, and the result was Woolex. Ah, here is Mr. Rosewater."

Julius Trent took one look at the small man in the elegant tail coat.

Heavens, the man used scent! The minute moustache and the hair that was permanently waved made the old millowner writhe.

"Mr. Trent, you're old-fashioned and don't like new ideas," Andrews stated after the introduction. "You've got to get used to the fact that Trent Mills are going to make Woolex. All the ready-to-wear manufacturers want it and we're going to produce it."

"The Trent Mills, Mr. Andrews, is going to make an announcement," thundered old Julius. "There'll be no more Woolex sold until the president of this company is satisfied that he's giving the public full value for its money."

"Mr. Trent, I hate to say this to you, but you've fallen behind in the parade." Andrews smirked at Rosewater. "You're out of step, decadent, old-fashioned. This is the day of big business. Woolex means a new deal to the Trent mills, and don't forget the banks control this business, and I've been put here to put new life into this business."

Old Trent was nearly purple in the face with rage.

"So you think the banks control my business, do you? Let me remind you that I'm still the largest single stockholder in this business. I've got stockholders who've been with me since I started. They'll stand back of me. I'm going to call a meeting right away. We'll settle this Woolex question right now, and settle it in a hurry. And when I come back here I want you back in your old office, Mr. Andrews." He glowered at the burly, middle-aged director. "Maybe the president of this company should have an office. Don't you agree?" Julius Trent snatched up his hat and stormed to the door, where he paused to look hard at Mr. Rosewater. "I'd like it fumigated."

The meeting was arranged for two days later at three o'clock in the afternoon. Charles Caldwell, who was legal adviser and friend to Julius Trent, took on the task of talking to all stockholders on the behalf of the president. He obtained proxies from all of them with the exception of Henry Perkins, who held a big batch of shares.

"Perkins isn't with the Andrews crowd, either," Caldwell informed Trent, on the way to the meeting. "He'll be present this afternoon, and will vote after he has heard the views of both sides. It's up to you to swing him."

Julius Trent from the president's chair looked balefully at the people grouped round the huge table. For an hour he had listened to nothing but talk about the properties of Woolex. A great number of these stockholders were strangers to him, and it was obvious that they were much impressed by what Andrews had to say about Woolex. It angered Trent to see that Perkins was listening eagerly. He had a rush of blood to the head when the perfumed Mr. Rosewater appeared with a number of rolls of cloth. Andrews almost put his arm round the director of fashions.

"This, gentlemen, is our pussy-willow weave, our biggest number. Kaufberger and Rochester report that the demand from the Philippine Islands alone for suits of this material has kept their shops working day and night. Since the introduction of Woolex, indications show that our volume will increase one hundred per cent. Our profits, two hundred." Andrews glanced round. "I think that proves conclusively that our present policy is the only desirable one."

Julius Trent looked solemnly at the assembly.

"Gentlemen," he spoke almost with contempt, "you've heard a lot of talk about profits, and while I know that profits are important there is one thing that is more important—reputation. Gentlemen, we're not selling cloth to fools, but to hard-boiled manufacturers who want their money's worth. You wish to replace my blue serge with Woolex robin's egg blue; my honest tweed with powderpuff texture; my herringbone with pussy-willow weave." He laughed angrily and bitterly. "Maybe in time you'll replace me with Mr. Rosewater."

Instantly a sharp-featured man jumped to his feet.

"Gentlemen, Mr. Trent has brought up a pertinent point. Representing the Traders' Exchange I am authorised to speak for them. We are of the opinion that in view of the fact that Mr. Trent is opposed to Woolex that he should step down from the presidency and that Welford Andrews should succeed him."

Julius Trent had been bluffed, and to his way of thinking double-crossed. How they must have laughed when he insisted upon holding this meeting. They had been scheming to get him out of the business and he had played into their hands. One look round told him that except for Caldwell every person was against him. Some, like Perkins, against him because they thought Woolex meant big money, and the rest because Andrews and his bunch had made it worth their while.

"I suggest that we vote on the motion by raising our hands. All those in favour of Mr. Andrews will signify by raising their hands," spoke the traders' representative, and smirked as shareholders raised their hands. "Gentlemen, Mr. Welford Andrews will succeed Julius Trent as president of Trent Mills."

"But you can't decide the presidency this way!" stormed Caldwell.

"It is for the best." Perkins stood up. "Julius Trent is a sick man and has naturally fallen behind in the parade. I propose that Mr. Trent be an ex-officio member of the board of directors, and—"

Julius Trent rapped on the table.

"That's big-hearted of you, Perkins. Considering I persuaded you in the first place to take up shares in my mills and thus made a small fortune for you I am overwhelmed by your kindness. Gentlemen, I don't wish to remain on the board of directors, and condone the production of Woolex, which I think and know is a very poor, indifferent production."

"You will enjoy the vast share of the profits that will be yours as the largest shareholder in this business," sneered the triumphant Andrews. "You can now live at your ease and receive four times as much as when you were working. Personally, Mr. Trent, I think you are very fortunate."

"I think you will be very fortunate if you can talk in this way in six months' time," Julius Trent thundered back, the veins standing out on his neck in his anger. "You're weaving for yourselves a Woolex rope that's going to hang the lot of you."

Julius Trent collapsed when he got home, and Mrs. Trent sent for the specialist who had recommended the sea voyage. The good lady whispered that her husband had had a stormy directors' meeting.

"There's nothing the matter with me," Julius told the specialist. "You're trying to make a sick man out of me, when I ought to be up fighting. Those boobs can't run my mills without me."

"They'll have to," the specialist said, with his fingers on the patient's pulse. "Unless you follow my instructions I will not be responsible for the consequences in three months' time."

A week later Julius Trent, his wife and daughter, were on their way to a mansion in the hills overlooking Pasadena in the glorious state of sunny

"Gentlemen," he said, "we're not selling cloth to fools, but to hard-boiled manufacturers who want their money's worth."

California. It caused Julius extreme satisfaction that there was a cloudburst the hour the express drew into the station. That cloudburst lasted for four days.

Bondage

IT was three months later. Julius Trent looked gloomily out of the window at the rain-sodden grounds. They had had enough rain to fill an ocean, but the rain was not the only reason for his gloom. In his hand he held a cheque for a substantial sum—profits from Woolex.

"A retired man's paradise," muttered Trent to himself. "The only thing out here that's heavier than the rain is the taxes."

Julius was a very unhappy man. All his life he had been actively engaged in making a fortune. He had never had much time for holidays—work was everything to him. Now he was a retired man. Old, decrepit and finished. Banished to sunny California, where he had to spend the whole day yawning over a paper or being driven round in a car only on fine days. If he sat in the garden he had to be wrapped up in shawls and rugs.

Mrs. Trent was happy, because never before had she had her husband so much to herself. Knowing how her husband hated being cooped indoors she sought him out.

"Betty come in yet?" he asked.

"I guess she's out with that Don Andrews again."

Julius turned on her.

"Why does she have to go with that fellow? His father gets him a job in the washing-room at the mills, and the idea was that he should go through every branch so that ultimately he could become a director. Two months and his father puts him on the board of directors and gives him a vacation so the poor fellow should not have a breakdown through overwork. Don promptly comes down here and spends all his time with Betty."

"I think she's fond of him."

"Well, I'm not!" Julius retorted. "I think he's a lazy, ignorant, spoiled collegio pup."

"Julius, he is the son of Welford Andrews, the president. Moreover, he is a director at twenty-four. He's forging ahead in the business world. He'd make a nice husband for Betty. No bad habits."

"Mother, how can you say that. He's got the worst habit in the world. Woolex! He even wears it."

"You must not be prejudiced against the young man," argued Mrs. Trent. "At any rate, Betty must decide for herself."

The clouds dispersed and the sun appeared, so that Julius was able to escape into the garden. It was too hot in the sun and he decided he would like to get into the shade. He tried to lift the heavy garden seat but it was too much for him. Suddenly a little wizened old man appeared, muttered an apology, lifted the seat with ease, and carried it to the shade of a big tree.

"You mustn't try and lift heavy chairs," stated little Mr. Douglas, who was a gardener. "You might hurt yourself."

Julius Trent allowed himself to be conducted to the new position and have Douglas enfold him in rugs.

"You're pretty old to go around lifting heavy objects."

"Old!" Julius snorted. "I'm not old. How old are you?"

September 12th, 1936

"I'll be seventy-two on Washington's birthday," answered the gardener.

"I'll be sixty-two on Lincoln's birthday. And you're calling me old." Julius Trent looked at the gardener with respect. "You don't look all that age, and how do you manage to lift garden seats and go around acting like a weight-lifter?"

"You're retired."

"What's that got to do with it?"

"A retired man is much older than an active man," the gardener chuckled. "A retired man must be older. If he's not, they make him older. He mustn't do this, he mustn't do that—mustn't take a drink, mustn't smoke, wrap up warm—all those things."

Julius stared at this prophet.

"By golly, you're right!"

"Bet you've got a weak heart."

"My doctor tells me I have."

"Bet you never knew you had a weak heart till you retired?"

"Right again." Julius patted the place next to him on the garden chair.

"Take a seat and tell me more. I want to find out your secret of health and strength."

The gardener did the talking and Trent the listening, and every few minutes the rich man would give a nod and a grin to show that he understood. Douglas had had a small store, and worked so hard that at the age of sixty he had been able to retire with sufficient to live on in comparative comfort for the rest of his life.

"Suddenly I realised I was just sitting round waiting for the undertaker," cackled the queer little gardener. "So I took a job gardening, just to make the wait a little longer."

Julius Trent was immensely impressed by all the gardener told him. His doctor had forbade smoking and he adored his pipe. The gardener persuaded him to borrow his spare pipe and try a few whiffs. Julius felt quite happy, but not so happy when the gardener produced a paper from his pocket and pointed to a headline: "Retired Pasadena Millionaire Drops Dead."

"You know what I would do if I were a retired rich man like yourself." Julius gave his master a shrewd glance. "I'd get me a little business and run it just like a kid with a toy, and I'd fool the doctors and live for ever." He turned over the paper. "This page is full of advertisements of businesses for sale or new concerns requiring capital and directors. Read them through."

"I haven't got my glasses."

"Then I'll read 'em. I don't need glasses."

Clearly and crisply the gardener read down some of the advertisements, and Julius listened intently.

Some while later Julius Trent crept into the house like a conspirator and hastened to his study. From his pocket he took out the pipe and placed it in a drawer. He wrote "Teamster's Delight" on a piece of paper and placed that beside the pipe—that was the name of the tobacco. Then he ran his finger down the adverts till he came to the one that had interested him most.

"Purple Checker Club Cleaner. Profitable."

There was fire in Julius' eyes as he wrote his letter of inquiry in the medium of the newspaper. The old gardener was right. If he wanted to live for ever he had got to kick over the traces. Julius laughed. He felt like a truant schoolboy.

The Checker Club

THE next morning was fine, and Julius announced that he wanted to go into town to get some odds and ends. He refused to use their own car and rang up for a taxi. The conspirator was driven to the Checker Club.

The Checker Club was a drying-and-cleaning establishment, and was painted like a chess or checker board. Aldrich, the sharp-faced owner, was in the back office trying to do business with a tall, broad-shouldered, handsome young man.

"Now that you've been over the books you know it's a money maker," Aldrich said with a smirk of satisfaction. "There is nothing poorer about these profits, so you know you're on a winner. Why, for six thousand, you'd be stealing the place."

"But I only have three thousand."

"Then, Mr. Mitchell, you're wasting my time."

"Would you sell a half interest?"

"No. Got to have all my money. Need it for another proposition."

A timid knock and the timid, pale-faced, large-eyed blonde young woman who was in charge of the shop, pushed her head round the door.

"Mr. Aldrich, there's two gentlemen outside. Oh, well, they're not exactly gentlemen—they want to see you."

"Perhaps it is somebody wanting to buy the place," Aldrich murmured. "Excuse me a minute."

Aldrich's eyes narrowed as he saw the two big men who lounged against the counter.

"Well, gentlemen, what can I do for you?" His smile was forced.

The man with the high cheek bones grinned in an unpleasant manner.

"You can pay up your dues in the Cleaners and Dyers Association. For six months you've been stalling and the boss is tired of it. You owe two grand. Now, kick in, or we'll kick you out."

Aldrich squirmed before the angry gaze of these two men, but he managed a smile.

"Gentlemen, I'm expecting to sell a half-interest to-day. If I do I'll pay."

"Okay, we'll give you a couple of days." The man leaned over the counter. "And that's the time limit—understand?"

Aldrich hastened back to his office. "I've been thinking this thing over."

He hoped the young man would not notice his shaking hands. "I'll let you have a half-interest for three thousand."

"Swell, then we're partners?"

"Partners is right. Only I've got to leave town for a little while. Think you can run the business while I'm away?"

"Well, I'm a graduate chemist. I know something about dyes and cleaning compounds."

"Fine. What about money?"

Mitchell winked.

"I can get that money right away—from my savings account."

Aldrich held out his hand.

"Then it's a deal!"

As Julius Trent entered the shop a young man dashed out and nearly knocked him over. The old man rapped on the counter and from a back room appeared the round-eyed shop attendant.

"I understand this place is for sale. Where's the boss?"

"Nice old man," squawked a voice.

"Don't mind Archibald, sir," the girl laughed.

"Archibald—who's Archibald?"

The girl pointed to a cage and a green parrot.

"He's always saying things. I wouldn't pay any attention to him. He ain't got any manners. I've been here three years and I find the best policy is to ignore him completely."

Julius glared at the parrot

"Ought to be stuffed."

"Silly old man!" retorted Archibald Aldrich was busy taking papers and articles from a safe when his assistant, Daisy, entered to whisper that there was an old boy outside and that she had a hunch he was a certain buyer. Aldrich hastily replaced his papers and sat down at his desk.

"I understand you want to sell?"

"Right! And I don't know where you'd find a better investment."

"If it's so good why do you want to sell out?"

"I've got to leave town."

"Would you mind me looking at your books to see how much money you're making?"

Aldrich handed the books over to Julius, who examined them with an expert eye.

"What's your lowest price?"

"Three thousand for a half-interest," Aldrich answered. "I've just sold a half-interest to a young fellow. You probably saw him go out."

Julius remembered the young man in a hurry, and nodded.

"Has he had any experience?"

"He's an expert and a chemist. Three thousand is dirt cheap."

"I'll give you twenty-five hundred."

"My price is three thousand."

"My price is twenty-five hundred!"

rasped Julius Trent.

"Sold!" cried Aldrich. "Who'll I make the bill of sale out to?"

For a moment Julius was stumped, then he thought of the wise old gardener and gave the name Tom Douglas. He signed the name and then produced a bulging wallet, from which he extracted two thousand five hundred dollars, and had just been handed a receipt when the young man who had nearly knocked him down hurried into the office.

"You're back quick," cried Aldrich.

"There's your three thousand dollars, Mr. Aldrich," Mitchell handed over his notes. In his eagerness he paid no attention to the amused millionaire.

"Young man, you paid too much," said Julius. "I got my half for twenty-five hundred."

"Why, what do you mean?" Mitchell stared at him in surprise.

"Shake hands with your new partner." The old man held out his hand. "I think I ought to be made treasurer of this company, just to keep you from tossing your money away foolishly. Aldrich wants to get out of town, so I persuaded him to sell."

When the young man realised the situation he gripped the older man's hand in a grip that made Julius wince. "My name is Mitchell, partner. Ken Mitchell."

"My name is—er—Douglas, partner. Tom Douglas."

Julius Trent decided that never before had he been so impressed with a first appearance. There was a frank, straightforward way about this boy that appealed to him. Ken Mitchell decided that his new partner was a nice old man who had probably retired and wanted a sleeping interest in some business.

Aldrich left town that night, and he did not send the two thousand to Morelli, of the Cleaners and Dyers Association.

"Do you know anybody that'd want to toss a pineapple into your place?" asked Officer Kerrigan.

Pineapples and Mud

JULIUS TRENT had an interest in life. He felt his brain that had lain dormant for weeks functioning once more. It gave him new strength to have to plan and scheme. He had to scheme where his wife was concerned. He let them imagine that the Checker Club was a place where men gathered to play checkers. His wife approved as she thought sitting before a board was not too much exertion for the invalid.

"I don't mind you going to this club, but you must promise to take your medicine with you," stated his wife.

The only fly in Julius' ointment was Don Andrews. That young man was always calling for Betty and taking her out in his racing car to parties.

"Why don't he go back to the factory and go to work?" he grumbled to his wife. "Instead of acting like he was retired—like me?" He grunted angrily. "I don't like my daughter running around with that nincompoop."

"He is nothing of the sort," argued his wife. "He's asked Betty to marry him, and I hope she says 'yes.'"

"Guess I'll go to the club—I can't bear being round if he's here," retorted Julius.

Julius was pleased to find on arrival at the cleaning establishment that Ken Mitchell had already been there several hours. Ken had been busy with a paint-brush and had done some startling work on the small motor-van that went with the shop. He had almost finished putting on a startling checker pattern.

They were in the shop, going through accounts, when the phone rang. Daisy had been given the morning off.

"I'll answer it," said Julius. "Maybe it's a customer."

"Hallo," said a deep voice "Is that Purple Checker Club Cleaners? Is Mr. Aldrich there?"

"No, Aldrich isn't here any longer," answered Julius. "He sold out!"

"Don't give me that stuff," came the voice. "Put Aldrich on."

"I tell you Aldrich isn't here. Me and my partner own this business."

"All right, chump. You asked for it," came the voice. "I'm gonna make you a present of a nice ripe pineapple."

"Pineapple? I don't want any pineapples," shouted Trent. "Hallo! Hallo!" He hung up. "Fellow rang off. Must have been a wrong number. Some guy wanted to send us some fruit."

Mitchell looked up from studying accounts.

"I think that old flivver will come in useful. You know if we call for and deliver we can double our business."

"A good idea."

"Right. Oh, and another thing. I've perfected a new cleaning fluid that's a knock-out. It's non-inflammable, too. Come round to the work-room and I'll show you how it works."

Julius Trent gave the work-room an approving glance. He had seen this room but a few hours before, and in that short while Mitchell had converted it into an up-to-date laboratory. There were bottles and test-tubes and all kinds of complicated apparatus. In the centre of the room was a large vat. Mitchell explained that he had kept a lot of this stuff at his digs and had fixed it up here.

"I worked most of the night."

"Heey, you're a pretty smart youngster," cried Trent. "Maybe I should have paid that extra five hundred. Show me this cleaning fluid."

Julius Trent watched Mitchell take out some liquid from the vat and apply it to an oily coat sleeve. It cleaned like magic. He tried it on a mark on his own coat that his wife could not remove, and it came away at once. Julius rubbed his hands.

"Now I'm going out to finish that painting job," Mitchell rolled up his sleeves. "I want to get it done by midday so that I can go out this afternoon and cadge some orders."

Chance took a part in the game. Mitchell took out the Checker Club van and spent some while driving round the streets as a form of advertisement. He secured two small commissions from restaurants and was about to pull into the kerb to try another place when Betty Trent came out of a hairdressing establishment. He had to swerve in close on account of another car, and the gutter was full of muddy water.

"Swish!" A cascade of filth was flung from the skidding wheels and deposited with a splash on Betty's white tennis dress. Mitchell noticed the damage and backed the van. The girl glared at him.

"Didn't you do a good enough job or did you have to come back here to finish it?" she cried as a few more spots flew on to her dress.

"I'm terribly sorry."

"You ought to be. You've ruined my dress."

He smiled.

"I don't think it's ruined. I can fix that easily. You see, I own a cleaning shop."

"I suppose you go around splashing mud on people just to round up some business?"

"I'll do this job for nothing." He was very earnest. "Look! You jump in and I'll have your dress like new and you back here inside of fifteen minutes."

So convincing was the young man's manner that Betty was persuaded into getting into the seat beside the driver. Ken talked brightly about his new business venture, and the girl had to admit to herself that Ken Mitchell possessed personality and charm.

Julius Trent was in the shop with Daisy when the van pulled up and the two young people alighted. Julius took one look and dived under the counter. He remained there until Betty had been shown into a changing booth by Daisy.

"Why, Mr. Douglas," exclaimed Ken as his head appeared above the counter, "what on earth are you doing down there?"

"I'm picking up pins," Trent said in a hoarse whisper. "Why have you brought that girl in here?"

"Accidentally I splashed some mud on her dress," Ken explained. "I'm going to clean it for her."

"That reminds me," Julius looked at his watch. "I must go and see the barber—need a shave."

"Didn't look as if he needed a shave to me," muttered Ken, smiling at Daisy. "My partner seems in a bit of a fluster. Must be rather too exciting, coming a new business."

Betty was amazed when she saw her dress. She donned it quickly and came out into the light, where she could see it better. Not a mark anywhere.

"Well, Mr. Mitchell, you certainly kept your word. I'd no idea it would clean like this."

"I used that new cleaning fluid I told you about," Ken grinned at her. "If you're ready I'll take you wherever you want to go."

"I'm playing tennis. I'm meeting my partner near the Central Bank. Could you take me there?"

"That's part of our service." His eyes twinkled merrily. "And I love my work."

Donald Andrews was not very pleased when Betty got out of a van, and he disliked the way Betty was chatting to the handsome young driver. He would have to speak to her about this sort of behaviour.

"I'm sorry I'm late, but you see this man just cleaned my dress," Betty explained. "It was a sort of experiment with a new cleaner. If it had failed I'd probably be here in a barrel." She smiled at Ken. "Well, good-bye, and thanks for everything."

"Might I call round some time?" His eyes were full of appeal. "I should like to prove to you that my cleaning fluid can be used on all kinds of cloth and linen, even silks. How about Wednesday?"

"Wednesday? Let me think." The furrow on her smooth forehead vanished. "Why, Wednesday's fine. Come over some Wednesday—next summer. Come on, Don."

Ken Mitchell watched the powerful sports car drive away. True, he had received a slight rebuff, but the girl had smiled as the car roared away from the kerb. Her name had been inside the tennis frock, and tactful questioning on the way to the appointment with Don Andrews had enabled him to find out where she lived.

Trent was back in the shop when Mitchell came in whistling.

"You seem cheerful."

"Business is good. I've got a swell partner. And I've just met the greatest girl in the world."

"Who is she?"

"She's a combination of Cleopatra, Helen of Troy and Joan of Arc. She was the one I brought into this shop—the one I splashed mud on."

Julius Trent blinked his eyes.

"And do you know anything else about this girl. What about her family?"

"I'm not going to marry her family."

Julius nearly dropped a bottle of paste.

"You gonna marry this girl?"

"Sure."

"Does this—er—goddess know you're gonna marry her?"

"Not yet," laughed Ken. "She's the one and only for me, and some way I'll get to know her."

Julius felt like a schoolboy as he put a hand in front of his mouth to hide his smiles. He announced that it was time they shut down for the day. Daisy was told she could go, and then the two partners went into the back office for a quiet chat on the day's progress.

Along the street came a powerful open car and there were four men.

"Slow down in front of two-thirty-one," said the unshaven rascal next to the driver.

As the car passed the three men raised their hands and three small objects sailed through the air towards the windows of the Purple Checker Club. The crash of glass and then three blinding explosions. The car went down the street like a flash of lightning.

The Meaning of "Pineapple"

JULIUS TRENT had just locked up the books when the place was rocked by the sound of the explosions. The door of the office was burst open and choking white fumes poured into the room.

The two partners with the instinct of self-protection flung themselves flat. The smoke cleared, and then Mitchell rushed out of the room with Julius close behind him. They stared solemnly at smashed windows, wrecked machinery and broken counter.

"I wonder who did that?" muttered Mitchell.

"I don't know," answered his partner. "But it's a lucky thing we weren't in here."

"Bombs caused this," Mitchell shouted angrily. "I'm going to call the police."

A squad were quickly down at 231 Powell Street, and having forced their way through the gaping crowds, entered the shop.

Officer Kerrigan listened to Mitchell's account of three explosions, and rushing out to find the place wrecked.

"Do you know anybody that'd want to toss a pineapple into your place?" he asked.

"Why, no, I can't imagine why anybody'd want to do that to us," truthfully answered Ken.

"Pineapple!" cried Julius. "Officer, did you say pineapple?"

"Yeah," Kerrigan's smile was hard. "That's what they call those little souvenirs they throw through windows."

"So that's a pineapple?" Trent fingered his chin. "Say, a fellow called up here and asked for Mr. Aldrich. That's the man that used to own this place, and when I told him Aldrich wasn't here he called me a chump, and said he was gonna deliver a nice ripe pineapple."

"That's funny." The officer looked sharply at the two partners. "Say, have you two paid up in the cleaning and dyeing racket?"

"Racket?" queried Ken.

"We're not in any racket."

Julius was indignant.

The officer grinned.

"Well, racket is what we call it, but Chick Morelli calls it the Cleaners and Dyers Benevolent Association."

"Who is this Chick Morelli?"

Julius nodded his head as light began to dawn.

"He runs the dyeing and cleaning racket on this side of town, and if you don't kick in with your monthly dues, you just ain't in business. We know it, and we don't know it; you know how it is. It's too hard to prove. And every time we make a pinch the cleaners are afraid to testify, and nobody'll prosecute."

"Maybe we should move to some other part of town."

"That won't do any good. Dutch Schmidt runs the same kind of racket on the north side."

Julius pondered the matter for a moment.

"Where can I find this Chick Morelli?"

"He's got an office in the Lexington Building."

"What are you going to do?" Mitchell asked his partner when the police had gone.

"I don't know yet, but I got a little idea," Julius Trent was smiling, but there was a hard tone to his voice. He chuckled softly. "I get ideas sometimes. Maybe this Chick Morelli ain't gonna like me so much very soon."

Fear

LITTLE damage had been done to the machinery, and as the partners had decided that the whole of the shop needed reconstruction it did not matter about the destruction; moreover, as the place was insured the expense would not come out of their pockets.

Julius Trent got decorators and builders working day and night, and when the job was nicely started decided that it would be a wise move to go and see this Chick Morelli.

At the Lexington Building he was conducted to the eighth floor and taken to a suite of rooms. In the outer office a number of villainous-looking men were sprawled around the place, smoking and playing cards. There was a red-headed typist who smoked as she worked. She yawned whilst she listened to him, but she acted quickly enough when Trent informed her he was a director of the Purple Cheeker Club. A minute later he was shown into a large room, which was more like a saloon bar than an office.

There was a huge desk, behind which sat a bald-headed Italian with sears on both cheeks. Diamonds sparkled on his fingers. Three men sprawled in chairs and all were smoking fat cigars, whilst nearby were bottles and glasses.

"Come in, Mr. Douglas," invited a man who looked like an ex-prize-fighter. He shut the door and leaned against it. Julius looked solemnly at the man behind the desk.

"Are you Mr. Morelli?"

"Yeah," Morelli took the cigar out of his mouth and pointed to a chair. "Sit down. Take a load off your feet."

"Thanks."
"Got something on your mind?"

"Yes," Trent answered. "You see, me and my partner bought the Purple Cheeker Club Cleaners. We're new in this business, and I thought maybe you could tell me what's the matter with us."

"You ain't in good standing with the association," Morelli said with a twisted grin. "You know you gotta kick in to the association. United we stand—divided we go out of business. It's like that. You owe me two grand."

"Two grand?"
Julius was startled.

"Yeah. Two thousand bucks."

"Two thousand dollars. Why, we've only been in business a week."

Morelli shrugged his shoulders.

"I know, but that guy Aldrich forgot to tell you about being behind in his dues. You gotta kick in."

"And what happens if I don't kick in?"

Morelli leaned forward.

"I ain't saying what's gonna happen. But I've heard of guys being stubborn and getting acid thrown all over their cleaning. And when that happens, the damage bills are something fierce. If I was you, mister, I'd get that dough, and quick."

"Well, two thousand is a lot of money," muttered Julius in dismal accents. "Could you give me a little time to raise it?"

"Sure, I'll give you lots of time to raise it," answered the crook grafter. "I'll drop around for the dough on the first of the month."

"The first of the month. Why, that's only two weeks away."

"That's right. I told you I'd give lots of time," Morelli's eyes narrowed. "And have that dough ready. Get me?"

"Yes, I get you," Trent stood up. "And it looks like you got me."

Morelli and his men roared with laughter.

Julius Trent walked back to the business in a very thoughtful frame of mind.

Ken Mitchell was standing back admiring the new colour scheme when the shop door bell tinkled, and in walked Betty with a whole heap of clothing.

"Here are some more clothes for you to experiment with," She looked round. "Say, what's happened here?"

Ken took the clothing.
"We're remodelling our store, but we're working whilst repairs—I mean, alterations—are going on. I can get these done by to-morrow night. I could deliver them myself—to-morrow is a Wednesday. You said Wednesday was a good day."

The girl laughed. She was not displeased.

"Bring them round by all means. About eight. I may or may not be there, but if there is anything that wants doing I'll leave instructions. The name is Betty Trent, 426, Lakeview Drive."

"Nice old man!" suddenly exclaimed the parrot.

"Does he mean you?" asked Betty.

"No. He means my partner."

Mitchell laughed. "He is a nice old man. I'll be round at eight to-morrow night, Miss Trent."

Julius came in some few minutes later, and happened to glance at the counter.

"She was here again," Ken saw the direction of his partner's glance. "She brought those things in to be cleaned."

"Oh, yes, I know! You mean this Cleopatra—Joan-of-Arc—Helen-of-Troy dame of yours." Trent fingered one suit. "This suit was cleaned only two days ago."

"How do you know?"
Julius chuckled. "He had sent it himself to the cleaners."

"By the ticket on the coat collar." He changed the subject adroitly. "No luck about Morelli. He says we gotta pay him two thousand dollars."

Mitchell was horrified.
"Two thousand dollars? Where in the world are we gonna get all that money?"

"We ain't!" Julius rasped. "These racketeers like Morelli—they're wolves—wolves who prey on honest business men like us. They irk me. And when a fellow irks me, I'm dangerous. I'm a pretty good irker myself!"

A week later Julius Trent might have been seen in the shop of a small cleaner—he had been in all parts of the town in the last few days.

"Now, see here, Mr. Thompson, I'm calling on all the cleaners on account of this outrage. This fellow Morelli's got everybody buffalod. Why, he even tried to blow up my place with pineapples. You saw the account, no doubt, in the papers. Now, if all we cleaners would get together, we could fix this guy so's he wouldn't be doing these things."

"Oh, no, not me!" the little cleaner shook his head. "It's too dangerous! I'd rather pay up and stay in business!"

"Oh, you, too! Every place I go this fellow Morelli's got 'em scared to death. You'd think he was king or something. Twenty places I've been to to-day, and in every place I get the same answer." His gaze rested on a coat on the counter and his fingers felt the material. At once his mind went to another subject. "Do you fellows have any trouble cleaning this Woolex?"

"Plenty."

"So do we. To tell you the truth, we won't touch it any more. It's no good. Whenever a fellow comes in to us with Woolex to clean, we hand him one of these cards." Julius produced a piece of stiff cardboard. "You see, the cards tell just why Woolex won't clean. In that way he won't get sore when you turn it down."

The little cleaner was much impressed. "That's a good idea."

"Keep the card," Julius placed it on the counter. "You may want to have some printed yourself."

Julius had planted similar cards in all the other establishments he had visited. He would have chuckled if he had known that Trent Mills were feeling the draught already. Because of the synthetic quality of Woolex dry cleaners were refusing to handle it, and cancelled orders were coming in with every mail. Welford Andrews was not finding the president of the Trent Mills as pleasant as he had imagined.

The First of the Month

JULIUS TRENT looked up from his grapefruit and stared at the large calendar on the mantelpiece. The first of the month! He wondered if his little idea was going to be a success.

The door opened, and in bustled his wife.

"Up early again!" she cried. "My, but you must have stamina!"

"Never mind about my stamina. You get me some more coffee." He pushed over his cup and gave her a keen glance. "What are you doing up so early?"

"I thought I'd better get up early if I wanted to see you. You're always at your Checker Club. Julius, I want to talk to you about Betty."

He avoided her gaze. "What about Betty?"

"Well, she's been out every evening all this week, and I think you ought to speak to her."

"With that Donald Andrews again? I'll speak to her to-night."

"No, not Don Andrews. Another boy. He calls for her in a delivery truck, of all things."

Trent spluttered over his coffee.

"Do you mean to say that our daughter is running around with a lorry-driver?"

"Well, it's not quite as bad as that," admitted Mrs. Trent. "It's a sort of combination delivery truck and sedan for some dry-cleaning establishment. The—er—Purple Checker Club Cleaners and Dyers. Such a curious name, isn't it?"

"Yes, and most convenient!" Julius laughed, and then assumed a scowl as he saw his wife's surprised expression. "What kind of a looking fellow is this driver?"

"Well, he's rather nice looking, and that's why I'm worried."

"Do you think Betty likes him?"

"Julius Trent!" She was indignant. "Does a girl go out every night with somebody she doesn't like?"

"No, I guess not." He made a great fuss with the paper. "I'll speak to her about it."

"This morning?"

"No, not this morning. I haven't time. This is the first of the month. Got something very important to do. Got a big tournament on at the club and I've got to be there, that's all." He kissed his wife. "I'll speak to her to-night."

"All right, but don't forget," insisted Mrs. Trent. "And wrap up warm. The weather's treacherous."

"Rats can be treacherous!" muttered Julius, and departed leaving his wife wondering whether he was a little touched in the head.

Julius Trent went out to the waiting car, and drove to the Purple Checker Club.

"Nice old man!" shrilled the parrot.

"Good-morning, Tom!" Mitchell appeared. "It's a grand morning, isn't it?"

"I don't see anything grand about it."

"I do. It's the happiest day of my life." Ken slapped the older man on the back. "She promised to marry me last night."

"You mean that Cleopatra-Joan-of-Are-Helen-of-Troy woman has promised to marry you?"

"Yes, sir! And am I happy?" Ken rubbed his hands together in his joy. "Tom, wait till you meet her. You'll love her!"

A muscle twitched in the older man's face.

"Maybe I will, but business is business. Have you forgotten what date it is?"

"No, it's the first. It's the day we pay off to Morelli or else."

September 12th, 1936

"And you're happy. Have you got two thousand dollars?"

"Nope. Have you?"

Julius scowled.

"What! Me pay two thousand dollars to a fellow like Morelli! Never!"

"That's the spirit!" Mitchell moved towards the 'phone. "Then we call in the police department and we ask to have a detail assigned to guard the place. After all, we're tax-payers."

"But we're not paying taxes to guys like Morelli. Only—" Julius broke off to chuckle softly.

"Only what?" Ken was puzzled.

"Only I've got a little idea in the back of my head," Julius answered.

"Maybe we won't have to call in the police. Now, I've got to go out for a little while. If that fellow Morelli comes here, you be sure and tell him to be back here at four o'clock. Now, remember, at four o'clock."

"Then you don't want me to call the police?"

"No."

"All right, I'll do as you wish, though it doesn't seem wise. What are you planning to do?"

"Don't ask questions." Julius laid a finger against his nose. "I'm not sure myself yet. But I've a little idea about this fellow Morelli's reception. Don't forget—four o'clock."

Julius took a car to the headquarters of Dutch Schmidt, and after some argument was finally admitted into the presence of this great man, who had a room and bodyguards similar to Morelli. Schmidt was a huge, muscular giant.

"Mr. Schmidt, I thought I'd try to make arrangements with you to open up a dry-cleaning place on the north side."

"Not a chance, buddy," was the decisive answer. "Too many joints operating on this side of town now. It's getting so there's a dry-cleaning joint for every two people."

"But we got a good dry-cleaning store."

Schmidt's face darkened.

"Say, are you trying to tell me the joints I look after ain't good joints?"

"Oh, no, no!" Julius hastened to smooth down the ruffled racketeer. "I didn't mean that. But you see, we've got a new cleaning fluid. My partner, he's a smart young man. He's got an education, and this new fluid cleans clothes like you never saw 'em cleaned before. He's got a patent on it. It's wonderful."

Schmidt yawned.

"Mr. Schmidt, have you got another suit of clothes?"

That made Schmidt and his two hirlings roar with laughter.

"Have I got another suit of clothes?" Schmidt shouted. "Oh, that's a good one!"

The racketeer got up and went across to a huge wardrobe or compactum. Sliding doors rolled back.

"Come here, mug!" he called out to Julius. "Take a look at that. One hundred and twenty-eight suits—not one of 'em with two pants. And you're asking me—have I got another suit!"

Julius Trent was suitably impressed.

"You've certainly got them!" he admitted, then he turned eagerly: "Mr. Schmidt, before you tell me I can't open up a store on the North side, let me prove something to you, will you? Let me take a half-dozen of your suits and clean 'em for you. I want you to see for yourself what this new cleaning fluid will do. It won't cost you a cent."

"Okay! That's fair enough." Schmidt studied the suits. "That bunch could do with a clean." He hauled out a number of suits on hangers, and tossed them over Trent's shoulder. "There you are, and don't let anything happen to them," he growled.

"I wouldn't let anything happen to them. I'll clean them up swell for you," Julius said. "Thank you very much, Mr. Schmidt."

Julius Trent told the taxi to go fast back to Powell Street. He leapt out with the suits in his arms.

"Well, how about the idea?" demanded Ken, appearing from the office.

"My boy, I think it's gonna work."

Julius dumped the suits on the counter. "Daisy." He pointed to the racks. "Get all those clothes in the back room."

"But why?" asked the girl, her eyes wide open.

"Don't ask questions—I'll explain later. Help her, Ken."

Ken wondered if his partner had gone completely mad as he helped Daisy with the clothes. The job done, Julius then proceeded to hang up in a prominent place the property of Dutch Schmidt—twelve suits of all colours.

"Just spread 'em out and make the most of 'em," Julius said to Ken. "Do that while I 'phone."

"But where did these come from?" questioned Ken.

"You'll get the answers later," snapped Julius, and dialed a number. "Hallo, is that Mr. Morelli? Well, this is Tom Douglas of the Purple Checker Club Cleaners."

"Hallo, Douglas!" drawled the Italian. "I see you didn't forget it was the first of the month. You're a smart guy!"

"You're doggone right I'm a smart guy!" Julius raised his voice. "You now listen to me, Morelli. I don't owe you any two thousand dollars, and I'm not gonna pay you any two thousand dollars. And another thing—you know what I think of you? You're a no good gangster. A cheap crook. A dirty, double-crossing grafter and a blackmailer! Pah!"

Julius hung up with a satisfied grin.

"Are you crazy?" gasped Ken Mitchell.

"Morelli is at the moment foaming at the mouth," Trent was grinning. "He is shouting at his boys that they'll go down and show old man Douglas where he gets off. They won't use pineapples this time, but liquid fruit. Now don't start to ask any more questions, Tom, as I've got another call to make. You may think this call even crazier."

The Trap

JULIUS dialed a number.

"Hallo, is that Mr. Schmidt? Well, this is Tom Douglas of the Purple Checker Club Cleaners. Yes, it's about those suits of yours."

"What about my suits?" came the voice of Schmidt. "If you've damaged those suits I'll break—"

"I ain't touched 'em yet, Mr. Schmidt," interrupted Julius. "But I'm scared about 'em. You see, there's a tough guy by the name of Morelli, and he just called me up, and he's mad because I took your suits to be cleaned, and he's coming right over to my place to throw acid over them. And, dear me, you should have heard the things he said about you, Mr. Schmidt!"

"What sorta names?"

"A dirty Dutchman was one. Oh, yes, and he called you a stool pigeon and a gaolbird."

"Oh, he did, did he?" It was a bellow of wrath. "Listen, Douglas, I'll be right over."

Douglas looked at the clock as he hung up.

"That worked beautifully. It will take Schmidt about five minutes to round up the toughest of his gang and come down here. As he is nearest he should arrive first, and that would suit me best. Curious that I should plan

To save his little son associating with a gang of desperate criminals, Jim Oakley breaks out of prison, but when he learns that his boy is mistaken by rich people for their kidnapped son, he makes a great and noble sacrifice so that the youngster will have every opportunity in a good home. A thrilling drama, starring Ralph Ince

"A Big Boy Now!"

A MID all the fun of the fair in the playing fields at the back of Chatham, a thick-set man of about forty was leading a small, curly-haired boy of eight. They had just come off the merry-go-round, and the boy's bright little face was flushed with excitement.

"It was fine, Uncle Duke, wasn't it?" he cried.

"Enjoying yourself, Mickie?"

"Rather! Let's go on again!"

"We ought to get back home," the man paused at one of the side-shows. "Let's have our pictures taken. Daisy will like that—something to show her, eh?"

They entered the booth. The photographer was already busy with a customer, a tweed-suited youth with a sulky face. He greeted the newcomers: "Having my mug done for Daisy. I'm jest coming."

"Mickie's going to have his picture taken," answered the man called Duke. "I've got an idea. You finished, Louis?"

The photographer put in, with a toothy smile:

"Just ready, sir! We don't waste time here. A lovely likeness, too." He handed a shiny little square of cardboard to Louis. "Does you credit, don't it?"

Louis said, without much enthusiasm: "Not bad. How much?"

"A shilling, sir. You can have two more copies for sixpence."

Louis shook his head.

"One's enough." He passed over the money and gave the photograph to Duke. "Come on, Mickie, sit on this chair and look as if you liked it. I'll hold your cap."

The boy seated himself in front of the camera. The shirt-sleeved photographer got ready. Duke, behind the camera, held up Louis' picture.

"Keep your eyes on this, Mickie."

The photographer held out a small stuffed canary in his left hand, while his right hand took a grip on the bulb which would release the camera shutter. He pinched the stuffed canary, and it squeaked out a little trill. The boy smiled, and the picture was snapped.

"Beautiful!" cried the toothy artist. "I'll come back for it," stated Duke heavily. "Here's eighteenpence. Do me three copies."

They went out of the show, Louis leading Mickie now.

"Gee, isn't there a crowd here!" he complained. He whispered to Duke: "I saw Harry jest now—staring into one of them peep-show things."

Duke shrugged his shoulders.

"I don't want anything to do with him."

"He says Jim's in Chatham Gaol," Louis whispered again.

"Harry'll be with him pretty soon, I guess." Duke stopped at another side-show.

"Like to have your arm tattooed, Mickie, same as the sailors?"

"Will it hurt?" asked the boy.

"Just a little pricking. We'll have it done in blue—heart shape."

Louis passed the boy over.

"I'll get along, Duke. Daisy's all by herself."

The "tattoo" gentleman, an old Turk, was free. He agreed to do the boy's arm in indigo for two-and-six.

"Make fine heart with arrow," he offered.

"Never mind the arrow," Duke decided. "Just a heart on his right arm—inside, below the elbow. Pull up your sleeve, Mickie—here's the place."

The tattooing was rather painful, but Duke gave the boy some toffee to suck. Presently all was done, and they went back for the photographs.

"Now we'll get home for tea," said Duke. "We've spent quite enough. We'll go riding on the horses to-morrow if the fair's still here."

"It's staying a week, Uncle Duke," Mickie announced. "My arm is feeling so funny!"

"Forget it," Duke told him. "You're a big boy now."

"Money for Jam!"

A YELLOW-HAIRED young woman was seated at a table in the lounge of the Harbour Bar, a little, shack-like public-house near the dock gates. Near her, leaning against the counter, was Louis. Duke, entering with Mickie, sent the boy upstairs to wash his hands, then seated himself opposite the girl.

"I want you to look at these," he said, putting the photographs on the table.

The girl took them listlessly.

"Three copies?" she questioned. "Come into money?"

"I hope to," Duke answered. "Pass me that newspaper."

She gave him the "Daily Gazette" which she had been reading. Duke opened it at a page where bold headlines announced:

"Millionaire Kendall and wife cruise—
September 12th, 1934"

ing to England in search of long ago kidnapped baby."

Duke flattened out the paper.

"Put them side by side," he ordered. "Here, let me show you." There was a picture of a baby about eighteen months old beneath the heading, and, next to it, a drawing entitled: "Artist's idea of what the Kendall boy might look like now at eight years of age."

Duke placed Mickie's photograph next to this picture. The resemblance was striking. Louis left his lounging attitude to peer over the heads of Duke and the girl.

"Well?" questioned Duke.

Louis went back to the bar. The girl shook her yellow curls.

"The Kendall kid had a birth-mark on its arm. Besides, it's dead. The kidnapers let it fall off the ladder."

"How do you know?" Duke demanded, gathering up the three photos of Mickie and putting them into his breast pocket. "Nobody knows," he answered his question. He gestured towards the girl, who was steadily regarding him. "Twenty thousand pounds is worth trying for, Daisy."

"Mickie's Jim's kid," she said. "There's no doubt about it. Jim married me—when his wife died—to have someone to look after Mickie. That's all Jim cares about—that boy."

"Jim's in prison. Got ten years," put in Louis, speaking in his sulky tones. "Manslaughter. Lucky to get off at all."

Daisy again shook her yellow curls.

"There's the birth-mark. Better let it be, Duke."

Mickie's shrill voice was heard from the gallery above the parlour bar.

"Aunt Daisy, I've washed my hands! Come up here—I want to show you my tattoo! An old Turk did it for half-a-crown. It's a heart—and it doesn't hurt a bit now!"

"Let's go get tea," spoke Duke. "I'm famished. Okay, Mickie, we're coming." He glanced towards the lounging Louis. "All you have to do is to say nothing, you two. I'll carry this thing through."

"Jim will stop you, somehow," Daisy grumbled. "He's sure to. We never have any luck."

"Over six thousand apiece for you," said Duke. "And the boy made for life. And Jim safe in prison. It's money for jam! Come on up to the kid."

They had scarcely finished their tea when the barman was heard calling from below:

"Duke, there's someone to see you!"

Duke and Louis were just going down to the bar lounge when the door was thrust open and a pale young fellow came staggering into the parlour. He almost fell against Duke.

"The police," he gasped. "They're after me!"

Louis caught hold of him, whilst Duke stiffened up angrily.

"This isn't a hide-out, Harry. This is a straight house."

"Put me somewhere!" panted the youth. "Just for an hour! They didn't see me run in here. Lend me a couple of quid, Duke, and I'll get across to France."

Duke pushed him away, while Daisy caught Mickie.

"Now, then, you go to bed!" she cried.

The boy was staring, all eyes.

"What's he done?" he whispered. "Been ringing door bells and running away?"

Daisy laughed.

"That's it. You go to bed."

Louis put in:

"It's no go, Harry. We got to run square."

September 12th, 1936

"Don't let me down!" pleaded the fugitive. "It was an old buffer who swanked out his wallet and—and dropped it—"

"And you picked it up?" growled Duke. "Not for me, Harry, thanks! You get out, or I'll hand you over myself."

The young man straightened his hat and braced himself.

"Okay, you two holy Joes! Turned pious, eh? I'll remember this, see if I don't!"

He turned to the door, opened for him by Louis, and went shakily down the stairs. Duke lit a cigarette.

"Young fool," he commented. "Lucky I didn't let him in on the job. See if they've got him, Louis."

Louis nodded and followed down to the bar, then through it to the dock-side road. Duke stayed chatting to the bar-tender.

Louis came back.

"Collins picked him up," he told them. "Harry's safe for a two-year stretch."

Duke tossed away his cigarette.

"There we are, then—just you and me and Daisy. I'll get in tow with the Kendalls as soon as their yacht comes to anchor."

"Maybe they won't touch here," Louis was saying when Duke cut him short.

"They will. I sent a cable to New York."

Breakaway

IN Chatham Gaol the prisoners were working in the shoe factory. A biggish man, with leather apron over his prison clothes, was standing by a bench examining the finished shoes and tossing them to the floor. A pallid young man was counting them into a sack held in his left hand. A sharp-faced convict was working at a stitching machine near-by, making a tremendous clattering.

The pale young fellow straightened up, and, under cover of the stitching machine's ceaseless racket, signalled with his lips to the examining prisoner, who at once turned to the machinist.

A glance passed between them. The stitcher quietened down his machine. The young man dropped a boot on to the floor and both he and the examiner stooped for it.

"Daisy's got Mickie," came the quick whisper as the pair stood up, "down at the Harbour Bar. Louis is with them."

"What's that rat doing with Daisy?"

"Making up to her. Duke's got some new scheme on—wants 'em both to help. I bust in on them—took 'em a bit by surprise. Daisy sent the boy to bed."

The machinist scraped the floor with his feet.

"Cave!" he warned them.

A warder came tramping by, glancing sharply at the two at the end of the bench.

"No talking!" he snapped, gripping the examiner's arm.

The machine resumed its deafening clatter. The convicts worked away in sulky obedience. Later on, when they were going into the exercise yard, the machinist found a chance to again caution the big examiner.

"Watch out, Jim, or you'll get sent to Princetown. It's rotten there."

They passed into the circular yard to begin an hour's monotonous tramp, tramp round the marked-out paths. Jim got a chance to tell the pale-faced pick-pocket:

"Thanks, Harry, I'll get the boy somehow. He's all I have to live for."

"No talking, Oakley!" roared the warder, pouncing on them. He glared at Jim. "I've cautioned you once before. All go in!"

Jim answered:

"I won't! I haven't had my hour."

The warder blew his whistle. Three other warders came running up. There was a deafening uproar in which all convicts took part. Jim's action had caused them all to lose a precious breath of fresh air. Jim was over-powered by the warders and dragged away from the shouting mob and hurried to the prison governor, who listened frowningly to the charge against him.

"Inciting other prisoners?" The governor drew an order-book towards him. "You will be transferred to Dartmoor, James Oakley, to-night. You'll serve out your sentence in Princetown Gaol."

In the train, in plain-clothes, but handcuffed to a warder, Oakley sat facing the engine. Silent, morose, watching and waiting for his chance. He had it all planned out.

The second warder sat facing him, reading a paper.

When the train was running over the track across the desolate Devon moors, Oakley asked the senior warder:

"I want the lavatory, officer, please."

The warder handcuffed to him rose. The two men shuffled along the corridor of the swaying train. As they passed from one coach to the next, Oakley was watching for an open window. He presently found one. At once he pulled up his arm with a swift jerk, causing the man manacled to him to utter a cry of pain. Oakley felt for the handle of the door with his free hand, plucked the door open, and flung himself head-long out of the train on to the bank, dragging the warder with him. They rolled over and over together down the steep bank.

The train ran on a mile before the senior warder came along the train to look for the prisoner and his mate. He saw the open door, and knew at once what had happened. He pulled the communication cord and stopped the train.

Then commenced an excited search for the men. It seemed impossible that Oakley could get away, handcuffed to the other man. But luck had been with him—a little workman's hut beside the line had given him a chance to hide as he stumbled along the track, carrying the insensible warder. In the hut was a grindstone. He managed to grind away the short chain that held the handcuffs together. When the search-party came along they found the warder lying prone beside the track, alone.

"Don't Tell Me Anything!"

A PLUMP, good-natured-looking woman of middle years was picking her way across the dark beach to where a grey-black old tramp tug was berthed by a small jetty. She was climbing the steps to the pier when a hand was put out from beneath her to clutch at and hold her ankle.

She made no effort to free herself, but swung the hurricane-lamp she was carrying so that its fitful beams fell upon the man below the steps. He peered up at her, his dead white face showing in a kind of imploring grin.

"It's you, Jim Oakley," stated the woman passively.

"It's me, Aunt Emphy," he admitted, letting go. "Can I come aboard the Firefly?"

"I can't stop you, can I?" she answered.

He crept out of hiding and followed her up to the jetty, then padded softly after her as she swung the lamp. They came to the gangway, crossed it, then moved along the deck of the tug to the cabin hatchway.

"You go first," said Aunt Euphy, "while I hold the light."

Oakley descended the ladder. Aunt Euphy came down with heavy deliberation. She was carrying parcels as well as the lamp.

"So you've come back?" she questioned.

"You may call it so," he answered, eyeing her as she hung the lamp on a hook in the wall of the cabin. "I've got to take Mickie away."

"He's with Daisy and Louis at the 'Harbour Bar,'" she told him. She regarded him with steady eyes. "You look all in, Jim. What's the matter?"

"Can you lend me a file?" he muttered. "When I get this off my wrist—he held up his right hand—"I can talk a bit easier."

She nodded her head. "I see." She moved across to some built-in drawers, opened one, rummaged about in it, and presently brought out a three-cornered iron file. "Don't tell me anything, Jim—I don't want to know."

Oakley made a gesture of thanks. "You always were a good 'un, Euphy," he muttered.

He took the file and climbed up the ladder out of the cabin.

Aunt Euphy opened her parcels and calmly began to prepare supper.

She didn't want to know. She liked Jim—she had liked Mickie's mother, dead these last three years.

Oakley returned to the cabin. He handed her the file, showing her his now freed wrist.

"I'd like a clean up, Euphy, and an old suit of clothes. I've broken gaol."

"Stop it!" she cried. "I won't listen. Get your wash and come to supper."

"You mean I can hide here?" he asked. "Is it safe?"

"I want a deck hand—a strong lad. Like the job?"

"Won't your men tell on me?" Oakley hesitated.

"They do what I tell 'em," she stated. "Sit you down, Jim—you're safe as houses here. Eat and be thankful."

"I am thankful, Aunt Euphy. With all my heart." Oakley's gruff tones softened. "I had to get away. I couldn't let Mickie stay along with that rat Louis."

"Duke's in charge at the moment," she told him. "He's a big tom cat—able to deal with rats." Aunt Euphy helped Oakley to a plateful of meat, then put a bottle of beer beside him:

"What are your plans, Jim?"

"To get Mickie away from that crew," he answered savagely. "My son isn't going to be brought up by crooks." He met her gaze. "I know what you're thinking—that a convict father isn't likely to be much better. But Mickie won't ever know—I'm going to start afresh. Going to change my name and get in a shipyard somewhere abroad." He paused to ask: "You'll help me get across to France?"

"With the boy?"

"That's the idea. I'm going to get him."

"How?"

"I'll find a way. I'll get a peep at the 'Harbour Bar' to-night. I can climb the roofs, now that my hands are free."

Inspector Collins Gets on the Track

MICKIE, in his little attic, was wakened out of first slumbers by the sound of the skylight being lifted. He turned over in his bed, staring up into the moonlit square of sky now being revealed. He saw a shadowy figure climbing into the room and sat up sharply.

"It's me, Mickie," came a quiet voice. "Don't call out—don't let anybody know. It's a secret."

The boy whispered, awestruck.

"Is it you, dad? Really you?"

Oakley was beside the bed. Next instant the boy was in his arms.

"Oh, Mickie—Mickie! My little brave boy!"

They hugged each other in silence, the boy's arms tight round his father's neck.

"Where you been, dad, all this time?" he whispered presently.

"Voyaging," answered Oakley. "I put into port on purpose to see you." He caught his breath. "You're all I got, Mickie—all."

"You won't go away again?" the boy pleaded. "Aunt Daisy's all right—so's Uncle Duke. But I love you best."

"I'm taking you with me," Oakley murmured. "To-morrow, or next day. I've got a lovely ship—just the sort you like. She's laying alongside a little jetty." He checked himself. "Hush—what's that?"

"Somebody come in," Mickie listened with keen ears. "Strangers—hear 'em talking to Uncle Duke?"

"I'll have to go." Oakley released the boy. "Don't let on I've been here. It's a dead secret betwixt you and me, Mickie." He moved away to the window, silent as a shadow—lifted the sash and slid out on to the tiles. The moon, hidden behind scurrying clouds, helped him to get away unseen, but his foot slipped once and kicked down a loose tile with a little crash into the yard below.

In the parlour on the first floor two plain clothes policemen were busy with Duke and Louis. One of them was searching Duke's pockets while that worthy, hands up, calmly smoked his cigarette. Louis was lounging in his shirt sleeves in a chair by the supper table regarding with amused eyes the second man's grip on his shoulders.

Duke, cigarette dangling between thick lips, asked his man:

"Satisfied, Inspector Collins?"

Collins, broad and grumpy, answered:

"No—far from it! You've Oakley hidden here somewhere."

"Search the house," said Duke. "May I put down my hands?"

"So you did send for the police!" growled Duke, as the two detectives walked into the cabin.

Collins stood away, frowningly.

"I'll search every hole and corner! It stands to reason Oakley will make for here—where his boy is. He don't trust you any more than I do."

"Got a warrant, I presume?" Duke queried. "It's usual—when you come bursting into a man's private house."

"I've got a warrant, Duke." Inspector Collins answered crisply. "Here it is." He showed a blue paper taken from his breast pocket. "Where's the boy?"

"Asleep in bed," Daisy told him. "Come up and look."

"You go, Banks," Collins ordered. "I'll have a little chat with the barman downstairs." A sharp little noise sounded from the yard. "Hallo, what's that?"

He ran to the window, jerked it open, and leaned out. The moon was bright again, throwing silvery patches here and there on the shabby little garden with its stunted bushes. A cat suddenly yowled and spat at some other male feline hidden in the shadows. Collins closed the window.

"All right, Banks—only cats. Creep upstairs with Mrs. Oakley and see if the kid's in his bed. Don't wake him."

Ten minutes later the policemen were ready to go. Banks had reported Mickie fast asleep; the barman hadn't been able to tell them anything.

"Because there's nothing to tell, inspector," said Duke in his slow un-ruffled voice. "Oakley isn't here. If I even get a glimpse of him, I'll ring you."

They called again in the morning, as soon as they had watched Duke and Louis off the premises. Daisy greeted them with a sneer:

"Come to bully me now?"

"We want a talk with the boy," said Collins. "Oakley has been tracked to within ten miles of here. He may have got at Mickie for a minute or two."

"Bullying kids is about your weight, inspector," said Daisy. "All right, come on up! I'll see you don't frighten him."

Mickie was in his room, ready dressed for school.

"Here's two nice, kind gentlemen come to see you," Daisy announced. Collins put out a hand.

"Well, Mickie—how are you?"

"All right, sir—thank you."

"Seen your dad, lately?"

"No, sir."

"He was asking about you," said Collins. "Only the other day."

Mickie asked:

"Was he, sir? When?"

"I told him you were growing up a lot, Mickie."

The boy felt Daisy's hands on his shoulders. Banks was watching them both with cold, keen eyes.

Collins let go Mickie's fingers.

"Haven't you a message for your dad?" he inquired.

"I'll be seeing him soon, sir."

"How d'you know that?" Collins demanded quickly.

"He promised us when he went away that he'd soon be home."

"All right, old son—we musn't make you late for school. Good-bye."

Again he shook hands; then nodded to Banks.

"We'll get along. Good-bye, Mrs. Oakley."

The Kendalls Arrive

JUST outside the port, the beautiful white yacht Trident was steady at its moorings. In the saloon were three people—a tall, cleanly shaved American; a grey-headed be-spectacled older man, and a palely handsome woman. The oldish man was saying:

"Don't go ashore, Irene. There's a chill wind—and a day's rest aboard is what you need."

September 12th, 1936

She turned to the other man.

"Shall I lie down, Paul?"

Her husband said tenderly:

"Yes, dear, do. Walter's right—the wind is cold."

She assented listlessly.

"I do feel tired. Yes, I'll lie down."

Her husband opened the door for her to pass into her sleeping quarters. He watched her go, sighing to herself. When he turned to the older man, he nodded his head as if answering some inner question.

"She'll never be right until she forgets," he said. "If ever she can forget."

"Time will show," the other tried to comfort him. "She has no idea why we have put in here?"

"Not a word has passed my lips," Paul Kendall answered. "If this fellow is only one more speculator on our unhappiness—"

"He is," came the quick decision. "Jackie is dead. I hate to say it, Paul, but I'm your doctor and a doctor has to tell the truth. I would advise you not to see the man."

One of the crew was at the door.

"There's a gentleman come aboard, name of Duke. He says he has an appointment."

Duke, heavy and quiet, had followed to the cabin. He glanced from one to the other:

"Mr. Paul Kendall?" he inquired.

Kendall answered:

"That is my name. This is my medical adviser, Dr. Walter Merian. You can speak before him."

Duke stepped into the cabin and closed the door.

"I take it I'm dealing with gentlemen who won't tell the police?" he asked. "Not that I've anything to fear; I'm just a go-between."

"Only Dr. Merian and I have seen your letters," Kendall answered.

"Well, sir, you'll have to act quickly if you want your boy—"

"If I want him!" cried Kendall passionately. "If you can bring him back to us—you can have anything you ask!"

Duke had been eyeing Merian and sensed that the doctor was against him. So he played his trump cards, the cutting from the Sunday newspaper with the artist's picture of what young John Kendall might now look like—and the photograph of Mickie. He drew them from an overcoat pocket and placed them on the table.

"See for yourselves," he said.

Kendall studied the boy's photograph with misty eyes. It meant his wife's happiness and perhaps her life—that their son should be found. He straightened up.

"It may be John."

"It is," declared Duke. "The fellow who kidnapped your baby is a sailor—that's how he got away without a trace. He brought the baby to England, meaning to claim the ransom. But he's a violent man and quarrelled with a sailor over something—and killed him in a fight. So he got caught and put away. Manslaughter." Duke gestured towards the newspaper cutting. "I saw that picture and I knew at once that Jim Oakley was a liar when he claimed to be father to young Mickie. So I got into touch with him, Mr. Kendall. I'm not married, but I can guess what your feelings are."

Merian put in:

"You know where this boy is?"

"I do. And I can get him. There's Daisy Oakley to deal with and a young fellow who's related to her. Oakley was given ten years, but he's broken gaol."

"I must see the boy," said Kendall. "If he is my son"—he checked himself at a warning sign from Merian—"if he's my son, I shall not fail to know him."

Duke lifted his bowler hat and wiped his forehead. Then put on his hat again.

"This is ticklish work, gentlemen, for me. If Oakley should get to know—my time on earth would be over! I can bring the boy to you to-night."

His greedy eyes fixed on Kendall as he lighted a cigarette.

"The money will be ready," came Kendall's promise. "It is here now. All in bank notes." He went to a safe built in the cabin wall and drew out a small attache case. This he opened and placed before Duke on the table.

The sight of the neat bundles of notes was almost too much for the conspirator. He took up a couple of bundles, but Kendall's fingers closed round his wrist. "I must see the boy and be dead sure," he said.

"I was only going to count them," Duke muttered, dropping the notes.

Duke stood away from temptation. "After dark to-night," he told Kendall, "I'll bring the boy and collect the cash. Then we'll get away—before Oakley gets us. France or Italy."

He gave Merian a curt nod, lifted his hat to Kendall, then moved to the door, opened it, and went without a backward glance.

"A crook," said Merian. "If ever I saw one!"

"Puss! Puss!"

CLOUDS obscured the moon and there was a hint of rain in the air. Oakley, on leaving the tug cabin, spoke gruffly to Aunt Enphy:

"You're sailing to-night?"

"Eleven—or just after. I want to catch the ebb tide."

"And it'll be safe for me to bring Mickie?"

"Safe as I can make it, Jim. But I don't know anything about you—or your plans. I don't want to—I've kept clear of the police all my days."

The man paused on the ladder, looking down at her.

"I'll never be able to thank you, Enphy. You're a great pal."

Aunt Enphy, busy at her work, only grunted. "Back at eleven, or you'll be left!"

Oakley slid off the ship and along the jetty like a shadow. By devious ways he brought himself to the Harbour Bar, climbing the wall at the back. Then he sealed up the stack pipe like a big monkey, and drew himself on to the roof. Some kind of a rumpus was going on in the bar below—he could hear shouts and thuds and groans, then presently a police whistle shrilling. He lay flat on the tiles under the deeper gloom of the chimneys, listening and wondering.

A policeman came running—only one—which puzzled him. Voices were carried up to him in a lot of talk, indistinguishable. Then things quietened; the policeman was heard to go—the barman calling a grumpy "good-night" after him. At ten o'clock the bar was closed and the little public-house became dead quiet.

Oakley moved from his cramped position and drew along to the skylight of Mickie's attic. He softly drew it up and slid under it into the dark room. He called, whisperingly:

"Mickie! Mickie, old lad—it's me, Daddy. Only me!"

Silence reigned in the pitch darkness. Oakley tiptoed to the bed and put out a hand. The bedclothes hadn't been turned down, no one was there.

Oakley's heart stood still a moment as terror gripped him. Something very wrong had happened. He re-

Through the daring of a young Englishman and a French girl an Arab rising is broken and peace restored to the desert. A saga of the French Foreign Legion, starring Ronald Colman, Claudette Colbert and Victor McLaglen

“UNDER TWO FLAGS”

Cigarette

THE 5th Battalion of the French Foreign Legion was stationed in the barracks of Abeshe. To the legionnaires this dirty little Arabic town was an oasis in their dreary lives; and what made it that was Cigarette's café. Cigarette, a pretty, impulsive French girl, ruled the place with a rod of iron, and ran it for her father.

The Legion adored her. Her sharp tongue slashed them when they were drunk, but when they were sick or wounded she was the first to bring them free wine and words of cheer.

Of all the legionnaires, Major Doyle was her favourite, and she was his. Major Doyle was an Irishman who had worked his way up through the ranks. Big and blunt and brusque, he embodied the discipline and the tradition of the Legion, and in his rough and plain-spoken manner he loved Cigarette. He pleaded often with her to marry him, but she laughed and said she would when he was a colonel.

Life for the 5th Battalion went on very much as usual until word came through that the 17th Company, coming into Abeshe to relieve some of the men, had been ambushed some fifteen miles from the town, had almost been wiped out by Arabs in a fierce skirmish.

Major Doyle, with a squadron of Chasseurs, galloped madly to their rescue, and when they arrived at a cluster of rocks found a pitifully small group of men fighting doggedly to keep the yelling horde of Arabs at bay. The men were under the command of Corporal Victor, an Englishman, who had taken charge when all the officers had been killed, and his meritorious service won the admiration of Major Doyle when all the facts had been explained to him.

The first night in Abeshe, Victor, accompanied by a few members of his old company, entered Cigarette's café.

Cigarette looked at him, and her face softened. He wore his clothes in the careless manner of a legionnaire, but his face, his eyes, the way he carried himself—all marked him as a man different from the others.

When he and his friends had seated themselves at a table, Cigarette strolled over to him with a bottle of wine.

“Corporal Victor,” she said sweetly, “I welcome you to my café and give you this bottle of wine.”

“Thank you, mademoiselle,” he answered without interest, “but may we have four glasses, please? We have brought our own wine—a bottle of old cognac.”

He stood the bottle in the centre of the table, and the four legionnaires solemnly stood and saluted it, while Cigarette gasped in amazement at this casual attitude.

“But,” she protested, “I am Cigarette!”

Victor smiled and said: “Again—how do you do, but may we have those four glasses, please?”

Cigarette exploded. Soldiers made a fuss over her, but not this one, so she berated Victor. Then her attitude changed, and she flung her arms round his neck and sat herself on his lap and cried to the legionnaires:

“He's too good to sing with us—”

But Victor sang, and did not seem to mind the arm round his neck. Then suddenly, in the midst of a rousing chorus, he opened his legs wide and she fell to the floor. The room roared with laughter as Cigarette jumped to her feet, her eyes blazing furiously.

“And now, mademoiselle,” Victor laughed, “if you will forgive me, I'll go to a café where drinking is the sole entertainment.”

Cigarette's anger rose to hysterical heights when Victor and his friends had gone. She swore she would have the major take away his corporal's stripes.

The next day, however, she saw him again. The corporal's stripes were gone, and in their place were sergeant's stripes. Cigarette went to Major Doyle and screamed and raged at the added insult. The major was helpless and embarrassed, tried to quieten her, but his efforts brought no results.

Somebody at the door called “Attention!” and Victor and Rake stiffened and turned on their heels. Victor's eyes widened, then he blinked in stark amazement, as a man would do if he saw a ghost.

But it was no ghost he saw—it was a girl. An English girl whose beauty seemed like the part of a beautiful dream. She was being shown over the barracks by Major Doyle, who was still a little worried over his hectic interview with Cigarette.

He was explaining to the girl about the life and barracks of the legionnaires, and she stopped and spoke to one of the men. Victor remembered suddenly that there was an English Commissioner in Abeshe. Perhaps this was his daughter.

Then he was conscious that the girl was near him, and heard the major explaining that he had just been made a sergeant for the way he had acted when the 17th Company had been surrounded by Arabs.

“How do you do?” she said when the major had finished his recital.

Victor relaxed and smiled. The girl looked down at a small piece of wood he had carved into the shape of a horse.

"Oh, it looks a thoroughbred, sergeant!" she exclaimed.

"What's this?" the major blurted out. "A lot he sees of thoroughbreds round here!"

There was a tense moment of embarrassment, broken by the major who walked over and spoke to one of the legionnaires at the other end of the room.

"He's rather like a hull in a china shop," murmured the girl in a low voice. "I'm so sorry——"

"Please don't bother," Victor answered. "A legionnaire must expect such things. I'm glad you like my horse."

The major came back and tried to buy the horse for the girl, but she refused, saying that the sergeant wouldn't want to part with it. Then they went out of the room, and the soldiers relaxed.

That night at the little hotel in the Arab town a reception was held in honour of Lord Seraph, the British Commissioner and his niece, Lady Venetia Cunningham.

Venetia, the girl that Victor had seen in the barrack-room that afternoon, stood in the patio garden talking to Captain Menzies.

Suddenly she stiffened, and a startled look came into her eyes, for coming towards her was Victor, and then she smiled amusedly.

Victor saluted the captain, and said: "Important dispatches have just arrived, sir. Colonel Ferol wishes to see you."

Captain Menzies excused himself, and, left alone, Victor smiled at the girl.

"Need I apologise?" he said softly. "Was there any such message?" "Oh, yes," replied Victor, "but I didn't bring them. I had to bring you something, and when I heard about the dispatches, I decided to report them to Captain Menzies."

"That is dangerous for you." "Twice dangerous," Victor said, with a laugh. "A firing squad on one side—your eyes on the other."

"You're a daring man, sergeant," the girl murmured.

"I had to come to bring you this," he said, and handed her the carved horse. "You were kind enough to admire it. I couldn't sell it, but I can give it."

"Thank you," she said, taking the little piece of wood. "I shall love it—not only for itself, but because you risked so much to bring it. Do you know, this is the first exciting thing that has happened to me in this monotonous country."

"You do not know Africa—the Africa beyond this hotel——"

She looked at him searchingly for a long moment.

"Will you show it to me—to-night?" she whispered.

Victor asked no more questions, but lifted Venetia over the patio fence, and in a moment they had disappeared down a dark street. They saw Africa that night—and they saw another thing. It was in both their eyes. The absurd futility of love did not occur to them in those precious mad moments.

But when the time came for Venetia to return, they looked at each other, and the stark realisation of their position came to them with brutal reality. Victor was a humble legionnaire. She had not asked why he was there, but Legion to hurry their past.

"Don't," she pleaded. "Don't say good-bye—let me go back alone."

Victor nodded, and she disappeared into the night—alone.

While Victor stood with Venetia in that dark street, Cigarette was in her café, waiting for him. He had promised September 12th, 1936 to come that night. The promise had been made in the desert earlier that day. Her anger against him had fled, and she had kissed him and told him that she loved him.

He had teased her about it, but Cigarette's young heart did not understand that he was teasing her. So she waited for him, but he did not come; instead, Major Doyle went to her room where she was sobbing on the bed and demanded that she marry him. She told him, in between her sobs, that she loved Victor and could never marry Major Doyle. Doyle strode out of the room, his face hard and his eyes flashing.

"A Soldier of France——"
THEN, suddenly over all came war and the shadow of Sidi-Ben-Youssif, the most powerful of the Arab chieftains. He had organised the tribes in one final effort to drive the French from Northern Africa. Major Doyle and his battalion were ordered to Ain Sefra to stop the juncture of the tribes.

In the barracks where the men were preparing to leave, Rake, Victor's friend, rushed up to Victor.

"Victor," he cried, "I—I have seen Lord Seraph. He's at the hotel with the British party. That lady who came to the barracks with Major Doyle, she—she's his niece!"

"Rake," Victor cried in alarm, "pack for me! I'll meet you on the parade ground. That wood carving of 'Forest King'—she has it, and I've got to get it back."

He hurried off to the hotel and slipped into her room by the back stairs. A hurried search of the room failed to reveal the hiding-place of the carving, and he was about to search the dressing-table drawers when the door opened and Venetia stepped in the room.

"What——" she began; but he cut her short.

"I've come to say good-bye," he said. "We've been ordered to Ain Sefra and—and I want that little carving back."

She took no notice of that last remark, but flung herself into his arms and kissed him passionately. He tried to put her from him and ask again for the carving, but a knock sounded on the door and her uncle's voice asking to come in.

"Come back to me," she whispered brokenly. "You won't always be a legionnaire."

A bugle sounded in the distance, calling the battalion together, and her uncle knocked again loudly on the door.

"Come back to me, please!" Venetia pleaded as Victor slipped out of the room the way he had come.

As he ran out of the hotel entrance and glanced back to where Venetia stood on the balcony, Cigarette crouched by the pillar and jealous hatred flamed in her eyes.

Major Doyle and the battalion went to Ain Sefra, but a change had come over the major. He wore the epaulettes of a colonel now, but his promotion brought no joy to his face. He was thinking of Cigarette and the man she loved.

His attitude to Victor had turned to cold hatred. This hatred found expression when the battalion arrived at Ain Sefra. Victor was sent out on a detail that meant his certain death—but he came back alive. He was sent on another, and when he came back was sent on yet a third, one that no man could hope to get out of alive.

He knew that Colonel Doyle was sending him to his death, but he did not know why. Every man in the battalion knew that the colonel hated Victor and Victor would never return to Abeshe, and this information was taken back to Cigarette by the wounded legionnaires.

In her hotel Venetia learned the true story of Victor. Her uncle, Lord Seraph, saw the wooden carving of the horse. He picked it up and looked at it in wonderment for a moment,

"The SINGING VAGABOND"

Captured by Outlaws

A LONE rider was etched against the setting sun as he sat his bronc on the brink of the ravine. He looked to be a carved statue, even his horse was immobile, still as the gun that rested on the pommel.

Suddenly a quiver of movement galvanised the horseman. A sound far off had caught his super-sensitive ears. His head jerked sideways, but his well-trained mount remained stock-still. It was true—wheels were approaching! Wheels coming in from the desert! That meant travellers—more, it implied lonely travellers, for the watcher well knew that the regular wagon train had passed two days before. Here was loot for this man and his renegade band who were hidden at the moment far down in the valley behind him.

With narrowed eyes the outlaw gazed towards where the desolate hills shelved to a cleft almost a mile off. Through that pass the wagons would come and then go along the grassy floor of the ravine immediately beneath him. It was their only route. Here, trapped in a hollow, with hills rising on each side, the travellers would be easy prey.

The outpost soon saw the first team of horses appear over the brow of the pass, a covered wagon swaying behind. He set the pair of glasses, that swung on a strap from his neck, to his eyes and focused them. One, two, three, four wagons. And no guard! None of the cursed scuts from Fort Henry rode jauntily beside the little cavalcade. Instead, the field glasses showed that peering from each of the wagons were women. Apart from the drivers, there didn't seem to be an armed man among them!

The sentry's spurs gouged the sides of his horse, the reins tightened, and in an instant he was headed down the steep slope, racing over the tumble of mesquite and rock, one arm flying, his broad Stetson flapping in the wind made by his reckless progress. Within five minutes he had snatched his horse to its haunches in the middle of a score of men who grouped expectantly round him.

"Wagons, four of 'em, just through the pass. No guards. And 's fur as I cud see only a bunch of girls fur us to wrangle. They'll sure carry bables."

Even as he spoke, hands reached for bridles.

"What say, boys?" called out the chief, but there was no need for the question. With grunts and nods the outlaws, who were known throughout the length of these Western wilds as the Renegades, leapt to their saddles. Hoofs clattered madly up the steep ascent towards the ridge, plunged over and hurtled down to where the wagons were now passing.

A volley announced the riders' presence—and made abundantly clear their intentions!

The cavalcade broke into pandemonium. Drivers lashed their animals, infuriating them. The horses reared and snorted, then stretched forward under the urge of the whips. Squeals of alarm broke from underneath the canvas coverings, and frightened eyes peered from under poke bonnets, while delicate hands clutched the iron stays as the vehicles were thrown into rolling frenzy.

"They said in town it was dangerous, coming without escort," one girl muttered through chattering teeth. "What will happen if—oh, look!"

Her finger pointed through the back of her wagon to the one behind. A horse had been shot through the head; it pitched forward its iron hoofs kicking in a last convulsion into the withers of its neighbour that had been dragged to its knees by the tautened traces. In a moment all the six animals comprising the team were a chaotic mass, half of them hurt, all of them struggling, traces snapping, the driver shouting, and through it all the cries of girls, the crack of six-guns, the splintering of coachwork.

Back of this squirming tangle, a wagon swung out of line. The driver tugged at the reins until it had cleared the wreckage; then managed somehow to release one hand and snatch up a carbine propped against his seat. He swung it towards the encircling horsemen.

"The cursed Renegades," he snarled: fired and growled his pleasure to see one of the attackers tumble headlong from his saddle and roll over and over in the dust.

But the broncs of the Renegades were faster than the harness horses. Firing, not so much to hurt as to frighten—since their enemies were a bunch of beautiful and helpless girls—the outlaws, laughing and shouting, closed in. The train was soon surrounded, and restive horses were being held while revolvers covered drivers and passengers.

"Git out, all o' ya," came the chief's brusque command.

Resistance was futile. Hands reached out and gripped slim wrists, a pull and one of the girls was in rough arms. The others were swept out in similar manner to the accompaniment of piercing screams. These girls from the towns knew the character of the men of the mountains and abandoned hope of escape. One of them, known as Honey, glanced fearfully round at darkening landscape. The timbered slopes seemed to crowd down ominously over the scene; she struggled in the grasp of a powerful fellow who had switched his rifle round to his back in order to lift her to the ground.

"You beast!" she spat at him, but the only answer she got was to have her chin tilted upwards as her captor laughed into her eyes.

"Purty lips to talk thataways to a man," he elided uncouthly. "I must teach 'em to be kinder like."

The girls were corralled in a human blockade of outlaws.

"Well, boys," said the boss with heavy jocularly. "what'll we do with the loot? It's a tidy bunch." His eyes rested appreciatively on one of the girls, a dainty sight he thought her in her striped gown and bonnet, slim and pretty, none the less attractive because of the look of horror in her shrinking eyes. "I'll look after you, me dear," he had said.

Everyone grew tense. Down the trail sounds broke into the scene. The hillsides began to echo the flying feet of horses pushed to their extremity.

"The scouts!" It was a yell from the leader. "On yer hosses!"

It was the way of the West in the 'sixties to fight from the saddle. The outlaws' brones—for they were hardly broken, many of them—were fleet, and the men could handle them adroitly. Almost before the command was ripped out all were in the saddle and had turned, not towards the fastnesses of the heights, but to face the new foe.

On they came, the men of the United States Army from Fort Henry, whose toilsome job it was to watch over travellers through this Bad Man's Land. They had learned of the foolish theatrical manager who, having missed the big wagon train, had decided to make San Francisco on his own in order to keep an engagement with his beauty chorus. The scouts knew the Renegades were out, and, headed by Captain Tex, had ridden madly in the wake of the unguarded wagons.

They were bearing down now—only just in time.

"At 'em, boys. No quarter," Captain Tex had said hardly above level voice. Every man there knew his job, knew his leader: would carry out the one and follow the other as far as Hell's gates and through. Low over their horses' necks they leaned, hands steady on the reins, no quiver of fear to shake the trueness of their aim as soon as they were within shooting range.

A score of guns barked. "Got 'im!" muttered Frog. "That bucco jumped so high he had time to say his prayers before he lauded." He was the wag of the company—and none the less efficient and loyal because of that.

No one laughed. Grim work was on hand. Captain Tex, as he emptied his revolver and plunged on, had a shiver of alarm—not because of the guns still snarling about him or thought of the hand-to-hand tussle that was imminent; it was because his eye had caught sight of a horseless wagon that had slowly commenced to move of its own volition down the slope. He knew this gorge well; where the ground fell away yonder beside the trail, it dipped at an ever-increasing angle to the brink of a precipice. Over that edge was a sheer drop on to rocks. The wagon was slowly rolling that way. And in it he could see several of the girls!

"Doggone it," he growled between clenched teeth, "how'll I stop that?"

Nothing could be done at the moment; he was in the midst of the outlaws, fighting desperately. On, hit the ground with his face, another toppled, stunned by a blow from the butt-end of his pistol, and then, with a calculating glance as if to assure himself his men could more than hold their own, he was away—away like the wind on Champion, the fastest horse in all California, in the dusty wake of the un-horsed wagon which by now was hurtling drunkenly down the incline towards the precipice.

Humbled Pride

IT looked as though gravity was going to beat the best that Champion could do, but the gallant horse, maddened by unaccustomed spurring, stretched out to the last ounce of his strength, crept inch by inch nearer to the runaway lumbering vehicle that threatened every moment to turn turtle.

"Wish it would," Tex thought fleetingly. "Better that than the precipice." But the wagon flung onwards, ever faster, with the captain straining in its wake.

He yelled after it. Grasping the stays of the cover, faces peered out at him, the fear of death in wild eyes that were made for lighter use.

"I'll get you," he shouted, hardly daring to hope he might. But he was nearly up to the tailboard that flung itself every way, following the gyrations of the vehicle. Suddenly, those inside saw him stand in his saddle, held their breath as he made a flying leap from his horse to grab a stanchion and hang, half on, half off the bucking-board. Then he was up on his feet, had grabbed the nearest of the show girls and, quick as thought, had flung both himself and her out into the air. The girl shut her eyes, awaiting the impact, thinking her last moment had come, but Tex's brain was running smoothly and as they fell he twisted her into the upper position and himself took the shock of the earth. Over and over they rolled; then leaving her he was up again, and, never touching stirrup, had vaulted into the saddle of Champion, who, as though he knew what was expected of him, had come to his master's side, heavily breathing and almost spent. Spurs and knees urged him again into the chase—a mad, seemingly hopeless pursuit of the racing, rolling wagon.

No time now to get aboard; the precipice was looming near, a score of yards away.

"Jump!" he cried to the two remaining girls within.

Side by side at furious pace the wagon and the rider sped towards death. One girl leapt; Tex caught her and with barest let-up in the hurricane speed of Champion, slid her to the ground. Leaving her bowling, he held out his arms for the remaining girl. She in turn leapt—and thus Lettie Morgan, principal show girl, came violently into the arms of Captain Tex.

Right on the brink of the ravine Champion came to a standstill, his forefeet dug into the loose earth, and Tex took in deep breaths to recover, hardly aware of the fragile slip of womanhood lying against his breast. Fainted, he supposed. Good!

But Lettie was very much alive. She had made no cry during the few minutes she was held in the grasp of this man who had snatched her from certain death. Once she looked up as they stood there. She saw the edge of the precipice, saw the heavy wagon go over, for an instant noticed how it crashed against a jutting rock before it disappeared out of sight. Its shattering progress was announced to her reeling senses by the rip and grind of breaking timber and the screech of tearing canvas and that final bump as it landed at length, little more than splinters, far beyond their vision at the bottom of the precipice.

It was too early for her to speak, hardly to think of the disaster from which this man had snatched her. She lay quiet in his hold as he turned Champion and raced back to the scene of the fray.

The fight was over, the brigands put to flight. Lettie shuddered at the signs of the recent battle that were all around her—horses lying dead upon their sides, three men for ever mute, one still squirming from side to side in final agony. It was hard to pity them, fresh as she was from their clutches, saved so miraculously by this handsome leader of the scouts. She stood regarding him for a moment while he gave instructions to his men. Heedless of his absorption in his job she walked across and touched his arm. He turned abruptly.

"I haven't had a chance to thank you," she said, "for saving my life." Her eyes shone up into his.

The response was not what she expected.

"Why should you bunch of females expect the United States Army to drop everything and ride to save you from your foolishness?"

The words whipped Lettie's pride. Her eyes blazed.

"I didn't ask you to save me," she flamed.

"We've enough to do without a bundle of stupid women crossing the border unprotected. Don't you understand the risk?"

"I know when I meet a bully!" Tex shrugged. Women meant nothing to him, his job everything. He tilted his Stetson over his eyes and moved off among his men. Very soon he gave the order to ride.

"Let each man take one of these women in front of him and get back to the fort," he ordered. "As for you," he said, turning to Lettie, "you ride with me." His tone was brusque, the voice of a man who expected to be obeyed. It riled Lettie.

"I'd rather walk," she stormed.

"Right," said Tex, "walk!" He watched the men mount, saw the girls swung up to the saddles; then with no more ado he turned Champion's head back to the fort. The others followed. And as they went they broke into the song they always sang when out on the march:

"We are the Singing Vagabonds." With no more regard to Lettie, the troop moved off. Tex led. He sang with the rest. Out of a corner of his eye he noticed that slim beauty who had flung her defiance at him—Lettie—walked beside his horse. Her head was held high, her mouth tight. She strode proudly—like a queen.

A mile and she was stumbling; no one took any notice of her. She fell behind the eavalcade, tripped to her knees, scrambled up and ran on. Her mind visualised herself left alone, with the troop gone ahead. Darkness was near. Still Tex sang with his men—and rode with his eyes staring ahead.

At length a small voice came up to him.

"I'm sorry, Captain Tex. May I ride with you?" Lettie could go no farther on the urge of her pride, her strength had failed her.

"Sure; didn't I ask you?" He smiled, he reached down, he seized one wrist of hers and swung her easily beside him. The troop had not halted in its stride, had not faltered in its song.

"We are the Singing Vagabonds."
They rode on to Fort Henry.

The Impostor

AS to Tex, so to all the members of the Show Girls Company, Lettie Morgan was sailing under false colours. She was not really the leading lady. Events had made her assume that rôle.

The night the company had set out on this hazardous trip to San Francisco, Lettie had been seated in a box at the theatre where a minstrel troupe had been performing. She was in love with one of the company, a handsome ne'er-do-well, named Larry, who had been quick to realise the value of the girl's infatuation. Was she not Lettie Morgan, heiress of the late millionaire? He encouraged her girlish affection and she was so obsessed by his impassioned avowals that neither her aunt nor the austere Judge Lane (who had proposed for her hand), both of whom were with her in the box, could dissuade her from going to Larry's dressing-room. Romance called to her. She was ready to renounce her high position and seek a life with Larry away from the restrictions with which her punctilious aunt hedged her about.

But the lovers had hardly embraced when into the shabby dressing-room walked the aunt, unannounced. Judge Lane was with her.

The lady spoke abruptly.

"Lettie," she said. "I've tried to keep this from you. I loved you, you have been everything to me, having no daughter of my own. But the time has come to tell you the truth and I think this is the moment to impart it. You have considered yourself a great heiress. You are not. Your father left nothing. For all the years since he died you have lived on my bounty."

It was a shock, but Lettie was loyal to her word to Larry.

"What does money matter?" she cried scathingly. "Do you think Larry and I care?"

"That is for the gentleman to say—and you," snapped the aunt, and walked from the room.

Lettie turned impulsively to her lover. "As if we care!" she repeated contemptuously.

Larry fumbled with his words. "You see, my dear," he said weakly, "I've nothing to—er—offer you."

"But you'll make good. You were just wonderful to-night. Oh, but we'll be all right. And do you think I mind if we have to struggle?"

"It may be a long while before—before—" He stumbled to a stop, confused, hesitant. The truth that the money did count with him was written in his eyes. She stared at him aghast for one long moment; then she had grasped the humiliating fact. Her imagined wealth, not she herself, had captivated him. She shrank away in her disillusionment, and only the Morgan pride kept her head high as she made for the door.

"So my aunt was right," she scoffed at him. "A fortune hunter!"

"See here, sweetheart—" he began, thinking that surely there must be some mistake. But she shot out a silencing hand.

"Good-bye!" she said imperiously though she felt at the moment that her heart would break. Haughtily she passed through the door, heeding nothing of his forward rush to intercept her, went from the theatre out into the night, clad only in her evening gown, her hair flying in the wind. One thing she knew; she could not return to the box where her aunt awaited her. She rushed into the streets. And as she emerged hurriedly on to the sidewalk she bumped into an elderly woman carrying so many parcels that it seemed she must be moving with all her belongings. She was. She was about to join the company of Show Girls bound for San Francisco.

"Let me help you," said Lettie, and gathering up some fallen packages struggled along with the woman towards where a buggy was drawn up beside a hotel.

The manager was worried, not so much about the absence of the elderly lady of the troupe, but owing to the fact that the new leading lady (whom he had not yet met) had not arrived on schedule.

"Ah, here she is," he cried, seeing the woman running up in company with Lettie. "We've been waiting for you," he said a bit sternly. "Get in."

Lettie was nonplussed. But here was a party of good people, and suddenly she remembered she was an orphan, poor and with nowhere to go unless she returned to accept the charity of her stern aunt. She got into the vehicle, ready to take whatever the future had in store for her.

One accomplishment Lettie had to help her carry through her imposture as leading lady of these Show Girls. She could sing. So she was not afraid when Colonel Seward, in command of the Henry Post, suggested almost as soon as the rescued company were safely inside that they should stage their show for the benefit of his staff.

"Some of my own men might assist," he smiled. "We amuse ourselves here between the work."

It was a great show. The girls were lovely and were not chary with their smiles. The scouts joined in—and Letty found herself singing with Captain Tex. He had a wonderfully sympathetic voice and they harmonised well in a haunting number called "The Honeymoon Trail,"

The ugly weapon buried itself in the ground a foot away from Frog's face which seemed rightly to belong to the night and the lone lands in which they were. A pleasant interlude after the dangers and thrills of the fight with the renegades.

Their number concluded, Tex led her into an ante-room, and as they sat he sang again the refrain—with a meaning that was obvious enough. He had never been in love with a woman before, but the grace and white charm of Lettie had obsessed him.

"Why shouldn't we—you and I—follow that honeymoon trail, Lettie?" he begged.

It broke the spell to the cultured girl from the town.

"I am not interested in your song," she said curtly, rising.

"You don't—care?"

"Only to go," she replied, and stamped from the room to seek her own quarters.

Tex went out on to the porch. It was a fine night and for a few minutes he stood thinking of this girl he had come to love. From the door he had a clear view into the corral where the horses were. Suddenly he started. In the dim light he saw a figure no more substantial than a ghost loom against the gate, lift the latch and dart away again—inside. Whinnings followed, and then—

"Gee, what's wrong?" he muttered, the girl forgotten, only the impending danger in his mind. For out from the gate came first one horse and, before he could grasp just what was happening, a dozen, a score, fifty horses were stampeding out into the night away from the corral, off to the open plain. The clatter of hoofs drowned his involuntary cry. The Post mustn't lose their horses; it was like being cut off from the world, impotent to carry on the work!

Tex bounded from the door, rushed to where Champion still stood in his own stable. Within a minute he had thrown the saddle over the high withers and had leapt on to his back. With no time to rouse the others, who were still enjoying the noisy performance in the big mess-room, he swung his horse into the trail the stampede had taken.

It was the wildest ride he had ever taken, even including his chase to-day after the runaway wagon. He dug his spurs into Champion, urged him on with soft words and threats, even lashed him with the reins. He must overtake the runaways. What had caused them to bolt?

For a mile he raced, flying like the wind—and Champion was the fastest horse in all the State. The fifty ahead sensed pursuit and stretched their necks, striding free with no human on their backs, rushing headlong for the wilds. Standing in his long stirrups, never touching his saddle, his head bent low forward, Tex urged his horse on. Champion laid down to it, his belly level with the ground, his hoofs beating a rhythmic tattoo on the hard ground. A grunt of satisfaction escaped Tex as he drew level with the last of the runaways, but he must get ahead in order to turn them in their impetuous flight. Gradually he passed first one then another, like a winner in a race coming up from the neck. On and on, over the uneven surface, jumping a patch of mesquite, plunging through the long sedge grass, nearer and nearer, yard by yard, towards the head of the bunch of wild and screaming animals, he rode, reins loose, his body one with his horse.

He did not hear the pound of other hoofs behind him, for his whole attention was on the job in hand.

"Whoop, whoop!" he yelled, pantingly, seeking to turn the leaders. He was abreast of them now, twirled Champion at them, heading them off.

September 12th, 1936

The leaders swerved snorted, whinnied, flung up on their hind legs and then settled again on their new course.

But Tex had them in hand. He gave Champion a final urge, circled across the noses of two who held the lead, brushed them, pushed them even at that mad pace and swung them back towards the way they had come.

Now he became aware of his following. Good; here was assistance! At the fort, someone had raised the alarm which he had had no time to do. Thank heaven the horses were saved!

He turned to watch the uninformed men circling round the mill of restive frightened animals. There were a dozen riders and Tex set about assisting to string out the panting horses and drive them back, but he was interrupted. Two of his colleagues, grin of feature, ranged themselves on either side of him and one shot out a hand to grab his shoulder.

"What's up?" demanded Tex, not comprehending.

"I arrest you, Captain Tex Antry," was the startling response.

"Arrest me?" cried Tex aghast.

"What the heck for?"

"Treason! It has been reported to Colonel Seward that you drove out the horses."

"But they stampeded. Someone had opened the gate of the corral. I followed. Who dares to say I drove them out? And for what purpose?"

"I only do my duty. You must answer to the colonel. Ride."

Tex was furious and snapped out angry questions, trying to get the hang of it, but his captors refused to speak all the long way back, as they rode behind the dead-beat horses to the fort. He was taken straight into the colonel's presence and it was no help to Tex to find the interview was not to be private. All his colleagues—his own scouts—were there, and all the members of the Show Girl company, a silent crowd who threw queer glances towards him as he stood between his captors, held by each arm. Lettie was there, too, queerly distraught but offering no glance that meant encouragement.

There was no beating about the bush with Colonel Seward. He had always liked Tex, knew his worth as an officer, fearless and with a lightning brain in an emergency, but to him the first tenet of his code was discipline.

"Why did you try to steal the horses?" he rapped out.

"I was trying to rescue them. They stampeded, sir."

A cynical grin spread over the face of one man present. It was a tall officer of the fort whose swarthy complexion and heavy jaw showed there was Indian blood in his veins. He overtopped everyone else, and Tex saw the leer of triumph about the cruel lips as he stroked his chin with talon-like fingers. Utah Joe, as he was known, was watching the proceedings with an evil relish.

"The captain," he said softly, "is in league with the Indians. Only yesterday I overheard him speaking to one of his feathered friends and the talk was of horses. Can he deny that? He knows I was present—accidentally."

"It may be," put in the colonel, "that a man of this company needs to speak with the Indians now and then. What is important is that the prisoner was seen behind the horses driving them out." He turned to Lettie, and to Tex's amazement asked her to speak.

"What did you do, my dear, after your song with the prisoner?"

"I went to my room, Colonel, and stood looking out into the moonlight."

"Did you see the prisoner?"

Lottie nodded. She squared her delicate shoulders and, steeled herself to speak the words she knew would condemn this man. She told herself it was what he deserved having dared to make love to her. Uncouth he was, calling her a fool.

"You have told us you saw him riding. Was he in front of the horses trying to stop them or behind them—driving them?"

"He was behind them."

Utah Joe smirked; he had always hated Tex, loathed his popularity. He would be in charge of the scouts if—anything happened to the captain.

"I told you, Colonel—" he began, but the old soldier silenced him with a glance and turned to Tex.

"You will be held for court martial," he announced shortly. "Take him away."

Tex was silent. He did not look at the girl who had denounced him, but walked stiffly from the room between his gaolers. They took him to a cell whose iron bars afforded a view across the barrack square. He sat gazing into the night, his thoughts busy. Had Lettie been mistaken or had she deliberately lied to obtain his conviction? Did she hate him so much? Why?

Only later did it cross his mind how deadly a position he was in.

He knew the sentence for all traitors was death.

"You Will be Shot at Dawn"

FROM his prison window two days later Tex saw a train of wagons enter the square. An aristocratic woman was helped descend by a man obviously from the town since he wore a black-tailed coat with breeches and boots. His very civat bespoke wealth and fashion, and his lawyer-like face looked grave beneath his wide-brimmed black felt hat. Tex was right in his surmise that these visitors were people of importance, for the colonel came hastening out and shook hands effusively with the handsome stranger. Then Lettie was sent for; and there was a greeting of affection on the woman's side while something in the man's regard of the girl sent a stab of jealousy through Tex.

The party, without a glance at the prison bars they passed, disappeared inside the colonel's quarters.

"Well," the colonel was saying, "to think that this charming girl who sang for us is a daughter of Millionaire Morgan. How came it?"

Lettie explained how she had run away and had seized the fortunate chance of being mistaken for the principal of the Show Girls. And then Aunt Hortense made her confession. The tale she had told in that dressing-room had been but a fabrication.

"You are an heiress, my dear, but it was obvious to me and to the judge here that the man Larry was merely after your money. And didn't I prove it to you?"

"Oh, yes," admitted the girl. "That is all over and done with. Men can be beasts."

"Not all men, Lettie," said the aunt softly. "Think what the judge has done. The moment we missed you and discovered what had happened he organized this expedition to find you. You might have been captured by bandits and—oh, it is unthinkable!"

"We were," said Lettie grimly. "And but for—"

"Yes?" urged the judge.

"I was saved by—by the scouts of the colonel here," she explained. And so the story came out.

"And you tell me the leader of these good fellows is a traitor," ejaculated the judge. "Seems incredible."

"It is incredible," burst out the girl and clung to the big man's arm. "Can't you help him, judge?" she pleaded.

"I'll see what can be done," said Lane. "Perhaps I have some influence. At all events I would do anything possible—to please you." There was no mistaking the meaning of his level glance upon her. "There is nothing I should love better," the man put in, "than to take you back to Washington as my wife. Will you marry me, Lettie?"

"If—if you help Captain Tex," she agreed.

"I promise at least to get the charge against him—reduced," he assured her.

But the scheming judge did not keep his word. Aunt Hortense whispered to him that Lettie had fallen in love with Tex.

He grasped her inference. Let Tex die!

He was to stay behind the wagons in order to make his "plea" to the members of the court martial, arranging to ride after the train on horseback. He let Lettie go with the hope that at least Tex would be saved the ultimate penalty of the traitor. And before she ascended the departing wagon she felt the least she could do was to comfort him with the knowledge of the judge's promise. She walked across to his prison window.

"Good-bye!" she said softly. "I'm sorry—for everything."

"Good-bye, Lettie! I did not know that you were a Morgan, or I should never have dared."

"Don't!" she pleaded. "As if that mattered. But I have done what I could. The judge has promised to speak for you."

"I shall never forget you as long as I live. I may say that, mayn't I? Though that won't be for long. Good-bye!"

She left him and went to the wagon. The train moved off, and Judge Lane returned to meet the men who sat in judgment on Tex of the Scouts.

Had Lettie been present to hear his oration before the military tribunal she would have shrunk for ever from the man she had promised to marry. He walked up and down the small office and talked. He told the company, in front of which Tex stood handcuffed awaiting the verdict which meant life or death to him, that he had been asked by Congress to make an unofficial inspection of the various military forts along the Californian border.

"Surely, gentlemen," said he suavely, "you would be unwilling that I should take back a report that those in command of Fort Henry feared to do their duty when a traitor stood before them."

It was tantamount to telling them he expected a verdict against the prisoner of guilty!

The grave men round the table in their immaculate uniforms listened to the evidence. They read Lettie's statement; they heard Utah Joe's assertion of Tex's connivance with the Indians, another man was found who declared that he had seen Tex open the corral gate and let the horses out. The inference was that Tex was selling the animals to the Indians, who were for ever raiding the farms, murdering the inhabitants, and holding up peaceable travellers across the border.

The officers were handed little pieces of paper on which to write their decisions. The colonel collected them, glanced through them without a trace of feeling betraying what he thought. Then he stood up, and Tex stiffened himself to hear the result.

"The unanimous verdict of this court of the United States Army is that you are guilty of traitorous conduct. The sentence is death. You will be shot at dawn."

Tex had spoken no word throughout. He turned on his heel, and, with head erect, walked between his gaolers back to the cell—the condemned cell now.

Smoke Signals to the Indians

THE train with Lettie, her aunt, and the "Show Girl" Company had gone; Judge Lane had ridden hot-foot after them as soon as he had spoken his perfidious oration. Utah Joe, exultant, rode in charge of the military escort that was to conduct the party through the bad lands.

Meanwhile, night had fallen, and two guards, with long bayonets fixed to their carbines, paced slowly before the door of Tex's cell.

Silence fell over Fort Henry which seemed emphasised by the white moon casting long shadows from the brooding hills.

That silence was not broken as a figure crept with cat-like stealthiness under the veranda where the guards kept their watch amid a darkness that was like a pool of ink in the white night.

A panther-like leap: a hand pressed viciously over one gaoler's mouth. The tiny noise of the butt-end of a revolver coming in contact with the base of a man's skull; the whisper of a stifled gasp. No sound of the falling body. Frog, friend of Tex, was too practised a hand for that. The guard fell limp into his arms, and was gently set upon the ground, then softly dragged behind a pillar. Meanwhile, Buffalo and the Idaho Kid, two other stalwarts of the scouts, who had left the company for this desperate venture, had dealt in similarly business-like manner with the other guard.

Frog was lifted on to the roof of the wooden building. For a few breathless minutes, while his comrades kept observation, he peered at the rough boards. With a slight ripping sound one gave. Then it was simple.

Inside Tex was on the qui vive, alert at the first suggestion of outside movement. When the raised board revealed the padding-like face of Frog, a thrill ran through him. His men believed in him, were ready to risk their lives for him. He knew what desperate chance this was they were taking; if discovered, they, too, would face the firing squad at daybreak.

"Tex!" It was but a whisper. "Awake?"

"Betcha, Frog."

The hole widened. Tex leapt upwards to be caught in the powerful hands of Frog. In a minute the prisoner was out on the roof, in another he was down beside Buffalo and the Kid, and like black ghosts gliding into nothingness, had disappeared along the length of the building and had won clear into the open. A dash and they were among the trees, where four horses stood ready saddled. With a sigh of relief Tex once again found the loved body of Champion stir between his legs, and the four moved quietly off.

"Where away?" asked Frog.

He had no schemes: the one objective had been to release the chief. It was for him to decide what should be done. If he chose to take to the mountains and turn outlaw they would have been with him; obviously none of them could return to the fort. It would be returning to death.

"After the wagon train," said Tex, without a moment's hesitation.

Something called him, warned him. At all events he felt he must once again set his eyes on Lettie, though they would have to be hidden witnesses.

Utah Joe had set camp in a rocky September 12th, 1936 hollow in the hills. Fifty men and women lay within the circle of the wagons. Fires shot sparks into the night, and, as was the custom of those days, the company swayed rhythmically to the song in which they all joined.

"To-morrow we shall be at Tuxedo Pass," a man remarked.

Utah Joe heard him.

"We go by Death Canyon," he said. The other roused himself.

"But that is the worst Indian country," came his surprised ex-postulation. "Captain Tex said so."

Utah Joe scowled.

"I know what is best for us," he snapped.

Judge Lane had overheard.

"I think we can follow Joe better than a traitor," he said.

The camp settled down to sleep. They lay as they were in their clothes under blankets. The night was warm. Silence, save for the heavy breathing of tired men and girls.

An hour passed—two. Then there was a movement at one end of the sleeping ranks. A man slowly pushed aside his blanket and crept from underneath. For a full minute he crouched, watching to see if anyone moved. All was quiet. The figure straightened himself—a tall man, unmistakable as Utah Joe. He slunk round the edge of the camp and disappeared among the wagons.

But one man had seen him—one of the scouts who held no love for him. He, in turn, threw aside his blanket and grasped a revolver. But he didn't use it; instead, he wakened his nearest neighbour.

"Utah Joe has left camp—sneaked out," he whispered.

The other was just in time to see the ghostly figure caught by a flicker of firelight. He nudged another companion. They saw the big leader of the train vanish into the woods.

"After him," said one, and they crawled from their improvised beds and crept out on the trail. They did not know what to suspect, but they were members of the United States Army, and their job was to see this train through to safety. To ensure that was to suspect anything that savoured of secret moves, and where was the reason for Utah Joe to go stealing into the darkness in the middle of the night?

Even at that it never entered their minds as a probability that the tall half-Indian was planning to sell the whole outfit to the Redskins.

Not until they had tracked him for over two miles. The sleuthing was simple enough; when once Utah Joe was clear of the camp he ceased even to glance over his shoulder, but hurried on, following a path that led deep into the woods and then came out into the mesquite-covered hillside. Here he paused; it was obviously a rendezvous, for he glanced impatiently from one side to another so that the three almost held their breath as they lay where they had ducked behind some rocks, afraid the slightest sound might betray them.

Then silently as a moving shadow another form was suddenly beside big Joe. An Indian! Jove, but they were uneasy in the way they moved. One moment Joe was alone, the next—

"It's White Eagle."

The whisper came on a long breath of surprise, hardly controlled.

"The white man's word is not to be trusted."

The Indian chief, dignified, with up-raised head and level eye under a waving sheath of feathers, spoke contemptuously.

"You are wrong, chief! I have done all that was planned. To-morrow the train makes for Death Canyon. There the horses and the ammunition are yours to take."

The Indian grunted in disbelief.

"Your word failed us before. We waited. The horses, it is true, were released, but it was a trick; they were returned to the fort."

Again the quick exchange of understanding glances between the eaves-dropping soldiers.

"That was not my fault," said Joe viciously. "A man I can trust let them out of the corral, but that ~~scout~~ Tex happened to see, and rode after them." His eyes glittered wickedly. "But his cursed interference is over for keeps. He will be shot at dawn."

That clinched it. In the minds of the listeners anger strove with exultation. They could prove Tex innocent—if they could get back in time to save him.

"The dirty coyote," one growled, and shot an inquiring look at his comrades.

"Ready?" it asked.

Both nodded.

"C'mon!"

Together they sprang. Shots rang out, Joe and White Eagle swung round to meet the unexpected attack, the Indian thinking that here once more was treachery. Still he had no alternative but to fight, and in an instant his knife was out, flashing in the moon. But the soldiers were on him, two of them made him their immediate objective. A bullet struck home. White Eagle stumbled silently; a hand struck even as he reeled, and the Redskin fell prone, squirming, but still without a cry.

Meanwhile, Utah Joe had fared better. With a vicious blow he had landed on the jaw of the remaining scout, felled him, and, with a snarl, had taken White Eagle's horse and was off, riding like the wind. Unmounted, the soldiers could not pursue. Moreover, they had to get their story to the camp.

Meanwhile, Utah Joe dismounted a couple of miles from the scene of the mêlée. Hastily he undid the horse's girth, and from beneath the saddle drew the rug. Making a fire of dry twigs, he laid the rug over it, holding in the smoke, then released it so that it ascended in a solid cloud. Thrice he did this—it was a signal to the tribe with whom he was trading the horses in camp and the valuables of its passengers, not to mention a quantity of ammunition it carried.

There was now no going back for Utah Joe. No longer could he hide behind his position at the fort and plot with the Indians. His treachery was known. His only hope now was to join forces with the Redskins.

Miles across the valley the tribe saw the signals and set out with all haste—a gallant if ruthless band of warriors, anxious for their captures, ready to kill man, woman, or child, following their uncouth but rigid code to fight the white man and take from him, their natural enemy, all they could get.

And half a day's ride away, on the other side of the camp, Tex, Frog, the Kid, and Buffalo were urging their mounts to their limit.

Back in camp the soldiers' news caused consternation. Hurriedly horses were hitched up, passengers took their seats, and the train moved off. The drivers cracked their long whips, the horses reared, and were put into gallop. The vehicles rocked along the rough track—not towards Death Canyon, but on the usual route for the border. At every turn an attack by Indians was expected.

The Indians were in league with the Renegades, and a Redskin messenger raced for the camp in the mountains.

The two bands joined forces and rode hard to intercept the wagons making for the desert. They espied them racing along a slope upwards towards a pass where hills hedged them in on either side. With fearsome yells the combined brigands, red and white, swooped down in an encircling movement, firing as they neared the occupants of the wagons. The "Show Girls" once again peered frightfully from beneath canvas coverings to see wild horsemen sweeping down on them, shooting as they came. But this time the soldiers were there to defend them, and at first sight of the enemy the escort covered the wagons as well as they could, presenting a living barrier between foe and prey.

The soldiers, however, never had a chance. They were outnumbered by a score, and, in addition, were restricted in their movements by reason of the fact they had to cover the women and the wagons. The wagons raced harder and harder, but the Indians and the Renegades were easily the faster.

"Stop!" yelled the scout who had put himself in charge. "We'll face them here."

He had chosen an open sward outside the reach of ambush.

Their attackers, at least, would have to fight in the open; no chance of shooting them down from behind the safety of rocks or woods.

"And look to that ammunition wagon," he added. "Loose the horses. Guard it to the death!"

A hundred rifles were spouting. Man after man went tumbling to bite the ground, lay stretched, either in death or writhing from wounds that were mortal. Overturned vehicles and piles of packages were utilised by the defenders as shields and butts from which to shoot. But still the brigands relentlessly closed in.

It was an orgy of slaughter. Horses squealed as shots or arrows struck them, and they fell in their traces, bringing others down to stamp and struggle. One or two of the wagons still containing members of the party were shot at by the Indians. They used arrows which carried burning feathers. The canvas tops burst into flames; out of these sprang men and women, shrieking and helpless, some only to meet the worse fate of shot or arrow.

The Indians and the Renegades were getting the upper hand. Girls were helping reload rifles covering behind the overturned baggage while the soldiers put up a last resistance.

"Don't let them take us," pleaded one girl. "Kill us first."

No man could answer, but the savage burst of firing showed the tenseness of their feelings.

Regardless of loss, the enemy was advancing in a rush. Half a dozen made for the ammunition wagon. It was typical of the desperate measures a man of the Army would go to when one scout gave the thing a push and started it rolling down the slope. Better to destroy it and himself, than that the Indians got it. He scrambled on to the cross-piece that ran from axle to axle beneath the wagon floor and lying prone sought to guide his cumbersome charge towards a ravine.

Other of the vehicles were dragged off by the frightened animals. One contained Lettie and the judge and bumped so violently it seemed it must overturn. Lettie, with a memory of what Tex had once accomplished, dragged herself from the judge's hold and leapt. She lauded without hurt save for bruises and lorn clothes. But the judge had not the courage to jump; he held on fearfully—not seeing the tree that loomed ahead!

EPISODE 6—
"Shot Down"

Read This First

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way into the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delucy, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Later, Mary's father is killed, and Buck is charged with the crime. He convinces Mary of his innocence and hands her a wallet which belonged to her father and which contains the map of a hidden gold mine.

Outlaws attempt to steal the wallet, but thanks to Buck they fail. Then, after clearing his name of the Grayson murder, the Ranger falls into the enemy's hands.

A Brush With the Posse

WITH a final, terrific effort Buck managed somehow to regain his feet while his antagonists were striving to bind him, and once more he laid about him with his fists, scattering the gangsters momentarily.

But he was one against many, and it was not long before the rogues had him down again, piling into him tooth and nail until he was too dazed to show further fight.

This time they gave him no chance to recover, but secured his wrists behind his back ere he could collect his faculties. Then three or four of the outlaws hauled him up off the ground, and Dirk spoke to them tersely.

"Put him on his horse and keep him covered," he snarled. "Keeler, you take charge of him, and see he don't make no false moves."

Buck was hoisted into the saddle of his pony, and the crooks also mounted their broncs. Then, Keeler leading the prisoner's steed by the rein, the whole band turned to ride through the wood.

"We'll head off the sheriff's posse," Dirk said, "and see if we can give Mort, Gabe an' Roscoe a chance to make their getaway. After that we'll strike back for the hide-out."

Thus spoke Dirk, and he had little doubt that by springing an ambush he and his comrades could provide their less fortunate associates with an opportunity of effecting an escape. But he did not know that he and his party were seen by a lone horseman as they pushed clear of the forest and began to spur along the edge of the trees.

The lone horseman was Spooky, and he had cut adrift from the sheriff's posse in order to gallop back and have a word with his fellow-Ranger. And now, as he saw Buck in the hands of the gangsters, he pulled his horse to a standstill in the heart of a thick coppie.

From the shelter of that coppie he watched the crooks and their captive moving swiftly in a north-easterly direction, and no sooner had they disappeared than he wheeled around and dashed away at top speed, urging his bronc over the prairie levels to the tune of pounding hoofs, and making for the trail where he had separated from the posse.

Fifteen minutes later he saw Sheriff Mark and his band in front of him. They were travelling at a mere canter along the winding Maverick road, and consequently Spooky had no difficulty in overtaking them.

"Hey, hold everything!" the little cowboy gasped as he came abreast of the sheriff and Judge Holmes.

The sheriff called a halt, and looked at Spooky sharply.

"What's wrong, friend," he demanded.

"I just saw a bunch of cut-throats with that nester Buck Grant," came the reply. "They had him tied, and was leadin' him along the edge o' the timber."

Judge Holmes laid hold of Mark's arm.

"You'll have to split your posse an' I get Grant out of trouble," he declared.

"But I've gotta take these here prisoners into town," Sheriff Mark objected, with a glance at Roscoe, Gabe and Mort. "Let that nester get himself outa trouble, judge."

"Is that how you repay the man who helped you to land these three outlaws?" Judge Holmes snapped. "No, sheriff, you're going to help Buck Grant. It's to your advantage to do so, anyhow. The skunks who jumped him probably belong to the same outfit as these fellows here, and now is your chance to grab the whole bunch at once."

The sheriff had coloured up in a somewhat shamefaced manner.

"Yeah, I didn't think o' that," he muttered, and then, turning to Spooky: "Which way did you say Grant and them hembres was ridin'?"

"Along the edge of the timber," Spooky repeated, "and in the direction of Twin Forks. They was travellin' plenty fast. It seemed to me like they might be aimin' to stage an ambuscade there and take their pals away from yuh, so I reckon you're showin' good sense in electing to operate against 'em. If I were you I'd cut across to the other trail and take 'em by surprise—turn the tables on 'em, see?"

The pompous sheriff was not grateful for the suggestion, though privately he realised the value of it.

"I don't need advice, feller," he said. "I figure I know my job—"

"Nevertheless Spooky's idea is a good one," Judge Holmes interrupted impatiently. "Come on, sheriff, detail a couple of your men to take care of your prisoners, and the rest of us will hit the breeze for the other road as hard as we can."

Under the judge's admonishment Sheriff Mark bestirred himself, and having singled out two of his posse to act as escort for Gabe, Roscoe and Mort, he and the remainder of the band set out for the trail on which Spooky had last seen Buck and his captors.

With the judge, Spooky and the sheriff taking the lead and setting the pace, it was not long before the troop of would-be rescuers picked up the road that skirted the woods, and they had followed this for a distance of some two or three miles when they sighted Twin Forks. And there, at the point where the forest trail joined the main highway to Maverick, they espied Dirk and his accomplices seeking cover behind a cluster of big rocks, with Buck a helpless captive in their midst.

The gangsters were unaware of the posse's approach, and if Judge Holmes or Spooky had been in command, the rogues could have been quietly encircled and taken by surprise. But the muddle-headed Sheriff Mark gave vent to a loud yawn as he clapped eyes on the outlaws, and calling on his men to follow him, he pushed straight on at a gallop.

Dirk and his comrades swung around at the first alarm. It was a shock to them, of course, to find themselves suddenly threatened by an attack from an unexpected quarter, when they had so fondly imagined that they would be the aggressors, and for a brief interval they were thrown into a panic. But they speedily recovered themselves, and the posse was still a couple of hundred yards from them when Dirk roared a command.

"Beat it, men!" he shouted to his associates. "Keeler, don't let go of Grant!"

The crooks scattered, jabbing at the flanks of their ponies with their spurrows. Keeler, with a hand on Silver's bridle, made tracks for a ridge to the south—gained that ridge, and putting his horse at it, won his way to the summit with Buck at his side.

From the top of the hill the gangster looked back and saw the posse breaking up to pursue his confederates. Then he realised that he himself had not been overlooked, for Judge Holmes and Spooky were headed in his direction.

"Seems like things haven't worked out according to plan, don't it?" Buck commented dryly.

Keeler shot an ugly glance at him, and then with a tug on the bridle of the Ranger's pony he started to ride along the crest of the ridge. But he had not gone more than a hundred yards when Buck served him a trick that neatly checked him in his flight.

The big Ranger's hands were fied behind his back, but his feet were free, and all at once he disengaged his left boot from the stirrup and kicked his captor's brone smartly but without viciousness, on the flank.

The horse was pounding along the very edge of the hillside, and the blow caused it to swerve. In another instant it had lost its footing and was plunging down the steep slope, carrying its master with it.

Keeler almost dragged Buck and Silver after him, but he lost his grip on the rein of the big fellow's pony, and though the latter cavorted wildly for a few seconds, the stalwart representative of the Law managed to keep his seat. Then, as Silver became calmer and halted of his own accord on the brow of the slope, Buck turned to see how his late captor was faring.

Keeler had parted company with his horse, and man and beast were rolling in headlong fashion towards the bottom of the declivity. From above Buck watched them tumbling through the scrub that matted the hillside, and saw the clouds of dust that rose from the tough vegetation as the luckless outlaw and his mount careered on their way. Then at last the animal and its rider brought up at the foot of the slope, and, not without relief, the Ranger observed the mustang struggle to its legs.

It seemed little the worse for its fall, and Buck, a true lover of animals, was glad to think that it had escaped injury. As for Keeler, he lay quite still for about half a minute, but eventually picked himself up and grabbed for his gun with an angry gesture.

He could see Buck on the summit of the ridge, and apparently he had a mind to revenge himself. But ere he could take aim the Ranger was joined by Spooky and Judge Holmes, and Keeler made haste to scramble astride his pony and charge off into a tract of brushwood, his departure being accelerated by a bullet or two from the revolvers of Buck's friends.

Keeler vanished, and up on the hill-top, Holmes and Spooky drew closer to the so-called nester.

"How'd you get rid of that fellow, Buck?" the judge asked.

"By a well-timed kick," was the reply. "But say, you might cut the cords around my wrists, and at the same time I'd be obliged if you'd tell me how the sheriff and his posse happened to come to my aid?"

"Through Spooky," Holmes answered. "He saw you with the outlaws."

He was taking out a knife as he spoke, and he lost no time in severing the Ranger's bonds. Then the three men rode down to the belt of thickets amid which Keeler had disappeared, but they saw no sign of that worthy, and pushing forth into open country again, they had been riding for about three-quarters of an hour when they espied Sheriff Mark and his party trotting towards them.

Buck and his two friends drew rein in the path of the oncoming horsemen, and noticed the dismal expression on the sheriff's face when the latter paused before them.

"They got clear away," Mark grunted lugubriously. "I thought we had that bunch o' desperadoes, too. Can't figure out how they managed to give us the slip."

"I think I know," Spooky murmured in a whimsical tone. "They was probably smarter than you, Sheriff."

Mark looked at him resentfully.

"Don't be funny," he bit out, and then lapsed into a moody silence.

It was a silence that was broken at length by Buck.

"Well, thanks for comin' to my help, anyway," he said to the sheriff in a slightly ironical tone. "You know, your presence always makes a fellow feel easier."

Maverick's guardian of the peace was gratified by this statement, and completely missed the good-humoured sarcasm that was behind it. Then Buck turned to Spooky and Holmes.

"Judge," he remarked, "I think I'll drift over to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and maybe you'd like to trail along with me. Spooky, I suggest you stay with the posse in case those outlaws get organised again and try to make another attempt to rescue their pals. I'll tell Miss Grayson you're helping the law."

"Okay, Grant," rejoined Spooky, addressing the big fellow as if he were a mere acquaintance, and a little while later Buck and Judge Holmes were cantering off across the range with Hidden Valley as their destination.

The Three Prisoners

IT was with considerable despondency that Mort, Roscoe and Gabe had watched Sheriff Mark and his posse leave the Maverick trail to go to the rescue of Buck and attempt the wholesale capture of the men who had been terrorising the county.

Their despondency was a mood that had settled upon them from the moment when they had been taken into custody—Mort at Bear Cave, Roscoe and Gabe at the Grant cabin. Yet, not long after they found themselves alone with only two deputies for an escort, the wretchedness of their spirits was succeeded by a feeling of tremulous hope.

Gabe it was who first realised that a bold and daring move against the officers in charge of them might well prove successful, especially if he and his fellow-prisoners were to act in concert.

The difficulty was to convey his design to Mort and Roscoe, who were staring straight ahead and glowering into space. Neither of them would look at Gabe nor at each other—which was little to be wondered at, since none of the three of them had shown much loyalty to his comrades when the subject of the Grayson murder had been broached.

At last, however, Gabe succeeded in catching the attention of the other two gangsters and flashing them a surreptitious, but meaning glance that told them something of his purpose and warned them to hold themselves in readiness.

True, the prisoners were unarmed, and the deputies who were in charge of them were riding with their six-guns in their fists. But the three outlaws were not bound or manacled—even Mort having been relieved of his thongs so that he could sit his horse and handle the reins. And in this manner captives and escort were riding down the trail when all at once

Gabe swung close to one of the officers, struck up his arm and landed a savage blow that caught the fellow on the jaw.

The man plunged from the saddle and hit the ground with a thump that knocked the breath out of his body. Next instant the other deputy raised a sharp cry and made as if to cover Gabe, but Mort and Roscoe were quick to act, and, pressing in on the remaining agent of the law, they lashed out at him viciously and hurled him to the dust.

"All right, boys," Gabe yelled. "Let's go!"

He set his comrades an example by wheeling away from the trail and spurring towards the south, and Roscoe and Mort lost no time in following suit. Then, with their horses' hoofs sounding a rapid tattoo, they dipped down into the dry bed of an arroyo and pressed forward along the ragged hollow until it had brought them close to a mass of brushwood thickets.

Meanwhile, the two deputies had regained their feet, and, as they saw the fugitives scrambling out of the arroyo some little distance away, they blazed at the rascally trio with their guns.

One of the crooks was hit. The officers were not certain whether it was Mort, Gabe or Roscoe, but whatever the identity of the victim he was observed to jerk himself upright in the saddle and then sway drunkenly from side to side. At one moment, indeed, it looked as if he must fall, but he managed to keep astride his brone, and the animal bore him into the thickets, following the other two horsemen.

The gangsters disappeared, and for several minutes the deputies whom they had outwitted were unable to take up the chase, their ponies having cantered on along the trail. When they had secured their mounts, however, they set out in pursuit at break-neck pace and crashed into the brushwood thickets with fine, if futile, determination.

The crooks had obtained too great a start, and there was no trace of them. In vain the officers reconnoitred the locality in the hope of picking up their tracks. Even the man whom they had so obviously wounded had vanished utterly, and at long last they were compelled to give up their search and return to the Maverick road.

They pushed ahead towards Twin Forks, and it was when they were about half a mile from this junction that they saw the posse which included Spooky and Sheriff Mark.

"Hey, where's your prisoners?" the latter demanded, as the two deputies came up.

"They—they got away, Sheriff," he was told. "Suddenly jumped us and high-tailed it for the hills. But I—I think we winged one of 'em."

Maverick's chief guardian of the peace was glowering at his subordinates fiercely.

"Winged one of 'em!" he cried out. "Is that the best yuh could do? Why, with your six-shooters in your mitts you should never 've given them hombres a chance to start anything. I can't see how it happened."

"I think I know how, sheriff," Spooky interposed with a great air of sagacity.

"Yeah?" said Mark, eyeing him.

"How?"

"They was probably smarter than your deputies, that's all, sheriff," the little fellow commented, whereupon Mark ground his teeth together and turned his back on him impatiently.

Five minutes afterwards Sheriff Mark and his posse were filing down the trail in a somewhat sorry procession, none of the officers having any cause to congratulate himself on the part he had played in the morning's work. As for Spooky, he separated from that posse after deciding that no purpose was to be served by going into town, and, intent on informing Buck of the latest set-back, he pointed his horse's head towards the north and "burned the wind" for Hidden Valley.

A visitor had called at the well-equipped ranch-house that Mary Grayson had inherited from her murdered father—a visitor who was always welcome, though during the last twenty-four hours he had differed pretty sharply with the girl on the subject of Buck Grant.

The visitor was Harvey Delaney, neighbouring cattleman, and, seated in the lounge, with his handsome, but ruthless, face thrust forward earnestly, he was discussing with Mary and Helen Moore the incidents that had occurred the previous night.

"But what makes you so positive that Buck Grant is working with the Phantom Rider?" Mary Grayson was asking him in an argumentative tone.

Harvey Delaney fidgeted in his chair. "I didn't say I was positive, Mary," he expostulated. "But I sure would like to know where Grant was last night, when the Phantom came here."

There was a pause, and then a comment was volunteered by Helen, Mary's friend from the East.

"Supposing Buck Grant is in league with the Phantom Rider," she remarked. "That doesn't make him any the less trustworthy, does it? After all, they say that the Phantom is on the side of law and order."

Delaney looked at her thoughtfully for a moment, then shrugged his wide shoulders.

"It all depends whether you believe that the Phantom really is a square-shooter," he grunted. "Personally, I'm not convinced that he is—"

But Delaney never finished his speech, for at that juncture there was a tap on the door of the lounge, and as the occupants of the room glanced round they saw a maid appear on the threshold, a maid who was followed by a tall, powerfully-built young man whom they recognised immediately.

"Mr. Grant to see you—all, Miss Grayson," the maidservant announced.

Mary jerked herself to her feet, and, staring past her employee, spoke to the caller in faltering accents.

"Mr. Grant," she said, "you shouldn't have come here—not with that murder charge hanging over you—"

And then her voice trailed off, for suddenly Buck was joined in the doorway by Judge Holmes, a strange companion indeed for a man who was supposed to be a fugitive from the law.

Buck and Judge came into the room, the younger man directing a sidelong, smiling glance at Holmes.

"I'm not worth a penny to anybody, am I, Judge?" he drawled.

"As far as a reward is concerned, no," his friend replied. "You see, Mary, with the assistance of Grant here we arrested and got a confession from the two men who killed your father."

Buck could have sworn that he saw an expression of intense relief cross the faces of Mary and Helen, and at the same time he noticed Harvey Delaney give a violent start. Then Judge Holmes went on speaking.

"The two men concerned are now on their way to gaol in Maverick," he stated, "along with a third desperado known as Mort."

"And Mr. Grant's innocence has been established," Mary cried. "Oh, I'm so glad! Both Helen and I were certain that he had nothing to do with my father's death."

It was gratifying to Buck to hear her talk in that strain, and he was telling himself that he must surely rank pretty high in her estimation when Delaney approached him and laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Good work, Grant," the tall rancher said. "I reckon I'd like to be one of the first to congratulate you. Er—who were the men that owned up to the crime?"

"Two fellers by the name of Gabe and Roscoe," Buck informed him.

Harvey Delaney drew his brows together and fingered his clean-shaven chin.

"Gabe and Roscoe," he reiterated. "I've never heard of 'em. They must be a couple of outlaws from out of this section."

"They're two of the gang that are doing their best to terrorise this section and grab all the land in it," Buck rejoined. "But, say, Delaney, am I right in suggesting that until this minute you were certain that I was responsible for what happened to Miss Grayson's father?"

Helen and Mary looked at the neighbouring rancher quickly, expecting him to make some sheepish admittance, and next moment they were staggered by the answer that he gave.

"Why, no," he said with consummate coolness. "I was pretty sure you weren't guilty. But tell us about the arrest, Grant. I want to hear the whole story in detail. How did you get on the track of these two men named Gabe and Roscoe?"

Buck cleared his throat.

"Well, there isn't much to tell," he began. "But first it might interest you folks to know that the sheriff ran across a feller who had seemingly been hog-tied by the Phantom Rider."

"The Phantom Rider!" Mary and Helen ejaculated in one breath.

"Yeah," Buck repeated, "the Phantom Rider. Now this fellow that the sheriff discovered is the one that the judge referred to as Mort. I don't suppose any of you happen to know him, do you?"

The girls shook their heads, and Delaney made a negative response.

"I don't know him by his monicker, Grant," he said. "It's an odd sort of name, too—one I wouldn't be likely to forget if I'd heard it. Mort, eh? In French it means death."

"Yes, that's something I learned at school, too, Delaney," Buck observed. "And I might mention that this fellow came pretty near to living up to his name. But as I was telling you—"

He did not complete his narrative, however, for just then there was another knock at the door of the lounge, and a second afterwards Spooky entered the room, his clothes thick with the dust of a long, hard ride.

"Yes, Spooky?" Mary Grayson queried. "What do you want?"

"I've got some news for the judge an' Mr. Grant, ma'am," the little cowboy explained, whereupon Holmes and Buck glanced at him sharply.

"What is it?" the judge asked. "Those outlaws that you captured." Spooky said. "They busted loose and got clear away."

Buck's face fell, and so did that of Judge Holmes.

"Busted loose?" the younger man echoed. "What do you mean?"

"You heard me," Spooky grunted with a disgusted air. "The men that was left in charge of them killers couldn't hold 'em. The crooks gave them the slip."

Rendezvous of Death

FOR something like a minute there was a silence in the lounge of the Grayson ranch, and then Judge Holmes spoke.

"I hope you girls will excuse me," he said to Mary and Helen, "but this is bad news indeed, and I think I'll get right back to town and have a talk with that wrong-headed fool who happens to be the sheriff of Maverick."

"I'll ride with you part of the way, judge," Delaney volunteered. "I've got some business to attend to at my ranch, and I'll trail along with you as far as Willow Crick."

Bidding the others good-bye, the two men departed from the Hidden Valley ranch, and shortly after they had gone Spooky went off to the bunkhouse, leaving Buck alone with Mary and her friend from the East.

It was now high noon, and the big Ranger lingered in conversation with the girls until one-thirty, when he suddenly noticed the time and announced that he had better be on his way. Mary, however, insisted upon him staying to lunch, and pressed the invitation so hospitably that he could not very well refuse.

In fact, he was prevailed upon to remain for tea also, and the dusk was gathering on the eastern skyline when he actually prepared to bring his visit to an end and spoke of returning to his cabin.

"Mr. Grant," Mary said then, "I'm worried about you. You know, by tangleing with these outlaws you've made bad enemies, for it's obvious from what they did to my poor father that they're men who would stop at nothing. I—I wish you'd let me send some of the boys along with you, just to see you safely home."

Buck grinned at her.

"It's mighty nice of you to concern yourself about me, Miss Mary," he declared, "but I'd feel too darned self-important with a bodyguard. I'll tell you what you can do, though—if it will set your mind at rest. You can get that fellow Spooky to ride over to Dry Creek with me. I was talkin' to him to-day, and I kinda figure we might have something in common. He seems a decent little cuss."

Thus spoke the big Ranger, giving no indication that he and the diminutive cowboy were in reality old friends and members of an organisation that had already done a great deal towards stamping out crime in the State of Texas. And, Spooky having been sent for, the two comrades were soon riding southwards at a canter through the gloaming.

En route to Buck's cabin on Dry Creek they talked of the mission on which they were engaged, and discussed their plans for the future. Then, when they reached the big fellow's homestead, they tied their ponies to the hitch-rail, and dismounting, strolled across to the porch.

It was as Buck was about to thrust open the door that he saw a note pinned there, and with a frown he detached it and unfolded it. A moment later he was striding into the dwelling with Spooky at his heels, and after lighting a lamp he scanned the missive that he was holding in his hand, a queer look dawning in his eyes as he read its contents.

"What is it, Buck?" Spooky demanded. "What's it say?"

Without a word the other tendered him the note, and the smaller man found himself studying a message which had been printed in pencil and which ran as follows:

"If you want information about them escaped killers, be at the Longhorn Saloon in Maverick at ten o'clock to-night.—A FRIEND."

Spooky laid the note on the table and eyed Buck grimly.

"A friend, eh?" he commented.

"Yeah," Buck said, "and if I leave now I've just about got time to make the saloon by ten."

He strode past the little Ranger, and hurried out of the cabin and unhitched Silver's rein from the hitch-rail. Then he swung himself lithely into the saddle, and with his bronc's hoofs thudding upon the grassy surface of the range, he galloped through the night in an easterly direction.

In another sixty seconds he had picked up the Maverick trail, and, with his knees pressed close against Silver's flanks, he rode at a good speed along the banks of the winding Pecos River.

The moon came out not long afterwards, swimming from behind a drifting belt of clouds and glistening upon the water. By its light Buck pushed onward rapidly, his features set and keen, and so at last he came within sight of the town of Maverick.

The main street was almost deserted, but, midway along it, a blaze of illumination spread across the thoroughfare from the windows of the Longhorn Saloon. It was towards this building that Buck repaired, and, on drawing abreast of it, he pulled Silver to a halt, disengaged his feet from the stirrups and slid to the ground.

He now walked up the steps of the porch and strolled, casually enough, through the doorway of the bar-room. Instantly the din and clatter of the place seemed to envelop him, the boisterous gaiety which prevailed there jarring upon his ears. For, as usual, the saloon was packed, and, amidst the discord of many voices raised in conversation, a bunch of cowboys whom Buck recognised as belonging to the Grayson ranch were rendering the chorus of a familiar song.

Buck elbowed his way in the direction of the bar. His demeanour was careless, yet his eyes were taking in all that there was to see, searching the whole room for some sign of a foe.

He detected no one who bore a resemblance to any of the outlaws with whom he had matched his wits so frequently of late. Apart from the Hidden Valley cowboys, who were naturally drawing attention to themselves as songsters, he saw no one with whom he was at all closely acquainted.

Buck moved forward to the bar, where he ordered a "soft" drink from the man behind the counter. Then, having emptied his glass, he looked at a clock on the wall and noticed that it was five minutes to ten.

Buck glanced at the customers who were nearest to him. They were respectable citizens of whom he had some slight knowledge, and he felt that he had nothing to fear from them. Therefore he turned his back to the bar, and, under the pretext of listening to the singing of the Grayson cowboys, he assumed a posture whereby he was able to command a view of the entire room.

The minutes dragged by, and the hands of the clock on the wall crept round to the hour. In a little while that clock began to strike, its chimes passing almost unnoticed in the clamour that filled the room.

The last chime had died away, and, with it, the last chorus on the lips of the Hidden Valley boys had been brought to a close, when suddenly a slightly built man sidled into the saloon from the street.

Buck clapped eyes on him at once, but recognised him as Lew Meredith, another of the Grayson ranch-hands, and was about to look away from him again when he noticed the man cast a meaning glance towards the right.

There was something so significant in the glance that Buck attempted to follow it. He was unsuccessful, however, for it had been directed at someone whom the big Ranger could not see. Then, even as he turned his attention on Lew Meredith once more, he observed a further mysterious signal which came from that worthy—a slight nod of the head.

Next instant Meredith was carrying his hand to his hip.

Buck detected the movement, and, though he had never anticipated an attack from one of the Grayson cowboys, he plucked his forty-five from its holster with a rapid gesture. Yet, quick as he was, Lew Meredith's "iron" was already in his fist, and it belched destruction at a lamp which hung from the ceiling of the bar-room.

The blast of the revolver rang out above the roistering voices that filled the saloon, and the bullet, shattering the lamp, plunged the premises into darkness, a darkness that was stabbed a split second later by another shot.

A leaden slug grazed Buck's arm and smashed into the back of the bar. He heard the men on either side of him stampe to right and left—heard the panic-stricken yells which broke from them, and which were taken up by the rest of the mob in the saloon, so that uproar and confusion spread like wildfire.

Then, with the crowd swarming to the farthest corners to steer clear of trouble, and with his eyes accustoming themselves to the gloom, Buck saw the form of Lew Meredith silhouetted in the doorway.

The Ranger blazed at him, and hard on the bellow of his gun came a sharp cry of pain. Staggering, Meredith dropped his six-shooter and reeled forth on to the veranda, where he missed his footing on the steps of the porch and pitched headlong into the street.

Buck started across the saloon, intent on running out to secure his would-be assassin, lest the fellow managed to pick himself up and make his escape. But, as he was in the very act of striding towards the threshold, a pair of curtains that masked the doorway of a back room were drawn aside.

It was a room where someone had taken shelter when the gunplay had begun, someone who now raised a murderous hand and fired at the dimly seen figure of the big Ranger!

"THE SINGING VAGABOND"

The horses, mad beyond any sense of direction, were headed straight for this obstruction and the wagon, swinging almost broadside on as at the last moment the horses sought to swerve, came smack against the thick trunk. It broke to splinters, and in the centre of the wreckage lay a broken human figure; Judge Lane's selfish schemes were for ever ended.

The victors were cheering, grabbing valuables and preparing a final round-up of those that had not been captured, when from over the rise came a ringing yell:

"We're coming; hold out!"

"It's the Chief! Tex! Tex!"

The Kid, Frog and Buffalo in the wake of Champion were slithering down to join the fight. Whether the inspiration of Tex's presence put fresh heart into the defenders or fright into the assailants, or whether the latter thought these three riders were but the precursors of new reinforcements, the fact was that the Indians and Renegades broke—swayed in doubt long enough for the defenders to form up with Tex at their head. Impetuously they charged, firing, and, when near enough, laying about them with rifle butt, fist and knife. The enemy staggered under this onset and some, anxious to get away with the few jewels and other possessions they had seized, turned and fled. That started a rout. In a few minutes every mounted man was scuttling towards the heights.

But not all had horses. Utah Joe was among them. Frog saw him and, mad with anger at what this lanky coyote had done to Tex, jumped wildly for his neck. He was no match for Joe, whose defeat only lent additional strength to his powerful frame. He flung the scout from him. Frog went headlong on his back and Joe had pulled a knife from his belt to hurl at the defenceless man when, just in time, an arm swept him aside so that the point of the ugly weapon buried itself in the earth a foot to one side of Frog's face. Joe swung round.

Tex stood before him.

There was grim intention in the captain's eyes. Both knew it was the moment for a final settlement, a fight to a finish. Tex had always suspected the great man from Utah, now that he had definitely ranged himself on the side of the Indians he was proved a traitor. On top of his own grievance Tex fought for the honour of the regiment.

They came to grips. Feet kicking up the ground, they struggled and Utah Joe laughed exultantly. He knew he was the bigger man, a full head the taller, fifty pounds the heavier. He used his weight to bear down on Tex, and pressed his great talon-like fingers into his rival's throat. They went down together, fast embraced, but the smaller man hadn't ridden the ranges as a cowboy without learning how to take care of himself. By a trick of wrestling he threw his bigger adversary over his shoulder. The latter was lithe, however, and on his feet with a bound. Tex came at him low as if to tackle as would a Rugby player, then shot upwards a fist with all his power behind it. Like a bronze kick it met the other's chin full on the point. The big man measured his length on the ground—and did not rise again, for Frog was up by now and sat down on him until two officers ran and bound him.

Meanwhile, as Tex was to find out soon, other prisoners had been taken. One, a Renegade, offered to make a statement if his life were spared.

"What have you to say that matters?" he was asked.

"A hell of a lot I can spill," he boasted. "That skunk thar," he twitched his head towards where Utah Joe sprawled on the ground in defeat, "it was 'im planned the stampede of the 'osses from the fort. I know, 'cause it was me 'ot he let in to open the corral gate. That guy, Captain Tex, collared 'em or they would have been taken by the Indians who was awaitin'."

They told Tex. He glanced across to where Lettie was standing by her thoroughly exhausted aunt.

"We'll go back," he said. "There's things to be explained. I'm cleared."

She looked with shining eyes into his—and his lightened with a knowledge that stirred him as no fight could. He took her to one of the wagons that had not been damaged. Forgotten his men, forgotten all responsibilities for clearing up and reshaping the caravan, he helped Lettie to the driver's seat and himself took the reins.

All he was aware of was that he was handling the ribbons with one hand. Lettie's fragile fingers had slipped into the other.

"GAOL BREAK"

remembered that in all the noises arising from that mysterious row in the bar, not one had shown him the voices of Daisy or Duke.

"They've taken Mickie away," he told himself. "Why? Where? Has he told them I've been here—that I was coming for him?"

He moved across the little room to the steps leading down under the gabled roof to the door on the landing. He opened the door with scrupulous care then peered down over the balusters. A dim light burned in the parlour—all was stealthily quiet.

With infinite care he crossed the parlour, feeling his way with outstretched hands. His foot caught against a stool and he stumbled full length on the carpeted floor with a sudden crash. At once movement was heard in the bar below.

Someone came up the stairs from the bar, calling:

"Puss! Puss! What are you up to, you little thief." The door was opened, and around the edge of it the barman thrust his bullet head. Oakley sprang up and banged the door-edge across the man's neck, throwing his whole weight against the door.

The barman, caught in a vice, his ears nearly flattened, tried vainly to jerk free, but Oakley put a great hand over his right eye.

"If you call out I'll grind your head off!" he muttered. "I'm desperate! Where have they taken Mickie? Speak up!" He pressed the sharp edge of the door against the gasping barman.

"Who—who is it? Lemme go—you're killing me!"

"Not so loud," warned Oakley. "Never mind who it is. Where's the kid?"

"Duke's got him. It's you, Jim Oakley—might have guessed it! You're smashing in my skull—oh—ooh!"

"I'll kill you if you don't answer quick," growled Oakley. "What's Duke doing with him?"

"Gimme a chance, Jim." Oakley drew off a little of the pressure. "Gosh—that's better! I'll tell you straight. You needn't get so mad. They're taking the boy to some millionaire feller whose boy was kidnapped."

"What for?" Oakley demanded. "What's their game?"

"Going to pass off Mickie as the millionaire's kid—found after all these years. There's a big reward. I staged a dust-up to-night in the bar to draw the police here—so's they could get away without being watched too close. They're all in it—Daisy and Louis and Duke. He's the prime mover."

Oakley jerked open the door and grabbed the speaker as he fell inside. He flung himself on the almost breathless man, and whipping out a cord from his seaman's pocket, he deftly bound his victim, legs and hands. Kneeling on his chest, he kept him from crying out for help.

"Now, before I gag you," he whispered hoarsely, "tell me where they've gone."

"It's a swell yacht moored in the tideway. A big white boat—the Trident. Feller's name is Kendall—you needn't gag me, Jim. I won't call out. I'd like to see Duke done brown—he's treated me shabby. Only giving me a hundred out of the thousands he's going to get."

Oakley took no heed. He gagged the barman with his own dirty handkerchief; then left him on the floor. He went down the stairs to the untidy bar, and, opening a window, climbed out through it into the night.

"You'll Let Me Say Good-bye to the Boy?"

DUKE'S ear slithered to a stop just short of the river pier. He jumped out, calling to Mickie:

"Come along with me! I'm going to take you to your dad!"

The boy followed at once, clutching at Duke's hand. Duke whispered to Daisy and Louis:

"You sit tight and wait for me. We'll drive to Dover and get the night boat." He moved off up the narrow lane and disappeared in the darkness, Mickie clinging trustingly to his hand.

On board the yacht, Duke was presenting Mickie to Paul Kendall and Dr. Merian.

"This is the boy," he stated. He turned to Mickie. "Say how do to the gentlemen."

"How do you do?" spoke Mickie, staring about him at the splendour of the cabin. "Is this my daddy's ship? The one he promised me?"

Kendall was trembling despite his outward calm. If this was his son—how everlastingly grateful he would be! He urgently wanted to take the boy in his arms and bring him to Irene, a joy of pure heavenly happiness for them both. He stared so hard at Mickie that the little fellow began to be frightened. He ran close to Duke.

"I—I want my daddy!" he whispered. Kendall found his voice.

"Leave him with me a minute, will you? I want to be quite sure."

Duke, eternal cigarette betwixt his lips, nodded.

"I'll be outside on the deck," he agreed. Dr. Merian opened the door for him, his old face gravely concerned.

As soon as they were alone Kendall caught up Mickie and held him close.

"Are you my boy—are you? I think you are!"

Mickie smiled to hide his fears. "Is this daddy's ship?" he repeated.

"Yes. Let me put you in this chair. Now let me turn up your sleeve. Why, what's this?" Kendall had bared the tattoo mark on Mickie's right arm.

"That's a heart," said Mickie with pride. "An old Turk did it."

Merian studied them both silently. Kendall turned to him, asking almost chokingly:

"Don't you think it's our son?"

Merian couldn't dash his friend's hopes. And even he was beginning to believe. Kendall strode to the door to call Duke to him.

"This tattooing on the boy's arm?" Duke whispered behind his hand.

"To cover up a birth mark. It was too terrible a risk for Oakley—to leave that dead sure clue on the child."

Kendall nodded. "Yes, that sounds reasonable." He made up his mind in a rush of emotion.

"I believe him to be my boy. I believe it with all my soul." He felt nothing but gratitude for Duke. "Come and take the money!"

Duke was only too glad. His fat face creased into smiles. He said, with smug satisfaction:

"I'd almost like to say—keep the dollars, Mr. Kendall. So far as I'm concerned, I would. But I'm only a go-between."

They were checking it together when in walked Collins and Banks. Duke, counting a bundle of notes, stopped dead.

"So you did send for the police?"

"No," Kendall was saying, when Collins shook his head.

"We don't want you, Duke—not yet. Oakley's aboard this vessel—you've brought the boy to him." He turned to Merian. "You the owner of the ship?"

"I'm Dr. Merian. That gentleman is Mr. Kendall."

The American's heart was so overjoyed at recovering his son that he didn't care how much Duke might be a crook. He answered:

"Mr. Duke and I are settling a business deal. He has helped me to find my child."

Collins glanced knowingly towards Banks.

"That's it, eh?"

"That is it," said Kendall, while Merian shook his grey head.

At the far end of the saloon was a port light, in the circular darkness of which Banks' quick eyes had caught a furtive movement. Mickie was staring up into the round, mirror-like glass.

"I can see eyes!" he called. "Eyes!"

Collins and his fellow detective slipped out and ran round the decks. They came upon Oakley peering through the port light. Heavy hands were clapped on Oakley's shoulders.

"It's all up, Jim," stated Collins definitely.

The convict turned to them, his face a greenish white in the gloom. He made no effort to shake them off.

"I heard everything—you'll let me say good-bye to the boy?"

"Word of honour, Jim?" asked the inspector.

"Word of honour, sir." The three of them moved together to the saloon where Oakley met Duke at the door, attachment hugged close. The two men regarded each other steadily; then Duke, in would-be hearty fashion, greeted the convict:

"Why, Jim, who'd have thought of seeing you here?"

Oakley muttered loud:

"It's all right, Duke—quite all right. Give my respects to Daisy and Louis. Maybe the money will help you all to go straight."

Duke checked a hasty reply. He went along the deck to where his shore boat was waiting. Collins told Kendall and Merian:

"This man is Jim Oakley, an escaped convict. He wants to speak with the boy. He's promised to say no more than good-bye to him."

Mickie ran forward.

"Oh, daddy, daddy—you've come at last!"

Oakley stooped to him, huskily whispering:

"I'm not your daddy, old lad. Only jest a kind of—kind of feller who's tried to be your father. A feller who's loved you a lot." He choked a little, then went on: "That's your daddy—". He gestured towards Kendall. "He's going to do you proud, Mickie—much better than I could ever hope to do. This is the ship I told you about—"

Irene Kendall was at the inner door, her hand to her heart, her smile of welcome to Mickie a sure reward to the convict so bravely renouncing his rights. Oakley smiled, too—a smile that made his rough, ugly face good to look upon.

"And that's your mother, Mickie. Go to her, old lad. Aye—that's right!" Mickie was in Irene's arms, letting her embrace him with all her long-pent mother love. Oakley straightened.

"I'm ready, inspector."

"MODERN MADNESS"

this little show-down for four o'clock and it should work out almost to the minute."

"I still don't get the hang of this," cried Ken.

"Schmidt and Morelli love each other like poison, and have been rivals for years. Those are Schmidt's suits, and Morelli is coming here to throw acid over them. He don't know they're Schmidt's suits, but Schmidt will think that Morelli knows. What will Schmidt do?" Julius made a gesture with his hand. "Then we shall see a glorious battle."

Schmidt walked in well within the five minutes, and he was accompanied by four of his toughest rascals.

"Where's Morelli?"

"He isn't here yet," answered Julius. "Now, I've got a little idea. Suppose you take your men and hide in my office so you can give him a fine reception when he does get here."

There was only Julius and the parrot in the shop when Morelli and his men walked in.

"What you want?" Julius put a good quaver into his voice.

"Out of my way, fool!" shouted Morelli. "I'll teach you to call me a no good gangster." From his pocket he took out a large bottle and whipped out the cork. "Watch this burn 'em up!"

His men laughed as Morelli splashed the acid on the suits.

"That'll learn you to call me a double-crossing grafter and a black-mailer!" Morelli shouted. "The next time—"

"What he said about you just now goes for me!" drawled a voice.

Morelli and his men whipped round to find themselves face to face with Dutch Schmidt and his gang. Every man was holding a gun. They dived for their own. Julius Trent dived behind the counter.

There was a roar of blazing guns.

All the hate that had accumulated for months and months was released in this gang fight. Their one thought was to kill. It was a showdown—a fight to a finish.

Ken Mitchell jumped out of a back window directly the firing started, and, seeing a pedestrian, yelled to the man to get the police here, as soon as possible. He rushed back to find the battle still in progress, though the firing was not so frequent. Two of Morelli's men were dead and one badly wounded, whilst Schmidt was wounded and had one of his gang dead.

The two factions were shooting it out from behind any kind of cover that they could find. Poor Julius found himself crowded out from behind the counter, and in trying to get into a cupboard when he winced—a bullet had caught him in the shoulder. He clutched his shoulder and watched the battle with eager gaze.

Morelli unwisely ventured to show his head, and Schmidt drilled him through the temple. Schmidt thought the battle was over, and crawled forth to gloat over his enemy. A gun cracked, and he sprawled in a heap.

When the police arrived the battle was at an end. Every man of the two gangs was dead or badly wounded.

"Looks like we're too late," cried a sergeant. "It seems to be all over."

From the cupboard Julius Trent swayed out and clutched at the counter. Into the smoke-filled shop rushed Ken and Daisy, to catch the wounded man in their arms.

"Officer, quick!" screamed Daisy. "Mr. Douglas has been shot."

The police carried Julius into the office, and Ken knew enough about surgery and medicine to make a rough dressing. All the while Julius smiled bravely.

"Don't worry, Ken. I'll be all right."

"Officer," Ken cried, "we've got to get a doctor right away."

"Sergeant!" The officer turned. "Order an ambulance. We'll get him to hospital." The sergeant darted from the room. "Are you able to make a statement, Mr. Douglas?"

"Sure, I can," Julius grinned. "I just had a little idea."

On the way to the hospital Julius used his influence and managed to persuade the officer, who had nothing but respect for his cleverness, that he wished to go to his home. The officer consulted with the police-surgeon and the request was granted.

A New Lease of Life

JULIUS TRENT lay in bed. He was propped up with pillows and looked amazingly well. On the counterpane were a number of daily newspapers.

"Momsey, it looks like I'm famous." He picked up a paper. "I showed them tough guys where to get off."

"I know, Julius, but you might have been killed."

"Not me, momsey. Them tough guys were a cinch for me. The minute they started that terrorism racket, I made up my mind to give 'em the business. I'm no chump. It's a hard guy I am."

There was a ring at the front door, and there stood Ken Mitchell. It was Betty who let him in and placed a warning finger to her lips.

"I think the time has come."

"Time? For what?"

"To ask dad if it's all right for us to get married."

"Good! But why do we have to be so mysterious about it?" asked Ken.

"Shhhh! Come on." Betty grabbed hold of his hand, and, like conspirators, they tiptoed upstairs.

"You know, Julius," Mrs. Trent was saying, "if I'd even suspected about this cleaning business—"

"Kind of slipped one past you there, momsey," chuckled Julius. "Hallo, that sounds like Betty."

Julius glimpsed someone behind his daughter and at once buried his face behind a newspaper.

"Hallo, mother!" Betty said. "You know Ken Mitchell, don't you?"

"How do you do, young man?" Mrs. Trent said a little primly.

"Put your paper down, dad," cried Betty. "I want you to meet Mr. Mitchell."

Julius put down his paper.

"Why, Tom!" gasped a surprised young man.

"Hallo, partner!" chuckled Julius.

"Tom, what are you doing here?"

"Now, don't get excited," Julius chuckled. "You see, I belong here. Haven't you read the papers? I'm the father of those three women of yours—Cleopatra, Joan of Arc and Helen of Troy. It's all very simple. I got tired of doing nothing, so I went in with you as your partner. And now it looks like you're going to be one of the family."

They were all laughing and talking happily when Harrison appeared.

"I'm terribly sorry, sir, but Mr. Caldwell is below and insists upon coming up to see you."

"How are you, Mrs. Trent?" Caldwell came briskly into the bedroom. "Well, Julius, you old son-of-a-gun. I read all about you in the papers when I got off the train. How are you?"

"Never better in my life," answered Julius. "One of those gangsters clipped me in the shoulder, but it's nothing—nothing at all. I'm a pretty tough bird, Charlie."

"I know you are," Caldwell grinned. "That's why I'm out here. You'll be pleased to hear the board of directors tossed Andrews out on his ear and they want you back as president. They know now that Woolex was a big mistake. Think you can handle it?"

"Handle it! Of course I can handle it!" roared the invalid. "Maybe we can have a real research department with my partner running it. He's a fine chemist."

"But, Julius, what will your doctor say?" wailed Mrs. Trent.

"My doctor, nothing," he scoffed. "Let me tell you something, mother. I haven't touched a bit of that medicine in weeks. There's enough over there at the Checker Club to start a drug store." He beckoned Ken to come nearer. "Oh, by the way, Charlie. I want you to meet my partner, Ken Mitchell."

Julius relaxed and smiled contentedly.

"Charlie, do you know the first thing I'm gonna do when I get back to that factory?"

"No, Julius, what?"

"Fire Rosewater." Julius rubbed his hands together. "I'll give him robin's egg blue, powder-puff texture and pussy-willow weave!"

"UNDER TWO FLAGS"

"That," he gasped, "is a figure of 'Forest King,' Tony Brett's horse. He gave it to me, and it is in my stables, now. You remember the Tony Brett scandal. His younger brother committed a crime, and Tony took the blame and disappeared, going to Russia where, we learnt, he was killed. Last summer his younger brother died after an accident, but before the end he confessed."

Venetia looked at him, her face pale but her eyes flashing with hope.

"The man that gave me that horse is a legionnaire," she said. "An English gentleman. Sergeant Victor must be Tony Brett!"

"Impossible!" her uncle cried. "Tony Brett is dead—but wait—where is this Sergeant Victor? I'd know Tony anywhere."

"He went with Colonel Doyle's battalion," she whispered.

But there was nothing her uncle could do to get Tony Brett back now. The wounded men were coming in rapidly by this time. Venetia, torn with a ghastly fear, rushed down to where the camel ambulances were being unloaded.

Cigarette was there, scanning the faces of each wounded legionnaire for the same reason. She saw Venetia, and she said bitterly:

"If you are looking for Sergeant Victor, you need not look any more. He's not coming back!"

Venetia grabbed her by the arm and demanded what she meant. Cigarette told her.

"You love him, too?" Venetia asked weakly.

"Yes, I love him, and he would have been mine if you had not come!"

"You say you love him," said Venetia, "and you can save him by talking to Colonel Doyle. If you love him, how can you let him die?"

On the hills of Ghardia dawn broke in a cold mist, and in the shadow of the mist seven legionnaires, gaunt and haggard, their clothes in tatters, lay behind a stone wall. They were all that was left of the detail of twenty men sent out by Colonel Doyle under Sergeant Victor.

In the sand, on the hills, and in the deep ravines, four thousand Arabs waited for the break of day before completing the carnage of the remaining men of the detail. Ghastly and brutal would be this last charge.

Victor moved among the men, trying to give words of encouragement. The day before he had sent a message to Colonel Doyle:

"This time the bad penny won't turn up."

The colonel had received it in silence; he admired the courage of his sergeant; he had liked him as a man, and still liked him, in spite of Cigarette—

One of Victor's men, lying behind the shattered wall, called out:

"Look! The Arabs are coming!" Through the mist horsemen appeared, but they were not Arabs. It was Colonel Doyle, leading the relief column. The Arabs also saw the column and disappeared behind the hills, waiting to mow it down from ambush.

Victor saw the death-trap, but there was no way to warn the colonel, and they had to lay and watch the Arabs swoop down on the column and cut it to pieces. Colonel Doyle fought like a tiger until a bullet took him in the shoulder and he went down. Lieutenant Petain helped him up, and, gathering the seventeen remaining members of the column round them, the colonel and lieutenant led the retreat to where Victor crouched behind the broken wall.

All day the battle went on, the legionnaires defending their position doggedly, and as night came on the Arabs drew away and the rattle of machine-guns and rifles ceased.

Victor donned the cloak and head-dress of a dead Arab and silently wormed his way to a hill and saw that their position was surrounded.

When he got back he reported to Colonel Doyle.

"Good work, Victor!" he said, all his former jealousy wiped out. "But why did you try to steal my girl?"

"So that's why you wanted me dead!" Victor laughed. "There was a girl, but not Cigarette. But what difference does it make now, we'll soon be dead?"

"If we could only hold out until noon to-morrow," said Doyle, "there is a large relief column on its way—"

"You'll get the extra time," interrupted Victor. "That is—if you give me permission?"

Doyle nodded.

"All right, go ahead," he muttered. Victor slid over the wall and was lost in the darkness. Two hours later he was ushered into the tent of Sidi-Ben-Youssiff. Victor threw off his robe and stood in his tattered uniform.

Sidi-Ben-Youssiff blinked in amazement, and then said:

"This is amazing, Brett—old Oxford classmates meeting here like this—enemies. May I offer you a drink?"

Victor nodded, took the drink. He was playing for time and told Youssiff that he was a fool, that the British Army was helping the French, and that they were even then marching on his camp. Sidi-Ben-Youssiff fell for the bait and sent spies to find out. He informed Victor that if he was right he would live; if he wasn't—well, he'd have to die.

Sergeant Victor was wrong. He knew he was when he went to Sidi-Ben-Youssiff, but his ruse had given Colonel Doyle the time that meant life to them.

Out on the desert, Cigarette, who had ridden hard after Colonel Doyle, had seen the battle from afar off, and, turning, had ridden her horse as hard as he would go back towards Abeshe. Then the horse grew weary, and so she had led the exhausted animal.

She made a pathetic figure as she stumbled along—so small and helpless in that vast expanse of sand. Then, faintly to her ears came the sound of horses' hoofs. She topped a sand dune, and there, in the distance, was the relief column of Chasseurs. She shouted and waved her arms wildly until the column stopped, and she staggered up to the colonel.

Back in his tent, Sidi-Ben-Youssiff confronted Victor.

"You lied to me," he said, "and that means, I am afraid, your death."

Victor shrugged his shoulders.

"I am amazed that you fell for the trick at all."

Sidi-Ben-Youssiff scowled, then he smiled.

"Remember the old Soccer game?" he said. "Well, we are about to have a game now, with horses. But there will be a little difference, because I am afraid, my dear Brett, that you will be the ball!"

As the Arabs grabbed Victor the sound of horses' hoofs and shouting came from outside the tent. It was the Chasseurs, and at their head rode Cigarette—knee to knee with the colonel.

The battle was brief, and as the Arabs routed and defeated, galloped away from the scene, Victor rushed over to where Cigarette lay and gathered her in his arms.

"Cigarette!" he cried.

She opened her eyes and smiled weakly up at him.

"I have seen so many men die," she murmured brokenly, "so I know what this is. But there is something I must say. She said—your English lady—if I loved you—I would—save you—tell her—I tried!"

"I will tell her, my dear," Victor whispered.

Cigarette nestled closer in his arms, and he bent down and kissed her. She smiled faintly and closed her eyes.

The remnants of the 5th Battalion, were assembled on the parade ground at Abeshe. A coffin sat on a caisson in front of them, and on it lay Cigarette's kepi. Two flags, the French and the British, waved over her as a French field-marshal stepped forward.

"We are assembled here to do honour to a soldier of France," he said, "killed in action against the enemy. In life she was a devoted friend and companion to the Foreign Legion, and by her latest heroic action she saved the remnants of the 5th Battalion. On behalf of the Government of France, I hereby confer on Mademoiselle Cigarette the Medaille Militaire."

Under an awning stood the late Sergeant Victor, now released from his service, and Venetia. As the last notes of the bugle died away he glanced at the girl. Tears were in her eyes, and as their glance met they saw the future—and a promise of happiness made possible by Cigarette.

HELL SHIP MORGAN

A GRIM DRAMA of the SE

When Captain Ira Morgan helped down-and-out Jim Allen he made a friend, and when he helped a desperate girl named Mary Taylor he found a wife. But he took Mary to sea with him and Jim—and there grim drama developed to a climax in the midst of a terrific storm. Starring George Bancroft and Victor Jory

The End of a Mutiny

AT the window of his own private office John Cabot looked out across San Pedro Bay with troubled eyes. The lights of the harbour were shining bravely enough, but beyond them sky and sea merged into utter blackness—a blackness out of which "white horses" rode turbulently shorewards.

The signs were ominous, and the thoughts of the grey-haired proprietor of the Cabot Cannery were so far away that he did not hear a clerk enter the room.

"Here's the seven o'clock weather report, Mr. Cabot," said the clerk.

"Huh?" Cabot swung round with a start and saw the slip of paper in the speaker's hand. "Oh! Any change?"

"No, sir," was the reply. "Storm warnings as far south as Panama."

"Umph! That means trouble!"

"Yes, sir." The clerk paused, then added: "And we need fifty tons of tuna to fill the orders on hand. Maybe we'd better start cancelling?"

"We'll cancel nothing," returned Cabot sharply. "Morgan promised to be here by Saturday, and he's never broken his word. It'll take more than a tropical storm to keep him away!"

Another clerk entered the room, and he also had a slip of paper in his hand.

"Wireless, sir," he said, "from Captain Morgan."

John Cabot adjusted a pair of pince-nez and took the message.

"Clearing Mazatlan to-day," he read aloud. "Headed north through storm. Arrive San Pedro Saturday."

There was a large map of Mexico and Central America on one of the walls, and he walked over to it.

September 19th, 1936.

"Let me see," he said. "Mazatlan." From the Mexican city and port of that name he moved a finger out to a spot in the Pacific Ocean and rested it there. "He ought to be about here."

His reckoning was not at fault. The tuna fishing vessel, Southern Cross, was at that moment battling with a fierce storm in almost the very spot he had indicated. For several hours past mountainous waves had tried in vain to engulf her, and her decks were awash.

To the members of the crew who were in the fo'c'sle it seemed impossible that an overloaded ship could fight through such a storm, but most of them stood in awe of Captain Ira Morgan, whose reputation had earned for him the title of "Hell-Ship Morgan," and several of them were gloomily endeavouring to play cards on a table that would not keep still when Giovanni Covanci stumbled down the ladder-way in streaming oilskins and sou'-wester.

Covanci was an Italian; an ugly fellow with a scarred face and a moustache that emphasised the thick lips of a cruel mouth. He was an experienced seaman and a powerful fellow, but he was a coward at heart and he was afraid.

"We can't make it!" he shouted. "We ain't got a chance. The sooner we do something about it the better!"

The men at the table looked at him, and one of them—Joe Cotton by name and a giant in stature—inquired pointedly:

"The sooner we do what?"

"Something—anything!" cried Covanci. "We didn't sign on as no shark bait!"

"Maybe," jeered Joe, "you think the old man'll put into one of them Mexican ports?"

"He will if we make him," Covanci retorted.

"Make him?" Joe laughed mirthlessly and clutched at the table as the ship gave a sudden roll. "Nobody makes Hell-Ship Morgan do nothing!"

"Then get ready to die!" shrieked Covanci. "I say we ain't gonna live out the storm! My parrot he is dead—the ship's mascot! Nobody can reach port with a dead mascot!"

That statement carried more weight with the superstitious sailors than anything he had said before. They looked at one another in dismay.

"He's right, mates!" exclaimed a man who had been trying to get some sort of rest in a bunk that kept doing its best to eject him.

"There's sharks followin' us, too!" growled another hand.

"Sure they're followin' us!" raged the Italian. "They smell food—human food! If we don't make Morgan put into port we'll die here like rats! Are you comin' with me?"

"I'm with you, Covanci," decided Joe Cotton; and that settled matters so far as the rest were concerned. They put on their oilskins and sou'-westers and they climbed up out of the fo'c'sle through a flood of water that cascaded down the ladder-way directly the iron door at the top was opened.

Several times they were nearly washed overboard on their way to the captain's cabin, but they reached it at last. In spite of their mutinous spirit, however, at the door they stopped short and eyed one another with some uncertainty—and Joe Cotton knocked.

Inside the cabin Hell-Ship Morgan was sitting at a table with a magnifying-glass in one hand and a pearl attached to a string in the other. He was a taller man than Joe, and a broader one; a man born to command. His clean-shaven face suggested strength of purpose, just as his massive frame suggested physical strength, but at the moment he was floating over the pearl.

On the wooden walls of the cabin hung all manner of things he had collected during his many years at sea—curved cutlasses from the Malay States, war clubs from the jungles of South America, broadswords from China, and rare Chinese tapestries; but the pearl he treasured most of all.

"Come in!" he barked, and put down the magnifying-glass and pocketed the pearl.

The door was opened, and eight dripping men followed one another into his presence.

"What are you doing on this deck?" he rapped at them.

Covanci quailed, but felt it incumbent upon him to speak for the others.

"We just wanted to see you about —" he began lamely.

"Get out!"

The harsh command silenced the Italian, but Joe Cotton was made of sterner stuff. He stepped forward beligerently.

"We want to tell you—"

"When I want fo'e'sle company," roared Morgan, "I'll visit you! Get below where you belong!"

In at the open door burst James Dale, engineer of the Southern Cross, a thick-set and phlegmatic Scot not easily disturbed by storms at sea, but now considerably disturbed.

"Cap'n!" he cried. "Cap'n Morgan!"

"What is it, Dale?" demanded Morgan, waving the others aside.

"We've sprung a leak! Water's rising in the bilges!"

"D'you hear that?" Morgan rose from his chair, and his brown eyes blazed. "Get below on your pumps!"

Covanci, more alarmed than ever, cried out:

"We're through taking orders 'from you, Captain Morgan!"

"You're what?" Morgan strode over to the Italian and gripped him fiercely by the shoulder.

"We're overloaded by twenty ton!" screeched his captive.

"This ship's got a curse on her!" declared Joe Cotton.

"She's goin' to the bottom, and we ain't goin' with her!" bellowed another frightened hand.

Morgan let go of Covanci and turned to Dale.

"Stand by your engines," he said curtly. "I'll take care of these men."

"Aye, aye, sir!" Dale went out from the cabin to struggle back to the engine-room, and Morgan faced the mutinous eight.

"I'll give you five seconds to go below!" he informed them.

"We ain't going!" defied Joe Cotton.

"Five seconds I said!"

"Save your breath, Cap'n Morgan!" bellowed Joe. "Either you put into port, or—"

A massive fist snashed into his mouth, another caught him sideways on the jaw, and he went down on his back as senseless as a log of wood. Covanci gulped and backed hurriedly away lest his turn should be next.

"Two of you take Joe to his bunk," directed Morgan menacingly. "The rest of you get below on the pumps, or I'll put the whip to your backs!"

"We—we just thought we—" stammered Covanci.

"I do the thinking on this ship!" thundered Morgan. "You signed on to take orders, and you'll take 'em till we stiek our nose back in San Pedro! I promised John Cabot tuna by Saturday, and he'll get 'em if I have to plug the leaks of this tub with your skins! Now get out, all of you! Get below!"

Without another word of protest two of the men picked up the inanimate form of Joe Cotton, and the other five shuffled out after those who bore him. The projected mutiny was at an end.

The storm was still raging, but the pumps were working, when Captain Ira Morgan went out from his cabin, not many minutes later. Climbing the companion-ladder to the upper deck, he ascended to the bridge and entered the wheel-house.

Several times on the way he was swept nearly off his feet by huge waves that broke over the vessel, but he was not even scant of breath as he forced the door of the wheelhouse shut behind him and approached the helmsman.

"What's she turning over?" he inquired.

"About twelve hundred, sir," replied the man at the wheel, none too happily.

"Why don't you keep her on her course?"

"She's a little hard to handle."

"Give me that wheel!" snapped Morgan.

Snug Harbour

THREE days afterwards the Southern Cross chugged across San Pedro Bay, out of a calm sea, making for Pier 5. The sun was shining in a clear sky, but gulls were screeching over the ship because of her cargo of fish.

Pier 5 was the property of John Cabot, and the cannery was at the shoreward end of it. Many of his employees were waiting on the pier to deal with the tuna, or tunny fish, as soon as the vessel had berthed, and Cabot himself went out from his office to welcome Morgan home.

Slowly the vessel drew alongside the pier and was made fast, and then John Cabot hailed the captain who had been shouting instructions from the bridge.

"Hallo, there, you old sea dog!" he cried.

Morgan looked down and waved a hand.

"Mr. Cabot, come aboard!" he boomed.

Without waiting for a gang-plank to be placed in position for him Cabot scrambled over the side and mounted to the bridge.

"I'm glad to see you," said Morgan, "I'm mighty glad to see you, too."

"Give him to me," said Morgan, and caught hold of the lapel of the stranger's coat.

declared his employer fervently. "You know, that storm had no worried."

"Just a blow," said Morgan with a characteristic shrug. "We came through with a hundred and twenty tons."

"A hundred and—" Cabot broke off to clap him elatedly on the back. "Oh, say, that's splendid! Splendid!" Joe Cotton called up from the deck below:

"Ready to unload, sir?"

"Yeah," Morgan returned. "Open the hatches and let's get going, Joe."

"Aye, aye, sir."

The hatches were opened and from the tanks beneath them the tunny fish were hoisted in baskets—by means of cranes—and emptied into an inclined water-trough on the pier, along which they were swept right into the factory, where men on either side of the trough dealt with them before they reached the canning machinery.

John Cabot watched the operations which were so familiar to him.

"A hundred and twenty!" he breathed, and turned again to his captain. "You know, Morgan, that's a record."

"If we had a bigger ship," said Morgan, "we'd bring in twice as many."

"I believe you would at that, you old dog!" declared Cabot heartily. "Any trouble aboard?"

Ira Morgan grinned.

"Not a murmur," he replied. "Sweet and smooth as a shark's tooth—nothing to do but kill time."

"Yeah, I can imagine," said Cabot.

Morgan looked across at a basket that seemed to be none too securely held by the hooks of a crane.

"Be careful with that load!" he bellowed.

The basket reached the hands of the men by the water-trough in safety, and disappointed seagulls screeched their annoyance.

"Lively, boys!" urged Morgan. "I've got a date with some folks in the Snug Harbour to-night."

"How about coming over to the office and having a little talk before you go to the Snug Harbour?" suggested Cabot.

"Sure," Morgan nodded, and when the long task of unloading was finished he made his way to the private office on the first floor of the big building, where he made his report and smoked a pipe while Cabot smoked a cigar and beamed at him.

"I know it's none of my business, Morgan," the grey-haired man said rather diffidently, after other matters had been discussed, "but—well, I think a lot of you for some reason or other." "Go on," laughed Morgan, "get it off your chest!"

"Well, I seem to say the same thing after every trip. I guess I ought to keep my mouth shut."

"Nobody's got a better right to talk than you, Mr. Cabot," demurred Morgan. "I'm the one to keep his mouth shut after what happened on the Panamanian."

"Now don't dig into the past," rebuked Cabot. "That's dead. It's the future I'm interested in."

Absent-mindedly Morgan spun a terrestrial globe which was close beside the chair in which he was seated. He knew quite well what his employer was trying to say and had no great desire to hear it.

"To-day we're alive," he stated, more or less defensively; "to-morrow, maybe, we're inside the belly of a shark."

Cabot looked at him gravely and shook his head.

"You know, Morgan, I never can understand you," he said. "Working hard, playing hard, trying to convince yourself that nothing else really matters."

"Nothing else does matter," was the emphatic rejoinder.

"Are you sure of that?"

"What do you mean?"

"Don't you ever want what other men have? The chance to settle down, friends, a home?"

Morgan's hand was withdrawn abruptly from the terrestrial globe and he sat rather stiffly upright.

"You're forgetting," he growled. "I had an idea of setting up a home once, and once was enough."

"And just because things didn't work out right that time," said Cabot, "you're determined never to give another woman a chance to hurt you as she did."

"Women!" Unutterable scorn was implied by that one word.

"They're not all like that," protested John Cabot.

"I'm not so sure," retorted Morgan in a tone that suggested he was perfectly sure. "You know what I came home and found—married behind my back!"

"Yes," Cabot agreed, "and I also know that you threw away a great career on account of it, and that's where you made your big mistake. Why, you could be where you belong to-day if you hadn't let your foolish pride give you the wrong slant."

Morgan's pipe had gone out. He put it in his pocket and stood up.

"It's no use, Mr. Cabot," he said gruffly. "You're a great guy—the best friend I ever had—but you can't make me over. I belong with that sea scum you were talking about—Covanci, Joe, and the hunch at the Snug Harbour. And whether I like it or not, they—they're my kind now. I'll see you to-morrow."

The Snug Harbour was a waterfront saloon run by a retired mate named Edward Hawkins. Swing doors gave access to it from Quay Street, but just inside was a sort of deck whence six broad steps led down into the main room.

Tables and chairs were dotted about the floor of this room, and at the far end of it there was a bar. The walls were half panelled and decorated with pictures of ships and plaster casts of fish, with here and there a lifebuoy, presumably to make the scuffling patrons of the place feel thoroughly at home.

When Morgan pushed open one of the swing doors and reached the top of the steps that evening, sailors and girls of his acquaintance were dancing between the tables to the music of a gramophone, while others sat and smoked, or leaned against the bar.

For a few moments he surveyed the familiar scene with appreciative eyes, then put his hands to his mouth and shouted:

"Ahoy, mates!"

Most of the dancers stopped short and waved to him, but bald-headed Hawkins hurried over to the steps from the bar.

"It it ain't Cap'n Morgan, back safe and sound!" he exclaimed, and ascended to grip hands with the valued customer.

"Looks like you've got a full house to-night," commented Morgan.

"That's right," agreed the proprietor. "Come on down and have a drink."

Morgan walked down the steps, and immediately four girls ran towards him.

"Captain Morgan, did you bring me back my Panama hat?" cried one of them.

"You didn't think I'd forget, did you, Helen?" he laughed.

"No," she assured him, and kissed him for the hat that was to come.

An Italian girl nestled up against his broad chest, but he held her at arm's length and surveyed her critically.

"Carlotta," he said, "you've gotten thin."

"Oh, Captain Morgan, you do not t'ink I'm skeeny?" she asked with a pout.

"No," said he, "but I think you need a drink."

"Oh, Captain Morgan," clamoured the third girl, "did you bring my perfume?"

"I've got it, Renee," he nodded. "And I've got that tortoiseshell for you, too, Nell."

With his arms round the four clustered girls he turned to the grinning Hawkins.

"All right," he said, "set 'em up for everybody. First drink's on me!"

Hawkins motioned to the waiters who were about the room to join the two assistants behind the bar.

"Get out the best we've got!" he shouted. "Come on, everybody, come on!"

Tables were deserted and there was a general movement towards the bar; but one man remained in his seat as though he had not heard the invitation, and he paid no heed to the noisy toasts that followed the rapid serving of drinks.

He was at a table near the steps and was drooping over it, a picture of utter dejection. He was a youngish man, with a mop of wavy black hair and brooding brown eyes, and his air of lassitude suggested that he was more in need of food than of the beer in a glass mug that stood neglected near his elbow.

A Helping Hand

WHILE drinks were being consumed at Morgan's expense, that redoubtable sailor home from the sea fastened upon a rather foolish-looking deck-hand as a butt for his particular brand of humour.

The deck-hand was in coloured shirt and trousers, and below the belt that supported the trousers a pocket yawned conveniently for Morgan's purpose as he waved a mug of beer and told a wholly incredible tale many of the others had heard before.

"A tiger shark, that's what it was," he stated dramatically. "I'd gone up into the rigging to look for sardines, our bait bein' low, when a big swell sent the boat rocking, and I could feel myself falling. I hit the water, and a shark wasn't twenty feet away."

The deck-hand stared.

"Did you have a knife?" inquired Ed Hawkins with well-assumed innocence and a covert wink.

"Not a sign of one," declared Morgan. "And before I'd taken two strokes the shark was between me and the boat."

He paused for effect, and the mug of beer he held was lowered several inches.

"I stopped swimming and waited," he went on slowly. "I knew I couldn't get away, and I knew he had me. He turned over on his back to strike. I could see the teeth coming closer and closer."

The mug of beer moved closer and closer to the yawning pocket.

"I could see the inside of his mouth."

The deck-hand drew a long breath.

"What did he do?" he gasped.

"He ate me up!"

The contents of the mug slopped into the pocket, and in the gust of laughter that followed the deck-hand realised that he had been led on to his own undoing. He clutched at the leg of his trousers with a horrified expression on his face.

"You're all right, buddy," gurgled Morgan. "You're all right."
 "Yeah," complained his victim, "but I'm all wet."

The practical joke pleased the on-lookers, but Morgan was always prepared to pay for his fun.

"Don't worry about that," he said cheerfully. "I'm going to buy you a new suit. I'm going to buy you and the entire house a drink, too. Come on, everybody, come on. Everybody up to the bar. The drinks are on me. Come on, waiters. Everybody up. Nobody's to be left out o' this!"

Used glasses were replenished, fresh glasses were filled, and in the midst of the hubbub Morgan looked round the room. The lone figure at the table near the steps had become conspicuous because everybody else was crowding round the bar.

"Who's that?" he demanded, jerking a thumb. "Sort of unsociable, eh?"

"Yeah, sorta," confirmed Hawkins; and then while all the others watched, Morgan stalked over to the table and shook with vigour a pair of drooping shoulders.

"Leave me alone!" snarled their owner.

"Come on, snap out of it!" urged Morgan. "Look at the fun you're missing."

"Leave me alone, I said!" The black-haired young man raised his head to glare at his would-be benefactor: "If you don't understand that, I'll make it clearer. I'm not interested in your company."

Morgan resented that rebuff, and his face showed it.

"You're kind of short on manners, aren't you?" he rapped.

"Well," retorted the young man, "did I ask you to come over here?"

"Come on and have a drink."

"No. I'm all right here, and I'm particular who I drink with. Besides, I don't like your face."

Morgan leaned over the table with clenched fists.

"What's the matter with it?" he challenged.

"There ought to be a lump on it," replied the unsociable one, lurching to his feet. "Right there!"

Out shot his fist, a straight left to the point of Morgan's jaw; but the blow was parried with ease and a heavier one administered that caught the stranger between the eyes and sent him crashing to the floor, in company with the chair upon which he had been sitting.

Two of the waiters hurried over from the bar with Hawkins.

"The nerve of the guy!" exploded Morgan.

"He's nobody," said Hawkins. "Don't worry about him. All right, boys, take care of him. Come and have a drink, cap'n—I'm buyin' this time."

Morgan went back to the bar with the proprietor, but the man was still lying on the floor in spite of a jug of water that was flung in his face, and the incident disturbed the captain.

"He didn't like my face," he explained to the others.

"Forget it, cap," urged the girl he had called Renee. "We're still celebrating, ain't we?"

"Sure," he responded. "Sure we are." He accepted a mug of beer that was offered to him and raised it.

"Here's to the grouch!"

Drinks were served to everybody, but Morgan kept looking across the room. He saw the two waiters raise the fallen man between them and move towards the steps.

"How bad's he hurt, Fred?" he called out.

"Oh, he's all right," was the reply.

"He just ain't had nothin' to eat for a couple o' days, that's all."

"Come on, Morgan," said the neglected Renee. "Forget about that guy, will you?"

But Morgan gnawed his under-lip, regretting what he had done.

"Takes a lot o' nerve to try and smack a guy when you haven't had anything to eat," he growled, and with sudden resolution strode back across the room.

"Wait a minute, Fred!" he commanded, and as the two waiters stopped short with the man they were half-carrying between them, he looked into a pair of dark brown eyes that were staring stupidly at him.

"Give him to me," he said, and caught hold of the lapel of the stranger's coat.

"Hawkins told us to throw him out," protested Fred, but Morgan had reached a decision that was not to be set aside.

"Did you hear what I said?" he snapped. "Give him to me!"

The semi-conscious man was surrendered to him, and without any great effort he slung the limp form over his shoulder. Voices called to him from the bar, but without even a backward glance for the crowd with whom he had intended to enjoy himself he mounted the steps with his burden and pushed his way out at the swing doors.

Half an hour later the stranger was trying feebly to sit up in a bunk on board the Southern Cross when Morgan walked in at the door of the cabin with a cup of hot coffee in his hand.

"Feeling better?" he inquired.

"If it isn't asking too much," returned the occupant of the bunk, holding his head between his hands, "you might tell me where I am."

"Aboard the Southern Cross," replied Morgan. "Captain's cabin. Captain's bunk."

There was more intelligence in the brown eyes now, but the unshaven face was drawn and pallid.

"Captain who?" asked their owner. "Morgan."

Morgan was out of the cab in an instant, and in the light of the head-lamps he knelt and picked up the girl.
 September 19th, 1936.

The brown eyes widened.

"Hell-Ship Morgan?"

"That's right," nodded Morgan.

"What's your name?"

"Jim Allen."

Morgan sat down on the edge of the bunk and proffered the cup.

"How about downing a little coffee?"

"Wait a minute. The last thing I remember—"

"I smacked you between the eyes."

"Hmm." The grunt was hostile.

"I didn't know you hadn't been eating regular."

Jim Allen accepted the cup, but did not drink from it. He stared blankly at his befriender.

"First you knock me out," he said, "and then you take care of me. Why?"

"Somebody had—" Morgan found explanation difficult and evaded the point. "Drink your coffee—it'll do you good."

"Thanks." Jim Allen sipped, found the coffee good, and continued to sip. Morgan fished out a pipe, filled it, and began to smoke.

"Sorry I got nasty," apologised Jim after a while.

"That's all right," Morgan said with a wave of his pipe. "Everybody's entitled to get nasty once in a while. Only it's bad business to try it on an empty stomach."

Jim Allen made a grimace.

"Well, if I waited till my belly got filled," he began, "I—well—"

"As bad as that?"

"Just about."

"A woman?"

Jim Allen nearly choked on a mouthful of coffee he was in the act of swallowing.

"Mind reader, aren't you?" he gulped.

"Not hard to figure that out," returned Morgan bitterly. "There's usually a woman behind a man when he hits the rocks."

"Uh-uh." Jim Allen drank more coffee and gazed thoughtfully round the cabin. "You know," he said presently, "I used to see scows like this when I was a kid in San Francisco."

"Yeah?" drawled Morgan.

"Yeah. Tuna boat?"

Morgan nodded.

"Maybe you'll laugh, but I was just three weeks away from my first officer's papers once."

"Couldn't pass the examination?"

"Naw." Jim Allen shook his head—and winced. "Didn't make it."

"D'you think you could learn to handle a pole?"

"Probably enough to get by."

"Live in the fo'c'sle, forty dollars a month and grub? What do you say?"

Jim Allen sat bolt upright and handed back the empty cup.

"I say wait a minute," he stated suspiciously. "Why should you offer me a job?"

"What difference does it make?" countered Morgan, depositing the cup on a locker. "Maybe I've got a hunch you're worth chucking a line to."

Jim considered that answer and found it to his liking. He smiled at the man who had knocked him out, and he offered his hand.

"When do we sail?" he asked.

A Successful Voyage

ON a breezy but very bright morning, ten days afterwards, the Southern Cross was ready to sail again to the shark-infested tuna fishing grounds off the Mexican coast. Stores had been taken aboard and the members of the crew were strapping along the pier when John Cabot shook hands with Ira Morgan at the door of his office on the first floor of the cannery.

"Good luck," said Cabot warmly.

September 19th, 1936.

Giovanni Covanci approached the gang-plank humming an Italian song, his dunnage-bag over his shoulder, his spirits apparently at their best, and a sailor who had caught up with him eyed him in astonishment.

"Thought you weren't goin' to sign on again, Covanci?" he challenged.

"Well, he pays the best wages, don't he?" retorted the Italian.

"And steps the hardest on his crew," commented the sailor.

"Some day he won't!"

With that cryptic remark the Italian made for the deck and descended to the fo'c'sle. Others followed, and Morgan arrived.

James Dale was waiting for him amidsthips and greeted him with a salute.

"Morning, Dale," said Morgan.

"Ready to turn 'em over?"

"Ready, sir," responded Dale, and went off to the engine-room.

Morgan ascended to the bridge and issued instructions. The anchors were weighed, the lines were cast off, and the ship moved away from the pier and across the bay towards the open sea, its single funnel jetting steam and smoke, its siren claiming a clear passage.

Jim Allen, with a cigarette between his lips, leaned over the rail of the upper deck watching the white wake astern. He was clad in shirt and trousers, and he looked a different being altogether from the human wreck who had suffered from Ira Morgan's fist in the Snug Harbour.

Good food had banished the haggard expression from his face, and his eyes were clear. There was no longer any suggestion of weakness about him: indeed, he made a fine figure of a man as he lounged there, seemingly at peace with the world and master of himself.

Morgan saw him from the bridge and descended the ladder-way in quite a temper.

"What are you doin' on this deck?" he rasped.

Jim turned and stared, then summoned a grin.

"I thought it didn't matter on a tuna boat," he said calmly.

"You're a member of the crew, Allen," thundered Morgan, "and you belong below. Understand?"

"No," said Jim defiantly, "I don't."

"Then you'd better learn! This deck belongs to the captain, the mate, the helmsman, and the engineer. Get below!"

"But I thought—" began Jim.

"Stop thinking! Ask the cook for suitable clothing, and find yourself a bunk in the fo'c'sle!"

Jim Allen blinked. This was not the way for a friend to treat a friend.

"Say, look here, Morgan—" he expostulated.

"Captain Morgan," snapped Morgan.

"Have it your own way," returned Jim with a shrug, "but you asked me to sail on this scow."

"You signed as a member of the crew," Morgan reminded him. "What passed between us has nothing to do with our positions now. I'm master aboard, and you'll take orders. Is that clear?"

"Aye, aye, captain," said Jim meekly, and he went off down the companion-way with no idea that Morgan was grinning broadly at his discomfiture.

The Southern Cross carried a mainmast to accommodate a crow's nest, and off the Gulf of Tehuantepec, some days later, the look-out on duty up aloft shouted excitedly:

"Bait ahead!"

Morgan instructed the engineer to slow down and the helmsman to keep to starboard, then discarded his coat and rounded up the whole crew.

"Turn out, you swabs!" he cried. "We've sighted bait! Get the net ready!"

A boat was lowered and a net was paid out to it. Covanci, in the boat, superintended operations, and gulls screeched greedily overhead.

A hatch was opened on board the ship, and after an interval the net was dragged in, and thousands of pilchards littered the deck.

"Looks like a good haul," said Morgan contentedly as the fish were poled through the hatch into the bait-tank down below.

Jim was swabbing the upper-deck next morning, when Morgan came up from his cabin on his way to the bridge.

"Morning, cap'n," said Jim smilingly.

"You've put on weight," said Morgan.

"Yeah," said Jim. "Must be the cook's fault."

"You glad you shipped?"

"No complaints, cap'n."

Morgan patted him on the back.

"Good," he said, and went on up the ladder.

That morning the man on duty in the crow's nest sang out the one word "Tuna!" and the vessel was stopped, and all hands turned out in haste. The hatch over the bait-tank was opened, and on either side of the ship men plied huge rods baited with pilchards.

Tuna—or tunny—belong to the mackerel family, of which they are the largest representatives, some of them reaching a length of ten feet and a weight of over a thousand pounds. They are excellent as food, and they are caught with rod and line.

The Southern Cross, being a tuna boat, was constructed specially for that sort of fishing, with built-out runways, upon which the men could use the rods, and water-troughs upon the deck into which the tuna could be flung.

From bow and stern, men flung pilchards into the water to encourage the sighted shoal to their undoing, and then as the sea became literally alive with them, the anglers cast their lines.

Jim proved himself to be quite adept at the game. Fish after fish he hooked, and with one foot against a rail for leverage, hauled each one forth, clean over his shoulder, to be dealt with at the water-trough.

Most of the tuna caught that day were of average size and weight, but some of them were too large and too heavy for one man to handle alone, and then help was speedily forthcoming.

All along each side of the ship the glistening shapes whizzed through the air, while gulls flapped their wings and tried in vain to snatch a meal.

With sweat streaming from their faces the men cast and caught and cast again, and the sun rose high in the heavens and the heat became intense.

Morgan walked along the deck, watching the efforts of his men and shouting:

"Lively, boys, lively! You can't count 'em until they're in the hatch! That's it—bring 'em aboard!"

It was not a record catch, that day, but it was a highly satisfactory one; and there followed another to match it within twenty-four hours.

Jim worked as sturdily as anyone, and Morgan did not fail to notice the fact. The man he had helped had proved entirely worthy of help.

On the homeward voyage, the evening before the Southern Cross was expected to reach harbour, Jim knocked at the door of the cabin and entered to find Morgan at his desk with a magnifying glass in his hand, gloating over the pearl he treasured more than any other of his possessions.

"You sent for me, cap'n?" he asked respectfully.

"Yeah." Morgan thrust the pearl into a pocket and put down the magnifying glass. "Come and sit down—and you can lay off that 'captain' stuff for a while. You've proved yourself a pretty good sailor."

Jim grinned and bowed, but did not take a seat.

"Well, that's a lot to say, coming from you, Morgan," he drawled. "To what do I owe this sudden honour?"

Morgan stood up. "I want to know something," he said pleasantly.

"Such as?" prompted Jim.

"Such as how you're feeling now."

"You were right about the sea air blowing the cobwebs away."

"Changed your mind, have you?"

"About a lot of things," Jim nodded. "Just as you said, there's always another woman around the corner. I'm following in your foot-steps from now on."

"I thought you'd get some sense," chuckled Morgan. "Now I've got something to tell you. Remember the first time we talked, and I told you I knew another guy headed the same way you were, only somebody pulled him up short?"

"I remember," said Jim.

"I was giving you history, Jim—about myself."

"I figured that one out," was the unexpected reply; and Morgan was not altogether sure that he liked it.

"You mean you even thought I was soft enough—"

he began. "You may fool a lot of 'em, Morgan," laughed Jim, "but I got the inside slant on you when you dragged me down here from the Snug Harbour and took care of me and put me back on my feet again."

"I was only—"

"To the rest of the world you may be a tough, two-fisted master of a hard-bitten crew, but to me you're just what polite society calls 'an old softie.' Understand?"

Morgan grabbed hold of Jim's shirt-collar with his left hand and clenched a formidable fist.

"I've got a notion to smash you right in the jaw," he said.

"Sure," decided Jim. "And now that we've got that settled, and find we agree about important things, there ought to be a lot of smooth water for us ahead. How about it?"

"Yeah." The fist was jabbed playfully against Jim's chest. "You mean we could sort of team up together when we hit shore?"

"Hit shore is right. Say, we'd be a tidal wave!"

"Prevailing winds, a full hatch, and a quick run home," said Morgan. "Do we drink to that?"

"Especially to the quick run home."

Morgan took a bottle of whisky and two glasses from a locker, and the glasses were filled. Jim raised the one that was handed to him.

"Partner," he said.

"Partner," said Morgan, and they drank to a firm friendship.

A Girl in Despair

AFTER the Southern Cross had moored at the pier in San Pedro Bay and its cargo of tuna had been unloaded, Morgan and Jim walked together towards the cannery, Morgan with his coat slung over his shoulder, Jim with his tucked under his arm.

A clerk from the office met them, and Morgan said to him:

"Hallo, George! I expected Mr. Cabot down."

"Don't you lie to me!" shouted Morgan furiously, pinning the Italian down by both arms and crouching over him. "You sneaked into my cabin!"

"He's at home, ill," said the clerk.

"Anything serious?"

"I don't think so, but he'd like you to go to his house to-night."

"I'll be there," Morgan promised.

"In the meantime we've got a date with some folks in the Snug Harbour."

He and Jim proceeded to that waterfront resort, and for several hours they enjoyed themselves thoroughly in the mixed company they found there. If Hawkins and the girls were at all surprised to see the redoubtable captain and the former down-and-out such boon companions they did not comment on the matter.

Jim worked the "shark" joke on a suitable victim—whose pocket was filled with beer—then ordered drinks for everybody.

"You'd better count me out," said Morgan, who had looked at his watch.

"Oh, are you quittin' us?" asked Jim disappointedly.

"I've got a date with Mr. Cabot," Morgan reminded him.

"Maybe I ought to go with you," suggested Jim.

"No, enjoy yourself. I'll take care of it."

Morgan went off, and Jim said to Carlotta, who was standing beside him at the bar:

"Great guy!"

"Says who?" asked the fickle Italian girl.

"Says everybody, when they talk to me!" he informed her.

At the top of Quay Street, Morgan chartered a taxi-cab to take him to John Cabot's house, which was situated at some distance from the harbour. It was rather a dark night and a long walk was not to his liking, especially as he wanted to get back to the saloon as quickly as possible.

The cab had progressed a couple of miles, or so, when the driver turned to inquire over his shoulder:

"What's that address again, mister?"

"A hundred and thirteen West Trinity Street," replied Morgan, and suddenly caught sight of a girl in the act of stepping off the kerb to cross the wide thoroughfare. "Look out!"

The driver swung his wheel and braked, but the girl screamed and fell.

Morgan was out of the cab in an instant, and in the light of the head-lamps he knelt and picked her up. She was clad in a little dark costume with a white blouse, and her face was nearly as white as the blouse. Her hat had fallen from her head, and her golden hair brushed against his right hand as he slipped it under her shoulders. Her eyes were closed.

"She stepped right out in front of me!" cried the driver in self-defence, scrambling down from his seat.

"Never mind about that," snapped Morgan. "We've got to get her to a hospital! Here, take her hat and hand-bag!"

The driver stooped to retrieve a very small felt hat and rather a shabby hand-bag while Morgan carried the girl to the cab, deposited her gently on a seat, and dropped down beside her.

"Step on it to the nearest hospital!" he shouted as the driver resumed his seat at the wheel.

The engine was re-started, the cab swung round a corner.

"Faster!" bellowed Morgan. "You're not going to a funeral!"

The driver did his best, but the vehicle was an out-of-date one and incapable of any very great speed. Morgan leaned forward in a fever of impatience—and suddenly his eyes widened. Between the two windows in front of him there was a narrow mirror, and in that mirror he had seen the girl open her eyes and smile.

"Never mind, driver!" he cried out. "Take your time! The lady isn't hurt as bad as I thought she was—in fact, she isn't hurt at all!"

The wondering driver slowed the over-strained engine; the cab ceased to rock and rattle. Morgan turned to the girl.

"You can quit acting, sister," he said with sarcasm. "I happened to see you in the mirror."

She sat up in her corner and began to tidy her hair with her hands.

"I might have known I couldn't get away with it?" she lamented.

"What made you try?" he said.

"Oh, it looked a good idea at the time!"

"You thought I'd feel sorry and pay off—is that it?"

"Yes," she replied wearily, "I guess that's it."

"What's your name?"

"What's the difference?"

"Just curiosity."

She looked at him in the light of a street lamp that was passed and she said slowly:

"Mary Taylor."

He had looked at her in that same light and he had noticed that she was very beautiful, though there were dark shadows under her eyes and a droop about her mouth. He felt sorry for her in a way, yet despised the trick she had played upon him.

"I suppose your mother is sick, and this is a gag to get money for medicine," he said dryly.

"I haven't any mother," said she.

"Maybe you're tryin' to help your brother through school?"

"No."

"Don't tell me," he drawled, putting his arm on the cushion behind her head, "that this frame-up was just to get dough for yourself."

"I'm afraid you're right, sailor," she sighed. "That's just about the size of it."

"Where do you live?"

"Right now I haven't any address." She bit her lip and added miserably: "You can drop me anywhere."

Morgan leaned forward again.

"Hi, driver, can you find Pier Five?"

"Sure," replied the man at the wheel, "but you wanted to go to—"

"Shove off to Pier Five!"

The pier was reached, the driver was paid, and the girl was helped aboard the Southern Cross and conducted to Morgan's own cabin. She was a little slip of a thing compared with him, but she seemed to be completely self-possessed, and she gazed about the cabin with interest.

"You must have been in a lot of ports ordinary fishing vessels never touch," she remarked.

"That's right," he confirmed, and he flung off his coat and perched on the edge of his desk, watching her with amused eyes as she wandered round the cabin examining his trophies. Miniature idols, hundreds of years old, engaged her attention, and then she came to one of the Chinese tapestries and fingered it appreciatively.

"A Lei Choi San tapestry," she said, "and it's real!"

Her knowledge astonished him.

"How do you know?" he inquired.

"It's the pattern of the Third Dynasty. You couldn't mistake that weave!"

He rubbed his chin, staring at her. It seemed to him that his hastily formed idea of her needed readjustment.

"Finny you should know about that," he grunted. "Not many people do."

"I was born in China," she said, leaning against the tapestry. "My father followed the sea, too."

"Oh?"

"He was master of the Argos, a freighter."

Morgan remembered the Argos. At one time, before a woman had upset his life by marrying another man, he had skippered a boat of her size engaged in the China trade.

"Went down last fall, didn't she?" he said.

"Yes," said Mary Taylor, with a little catch in her voice. "In a typhoon off Formosa Strait."

"And you?"

"I was in school, here in California. My mother died when I was a little girl, but dad used to come and see me every trip. You see, I was all he had, and—" She broke off with a mirthless little laugh, and there were tears in her blue-grey eyes. "Why, here I am, telling you all about myself, and I don't even know your name!"

"Morgan," he replied gruffly. "Captain Morgan."

It was evident that she was not acquainted with his name—or his reputation as a tyrant.

"Do you always help people this way?" she asked.

"As a matter of fact, I don't," he replied, "only—well, I—er—I sort of figured you needed somebody to look after you, and—"

"You appointed Captain Morgan; is that it?"

"Not exactly."

"Oh! You thought I was a waterfront girl?"

"Doesn't matter what I thought," growled Morgan. "I guess you're different. Your father was a seafaring man. Anyway, it's getting late."

He walked over to her and she smiled at him.

"Guess you need somewhere to sleep," he said.

"I hadn't anywhere last night," she confessed, "but it didn't rain."

"Umph! We'll talk things over tomorrow."

He went to the door of his sleeping quarters and opened it.

"I'm sorry there's no key," he said, "but the bolt works on the inside."

With a little nod of thanks she moved past him and looked down at the bunk in which Jim Allen had once spent several nights. Then she closed the door and shot the bolt.

"Here's to Mary!"

THE sun was up, and an invigorating breeze was blowing across the bay from the Pacific Ocean when Jim Allen stepped aboard next morning. He saw Morgan on the upper deck, leaning against the rail with some ship's papers in his hands, and, none too steadily, he climbed the ladder-way to him.

"What a night!" he exclaimed.

"You don't look like you missed much," remarked Morgan.

"No!" Jim held his throbbing temples and grinned reminiscently. "Say, how did you make out with Cabot?"

"Missed him last night," Morgan replied evasively. "Supposed to see him this morning."

The negro cook was approaching from the direction of the galley with a loaded tray in his hands, and Jim looked down at him.

"There's Pittsburg with breakfast," he said, trying to moisten his dry lips with a tongue that was still drier, "and how I do need coffee!"

"Jim," said Morgan hurriedly, "mind if you have your coffee below?"

"No, of course not," Jim replied, "only I thought that ranking officer stuff only went at sea. My error, cap'n!"

"Don't be a fool! I've got some figures to go over, that's all it is. You get your coffee and some sleep, and then you'd better get busy with your studying. Remember, your mate's examination comes up in three weeks."

"Okay," nodded Jim. "I'll work all day. But how about to-night? Do we spread our sails again?"

"Huh?" Morgan seemed a trifle preoccupied. "Oh, sure—sure we do."

The negro passed them to the cabin, and Jim descended to the main deck. Morgan moved along the rail and saw that instead of proceeding to the fo'c'sle, he had perched himself on the side with his back to the rigging of the mainmast.

There he remained, with the breeze in his face, and when the cook returned with an empty tray, he stopped him.

"Hi, Pittsburg," he said, "bring me some coffee here on deck. I need all the air I can get."

"Yassuh, right away, Mis'r Allen," responded the negro.

"Hurry!"

"Yassuh. I'se hurryin' as fast as I can."

Morgan looked down again with a frown, then went to his cabin and knocked at the door.

"Come in!" called a feminine voice; and he entered to find Mary Taylor eating the breakfast he had ordered for her. She was in his own chair at his own table, and she seemed to be thoroughly at home there.

"Good-morning," he greeted.

"Good-morning," said she, sipping hot coffee.

"Sleep well?"

"I always sleep well."

"I'm sorry you didn't have your luggage."

"Oh, that didn't matter!" she assured him. "I've done without it for three nights now. I couldn't pay the rent, so I couldn't take it away."

He dropped into an easy-chair and watched her appreciatively as she ate. There was colour in her face now, and she made a very attractive picture.

"Looks like I was right last night," he remarked after a while, "about your being different. You were willing to go to any length when you stepped in front of that cab, I guess, but you've got all the courage of a seafaring man's daughter again to-day."

"Last night," she replied, "I was cold and hungry, and nothing mattered. But you've changed everything. I've got a grip on myself now."

"Hum!" Morgan became busy with the papers in his hand and a pen he took from his pocket till a knock disturbed them. "Come in!" he shouted, and the sable-faced cook looked round the door.

"Oh," said Morgan, "have you finished with your breakfast?"

"Yes," replied Mary.

"You can take it away, Pittsburg."

The negro gathered the breakfast things together on his tray and departed with them. Jim was still on his perch, an empty cup in his hand and a cigarette between his lips, when footsteps on the ladder-way caused him to look round.

"Oh, Pittsburg, here!" he called, and held out the cup.

Pittsburg advanced and added the cup to the collection on the tray—and Jim noticed the collection.

"Looks like the captain had a pretty good appetite this morning," he commented.

"The cap'n ain't had nuthin' yet," stated the cook.

"Those plates look awfully empty to me!"

"Aw, shucks," gurgled Pittsburg, "the cap'n's lady ate off'n them, Mis'r Jim."

"The captain's lady?" Jim echoed in astonishment.

"You ain't hard o' hearin', is you, Mis'r Jim?"

In the cabin, Morgan said to Mary Taylor:

"How about getting yourself a job?"

"The trouble is to find one," she replied, "but somehow I must."

"I'm going to see Mr. Cabot this morning. Maybe he'll have something for you."

"Thanks, Captain Morgan," she said gratefully. "But why are you doing all this for me?"

"Can't a man help a girl without having to explain?" he growled, and went over to his desk and sat down at it with the papers.

There came a loud rap at the door, and Jim walked in without any invitation. His eyes went straight to the girl.

"Good-morning, captain," he said facetiously. "I see you're still busy with those figures you were talking about."

Morgan sprang up, but not in time to prevent the intruder from dumping himself on a stool at the table.

"Oh, Miss Taylor," he began rather reluctantly, "this is—"

"Jim Allen," Jim completed for him, "and do I go for papa's judgment?"

Mary liked the breezy manner of the good-looking young man, but Morgan did not.

"Mary and I were just going ashore," he said, putting on his coat. "We—"

"Not another word, captain—not another word!" interrupted Jim with mock solemnity. "I'm the soul of discretion." He beamed at Mary. "It's a charming little place we have here, isn't it?"

"Yes, very," she replied. "Are you a member of the crew?"

Jim winced at that very quiet rebuff, but otherwise bore it well.

"Just at present," he admitted. "But in a few weeks I'll have a 'mister' tacked on me."

"You won't, unless you get busy with your studies," rapped Morgan. "Mates are supposed to know something!"

"Only when they're at sea, captain," mocked Jim.

"Get your hat, Mary!"

"Aye, aye, sir!" Mary rose and put on her hat, then picked up her handbag.

"The captain and I," said Jim, "are doing a little entertaining this evening. Mary, and if you're not going to be busy—"

"She is!" Morgan broke in curtly.

"Come on, Mary!"

He put an arm round her shoulder and led her towards the door.

"Good-bye, Mary," said Jim, waving his hand. "Come back soon, Mary."

"Good-bye," said she, without looking round.

John Cabot, who had been suffering from a chill, was better that morning, and in his office. He listened with interest to Morgan's story of his encounter with Mary, and he arranged immediately for her to have a job in the cannery.

From the office Morgan went with his beautiful protégée to a modest apartment-house in Wilmington Street, and there arrears of rent were paid up and Mary regained possession of the little third-floor flat she had left in despair.

Morgan accompanied Jim to the Snug Harbour in the evening, but he was not in the mood for the sort of entertainment the place provided, and he sat gloomily at the table near the foot of the steps while Jim danced with Carlotta and other girls.

"I'll see you later, baby," Jim said at last to one of his partners and went over to the table.

Morgan was in the act of smashing half a cigarette into an ashtray.

"What's the matter, cap?" rallied Jim. "You don't seem to be enjoying yourself."

"I think I'll be shoving off," returned Morgan, and pushed back his chair. "I've got a business appointment."

"Say, wait a minute," Jim caught hold of his arm. "What kind of business?"

"Lay off, will you?"

"Sure, I know," laughed Jim. "Mary's a good girl—you've been telling me that all day."

"You don't understand," Morgan snapped impatiently. "She isn't like these girls here."

"All dames are alike," declared Jim. "And you told me that, too!"

"I said a lot of things before I met her."

"Will you stop being a fool? You wised me up, and now you're leading with your chin! You've had one experience—do you want to pile up on the same reef?"

"Maybe you'd better stay clear," gritted Morgan.

Jim shrugged at that.

"Well, you're heading for a shipwreck," he said. "No woman's worth it—remember telling me that?"

"I remember."

"All right, then, why not stop—"

"I wonder if you'd mind getting me a drink? That private bottle they keep for me."

That sounded a little better, from Jim's point of view, and he hurried off down the long room and squeezed through the crowd at the bar.

"Give me a drink for Captain Morgan out of his own bottle," he said, "and make it snappy."

A glass was filled and handed to him, and with it he sped back to the table. But Morgan's chair was empty, and there was no sign of him anywhere.

He shouted to the proprietor, who was talking to a customer on the other side of the steps, and the proprietor walked over to him.

"Where did Morgan go, Hawkins?" he asked.

"Home, I guess," was the reply. "What's the matter with him? He's never acted like this before."

"Aw," said Jim disgustedly, "he's fallen for a dame!"

"Quit stringing me! Morgan's too wise for that!"

"Well," shrugged Jim, "that's just

"It's almost certain death to send a man over in this storm," Jim expostulated.

what's happened. I tried to warn him, but he wouldn't listen to me."

"Why be upset about it?" said Hawkins, spreading his hands. "It won't be permanent."

"No? Well, I've got a hunch this one's too smart to let him off easy. She's sold him the idea that she's not like the others."

"Maybe he isn't."

Jim, still bitter concerning his own experience, had no faith in that possibility. The fickleness of a girl had driven him to drink and the gutter, and but for Morgan he might have sunk even lower than the gutter.

"Haven't you got any sense?" he snorted. "They're all alike, and I'm not going to let him take another bump."

"How are you going to prevent it?" inquired Hawkins.

Jim held up the drink he had obtained for Morgan.

"Here's to Mary!" he said scornfully; and he drained the glass.

The Way of a Man

JIM saw Mary several times before the Southern Cross sailed again to the fishing grounds, and he made himself very nice to her on each occasion; but it was after the next voyage that he really set about rescuing Morgan from her clutches—as he himself would have expressed it.

On two evenings in succession she found him waiting for her outside the employees' entrance of the factory when she emerged from it.

"What, you here again?" she exclaimed, when he sailed up to her on the second evening.

"Getting to be a habit," he said, "like telling you how pretty you are."

"Silly!"

"Anyway, I haven't been here very often. Morgan generally waits for you since you've been working at the cannery."

She gave him a friendly smile.

"Shall we walk, or take a street car?"

"Let's walk," he suggested. "Takes longer!"

The apartment-house in Wilmington Street was reached, and he climbed the stairs with her to the third floor and followed her into the sitting-room of her flat.

"This is the first time I've managed to crash in here," he remarked, and he put his cap on a sideboard and sat down on a couch.

"I'm sorry you can't stay," said she rather pointedly, "but I've got to cook dinner now."

"That's all right," he returned blithely. "I'll help."

"No, seriously, Jim," she protested. "Listen to me—you've got to go before—"

"Remember what I told you yesterday?"

"No."

He rose and walked over to her. She had just taken off her hat and was shaking her golden hair loose.

"About your lips being made for kisses."

"Was it you who said that?"

"Don't bear down on me, sister. Once I'm crossed I accept no responsibility."

"You're going right now," she stated icily.

"Without a kiss?"

"Without a kiss."

He took her in his arms, but she averted her face.

"I could be satisfied with just one," he told her.

"Here's your cap, mister." She snatched up the cap and held it out to him.

"Thanks." He released her as though to accept the cap, but caught her face between his hands instead and kissed her on the lips.

"Stop it!" she cried.

He kissed her again, and she slapped his cheek with all her might and broke away from him.

"What's the matter?" he jeered.

"Afraid of Morgan? You needn't be!"

"Jim," she said, looking at him with troubled eyes, "you're spoiling something. You were Morgan's friend. I liked you."

"You're going to like me a lot better," he declared, and would have grabbed her again, but she put the table between them.

"Get out!" she stormed.

"Eh?" Jim stared at her, and was surprised to see tears in her eyes.

"Get out!" she repeated. "But before you go there's something I want to say to you. The night I met Morgan I was reckless, and he knew it; but instead of trying to take advantage—as you would have done—he took me in and treated me decently, and I'm never going to forget it. Not for you, nor a hundred like you! Now get out of here!"

He rained the cap on his head and he went slowly to the door. But as he opened the door he looked back at her.

"I guess I made a mistake," he said contritely. "I'm sorry, Mary."

Five minutes after he had gone there was a knock at the door and she was afraid that his repentance had been short-lived.

She put the door on the chain before she opened it, determined not to let him in; but it was Morgan in the passage outside, his arms full of paper-bags and packages.

"What's the matter?" he exclaimed. "Afraid somebody's goin' to try to break in?"

"I didn't know it was you," she replied with a little sigh of relief, and she freed the door from the chain and opened it wide. "Come in."

Morgan entered with his numerous purchases.

"Here I am," he complained, "thinking maybe I'll get an invitation to stay, and I can't get in!"

"What in the world have you got in all those packages?" she asked.

"Steak, onions, potatoes—oh, a lot of things!" He deposited the collection on the table with care and took off his cap, beaming at her.

"What do you think people will say to your coming up here and bringing all those things?"

"They'll probably say I'm hungry."

"I'm afraid they're saying more than that. I—I guess I shouldn't have let you help me."

He looked down at the packages and the paper-bags and then he looked at her. She had turned her back on him to hide her tears, and her head was bowed. With sudden resolution he went over to her.

"Mary," he said huskily, "maybe this isn't the right time to talk about it, but I—I guess you know I love you—have loved you ever since that first night. Remember when I took you to my ship?"

"Yes, I remember," she replied.

"I've thought a lot about it. The way you looked—so helpless, yet still kind of proud. Then, the next day, we landed you a job."

"You landed it," she corrected.

"And right away you made good. I was mighty pleased about that, after recommending you." He drew a long breath. "But I guess too many people have seen me meeting you after work. Anyway, as long as people are talking, why not give them something real to talk about? I could take better care of you if we were together. What do you say?"

Mary, without looking at him, replied slowly:

"I could hardly say 'No' to anything you asked."

"The ship sails next Sunday. We could be married just before she leaves."

"Married!" She turned and tried to smile at him. She was tremendously grateful to him for all that he had done for her, but she was not in love with him.

"Yes," said Morgan, holding out his hands. "And then a honeymoon at sea—the wind in our faces—"

"On Sunday," she nodded. "All right."

They were married on board the Southern Cross, in the presence of the crew, by a parson who wished them good luck after the ceremony was over. John Cabot gave Mary away; Jim acted as best man because Morgan had insisted.

"I want to be the first to congratulate you," said Cabot warmly.

"Thank you," said Mary.

"Both," said Cabot.

"Good luck, cap!" chorused the members of the crew; but Jim did not even claim the kiss to which he was entitled.

"Thank you, boys, thank you," said Morgan, and he produced from his pocket the pearl he treasured, dangling it on its string. "Mary, I've got a present for you. It's the Callao pearl—the first one I've ever given away."

Mary took the pearl and held it out in the palm of her hand.

"Oh, it's beautiful!" she cried.

"You like it, eh?" said Morgan, and he fastened the string round her neck.

The crew, all dressed up for the occasion, gave three resounding cheers, and then Jim stepped forward. Jealousy was in his heart, but a smile was on his lips.

"I want to wish you both all the happiness in the world," he said. "You're pretty lucky, captain."

"I'm not the only lucky one here today," chuckled Morgan. "Boys, Mr. Allen got his papers yesterday morning. You're lookin' at the new first mate of the Southern Cross."

There was a cheer for Jim, and then the parson hurried off because he had to conduct a service in church within an hour.

"On deck, men," said Morgan briskly.

"We're stepping off in ten minutes."

The members of the crew departed to shed their best clothes and take up their duties, and Morgan escorted John Cabot ashore. Jim was left alone in the cabin with Mary, who went to a port-hole and looked out through it at her husband, walking along the pier beside his employer.

"I've been wanting to tell you," said Jim, crossing over to her, "that I made the biggest mistake of my life that day in your flat."

She gave him a glance over her shoulder, and she knew that he was sincere.

"Let's pretend it didn't happen," she suggested.

"I can't do that," he returned with a regretful shake of his head, "and I want you to know I'm ashamed of what I did."

"You just lost your head," she said gently. "Sometimes people do that—and make mistakes. Listen to me, Jim. You know how I met Morgan, and what he did for me. If I can give him some measure of happiness, then that's the smallest payment I can make on that account."

Jim nodded. The wistful expression on her face, combined with her words, told him that she did not love the man she had just married.

"I want you to understand that," she added solemnly. "Do you?"

"I understand," he assured her.

"Wish me luck, will you, Jim?" She offered her hand.

"You know I do, Mary."

For one long moment he held the hand in his, then let go of it and went abruptly out from the cabin.

Covanci States His Terms

IT was on September 27th that the honeymoon at sea began, and in the early days of the trip Mary was not unhappy. The weather was good all the way down the Californian coast, and Ira Morgan was very attentive to his beautiful bride.

But life on board a tuna boat has many limitations. The fish-tanks occupy nearly all the space not taken up by the captain's quarters, the mate's cabin, the engine-room, the fo'c's'le, and the runways—and Mary began to find the cramped life irksome.

Eight days elapsed before bait was sighted, and by that time the wheel-house had become more attractive to her than the cabin; especially when Jim was at the wheel. His airy manner contrasted strongly with the uglier side of her husband, as displayed in his dealings with the crew, and though just at first the actual fishing for tuna interested her, she very soon wearied of the reek and the slimy mess that accompanied it.

The vessel was off the coast of Chile, eighteen days out from San Pedro, when one evening Morgan looked up at her from his desk, where he had just made an entry in the log-book. The barometer was falling and the fish-tanks were nearly full.

"I'm figuring on heading for home in a few days," he said. "We've got enough fish on board to last the canneries for weeks."

"Yes," she sighed, "I know."

He put down his pen and frowned. She was leaning against the Chinese tapestry with her hands behind her head and what appeared to him to be a discontented expression on her face.

"You don't seem very enthusiastic," he grunted. "Anything worrying you, Mary?"

"Of course not," she replied, summoning a watery smile. "I—I guess I'm just a little tired of fish."

"I don't blame you," he said, slumping round in his chair. "When we get back we'll fix up a nice little home. All I want to do is to make you happy."

"You've already done that."

"Sure?"

"Sure," she declared.

Jim knocked at the cabin door and entered.

"Bad weather ahead, sir," he reported.

"Barometer still falling?" asked Morgan.

"Yes, sir. I wirelessly Panama. There's a storm headed our way."

"Any trouble below?"

"I haven't seen any, sir."

"Keep your eye on 'em."

"Yes, sir."

Jim went out again without a word for Mary, and she felt hurt.

"What's the matter?" inquired Morgan, as she moved away from the tapestry and put her hands to her face.

"Oh, nothing!" she shivered. "Gives me the creeps when I think of a storm, and sharks following us."

Another splendid episode of the thrilling serial,

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

Starring Buck Jones.

"Don't let that worry you," he urged, walking over to her and holding her arms. "Sharks always follow a loaded fishing boat. They smell blood."

"Oh, don't please!" she cried, and broke away from him.

"I'm sorry," he said.

"It's foolish of me," she confessed.

"I'm probably a little nervous. I think I'll get some air."

She went out, and for a while she leaned over the rail of the upper deck. But heavy clouds were banking in the sky, and the sea looked grey and sullen. She turned away and ascended to the wheel-house.

Jim was at the wheel, but he did not seem to notice her till she stood beside him.

"Hallo, Mary!" he said then. "Standing the trip all right?"

"No, I'm not!" she replied emphatically. "And I'm glad we're turning back!" She laughed bitterly. "You probably expected me to say that."

He shook his head, quite sympathetically.

"You're upset," he said. "A long trip on a boat like this is tough on a girl."

"Cooped up every day and night on a fishing boat!" she shrieked. "That's just what a girl dreams of!" She pointed through one of the windows. "Do you see that black water out there? How many times do you think I've stood by the rail, wondering if I dare—"

"Mary," Jim broke in hoarsely, "you shouldn't have come up here!"

"I had to!"

"I'm on duty." "You've been avoiding me," she accused. "You've kept out of my path as if I—"

"Look how plain you can see Tablis Light from here," he said. "Pretty, isn't it?"

"Jim," she persisted wildly, "we can't put this off any longer!"

"Mary," he returned, "there are a lot of dangerous reefs out there."

"You needn't warn me!" she cried. "I've got to talk! You know I love you, don't you, Jim? You've known it ever since we've been on this boat! I made a mistake in marrying him, but can't we do something about it? We have a right to happiness!"

"We haven't any right," said Jim sadly. "I love you, Mary—I guess I'll go on loving you always—but something tells me that's where it's got to end."

"Oh, it mustn't!" She flung her arms round his neck. "It can't!"

"It must!" he insisted, and let go of the wheel to free himself from her embrace. "There's only one thing to do if we've really found ourselves—try to forget. We both owe him too much. Mary, to hurt him."

She wiped her eyes with a tiny handkerchief and became calmer, gaining strength from his strength.

"I guess you're right," she said brokenly at last, and went out to the ladder-way.

But Covanci, from the deck below, had seen her with her arms round Jim's neck, and he was waiting for her at the bottom of the ladder, a half-smoked cigarette in his hand and a look of cunning on his swarthy face.

"Good-evening, Mrs. Morgan," he said.

"Good-evening," she returned with a start. "You're Covanci, aren't you?"

"Yes." He blew a cloud of smoke almost in her face. "Nice night out, isn't it?"

"Yes," she agreed faintly, half-scared by his manner.

"Nice night for the man at the helm."

She knew then that she had been seen, and she would have escaped up the ladder, but he seized her by the wrist and arm.

"I wouldn't hurry, if I was you, Mrs. Morgan," he said grimly. "I wasn't goin' to talk-a to you to-night, but as long as you came down—"

"Get out of my way!" she stormed.

"Just as you say," he purred, still holding her wrist; "only I'll be seein' the skipper, and I sorta figured you might want-a to hear which I shall have to say to him."

"What do you mean?" she gasped.

He let go of her wrist and hunched his shoulders.

"You and Meester Allen might say I've been spying, but sailin' under Cap'n Morgan sort o' makes it my duty to see that he knows what's goin' on around here."

"Do you think he'd believe you?" she asked in a voice that was intended to be scornful but was not by any means under control.

"Maybe not," said Covanci, "but he might. Eet is a chance. I'll go and see."

"No, Covanci, no!" she cried in a panic. "You mustn't do that! It would hurt him."

Covanci leered at her.

"I ain't askin' nothin' for myself," he said. "I am thinkin' about the rest of the crew."

"What do you want?"

"Well," he drawled, "that pearl the cap'n gave you, for instance."

She stared at him aghast.

"You—you don't expect me to give you that?" she faltered.

"I'll be here on deck for another two hours before I turn in," he replied significantly.

The Broken Mast

FOR a little over three hours the Southern Cross held on her way in a sinister calm through a darkness that seemed almost suffocating; and then the storm broke. A furious wind lashed the sea into great foaming waves, rain sheeted down, and the vessel tossed and dipped and rocked and quivered.

Morgan made his way to the wheelhouse, and with water streaming from his oilskins and his sou'-wester went to the man who had relieved Jim.

"The glass still falling?" he demanded.

"Aye, sir," was the shouted reply.

"Change your course three points west."

The helmsman swung the wheel and held it with difficulty, and then Jim burst in upon them, seant of breath and holding on to the door after he had closed it.

"Trouble in the fo'e'sle," he reported.

"What kind of trouble?" rapped Morgan.

"Covanci," Jim replied. "He's been drinking."

"You stay here, and if the glass falls any lower call me."

"Aye, aye, sir."

Morgan went out, descended the ladder-way, and worked his way along the side to the fo'e'sle. There were eight men down there, most of them had just finished their watch but were still in their oilskins. Covanci was drinking from a bottle of whisky which he had more than half emptied, and was making himself a nuisance.

"Hi, lay off that liquor!" admonished Joe Cotton. "If Morgan catches you it'll be just too bad."

"Morgan!" shouted the Italian tipsily. "Hell-ship Morgan. I know what I'm doin'. I'm not afraid of Morgan!"

Water showered down into the fo'e'sle as the door at the top of the ladder was opened and Morgan descended the rungs. He grabbed Covanci by the shoulder and swung him round.

"Give me that hottle!" he roared.

Covanci had tried hastily to conceal the whisky bottle under his oilskins, but the hand that held it there was jerked forth, the hottle was wrenched from it and was smashed to pieces upon the floor.

"Now get into your bunk and stay there," commanded Morgan, "or I'll put you in irons!"

"You put me in irons?" defied Covanci. "Not this time you won't!"

Morgan's right fist smashed into his jaw, and as he fell a heave of the ship brought the floor up against the back of his head. He sprawled beside a bunk, completely knocked out, and for a moment mutiny flamed in the eyes of his companions.

But Morgan was not afraid of them. "Up on deck, all of you!" he thundered. "Lash down everything that's loose—we're not in the worst of the storm yet!"

Sullenly the men obeyed, and then he caught up a bucket of water and dashed its contents into Covanci's face.

"Get up, there!" he rasped, dropping the bucket as the Italian opened his eyes.

Covanci staggered up against the side of the bunk, but as he did so the Callao pearl dropped from his left hand and Morgan pounced on it.

"I—I didn't steal it!" stammered the Italian.

"Don't you lie to me!" shouted Morgan furiously, pinning him down by both arms and crouching over him. "You sneaked into my cabin!"

"No, no, I didn't!" screeched Covanci. "I'm not lyin'—I swear it! Your wife, she gave it to me. She did, cap'n! On my mother's soul she did. Listen to me!"

"You talk—and talk fast!"

"I made her do it. I saw her in the wheelhouse with Meester Allen. He had her in his arms—"

"You're lying!"

"No, no!" cried the Italian frantically, as the hands that gripped his arms shifted to his throat. "I spik-a-da truth! You leesten—I—I tell you all about it!"

The men who had gone on deck at Morgan's command were clinging to the side amidships instead of carrying out his instructions. Jim saw them from the wheelhouse and went down to them, determined to nip in the bud any trouble that was brewing.

"Break up here!" he bellowed at them above the noise of wind and rain. "Get out that live-bait tank! Want it to roll overboard?"

The men moved off towards the stern, and Jim returned to the wheelhouse.

"Steve," he said to the helmsman, "get aft and help the men on the bait-tanks."

"Aye, aye, sir."

The wheel was surrendered and the man went out into the storm. But the door had been closed for no more than five minutes when it was opened again, and Mary stumbled in, enveloped in oilskins, wild-eyed with fear.

"Jim! Jim!" she cried, and tottered towards him.

"Mary," he said reprovingly, "you should be in the cabin."

"I can't stay there!" she whimpered, clinging to his arm. "I've got to talk to you about Covanci. He's got the pearl!"

"Stolen it?" Jim asked.

"No, he didn't steal it. I—I gave it to him."

Jim stared at her incredulously.

"You gave it to him?" he exclaimed.

"I had to," she sobbed. "He—he saw us in here and threatened to tell Morgan. I—I— Oh, I was afraid!"

"Steady, Mary," urged Jim. "Steady, girl!"

"Oh, Jim, I'm frightened!" she shivered. "I don't know what to do!"

The door on the other side of the wheelhouse was opened and Morgan burst in upon them, his eyes ablaze.

"Covanci wasn't lying after all!" he said, stalking over to them and thrusting his face nearly into Mary's. "He did see you! Saw you in Allen's arms, like he said!"

"Morgan!" protested Jim.

"You keep out of this!" Morgan raged at him.

"Ira, you've got to listen to me," pleaded Mary. "Covanci did see me with Jim. He may have heard me tell him I love him. I do love him. I've fought against it. I've tried to cut it out of my heart, but I can't—I can't! I married you, but I've loved him all the time!"

"You're lying!" Morgan snapped at her. "You're lying to save him!"

"I'm not!" she cried desperately. "I love him!"

Morgan backed away from her as though she had struck him, and in that dramatic moment a deck-hand flung back one of the doors.

"The fore-stay guy-line's parted, sir!" he reported.

A husband of a few hours is shot by a woman of mystery, and the wife, fearing accusation of the crime, flees to France. War breaks out and she marries a flying ace, but back from the dead comes her first husband, who is now an English air pilot, and so does the mystery woman. A thrilling spy drama, starring Jean Harlow, Franchot Tone and Cary Grant

The Young Inventor

THE great charm about Suzy was her glorious fair hair. She was pretty and had a good figure, but it was the hair that made her such an arresting picture.

As she went about the small flat tidying and straightening she smiled contentedly. She was a very lucky little schemer, though her friend Maisie thought she could have done better than marry a young factory mechanic.

Suzy had left the orphanage in Pennsylvania with a determination to get on in life. She did not aim to become anyone great, but to attain security and peace, and in marrying Terence Moore she felt she had attained her object.

They had met through Terry doing his best to kill her. Suzy had obtained work in the States with a third-rate touring company as a chorus girl. At the end of the tour some of the girls were asked to go to England to appear in an American revue in London. Suzy and her friend Maisie went. The show ran for some weeks and then flopped, and the two girls had not enough money to get back to the States. Maisie heard of a job in a French café and accepted it, but Suzy would not go with her. She was going to stay in England and make good or else pick out a duke, an earl, a lord, or someone with money to marry. And she was down to her last shilling, and stumbling across a road in a thick fog when a powerful Rolls-Royce knocked her down. That was how she came to meet Terence Moore and his friend Knobby MacPherson.

On account of the car she had mistaken Terry for a lord, but the day the two men took her to the Derby she learnt her mistake, because this time their car was a dreadful old flivver. Frankly, Terry told her he was a mechanic in a factory and that Knobby was odd-job man. The Rolls belonged to the boss of the factory.

At the races Terry wanted to back a horse called Ragamuffin at two to one, and he gave Suzy Trent a stake of a five-pound note as if it were five-pence. He was in a rash mood. But Suzy had not liked the name and had also been rash—she put the money on Golden Fleece. Miracles sometimes happen, because the horse won at twenty-to-one.

By accident Suzy found a bankbook when they celebrated winning a hundred pounds at Terry's digs. Against June 16th, 1914 she found that his credit was four hundred pounds and some odd shillings. He was not a duke or an earl, but he was a nice young man. Suzy decided that she liked him and that she could easily love him; she would make him a good wife.

"Four hundred pounds is two thousand dollars," Suzy had argued with herself. "Why, one could eat for years and years and years on that."

Should she go to her friend Maisie in Paris or marry Terry? She had decided it was much pleasanter to marry Terry, with whom she was already more than a little in love. She used her wiles and Terry proposed, and then Suzy had felt that she was a little beast. Frankly, she told him that she had angled for him.

"I think you're the finest man in the world and it is a great temptation to say yes, but I can't go through with it. I do like you an awful lot. I planned to marry you because it's hard to struggle alone in a strange city, fighting to keep alive. You deserve better than that, Terry."

But Terry had swept her into his arms and said he was willing to take the risk. Some day she would care for him, and so she had married him. And she was glad, because every day she grew to like Terry more and more, so that she was almost convinced that she loved him.

Many nights Terry was away. He was working on a stabiliser for aeroplanes, and the only chance he had of completing his experiments was to sneak into the factory after it was closed down and do some quiet work with the lathes and drills. One night he decided to take Suzy with him to the factory.

"You've brought me luck ever since I met you," he told her. "My invention is almost complete. With you there—just you and me in that silent plant, I'm sure I'll be able to solve one or two problems that are still holding me up. You will be my inspiration. With the four hundred pounds I have saved I can place my invention and we'll be rich for life."

Terry spoke eagerly, and his grey eyes were flashing. He was a slim, wiry young Irishman, shrewd of tongue and sharp of eye, and clever with his hands.

They drove to the factory, and that was the beginning of the great adventure.

The Mysterious German Factory

TERENCE MOORE was engrossed in making some steel pins and Suzy was equally engrossed in watching him, so much so that neither heard a door below open or heavy footsteps mounting the wooden stairs.

"Who iss dere?" It was a woman's voice calling in guttural tones. "It's Mrs. Schmidt, the boss," hissed Terry. "Hide in that office of mine. It has glass windows, so keep your head down. I'll get rid of her in a minute."

Terry was busy at the machine when the bulky form of Mrs. Schmidt appeared at the top of the stairs.

"So, it iss you!" the woman shouted. "Coming into my factory after hours, wasting my lights and my power and my machinery on your own silliness."

"But I didn't think you'd mind, Mrs. Schmidt," said Terry in his most disarming manner. "And it was my own time, and I thought—"

"You thought!" the German woman interrupted him harshly. "Now I tink, and vat I tink, I say. Dat iss—you get out, and stay out. Dis very minute. You're sacked!"

"Very well, Mrs. Schmidt, if that is the way you feel about it," Terry gave a resigned grin. "I'll just pack this contraption—"

"You will not—not now. To-morrow you come for it, get any pay coming to you, and dat's the end!" She pointed. "And go out de front way—not the back."

The woman went into her office and closed the door. At once Terry darted across to his own room.

"Suzy," he whispered, "you go downstairs by the front way and wait for me by my old car. I've got a hunch there's something funny going on here. I have always thought Mrs. Schmidt was a rum bird. I'm going to stay and see what she's up to. Hurry, Suzy. I can look after myself."

When Suzy had gone Terry switched off the lights and shut the door with a bang, then he waited in the shadows. Why he was prying like this he was not sure, but it was more than idle curiosity. Almost immediately he heard footsteps coming up the back stairs. Mrs. Schmidt opened her door, and in the faint light he could see a man wearing a chauffeur's uniform and a beautifully dressed woman. They went into Mrs. Schmidt's office and the door closed.

Terry crept quietly towards the door, stood on a chair, and peered in through a transom. He saw Mrs. Schmidt hand some letters to her visitors, then the woman glanced up and saw him. The strangers did not turn, he only saw their backs, but Mrs. Schmidt came towards the door and opened it. To his surprise she beamed at him.

"Why, you neffer tell me you know German?" she asked. He decided that it was wise to make no answer, but just to grin knowingly. "Vell, anyway, this is a lucky night for us—just got a big order," the woman continued. "It vill make us a fortune."

"How lucky for me?" mocked Terry. "Now you've fired me."

"Acht, you silly boy. You take me and my temper too seriously. Come back to-morrow. For a long time I tink Terry should have more money. Long time I think you fine mechanic. Maybe I make you the manager."

Terry was all grins when he rejoined Suzy by the car.

"I caught a glimpse of the man and his lady friend," she told him. "My, but she was beautiful, and all dressed up in furs like a duchess. What on September 19th, 1936.

earth was she sneaking into the factory for?"

"I can't make it out," said Terry. "You see, they were talking in German, and I don't know a word of it. At any rate, old Ma Schmidt saw me and was all smiles. She's promised me more money and hints she may make me manager. So who cares who her friends were."

Mrs. Schmidt answered the anxious looks of her visitors when she returned to the office by a determined shake of the head. Then she wrote on a card, and without a word handed it to them. They nodded silently.

"Terence Moore, 36 Isling Street," was written on the card.

The young couple drove back to Terry's apartments, and the young mechanic was in the best of spirits.

But Suzy was worried.

"I wish I knew what they had been talking about. Those papers and all that talk in German. They might have been spies."

"Snap out of it," chided her husband. "Probably the old hag is double-crossing her partners. Anyhow, these aren't war times, so what's the use of spies or secret agents? Dismiss it, sweetheart. I think the old dame is square, though quick-tempered." He took out some notes. "This is the wedding present I've been meaning to give you. Actually, it's your share of the winnings on the Derby, and I want you to buy yourself some new clothes. One thing more before I get the kiss I'm expecting." He took a small box from his pocket. "My father gave this to my mother soon after they were married, and now I give it to you."

"Darling!" cried Suzy, and flung her arms round his neck.

She froze in his arms, because the door behind Terry had opened slowly and silently. The woman she had seen at the factory stood there, and in her hand was an automatic. Terry had felt his wife stiffen in his arms, and as he released her to find out the reason the woman raised her arm, took deliberate aim at Terry and fired twice.

Terry slumped to the floor. The woman tossed the pistol towards him and darted out of the room. Suzy tried to scream to give the alarm, but her voice would not come. She sank down on the floor beside Terry's limp body. Suddenly her hand came in contact with something cold. It was the pistol. In fascinated horror she picked it up and stared at it.

There was a scream. Suzy turned towards the open door. A woman lodger with wild eyes stood there, staring. She was pointing at the body. "You've killed him!" she accused.

Screaming in terror and acting like one possessed the woman dashed down the corridor, and Suzy could hear her yelling:

"Help! Help! Murder! Murder! Moore has been shot dead by his wife. Police! Police! Murder! Murder!"

Suzy dropped the pistol and jumped to her feet. Blind panic seized her. She darted to the door, and then recoiled as she heard gruff voices. Already a patrolling policeman was on the scene. She rushed back into the room, shut and bolted the door. She knelt beside Terry and felt his pulse frantically. He was dead! What should she do? They would accuse her of the crime. Police whistles shrilled, and that made her panic even worse. She thought suddenly of the back stairs.

The terrified girl snatched up her hat, coat and purse and flew to the door that led on to emergency stairs in case of fire. She crept quietly cut as heavy hands pounded on the outer door. She gained the street without being seen, managed to walk casually to a corner, and then in blind panic rushed down a dark alley. She ran for almost a mile before exhaustion brought her to a pause.

Was it all just a horrible nightmare? Would she wake up and find Terry comforting her? She found herself in a park and sat down to rest on a bench—she knew it was not a dream. She wished she had stayed beside Terry and faced the police. It was too late to go back now. Running away would be such damning evidence against her. Suddenly she thought of Maisie. In France she would be safe, but she required money for the crossing. She jumped to her feet—she had thought of the money Terry had given her a few moments before he had been killed.

Most of the night she walked in the shadows, and in the morning took a train to Dover. No one challenged her as she walked on to a Channel boat. Only a few more hours and she would be safe with Maisie.

She had bought a morning paper. Was it morbid curiosity or fear that prompted her to turn the pages in search of a news item concerning a young man shot, a hue and cry for the girl who was suspected of the killing and had escaped? She could find nothing about Terence Moore. The papers were far too occupied with startling news—news that was going to throw the world in the throes of a terrible war:

"Austrian Archduke Assassinated at Sarajevo."

An Air Raid Helps Romance

ALMOST exhausted, Suzy reached Paris, and a facon took her to Maisie's lodgings. What a relief to find the door opened by Maisie! Suzy collapsed in her friend's arms.

It was several days before Maisie could get a coherent account of what had happened.

"Maisie, I was a dirty yellow cur to run away. I should go back. I can't be a coward for ever. Terry wouldn't have run away and left me. He was brave and fine, and—"

"Crazy about him, aren't you?"

Suzy's voice broke.

"That's the worst of it. I liked him, but I didn't love him. I failed him in every way."

Maisie argued that there was nothing to be gained and a great deal to lose if Suzy returned to London. There was a war on and probably the authorities in England were far too busy to bother about some unknown mechanic.

"When you're rested you can come and help me at the café," Maisie suggested. "Your blonde hair will go over fine with the soldiers. This war is filling our place every night, and officers and soldiers spend their money freely. We can save, and when we've got enough we'll go back to God's own country, and never leave it again."

By tacit agreement they never spoke of Terry. The girls were at the café long hours, and for that Suzy was grateful. The excitement and bustle of war helped her to forget and shut out the past. Suzy, in her white and somewhat daring muslin evening dress was a great success among the revellers at the café. She danced charmingly, and her voice was very pleasant. She smiled at her many admirers, but she was not really interested in any of them—until one night.

It was the indifference, not the interest, of a group of young French airmen, that piqued her. They sat at their table drinking and talking whilst she was trying to sing. Suzy stepped down from the platform and wended her way among the tables, and as she moved she sang, until finally she claimed the attention of those young officers.

Pop Gaspard's was well known, and they had been there many times in days of peace. Never had they seen so charming a girl, and she was invited to drink champagne with them. One of the officers was tall, handsome, with the merriest eyes, and could speak English perfectly.

"I wonder what brought me here to-night?" He kissed her hand. "It was fate. From now on I'll be here every night of my leave. Permit me to introduce myself. I am Andre Charville, of Paris—when I'm not up in the air."

"I'm Suzy Trent, of New York—when I'm not dancing in a Paris café."

They were dancing together in perfect rhythm when there was a loud explosion, and in a moment the café was in an uproar.

"To the cellar!" someone shouted. "The air raids have started."

For a second time in her life Suzy knew abject fear. It was Andre who picked her up in his arms and carried her down to the cellar. As she lay there, huddled under the shelter of a great wine cask, she saw him helping others to safety, assuring frightened men and women that there was nothing to fear, and being the only one to smile at the terrible danger. It was Andre who drew wine from the casks and passed it round, and it was his voice that started the singing.

Every night after that he came to the café, and then came the moment that Suzy dreaded. Maisie had paid money for two berths back to America, but there was a long waiting list. Their chance to get back to God's country came two days before the end of Andre's leave.

Suzy did not want to go. Andre was her hero. He had shown her round Paris and taken her up the river to St. Cloud. It was so hard to go, because all the while Andre was pleading for her to stay. Actually, he saw her into the train for Havre, and yet when she came to the quay she found Andre—he had flown from Paris.

"I can't let you go, dear. I've known it all along. Will you stay and be my wife?"

Maisie sailed alone.

They were married that day, and spent a few blissful days together in a quaint Normandy village. He had put through two long-distance calls—the first a demand for an extension of leave, the second a somewhat difficult explanation to his father. Andre was so bright and gay on that honeymoon that Suzy had no misgivings until the cab stopped before the splendid old mansion in the Fauberg St. Germain. As Suzy stepped out of the car Andre swept her up in his arms and tossed her over his shoulder. He was going to carry his bride over the threshold. "Put me down!" cried Suzy, as the butler opened the door. But before she was on her feet Baron de Charville was coming down the long stairway.

"Father"—Andre grinned merrily as he steadied Suzy with his arm—"this is my wife."

A cold shiver went through the girl as she saw the white-haired, dignified old aristocrat who bowed to her so coldly.

"Albert, show Madame de Charville to her room," said the baron. "My son, I will be grateful for a few words with you alone."

"I know you want to read me a lecture," cried Andre, when they were in his father's study. "But first I want to say one thing. You grandfather married out of his class, and she brought into the family enough vitality to keep the family alive during the Napoleonic wars."

"You have a great deal of her vitality," the baron said with an ironical smile. "But I would remind you that she was not a cabaret girl.

She was lower than the De Charvilles in rank, but not to such a degree. Andre, you have always been a headstrong, impetuous person, and this would not be the first escapade of this sort from which I have extracted you. For the moment you are possessed of the grand passion, she is the one and only, and so forth. This is your home and I am a lenient man to my only son. In war time the unusual excitement brings about many strange things that would not happen in normal life. Should you, at some later period, change your views perhaps we can persuade madame not to be unreasonable. If we understand each other, shall we let the matter rest?"

"You're wonderful, father. A grand tactician and the greatest man in the world."

"Nonsense, my boy. I am just a very foolish old man." From a desk he picked up an envelope. "Here is a wire for you that may need immediate attention."

"I have to go back at once," said Andre when he had read the message. "I'll run up now and say good-bye to Suzy."

The parting was much harder to Suzy than it was to Andre.

In the lonely weeks that followed the baron found the girl was like a daughter to him. She was not a bit like his idea of a cabaret girl. She spent all her time with him, and read him all the news that came in Andre's letters. These were so seldom and so short that often Suzy invented letters because the old baron's whole life was wrapped up in his son.

They had quite a celebration the day they received a message that Andre had shot down his twenty-fourth plane and had earned another medal "For conspicuous gallantry and enterprise above and beyond the call of duty."

Mrs. Schmidt handed some letters to her visitors

"To our Andre—yours and mine, Suzy!" The old baron had raised his glass to her. That was the beginning of a real affection between them.

Andre obtained special leave to come to Paris, and Suzy saw him for such a short while. He had urgent business at the War Office. He would have gone off to the front without saying good-bye to Suzy if it had not been for the baron.

Andre had rung up from a café.

"When did the War Office move to a café?" The baron's voice had been a little grim over the phone. "I'll bring Suzy to the train. I've grown very fond of my daughter-in-law. You will be kind to her."

Andre informed two beautiful girls who wished to come to the station to kiss him a fond farewell that the kiss must be reserved for some other time as he must say good-bye alone to his wife. Poor simple Suzy thought he had come straight from the War Office. She clung to him, and tears streamed down her cheeks when the leave train steamed slowly out of the station. Baron de Charville, who knew his son so well, shook his head sadly.

Suzy would not have been so happy if she could have seen the handsome woman in the rich furs that was waiting to meet the train at the other end. Madame de Chabris was very beautiful, chic and conscious of her power over men. Andre might have imagined that his fatal fascination had gained for him the attention of madame, but for once Andre was very much the victim of a foolish infatuation.

An infatuation that was soon to bring him close to a terrible disgrace. A disgrace from which he was to be saved by the foolish little cabaret girl and a man who was to come back from the dead.

Andre is Wounded

TERENCE MOORE had not died. He had hovered between life and death, and when the police had fetched an ambulance Terry had recovered sufficiently to make a statement. That was the reason why no one tried to arrest Suzy as a murderess. An inspector informed Terry that they would do their best to find Mrs. Moore, though he was of the opinion that the young wife, when she realised there was no evidence against her, would get over her sear and come back to her husband. The police had a strong idea why the young man had been shot when they heard he had been employed by Mrs. Schmidt. The fat German woman was arrested and interned, but the police caught no one else.

Terence Moore hoped for weeks and weeks that Suzy would come back to him. At last he realised she was never coming back, and life for him was hardly worth living. By the irony of fate his stabiliser had proved of greater value than he had hoped for in his most cherished dreams. Money and honour were his. He had been given a commission in the Air Force, and it was not long after the commencement of the Great War that a high official sent for him.

"To you will go part of the credit for winning the war, when at last it is won. This gadget of yours has revolutionised flying."

Having seen his stabiliser perfected and adapted by the Air Force, Terry desired now that he be allowed to go to France, where by reckless daring he might meet the death he desired. Life meant nothing to him without Suzy. But the War Office had other plans about Lieutenant Terence Moore. His application to go on active service was refused.

Twelve months after the commencement of the war Captain Terence Moore stood to attention before his colonel.

"Do you think I've got nothing better to do than read chits from you?" rasped the colonel. "For weeks you have been bombarding me with applications for a transfer. I believe I have turned you down nine times, and every time I have had you up here and explained why the authorities won't dream of allowing you to go on active service. Let there be an end to it, because I can assure you, captain, that you can go on applying until doomsday and it won't make any difference. You are needed right here in England."

"Very well, sir," Terry clicked his heels. "Anything else, sir?"

"Yes. You are to take seven of the new ships to the Fourteenth French Squadron. They have been losing aircraft with uncanny regularity. There may be foul play involved. Whatever the cause we are sending them these new machines. And the special model you will deliver to Captain Charville, whom I think you have met."

"Several times. He is the best flyer I have seen."

"He has a reputation for being reckless," said the colonel, speaking now as man to man, for everyone liked Terence Moore. "I've heard rumours that he is a great success with the ladies."

"He is continental in his charm and behaviour," grinned Terry. "He is attractive to women, I suppose, and lionised by everyone. But he is brave and gallant. I admire him very much."

"Anyway, his private life is no concern of yours and mine." The colonel turned to some documents. "Perhaps I should not have mentioned it. Now see that the planes are ready and delivered within three days. You will stay to test them, of course. And if it is any satisfaction to you, who seem determined to risk your precious neck, test pilots have been known to break theirs."

"The seven ships will be ready by morning, sir," Terence clicked his heels and saluted. "Directly you give the word I will be prepared to start the flight."

At dawn, Terence Moore was away with his flight, and without seeing any sign of Bosch planes made an uneventful Channel crossing.

Meanwhile, in the Paris home of Baron de Charville, Suzy had the care and attention of an invalid. The baron was not very strong and a bad cold turned to pneumonia. The doctor vowed afterwards that but for the careful nursing and attention of Suzy the baron would not have survived. Baron Charville would not let her write to Andre of his illness. According to him the illness was nothing serious and it was not right that Andre should be worried by home affairs. Suzy agreed that Andre should have no worries, and she decided also that the baron should have none as well. Any fear of anxiety that she felt herself, any loneliness or heartache she kept bravely to herself.

It was about the time that Terry was preparing to take off for his flight to France that Suzy sat reading a letter aloud.

"He says he's fine, but working hard. He has not been in a moment's danger. And he says I'm to tell you he thinks of you often and always with pride because he is your son."

Suzy hoped it sounded sincere, because the majority of these letters were just blank pieces of paper. She had just finished reading one of these imaginary scripts when the butler entered with a telegram on a silver tray.

The girl went as white as death. If it were bad news best to get it over with quickly. She almost snatched the telegram. The baron watched her with dread concern.

Her laugh was the hysterical outburst of intense relief.

"Captain Andre Charville wounded in action," she read out. "Condition not serious."

At once Baron Charville got in touch with the War Office. He had a lot of influence and he was able to arrange for a pass for Suzy to go out to see her husband in hospital. A young officer met her at the station.

"Captain Charville said 'You'll recognise her easily,'" the officer told her. "No matter how many women get off the train, just go up to the prettiest. That will be my wife."

The words brought a glow to Suzy's face. Forgotten were the long, weary days when there had been no letters from Andre. In her heart was only happiness. The officer took her straight to the hospital. Curious that at that very hour Captain Terence Moore should have landed with his flight at the nearby base aerodrome.

Andre had not been badly wounded. He beamed at Suzy and kissed her fondly, but he had the grace to look ashamed when she told him about the letters. He admitted that he was a selfish, worthless rascal in such a frank manner that Suzy had to forgive him. Andre had that peculiar charm that earned forgiveness.

"I may not have written very much, but I have read all the letters written by you and father to me," he admitted with a boyish grin. "He tells me how wonderful you are. You have found a place in his heart."

In arranging some parcels on the table—presents from herself and the baron—a vase of flowers was upset. She ran out of the room to get water and another vase.

Andre stared after her with a perplexed frown. If his father had become so attached to Suzy it would not be so simple for him to get a divorce. Suzy was sweet, but compared with the dark-haired beauty of— A vigorous knocking on the door broke in on his thoughts. He shouted irritably "Come in," but his face underwent a change as he saw a British officer standing there: "Terry Moore! And I am glad to see you—and not just because you're bringing me your wonderful planes, either."

"They thought at the Field you'd sleep better if you knew your pet machine was here, but"—Terry pointed to a fur on the table and a lady's bag—"I guess I'll be off now I've reported. I'm afraid I'm intruding."

"Of course you're not, you old idiot," shouted Andre. "It was only my wife. She came down from Paris when she heard I was wounded."

"Did you say 'wife'?" grinned Terry.

"Yes, and it's genuine," Andre said with a rueful grin. "I'm not joking, old boy. She's just gone out to get a vase and she'll be back any second. Since our marriage she has been living in Paris with my father."

"You amaze me."

"She's the finest, squarest girl in the world." For once Andre was serious. "You know that I like the ladies, so be careful what you say, as I don't want her hurt by any careless joke she might overhear."

"Of course not," Terry laid a reassuring hand on his friend's shoulder. "Now that I know that you are in earnest I will be most careful, though I must say I'm surprised."

The door opened and Suzy came in with a vase full of flowers.

"Come in, dear," Andre called out as he hesitated at sight of a strange man in the room. Terry was standing so he only saw his side face. "I want you to meet my good friend, Captain Moore." As Terry wheeled round to acknowledge the introduction, Andre added: "Terry, my wife, Madame Charville."

Suzy stared at the man she had left for dead. Her face went ashen and the vase crashed to the floor.

"What is it, dear?" Andre demanded. "You look as if you'd seen a ghost."

"Probably madame sees in me a resemblance to someone she used to know," Terry spoke with a twisted grin.

"I did see something of that kind," Suzy forced herself to say. "A man I thought was dead, but—"

"You sit down and take it easy," interrupted Andre, "Corridors of hospitals are gruesome places. They don't affect hard-hitten soldiers. Terry, pour her out a stiff glass of cognac. Let Terry look after you, dear. Unfortunately, I can't at the moment."

Terry poured out a drink, and though he had recovered partly from the shock of seeing Suzy his hands were trembling. He handed her the glass and his eyes were hard.

Suzy's Eyes are Opened

THE next ten minutes were the most agonising that Suzy had ever known. Hard to listen and smile whilst Andre paid her pretty compliments, while Terry stood there grinning ironically and contemptuously. She could not blame Terence for thinking the very worst of her. That she had married another man when her first husband was living was not the point that worried her most at the moment. It was her cowardly action in running away from a man who had been so good to her—callously deserting him in his hour of need. She knew that Terry must despise her for her action.

Fortunately, the patient did not seem disposed towards a lengthy interview. With a charming smile Andre explained that by the rules and regulations of this hospital he must not talk too much or have visitors for any lengthy period. But it was unfortunate that he should insist upon Terry seeing Suzy to her hotel.

It did not surprise Suzy that Terry should have little to say in the car ride, and she was not altogether surprised when he announced that he would escort her to her room.

"Not quite the thing for an officer to see a lady to her room," Terry said with an ironical grin. "But as she is still his wife I don't see why anybody should object."

In her room she faced him determinedly.

"Terry, you deserve to think the very worst of me. You feel nothing but contempt for me, and I can't blame you, but I do want you to know that I thought you were dead. I lost my nerve. When that woman screamed that I had killed you and I heard police-whistles going in the street and their heavy footfalls on the stairs I could think of nothing but flight. It looked like a frame-up. I ran and ran and ran."

"I'll say you ran," sneered Terry. "You didn't care what happened to me. Expect you were glad I had been bumped off by German spies."

"Oh, Terry, please let me try to explain!" Suzy pleaded. "Just a few minutes before that woman shot you we had been talking and you gave me that money from the Derby winnings. It seemed my one chance of escape. I could think only of getting to France and my friend Maisie. On the Channel boat I tried to find something in the paper about the affair, but there was no mention of it. For some foolish reason that made me all the more panicky. I got to Maisie and collapsed.

When I recovered I wanted to go back and give myself up to the police, but Maisie said I wouldn't have a chance—that I would be going to prison and would do no good by my action. I was a coward, Terry. Please try to forgive me."

"And then what happened?" he asked. "I'd like to know how you married into the aristocracy."

Frankly, she told him of meeting with Captain Andre Charville and the air raids, how he had swept her off her feet and married her. He listened unmoved whilst she told of a brief honeymoon and Andre being recalled to the front.

"I had a good idea where you had gone," Terry told her when she had finished. "But I was in hospital, and even if I had been able I wouldn't have gone after you. You used me as a stepping-stone, with your eager eye open for the better chance. Even if I hadn't been killed you would have left me at the first chance of somebody with more money and a better position. Well, what do you propose to do about it?"

"I'm going to tell Andre."

He raised his eyebrows in doubt.

"That would mess up all your fine schemes, my lady. At the moment you have two husbands, and one you've struck off the list. If you tell Andre you'll strike both of them off the list, and then what will you do?"

"I married Andre because I loved him and because I thought you were dead."

"Did you tell Andre you had been married before?"

"No. I loved Andre, and I feared to lose him. Also, I did not want to stir up the past. What good would it do to tell Andre—?"

"He might not have married you, especially if he thought you were suspected of killing a man." Terry laughed bitterly. "You haven't the courage to tell him."

"I'll tell him now," she flamed. "This very hour."

"Captain Moore," said the French officer, "we thought of trying out the new machines. What is your opinion?"

She rushed out of the room with his ironical laughter ringing in her ears. It was raining, but she paid no heed. She reached the hospital, and naturally the orderly did not stop Madame Charville from going up to her husband's room. Outside his room she hesitated, then quietly she opened the door.

A beautiful woman was bending over his bed and kissing him. As in a dream she heard Andre calling the woman by endearing names. Quietly she closed the door.

Terry was lounging in a room smoking a cigarette when the door opened and Suzy came slowly into the room. The girl was soaking wet and her shoulders were bowed.

"So you didn't tell him," he accused. "You hadn't the nerve!"

"Andre was not alone," she said in dulled tones.

Terry gave her a searching glance and then frowned. Though he felt enraged against Suzy he was not blind to the fact that the girl was suffering. Apparently she was crazy about Andre like so many other poor dames. Also, it would seem that she had not been wise to the philandering nature of Charville. He guessed that it must have been the beautiful Madame de Chabris, whom Suzy had found with Andre. He curled his lips. It served her right.

"I am going back to Paris." Suzy roused herself. "Andre's father is ill. A scandal would kill him, especially if he knew his son had married someone whose husband was still living. It might get to his ears that Andre was also involved. It may seem strange to you, but Baron Charville looks upon me as a daughter, and I love him dearly. And I'm not thinking of his money or position when I say that. Will you do nothing, Terry, until the baron is out of all danger?"

"Why should I interfere? I don't wish to rob you of a good bargain," Terry answered. "Perhaps I may stop a bullet and then your problem will be solved. Andre is the finest flyer in France and my friend, so why should I intervene? I have no animosity against him. Who knows of our brief marriage? The clergyman, Knobby and an inspector or two from Scotland Yard." He laughed. "That makes you look scared—talking of Scotland Yard. Naturally they were interested, and at first I wanted them to search for you, until I realised how worthless you were. The police were too busy with other affairs and were glad to drop the case. They think you are dead. Maybe I can get the ceremony wiped off the record—it makes no difference to me. Many things may happen to me before I die, but one thing will not." He walked to the door and his eyes seemed to bore into her soul. "I will never marry again."

"I'm sorry, Terry. Shall I never see you again?"

"I must stay until Andre is on his feet and in the air," he told her. "There are certain things about the special plane I have brought over for him from England that I must explain. Those are orders. But if we use our wits we need not meet again—ever."

"Then I'll go back to Paris. Andre's father misses me." Suzy gazed at him beseechingly. "You see, he doesn't know I'm a coward, living under false pretences."

That night Suzy returned to Paris, and she managed to smile when she told the baron that his son was making good progress and would be about again in a few days. Her reason for returning so soon was to tell him the good news and allay his fears.

Face to Face

CAPTAIN TERENCE MOORE was destined to stay in France longer than he had imagined. Andre Charville was ordered to take ten days' sick leave before attempting any more flying, and Terry had to remain until Andre returned from Nice. There was plenty to do testing the new machines and helping to overhaul some of the other craft.

From Captain Barsanges, the officer in charge, Terry heard a great deal of the activities of this flying base. He did not like the way a great number of machines had crashed from mechanical defaults. It gave the impression of treachery. The captain confessed that on several occasions the Germans had been waiting for them when the squadron had attempted to cross the line on a bombing raid. Andre Charville had several times been attacked by three or four machines, but had got away. The captain was confident that Andre would work wonders with the new machine, which was so much swifter than anything the squadron had flown before.

On the day after Andre returned from his rest and was flying his new plane for the first time Captain Barsanges introduced Terry to Madame de Chabris. That twisted grin twitched Terry's lips as he stared at the beautiful woman who had ousted Suzy from Andre's affections.

Madame gave him an intent look, followed by a ravishing smile.

"Pardon me, Captain Moore, but have we ever met before?"

"I regret that I haven't had the pleasure."

"Curious, because your face seems familiar. You have never been to Russia?"

"Never, madame. It must be my double, because I am certain we have never met before." His eyes twinkled merrily. "I could not have forgotten where and when, I assure you, if I had had the pleasure of meeting you."

Madame laughed.

"You pay a pretty compliment, captain. I must have made a mistake. I'm always thinking I've seen someone before, and since the war I've become worse than ever. Uniforms do have a tendency to bring out similarities, instead of differences in human beings. But now that we have met won't you come to see me? This evening a few friends will be at my chateau where I'm living, and I hope you will be among them."

Terry assured her that he would be delighted. Madame went off to high ground where she could get an unrestricted view.

"A most fascinating woman," Terry said to the French officer. "Who is she, captain?"

"A remarkable woman," answered Captain Barsanges. "A great help to us in keeping up the morale of officers and men. You'd have met before this, but she has been away. She has a place in Nice and there Captain Charville went to recuperate. They are great friends. The chateau has open doors to the officers of this squadron, and she is constantly organising concerts and parties for the men. She is a great favourite with all of us." The captain pointed. "See how anxiously she scans the skies; she is very concerned about Andre."

Terry Moore rather fancied himself as an airman, but he had to admit that his skill was poor compared with that of Andre Charville. Amazing what Andre could do with the new machine. It was a thrill to watch the silver grey machine twisting and turning in the air. Every conceivable trick Andre tried, and Terry glanced at Madame de Chabris—he guessed that a great deal of this showmanship was for her benefit.

Finally Andre made a perfect landing, and seeing Terry rushed across to ring his hands heartily.

"Never have I been in such a dream of a ship," Andre cried. "I should say she's faster than anything the Germans have got, and I'm just longing for the chance to try the craft out over the lines."

He turned to smile at madame, who had walked across to meet him.

"Oh, Andre, why will you take such risks?" she cried, and her expression was one of deep concern. "I was so worried."

As Terry walked away he wondered what chance Suzy would have against such a glorious woman as Madame de Chabris.

That night Terry Moore went to the chateau, and it proved a right royal entertainment. Every officer from miles around that could be spared from duty was at the party and champagne flowed like water. Andre showed his admiration quite frankly, but she showed the flying ace no special attention. She was, as a good hostess should be, equally interested in all her guests.

Two days later Captain Barsanges met his officers in the private room of their favourite estaminet. Terry was present as an adviser. He smoked his pipe and wished he could get the chance of a raid over the enemy lines.

"Gentlemen," stated the captain, "I have asked you to meet me here because this is a very convivial spot, and is just as good a place as headquarters to discuss our plans." He laughed. "In fact, if we met at headquarters someone might get wise that activities were being planned. Gentlemen, we intend to cross the lines and to bomb a certain spot which we now know is a large ammunition dump, but the place is well guarded. We have got to get there by devious routes and means, and here is the scheme."

The officers crowded round. Terry sucked at his pipe and paid little attention. Vaguely he heard the details.

"Captain Moore, we thought of trying out the new machines. What is your opinion?"

"You are a flight of nine, and six of your old machines are in pretty good condition," Terry answered. "I've given them the once over and they're not likely to break up. You don't want all your eggs in one basket."

"Terry is right," spoke Andre. "And if he says those other machines won't break up, then you can be sure they won't. What time do you want me to take off, captain?"

The scheme that Captain Barsanges proposed was that Andre Charville should endeavour to lure the Bosch away from a certain sector of the line. Openly he would fly over No Man's Land, and naturally every German airman would be out to bring down the man who had destroyed so many of their machines. Captain Barsanges was certain that by now spies would have reported the arrival of the new wonder machine, and the silver grey would be spotted at once. Andre would draw the enemy away so that the main flight could get across the lines without meeting any serious opposition, could get to their objective, destroy the ammunition dump and be on their way back before the Germans realised they had been tricked. Andre must not endanger the new machine too much and keep his enemies at a safe distance, and should be back at the base just after dawn, which would be about six.

After the meeting broke up Andre hurried away. Terry decided to follow to his hotel to have a final talk about the new machine, and a vague feeling of disquiet came to the English officer when a servant informed him that Captain Charville had gone out and might not be back that night. Terry had a strong idea that Andre had gone to see Madame de Chabris.

The Mystery Woman Revealed

BARON CHARVILLE gazed shrewdly at Suzy and remarked that she looked tired. He accepted her explanation that she had found the journey a strain, and hoped in his heart of hearts that his scamp of a son was not reason for her dejected demeanour. The baron knew his son only too well. But Suzy managed to smile and to talk of all that she had seen.

"You look ever so much better," Suzy told the old man. "But I hear from Albert that you've been reading a lot since I've been away, and that's against doctor's orders. To-night I shall read to you."

"Not for long, my dear," countered the baron. "You need some beauty sleep."

Suzy began to read extracts from the papers about the war and for something lighter picked up an illustrated magazine. The baron was always interested in the affairs of Society. She read out the outlines and described dresses and uniforms. Suddenly she gasped, and he saw her go very white.

"What is it, my dear?"

"Just some pictures of the front—they shouldn't print such things." She gave a shaky laugh. "I'm sorry to be so nervous. I think I will take your advice and go to bed." She had pulled the magazine on to her knee, and as she talked she tore out a page, sewing it into a ball. "Don't you stay up long."

The baron saw the screwed up ball.

"Is that the page you don't like?"

"Yes, but that's not the reason I tore it out," she lied. "Someone has spilt some wine on the page. Good-night."

Suzy got to her room and breathed a sigh of relief. She did not want the baron to know that the magazine had not contained pictures of war atrocities. That she had been upset by a picture of a man and a woman. She unrolled the screwed-up ball and smoothed it out carefully.

Captain Andre Charville, the famous air ace, and Madame de Chabris. The woman who had taken her place in Andre's affections. Suddenly she looked more closely at the picture. The face of this charmer seemed familiar. Suddenly her mind went to that room back in London before the war, the door opening slowly, the woman standing there with a loaded gun—the woman she had seen at Mrs. Schmidt's factory. She held the picture close to the light, and she knew then that this was the woman who had shot Terence Moore.

Suzy rang for Albert, the butler. Told him in a hoarse whisper that she had to be away for the night, perhaps most of the following day, and that the baron must not know. She could not explain, but it was of the utmost importance. If the baron should discover she was gone the butler must tell his master that she had received a telephone call from a girl she had known in New York.

"But, if possible, Albert, let your master think I am resting," she counselled. "Now, will you please order me a car as I must leave immediately."

A few hours later she was at the hotel near the flying field. Captain Charville was not in they told her. She asked then for Terry, and learnt that the English officer had come in a few minutes previous. She ran up the stairs and burst into his room.

"She is the woman who shot you!" cried Suzy, and Terence peered more closely at the picture.

"Thank God you're here," panted Suzy. "Don't waste a minute asking questions. I have only an hour or so before I must go back. Look at this, Terry—look!"

Terence stared at Suzy in amazement. He had been trying all the evening to banish the image of this girl from his mind, and failed. Now she burst into his rooms like a whirlwind. Almost mechanically he took the crumpled page from the illustrated magazine. He read the caption: "Madame de Chabris and the famous ace Captain Andre Charville, at Nice."

"I'm sorry, Suzy, if this picture agitates you," he said with a mocking grin "But—"

"I know what you're going to say," fiercely she interrupted him. "This is not a jealous tantrum. You don't know who that woman is, nor does Andre. We must find him at once—warn him."

"What are you raving about, Suzy? What is the matter with Madame de Chabris. She is the most popular—"

"She is the woman who shot you!" cried Suzy. "I saw her plainly twice—at the factory and at your rooms. Do you think I could ever forget—or be mistaken?"

Terence peered more closely at the picture.

"But this is absurd. Why, she is the most hospitable woman in the district"

She arranges concerts for the men, entertains the officers at her chateau, and is liked by all."

"I know that is the woman who shot you. I would swear it in a court of law. She is a spy."

He shot a startled glance at her.

"By Jove, they have lost a lot of 'planes round here, and—" He paused, remembering her greeting of him. Had she met him in Russia? "I believe you're right, Suzy," he cried suddenly. "I met her and she thought she recognised me. Asked if we had met—she was testing me. Come, we'll go to her chateau. I'm quite sure Andre will be there. Or no—we'll go to the Intelligence Officer first—he would have the record of all people in the district."

"We can't, Terry—not until we find Andre," Suzy protested. "He may be in actual danger now. And there's another thing. We can't have him dragged into this mess. It would ruin his career. Worse than that, it would kill his father. It is up to us to protect that dear old man from any possible sorrow or disgrace."

"I see your head is working better than mine." The smile that Terry gave the girl was genuine. "You're a queer lass, Suzy, and I think that perhaps I've misjudged you." He picked up the coat he had discarded and hurriedly donned it. "Come on—let's go!"

They said little as they drove at a terrific speed away from the village out on to a country road. When they reached the chateau they found it in darkness, except for a light at one upper window.

As they crept quietly up the path Terry spoke in a low, changed voice.

"It's not necessary for me to tell you to keep your courage. Heaven only knows what we may be letting ourselves in for, but I know whatever it is, you will face it. I want you to know that I think you the bravest person, without any exception, I have ever met. I'm terribly sorry I said all those unkind things to you."

Her hand slid into his.

"You're the grandest man I've ever met," she whispered.

They rang the bell, and there was a long wait before they heard footsteps and saw a light.

An Enemy Spy

VERY cautiously the door was opened. The shock-headed butler peered at them suspiciously.

"Pardon me," murmured the servant. "But it is very late, and madame gave strict instructions—"

"She is expecting us," Terry pushed past the servant into the big hall. "She knew we were coming to bring her a most important message; perhaps she meant to admit me herself. I can see by the light that she is still waiting for us."

The butler hesitated as if uncertain what to do next.

"We need not be announced," Terry gave Suzy a beckoning gesture.

Holding Suzy firmly by the arm Terry urged the girl up a long flight of stairs. From below the butler watched them suspiciously.

At the top of the stairs they saw a door from underneath which a light shone. Terry knocked and then flung open the door.

Madame de Chabris was helping Andre into his coat. She was garbed in a somewhat daring gown, whilst on a table there was the remnant of a supper. Numerous champagne bottles showed that it had been quite a feast.

"Suzy!" gasped Andre in amazement. Realising he had been discovered in an awkward situation he tried to carry off the affair with ironical humour. "I don't understand this unceremonious entrance, but now you are here permit me to introduce you. Madame de Chabris, may I present my wife? You already know Captain Moore."

"And I, too, know Madame de Chabris," said Suzy calmly. "She may not recall me—we met under rather peculiar circumstances."

Madame was watching them with hard, angry gaze. Her smile was a mockery.

"I am delighted to have you with us, even though your arrival was a trifle out of the ordinary," Madame smiled as if vastly amused.

"Pardon me, madame." Andre's eyes were alight with anger. "But as I am responsible for this intrusion, I demand that my wife and Captain Moore apologise for their outrageous behaviour."

"Andre, we will explain it to you later," spoke Terry. "It is imperative that you come with us at once."

"Since when did you take to issuing orders to me?" asked Andre. "As for my wife—even a jealous woman—"

"Andre," Suzy interrupted him firmly. "This isn't jealousy. I am not angry. We hoped you would go with us quickly and quietly. As you will not I must tell you that Madame de Chabris is an enemy spy!"

Madame de Chabris burst out laughing.

"This is better than a play or a murder mystery."

"Suzy, have you lost your mind?"

stormed Andre. "How dare you make such an accusation. And you, Terry, what do you mean by this outrageous conduct?"

"You can't laugh this off." Suzy stared fixedly at Madame de Chabris. "I have seen you twice before and on the same night. It was when you were operating in London just before the war."

"Mistaken identity evidently," Madame smiled, though her face had paled. "Captain Moore, you remember how I told you I'm always thinking I've seen someone before. You are evidently like me in that respect, Madame Charville. I haven't been in England since I was a schoolgirl."

Andre gave her a sharp look. It was a bad slip she had made; he remembered her telling him she had been walking along the Embankment when she had heard newsboys shouting about the assassination at Sarajevo. There was an expression on Madame's face that he did not understand.

"I saw you shoot Terry," Suzy continued, "because you thought he knew your plans. You really needn't have done that, for he doesn't understand German. And for that, I saw you down at Schmidt's factory."

"This is too fantastic," Madame de Chabris' voice was shrill. "And it grows more so with every word you say. Not only have I not been in London for years, as I told you, but until this minute I never heard of Mrs. Schmidt's factory."

"Why—did—you—say—Mrs. Schmidt?" demanded Suzy, pointing an accusing finger. "You are a German spy!"

Andre stared at Madame de Chabris and in the woman's rage-distorted face he read the truth.

"A spy!" Andre cried with horror.

The door opened and there stood the butler.

"I am here, Madame." The man had a revolver in his hand. "Together we will handle this little affair. You gentlemen will keep very still."

Terry turned towards the 'phone and instantly the gun covered him. "I wouldn't if I were you." The butler gave a twisted smile. "It would only be a waste of time as I have cut all the wires." He looked at the woman and nodded towards the door. "Hurry, Diane, the car is ready. Our bags are in it and a hamper of food. The windows and doors are all barred, as this one will be after we have left. We have time enough to get away—but only enough."

Madame de Chabris moved swiftly to the door, where she paused to smile mockingly at Andre Charville.

"You have amused me, captain, with your childish prattle," she laughed lightly. "I hand you back to the tender mercies of your wife. You may be a great airman, Andre, but you have the brains of a babe."

Andre, fearless and reckless, suddenly hurled himself forward. Without hesitation or scruple the butler fired. Andre spun round and dropped in a heap.

Madame de Chabris gave a suppressed cry of fear and fled through the open door. For a moment the butler stared down at his victim, before backing away. Swiftly the German was gone, the door slammed, and the key was turned in the lock.

A Chance in a Thousand

SUZY flung herself down beside the still figure. Terry rushed for the windows, and found to his relief that they opened. He found himself on a balcony, and as he stood there trying to plan what to do next he heard the motor of a car. A moment later the car appeared from the courtyard, the butler was at the wheel with Madame at his side. Terry noted their direction before hastening back into the room.

Andre was unconscious. Suzy found some water and tried to force-it between the lips, whilst Terry searched for the wound. His eyes narrowed when his hands came away stained with blood—he knew enough about the human body to know that this wound was in a very dangerous place.

Andre's eyes opened. He stared at them dully, and then recognition came into his eyes. He tried desperately to speak, but only faint wheezing sounds came from his lips.

"Don't try to talk," Terry advised. "All you need is a little rest and you'll be all right."

"Look at the time!" they heard the hoarse whisper.

Terry understood.

"You're supposed to take off at four—is that it?" The wounded man nodded. "Don't worry about that. I'll take care of it. There's plenty of time."

Andre sank back and closed his eyes. Suzy stared anxiously at Terry. "What can we do?"

"The 'phone's dead, so I can't ring the dressing-station," muttered Terry. "And we don't want to broadcast the fact that Andre was shot at Madame de Chabris' chateau. Moreover, we daren't try to get him to our car because I think his wound is too serious. Still, we can't leave him like this. You stay here and I'll go to the nearest inn. I'll try to get the squadron doctor, and—"

"No use—too late!" came a husky whisper, and they saw that Andre's eyes were open. "Waste of time—I'm finished. Terry, the take off is at four—there's still time."

Terry seemed to understand the pleading in the dying man's eyes. "I'll see you through," Terry grinned, and glanced round. Andre had been about to put on his flying coat when they had so abruptly burst into the room. It was lying on a table with a helmet. Terry got to his feet and picked it up from the table, and turning saw the dying man smiling.

"What are you going to do, Terry?" asked Suzy.

"I must make the flight," he told her. "You must stay here and tend him as best you can."

"Thanks," came in a whisper from Andre, and he gave his same lumpy grin. "You always were a pal, Terry. Glad you knew Suzy in London. Look after her for me, old man. Sweetest girl I've ever known—too good for me." A spasm of pain twitched his face. "Better this way. Forgive me, Suzy."

"Oh, Andre, I—!" Suzy cried and then broke off with a gasp as she saw the head go lumpy against a cushion.

Terry shook his head after making a quick examination.

"He's dead, Suzy."

The girl steeled herself to be brave. "Terry, we could not save Andre from death, but we can save him from the scandal of such a death. He has earned the right to a hero's death. You say you can make the flight—couldn't you pretend to be Andre, and—"

"It's a thousand to one chance," cried Terry. "But worth trying. I'll get down to the field and try to make the plane without being recognised. Wait here till I come back and don't be surprised if I crash outside the chateau. Try to get Andre down into the courtyard. If it is within human possibility I will be back. If I'm not back by mid-morning, then you'll just have to do whatever you can."

EPISODE 7—

"The Night Attack"

READ THIS FIRST

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way to the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky, has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delaney, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Mary's father is killed the next day, and leaves her a wallet containing the map of a hidden gold mine. The outlaws try to secure this wallet, but are frustrated by Buck. Then one night, at a saloon in Maverick, an attempt is made on the Ranger's life.

A Close Call

AS the smashing report rang out behind him Buck felt the hot breath of a bullet scorch the lobe of his ear, and with swift presence of mind he threw himself flat, and lay motionless as if he had been hit.

The unknown assassin was apparently deceived, for no second shot was fired, and a tense silence closed down on the saloon as the echoes of the gun-blast died away. Then all at once voices were raised, and, amidst an ever-increasing babel, the people who had scattered for cover began to swarm into the middle of the bar-room again.

Someone fetched another lamp, and by its light the crowd milled around Buck while he was picking himself up.

"Are yuh all right, feller? What started the fight, anyway? Who was it took a shot at yuh? You ain't hurt, are yuh?"

These were but a few of the questions which were volleyed at the big fellow by the anxious citizens, and he was doing his best to answer them when Judge Holmes showed up.

"What was the trouble, Buck?" the judge demanded. "How did it all begin?"

"Lew Meredith was the one that started it," Buck replied. "He shot out the light and then tried to get me. I winged him instead, and he fell out into the street. Then someone blazed at me from behind—someone who was in too much of a hurry to be a good marksman. I think he must've fired at me from that back room over there."

A number of the bystanders surged towards the apartment Buck had indicated, and, sure enough, the reek of powder met their nostrils as they entered it. Out of the unknown killer who had discharged the shot there was no sign.

Meanwhile, some of the Hidden Valley cowboys had gone out into the street, and very soon they were marching Lew Meredith in to explain his conduct.

His right hand had been smashed by the slug from Buck's forty-five, and he was grimacing with pain. No one showed any sympathy for him, however—least of all the stalwart ranger.

"What's the idea, tryin' to drill me?" Buck demanded grimly. "And who was your pal that took a potshot at me from the curtained doorway of the back room?"

Lew Meredith seemed to hesitate for a moment, and then he blurted out a protest.

"You got me wrong, Grant," he jerked. "I didn't draw on you. You just mentioned somebody that tried to get you from behind. Well, I saw the feller—saw him takin' aim at you. That's why I busted the lamp, to save you, Grant. Then I blazed at the curtains over that doorway. I wasn't tryin' to drill you—honest I wasn't!"

"Did you recognise the man you saw in the back room?" his interrogator wanted to know.

"N-no, Grant, I didn't," Meredith answered. "He—he was a stranger to me."

Buck pursed his lips. Not one word of Lew Meredith's glib story did he believe, and he was tempted to give the lie to the whole statement there and then. But suddenly he resolved to make a pretence of accepting the puncher's explanation, and he was about to address the man in an apologetic tone when he became aware that Harvey Delaney was moving to his side.

"It looks like you made a mistake, Grant," the cattleman said. "Meredith's account of what happened is plausible enough, anyway."

"Yeah, I think you're right," Buck murmured, "and I'm mighty sorry I acted so hasty. But, after all, when you see a man pull a gun, it's kinda natural to jump to conclusions."

It was at this juncture that the sheriff and Deputy Craig put in an appearance, having heard the shooting in their quarters along the street, and Buck had to describe all that had occurred. Then, while Maverick's guardians of the peace were engaged in questioning Lew Meredith, the big Ranger edged aside with Judge Holmes.

"Meredith was lying," Buck whispered. "When I let out that someone had tried to plug me from behind, he was smart enough to think up a good story. But that second shot of his didn't go anywhere near the curtained doorway. It was meant for me all right."

Judge Holmes looked at him uneertainly.

"Lew Meredith is one of Mary Grayson's top hands," he murmured. "He's always been trusted up at Hidden Valley."

"Yeah?" Buck rejoined. "Well, I'm willing to lay odds that he's in with the outlaws who are terrorising this section."

"Then why don't you cross-examine him a little more thoroughly?"

The younger man shook his head.

"No," he told Holmes in an undertone, "it's better to let him think that I've been taken in by his explanation. So long as he's a free man and imagines that he has nothing to fear, he's liable to lead us to the gang's hide-out—or even to their leader. We've got to have him watched, that's all."

Turning, he glanced in Meredith's direction and observed that the sheriff and Deputy Craig had left the Hidden Valley cowboy after helping him to bind up his bloodstained hand. Then all at once Buck noticed that Harvey Delaney was sidling close to Lew.

Delaney engaged Lew Meredith in conversation, and presently Buck saw him slip some money into the latter's uninjured fist. It was a gesture that caused the handsome Ranger to start, and, frowning, he spoke to Holmes out of the corner of his mouth.

"Say, you were talkin' to Delaney just before the shooting started, judge," he breathed. "Can you tell me what he did or where he went?"

Holmes looked at him curiously.

"Why, no, I can't, Buck," he said. "We sort of got separated in the general confusion—and it was dark, of course. But what makes you ask?"

"I was just wonderin' if Delaney might have slipped into that back room," the younger man replied in slow and deliberate accents.

"Buck!" the judge whispered hoarsely. "You aren't suggesting it was Harvey Delaney who tried to bump you off!"

The Ranger glanced around to make certain that no one could overhear his discussion with Holmes.

"You never can tell," he muttered. "I remember you once saying yourself that nobody was above suspicion."

"But Delaney is one of the most prominent ranchers in this county," the judge expostulated. "To be exact, he ranks as the fourth biggest landowner—next to myself, a man named Hudson, and young Mary Grayson. You can't suspect a fellow like that of being connected with outlaws."

"I just saw him hand Lew Meredith a roll of dollar bills," Buck vouchsafed. "Doesn't that strike you as being pretty queer?"

Judge Holmes did not agree. For the life of him he could not bring himself to doubt the cattleman's integrity.

"You don't know Delaney, Buck," he said. "He's generous to a fault—always helping somebody out of a difficulty. I could name a score of nesters and small ranchers to whom he's lent money."

The Ranger was silent for a moment, and stood fingering his rugged jaw. Then he gave a shrug of his broad shoulders.

"Well, maybe he's okay," he mused. "But Lew Meredith isn't—I'll swear to that. And first thing to-morrow morning I'm gonna head for Hidden Valley and tell Mary Grayson to watch out for him."

At the Grayson Ranch

TRUE to his words, Buck Grant left for Hidden Valley after breakfast the following day, and it was as he was approaching Mary's outfit that he saw Spooky standing near the corral.

He joined the little Ranger who had obtained employment at the Grayson outfit as a cowpuncher, and, looking around cautiously, addressed him in a guarded tone.

"Did Lew Meredith get back here last night, Spooky?" he inquired.

"Yeah," his comrade answered. "Leastways, he got back, though I wouldn't say 'all right.' Somebody had shot him in the hand, and from the way the boys were talkin' I understood it was you as had done it. What happened, Buck?"

The big fellow proceeded to retail all that had occurred at the saloon the night before, and when he had finished his narrative Spooky knitted his brows.

"So you reckon Lew is in with the outlaws, huh?" he grinned. "That means I'm gonna keep an eye on him, pardner."

"You bet you will, Spooky," Buck declared. "And now I'm goin' over to the ranch-house to tip off Miss Mary."

He parted with the other Ranger and cantered across to the well-appointed home that Mary had inherited from her father, and as he emerged from a grove of trees in front of it he saw the girl and her friend Helen Moore sitting on the veranda.

They were not alone, for Lew Meredith was with them, and appeared to be telling them why his right hand was swathed in bandages.

Buck rode up to the house and dismounted from his pony. A moment later he was saluting the two girls and nodding to Meredith, who returned his mute greeting in an uneasy fashion.

"Oh, good-morning, Mr. Grant!" said Mary. "Lew here has just been describing your narrow escape in Maverick last night. You've no idea how thankful I am that you didn't come to any harm, but it shows that I was right when I told you that your life was in danger."

Buck had to admit that her warning had been no idle one, and then, after some further conversation, the girl suddenly produced a letter which she had received by the morning mail.

"Oh, by the way," she mentioned, "you might be interested in this. It's from the railroad company, and it states that their representative, a Mr. Blake, will arrive in Maverick to-day by stage-coach. Apparently he's coming out to Hidden Valley in the hope of negotiating a deal with me and buying this ranch. I'd like to know what you think about it, Mr. Grant."

Buck's features became set, and he found himself wishing that she had not talked so openly in the presence of Lew Meredith. But without comment he took the letter which she passed to him, and remained silent until he had run his eyes over its contents.

"H'm!" he murmured, returning the epistle to her at last. "I'd kind of hate to see you pull out of this country, Miss Grayson."

"Why?" she asked in surprise. "The letter hints that the railroad company will give me a good price for the ranch."

"I know," Buck said. "But it looks like I'm gonna lose a friend on account of it. I was beginning to enjoy calling in at Hidden Valley."

Mary smiled, and then, after a pause, Buck went on speaking:

"Just the same," he observed, "this letter has told me a whole lot. Do you know what I think? I think that those outlaws who have been preyin' on this section must have got advance information regarding the railroad's plans. They must have found out that a line was going to be run through Benson County, and that's why they've been trying to drive out the settlers."

It was while he was volunteering this statement that he noticed Lew Meredith draw away, as if disinterested in the discussion, and when the cowboy was out of earshot Buck leaned closer to Mary and addressed her quickly.

"It's a pity you brought up the subject of this letter from the railroad company in front of that fellow, Miss Grayson," he said. "I don't trust him."

"Lew?" Mary faltered, exchanging a glance with Helen. "Why, I don't understand. He's one of the best men on my ranch." Besides, he tried to save your life last night."

"That's what he told you," Buck answered significantly, "but I'm not so sure."

He then gave his own account of the incident that had taken place in the Maverick saloon, and the two girls listened to his story in a bewildered silence—a silence which Mary was the first to break.

"You—you mean that you suspect Lew of being a member of the gang that has been operating against the settlers?" she gasped, when Buck had related all.

"I'm positive of it," was the reply. "Nobody could convince me that he didn't try to drill me last night."

Mary's lovely face had paled.

"This is terrible!" she exclaimed. "Would you—would you suggest that I discharge him?"

"No," Buck said hastily. "I wouldn't do that. If you give him enough rope he may convict himself and the rest of the gang as well. But just remember what I've told you, and don't talk too much when he's around."

"As it is," he added thoughtfully, "I wouldn't be surprised if he was on his way right now to tell those outlaws about the railroad company's letter."

It was a shrewd guess, for Lew Meredith had gone off to saddle his horse, and at that very moment he was riding into the brushwood thickets on the blind side of the bunkhouse.

He left the outfit surreptitiously, but he was very far mistaken in imagining that his departure went unnoticed, for only a few seconds after the vegetation had swallowed him another horseman took up the same trail.

The horseman in question was the redoubtable Spooky, and with the skill of one who was well practised in the art of playing the shadower, Spooky dogged the treacherous cowboy through the thickets until a sweep of open prairie was reached.

Across that grassy plain Lew Meredith rode at a smart pace, and now his tracker had to exercise all the cunning he possessed in order to keep him in sight without letting him suspect that he was being followed—a difficult task considering that there was very little cover available.

Spooky did his best, yet his best was not good enough. Before quarry and pursuer had gone much farther Lew managed to turn his head, and, though the diminutive Ranger was a couple of hundred yards behind him, and though the latter made haste to swerve into a deep arroyo, the outlaw caught a glimpse of him ere he could conceal himself.

Involuntarily, Lew Meredith checked, and then, quickly grasping the situation, he pushed forward once more as if he had noticed nothing. Nor did he look back again till he came to a tract of forest-land that lay between him and the hills.

Passing into the midst of the trees, he halted and wheeled around to peer in the direction whence he had come, and from the shelter of the wood he saw Spooky advancing over the prairie at a steady trot.

Convinced that the little fellow was on his trail, Meredith dropped a hand to his hip and tugged out his forty-five, and it was even as he was pulling the gun from its holster that he heard movements nearby, movements that caused him to glance over his shoulder with a violent start.

He at once perceived a couple of men approaching him through the eternal dusk of the forest, and, alarmed at first, he was reassured an instant later as he recognised them, for they were none other than Gabe and Roscoe, members of that same gang which employed him as a spy.

"Hallo, there, Lew!" exclaimed Gabe. "Anything wrong?"

"Plenty!" Meredith answered huskily. "I was headin' for the hide-out when I found out somebody was followin' me. They calls him Spooky—a little runt that joined the Grayson outfit a few days ago.

Gabe and Roscoe looked at each other sharply, and then, after a moment's silence, Lew Meredith spoke again.

"I don't know what his game is," he muttered, "but maybe he's connected in some way with the Phantom Rider. He's too darned interested in my movements for my likin', anyhow, and I vote we grab him an' make him talk."

It was a suggestion that met with the approval of the other two gangsters, and they followed Lew's example as the cowboy sought adequate shelter behind a clump of tall shrubs on the edge of the wood, where they awaited the arrival of Spooky with drawn revolvers.

By this time the little Ranger was nearing the forest, and he had almost gained the fringe of the trees when suddenly his foes spurred out of their covert and took him completely by surprise.

With a smothered oath Spooky attempted to go for his gun, but, finding himself covered by the "irons" of the three outlaws, he restrained the impulse and slowly raised his arms. Then, pressing close to him, Lew Meredith relieved him of his six-shooter with a rapid gesture and addressed him curtly.

"What's the idea of playin' hide-and-peek with me, feller?" he ground out.

Spooky looked at him steadfastly for a space, and then favoured him with a twisted smile.

"Kinda jumpin' to conclusions, ain't you?" he drawled.

"Yeah?" Lew rasped. "Well, maybe I've got another hunch. Maybe I've got a hunch you're workin' for somebody."

"Sure. Mary Grayson."

"No, not Mary Grayson, but the Phantom," Lew Meredith said tersely. "Better come clean, feller, and tell us what you know."

"Yeah, better talk," Gabe struck in with ominous mien. "Who is the Phantom?"

Spooky was still smiling that twisted smile.

"Why don't you ask him?" he remarked.

Gabe uttered a blistering oath, and spoke to Lew and Roscoe out of the corner of his thin-lipped mouth.

"This guy thinks he's tough," he rasped, "but there's ways of loosenin' a man's tongue. Supposin' we try some of the old Indian tortures on him—"

"Wait a minute, Gabe," Lew interrupted. "We've got no time for that now. We'll take him to the hide-out and let the boss go to work on him at his leisure. Yuh see, first I've gotta pass on some information I picked up at the Grayson ranch. It seems there's a man called Blake comin' to Maverick by to-day's stage, and I've an idea the boss will want you fellers to make sure he don't reach town."

"Why?" demanded Roscoe. "Who is this man Blake?"

The question was not answered just then, for, even as Roscoe put it to Lew, the quiet of the range was split by the blast of a gunshot, and almost simultaneously a bullet whistled between the gangsters and smacked into the trunk of a tree hard by.

The crooks swung round in alarm, and immediately beheld the figure of a horseman galloping across the open prairie towards them. It was a figure which they must have observed before if they had not been so engrossed in their prisoner, and it was one whose appearance struck terror and dismay into their blackguardly hearts.

For although the oncoming rider was alone, he was a man who had more than once proved a match for any four of the outlaws.

"The Phantom!" yelled Gabe.

The Phantom it was, his long white cloak streaming from his athletic form as he leaned forward in the saddle of his fleet-limbed bronc—the Phantom, with a smoking six-gun in his fist and the light of battle in his eyes.

True, he was too far away for the gangsters to see the look in his eyes, but the forty-five was plain enough to their view, and as a second slug helched from it and snatched Gabe's hat from his head, that worthy wheeled for the trees and clapped spurs to the flanks of his pony.

Lew and Roscoe lost no time in following suit. Abandoning Spooky in their panic, they dashed into the wood and vanished amidst its shadows, and

"What's this I hear about an attempted hold-up, Grant?" the sheriff demanded.

the drumming of their horses' hoofs had died away when the Phantom swept abreast of their late captive.

"Hallo, Buck!" the little fellow jerked. "Where'd you spring from?" Buck answered him through the folds of the kerchief that he wore in his rôle of Phantom Rider.

"I left the Grayson ranch because I had an idea Meredith might be on his way to the outlaw lair," he stated, "and I thought there was maybe just a chance that you hadn't noticed him sneak off. I struck south at random, knowin' the gang's hide-out is somewhere in the hills, and hopin' I might pick up Meredith's trail. Back in the brush I rigged myself out as the Phantom, figurin' I'd be safer in these clothes. Then I reached this strip of prairie and spotted you on the edge of the wood."

"Yeah, and you sure got me out of a fix," Spooky declared. "But say, if we're gonna find that outlaw hide-out, we'd better start chasin' Lew and his two pals."

Buck was of the same mind, and the pair of them rode into the heart of the forest, yet for all that they accomplished they might have saved themselves the trouble, for the fugitives had totally disappeared, and though the Rangers searched the locality for an hour, they failed to obtain any clue as to the direction which the crooks had taken.

"Well, it looks like we're wasting our time, Buck," Spooky vouchsafed at length.

The big fellow nodded briefly.

"You're right, pardner," he agreed. "Huh, I wish I knew what that gang's next play will be."

"I dunno," Spooky muttered. "But Lew mentioned somebody called Blake. He was on his way to tell his boss about him, and seemed to hint at a hold-up. I've an idea the boss will want you fellers to make sure Blake don't reach town," he says. "They was his very words, so far as I can recall."

Buck appeared to stiffen, and next instant he was gripping his comrade by the wrist.

"Spooky," he rapped out, "that's just what I wanted to know. Blake is a railroad agent, and he's coming into this territory to buy up land for his company. Those outlaws are out to stop him because their aim is to grab every acre in this county and then hold out against the railroad for a high price. So they're liable to stick up the stage, are they?"

"What are you gonna do, Buck?" Spooky faltered. "By now the whole gang is probably on the move."

Buck had started to peel off the rig that he wore as the Phantom, and soon he was stuffing the clothing under his saddle.

"We're going back to Hidden Valley," he said, "and I'll tell Mary Grayson that I suspect an attempt will be made to kill or capture this fellow Blake. I guess she'll be willing enough to let me form a posse with the men who are working for her."

A little while later the two Rangers might have been seen speeding northward across the prairie, and less than half an hour afterwards Buck was reporting to Mary and urging her to let him lead her employees against the outlaws.

She fell in with his proposal readily enough, and, the boys having been summoned, they mounted their brones with alacrity on learning that they were to shield the Maverick stage-coach from a possible attack. Then, with the whole personnel of the Hidden Valley ranch behind him, Buck Grant set out for the south-east trail.

Spooky was a member of the troop, of September 19th, 1936.

course, and, riding stirrup to stirrup with Buck, he whispered an anxious query as they were galloping over the mesquite at the head of the Grayson punchers.

"Can you trust this bunch of cow-pokes?" he asked huskily. "Lew Meredith may not 've been the only spy among 'em."

"I'll take that chance," Buck retorted. "But from the way they acted when they heard they were gonna tackle those outlaws I'll stake my life that they're square-shooters."

After Dark

WITH the dust billowing in clouds behind the thundering feet of their ponies, Buck Grant and the men from Hidden Valley swept across the grazing lands of Benson County, and they had covered a distance of some ten or eleven miles when they heard a sound which there was no mistaking.

It was the sound of gunplay, and it came from beyond a ridge three hundred yards ahead of them. A couple of minutes later they were on the summit of that promontory, and from its crest they looked down upon the south-east trail and beheld a spectacle that caused them to reach for their six-shooters.

The first object which their gaze encountered was the stage-coach, travelling over the road at break-neck speed with the driver wielding whip and reins like a madman, and the armed guard huddled beside him in an attitude that told he had been severely wounded.

And galloping in pursuit of the coach was a band of hard-riding desperadoes whose forty-fives spat flame through the haze of dust that partially obscured the scene.

Buck let out a yell, and next moment he and his followers were swooping down the slope of the hillside, bent on intercepting the gangsters by swinging on to the trail between them and the stage.

The ground trembled under the hoofs of the brones that were carrying the Hidden Valley cowboys, and the steady drumming of the iron-shod feet was punctuated by the sudden detonations of the revolvers that the ranch-hands had plucked from their holsters. In another instant the outlaws down on the Maverick road were drawing rein, and then, realising that they were up against a force of determined men, they turned tail and fled in cowardly fashion.

Buck and his companions surged onward and took up pursuit of them, harassing them with volleys of lead till they scattered into a vast tract of chaparral thickets. Then, anxious to return to the stage and escort it safely into town, the big Ranger and his party gave up the chase and cantered back along the trail.

The driver of the coach had brought the vehicle to a halt, and thankfully accepted the offer of a bodyguard. Thus, when the stage rolled into Maverick some time afterwards, it was attended by a resolute band of horsemen.

Several of these took charge of the driver's wounded comrade and bore him off to a doctor. The others, Buck amongst them, dismounted alongside the coach, the door of which was now thrown open by a small, plump, elderly man in tailored clothes.

He was the only passenger, and Buck eyed him keenly.

"You must be Blake, the railroad agent," he observed.

"Y-yes," the little man stuttered, mopping his brow with a handkerchief.

"Blake's the n-name. My, what a country to send me to! I—I—"

He did not finish the sentence, for at this juncture the Sheriff of Maverick put in an appearance.

"What's this I hear about an attempted hold-up, Grant?" he demanded.

Buck gave him a brief and none too illuminating account of the affair, and was in the middle of his story when Blake caught sight of a man who had emerged from an office at the other side of the street. The man in question was none other than Judge Holmes, who, in his capacity as an administrator of the law, owned premises in the town as well as his outlying cattle-ranch.

Blake was apparently acquainted with the judge, for he immediately hurried across to him, and by the time that Buck had finished talking to the sheriff, the railroad agent had entered Holmes' office and was ensconced with him there.

Buck made his way to that office a little while later, and, on crossing the threshold, he found that Harvey Delaney was present in the room with Blake and the judge.

"Here's Grant now, judge," Delaney remarked, as Buck showed up.

Holmes rose and greeted the young Ranger with a considerable warmth of tone. Then he formally introduced him to Blake, whom he declared he had known for a good many years.

"Mr. Blake tells me, Buck," the judge continued, "that he's come here to negotiate a deal with Mary Grayson."

"Yes," Buck rejoined. "Mary mentioned it to me, and I might tell you that was why an attempt was made to hold up the stage-coach. Those outlaws were after Blake."

He gave his reasons for holding that opinion, but was careful to avoid any reference to the Phantom, and, when he had finished speaking, there was a spell of silence which was only broken when Blake raised his voice.

"From the sound of things," the railroad agent quavered, "I fancy it would be advisable if I saw Miss Grayson and clinched this deal with her as soon as possible."

"And you shall, Blake, you shall," Judge Holmes announced. "Mr. Delaney here is going out to Hidden Valley this evening, and I'm trailing along with him, for I want to set Miss Grayson's mind at rest regarding a certain wallet that I'm carrying around on her behalf. So, if you like, you can have our company out to the ranch."

"I'd advise you to join up with the Grayson cowboys as well, judge," Buck interposed. "They can easily stay in town until you're ready to leave."

It was a suggestion that met with Holmes' approval, and he nodded his grey head.

"A good idea, Buck," he agreed. "How about yourself? Will you be taking the Hidden Valley trail to-night?"

The younger man made a negative movement.

"No, judge," he stated, "you won't find Buck Grant on the Hidden Valley trail to-night."

Buck meant those words, but, secretly reflecting, he decided that he would not be very far away from the Grayson ranch—in the guise of the Phantom. For he intended to keep watch and hold himself in readiness for any desperate coup that might be staged by the outlaws of Benson County.

The shadows of evening were gathering upon the hills when a lone horseman drew rein outside a remote dwelling that was hidden away in a corner of a gloomy canyon.

The horseman was Dirk, lieutenant of the mysterious gang-leader who commanded those rustlers with whom Buck Grant had tangled so frequently of late.

Dismounting outside the cabin, Dirk tethered his brone to the hitch-rail and entered the outlaw rendezvous to discover his confederates assembled in a back room.

"Hallo!" greeted Lew Meredith, who was among those present. "Where's the boss? I thought you was gonna meet him."

"I did meet him," Dirk rejoined crisply, "and I told him about the brush you had with that hombre named Spooky. He agreed that in consequence of it you couldn't go back to your job at the Grayson ranch. And, by the way, it was the boss who tried to shoot Grant from the back room at the saloon last night."

Lew nodded slowly.

"I kinda guessed that," he observed, and then, after a moment's silence: "What else did the boss have to say?"

"He gave me orders to round up you fellers and make for Hidden Valley," came the reply. "It appears that Blake, the railroad man, is goin' out to see Mary Grayson to-night and clinch a deal with her. We've gotta stop that deal."

"And that ain't all," he added. "The wallet containing the chart to the Grayson gold diggings will be there as well, and it's up to us to grab it."

"How?" somebody asked.

"I'll make that clear later," Dirk answered. "Meantime, it's boot and saddle for every man-jack of us. Come on, we'd better get started."

He strode out of the cabin again, and, rising to their feet, the other rogues trooped after him. A few seconds later the whole band of crooks had mounted their ponies, and soon they were pushing northward through the hills at a rapid pace.

The gloom of night thickened as they pressed on in the direction of Hidden Valley, and, when they at length drew near to the tract of brushwood that lay immediately to the south of the Grayson outfit, the darkness that had settled over the range was almost opaque.

In spite of this, however, they were seen by a rider who was approaching from the east, a lone horseman who wore a white cloak and whose features were masked by a kerchief. He was Buck Grant, alias the Phantom, and, though he despised the outlaws, he himself was concealed from their view by a copse of trees in which he abruptly drew rein.

Unaware that they had been sighted by one whom they had reason to dread, the crooks galloped on into the brushwood and wound their way through it until they gained the north fringe of the thickets, whence they were able to survey the Grayson ranch.

There were lights in the long, low building where the cow-boys in Mary's employ were quartered, and the faint strumming of a guitar reached the ears of the gangsters. There was also a light in one of the windows of the pretentious ranch-house, and, though this was some little distance away, Dirk and his companions distinguished movements beyond the net curtains of the room in question.

"It looks like Black may be here already," growled Dirk. "Gabe, you and Keeler sneak over to the house. Pick off that railroad agent and blast out the light. Then make a quick dash into the room and snatch up all the papers you can lay your hands on."

"That's a pretty tough assignment, ain't it?" muttered Keeler.

"It won't be if you handle it the right way," Dirk retorted. "The element o' surprise will be in your favour, and you can pull off the whole job inside a minute. Once you've got what you're after, you can high-tail it back to the thickets here."

"What about them cow-pokes in the bunkhouse?" Gabe demanded.

Dirk answered him in a reassuring tone.

"Don't worry about them," he stated. "We'll be ready to cover your escape, and if those punchers show themselves we'll let 'em have it with our forty-fives. Now get busy, the two of you, and do as I told you."

Doggedly, but none too enthusiastically, Gabe and Keeler dismounted from their brones and moved out of the shelter of the brushwood thickets. Then, giving the bunkhouse a pretty wide berth, they slunk across the open ground towards the main dwelling which was their objective, and before long they were close to the wall of the building.

With extreme caution they stole up to the window that they had marked from the edge of the chaparral. It was open, and the murmur of voices was audible to them, and as they raised their heads warily above the sill they found themselves looking into a comfortably furnished lounge occupied by five people, two girls and three men.

The two girls were Mary Grayson and Helen Moore—the men Judge Holmes, Harvey Delaney and Blake, the railroad

"SUZY"

A grip of her hands, a smile of determination, and Terry dashed out on to the balcony. He wrenched down a curtain and fixed it to a balcony rail. Suzy watched him slide to the ground.

It did not surprise Terry to find that their car had been put out of action and he was wondering of the chances of getting a lift when a gleam caught his eyes. Propped against a wall was a powerful motor-eye—Andre's own machine—and it was untouched.

Revenge

TERRY knew he must time everything carefully. He must arrive at his destination on time, but with not a moment to spare. The gods seemed to be helping him, because he found a pair of goggles tied to the handle-bars. The motor-eye also bore Andre's insignia, so that Terry reckoned he should be able to get through without being detected.

The machines were all out on the flying field, with mechanics standing by. The silver grey was easily detectable in the semi-darkness. Near the hangars Terry detected a group of officers—probably hanging around to see Andre take off. He drove up to the silver-grey, hopped off the machine, which was at once taken charge of by a mechanic. He did not speak. He only waved to a mechanic as he climbed into the cockpit. He raised his hand in signal. Mechanics quickly removed the blocks from under the wheels, and the engine roared to life.

He had taken off!

Terry circled the flying field to get the wind, and once in position, went off at high speed. He headed for the enemy lines.

It was an hour before dawn, but the darkness had gone. For some miles he flew low to avoid observation from balloons. He glanced downwards and whistled sharply. A long strip of road lay below him, and it was deserted except for one car, travelling at terrific speed. He swooped down, and then a hard smile showed on his strong face. It was Madame and the butler, making a desperate effort to get to some secret hiding-place near the front lines, where they would probably send by some means a warning of the bombing raid and the news that Andre Charville was dead. Terry zoomed high again to avoid rousing suspicion. Ahead lay more open country, and at the end a slight incline. He released the safety catch on his two guns and swooped down again. His expression hardened as he saw the woman look up and evidently shout something to her companion, for the car's speed increased. Terry brought his machine down so low that he was no more than a hundred feet from the road and about twice that distance behind the car. His two guns woke to life, and little spurts of dust on the road showed the strike of the bullets. He zoomed upwards again and looked down at the car, which was now being driven madly by the man who had killed Andre. Once more Terry swooped, and this time his aim was deadly. The bogus butler stiffened, stood upright, and then crashed across the wheel. Madame pushed him away and gripped the wheel. The car careered from one side of the road to the other. Suddenly there came a burst of flame, and Terry knew his bullets had penetrated the petrol-tank.

The blazing car rushed down the incline, lurched across the road, hit a ditch and rolled over. It was a blazing wreck, and Terry knew that Madame de Chabris and her accomplice were beyond all human aid.

Terry glanced at his watch as he zoomed over the trees. In a few minutes the other planes would be roaring off from the flying field. He rose to about six thousand feet and let his engine out—he must be well in front of those that came after him. A glance down not very long after showed him a shell-wrecked village, and beyond, land pock-marked with holes—No Man's Land. Then, far off, but coming towards him, he glimpsed a number of machines. It was the German squadron.

Terry had never been in action, but he knew perfectly what he meant to do, and he did it. Each movement of the control, each firing of the guns was as his will directed, and always he remembered that if Andre's name were to be saved the machine must not be brought down.

For the honour of defeating so renowned a flyer the Germans did not attack in mass, but preferred to let a picked airman match his skill against Andre Charville. The extra speed was a great help to Terry, and the machine was so easy to control that the German machines seemed clumsy. Combined with this, Terry flew the machine in a manner that was brilliant and skilful, and it had also caution in place of recklessness. He did not take needless risks. Two German machines crashed in flames and one drifted earthwards with a badly wounded pilot.

A glance at his watch told him that the other machines must now be nearing the line. The silver grey streaked away with five machines in pursuit. Often he turned on the enemy and attacked like a vicious hornet. One more machine he brought down before flying back over the lines.

In the office at the flying field the phone rang and Captain Barsanges took the call.

"This is headquarters at Souilly. Our number seven observer just confirmed reports that Captain Charville has brought down three enemy planes, two in flames, close by Batheville. Followed by five machines, Captain Charville turned towards Mouvain. He may be wounded—the enemy had him at close quarters. Report just come in that one more German machine down and that Captain Charville got safely back across the lines. When he arrives at the field, express our thanks and congratulations."

Captain Barsanges passed on the news to those officers who had not taken part in the fight.

"A great day," cried the captain. "I have the report that the other machines completely wrecked the ammunition dump and were not even attacked. They should be back very soon. Let us go outside and look for Andre."

Off towards the horizon there was a tiny speck. It was a plane.

"It's Charville!" shouted the captain.

"He's come back!"

The silver grey swooped down towards the flying field, went into a nose dive, flattened out very close to some tree-tops, and then seemed to climb sluggishly.

"There is something wrong," shouted one of the officers. "Andre would have stayed to the bitter end whilst there was still a Bosh within range. He looks as if he were going to crash."

"Follow him!" shouted Captain Barsanges, as the machine vanished behind some trees.

There had been nothing wrong with the plane. Terry had deliberately wobbled the stick. It was not easy to give the impression that he would crash at any moment and be sure that he would not fall. But for Andre's sake he must not fail.

Suzy heard the whirr of an approaching plane. She ran out into the garden to see if it could be Terry coming back at last. It was. But the prayer of thanksgiving was clogged in her throat as she realised the machine was going to crash. The silver grey machine almost hit a wall, righted itself, skimmed over some fruit trees, and then seemed to rush towards the chateau. She shut her eyes as the plane roared towards her.

There came a sickening, rending crash, and she opened her eyes to see a crumpled thing that had once been the silver grey, pride of an English factory. She tumbled forward, crying out Terry's name.

"I'm all right," came his voice from the twisted cockpit.

With difficulty he crawled from the wreckage, because one arm had been smashed up in the crash.

"Are you wounded, Terry?"

"It is nothing," he said brusquely and leaning on her for support. "Come. We've something to do, and we haven't much time—something we must do for Andre."

He was taking off his coat—Andre's coat—as he staggered towards the chateau. They put it on the dead man. Together they managed to carry the body out into the garden. They laid it among the wreckage of the plane.

A Hero's Funeral

ON the flying field was the wreck of the silver grey plane, and in the smashed cockpit lay a coffin containing the body of Captain Andre Charville. The flags of the Allies covered the coffin, whilst the front of the machine was bedecked with wreaths. One wreath had been dropped from the air—from the Germans as a sign of appreciation for a great airman.

In front of the wreck were the officers and men of the squadron, and on the extreme left two people stood by themselves. It was Suzy and Terry. Captain Barsanges approached them.

"The knowledge that his son died a hero's death must comfort his beloved father," he said to Suzy. "I cannot find words for the tribute I would wish I could pay him. But it is indeed that I should. No one could pay Captain Charville the tribute he has paid himself. His last hour was his greatest. During all the meaningless horrors of war we can cling to the memory of the selfless courage of men like Andre Charville. It is such courage, and such courage only, that purifies war. Madame de Charville, all France will mourn with you. And the three colours of France will be brighter because he was her son."

Suzy was unable to speak. Her head thrown back, her eyes shining with tears she could not shed, were her only answer. She looked at Terry, who had done this great deed for her sake and the sake of Andre Charville, and through a mist of tears she tried to tell him that Captain Terence Moore was the greatest man in the world.

Terry offered her his arm. Together they walked away.

"HELL-SHIP MORGAN"

Morgan waved him away.

"Get to your cabin," he said curtly to Mary, and took hold of the wheel. "Round up the crew, Allen, and report for'ard to me on deck."

"Aye, sir."

Jim went out, and from the upper deck he bellowed to the crew. Mary gave one anguished glance at her husband, then somehow struggled back to the cabin.

Jim, down on the main deck, sent a man to relieve Morgan, then superintended the efforts of the crew to make the main-stay fast. Mountainous waves were swamping all about them; water was everywhere. The stay could not be held, let alone made fast, and over and over again the men were flung about the deck, clinging for dear life to any fixture upon which they could lay hands.

Morgan instructed the man who took his place at the wheel to keep the ship headed due west, told the engineer not to slacken speed, and stumbled down to the group who had once more got hold of the stay.

"Tie it before we lose a man!" he yelled. "Lively, lively! Hold it this time!"

"Make it fast!" shouted Jim. "Heave!"

The stay was made fast, and the men pulled and sprawled and rose to pull again. But the unsupported mast had cracked, and suddenly it split asunder, no more than half a man's height from the deck.

"Lay aft all hands!" vociferated Morgan; and then with a crash the mast went overboard, smashing part of the rail, and taking with it the staging from amidships.

The vessel rose out of a valley of water and crested a wave, but the floating mast was attached to it by the chains and cross-pieces of the rigging, and it banged against the hull.

"Pete, Joe," bellowed Morgan, "grab a fire-axe and crowbar over the side and cut loose those stages holding that boom!"

Some of the men went off and returned with lanterns, in the light of which they viewed the broken mast and all the wreckage attached to it; but not one of them was prepared to dive into a shark-infested sea of such wildness.

"Fire-axe and crowbar, I said!" thundered Morgan. "If that rigging gets foul of our propeller we're through!"

Jim leaned against the side of his rig.

"It's almost certain death to send a man over in this storm!" he expostulated.

"Yeah?" Morgan roared at him. "Well, maybe you'd better go over, Mr. Allen! It'll take a little more courage than stealing a man's wife—and there's a chance you won't come back!"

Jim turned and looked at him in mute reproach.

"What's the matter?" jeered Morgan. "Lost your nerve?"

Off came Jim's oilskins and his hat, and he grabbed at an axe a man had brought at last and at a rope Joe Cotton offered him.

"Hold on to that!" he cried. "I'll cut the mass loose, then you can haul me back aboard."

He fastened his end of the rope round his chest, under his armpits, and he heaved himself over the side into the turbulent sea. In the light of the lanterns held for him he reached the wreckage and hacked away at it, but the waves flung him off again and again, and often he disappeared completely beneath a welter of water.

Mary, once more on the upper deck, held on to the rail and looked down with tortured eyes. It seemed to her that the storm was abating a little, but she feared for his life. She heard the shouts of the men:

"What's holding that gear? Must be fouled below! Starboard shroud's fouled on the keel for'ard! If he can clear his end, we can haul her aboard! He's in trouble!"

Jim was indeed in trouble; a great wave had engulfed him, and as it swept over the ship and he got his breath again, he found that his hips were caught between the mast and some of the rigging, and he could not extricate himself.

"He's a-foul o' that gear!" cried a voice.

Morgan stared down, and for a while his jealous rage was banished. Jim was in danger of being crushed to death at his instigation! He discarded his oilskins, and with a rope round his chest cried out:

"As soon as I free Allen, haul him aboard!"

Over the side he went, headlong into a swamping wave, and then they saw him swimming vigorously towards the mast. Several times he vanished from sight, but he reached Jim at last, and after several vain attempts managed to free him.

"He's made it!" cried Joe Cotton. "Heave away! Heave away!"

Jim was hauled aboard, uninjured, though only half-conscious; but Morgan had taken the axe from him and with it was trying to complete the severing of the gear.

A shout went up as the broken mast floated clear; but even as Morgan let go of the axe and turned to swim towards the ship a great wave lifted the mast upon its crest and drove it violently against the swimmer's back.

"Fair Weather Ahead"

THE storm passed with the night and dawn broke over a quiet sea, but Morgan lay in his bunk helpless and in pain.

"Mary," he said in a weak voice, "you there?"

She was sitting in a chair beside the bunk, where she had been for hours, and she reached out a hand to the one that moved restlessly upon the blankets.

"I'll always be here," she replied.

"I heard somebody say my back—"

"You must rest now," she insisted gently. "Try not to move."

Jim entered the cabin, and Morgan knew his footsteps.

"I'll rest, dear," he said. "Leave me alone for a while. Look after her, Jim."

Jim helped Mary to her feet in silence; words would have choked him, just then. He knew the agony Morgan must be in, and there was no doctor on board. He reached down and clasped the hand that she had released, and Morgan smiled wanly at him.

"Mary," he said, "before you go will you hand me the log, please?"

She went off to his desk and returned with the log-book and his fountain-pen, and she opened the book on the blankets for him and put the pen in his hand.

"Thanks," he said. "Now get some air, both of you."

They went out from the cabin into brilliant sunshine, and after they had gone Morgan managed to make an entry in the log-book by propping it against his left arm.

The effort brought beads of perspiration to his brow and he let the book drop back and himself lay motionless for several minutes. Then abruptly he reached both hands above his head to the curtains of the bunk and pulled on them till he had raised himself sufficiently to topple over on to the floor.

A quarter of an hour elapsed, and Mary said to Jim at the rail of the bridge:

"I think I'll go back to him now. He may need me."

She went down the ladder and she reached the cabin. To her surprise the door was open, and to her horror the bunk was empty.

"Jim!" she screamed. "Jim!"

Jim raced down to her. The empty bunk told its own tale: Morgan must have crawled out on to the deck and forced himself overboard.

They searched the deck, but there was no sign of him, and Jim, remembering that last request for the log-book, went back with Mary to the cabin to see whether he had written anything in it.

He found the entry, and Mary read it over his shoulder till her eyes were blinded with tears. It ran, none too legibly:

"Back broken—helpless—can't remain that way. Smooth water running—fair weather ahead."

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

agent. They were gathered around a table on which a lamp was standing, and in the full glare of that lamp Mary was leaning over an important-looking document which she was apparently about to sign.

Gabe and Keeler exchanged a significant glance as they perceived this document, for they had no doubt that it was a deed of transfer making over the Hidden Valley property to the railroad company. Then they noticed something else—a pocket-book that was lying on the table close to Mary Grayson's elbow.

"The wallet," Gabe whispered to Keeler.

Keeler nodded, and, with an ominous expression on his swarthy features, he shifted his hand to his hip and drew his six-gun from its holster. Gabe imitated his example, and as he did so he heard Mary Grayson speak.

"You know," she said hesitantly, addressing Blake and fumbling with a pen that she was holding in her fingers, "I—I hate to part with this old place. I may be absurdly sentimental, but it's going to be a wrench—leaving the house where I was born."

"I should think the price offered by the railroad company would console you for any regrets you may have, Miss Grayson," Blake remarked with a smile.

"That's right, Mary," Harvey Delaney put in. "You can't afford to pass up this chance of selling out at so high a figure."

"The girl pursed her lips, and then, beriding over the document on the table again, she prepared to attach her signature to the deed.

Neither she nor her companions saw the two men who were posted outside the window, but in the very instant that Mary was setting pen to paper the outlaw known as Keeler drew the trigger of his forty-five, and the quiet of that room was suddenly shattered by the roar of the weapon as a shot burst from its muzzle.

It was a shot that smashed the light to fragments and plunged the lounge into darkness, and it was followed by a choking cry from Blake. Next moment Gabe and Keeler were turning towards the front door of the ranch-house, but ere they could reach the porch they were arrested by a clatter of hoofs, and, wheeling, they beheld a white-robed figure bearing down on them at top speed.

"The Phantom!" yelled Keeler.

As he shouted the words he blazed at the oncoming horseman with his six-gun, and, Gabe's revolver echoing the report a split second later, the cloaked rider was seen to throw up his arms and fall.

Lionel Barrymore's Big Fight

Lionel Barrymore, once knocked out by John L. Sullivan, famous heavy-weight, is still a fighter.

In "The Gorgeous Hussy" he was to stage a terrific fist fight with Wade Boteler. As the time approached for the battle, studio friends several times approached Barrymore.

"Hadn't you better rehearse it?" he was asked. Barrymore put them off or evaded the question. "All in good time," he remarked.

Finally came the fight.

Barrymore put up as grand a fight as had ever been staged, to the delight of Clarence Brown, the director, who was in on the secret from the first.

For years Barrymore has been an expert boxer.

Famous Tablecloth Aids Research

Oddest item among the books, paintings, and other articles being used in research for Cecil B. DeMille's Paramount picture, "The Plainsman," is a tablecloth.

Several years ago DeMille engaged in an argument with Will James, famous cowboy artist, about the arm movements of a rider on a bucking bronco. DeMille and James were sitting in the Brown Derby Restaurant in Hollywood, and James, in the course of the talk, made sketches of cowboys on the tablecloth.

When the session ended DeMille bought the tablecloth. It was turned over to Dwight Franklin, DeMille's designer, and the James sketches will be used for reference in designing costumes for Gary Cooper and other members of the cast.

Movie Within a Movie

One reel of a Western film that will never be completed plays a rôle all its own in "The Last Outlaw," Radio's new picture, featuring Harry Carey, Henry B. Walthall, Margaret Callahan, and Hoot Gibson.

In the course of the plot Harry Carey, an outlaw just released after twenty-five years in prison, visits his first movie along with the other three principals. For the "movie" in question a special reel was filmed by Director Christy Cabanne, with Fred Scott playing the rôle of its Western cowboy-hero, and this, in turn, was projected in a full-sized film theatre built at the studio while the camera picked up both the picture on the screen and the reactions of the audience.

British Brothers in Hollywood

The most amazing family of brothers in Hollywood are English—the Westmore Brothers, who were born at Tunbridge Wells, and appear to have made the American make-up trade their own.

The fame of Percy, Ernest, Wally, and Monte Westmore's family extends as far back as the seventeenth century, when the then king of England presented a crest to Richard Westmore, of Middletown, as a token of esteem for his wig-making.

The Westmore family since then has held to the tradition of wig-making and make-up through each generation, until to-day there is hardly a star in Hollywood whose beauty has not been greatly enhanced by one of them.

Wally is in complete charge at Paramount, while his brothers are in charge at other major Hollywood studios.

These boys have six cousins in England, and four of them are now en route to Hollywood to assist and to learn the make-up business. The four cousins from England are also called Percy, Ernest, Wally, and Monte, and in order to avoid complications the eight Westmores will be known as Percy I, Percy II, Wally I and II, and so on.

The combination of these eight will make the family tradition as strong as the rock of Gibraltar and will be the largest and most successful make-up clan in the history of the screen.

A Rain Bath for the Stars

Motion-picture technicians have not yet found a way to keep people from getting wet in scenes depicting rainstorms.

But the construction of huge sound stages such as the Will Rogers Memorial Stage at Twentieth Century-Fox studios has enabled studios to provide fairly comfortable rainstorms!

It was during the filming of "To Mary—With Love," in which Myrna Loy and Warner Baxter co-star, that Director John Cromwell provided the carefully adjusted showers. The scene depicted the two stars and nearly a thousand extras witnessing a reproduction of the Dempsey-Tunney fight in Philadelphia.

Now that fight was fought in the pouring rain. So Director Cummings was forced to order a thorough drenching for those involved in the scene.

John Cromwell the director ordered that the water spurting from the "rain jets" over the heads of the two stars and the crowd of extras be heated to comfortable bath temperature, and that the entire sound stage temperature be raised to eighty degrees.

As a result, the entire throng submitted to a drenching rain without the appearance of a single sneeze as an aftermath.

Dramas Inside!*

" MURDER on a BRIDLE PATH"

Starring James GLEASON & Helen BRODERICK

When Violet Feverel is found dead in Central Park, apparently thrown and trampled by a horse, Detective-Inspector Piper decides that it must have been an accident. But Miss Hildegard Withers convinces him that it was murder, and the two investigate a complicated case in which there is yet another killing before the guilty person is discovered. A first-class mystery, starring James Gleason

The Watcher

THE driver of the taxicab parked on the rank in East Eighty-Sixth Street was fast asleep, his arms on the wheel, his face on his arms, when Don Gregg left a doorway in which he had been lurking and ran across to him. It was five o'clock in the morning and the sun was rising redly over the East River, but the driver had been plying for hire all night and he was tired.

Don Gregg looked none too fresh himself. He was young, clean-shaven, and in a lean sort of way almost handsome, but his face was drawn and his grey eyes were heavy-lidded and bloodshot. The collar of his dark overcoat was turned up about his ears and the brim of his slouch hat was pulled down as though to hide his eyes.

Not very far along the street two cars were moving away from the canopied entrance of a tall apartment-house, and Don awakened the driver in haste.

"Follow that car!" he said harshly. The driver blinked in the direction indicated by a pointing finger.

"Why?" he challenged.

"This is why!"

Don plunged his hand into a pocket of his overcoat, whereupon the man sat up, half expecting to be shown a detective's badge. But it was a five-dollar note that was flourished in his face.

"Okay, boss," he said, and Don scrambled into the cab and the self-starter roused a cold engine into activity.

There was not much traffic about in that particular region of New York City so early in the morning, and the September 26th, 1936.

two ears were trailed without difficulty round a corner into Madison Avenue and down that wide thoroughfare into East Fifty-Seventh Street.

Outside the double and cross-divided doors of a livery stable just beyond Park Avenue the leading car came to a standstill with a screeching of brakes and the other one stopped close behind it. Don Gregg instructed the driver of the taxicab to pull up at the corner and there descended and handed over the five-dollar note.

He made for a doorway, and the driver saw him peering out from it as he drove off. From the leading car a girl in riding-coat and jhodpurs was being helped down by a youngish man in evening clothes, and Don's attention was concentrated upon her.

Violet Feverel was her name, and but for a petulant droop about her mouth she would have been beautiful. Two other girls were in the car, and one of them leaned out to say:

"Sorry you're deserting, Violet. It was a grand party."

"Glad you could come," responded Violet Feverel, and turned to the man in evening clothes. "Thanks for dropping me, Tony."

"We don't want to drop you," he declared emphatically. "Why don't you come on to Harlem with us?"

"No, thanks." She smiled slightly.

"I'm in the cavalry this morning. Have you got a cigarette?"

Tony groped in his pockets, but the last of his cigarettes had been smoked. She went back to the open door of the car.

"Have you got a cigarette in there?" she asked.

There were two men in the car as well as the two girls, but they hadn't a cigarette between them.

"Try Eddie," suggested one of the men.

Eddie Fry, a curly-headed young fellow with a muffer round his neck, was in the driving-seat of the car behind and a girl with pale red hair and large dark hazel eyes was sitting beside him. In the back were two other girls. He saw Violet Feverel walking towards him, and he said hastily to his companion:

"Babs, you'd better hide down there so Violet won't see you."

"But, Eddie," she said nervously, "do you think it's all right?"

"Sure it's all right," he returned. "Go on—get down!"

She slid from the seat and crouched down on the floor of the car just as her sister Violet reached the window. The girls in the back seat were laughing, and Eddie told them to shut up.

"Got any cigarettes, Eddie?" asked Violet.

"Sure," he replied, and held out a case, screening the girl on the floor as well as he could.

"And a light?"

He had to unfasten his overcoat to get at a lighter which he ignited and offered. She lit the cigarette, and in doing so looked down past him and saw the huddled figure of her sister. Immediately she flew round the car to the other door, opened it, and dragged the girl out.

"Well, chiseller!" she cried furiously.

"What do you mean by that?" asked the girl, white of face and trying to free herself from the hand that gripped her arm.

"You know what I mean!" Eddie scrambled out from behind the wheel and rushed round to them.

"Oh, leave her alone!" he stormed. "What have you got to be sore about?" "Not a thing, Mr. Fry," Violet Feverel retorted scathingly. "And my own sister, too!"

"We were going to tell you," began Barbara, "but—"

"But it was more fun sneaking around behind my back, wasn't it?" raged Violet.

The upper part of one of the double doors of the livery stable swung back and the manager of the place looked out, thrusting his elbows on the lower part of the door. Heads were thrust out of the windows of the two cars, and from his hiding-place Don Gregg watched and listened.

"I wouldn't talk about sneaking around people's backs," cried Eddie Fry. "You seem to be doing pretty well with that stable boy of yours!"

Violet Feverel smacked his face and stalked away towards the stable, and he would have followed her but Barbara stopped him.

"Let's take a walk until you cool down, Eddie," she pleaded. "One of the others can drive."

Tony got back into the front car with a grimace.

"Violet's on the rampage," he said. "Let's get out of here."

The two cars were being started, and Eddie and Barbara were walking off together, when Violet reached the stable and the manager opened for her the part of the door upon which he had been leaning.

He was tall, young, and obviously conceited.

"You certainly have a fast right hand," he said as she stepped into a brick-paved yard between well-kept stalls. "I was going to help you, but—"

"But you found out I could take care of myself," she snapped. "It's a good thing for you to remember."

There was an office on the left of the yard, but she passed it with her chin in the air and he kept pace with her.

"Was there anything special meant by that crack?" he asked, twisting the ends of his little moustache.

"Have my horse saddled."

The expression on his face showed that he resented her tone.

"Highpockets is saddling him now," he returned curtly.

The grinning face of a negro stable-boy appeared at the bars of one of the stalls, and then a red stallion was led out into the yard.

"Good-mornin', Miss Fev'rel," boomed the negro.

"Give me a leg up, Highpockets," said she.

He stared at her in a puzzled fashion and at the manager who usually helped her into the saddle. But the manager nodded and held the stallion's head, so he obeyed.

"I'm ridin' alone this morning," she stated icily as she took up the reins, "and that's the way I'm doing everything so far as you're concerned."

"But, Violet," protested the manager, "why all this—"

"You know why," she broke in, "so don't let's go into that again."

She rode out from the yard into the street and turned in the direction of Central Park. Highpockets went to close the lower part of the door after her, but the manager waved him aside.

"If anybody wants me," he said, "tell them I've gone to breakfast."

"Yassuh, Mis'r Wells," nodded the black, and Latigo Wells walked out past him and also turned to the right.

The lower part of the door was closed and bolted, and the negro looked thoughtfully over it.

"This sho's gwine to be a bad mornin'," he soliloquised with gloom. "Sun come up red, everybody's actin' more like snappin' turtles than white folks, and I'se hungry. Yassuh."

He slammed the upper part of the door and was about to bolt that, too, when Don Gregg came running over from his lurking place.

"Hi!" he shouted. "I want to rent a horse!"

Highpockets reopened the upper part of the door and viewed the stranger.

"Boss gone to breakfast," he said with a shake of his woolly head. "Won't be back till after a while."

"I don't want the boss," retorted Don. "I want to rent a horse."

"Yeah, but you gotta see the boss before you gits a horse. We don't rent hosses to strangers."

The upper part of the door was slammed, but it creaked open again a few seconds later, and Highpockets was surprised to see the young man who wanted a horse help himself to a tradesman's cycle that was resting against the kerb outside a shop across the street and ride away on it.

The Red Stallion

VIOLET FEVEREL cantered into Central Park by its southern entrance in Fifth Avenue and beyond the pond turned into a bridleway with bushes and trees. The early morning air was crisp and a breeze stirred her golden hair as she set the horse to a gallop.

"Yeah, I guess you're right," decided Piper. "No witnesses, eh?"

She had ridden nearly as far as the lake when suddenly the red stallion reared up on his hind legs and she was pitched out of the saddle on to the turf close beside a bush.

The fall jarred every bone in her body, but she was not otherwise injured, and she sat up to see the spirited animal disappearing round a bend. Slowly she rose to her feet and readjusted her hat, and she was about to start off in pursuit when a sound in the bush caused her to look round.

Her blue eyes widened with horror and she uttered a piercing scream. Then something struck her on the head, and down she went, flat on her back, with outspread arms.

Central Park is well policed, but ten minutes elapsed before a patrolman came upon her body and blew his whistle. Other officers came running to the scene, a few curious pedestrians gathered round, and from the nearest telephone-box a burly sergeant rang up the precinct station in East Sixty-Seventh Street.

Almost simultaneously with an ambulance from Bellevue Hospital a car arrived from headquarters, and Dr. Charles Bloom, the medical examiner, adjusted his pince-nez and knelt to ascertain the cause of death.

"It was an accident all right," he said after a while, and got to his feet. "I wonder what's keeping the inspector?"

Another squad car drove up close to the ambulance and from it Detective-Inspector Oscar Piper descended, a sharp-featured man with steely blue eyes, a tight-lipped mouth, and a wisp of a moustache.

"Oh, here he is!" exclaimed the doctor, and a plain-clothes man named Burke hurried towards the car to greet the newcomer.

"Hallo, Burke," said Piper, mainly out of the corner of his mouth. "Gotta miss my breakfast again this morning?"

"Not to-day, inspector," replied the detective. "She was thrown, and it looks like the horse kicked her."

Piper joined the group round the dead body of Violet Feverel.

"Hallo, doc," he said. "What've we got?"

"Well," replied the medical examiner, "it looks like an accident. Apparently the horse threw her and trampled her. The hoofprint is clear."

Piper went down on one knee to look at a wound in the back of the girl's head—and at her hat, which lay beside her left hand. The hat was crushed and bore the imprint of a horseshoe.

"Yeah, I guess you're right," decided Piper. "No witnesses, eh?"

Burke, to whom the question was addressed, replied in the negative, and Piper rose and looked to left and right.

"Where's the horse?" he asked.

"Must've run away."

Concealed from view by the bushes, a tallish and middle-aged woman was leading the red stallion along the bridle-path and carrying a little black and white rough-haired terrier in one arm. Her face was full and plain, her nose was long, and her jaw suggested a tenacity of purpose.

"I guess that's all," said Piper. "You can make out the death certificate doc. I don't see why I always have to miss my breakfast for these accidents."

"I had an uncle once," said a feminine voice close behind him, "who thought the world war was an accident."

He swung round with a start, and September 26th, 1936.

he saw the woman with the horse and the dog.

"It would be you!" he exploded, while all the others stared. "It's getting so, Hildegard, that a person can't be killed within the city limits without you showing up. Where'd you get this horse?"

"Mister Jones and I were out taking an early walk," she replied, "and we found it, so we thought we'd look for the rider."

He took the bridle from her and she set Mister Jones, the terrier, down upon his four feet.

"Well, it's all right, see!" snapped Piper. "It's nothing but an accident."

Miss Hildegard Withers viewed the body on the ground with quick blue eyes and emitted a characteristic sniff. "I don't think so," said she.

"Oh," scoffed Piper, "got a theory, I suppose? Going to try and tell me she committed suicide? Hi, doc, you know Miss Withers!"

The lanky medical examiner walked over to them.

"How'd you do?" he said. "We met during that schoolhouse case—the one the Press called 'Murder on the Blackboard.' You helped us a lot on that case."

"Thank you, doctor," responded Miss Withers meekly. "And I may help you on this one, too."

"Aw, Hildegard," wailed Piper, "don't start gumming things up."

"All right, Oscar." She flipped a hand at him. "You run along to breakfast, but I'm going to find out how this blood got on the horse by accident."

"Blood?" Piper gaped in astonishment at a little patch of crimson on the neck of the red stallion which she pointed out to him. "What'd you make of this, doc?" he exclaimed.

Dr. Bloom looked closely at the little patch.

"Why, I don't know," he confessed. "There doesn't seem to be any wound."

"Aw," growled Piper, "probably just scratched himself on one of these bushes."

"But there's no scratch," said Hildegard Withers.

The doctor instructed two internes from Bellevue Hospital to remove the body of the dead girl, and turned to a policeman from the squad car.

"Durkin," he said, "get me my kit. I'm going to do some probing."

Miss Withers had no desire to witness the probing of a spirited horse's neck for a bullet that might not be there, and she drifted away.

She saw Violet Feverel transferred from the ground to a stretcher, covered over with a sheet, and borne off to the ambulance, and then she kicked against something half-buried in the turf and stooped to unearth a well-used briar pipe.

She rose with the pipe in her hand, glanced round to make sure that nobody had noticed what she was doing, and opened a handbag which had been tucked under her arm. The pipe was stowed in the handbag, and she was looking thoughtfully from the spot where she had found it to a bush only a few feet away when two very obvious grooms came walking along the bridle-path.

"What's going on here?" asked one of them with a nod of his head towards the ambulance.

"Accident," replied the other laconically.

"You ought to be on the police force," said Miss Withers. "Oh, by the by, do you know where that horse belongs?"

The two grooms became aware of the red stallion and of the men clustered round it.

"Why, yes," replied the one who had received a very doubtful compliment; "that's Siwash from the Thwaite Stables, East Fifty-Seventh Street."

"Thanks," she murmured.

The two grooms passed on, and she was looking about the trampled ground when Piper shouted to her:

"Hi, Hildegard, come here! Look what we've found!"

She went back to him, and he displayed, in the palm of his hand, a little bullet.

"A BB shot!" he exclaimed. "Somebody must have plugged that horse with an air rifle!"

"By accident," said she dryly; but Piper appeared not to hear that comment.

"You know, I knew there was more in this than met the eye!" he declared.

Dr. Charles Bloom joined them, wiping his pince-nez with a huge handkerchief.

"In view of this, inspector," he said, "I think I'd better make an autopsy."

"Yeah, that's right," approved Piper. "Go ahead, doc. The girl may have been dead before the horse kicked her."

The doctor went off to the car that had brought him, and he was climbing into it when two plain-clothes men appeared round a bush carrying, between them, a damaged bicycle, from the bent front wheel of which a tyre was hanging limply.

"Hi, boys, what have you got there?" demanded Piper.

"Offhand," sniffed Miss Withers, "I'd say it's a bicycle."

The machine was set down in front of them.

"Don't handle it, chump!" Piper rapped at a man who had caught hold of the handlebars. "I want to have it dusted for finger-prints. Use your handkerchief!"

He turned exultingly to Hildegard Withers.

"Now we're getting somewhere!" Miss Withers had nothing to say to that. She called to her terrier, and she caught hold of his lead. Piper spoke to one of the plain-clothes men.

"Sims," he said, "get on the 'phone and call all stables in the neighbourhood and see if you can find out which one that nag came from."

"It's from the Thwaite Stables in East Fifty-Seventh Street," Miss Withers stated quietly.

"Huh?" In his astonishment Piper nearly fell over the lead and felt tempted to kick the dog. His men were repressing grins with difficulty.

"Well, why don't you get busy?" he roared at Sims. "Get on that horse! Here, you take this ankle-chewing mutt, too!"

Miss Withers, with a pained expression on her face, held out the lead.

"Yes, Mr. Sims," she said, "take him to my apartment—and you might feed him. I'm going to be with the inspector all day."

Piper promptly strode away towards the squad car, but she ran after him.

"Thwaite Stables on East Fifty-Seventh," he said to the driver, but as he opened the rear door Miss Withers collided with him against the running-board.

"Where'd you think you're going?" he snapped. "What are you following me for?"

"I don't know, Oscar," she returned demurely. "I guess it's because you bring out the mother in me."

"Oh, go ahead!" he growled.

At the Stables

IN response to a loud banging on the double and divided doors of the stable in East Fifty-Seventh Street, one upper portion was opened and the face of Highpockets looked out.

"Ah can't rent no hosses to no strangers," the negro informed Detective-Inspector Oscar Piper and the female beside him.

"All right, all right!" returned Piper sharply. "Never mind that." He held out his badge. "Come on, open up!"

Highpockets gulped, and his eyes bulged nearly out of his head.

"Oh, Lawsy, de poleese!" he gasped. "Yassuh, yassuh, openin' up right away, suh!"

Both doors were opened, top and bottom, and at that moment a plain-clothes man arrived on the back of the red stallion. Sims had gone off with Mister Jones to Hildegarde's flat in West Seventy-Seventh Street, deputing to a colleague the task of riding the horse back to the stable where it belonged.

"All right, Grady," said Piper, "bring him in."

Highpockets gaped.

"What you all bringin' back Miss Fev'el's hoss for?" he asked wonderingly, as Grady dismounted and led the horse into the yard.

"Feverel, eh?" Piper whirled round on him. "Sounds like a phoney name to me. Where does she live?"

"Ah don't know," declared the negro, taking the bridle of the stallion. "She don' live here."

"Well," said Piper wryly to Miss Withers, "we've cleared that up. She doesn't live here. Okay, Grady, but you'd better stick around."

Grady nodded, and drifted out in the street.

"Who's in charge here?" demanded Piper.

"Mistah Wells is the manager," replied the black, "but he's out to breakfast."

"Out to breakfast, eh?" Piper's eyes glistened. "How long's he been gone? About three-quarters of an hour, maybe?"

"No, not that long." Highpockets shook his head with vigour. "About an hour or two—maybe."

Piper looked helplessly at Miss Withers, whose face expressed nothing in particular.

"Okay, Hildegarde," he said. "You're witness! Where's the office?"

"Right over to your left, suh." Highpockets pointed to a closed door, and led the horse away. Miss Withers followed him at a distance, and Piper opened the indicated door and entered a very plainly-furnished office.

A desk in it engaged his attention, and he proceeded to open one drawer after another.

Siwash, the red stallion, was led into its stall and unsaddled, and Highpockets, all unaware that Miss Withers was watching him, took a rabbit's foot from a pocket of his trousers and rubbed it on his rather shapeless nose. "Rabbit foot," he said sepulchrally. "I knowed dis day was gonna be unlucky for somebody."

"You did, eh?" Miss Withers entered the stall, startling him nearly out of his wits, and he pocketed the rabbit's foot in haste. "Now look here, son—"

"Ah knows nuthin'!" he cried. "Oh, I'll take your word for that!" said she. "Suppose you tell me your name?"

"Highpockets, ma'am."

The name sounded incredible, but she accepted it with a shrug.

"Well, have it your own way. How long have you worked around here?"

"Thank you, doctor," responded Miss Withers meekly. "And I may help you on this case, too."

"About three month, ma'am—not countin' the week I was in gaol."

"What were you doing in gaol?"

The negro rolled his eyes and replied: "Shootin' dice."

"No, I mean, what did they put you in gaol for?"

"Shootin' dice."

She laughed a little, and after that Highpockets answered quite readily other questions she put to him.

In the office Piper had found a book in which accounts with regular customers were kept, and he was examining it at the desk when Latigo Wells stepped in at the door and stopped short to scowl at him.

"Well, good-morning," the manager barked. "What can I do for you?"

Piper put down the book.

"You the manager here?" he inquired curtly.

"Yes, Wells is the name."

"Did you know Violet Feverel?"

Latigo Wells looked startled.

"Why, yes," he admitted, dropping his tone of resentment. "She—"

"Just come back from your breakfast, haven't you?"

"Say, what is all this?" demanded Wells. "Who are you, anyway?"

"Inspector Piper, Homicide Squad." Piper displayed his credentials. "Come on, answer the question!"

"Yes, I've just got back from breakfast."

"Where'd you eat?"

"Fifty-Ninth and Madison."

"How long have you known Miss Feverel?"

The manager perched himself on the edge of the desk and appeared to be searching his memory.

"Quite some time," he said.

"Know her socially—away from the stables?"

"Yes, sort of. I've had a date with her occasionally."

"Ever have any trouble with her?"

Wells looked away from the keen blue eyes that were boring into his dark-brown ones, but he answered emphatically enough:

"Certainly not. We were the best of friends."

"Oh!" interpreted Piper. "Liked her a lot, eh? Matter of fact, you were a little bit in love with her, weren't you?"

"I wouldn't say that. She was— Say, I don't see why you're asking me all these questions."

"You don't, eh? Well, Violet Feverel's been killed under very strange circumstances." He stepped nearer to the young man. "Murdered!"

"Murdered?" The manager paled.

"While you were out at breakfast," said Piper significantly.

"While I—" Wells bounced off the desk, trembling visibly. "What are you trying to do?" he screeched. "Hang it on me?"

"Take it easy, take it easy," urged Piper, and caught hold of his arm. "Come on, sit down. I'm not hanging anything on you—I'm just trying to find out all I can."

Wells sank on to a chair, and with fumbling hands took out a cigarette; but the cigarette remained unlighted.

"Now, come on, be a good fellow," said Piper. "Tell me all you know. Did she have any enemies to your knowledge?"

"No," was the hesitating reply, "I don't think so. Er—wait a minute—this might be something. She had an argument with a guy outside the stable this morning, and she slapped his face."

"Slapped a guy's face? Now we're getting somewhere!"

Miss Withers, by this time, had extracted what she considered to be some useful information from Highpockets. She rewarded him with a five-dollar note, and she said:

"You're a fine fellow, Highpockets, and I know I can trust you to keep quiet about all you've told me. Understand?"

"Yes, ma'am, Miss Withers," tho negro assured her. "When Ah keeps quiet, Ah keeps quiet all over."

Miss Withers made her way to the office and looked in at the open door.

"Oh, Hildegarde," boomed Piper, "I want you to meet Mr. Wells, the manager here."

She crossed the threshold and she tilted her head at the young man in the chair.

"How d'you do, Mr. Wells?" she purred, and then: "Is this the murderer?"

"Mr. Wells," snapped Piper disgustedly, "has just given me some very valuable information."

"Well, isn't that nice? Then he's probably told you he had a row with Miss Feveler this morning?"

"No," said Piper, staring blankly at her, "he didn't say anything about that."

Wells jumped up from the chair in consternation.

"Hi, wait a minute!" he cried. "I can explain!"

"You can explain down at headquarters," retorted Piper, and he bellowed for Brady.

Latigo Wells was taken away in custody, and Piper beamed at Miss Withers.

"You know, I thought that guy was holding something back," he said shamelessly. "Nice work, Hildegarde."

"Umph!" sniffed Miss Withers. "Nice work if you can get it!"

In the Dead Girl's Flat

FROM the Thwaite Stables the inspector and his unofficial colleague travelled in the squad car to the tall apartment-house in East Eighty-Sixth Street; and there, after a brief conversation with the clerk in the glass-partitioned office on the ground floor, ascended to the fifth-floor flat in which Violet Feveler had given a party the night before.

"How long has Miss Feveler lived here?" Piper inquired as the clerk unlocked the front door with a duplicate key.

"About eight months," was the reply. "Anything else, inspector?"

"Yeah," drawled Piper. "In case she gets any 'phone calls while we're here, switch 'em through to me—and don't be listening on the wire."

"Of course not, sir," said the clerk.

From the carpeted corridor Piper and Miss Withers stepped directly into a large and well-furnished sitting-room which was in rather a state of disorder.

"Well, what's been going on here?" exclaimed the inspector, staring at littered music on the floor near a grand piano, scattered cushions, and pictures askew on the walls.

"Get out of here!" shrilled a voice. Piper immediately pushed his companion down into an easy-chair, and standing in front of her, whipped out a gun.

"Come out of there!" he rasped.

"Get out of here!" shrilled the voice again. "Get out of here!"

Miss Withers suddenly began to laugh, and as she laughed she pointed towards the piano. Underneath it was a green parrot in a cage, and Piper put away the gun with a snort of disgust.

"A parrot!" he exploded. "How d'you like that?"

"You certainly had it scared," said she.

They wandered about the room, and Piper reached the mantelpiece, where he picked up a large framed photograph.

"Hi, look!" he called out. "Here's a picture of her with that guy Wells! September 26th, 1936.

They must have been pretty friendly, at that!"

Miss Withers looked, then pounced on another framed photograph—one of Violet Feveler with Eddie Fry.

"Here's another young man," she said. "I wonder who he is? Oh, listen!"

The sound of a key in the lock of the front door had reached her alert ears. Piper heard it, too, and together they dived across the room to a luxurious chesterfield and crouched down behind it.

Eddie and Barbara entered the room, and Eddie closed the door behind him.

"Just toss some things into a suitcase, Babs," he said. "We'll have to hurry if we want to get away."

"I'll hurry, dear," she promised, and ran across to a bed-room and disappeared into it.

Eddie went over to an ornamental desk near one of the windows, and Piper and Miss Withers watched him over the back of the chesterfield as he opened a drawer and took out what looked like a packet of letters.

"All right," said Piper, rising to his feet, "I'll take those!"

Eddie swung round and stared wide-eyed at the two who moved towards him.

"What is this?" he gasped. "Come on, come on," said Piper, holding out his hand. "Come across with those letters."

"You know it isn't nice," rebuked Miss Withers, "reading other people's mail."

"Who are you?" faltered Eddie.

"Inspector Piper, Homeie Squad." Piper snatched away the letters, and Barbara emerged from the bed-room in a state of alarm.

"It's about Miss Feveler," said Miss Withers.

"Violet?" Barbara tottered forward.

"It's something happened? She's dead, isn't she?"

"How did you know that?" demanded Piper harshly.

"Why, I—I can see it in your faces. Oh-h!" She burst into tears, and Miss Withers straightaway put an arm round her heaving shoulders.

"I'll take care of her," she said, and led the weeping girl back into the bed-room and closed the door.

"Young man," said Piper sternly, "what's your name?"

"Edward Fry," replied Eddie.

"Where were you two going in such a hurry just now?"

"We were going to get married."

"Oh!" Incredulously the inspector eyed the good-looking but rather agitated young fellow. "Is that why you said 'We'll have to work fast if we want to get away'?"

Eddie nodded.

"We didn't want Violet to know about it till afterwards," he explained.

In the bed-room Barbara had flung herself on a bed and was sobbing into a pillow, but she managed to answer the questions with which Miss Withers gently plied her.

"You were going to marry him," said the spinster, "and you've only known him a month?"

"Not quite a month."

"You're rather impetuous, aren't you?"

Barbara looked up and nodded.

"How long have you been living here with Violet?"

"About five months. I wasn't very welcome, and I'd have been terribly unhappy if it hadn't been for Eddie."

"Looks like you're in love with him," commented Miss Withers.

"Yes, I am."

Piper, standing on the hearthrug in the sitting-room, frowned at the photograph of Violet Feveler and Eddie that stood on the mantelpiece.

"So you didn't want her to find out about your marriage to her sister," he said. "Might have made trouble, eh?"

"She always made trouble for everybody," Eddie declared.

"Did you ever have any trouble with her?"

"Why, no."

"Why did she slap your face this morning?"

Eddie flinched, but made no reply.

"Thought I didn't know about that, eh? So you didn't go to Harlem with the rest of the party?"

"No, we took a walk."

"Oh, you took a walk?"

"Yes." Eddie sat down in a chair. "Then we had breakfast."

"So you had breakfast?" Piper seemed quite annoyed to hear it.

"Well, it looks like everybody had breakfast this morning but me! Where'd you walk? In the park?"

"No," said Eddie, "we just walked and talked, and then we decided to elope."

Miss Withers had finished with that particular subject in the bed-room.

"Tell me, Barbara," she said in a friendly way, "is there anybody who had any reason for hating your sister?"

Barbara nodded, and then wished that she hadn't.

"Oh, it couldn't be!" she exclaimed.

"Who is it?" insisted Miss Withers.

"Don—but Don couldn't have done it! She divorced him, but he couldn't have—"

"Don who?"

"Don Gregg."

"Umph! Don Gregg, ex-husband!"

Miss Withers rose from the bed on which she had been sitting beside the girl. "You stay right here, Barbara."

She went out into the sitting-room, and Barbara immediately got up and went to a dressing-table, where she opened a drawer and took out a little diary bearing the dead girl's name in gilt letters upon its cover.

From another drawer she took out a box, and she put the diary in the box, then opened a hand-bag which was lying on the table and transferred from it to the box a little automatic of blue steel.

Miss Withers, meanwhile, had whispered to Piper, and Piper suddenly flamed at Eddie:

"Say, why didn't you tell me about Gregg?"

"Gregg?" Eddie looked round from a window to which he had discreetly retreated. Miss Withers sat down on the chesterfield.

"Yes, Don Gregg," snapped Piper. "Violet Feveler's ex-husband. What do you know about him?"

"Nothing—nothing much," said Eddie with marked reluctance. "She got rid of him about six months ago."

"Was he in love with her?"

"Naturally, Oscar," purred Miss Withers, "if he married her."

"Pah!" snorted Piper, and he repeated his question.

"I suppose so," said Eddie with a shrug. "She took everything he had, and jammed him up on his alimony."

"Oh, she did? Why didn't you tell us about this before?"

Eddie replied that he didn't think that it was important.

"Oh, you didn't think it was important."

Piper scratched his chin.

"An ex-husband," he mused, "alimony—trouble. Uhuh! He loved her—and she's dead! Hildegarde, this may be what the French call a crime of passion."

The bed-room door opened and Barbara reappeared. She had removed most of the traces of her tears, but she still looked badly upset.

"What do you know about Don Gregg?" Piper barked at her.

"Don?" she faltered. "Oh, I'm sure he's innocent."

"Oh, you're sure he's innocent, eh?"

"I know he is," stated Eddie definitely, and Piper swung round on him.

"How do you know?"

"Because," was the unexpected reply, "when he didn't pay his alimony, Violet had him thrown into gaol."

"What?" bellowed Piper.

"And he's still there."

"So the murderer was in gaol at the time of the murder," remarked Miss Withers. "Well, if this was a crime of passion, Oscar, it was pretty darned platonic!"

"All right, all right, all right," growled the discomfited sleuth. "Hold it!"

The bell of the front door rang and Barbara would have answered its summons, but Piper stopped her and motioned to Miss Withers and to Eddie to go into the bed-room.

The bell rang again while they were obeying, and an excited voice rang out:

"Miss Feverel! Miss Feverel! Miss Feverel!"

Piper walked over to the door and crooked a finger at Barbara, and he was hidden by the door when she opened it. On the mat in the corridor outside stood a man who looked like a butler—a man with stooping shoulders, a thin, clean-shaven face, and a queer-shaped jaw. He was holding his hat in his hand.

"What is it?" asked Barbara.

"Please tell Miss Violet," said the man tremulously, "that her father in-law wants to see her right away. Tell her to hurry, or it may be too late."

Piper swept out from behind the door.

"Why will it be too late?" he questioned sharply.

The man's jaw dropped and he blinked at the detective.

"Excuse me," he mumbled. "I—I didn't know—"

"What didn't you know?"

"That Miss Feverel had guests."

"Come in!" Piper snapped, and as the man stepped into the sitting-room he shut the door. "Who are you?"

"Abraham Thomas," was the nervous reply. "I'm working for Mr. Patrick Gregg—Miss Feverel's father-in-law. If you'll just tell Miss Feverel—"

"My sister is dead," blurted Barbara.

"She was killed this morning."

"Killed?" echoed the butler, seemingly aghast. "Why—why it can't be!"

"She was murdered," said Piper.

"But nobody would want to murder her!" exclaimed Thomas. "It's old Mr. Gregg they're after!"

Miss Withers stepped briskly out from the bed-room.

"What makes you say that?" she asked.

The butler gaped at her.

"Well," he said in a quavering voice, "yesterday somebody poisoned old Rex, his dog, and Mr. Gregg is afraid he'll be next."

"Where does Mr. Gregg live?"

"Long Island, ma'am. I've got to be getting back there now."

"Just a minute," commanded Miss Withers. "We'll go with you."

She looked at Piper for confirmation, and he frowned.

"Might not be a bad idea," he conceded, "but I don't see what a dead dog on Long Island's got to do with a girl killed in Central Park."

"The dog belonged to her father-in-law," said Miss Withers tartly, "and he's afraid of his life. Now, you don't want another murder on your hands, do you?"

"Okay," surrendered Piper, "but I still think it's a snipe hunt."

"Excuse me," said Thomas diffidently, "but are you the police?"

"He's on to you, Oscar," laughed Miss Withers. "Better give yourself up!"

"All right, go ahead!" Piper picked up his hat and put it on his head, then turned to Barbara. "I'm not through with you two yet," he said menacingly. "Take my advice and don't try to leave town."

The House on Long Island

DOWN at the curb in East Eighty-Sixth Street an old-fashioned limousine was standing close behind the squad car, a uniformed chauffeur at its wheel. The squad car was dismissed, and Piper and Miss Withers climbed into the limousine after the butler had seated himself beside the chauffeur.

A journey of some thirty-five miles followed, and then from a country road the limousine turned into a winding drive and came to a standstill in front of a house which Miss Withers decided was hideous.

It was large and gabled, but it was built in the worst possible style of the previous century, with wings that did not match, porches heavily porticoed, and a turret that made the whole place look lopsided.

The butler was the first to descend, and he preceded Piper and Miss Withers up the steps to the double front doors and rang the bell.

"Well, this is a nice cheery place," said the spinster. "It's just dying to be haunted."

"Yeah," drawled Piper, "and about all we'll find in there is moth-balls."

Having snapped one of the steel bracelets round Don's wrist, he gripped Miss Withers fiercely by the arm and snapped the other one round hers.

Thomas pressed the bell-button again, but without effect.

"Well, what's the matter?" complained Piper, trying to peer through the stained glass of a leaded panel. "Why don't somebody open up?"

He beat a tattoo with a knocker, but still there was no response from within.

"Ever do any housebreaking?" he said to Miss Withers.

"I house-broke a Pekinese once," she replied.

Abruptly one of the doors was opened, and a queer-looking fellow stared out at them. He might have been almost any age between twenty and thirty, and his right shoulder was hunched and his head seemed permanently bent towards it.

"Joey," said the butler, "show the lady and gentleman into the back parlour."

They entered a gloomy hall, Joey limping ahead of them, and at the foot of some stairs Thomas said to Piper:

"I'll tell Mr. Gregg you're here, sir."

He ascended the stairs, but the cripple moved past them and opened a door.

"You can wait in here," he said in a voice which sounded as though it had never finished breaking, and Miss Withers and the detective stepped into a room overcrowded with heavy furniture and full of gloom.

"This place would be great for an undertakers' convention," remarked Miss Withers with a sniff; and then the voice of Thomas rang out from above the stairs:

"Joey! Joey, come up here quick!"

The cripple limped swiftly away, but Piper followed him, and Miss Withers followed Piper.

"What's the trouble up there?" shouted the inspector as he sped upwards; but he received no reply, and he reached a wide hallway on the first floor to find the butler rattling the handle of an oaken door and shouting:

"Mr. Gregg!"

"What's wrong?" demanded Piper.

"He doesn't answer—and the door's locked from the inside."

"We'll soon fix that," said Piper. "Get out of the way."

The butler and the cripple moved aside and the detective put his shoulder to the door in such a fashion that the lock gave way.

He burst into a bed-room as gloomy as the room below, and quite as heavily furnished, and he reached a massive wooden bed which might at one time have had posts and a canopy—and leaned down over an old man who lay upon it, his scanty white hair upon a pillow, his hands spread out on the coverlet.

"He's breathing!" exclaimed Piper. "Open a window! Get the doctor!"

The cripple went to a window and opened it; the butler ran out from the room. Miss Withers stood beside the detective, studying the thin and lined face of the old man. Joey limped out past them, and then Piper said:

"Well, I don't think there's anything we can do till the doctor comes. Looks like a stroke to me."

"Yes," returned Miss Withers, but without conviction. "Look, he has a big bump behind the left ear. How do you suppose that happened?"

"Oh, probably fell and hit his head when he had the attack."

"And then climbed back into bed?"

"Yeah," said Piper, and scratched his chin while she straightened the bedclothes.

Thomas reappeared while she was tucking in a sheet.

September 26th, 1936.

"Dr. Peters is on his way over," he said. "He lives just down the road. Poor Mr. Gregg— Oh, I'll do that, ma'am."

He finished tucking in the sheet and he straightened the tumbled coverlet.

"He has a bad heart," he said. "The doctor told him that any excitement was likely to prove fatal. He had a slight attack not long ago."

"What caused the excitement that time?" inquired Piper.

"Horse racing, sir. Mr. Gregg has been a horseman all his life."

Somewhere in the house a bell rang.

"Oh, if you'll excuse me, that must be the doctor," said the butler, and hurried off again.

Miss Withers promptly went to some clothes which were lying on a sofa across the room and proceeded to go through the pockets of a pair of grey trousers.

"Are you sure you've never been married?" chaffed Piper, watching her with amusement.

"If you're trying to be funny," she retorted severely, "there's a time and place for everything." She held out a slip of paper she had discovered.

"Here, look at this!"

He took the slip. On it was written:

"Received from Pat Gregg nine hundred dollars for back alimony due. VIOLET FEVEREL."

"I knew Don Gregg was the one—" he began.

"S-s-s-h!" hissed Miss Withers, and the slip of paper was out of sight when Thomas ushered into the room a short and rather tubby man with a pronounced nose and a clipped moustache.

"Dr. Peters," the butler said introductively; but the doctor, with the barest of nods, leant over his patient, turned back the lid of one of the closed eyes, and held a skinny wrist.

"Hot water and some towels, please," he said.

"What is it, doc?" asked Piper, after Thomas had gone. "A stroke?"

"Umm," grunted the doctor "I warned him."

"About what?" ventured Miss Withers.

"He has a very bad heart." With none too friendly grey eyes Dr. Peters surveyed his questioners. "Thomas told me that you are the police," he said. "and that Miss Feverel is dead."

"Murdered," corrected Piper. "I'm not surprised. She was an evil woman."

"She certainly wasn't the most popular girl in her class," remarked Miss Withers.

Thomas reappeared with a jug of hot water and some towels, and the doctor frowned at her.

"Oh, don't mind me," she said casually. "I'll just look around."

She went out and shut the bed-room door behind her, and she glanced about the wide hallway out of which several doors opened, but it was a second flight of stairs that interested her and she flitted noiselessly up them.

On the floor above she entered a room directly over the bed-room and saw that it was fitted up as a sort of study. There was a big flat-topped desk in the middle of it, facing a window, and on the desk stood a mounted telescope of considerable size.

"Heavens, the man's an astronomer!" she exclaimed, and sat down in a chair behind the desk and applied an eye to the telescope.

There were many trees in the extensive grounds at the back of the house, but no trees were visible through the telescope. Instead, she found that she had a perfectly good view of the Belmont Park race track, and of two stable-boys riding horses upon it.

"My error," she murmured, "not stars—horses!"

With her gloved hands she went through the drawers of the desk, looked at all the papers on top of the desk, and under the blotting-pad found a scrap on which had been written:

"Bet $100 on Wallaby at 15 to 1."

She folded the piece of paper, slipped it into her glove, and went out from the room; and she reached the floor below just as Dr. Peters and Piper emerged from the bed-room.

"The doc say he'll pull through all right," said Piper.

"He'll recover all right," confirmed the doctor; "but I can't understand it. Somehow the hand of death must have slipped."

"Doctor," said Miss Withers, "could Patrick Gregg have gone into town, killed his daughter-in-law, and then come back here?"

"Impossible!" returned the doctor with ill-concealed scorn. "His heart couldn't have stood the excitement. Excuse me."

He made his way to the stairs and descended them, preceded by the butler.

"What a question!" jeered Piper. "Could Patrick Gregg have killed his daughter-in-law! Why, this alimony receipt proves that Don Gregg was out of gaol."

"I don't care what you say," she retorted with a sniff, "there's something phoney going on here."

The Forged Order

DETECTIVE-INSPECTOR PIPER went down the stairs, but the indignant spinster re-entered the bed-room and stood beside the bed looking down at the old man in it.

"Faker!" she said suddenly and loudly, and Patrick Gregg opened his eyes.

"What's that?" he asked in a feeble voice, staring up at her.

"I said 'faker,'" she replied, and calmly perched herself on the edge of the bed. "When you pretend to be asleep why don't you breathe naturally? When did you come to?"

"While the doctor was here," he said slowly. "He told me you were police, and about Violet."

"Must have been quite a shock," she suggested.

"Pleasant shock," he returned. "She was no good. Horse kick her?"

Miss Withers shook her head and informed him that the girl was murdered.

"Murdered?" said he in surprise. "When did it happen?"

"Early this morning. Why?"

"I was just wondering."

Miss Withers rose.

"Were you alone when you had this attack?" she asked.

"What's that? Oh, I suppose so. I can't remember. But I had a funny dream." He raised a hand and waved the forefinger back and forth. "I dreamed I was a pendulum in a clock."

He licked his lips and closed his eyes again, and she put the hand back under the bedclothes.

"Well, pleasant dreams," she said.

She descended to the hall, and there she heard the voice of Piper in the back parlour and made for the open doorway.

The inspector was squatting on an ottoman, his hands in his pockets, and he was speaking to Thomas:

"Come on now, just between you and me, the late Mrs. Don Gregg—otherwise Violet Feverel—was a very popular around here, was she?"

"No, sir," agreed the butler, "she was not. If I may say so, she was a trouble-maker, and Mr. Pat Gregg disapproved of her violently. So did Mr. Don, after a while."

"He did, eh?" Piper bounded to his feet and stood over the butler. "Why did you lie to me?"

"Sir?"

"Why did you tell me that Don Gregg was still in gaol when you knew he was released two weeks ago?"

"Well, but he wasn't released, sir." Piper produced the receipt Miss Withers had found.

"Here's the alimony receipt," he said fiercely. "It's paid!"

"Yes," said the butler, "but, you see, sir, Mr. Gregg paid only the alimony due at the time Master Don was arrested, not the amount that had accrued while he was locked up."

"Are you trying to tell me," howled Piper, "that Don Gregg was kept in gaol after this nine hundred dollars was paid?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I'm a speckled ape."

"This is no time for a confession, Oscar," rebuked Miss Withers from the doorway.

"I don't believe it!" snorted the detective. "Don Gregg is the guy. The dame was a rat, and he knocked her off. I'm going to check on your story, mister. Where's the 'phone?"

"Just outside in the hall, sir."

Piper went out to a telephone on a table in the hall, and Miss Withers stopped the butler as he was about to pass her.

"Oh, tell me, Thomas," she said, "what kind of a pipe do you smoke?"

"A corneob, ma'am," the butler replied, without evincing any surprise at the question. "I paid twenty cents for it, and I've smoked it for twenty years."

"Really?" she murmured, and walked along to the inspector, who had rung up the gaol in Thirty-Seventh Street to which divorced husbands are committed when they fail to keep up their payments of alimony to their former wives.

"Listen," he was shouting. "Have you got a guy down there named Don Gregg? You what? Oh, you did, eh? Who's this talking? Oh, Warden Mahoney! Oh, Warden Sylvester Mahoney. Well, listen, Mr. Warden Sylvester Mahoney, I want you at my office in half an hour, and bring all the records of the case with you. Yeah!"

He slammed down the instrument, and turned to grin triumphantly at Miss Withers.

"Don Gregg was sprung out of the alimony gaol last night a few hours before the murder," he stated.

"Who let him out?" she asked.

"I don't know, but I'm going to find out."

He retrieved his hat from the back parlour.

"In gaol, huh?" he said. "Looks like I hit a bullseye!"

He strode towards the double front door, and Miss Withers kept pace with him.

"It hurts me, Oscar," she confessed as he pulled back the latch, "but I think you've got something."

"Stick around," he boasted, "and you'll see an arrest in twenty-four hours."

One of the doors was opened, and Thomas hurried forward to see the unwelcome visitors off the premises.

A full hour elapsed before Piper reached his own room at police headquarters in Centre Street, and Warden Sylvester Mahoney had been waiting in it for some time. He was a big man and a bulky one, with a florid face and a neck that bulged over his collar —a man of importance, in his own estimation.

Piper took the folder he presented, lit a cigar, and studied a document.

"So this is the court order that sprung Master Don Gregg, eh?" he suddenly burst out, and stabbed the document with a finger. "I suppose you've noticed, Mr. Sylvester Mahoney, that the seal is phoney and that the order is a forgery?"

The warden gulped and gripped at the hat on his knees. His flabby face seemed to sag.

"Dear me, dear me," he murmured; "but, inspector, how was I to know?"

"How were you to know?" roared Piper. "How were you to know any thing? D'you know what city this is? D'you know what the date is?"

"I—I think," stammered the warden, "it's the seventh."

"You think it's the seventh, eh? Well, it ain't!" Piper consulted a calendar-pad. "It's the ninth!"

"My mistake."

Piper walked round the desk and flung himself into his chair behind it.

"Here was a guy who might have been a murderer," he raged, "and you sprung him out of gaol!"

"He couldn't have murdered anybody while he was in gaol, could he?" said the warden hopefully.

"No," returned Piper, "and if you'd kept him in gaol, I wouldn't be hunting for him now."

"Well, it—it's all very confusing. But, you see, inspector, one of the boys had a birthday, and a friend of his sent him some—well, some bottles for a little celebration."

That practically was a confession that the warden had imbibed the night before, and that as a consequence he had not been any too careful.

"Birthday!" repeated Piper. "Whose birthday?"

It appeared that Don Gregg had had

She was far too scared to answer, and she shrank back against the wall as he leaned menacingly over the side of the dressing-table.

the birthday, and this was added fuel to the inspector's wrath.

"Get out!" he bellowed. "Get out, Mr. Sylvester Mahoney, because I'm looking for myself for murder!"

The warden was only too glad to escape, and he almost ran from the building. Piper shouted at the top of his voice for a detective-sergeant named Kane, and after an interval a short and very tubby person put his head in at the door—a head from which a well-worn slouch hat had not been removed.

"Did you call, inspector?" inquired the owner of the face and the hat.

"Did I call?" snapped Piper. "What did you think I was doing—singing? Send out a general alarm for Donald Gregg."

"Yes, sir," responded Kane. "What do we want him for?"

"For the murder of Violet Feverel," was the reply.

A Shock for Miss Withers

BARBARA—whose surname was Foley, just as her sister's had been before she had adopted the name of Feverel for stage purposes—was alone in the flat on the fifth floor of the apartment-house in East Eighty-Sixth Street when she heard a sound as of someone trying to open the front door. Instantly she rushed into the bed-room and returned from it with the automatic in her hand.

A key grated in the lock, the door swung wide, and Don Gregg entered the sitting-room, but stopped short and held up his hands at sight of the girl and the gun.

"Don't shoot!" he pleaded hoarsely. "I'm Don Gregg. Who are you?"

"Oh!" The gun drooped in Barbara's hand. "I'm Barbara," she said in rather a shaky voice. "Violet's sister. I—I thought you were in gaol."

"I was," said Don, closing the door. "I got out last night."

"Last night?" she gasped. "Oh!"

"What's the matter?" He followed her as she sped to the little desk on which a telephone reposed. "What are you going to do?"

She pointed the gun at him again. "Stay where you are!" she shrielled. "I'm going to call the police!"

Outside the canopied entrance of the building Miss Withers descended from a taxicab and handed the driver the exact fare registered on the clock, much to his disgust. She was crossing the pavement when a newsboy thrust a special edition of the "Chronicle" upon her, and she paid for that, too, because she had caught sight of enormous headlines:

INSPECTOR PIPER PREDICTS ARREST IN TWENTY-FOUR HOURS OF FEVEREL MURDER SUSPECT.

She looked at a picture of Don on the front page beneath the headlines, and she made a grimace at a picture of Detective-Inspector Oscar Piper which was close beside it, then folded the paper and marched firmly into the building and entered a lift.

Up on the fifth floor Don Gregg had persuaded Barbara not to telephone the police, and had listened in apparent astonishment to her statement that his former wife had been murdered early that morning.

"I came here to see Violet," he told her. "I didn't know she was dead."

The doorbell rang, and they looked at one another in dismay.

"Don't answer it," whispered Don. "Maybe they'll go away."

But it was Miss Withers at the door, and she had no intention of going away.

September 26th, 1936.

She continued to press the bell-button till at last Barbara bundled Don Gregg into the bed-room and opened the door.

"Hallo!" said Miss Withers, brushing past her and stopping beside a little table near the chesterfield. "I hope I'm not disturbing you. I just dropped in to ask a few more questions about your sister."

"But I've told you everything I know," protested Barbara, trying not to appear flustered. "Really, I have."

There was a briar pipe on the table, and Miss Withers had not failed to notice it.

"Do you smoke?" she asked abruptly. "Yes, a little bit."

Miss Withers picked up the pipe and found that it was warm.

"But not a pipe, I hope?"

"Oh, that—er—that belongs to—"

"To the man hiding in the other room," Miss Withers completed for her, and raised her voice. "Come out, young man."

Don Gregg came out from the bed-room. The collar of his overcoat was still turned up about his neck, but his hat was on the back of his head, and his gray eyes were defiant.

"This is Miss Withers from the police," said Barbara.

"And you're Don Gregg," said Miss Withers, walking over to him with the newspaper in her hand. "Don't you think it's kind of silly for you to come here?"

"I came to see Violet," he stated, removing his hat. "I didn't know she was dead."

"Don't lie to me!"

"I'm not lying to you!" he retorted. "What did you do after you got out of gaol last night?"

He went over to the table on which he had replaced the pipe, and he thrust the pipe in his overcoat pocket.

"Why," he said slowly, "I went to a Turkish bath."

"Then what did you do?"

"Well, I slept there, and this morning I came here."

She looked at him steadily for several seconds.

"All right," she said then, "if that's the truth come down to headquarters and tell your story to the police."

"And get thrown back in gaol?" he scoffed. "I should say not!"

Barbara ran to him, caught hold of his arm.

"I think you'd better go, Don," she said.

"If you're innocent," said Miss Withers, "you have nothing to worry about. And, besides, I have a great deal of influence with Inspector Piper."

"All right," growled Don, and he restored his hat to his head and went out from the flat with her.

There was a uniformed attendant at the entrance to the building and Miss Withers asked him to get a taxi. Detective-Sergeant Kane was lurking on the pavement with a colleague considerably taller than himself, but he did not know Miss Withers, and Miss Withers did not know him.

"Are you sure it's going to be all right?" asked Don nervously while the attendant was trying to find a taxicab.

"Now don't you worry," Miss Withers returned reassuringly. "Leave everything to me."

They moved towards the kerb, but Kane suddenly swooped.

"Well, where d'you think you're goin'?" he demanded harshly.

"And what do you think you're doing?" Miss Withers retorted.

"I'm arresting both of you in the name of the law!"

"But you can't!" she cried indignantly as he flashed his badge. "I'm a friend of the inspector's. I'll show you."

She opened her handbag and fumbled in it, intensely annoyed because a crowd was gathering round them. But Kane peered into the bag.

"Here, watcha got?" he cried, and plunged his own podgy hand into the bag and brought forth a small but very serviceable six-shooter. "A rod, eh? Well, you never can tell."

"I was looking for my courtesy badge," she said as laughter rang out behind her.

"What badge?"

"The one the inspector gave me."

"Lemme see it."

"Just a minute." Miss Withers searched, but searched in vain. "I must have left it at home," she said blankly.

"Oh, sure!" jibed the detective. "On the bureau. Right beside the permit for this!"

He pocketed the gun and produced a pair of handcuffs, and having snapped one of the steel bracelets round Don's wrist he gripped her fiercely by the arm and snapped the other one round hers.

"Call the wagon, Jim," he directed gruffly.

A patrol wagon arrived while the crowd grew in numbers, and the manacled pair were ordered to get into it.

"But you can't do this to me!" stormed the spinster.

"Oh, I can't, eh?" Kane bundled her up into the wagon while his colleague dealt with Don. "Well, it's done, ain't it?"

To the accompaniment of more laughter from the onlookers he followed his prisoners into the vehicle, and the doors were closed and fastened.

Some half-hour later the self-important little detective swaggered into Piper's office at headquarters with an expansive smile on his fat face, and Piper looked up at him from his desk.

"Well, what's on your mind?" snapped the inspector.

"It's Gregg," replied Kane boastfully. "I nabbed him right outside the apartment-house—him and a dame."

"Nice work," approved Piper. "Bring 'em in."

Kane went to the door, which he had left open, and shouted into the ante-room.

"Come on, you!"

Handcuffed together, Don Gregg and Miss Withers walked past him into the office, and the expression on Piper's face as he viewed the female prisoner was a study in mixed emotions.

"Hildegarde!" he exclaimed.

Miss Withers held up her right hand, and with it Don's left hand, and the inspector laughed again at sight of the handcuffs.

"Kane," he gurgled, "you ought to be promoted for this!"

"You're as funny as a cry for help!" cried Miss Withers with a sniff.

"All right, Kane," chuckled Piper, "take the cuffs off."

"I was afraid," said the spinster as the discomfited little detective obeyed, "that we were going to have to get married. Oscar, I told Mr. Gregg that you'd just ask him a few questions and let him go."

All trace of amusement faded from Piper's lean features.

"Oh," he said with sarcasm, "so I'm just going to ask him a couple of questions and let him go?"

"Uhuh," she nodded. "I think you will when you hear the answers."

"So he's got an alibi, eh?"

"The only evidence you have," she retorted, "is a BB shot in a horse. You can't hold him on that."

"I can't, eh? I'm going to ask him some questions that'll knock his hat off!"

Miss Withers smiled at Don.

"Better hold on to your hat, Mr. Gregg," she said.

"Sit down, Gregg," commanded Piper. "Sit down, Hildegarde."

Don seated himself in a chair, but Miss Withers sailed towards the door.

"No, thank you," she said on her way out. "I'm afraid you might start questioning me."

"Deduction!"

KANE was distraised, and Piper deserted his chair to sit on the end of the desk within a few inches of the young man he believed to be a murderer.

"Gregg," he said bullyingly, "we know you were released last night on a forged order. How did you do it?"

"On a forged order?" asked Don.

"Aw, come on, Gregg! We know the whole thing. We know that you were sprung from gaol on a phoney writ and killed the woman who had you locked up. Now you might as well come clean."

Don drew a long breath.

"Well, I got out of gaol, yes," he admitted, "but I—well, I spent the night in a Turkish bath."

"Yeah?" Piper glared at him incredulously. "What was the name of the baths?"

"The Central Baths."

A bell-button on the desk was jabbed, and Kane re-entered.

"Oh, Kane," said Piper, "find out who the attendant was at the Central Baths last night. Get him over here right away."

"Yes, sir," said Kane.

"And don't bring back Hildegarde Withers!"

"Oh, no, sir!"

During the period of waiting that followed, Don felt in one pocket after another, and Piper watched him.

"What's the matter?" he rapped. "Lose something?"

"Yes," said Don, "my pipe. It's gone. Somebody's picked my pockets!"

"Now who could have picked your pockets at Police Headquarters?" jeered the inspector.

Miss Withers, of course, was the guilty person. She went from Centre Street into Broadway, and there invaded a high-class tobacconist's establishment.

"Can you tell by examining a pipe what kind of a man might have smoked it?" she asked anxiously of an elderly and bald-headed man who leaned over a glass-topped counter as she approached it.

"It's quite possible, madam," was the reply. "Pipes are always like the men who smoke them."

Miss Withers differed from other women; inside her astrakhan-trimmed jacket there was a pocket almost as capacious as a poacher's. From this pocket she produced two briar pipes—the one she had found in Central Park and the one she had managed to filch from Don's overcoat. She laid them on the counter, and she said:

"Well, I'd like to find out all about the man who smoked these. It's very important."

The tobacconist picked up Don's pipe and examined it with care, particularly the mouthpiece.

"This is a very ordinary pipe," he said, putting it down again, and he picked up the other. "Ah, but this—this is interesting! It tells me quite a lot about the man who smoked it."

A pair of spectacles were readjusted upon an aquiline nose, and the mouth-piece of the pipe was turned this way and that.

"Such a man," declared the tobacconist, "would be of middle-age, probably a professor, or a chemist—and he has false teeth."

Miss Withers repossessed herself of the pipes, thanked her informant, and departed.

Meanwhile, Detective-Sergeant Kane had returned to headquarters with an enormous fellow from the Central Baths who had been whisked away from his duties in trousers and vest. He was a trifle over six feet in height and he weighed at least eighteen stone.

Piper viewed this mountainous person in some astonishment.

"So you're the rubber over at the Central Baths, eh?" he queried.

"Yes, sir, I am," replied the giant complacently. "And a pretty good one, too."

"All right." Piper gestured to Don, who rose to his feet. "Take a look at this man. Was he over at your baths last night?"

The attendant regarded Don from head to foot with a pair of critical brown eyes, but shook his head.

"I wouldn't know, sir," he said. "I couldn't tell."

"What d'you mean you couldn't tell?" rapped Piper.

"Well, a suit of clothes is just a suit of clothes to me, sir. I don't see 'em in any clothes."

"Oh," said Piper, "I get you. Strip yourself to the waist, Gregg!"

Don obeyed quite readily, and a smile of recognition spread over the giant's face.

"I can tell you now, sir," he boomed. "He was at the baths last night. In fact, I rubbed him myself."

"You rubbed him yourself?" Piper was obviously disappointed. "You sure?"

The attendant was positive.

"All right," growled Piper, "you can go."

Off went the witness, and Kane went, too. Piper relit a cigar that had expired in his mouth and turned none too happily to Don.

"So far your story's okay," he said. "I'm not going to hold you, but don't try to leave town."

Don, having resumed his garments, decided to go to his father's house on Long Island where he had lived before his unhappy marriage and after his divorce. But as soon as Patrick Gregg heard of his arrival from the butler he sent for him, and a none-too-pleasant scene occurred in the depressing bedroom.

The sick man, considerably better by this time, accused him of having murdered Violet Feverel.

"Why do you say that?" Don demanded heatedly. "I tell you I'm in the clear. I've got an alibi!"

"You're involved in a murder," shouted his father, sitting up in bed and pointing an accusing finger at him, "and I hope the truth comes out, even if you are my son!"

"That's a fine attitude for you—"

The butler burst into the room with upraised hands.

"Master Don," he expostulated, "you mustn't excite your father. The doctor said he'd have another attack if he wasn't kept quiet."

"Get out and stay out!" Patrick Gregg roared at his son. "I want no part of you!"

Don smothered his rage and went out to the stairs, and Thomas followed him. They descended together to the hall, and on the way Thomas said, regretfully:

"I'm sorry, Master Don."

"You'd have thought I could go to my own father," complained Don. "Oh, well, he never had much love for me, anyway—and I'm not so sure that I've much love for him, either."

The bell of the telephone began to ring as they reached the foot of the stairs.

"I'll get that," Don said, and he went to the table in the hall and picked up the instrument. "Hallo! Yes, this is Don Gregg speaking."

Eddie Fry was on the other end of the line, speaking from the flat in East Eighty-Sixth Street.

"I'm a friend of Miss Foley's," he stated. "She wants to see you as soon as possible. It's very important."

Don looked at his watch and found that it was just after eleven o'clock. "Tell her I'll be there around noon," he said.

Thomas was standing by the newel-post as he put down the telephone.

"Get my ear," he directed, and after the butler had disappeared he went slowly up the stairs.

Miss Withers, having had a very early breakfast that morning, had an unusually early lunch before she returned to Headquarters in quest of Oscar Piper. The inspector was munching sandwiches when she invaded his room and seated herself in a fairly comfortable chair near the desk.

"Oscar," she said impressively, "Don Gregg didn't do it."

The inspector, in his shirt sleeves and with his waistcoat unfastened, swallowed the last morsel of the last sandwich but one and scowled at her.

"Don't be a sap," he snorted. "Of course he did it!"

"How are you going to prove it?" she challenged.

"Well—"

"Exactly!" she cut in. "Oscar, the man who killed Violet FEVEREL was middle-aged. He was a thoughtful man—possibly a chemist, or a professor—and he has false teeth."

Piper bounded to his feet. "What's his name?" he asked excitedly.

"I haven't the least idea."
"Then where'd you get all the dope?"
"Deduction, Oscar."

"Aw!" He forgot all about the remaining sandwich in his disgust, and he lit a cigar.

"How can you find out if a man has false teeth?" inquired the cause of his distraction.

"That's easy," he growled. "Get him mad enough to bite you!"

Dr. Charles Bloom, the medical examiner, looked into the room with a sheet of paper in his hand.

"Oh, come on in, doc," said Piper. "What you got—the autopsy report?"

"Yes," Bloom advanced to the desk and handed him the sheet of paper. "But there's nothing new. The girl had been killed by a blow on the head, that's certain."

"Okay," Piper did not even trouble to look at the report. "Oh, by the way, Miss Withers wants to know how she can find out if somebody has false teeth."

"H'm." The medical examiner pursed his thin lips. "That's quite a problem. Well, you can offer him an apple. If he bites, the teeth are his own. If not—not."

He went out, closing the door behind him, and Piper grinned at Miss Withers.

"Now all we need's an apple," he said dryly.

More Revelations

IT was only a few minutes later that Schultz, the handwriting expert at headquarters, entered the room. He was a little man with a veritable mane of white hair, and he had a whole sheaf of papers in his hand.

These he proceeded to spread out on the inspector's desk, and they proved to be enlargements of different letters and words from the receipt for the alimony and the court order which had secured Don's release from gaol. He was demonstrating the difference between some of the specimens, and the similarity between others, when Piper impatiently interrupted him.

"Look," he said, "all I want to find out is, did Gregg forge that court order?"

"A forged court order?" exclaimed Miss Withers in astonishment.

"Yeah. Your friend Gregg got out of gaol on a forged order. I forgot to tell you about it, you were so sure he was okay."

"Huh!" she sniffed. "I still am!"

"Oh, you are? Well, come on, Schultz, did Gregg forge that order?"
"No," said the little handwriting expert quite definitely, "he didn't."

Piper's disappointment was manifest. Miss Withers, smiling triumphantly, took the scrap of paper she had found under the blotting-pad in Patrick Gregg's study and opened it out.

"Mr. Schultz," she said, "do you think this might be the handwriting we're looking for?"

Schultz studied the writing, and Piper leaned over the desk.

"What's that?" he demanded.

"That's a specimen of Patrick Gregg's handwriting," Miss Withers informed him tartly. "I forgot to tell you about it, you were so sure he was okay."

"Pat Gregg?" Piper could hardly believe his ears. "Well, how d'you like that? Here—here's an old man who had a stroke—"

"How about it, Mr. Schultz?" Miss Withers interposed.

"Well, I can't be sure from a casual examination," was the guarded answer. "I'll have to chart the handwriting."

"Go ahead and chart it," rapped Piper.

Schultz gathered up all the papers and retreated.

"Pat Gregg!" exploded Piper. "Next thing you'll be telling me—"

A telephone bell interrupted him, and he snatched up the instrument. Highpockets was on the other end of the line, speaking from a call-box, but he was too excited to be articulate, and Piper, gathering that the stable-boy wanted to speak to Miss Withers, handed the instrument to her.

"Who is it?" she asked.

"I don't know," said the inspector, "but he's hissing like a snake!"

At the sound of her voice the negro became a little calmer, and a lot more coherent. Her brows went up as she listened.

"Yes, yes," she said, "you stay there, Highpockets. I'll be right over."

She handed the telephone back to Piper and rose and picked up her hand-bag.

"Come on," she said urgently, "we've got something!"

"What?" asked Piper.

"I'll tell you on the way over."

In a squad car they travelled uptown to East Fifty-Seventh Street, and Kane accompanied them. Highpockets ran out from the Thwaite Stables as the car drew up near the wide-open doors, and, waving his arms about as though he himself were fighting, he bellowed at Miss Withers as she descended:

"Dey bin scrappin' with each other! I mos' scared to death. Better go in dere and do somethin' Dey bin fightin'—"

Piper and Kane dived into the brick-paved yard, but Miss Withers remained with the shouting and gesticulating negro.

"Now listen, Highpockets," she said, when he had calmed down a little. "I've got a ten-dollar bill in this bag. You just quiet yourself and begin at the beginning."

Highpockets' eyes ceased to roll, and avarice shone in them.

"Yes, ma'am," he said in his natural voice. "I'm awful calm, now. I'll tell you."

In the yard, outside the stall of the stallion, an altercation between Latigo Wells, recently released from custody, and Don Gregg ceased abruptly as the two detectives arrived. Eddie Fry was there, and Barbara was with him.

"What's going on here?" blazed Piper, and Don immediately pointed an accusing finger at Wells.

More Than the Call of Duty

READ this! The commissioner in charge of the secret investigation department held out a sheet of official paper to his assistant.

"Good heavens!" gasped the other. "Lynch murdered! How did this happen, chief?"

"He hadn't a chance." The commissioner held up another sheet of paper. "I have here a full report, which came in a few moments after that note. They found a car had crashed on a winding mountain road, and they found Lynch's body in the wreckage, and he had been shot in the back. Lynch was working on the Sanderson case."

"Sanderson—that's the man who has a formula for some new explosive, isn't it?"

"Yes, and evidently a pretty good one, because I've a hunch that a certain gang are after it. We've been trying to locate Sanderson because our people might like to buy the formula. I reckon Lynch was on to something when he was bumped off."

"What's the next move?"

"Only one man can handle this case—Bob Woods."

"But he's due for a vacation, chief," cried the assistant. "First he has taken in six years."

"Jack Lynch was his buddy."

The assistant turned as he heard the sound of heavy laughter.

"I'll bet that's Bob. Like to see him?" The chief nodded.

Bob Woods was a thick-set, muscular man. A frank, open face and a ready smile. He removed a straw hat as he came into the commissioner's room.

"Can't think why I bought this darned thing," he remarked in the easy manner that made him so popular. "Had to celebrate my holiday some way, I suppose." He stared at the two officials. "Say, don't you two look bright and cheerful. I believe it's because I'm going away on a holiday."

"I wanted to see you, Bob, because there is something here that you're the only man could handle properly."

"I knew it—I knew it!" Bob gave a gesture of despair. "I knew something would stop me going on that fishing holiday with Jack Lynch. Tell me the worst, chief."

The commissioner's only answer was to hand across the desk the note that he had already shown to his assistant.

There was no expression on Bob Woods' face as he read the short message, but he sank into a chair as if he were tired, and sat there staring dully into space. The other two men glanced at each other, but wisely made no remark. After a while Bob roused himself, glanced again at the note, and then handed it back to the commissioner.

"So they got Jack?" Bob spoke slowly, and his eyes were hard. "I can start on this case, chief, at once. Have you any dope?"

Solemnly Bob listened whilst the commissioner told of an international spy ring, whose American operatives were attempting to buy from its inventor, Sanderson, the formula for a deadly explosive. That the authorities had not thought a great deal of Sanderson's discoveries until finding out the interest taken by outside agents. Sanderson's whereabouts were, at the moment, unknown. Sanderson was rather a crank, and though well known to scientists for his discoveries, had always remained very much in the background. Lynch had been instructed to look into the case, and had evidently made discoveries that had caused this spy ring to murder him in cold blood.

"You have worked with Lynch on many cases and know his methods," stated the chief. "We can show you where the accident took place, but we can't tell you very much else. Wilson had been giving some sort of assistance to Lynch—and Wilson, you can get in touch with at this tobacco store. Wilson should know all that there is about this case, and it's up to you, Woods, to pick up the threads."

That morning Bob Woods left New York for California.

The door of the laboratory opened and a dark, foreign-looking man entered. The ferrety, shifty-eyed individual standing by some bubbling retorts looked at him narrowly.

"What luck?" he questioned.

"Nothing on the body," was the reply. He held up a pipe. "But I have found something here." He pulled the pipe apart, and from the pipe-stem drew out a piece of paper. "A sort of wedge to keep the holder fixed into the pipe. You will notice that it is not stained with nicotine, and cannot have been here when the pipe was smoked. It is quite blank."

"Try the acid test."

That test brought no result.

"How about the light?" came the next suggestion.

The foreigner scowled when that had no result. He peered into the pipe and fished out a knife. He scraped out the bowl on to a piece of paper, and asked for some luke-warm water. The contents of the bowl he tipped into the glass, and noted the deposit was melting. He dipped the paper in the liquid and placed in on a blotting-pad. Nothing happened, so he held the paper near to a small flame. He smiled and beckoned the other man. Wording had appeared.

"Have located Sanderson. Explosive seems very powerful and deadly. Record, head of spy ring, trying to obtain formula.—LYNCH."

Jule Record smiled.

"It was as well that Lynch was removed. Now you see what a menace he would have been to our plans."

The Gramophone Records

ON arrival at San Francisco, Bob Woods went straight to the tobacconist and bought some cigarettes, for which he offered a two-dollar bill.

"Don't see many of these."

The man looked closely at Bob.

"You'll find it's genuine."

The owner of the shop was satisfied from this special answer—a password—that Bob Woods was a Federal Agent.

"What can I do for you?"

"Where can I find Wilson?"

"Through the telephone booth," was the answer. "Rap three times on the wall."

The back of the telephone booth swung back, and Woods walked into a room. He nodded to the little man with the comical smile, and glanced thoughtfully at a man who was seated before a large radio set.

"This is Andrews," said the little man, who was Wilson. "I thought we might pick up something on the air."

Bob tossed his hat on to a table, and sat down in a rickety chair.

"What can you tell me about the case?"

"Very little," Wilson hesitated. "We're terribly sorry about Lynch. He was a grand fellow, and we're sure he was on to something, or else this wouldn't have happened. He set off on the morning he was killed, and he was very excited. Reckoned he would be able to clear up the Sanderson case in a few hours and then meet you for a vacation."

"Jack always liked to play a lone hand." Bob Woods shook his head sadly. "I gather, Wilson, that you can tell me nothing more than I know already—that Lynch, hot on the scent, was trailed—was bumped off by persons unknown."

Wilson gave a faint nod.

"Anything from the air?"

"Nothing, though this message has come through three times." Andrews handed over a sheet of paper. "Looks like a code message. May be of no importance."

On the paper was written:

"V S S K G."

Bob frowned over it, and finally placed it in his pocket.

"Where was Lynch staying?"

"Some quiet apartments in Cedarville," answered Wilson. "Got a flatlet on the fifth floor. I've been through all his papers, but I didn't find a thing."

"We'll go take a look. You stay here, Andrews, and see if you can pick up anything else—we'll be back in an hour."

It was dusk when they reached Cedarville and the quiet block of flats where Lynch had resided. There was an amazed look on Wilson's face when the door of the flat would not open. The two men put their weight against the door and burst in.

Bob had drawn out a gun, and the first thing he noticed was the billowing curtains. He darted to the window.

Outside was a fire-escape, and, almost at the bottom he could see the scurrying figure of a woman.

"Wilson," Bob snapped out. "Come here." The other peered from the window. "See that woman—see that car she jumped into—tail it and then come back here."

"Okay, boss!" Wilson rushed out of the room.

Bob was thoughtful as he stared round Lynch's room. On the floor were a number of papers, and he guessed that the woman had been searching his friend's desk. He walked across, and at once his quick eyes noticed something sticking out of the centre drawer. It was a strap from a lady's handbag and it was wedged so tight that he had quite a task opening the drawer.

The woman must have been seated at this desk with the drawer open, and she had been so startled by hearing people at the door that she had hurriedly closed the drawer and in some way jammed her handbag. Unable to move it, she had wrenched the bag free and scurried down the escape.

A glance through the papers in the desk told him little, for they were mostly routine matters. Against the wall was a gramophone. Now Lynch and Woods had made an arrangement between themselves whereby they could leave a record of recent activities by an ingenious, secret method. Bob Woods also had a gramophone, and by means of records they had kept in touch with one another.

Bob looked through the pile of records, and he tried out several, but they were all dance tunes or light opera. Then Bob held the records near to the light and a slight smile appeared on his lips. On the desk were a number of pipes, and he scraped the bowl of one in the same way that Record had done, and placed the residue in a glass of hot water, which he had obtained from a wash-basin. He was dabbing one of the records when Wilson returned, very much out of breath.

"It was a girl," he exclaimed. "A good-looker. I tailed the car to the Santa Barbara Hotel, but she gave me the slip in the lounge. She's in the hotel some place, and I've left two of the boys watching the various exits."

"Good work," Bob grunted, and walked across to the gramophone. "Keep quiet and listen to this."

Wilson looked at Woods in amazement as the Federal Agent placed the record on the machine. It was a popular waltz. Suddenly the music ceased, and there came the sound of a voice from the gramophone.

"Lynch!" gasped Wilson.

"Shut up!" snapped Woods.

"After many weeks of searching have at last got a line on the Sanderson case." Lynch's voice even made Woods shudder. "On June 19th I contacted Sanderson. Appears to have formula for a deadly explosive which will revolutionise modern warfare. June 20th—Sanderson inclined to be secretive and not disposed to tell me his hide-out. Has a secret laboratory. Apparently his formula is almost complete, and in a secret laboratory is working night and day. Very suspicious of all inquiries. June 22nd.—Again contacted Sanderson, who has promised to meet me at his laboratory. So far only had conversation from call booth. Learnt big organisation after Sanderson's discovery and offering big price. Only my threat that the sale of formula may cause the outbreak of a terrible war has stopped him selling. Have discovered that

"What luck?" questioned the foreign-looking man.

Quietly the curtains were pushed to one side, and Bob Woods stood there and watched her.

Recard is the ringleader of this organization. Recard is working to obtain formula, which he plans to sell for a fortune to some foreign country. Recard is wanted in many countries for spying and other offences. June 24th.—Have seen Sanderson but not at his laboratory. Have satisfied him that I am working for the Government. Sanderson desperately in need of money. Have decided to take a car trip to Silver Falls and discuss problem with Bob Woods. Sanderson wants some sort of note from the White House." After that followed some music. "Just before leaving to meet Woods found out that Recard is expecting to meet an accomplice. Vilma Santos is the woman, and imagine she has come from some part of Asia with money to help Recard buy the formula." The record ended with music, and Bob switched off.

"Vilma Santos." He took out the paper from his pocket. "V S 8 K G—Vilma Santos arriving at eight on King George. Wilson, the King George docks at eight in the morning, and if I guess rightly the woman will be on board. We're meeting the liner, Wilson."

The Steward

NATURALLY the badge that proved they were Federal Agents assisted Woods and Wilson at the docks. An embarkation officer allowed them to take up a position near the main gangway, and behind some merchandise. They were able to watch without looking too much like watchdogs—the officials had orders to scrutinise everybody's ticket. A signal was arranged should they observe any irregularity.

Bob Woods began to finger his chin in perplexity when the stream of passengers began to lessen. They knew that so far no one had passed the officers with the name of Vilma Santos, nor had they observed anyone acting suspiciously. Bob had almost decided to go on to the King George and have a search made of the cabins, when he laid a hand on Wilson's arm. A solitary figure had appeared at the top of the gangway.

Wilson stared at his superior in surprise, for it was only a steward.

The steward was carrying a heavy suitcase and walked very carefully. A very smooth-faced, almost feminine type of young man, who seemed a little nervous. The officer examined the steward's pass and nodded that it was all right to proceed.

Bob came to the officer's side.

"Who was that?"

"If anyone is suspicious that's the person," said the officer. "But that is a man."

"Ever seen a man walk that way?" Woods pointed. "Ever seen a steward with powder on his cheeks? I hope not."

"I've got it!" gasped Wilson. "The steward's a woman!"

"You're improving," laughed Woods. "Come on!"

Outside the docks a long, powerful car was waiting. Now the steward began to hurry. The back door was opened by a sleek, dark-skinned man, and the bag tossed inside, then the door beside the driver was opened and the steward jumped in—the car went off with a roar. When the car pulled up outside the Santa Barbara the taxi containing Woods and Wilson was close behind.

The steward entered the hotel and the car drove away. Woods was just in time to see their quarry enter a lift.

"Find out the room number," whispered the agent. "The lift has stopped at the sixth. Better take the stairs."

"And me with drooped arches," bemoaned Wilson.

Bob Woods studied the people sitting in the lounge, and his keen eyes detected a girl who was dressed very much in the same sort of clothes as the person seen escaping from Lynch's flat. She was reading a magazine, and yet she was constantly looking up from her reading. There was plenty of room on the settee, so Bob Woods took a place beside her.

A quick glance she gave him before before going back to her reading.

Her left hand was resting on a handbag, and she took it away to smooth an unruly brown curl, giving Bob the chance to have a good look at the bag. That twisted smile came to his lips as he noticed one end of the strap was torn and the other end missing. Quietly he took out the strap, and, holding it hidden, made a comparison—no doubt that this was the strap of the handbag.

Wilson, in the meantime, had found out that the steward had gone into Room 210. He proceeded to make himself comfortable in the corridor and wait till the woman—if it were a woman—reappeared.

The Treacherous Recard

JULE RECARD admitted the steward to his room, and after locking the door, would have taken his visitor in his arms. The latter dropped the suitcase and stayed him with outstretched hand.

"My darling, what is it?" Recard said in injured tones.

The steward removed the peaked cap and out tumbled a mass of black curls. The woman shook them into place, but her eyes never once wavered from the man's face.

"I understand that you've got someone else into the game. A woman. Who is she?"

"You're not jealous, are you, dear?"

"Oh, no!" The woman's eyes flashed. "I'm delighted about it. I can't leave you for a day without you prove unfaithful to me. I risk my life and my freedom for you and come back to find you carrying on with another woman."

Recard pointed to the bag.

"You have the money?"

"Yes, but—"

"My dear, I can explain." He smiled at her and held out his arms. "You must not be so suspicious. I must have people to help me. This woman is of use to me." His eyes narrowed. "What did Mullins tell you?"

"Only what I could worm out of him," blazed the woman. "He mentioned that your plans were all in readiness, and by chance mentioned that a woman had helped in the negotiations with Sanderson."

"It's quite right, my dear," he smiled. "Sanderson's a most difficult person to contact, and only through her help have I been able to fix up almost complete arrangements. She is taking me to see Sanderson in the morning. Vilma, you have my word that this woman means nothing to me. It is only you I love."

The woman seemed slightly mollified. "Don't give me cause for suspicion, Jule, because if I find you have lied to me I am likely to get a little angry. One word from me and I could burst this scheme of yours wide open."

With difficulty Recard controlled the impulse to put his hands round her throat and throttle her.

"My dear, there is no one else." He rubbed his hands together. "Within a few days the secret formula will be in my possession. Then we can go down to Mexico, where I will hand the formula to special emissaries, and we shall be richer by a quarter of a million dollars. My angel, you haven't kissed me yet."

The woman submitted to his caress, but all the while she was wondering what was behind that inscrutable smile.

"All my plans are practically complete," explained Recard. "Now you have arrived with these bonds and securities, which can be converted into cash at a moment's notice, the prize is within our grasp. It would be as well if you went to our house."

"Whilst you stay here?" she asked quickly.

"My dear, do not be so suspicious." He was patient. "I am staying here under an assumed name, and it would not be wise to have my wife with me. If you go to the house with Mullins you can help me most. We must give these Federal Agents no chance of trailing us."

"But I don't see why your wife—"

"Vilma, please let me conduct this in my way. That house has been left long enough. Besides, I may require you to help me in the laboratory testing out old Sanderson's formula." He pointed to the bed-room. "Some people may have seen you enter here as a man. I have your clothes in my room. It would be best if you change and go back to the house."

Wilson was half-asleep when he woke to the fact that a very beautiful woman was standing by the lift. She gave him a slight smile. Poor Wilson had no idea this was the steward. The lift doors opened and madam disappeared, leaving Wilson goggling foolishly.

The woman downstairs had seen the steward enter, and knew whom she was, and was waiting for the reappearance of the other to go up to see Recard.

Bob Woods edged a little nearer to her.

"Looks as if we might have a war in Europe," he remarked.

The girl frowned at his impertinence in addressing her.

Bob was unperturbed. "War is a terrible thing with these new engines of war. What with new gases and deadly explosives."

"I'm not interested."
"You should be," Bob grinned. "America might be involved. Airships might come over dropping bombs. There's a bit here about a new explosive discovered by some old crank named Sanderson."

The girl gave a slight start, then, without answering, turned her back.

"It says here that the explosive is more deadly and powerful than anything yet discovered." Bob rustled the paper. "Sanderson is reputed to be out for the highest bidder. Awful if that explosive got into the wrong hands, don't you agree with me?"

The girl hesitated as if she would call one of the bellboys, but there was something in his eyes that made her pause. A sort of knowing look. Who was this man?

"I've never heard of Sanderson."

"Oh, yes you have!" Bob chuckled. "You're trying to secure the Sanderson formula."

"What do you mean by that?"

"What I said, young lady. You're after the Sanderson formula. Well, so am I." He winked. "And maybe the syndicate for whom I'm working can pay better than the bunch for whom you're working. No good trying to bluff me. A lot of people know about the Sanderson explosive, and you'd be surprised if you knew the people for whom I'm working. Stand in with me and I'll guarantee you a small fortune."

"You must be quite mad."

"Lady, don't try to keep up that game." Bob shook his head. "We've got our agents and we know who are working against us. What do you say to working in with me on a fifty-fifty basis?"

Bob Woods was hoping to get some useful information from this girl. Usually money would open most mouths, and in his pocket was a big wad of notes. Not that Bob intended to part with them, but they might prove a good bait.

Suddenly over Bob's shoulder the girl sighted Vilma Santos. This man had been following Vilma, because she had seen the two men enter the hotel close on the steward's heels. Round her neck was a heavy bead bracelet. A cry of alarm and the girl clutched at her dress—she had cunningly broken the necklace. The heavy beads rolled on to the floor, and, unsuspecting, Bob went down on his knees. Some of the beads had gone under a couch.

Bob straightened his back and gave a rueful grin. An old trick, and it had caught him—the girl had vanished. But his sharp eyes saw something else. A beautiful woman getting into a taxi. His knowledge of disguises told him that the woman was Vilma Santos. He got to his feet, and as he hastened towards the swing doors Wilson came running down the stairs.

"No sign of that steward," said Wilson. "All I saw was a darned good-looking dame. She smiled at me, Bob. If I hadn't been busy I might—"

Bob clutched his arm.

"Is that her going off in that taxi?"

"Yeah. That's her."

"That is the steward, you dumb egg!" rasped Bob.

"You don't say." Wilson's eyes nearly popped out of his head. "Who would have thought it?"

"Go book a room in this hotel for two," ordered Bob. "And try to get the room next to 210, and don't tell everybody your business. Look like a travelling salesman. I'll be back."

Bob tailed the taxi for some distance. Vilma alighted and began to look at shops. Up drove a car, and Vilma entered it and was driven away. At traffic lights Bob got held up and cursed heartily at losing his quarry. He returned to the hotel, and was glad to find that Wilson had secured Room 209. He found Wilson sprawled on the bed fast asleep.

"You're a fine assistant."

"Sorry, Bob, but I've done so much running about I'm worn out," apologised Wilson. "Besides, what could I have done?"

"Found out what's happening in the next room."

Actually, the girl was in Recard's room, and was sitting on a settee with his arms round her.

"Thank goodness I got rid of Vilma," Recard smiled at her boldly. "Her jealousy nearly drives me crazy. After this deal is through I finish with her. There is someone else who means a lot to me. You say that Sanderson will see me. When we get that formula we can ask any price. I'll divorce Vilma and you and I can live in wealth and comfort for the rest of our lives."

"There will be no more bloodshed, Jule?"

"Accidents happen sometimes."

"Like Jack Lynch?"

"He would have spoilt our plans." Recard shrugged his shoulders. "What is one Federal Agent more or less? That reminds me of something important. You say you were disturbed in Lynch's rooms, but you had not found anything. I want you to go back there again and look for some gramophone records."

"Gramophone records?" questioned the girl.

"I have found out that Lynch was often experimenting with records, and, according to his landlady, talking to himself. Maybe some of those records may prove interesting. I must not leave a scrap of evidence against us."

"What Lynch found out might ruin your plans?"

"He knew too much, so that was why he had to go."

"You are very ruthless, Jule." Her eyes watched him intently, but she freed herself as he would have drawn her closer. "If I'm going to get these records I must go now."

When the girl left Recard's room she did not know the door of 209 was slightly ajar.

"I'm going to follow the girl," Bob Woods told Wilson. "Whilst I'm away bide your chance, and when Recard goes out of his room, slip in and fix dictaphones. Don't fail me, Wilson."

"It's as good as done."

Bob Woods was able to follow the girl easily, and when she headed for Cedarville he had a good idea of her destination.

Twenty-four Hours

THE girl had the key that she had been given by Recard, who had got it from the body of Lynch.

Swiftly she closed the door and switched on the light. She went to the gramophone and took out the records. She did not notice a faint movement of the curtains of the window that led to the fire-escape.

Very methodically she went through all the records, and it was not till almost the end that she came to the record of Lynch's own making. She clung to the gramophone cabinet as if she felt faint. Quietly the curtains were pushed to one side, and Bob Woods stood there and watched her.

"Found what you wanted, sister?"

She spun round with a gasp of dismay.

"You!"

"A clever gag with those beads." Bob was watching her every move. "Suppose you thought you had thrown me off the trail, but it takes a lot to get rid of me. Just keep your hand away from the pocket of your coat. I hate to use a gun on a woman, but in necessity one has to be quite callous."

"I have no gun," she answered him.

"A pity you didn't accept my offer to work with me." He lit a cigarette. "What do you know of the death of Jack Lynch?"

The girl shot him a startled glance. "I don't believe what you told me about working for another syndicate is true. Who are you?"

Bob Woods showed her his badge. "You're a Federal Agent!" "I am!" His voice hardened. "And now you'd better talk, sister. I want to know what you know about Jack Lynch."

Again she avoided the question. "You think I'm working for Recard, don't you? Would it surprise you to know I hate him?"

Bob Woods came closer so he could see her better. This girl was not only good-looking, but she did not look like a wrong 'un. Her face might be set in hard lines, but the gaze from the blue eyes never wavered from his. He did not know what to make of her, though he had to admit she was uncommonly attractive, and felt sure that if she were to smile she would be most appealing. He squared his shoulders—if he were not careful he would be getting sentimental.

His voice became gruff.

"I'm listening."
"I hate Recard more than any person in the world." As she spoke those blue eyes never faltered. "What I'm doing may seem very suspicious, but I have a reason. Recard is a crook and a dastardly scoundrel, and it is my aim to bring him to justice. If you persist in interfering you will ruin all my schemes."

"Who are you?"

"My Christian name is Helen, my surname is my affair," she said fiercely. "But I swear that I'm not trying to aid and abet Recard, but luring a rascal into a trap. Give me twenty-four hours and I can succeed in my plans. Interfere and Recard is more than likely to get away with Sanderson's secret formula, and if that should get into unscrupulous hands you know what that would mean. Sanderson has discovered an explosive that is four times as destructive as anything ever discovered before. Please trust me."

By rights Woods ought to have arrested this mystery girl, but she seemed so in earnest that he hesitated. From his pocket he produced the strap of her handbag.

"I disturbed you the other day, and when I saw your handbag in the lobby of the hotel I knew you were the young woman who got away down that fire-escape. What did you want then and now from Lynch's apartment?"

"For many months your department has wanted to lay hands on Recard and men like him," was her reply.

"But there are many scoundrels who know how to evade the law. You might arrest Recard for the murder of Lynch, but you would have difficulty in pinning the crime on to him. You would have to let him go free. I'm out to get Recard so that he will not go free, but if I'm to obtain the evidence that is necessary I must have a free hand."

"I asked you before what you know of Lynch's death."

"I know Recard was responsible, but I have no proof, though he has boasted of men he has killed. Give me twenty-four hours and Recard shall not escape."

"Very well—twenty-four hours," Bob Woods decided. "I've never done anything like this in all the ten years I've worked for the department, and if my chief knew he would say I was crazy, but somehow you've succeeded in convincing me that you're on the level. I will hold up on my investigations. My name is Bob Woods, and you can get in touch with me at the Santa Barbara Hotel. I'm risking my job in letting you do this, and risking the chance of letting a scoundrel slip through my fingers, but you must have some magnetic will that makes me act this way."

The girl held out her hand.

"I won't fail you."

Bob gripped it.

"You have a grudge against Recard. Care to tell me?"

"At the end of the twenty-four hours you shall know why I hate him so. No person can hate him as much as I do."

"Jack Lynch was my friend." Bob walked towards the window. "If you fail I swear I will not rest till I have avenged his death. Why you should have a prior claim I cannot imagine, but a girl like you would not be taking all this risk unless your reasons were very great. Therefore, Helen, for twenty-four hours you have a free hand. I will leave by the escape."

It was not very long after that the girl left the block of flats. A taxi took her to the outskirts of the city. She told the driver to wait at some cross-roads, whilst she walked briskly down the quietest of the roads to a house surrounded by a high hedge. The house was in a bad state of repair and looked deserted. The girl had a key, and with a glance round to see she was not followed, let herself into a deserted hall.

She knocked at a door and entered when there was no answer. A bed was in one corner, and there were a few sticks of furniture. She looked round and satisfied the person she sought was not there, went back into the hall and up some stairs. She did not walk on tiptoe, but if well used to this old mansion, and was not afraid of being heard. After going down a number of corridors she came to some big doors, which she unlocked with another key.

A sort of lounge with stairs leading downwards into darkness. She touched a switch and a light appeared below. Eagerly she hastened down the stairs. There was an earthy, peculiar smell. She rapped at a door, and when there came no answer, placed her hands against the door. She knew the secret of that door which had no handle, because it swung back. The room beyond was a laboratory. Everywhere were benches loaded with queer retorts and vessels. Something spluttered in a pan, under which flickered a blue flame. On one side were great steel doors. The smell of chemicals was very strong. On a bench was a keyboard, and she pressed a button, and immediately a red light appeared over the steel doors.

"You asked for this, flat-foot, and you deserve all that's coming to you!" cried Helen.

A moment later there came a rumbling and one of the doors rolled back, and thick smoke rolled sluggishly into the laboratory. Out of this murk appeared a masked and goggled figure. The door rolled back, shutting out the foul fumes. The mask and goggles were removed to reveal an old man with sharp, shrewd eyes. The very long nose and the almost bald head gave Sanderson the appearance of an owl.

"You quite startled me, my dear. I was not expecting anybody. Nothing wrong, I hope?"

"No, professor. I called to say that Recard has the money and we can sell him the formula some time tomorrow."

"I wrote to the authorities and they did not even bother to send anyone even to investigate." The professor looked worried. "I wonder if I'm right in letting this formula fall into foreign hands? You are sure this man represents the League of Nations?"

"Your formula will not fall into the hands of anyone who will throw the world into another terrible war," the girl cried. "You can rely on that. Where is the formula?"

"It is complete." Sanderson pointed. "It is in that safe over in the corner."

"Good!" Helen looked at the steel doors. "Are you any farther advanced with the new gas you are trying to make?"

"I have succeeded beyond my wildest dreams." The professor walked across to some levers. "I am able to fill those chambers with any sort of gases and be able to extract the most deadly fumes by means of touching these levers. All that remains is just waste material."

"Could a person live in it after you have released the fumes?"

"No; not even with this apparatus," answered the professor. "I could live for a little while, but soon I should suffocate. It would be a slow and very unpleasant death. Tell me, my dear, when will Recard come here to buy the formula?"

"Tomorrow night, so there is no need for you to work any more to-day. You must rest yourself." Her eyes seemed to stare at those steel doors as if they fascinated her. "I can take you back into town with me."

There was a curious glint in those blue eyes as the girl assisted the old professor into the waiting car. Her zero hour was at hand.

Silenced

BOB WOODS called himself all kinds of an idiot because he had been influenced by a pretty face. He had promised to do nothing for twenty-four hours because this girl hinted that she had a prior claim. What did he know about the mysterious Helen? He was greatly attracted by her, but women, with their smiles and beguiling ways, had bluffed far cleverer men than himself. He decided to go back to the hotel and talk the matter over with Wilson.

Of course, Wilson would call him a sap, especially as the nit-wit had been tricked by Vilma Santos. Bob decided that he would use his discretion about discussing the matter with Wilson; he wondered if his assistant had succeeded in fixing a dictaphone.

It did not surprise Bob to find Wilson sprawled on the bed. Always sleeping. But he saw the earphones and knew that Wilson had succeeded in planting dictaphones.

"What luck, old timer?" he asked as he washed his hands.

September 26th, 1933.

There came no answer.

"Wake up, you old scoundrel," Bob called. "You can't sleep all the day."

Bob dried his hands and went over to the bed. This sleeping habit of Wilson's was getting beyond a joke. Important information might have come through, and Wilson not taking it.

"Wake up!" shouted Bob, and gave Wilson a shove.

To his surprise, Wilson rolled off the bed and lay there sprawled out. Puzzled, he stared down, and suddenly noted the pallor of his assistant's cheeks. With a sharp intake of breath he went down on his knees and shook Wilson roughly. A touch on the cheek and he drew back his hand with sudden dread.

It was now that he observed that the wires from the headpieces seemed to be round Wilson's throat. With hands that shook he turned over the body and knew that his companion was dead. He had been throttled to death. With difficulty he freed the wires and tried artificial respiration, but Wilson did not respond.

There was a grim, hard look on Bob's face as he got up and followed the wire to the wall. It was cut, but he found a place where a hole had been drilled near the door. Quietly he went out into the passage and noted a similar hole on the door of 210. He had a shrewd idea of all that had occurred. Wilson had planted his dictaphone, and either the wires, the holes in the door, or the instrument had been seen by Recard. Recard had entered 209 and killed Wilson.

Bob tried the door of 210 and found it open. It did not surprise him to find the room empty—the occupant had gone and taken all his luggage. From a picture hung part of a dictaphone, and a fierce grin came to Bob's face as he saw it—Recard had guessed he would enter 210, and had left it as a sign of mocking defiance.

No good wasting time here—something had to be done. He thought suddenly of the girl. She must have been in on this killing. If only he could find her! He went back to his room to stare down at the body of Wilson. First Lynch and now Wilson—their deaths had got to be avenged.

Suddenly he dropped on his knees because he had noticed something protruding from the hand of the dead man. Just the edge of a piece of paper. He forced open the fingers and drew forth a crumpled ball. It seemed to be blank, but the agents often used an invisible ink. He smoothed out the paper, and from a drawer took out a flat instrument which he plugged into the wall. At once a powerful light ray appeared, and on placing the paper over it, he was able to see a message:

"Recard seeing Sanderson to-night. Some dame, not Vilma Santos, has made contact for Recard with Sanderson. Recard plans to quit hotel. Has a hide-out at the Haven, in Yellowstone Park Avenue."

The girl had double-crossed him. She must have been wise all the time. Directly he had left her in Lynch's flat she had probably rung Recard. How they must have laughed!

Captured

ON leaving the hotel Recard had gone to a small restaurant to meet the girl, and he was inclined to be sharp because she kept him waiting. She stated that she had tried every record, but there was only music on all of them. She had ransacked the place and found nothing that could incriminate Recard.

They left the restaurant and went to the house in Yellowstone Park Avenue, and as they entered by the front door the bushes close at hand parted and Bob Woods peered forth. The agent was an expert at opening windows and soon found a means of egress into the house. Hidden behind a curtain, he was witness of a scene between Recard and his wife.

"Why have you brought this creature here?" demanded the jealous Vilma Santos.

"Vilma, will you hold your tongue?" Recard shouted.

"How dare you speak to me like that?" the woman countered. "Why is she here?"

"Because I can't contact Sanderson without her," Recard exclaimed. "She is his representative. It's not my fault that Sanderson does his business through a girl. But without her I can't buy the formula. Now do you understand?"

"I don't trust her," muttered Vilma. "It wouldn't surprise me if she was a Federal Agent."

"What right have you to say that?" demanded the girl. "I work for Sanderson, and I draw a commission on the deal. The higher the price the higher my commission. We tried the Government and they wouldn't even bother to send a representative. I've got no love for them, so it's absurd to make out I'm a Federal Agent."

"Vilma, I can't have my plans spoilt by disputes and suspicions," Recard argued. "Everything is set. Helen is taking me—"

"So you use her Christian name?"

"And why not?" Recard almost foamed at the mouth. "We have been negotiating and arguing over the price for the formula for days and weeks, so why shouldn't I? My dear, you carry your suspicions too far. One day I may lose my temper."

"And then what would you do?" His face contorted, but it ended in a smile.

"I should regain my temper and tell you not to be foolish." He held up his hand. "No more argument, please. Everything is arranged. I am going in a few minutes to see Professor Sanderson, and if the complete formula is handed to me I shall then conduct this lady to the house of a banker, where I will hand over the price named."

All this while Mullins, who was Recard's radio operator and right-hand man, had listened with an evil grin on his unhealthy features. He knew very well that Recard aimed to walk out on Vilma at the first opportunity, and if she made any trouble it would be just too bad for her. Recard aimed to get the formula, the girl and not pay Sanderson a cent. Once the formula was in his possession Recard could snap his fingers at Sanderson. The girl would have to obey orders or else be framed, but as Recard imagined Helen to be in love with him he had no fears about her.

"You'll come back here?" asked Vilma.

"No. I have fixed a meeting-place with Mullins," instructed Recard. "I want Mullins to help you in destroying all evidence in this house. The wireless must be smashed. Directly it is dark you will leave, and I propose to meet you at midnight. Then we will travel south."

"Who are 'we'?"

"You and I, my dear, with Mullins as the discreet chauffeur," Recard said

Who was the secret leader of the desperadoes who were terrorising the Valley of the Pecos? That was the riddle which a young Texas Ranger was detailed to solve. Ride with him to the tune of hammering hoofs and blazing guns, and follow his gripping adventures in this mighty serial drama of action and romance

EPISODE 8—

"The Indian Attack"

READ THIS FIRST

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way to the Valley. Doing, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delancy, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Old Grayson is murdered the next day, and leaves Mary a wallet containing the map of a secret gold mine. Later, a railroad agent makes Mary an offer for her land, and she is on the point of signing away the property when an outlaw bullet smashed a lamp and caused the agent to sink to the floor.

Immediately afterwards the Phantom appears on the scene, but falls from his horse as two more shots ring out at close quarters.

Now Read On

The Wallet Disappears

"GOT him!"

The words were spoken simultaneously by the gangsters known as Gabe and Keeler, but they speedily discovered that they were mistaken, for in tumbling from his horse the Phantom had merely sought to deceive them, and now, from the cover of a clump of shrubs, their supposed victim opened fire on them with an accuracy that threw them into a panic.

The first shot blistered Keeler's cheek, and his second cut a hole in the sleeve of Gabe's shirt. In another moment the two outlaws were veering away from the ranch-house porch and sprinting in the direction of the thickets where they had parted with Dirk and the rest of the gang.

Crouching amidst the shrubbery into which he had plunged, the Phantom accelerated the departure of the fugitives with two more slugs that kicked up the dust at their heels. Then he saw the Grayson punchers come swarming from the bunkhouse, to be met with a volley from Dirk and his men.

The ranch-hands were forced to retreat into their quarters again, and thus Gabe and Keeler were enabled to rejoin the remainder of the outlaw band. Meanwhile, over at the principal building of the Grayson outfit, Mary had appeared at the front door with Helen Moore, Judge Holmes and Harvey Delancy, and from his covert in the shrubbery the Phantom obtained a clear view of them as they peered across at the thickets on the south side of the property.

The Phantom himself was not visible to the eyes of Mary and her companions. Nor did he attempt to show himself, but, striking off through the bushes, worked round to the rear of the ranch-house and slipped into the dwelling by a back door.

A few seconds afterwards he was in the lounge where Mary had been on the point of signing the railroad company's agreement when Keeler's six-gun had interrupted negotiations.

The lounge was in darkness, but, accustomed to the gloom, the Phantom perceived the body of a man lying on the floor, and recognised Blake. The latter had obviously been struck down by the same bullet that had smashed the lamp.

The Phantom knelt beside the railroad agent, and gave vent to an exclamation of relief as he discovered that the man was still alive, though unconscious and severely wounded. Then he turned towards the table, and spying the wallet that contained the chart of the Grayson gold mine, he snatched this up with a rapid gesture and thrust it into his pocket.

A moment later Buck Grant, alias the Phantom, was hurrying out of the room again, but as he emerged found that he was seen by a scared housemaid who was descending from her bed-room with a naphtha lamp clutched in one trembling hand.

The maid uttered a shriek, and the sound lent added speed to Buck's exit. He was clear of the house in the twinkling of an eye, and dodging forth through the kitchen doorway, he spied his bronc Silver some forty or fifty yards from the building.

The animal was standing near a barn, to which it had trotted when its master had flung himself from the saddle, and Buck dashed towards the creature. As he ran he heard the frightened maid shrieking at the top of her voice inside the ranch-house, and guessed that her cries would bring

September 26th, 1936.

Mary back into the dwelling from the front door.

His guess was right. Followed by Delaney, Helen Moore and Judge Holmes, Mary came rushing into the hall and seized the hysterical housemaid by the arm.

"What's wrong, Lizzie?" she demanded. "What are you screaming for?"

"A ghost!" was the shrill response. "I've just seen a ghost! All in white, he was—from head to foot!"

"The Phantom!" barked Delaney. "Which way did he go? Mary, tell this fool of a girl to pull herself together!"

"A ghost!" Lizzie repeated wildly. "I've just seen him! He went out through the back door!"

Harvey Delaney made for the kitchen, and Holmes accompanied him. As they stumbled out of the house they obtained an impression of a robed figure mounting a silver-grey brone in the vicinity of the barn, and Delaney promptly tugged out a six-gun.

He was prevented from using it by Holmes.

"Hold on, Harvey," the older man protested. "The Phantom is a friend."

"You think so?" Delaney snapped. "Then how do you account for him shooting out the light in the lounge just now?"

"He didn't do that," the judge retorted. "It was one of those two fellows we spotted from the front door—the men who were heading for the thickets."

"And the Phantom was in cahoots with them," Harvey Delaney ground out. "I'd gamble on that, judge. Let go of my arm and give me a chance to pick him off."

But Holmes would not release him willingly, and by the time that the big cattleman had wrenched free, the Phantom had spurred off across the range, vanishing beyond a fold in the landscape, and it was in a disgruntled fashion that he jammed his forty-five back into its holster and returned to the hall with the judge.

They found Mary and Helen doing their best to pacify the abject Lizzie. At the same time they heard a smattering of gunplay coming from the direction of the bunkhouse, where the Grayson cowboys were answering the fire that had been opened up on them from the brushwood thickets, but the shooting was dying down as Delaney addressed the girl who had inherited the Hidden Valley ranch.

"It was the Phantom all right, Mary," he declared, "and, though Holmes won't agree with me, I think he's a wrong 'un."

"How can you say that, Harvey?" the girl exclaimed in a harassed tone. "Anybody who has ever had any dealings with him will tell you that he's on the side of law and order."

"He may appear to be," Delaney grunted. "But if he's an honest man why does he have to go around hiding his identity by a mask and a cloak? No, Mary, he's not a friend, and I'll stake my last cent that he was behind those men who surprised us from the lounge—the men who shattered the light and drilled Blake!"

Mary cried out at that.

"Blake!" she ejaculated. "I—I'd forgotten him! Yes—he cried out, didn't he? He must have been hit!"

She took the naphtha lamp from the quaking grasp of her maid, and together with Helen, Delaney and Holmes she tottered into the lounge.

There lay the railroad agent, and with a look of concern on her pretty face Mary dropped to her knees beside him. She was joined in this attitude by Harvey Delaney and the judge, who lost no time in examining the wounded man.

"I think he'll be all right," Holmes said at length, "but he's pretty badly hurt, and we'd better send for a doctor."

It was at this moment that there was a tramping of feet on the porch, and immediately afterwards Mary's foreman entered the house with some of the boys, Spooky being amongst them. "What happened, ma'am?" the foreman queried huskily. "We heard shots, and when we came outa the bunkhouse we was met by a volley that drove us back inside. Then we started to blaze at the thickets, and whoever the hombres were that had opened up on us, they cleared off pretty soon."

"It was some kind of an attack by outlaws, Steve," Mary answered. "I don't know what their game was, but they got Mr. Blake here, and you'd better take him upstairs to one of the spare rooms. Spooky, you and Bob give Steve a hand. Slim, you ride to town and fetch the doctor. The rest of you go back to your quarters, but be ready for trouble, in case those outlaws show up again."

Her instructions were obeyed, and it was while Blake was being carried up to bed that Harvey Delaney spoke once more.

"Is anything missing from this room, Mary?" he asked grimly.

The girl looked at him quickly, and then her eyes travelled towards the table at which she and her companions had been gathered when Keeler's gunshot had blasted out the light and struck down the railroad agent.

The deed which she had been about to sign was still there. The pen that she had been in the act of wielding was lying beside it, just as she had dropped it when the lamp had been extinguished.

"No," she began. "I—"

And then she stopped, for suddenly she remembered the pocket-book that contained the chart of her father's gold mine.

"The wallet!" she gasped. "I left it on the table, and it's gone!"

"I thought so," Harvey Delaney breathed. "And the Phantom was the man who took it, for your maid saw him coming out of this room. Now maybe you'll believe that he's a crook and that he was in league with those two men who made off into the brush."

Mary stared at the table in silence, her face pale, an expression of uncertainty in her eyes.

"I—I can't understand it," she faltered. "It—it just doesn't make sense. Judge Holmes, you told me that the wallet was given to you by the Phantom with a request that you would keep it safely for me until I wanted it."

"That's right, Mary," Holmes answered. "At least, it was sent to me with a covering note that purported to be from the Phantom."

"And yet the Phantom came here to-night and stole it," the girl said. "What kind of game is he playing?"

The judge looked at her helplessly, with the air of a man completely bewildered, though he had a shrewd notion of the truth.

"I have no explanation to offer, Mary," he murmured, "but somehow I can't bring myself to accept Delaney's theory that the Phantom was operating with the men who shot Blake and who scuttled off into the brushwood, where they apparently had a bunch of accomplices waiting for them."

"If you ask me," Helen Moore interposed, "the Phantom scared off those men whom we saw, judge. I wonder if they'll come back with their confederates and start some more trouble?"

Had she but known it, there was small fear of that, for the outlaws were at present riding in a south-easterly direction in the hope of picking up the trail of the Phantom, whose flight from the ranch-house they had witnessed.

They were not successful in their purpose, however, and after wasting a full hour in reconnoitring the country between Hidden Valley and the Pecos River they set out for their lair in the heart of the mountains.

Some time later they might have been seen drawing rein at the lonely cabin which was their hide-out, and as they dismounted from their ponies Dirk spoke in a lugubrious voice.

"I wonder if the boss has got here yet," he said. "I ain't looking forward to meetin' him—without that wallet he sent us to get."

His comrades exchanged uneasy glances with him, and then the whole gang filed into the cabin. As they crossed the threshold they found a lamp burning at a low glimmer in the front room, and by the thievish light of it saw an indistinct figure standing in one of the farthest corners.

It was the figure of the man who was their chief, and Dirk proceeded to address him sheepishly, but had not been talking for long when the gang leader cut in on him in harsh accents.

"Never mind the alibis, Dirk," he spured. "You slipped up on the job, and all of you are to blame as much as Gabe and Keeler. You let the Phantom put one over on you—that's the long and short of it."

"We did the best we could, boss," Dirk expostulated, "and the boys will bear me out when I tell you that we hunted high an' low for that Phantom after we saw him ride away from the Grayson ranch. I'm tellin' you, boss, we did our level best."

The leader of the gang ripped out an oath.

"Your level best!" he blazed. "That's always your lame excuse. Well, it looks to me like I'll have to get some new men to help you make good."

"New men?" Dirk echoed. "Where you gonna get 'em?"

"That's my business," was the curt rejoinder. "But get them I will. Meantime, you'd better lie low until you hear from me again."

With those words he thrust his way through the pack of ruffians and slammed out of the cabin. Then, striding round to a lean-to that was attached to the dwelling, he led forth a sorrel pony and swung himself astride the animal.

A moment afterwards he was spurring savagely from the ravine in which the gang's hide-out was situated, and once clear of the canyon, he struck due north through the hills.

Delaney Sets a Trap

THE following morning Spooky slipped away from the Hidden Valley outfit and rode over to Dry Creek, where Buck Grant's homestead was located, and it was as the little Ranger was reining up outside the shack that his six-foot comrade appeared on the threshold.

"Hallo, Buck," Spooky greeted him cheerfully. "How's tricks?"

"Fine and dandy," the big fellow answered. "It's kinda lucky I showed up at the Grayson ranch last night. I reckon those outlaws would have got the wallet if I hadn't been on hand."

His partner nodded.

"You're right," he agreed. "But what do you intend to do with that wallet now? Turn it over to Judge Holmes again?"

"No," Buck replied. "I've been thinking things over, and I believe it will be safer with me than with anybody else."

"It might be even safer with me," observed Spooky, "especially if the outlaws happen to discover that you were the Phantom."

Buck looked at him quickly, and seemed to ponder the other Ranger's suggestion. Then he produced the wallet and passed it up to Spooky.

"Not a bad idea, pal," he declared. "You'd be the last person in the world that anyone would suspect. Okay, you take care of it—for a while, at any rate."

Spooky placed the wallet in his hip pocket, and then, after a brief silence, he volunteered another comment.

"We oughta put Mary Grayson wise, somehow," he murmured. "I don't mean we should tell her that I'm holdin' the wallet, but we could let her know that it's in safe-keepin'. Suppose you write a note to her, settin' her mind at rest."

Once again Buck showed approval, and when Spooky left the cabin some time later he was the bearer of a message that his comrade had printed in pencil; a message which he carried back to the Hidden Valley ranch, and which he handed to Mary Grayson a few minutes after his arrival there.

He found her in the lounge, and, delivering the note, which was enclosed in an envelope, he told her a trumped-up story of how he had come across it. "I was over at the barn just now and saw this pinned to the door," he stated. "It's addressed to you, Miss Mary."

The girl took the missive and ripped open the envelope, and, watching her, Spooky noted the expression of tense interest that dawned on her lovely features as she read the epistle. Then, all at once she rose from the couch on which she had been sitting, and, hastening out into the hall, she called Helen Moore by name.

The latter soon presented herself in the lounge, and Mary was in the act of divulging the contents of the note she had received when Lizzie, the housemaid, came into the room and announced Judge Holmes and Harvey Delaney.

Within a few seconds the judge and the neighbouring cattleman were entering the apartment in which Mary, Helen and Spooky were standing.

"Good-morning, Mary," Holmes began in his fatherly way. "I thought I'd drop in on you and see how things were, and it seems Harvey here was of the same mind. We met on the trail."

"I'm glad you came, judge," Mary said, "for I have news for you. Spooky found a note pinned on the barn door. It's from the Phantom, and must have been left by him last night, I suppose."

Both Holmes and Delaney immediately showed signs of curiosity, and listened attentively as the girl provided them with the gist of the message.

"The Phantom says that I've no need to worry," she told them. "He's going to take care of the wallet for me, and assures me that it will be quite safe with him."

Delaney frowned at that.

"And you mean to say, Mary," he exclaimed, "that you're willing to take it for granted that the wallet will be safe with him? Why, you're crazy! What's his idea in doing so?"

"This note makes his motive perfectly clear," Mary retorted. "His aim is to prevent the outlaws from getting it, of course."

Harvey Delaney seemed far from satisfied. His strong, keen face wore a look of impatience.

"If you ask me," he said, "the Phantom wrote that message as a bluff, in order to prevent you from taking any steps to recover the chart of your father's mine. No doubt, while you're sitting quietly at home and making no effort to get the wallet, he'll jump that hidden claim and enrich himself by it."

"Harvey," Mary rejoined, "I don't know who the Phantom is, but I feel certain you're doing him an injustice. He's acted too honourably in the past to turn around and rob me of any part of my inheritance."

"In any case," she added, "what steps could I take to recover that wallet, even if I questioned his honesty? Why should he take the trouble to write a note setting my mind at rest if he means to steal my father's gold mine? I've no means of bringing the law on him, when I haven't the vaguest idea who he is."

Delaney moved a step nearer to her, and when he spoke to her again it was in a voice that was low and significant.

"But supposing you suspected his identity," he said, "and supposing you were to lay a trap that would put your suspicions to the crucial test?"

The girl stared at him in a puzzled fashion. So did Helen Moore, Judge Holmes and Spooky.

"What do you mean, Harvey?" Mary demanded. "Do you suspect someone of being the Phantom Rider?"

Delaney answered her tersely.

"Yes," he rapped out. "I think Buck Grant and the Phantom Rider are one and the same man!"

Holmes and Spooky exchanged a swift glance, and then, looking at Mary and Helen, they saw the amazement that was written on the faces of the two girls.

"It's close on time," the cattleman said. "Now to see if the Phantom Rider shows up."

"Grant and the Phantom both appeared in this country about the same time," Delaney went on in an emphatic tone, "and to my mind, Grant's behaviour hasn't been straightforward. Anyway, I'd like a chance to prove my theory."

Hotly resenting the insinuation that Buck was a questionable character, Mary speedily made it clear that the young "nester" from Dry Creek occupied a high place in her esteem.

Delaney, however, was stubbornly intractable, and was arguing with the girl in a dogged manner when Judge Holmes broke in on the discussion.

"You say you'd like a chance to prove your theory, Harvey," he remarked. "Have you any plan in mind?"

"Yes, I have," the other man replied. "If a message was sent to Grant telling him that an attack was expected here—and if the Phantom showed up in response to such a message—that would establish my suspicious pretty conclusively, wouldn't it?"

"I'll be no party to a scheme like that," Mary interposed angrily, but the judge laid a hand on her arm.

"Harvey Delaney may be right, Mary," he told her. "I've heard the same theory expressed by other folks, and, though I very much doubt it myself, I think we might put it to the test. Spooky here could carry the message, and drop it in at Grant's cabin."

He looked at the little fellow meaningfully as he spoke, and received an understanding glance in return. Then Delaney proceeded to scrawl a somewhat mysterious note which stated that an outlaw raid would be launched on the Grayson ranch at three o'clock that afternoon.

"Leave this at Grant's homestead," he said at length, tendering Spooky the missive, "but don't let him see you if you can help it."

Spooky nodded, and went outside to his horse, but, as he was preparing to mount, Judge Holmes followed him out of the ranch-house and addressed him in an undertone.

"I thought it might be as well to fall in with Delaney's suggestion, Spooky," he whispered. "You can put Buck wise, and he can kill, once and for all, this rumour that he is the Phantom."

"He'll kill it all right, judge," the little fellow murmured, and an instant later he was clapping his heels to the flanks of his pony.

Holmes stood watching him for a minute or two as he galloped across the range, and then he retraced his steps into the ranch-house and joined Delaney and the girls again, walking into the lounge just as Mary was making a caustic remark to her neighbour.

"Well, Harvey," she was saying, "since you've chosen to use my house as a bait to prove your suspicions, I suppose I'll have to invite you to stay to lunch."

Delaney grinned at her. "Either that, or I'll break into the larder," he declared. "I'm going to be pretty hungry long before three o'clock, the time scheduled for the imaginary attack."

Judge Holmes scolded him on that score, and so Mary and Helen had company for the midday meal: a meal over which they lingered so long that the hands of the clock in the dining-room were pointing to the time of two-thirty when they eventually rose from the table.

With half an hour to wait, the two men and the two girls drifted back into the lounge, and here Delaney took the liberty of throwing the windows wide open. Then he assumed a position whence he was able to command a view of the country to the south.

Mary, Helen and Judge Holmes moved over to the windows as well, and they remained there while the minutes dragged by, till it seemed as if they had been gazing across the range for an eternity. But at last Delaney took out his watch, and, after glancing at it, uttered a grunt of anticipation.

"It's close on time," the cattleman said. "Now to see if the Phantom Rider shows up."

Scarcely were the words spoken when the figure of a horseman burst out of the brushwood thickets some distance from the ranch and began to career along the fringe of them. He was a horseman who forked the saddle of a white mustang, and who wore a voluminous cloak and a kerchief that concealed his features, and at sight of him Delaney gave vent to a triumphant cry.

"Friends," he ejaculated, "the Phantom! And right on the dot! Now do you deny that he and Grant are one and the same?"

Judge Holmes remained silent. As for Helen and Mary, they appeared to be denied the power of speech, and were still staring mutely in the direction of the thickets when the voice of Lizzie, the housemaid, became audible.

"Mr. Grant to see you, Miss Mary."

The quartet at the window spun round, and saw Lizzie draw aside from the threshold of the lounge to admit Buck, who was immediately aware of the astonished expression on Harvey Delaney's countenance.

Thunderstruck, crestfallen, Delaney gaped at the big fellow from Dry Creek, and then looked through the windows again to catch a final glimpse of the robed figure on the white horse as the latter re-entered the thickets. A moment afterwards the tall cattleman was listening to Buck's drawling tones.

"Looks like somebody has been playin' a joke on me," Buck observed. "I expected the ranch to be surrounded by outlaws. Can anyone explain this note to me?"

"You'd better ask Mr. Delaney," Mary answered, shooting a glance at the discomfited rancher who was her neighbour. "It was his idea."

Harvey Delaney eyed Buck sheepishly, and noticed that he was fingering the missive that Spooky had been instructed to deliver.

"Forget it, Grant," the cattleman said. "It was just a little misunderstanding, but it's all straightened out now."

He turned and picked up his hat, and then, making some reference to a certain business appointment that he had at his ranch, he made his way towards the door.

Helen and Mary accompanied him as far as the porch, both of them being anxious to show that they were not "bad friends" with him on account of what had happened, and it was during the brief absence of the two girls that Holmes spoke in an aside to Buck.

"Who was the bogus Phantom Rider we just saw on the edge of the brush?" he asked. "Spooky?"

"Sure," Buck declared. "As soon as he gave me the low-down I told him he'd better take my place."

"And where did he pick up the white bronc? That wasn't your horse, Silver."

"No," Buck said with a smile. "That's where the laugh comes in. Spooky lifted it from the north pasture of the Delaney ranch. He'll be on his way back there with it now."

Holmes chuckled softly, but managed to subdue his mirth when Helen and Mary reappeared in the lounge, and a little while later announced that he must return to town.

Departing, he left Buck with the two girls, and soon after the judge had gone Helen Moore went upstairs to attend to Blake, the railroad agent, who was still lying in the room to which he had been carried the previous night.

Buck, therefore, found himself alone with Mary, and was engaged in conversation with her when Spooky showed up at the outfit. Then, with the afternoon wearing on, the stalwart nester from Dry Creek suggested to his hostess that a gallop across the range would not come amiss.

It was a proposal to which Mary readily assented, and before long the two of them were riding off through Hidden Valley, little dreaming that ere they saw the Grayson ranch again they were to figure in an unexpected adventure.

Redskin Allies

ABOUT the time that Buck and Mary set out to enjoy a gallop across the range, a crowd of men might have been seen outside a remote cabin in the hills.

The men in question were the outlaws who had been terrorising Beuson County, and the cabin was their hide-away and rendezvous. It was here that Dirk had put in an appearance after a brief interview with the mysterious leader of the gang, and from the saddle of his horse he was now repeating his chief's orders to the other members of the band.

"The boss wants us to run off a bunch of Mary Grayson's cattle," he declared. "They're located on the prairie west of Sandstone Bluff, and there's three punchers in charge of 'em."

"Sandstone Bluff?" echoed Keeler. "That's pretty close to the ranch, ain't it? We're liable to have the whole outfit down on us before we get far away with the herd."

"No," Dirk retorted. "The boss has decided on his new men. They'll cover our raid and hold up the main body of the Grayson cowboys if the alarm is given."

The other rustlers looked at one another, and then the ruffian known as Gabe voiced a query.

"Who are the new men?" he demanded.

"Red Eagle and his renegades, from the reservation. Yep—Indians. The boss has sent word to them to meet us near their camp."

"Can we bank on them?" another of the outlaws growled.

"Sure," answered Dirk. "Red Eagle's father is friendly to white folks—realises there ain't no sense in bein' anything else. But Red Eagle and some of the young braves are allus ready for trouble, especially if there's any dough in it. Come on, you fellows had better mount up. We've a lotta ridin' to do."

The rest of the gangsters were soon astride their ponies, and at the head of the outlaw band Dirk then led the way through the hills, striking deeper into the barren fastnesses of the mountain country until an hour later he espied another group of horsemen approaching from the opposite direction.

They were Indians of a degenerate breed, rigged out incongruously in garments that were a compromise between the picturesque attire of their forefathers and the clothing of civilisation. They were armed, too, with revolvers of the latest pattern, traded to them secretly by whites who had ignored the regulations of the Government.

Civilisation had done little to improve

"FEDERAL AGENT"

in a soft, quiet tone of voice. "It will be a second honeymoon."

"I would like a few words with you, Jule," insisted Vilma. "It will be as well if we go to the laboratory. We can talk and then you can help me destroy everything. Mullins had better come with us."

"Will you please wait here?" Recard smiled at the girl as he followed his wife.

The girl gasped when the curtains parted and there stood Bob Woods.

"You promised me twenty-four hours."

"You tricked me," Bob countered. "It was all lies that you told me. Swearing to hate Recard, when all the time you're planning to go off with him. It's plain you aim to rob Sanderson of his formula, and then vamoose south with Recard with not only the formula, but the money."

"Not so loud—they'll hear you." The girl had gone very white. "I swear I hate Recard. Your coming here is likely to ruin everything. Why didn't you trust me?"

"Because I got back to the Santa Barbara to find my friend dead—throttled."

"You mean they killed Wilson?" the girl gasped. "I did not know. After leaving Lynch's room I met Recard by appointment—I did not even tell him of the gramophone record. I know nothing of your assistant's death. You must believe me, because I have Recard almost in my power. Do not ruin everything now."

"I've had enough of this," rasped Woods. "I've got you all in this dump and I reckon I can pin enough on all of you. I'm going to ring the police and get a flying squad here."

"Don't touch that 'phone!" begged the girl. "It's connected with Recard's laboratory."

But Bob Woods had taken the receiver from its hook. He raised the 'phone as if about to call a number and all he heard was an insistent buzzing. He hung up and stared at the girl.

"I wish I could believe you."

"They're coming down the stairs," whispered the girl. "You're trapped! Your only chance is to play up to me." She laid a finger on her lips, and then raised her voice. "Thought yourself clever, trailing us here. Well, you've been a bit too clever. I've tricked you into warning my friends."

"Keep still!" came the voice of Recard from behind heavy curtains. "One move and you're a dead man. Better raise your hands."

Slowly Bob raised his hands. The curtains were flung back, and Recard, Mullins and Vilma came into the room.

"Well done, Helen," approved Recard. "And now, Mr. Agent, have you anything to say before I shoot?"

"You don't think I should have walked into this dump without protecting myself," sneered Woods. "I've got other men besides Wilson trailing me."

"Better kill him," hissed Vilma.

"Search him," ordered Recard to Mullins.

Mullins frisked Woods and removed a gun, whilst Recard kept the Federal Agent covered.

"What are you going to do with him?" demanded Vilma Santos.

"We do not want to leave anything in this house that might be used against us," softly spoke Recard. "Mullins, get some rope and lash our friend to that chair." He turned to the woman. "As arranged, you and Mullins will finish the work of destruction, you will then take this interfering fool of a policeman out to the saloon car—I am using the open tourer. Mullins knows what to do with this man when San Francisco has been left many miles behind. I can leave this to you, Mullins."

"It'll be a pleasure, boss."

"You had better keep a close eye on him," Recard went on. "He must not escape. Vilma, you had better get back to the laboratory. I will go now to see Sanderson."

"Yes, we mustn't waste any more time." It was Helen, and she looked intently at the bound man. "You asked for this, flat-foot, and you deserve all that's coming to you." In her hand she had secreted a knife, and she walked across to the chair. She laughed harshly. "I hope you have a pleasant ride. I'm almost sorry I shan't be with you, but I've got a date with Sanderson. As you're not long for this world I'll tell you his hide-out. It is near the Junction crossroads, and Sanderson lives in the old deserted Blue Mill." Her laugh was shrill.

Recard laughed. Little did he know that as the girl stood by the chair of the bound man her hand slid down towards his hands that were bound behind the chair-back.

The girl laughed again and moved away from the chair to stand beside Recard.

"We mustn't keep Sanderson waiting," she hinted.

Bob Woods was alone with Mullins, who sat on a chair with a gun on his knee, and leered at the man he was soon going to kill, whilst upstairs came the sounds of crashing glass—Vilma was smashing up the laboratory and the radio. All the while the Federal Agent was saying at the bonds that secured his wrists.

Fortune favoured him, because Vilma Santos came to the top of the stairs and shouted to Mullins to come and help her. The task was more than she could manage.

When Mullins came back he stared at the chair aghast—it was empty. He had scarce got over his surprise when the gun was wrenched from his hands and powerful fingers were locked round his throat.

Mullins managed to break free, and then a mighty fist landed to the point of the jaw. He went down like a felled ox.

Vilma Santos heard the scuffling and came running down the stairs. Her eyes widened at sight of a battered Mullins sprawled at the foot of the stairs. One wrist was circled by a handcuff. Bob showed no mercy, and seized her before she could escape.

She screamed and tried to bite and claw, but his hands were like steel. There was a click, and then Bob stood back to survey his work. There was a handcuff on both their wrists, and the chain went between the stout iron banisters.

"You two can stay there till I come back for you," he mocked. "I might add, madam, that I'm doing you a service. Recard intended to walk out on you for that other dame, and never intended to meet you at midnight. Mullins would have met Recard and the girl later, but you wouldn't have been with them. I trust your darling Jule had not planned the same end for you as he had for me. Now I must leave you two for a while. I hope you have a nice friendly talk whilst I'm gone."

As Bob tore through the night he prayed he would reach the Blue Mill in time.

Helen in Her True Colours

ON arrival at the Blue Mill Helen admitted Recard to the old house.

The crook kept his hand near his hip, as if suspicious of a trap.

"This place seems deserted."

"It suited the professor," explained the girl. "Somebody was killed here, and as a result they can never let the place. The professor got it very cheap, and I don't suppose anyone knows he comes here as this road is seldom used—it leads to a disused quarry. Apart from this room"—she opened a door—"the whole house is bare, except for the cellars. Professor Sanderson is evidently down in the cellars, where he has done all his experiments."

Assured that all was well, Recard allowed the girl to lead him through the old place. She knocked at the doors of the laboratory, and when there was no answer, entered. She disappeared into the blackness and a light was switched on.

Recard looked round. This was evidently the place where Sanderson carried out his experiments.

"Where is the professor?"

"Like all professors very bad on appointments," Helen answered. "I told him that you would be here about nine. He's bound to be here at any moment. At any rate, while we're waiting you can have a look at the formula. The old fool trusts me with all his keys."

From the safe she took out a thick roll of parchment and handed it to Recard.

"With your knowledge of chemistry you should be able to understand this. Anything you don't fathom the professor will tell you when he arrives. There is a bench over there."

Recard unfolded the roll of parchment and smoothed it out on the bench. He was so eager that he did not observe the fierce light that blazed in the girl's eyes.

After a while Recard looked round.

"I can't make much of this," he said.

"You're sure it is the formula?"

"No, that isn't the formula." The girl's hand came from behind her back and it held a gun. "I've got you at last, Recard!"

"What do you mean?"

"You're at my mercy."

"So you are a double-crossing Federal Agent?"

"No, I'm Helen Lynch!" she cried.

"The sister of Jack Lynch, the man you murdered by shooting in the back."

Recard gaped at her as if he could not believe what he had heard.

"My brother told me a lot about the Sanderson case, and it was I who managed to find this hide-out of the professor's," Helen told him. "When you murdered my brother I swore to get even, and got the professor to act as a go-between." She gave a short, bitter laugh. "I learnt something of the secrets of this laboratory and what is behind those steel doors."

Recard looked at the doors and they seemed to fill his evil soul with terror.

"What do you want of me?"

"I'm going to hand out to you the fate you deserve." Still keeping him covered she moved across the laboratory. "When I press on this lever these doors swing back; when they close it is a slow death by suffocation for anyone that is imprisoned."

"You mean——"

"That like a rat you can die," Helen shouted. "You showed my brother no mercy and now it's your turn. You killed Wilson Well, you can think of my brother, Wilson, and others that you have murdered as slowly you begin to suffocate."

"You'll go to the chair for this."

"That wouldn't worry me, but they may never find out. This shall be the perfect crime. I've told Professor Sanderson that it is to-morrow you buy the formula. You came here a day before and it is obvious that you have tried to steal the formula. Somehow you enter the gas chamber and stumbling against a lever close the doors, trapping yourself. You fail to escape and die miserably."

"Think of the money you are going to lose." Recard's eyes took in the whole place for some means of attacking this girl. "Besides, I didn't kill your brother."

"You gave the orders."

"I gave orders for Lynch to be stopped. Lynch would not stop and in the gun fight was——"

"Shot in the back," Helen interrupted. "Lies won't save you, Recard. You'll tell me in a moment you didn't tell that skunk Mullins to murder that Federal Agent. It may interest you to know that whilst I was talking I slipped him a knife, and if I know anything of him Mullins and your wife will be his prisoners."

"So you've been double-crossing me all the time?" He made a step forward as if he would leap at her.

The gun never wavered.

"Another step, Recard, and this gun goes off. I know how to handle a gun and I can't miss."

Recard hesitated. If he tried a rush she would fire and fire to kill. If he were not to die a horrible death he must find some way immediately. If he could think of nothing, then he would hurl himself at her on the chance that she was taken by surprise. He was standing near the long laboratory bench, and he wondered if there was time to grab one of these glass vessels and hurl it at her—he dismissed the idea as hopeless. It was then that he noticed at the end of the bench the light switch.

"You can't kill me like this without giving me a chance." He began to talk to gain time. He held out his hands pleadingly, and managed to edge along the floor. Helen did not suspect because though she saw him move slightly it did not bring him any nearer to her. "I got a right to live," he shouted. "Lynch had shot many of my men, and it he had stopped when ordered he would have been alive to-day."

"Did you give that chance to Wilson?"

"I told one of my men to put him to sleep," lied Recard. "And the fool strangled him. Was that my fault?"

"You're gaining nothing, Recard." Helen began to press on the lever. "Either be shot down or get behind these doors."

His hand slid forward and next moment the laboratory was in darkness.

Recard bent double as Helen fired. The bullet passed over him, and before she could fire again he had flung himself forward to scize her by the wrist. The gun exploded harmlessly again, and then Helen gave a cry of agony as Recard brutally twisted her arm, forcing her to let go of the weapon.

A Fight to a Finish

BOB WOODS found the cross roads, but it was some little while before he came to the Blue Mill.

It was a gloomy old place. He tried the front door and found it locked. Actually, Recard had shot the bolt when Helen had not been watching. Easy for Bob to have broken down the door, but the noise would have warned Recard.

A tour of the house revealed wooden planks laid over some sort of coal chute. They removed easily enough, and a flash of his torch revealed a door into the house.

The sound of two shots and a woman's scream startled him. Helen was in danger. Quickly he dropped down and ran to the door, which was bolted, but his weight soon burst it open. He guessed he would not have been heard because of the noise coming from somewhere close at hand. He heard Helen scream again. With the aid of his torch he picked his way down a gloomy, dirty passage until he came to high doors. He placed his ear to the keyhole.

"I've got you now, my pretty." It was the voice of Recard. "No one ever double-crosses me and gets away with it. You want me to suffocate to death, and so, pretty lady, I guess you can sample some of your own medicine."

Very quietly Bob turned the handle and breathed a sigh of relief that the door was not locked. Moreover, the hinges did not squeak, and he was able to creep into the laboratory like a shadow. A moon cast a fitful shadow and Bob could vaguely glimpse two people struggling on the floor.

"One move and I'll throttle you like I did Wilson," snarled Recard. "Now you're going to tell me how to work these cursed doors—tell me the way to kill you."

Groping fingers found the switch and the laboratory was flooded with light. Bob Woods hurled himself forward at Recard's back.

Though Recard was winded he fought desperately. His clawing hands tried to get at the pistol, but Bob managed to kick it into a corner. Helen crawled away and watched the fight with agonised eyes. It never occurred to her to try to get the gun—she was too absorbed in the fight.

The two men were on their feet, and how her heart leapt as Woods got in a terrific punch to Recard's jaw. Recard went down, but he was game. Out went a leg as the Federal Agent rushed and down sprawled his enemy. Now it was his turn to rush, but Bob Woods doubled his feet under him and shot them out like pistons into the other's chest.

A table covered with bottles and paraphernalia crashed over, and the two men rolled amongst the broken glass. They staggered up, and faced each other before attempting to attack. Suddenly Recard darted to a table and swung up a huge glass jar. The Agent dodged and the jar smashed to pieces against the wall. Locked in each other's arms they rolled over the floor, with each trying to get uppermost. A punch below the belt caused Bob to relax his grip and Recard wriggled free. He grabbed up a chair with the full intention of smashing it down on his victim.

"Look out, Bob!" screamed Helen. Bob Woods twisted sideways and the chair crashed on the floor, but when Recard swung up the chair for another blow a fist with the force of a mighty battering ram behind it caught Recard and hurled him back. The crook staggered into the long bench that was loaded with test-tubes, retorts, bottles, jars and beakers. The whole lot went over with a sickening crash, and Helen thought that the fight was over, but desperation often lends a man strength. Recard staggered to his feet, his face streaming with blood, and screaming curses rushed forward.

"Take that, you rat!" shouted Bob, and his right landed with a thud to the point of the jaw.

Recard was hurled back to crash once more into the debris. Fear and rage seemed to drive the man mad, and though his hands were cut and bleeding he began to pick up broken bottles to throw at Bob, who had hard work dodging the missiles. Then the crook found an iron bar and tried to smash Bob over the head.

Strong hands wrenched the weapon away and Bob crashed a right and left to the jaw. This time Recard crashed against a cupboard that was loaded with bottles. They smashed and instantly white fumes burst forth.

"It's gas!" screamed Helen. "It's deadly!"

Bob would have rushed forward to try to help the wretched Recard, but Helen grabbed his arm.

"One whiff of that and you haven't a chance." Her voice was shrill with fear. "Come away before it is too late."

The blows that Recard had showered on her and the mental strain were too much for her, and Bob was just in time to catch her in his arms. Some more of the bottles exploded and there was an ominous sizzling noise. A flicker of flame showed in the dense fumes, which were moving towards him like a cloud.

Bob Woods decided that the best thing was to get out of the Blue Mill, and quickly.

But that was far from a simple matter. There was a sharp report and in a flash the choking fumes surrounded them. They coughed and spluttered. They tripped over a smashed table and sprawled on the floor, and when Woods got to his feet his outstretched hands could not find the girl.

"Where are you?" he gasped out.

A faint cry was his answer.

Stooping, he groped about the floor till he found her. The gases were making him faint and dizzy, but somehow he managed to pick up the half-fainting girl in his arms. Now he had no idea which was the way out of the laboratory till another sharp explosion gave him a rough idea of his bearings. What a relief to find himself out in a passage. Now he could use his torch.

A glance back showed that the laboratory was in flames, and he did not know how soon it would be before the explosives would go up like a volcano. At last he reached the chute, and he was in such an exhausted condition that he had to rest to get back his strength. Luckily, the air revived the girl, so that she was able with his assistance to clamber upwards. A moment later they were in the garden. They raced to the car, and scarce had they reached it when the Blue Mill rocked under a violent explosion.

"Best thing we can do is to get a call through to the fire squad," decided Bob. "That place will be ablaze in two shakes. Way goes old Sanderson's formula."

"MURDER ON A BRIDLE PATH"

"He's the one that did it!" he cried. "I tell you he killed her!"

"Aw, you're crazy!" roared the stable manager. "You're trying to hang it on to me."

"Quiet!" thundered Piper. "What are you three doing here?"

Barbara was the first to speak.

"Go on, Eddie," she said, "you'd better tell him."

"All right," Eddie stepped forward. "You see, Violet gave this fellow Wells nine hundred dollars."

"What!" howled Piper.

"We found an entry in her diary," Eddie held out the little book Barbara had taken from a drawer of the dressing-table in the bed-room of the flat. He pointed to an entry which Piper read aloud:

"Gave Latigo nine hundred dollars to put on Wallaby."

Why didn't you tell me about this before?"

"Well," Eddie replied, "we didn't think it was important."

"Oh, again you didn't think it was important!" raged the inspector, and whirled round on Wells. "Well, Mr. Latigo Wells, it looks like you've got some explaining to do. She gave you the money, and when she couldn't get it back you killed her."

Miss Withers sailed along the yard, and he shouted to her above the trembling manager's protests:

"I think we've got him, Hildegarde."

"Wait a minute," said she importantly. "I want to tell you something."

He stepped aside with her, and a whispered conversation ensued, during which Eddie and Barbara looked at one another and at Don.

Finally Piper stalked over to Don.

"Oh, Gregg," he said in an ominously quiet voice, "where did you go when you left the Turkish baths?"

"Why, I had my breakfast there," was the reply, "and then I went to the flat."

"What are you lying for? You tried to rent a horse to follow Violet Feverel. Why did you want to follow her?"

A telephone bell shrilled in the office, and Wells made a movement which was instantly stayed by the inspector.

"I'll take it," said Miss Withers. "I'll tell them you're in conference, Mr. Wells."

She sped off down the yard, and Piper faced Don again.

"You may as well spill it, Gregg," he gritted. "A wrecked bicycle was found near the spot where the girl was killed."

"So what?" challenged Don.

"That bicycle was stolen from across the street, and you were seen doing it. A little piece of cloth was caught in the sprocket wheel—dark cloth!" Piper picked up the skirt of Don's overcoat and found a little tear in it—a tear on which all eyes became focused.

"Say, wait a minute—" Don began hoarsely.

But Piper would not listen.

"When you couldn't rent a horse," he accused sternly, "you stole a bicycle, and you just happened to ride in the park where Violet Feverel was murdered."

"I did follow her," admitted Don frantically. "But I never saw her. I ran into a tree—"

Miss Withers came running up, a trifle scant of breath.

"It was Mr. Schultz, the handwriting expert," she panted.

"What did he want?" snapped Piper.

"He says," replied Miss Withers, "that the forged court order was in Pat Gregg's handwriting."

Piper emitted an ejaculation that sounded uncommonly like an oath.

"Well, how'd you like that?" he howled. "So your father forged the court order, eh, Gregg? Well, maybe you'll talk now, and maybe your father'll talk. Kane, get another car from headquarters and take 'em out to the Gregg home, all of 'em."

"Yes, sir," said Kane dutifully, and he made use of the telephone in the office.

The Knotted Sheet

DAYLIGHT had faded into dusk when the squad car containing Detective-Inspector Piper and Miss Withers drew up outside the front steps of the ugly house on Long Island, and in the gloom the place bore a more sinister aspect than ever.

The two descended from the car and ascended to the porch, but a repeated ringing of the bell and pounding of the knocker failed to elicit any response from within.

"Nobody home!" growled Piper.

"If I lived in a place like this," commented Miss Withers, "I wouldn't stay home, either."

"Well, a locked house never stopped me yet," Piper boasted. "If there's anyone in there at all, I'm going to sneak up on them."

He went off to look for an unfastened window, and presently Miss Withers tried the handle of the door, and found that the door would open.

She stepped rather timorously into the hall, which was in darkness, and she had groped her way to the stairs when she heard a crash in the back parlour. Piper had found one of its windows unfastened and had raised the sash and climbed in over the sill; but he had blundered against a table which overturned, and as he fell to the floor with it he had caught his hand in the shade of a reading-lamp, which had been sent flying.

He was rising to his feet and flinging the lampshade from him when Miss Withers reached the doorway of the room and cried out in a voice she herself did not recognise:

"Stand still, I've got you covered!"

Piper stood perfectly still, and then she found the switch and flooded the room with light.

"Relax, Hildegarde, relax," rebuked Piper, not without relief, and in some embarrassment she dropped the hand she had been pointing as though it were a gun.

In the hall he switched on more lights. "The place seems kind of empty," he remarked. "I wonder where everybody is."

"I don't know," she said; "but old man Gregg's home, that's a cinch. Come on."

They climbed the stairs together. "How did you get in, anyway?" asked Piper.

"The door wasn't locked," she replied, and it was his turn to feel foolish.

The door of Patrick Gregg's bedroom was wide open when they reached it, but the bed was empty.

"He's gone!" exclaimed Piper blankly.

"Right again, Osear," said Miss Withers.

"Do you suppose somebody could have tipped him off we were coming?" "It's possible," she conceded, "but I have an idea where he might be."

She led the way up the second flight of stairs and she pointed mutely to the closed door of the room in which she had looked through a telescope.

Piper opened the door and she reached round it to switch on the lights. Patrick Gregg was in the chair behind the desk in his dressing-gown, his face flat upon its leatherette surface, one arm close to his head, the other stretched out towards an inkstand as though it had fallen away from the telescope.

Piper felt for a pulse which had long since ceased to beat, and Miss Withers explained about the telescope.

"Umph!" grunted the inspector. "Looking at the races this afternoon, that's what did it. The doctor said he couldn't stand any excitement." He snapped thumb and finger in annoyance. "He would have to pop off at a time like this."

"I'm not so sure he popped off," said Miss Withers, and that caused him to examine the body more closely. Presently he went down on his knees, and he found red marks round the old man's bare ankles.

"Looks as though they've been tied," he said, and rose thoughtfully. "You know, Hildegarde, he might have been murdered at that. But how did he—"

"I think I know," she interrupted. "Come on!"

They descended to the bed-room, and there she pointed out some sand upon the carpet, near the bed, which she had noticed that morning.

"If he had been sandbagged," she said, "it wouldn't show more than a lump on his head, would it? And look!"

She pulled out the bottom of a sheet, the corner of which was knotted.

"It was like that this morning," she said.

"Knotted!" exclaimed Piper. "And his ankles are chafed! That might mean that somebody—"

He broke off to look up at the ceiling. There were heavy beams across it, and in one of the beams there was a big hook—almost directly over the bed.

"Look!" he cried, and stood up on the bed to examine the hook. It had been pulled out of shape as though by a weight almost too much for it.

"Something's been tied around here!" he proclaimed excitedly.

Miss Withers stared from the knotted sheet to the hook.

"Osear," she said suddenly, "he dreamt he was swinging like a pendulum—he told me so! Somebody tried to kill him this morning! He was hit on the back of the head with a sandbag and hung up there by his heels!"

"Uhuh!" Piper got down from the bed. "That would make the blood run into his head so it would look like he had a stroke."

"Whoever did it," decided Miss Withers, "tried it this morning, but something happened, so they came back this afternoon."

"Yeah," objected Piper, "but if he was killed here how did his body get up in that turret room?"

"Must have been carried there," she replied, "so that it would look as if the excitement of the races killed him."

"You've got it!"

A sound down in the hall as of a door being closed sent them out on to the landing, and over the banisters Piper caught sight of Thomas, who had stared at the squad car in the drive before he entered the house.

"Oh, it's you, is it?" shouted the inspector, and swept down the stairs. "Where've you been?"

Thomas stopped short, holding his bowler hat between his hands.

"Is anything wrong, sir?" he asked.

"Never mind that," snapped Piper.

"Where've you been?"

"Mr. Gregg said I might go to the races, sir, at Belmont Park," the butler replied.

"Oh, he did, eh? What time did you leave the house?"

"Why, it—it was shortly after lunch, sir. Pardon me, but are you alone in the house?"

"Why?" demanded Piper sharply.

"Mr. Gregg's up in his room, isn't he?"

"Yes, sir, of course." The butler appeared to be worried. "I was wondering where Joey was."

"Joey?"

"That's the cripple boy who works here," explained Miss Withers, who had followed the inspector down. "He opened the door this morning."

"Oh, yeah," Piper remembered.

"Was he here when you left?"

"Yes, sir, he was," Thomas replied.

"I'm his father, you know. The boy is not well, but there's no harm in him. Mr. Gregg will tell you—"

"Mr. Gregg won't tell me anything!" rasped Piper. "He's dead!"

"Dead?" The butler looked flabbergasted. "Why—why I—I left him all right this afternoon. Poor Master Don, he'll be broken up over this. He'll regret the quarrel."

"What quarrel?" Piper almost shouted.

"Oh, nothing, sir—nothing."

"Come on, what quarrel? What was it about?"

Thomas bit his lip and stared at Miss Withers, who was regarding him intently.

"It—it was— Well, Mr. Gregg thought Master Don had killed Miss Violet," he mumbled.

"He did, eh? What made him think that?"

"I can't imagine, sir."

"Listen, the—" The strident note of a motor horn out in the drive caused the inspector to break off abruptly. "Wait a minute!" he commanded. "I'll attend to that—and you stay right here!"

He went to the front door, opened it, and strode out on to the porch.

"By the way, Thomas," said Miss Withers in a friendly sort of fashion, "who won the big handicap?"

"Wallaby, ma'am," replied the butler.

"Did you have a bet on him?"

"I would have liked to, ma'am."

"Anyone who did have a bet on him won a lot of money, didn't they?"

"Yes," replied Thomas, "a lot of money."

Despite the inspector's instructions he walked slowly up the stairs, and she did not try to stop him. But after he had disappeared round the bend at the half-landing she, too, slowly ascended.

Caught!

THE car which had arrived in the drive was the one Kane had obtained from headquarters, and it contained Don Gregg, Barbara, Eddie Fry, and Latigo Wells—to say nothing of several plain-clothes men.

On Piper's instructions the four were marched into the hall, Kane bringing up the rear, and there Eddie Fry looked at Don and said:

"Gregg, I think we ought to tell him everything."

"I do, too," declared Barbara.

"Well, somebody'd better tell me something!" snarled Piper. "What is it?"

Eddie held out a very small piece of paper.

"It's a page that Don tore out of Violet's diary," he said. "She hated old man Gregg. She says on it that she'd like to kill him."

Piper snatched at the paper, read what was written on it, and held it behind his back.

"But somebody killed her first, eh?" he said caustically. "Maybe it was the same person that had a quarrel with your father this morning, Gregg!"

"I don't see—" Don began angrily.

"Oh, you don't see, eh?" roared Piper. "Where were you this afternoon before I saw you at the stables?"

"I spent the afternoon with these people," Don indicated Eddie and Barbara, and Eddie nodded confirmation.

"You were pretty sore at your father, weren't you?" said Piper. "Were you sore enough to kill him?"

"Kill him?" gasped Don

"We found your father upstairs, dead!"

By the time Miss Withers had reached the hallway of the first floor Thomas had disappeared. She was looking about her when a shuffling sound on the upper stairs caused her to turn about, and she saw the cripple limping downwards.

She met him at the bottom of the flight, and he started slightly as she faced him.

"Where have you been, Joey?" she inquired.

"Upstairs, ma'am," he replied.

"What were you doing up there?"

"That's where I live—me and my father."

She raised her brows a trifle, but forbore to ask any more questions.

"All right, Joey," she said, and watched him as he limped away to the landing and went down the lower stairs.

In the hall Piper was blazing at Don Gregg when the cripple endeavoured to slip past him.

"Hi, you!" bellowed the detective.

"Where're you going?"

"To the stables, sir," was the reply.

"Well, forget about the stables! Stick around here!"

Joey's rather wild eyes were rebellious, but he leaned against the wall, not daring to disobey the police.

Miss Withers heard the harsh command, then crept up the second flight of stairs. Beyond the room in which Patrick Gregg was sprawled dead across his desk there were five more stairs, and at the top of them a door. She opened the door and slipped into a bedroom obviously under the roof of the turret.

The ceiling sloped down on either side of it, as she discovered after she had switched on a light, and it was very meagrely furnished. Near the window there was a double bed, and near the door there was a dressing-table of stained deal. In the wall which had no slope there was a cupboard, and she opened its door.

On the floor inside lay a long and narrow bag from which sand had leaked, and in a corner an air rifle was propped against the wall.

She backed out from the cupboard and went to the dressing-table, and she did not notice that the door of the room, which she had closed, was now open a couple of inches.

On the dressing-table, beside a candlestick, there was a cardboard box. She opened the box and from it poured some BB shots into the palm of her gloved hand and studied them.

She was putting the shots back into the box when the door swung wide, and she turned to see the butler standing there with a most malignant expression on his thin face.

"Thomas!" she gasped.

"Did you call, ma'am?"

She was far too scared to answer, and she shrank against the wall as he closed the door and leaned menacingly over the side of the dressing-table.

"You know, don't you?" he said, the light of madness in his staring eyes.

"You know everything?"

With one claw-like hand outstretched, he moved round the dressing-table, and from behind it and the wall snatched up an object that made her shudder—a garden hoe with a horseshoe wired to its blade. She was in deadly fear of her own life, but she found her voice.

"So that's how you killed Violet Feverel?" she said, almost in a whisper.

"Yes," he returned, raising the strange weapon, "but you'll never tell a soul, because you'll never get out of this room alive!"

Down in the hall, Piper had accused Don Gregg of having had a violent quarrel with his father in the morning.

"What was it about?" he demanded.

"Nothing important," stated Don.

"That isn't what Thomas told me."

"Thomas?" the young man echoed in surprise.

"Yeah, he told me all about it."

Don became furious at what he considered to be a piece of treachery.

"Well, did he tell you he was the one that got me out of gaol?" he stormed.

"Oh," drawled Piper, "so it was Thomas?"

He scratched first his chin and then the back of his neck.

"Well, now, that's funny," he mused.

There was nothing funny to Miss Withers about Thomas' revelations, up in the room under the roof of the turret. She listened because she had to listen, but her heart was pounding against her ribs.

"My son was crippled," the butler stated fiercely, "by one of that old man's horses. I saved and saved for years and years so that he could be cured, and then I gave nine hundred dollars to old man Gregg to bet on Wallaby because that would have made it enough. But he stole it. He gave it to Violet Feverel for Don's alimony!"

His voice rose to a shriek.

"I went to her, after he had told me, but she laughed at me. I got 'em both—Violet Feverel in the park, and old man Gregg in his bed!"

Maniacal laughter filled the room.

"I carried him up to his study so that he could see the horses for ever and ever and ever!"

Raising the hoe above his head by its handle, he struck suddenly, but Miss Withers ducked in time to evade the blow and flew out past him on to the landing.

"Oscar!" she screamed at the top of her voice. "Oscar!"

Thomas rushed out at her, aiming another blow at her head, but again she evaded the horrible weapon, and she stumbled down the stairs with the madman after her. On the floor below he reached over the banisters to hurl the thing at her, but the banisters gave way and he pitched headlong downwards, screeching horribly, and fell in a crumpled heap almost at Piper's feet.

On the following afternoon Miss Withers leaned forward in a chair at the end of the inspector's desk in his office at headquarters. Eddie Fry and Barbara had got married that morning, and were on their way to Canada for their honeymoon, but there was still something on the spinster's mind.

"There's one remaining point I'd like cleared up," she said.

"What?" asked Piper.

She took a briar pipe from her hand-bag and pushed it across the desk to him.

"The owner of that pipe has false teeth, but Thomas' teeth were his own

—such as they were—discoloured and decayed for anyone to see. Yet I found that pipe in the park near the body!"

"So you think the murderer must be still at large, after all?" suggested Piper with playful sarcasm.

"Oscar," she chided, "I'm not all that funny!"

Dr. Charles Bloom walked into the room, and Piper held up the pipe.

"Hallo, doc," he said. "Ever see that before?"

The medical examiner took the pipe, and one glance at it was enough.

"Why, yes," he exclaimed, "it's mine! I've been looking for it ever since yesterday morning. Thanks!"

"Wait a minute, doc," chuckled Piper. "You've got some questions to answer. Miss Withers suspects that you don't eat apples. You'd better have a good answer!"

The doctor turned with quite an annoyed expression on his face to the funder of the pipe.

"The answer, Miss Withers," he said stiffly, "is apple-sauce!"

He went straight out, his head in the air, and Piper roared with laughter.

"Trying to pin a murder on the medical examiner!" he gurgled.

Miss Withers promptly whisked a cigar from a box on the desk and jabbed it into his open mouth.

"FEDERAL AGENT"

"The formula is at a bank—it is quite safe," gasped Helen.

"Well, why did you take Recard to the Blue Mill?" Bob demanded.

"Because I wanted to kill him," answered the girl. "Because he killed my brother, Jack."

"So you're Helen Lynch!" burred Bob. "I knew there was something about your face that was familiar—it was the eyes. Mighty good thing, young lady, I showed up, and Recard got the better of you. You can't go handing out justice that way, though that skunk deserved all that came to him."

After Vilma and Mullins had been handed over to the police and Bob had had a talk with Professor Sanderson on the right person to see in regard to the formula there seemed nothing more to do but go and watch the Blue Mill blazing merrily.

"Helen!" Bob had his arm through hers. "You're alone in the world now, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Are you in a job?"

"I was, but I resigned after Jack died."

"Well, I've got a month's vacation that's starting right now," Bob cried. "I'm going to write my report to-night and post it in the morning, and I'm going to assure head office that for a month I'm going to be missing. I'm going on my honeymoon."

"Who with?" Helen tried to free her arm.

"With you, stupid," Bob grinned. "And I'm marrying you directly after breakfast before you have a chance to change your mind."

"THE PHANTOM RIDER"

these Indians—had merely sapped such qualities as their race had formerly possessed, and added new vices to their old ones so that they were ripe for any mischief—and typical of the harm thus wrought amongst a once-proud people was the young brave who commanded this particular party.

He was Red Eagle, a lean, swarthy native with shifty eyes and a face that was ravaged by the effects of whisky. Indeed, his breath stank of the raw spirit as he drew rein before Dirk and lifted a hand in salute.

"I come with my friends here in answer to message," he said. "We slip away from Indian village, and take care that my father, the old chief, does not see us. Him no' like make trouble. Old people all the same—they no' like trouble."

"But you don't mind trouble so long as the pay is good, huh?" Dirk commented with a leer. "Okay, Red Eagle, you'll get plenty of dough if you do as I tell you. Now listen."

He began to make the situation clear to the wayward son of the old Indian chief, and, when the renegades had learned the part that they were to play, they and their allies took the trail that led to Sandstone Bluff.

They rode at a brisk pace, and before the sun had gone down beyond the western peaks of the Guadalupe mountains, they were in sight of their destination—a sweep-of-prairie sloping away from the bluff, and dotted with steers which were peacefully grazing.

Three cowboys were guarding the scattered herd, and Dirk and his cronies did not anticipate much trouble from these. A single volley and the punchers would probably ride for their lives. So the outlaws imagined, at any rate.

"Come on, men," Dirk rapped out, and with a jab of his spurs he sent his horse bounding from a strip of forest through which the rustlers had made their way.

The scoundrelly whites whom he commanded were quick to follow his example, and, meanwhile, in accordance with the pre-arranged plan, the pack of renegade Indians moved northward to the edge of the wood under Red Eagle's leadership—there to take up a position and beat off any of the Grayson hands who might come from the direction of the ranch.

Before the renegades had reached the northern fringe of the timber, shots were ringing out across the expanse of prairie on which the Hidden Valley beeves were feeding. They threw the herd into confusion. But, contrary to expectations, they did not put to flight the three punchers who were in charge of the steers, for these promptly drew their forty-fives and answered the challenge of the gangsters' fusillade.

It was at this very moment that a man and a girl hove into view on the brow of a low ridge to the north-west, and with the blasts of the revolvers resounding in their ears the two of them pulled up abruptly.

The man and the girl were Buck Grant and Mary Grayson, homeward bound from their gallop across the range, and as they beheld Dirk and his associates bearing down on the stampeding drove of cattle they looked at each other quickly.

"Rustlers!" Buck ejaculated. "And operating in broad daylight! They've got their nerve!"

"I'll say they have," Mary cried. "The ranch is only just beyond Sandstone Bluff there, and my cowboys are bound to hear the shooting."

Buck gripped her by the arm.

"Maybe not," he said. "You head for the outfit and send 'em out here. This is no place for you, anyway."

"What are you going to do?" the girl demanded.

"Give those three herdsmen of yours a little support," was the reply. "I reckon they'll need it. Go on now, you get going."

Mary was loath to leave him, believing that he and the three punchers down on the prairie were likely to meet their death at the hands of the outlaws. But he prevailed upon her to ride for the ranch and give the alarm, and as she began to spur in the direction of her home he galloped to the aid of the men who were facing the onset of the charging outlaws.

and avoid disappointment?

Before Buck had covered a hundred yards of ground, however, he looked back to see if Mary were still making for the ranch that lay beyond the bluff, and, as he turned his head, he at once became aware that she was in danger.

Two renegade Indians were careering in pursuit of her—ruffians who seemed to spring from nowhere; or so it appeared to Buck, who knew nothing of the party which was lurking in the wood.

They had been ordered by Red Eagle to seize Mary, and they were gaining on her rapidly. Consequently, Buck wheeled around and abandoned his former intention of going to the assistance of the three cowboys in charge of the herd, riding to the rescue of the girl instead.

Never before had he taxed his brone, Silver, as he did now, and, leaning forward in the saddle, uttering words of encouragement in the pony's ears, he urged the gallant creature over the mesquite at breakneck speed to take up the chase of the renegades who were out to secure Mary Grayson.

He had not gone far when he realised that he himself had been marked down for pursuit—by two more renegade Indians who suddenly debouched from that wood where, if Buck had only known it, the band of braves under Red Eagle's command were lying in concealment.

Menaced as he was by these unexpected foes, the big Ranger concentrated his attention on the pair of rogues who were striving to overtake Mary, and, though they were making up on her, their horses were no match for Silver. Therefore, Buck was soon abreast of the hindmost of the girl's pursuers, and with a powerful back-handed blow he knocked the fellow clean off his mustang's back.

With a hoarse cry the Redskin plunged to the dust, and the shout that broke from his lips as he fell caused his accomplice to look round sharply. In another instant the latter was tugging out a six-gun, and, still riding at top pace, he tried to drill Buck through the body at point-blank range.

Luckily the white man was within reach of him ere it was possible for him to draw trigger, and, catching him by the wrist with one hand and gripping him by the throat with the other, he succeeded in unhorsing him—though at the cost of parting company with his own brone.

Both men crashed to earth, and the gun flew from the renegade's hand. Then, rolling asunder, they picked themselves up and launched a simultaneous attack, the Redskin leaping at his antagonist pantherishly, but meeting an Anglo-Saxon uppercut that grassed him in the twinkling of an eye.

But, in the meantime, the second pair of Indians who had dashed from the cover of the wood were coming up fast, and with savage yells they sprang from their ponies and closed with Buck, to be joined within a few seconds by the brave whom the Ranger had first assailed.

Some distance away, Mary Grayson brought her horse to a standstill and looked back to see her protector battling furiously with his enemies—saw the dust rising from their feet in clouds as they staggered from side to side in their life-and-death struggle. Then, all at once, Buck seemed to wrench himself free with a tremendous effort, and, swinging his fists, he scattered the three renegades who had been grappling with him.

At that same instant, however, Mary detected a movement on the part of the Indian who had gone down from Buck's uppercut a minute before, and a thrill of horror coursed through her as she saw him scramble to his feet and pluck out a wicked-looking knife whose blade glinted sinisterly in the rays of the setting sun.

"Buck!" Mary screamed, and then covered her face with her hands as the murderous Redskin pounced on the white man from behind.

A DRAMA OF TRAIN WRECKERS

A detective finds a murdered man in his room at his hotel, but when he summons the officials the body has vanished. They suggest hallucinations, but next day he is involved in a train wreck and he sees the dead man in the flames. A gripping thriller, starring Edmund Lowe and Constance Cummings

The Body that Disappeared

JOHN HARWOOD staggered up the stairs of his hotel. He was a little sick of Nice and its everlasting gaieties. That night there had been a big Carnival Ball, and trying to get the festive spirit, he had mingled with the crowds in the guise of Mephistopheles. The American knew no one in Nice, and as a result had drowned his sorrows in more wine than was good for him. He wished the dickens that Felton would turn up so they could leave Nice and be on their way to England and eventually Scotland.

Harwood was the European agent of a big American detective agency, and he had gone to Nice for a holiday. Whilst there he had received instructions that his services were required for the unravelling of a jewel theft in Scotland, and that he was to wait there for Felton, the representative of an insurance company. The necklace lost by Lady Morland, who was an American, was of great value, and the insurance company insisted upon sending a representative. As a result Harwood had to hang around Nice.

On reaching his room he had some difficulty in fitting the key into the lock, but managed it at last. He staggered inside and then pulled up in surprise at sight of a weird thing sprawled across a table.

Harwood laughed. He remembered quite clearly where he had seen this person before. It was the man who occupied the next room. Harwood had got his devil's tail jammed in his own door, and had left the doorkey in his suit. The man next door, wearing the guise of a monk with a monstrosity of a cardboard head mask, had opened the door with his own key. Harwood chuckled again because they had had several drinks together until the surging crowds had parted them. Apparently, the monk had come to Harwood's room for a drink, and had fallen into a tipsy sleep.

"I'll mix you a corpse reviver," cried Harwood.

There came no answer from the unexpected guest. "Must make it pretty strong," Harwood muttered. "Seems to be out." After a certain amount of trouble he mixed a very strong drink and swayed across the room. "Drink this, old boy." He slapped the man on the shoulder. "Do you a power of good."

There came no response, so Harwood slapped the man a trifle harder, and to his surprise the sleeping man rolled off his chair on to the floor. The grotesque head came off and he found himself staring at a bearded, elderly man, whose cheeks were the colour of chalk. The detective went down on his knees, and the alcoholic fumes were dispelled in a flash when he found the man dead—strangled!

Down to the reception bureau hastened Harwood.

"Look here, my name's Harwood and—"

That was as far as Harwood got, because a hand was laid on his shoulder and he found himself staring at a remarkably attractive girl, who was in travelling clothes with a rug over one arm. She smiled at him.

"I've been looking for you—I'm Felton."

"Good heavens, I thought Felton was a man." Then he saw the manager coming out of his office and remembered. "M'sieur, a word with you," he called. The fat manager bowed, beamed and hastened forward. "There's a dead man in my room. I think he's been murdered!"

The pretty girl gasped and the manager muttered "Mon Dieu!" whilst a reception-clerk, who thought the American gentleman was joking, tittered.

At any rate, Harwood finally convinced everyone that there was a strangled man in his room, and a rush was made upstairs. The detective clutched at a chair when he found his room empty—the body had gone!

Naturally, everyone thought John Harwood was suffering from delusions or strong drink. The manager was quite cross, and Harwood was not pleased with the mocking laughter of Miss Caryl Fenton.

"I tell you I saw a man sprawled in that chair," he told her when the irate manager and his staff had departed, "and that when I slapped him he fell on the floor—dead—strangled. I know I've had quite enough to drink, but I don't care if I live to be a hundred I shall always swear I saw a dead body lying just there." He pointed dramatically.

"May I remind you that you had orders to leave Nice immediately I arrived," said the girl. "And that tonight we've got to be on our way across Europe towards England. Have you forgotten all about Lady Morland's necklace?"

"No, I have not."

"We must leave by the midnight Continental Express." Miss Fenton addressed him as if he were a child. "Kindly come out of your trance and start packing, because the train leaves in exactly half an hour. You can sleep this off in the train."

It was a reluctant and bewildered John Harwood that boarded the Continental Express. He was now in that state when he was almost sure he had seen a body, but just the slightest bit doubtful that it might have been the result of too many drinks.

The Train Smash

HARWOOD had been ready to leave at a moment's notice and had bought tickets. Naturally, he had got a double sleeper, thinking Fenton was a man, and as a result of the train being full had to repose on luggage in a corridor, whilst his companion slumbered in the luxurious sleeper. Harwood decided that life was very hard, especially as the train rattled and bumped in a manner that made sleep almost impossible.

At last Harwood managed to doze off, and it seemed that he had scarce closed his eyes when he had a rude awakening. First his head hit a wall, then his body seemed to come off the floor to crash against the roof, then he was twisted like a ball and hurled violently to the floor. Vaguely Harwood wondered whether this was some dread nightmare. The sound of splintering wood, breaking glass, terrific crashings and agonised screaming made him realise at last the train was off the lines.

Next sensation was sinking and having a vague conception of the whole coach crumpling up, then his head hit something and everything went black.

When Harwood opened his eyes he was in a place that was not heaven. Everything was red and leaping. His vision cleared and he realised these were flames. The express had crashed at sixty miles an hour and the coach was a blazing wreck. He did not know that his face was blackened, his forehead streaming blood from flying glass, and that his clothes were in tatters, but he did know he was alive, and if he wished to survive he must get out quick. It was as he moved towards a broken window that he saw the body.

Half protruding from a wrecked seat was the body of a bearded man. It was the dead man that he had seen in his room. Suddenly leaping flames began to roar and crackle close to the body. Fascinated, Harwood crawled forward. The man had been dead some time. The shrewd eyes of the detective were quick to note the dangling sleeve and stiff, blood-stained shirt cuff. There was writing on the cuff—an address. Harwood ripped off the cuff, and as the flames blazed up darted for the window.

Harwood got clear in the nick of time. The coach became a blazing mass. He rolled down a slight slope and was helped to his feet by someone. Vaguely he heard that the express had been deliberately derailed and that it was feared many had perished. He could find out nothing about Miss Fenton, though a rescue worker informed him that a number of the passengers had been conducted to a near-by convent. He was so badly battered and bruised that it was an effort to limp the quarter of a mile to the convent.

A nun admitted him and led him to the cloisters. Here temporary beds had been fitted up for the wounded and hurt. Nowhere was there any sign of the girl, until a Sister in white robes told him in broken English that an American young lady was in the library.

It was Fenton and he was intensely relieved. The girl gave a cry of joy at sight of him. She had feared he had been killed or burnt. She had not been hurt, but had been knocked silly, and had woken up in this convent. Harwood shook her hand warmly, and did not notice the clean-shaven, elderly man seated at a table.

Harwood suddenly remembered about his discovery.

"Listen, Miss Fenton," he cried.

"You know what I told you about seeing a body in my room and how you thought I was crazy because I couldn't produce the corpse. Well, I saw the same man on the express."

"What!" The girl was shocked. "And believe me, this is no hallucination," Harwood grinned triumphantly. "It was the same man, and he had been dead some while. The body vanished from my room and was dumped on the express, and, in my humble opinion, the train was derailed because someone wanted to cover the murder. The express was wrecked so the world should think this man was killed in the smash. If only I could get in touch with the police I'd—"

The girl shook his arm and pointed. Startled, Hopwood glanced round and saw the man at the table. The latter smiled and bowed.

"Permit me to introduce myself, m'sieur," he said. "I'm Paul Turbe, Assistant Prefect of the Paris Police. By the irony of fate I was holiday-making in the district, and naturally I have taken charge. I could not fail to hear some of your remarks about a dead body. Perhaps shock, concussion, or—"

"Nothing," Harwood interrupted with a quick sweep of his hand. "I had that same sort of gag tried on me at Nice and I nearly swallowed it. M'sieu Turbe, I am certain the express was wrecked to hide a murder."

With a slightly mocking smile the Assistant Prefect listened to Harwood's tale, and it was obvious to the detective that the great man thought him demented or suffering from the accident.

"You think I'm crackers," shouted the exasperated Harwood. "Well, I'm so crazy I'm willing to wager a grand—that's a thousand dollars—that the man was murdered and that I'll find the murderer. Will you take the bet? But first let me tell you who I am. I'm Harwood of Pinkerton's."

The detective went down on his knees and he knew in a flash that the man was dead—strangled!

October 3rd, 1936.

"Why look a gift horse in the mouth?" laughed Turbe, with a smile of sympathy for the girl. "Certainly I take your bet."

"Okay!" snapped Harwood. "Now I believe in a straight fight and no trickery. Always start square with your opponent. I'm going to show you eluc number one." He fished out the blood-stained cuff. "That I tore from the sleeve of the body before the flames got busy."

The Limping Man

CARYL FENTON began to believe there was something in Harwood's story, and she consented to go with him to Paris to the address that had been on the cuff, but she made the detective promise that if they found nothing there they were to continue their journey at once.

"We'll both get fired if we don't get to Scotland and settle this necklace case of Lady Morland," the girl complained.

"Send her a wire," suggested Harwood. "Delayed by train smash—fog in Channel—trouble with passports—anything. I reckon I'm on to something. I've found out the dead man's name was Karl Wagner—his badly burnt body was found and identified. Also, I'm all out to show Mister Paul Turbe that we're not the fools he appears to think. When we get to Paris we go straight to that address on the cuff. I imagine Wagner wrote the address, because he has a bad memory. Axel Hoyt may be the next stepping-stone."

They found that the address in Paris was in a fashionable quarter though quiet. A sleek manservant admitted them, and stated with a how that Axel Hoyt resided there and asked the nature of their business. Harwood answered vaguely that it concerned a personal friend of his master. They were admitted to a large room. At a piano sat a rather curious little man. He was playing and sweeping back his hair in the manner of a genius. He did not cease playing, but with a nod indicated chairs.

The opera selection finished, Axel Hoyt rose to his feet. He was garbed in a black frock coat and his face seemed unnaturally white—keen, dark eyes stared at the visitors. When he walked towards them he limped.

"I have just arrived in Paris," stated Harwood. "And I thought it best to come and see you as I have some bad news about a friend of yours." Hoyt raised his eyebrows. "We were train acquaintances, but there was an unfortunate railway accident and your friend was killed. His name was Karl Wagner."

Harwood thought Hoyt gave a slight start.

"So Karl is dead." Hoyt spoke softly. "I am very sorry to hear that. How did you get my address, m'sieu?"

"It was written on a piece of paper," lied Harwood. "It was found when they searched the body. I happened to be coming to Paris with my wife." He dare not look at Caryl. "And I thought the only thing I could do was to let you know."

"I thank you." Hoyt gave a little bow. "Very kind. I did know Wagner, but it was only a business acquaintanceship. I am sorry to hear about this train smash. Thank you for coming to see me. I knew Wagner not very well, so I feel you have come on rather a fruitless errand, but, all the same, I appreciate the kindness."

Harwood had been glancing round the room. He saw a number of photographs of a raccourse, and as they rose to leave Harwood managed to get a closer view.

"I see you know Buenos Aires raccourse," he remarked. "Nice place."

"I have never been there," Hoyt spoke shortly. "I rent these apartments, and I have not moved the pictures. Good-day, m'sieu! Good-day, madame!"

"I'll wager those pictures of Buenos Aires were his own," whispered Harwood, as they went down the stairs. "He did not want to admit he had been there. Moreover, he was unmoved by the death of Wagner, and said he was sorry to hear about the train smash. I spotted several newspapers that had been flung into a waste-paper basket, and as their front pages talk of nothing else but the disaster, he was bound to have seen about it. Why did he act as if it were news to him?"

"Will you explain why it was necessary to refer to me as your wife?" Caryl demanded.

"I thought you wouldn't mind," Harwood grinned. "I didn't want Hoyt to get suspicious. Caryl, I'm going to break into this place to-night and have a look round."

"You can leave me out," firmly stated the girl. "I've no desire to spend the rest of my life behind bars."

Yet so persuasive was Harwood's tongue that Caryl accompanied him that night when they entered the house by picking the lock of the front door. Harwood explained that he had taken lessons from a crook, whose life he had saved. The house was composed of several flats and Hoyt was on the top floor. They went up the stairs, and with a finger against his lips, the detective signalled for extreme caution. After experimenting with a number of keys and some wire instrument, Harwood managed to open the front door of the flat and they tiptoed inside.

By means of a torch they found their way to the big lounge. The flat seemed extremely quiet and seemed to possess a musty smell. Harwood listened against several doors and could hear no sound. It was two in the morning—awkward if Hoyt were out and returned to find someone busy ransacking the flat. But the beam of light from the torch showed them that Hoyt was not likely to return—the lounge was bare. Harwood flashed the light round—not a stick of furniture.

"They've gone!" came Caryl's hoarse whisper.

"I must have scared the rats," Harwood muttered. "I'll switch on the lights."

The man and girl stared round at the bare, untidy room; dust, bits of shavings, some sacking and a broken plate were all they saw. But a few hours before this room had been crammed with furniture and a grand piano. They had certainly got busy after receiving that visit from Harwood. "Hallo, there's something they couldn't take." Harwood pointed to a clock let into the wall. "I might as well take a look at it."

They were standing there admiring the clock when Harwood decided to open the glass door that encased it—something floated to the floor. The door latch was broken and this piece of paper had been used as a wedge.

"Hallo, look at this." The detective unfolded it and held it out so the girl could see. "An invitation to a Guildhall banquet. Our friend Hoyt must have been a big noise to have been invited."

"Look at the date." Caryl pointed. "It's seven years ago."

Harwood put the invitation into a waistcoat pocket. "Hoyt has been here a good many years, the condition of this piece of paper proves that, and yet he runs because I talk about his friend Wagner—that's how the story reads to me."

Harwood walked to the window and flung up the bottom half. Caryl came to his side to lean on the ledge and stare over Paris.

"Somewhere in this city Hoyt is hiding and—"

The detective ducked because something whined past his ear to smash into the wall behind with a dull thud. Before Caryl could ask what was happening, she was seized by strong fingers and flung to the floor.

"Someone shooting at us," hissed Harwood. "Thank heaven whoever it was scored a miss."

Crack! Crack! The hidden gunner got busy when Harwood tried to peep over the window ledge.

"Don't be a fool," screamed Caryl. "Let's get out of here!"

"Humiliating as it may seem, but I see no other way but to crawl." The detective laughed. "That window-sill is pretty low, so keep as flat as you can. Let's crawl!"

They reached the door, and then came the task of reaching up a band to the door-handle. Caryl was nearest the door, and she managed to reach up to the handle. Scarce had she opened the door than two bullets splintered the woodwork. She did not cry out, and Harwood gave the girl an approving glance. Very slowly they opened the door and wriggled through. With a sigh of relief they got to their feet.

"I think we will leave here before our friends decide to pay us a personal visit." Harwood took her arm. "We will depart at dawn from this unfriendly city and be on our way to England."

"And from there on to Scotland?" asked Caryl.

"No, my dear, not yet. We are going to see the Guildhall," chuckled Harwood. "The fog in the Channel is going to prevent us from having the pleasure of dear Lady Morland's company for another day or two."

The Trail Broadens

THEY crossed the Channel in brilliant sunshine, and Harwood hoped fervently that Lady Morland did not read the weather reports. They had slept on the train and on the boat, so that they did not feel too exhausted when they reached London. Besides, Harwood on a trail was a mass of energy, and it had an inspiring effect on Caryl Fenton. Not till the afternoon did they manage to get into the Guildhall.

A guide showed them round, and in a droning voice rattled off a long monologue upon the history of the Guildhall and of the many events that had happened beneath its marvellous roof. There were forty or fifty people, mostly Americans, being shown round, and Caryl marvelled at the absurd questions asked by some people. A nudge in the ribs made her glance at the detective.

"According to this guide book we shall shortly be shown into the banquet hall, and round the walls are huge photographs of the dinners that have taken place here. I want a good look at those pictures." Harwood indicated the crowd. "Just memorise some of those daft questions that are being asked, because I may want you to delay the guide as long as possible by those pictures. How many people sat down to dine? Did they have roast turkey on the menu—what did the Lord Mayor wear? Who sat on his right, and why? You should do this fine."

"Thanks for the compliment," Caryl said a trifle crisply.

"And don't shoot your questions till I tip you off," he added. "It's that 1929 picture I want to see most."

Harwood succeeded, through the clever work of Caryl, in getting a good look at the picture of the 1929 Lord Mayor's banquet through a magnifying glass, and his eyes opened wide when he located Hoyt almost at once. Unfortunately the light near the picture was not very good. When the party were shown into a library, Caryl went all hot and cold because Harwood was not with them. What was that crazy idiot up to now?

The guide was now getting to the end of his tale, and come to the part that made him speak with fervour. He might not get a pension, and would be very grateful for any trifling reward the visitors might care to make him—a doctor had warned him that so much talking was straining his vocal cords.

A hoarse cough caused many to fumble in their pockets. And the callous Caryl would ask questions at a moment like this. She smiled contentedly when Harwood appeared from nowhere, but she did not fail to observe the bulge in his coat. They had booked rooms in a large hotel, and in the privacy of his room they had leisure to study the picture of the 1929 banquet which Harwood had stolen from the Guildhall by cutting it out of its frame.

"See, there is Hoyt!" Harwood was peering through the glass. "No mistaking him. See that bearded man quite close to him—that, my sweet, is Wagner. Now it seems to me that there are three others in whom we must take an interest. One is the woman between Hoyt and Wagner, and the other two are the men opposite."

"Why?"

"They look like a group," was his explanation. "I get the impression they were not aware the picture was going to be taken and were discussing some matter. The five seem to be interested in the one of their party doing the talking—that being the guy of whom we can only see the back of his head. The only outstanding feature there is the hand with the cigar."

"The hand is by the ear, and I should say he appreciates a cigar. It is a sort of attitude adopted by a man who wishes to swank about being able to afford expensive cigars. A characteristic gesture, but not very helpful to us. On his left is a woman, who has edged her chair away and is turning to people farther up the table, and so I rule her out of the party. On his right is a man, and as he has turned his head we get a part of the face. I'm going to have special enlargements made."

"What do you propose to do after that?" asked Caryl. "We've got to go to Scotland some time."

Harwood scratched his head with a pencil.

"I have an idea." Caryl pointed to the woman between Hoyt and Wagner. "I know a woman who dresses Society for Court functions, and she is quite discreet. The gown worn by the woman is very distinctive and cost a lot of money. My friend might be able to tell me who designed it, and that might lead us to the establishment which sold the dress."

Caryl's idea proved fruitful. Her friend had a marvellous memory for fashionable designs. She had herself brought out a model like this, and had been incensed because another firm had dared to copy the design.

The firm was still in existence. Off went the sleuths and interviewed a madame, who surrendered to that charming Harwood smile and informed them that the lady was still a client of hers, and that her name was Miss Elizabeth Wentworth and the address: Wentworth Hall, Buckley, Hampshire.

"Clue number one," snapped Harwood. "That cuff I tore from the body before the flames got busy."

Harwood and Caryl caught the six o'clock train from Waterloo, and their destination was Buckley. They went to the local inn, as Harwood said that innkeepers always knew everything about the locals. They ordered a drink, and Caryl was about to ask Harwood when he proposed to start asking questions, when he took her by the arm and led her to a dart board.

The first two darts stuck in the board, but the third he cast in another direction. It pierced a poster, and Caryl gave a little gasp. The poster proclaimed that that evening, at the mission hall, a whist drive was being held to raise funds for the "Pilgrims of Peace." The vicar would preside. Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, the secretary of the organisation, had her name at the bottom of the poster, and it was through her name that Harwood had flung the dart.

The Whist Drive

HARWOOD drained his glass of beer and announced that he proposed to compete in the whist drive.

Caryl drained her half-pint and spluttered that she was the worst card-player in the world.

"Impossible!" cried Harwood. "At any rate, we'll go to the slaughter together."

"But you'll find the losing lady goes down and the losing man moves up," laughed Caryl. "And what do you propose to do at the whist drive?"

"Take a look at Lizzy and see what I think of her," chuckled the detective. "I shall connive some way to get to the same table, whereupon I intend to whisper something about Hoyt and see what effect it has on her."

They arrived at the mission hall, and the whist drive was preceded by a short service. Harwood nudged Caryl. "See the platform," he said in a stage whisper. "See the woman with the smart clothes and the fox fur—that's Miss Lizzy Wentworth. Also take a good look at the man on the right of the vicar." He glanced across at a poster on the wall. "That, I imagine, is Sir Charles Webber, the President of the 'Pilgrims of Peace'; and when he turns his head you will notice the likeness to the man opposite Hoyt at the banquet."

"You're right," came her excited whisper.

"Of course we may be on a blind trail, and they may be quite innocent; but I have a hunch they're all mixed up in this game. At any rate, I may be able to tell you more after I have played whist with Miss Wentworth." He gave a quiet chuckle. "I bet old Turbe gets a surprise this evening. He should have got by air mail my clue number two, which is the picture of the Guildhall banquet, and, just to help the poor fellow, I put a tick against Hoyt, Wagner, and Miss Wentworth. I could make good use of that thousand dollars."

"In what way?"

"I might get married," blandly answered Harwood.

"You'd want more than a thousand bucks to persuade any girl to marry you!" scoffed Caryl. "Hallo, what's that bell for?"

"A few words from the dear vicar," whispered Harwood. "And a nod or so from the patrons on the platform."

As far as the two sleuths could gather, the purpose of the "Pilgrims of Peace" was to prevent war at all cost, and funds were required to send a missionary ship that would go round the world trying to persuade belligerent nations to vote at the next League of Nations' conference for world peace. The cause seemed good but quite hopeless to Harwood's idea, but everyone present seemed most enthusiastic. Sir Charles Webber strutted to the front of the platform and said, with chest well stuck out, that he was delighted to see these good people here. Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, in a tired, drawl—ing voice, spoke of the cause, and mentioned a number of distinguished names—people interested in the cause. She smiled and added that any contribution would be welcome. The vicar announced that his curate would be pleased to receive any cheques or contributions at the platform. From the background a thin-faced man with a very pious expression shuffled forward and said a few words in a rather high-pitched voice.

Harwood looked at Caryl.

"Ever seen him before?"

"He does seem familiar somehow," Caryl wrinkled her delightful nose. "He looks very religious."

"Crooks often do," muttered the detective. "You try and think of someone who walks with a limp. Hallo, there goes the bell. Seconds out of the ring. Here's to the first round."

Caryl found the whist drive a most trying affair. She was soon separated from Harwood, who seemed to lose every hand. Actually, the 'tec was an expert card manipulator, and twice in his eagerness to get moved in the direction of Miss Wentworth, he dealt one of his opponents a hand that contained thirteen hearts—they were trumps. Of course, it was his luck that Miss Wentworth should start at Table 18 and Harwood at 6. It was not till almost the end of the evening that he saw his prey move to Table 15—they were opponents at the same table.

There was still a lot of skirmishing going on at other tables, so the four at No. 15 waited till the clamour died down. Harwood was busy with the cards. He smiled at Miss Wentworth.

"You don't remember me, Miss Wentworth?"

She gave him a puzzled glance.

"I'm sorry, but—"

"It was at the Guildhall banquet seven years ago." His eyes watched her closely. "I was at the next table."

The beautiful Miss Wentworth gave him a very close scrutiny.

"I feel sure you've made a mistake." She spoke in slightly bored tones. "I did attend a banquet, but I don't remember when it was."

"One nine two nine," promptly replied Harwood. "I remember it so well because you were sitting next to a man I knew quite well. Nice man, Axel Hoyt." Now the woman could not check her unmistakable start, but Harwood went on as if he had seen nothing. "I've been abroad for years, but the other day I happened to be in Paris. What a surprise I got to see Hoyt again. I didn't speak to him, but—"

"You are quite mistaken," Miss Wentworth spoke coldly. "Axel Hoyt died three years ago. Would you stop shuffling the cards—you're holding up the game."

Harwood dealt and talked. "I would have sworn it was Hoyt."

"Hoyt is buried in Buckley," the woman said in a cold, rebuking tone of voice. "You can see his grave there if you don't believe me."

Harwood apologised humbly for his mistake and gave so little attention to the game that he trumped his partner's act. What the elderly spinster called the detective is nobody's business—even the vicar was shocked.

When the whist drive was over Miss Wentworth went over to speak with Sir Charles Webber, and they had not been chatting many moments when the curate limped over to them. Harwood, who was sampling a most appalling cup of cocoa, happened to glance across, and it did not surprise him to find three pairs of eyes studying him closely.

"Sweetheart, the plot thickens." He spoke out of the corner of his mouth.

"I'm not your sweetheart," snapped Caryl. "What's the next move, Bonehead?"

"We stay the night at the village inn, before breakfast we visit the churchyard to see if a certain lady is telling the truth, and after that a visit to the registry of births and deaths, where I expect to do a lot of expert lying to obtain the information I require."

"And I suppose I have to assist, big boy?" She laughed mockingly. "One more day's delay. If we don't both get sacked it will be a miracle."

Harwood's parcel had reached Paul Turbe in Paris. The Assistant Prefect studied the photograph and smiled at the detective's note that this was Clue No. 2, and that as the mystery was almost solved, it would be a good idea if he saw that there were sufficient funds to pay out a cheque for a thousand dollars. Turbe looked at the cardboard cylinder in which the picture had been sent, and it was plain to see that it had been posted at Buckley.

A Second Death

SURE enough they found Hoyt's grave, and Harwood told Caryl that the Buckley Registry office might supply the next link. The girl gazed at the American with incredulous eyes as he talked to the kindly little registrar. They had been married a year and they wanted to call their first child after his wife's uncle, Axel Hoyt. They were faced with a difficulty, as they wanted to use Hoyt's middle name, which was Aloysius, and they were not sure of the spelling. There was much argument in his wife's family over the matter, and as far as Harwood could see, the death certificate was the only means of deciding the matter. How he got the tale over Caryl can never understand, but he succeeded and discovered that Dr. Evans, who lived locally, had attended the supposed death.

It was a bad blow on arrival at Evans' house to learn from his housekeeper that the doctor had received an urgent summons by telegram to a patient in a neighbouring town. The good woman mentioned that he had caught the 9.45, and politely closed the door.

"The train has just left," remarked Harwood, looking at his wrist watch. "But if we hop across the road to that garage we may succeed in hiring a car that will get us there almost as soon. If we can make the station before Evans we'll be in luck."

"Why?"

"My dear Caryl, you ask too many awkward questions," Harwood grinned. "What I shall say to Evans when I locate him I shall try to figure out during the car trip. First let us obtain a car. Come on!"

They succeeded in hiring a powerful open two-seater of a somewhat ancient type. It rattled and shook, and when doing sixty threatened to break up. They had secured a map from the garage, which Caryl spread out on her knees.

"According to this map," the girl said, after they had gone a considerable distance. "We are now within four miles of Ramley, and very shortly we cross the railway line. Then there seems to be a mile beside the railway, and then, for some comic reason, the road again crosses the track."

They reached a level-crossing as the man in charge was about to shut the gates, but their violent honking kept them open. As they flashed past the man shouted something about deserving to get killed. A minute or so later, hearing a train, they glanced back.

"That's the 9.45," cried Harwood, "Our man's on that train."

"It's a straight stretch and the train's catching up," shouted Caryl. "We can't beat it to the next crossing."

"We can try!" Grimly Harwood bent over the wheel.

It was a hard race, in which Harwood had to admit himself beaten. The train had gained the lead.

"Look!" shouted Caryl, as they came into a straight stretch. "Look at that lorry!"

Even as they watched, a lorry crashed through the gates and stopped right across the line. They saw a man get out and run for dear life. Appalled, they glanced back. A screeching of brakes denoted that the engine driver was applying his brakes, but the speed was too great.

The engine hit the lorry with a crash. The level-crossing was at an embankment and the engine left the line, swiped off part of a signal-box and crashed down an embankment, carrying the three coaches and guard's van with it. There came the sounds of terrific smashings as the coaches were telescoped.

An hour later, Caryl and Harwood were at the Three Feathers Inn, which was situated a quarter of a mile from the scene of the disaster and about a mile from Ramley. The local train had not been carrying many passengers, but the engine-driver and four passengers were dead, with five passengers gravely injured. Harwood was sunk in gloom because Dr. Evans had been in the first coach and was one of the dead.

The Squire of Ramley, who was the Chief Constable of the district, a sergeant, and two policemen had arrived at the inn, and Harwood had made a frank statement of what he had seen.

"It was a deliberate train wreck!" he cried. "That lorry was timed to crash through those gates in order to derail the train. I am a detective, and there was a Dr. Evans on that train with whom I wanted to talk; someone wrecked the train to prevent me speaking to him."

"Rather a sweeping statement!" cried the Chief Constable. "These sort of things don't happen in England."

"Well, it happened to-day!" rasped Harwood. "Do you remember the Continental Express from Nice to Paris that was derailed a few days ago? I see you read about it. As part of the rail had been removed, it is known the train was wrecked for some sinister purpose. Well, I think the same man or gang engineered this disaster."

"I think you're quite right," said a voice that made Harwood and the girl turn round eagerly.

It was Paul Turbe, the Assistant Prefect of Paris.

"What are you doing here?"

"So far, I have been one move behind you, Harwood." Turbe gave a grim smile. "And, frankly, I think that now I have drawn level. I confess I thought your tale about the Continental being deliberately wrecked a lot of nonsense, but I soon found out you were right. I started investigations on my own account, and I must say your picture of the Guildhall banquet was of great value. I was at Burley late last night, but I went to Ramley Station to meet Evans—the wrecker was one move ahead of me."

Harwood introduced the Chief Constable to the Assistant Prefect and the sergeant. The Chief Constable was astounded to hear that it was a case of train wrecking.

"A fiendish murder!" the Constable cried. "Scotland Yard must know of this!"

Paul Turbe beckoned to Harwood to come to one side.

"I have gone over the ground with a fine toothcomb, and frankly I think it is only a matter of hours before I get my man," Turbe smiled. "And your thousand dollars. Now you have played fair by me in giving me two very valuable clues, so I think it right that I should give you a helping hand. On that cuff that you took from the body of Wagner there was not only that address in Paris, but part of a cuff-link." From his pocket he produced the link. "You will observe the rather peculiar palm-leaf design." He fumbled again. "There was nothing on the body of Dr. Evans that was of any assistance, but his cuff-link might interest you. Please note that it is identically the same as that found on Wagner. I made a lot out of these cuff-links—they should help you."

When Turbe had gone Harwood thought for a few minutes, then he hastened to have a few words with the landlord. He returned to Caryl.

"I've just asked the landlord to get through to Buenos Aires Police Department for me. I'm going to have a talk to my friend Mulligan." He laughed. "The whole village is agog because I happen to be phoning someone thousands of miles from here."

"Have you solved the cuff-link clue?" asked Caryl.

"No," he admitted, and frowned. "But these palm-leaves are strangely familiar. I know I've seen them recently, and—" Suddenly he dived his hand into his pocket and pulled out a crumpled handbill. "By gosh, I've got it! Look, Caryl!"

It was the handbill of the whist drive promoted by the Pilgrims of Peace. Their emblem was identically the same—a crossed palm-branch.

By some miracle the landlord got the telephone call to Buenos Aires through under an hour, and from Mulligan the detective got information that seemed to explain almost everything.

"Mulligan knew all about Hoyt, whom he is sure is not dead," Harwood told Caryl. "Hoyt made South America pretty warm for him by his gun-running and smuggling. There is a small war going on there at the moment, and they have been tipped off that a bunch of international crooks—of whom Hoyt is one—are thought to be scheming to get arms into the country. This missionary campaign is just a fake to cover their latest gun-running activity. One old dame, with whom I played cards with at the drive, told me of the wonderful work done by the mission, and she told me that they had headquarters in London, where they exhibited in a museum all the terrible weapons of war that the Pilgrims were fighting against. Sweetheart, the old car is taking us to London."

"And what shall I tell Lady Morland?" she inquired sweetly.

"I think you'd better have suspected appendicitis," decided Harwood. "That should stall her."

The Pilgrims of Peace

THEY journeyed to London without incident, and soon discovered the headquarters and museum of the Pilgrims of Peace. Harwood gave Caryl a significant glance when they observed the awning outside the building and the plush carpet. From posters outside the detective learnt that the mission ship, John Murdoch, was at Bordeaux, and would be sailing on the Crusade within the next few days.

"I suppose all this business here is to pull wool over the eyes of the police and to fleece the public for more funds," Harwood said with a sneer. "Let's take a look at their museum."

The place was crowded with people, and everywhere the two went they heard people talking in praise of the noble work that was being done by the Pilgrims. There were a great number of exhibits in glass cases: Bombs, rifle-grenades, aerial torpedoes, trench-mortar shells, smoke shells, gas shells, a howitzer, a field-gun, many types of machine-guns, rifles from all over the world, revolvers, swords and daggers. There were pictures of mine-craters in the No Man's Land of the Great War, and a great number of gruesome war scenes. Besides the war, they showed scenes of the carnage in Abyssinia and Spain.

"Sort of Chamber of Horrors," hissed Harwood. "And don't some of these goody-goody folk wallow in it. Ah, refreshment!" A big man with a scarred face and tray of glasses approached and tendered them a cocktail. "I bet this is pretty poisonous." He glanced after the man. "That fellow seemed to be very interested in us."

"Well, you would walk into this hornet's nest. How peaceful Scotland must be."

"Nonsense!" scoffed the detective. "You're revelling in the excitement. There's a platform over there—let's go and hear what rubbish they're talking."

They mingled with the crowd, and Harwood grinned when he observed on the platform Miss Elizabeth Wentworth, Sir Charles Webber, and Hoyt. The last-named was wearing the garb of a priest. Sir Charles announced that it was wonderful to have this send-off from so many well-wishers.

It would be the work of the mission to bear the palm branch of peace to every country. Loud cheering. With a wave of his hand he indicated the people on the platform. Within a very few minutes they would be leaving here to catch a boat train at Victoria, and it might be many months before they would be fortunate enough to see England again.

Their mission would not be an easy one, and he trusted that the adherents at home would work to keep the cause going and to help with funds, if an appeal for money should be necessary. More cheering. This was followed by a prayer and a psalm; whereupon Sir Charles indicated that it was time for all good people to go home, as they had their train to catch.

Harwood swung up a big chair and the toughs covered down, not desiring to get hit.

People began to leave, but Harwood hung around because he did not want to miss anything. A queer kind of fellow came up to the detective and began to recite some poem about the John Murdoch, and, when he tried to push the fellow to one side, another apparently half-witted youth appeared and began to talk a lot of nonsense.

"Will you kindly stand to one side?" growled Harwood, and blinked to find three large men that were between him and the exit. Moreover, Caryl had been separated from him, and he could not see her anywhere. The waiter who had served the cocktails appeared with two more men dressed as servants. They crowded round Harwood, and all talked loudly. The detective knew that they were trying to keep him a prisoner; he was in a nasty jam.

Behind him was a table, and on it a few cocktails that had not been finished. "I'll take a drink before I go!" Harwood cried, and made for the table. Still jabbering, the men surged after him.

The reciter was in the lead, and Harwood stared at the fellow's pointed chin speculatively. Ponk! His left lifted the surprised fellow clean off his feet. That stopped the jabbering. With angry shouts the men rushed at Harwood, who floored a couple before leaping over the table.

From behind a case appeared Caryl Fenton. She had realized that an attempt was being made to separate them. She had gone with the crowd, and then doubted back when no one was watching. How could she help John to fight all those horrible men?

Harwood was strong, and he swung up a big chair as it it were a stick. The toughs cowered down, not desiring to get hit. Crouching, they began to edge nearer their victim. It was then that the wildly despairing gaze of the girl saw the glass case containing a number of Mills' bombs and the notice that these bombs were alive. Crash! With her handbag she had smashed the glass.

"I'll blow you all to bits if you move an inch!" she screamed.

Harwood hurled the chair at the men and bounded to her side to take the bomb from her hand.

"Folk, I have now removed the pin!" he shouted. "I believe three seconds is the time that this pretty toy takes before it explodes." All the while his fingers were pushing the pin back. Now he swung back his arm. "One—two—catch!" He flung it.

Those toughs had not waited. In a mob they scuttled like scared rabbits towards the back of the hall.

"Come on, sweetheart!" Harwood caught the girl's hand. "We've got a train to catch."

They arrived at Victoria with three minutes to spare. Harwood pushed everyone away from the booking-office and secured his tickets. A wild rush towards the train, for the guard had blown his whistle. A first-class carriage door swung open, and as the train began to move Harwood bundled the girl inside. They sank panting into seats.

There was one other passenger, who seemed engrossed in his paper. A rustle and the paper was lowered.

"I thought you were going to miss the train!" laughed Paul Turbe.

The Tunnel

PAUL TURBE laughed at their surprise.

"I told you, Harwood, I was gaining on you." He laughed heartily. "I might almost say I was a move ahead. Smart work to solve that link clue. I presume you've found out the real work of the Pilgrims of Peace?"

"I have." Harwood mopped his brow. "They did their best to detain us at their museum, but we managed to escape."

"I thought you might have trouble, but I felt certain you would make this train." The Assistant Prefect pulled back the sliding door. "If you put your head outside, you will observe two men at either end of the corridor." Harwood followed the suggestion and saw the men. "Those are detectives from Scotland Yard."

"What are you planning?" Harwood asked as he sank back into his seat.

"To rope in the whole gang." Turbe puffed at his cigar. "This train is a special for the Pilgrims of Peace, so that the whole of the gun-runners are with us. Only this coach is empty—I had it put on for the benefit of Scotland Yard, Mr. Harwood of Pinkertons, and for myself. Mr. Harwood, I am willing to wave aside the bet that we made, because I think we should work together. There is a big reward for the arrest of these people, and we can share that reward."

"As we seem about all square, at the moment, I'm game," answered Harwood. "Though I think I have a lot of information about which you know very little, but as you no doubt have warrants for the arrest of these Pilgrims, I think it would be best for me to accept your offer."

Paul Turbe listened with a thoughtful air to Harwood's story, and added bits of information that he himself thought helped to link up the whole mystery. He commended Caryl on her bravery.

"Sir Charles, Miss Wentworth, and Hoyt are now in the dining-car." Turbo looked thoughtfully at his cigar. "Why not arrest them on the train? Supposing I go to my table that is near them, and you go and confront them. I can hear everything, and the Scotland Yard men will be handy should trouble arise. When you think the moment has come for the arrest, light a cigarette and I'll leave the car to give the detectives their orders."

The scheme was discussed and approved. Paul Turbe lit a fresh cigar and went along to the dining-car. A few minutes later Caryl and Harwood followed. At a table sat the three conspirators and what a shock they had when Harwood smiled at them. Calmly he pulled up a chair for Caryl and then took the vacant chair next to Miss Wentworth.

"A very pleasant evening," Harwood beamed at them. "I trust you Pilgrims are all in the best of health?"

"What the dickens do you mean by this intrusion?" rasped Sir Charles Webber. The woman and the priest eyed the detective covertly.

"The game is up," answered Harwood. "The Pilgrims of Peace are finished. You're gun-runners." He saw their startled glances. "Now, don't get nasty and try any of that rough stuff you tried to hand out at your headquarters, because this time I have protection."

"You must be out of your mind!" stuttered Sir Charles.

"Wagner was in with you all at one time, but either he knew too much or was difficult, and so you bumped him off," Harwood told them. "Unfortunately you killed him in my room at an hotel in Nice. The body then vanished, and the Nice-Paris express was wrecked—the body appeared in the wreckage."

"In fact, the train had been wrecked to hide the murder. Being a detective I was annoyed, and decided to find out what it was all about, and the trail led me to Paris to the house of M'sieu Axel Hoyt. There I heard a lot of lies, and when I made my next call I found Hoyt had flown."

"Someone then tried to shoot this lady here and myself, but we disappointed this somewhat poor gunman. To cut the story short, my trail led me to Miss Wentworth and you, Sir Charles. Miss Wentworth informed me Hoyt was dead, and there he was standing on the platform."

Playtime Over

IN the offices of Thomas & Thomas, solicitors, on the thirty-sixth floor of the Empire Building in New York City, Lawrence Thomas, senior, was awaiting the arrival of Lawrence Thomas, junior. It was already ten o'clock, and a fine summer's morning—but Thomas senior was in a fine winter's temper. He rang his desk bell impatiently for the third time since his arrival.

"My son here yet?" he demanded of the tall lady who answered the summons.

"Just coming in, sir," she told him.

"He won't be a minute."

"What's he doing?"

"Washing his hands, sir. He drove here, and, while putting away his car in the garage—"

"All right, all right! No more excuses! Send him to me at once, washed or unwashed!"

Three minutes later "Larry" Thomas appeared. He was tall, good-looking, and a trifle pale. He hadn't been to bed all night, and had quickly slipped out of evening dress whilst the lady secretary had been keeping his irate father in conversation. He came along breezily to the old man's desk.

"Morning, dad! Lovely morning, what?"

"Haven't had time to notice," growled Thomas, senior, glancing up from his letters. At once he perceived that Larry, despite the lounge suit, was still wearing a white dress tie and wing collar. "Going to a funeral?"

"No, dad."

Old Thomas thumped his desk. "Yes, you are! You're attending your own! From this moment the firm of Thomas & Thomas comes to an end. It reverts to its original style of Lawrence Thomas—me! You're fired!"

"But, dad, you can't do that—"

"I've done it! I've stood your slack ways quite long enough. You don't realise what work is. But you're going to. I've fixed you up at Harrison's, as Deputy District Attorney."

"Gee, dad, I'm not suited for sleuthing!"

"You'll have to show your mettle, Larry. No more bottle parties and girl-hunting. Take this letter; put on another tie and collar and your hat, and go straight along to Harrison. He's expecting you."

Larry saw that the old lad meant it.

"Okay, dad. And if I make good—"

"Learn discipline, responsibility and punctuality, and—you'll come back here. Good-morning!"

Larry was interviewing Lawyer Thomas Harrison, District Attorney, half an hour later. A fine, upstanding old gentleman with a fierce grey moustache and beetling eyebrows. He stood up when Larry entered, fluttering Thomas senior's letter in his large, capable hand.

"Don't sit, Larry—I'm busy, and you're going to be busy. Assistant District Attorney means you'll do most of the work. Now then, we're in a jam. Can't bring anything off. Every time we make a raid on some suspected place everything's clear."

"Leakage, sir."

"And maybe the leakage is in this office." Harrison's moustache bristled with indignation. "But where? Who? All my staff seem above suspicion." He pressed the bell-button on his desk. "I'm putting you in charge of the investigation department." An office-boy appeared at the door. "Ask Mr. Hill to come here."

A shortish, well-groomed, sleek man entered a few moments later. Full-faced, small moustache, light blue eyes.

"Oh, Arthur, this is Lawrence Thomas, junior! Larry—meet Mr. Arthur Hill." Harrison presented the two young men.

He put down old Thomas' letter.

"Arthur, I'm giving you full charge of this office. Larry will relieve you of investigation—"

Hill broke in:

"But I've got that all properly wired!"

"You can show Larry the scheme you have in mind. Something has got to be done—we're the laughing stock of all the newspapers."

Hill's face was a study.

"I was counting on—" He broke off.

"Of course, it's up to you, Mr. Harrison."

"I want you here, Arthur," his chief told him. "You're the experienced man. The Parole Board have had another request for the release of Fred Cole. The application was meant to fail, I think. But it shows activity in the wrong quarters. Take Thomas along to your room and get busy, both of you."

The rest of the day was spent in Hill's sanctum, where Larry was shown the routine work and given lists of places and persons under suspicion of the police. Hill showed him a Press-cutting album of prosecutions.

"We don't seem to have scored many convictions," Larry offered.

"These crine guys have cutw lawyers to defend them," Hill answered.

"They don't mind what they pay a smart counsel. Arnold Crane's one of their pets—he can talk a jury into believing black's white."

"I'd like to know him," Larry grinned. "Useful sort of fellow."

At the Dover Club

THAT night Larry called in at the news-room of New York's brightest evening paper. A girl with fair, curly hair and demure eyes was tapping a typewriter at the end desk.

"Hallo!" she greeted. "Can't stop to chatter!"

"Hallo yourself," Larry took off his hat, to lounge against a filing-cabinet. "How's Kitten?"

"She's Kit—in office hours."

"Kit, will you go places with me to-night? To the Dover Club?"

"I went places with you last night, Larry. And I don't like the Dover. It's a notorious place."

"I'm going to be notorious," grinned Larry. "Listen. I'm Assistant District Attorney to old Tom Harrison."

"Gosh!" Kit stopped typing. "Did your dad do this to you?"

"He did. But it's not news, as yet." He asked again: "One last fling, Kit? Come to the Dover with me?"

"Call for me at eleven," she agreed. "But we won't stay late."

Eleven-thirty that evening found them in evening dress handing in hats and coats to Annette, the "check" girl at the bureau of the Dover Club.

"It's Mr. Lawrence Thomas, isn't it?" she asked.

Larry laughed.

"Seen my picture in the College Magazine, eh?"

Annette smiled gently.

"Maybe."

Kit didn't like this.

"Let's go, Larry," she whispered.

But a half-tipsy fellow in a light coat and a felt hat had followed them up. Ho buttonholed Larry as he turned.

"Hallo, hallo! What bringsh Mishter Larry here?"

"Mister Larry's feet," came the quick answer.

"Introduce me, Kit," gurgled the fellow.

"This is Al Wilson, radio announcer," Kit stated, not too cheerfully. "He does the Society gossip column for us."

Wilson ambled off. A pleasant-looking aristocratic man of about fifty came along to the hat-and-coat counter, smiling at Annette. His hand brushed against Larry's shoulder as he took off his hat.

"Sorry!" he cried, at once turning to the young man.

"That's all right," Larry answered.

"It was quite my fault," persisted the pleasant gentleman.

Kit pulled at Larry's arm.

"Come on!"

When they had seated themselves in a darkish corner of the brightly-lit and noisy little club, Kit told Larry:

"That was Arnold Crane, the crook lawyer. I believe he runs this place."

"Crane, eh?" Larry glanced about the dance floor and tables, but the pleasant gentleman had vanished. "I'm told it's Joe Ross who bosses this show."

"Crane puts up the money," Kit shrugged pretty shoulders. "I don't like it here. Let's go somewhere else."

Larry pressed her fingers under cover of the table.

"Don't worry, sister, big brother will take care of you."

He gave orders to the bowing waiter.

Arnold Crane had gone to his private room, where he seated himself at his desk. He read some notes left on his pad, nodding to himself. Then he took up the 'phone and dialed to the office, listened awhile, and put the instrument back. Joe Ross was engaged, for the moment.

Joe was trying to calm down a handsome and very angry young woman. She was glaring at Joe.

"You'll get Fred out of gaol, Joe Ross, or I spill the beans! Get that into your thick skull. I'll show up this joint and its faked roulette outfit! Fred's my man and he's not going to serve seven years for something one of you fellows did. Maybe you!"

"See here, Mollie," Ross tried to coax her. "I've been personally to the Parole Board. They won't listen."

"Get Crane to go. He's got to go, see? I'm nigh crazy—I'm desperate!" She suddenly flourished a pistol at him.

As Ross shrank back, she flung the gun noisily on his desk.

"You're not worth powder and shot! I won't waste a minute more with you fellows here. I'll go to the D. A."

She flounced out of the room, slamming the door violently behind her, then hurried across the dance floor, glancing at Larry and Kit, as she passed by their table, with unseeing eyes. She flung herself down on the seat by the telephone call-box.

Ross went round by a back way to Crane's room, to answer Crane's call in person.

Ross told Crane about Mollie, his ugly face full of gloom.

"She swears she'll squeal."

"I'll handle her," Crane answered easily. He lit up a cigar. "I've a spot of news for you, Joe. Arthur has been taken off his job."

"You mean we can't count on Hill any more?"

"I never did count on him," said Crane, puffing rings of blue smoke upwards. "I don't count on anybody, not even you, Joe." He laughed softly and pleasantly.

"Playboy Larry Thomas has got Hill's job. We don't need to worry." He held up a warning hand. "Shut down a moment, someone's at the 'phone." He picked up the instrument on the table, listening-in to the caller in the box outside.

Kit went to the call-box after the dance. She had remembered a mistake in her article for the morning's issue of her paper.

"I'll get the night editor to correct it," she told Larry.

"You only think of your old newspaper, Kit."

He came lazily sauntering after her. He saw her pluck open the door of the box.

Her quick cry brought him at a rush to her side. The huddled body of Mollie Cole had fallen softly outwards at Kit's feet. A crowd gathered round about them. Joe Ross came running out of the private room with Crane at his heels.

"What's the matter?" called Ross, thrusting a way through the horrified crowd. One of the dancers was kneeling by the crumpled-up body. He slowly straightened it, then rose up.

"I'm a doctor—this woman has been shot through the heart. She died on the instant. Does anyone know her?"

"She was in the telephone box," gasped Kit, her face ashy. "She fell out when I opened the door. There was no shooting."

"You heard no report," the young doctor argued, "because of the noise of the band. And there are such things as silencers. Best call the police, Mr. Ross."

Larry asserted himself. "I'm Deputy D. A. Lawrence Thomas—no one must leave the hall," he ordered. "See that all exits are covered."

Arnold Crane took Ross by the arm. "He's right. Suleide, poor thing. I wonder who she is? Put screens round her, Joe. I'm sure we all deeply sympathise with you in this terribly sad affair."

His quiet, unruffled manner had its effect. The dancers went back to their tables; screens were placed around the body; the police came in and carried it away on a covered stretcher. No one had identified Mollie Cole.

Who is She?

NEXT morning, when Larry went into the D.A.'s office, he found old Harrison in a discontented mood.

"Can't congratulate you on the start you've made, Thomas," came his greeting. "What on earth took you to the Dover last night? It is certainly not the place for anyone working in this office."

"Sorry, sir. I didn't think—"

"You've got to think, if you're going to make a success here," Harrison caught him up. "A night club—a notorious night club, and the new Assistant District Attorney dancing there after midnight. Who was the girl with you?"

He flourished the morning paper at Larry, with its flaring headlines.

"New D. A. involved in the Dover mystery."

"Involved," grumbled Harrison, not waiting for any reply from Larry. "Involved! See what you've done for yourself?"

"I was there with Miss Kit Cathcart. She's on the papers—but I'll swear she didn't put in that stuff."

"How d'you know she didn't? But put all that aside—you've got to clear yourself. Here's a mystery woman shot in a call-box, and nothing to show how, or by whom."

Said Larry:

"It seemed to be just suicide."

"Shot through the heart under the left shoulder-blade. No one could hold a gun that way." Harrison tossed aside the paper. "I'll give you a change, Thomas, to clear up this case and bring the culprit to justice. If you succeed—well and good. If not, I've no use for you."

Larry went along to Hill's room. There was plenty of sympathy in Hill.

"Rough luck, Thomas!" Hill laid a friendly hand on Larry's arm. "I know what the old man thinks, he's been letting off steam on me. Of course, you oughtn't to be seen at such places as the Dover—but how were you to know?"

A new note of determination showed in Larry's usually careless voice.

"Having got myself in this mess, I'll get myself out."

"What can you do?" Hill asked, shrugging his shoulders.

"Get a search warrant. Comb through that place with a fine comb," Larry answered. "You can give me the necessary order. I'll ring up the police while you get it ready."

"Okay," Hill agreed. "There's a second line in your room."

Larry left Hill busy at his desk writing out an "order for search." He went straight along to his room, but found the 'phone blocked when he tried to ring. Presently he got through.

Half an hour later, Larry and six plain-clothes police were at the Dover. The place looked tawdry enough in the cold daylight. Ross was in his room, studying the morning's paper. He glanced up as Larry entered with the search warrant.

"Wanting me?" he asked.

"I'm from the District Attorney's office," said Larry. "I'm going to look over these premises."

"What for?"

"There was a woman murdered here last night."

Ross took up a cigar, twiddling it between his fat fingers as he studied Larry.

"I remember you now—it's Mr. Thomas." A soapy smile creased the large face as Ross gestured towards the open newspaper. "That kind of thing's most annoying. Look all you like—it's just too bad that girl should pick on us to kill herself."

"She was shot in the back," said Larry.

Ross shook his head.

"Suicide."

"Did you find a gun?"

"Yes." Ross went to the safe behind him, opened it and took out something wrapped about with a not too clean handkerchief. "One of our charwomen found this when brushing out the call-box. It had slipped under a loose board. The poor girl dropped it, of course."

The police sergeant with Larry took the "exhibit," carefully unwrapping the handkerchief. He sprinkled some chemical powder over the butt of the little gun, and finger-prints showed up.

"We'll check these down at the mortuary," said Larry. "Coming with us, Ross?"

"I'll wait here for you."

When they left the shady little club an hour later, Larry went along to the mortuary, where photographs of the dead woman were being taken. She had not been recognised, nor did her finger-prints help to clear up the mystery of her identity, beyond showing the same as those on the gun.

Caught Out

TWO weeks went by. Larry's every attempt to solve the riddle met with failure. The coroner's verdict was an open one.

"If we could only find out who she was," Larry told Hill gloomily. "That's the puzzle—that's where we've got to begin. It's so queer that no one should know her. That gun was no help—one of a thousand others exactly like it. The number on it shows that it was bought at Chicago. And—that's all."

Hill wasn't very cheerful this morning; nor helpful.

"I've got toothache," he growled. "Caught cold or something. And the news don't make you laugh. There's a tough guy broke prison yesterday. Convict named Cole."

"I saw it," Larry told him. "Know anything of him?"

"He's on the files," Hill answered. "Excuse me, Thomas, I got to have something for my tooth."

Larry was poring over the files when Kit came rushing into his room, unannounced.

"Oh, Larry!" she cried. "Just look!"

She dropped a gaily covered cinema magazine on top of his papers. In three-colour process a blonde girl's face smiled at them. Larry stared at the fixed smile; the heavily-shaded eyes; the plucked eyebrows; the marcelled hair; the too marvellous teeth.

"Yes?" he queried, at a loss to understand his little friend's excitement.

"Don't you see? Don't you get it?"

Kit grabbed up his pencil and began to shade in the peroxide hair with thick, quick strokes. Deftly she added a line here and there, while Larry watched her with ever-growing interest. Suddenly, the likeness flashed at him.

"Gosh, Kit, it's the girl!"

"Of course it is! I saw this old magazine at a dime store and spotted her at once. It's years and years old, but there's your girl—Mollie LeStrange. I read up about her in the office 'Who's Who on the Films.' She married a man named Cole. Fred Cole, rather a bad egg—"

"Cole? Why, Kit, that's the convict who got away from Sing-Sing last night!" Larry was as excited now as Kit. "And see here." He lifted the magazine off the office files. "Cole was sent up for seven years for attempted murder. Joe Ross was chief witness against him."

Larry stood up to grab Kit in his arms.

"If you aren't the world's sweet-heart, Kit!"

She wriggled free.

"The world's too big for little me!"

"I'm going straight to the Dover. Cole will sure make a bec line for Ross," Larry decided.

"Larry, be careful," Kit warned him.

"That's a bad place."

"I'll be all right," he answered in his light-hearted way.

"I've found out something. Kit—all the honours mustn't go to you. That pistol Ross so conveniently found in the 'phone call-box doesn't fit the bullet the doctor's dug out of poor Mollie."

"I knew it was murder," Kit declared. "But how?"

Larry had got his hat.

"That's the puzzle. But I've an idea—and if I get a chance this morning of a quiet look round at the Dover—"

He checked himself, teasing her.

"Well, I'll give you a ring."

Kit told him, cheekily.

"I wouldn't say 'No' to a ring from you, big boy!"

Larry went down town to the little club. He found the Dover in the hands of the cleaners.

"No one's here," the chief charlady volunteered. "Will you leave a message?"

"I'll wait."

Larry walked across to the call-box, opened the swing door and went inside. While pretending to put through a call, a nickel piece in his hand, his eyes were taking in every detail of the box. A framed notice on the wall stated:

"Local calls five cents."

It was all quite usual, and there was a loose board in the flooring. He stepped out quietly, someone was moving in the room behind the box. Ross had evidently come back—or had he been there all the time?

Larry thrust open the door marked "Private," and strode into the room.

Hill was pacing the floor, his back turned, his shoulders humped. He called as he turned:

"Gosh, Joe, where have you been?"

He saw Larry, and all speech died on his suddenly dry lips. A sickly grin writhed them.

Larry's face grew hard as flint.

"No wonder I couldn't get anywhere!"

"I don't understand—" Hill began, shrinking back. "I—I only looked in here to ask Ross—"

"To tell Ross, you dirty double-crosser!" Larry jumped at him. "Tell him all that's going on at the office. I'll shake the truth out of you!"

He caught Hill by the collar, but the fellow, cornered, struck out with his left at Larry's chin. The blow sent him staggering backward, but he was at Hill in a flash. A regular dog fight followed; Hill, thick-set and desperate, aimed at laying Larry out by any means, fair or foul. They clinched, upsetting the table with a crash; then, on the floor, they hammered away ruthlessly at each other. A heavy paper-weight, which had fallen from the table, was grabbed up by Hill and raised to give Larry a smashing blow on the temple, but the youngster gripped the murderous wrist with fingers like a vice.

For a tense minute they held each other; Hill seeking to batter the life out of Larry—Larry slowly gaining on that upraised arm. With a sudden twist, Larry reversed the position, and, as the paper-weight dropped from nerveless fingers, he had Hill by both wrists.

Larry unthinkingly picked up the revolver as the door was thrust open by Wilson.

The struggle continued but a few moments more. Jerked to his feet, Hill was forced backward over the steel arm of the desk chair and held powerless.

"Let—go!" he gasped brokenly.

Sweat was pouring down his face, his breath was coming and going in gusty sighs. His eyes were half-closed, his cheeks were a pasty, yellowish white.

Larry pulled him into the chair and stuck him there like some grotesque doll. Hill looked as if he was going under.

"It's—it's my heart," wheezed Hill. "Let—me—be—"

Larry crossed to the filter by the window and drew a glass of water, watching Hill warily.

There was no need—the man was done. He couldn't hold the glass to his blue lips when Larry brought it to him.

"Listen, you cur, you'll give me evidence against the crew who run this place—definite, positive evidence, or I'll hand you over to the police," Larry told him fiercely.

"I—understand, Thomas."

Hill slumped forward as he spoke, falling on his knees. Larry jerked him back into the chair.

"I'll give you twenty-four hours to tell all you know."

Hill didn't even hear the threat—his heart was thumping too noisily in his breast.

Silence reigned in the usually noisy little club. The women, white-faced, cleared up their mops and pails and sidled out.

Hill, painfully recovering his wind, managed to get up and pull the chair to the desk. He gazed hopelessly at the disordered room as he sank into the chair.

Crane and Ross let themselves into the Club, and at once scented something to be wrong. They crossed sharply to Ross' room, but all seemed in order there. They came back to the dance floor, then a moan from Hill took them, at a run, to the room behind the telephone call-box.

Hill was laboriously trying to straighten the place. He staggered into Crane's arm with the ink-splashed table which had been overturned. Crane called to Ross to take the table, then half-carried Hill to the desk chair. "Tell us all about it," Crane ordered.

"Thomas—he's been here. Caught me."

Ross lifted heavy-lidded eyes to Crane's.

"I knew it."

"Caught you—and you squealed?" the lawyer demanded.

Hill shook his tousled head. His hands fingered his torn collar and tie.

"Didn't say a word. He hit me. He knows I'm in it."

Ross muttered:

"Best out and run."

Crane's generally smiling mouth was set in a snarl.

Both men regarded Hill as though he was some crawling thing to be disposed of quickly. Presently Crane spoke, his smile reappearing.

"Where's Thomas now?"

"Gone back to Harrison. But he'll wait. He said he'd give me a day to come clean and bring him evidence," Hill told them shakily.

Crane's smile deepened.

"And you'll give him evidence, Arthur. You'll meet him to-night at the Wonder Hotel down town. You're staying there, see? Hiding from us. You'll book a room and you'll lie low all day. Thomas'll be fool enough to keep things up his sleeve, so's to make a big splash at the end. Phone him now. I'll tell you what to say."

October 3rd, 1933.

Hill gazed up at the smooth face with half-glazed eyes. He guessed that Ross was fingering a gun in the pocket of his loose lounge suit. Crane took up a sheet of notepaper, writing hastily on it. Ross came close to the wretched gobetween, grunting:

"Do as he tells you."

Hill lifted the receiver on the desk off its base, then dialed with a nervous forefinger. He got the D.A.'s office.

"Put me through to Mr. Thomas, please," he steadied himself to say. "It's Arthur Hill this end."

The three waited for Larry's voice to sound crisply in the instrument. Hill took up the notes Crane had scribbled for him.

"That you, Thomas? Hill speaking. I'm all alone here—you know where—and I've got evidence enough to fix the whole bunch. I'll have to hide away till to-night. Meet me at the Wonder Hotel in Forty-Second Street, West, ten o'clock. Ask for Room 214. Two hundred and fourteen, fifth floor."

Larry's voice crackled:

"I'll be there!"

"You might keep quiet, Thomas, till you've seen me," Hill was being prompted now by Crane's faint whisperings. "I got drawn into this—got into debt. Thanks, much—I'll have to ring off. There's someone coming in."

The receiver was clamped down on its stand.

"What's he say?" Crane asked.

"He'll hold up till I meet him," Hill quavered.

"That's fine! And we'll be there, too. And, likely, there'll be a little accident." Crane was quite himself again, pleasantly easy. "Things happen so unexpectedly, Arthur. Pull yourself together; Joe will get you a new collar and let you out the back way. Get yourself lunch and a drink, and toddle off to the Wonder. It's a nice little show—they don't ask a lot of tom-fool questions."

A Frame-up

LARRY, after a busy afternoon on the lines of inquiry which had now opened out to him, called at the Wonder Hotel a little before ten o'clock. Just as he was entering the lounge a hand was laid on his arm. He turned sharply—to see Al Wilson grinning in his mane way.

"Just going to have one?" Wilson hiccupped. "Don't mind if I join you?"

"I've an appointment. Sorry."

Larry didn't wait for further argument, but went straight in, letting the swing doors almost nip off Wilson's sharp nose. The Society reporter waited a moment or two.

"Guess I'll see what he's up to."

He thrust open the doors and pushed in. With a nod to the house-porter, he slithered up the stairs in Larry's wake.

Larry's long legs took him up the shallow stairs three at a time. He reached the fifth floor and the bedrooms, beginning at two hundred. He strode along to No. 214.

He rapped sharply on the panel. There was no reply, so he rapped again, then opened the door.

The room was in darkness, save for the light filtering in, under half-drawn blinds from the street below. Larry felt for and found the switch, and snapped it down. He saw Hill lying out full length in front of the fireplace.

He was facing the gas fire, very still and silent.

"Tooth bad?" Larry called to him, as he closed the door.

No answer. Larry came closer—a sudden doubt assailed him. He knelt by the prostrate man, and, putting a hand on his shoulder, slowly turned him over.

Hill, his eyes half-closed, his face cold and set, was dead.

There was a pistol lying by his side. Larry, unthinkingly, picked it up and had it in his hand as the door was thrust open by Wilson. The two exchanged lengthy stares. Then Wilson, fingers on the door handle, spoke.

"Shot him, hey? I heard you were fighting this morning."

"I didn't shoot him," Larry sharply answered. "I've just found him."

"You didn't give him a chance!" Wilson stammered. "I'll be going before you have a smack at me!"

He hopped out of the door, and Larry heard him turn the key with a click that brought his danger home to him. He had been framed—the murder of Hill would be fastened on him. And, he had just put his finger-prints on the pistol.

He dropped it as though it were red hot. He had to act quickly. He rose from his knees and went to the window. Not a hope; five floors up and in front of the house. He ran to the door, and was jerking at it when it gave to him, Wilson, with two uniformed police, entered the room, Larry falling back before them.

"I charge this man, Lawrence Thomas, with murder," cried Wilson, pointing a crooked finger. "That's Arthur Hill of the D.A.'s office. They were enemies from the outset—had a fight this morning at the Dover Club."

"Wait a minute, mister," spoke the leader of the two policemen. "Let's get this down." He produced notebook and pencil. "What's your name and address?"

"I'm Al Wilson, radio announcer and journalist. Everybody knows me!" Wilson swelled out his chest, enjoying himself immensely. "You'll hear me tonight telling the world—"

Larry's fist crashed between his eyes, knocking the boaster flat. The police jumped at him, but he had them un-awares. He tripped one with a suddenly thrust out foot and threw the other over Wilson's prostrate body. Then he made a dash for the passage, raced along it and vaulted the stairs in leaps of a flight, one hand on the banisters. He had reached the second floor before the policemen's whistles shrilled out ear-piercing warnings.

Larry ran to a window at the end of the corridor, flung it up, and saw that it gave on the outside emergency stairs. He slithered down these and reached the dark yard at the rear of the hotel. He ran along this and climbed the side gate, then, dropping into the street, walked casually to where he had left his car, got in, slammed the door, and started up. With the whistles dimming his ears, he drove off, making at once for the main thoroughfare.

As he guessed, the police were already calling all cars. He had to work quickly and surely. A hold-up at the Wonder Hotel would have smashed his plans for netting the man who had murdered Mollie Cole and their tool, Arthur Hill.

He threaded his way through the traffic, hoping that the police would not yet know his car or its number. At a public call-box in a side street not far from the newspaper office where Kit was waiting for him, he drew into the kerb and risked a call.

"Meet me outside the Dover—get a taxi. Hurry!"

Her answer came crisply.

The spectacular story of untamed mountain folk battling the approach of civilization and fighting their age-old feuds. Starring Sylvia Sidney, Henry Fonda and Fred MacMurray

"THE TRAIL of the LONESOME PINE"

The Deadly Feud

IN a rough old shack in a remote region of the Rocky Mountains Judd Tolliver sat puffing gloomily at his pipe. Melissa, his wife, as she busied herself at the wash-tub, a sad-faced, elderly woman with tragedy lying behind her eyes, was talking—bitterness, infinite hopeless bitterness in her tired voice.

"And so it goes on, Judd—always has gone on, ever since we was married—always will go on, too, because that's all you live for. Killin' them Falins! You've raised Dave to it—you've raised June to it. And you'll raise Buddy to it, and nothin' I can say will ever alter it. Where's the good of it—where's the sense of it? What's June done to inherit this business of killin'? What's Buddy done to be raised for nothin' in life 'cept to kill Falins? Oh, I'm sick and tired of it all."

With a gesture of utter weariness she turned away, and her husband shifted his pipe a little uneasily in his mouth. A frown had come to his rugged face. "Tain't none of my makin', Melissa," he said slowly.

She swung round on him almost fiercely.

"Haven't all the Tollivers said the same for years and more years?" she demanded. "Yet which of you has ever tried to put an end to it all? Never a one of you! Ask Buck Falin, ask any of his boys, and they'll all tell you that it ain't none of their makin', either! But it don't stop any of you goin' on with it."

She flung out an arm to a far corner of the room where a young man lay on a bed, his dark eyes fixed steadily and almost relentlessly on her as she talked.

"Dave this time," she went on with rising bitterness in her voice, "and no fault of anyone's that he ain't lyin' dead before our eyes. And all that's in his mind, and in your mind, too, Judd Tolliver, is for him to get on his feet again so that he can lie up on the hills and kill one of them Falins. And then they'll never rest until they've had both you and Dave, and so it will go on until there ain't none of us left."

"They shot at Dave," answered the old man slowly and stubbornly, "and they'll answer to me for it."

"We shall all answer to you for it," she retorted. "You'll none of you ever be content till they've wiped out the whole lot of us. I'm sick and tired of all this killin', killin', killin'!"

For over a hundred years the deadly feud had raged between the Tollivers and Falins, dying down occasionally for a year or two, blazing up again suddenly like a fire newly roused out of life by a stray puff of wind. For a feud once begun and carried on is never likely to end. Those rough, stubborn, prejudiced old mountaineers held it to be unworthy of their heritage to put out the sudden hand of friendship and forgiveness to the enemies of their ancestors. Blind, unreasoning loyalty to their kith and kin demanded blood, and only blood to wipe out the stain of blood; a life called for another life. That new generations arising had no personal grievances of their own against the opposing side mattered not at all. They were taught from their earliest youth the legacy of hate that had come down to them willy-nilly. And it was required of them that they should follow it blindly and ruthlessly, bequeathing it in turn to their children when they passed on.

At the moment there were five Tollivers. There was old Judd Tolliver and his wife Melissa, Dave, their adopted son, but hating the Falins as fiercely and as ruthlessly as if he had been born a Tolliver; June, a slender, pretty, untamed, wild (thing of eighteen, engaged to be married to Dave in accordance with her father's expressed wishes, and perfectly content to be so, since outside the Falins, she had practically never met another young man in her life; and Buddy, her little brother aged four, whom she worshipped with all the love of her simple, wild young nature.

Of the Falins there were only four—but they held it to be a fine advantage over the Tollivers that whereas the latter could only number two grown men among them, they, the Falins, had four.

And Buck Falin and his three stalwart sons were as ruthless as any four men could be.

June came running into the Tolliver shack on the following day wiping the water from her face and hair, and with her wet clothes clinging around her.

"Fallen into the lake," she explained hurriedly in answer to her mother's and father's surprised look. "There's a stranger on his way up here, dad. He's askin' for you—says it's business."

She disappeared into her own little room, eager to change her clothes. For the stranger was young and good-looking, and had laughed at her when he had seen her tumble into the lake. And though the laugh had not been really unkind—he had tried to help her out, but she had indignantly refused—she was anxious, girl-like, to show to better advantage when he called.

Judd Tolliver looked up, frowning when the stranger came into the shack. He saw a tall, good-looking young man in the late twenties, a man easily dressed and easily mannered, with a quiet voice, steady grey eyes, and the jaw of a fighting man. Though there was nothing aggressive about him when he addressed the old man. He seemed to be anxious to be conciliatory.

Judd Tolliver, however, was suspicious. He was suspicious of everyone strange who came into the shack. They might possibly be on the side of the Falins, and until he had made quite sure that they weren't, he was taking no chances with them.

"My name's Jack Hale," said the stranger briefly.

"Well, what do you want?" demanded the old man.

Hale, ignoring the abrupt rudeness of the question, proceeded to explain. He was an engineer, representing a syndicate who were running a railway through the country for the development of coal mines. They had got the necessary permission from the Government, and all that, he, Hale, wanted was to negotiate with Judd Tolliver for the right to cut through his land with the railway. He added that he was prepared to pay in cash for the right, and the amount would be five thousand dollars and a percentage on the coal that might be extracted from the ground.

But here June, who had come in quietly to overhear the last part, excitedly broke in.

"Five thousand dollars! Why, dad, that's a fortune!" she exclaimed.

But old Judd Tolliver waved her aside impatiently. It was a fortune to him, but in his slow, suspicious way he had no intention of jumping at it.

"Well, I reckon I'll consider it," he replied slowly. "But I'll have to talk it over with my boy, and at the moment he ain't in no condition to talk anythin' over with anyone."

Hale followed his eyes to where Dave Tolliver lay on his bed, and a frown came to his face. It struck him very forcibly that from the appearance of the sick man it was going to be a long time before he would be in a condition to talk business of any sort.

"What's the trouble?" he demanded. "Got shot in the arm—and it ain't healin' proper-like."

Hale strode across to the bed. He had originally trained for a medical career and had good knowledge on the subject.

"Let me have a look at it," he said sharply. And then, as he saw resentment smouldering in the other's dark eyes, he added quietly but authoritatively "Do as I tell you, please. You needn't be afraid. I was trained to be a doctor before I took up engineering work."

But he gave a quick exclamation of dismay and anger as he glanced at the young man's arm.

"Have you had a doctor to this?"

"We haven't," replied old Tolliver almost as if he resented the absurdity of the question. "There ain't no doctors in these parts."

"But good heavens, man, this arm is gangrenous! This lad of yours will die unless something's done immediately."

A quick, frightened exclamation from Mrs. Tolliver and a gasp of dismay from June were smothered by Judd's voice as he cut in stolidly:

October 3rd, 1936.

"We're doin' all that can be done and I reckon that's all there is to it," he began when Hale cut him short. "Then I'll have to operate myself," he exclaimed sharply. "Here"—he swung round on June—"heat me some water, quick, and see that it's boiling. And get me some strips of clean linen, and—"

"You shan't touch him!" old Tolliver broke in fiercely. "We've never had a doctor and we ain't goin' to start it now. The old remedies have cured us up to now and I guess they'll do it again. We didn't ask you to come buttin' in and we don't want you. Now get out!"

Silence, desperate, tense silence for the moment. The old man's eyes were blazing; Mrs. Tolliver's were tragic, pleading. June was gazing, obedient from long years of submission. Dave Tolliver seemed utterly indifferent to the issue.

Hale's jaw, however, had tightened. He was handling a difficult situation and he knew it; knew, too, that a false move on his part at that moment, pregnant with danger, would result in irrevocable failure.

He laid his hand on the old man's shoulder, and when he spoke there was that in his voice which charged the little shack with authority.

"Mr. Tolliver," he said quietly, "I reckon this lad's life is pretty dear to you, and I can save it if you'll let me. You can trust me; I know what I'm doing. He's a young man, same as I am, and he's got to live! Let me carry on and he shall live!"

Silence once more. Old Tolliver's face was working. His wife was crying quietly. Then the old man looked up.

"You mean he'll die if you don't—do things?"

"He will—but I can save him if you'll let me."

"Carry on then," said the old man laconically.

It was a strange scene and for many years it lived with Jack Hale. He had no anaesthetics to deaden the terrible pain that he knew he was going to inflict by the use of the knife; but it heartened him when Dave Tolliver told him laconically that he'd "stick it whatever it was."

With old Tolliver and his wife standing by the head of the bed, with June standing nearby, something like rebellious tumult in her face, and with an old woman in the corner nursing a baby, he began the delicate task of cutting away the poisoned flesh.

He straightened himself up at length. He had cut away all that he had dared to cut, he had bathed and cleaned the terrible wound, dressed it as best he could, and bound it up. That he had hurt his patient terribly in the doing of it he knew only too well; but his patient had borne it bravely, incredibly bravely, and his eyes were showing faint gratitude.

"With any luck he'll do now," said Hale as he wiped the perspiration from his forehead.

In less than a week Hale's prediction stood fully justified. Dave Tolliver was on the road to recovery, his father, as had the Falins also, had signed the contract giving the railway the necessary permission, and Hale and his men were hard at work.

Drawn Into the Feu

THE railway went ahead fast from that moment; but other things less visible were going ahead also. For June, who had been attracted by Jack Hale from the start, was getting more and more attracted by him every day. And as her little brother Buddy had formed a very strong liking for Hale—which the latter was not slow to reciprocate—June seldom allowed a day to pass without bringing the child down to the railway. Actually, Hale was not a little worried about these visits. He in his turn had been attracted by the girl, but he had soon learned that she was Dave's girl, and there, he told himself, the matter ended.

He handled the situation as only such quiet, reserved men do, and one morning, when June walked into his little office where he was hard at work, he greeted her with a frown as he turned back to his desk.

"Good-morning," said the girl with the smile of one who is sure she is welcome.

"Good-morning," replied Hale curtly without turning round.

"You don't seem very pleased to see me."

"Well, I'm very busy."

"You always are—when I come down here."

There was a pause, during which Hale wrote furiously. He had noticed the teasing, coquettish note in the girl's voice and he was rebelling against it. He longed to throw aside his work and talk to her, but he knew only too well that if he yielded once he would go on yielding again and again. So his answer came brusquely enough.

"At the moment I'm very busy."

"That means I'm not wanted?"

He merely shrugged his shoulders. He knew he couldn't look her in the eyes and tell her so.

Her anger rose then, swift, primitive. "I think you're very rude," she said.

He swung round at that, frowning up in a flash.

"And I think you're very foolish," he retorted.

"Why?" she asked.

He hesitated a moment. It was impossible to tell her what he wanted to tell her, that because she was promised to another man it was unwise for her to be coming continually to his office. So instead he hedged, hardly caring what he said.

"Well, because there's hundreds of better ways of spendin' your time. If you're goin' to marry Dave you ought to be learnin' things."

Her eyebrows went up.

"What things?" she asked simply.

There was no escape now and he knew it and made up his mind to go through with it.

"Hundreds of things. You're making money now and your life's going to change. You'll want to know things when you're married, June, and you ought to be spending your time learning them, the same as other girls do, instead of loafing around."

"What don't I know that other girls do, and why shouldn't I loaf around, as you call it, if I choose to?" she asked rebelliously.

Once again he fell back on generalities.

"Well, if I were you I should want to learn things and get educated. Other girls do. You told me yourself you couldn't read or write, and that's a mighty poor thing for any girl to say, specially if she's goin' to get married."

"Will you teach me?"

"Of course not," he retorted sharply. "I haven't the time—you ought to be able to see that—and besides, I've got my work to do. And I've got to get on with it now, what's more, otherwise I'll be all behind."

Turning his back on her, he sat down once more at his desk, closing the discussion, and she went out and walked slowly back to the shack in a flaming temper. For she knew only too well the truth of all that he had said, and the truth hurt. But other things hurt, too, and she began on them the moment she entered the shack.

Her father and mother listened in silence while she told them that it was high time that she had some sort of education. But she failed to tell them from where the idea had come to her. Rather did her conversation suggest that it was Dave who had started it.

But old Judd Tolliver came down flat-footed when she had finished. He declared harshly that it was all nonsense. The Tollivers had been content all these generations without education; what did she want to start now for? And on June retorting that she didn't know and didn't care, but she was going whether he liked it or not, he got up grimly from his chair with a laconic "Oh, is that so, my girl?" and reached for the broad leather strap that had hitherto been used to settle all the arguments of his children in their recalcitrant moments.

But here his wife flung herself in between them, while June stood white-faced but still stubborn.

"Judd, you can't do it—you can't do it!" she panted.

"Can't I? You watch me. If a child of mine disobeys me—"

"I don't want to disobey you, dad," said June. "I've never disobeyed you in my life, and you know it. But I'm a woman now, just an ignorant woman what knows nothin'. And it ain't fair to keep me ignorant all my life. Look at mother here, what chance has she ever had since she married you? Slavin' from mornin' till night, seein' nothin', knowin' nothin'. And it ain't fair that I should have the same now we've got money."

"It's true, Judd, and you know it," said Mrs. Tolliver gently and sorrowfully. "Not that I'm grumblin' 'cos you've been a good man to me. But we've got money now, Judd, and surely it be only right to give the kids better chances than we've had ourselves?"

Old Tolliver relented then—he had to. And that afternoon June left for Gap-town. But it was not the mail coach that took her, but Hale, whom she artfully waylaid. For she knew that he was driving into Gaptown that afternoon, and she stopped him—somewhat to his dismay—and asked him for a lift. And he, because he couldn't very well refuse, gave her the required lift. And that was how the trouble really began and Hale got drawn into the Tolliver-Falin feud all unwittingly.

It was the following day, and Dave Tolliver, who had been away in the mountains, came back and asked for June.

"Why, she gone off to Gaptown to get eddicated, Dave," replied the old man, looking slightly puzzled. "I reckoned you knew all about it from what she said."

For a moment or two the young man stared blankly at him. But swift anger, blind anger was surging up in his heart, for already rumours had been reaching him of June's constant visits to the railway—though he had been trying his best to dismiss them as idle talk.

"I've never said nothin' to her about it," he answered slowly. "I don't want June no different from what she is."

There was a long and dreadful silence. But the thoughts of both men had gone in the same direction. For old Tolliver, too, had heard whispered rumours.

"I wonder who can have advised her to this?" he said presently and with a troubled face.

"If you don't know I can tell you," rejoined his son angrily. "It's Hale and no one else. I've been hearin' for quite a while that June's been spendin' a mighty lot of time down at the construction camp. And now I'm beginnin' to see why."

The old man's look of anxiety deepened.

"It don't seem to me to sort of fit in somehow," he began, but his son cut him short as he reached for his gun.

"We'll soon find out if it does," he answered grimly.

He went down to the construction camp with black murder in his heart and his loaded gun in his hand. When Thurber, the manager of the works, told him that Hale was not there he threatened him with his gun—he was in the mood to shoot anyone on sight—but the panic-stricken assurance of the badly scared Thurber that Hale was indeed not there but had gone into Gaptown the previous day soon convinced him that he was speaking the truth. But his anger was boiling more than ever as he left the camp and started to make his way in the direction of Gaptown. For now all he could see was a deliberately planned elopement between June and Hale.

But as he strode along through the pine trees rude interruption came in the shape of a bullet that came whizzing past his head, making him drop swiftly in his tracks. For that bullet told him that long before he ever found Jack Hale he had another enemy with whom to settle. It told him that the Falins were out once more on the blood-feud and if he failed to get this particular Falin, then the latter would undoubtedly get him.

It was no unusual scene that those age-old mountains saw that afternoon. It was a scene that they had witnessed many and many a time before—two desperate men stalking each other with swift death staring each of them in the face. It was a scene of two men, with murder in their hearts, slipping from tree to tree, from boulder to boulder with the swiftness and silence of panthers, firing every now and then and dropping as quickly from sight—yet ever narrowing the circle as they drew nearer and nearer, each waiting like panthers for the last desperate spring of all with death for one or both of them at the end of it.

Suddenly in the silence two shots rang out in quick succession, close to each other, echoing and re-echoing over the hills, and then with scarcely a second's interval two figures seemed to spring out of the rocks from nowhere, two figures that launched themselves simultaneously at each other.

Over and over they rolled on the rough ground, each striving for the mastery, tearing at each other like wild cats, while the air was heavy with the sound of blows and curses. And nearer, ever nearer, they drew to the edge of the mountain on which they had been fighting.

And then, suddenly, with a tremendous effort Dave Tolliver wrenched himself free and was on his feet. But Falin had gained his feet, too, and with a snarl hurled himself at his opponent. But even as he did so the younger man swerved, and his fist, with all its owner's weight behind it, crashed in on Falin's jaw. As he staggered back he stumbled as he did so, slipped, lost his footing, and grabbing desperately at the ground, disappeared over the edge.

Dave Tolliver stood still, panting furiously. "That's one of 'em settled," he ejaculated as he turned and walked away.

The moment that Hale came face to face with him in Gaptown on the following day, he knew from Dave Tolliver's face that there was big trouble ahead, and cursed himself for allowing himself to get mixed up in it. But he faced him steadily enough.

"What have you done with June?" was the younger man's first question.

That told Hale all there was to know. He read hate and murder in Dave's eyes, and a sense of utter weariness at the futility of it all surged over him. But he knew it had to be met and was determined to do his best.

"Look here, Dave," he exclaimed, "I know exactly what's in your mind, but you're wrong—dead wrong."

The other's voice was ice-cold when he answered:

"You've tricked June into runnin' away with you!"

"Oh, you're a mile out! If only you're listen to me—"

"I wouldn't believe a single word you said."

"Righto, then have it this way." And in a flash Hale lashed out, catching the other on the jaw, and the fight was on. But as they fought there was this difference between the two men. Dave was fighting to kill, but Hale was not. Even in his anger he held himself in check. For June's sake he was determined to do little more than defend himself.

And then all of a sudden dramatic interruption stepped in. For Hale had hit out at Dave and had sent him staggering back against the empty shack by the side of which they were fighting, and was waiting for a new onslaught which never came. For all in a flash came a hatehat, hurled with terrific force, which only missed Dave Tolliver by inches, and buried itself deep in the woodwork. And as Hale swung round with an oath he saw three men running towards them and knew in a flash that it was the Falins!

But he laughed from sheer joy. For now he saw the solution of the problem. For he noticed in a second that the three rapidly advancing men were gunless. And in a second he was by Dave's side.

"This is where we join forces, Dave," he said. "Come on, lad, we'll beat 'em to it."

He fought differently now, fought with the venom he had lacked when he had been fighting Dave. But he could very soon see which way the fight was likely to go, and managed here and there to pant out instructions to Dave—little short breathless sentences, but each charged with meaning and truth.

"You've got—to get—away—from this. They mean—to kill—you—but they—won't kill—me. Slip out—and get—June! She'll explain—up in the town—I'll hold 'em."

Perhaps then it filtered into Dave Tolliver's bemused brain that he had been wrong, had done Hale an injustice. Perhaps June was the magnet. Under no other circumstances would he have left Hale alone.

But Hale managed his part well, and it was not until Dave had completely disappeared that the Falins discovered the trick that Hale had managed to play on them.

Hale leaned against the shack struggling for breath, and Buck Falin addressed him.

"I reckon you'll be sorry for this, Hale," he said with deadly meaning in his voice. "You've butted into our private quarrel and we're not forgettin' it."

The Falins Keep Their Word

THE months had rolled by. June was still away, having gone under Hale's advice to his sister in Louisville, from where she was writing to her family, telling them of her progress. But there was no more enmity between Hale and Dave. And Hale knew full well that both Judd Tolliver and his adopted son were his sworn friends, even though they never said so. He had ranged himself on their side against their enemies, and they would never forget it.

But he had lost a lot of heart in his work now. June to him was irrevocably gone. In the fullness of time she would come back and marry Dave. Though he told himself that it would be better so. He, Hale, had only butted in by accident. Dave had always been her man, and she was irrevocably Dave's girl. Probably by now she had forgotten him altogether.

But he had other troubles even more serious than this. For not only was the feud between the Tollivers and the Falins even more bitter than before, but he was very seriously mixed up in it, too. Mysterious outrages were constantly happening at the railway construction camp. One day a big fire occurred which destroyed any amount of material. No one could say exactly who had done it; but Hale knew that it was the Falins, though he gritted his teeth and swore by all his gods that a whole army of Falins shouldn't stop him from completing the work he had set out to do.

Old Judd Tolliver had come down to Hale's little office one day, and the two were talking together when the telephone-bell rang. And to Hale's amazement he heard June's voice at the other end. Though there was hardly a tremor in his own voice when he answered:

"Hallo, June, is that you? How are you? Here, hang on a second. Here's your father and he'd like to speak to you."

He swung round on old Tolliver. "Here's June on the 'phone. Come and talk to her."

He stood watching the scene with amusement in his eyes. Judd Tolliver was holding the receiver as if it had been some species of deadly snake, though excitement and amazement were in his eyes. For it was the first time in his life that he had ever used a telephone.

And then all of a sudden from outside, not half a mile away, came a terrific explosion, rattling the windows of the office and dying away into dreadful silence.

In a flash Hale was out of the office, and old Tolliver, who had dropped the receiver with a clatter, was rushing after him. And as they ran a scared, white-faced man came running towards them.

"They've blown up the bridge! I saw your buddy on it, Mr. Tolliver, only a few minutes ago!"

Two hundred miles away, June, through the telephone, heard the terrific roar of the explosion, and her heart missed a beat at the sudden silence which succeeded it.

"Dad, dad," she screamed, "what is it—what is it?"

For minutes that seemed like hours she waited, scarcely daring to breathe, in an agony of apprehension. She got through to the exchange, but all they could tell her was that the line was still connected, that possibly they had been called away and would come back. So she told them that she would hold on—and more agonised minutes drifted slowly away.

And then all of a sudden she heard the murmur of voices, and once more her heart began to pound anew.

The sight of what was taking place was mercifully hidden from her. She could not see that dread procession that filed into the little office where the telephone receiver still swung on its hook, unnoticed, unheeded by all. She could not see Jack Hale as he strode in, his face stern and set—could not see him lay Buddy's little mangled body down, cover it gently up, lay his hand on old Tolliver's bowed shoulders, mute sympathy in his eyes and in the gesture.

But she could hear her father's voice as it floated out to her, clear and distinct, with such awful horror in it as she had never heard—the voice of a man in a dream.

"Dead? My Buddy dead? Killed by them Falins—"

And for the first time in her life she slid to the floor in a dead faint.

The End of It All

IT was a week later; the worst days

Hale had ever known in his life. Little Buddy had been laid to rest, but all the life seemed to have gone out of the Tolliver household. Mrs. Tolliver only sobbed and wept, raved and stormed in turns. In turns she blamed her husband, blamed her adopted son. And they listened in silence, realising the uselessness of words.

And then, one day, when Hale had come down to see them, June suddenly walked in, and it begun all over again. For June had accused them all of lethargy—had declared that they were doing nothing. And had at the finish flung fiercely round on Dave.

"Dave," she exclaimed, "why don't you act as a Tolliver should act? Why are you sittin' here doin' nothin'?"

He shrugged his shoulders helplessly. But here Mrs. Tolliver broke in.

"You don't know what you're sayin', June. Where's all these killin's leadin' us to? What's the use of goin' on with 'em? Someone's got to stop it."

But the girl flamed up furiously. "Then it can be up to the Falins and not us!" she flung back. "They've killed my Buddy, and all you do is to go up to the sheriff and ask him"—the bitterness in her voice was beyond all words—"ask him to interfere! Why ain't we interferin'? Why ain't you takin' a hand, Dave Tolliver? You've asked me to marry you—right, and so I will if you'll act like a Tolliver!"

In a second he was up from his chair, reaching for his gun, but even as he did so Hale sprang up and caught at his arm.

"You leave me alone," flashed out the younger man ominously, "or it will be the worse for you."

But Hale still held him tightly, and

A young man becomes involved in the intrigues of a sinister association. A dynamic story, with action, mystery, suspense and humour. A fast-moving, swash-buckling romantic type of story that fits Robert Montgomery like a glove

A Pig in a Poke!

THIS April morning, Colonel Geraldine, enquirey to the Crown Prince of Karovia, was searching the royal palace for his young master. The king was in full council—the ambassador of the neighbouring kingdom of Irania was present with important proposals.

Geraldine at last found Princee Florizel in the kitchens, in the midst of a loudly applauding crowd who were watching him trying to walk a slaek wire fastened from one end of the room to the other.

"Good gracious, your Highness!" cried Geraldine, shocked beyond measure. "What are you doing?"

"Bringing the carnival in—since I'm not allowed to go out to it," Florizel answered. "Don't worry me, or I'll fall!"

He appeared a handsome young man as he balanced himself precariously. He was tall, dark, faintly moustached—and he wore his dark grey flannels and white shirt with royal distinction. All the same, he fell off the wire into Geraldine's promptly outstretched arms.

"Enough of this!" cried the irate colonel, rushing the wriggling young man upstairs to his bed-room. "Get dressed at once!" he dared to command. "The king is tired of waiting for you. You've got to marry the Princess Brenda."

"That little wretch?" gasped Florizel. "I say, Geraldine, that's a bit thick!"

"You tell his Majesty so." Geraldine forced the young man into his regimentals and hurried him away. Florizel entered the council somewhat short of breath, but looking every inch a prince. He saluted his father, bowed to the Iranian Ambassador and the counsellors present, took his seat and sat very erect. "Proceed, Excellency," ordered the king.

The Iranian Ambassador, standing in his place, coughed a little.

"You must understand, sir, that our Court is quite willing that her Royal Highness should accept your Majesty's gracious proposal. It will cement old friendships and ensure the safety of both kingdoms. But"—here the old fellow coughed again—"but the Princess Brenda is somewhat difficult. She hasn't seen his Royal Highness the Princee for many years, and—and to give you her own words, sir—she says she won't buy a pig in a poke."

"I quite agree," said Florizel. "Silence!" cried his father. "I will settle this affair. The princess shall be afforded an opportunity of seeing you—and you will behave as unlike a pig as possible. Gentlemen, the council is at an end. Good-morning to you all."

Left alone with his son, the king told him:

"Florizel, my son, revolution is in the air. We have very little money in our coffers. A lovely young partner, with millions to bring into our impoverished country, means that trade will recover and our people be happy once more."

"But Brenda!" sighed Florizel. "A girl with plaits and eyes like beads."

"Some beads are beautiful," said the king. "Call Geraldine in."

When the colonel had duly saluted, the king gave his final orders.

"You will go to England, Florizel, to learn manners. Geraldine will go with you. When you return, you will marry Brenda."

"Your Majesty," said Geraldine quickly, "I shall be delighted. I have long desired to bring your Majesty one of England's famous Christmas puddings."

"They're even worse than Brenda," said Florizel.

"Attention, both of you!" the king commanded. "Five years ago a revolution nearly succeeded. A thorough-paced rascal—a doctor of philosophy named Noel—stirred our people to madness. We managed to crush the revolt, but Noel escaped. He may be alive and still plotting against us. Geraldine, we must have this marriage—and I shall hold you responsible for it."

That same evening Florizel and his enquirey were aboard a packet-boat bound from Antwerp to the port of Dover.

They travelled under the assumed names of Theophilus Godall and Major Hammersmith. The journey was very dull—until they were almost at the end of it. Then a steward came along the decks of the steamship to Florizel.

"Mr. Godall, a lady has asked me to give you this letter."

"Don't take it," whispered Geraldine. "It's a trap of some sort."

But Florizel had opened the letter. He read it through.

"I will come immediately."

He rose from his chair, tossed the note to Geraldine, and proceeded to state cabin number 3. Here he found a raven-haired and agitated young woman standing by the door.

"You are Mr. Godall?" she asked swiftly. As he bowed, she went on in a shaking voice. "I am in great peril, sir. I am bearing a most important document. There are those abroad who have tracked me and who will endeavour to steal this." She held out a long, heavily sealed letter. "Will you take it and keep it until I leave the ship? If you will do me this great kindness—and I know you will, because you are a gentleman—you can hand it back to me as I come down the gangway. Once on English shores, I shall be safe."

"I will do it for you, madam, with pleasure." Florizel had taken in the pale beauty of the girl's face. She was very handsome—and vaguely familiar. He believed he had seen her somewhere in Karovia.

Almost as he spoke, a dark, heavily built man burst into the cabin. He stepped past the prince and confronted the girl.

"Give me that letter!" he demanded. "Stand away, you!"

He thrust out an arm to keep Florizel at bay. But the latter caught the fellow by the collar and flung him aside.

"Your quarrel is now with me," the prince cried fiercely. "I will guard this letter with my life!"

The dark man glared at him. "I warn you, Mr. Godall!" he croaked. "You observe I know your name. I solemnly warn you!"

He strode from the cabin just as Geraldine came excitedly running in to rescue his royal charge.

The Young Man with the Cream Tarts
THE next evening "Mr. Godall" and "Major Hammersmith" were dining at a little restaurant in Soho. They were discussing the mysterious lady.

Said Geraldine with conviction: "She is a spy sent to kill you or get you into some dire trouble. She didn't come off the ship—you still have the letter—and I suggest that you destroy it at once."

"My dear fellow, I can't do that." The prince took the sealed envelope out of his pocket. "It is a sacred commission."

"Fiddlesticks!" Geraldine snatched up the letter and tore it open. A perfectly blank sheet of folded foolscap was revealed.

"It's lucky I'm here to look after you," said Geraldine.

Florizel was vexedly studying the blank paper when a great noise and much laughter from the tables by the door caused both of them to stare in that direction.

A young man, followed by two commissionaires, had entered the restaurant. Each commissionaire carried a large silver dish of cream tarts. The young man begged the company at each table, as he came to it, to taste these tarts, protesting that they were the most delicious in the whole world. Sometimes his offer was accepted; sometimes harshly refused. In these latter cases the young man ate the rejected tart himself.

Presently he came to Florizel. "Sir," said he, "will you honour me?" He offered the prince a tart. "I can vouch for the quality of these confections, having eaten two dozen and three of them already."

"Don't touch it!" cried Geraldine. "I will eat one," said Florizel, "on condition that you sit down and join us at supper."

The young man hesitated. "I must either eat or give away the rest of these tarts." He suddenly laughed. "There are but seven left. I will liquidate the last five if your friend and you will eat one a-piece."

Geraldine was beginning a protest when Florizel took a tart and devoured it in a couple of bites. The young man started on the five he had promised to eat: Geraldine, with many misgivings, ate the last one. The young man dismissed the commissionaires, tossing them his purse.

"There," he cried, "all is finished! I am penniless, and I have ended a most foolish career by a crowning act of folly. I will sit to your table, gentlemen, and will take wine with you. I confess to being somewhat surfeited with food."

He dropped into the chair next to Florizel, who filled his glass with champagne.

"Here's your health, sir," said the prince. "My name is Theophilus Godall; my friend is Major Alfred Hammersmith. We are, like yourself, men of broken fortunes, making a night of it on the last few pounds we have managed to save from the wreck of our estates."

"How?" the young fellow exclaimed. "Are you ruined, like me? Are you"—he lowered his voice and glanced around—"are you going to avoid the consequences of your folly by the one easy path?"

Geraldine, taking his cue from Florizel, answered boldly: "Yes, sir—we are."

"You are determined to end life to-night? Good!" The young man swigged off his champagne. "Then we are well met, we three. Come with me, Mr. Godall, and you, Major Hammersmith—to the Suicide Club!"

The three companions went together in a four-wheeled cab through the dark streets of Soho, almost deserted at this time of night. Another cab followed them secretly.

They came to the entrance of a narrow court, where the young man stopped the cab. The second cab passed by quickly, stopped farther on, when two people alighted to watch the prince.

"You must please pay the fare," the young man stated. "I have not one farthing of money."

Colonel Geraldine paid the jarvey and they alighted. The young man led the way up the court until they came to a narrow doorway.

"Wait for me here," he whispered. "I must arrange things with the president before you enter. My name, by the way, is George Barnley. Make a note of it—you will read about me in to-morrow's issue of 'The Times.'"

When they were alone, Geraldine spoke earnestly to the prince.

"Of all your follies, your Highness, this is the wildest and most dangerous."

"Are you afraid?" Florizel whispered back.

The colonel drew himself erect. "A Geraldine is never afraid. But Major Hammersmith remembers that he is responsible for you."

"I absolve you from that responsibility," Florizel told him.

Mr. Barnley had returned. He beckoned to them.

"The president will see you. Be frank in your replies to his questions."

They went along a gas-lit corridor to a small room. Mr. Barnley, with a ghastly grin, went out of this room by a door on the far side. A murmur of voices reached them when the door was opened—the sounds of melancholy music. Again Geraldine begged the prince to come away.

"I have set my heart on solving this puzzle," Florizel told him.

The inner door opened, and again they heard the wailing music. A tall, thin man entered, sallow-checked, sunken-eyed, and dressed in old-fashioned evening clothes, with a double tie of white satin about his linen collar. His shirt was frilled down the front, and his bald dome of a head was fringed with long, greying hairs which dangled over his shoulders. He bowed slightly to them.

"You wish to speak with me?" he asked.

"We desire to join your Suicide Club," said Geraldine.

"What is that?" came the smiling answer. "Some little joke of yours, gentlemen? This is a private dwelling-house in which I reside."

"Sir," spoke Florizel in his impetuous way, "we are here upon the invitation of Mr. George Barnley. You are either going to admit us, or you will bitterly repent having allowed us to come so far as this room."

The president laughed.

"That is the way to talk," he approved. "This is, to you, a frolic for April Fool's Day, but I like you, and I will admit you." He took a small Bible from his pocket and placed it in Florizel's hands. "Repeat after me, if you please."

The oath was a very binding one. It was a sacred pledge never to reveal or even hint at the mysteries of the club. Geraldine liked the adventure less than ever, but took the oath after Florizel had done so. They followed the president into the club lounge.

It was an ordinary club-room with easy-chairs and a comfortable fire burning in the grate. Two waiters moved about among the members, bringing them refreshment. The company was chiefly that of oldish men, but there were others like young Mr. Barnley also present.

A sad-faced youth was at the piano; two of the men were playing chess in a corner; Barnley was standing by the fire. The president whispered to Florizel:

"The entrance fee and first year's subscription is one hundred pounds each, if you please."

Florizel nodded to Geraldine.

"Please write a cheque for two hundred pounds, Hammersmith, payable to bearer. I will settle afterwards with you."

The money was paid over. They signed their names. The president smiled as he looked over their shoulders.

"All bear assumed names here," he sighed. "It is odd that so few have courage to end their lives in the full glare. Why are you wishing to die, Mr. Godall?" he asked.

"I have no more money."

"That is reason enough," said the president. "Now, sir"—he addressed Geraldine—"what is your reason? You evidently have money."

Florizel answered while the colonel was hesitating:

"My poor friend was cashiered last week for cheating at cards."

"Excellent!" approved the president, while Geraldine went scarlet with vexation. "Take your seats, gentlemen. Order champagne—it is usual; and the hour is at hand when we commence our play."

They seated themselves near to an old fellow on a couch who had been glancing at them.

"You are newcomers?" he asked. "Friends of young Barnley—a mad fellow! I am Dr. Malthus. I have been a member for two years."

"Two years?" said Geraldine, much relieved. "But I thought—"

"Quite so," Malthus checked him. "But I have been extraordinarily unlucky. Everybody gets the ace of spades but me. But I love the thrill—and I shall get it one night. You may not know the procedure—allow me to explain. No one really likes committing suicide. It is sometimes—er—painful; sometimes incomplete. Well, here, the president arranges it all. Another, quite nicely, does the killing for you."

"But that is murder!" gasped Geraldine.

At this moment the president's voice was heard:

"Gentlemen, the deal! Please follow me into the card-room."

They walked, in twos and threes, past folding doors which had been thrown open, into a long, narrow room, the centre of which was occupied by a green-clothed table. The company settled down in chairs around it. The president took a pack of cards from a side table.

There was a vacant chair opposite Florizel's, and, just as the president was about to deal the cards, a girl in black entered. She took the vacant chair, her dark eyes fixed and unseeing.

It was the mysterious lady of the sealed envelope.

"Attention, please!" came the president's cold voice. He began to deal out the cards, walking behind each chair to lay a card in front of the player. "The ace of clubs represents the officer for the night—the ace of spades stands for the lucky one who is to leave this vale of tears."

Florizel was dealt the nine of clubs; Geraldine received the three of spades. The fatal cards did not appear until the second round. Then the girl turned over her card to show everyone that the ace of clubs had fallen to her.

A tense minute later Mr. Barnley received the ace of spades.

"Please to return to the lounge," said the president. "All except Miss Vandeleur and Mr. Barnley."

Florizel tried to speak to her, but she only regarded him with a stony stare. Dr. Malthus caught at his arm.

"Help me back to my chair," he breathed thickly. "I feel absolutely shattered. I must really give up playing."

The next morning, while breakfasting at their hotel, Geraldine read out from "The Times" to the horrified Florizel:

"We much regret to announce that Mr. George Barnley, well known in London sporting society, met with a fatal accident last night whilst returning from the theatre to his rooms in Savile Row. A large coping stone fell on his head from the roof of a house near by as he was passing beneath, and instantly killed him."

Miss Vandeleur is Again Lucky

DESPITE Colonel Geraldine's arguments, Florizel persisted in returning to the Suicide Club the following night.

The president told them:

"I expected you."

The deal, this time, was soon over. Florizel received the ace of spades in the first round and Miss Vandeleur the ace of clubs.

"Strange fortune," smiled the president. "Our new lady member, twice running, has had the luck to officiate."

When the others had withdrawn, he told Florizel:

"You will please accompany Miss Vandeleur in the closed carriage which waits at the end of the passage. She will arrange your death most charmingly."

There was no chance of a word with Geraldine. Florizel, always polite, entered the carriage with the mysterious lady. She made no reply to any of his questions as they drove out of Soho towards Regent's Park.

She told the driver to halt and wait

when they approached the Zoo. She then addressed Florizel:

"Get out, please. We are going to see the lions. You will enter the last cage, and—and, afterwards, I shall go home."

But when they were in the lions' house her nerves failed her. She had begun to open the door of one of the cages with a key taken from her bag, when suddenly she burst into tears.

"My dear lady," cried the prince, "what is the matter? Are you ill?"

"Noel shouldn't have expected it of me," she sobbed. "I can't do it! Let us go."

"You killed Barnley," the prince wondered. "Why not me?"

"I didn't kill him. I talked to him like a sister and—sent him to his people in Scotland. I paid his fare. Anyone can put a death notice in a newspaper."

The prince considered this for a few moments, then he spoke very seriously: "You mentioned the name of Noel just now. I have heard of a Dr. Noel."

"He is the president of the club," Miss Vandeleur dried her tears. "Where is our cabman?"

They were at the gates of the Zoo. There was no sign of the carriage.

"Why did you join the Suicide Club, Miss Vandeleur?" Florizel asked.

"Because I am being forced into a hateful marriage. I ran away—after telling my people I would not buy a pig in a poke!"

"Dear me!" said the prince. "You must be little Brenda grown up."

"I followed you," she confessed. "I wanted to know what kind of a man you had become—if you were a man of courage. You were a most odious little boy."

A shot rang out and a bullet whistled past them through the night air. The prince caught at his companion's hand and raced her into the roadway. They ran along the Albert Road, stopping at the entrance to a small inn. The prince hammered at the door and they were admitted in rather breathless condition. Safe in the little hostelry, Brenda said:

Noel flung up his arms as he overbalanced. . . .

"That was Noel. He hates you. It was to save your life that I went into the club. I bribed him to deal me the ace of clubs. I knew he'd give you the ace of spades."

Further knockings at the door brought them to silence.

Florizel rose.

"Put out the lamp," he told her, "and stand clear! This must be someone come to finish where you have failed."

A man, be-cloaked and in a great hurry, rushed in when Florizel opened the door. At once Florizel closed with him and threw him heavily.

"Leggo!" gasped a well-known voice. "It's only me!"

It was Geraldine. The prince raised him up.

"My dear fellow, a thousand pardons."

The colonel grunted:

"There's another madman outside, firing off a pistol at everything he sees!"

Trapped!

THE three breakfasted together next morning at the little inn.

Geraldine was being very polite to the princess when the waiter knocked over his coffee cup. Brenda jumped up hastily from the table.

"You clumsy idiot!" shouted the colonel.

"I'm terribly sorry," the waiter apologized. "My nerves, sir—all to pieces. Egg and bacon, sir?"

"No!" thundered Geraldine.

"It's my little dog, sir," went on the old man in tears. "He killed a parrot, sir, that flew in from the Zoo. And he's to be tried for murder."

Florizel put down his newspaper.

"Try a dog for murder?"

"Yes, sir. It's one of the new laws, sir. I'm—I'm heartbroken, gentlemen." He raised terrified eyes towards Brenda, standing by the window. "I love my little dog. He's all I have in the world."

"I will go with you to this strange court," said Florizel. "I will save your dog."

"Thank you indeed, sir. Will you come now? It's a lot to ask you—"

Florizel was already at the door.

"I will put on my coat at once."

The old man went to a side table and took up a small round parcel. He brought it to Geraldine.

"Your Christmas pudding, sir. The cook had one left over. I managed to get it for you—ten and sixpence, sir."

Brenda went quickly to Florizel, when he came back with hat and coat:

"Don't go!" she murmured. "I am afraid for you."

"We are in England," Florizel reminded her. "Come, Hammersmith."

The colonel snatched up his round parcel.

"Excuse us, princess," he bowed. "We will return in a few minutes."

They went to a tall house up a side street. The old waiter knocked at the door and they were admitted by a man in livery.

He escorted them to folding-doors on the left of the passage. These were thrown open and Florizel and Geraldine stepped into a large bare room.

Before them was a long table at which several people were sitting, all facing the door. The judge rose to his feet as the folding doors were sharply clapped together by two men. He spoke very pleasantly:

"Good-morning, Mr. Godall. Good-morning, Major Hammersmith. Most kind of you to come."

It was the president of the Suicide Club!

"What do you want of us, sir?" Florizel inquired, sternly regarding that venerable face with its burningly dark eyes.

"My dear prince, I am Dr. Noel," came the ready answer. "Your father threw me into prison, with the order that I was to be hanged on the following morning. Hanged—because I had dared to offend him and his autocratic rule! Kings are superfluous in these days. The people must rule. It is strangely fortunate for me to catch both you and the colonel at one cast of the line. News of your arrival was brought me by one of our spies—but I knew we must employ cunning to properly get you. Hence the cream tarts and Mr. Barnley. Hence the Suicide Club and its amusing ritual. It has brought us two hundred pounds, you will recollect." He chuckled a little. "The jury will give you a hearing—and hang you immediately afterwards. Behold the gallows!" He dangled a slip-knotted rope hanging from a ceiling hook behind him.

Geraldine glanced towards the men by the door.

"Staud away!" he cried, raising the small round parcel which contained his Christmas pudding. "I suspected some plot. I will throw this bomb—and you shall all perish with us!"

He backed against the inner wall. Florizel, walking stick tightly gripped, moved close to him. The pudding was upraised—the president and the jury sprang towards the windows, their faces ashen with terror. But one of the men at the door began to creep in on Geraldine.

Florizel, without turning his head, had seen the fellow. He waited until he was almost at Geraldine's back; then Florizel's gloved fist shot out, catching him at a blow. Geraldine, with a yell of rage, threw the pudding at the president. It struck him between the eyes.

Pandemonium followed. Florizel fought with cool desperation, overthrowing first one and then another of the mob. Geraldine performed prodigies of valour.

The president wiped away the sticky contents of the burst parcel from his livid face.

Florizel reached the folding doors and jerked them open.

"Come, Geraldine!" he called, as he dashed along the corridor. He pulled open the front door and rushed into the street.

A policeman was standing by the railings of a house near by. The policeman was talking to the cook in the area below and came away with reluctance. Meantime the front door had slammed to.

"My friend is in there," Florizel told the officer in a breath. "He is surrounded by anarchists! I call upon you to help me save him!"

The policeman blew his whistle. He then approached the door and knocked upon it. It opened at his touch—the passage was empty. Florizel ran in with the policeman—the folding doors were wide. There was no sign of anyone. Everything had gone, table, chairs and the slip-knotted rope!

Florizel, after a vain search of the empty house, returned to the inn. A note was waiting for him. It was from Brenda, telling him that she had been compelled to return with her escort to Iramia.

While he stood in the porch considering her note, a furtive youth came up to him.

"Are you Mister Godall?" he asked. Florizel nodded. "I'm sent to tell you Major Hammersmith is in great danger, sir. If you would save his life, you must come to this address at ten o'clock this evening."

He thrust a card into Florizel's hand. "You're to come in by the garden gate. And you're to come alone."

Retribution

IN face of his oath, Florizel could not call in the police. A better plan came to his mind; he would ask for help from a few trusty officers and gentlemen attached to the Karovian Embassy in St. James's Square. He began collecting them at dusk, calling for them in a hansom cab which he drove himself in order to secure secrecy.

He brought them in pairs to a furnished house in St. John's Wood which he had hired for the occasion, and entertained them with lavish hospitality. He explained the position.

"I must go alone to meet this fellow Noel," he told them. "It is another trap, of course; but as the garden of this place backs on to the garden of the house where I am supposed to be rescuing Geraldine, it will be only necessary for you gentlemen to climb a wall and come to us, with your pistols and my rapiers, at ten minutes after ten. I shall ask you to see that Dr. Noel has fair play."

At ten o'clock precisely Florizel presented himself at the garden gate of the other house. The furtive youth opened the door when he rang the bell.

"This way, sir." He directed the prince under the dark trees towards the back of the mansion. Three men suddenly sprang out from the shadows. One held a lantern, which he flashed on Florizel; the others covered him with their revolvers.

"You will not need your walking-stick," spoke the leader, snatching it away from Florizel. "Follow us and do not attempt to call for help. If you do not—he grimly flourished his gun—"you will be shot down like a dog!"

They entered the house from the back. Noel and his myrmidons were gathered into the large stone-floored kitchen. Geraldine, his hands tied behind his back, was being held by two of the fellows.

"You shouldn't have come!" he called heartbrokenly. "My life is worth nothing!"

"It is very dear to me," Florizel answered. He saw Noel advancing towards him, smiling in his hateful way. "You will release my friend!" he commanded.

"We will release you both, Prince Florizel," said Noel. "By means of the rope you have once avoided. We shall hang you together—it will be a fitting end to a couple of tyrants who have too long opposed the people. A deep grave has been dug outside—it will hold you both most comfortably."

At this moment the rescue party, headed by Major O'Rook and Captain Rich of the Embassy, burst into the room. O'Rook shouted:

"Hands up, all of you! The game is finished!"

The surprise was complete. The murderous gang put up their hands. Geraldine was released, and, with clenched fists, faced Dr. Noel.

"Human Targets"

READ THIS FIRST

Buck Grant, a settler in the Pecos Valley, is in reality a Ranger investigating stories of terrorism by a gang of outlaws whose leader's identity he hopes to discover.

Judge Holmes, of Maverick, is the only man who knows Buck is a Ranger. He is likewise the only man who knows that Buck is the Phantom Rider, a cloaked horseman who is defeating the activities of the outlaws at every turn.

One morning, however, masked gangsters butcher Shorty, another Ranger who is on his way to the Valley. Dying, Shorty tells Buck to go to the Hidden Valley Ranch, and later Buck learns this is the property of a man named Grayson.

He meets Grayson's beautiful daughter, Mary, who has returned from the East and brought with her a friend, Helen Moore.

Meanwhile, a Ranger known as Spooky has entered Maverick, and Buck instructs him to obtain work at the Hidden Valley outfit. That same night Buck casually drops in at that ranch himself, and is introduced to Harvey Delancy, a neighbouring cattleman who is on friendly terms with the Graysons.

Old Grayson is murdered the next day, and leaves Mary a wallet containing the map of a secret gold mine. Later, a railway agent offers a high price for the Grayson land, but is wounded by a gangster's bullet before the deal can go through. Then, operating in league with renegade Indians, the outlaws raid Mary's cattle.

They are seen by Buck and Mary, who ride for help but are set upon by Redskins. In the scuffle one of the renegades tries to knife the white man.

Now Read On

The Herd Lost

MARY'S scream had warned Buck, and he turned in the nick of time to meet the onslaught of the Indian who had sneaked up on him from the rear.

The renegade's dagger was upraised for a death-stab, but ere the blow could fall Buck drove his fist into the assassin's jaw with an impact that hurled the fellow to the dust. Then he yelled a command to Mary, bidding her ride onward for the Hidden Valley Ranch and bring help without delay.

Farther down the trail the girl uncovered her face as she heard the big nester's stentorian tones and saw with relief that he had balked the attempt on his life. And next instant, even as Buck was sailing into the other Redskins, whom he had scattered a few seconds previously, Mary Grayson pulled her horse round and spurred in the direction of home.

About a minute later she was passing Sandstone Bluff, and once she had skirted the bold promontory she came in sight of her ranch, towards which she galloped at the top of her pony's speed.

Some of the boys emerged from the bunkhouse as she drew rein abreast of that building's doorway, and her foreman Steve was among them. It was he who called out in alarm as he saw the expression on Mary's countenance.

"Anything wrong, Miss Grayson?" he queried sharply.

"Plenty!" Mary answered. "Outlaws are running off that herd of cattle beyond the Bluff. They've got some renegade Indians working with them, too, and Buck Grant has tangled with four of them. Quick, there's not a moment to lose!"

Her foreman soon had the rest of the hands assembled, and once they had saddled their broncs the cowboys lost no time in swinging themselves astride their mounts and pounding along the trail, with Mary Grayson in their midst and Steve sharing the lead with the thick-set figure of Spooky. Indeed, it was not long before Spooky was at the head of the party, urging his mustang across the verdant range like a man possessed.

His anxiety to reach the scene of the raid might well have set the others wondering, but they could never have guessed that he and Buck Grant were close friends—any more than they could have guessed that they were both members of that gallant organisation known as the Texas Rangers.

Rounding Sandstone Bluff, the rescuers suddenly beheld Buck and his antagonists a couple of hundred yards away from them. The white man was still laying about him with his bunched knuckles, but the Indians were game enough, and were doing their utmost to close with him when they became aware of the band of riders who were sweeping into view.

One glimpse of the newcomer was enough for the Redskins, and on a common impulse the four of them took to their heels, leaving Buck Grant where he stood and throwing themselves on to the backs of their horses. Then they made straight for the wood where the main body of the renegades was ensconced, and they were fleeing wildly in that direction when Buck was joined by Mary Grayson and the boys from the Hidden Valley outfit.

"Are you hurt, Buck?" Mary gasped. "Just my feelings, that's all," the big fellow answered cheerfully enough. "But come on! That herd of yours on the other side of the wood needs lookin' after."

His bronc Silver was near by, and a running jump carried him into the faithful creature's saddle. Another moment and he was leading a stampede towards the strip of forest, which the fugitive Indians had now reached.

The wood lay directly between Buck and the herd, for by this time Dirk and his pack of outlaw accomplices had run the cattle southwards from their pasture. It was the big Ranger's purpose, therefore, to cut clean through the forest with Mary Grayson's employees in an effort to intercept the rustlers. But he did not bargain for the volley of rifle and revolver-fire that burst all at once from the edge of the tall timber.

It was a murderous challenge that caused Buck and his companions to pull up sharply and dive for such cover as was available, and Buck made it his business to take care of Mary and hustle her behind a cluster of rocks. Then he opened fire on the wood, and the guns of the Hidden Valley boys were echoing the blasts of his forty-five when the Grayson foreman crawled across to him.

"Them Redskins must have had some pals lyn' doggo in the timber," Steve said to Buck and Mary. "I'll guarantee they're Red Eagle's bunch of cronies, though it's gonna be hard to prove it unless we can round 'em up."

"Who's Red Eagle?" Buck demanded. "Son of an old chief up in the reservation," was the laconic reply. "The old feller's all right, but the son and some of the younger bloods are a hot-headed lot. They're bad medicine, take it from me, and it's strong liquor that makes 'em so."

Buck ground his teeth together. "I get it," he said. "Those rustlers who jumped the cattle are usin' the renegades to cover their escape. If we're gonna save the herd we'll have to shoot our way through that wood."

"Yeah?" Steve grunted. "Well, I'm figurin' it will be a tough job. Them renegades are in a strong position, and judgin' by the flashes of their guns they ain't weak in numbers."

The foreman's pessimistic words were confirmed. The sun was going down behind the western hills as he spoke them, and the moon and the stars were out before Red Eagle and his band finally retired, in face of a gradual advance on the part of the white men.

The Indians had maintained a resistance as effective as it was stubborn, and, with their work well done, they were galloping off through the wood when Buck and his companions gained the fringe of the trees at last.

For Mary Grayson's party it was an empty victory indeed, but as they heard the receding hoof-beats of their unseen enemies' mustangs they hurriedly secured their own mounts and charged in pursuit. Yet on penetrating the forest and pushing out on to the plain beyond, they saw that the renegades were far ahead of them—a dim cloud of horsemen vanishing into the fastnesses of the mountain country.

Then something else caught the attention of the baffled white men. It was the spectacle of two cowboys bending over a stricken comrade on the otherwise empty pasture where Mary's cattle had been grazing prior to the raid.

They were the punchers who had been in charge of the herd, and, riding over to them with Buck and the rest of the men, Mary spoke in an urgent tone.

"Who is it that's hurt?" she asked anxiously.

"It's Lefty, Miss Mary," one of the herdsman told her. "He's in a pretty bad way. Tim here has got a slug in the shoulder, too. We did our best, but them rustlers was too many for us, I guess. I wish you could've shown up sooner. The cattle would have been saved, then."

October 3rd, 1936.

"We were held up by a bunch of renegades," Buck put in. "Which direction did those rustlers take?"

"They drove the cattle south," came the answer. "Looked as if they were heading for Dead Man's Pass. They'll be there by now."

Mary exchanged a despairing glance with her foreman.

"Dead Man's Pass," she said heavily. "That's the last of my herd."

"You're right, Miss Mary," Steve muttered. "Your father allus said that a cow through Dead Man's Pass was a gone critter. Once a rustler gets a drove beyond that point there's no chance of finding your stock any more."

"We can try, can't we?" It was Buck's voice again. "Come on. Let's give it a whirl, anyway. A couple of you take Tim and Lefty into town and have the doctor look them over. The rest of us will make for the pass."

The encouraging strain in which he spoke was infectious, yet in their hearts those who accompanied him southward to Dead Man's Pass felt that their quest was a vain one. Nor were their convictions ill-founded, for, although they searched the hills until they were saddle-weary, they discovered no trace of the missing cattle.

There was a hint of dawn in the sky when the party at length returned to Hidden Valley, and, as he prepared to bid Mary good-bye in front of the ranch-house porch, Buck could not help noticing how drawn and pale her features were.

"You're all in, Mary," he said to her. "Better go to bed and get some sleep."

"I'm not tired, Buck," she murmured. "Just depressed. I was going to sell those cattle to-morrow and realise some money on them. Now I'm flat broke—no money for supplies, no money to pay the men their wages."

"Aren't you forgetting the offer the railroad company made you for your land?" Buck told her reassuringly.

"But that deal will take time," she pointed out, "especially with Blake, the railroad representative, lying up there in one of my guest rooms and hovering between life and death. No, it's ready cash I need. I only wish I knew where that gold mine of dad's was located. A few nuggets out of it and I could pay my way."

Buck eyed her whimsically.

"Why don't you get the chart of the mine from the Phantom?" he suggested. "You say he's taking care of it for you."

"Well, I surmise he is," Mary answered. "But, not knowing who he is or where to locate him, how can I possibly get word to him that I need that map?"

Buck managed to check the smile that came to his lips.

"Maybe he'll find out for himself," he said. "He seems to be the kind of hombre who has ways and means of pickin' up information."

And shortly after making this cryptic and unenlightening observation, Buck Grant took his leave and set out for his homestead on Dry Creek.

The Phantom's Message

THE following evening Harvey Delaney dropped in at the Hidden Valley outfit to see Mary Grayson, and he had not been there long before the girl was telling him of the predicament that she was in.

Delaney listened to her story sympathetically, and when she had finished talking he leaned towards her and addressed her in an earnest tone.

"You're sure in a spot, Mary," he said to her, "but I'd like you to know that you can count on me for anything you need. Of course, I can't offer you the price for your ranch that the railroad company has mentioned. Nevertheless, if you're willing to take ready cash—"

"Oh, no, Harvey," the girl interrupted. "It's very kind of you, but it would hardly be fair to go back on the deal that I was arranging with Mr. Blake when he was shot down. I practically gave him my word that I'd do business with his company."

Delaney looked at her shrewdly.

"Then maybe I could make you a loan," he volunteered. "I'll let you have what money you need, and you can pay me back when you sell your property to the railroad."

"No thanks, Harvey," Mary rejoined. "I couldn't think of imposing on you to that extent. I'm afraid you misunderstand me when I started to speak about my troubles. I wasn't hinting that you should help me out."

"I know that, Mary," the neighbouring cattleman said gently, "and I'm not surprised that your scruples won't permit you to borrow off me. But it would be a salve to your conscience if we made a business arrangement of the whole thing, wouldn't it?"

"How do you mean?"

"Well, call it a mortgage if you like," Delaney explained. "I'll lend you a sum of money at an agreed rate of interest repayable within thirty days—your ranch to stand as security in the event of default. Of course, I don't need any security so far as you're concerned, Mary. We've been friends too long for that. But if we draw up an agreement and conduct this matter as a business proposition, then you won't have to look upon it as an act of charity—which is your only objection to my offer, I take it."

Both Delaney and Mary were unaware of the fact, but an attentive ear was pressed close to the keyhole on the other side of the door behind which they were talking. It was the ear of Lizzie, Mary Grayson's housekeeper, an honest enough young woman, but a born eavesdropper and an inveterate gossip.

Lizzie had heard all, and she continued to listen-in to their discussion until Mary and Delaney moved away from the door, and their voices became an indistinct murmur. Then she went out on to the ranch-house veranda, and, catching sight of a cowboy who was loitering near the porch, she hastened to transmit her news.

The cowboy in question was none other than Spooky, and Lizzie beamed at him smugly.

"Everything's going to be all right now," she declared, in the knowing accents of one who enjoyed imparting information.

Spooky stared at her in a puzzled fashion.

"Everything's going to be all right now?" he reiterated. "What do you mean?"

"I just heard Miss Mary and Harvey Delaney talkin' in the lounge," the housekeeper replied. "Poor thing, Miss Mary was all het-up on account of havin' no ready cash, an' that nice Mr. Delaney allowed as he'd lend her as much money as she wanted—on the security of her ranch."

Spooky gave a slight start, but, recovering himself, affected to be as pleased as Lizzie evidently was. At the first opportunity he slipped away, however, and a minute after he had left the housekeeper he was riding in the direction of Dry Creek, determined to acquaint Buck with the tidings that he had received.

Buck was not alone in his cabin. He had received a visitor in the person of Judge Holmes, and the pair of them were deep in conversation when Spooky broke in upon them.

"Hcy, Buck," the little fellow exclaimed without preamble, "there's something you oughta know. Delaney's at Hidden Valley offerin' Mary Grayson a loan on the security of her ranch. I ain't got nothin' against Delaney, but I don't like the sound of a proposition that has a mortgage mixed up in it."

Buck stood up, and so did Judge Holmes. But whereas the expression on the younger man's countenance was tense and grim, that on the features of the judge was mildly impassive.

"Why now, Spooky, you're not being very fair to Delaney," Holmes protested. "He's been a friend to the Graysons all along, and I call this a real neighbourly gesture. Buck's just been telling me what the loss of that herd meant to Mary, and naturally Harvey Delaney would want to help her out. He's got plenty of money to do it, too."

"Yep, and plenty of mortgages on other ranches as well, according to all accounts," Buck cut in.

"Why, surely you don't suspect him of having any ulterior motive?" the judge queried.

"I suspect anybody who's trying to get a foothold in this country," was Buck's retort, "especially with the railroad aiming to lay a line clean through it. The man who holds territory here can stick out for a fortune when the railroad company wants to buy. And just because Delaney has been friendly with the Graysons all along, that won't make his mortgage any the less binding. He wouldn't be the first hombre to forget friendship when there was a stack of dough in sight."

Judge Holmes pursed his lips. "That's true," he reflected, "and a mortgage would certainly give him power over Mary. Yet it might be kind of difficult for you or me to tell her that, Buck. She thinks a good deal of Delaney."

The stalwart Ranger gave him a side-long, thoughtful glance.

"There's someone else whose opinion she values pretty highly, judge," he commented. "I mean the Phantom Rider. She doesn't know he's Buck Grant, but from the way she's talked it's clear she has a lot of faith in him."

"I get it, Buck," Spooky interposed. "You're gonna ride as the Phantom again, an' give her a piece of advice."

"Spooky, you're almost too intelligent to live," Buck said with a grin.

"But, by the way, have you got that chart I asked you to take care of? I want it, for to-morrow I'm ridin' north to locate the secret mine. If I can lay my hands on any gold that may be there, Mary Grayson's immediate troubles will be over."

The map of the mine was produced, and Buck thrust it into his pocket. Then he rigged himself out in the garb that he wore as the Phantom, and, Spooky having saddled Silver in the meantime, the big fellow was soon galloping along the trail that led to the Hidden Valley outfit.

He prayed that he would not be too late to prevent Mary from coming to any definite arrangement with Harvey Delaney, and when he at length reached the vicinity of the Grayson ranch-house he lost no time in dismounting from his horse and advancing towards the building on foot, leaving Silver tethered in a coppice that was within a stone's throw of the veranda.

Everything seemed in his favour. No one was about, and the only light in the ground floor of the ranch-house came from a room which he knew to be the lounge; and as he reached the open window of that lounge he peered cautiously over the sill and saw Delaney and Mary seated at a table there.

Delaney was reading the contents of a document which he had apparently drawn up, and Buck heard his voice clearly.

"Thirty days from the above date," the man was quoting, "I, Mary Grayson, promise to repay Harvey Delaney the sum of ten thousand dollars, and hereby pledge the Hidden Valley ranch as security for payment of same."

He paused, and then:

"Well, Mary," he continued, "that's the agreement, and I'm glad I've finally persuaded you to shelve your scruples in regard to borrowing money from me. For I don't think I need mention that you haven't a better friend in Benson County."

"I'm very grateful to you, Harvey," the girl said, "for I really am up against it."

"All right, then," Delaney announced. "Put your signature to this, Mary, and I'll let you have my cheque for the ten thousand."

Mary picked up a pen, and the neighbouring rancher thrust the document towards her. Another moment and the transaction would have been carried out, but even as the girl was on the point of attaching her name to that deed she heard something fall with a light thud behind her chair.

She started, looked round quickly, and caught sight of a crumpled fragment of paper lying on the floor. It was wrapped around a stone, and in the very instant that she snatched it up it dawned on her that it must have been thrown through the window.

"What is it, Mary?"

Delaney spoke the words, but without answering him the girl stumbled across to the window, and as she looked out into the night she discerned a familiar figure running in the direction of a coppice—the figure of a man in a white cloak—the figure of the mystery rider whom she knew as the Phantom.

With a sharp intake of the breath, Mary drew back from the window, and, unfolding the missive that she had picked up, she scanned it rapidly, and read as follows:

"Don't accept a loan from anyone, not even Harvey Delaney.—THE PHANTOM RIDER."

"Mary, what is it? What's that note you picked up? Let me see it."

Delaney's voice aroused her. She found him standing by her side, but it was obvious he had not discerned the Phantom. His eyes were riveted on the scrap of paper which she was holding, and which she now made haste to conceal.

"I can't show it to you, Harvey," she gasped.

"But why?"

She did not explain—scarcely knew what to say. She only knew that she was prepared to follow the Phantom's counsel, blindly. Delaney was her friend, but the Phantom had proved himself an even greater friend, and even though his identity was unknown to her she felt that it was impossible to question his judgment. Indeed, the very mystery that surrounded him seemed to lend force to this message from him.

At last she found her tongue. "Harvey," she stammered out, "I— I can't accept that loan."

"What do you mean, Mary?"

"It's something I can't discuss, Harvey—"

And then she stopped, for at that moment Lizzie burst into the room, her eyes goggling, her face drained of every vestige of colour.

"You've heard of the Phantom Rider, ain't you?" the white man queried.

"Miss Mary!" the housekeeper screeched in alarm. "Miss Mary, I just saw that ghost man from the window of my room! Him they calls the Phantom! I saw him—plain as daylight—ridin' away into the brush!"

Mary stole a furtive and uncertain glance at Harvey Delaney. His countenance seemed to have grown suddenly rock-like in its hardness, and there was a glitter of resentment in his eyes; and, seeing the look on his features, Mary experienced a feeling of awkwardness, for she knew that it must appear as if she did not trust him.

Yet, much as she hated the idea of him taking offence, she could not bring herself to reconsider her impulsive decision and go against the Phantom's advice.

The Northern Trail

IT was early morning, and Dirk and his fellow-rustlers were assembled in the remote cabin that was their hide-out.

With them was their leader, courting, as usual, the deepest shadows of a room whose windows were thickly curtained, and in the semi-darkness he and his hirelings were holding a conference upon their ambition to acquire Hidden Valley and the rest of the territory through which the railroad company was to lay its line.

"Well, anyway, boss," Dirk was saying, "you've got to give us credit for a clean job the other night. We lifted that Grayson herd, and we've already turned the cattle over to Lopez, the buyer from Mexico."

"Which means them steers are safely over the border," put in Keeler, another of the gang.

"Yes," agreed the dim-seen leader of the band, "and the loss of her herd leaves Mary Grayson with no resources except the gold diggings her father discovered."

He paused, and then drummed his fingers on the surface of a scored table at which he and his men were seated.

"The Phantom has the only means of locating that mine," he went on truculently. "If we only knew where to look for it, we might trap him there—yeah, and net a fortune into the bargain."

"We know that mine is somewhere north of Music Mountain, boss," stated Dirk. "I'm goin' up that way myself this mornin' to meet Red Eagle and his renegades, and pay 'em the dough you promised 'em for helpin' us. I fixed up to see them near Navajo Canyon. Wonder if there's any chance o' me runnin' across the Phantom while I'm around there."

It was a possibility that seemed to impress the gang-leader, for he leaned forward quickly in his chair.

"You never know, Dirk," he said. "Listen, take Gabe and Keeler and Roscoe with you. If you do happen to spot the Phantom, stick to his trail. He may lead you to the mine. And if he does, let him have it in the back as soon as you're certain you've reached the diggings."

Ten minutes later Dirk was riding from the hide-out with the three men who had been detailed to accompany him, and it was at a smart trot that they pushed through the hills, their objective being Navajo Canyon, away to the north.

If the gangsters had but known it, they were not the only ones who had business in that locality on this particular morning, for about the time that they set forth on their journey, Mary Grayson was preparing to leave Hidden Valley ranch and make tracks in the same direction.

In fact, at the very moment when Dirk and his comrades departed from their headquarters, Mary was bidding good-bye to her friend Helen Moore in front of the ranch-house porch.

"But who is this man Hudson that you want to see?" Helen asked, as the other girl climbed astride a pony that had been saddled for her.

"A man who was a close friend of my father's," Mary replied. "He owns a ranch to the north of a place called Navajo Canyon. I was looking through some correspondence in dad's desk last night, and it seems to me that Hudson may have been in his confidence—and perhaps know something about that hidden mine."

Having explained the reason for her decision to travel north, Mary left her friend and took the trail that led towards Music Mountain, and some two or three hours later she might have been seen skirting the slopes of that barren elevation. Then she pressed onward into a sombre gorge—the ravine known as Navajo Canyon—and it was as she emerged from this, after covering the length of it, that something slithered through the dust immediately ahead of her bronc.

It was a rattlesnake that had dragged itself from some rocks near by, and it speedily vanished into a mass of chaparral thickets on the other side of the trail. But its momentary appearance startled Mary's horse, and, cavorting in its alarm, the pony threw its rider heavily to the ground.

The shock of the fall drove the breath from Mary's body, but, recovering herself, she glanced quickly and fearfully in the direction of the thickets. There was no sign of the rattlesnake, however, and she realised with a feeling of thankfulness that the serpent had probably been as scared by the encounter as her horse.

She then became conscious that her right ankle was paining her. Her foot must have been twisted in the stirrup when she had fallen, and as she made an effort to rise it gave way beneath her the instant she laid her weight on it. With an exclamation she sank down again, and was nursing the injury tenderly when she heard a shout and looked round to see a horseman approaching her from the canyon.

"Buck!" she ejaculated. "What are you doing here?"

"I've been scouting around to see if I could find any trace of that mine for you," he answered in a tone of concern. "But what happened, Mary? Are you hurt?"

She told him how she had been thrown, and, dismounting from his bronc, he examined her ankle and noticed that it was swollen. Then he indicated a dilapidated cabin which stood about three hundred yards beyond the mouth of Navajo Canyon.

"I'd better get you over to that shack and do a little doctoring," he said. "Looks to me like you've got a bad sprain there."

He secured her horse and lifted her into the saddle, then swung himself on to Silver's back and led the other pony to the cabin he had espied; and on reaching this he carried her inside and placed her on a chair.

The chair was thick with dust. So was every other article of furniture in the dwelling, which had obviously been untenanted for a considerable time.

"Nice lay-out," Buck commented ironically. "Say, you get your riding-hoot and stocking off, while I see if I can find some water."

He went out of the cabin, and was just in time to see Silver cantering off with Mary's horse through a tract of brushwood not far from the shack, whereupon he promptly sprinted after the two broncs and caught up with them as they were slaking their thirst at a stream on the other side of the thickets.

He allowed the animals to drink their fill, and then tethered them to the limb of a tree close by. Next he dipped his sombrero into the stream, and, leaving the ponies where they were, carried the hat back to the cabin.

Mary had removed her boot and her stocking, and, using his sombrero as a basin, he bathed her injured ankle and afterwards bound it tightly with a handkerchief.

A confusion of sounds caused Buck to rush to one of the grimy windows. Three horsemen were galloping towards the dwelling.

They were renegade Indians, their long hair flying in the breeze, their voices raised in a chorus of shrill whoops that were accompanied by the blasts of fire-arms which they were flourishing in their hands.

"Redskins!" Buck jerked. "And heading straight for this shack!"

"Who are they firing at?" Mary gasped.

"Nobody," the big Ranger answered. "They're just getting rid of some high spirits, I guess. If you ask me, they're tanked up."

"Tanked up?" Mary echoed.

"Yeah—drunk," Buck said to her. "By thunder, I'd like to know where they get their liquor from! These Indians are supposed to be civilised. They wear white men's clothes, they ape white men's ways, and they're taught some sort of schooling. But when it comes to taking whisky they revert to type, and there's no telling what mischief they're liable to get up to. It might be wise to keep out of their way. Look, that pantry over there."

He motioned to a cupboard at the far side of the room. A poster had been nailed to the door of it, a faded reward notice bearing the picture of some forgotten bandit and offering a reward for the latter's capture, dead or alive. But Buck paid little heed to that bill as he assisted Mary across to the pantry and entered it with her.

She had snatched up her stocking and her riding-boot, and she donned them in the gloom of the cupboard as she and Buck stood there behind the door, which they had pulled shut. Meanwhile they could hear the renegades approaching rapidly, and soon they realised that the Indians were drawing rein outside the cabin and dismounting.

"Lucky I left our horses out of sight," Buck whispered to Mary in the darkness of the pantry. "Unless those drink-crazed fools blunder off through the thickets in search of water, they'll never guess that anybody else is around."

The three Redskins lurched into the dwelling, talking loudly in their native tongue and brandishing their guns. They had ceased their display of random shooting, however, and in their hiding-place Buck and Mary heard the clatter of the weapons as they were laid heavily on a table—two revolvers and a magazine rifle.

Buck had some slight knowledge of the dialect in which they were conversing, and from their slovenly speech he gathered that they were expecting someone to meet them at the shack.

He also learned that one of the renegades was known as Red Eagle, a fact which convinced him that these were three of the party who had covered the escape of the rustlers when Mary's herd had been "lifted."

Each of the Redskins had produced a flask of rye whisky, and they were imbibing the strong spirit freely. Indeed, they had drained them dry when the pounding of hoofs at length caught their attention, signalling the arrival of another group of horsemen.

Then they heard a white man's voice, a voice which was familiar to Buck, and one which he immediately recognised as the voice of the ruffian known to him as Dirk.

"Hallo, there, Red Eagle!"

Dirk spoke the greeting as he came into the shack with Gahe, Keeler and Roscoe at his heels, and the Indians rose unsteadily, whereupon the four rustlers were quick to divine from their bleared eyes that they had been drinking.

Dirk frowned slightly and looked at Red Eagle, a tall, lean Indian with a face that was both crafty and insolent.

"Fire-water, huh?" the white man said.

"Sure," the Indian rejoined. "Fire-water—plenty good."

"Yeah?" growled Dirk. "Well, better go easy on it—you an' your friends. I know the boss supplies you with it, but he don't expect you to soak yourselves in it."

Red Eagle eyed him mockingly, and then, after a brief silence, Dirk addressed him again.

"Listen," he said, "we're here to slip you some dough for what you did the other night. But afore we pay you off I want to mention another job that we'd like you to tackle."

"So?" Red Eagle grunted. "What you want me do, huh?"

Behind the closed door of the pantry, Buck and Mary were listening with bated breath, and Dirk's next words caused them to stiffen involuntarily.

"You've heard of the Phantom Rider, ain't you?" the white man queried. "And you know the sort of rig-out he wears, don't you?"

"Sure," was the Indian's laconic reply.

"All right," Dirk went on. "We've got a hunch he may be somewhere in the hills north of here, lookin' for a lost gold-mine, and it's occurred to me that you might get your hand together and spread out in the hope of spottin' him."

Red Eagle's sloe-black eyes seemed to narrow.

"So?" he remarked again. "And if we do spot him?"

"Trail him till he finds the mine," Dirk answered. "Then feed him lead. But get this, Red Eagle—you'll have to sober up, for right now you couldn't hit a barn door with a load o' buckshot."

It was an observation that kindled an expression of resentment on the Indian's features.

"You dare say that to me, Dirk?" he mouthed thickly,

"SEVEN SINNERS"

He beamed at the priest.

"Those clothes suit you, but if you're thinking of trying any more disguises, you cure your limp—it betrayed you. I found out that a Dr. Evans had signed the death certificate, and when I went to see the doctor he had been lured away. He was killed at Ramley in that train smash. The man who derailed the Nice express this time shoved a lorry across the permanent way. That's two crimes you people are responsible for."

The three conspirators glanced at each other in fear.

"A ring on Evans' hand made me suspicious about the Pilgrims of Peace." He looked at the priest. "I got a call through to Buenos Aires, and though you told me, Hoyt, you had never been there, the police of South America knew you. They're expecting you—all of you—on the John Murdoch."

He took out a slip of paper.

"I happen to have an agent on that ship, and this cable states that your destination is South America, and that the John Murdoch is stuffed full of guns, bombs, and machine-guns. You'd get a pretty stiff sentence for gun-running, but for murder—"

"We've never murdered anyone," Sir Charles whimpered. Harwood could see the man shaking. "This is the first I've heard about Evans. He was my best friend, and—"

"Keep your mouth shut, you fool!" snarled Hoyt.

"You'd better talk soon or you'll be for the high jump," mocked the detective, and leaned forward. "Maybe I can help you. You see, I don't think you had a hand in these murders. I don't think any of you have the nerve to send a train crashing off the lines and needlessly killing people, but your ringleader would. Tell me his name, and—"

He took out a cigarette and lit it. "And I might do my best for you."

"He's bluffing!" cried Hoyt. "Hold your tongues!"

"I assure you that I—" Harwood happened to look up and noticed that in a mirror he could see the rest of the dining-car. His voice died away because he could see a man's back—a man that held a cigar quite close to his ear—the man who had sat next to Sir Charles Webber at the Guildhall banquet. Even as he watched, the man got leisurely to his feet and strolled out of the compartment.

Harwood glanced at Caryl.

"I now know who is the ringleader of this bunch. A very ruthless man, who would not hesitate to double-cross any person that stood in his path." He studied three frightened faces. "Are you going to talk or are you too seared of him? Nothing can happen to you in an express travelling at eighty miles an hour, and—"

"But, John"—Caryl touched his arm—"we're not travelling all that fast. The train is stopping."

"So we are—curious." Harwood was puzzled. "Sounds as if we were coasting along." He rushed to a window and tried to peer forth into the darkness. "We're not doing more than twenty miles an hour."

Harwood suddenly thought of the man whom he knew to be the train-wrecker. Might the man not attempt a third crime? In this train were the only people who could betray the murderer's secret. The sound in the train changed to a dull rumbling.

"We're in a tunnel!" he shouted.

"They saw him race up the saloon car and fling open a door. Next moment Harwood was back in the saloon, and they saw by his face that something was radically wrong.

"The coach has been uncoupled," he cried. "It looks as if we're going to stop in a tunnel."

"He's tricked us!" screamed Sir Charles Webber. "I warned you not to trust him."

"Come on!" Harwood beckoned to Caryl. "We've got to get out of here."

The detective and Caryl, followed by the others, dashed down the saloon. The coach groaned to a stop with a shudder. On flinging open the door, at first they saw only blackness.

"That white patch," Hoyt pointed. "That's the mouth of the tunnel. It's gone black. What's that I can hear?"

"Good heavens," gasped Harwood, "it's a train!"

In that moment Harwood saw everything. He realised now why the ring that had been found on Dr. Evans had been given to him. It was to lure him to this coach, which the wrecker had uncoupled knowing it would come to a stop in this tunnel.

The roar of the train grew louder. With screams of fear Elizabeth Wentworth dashed back into the saloon, followed by Webber and Hoyt. Harwood could see the flames from the smoke-stack of the oncoming engine.

"We've got one chance," Harwood yelled, and gripped the girl's arm. "A refuge in the tunnel for line repairers." They leaped down on to the track.

Paul Turbe sauntered into a Gaumont-British news theatre and selected a comfortable stall. They were showing pictures of the terrible smash that had occurred in a tunnel when a coach had been uncoupled. Everyone had been killed, according to the report.

The Assistant Prefect smiled as he watched the gruesome scenes. He decided he would like a cigar. He bit off the end and placed the Corona in his mouth. He fumbled for a match.

"Excuse me," said a hoarse voice behind him, and a lighter flickered into flame.

"Thanks," murmured Paul Turbe, and, turning round, stared into the face of John Harwood.

Paul Turbe drew a gun and tried to make a get-away, but there were too many men watching that news theatre and inside that news theatre; men who were after Turbe—real Scotland Yard men. Only one man died in the gun fight, and that man was Paul Turbe.

The Buckley registrar was astounded when Harwood and Caryl walked into his office. He beamed at them.

"You've come to register your child?"

"No, sir," chuckled Harwood. "You see, we've just had a telegram from a Lady Morland in Scotland. You wouldn't know her, but she's found her necklace, got caught in some dress or other. Of course, that doesn't mean anything to you, but it means a lot to us, because now we won't get fired, and as we've just collected quite a nice reward for assisting in killing a most unpleasant scoundrel, we thought we'd celebrate by getting married."

"THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE"

when he spoke his voice was steel-like.

"This is my show, Dave," he replied, "not yours! There's been enough killing in this family and there's going to be no more. I loved little Buddy as a brother just as you did, Dave; but I brought all this trouble on you, and it was I who was responsible for Buddy's death."

He looked round sternly as he picked up his gun from the table.

"Let no one attempt to stop me," he said. "I'm goin' over to the Falins, and if they don't wipe me out I'm wiping them out."

But even as the door closed on him June was rushing after him, though her mother caught her and held her.

"Let me go—let me go!" panted the girl. "He'll be killed—he'll be killed!"

In a flash she had thrown herself into her father's arms and was pouring out her words in an incoherent stream.

"Oh, let me go—go after him—stop him! They'll kill him, and—and I love him! Oh, I can't help it, but I've always loved him, and if they kill him I'll die."

Just for a moment there was a deathly silence. Over his daughter's head old Tolliver's eyes met Dave's. The latter had gone a little white, but his jaw had come out. Without another word he walked across to the door. But there was no gun in his hand as he went out.

Hale, striding along in the direction of the Falins, swung round as he heard footsteps behind him.

"This is my job, Dave," he said curtly. "I don't want you here."

Dave's answer was to slam out his fist with all the force behind it he could muster, catching Hale on the point of the jaw and sending him sagging limply to the ground.

Just for a second he stood looking down on the inert body, strangely sorrowfully. Then he picked up his gun, tossed it among the bushes and with his hands in his pockets set out at a smart pace for the Falin's shack.

Buck Falin and his sons sat in their shack, the old man with his head resting in his hands. And once more he gave vent to his feelings as he had done many times before during the last few days.

"We've always fought against men, we Falins. And now we've killed a kid—a pretty little innocent kid. And they'll label me in these parts as the man who kills kids."

Wade Falin spoke suddenly as he lounged against the window.

"Holy smoke! Here's Dave Tolliver without his gun!"

In a flash he had snatched up his gun, but his father leaped at him and whirled it out of his hand.

"Stop that!" he commanded and held up his hand for silence.

They all looked on, wondering—heard the footsteps getting nearer, heard a knock on the door.

"Who's there?" demanded the old man.

"Dave Tolliver."

"What d'you want?"

"To talk with you—and I've got no gun."

It was a strange scene. Dave stood erect, his hands at his sides. Buck

Falin faced him, his sons behind him

And then Dave spoke.
"I came to tell you, Mr. Falin, that we're through. You've licked us and we know it. Can't we stop all this killin' now for ever?"

The old man gazed incredulously at him for a space.

"Are you—speakin' truth?" he demanded at length.

"I mean every word I've said. We want to finish with the feud."

The old man's eyes bored him intently. But they went down the next minute.

"I just don't know what to say," he answered. "There ain't no words of mine, worse luck, that can bring your poor little Buddy back, but I'll be sorry for it all the days of my life, Dave Tolliver, and I'd like you to know it. I've never killed a kid yet—and I want you to believe that I never meant to."

"Thank you, Mr. Falin."
"Will you—will you shake hands, Dave Tolliver?"

He put out a hand, and the next moment the younger man had gripped it tightly.

The old man stood silent while the door closed. Wade Falin broke the silence and there was a laugh in his voice. For he had picked up his gun and was watching Dave as he strode away.

"Gosh, dad, that was real cunning. Why, I thought you meant to let him get away first of all. As it is—"

His gun went to his shoulder, and was a quick report, he saw Dave stagger and fall. But the next minute another shot rang out, and Wade Falin sagged to the floor and lay very still. And his father, with the smoking gun in his hand and his eyes blazing with wild fury spoke:

"The rat—the dirty rat!" he exclaimed furiously. "Fetch Dave Tolliver in, all of you. If he dies, I'll kill the rest of you!"

It was old Falin himself who carried Dave into the Tolliver shack and laid him down. It was old Falin himself who faced Judd Tolliver as a brave prisoner faces the firing party.

"I've got to tell you, Judd Tolliver," he began, but in a moment his voice faded away. For Dave's eyes had opened and he was signing them all to listen, as to their amazement his hand went out and gripped Buck Falin's.

"Let me—do—the tellin'," he murmured faintly. "The feud's—over. We've shaken hands—you've got to, too, dad. Comin' away I fell on my gun."

Buck Falin's head went down, and Dave's faint voice murmured on as he smiled at June in the shelter of Hale's encircling arm.

"It's all right now. You two'll—be able—to get married—and—"

As Buck Falin put out his hand and Judd Tolliver gripped it Dave's smile deepened.

"Well," he murmured. "Now I don't care—what—"

His voice trailed away, his head drooped to the pillow. But the two old men both stood gripping hands tightly. Death had taken yet one more victim; but both knew that it was the last that the feud would ever claim. The feud between the Tollivers and the Falins was at an end.

"THE DRAGNET"

"Okay. I'll be there. It's a trick box all right."

Larry slammed down the receiver. He ran his car a little way down the street, then left it parked outside a house. He must trust to his legs now.

Meanwhile, at the Dover Club, things were happening. Ross, returned from his pilgrimage to the Wonder Hotel, had moved about the club in his usual manner, feeling rather sick inwardly, but, outwardly, all oily courtesy to his patrons.

As Ross had passed by a solitary diner in correct evening clothes, this gentleman had risen softly and had come behind him, right hand in the pocket of a brand new dress jacket. Something like a short stick stuck out the pocket.

"Keep walking, Joe. Keep smiling. I've got you covered, and I'll hole you through and through if you won't! It's Fred, all right, don't worry. Keep walking—straight to your office, Joe."

Ross, with the gentleman in correct clothes close behind him, had "walked," more or less naturally, across the floor back to his office.

"Which of you killed Mollie?"

"I didn't, Fred. I swear it!"

"Didn't you, Joe? Just too bad!"

Fred Cole, hatchet-faced, pale and dead, with determination, was caressing the trigger of his pistol.

"It—it was Crane," Ross muttered thickly. "Shot her—before—before—I could stop him."

"You're a liar, Joe."

"It's the straight truth."

Cole played with the pistol lovingly.

"Get him here, Joe. Telephone for him," came the quiet order.

Ross took up the instrument and dialed a number, his fat hand shaking

Crane said he would be over in ten minutes.

Only the tick-tock of the clock on the mantel behind the perspiring Ross disturbed the silence until somewhere about ten-thirty, when the office door gently opened to admit a sergeant of police and two policemen. The sergeant, levelling a pistol at Cole, spoke sharply:

"Gaine's up, Fred! Drop that gun!"
As Cole sulkily obeyed, Ross put up his hands.

"Glad you've come, officer. He'd got me in a jam."

Cole, white as chalk, muttered:

"He killed my wife. Shot her dead in the 'phone call-box outside."

The sergeant signed to the two policemen who closed in on Cole, and, without any fuss, put handcuffs on his wrists.

"Stop Him!"

ANNETTE, the check girl, was off duty for a few minutes and somebody else was on the door when Larry and Kit walked in.

"Cards, please," came the challenge.

"This is a members' only night."

Larry stepped up to the man, poking a gun under his ribs. Kit closed the outer door and dropped the bolt.

"Keep quiet," said Larry in level tones. "The police are in possession. Tell me about that call-box and save your dirty skin."

"There's a box drawer that pulls out, guv'nor—so's the guv'nor can see who's telephoning," whined the man.

"And the guv'nor is?"

"Crane, sir. He's the real guy here."

Larry and Kit entered Ross' room just as the police were marching out with the gaol-breaker Cole.

The telephone tinkled on the desk where Ross was lighting a cigarette. The sergeant snatched up the instrument, the rest all suddenly silent.

"Mr. Lawrence Thomas?" The sergeant put down the 'phone as he turned to Larry.

"Yes."

"You're wanted on a charge of murder at the Wonder Hotel."

"That's the man who helped to kill Arthur Hill." Larry jumped at Ross, clutching him round the throat. They glared at each other. "Spit it out, Ross!" Larry ordered.

Ross made no attempt to struggle. His beady eyes met Larry's in sullen defiance as he snarled:

"I know you killed him, and I'll give evidence to that effect. I saw you go in."

"So you were there?" Larry released the fellow. "Note that, officer!"

Kit, clinging to Larry's arm, drew him away. The policemen escorting Cole paused, waiting for orders.

A trampling of hasty feet heralded the arrival of a flying squad of police sent in search of Larry. They were in charge of an inspector, who at once took over. He addressed Larry:

"Take it quietly, Thomas. You've put yourself wrong by resisting the police in execution of their duty. Anything you say will be taken down."

"I ask nothing better," Larry told him. "I've found papers hidden in Hill's desk which told me what I wanted to know. He was on the payroll here—there's proof beyond all question. He knew too much, and so they killed him, trying to plant it on to me. I had to get back here. I knew Cole was coming for revenge and I didn't want him to forestall justice."

Cole, manacled and seething with passion, spoke out:

"I'd have had 'em both if you fellers hadn't pushed in. I'll get 'em yet."

"Silence, you!" shouted the inspector.

"Go on, Thomas, I'm taking notes."

At this moment Crane walked in, clean and spry and cool as always.

"What's this, inspector? People in the hall are beginning to fear a raid."

The inspector tapped his notebook with his pencil.

"Go on, Thomas."

Larry handed him the pistol from his pocket.

"Found in Hill's desk. You'll find it fits the bullet that killed Mollie Cole. It hasn't been fired since. Hill was to get rid of it, but didn't get a chance. It's Crane's gun—you'll be able to check up on that. He shot Mollie Cole through the wall here."

"Through the wall?" the inspector asked.

Crane merely smiled.

"Yes." Larry advanced to the wall between the phone box outside and the room itself. Here was a small knob in the beading of the panels. Larry took hold of the knob and drew out a hidden drawer. At once a gap in the wall appeared, and the interior of the call-box was visible to all. On the back of the drawer was lettered:

"Local calls 5 cents."

"Fits into the frame," Larry explained. "You'd never guess it from the box. Crane put the bullet into Mollie's back while Ross rang off the phone from this desk."

"A pretty story," sneered Crane. "I'm glad you're writing it down. What interest could I have in killing the woman?"

"You killed her all right!" Cole hissed. "Same as you had me put away. We knew too much. And now you've done in that fool Hill. I'll tell you everything, inspector—how the wheel's faked—how the dice are loaded—how Crane has lined his pockets, the trick. How we've all been his dupes, first to last. Even Joe Ross—"

The inspector suddenly dived at Crane, who had his hand to his mouth.

"Stop him!"

A brief, violent struggle followed, then Crane was handcuffed between two of the police. He was still smiling.

Larry and Kit were allowed to go. As they climbed into Kit's car, she gave the wheel seat to him.

"I'm going back to dad to-morrow," Larry told her. "Partners once more. What about you coming in, too; in the firm of Thomas & Thomas?"

Kit rested her head on his shoulder. "Suits me," she whispered.

"THE SUICIDE CLUB"

"You will answer to me, you scoundrel!" he cried.

O'Rook had handed a pair of rapiers. The prince offered the hilts of them to Noel.

"Choose, if you please. I challenge you to a duel to the death. These gentlemen will keep the ring for us."

"I ask nothing better," answered Noel. "My quarrel, after all, is with you, Prince Florizel, as the representative of a tyrannical monarchy."

A ring was formed and they fought with ferocity, Noel showing himself a swordsman of no mean ability. Twice he was nearly disarmed by Florizel, and twice saved himself, to press the prince with new and surprising vigour.

At last Florizel forced him into the garden. The crowd—Noel's men and O'Rook's—followed to keep silent watch. Noel pressed the attack, and, for a few tense minutes, held Florizel at bay. Then, step by step, the prince forced his opponent backward until he was standing, all unaware, on the brink of the pit he had dug for his victims. Here Noel fenced with great desperation and actually succeeded in wounding Florizel in the left arm.

The prince suddenly broke through Noel's guard and struck his rapier sharply out of his hand. Noel, up his arms as he overbalanced and fell backwards with a crash into the open grave!

When his men came hurrying to lift him out, they found that he had broken a leg in the fall.

Florizel handed his rapier to O'Rook. "Honour is satisfied," he stated. "See that he is taken to a hospital at once."

He turned to go. From somewhere out of the crowd came Brenda, hatless and frantic in her haste. She flung her arms about Florizel.

"My prince!" she cried in rapture. "I adore you!"

"Darling girl," whispered Florizel. "Calm yourself. We are not alone."

Six weeks later, the Princess Brenda was married with great pomp and ceremony in the lovely old cathedral of Irania to his Highness, the Crown Prince of Karovia!

swaying a little on his feet. "Me, best shot in all this country? Huh, I outshoot you, anyhow!"

The white man's upper lip curled in a sneer.

"Don't make me laugh," he scoffed. "I'll bet you five bucks against your mustang that you can't outshoot me."

Quick to accept the challenge, Red Eagle snatched his forty-five from the table and rammed it into his holster with an uncertain gesture. Then he commanded Dirk to select a target, and, looking about him in a somewhat amused fashion, the rustler suddenly pointed across the room.

"There you are," he said. "We'll aim for that guy's nose. That's the target. We draw and shoot, and the first bullet that hits the mark is the winner. Keeler here can give the word to fire."

Within their hiding-place, Buck and Mary wondered what Dirk meant by "that guy's nose." They did not know that his extended hand was indicating the photograph on the bill which was pinned to the door of the small pantry where they had concealed themselves!

"Good!" they heard Red Eagle say. "Me think you lose five dollar, Dirk."

There was a pause, during which the marksmen looked towards Keeler for the signal; Dirk steady and confident to the point of contempt, Red Eagle no less confident, but far from steady.

"Go!" Keeler ejaculated all at once, grinning as he pronounced the word, and on the instant Dirk and the Indian plucked their irons from their holsters and pumped lead at the door of the cupboard, the bellow of the guns resounding deafeningly through the shack!

EPISODE 1—

“The God Horse of Sujan”

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

[The Spoilers

FEW portions of the world's surface are more remote from the influences of civilisation than the tropical island of Sujan, a land whose interior lies masked under the eternal fastnesses of the jungle, a land whose festering swamps and deep thickets form the abode of savage beasts, a land which is the domain of a strange native people whose origin is wrapped in mystery.

It was to this island that three white men had come, and, though they were not by any means the first of their race to set foot on Sujan, yet they were of a very different breed from those of their nationality who had at one time or another preceded them, and who had been for the most part scientists and explorers.

These three men were Americans, and, disembarking from a ship that had cast anchor in a natural harbour on the Sujan coast, they had entered the interior on horseback and made their way to a certain village where the human population of the island was concentrated.

They answered to the names of Mitchell, Wheeler, and Martin, and it was by these names that they had introduced themselves to Tanaga, high priest of Sujan, chief devotee of the singular religious faith that ruled the lives of the natives, and a personality whose spoken word was law from one end of the island to the other.

The main building in the village of the Sujanese was the temple of worship. Ornate in its architecture, it was a building that commanded interest and attention by its mystically imposing aspect, for the inhabitants of the island were no mere barbarians, but a people with an ancient culture of their own—friendly to strangers, too, though quick to take offence at any slight, and capable of meting out stern treatment to those who abused their hospitality.

Within the sombre confines of that mosque, and before an altar adorned by a plaque which represented a prancing stallion, the three Americans had obtained an audience with Tanaga, the high priest, a tall, dignified man who was still in the prime of life and whose lean figure was clothed in loose, skirted garments. And now Tanaga was listening to what the white men had to say, listening carefully and attentively as they spoke to him in English of the mission which had brought them there.

The voices of the three Americans were couched in the accents of the West, and a fellow-countryman might have placed them as Californians, while the subject of their discourse might have indicated to him that they were closely acquainted with ranch life. Tanaga, however, was not sufficiently familiar with the English tongue to recognise the variety of its dialects, though he had acquired a good working knowledge of it from other men who had visited his domain.

He was well enough versed in the language to understand very soon the reason for the Americans' presence in Sujan, at any rate, and when they had finished talking he shook his head to signify that they had come upon a useless errand.

“But, your Excellency,” one of the Yankees protested then, “the fame of your horses has travelled even as far as America, and as agents of a dealer there we've journeyed all this way specially to buy some of them from you.”

The speaker was Mitchell, big and hulking, with a pair of gimlet eyes set in a weather-beaten face. He seemed puzzled by the high priest's attitude. Neither he nor his companions—nor the rancher in California for whom they were acting—was aware that Sujanese ritual forbade such a transaction as the one they had contemplated.

They had learned that no finer horses were to be obtained anywhere in the world than those which were bred on this remote island. But if they had delved more deeply into the book of exploration from which they had gleaned this fact, they would also have read the following paragraph:

“Deep in the interior, guarded well by the jungle and its roving beasts, nestles the sacred temple of Sujan. Here for countless ages a devout people have flocked to the worship of a chosen god horse, cherishing him as sincerely as did the Assyrians the bull, or the Egyptians the cat—”

Mitchell and his associates knew nothing of this. Nor were they enlightened when Tanaga, the high priest, addressed them quietly in his curious, low-toned voice.

“In Sujan we do not sell our horses,” he said.

The Americans were not content to accept that simple statement, which had been delivered in English, but with an outlandish inflexion.

“We're in a position to pay well,” urged Wheeler, dark-moustached and swarthy.

“All the money in the world could

Wheeler and Mitchell slipped out of the stables to find their accomplice in the act of throttling his victim.

not tempt us to part with a single steed," Tanaga replied. "You see, my friends, for centuries the horse has been held sacred by my people."

The Americans stared at him for a moment, and then Martin spoke. He was a shifty-looking fellow with a thin-tipped mouth.

"You mean you worship horses?" he asked incredulously.

"They are all sacred to us," Tanaga rejoined, "though we worship but one—the black Arabian stallion."

"A black Arabian?" Martin ejaculated.

The high priest looked at him steadily.

"You doubt me," he said. "I can hardly blame you. There is no horse in the world like him—this horse whom we call Rex, and who is the proud descendant of a noble breed. Come, you shall see for yourselves, for unless I am mistaken the guards will be bringing him back now. They have been exercising him."

He conducted them to a window of the temple, and suddenly he pointed through it. Then, as they followed the direction of his extended arm, they saw a troop of warriors cantering across a sweep of plain that was like a great clearing in the jungle.

The warriors were mounted upon fine, mettlesome ponies, and, shrewd judges of horseflesh as they were, the white men were visibly impressed by those animals. But next moment they had concentrated their gaze upon a riderless stallion which was being coaxed across the savannah by the troop of Sujanese.

It was Rex, the Arab steed that Tanaga had mentioned, and never had the Americans set eyes on so magnificent a beast. Lithe, powerful, and spirited, that horse would have been coveted by any breeder who had been privileged to see him, for a man had only to take stock of him for the space of a minute or two to gain an inkling of his qualities and to realise that here was a creature which could not be surpassed.

"Why, he's like a king," breathed Mitchell.

"He is a king," Tanaga declared in a fervent and earnest tone. "He is the living symbol of that spirit which we worship—the spirit of the god horse of Sujan."

From the temple window the high priest and the three Americans watched Rex as he was shepherded to a building situated some little distance from the village. It was a building which Tanaga described as the Sacred Stables, and, the god horse having been lodged safely within it, the troop of warriors who had performed the duty of exercising him were soon riding at a trot towards their quarters in the settlement.

The high priest and the three white men turned away from the window then, and for an interval none of them spoke. There was a queer, thoughtful expression on the face of Mitchell, however, and presently he broke the silence, putting a question that sounded careless enough, though it was one that caused Wheeler and Martin to glance at him swiftly.

"Is it customary to leave the god horse unguarded in those stables like that?" he asked Tanaga.

The high priest shook his head.

"The god horse Rex is under vigilance night and day," he observed. "If you were to go into that building now you would find a sentry posted near his stall. Besides, the god horse is not easy to handle. He is submissive only to those with whom he is familiar."

There was a pause, and then once again Mitchell tried tentatively to strike some bargain with Tanaga. But he was wasting his time, and at length the high priest dismissed the subject.

"Let us talk no more of your vain mission," he said. "Rather let us talk of life in the country from which you have come. I am always interested to meet people from other lands, and, indeed, I shall be honoured if you will remain here as my guests for a little while."

This hospitable offer was not accepted. "I am sorry, your Excellency," Mitchell answered, "but I reckon we'll have to return to the ship."

"Then may I provide you with an escort through the jungle?" Tanaga suggested.

"That won't be necessary," came the reply. "It's no great distance to the coast."

A few minutes later the Americans took their leave, and, swinging themselves astride their horses, they rode southward into the jungle. Yet they had not gone very far when Mitchell drew rein.

"Boys," he said to Martin and Wheeler, "we've got to get that black Arabian stallion, and if there's only one guard at the Sacred Stables it ought to be easy."

Wheeler nodded, but Martin fidgeted uncomfortably in his saddle.

"It might be dangerous to cross these Sujanese," he muttered. "Is any horse worth the risk?"

"That god horse is," Mitchell grunted. "Say, he'll make a fortune for Crawford. Think of it—a black Arabian! Think of the draw he'd be! Why, if Crawford sold him outright he'd collect plenty of dough. Not that I'd advise him to sell, for that stallion would be worth holdin'—if only for breeding purposes."

Martin frowned. "If we bungle the job," he said, "it's liable to cost us our lives."

"There won't be any slip-ups," retorted Mitchell. "We're gonna get that stallion, and we're gonna take him back to the States. Say, what kind of reception d'you think we'd get from Crawford if we came back empty-handed, anyway?"

There was no further argument, and Mitchell proceeded to outline the plan by which he intended to seize the god horse of Sujan. Meanwhile, the sun was going down in the west, and the eternal gloom of the jungle was deepening before the approach of evening, yet it was not until the black darkness of night had fallen that the three white men finally turned on their tracks.

Reaching the clearing in which the village was situated, they made a wide detour and approached the Sacred Stables from the rear. Then, dismounting from their ponies and tethering them to the limb of a gnarled tree, they sneaked round to the front of the building that was their objective.

All was quiet. From the village, some distance away, there came faint indications of life and movement, but in the neighbourhood of the stables a brooding stillness seemed to reign.

"Martin," whispered the American who was known as Mitchell, "you stay out here and tip us off if you see anybody comin' from the village. Wheeler and I will handle the guard inside."

Martin took up a position near the entrance of the stables, and the other two men moved forward to the threshold of the building. As they did so they must have betrayed their approach in some way, for the inquiring voice of the sentinel reached their ears from within.

"Is that you, Pasha?" he called, evidently expecting someone of that name.

He had spoken in the native tongue, and the Americans did not understand his words. Nor did they pause to speculate on the meaning of those words but stepped quickly through the doorway to perceive the Sujanese guard standing a few yards to the right.

He was posted outside a stall occupied by the god horse Rex, and at sight of the intruders he stiffened involuntarily. Yet before he could utter a sound or raise a hand to defend himself the Yankees were upon him, and a blow from the butt of a revolver laid him senseless on the floor.

Scarcely had he fallen than the black Arabian in the stall gave vent to an ominous snort, and next instant he was rearing up on his hind-legs and pawing viciously at the stout gate which was between him and the guard's assailants.

Mitchell and Wheeler turned and looked at the plunging animal, and saw that his ears were lying back against his head, while his eyes held a glint that was both menacing and fearsome.

"Huh," Mitchell commented, "seems like the god horse musta been fond of the sentry and don't approve of the way we've treated him. We'll have to watch out for them hoofs, Wheeler. Look, get those ropes that are hangin' up on that peg over there. We'll use a couple of them as lariats. Make it snappy now!"

Wheeler started for the ropes, and, selecting two of them, he had tied a noose in each when Martin suddenly appeared on the scene.

"There's a native headed this way," he reported breathlessly. "If he finds out what we're up to he'll give the alarm. One look through that doorway there and he'll be off like the wind to get help."

"Yeah, and if he hears the racket that this god horse is kickin' up he'll be suspicious before he gets near the doorway," jerked Wheeler.

Mitchell gripped Martin by the arm at once, and at the same time spurned the body of the unconscious guard whom he and Wheeler had attacked.

"Quick!" he ordered. "Throw on some of this guy's clothes and step out to meet the native that's comin' from the village. That should allay his suspicions until he's close enough for you to deal with him. How far away was he when you spotted him? Have you got time to fix yourself up?"

"Just about," said Martin, and in another moment he was hurriedly stripping the prostrate sentry of his outer garments.

A little while later the disguised American emerged from the stables, and as he came out of the doorway he saw the individual who had been approaching from the village.

The native had checked, and was listening to the racket that the god horse was setting up. He seemed, indeed, to be on the point of turning back to the settlement, but on perceiving Martin he hurried forward, evidently mistaking him for the guard.

Not until he was face to face with the American did he discover the deception, and the truth dawned on him too late. For, springing to action even as the native whipped round to run for it, Martin caught him from behind and encircled his neck with a cord.

Wheeler and Mitchell slipped out of the stables to find their accomplice in the act of throttling his victim, and they looked on with bated breath until the native slumped to the ground and lay still. Then Mitchell spoke in husky accents.

"Nice work, Martin," he said. "Now wait here till we get that horse out."

Martin remained on the watch, and soon he was able to tell from the sounds which reached his ears that Mitchell and Wheeler were matching their cunning against the ugly temper of the Arab stallion; and thirty seconds later the horse was issuing from the stables with his head snared by a couple of lariats.

Martin's confederates were holding on to those ropes, and Wheeler let go of his as the stallion almost caught him with a flying back-kick from his hoofs. Martin dived for the lariat, however, and, somehow, he and Mitchell succeeded in working the captive horse round to the spot where they had left their own ponies.

Tanaga had been right. The god horse Rex was resentful of the attentions of strangers, and it was only after a hard tussle that Mitchell and Martin were able to climb into their saddles and make off with their prize, overcoming his resistance by hauling on the ropes.

In fact, there was a skirmish before they were fairly under way, and it was one that proved disastrous for Wheeler, who had followed up anxiously and scrambled astride his mount in hot haste.

Unluckily enough for Wheeler, his pony became alarmed by the wild antics of the god horse, and, cavorting with fright, he hurled his rider from his back. And, as he was catapulting through space, Wheeler struck his head against the low bough from which he and his comrades had just unhitched their reins.

When the man hit the ground he was "out," and Mitchell and Martin did not stop to pick him up. With Rex straining against the lariats, they had enough on their hands—moreover, their one desire was to put distance between themselves and the Sujanese village without delay—and consequently they abandoned their accomplice to his fate.

A few minutes afterwards there was no sign of the two horse thieves. They had disappeared with their prize in the direction whence they had come, leaving behind them the two huddled bodies of the natives they had attacked and the insensible confederate whom they had deserted so callously.

Of those three prostrate men, the first to recover was the individual who had been half-strangled by Martin, and on opening his eyes he gazed dully at the stars for a time, like one more dead than alive. Then all at once he seemed to recall what had happened to him, and, struggling to his feet, he tottered to the entrance of the Sacred Stables.

There he saw the figure of the guard who had been stunned, and from that prone figure his glance travelled to the empty stall which had been occupied by Rex. Then, swinging round with a cry on his lips, he made tracks for the native village and did not stop until he had reached the temple.

To the high priest Tanaga he gave his startling news, and soon there was a sounding of trumpets in the settlement and a riding of armed warriors, who swept into the jungle and took the trail that led to the bay where the white men's ship was known to be anchored.

Rinty fell atop of him, and the dog's gleaming teeth were at the man's throat in another instant.

After that there was a comparative silence in the village, a silence broken only by the grim mutterings of a fanatical people as they awaited the return of the pursuers. But a full hour elapsed before these put in an appearance, and a groan went up as it was seen that the god horse, Rex, was not in their midst.

Drawing rein before the temple, the warriors dismounted and entered the place of worship to confront Tanaga, at whose feet they flung a wild-eyed wretch who was attired as a Sujanes, but who was not of that race.

"Excellency," one of the warriors reported in the native tongue, "we reached the coast only to see the foreigner's ship sailing out of the bay. But on our way back we came upon this son of a dog in the jungle, and he, at least, will answer for the outrage that has been committed to-night."

Tanaga looked down at Wheeler, for the grovelling creature who had been cast before him was none other than he, and a bleak, stony expression crossed the high priest's face as he contemplated the white man.

"Yes," he muttered, "this cur must pay the penalty. Yet that will not compensate us for the loss of the sacred god horse."

For a moment his eyes seemed to register the painful emotions from which he was suffering. Then they became hard again, and they were glittering like diamonds when he addressed Wheeler in English.

"You and your friends," he said, "you have committed the greatest crime that Sujan knows. And the punishment for that crime, white man, is death!"

Wheeler gave vent to a hoarse exclamation. His distorted features were the colour of chalk.

"Listen, I'm innocent!" he lied. "I—I tried to stop them. That's the reason they struck me down and left me. When I came round I rode after them, hoping I could catch up with them and persuade them to turn Rex loose. Then I ran into your men, and they told me I was too late—and they wouldn't believe me when I explained to them I'd been an unwilling party to the whole business."

"I do not believe you, either, white man," Tanaga rejoined deliberately. "The evidence of the two men who were rendered senseless by you and your friends—it hardly bears out your story."

"I know," Wheeler panted, "but Martin and Mitchell forced me to work hand-in-glove with them—an' finally turned on me when I plucked up the courage to try to argue with 'em. Listen, Excellency, if only you'll spare my life I'll bring the god horse back to you. I give you my oath that I will. Let me make my way to America, and I swear I'll return with that horse."

Tanaga's lip curled contemptuously.

"You expect me to take your word?" he asked.

"Then send somebody with me!" Wheeler implored. "I won't fail you. I'll do anything to bring back your god horse, if only to get even with Mitchell and Martin. Can't you see that?"

Tanaga eyed him narrowly, and seemed to consider the proposal that he had made. The return of the god horse, Rex—this the high priest desired above all things—and Wheeler was the only link with the scoundrels who had stolen the animal.

Tanaga glanced suddenly at a native who was standing nearby. It was the native whom Martin had very nearly throttled to death.

"Pasha," the high priest said, "when a foreign ship calls at Sujan again, you will sail in it with this white man. It will be your duty to see that he keeps his word, and to warn him that if he betrays my trust we shall track him down—whatever steps he may take to escape our vengeance."

Crawford

A WEATHER-BEATEN cargo-boat from distant parts had crawled into the docks at San Francisco, and, as she was steered into her berth at the quayside, the figures of Mitchell and Martin might have been seen at her rail.

"I was just thinkin' of Wheeler," Martin said, while the ship was being moored. "It was kinda tough on him, leavin' him back there with all them natives."

"That was his hard luck," Mitchell retorted. "I reckon you and me was both in too much of a hurry to bother about a man that was fool enough to get thrown from his horse. But, say, I don't see any sign of Crawford. I cabled him to be here with a trailer, and I made it clear that we'd got a horse in a million for him."

Even as he spoke the words a powerful car swung on to the quay, drawing behind it a great horse-box, and at sight of the man who was driving the automobile Martin uttered an ejaculation.

"There's Crawford now!"

The man in the car was a big, broad-shouldered fellow of some thirty-five years, with a domineering countenance and a pair of shrewd eyes—eyes that revealed an astute appreciation of horseflesh when the kicking, struggling form of Rex was disembarked from the ship a few minutes later and manoeuvred into the trailer.

With the god horse safely imprisoned, there ensued a long journey through the streets of San Francisco and out beyond the eastern suburbs towards the distant foothills of the Sierras. It was open country here, with an occasional ranch-house to break the monotony of it, and as he drove over the empty, dusty roads with Mitchell and Martin at his side, Crawford talked almost incessantly of the stallion in the trailer.

It was clear that he had been impressed by the animal, and that he considered his agents' trip to far Sujan had not been wasted. Nor was he greatly concerned over the fate of Wheeler, when Mitchell explained how that worthy had been left behind.

"A bad break for the guy," was his only comment, "but it can't be helped. Now that horse—I can see him bringing in any amount of big dough. Say, the mere fact that he was held sacred by some crowd of natives—that in itself puts a price on him. Imagine what an attraction he'd be in a circus, for instance."

"I thought of that myself," put in Martin. "Not a bad idea, boss."

"But only an idea as yet," mused Crawford. "First off, I'm gonna train him. Might use him in a few polo games over at the Bruce Riding Academy."

"It will be quite a job setting the saddle on him," Mitchell observed.

Crawford smiled grimly.

"I never saw a horse yet that I couldn't handle," he stated.

He drove on, and another mile or two had been covered when a bend in the road brought the three men in sight of a well-appointed ranch-house. It was Crawford's own outfit, and, pulling up near a corral behind the main building, the rancher alighted from his automobile and walked round to the back of the trailer.

He was followed by Mitchell and Martin, and they were unfastening the tail-door of the horse-box when another of Crawford's employees showed up, a sallow-faced individual, who gave vent to a low whistle at his first glimpse of Rex.

"Say, he's a beauty, ain't he?"

"Some horse, Jones, eh?" Mitchell answered with pride. "Pretty ornery as regards his temper, though."

His words were borne out as Rex backed clear of the trailer and proceeded to resist all efforts to pen him in the adjacent corral. It seemed, in fact, that the very lives of the men who were attempting to drive him into the enclosure were in danger, and, narrowly escaping a blow from a flying hoof, Crawford reached for a whip that was resting against the fence.

"Tough, eh?" he snarled. "Well, he may have been a king in Sujan, but I'll soon show him who's boss around here."

"Careful, now!" Martin warned. "He's faster than chain lightning."

Crawford paid no heed, and lashed at Rex with the whip. But he had cause to regret that brutal act, for, infuriated by the unaccustomed sting of the leather thong, the god horse reared himself up on his hind legs and struck at him with his forefeet.

Far from being cowed by the whip, the unprobed depths of the stallion's savage instincts were aroused with a vengeance, and Crawford had to seek the nearest shelter to escape the animal's retribution. Then, safe from those deadly hoofs, but white to the lips with fear and chagrin, he saw Rex make a dash from the ranch and head blindly for the hills.

Mitchell, Jones, and Martin hurried anxiously to their employer's side, and the first-named spoke in a querulous tone.

"I told yuh he was a killer, boss!" he panted.

"Yeah!" Jones gasped. "An' look—he's gettin' away."

Crawford ripped out an oath.

"Well, don't stand there staring at him!" he bellowed. "Grab three horses and get after him! Bring that black Arabian back here—understand?"

A command from Crawford was something that none of his men ever dared to treat lightly, yet this order which he gave now was one that Mitchell, Jones, and Martin could not carry out. For, although they lost no time in setting out in pursuit, there was never a hope of their catching up with the fugitive stallion, and an hour later they returned gloomily to the ranch, having lost all track of Rex in the heart of the hills.

There was an ugly expression on Crawford's heavy countenance as he listened to their tale of failure.

"All right," he ground out at length. "It looks like we'll have to comb the range for him. Jones, get some of the boys and scatter through the mountain country. See if you can pick up any trace of that god horse. Mitchell, you and Martin can stay here and help look after the ranch. Meantime, I'm going over to the Bruce Riding Academy to play in a polo game there."

He paused, then directed a baleful glance at Jones.

"And don't forget," he said harshly. "I want that stallion in my corral!"

Trouble follows when Dizzy Davis, an experienced but irresponsible airman, joins Federal Air Lines as a pilot, and, as a result of one of his selfish actions, a flying chum crashes to death in a fog. After he has learned that his licence will not be renewed, Dizzy makes amends—in his own fashion. A grand drama of the air, starring James Cagney and Pat O'Brien

Payson Bails Out

VAINLY the operator in the long-windowed control-room of Federal Air Lines at Newark, New Jersey, was trying to get into touch by wireless with Eddie Payson, who was flying the mail from Pittsburg, Pennsylvania.

"Federal Air Lines, Newark, calling Payson in 'plane three," he said over and over again into the microphone on his desk. "Federal Air Lines, Newark, calling Payson in 'plane three. Payson, why don't you answer Newark?"

There were several desks in the big room, and at one of them the transportation agent was seated, a man little older than the operator and at the moment more worried than he cared to appear.

"Sure your radio set's okay, Buzz?" he inquired.

"Yes, sir." The operator's real name was Arthur Collins, but he was known, descriptively, as "Buzz" on account of his job.

"Keep at it!"

Buzz kept at it, chewing gum all the time to prevent his throat from going dry; but there was no response from the loudspeaker that stood behind the microphone.

A dark-haired young man in spectacles entered the room with a sheet of paper in his hand. He was Leslie Bogan, and his chief concern was with the meteorological conditions on all the air routes of the company.

"Oh, Les," the transportation agent called out to him, "what's the weather at Harrisburg?"

"The weather at Harrisburg," was the reply, "is fair. Broken clouds at fifteen hundred feet, visibility twenty miles. What's wrong?"

"Payson doesn't answer."

Leslie Bogan handed over the sheet of paper.

"You can't blame that on the weather," he remarked.

"There's nothing to blame on anyone yet," growled the transportation agent.

A telephone-bell rang, and Leslie went to an instrument on the desk of the absent division superintendent, while the transportation agent stood up and scowled at a relief map on the wall, and Buzz continued to call Payson in 'plane three.

"Oh, go ahead, say something!" exploded the chewer of gum, tired of repeating himself so often. "Call me names! Newark calling Eddie Payson!"

Leslie put down the telephone he had been using and turned to the transportation agent.

"Harrisburg reports their radio range was inoperative for ten minutes," he stated, "but it's on again strong and clear."

"I don't know why he can't find the beam!" raged the transportation agent.

"It'll at least keep him in the airway!"

"It will if he finds it!" quoth Buzz disgustedly, and spoke into the microphone again: "Newark calling Eddie Payson in 'plane three. Payson acknowledge this message. Report your position and altitude to Newark at once. Payson, why don't you answer Newark?"

Eddie Payson did not answer because he had lost his head in the clouds and was too terror-stricken to use his wireless telephone. Opening the window of the 'plane he was driving, he flung forth the mailbag attached to a flare, then heaved himself out of the machine.

Headlong he fell for several hundred feet into darkness, and then his parachute opened and he floated towards the earth he could not see—the earth of Pennsylvania, not the earth of New Jersey.

Another quarter of an hour passed, and Buzz still spoke futilely into the microphone in the control-room at Newark, the transportation agent on one side of him and Leslie Bogan on the other.

"You're positive you're transmitting?" demanded the transportation agent.

Buzz promptly flicked a key on a sloping board beside the microphone and said:

"Newark calling Texas Clarke in 'plane two. Radio test. Go ahead!"

A deep voice issued from the loud-speaker almost immediately.

"Tex Clarke in 'plane two," it stated cheerfully. "Newark coming in okay. Clear as a bell, baby."

"Okay, Texas!"

"If Eddie were all right," said Leslie Bogan, "he'd have made his half-hour report by now."

"Call the division superintendent," directed the transportation agent gruffly.

The division superintendent was Jake Lee, a red-headed and blue-eyed son of Erin, who at that moment was playing backgammon with his wife, Mary, in the sitting-room of a cosy flat three miles away from the airport. Jake was just about to make his throw when the telephone-bell rang and his wife rose.

"Hold those dice, Jake," she said, October 31st, 1936.

"I want to watch you roll. Lee's residence."

"Oh, you don't trust me, ch?" Jake shook the dice-box and rolled the dice on to the tablecloth. "Well, I've thrown a six and an ace. That practically puts you out of business!"

The telephone was thrust into his hand and he held it to his ear.

"Hallo!" he said. "Jake Lee speaking."

"We can't contact Eddie Payson," Buzz informed him. "He left Harrisburg on schedule. He had to climb into the clouds, flying blind."

"Well," said Jake, "is he on his course?"

"No," Buzz replied; "his last report is that he'd lost the beam."

Jake frowned at the backgammon board.

"Well, call Payson every five minutes," he instructed. "Phone the caretaker at each emergency field between Harrisburg and Newark, notify all the pilots in the air by radio, and all the eastern ground stations by teletype—and I'll be right over."

"What's wrong?" asked Mary anxiously, as he put down the instrument and reached for the cap that went with the uniform he wore.

"Oh, Eddie Payson," he answered in a worried fashion. "He's bringin' in the mail from Pittsburg and he doesn't answer his radio. I've always been afraid of that kid. I'll see you later, honey."

He kissed her and went off to the airport; and Buzz was still calling Payson when he burst into the control-room.

"Any further word?" he asked, advancing to the operator's desk.

"No, sir," replied the transportation agent. "Nothing!"

"It's tougher waitin' here for news than it is flyin' the runs yourself. How long after he left Harrisburg did you last hear from him?"

"Eight minutes." Jake went over to the map and pointed a finger at it.

"He should be right here," he said, indicating a spot between the city of Reading and the city of Newark. "It's a rough country, but there are plenty of houses. He's either crashed, bailed out, or his radio's gone sick. He oughta—"

A voice from the loudspeaker interrupted him:

"Tex Clarke, in 'plane two, Newark."

"Go ahead, Texas," said Buzz into his microphone.

"Tex Clarke in 'plane two. Hang out a lantern, or a coupla o' candles! I'm comin' in!"

"Okay, Texas!" returned Buzz. "Field clear. Wind south three. Come on in!"

Nearly half the staff had gathered in the control-room. Jake turned to a short and thickset man of middle age with hardly a hair on his head.

"Baldy, meet Tex!" he commanded.

Baldy went off to the flying-field, and Jake was rapping out at the others who had no business to be present when the bell of the telephone on his desk rang.

He pounced on the instrument.

"Federal Air Lines," he said. "Oh, well, this—is Jake, Eddie. Are you all right? Well, kid, that's a relief! How's the mail?"

Eddie Payson was on the other end of the line, speaking from a wall-telephone in a little railway-station.

"The mail's okay," he replied. "There's an eastbound train out of here in forty-five minutes."

"Put the mail on it," said Jake crisply, "and we'll send the crash truck for you and the wreck. Where are you? Oh, okay, Eddie!"

October 31st, 1936.

He put down the telephone and turned to the others.

"Payson bailed out near Wanamaker."

"Wanamaker?" exclaimed a tall man in overalls whose surname was Wilson, and who was known as "Doc" because repairs were his chief concern. "Wanamaker's in Indiana!"

"Aw, he must've been on a Cook's tour to get that far off the airway!" growled Jake. "Pick him up at Robbin's farm, two miles east o' the town, and take seven bucks with you to pay for that 'phone call. And get that crash truck rolling!"

Doc Wilson made himself scarce, and Leslie Bogan reappeared from his own den with a weather chart which he spread out on Jake's desk.

"Better take a look at this, Jake," he said. "There's bad news ahead. That low-pressure area around Cincinnati is moving north-west."

"Yeah," said Jake, studying the chart. "She ought to hit here late on Thursday."

"That's right," agreed Leslie. "My forecast gives us clear weather tomorrow, with increasing cold, and then heavy fogs followed by high winds, sleet and ice."

Out on the lighted flying-field the machine piloted by Texas Clarke landed perfectly, and Tex himself climbed down from it. Almost simultaneously one of the double front doors of the control-room swung open and Mary Lee slipped unobtrusively in at it and seated herself on a chair.

Jake heard the machine and caught sight of his wife.

"Warn the ticket office," he said, "that all passenger schedules may be cancelled on short notice. We're not going to take any chances on them. Mail pilots can punch the dirt if it gets unflyable. Notify Bellefonte, Cleveland, Columbus and Chicago."

He rose and went over to the beautiful occupant of the chair.

"What are you doing here?"

"Well," replied Mary in the incoherent of voices, "you can't play backgammon alone, and solitaire's not much fun since I met you."

"Yeah, yeah, that's right," he agreed. "I kinda like two-handed games myself."

The airman who had just landed walked into the room, a wide-faced and amiable-looking fellow, enveloped in his heavy flying kit.

"Texas Clarke reports his return to Newark," he said.

Behind him came a short and slender woman who was his wife and who had met him on the field. Greetings were exchanged, and then Tex shed his parachute pack, and his wife—a decided blonde named Louise—helped him out of his leather coat.

"I heard Payson's jamboree over the radio," he remarked as he removed his helmet and goggles. "Sure interfered with Amos and Andy. What happened?"

"Oh, he got lost in the clouds and hit the silk," replied Jake. "He's all right."

"Huh!" grunted Tex. "He oughta be tickled, he's all in one piece!"

"I wish you were all in one piece!" said his wife.

A boy entered with a message in Morse, ripped from a tape-machine, and Jake studied it.

"Oh, here's good news!" he exclaimed. "Listen! 'The prodigal returns. Dizzy Davis coming home!'"

"Dizzy comin' back here?" Tex looked astonished.

"Why didn't you tell me, Jake?" asked Mary.

"Oh, I was savin' it!"

Tex's wife seemed by no mean pleased at the news.

"Dizzy Davis!" she cried. "I thought he was still in Denver. Is he coming back here?"

"Yeah," said Jake. "He's ferryin' an overhauled job from Chicago. This afternoon he had a forced landing—this side of Cleveland."

"Was he hurt?" asked Mary.

"No!" interjected Tex's wife tartly. "No, he wasn't hurt! Not with my luck. Tex, come on!"

Tex deposited his discarded garments in the pilots' room and reappeared.

"Well, where we goin'?" he inquired.

"We're going home!" she informed him. "I want to get one last farewell look at it before Dizzy gets here. Come on. You know, I could be hanged for what I could do to Dizzy Davis!"

She marched him off, and Jake said laughingly to Mary:

"I may be wrong, but something tells me she doesn't like Dizzy. I'm glad you like him, honey, because it's certainly tough on a fellow when a pal and his wife don't mix."

Mary was tempted to bite her lip, but refrained.

"I'll never be tough on you, Jake," she said.

"No kiddin'?"

"No kidding," she assured him.

He picked up his cap and put it on his head.

"Buzz," he said to the operator. "I'll be at the Browning plant till three-thirty to-morrow. If you want me, 'phone me."

"Speak of the Devil!"

IT was just after four o'clock on the following afternoon, when Jake arrived at the airport in his own two-seater, entered the main building, and approached the double doors of the control-room.

A man in striped overalls and a woollen jacket was standing aimlessly by the rails just inside the doors, a rag in one hand and a tin of metal polish in the other. His face was lined, though he was not even middle-aged, and there was a vacant look about his blue eyes.

"How are ya, Mike?" Jake said to him.

"Hallo!" Mike Owens, at one time an excellent pilot but now a human wreck, stared stupidly and shuffled towards the door which had just swung back into position.

"You'd better shine that plate before you go."

The plate Jake indicated was an ornamental one, fastened to three brass rods across the glass panel of the doors and bearing the inscription "Federal Air Lines." Mike looked at it and nodded.

"Oh, sure," he said with a little laugh. "I forgot what I came for. Doc sent me over here four times. I— I'll make it look real pretty, Jake."

He applied some of the polish to the rag and began to rub the plate.

"You're doin' a swell job, fellow," Jake declared in a voice unusually gentle for him. "Don't worry too much about it."

He passed on into the room and found a visitor waiting for him beside his desk; Al Stone, the general manager of Federal Air Lines from the New York office of the company, a man of considerable bulk and height, and not a little self-importance.

"Sorry to keep you waiting," said Jake. "I went over to the Browning Company. They've just got a new transport. There's all the dope."

He presented a folder, containing details which Al Stone proceeded to study, and called across to Buzz to let him have the latest weather report.

"Well, what do you think of it?" he asked, after he had glanced at the sheet Buzz took over to him.

"Cruising speed two-twenty," remarked Stone. "That sounds high!"

"Well, I checked with the test pilot. He says it'll do better than two-twenty."

Al Stone tossed the folder on to the desk.

"You know, the old man likes that Adams Bomber," he said. "But I'm not thinking about that right now."

"No?" Jake raised his rather heavy brows. "Well, what's on your mind? Spill it."

"It's about Dizzy Davis. He's not even here yet, and he's up to his old tricks already. That forced landing yesterday was a fake!"

"How d'you know?" challenged Jake.

"Report from Cleveland by telephone. When the mechanics reached the 'plane they found nothing wrong, except the left magneto block had been pulled loose."

"Pulled loose?"

"He did it himself, of course. They say he drove back to the 'plane with a lousy load of cuties, thanked the boys, kissed the girls good-bye, and got into the air twenty-four hours late!"

"That's your story!" said Jake, with an air of incredulity. "Why don't you wait and hear what Dizzy has to say?"

"Oh, he'll spin a good yarn!" growled the general manager. "He always does. I'm telling you, Jake, Dizzy's a menace and a liability."

"And the best cock-eyed pilot on this air line, or any other!" declared Jake warmly.

"Maybe, but here we are in the newspapers, again—Mail 'plane forced down!"

"He wasn't carryin' the mail. He was ferryin' an overhaul job east."

"D'you expect the newspapers to print that?" scoffed Stone. "Our record's good, Jake. We want to keep it that way. Now there's some excuse for Payson, but there's none at all for Dizzy. He's never been reliable. I don't see why you want him here!"

Jake dumped himself on a corner of the desk and waved a hand.

"Well, sit down a minute and relax," he said grudgingly. "I'm gonna make a speech."

Al Stone sat, though he did not relax. "All right, shoot!" he grunted.

"Who made the first night hop over the Alleghenies? Dizzy Davis—in a crummy old D.H. at that—and there weren't any beacons or lighted emergency fields then, either! Who kept yellin' his head off for radio until you mugs finally decided to spend some money on it? Who went down to Texas and got the dope on blind flyin' from Bill Ocker, and came back and flew over the Hump with fog on the ground on both sides of it? Davis!"

Jake picked up a paper-knife shaped like a dagger and stabbed the air with it.

"If he hadn't done that," he went on almost fiercely, "we'd still be sittin' on our tails, and then when there's a cloud in the sky the birds don't sing! Before that it was standard practice for an aviator to stick his head out o' the window and say: 'Ah, it's rainin'!' and then climb back into bed again! I know—I was one of 'em!"

Abruptly a voice rang out from the loudspeaker on Buzz's desk—a voice familiar in Jake's ears:

"Dizzy Davis, in Twenty-two, calling Newark. Dizzy Davies, in Twenty-two, calling Newark!"

"Go ahead, Davis!" said Buzz into his microphone, and prepared to make notes on a pad.

"Position over Sharon. Altitude two thousand. Temperature fifty-eight. Visibility unlimited. Ceiling, three thousand feet. Scattered clouds."

"Okay," said Buzz; and then the voice burst into song:

"Oh, how I miss you, dear old pal of mine—" How's Jake? Say, tell him I—"

"Regulation Number Three," interrupted Buzz severely. "Pilots will refrain from all personal conversation while in flight."

"Okay, Toots!" responded the voice airily. "I can read!"

Jake grinned at Al Stone. "Speak of the devil!" said he.

"Devil is right," growled Stone, and took out a cigarette-case.

"Aw, let me tell you something! Hi, gimme one o' those, will ya?"

The case was held in his direction, and he took a cigarette and lit it.

"Dizzy and Tex Clarke and I," he said, "are the only old-timers left in this division. We were all in the War together. I'll never forget. Dizzy was the kid of the outfit, and I taught him how to fly—and three weeks later he was teachin' me!"

"That's pure sentiment, Jake," protested Stone. "I'm not interested in past history. We're running a business. If the war-time pilots don't fit to-day's standards, they're through!"

"Those ate the men who made your airways."

"I can't help that. Compare Davis with the type of youngster we're getting to-day. They're college men, educated to the job, technically expert. They never pull anything wild, and they can fly, too!"

Jake stood up and gritted his teeth. "Al, get this!" he said stiffly. "I hire and fire the pilots on this division, and as long as I've got the job Dizzy Davis is gonna have one!"

"Okay, Jake." Stone rose and rammed his black soft-felt hat on his head. "But the next slip Dizzy makes out he goes, even if you have to go with him!"

"Thanks," said Jake.

Dizzy Arrives

A LITTLE while after Al Stone had taken his departure in a huff, the voice of another pilot issued from the loudspeaker, announcing that Lawson, in 'Plane Six, was coming in to land. Another machine was already roaring over the field, and Buzz glanced at it through the panes of the long windows.

"Wait a minute," he directed. "A student in first solo heading in. Better take another turn around the field."

Jake looked out at the machine which was coming to earth.

"Who's flyin' that training job, Buzz?" he inquired.

"Tommy," was the reply. "You're crazy! There's only one in it!"

"Sure," said Buzz. "First solo."

"Well, can you beat that kid?"

Doc Wilson walked into the room to announce that the Government inspectors would be arriving in an hour's time for the regular quarterly check.

"Did you thank 'em for the advance notice?" asked Jake dryly.

"We don't need no notice," said Doc. "We're ready."

"That's what you think."

Out on the flying-field the descending machine came to rest upon the concrete, and a number of people ran over to it, including a stewardess, Tex Clarke, and a couple of other pilots.

From the cockpit a girl scrambled down amongst them—a slender girl, even in her flying clothes; brown-haired, green-eyed, and full of life and spirits.

"Nice work, Tommy!" boomed Tex. "Congratulations!"

The others uttered words of praise, and the green eyes became very bright and their owner's face flushed with elation.

"Oh, gosh!" she exclaimed. "I feel like an angel!"

"Well, you sure look the part," Tex declared.

"Was I all right?"

"Oh, perfect," he assured her, "except that last landing! You came in a little too fast."

Jake had emerged from the control-room, and she rushed across to him.

"Hi, Jake!" she cried. "Jake, I've flown alone for the first time! I've soloed!"

In her excitement she flung her arms round his neck, and he held the arms as though shocked.

"Hi, you're gettin' familiar with the boss, aren't you?" he rebuked.

"Oh, Jake, don't be so dignified!" she pouted. "Aren't you proud of me?"

"Sure I'm proud of you," he returned, "but listen, don't try to be the snappiest solo bird on the field—try to be the oldest. Your grandchildren will appreciate it."

"Don't worry," she laughed. "I won't go haywire on you."

She tried to hug him again, but he hurriedly released himself.

"Take it easy," he urged. "There's the boy friend!"

Tay Lawson, a young pilot, was crossing the field from the machine in which he had just landed. She rushed to him, crying:

"Tay! Tay! Tay, I made it! I made it!"

Tay Lawson congratulated her.

"I knew you'd do it," he declared. "Were you scared?"

"Scared?" Tommy, who derived her nickname from her surname Thomas, drew a very long breath. "I'll say I was!"

"I remember the first time I soloed —" Tay began; but Jake heard and cut in upon the reminiscence.

"You're not gonna go back that far, are you?" he jeered.

In at the gates of the airport came a motor-truck, driven by Baldy, which contained the wreckage of the machine Eddie Payson had abandoned to its fate the night before. Jake walked across to it with Doc Wilson, and one comprehensive glance at what had been a mail plane was sufficient.

"Well," he said to Doc with a grimace, "it looks like you can strike that from the list of registered aircraft!"

Doc had done that already, and said so. Jake turned to Baldy, who had jumped down from behind the wheel of the truck.

"Where's Eddie Payson?" he asked. "He dropped off by the office," was the reply; and Jake went back to the control-room.

Buzz was chewing gum and receiving a weather report from Chicago; Payson was standing by Jake's desk in the uniform of the air line and fiddling nervously with his cap.

"All right, Eddie," said Jake, dropping into his own chair behind the desk, "sit down."

"Thanks," stammered the pilot, "but I—I—"

The paper-knife was jerked in the direction of a chair, and Eddie sat.

"Come on, what's the story?"

"Well, I was flying blind on the north leg of the Harrisburg beam. Couldn't see anything but my instrument board—not even the wing tips. Then they turned the beam off."

"It was only off for ten minutes," rapped Jake.

"I know, but I couldn't pick it up again."

"You've got a map, a pencil and paper, a clock, and a compass. You ought to be able to take care of your course."

"I tried that but with fog all around me, I—"

"No, Eddie!" Jake pointed the paper-knife. "This is purely a case of pilot and cockpit trouble. You got jittery, flying blind. You wandered away from the beam, and you got lost. You were afraid to fly under the fog for fear of hittin' the mountains. Then you got panicky and bailed out ten miles north of the airway, with a fifteen hundred foot clear ceiling below the clouds! Is that right?"

"I guess that's right," Eddie admitted miserably. "But all the time some little voice inside me kept saying, 'You're just guessing, Eddie. You don't know where you are!'"

"Yeah," nodded Jake. "Yeah, that sky's a pretty lousesome place when it gets fogged over. But a pilot's supposed to use his head and forget that voice!"

"I'm not afraid, Jake!" blurted the pilot. "Really, I'm not. I tried to bring the mail through."

But Jake shook his head.

"Whenever the weather licks the pilot," he said, "instead of him lickin' the weather, he's finished! The first time makes the second time easier, and the first thing he knows he's in trouble when the weather is perfect."

Tears became very near to Eddie's eyes.

"Jake," he said pleadingly, "all my life I've been working to be a pilot. Model planes—school—college. Give me another chance, will you?"

Jake dropped the paper-knife and walked round the desk.

"Eddie," he said, "ever since the first day we hired you as a rookie all the pilots that've flown with you had to make a report on you. Now you've seen the forms that we use, and there's a line that reads, 'Reaction to emergencies.' That line could just as well read 'nerve' or 'courage,' or anything you want to call it. Now your reports have all been good, except for that one line, and then, most of the times, question marks."

He paused a moment, sorry for the young man who had failed, then added:

"Last night you answered those question marks. It cost us a forty thousand dollar aeroplane. They've got your final cheque in the office."

"Well, I—I guess there's nothing more to say," faltered Eddie. "You've been mighty square about it, Jake. So long."

He stumbled from the room, and Doc Wilson, who had entered it a little while before, said gruffly:

"Tough break for the kid."

"Oh, there's times when I'd gladly give up this swivel-chair job!" growled Jake. "Haven't you got somethin' else to do besides stand there and moan?"

The voice of Dizzy Davis rang out from the loudspeaker.

"Go ahead, Davis," said Buzz.

"Boys, I'm almost home," announced Dizzy. "I can smell Jersey City."

"Okay, Twenty-two!"

"Don't be so business-like, Buzz," reproved Dizzy. "I'm tryin' to tell ya I'm landing at Newark. Never mind the fatted calf. Make it lobster thermidor at Mamma Gini's."

"Okay, Twenty-two!"

The drone of a plane in the sky became audible and increased in volume. Jake looked up through the window behind his desk, and Doc and Leslie Bogan joined him. Even Buzz deserted his wireless.

Dizzy was approaching the airport at a considerable height, and as they watched they saw his machine turn completely over and swoop towards the field upside down.

Jake muttered something under his breath, while out on the field pilots and mechanics stared aghast. But over went the machine again, and down it came to a perfect three-point landing.

Dizzy Davis pushed his goggles up over his helmet and grinned at those who gathered round the machine, then opened the roof of the cockpit and descended to the ground, an impish-looking fellow with a freckled face decorated with a tiny moustache and illuminated by a pair of very bright brown eyes.

"How are ya, Dizzy, you old rooster?" boomed Tex, and staggered back from an embrace that nearly sent him sprawling.

Jake hurried out from the control-room with Leslie Bogan and Doc Wilson.

"Sweet home!" he cried.

"Welcome!" Dizzy rushed at him.

lost his balance, and sat down on his parachute pack with a thud.

"Well, home again," he said, looking about him, "and what do I see? A pair of strange feet—large and very flat feet!"

The owner of the feet happened to be one of the Government inspectors from Washington, a tall man and a dignified one who did not even smile, but who said ominously

"And they belong to Joe Allen, Department of Commerce inspector."

Dizzy scrambled to his feet.

"Oh, hallo," he said, "how are you, Mr. Allen? I'm pleased to meet you. My name's Davis."

"Yes, I know," returned the inspector. "That was a very fancy landing of yours. The next one like it will cost you a suspension."

"Uhuh!" Dizzy grinned. "There's not goin' to be any next one."

"I'm not kidding. If you want to fly around here, you'd better watch your step!"

The grin persisted.

"Well, I've never had much fun doin' that, Mr. Allen," said Dizzy, "but I'll try."

"Let me see your pilot's licence."

"Pilot's licence?" Dizzy unfastened his heavy leather coat and groped in the pockets of his tunic. "There we are!" He handed over his licence. "You'll notice I've made application for renewal."

The inspector examined the card and the slip of paper inside it.

"I see you've applied for a waiver for physical defect," he said. "What is it?"

"Skippy pump," replied Dizzy. "Six years old. Oh—er—told me, how is Washington on us old cripples these days?"

"Tough!" The inspector wrote on the licence with a fountain-pen and handed it back. "They're holding up licences they used to renew without batting an eye."

"Oh!" Dizzy looked at the licence and put it in his pocket. "You write a lovely hand, Joseph. I suppose you're gonna turn me in?"

The inspector shook his head.

"I've got my job to do," he said, "but I'm no stool-pigeon. You get away with that fancy landing this time."

"Thank you," said Dizzy, and the inspector turned to Jake.

"Get my notice about inspecting?" he inquired.

Jake assured him that everything was ready for him, and he walked off in the direction of the hangars.

"You're as lucky as ever, you lug!"

Jake said to Dizzy.

"Baldy," said Dizzy with a magnificent gesture, "my luggage!"

Baldy went to the machine, whence he removed a suitcase and a bag. Dizzy, with Jake on one side of him and Tex on the other, moved towards the control-room.

"You know, Dizzy," said Jake, "that Bureau of Commerce is gettin' awfully tough lately. I wouldn't tangle with that Joe Allen if I were you."

"Don't worry about Joe Allen," returned Dizzy cheerfully, "we'll take care of him. How's Mary?"

"Oh, she's fine! She's comin' over to pick us up pretty soon."

"That's swell! And how's your matrimony, Tex? Did she send me her love?"

"Sure!" lied Tex.

"Yeah, I'll bet she did! In a hand-crocheted bottle of arsenic! Come on, I wanta see Buzz! I haven't seen him in years!"

The Fate of a Pilot

IN the pilots' room Dizzy discarded his flying clothes, and in the control-room he and Buzz were exchanging greetings when Tommy walked in at the door and Tex pounced on her.

"Hi, kid, you wanna meet a real pilot?" he asked.

"Around here?" she laughed. "I'd be delighted!"

"Come on!" Tex led her over to Dizzy and effected an introduction, and Dizzy viewed her with appreciation.

He had a distinct weakness for the so-called weak sex, and he liked the look of her.

"Well, Tex," he said, "I want to thank you from the bottom of my heart. How are ya? I'm Dizzy Davis."

"Yes, I know," returned Tommy with complete self-possession. "Tex happened to mention it when he introduced us."

"Yeah, yeah." Dizzy looked at her uniform and the cap on her head. "Aviator?"

"Just soloed," she replied. "Tex is teaching me to fly."

"Yep," confirmed Tex. "I'm her daddy."

"Gee! Well, good-bye, daddy!"

Tex took the hint and drifted away. Tommy said:

"Your landing was a honey! Wish I could fly like that?"

"Well, how about lettin' me give you a lesson or two?"

"Oh, would you?" she breathed.

"I can't think of anything I'd rather do."

"Keep your fingers crossed," said Jake from his desk. "He'll give you the well-known Davis run-around!"

"I've heard of that," said Tommy, and she crossed her fingers almost under Dizzy's nose, then walked away.

"Say, what d'you want to throw that monkey-wrench for?" demanded Dizzy.

"Anything for a pal," returned Jake with calm.

Tay Lawson stepped in from the field.

"Number Eleven's inspected," he reported. "Express mail and passenger manifests checked. Ready to take off. Any special instructions?"

"Yes," replied Jake. "Keep your eye on the weather—the map's gonna change fast in the next couple o' days. Oh, I want you two fellows to meet each other. Pilot Lawson—Dizzy Davis."

"Hallo!" said Dizzy casually.

"Hallo!" said Tay. "Welcome back to Newark."

"Lawson's my right-hand man," Jake explained. "In charge of all test work, overhaul, and motor replacements."

"You must be good, fella," remarked Dizzy, "to have all that responsibility."

"Sure," said Jake. "He keeps his mind on his job! He's developing that new de-icer. It prevents the ice from forming on the wings. Go over it with him, will you—when you have time?"

"How about to-morrow?" suggested Tay.

"Huh?" Dizzy was looking at Tommy, who had re-entered the room.

"To-morrow? Oh—er—let's see—to-morrow. Say, Tommy, what are we doin' to-morrow?"

"We?" Tommy raised her brows; Tay's were frowning.

"Yeah, I mean—er—what are you doin' to-morrow?"

"Ask me the day after to-morrow!" Tommy slipped her arm through Tay's and went out with him on to the field.

"I never thought I'd live to see the day," rejoiced Jake.

"Dizzy Davis knocked clean out by a girl!" derided Tex.

Dizzy made a face at them both. "You under-estimate me, boys," he said. "That was just round one. We'll give her that one."

Jake suddenly became official.

"You'll fly the noon mail west to-morrow," he stated, "come back the next day, have two days off, and then the regular schedule."

Dizzy flung out both hands.

"Here we go," he proclaimed, "right back on the old merry-go-round! Dizzy Davis, the flyin' postman!"

"Yeah," said Jake, "and now listen, you lug—what's the dope on that forced landing yesterday?"

Dizzy stared.

"Is this official?" he asked.

"Well, no, not if you don't want it to be."

"Okay. Well, here it is. I'm ballin' the jack at about a thousand feet when a swell chateau passes under my left wing. Biggest place you ever saw. Beautiful lawns and gravelled drive-ways, and a big swimming pool. Well, in the pool are four beautiful dames."

"Four?"

"Yeah, four. And then the unexpected happened. A magneto block got loose!"

"Yeah, a magneto block got loose," snorted Jake. "And Al Stone knows all about it!"

"Who told him?" asked Dizzy blankly.

"I don't know. He got the report from Cleveland and guessed the rest. He wanted to fire you."

"Fire me!" Dizzy emitted a scornful noise. "Since when can he fire anybody?"

"He runs the air line."

"He may be boss," retorted Dizzy. "but he doesn't run the line. I'd quit

"Well, what do you think of it?" Jake asked, after he had glanced at the sheet Buzz took over to him.

before I'd let a guy like that fire me!" "Yeah? Well, look out he doesn't call your bluff." Jake dismissed the subject with a flip of his hand. "Now that you're here, where are you goin' to stay?"

Dizzy replied that Tex had asked him to stay at his place, but Tex did not confirm the statement.

"I—I guess I'd better call Lou," he said lamely.

"Yeah," said Dizzy. "Ask her what she's gonna have for dinner."

Tex rang up his wife, but her attitude was such that it was just as well Dizzy and Jake could not hear her end of the conversation.

"Dizzy," mourned Tex, after he had hung up, "Lou says her mother's comin' on from Cleveland. I'm sorry."

"I bet you are!" quoth Dizzy. "Aw, that's all right, forget it. I'll get a little place of my own, and you can come and live with me."

One of the double front doors was opened and Mike Owens knelt at it with his polishing materials.

"There's Mike!" exclaimed Dizzy, and ran over to the kneeling man.

"Mike, I'm glad to see you. I haven't said eyes on you in years. The only guy in the outfit crazier than I was. Mike, you look—"

Mike rose to his feet, staring vacantly. "You—you want something?"

"Don't you remember me?" asked Dizzy in astonishment. "I'm Dizzy—Dizzy Davis."

"Dizzy Davis?" Mike repeated the name as though it were strange to him.

"Fifty-ninth Squadron, Kelly Field."

"Kelly Field?" A glimmer of intelligence appeared in Mike's blue eyes.

"Oh, yeah, I remember you. You were a pilot."

"I still am," said Dizzy.

Mike proceeded to polish the plate on the door.

"You—you've been away," he said dully.

"Yes, Mike; I was out West for a while."

"I thought I hadn't seen you around. Drop in at the house some time. I got some mighty good gin."

"All right, Mike, I will," Dizzy looked back at Jake and Tex, but they made no comment.

"Jake thinks if the front door don't look right people won't come in," said Mike, and presently shuffled off; whereupon Dizzy cried out in a horrified voice:

"Jake, you can't do that to him! Mike's a pilot!"

"Mike was a pilot," corrected Jake.

"Well, what happened to him?"

"Smacked a tree in a fog. I thought you'd have heard about it."

"Broke practically every bone in his body," added Tex.

"Oh," lamented Dizzy, "I certainly said the bright thing to him right off the bat!"

"Mike doesn't know what it's all about," Tex reassured him.

"Well, can't something be done for him? Holy smoke! Mike Owens polishing brass door-knobs!"

"Yeah, and he doesn't do that very well," said Jake. "He's had the best attention in the country, but nothing more can be done. He's got a wife and a couple o' kids. We can't let him starve. Tex has been lookin' after his family."

"Yeah, with your help," said Tex.

Dizzy went back to them, and from each pocket of his breeches he pulled out notes which he thrust upon Tex.

"Here you are," he said. "And if you need any more, just holler."

October 31st, 1936.

"Oh, Dizzy," Tex protested, "they don't need all o' this!"

"Forget it," said Dizzy, stalking up and down. "It's enough to make a man sick inside. Why don't those nits in New York do something about a pension for him?"

"It takes money to start a pension," said Jake. "We're trying to work something out."

"Oh, it takes money to start a pension, eh?" howled Dizzy. "It's enough to drive a guy off his nut, all this red tape! Tex, come on, I—I need a drink. How about you, Jake?"

"Me, too," replied Jake. "I'll phone Mary. We'll have dinner over at Mamma Gini's. We'll all meet there."

He dialed a number on the telephone on his desk, and Dizzy suggested that Tex should ask Lou to join them.

"I—I don't think she'd come," said Tex, who knew quite well that she wouldn't.

"Well, you can come for a couple o' drinks, anyway."

Jake made arrangements with Mary, and he was putting down the telephone when Tommy crossed the room, dressed in a dark frock with a white collar, and disappeared through a doorway.

"There goes my dinner partner!" announced Dizzy. "Second round coming up! How's the betting?"

"Tommy all the way," declared Jake; and Tex offered ten dollars to five against Dizzy's chance of success.

"All right," said the incorrigible one. "If I lose, you all eat on me."

He followed Tommy into an adjoining room, where she was making notes in a book at a bench.

"Hallo, Tommy!" he said! "I—I—I've come to apologise."

"For what?" she inquired, and put away the book.

"Oh, for acting like a chump," he replied, walking over to her. "You put me in my place, but I know I deserved it."

"I didn't expect this," said she in manifest surprise. "I—I—er—oh, forget it!"

"Oh, no, no, I—I don't want to pass it off that way." Dizzy dared to put a hand on her wrist, but she looked down at the hand and he removed it in haste. "I know I got off on the wrong foot," he went on humbly, "but I—I—er—I'd like to begin all over again, and show you what the right is like."

"And how are you going to do that?" she asked.

"Well—er—we're all going over to Mamma Gini's for something to eat. Will you join us?"

She hesitated.

"You know, Dizzy," she said suspiciously, "this is probably just another good line of yours."

"I promise to behave myself," said Dizzy. "And you've got to eat some place, haven't you?"

She took her coat from a chair and put it over her arm, and she put on her hat.

"Still suspicious?" asked Dizzy.

"Yes," she replied, "but hungry."

Buzz was busy at the microphone when they walked out together into the control-room, but the faces of Jake and Tex fully expressed their feelings.

"A Grand Reunion"

MAMMA GINI'S was a very popular restaurant in Broad Street, Newark, and Madame Gini, in addition to being an Italian woman of massive proportions, with a moon of a face and a double chin, was quite a character. She herself waited upon the five who invaded her establishment in a party, and the five enjoyed an excellent meal—and excellent Chianti.

Dizzy danced with Tommy to the music of a little mandoline band, while the others remained at their table.

"It's a grand reunion," said Jake.

"Well," agreed Tex, refilling a glass he had emptied several times, "only I wonder what Lou's gonna say when I get home."

"Aw, you've got to kick it around sometimes," said Jake. "Look at Dizzy—he's havin' a great time." He turned to his wife. "How are you doin', honey?"

"Well," she replied fondly, "you're here, aren't you?"

"If I'm not," said he, "I'm gonna get awful sore when I find it out!"

"That kind o' talk makes me feel good," declared Tex. "How long you two been married now?"

"Two years," Mary replied.

"Umph! Lou and I've been married five." Tex sipped his wine and was afraid he had been indiscreet. "Aw, now don't get me wrong," he went on.

"Lou's a good sport, only she just doesn't like Dizzy. Says he gets me into bad habits."

"I can't give you an argument about that," laughed Jake.

"Lou can and does!"

"Don't worry," said Mary, "I'll square Lou for you."

"Yeah," growled Tex, "but you can't square her until to-morrow—I gotta see her to-night!"

The music of a fox-trot had ceased, and Dizzy had stopped with Tommy by a curtained archway. His "skippy pump" had resented the exertion of the dance, and he was a trifle breathless.

"What's the matter," asked Tommy, "can't you take it?"

"Certainly I can take it," he replied indignantly. "How old do you think I am? I'm only thirty-four."

"That's an awful lot when you're nineteen," said she.

"Yes," he agreed, "but when you're thirty-four, nineteen is no age at all. Say, do you realise that when you're only thirty-four I'll be only forty-nine?"

"What of it?"

"Well, if you think that when I'm forty-nine I'm goin' to dance with an old hag of thirty-four, you're crazy!"

"Do you realise," she retorted, "that when I'm forty-nine you'll be sixty-four?"

"Well, look here," he chaffed, "when you're forty-nine you'll be floating around in a wheel-chair. I'll be out dancing!"

"Yes? With whom?"

"How do I know? She isn't born yet."

There was no doubt that Dizzy had a way with him. He was different from any man she had ever met before, and she liked him. Impulsively she put a hand on his shoulder, and she said:

"You know, Dizzy, I'm glad I came."

"Now, wait a minute, wait a minute!" he exclaimed, removing the hand. "You can't do that to me! You've got to realise that anything you do has consequences. You do that again, and you'll be kissed!"

Tommy crossed two fingers and began to count.

"What's the idea?" asked Dizzy.

"Mother told me when I was tempted to do something to count ten," she replied. "Can you wait?"

"Wait?" he echoed. "I'll help you. Start all over again. A-one!"

"A-two!" laughed Tommy; and between them they had counted up to nine when Jake came up behind them.

"How about dancing this one with your boss?" he said, and whisked Tommy away.

Dizzy sauntered back to the table and sat down beside Mary. Tex had adjourned to the bar.

"You'd better watch that husband of yours," he said. "Look at him dancing around with that young girl over there—the old reprobate!"

"I don't worry about him," said Mary. "Well, stranger, how does it seem to be back east?"

"Oh, wonderful, stranger, wonderful!" Dizzy waved a hand. "Nothing out there but mountains and cows."

"Uhuh!" Mary leaned nearer. "Listen, Dizzy, I don't want to preach, but Tommy's young. She's only nineteen."

"Yeah, I know that," said Dizzy. "What of it?"

"Nothing. Only when you're nineteen it's so easy to fall for a handsome aviator and get your heart broken into tiny pieces."

"Aw, that never happens!"

"It does sometimes," she said gravely. "I remember reading about a case like that."

Dizzy looked at her—and looked away again.

"Well—er—well, that girl you were reading about turned out all right, didn't she?" he asked, fingering the stem of an empty glass.

"She turned out all right," nodded Mary. "She was lucky. She met a fine fellow, right after that, and married him."

"I was very glad to hear that," declared Dizzy in all sincerity. "Very glad."

"She's had two of the happiest years in her life." Mary glanced across at Jake, dancing with Tommy. "You see, Dizzy, Jake didn't ask me about anything that had happened before. If he had, I'd have told him—without mentioning any names. It wouldn't make things any better to break up a friendship like yours and Jake's, would it?"

"Oh, no, no, it certainly wouldn't," Dizzy agreed.

Jake came dancing up to the table with Tommy, and Tex ambled back from the bar hugging a full flask of Chianti.

"Now, Tex, what are you going to do with that bottle?" asked Mary, who was of the opinion that he had already consumed quite enough wine.

"As soon as it's empty," replied Tex. "I'm gonna take it home and make a lamp out of it."

"Well, we're going," announced Jake. "You'd better get some shut-eye, too, fella."

Dizzy, thus addressed, declared that he and Tommy were staying a while. Tex sat down and filled a glass; Jake and Mary said good-night and went off in the direction of the cloak-rooms, and Dizzy was urging Tex not to make his wife any more sore than she was already when Mamma Gini sailed up to the table in all her amplitude.

"Phone for Mr. Tex," she stated.

"Me?" Tex blinked and drained the glass he had filled. "A lady?"

"Your wife!"

The telephone was attached to a wall at the far end of the long room, beyond the bar. Tex rose reluctantly, and as he was none too steady on his feet, Dizzy went with him to the instrument.

The receiver was dangling on its cord, and Tex applied it to his left ear.

"Hallo, Lou!" he said into the transmitter. "Yes, this is— Yeah, I'm here! Eh? Aw, now listen, Lou. I ain't hardly had a drop! Eh?" He tried to adopt a fiercer tone. "You listen to me, Lou! I'm gonna—" An expression of dismay that was almost comic spread over his face. "Oh, all right—all right, Lou. Yeah, yeah, Lou, I'm comin' right home. Good-bye, Lou."

The receiver was restored to its prongs.

"That couldn't have been Lou," commented Dizzy. "She hardly said anything!"

"Yes, she did," growled Tex. "She said come home now or never!"

"Well, that simplifies everything, doesn't it?" said Dizzy with a grin. "Now you don't have to go home at all!"

Mamma Gini arrived in full sail, beaming all over her fat face.

"Mr. Dizzy," she said, "the young lady who was with you to-night, she told me to tell you 'good-night' for her."

"Good-night?" Dizzy stared. "Why, where'd she go?"

"She went home with Mr. and Mrs. Lee," was the reply.

Fog!

TOMMY was in the control-room at the airport, next morning, when

Dizzy entered it. She was in flying-clothes and looked just as attractive in them as she had done in a frock. Dizzy, having greeted her, presented her with a counting frame of beads on wires, such as is used in kindergarten schools.

"For me?" she asked in astonishment.

"For you," he replied impishly. "Chinese children have learned to count from those things for centuries, so it ought to get you all the way up to ten."

"I'll start working on it right away," she laughed.

"Then he—he didn't hear!" sobbed Lou. "He can't land in this fog without his radio! What are you going to do?"

"Good idea." He straightened her tie for her. "Now tell me something. Why did you run out on me like that last night?"

"Don't you know?"

"I haven't the remotest idea," he declared. "The only thing I know is that I was never so humiliated in all my life. I went home—to an hotel—and I cried all night. I knew it wasn't anything I could have said or done, so naturally I just came to the conclusion that—" He made an excellent pretence of crying. "Well, that you—you misunderstood me."

"No, I'll tell you what it was," said she. "You see, you began to look so attractive— Well, you know the way those soft lights flatter you when you're thirty-five—"

"Thirty-four," he corrected sternly.

"All right, thirty-four—don't be so sensitive! Anyway, you began to look so attractive to me that my heart kept going pit-a-pat, and I finally got hold of myself, and I said: 'Tommy, this is all right, but how does he look in the morning?' And now that it's morning—"

"I look a hundred and two!"

"No!"

"All right, then we start all over again. How about a flying lesson this afternoon?"

"Flying?" Her green eyes sparkled. "Any time you say! Oh, but you take the Cleveland mail out in an hour!"

Dizzy had forgotten that circumstance. "Oh, don't—don't worry about that," he said. "I can get Tex to take my run."

"Jake will never stand for that," she informed him. "He says the planes go on schedule, and so do the pilots."

"Well, you forget about it, see? I'll take care of the rest."

"I'll be here," she promised, "but you'll never get away with it."

But Dizzy did get away with it. Some little time later he went into the pilots' room as though to prepare for his flight, but knowing well that Tex was in there, and in the act of putting on his leather overalls suddenly sank to the floor, gasping.

"Say, what's the matter?" asked Tex in high concern. "Is it that dud ticker o' yours?"

"Yeah," murmured Dizzy faintly, and permitted himself to be helped into a chair.

"You're gettin' old," said Tex. "You can't take it."

Dizzy almost forgot the part he was playing on hearing that statement.

"Wait a minute!" he exclaimed.

"Too many people around here are sayin' I'm gettin' old!" He remembered himself and clutched at his chum, emitting a groan.

"I—I better get a doctor!" stuttered Tex in alarm.

"No, don't get a doctor!" gasped Dizzy. "I've gotta make that Cleveland run. That mail's gotta go out."

Tex immediately offered to take the run for him, which was just what he desired, of course; but he protested that Lou would get sore.

"That's all right," said Tex bleakly. "After last night I'm afraid to go home, anyway."

Dizzy clutched at his heart and groaned again. He seemed to be labouring for breath.

"Oh—thanks—Tex," he murmured.

"Thanks—so—much. Oh-h-h!"

"I'll go to Cleveland," said Tex determinedly. "You take it easy."

Dizzy stumbled to his feet and blundered out from the room, and on schedule time Tex took off in the mail plane for Cleveland. Not very long after his departure, Dizzy was well enough to take Tommy up into the air and to give her quite a sensational lesson in flying.

The afternoon wore on to evening and fog began to settle down upon the airport. Leslie Bogan leaned over Buzz's desk as a report came in via the loud-speaker from Cleveland:

"Nine p.m. Ceiling zero. Visibility zero. Dense fog. Temperature thirty. Dew-point thirty. Wind west two. Barometer twenty-nine eighty. Cleveland to Chicago, trip four, cancelled."

"Looks bad," commented Leslie Bogan, and just then Jake walked in from the field.

"Fog's so thick you can cut it in chunks," he said, and pointed out through the windows. "Look at those seagulls! They've been in this flyin' racket so long they've got sense—they're walking on the ground!"

The loud-speaker on Buzz's desk came to life again.

"Tex Clarke, in 'Plane Nine, callin' Newark."

"Go ahead, Texas," directed Buzz.

"Tex Clarke to Newark. Eastbound. Can't see my hand on instruments. East leg of Bellefonte range. Compass one-o-one. Altitude ten thousand. Temperature forty-six. Give Newark weather."

"Ceiling here zero," stated Buzz.

"What's the top of the clouds, Texas?"

"I don't know. Went up fifteen thousand. Started takin' on ice, so came down again. I'll go up and feel for it if you say so."

"Tell him never mind," said Jake, and gazed moodily out at the fog which was becoming thicker every moment. "That stuff'll turn to sleet before morning. We can't take a chance with passengers. Buzz, notify all stations, division superintendents, nothing but the mail leaves Newark till the weather clears."

"Yes, sir," responded Buzz, and proceeded to call up all the Federal Line stations. "Newark closed in," he stated. "Bellefonte closed in. Newark to Bellefonte, zero-zero. Cancel all passenger traffic east of Cleveland. Train all passengers. Caution all mail pilots."

"Tex sure bumped into a sweet trip this time," commented Leslie Bogan.

"Yeah," agreed Jake. "Well, Dizzy oughta be glad he's on the sick list."

Dizzy, at that moment, was perched on a stool at the bar in Mamma Gini's restaurant, and Tommy was perched on another stool beside him.

"By the way," said Dizzy, "don't you ever try any of those things that I did this afternoon until you can land the ship on a dime from any position with a dead motor. Got it?"

"I promise," said Tommy. "But, oh, I loved it! What is it, Dizzy, that makes flying what it is? Is it thrills, or—"

"I think it's because when you're up there you're absolutely on your own," expounded Dizzy. "The world is down there under your wings. Nobody can touch you. There isn't anything anybody can do— Aw, I don't know what it is! One thing I do know, I'd rather be a mail pilot than a king!"

"Tell me, Dizzy, do you ever get worried when it's foggy like this?"

"Always," he replied quite frankly. "Whenever I get in a jam, and I'm lucky enough to figure a way out and get my feet on the ground again, I always say the birds can have it!"

He looked round at a window, and not even a lamp in Broad Street was visible. His conscience troubled him, and he said

"I'd no idea Tex was gonna run into this kind of weather when he took my run. I'd rather be up there myself. Let's run over to the office and see how he's makin' out, eh?"

A fog-horn was sounding dimly across the flying-field when they reached the airport, and Jake was looking distinctly worried when they entered the control-room. He was studying a weather chart.

"How does it look?" asked Dizzy.

"How d'you think it looks?" growled Jake. "The weather won't clear till that high cloud over Omaha moves east and shoves the dirt out to sea. Oh, Tommy, all passenger flights are cancelled. See the boys in the hangars get their food, will you?"

Tommy went off, and a few minutes later an unexpected and none-too-welcome visitor walked into the room, greeted Jake effusively, and offered him and Dizzy cigars. He was Fred Adams, of the Adams Aircraft Construction Company—tall, bushy-browed, and wearing a bowler hat at an angle.

The cigars were declined.

"Say, I've got some stuff you'll like!" declared their would-be donor. "I ran into some rare old Bourbon whisky. I'll send a few bottles over to the flat. Enough for you, too, Dizzy."

"Lovely!" quoth Dizzy. "What do we have to do to repay these kindnesses?"

"Not a thing!" laughed the visitor. "Of course, if you happen to fly that Adams Bomber and like it, just say so."

"And if we don't like it," suggested Dizzy, "we give the whisky back?"

Fred Stone protested that he was not trying to buy anybody. He had read about Payson's crash, and thought Jake might be in the market for some new equipment.

"You know we're converting that Adams twin-engine bomber into a passenger ship," he said. "Looks beautiful on the drawing-board."

"Yeah," said Jake, "but they don't fly on drawing-boards, and we're not doing any bombing nowadays—we're hauling mail, express, and passengers. You're wasting your time and cigars, Fred. I saw that Browning transport the other day, and it's the finest plane in the world. Lands at fifty-five with the wing-flaps down!"

"That's impossible!"

"It is not! Took off with one motor and a full load. Can the Adams Bomber do that?"

"It cannot!" said Dizzy.

"You boys seem to be prejudiced against our stuff," complained Adams. "We've got a good, fast, safe, and comfortable aeroplane. Please don't make a decision until you've flown our ship."

"No, we'll give you a fair trial," promised Jake.

"Well, that's all I can ask." Fred Adams buttoned the heavy overcoat he was wearing. "Oh, and, say, Jake, our connections in Washington are getting better and better. We might be able to do you some good down there. Well, no hard feelings."

"Not while the Bourbon lasts," said Dizzy; and their visitor went off, chuckling.

"I like that Fred Adams," remarked Dizzy, helping himself to one of Jake's cigarettes. "He's about as subtle as a push in the mouth! He's gonna do things for us down in Washington!"

"Yeah," said Jake. "Oh, Diz, did you find an apartment?"

Dizzy nodded.

"I got a little place down the street," he replied. "It's just about big enough to throw my hat."

"What did the doctor say about that heart o' yours?"

"The doc? Oh, yeah, yeah—isn't it funny that Mamma Gini's food should do that to me?"

"You wanta take care o' yourself," admonished Jake. "Why don't you go on a diet? You're not as young as you used to be, my lad!"

"All right, pop," jeered Dizzy.

Mike Remembers

JAKE went out to the hangars, a few minutes later, but before doing so told Buzz to call Tex again. The voice that issued from the loudspeaker was not as distinct as it had been.

"Report your position and altitude," said Buzz.

"No change," was the rather muffled response. "Still flying blind on Newark range. Altitude eight thousand. Visibility zero. What ceiling at Newark now?"

"Ceiling here is still zero," replied Buzz. "Dense fog. Check your radio. Transmission is blurred. Call you back in a few minutes."

"Okay, Newark," said the muffled voice, and Buzz stood up.

"I'll check that ground lead," he decided.

Tommy had re-entered the room in time to hear what was said about the transmission, and after Buzz had gone out, she asked anxiously:

"What do you do when you're flying blind and your radio doesn't work?"

"Well," replied Dizzy, "you just sit there and sweat, and look for a hole where you can see the ground. If you find it, down you come."

"And if you don't?"

"Oh, well, it's a pilot's job to bring the ship down, but if things get too tough you just go over the side."

"Gosh, I'd be scared stiff!"

"Show me any pilot that isn't!"

"You know, Dizzy, I've never met anyone quite like you before. You're sort of goofy and tough and sweet, all at the same time."

Dizzy grinned, and suddenly put an arm round her and kissed her.

"Oh, Dizzy, don't!" she cried. But he was kissing her again when the door from the field swung wide and Tay Lawson strode into the room.

Tommy immediately ran off; but Tay advanced upon Dizzy in a fury.

"What are you trying to do?" he roared.

"What's that to you?" retorted Dizzy.

Tay's answer was a blow intended for Dizzy's jaw, but the blow was warded off, and the two were squaring up for battle when Jake appeared in the doorway.

"Cut it out!" he bellowed. "Cut it out!"

They dropped their fists and he stepped between them.

"What's the matter with you two?" he demanded sternly. "The next time this happens I'll fire both of you! The least you can do is to settle your private fights outside!"

"I'm sorry, Jake," muttered Tay. "I lost my temper."

"All right, I'm sorry, too," said Dizzy. "Come on, kid, let's shake and forget it."

He offered his hand, but Tay ignored it.

"I'll see you later!" he growled.

"That'll do, Lawson!" rebuked Jake, and reluctantly the airman shook hands with Dizzy and disappeared into the pilots' room.

"It didn't amount to anything, Jake," declared Dizzy. "I was standin' over there, foolin' around with Tommy, and he came in and got sore. It didn't mean a thing!"

Dizzy dumped Tay Lawson in a chair and proceeded to gag him with his own handkerchief.

"That's just the trouble," complained Jake. "Nothing means anything to you, but she means a lot to him! Why don't you grow up?"

Further discussion of the matter was prevented by the return of Buzz, who had found the ground lead to be in order. He sat down at his desk and called Tex again; but there was no response from the loudspeaker.

"Call him again!" barked Jake. "And stop ebewin' that gum!"

"Yes, sir," Buzz discarded the gum, but he could not get any answer from Tex.

"His radio must be dead," decided Dizzy. "He'd have told us if anything else was wrong."

"Phone Martin's Creek Emergency Field and see if they've heard anything," directed Jake. "He's due in fourteen minutes."

Buzz did so.

"Passed over Martin's Creek a few minutes ago, flying high," he reported.

"Well, that's a relief," sighed Dizzy.

"Notify all stations by teletype Number Nine not reporting," said Jake, and put his head into Leslie Bogan's room.

"Les, gimme that weather report."

Dizzy followed him to his desk.

"Say, Jake," he blurted remorsefully, "you know, don't you, that I didn't swap runs with Tex just to hand him a hard one?"

"Oh, sure, I know that. What is it, Mike?"

Mike Owens had wandered in at the double doors. He hobbled over to them.

"Is—is Tex in the air—in this?" he asked quaveringly.

"Yeah, he's on his way home. Mike," Jake replied.

"On his way home?" Mike put his hand to his mouth. "I was comin' home on a night like this," he said in an hysterical fashion, "and I couldn't see the ground, the trees, the houses, or anything! And then—then I hit! I stopped like a train hittin' a wall!" His voice rose to a shriek. "Then I hurt all over!"

"Cut it, Mike—cut it!" urged Jake; but Mike had suddenly remembered.

"And my chest!" he screamed. "I couldn't breathe, I tell ya!"

"Take it easy, Mike!" Dizzy shouted at him, his own nerves all ragged.

"Take it easy!"

"Yeah, take it easy, that's right! You ought to be smart and stop flyin', Dizzy! What good does it do you? Make you brave? No, you're afraid! You know you're afraid! You're always afraid! You're afraid some day you'll hit! It's true! It's true, I'm tellin' ya!"

"Stop it, Mike!" thundered Jake.

"Stop it!"

The voice of Buzz, still calling Tex, was the only sound in the room for a moment; then Mike picked up the polishing rag he had dropped and the vacant look returned to his eyes.

"I'm all right now," he murmured.

"I—I was just kinda fogged over."

"Yeah, you're all right now," soothed Jake. "Run along home."

"Yeah," said Mike. "I guess I better go home. The wife might be worryin'—she—she thinks I'm still flyin'."

He stumbled away with his cleaning materials, and it was a relief to them to see him go. Dizzy looked out into the fog, and he said:

"You know, Jake, Tex'll never get down in this without a radio, unless he finds a hole."

"Find a hole in that mud?" scoffed Jake. "It's solid overcast, at least fifteen thousand feet thick!" He snatched up a wireless telephone. "Here, plug this into the outside transmitter circuit and check it."

Dizzy went out with the instrument, and while he was gone Tex's voice from the loudspeaker startled both Buzz and Jake.

"Tex Clarke, in Number Nine, still on instruments," it stated, not very clearly. "West leg of Newark range. Altitude four thousand. Give ceiling at Newark."

Buzz replied that the fog was still on the ground, ceiling zero, but it became evident that Tex could not hear.

"Newark, answer Nine!" said his voice.

"I did answer, Tex," said Buzz. "What's the matter with you? Get on the job!"

Buzz looked at Jake. "He's not receiving," he said. "Sounds like his sending set's gone bad, too!"

Crashed!

DIZZY returned with the wireless telephone and reported that the outside set was working.

"Well, there's nothing to do but wait, I guess," remarked Jake. "We'll be hearing his motor in a couple o' seconds, anyhow."

Several minutes passed, and then Tex's voice was heard again.

"Go ahead, Texas," said Buzz.

"Wake up down there!" raged the voice. "I'm still flyin' blind, west leg north range. Think I'm gettin' close to field."

"Field light, Buzz," said Jake; and the field lights were switched on, and Baldy was instructed to get the flares ready. Two long minutes passed, and then Tex's voice was heard again:

"Newark answer Nine. I've got to set my altimeter. I can't make a landing unless you gimme the dope. Hi, Newark, answer Nine! When I get to the ground I'm gonna wrap this radio round Baldy's neck! The beam's fading out. Newark, answer Nine! I can't land unless you gimme the dope. I can't—"

The voice faded into nothingness. "Sounds like his sending set's quit on him!" exclaimed Jake.

"I wish I were up there instead of him," growled Dizzy. Tommy came running in from the field.

"I heard a 'plane up there!" she cried excitedly.

"Quiet, quiet!" commanded Jake. "Quiet, everybody!"

In dead silence they listened, but it was not till the windows had been opened that they heard the beat of twin engines.

"It sounds awfully high, Jake," said Dizzy.

"Yeah," agreed Jake. "Come on, Dizz, we'll get on that outside set!"

They went out into the fog, and Jake spoke into the wireless telephone while Dizzy held a headphone to one ear. Tommy and Leslie Boden leaned out of a window. The hum of the mail 'plane was fairly distinct.

"This is Jake, Texas," said Jake. "You're approaching the field, west of the office. You sound much too high. You must be a thousand feet. You should be losing altitude very fast. Answer by radio, or jazz your motor if you hear me."

October 31st, 1926.

"He's not getting a thing, Jake!" lamented Dizzy.

The flares were ablaze; the beam was doing its best to pierce the fog.

"Shut off those lights in there!" Jake snapped at Baldy, and the control-room was plunged into darkness, and everybody streamed out into the field.

"You're miles too high!" Jake shouted into the telephone he held. "Circle back and make a new approach. You've gotta come in lower. You must—"

"He's going on!" exclaimed Dizzy.

The beat of the engines died away in the invisible distance, and they all went back into the control-room, where the lights were switched on again.

"Doc," said Jake, "have that ambulance and crash truck stand by. Dizz, notify the State police. Buzz, have all radio stations stand by. Keep all those beams open. If his radio happens to click he might work any of them!"

A period of intense activity followed; and then Dizzy, from a telephone on a land line, received a message.

"State police report a ship over Passaic!" he cried.

"Send it out!" shouted Jake.

Buzz spoke into his microphone, but in vain.

"Oh, can't somebody do something?" whimpered Tommy.

"If you want to stay here keep quiet!" Jake snapped at her.

Messages came in from Albany and from Plainfield, and at Plainfield the ceiling was a hundred feet; but all efforts to tell Tex that were unavailing. Long Island reported that the fog was on the ground there, but the information was valueless. Buzz, on Jake's instructions, radioed to Tex to climb for altitude and go over the side; and he was repeating the message for the twentieth time when Lou Clarke pushed her way in at the double doors, bare-headed and wild-eyed.

"Jake, what is it?" she shrieked.

"What's wrong?"

"Oh, it's all right, Lou!" said Jake, none too convincingly. "Don't worry, Tex'll get down all right."

"Stop lying, Jake!" She flew to one of the windows at the sound of wheels, and she saw the ambulance and the crash truck go by in the murk. "Oh!"

Tommy ran to her, held her arms, and Dizzy and Jake joined her by the window, Jake with a strip of teletype in his hand.

"You've got to tell me, Jake!" she cried. "You told him to bail out, and you know Tex—he'd never do that without orders from you!"

"His radio's dead," said Jake, after a little dreadful silence.

"Then he—he didn't hear!" she sobbed. "He can't land in this fog without his radio. Well, what are you going to do, Jake? You've got to do something!"

"Let's go home," pleaded Tommy.

"No, no!" cried the distracted woman.

"No, I've been there, sitting over the radio! Oh, not just to-night, but one night after another—all alone! Wondering whether Tex'll come home or not!"

"I know, darling," said Tommy sympathetically, "but come along."

Lou shook off her hands and turned with streaming eyes to Jake.

"Oh, I've been through it so often!" she wept. "Sitting there, goin' crazy, waiting for the telephone to ring. Oh, what are you gonna do? Can't you do something? You just stand there, and—"

"We'll get Tex down all right," interrupted Dizzy, and he caught hold of her arm; but she beat his hand away.

"Don't come near me!" she stormed at him. "If it weren't for you it would never have happened! You ought to be up there! You got Tex to take your place, and I know why. So you could have a date with Tommy. The great Dizzy Davis out for another girl!"

Jake swung round on Dizzy as Tommy managed to lead the weeping woman away.

"Is that why you switched your run?" he demanded curtly.

"Yeah," confessed Dizzy.

"Oh!" The sound of a machine in the sky blotted out everything else. "Listen! Shut off that teletype!" Jake shouted. "He's picked up the field lights!"

Lou was sobbing in a chair, and Tommy was bending over her. From the loudspeaker came Tex's voice, faint and jerky:

"Tex Clarke to Newark. Buzz, listen to me. I think I see the field. Tell Jake I'm headin' in!"

Buzz spoke back, but to no purpose. Once more the lights in the room were switched off, and they all crowded round a window which was open, Jake with the wireless telephone in his hand.

"Tex," he said into the transmitter, "you're comin' into the field, headin' straight for number one hangar. Keep her straight, and settle her in slow."

Tex's voice spoke into the darkness of the room:

"Tex Clarke callin' Newark. Why don't you answer? Answer me, Newark!"

Lou held a handkerchief over her mouth so that she shouldn't scream.

"He's not gettin' a thing, Jake!" lamented Dizzy.

"I know," gritted Jake; "but I can keep on tryin'! You're headed for the hangars, Tex, right over—"

The noise of the aeroplane's engines had developed to a roar.

"He's gonna get killed!" screeched Lou. "He's gonna get killed!"

"Quiet, Lou!" rapped Jake. "You sound too low, Texas! You're still outside the field! You're headed for the hangars! Lift it, Tex—lift it!"

Those last words had barely passed his lips when Tex's 'plane crashed, out in the field, and Lou gave a blood-curdling scream of horror. Then, as it seemed to those who stared out through the window, a streak of flame stabbed through the fog—and there followed a tearing, rending sound as the wreck smashed into the hangars.

"Last Flight"

IT was after midnight when Jake returned with Tay Lawson from the hospital to which Tex had been conveyed. Doc Wilson and Baldy were in the control-room, as well as Buzz and Leslie Bogau.

"Well, gang," said Jake cheerfully, "get a load of good news! Tex got off the table in great shape. He was conscious for a couple o' seconds, looked up with that old familiar smile of his, and slipped back into the ether."

They were all delighted to hear it.

"How's his leg?" asked Doc Wilson anxiously.

"Goin' to be all right."

"What did they do to him, Tay?" inquired Baldy.

"They gave him a blood transfusion from Dizzy," was the reply.

"Oh," said Doc Wilson, "he'll pull through all right, then!"

"Tay," said Jake from his desk, "you'd better get some rest. You may have to take out the night mail."

"I don't need any rest," declared the airman.

A daring champion of the speedway and ace attraction of the circus is lured into the police force as a motor-cycle cop. He becomes involved in many adventures. A thrilling drama, starring Jack Holt

The Chasm of Fire

TWO young State policemen and a girl were strolling among the crowds at the circus carnival. As the girl often glanced at and spoke more often to the tall policeman, it was obvious which one interested her most. The other young policeman was round-faced and freckled, and keenly interested in everything.

"If you want us to see Donovan do his stunt you've got to keep moving," laughed the tall policeman.

"Crash is the star act of this show," was the reply. "They ring bells and sound sirens when he's due to begin his act."

The three young people paid for admission into a special arena, and paused to listen to a barker.

"We are going to entertain you with the greatest attraction of modern times. On the top of the ramp I want to introduce to you—Crash Donovan—world famous dare-devil and master of the motor-cycle." They stared upwards at a white-garbed figure astride a motor-cycle. "He is about to perform the most difficult and original feat in the history of dare-devil riding. A death-defying leap across a chasm of flame." Now they looked at a blazing ring of fire.

"I suppose he has to ride down that chute?" The girl pointed. "Then the chute bends upward and it must hurl him into the air and through the ring of flame. Must be a pretty dull way to make a living."

"Yes—the same thing over and over again."

"Like a highway patrolman."

The tall young man shook his head. "But there's a big difference—the crowd—that's what men like Donovan live for."

"Are you ready, Crash?" sang out the barker. A hand was raised in answer. "Let 'er go!"

At a terrific speed the dare-devil went down the chute, roared up the slope, took off into space, passed through the flames, and made a spectacular landing on some special kind of skid-proof flooring.

The freckle-faced cop insisted upon his two companions being introduced to his hero, and, after much shouting, Crash Donovan strolled in their direction. The most conspicuous thing about Crash was the protruding jaw. The eyes were bright, twinkling, and humorous, whilst the smile was mocking. A man of some thirty years and more—a person who had more than usual confidence in himself and his abilities.

"So you're still fooling 'em, eh?" cried his admirer.

Crash grinned. "You coppers can't have all the soft jobs, Alabam."

The tall policeman frowned. Alabam was the nickname the boys had given Alec Thomas, and he resented this man's familiarity.

"Say, I brought you some more public!" Alabam cried. "This is Doris Tennyson and this is my riding-partner, Johnnie Allen."

Crash smiled in his patronising way at the girl and then held out his hand to her companion.

"Allen!" He bent forward for a closer view. "Any relation to Sam Allen?"

"My oldest brother!" Johnnie exclaimed. "You know him?"

"Do I know him?" Crash gave a rasping laugh. "Say, he and I soldiered together in one of those comic wars out in the Balkans. Reckoned fighting was better than being one of the great unemployed. Great guy your brother. Where is the big mug now?"

"A war caught up with him in China," Johnnie answered. "He died of wounds out there."

Crash shook his head. "I didn't know that. Sorry."

"We got our machines outside this arena," Alabam explained. "They're fitted with radio and we may get a call."

As luck would have it there came a call almost the moment they reached their machines.

"Calling motor-cycle fifty-eight—calling motor-cycle number fifty-eight!"

"That's me!" cried Alabam. "Something important coming up!"

The grin of expectancy faded slowly from Alabam's face as he listened to his orders:

"Go to corner of State road number eleven and county road number two—woman driver blocking traffic—husband objecting from back seat—arrest woman—ambulance following to pick up husband."

When Alabam had mouched discontentedly away, Crash Donovan turned to Johnnie. "So you're Sam's brother?" he cried. "Reckon that calls for a drink. Come on."

They seated themselves on stools at a refreshment counter.

"Three beers," ordered Crash. "Sorry, Crash, I'm in uniform."

The dare-devil laughed and turned to the attendant.

"Harry, make it three lemonades, and, if you laugh I'll punch your fat face."

The girl glanced at Johnnie and the look was expressive. Crash Donovan might be a wonder stunt merchant, but otherwise she did not think very much of him. Johnnie, who was more than ordinarily proud of his uniform, had little time for circus folk, and maybe the smile on his good-looking face was a trifle contemptuous.

Crash smiled at the girl.

"Are you the mascot of the outfit?"

"She has what one might call an impersonal interest in us," Johnnie hastened to explain. "Her father's the Chief of the Highway Patrol."

"You ride well enough to be in it yourself, Mr. Donovan," hinted the girl.

"Thank you, Miss Tennyson." He roared with laughter. "I can't see myself in one of those monkey suits."

"Why not try it?" tartly cried Doris.

"I've been everything," Crash told her. "Cowpuncher, parachute jumper, soldier of fortune, but I always go back to the carnival. There's nothing like it."

"You've never been in the patrol, Mr. Donovan."

"Well, Miss Tennyson, maybe when I get old enough I'll try it."

"Who asked you to try it?" snapped Johnnie.

Crash beamed good-humouredly.

"You sound just like your poor brother Sam. Why, if I wore a uniform like that I'd be dodging myself half the time."

"Well, when you've got enough applause, keep it in mind," coldly spoke Doris as she finished her drink. "You may get tired of the carnival."

"Listen—once a carnie—always a carnie."

"Well, come on, Doris." Johnnie took the girl's arm. "We've got to go. Watch yourself, Crash."

"If I don't, nobody else will."

"Except your—public," scornfully answered Doris. "Good-bye."

"Give me a beer," muttered Crash Donovan, watching the two young people move away. "You know, Harry, if there's anything wrong in being a carnie, that's it."

"What?" demanded Harry.

Crash's smile was a trifle bitter.

"It's hallo and good-bye!"

A Frame-up

SOME nights later the captain sent for Allen and Thomas.

"Highway Ninety-nine," came the order. "Watch for glaring headlights."

"All right, captain." Johnnie Allen saluted. "I'm riding extra motor number five. Thomas is riding his usual machine, number fifty-eight."

They passed out through the control-room and Alabama grinned at the radio officer. "Let's hear your cheerful little voice once in a while, Foghorn." He had to duck to avoid a heavy book.

The two young fellows went out to their machines, where a mechanic reported that everything, including the radio, was in working order. The two machines roared to life. Side by side they were soon patrolling Highway Ninety-nine.

Now on that highway was a roadhouse known as the Colonial Club, and seated at a table with a number of men and girls was Crash Donovan. The second item of the cabaret programme had concluded, when Crash, who was a well-known patron of the roadhouse, jumped to his feet and raised his hand for silence.

"Ladies and gentlemen—the surprise of the evening—introducing Miss Marjorie Day, star of the Little Egypt Carnival." He held out his hand, and a smiling brunette got up and, after a bow to Crash, walked towards the centre of the floor.

At a table on the other side of the dance floor sat four men, and there was a considerable amount of beer on the table. They waved their hands to Marjorie Day, who gave them a frigid look of disapproval.

The girl's song was one of the latest medleys and her rendering was delightful. There was quite a crowd present and the applause was deafening. Miss Day obliged with an encore and then went back to Crash Donovan's table.

The dark man with the scarred face in the party of four leaned forward.

"Come on!" His voice was a whisper. "It's time to start things. Put on your act, Spike."

Spike was a big, fair-haired fellow, who had been doing a lot of shouting and singing. Obviously a bruiser. He got to his feet and went staggering across the floor towards Crash Donovan's table.

Marjorie Day was about to sit down when Spike caught hold of her arm.

"Come here, honey, I want you to meet some friends of mine."

"Leave go of my arm!" fiercely cried the girl.

Crash, who had been chatting to another girl, looked round, and in a moment was on his feet.

"Here, wait a minute!" His jaw stuck forward aggressively. "This lady is my guest. You get back to your friends."

"Friends wanna meet her," leered Spike, still holding the girl. "You sit down before I hurt you."

Crash clenched his fists, and Spike, without warning, lashed out with his free hand, catching the dare-devil a nasty blow between the eyes. Crash swayed back, and then—wink!—a right hand landed on the point of the bruiser's chin, and he went flat on his back as if he had been pole-axed.

That was the signal for the three other men to rush across the room to the rescue of their friend, and that was the start of a glorious free fight. Other men present, for some reason, seemed to side with the toughs, and, naturally, many backed up Crash. Tables were flung over, women screamed, and the roadhouse rang to the sound of blows and curses. The Italian proprietor rushed to the 'phone and called the police.

A car with brilliant headlights had just flashed past the two patrol-men when their radio woke to life. "C.H.P. calling motor number five and fifty-eight," droned the voice. "Five and fifty-eight—go to Colonial Club on Highway Ninety-nine—a riot."

"Get that car that just went by," ordered Johnnie. "Meet me at the Colonial Club."

At seventy miles an hour Johnnie tore back along the road he had come, and he covered the five miles in about the same number of minutes. He leaned his machine against a tree and dashed into the main restaurant. Was it a riot? It seemed as if fifty people were engaged in fighting each other and smashing up the place.

Spike and Crash were in the centre of the fight. Spike had recovered and was all out to get the man who had floored him. The sight of the policeman instilled fear into quite a number of the fighters, but it didn't stop Crash and Spike. These two were wading into each other. Crash had got his man pinned down on a settee, when Johnnie dragged the two men apart.

"Hey, Donovan, what's going on?"

"Oh, just having a little fun!" muttered Crash, with blood trickling down one side of his cheek.

"What started it?" demanded the law.

"He did!" snarled Spike.

"You lying hound!" shouted Crash. "Haven't you had enough?"

Crash would have rushed at Spike if Johnnie had not seized the dare-devil by the shoulder, swung him round, caught his arm in some kind of a grip, and then sent the older man hurtling to the floor.

Crash Donovan lay where he had fallen.

"Where'd you learn that one, Johnnie?"

"That's what the highway patrol call the civiliser," rasped Johnnie, who thought Donovan was the guilty party. "Come on, Crash."

"Come on?" Crash got slowly to his feet. "What do you mean—come on?"

"I'm arresting you for causing a riot!" cried Johnnie. "Now you know what I mean." He fished out handcuffs. "Are you coming quietly, or "Quietly." Crash's grin was a trifle crooked.

A car had drawn up outside the road house, and three men got out. The leader was a tall, big-boned man.

"The boys will have things pretty well torn up in there by now," he said to the driver. "Keep your motor running, Jerry. Come on!"

The three men drew out guns and moved cat-like towards the restaurant, and they came in one door as Johnnie went out of another with his prisoner. The manager was trying to soothe his patrons when something nudged him in the ribs, and he knew it was a gun.

"In your office!" hissed the gang leader.

But the manager had a bodyguard, and they saw the action of the gangsters.

Johnnie had got his prisoner outside.

"I'll deputise a car to take you in!" Johnnie rapped out.

"You don't seem to like me," grinned Crash. "I didn't start this, but have it your own way. That big mug—"

"You can tell that to—" Johnnie whipped round at the sound of shots. Three men rushed out of a door and made for a car. They had forced the manager to hand over the takings, but had had to shoot his bodyguard to effect a getaway. "You stay here!" Johnnie shouted, and fearlessly raced towards the gangsters.

The gangsters saw the policeman and opened fire. Johnnie whipped out a gun, but before he could fire a shot he spun round and dropped in a heap. The gangsters piled into the car and roared away.

Crash Donovan knelt beside the groaning officer.

"Get you bad, son?"

"Worse than that," muttered Johnnie. "They got away."

"Not yet they haven't!" cried Crash, and, without further argument, snatched Johnnie's peaked cap from his head and picked up the fallen gun. A moment later he was on Johnnie's motor-cycle and roaring down Highway Ninety-nine.

The gangsters were complimenting themselves on their getaway when they heard the roar of the pursuing machine. A cursed policeman; and directly Crash got near enough they began firing through the back window. But Crash kept swerving his machine from one side of the road to the other so that it was not an easy target.

The car cornered at fifty with a screeching of tyres, but Crash came round at over sixty, and was on the car before the gangsters were expecting him. His gun roared as he aimed at the tyres. Bang! A tyre had burst. The car shot across the road, flinging the gangsters against each other, hit a high kerb, bounced across to the other side, another tyre burst, the car spun round broadside and turned over.

Four bruised and aching ruffians crawled out of the wreckage to find a grim-faced man standing there covering them with a gun.

"Come on—all of you! Get moving! Stick your hands high!" he ordered.

One man tried to draw his gun on Crash and a gun cracked. The rascal screamed and nursed a smashed wrist.

"So you want to play, eh?" sneered Crash. "Come on—higher—reach—"

A screeching of tyres and another police patrol.

Alabam saw a patrol officer holding up four desperate-looking fellows, and he noticed blood oozing from one man's arm. Then his eyes opened as he noted that the patrol officer certainly wore a helmet, but the rest of his attire was out of keeping.

"What goes on here?"

"Hallo, Noisy!" laughed Crash.

"Say, this is great fun!"

"Great jumping horseflesh—you!" gasped Alabam.

"Yes. I'm deputising for Johnnie."

Crash never took his eyes off the crooks. "A little trouble back at the Colonial Club."

"You don't mean—he's—"

"Don't worry. Johnnie's tough. Got him in the shoulder. One of these thugs drilled him."

Alabam whipped out handcuffs, and was busy manaculating the men together when they heard the scream of a police siren. A police car drew up, and Crash had to smile because it was bristling with police and machine-guns. Johnnie, his arm bandaged, was one of the first out of the car.

"Nice work, Crash!" There was a hoarseness in his voice. It was a mixture of admiration and emotion.

"Guess I had you wrong."

"Forget it!" Crash stuffed Johnnie's gun back into its holster.

"Does this give you a new slant on the patrol?" Johnnie asked with a wry grin.

Crash nodded.

"It does have its moments. Say, how much do they pay you roadhogs?"

"One-seventy a month."

"Every month?"

"Yes."

Crash Donovan whistled.

"I could use a little of that dough myself."

"Alabam," Johnnie called out. "What do you think? Crash is thinking about joining the patrol."

"You aren't serious?" Alabam had seen the crooks bundled into the police car, and his part of the night's affray was ended. "What's the idea, Crash?"

Crash Donovan laughed in his hearty, mocking manner.

"Well, I got a hunch I'll make a better-looking cop than some I know."

In the morning Crash Donovan went with Alabam to see Chief Tennyson.

"You helped to round up a very desperate gang whom we've been after for months." The chief held out his hand. "It'll be a pleasure to have you on the strength. I will have your application put through the right channels immediately."

The Hardening Process

JOHNNIE, in mufti, his arm in a sling, was sitting on a seat in a park, but not alone. Close to him was Doris Tennyson.

"You must be getting back to hospital."

"No hurry," laughed Johnnie. "Now my arm's almost healed I'll be back to work in three or four days."

"That's what you said a week ago. You've got to take care of yourself, Johnnie."

"You're worse than Crash Donovan," protested the wounded hero. "He comes into the hospital every day, and if I move as much as a finger he wants to put me in a strait jacket."

"I like Crash very much now," the girl admitted. "He told me quite a lot the other day about your brother Sam saving his life out in the Balkans. Crash is pretty busy these days. He told me yesterday that every time he took another examination he got a headache."

"Well, he passed them all with flying colours."

"Thanks to Officer Allen's tutelage," proudly whispered Doris.

"By the way, when is your father going back to take charge of the training school?" questioned Johnnie.

"To-morrow." Doris looked gloomy.

"And I've got to go with him."

"I'm glad."

"You want to get rid of me?"

Johnnie chuckled.

"You don't know all the regulations, Doris. You see there's one that says that all members of the patrol must go back to training headquarters once in every twelve months, and I think I could be persuaded to apply for this course."

"You mean you have applied," corrected Doris with a happy smile.

The next morning, in an orderly-room, the sergeant was calling out the names of all recruits who had been detailed to undertake the course. Naturally Donovan's name had to be called twice before he came panting into the room carrying a bulky suitcase.

"Where's Michael Donovan?"

"Here."

"Sir," corrected the sergeant.

"Sir," Crash said with a grin.

"Thanks for letting us know," the sergeant grinned back. "Take off your hat and sit down."

Crash sat down next to Alabam, who was also going on the course.

"Well, well, if it isn't the dare-devil demon of the carnival!" jeered Alabam.

"How'd you get in here? You know you have to pass a Civil Service examination. I didn't ever know you could read and write."

"But the guy next to me could," chuckled Crash.

The sergeant rapped on his desk to enjoin silence. "I've just got six weeks to make patrolmen out of you recruits, and from the looks of some of you, it's going to be a man-sized job." He gave a glowering look that was supposed to instil dread and respect. "Bring your bags and follow me."

Crash Donovan was delighted to find that his room mate was Johnnie Allen, and he had scarcely unpacked when an orderly appeared to say that all recruits and those taking the course were to go at once to the main lecture hall. Here Chief Tennyson had a few words to say:

"In addition to your first duty, which is regulation of motor vehicles, you have other responsibilities which you must understand. You must protect the lives and property of the people of this state, even at the risk of your own. You must be ready to instruct them in the things that make for safety on our highways. You must learn courtesy—patience—efficiency at all times. You will be put through what we call the hardening process."

"What's that?" Crash hissed in Johnnie's ear.

"All that the word 'hardening' implies," Johnnie winked. "You gotta be tough to take it."

Crash had to agree after one day of the hardening process that you wanted the hide of a rhinoceros and the constitution of an ox. Gymnastics, physical drill, boxing, all-in wrestling, route marches, rifle practice and motor-cycle drill.

Alabam and Johnnie were detailed off to assist with the instruction, and the former was detailed to conduct the revolver class. He demonstrated to the best of his ability how to draw a gun and aim at various targets. If the recruit got six bullets on to the target he passed them through the first test.

Crash had got his man pinned-down on a settee.

"That was a fluke," decided Alabam.

"See if you can hit the middle of the black," he said to Crash.

Crash smiled as if he were being talked to by a child, then he raised the gun. Crack! It was a bull's-eye.

"That was a fluke," decided Alabam.

Crash fired five shots in quick succession. Alabam gasped because the bull had been almost cut out.

The dare-devil stunt man learned fast. He had not been there many days when the sergeant gave them a demonstration of the "civiliser," the hold that Johnnie had used that night at the roadhouse. The sergeant made every recruit take a full punch at him with left or right, and then he would sway his body, move his hands quickly, and the recruit would score a bad miss and then find himself flat on his back. But when the sergeant ordered Crash to try a poke at him with his left, something went wrong, because the sergeant failed to grip Crash and was himself laid out on the turf, much to his annoyance and the amusement of the recruits.

Doris Tennyson had two frequent visitors. Johnnie used to frown a little because Crash seemed always to bring better flowers than he did, but he did not worry very much, because Doris and himself were unofficially engaged. Crash did not know that, and he thought he had just as good a chance as his rival.

Crash proved one of the most proficient pupils to learn during motorcycle-drill. He was certainly one of the most daring. One had only to ask Crash to charge a stationary car, crash the machine, and then jump from the saddle over the car, and he would attempt it.

One afternoon Crash called on Doris and Johnnie was not there. Doris uttered an exclamation of delight at the gift of violets, but she did look a little surprised when she was kissed. Being a modern young miss and liking Crash, she smiled back, but he did not miss the slight reproving gleam in the blue eyes.

"I like you," said Doris.

"That's fine."

"And I'm awfully glad you're going to be Johnnie's riding partner," she added, her eyes never wavering from his. "Will you do something for me?"

"Sure." He was puzzled.

"Will you look after Johnnie and see that nothing ever happens to him?"

Crash Donovan had got his answer. But he was a man, and one can forgive him if his smile was a little forced.

"So you like him that much?"

"Yes, please."

"Okay."

"Thanks, Crash." This time Doris herself did the kissing.

"Well, I guess I'd better go home," Crash said with a twisted smile, "and see he's tucked into bed."

And though Doris knew that Crash liked her very much, she did not know that the big man loved her as he had never loved a girl in all his life. But she did know that if Crash had promised to look after Johnnie, he would do it.

Crash was one of the first to get his badge as a highway cop. On the last day of the class Chief Tennyson called upon Donovan to give an exhibition of trick riding, and the thousands present had to admit that it was one of the most thrilling, death-defying spectacles they had ever witnessed.

At the end there was a grand drive past, and it concluded with the staff and recruits giving a song:

"Hail to the Highway Patrol.

The boys who ride for the gold and blue!

Hail to the fellows who strive

To make the highway safe for you!

And give a cheer for our chief and our State;

To serve them well, that will be our goal.

Every hour, through storm and darkness,
You can depend on the Highway Patrol."

The patrolmen were given a long week-end's vacation and then they had to report for duty.

Road Duty

JOHNNIE ALLEN and Crash Donovan took the road together. Alabam Thomas almost wept over the severing of his partnership with Johnnie, but he had to obey orders. The chief had found out that he was a licensed radio operator, and appointed him with an increase of pay, to take over a new portable outfit. Alabam would rather have had less pay and stayed with Johnnie. Sitting in a trailer all day and listening to messages and sending out orders was dull work.

Crash found that a patrolman's life was full of variety. Some days little would happen, but on others every sort of trouble would crop up and the radio would be busy all the while. Arrest of a charabane driver who had knocked down a little girl; a five-mile chase after a speed merchant; a robbery at a small store; a bad smash at cross-roads; and then a fight with car thieves.

Risks or the bullets of gangsters did not matter one iota to Crash Donovan, but he did not like it when one evening another patrolman lost his nerve. This officer had been the first on the scene at a particularly nasty smash in which a woman and child had been killed through the crazy driving of a tipsy wagon-driver. Some evenings there were instructional classes, and it would happen that all officers were present on the night of the accident for a lecture on map-reading. In the middle of the lecture the radio announced an accident in which three people had been smashed to pieces in a head-on collision. The patrolman got to his feet as white as a sheet and collapsed in a faint.

"I'm afraid that's the finish for poor old Dave," whispered Johnnie, who was sitting next to Crash.

"That happen often?"

"When their nerves blow—they never ride again. Well, it's all in the day's work. Guess the lecture will be off now. Any plans, Crash?"

"I'm gonna get out of this uniform and get a good stiff drink."

"I got a better idea, and it isn't all mine," laughed Johnnie. "You're coming round to have supper with Doris and myself."

Arm in arm they went to have an excellent supper with the girl—whom the two thought to be the sweetest cook and the grandest girl in the world.

That night the two were on night duty from midnight, and about eleven-thirty they bade Doris good-night and hastened back to headquarters. Punctual to the second they went on patrol duty, and had not been gone a quarter of an hour when they received a radio warning.

"Attention all police units—attention all police units. Watch for gang of dangerous smugglers headed south from Long Beach on route one-O-one. Driving grey sedan, licence number two S—'S' like in sugar—three-four-six."

They had their orders what to do on such a call, namely, to go to any cross-roads that they thought might be the route taken by the wanted car, stay there for a while and wait for any further orders.

The two patrolmen hid their machines in some bushes, and after a while a car dashed over the cross-roads at a tremendous speed.

"It's grey and it's a sedan," Johnnie said significantly.

Alabam is Wounded

There were four men in the grey sedan, and the young fellow with the sallow skin and dark eyes, who sat in the front seat spoke angrily to the driver.

"What's the idea of going over a halt sign like that? You want to get us picked up?"

"Ain't no one round these parts, Tony."

The leader poked his head out of the window.

"I'm not so sure. I can see two lights some way back. Step on it."

A few minutes later Tony glanced back and saw that the lights were appreciably closer. Their clearly they heard the police sirens.

"We gotta shake 'em off," Tony shouted at the driver. "If you hadn't been such a fool this wouldn't have happened. Let her out."

"The tyres ain't too good," whined the man at the wheel.

"If you don't step on it it'll be just too bad," threatened the leader. "So you turn out a car with dud tyres when—"

"But I never thought the cops would get wise to us."

"You couldn't think if you tried," rasped Tony, and pushed his head out of the window. "We seem to be keeping our distance, but we've got to go faster if we're going to lose 'em." The next time he looked back his language was lurid. "They're gaining on us fast."

Ahead lay some dangerous corners, and the two patrolmen felt certain they would catch up with the quarry, but just before the danger the big car shot off the road down a track, bumped on to some open land, tore through a wheat field, and smashed through a hedge on to another arterial road.

The going was bad enough for a car, but for a motor-cycle it was almost an impossibility.

"These mugs know their maps," yelled Crash, adroitly keeping his machine in a cart-rut.

"We'll get 'em!" Johnnie sang back.

When they got back to the main highway the crook car was but a speck in the distance.

"Now we'll show 'em something," Crash muttered.

The two machines tore along the wide arterial highway at eighty miles an hour, and the screeching of their sirens carried a long way.

A police car drawing a radio trailer heard the distant screech, and the officer in charge pulled up so suddenly that Alabam, who was almost asleep over a jig-saw puzzle, spilt all the pieces on the floor.

"What you make of that?" the patrol officer questioned.

"Sounds like trouble," answered his companion. "Look!" Over the crest of the hill had appeared a car with brilliant headlights. "That's the car the boys must be trailing. See that light cutting the trees—that's our boys close behind, tailing 'em."

"We'd better have a look," decided the officer. "Swing the car across the road and with our torches signal them to stop."

The crooks, realising they were being overtaken, were striving desperately to maintain a high speed on the slender chance that they might reach some woods, where they could try another short cut down an old lane. Suddenly the driver shouted that he could see flashing lights ahead, and the powerful headlamps picked out a car and trailer almost right across the road.

"We ain't stopping for nothing," yelled Tony.

The two patrol officers with the radio outfit opened fire when the car refused to stop. The crooks replied with revolvers, rifles and a small machine-gun.

Alabam got busy with his radio. He must inform headquarters of what was going on. Suddenly he squirmed and writhed and eluded at his side. The crooks, as their grey sedan lurched past, had fired blindly, and several bullets passed through the radio trailer. Poor Alabam had stopped one in the ribs.

The crooks were past. Johnnie and Crash screeched their machines to a stop when they saw the radio patrol. Johnnie shouted a few words about "Grey sedan" before diving into the trailer.

"Alabam," he yelled, "two S—as in sugar—three-four-six. Put that number on the air."

Johnnie jumped back to his machine. Once more the two motor-cyclists roared in pursuit.

With great difficulty Alabam tuned in on his radio and moved his pain-racked body nearer to the small microphone.

"Attention all points—emergency! Occupants grey sedan—two sugar three-four-six, U.S. one-O-unc. Felony—shot patrolman mobile unit. Have to hurry, dangerous.—Thomas."

Alabam rolled from his seat, and the two officers discussing the affray heard the crash as he hit the floor.

"Alabam!" one shouted. "What's up?"

There came no answer.

The two officers grabbed open the door and saw Alabam sprawled on the floor with a pool of blood rapidly forming on the boards. Gently they lifted him. Alabam opened his eyes and managed a grin.

"I'm okay, Bill. Take over—will you?" he whispered, and slumped in their arms.

"Take that chair away and put the cop in the window," ground out Tony.

Run to Earth

THE crooks had gained a good lead when Crash and Johnnie had pulled up by the mobile outfit, but it was not long before the powerful motor-cycles were close on their tail again.

"Mike," Tony, the leader, shouted to his driver, "get off the main highway. It'll slow 'em down."

"A mile ahead there's the very place," Mike answered. "A sandy track with little grip. I can hug the banking and get through, and the cops when they keep to the main track'll be thrown."

The trick worked because Johnnie, in the lead, charged recklessly after the grey sedan when it left the road. Naturally, he thought he could follow where the car went. His front wheels went deep into soft sand, he skidded sideways and was flung out of the saddle.

Crash managed to keep his balance, and, as he swerved past, Johnnie raised himself on one elbow: "Go on!" he yelled.

Crash Donovan was back on the main road and tearing after the sedan before Johnnie had got to his feet and picked up his machine. He straightened the handlebars and was glad to find no damage had been done to his engine. He followed the car trail out on to the highway.

The grey sedan gained so much by this manoeuvre that when Crash reached the main road the car was out of sight. He could tell by the wheel marks the direction taken, and, after roaring along the road, at last came to a straight stretch, and his heart leapt as he came again within sight of his quarry.

He came to a bend, and suddenly braked his machine to a stop, and turned back. A car had gone off the road and through a low hedge. So they were trying that trick again. He dodged about among pine-trees, and finally came back to the highway. He cursed himself because, if he had not been so smart and seen that smashed hedge, he might be close on them at this very moment. That was if the crooks had come back to the highway; if he had remained on the road they might have continued their cross-country ride to another main highway. It was flat and woody, and not an impossible feat.

Feeling thoroughly enraged, Crash fairly roared his machine, and had gone five miles when he came to another long, straight stretch. No sign of the cursed car, so back went Crash, and had scarce gone a few hundred yards when he saw a track and wheel marks.

Tearing a handkerchief in half, he put it in the centre of the track so that it looked like a pointing arrow—Johnnie would see and understand.

Though this track twisted and turned it was firm, and it seemed to Crash that it was well used. His light picked out ear tracks that were recent. After a while he dimmed his lamps and proceeded a trifle more slowly. Not a sound could he hear of the grey sedan, and it would ruin everything if he drove straight into an ambush. The crooks had made a getaway, but he had a hunch that down this track he would come to some sort of hide-out.

About four miles ahead of Crash the grey sedan was pulled up before a dilapidated old shack.

"Come on, you men, get those boxes out of there quick!" shouted Tony.

"What's the hurry, boss?" cried one of the gang. "We lost 'em miles back."

October 31st, 1936.

"Maybe we lost 'em and maybe we didn't!" snarled Tony. "Come on—snap into it. Get some of the men from inside to help." The boxes were very heavy, and it took the combined efforts of two men to lift one of them. At last all the smuggled goods were out of the car. "Mike," rapped out Tony, "get the bus under cover as quick as you can."

"Okay!" Mike started the engine and sped away towards some dense bushes.

And Crash Donovan, wondering whether he was on the wrong trail, after all, heard the sound of the self-starter and the roaring of the engine. A moment later he sighted the house and saw the figure of a man scuttling through the bushes.

Tony, from the house, had seen the lamp flickering among the trees, and was not surprised when Mike dashed in to say that a cop had spotted him.

"So you weren't so darned clever!" the leader snarled and whipped round, "Barricade the doors and cover the windows."

They saw the policeman and opened fire. Crash made for a large tree surrounded by shrubs, flung himself from his machine and from behind the tree fired at the windows.

A roar of a motor and out of the darkness came a headlight—it was Johnnie. The two police officers opened fire.

"We ain't got much chance of getting those rats out," opined Crash. "Reckon there must be seven or eight of 'em from the flashes, so it would be suicide to rush the place, but now we've corralled 'em we don't want 'em to make a getaway. I saw a telephone pole about a mile back."

Johnnie nodded. "I get the idea. Can you get back to it and tap a wire. I'll hold them here."

"Sure!" Crash quickly agreed, and laid his hand on the other's shoulder. "Keep your head down, Johnnie boy. I won't be long." A leap into the saddle and he had flashed away among the trees. Tony saw the machine and guessed one of the patrols had gone for help.

Crash Donovan came to the telephone pole and shinned up it like a monkey. He had brought from the saddle-bag of his machine a small instrument, and the two wires he adjusted to the telephone wires.

"Hallo! Hallo! Emergency—State Patrol Headquarters!" he cried into the miniature telephone.

At last he heard a voice saying that he was being put through; then came headquarters.

"Donovan speaking."

"Where are you?"

"Pine Ridge. Have located smugglers. Send help."

"Right."

"We'll take care of 'em, but hurry!" was Crash's final message before disconnecting.

It was not long before a general call was being sent forth: "Calling all police units. Calling all ears. Criminals spotted on Pine Ridge—"

Chief Tennyson turned out every available man, and, within five minutes of getting the news that Crash Donovan and Johnnie Allen were holding the smugglers at bay in a cabin on Pine Ridge, a dozen cars loaded with police and two dozen of the cycle patrol were roaring through the night in the cause of justice.

Crash Donovan roared back towards the shack, and was surprised not to hear any sound of firing. Allen's machine was there, but there was no sign of Johnnie. Crash flashed a torch on the ground and recoiled at the sight of blood.

A flash of light ahead made him peer through the bushes.

The door of the shack had opened, and then his heart missed another beat, because he could see the uniformed figure of Johnnie. Even at that distance Crash was able to see that the young officer was wounded, either in the right shoulder or arm. Two crooks were driving Johnnie into the shack at the point of the gun.

The shack door closed with a slam.

A Human Target

TONY, the leader of this band of smugglers, was no ordinary gangster. He had received a good education, but had envied those college graduates who had ears and money. It had started with a small gambling school in his room, and, finding how easy one could make money this way, had looked round for other means of fleeing the foolish. He had been found out taking bets on races and expelled. The result was that Tony had turned to a life of robbery and crime. Though only twenty-five he was the leader of a gang, and it was his boast that, so far, he had eluded the long arm of the law.

But Tony, as he crouched by one of the windows, knew the arm of the law was very close. He had seen one of the patrol officers disappear, and knew that he had gone for help. Probably it would take an hour before a strong body of police could get here, and all Tony and his men could do would be to die or surrender. Tony gave a bitter grin—surrender to serve twenty years or more in a prison, where you would become a poor, broken wreck.

Surely there was something that could be done? If they got the car and tried to make a getaway the cursed policeman would be on their trail. But supposing they killed him? That would mean the chair. Supposing they captured him and made him a prisoner? Tony grinned, because now he thought he could see a possible way of escape.

"Mike," he rapped out. "You and the boys keep up heavy fire at that tree, behind which the cop is skulking. 'cos I'm going out."

"You ain't doing a run-out—"

Tony's gun covered the man.

"One more crack like that and you'll taste a dose of lead." His eyes blazed. "I've risked my life for you seem more than once. I'm not yellow, if you rats are. We're cornered, and maybe I could sneak away, but I'm not a quitter." He laughed. "Don't think it's because of you spineless skunks that I'm sticking. I'm thinking of all that junk that's worth thousands, and I'm not quitting that. If you want to get out of this jam, you do as I say, and the first that questions my orders—"

"I'm sorry, chief," whined Mike. "But if you're going out we ain't got a chance."

"I'm going out to get that cop," sneered Tony. "Keep your fire on that tree to distract his attention. I'll get him on the flank, and be prepared to watch out for my return." He rubbed his lean hands together. "I may have a prisoner."

Quietly Tony stole out of one of the back doors. There was a bluff behind the shack. Tony knew that a few stones or rocks rolled down the slope would smash the place to pieces. It was sure the police would think of that.

Very quietly he left the shack, and on hands and knees crawled towards the trees. It was a simple matter to reach cover without being seen by the patrolman, but not so easy to get close enough to shoot. Dry sticks would snap under one's feet, but the explosion of the guns helped Tony, and at last he was able to stand upright to peer round the bole of a tree.

Not ten yards away crouched Johnnie Allen, who from behind his tree was firing at the shack. Slowly and deliberately Tony raised his revolver and, taking careful aim, fired.

The gun dropped from Johnnie's right hand as the bullet smashed into his shoulder, but with fearless contempt of danger, and impervious to pain, he tried to recover his gun with his sound left hand.

"Leave it alone!" snarled Tony. "Unless you want to die!"

Johnnie Allen straightened, and he gazed angrily at the gangster. That he was wounded did not mean much, but it hurt Johnnie's dignity that he had been tricked by a crook. Useless and futile to disobey this order.

Tony picked up the revolver and stowed it away in his pocket, then with his own gun he pointed towards the shack.

"Now get going—make it quick. Hurry!"

Johnnie had no course but to obey. The shack door was flung open and out came two of the gang. Crash Donovan was in time to see Johnnie forced into the shack.

It gave Tony great joy to lock his prisoner's wrists with the officer's own handcuffs. They pushed him roughly on to a bench.

"What do we do next?" demanded Mike.

"Get the car!" rasped Tony. "The coast is now clear for a getaway before these cursed cops get back."

"Do we give him the works?"

"And get a stretch for murder?" Tony gave his man a contemptuous look. "But he'll make a fine hostage. Get the car."

Mike ran out. Crash! Crash! The driver came tearing back.

"The cops are back, chief!" he gasped.

Tony rushed to the window, and it seemed that the forest was alive with flickering lights.

"They've cut off the back road!" Tony's expression was fendish as he glowered at Johnnie. "I'll wipe the grin off your face. Take that chair away and put him at that window."

The crooks dragged Johnnie to his feet.

"Take it easy, will you?" cried Johnnie.

"Can't take it, eh?" sneered Tony, and pointed to the window. "I'm going to make you a block for that window. It'll be just too bad for you if some of your friends should fire at the windows."

"You murdering skunk!" sneered Johnnie contemptuously. "Getting me plugged won't help you any—except to the chair. You're corralled and haven't a chance. In fact your only chance is to surrender. If any cops are killed in this gun fight the whole of you will die, but if you surrender you may get off with a sentence."

The other crooks looked at their leader, but Tony knew that surrender would not save his skin, and his only possible chance was to try to fight his way out of here.

"Do as I ordered!" he rapped out to the men. "If the cops turn any spot lights on this place they'll see him, and we can use him as a shield. We aren't beaten yet."

A Chasm of Flame

CRASH DONOVAN was wondering what to do when Chief Tennyson appeared with a large body of police. He hastened to the tree, behind which Crash was taking cover.

"What's the set-up?"

"They're inside."

"Well, we'll have to blast them out," decided the chief, after studying the place carefully. "Too much open ground to try a rush, and I'm not losing good men on trying it. A few grenades will soon get these rats out into the open." He turned to an officer.

"Got those grenades?"

"Yes, sir. Fifty of them."

"All right," the chief nodded. "Throw them in."

"But, chief," Crash laid his hand on his superior's arm, "you can't do that—Johnnie's in there!"

"Then Johnnie'll have to duck."

"Not much chance of ducking!" cried Crash. "Those grenades will blow that shack to blazes."

The chief's face hardened.

"Tough situations like this arise in our job, Crash, and we've just got to do our duty. These men have got to be killed or captured. We've just got to get 'em, and we can't quit just because one of us happens to be their prisoner. And, believe me, Crash, Johnnie will understand."

"Well, I don't altogether agree," Crash said in his fierce, argumentative manner. "I agree this scum have to be killed or captured, but not without some effort being made to save Johnnie Allen. Moreover, chief—duty or not—you'd have to answer to your daughter if you made no attempt to rescue Johnnie. They're corralled in that shack, so what's the hurry?"

"That bunch will probably murder Allen out of revenge," the chief replied. "I've got the majority of my men on this job, and many districts have been denuded of their patrols, and so I want this job cleared up before daybreak. I know this type of criminal, Crash, and one reason why I suggested grenades was because I did think it gave Johnnie a slight chance. They won't expect grenades, and it'll take 'em by surprise. They may have him a prisoner in one of the rooms."

"Take a look at that window," Crash pointed as powerful lights were turned on the shack. "See that human form—that's Johnnie. The skunks are firing from behind him. If you use grenades they'll shoot Johnnie in the back. I've got an idea, chief."

"What is it?"

"See that hill?"

"You mean that high ground behind the shack?"

A telephone-bell rang, and he picked up the instrument on his desk. Dizzy was on the other end of the line, in the waiting-room of the St. Anne's Hospital, and the news he had to impart was not by any means reassuring.

"All right, Dizz," said Jake, and he put down the telephone and addressed the others. "Well—er—his heart's not so good. They won't know anything for a couple of hours. You may just as well get goin' and do whatever you have to do."

Lou was in the waiting-room at the hospital, and Dizzy went to her after he had hung up.

"I know it sounds stupid to say I'm sorry, Lou," he murmured, "but I am, really."

"I know you're sorry," she gulped. "Your kind always is when it's too late. I've no desire to hurt you, Dizzy—that won't help Tex—but I've got this to say to you, you're no good. You're no good, and you never have been!"

Dizzy went back to the airport thoroughly upset, and he told Jake he had a hunch Tex wouldn't recover.

"Well, stop thinking that way!" snapped Jake. "Anyway, it wasn't your fault that he crashed. When Tex took the run the show was all his."

"I'd give anything if I hadn't faked sick and sent him up there," said Dizzy miserably.

"Look here," said Jake. "there's a bottle in the locker—you'd better knock on it. You look as though you need it!"

Dizzy thanked him, helped himself to a stiff whisky, and went off with it into the pilots' room.

Joe Allen entered as Dizzy went out. The inspector had finished his interrupted inspection, and he said:

"You've got a clean bill, Jake."

"Well, I'm glad something's right around here!" Jake growled.

"Where's Davis?" asked the inspector.

"He's inside," Jake pointed to the pilots' room. "He's all broken up about Tex."

"And I've got another jolt to hand him," said Joe Allen regretfully. "Washington won't renew his pilot's licence."

"Why, they can't do that!" cried Jake. "He can't fly without a ticket!"

"That's just it! They don't want Davis to fly! I'm sorry, Jake, and I'd rather you tell him about it."

"D'you think that'd be easy for me?" "No," admitted the official; "but it might make it easier for Dizzy."

"Make what easier?" demanded a voice, and Dizzy walked out from the pilots' room. "Well, come on, tell me—tell me! What is it? Tex?"

"No, it's not Tex," said Jake, and bit his lip. "It's your licence. They're not going to renew it."

"Why?"

Jake looked at Joe Allen, and Joe Allen took from his pocket a message he had received by wire from Washington.

"Here's what they say." He read aloud: "The record of Pilot Davis, licence number three-seven-six, shows repeated violations of regulations as indicated by complaints filed at this office. You are hereby directed to lift the licence of this pilot and forward same to this office immediately."

"But it's all so unfair," raged Jake, "cancelling a man's licence without October 31st, 1936.

giving him a chance to state his own case."

"They make the decisions," said the inspector. "All I can do is carry them out. I'll—er—I'll have to have that ticket, Davis."

Dizzy dropped heavily into the chair Jake had deserted, and he took his licence from his breast-pocket.

"Sixteen years," he said, opening the little case and removing the precious slip of paper from it.

Joe Allen held out his hand for the slip, but Dizzy tore it to pieces and flung the pieces on the floor.

"Sorry," said the inspector—and walked straight out from the room, leaving Dizzy staring at the empty case.

"If only I could figure a way to get that licence back," said Jake, after a while. "Listen, if I did get it back, would you promise to stick to the rules and keep out of trouble?"

"What d'you want me to do—take up knitting?" growled Dizzy. "All right, I'll promise. But how're you gonna get it back?"

"Fred Adams wasn't kidding when he said he had a big drag in Washington," Jake replied. "He has a drag—a real one. He could get that licence approved in five minutes."

"And what d'you suppose he'd want for that?" scoffed Dizzy. "Do you think I'm gonna let you buy a lot o' second-rate stuff just to get my licence back? And what would you do after you bought it? You'd resign!"

"Well," growled Jake, "I'm gettin' tired o' fightin' Al Stone."

"After all the years you've spent tryin' to get somewhere! I'm not gonna let you take the rap for me!"

"I'm still running this air line!" "Well, then, run it right! Yeah, and cut out this silly sentimentality. Let the old-timers go. I wouldn't be missed, and neither would Tex. Flyers aren't pilots any more, they're engineers. This is a college man's game. Our work is done. Pioneering's over."

"Pioneering is not over. The de-icers are pioneering!"

The telephone-bell rang, and Jake answered the call.

"Federal Air Lines. Jake Lee speaking." His jaw dropped, and his voice changed. "Oh, no, it can't be!" He gripped Dizzy's shoulder with his free hand, and Dizzy knew—and bowed his head. "Okay! Okay!"

Buzz looked round, and Jake nodded slowly as he put down the telephone.

"You'd better tell the gang," he said hoarsely. "I'm goin' over to see Lou. Will you take over the duty, Dizz?"

"Yeah, Jake, I'd like to," Dizzy responded.

There was a board on the wall across the room on which metal tags hung from hooks—tags bearing the names of the pilots of the Federal Air Line. Jake took from it the tag that belonged to Texas Clarke and hung it on another board labelled "Last Flight."

Dizzy watched him in silence; Buzz went out to break the news to the others.

"You'd better cancel the night mail," said Jake, picking up his cap. "No use having any more trouble. Tell Lawson it's off."

"All right, Jake," said Dizzy.

Dizzy Makes Amends

AT eleven minutes past one the Cleveland operator reported, over the loudspeaker, that fog had changed to heavy sleet in his district; but Dizzy had not issued any orders, and out in the foggy flying field the mail plane for Cleveland was being tuned up for flight.

Tay Lawson stepped into the control-room, all ready to start, and found Dizzy alone in it, slumped in Jake's chair.

"I—I'm sorry about Tex, Davis," he said. "I know how you feel. Is Jake at the hospital?"

"Yeah," Dizzy replied. "He's over there with Lou."

"Did he leave any orders about the mail going out?"

Dizzy hesitated, then lied.

"Nope," he said.

"Well, I've got to get going."

Dizzy stood up.

"Ever been over the hill in weather as nasty as this?" he inquired.

"Few pilots have," Tay replied. "But Jake's been waiting months for weather like this to get the dope on those new de-icers."

"Well—er—listen, Lawson, tell me—how do those new de-icers work?"

Tay looked at his wrist-watch. "I'm sorry," he said, "but I haven't got time now."

"Oh, yes, you have!" retorted Dizzy sharply. "Those are orders! I'm in charge here! How do they work?"

"All right, I'll show you!" Tay went to a table and returned with a small model of an aeroplane to which a rubber tube was attached. "The de-icers are rubber, cemented along the leading edge of the wings. They divided into four compartments, running parallel along here, connected by tubes that control here, in the cockpit, and worked by a pulsator in the motor. The action is alternate—like this!"

He squeezed the bulb of the rubber tube, and all along the edges of the wings little rubber flaps rose and fell.

"That cracks and loosens the ice," he explained, "and it's carried away in the slip-string. Tunnel tests show that, so there's nothing left to do now, but fly under actual icing conditions."

He put the model back in its place and began to button his leather coat.

"Are you really in love with Tommy?" asked Dizzy abruptly.

"What's it to do with you if I am?" challenged Tay angrily. "Now, look here, Davis, I—"

"Aw, come on, kid, let's cut out this squabbling," interrupted Dizzy. "I like Tommy—I think she's a great kid. Take good care of her. I wish both of you all the luck in the world."

Tay gaped at him in surprise. "That's darn nice of you, Davis," he said, and turned to go.

"Lawson!"

Tay turned about, and he was totally unprepared for the blow that caught him on the point of the jaw. He went down like a log, completely knocked out, and Dizzy caught hold of him by the sleeve of his coat and dragged him along the floor into the pilots' room, where he dumped him in a chair and proceeded to gag him with his own handkerchief.

Sleet was beginning to beat down the fog that enveloped the flying field, and Dizzy was taking off into a wall of wet darkness, when Al Stone arrived at the airport in his car and burst into the control-room.

"Where's Jake Lee?" he demanded. "He's gone over to the hospital, Mr. Stone," Buzz replied.

"Is that the night mail going out?" "Yes, sir. Right on schedule."

"Oh! So Jake decided the weather was good enough?"

"I really don't know, sir. He doesn't discuss those things with me," said Buzz.

Dizzy was flying blind through sleet that became thicker every moment, and ice was beginning to form on his wings, when Jake returned from the hospital to find Al Stone striding up and down the control-room. He greeted the general manager in surprise, and Stone said grimly:

"I came over here at this time o' night because I didn't like your attitude on the 'phone this evening. Of course, I know you're tired and upset, but after all you've got to pay some attention to the opinion of the New York office!"

"I didn't know it had any!" retorted Jake.
 "Well, it has. And if we're gonna work together, you've gotta listen more reasonably. All your trouble comes from Dizzy Davis. I've warned you about him before, and you've talked me out of it. Now I'm gonna have it my way!"

"All right," said Jake wearily. "You can have it your way, but without me. Dizzy is through with Federal Air Lines, and so am I." He drew a long breath and added: "So is Texas Clarke."

"What are you talkin' about?" Al Stone dropped his bullying manner in dismay.

"Tex is dead. He died a little while ago!"
 "Well, that's too bad. I—I'm sorry to hear that." The general manager turned and stared out into the obscured field beyond the windows. "But that doesn't mean you have to leave, does it?"

"Aw, we can't get along, Al," said Jake. "I'd be happier some place else, and so would Dizzy. Incidentally, my last official act will be to recommend that you buy the Adams Bomber."

"Adams Bomber?" Stone swung round. "I thought you were stuck on a Browning Transport?"

"I was," said Jake.
 "Well—"

A voice from the loudspeaker silenced him and caused Jake to start.

"Dizzy Davis, in Six. to Newark," it said. "West leg of Newark range. Visibility zero. Temperature thirty. I'm beginning to take on ice. Building up on the leading edges. Gonna try the de-icers—see if they break it up. Will call you in a few minutes—give you the results."

"When did he take off?" rasped Jake.
 "Okay, Davies!" Buzz said into his microphone; and then, in answer to Jake's question: "He took the night mail."

"Took the night mail?" exploded Jake. "Why, he'll be covered with ice before he goes thirty miles!"

Doc Lawson walked in from the field, his overalls dripping with melted sleet, and Jake stalked over to him.

"Didn't you know the night mail was to be held?" he shouted.

"No, sir," was the reply. "Dizzy said he was taking Lawson's place."

"Well, he had no business takin' Lawson's place. And Lawson had no authority to switch with him!"

"I thought you were running this airport," interposed Al Stone with sarcasm.

"Well, why don't you let me run it, then?" Jake roared at him. "Buzz, tell him to turn back at once!"

Buzz called Dizzy and gave him the order, but Dizzy's voice replied quite jauntily:

"It looks worse behind than it does ahead. I'm goin' on!"

"Tell him he can't go on!" raged Jake. "I'm orderin' him back to Newark!"

Buzz did so—in official language—but Dizzy responded: "All right, Buzz, all right. Tell Jake to come to the mike."

Jake grabbed up a wireless telephone, and into it he said with fierce emotion:

"Listen, Dizz. You know you can't fly through that stuff. Turn back before you get into trouble!"

"Will you stop crabbing and lend an ear?" demanded the voice of Dizzy. "This is important. This is the dope on the de-icers. Stop barking, and take down some notes on what I'm gonna tell you!"

"Take it down, Buzz," said Jake, with a gesture of helplessness, and Buzz picked up a pencil and pulled a pad towards him.

"The pressure's got to be doubled," Dizzy's voice proceeded quite calmly, although ice was forming thick and fast upon his wings, and only a little of it was being jerked off the edges. "The rear tube has got to be moved back at least—oh, at least eight inches, so the ice won't form behind it. Then it'll work like a million bucks!"

There was a long pause which those who listened found agonising, then:

"Right now, the tubes are frozen fast. And listen, you've gotta put 'em on that? Got it? That's all I can tell you now, Jakey boy."

Jake spoke harshly into the wireless telephone.

"Listen, Dizz, I'm orderin' you back to Newark! No arguin', and no grand-standin'! Get over the field as soon as possible!"

Dizzy made no response to that command, but a loud banging was heard which seemed to come from the pilots' room.

"Open that door, Doc!" shouted Jake. "Go on, get her open!"

Dizzy had locked the door of the pilots' room, but the key was in the outside hole of the lock. Doc Wilson turned it, opened the door, and backed away in bewilderment as Tay Lawson tottered out with his hands bound behind his back and a handkerchief tied round his mouth and knotted behind his neck.

Jake hastened to unfasten the handkerchief: Doc Wilson freed Tay's wrists.

"Oh, I might have figured this!" Jake cried, and ran back to the wireless telephone. "Newark calling Davis in Six! Newark calling Davis in Six!" "Yeah, Jake?" Dizzy's voice was quite strong and clear from the loud-speaker, and there was no suggestion of fear in it. "It's getting very heavy now, Jake—ice all over. I've got the throttle wide open, but she's mushin' along at eighty-five and losin' altitude fast. Great weather for this test, boy!"

"Listen, Dizzy, this is Jake!" Jake howled frantically into the mouthpiece of the telephone he held. "Leave the ship! Use your parachute! Don't wait till she spins! Go over the side! Bail out! Hit the silk, d'you hear me?"

"No ear do, baby," said Dizzy's voice, and then Doc Wilson made a belated confession.

"Jake, when Dizzy got into the ship," he said, "he didn't wear his 'chute."

"What?" yelled Jake.

"His 'chute's inside," said Tay. "I saw it there!"

Jake knew, then, that the whole thing had been done deliberately.

"Dizzy, nurse her down!" he implored. "Land her on her wings so the crack-up will be easy! Do something! Do anything!"

Mary entered the control-room, worried because her husband had not come home; but she stopped short by the rail inside the double doors as Dizzy's voice rang out from the loudspeaker:

"I'm down to fifteen hundred feet on the beam. The ice looks a foot thick on the leading edge. It's getting very wishy now, and it—it won't respond to the controls. Oh! Oh, here I go, baby—just startin' to spin! Don't look for the crash to-night! Give my love to everybody, and don't be mad at me. I wish I could—"

In the uncanny silence that followed Mary began to sob. They all knew that somewhere Dizzy had spun downwards to his death. For long minutes they all stood staring at one another, then slowly Jake put down the telephone and turned to his wife.

"Run along, dear," he said. "I'll be home soon."

She stumbled out at the doors, and Al Stone drew a very long breath and asked:

"How do you feel about this, Jake? Are you gonna stay?"

"Well," said Jake, closing his eyes and opening them again with a sigh, "there's no use my going now. I've watched this line grow from nothing—I've watched men die to develop it, friends of mine. Yeah, I'm gonna stay. But how I run this line, and how pilots fly is my business. You go back to New York and dig your spurs into your desk. Lawson, did you hear what Dizzy said about those de-icers?"

"No, sir," replied Tay.

"Well, get the dope from Buzz. That's your next job—and, remember, a swell guy made it easy for you!"

"CRASH DONOVAN"

"Yes." Crash's voice had a determined ring. "A man could ride down it and be on them before they knew it."

"Only a miracle man."

"I'd like to try it. I've done more difficult stunts than that at the circus."

The chief shook his head doubtfully. "Why, they'd see you before you got near the house."

"Set fire to the brush. They won't see through the smoke. They'll just think we're trying to smoke 'em out."

"So your scheme is to fire the brush and ride through the flames and smoke towards the house." The chief looked admiringly at Crash. "And you dismount near a window, and—"

"Dismount nothing!" laughed Crash, contemptuous of danger. "I've crashed many a machine through a glass window. I'm going to get to that bluff and the flames should show me a window that looks easy. It's worth trying, Chief."

"All right, Crash, it's up to you." He turned to the grenade officer. "Better hand out a few grenades for use if this scheme fails. Get the brush fired as soon as Crash gives you the signal. When you see him coming down the hill, give 'em a burst of fire, and then rush 'em on all sides."

The officer at once detailed police to get into position on the hill, whilst two other men assisted Crash in getting his machine to a good place on the bluff. Crash found a place which looked to have a reasonable run-down without many trees or bushes. He had examined the ground and except for brush seemed to have few obstacles. A faint moon showed him a large window. The officer appeared to announce that everything was set.

"Then fire the brush," Crash decided. "I shan't start till there is a good blaze."

The crooks were busy firing from behind Johnnie's body and from the windows, when Mike rushed up to Tony and reported that all the hillside was blazing. The leader gazed at the flames, and shrugged his shoulders. It was a smoke screen.

"Boys, it may help us." Tony suddenly saw a chance. "Outside the back door there is a small stream with steep banks. When the flames and smoke are all round the police will try a rush, and we slip past them."

The brush burned rapidly and furiously. It was dry and it was fanned by a stiff breeze. Smoke and flames swept down on the house below. Crash Donovan tensed himself for the most daring ride of his life. Now was the moment.

The police hidden on the hill heard the roar of his machine above the crackle of the flames. They saw a cycle and rider tearing down the bluff at a mad pace and they saw it dive through the flames. They opened fire on the house and then charged.

Grimly Crash gripped his handbars. Often the machine had both wheels off the ground, but his balance was so perfect that bumps, holes and undergrowth seemed to make no difference. The flames were a red inferno, but his speed was so great that it carried him through them before they could do any harm.

He switched on his headlight, and it showed him a small strip of lawn, a sunken stream, and then a porch with French windows. The stream would have unscathed most riders, but Crash seemed to give a jerk with the handlebars and the machine sailed over a ten-foot gap as if flying. A step had to be jumped and then the machine hurtled through the French windows.

Instinctively Crash applied the brakes, and the machine skidded on the rough wood.

Tony and his crooks turned at sound of that tremendous smash, and their eyes opened wide to see that it was a rider on a machine who had come hurtling through the windows.

Crash was on his feet and out from his holsters came two guns.

The police burst in to find Crash holding up a number of covered wretches.

Crash pouched his guns and hastened across to Johnnie, and began to cut his bonds.

"You okay?"

"Sure," chuckled Johnnie. "But what kept you so long?"

Chief Tennyson came up and grinned his approval.

"Good work, Crash."

"Thanks, Chief."

"You, too, Johnnie." He gave the lad, who loved his daughter, a friendly nod.

The discomfited crooks were led away in handcuffs.

Always be Tops

THE bullet was lodged in the shoulder and Johnnie had to undergo an operation before it could be extracted. It was touch and go whether the arm would be saved, but a sound constitution pulled him through. Three weeks after the affray the doctor announced that he could leave the University Hospital.

It was Crash Donovan who packed his belongings, and fussed around him. Alabam, whose shoulder was still bound up and had to stay in hospital for another month, hovered around. Then Doris appeared. Johnnie was going to spend a month's sick leave at the Chief's house.

"I don't know what to say." She looked at Crash. "But, well, you know how grateful I am, don't you?"

"Don't try to say it." Crash bent his head and Doris kissed him. "Ah, that's better."

And Johnnie grinned approvingly, but when the two young people had gone Crash became very taciturn.

"You know, Crash—love's kind of a wonderful thing." Alabam had been doing all the talking, so he had not observed his companion's pre-occupation.

"Alabam—a man's a sucker to play a game he's not tops."

"Meaning what?"

"Love." Alabam became gloomy.

"Yes, that's one game I always lose at."

"Pretty tough losing at anything." Crash straightened his shoulders. "But there's one place I don't lose—one place that I'm champion."

A month later one might have heard a barker at a big circus proclaiming to a huge crowd that "Crash Donovan, world famous daredevil, and master of the motorcycle, would now attempt his death-defying leap through a chasm of fire."

"Once a carnie, always a carnie." Crash had said, but that wasn't why he had left the police force.

"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

and townsmen alike who had developed an interest in polo.

Perhaps the keenest player amongst the academy's list of patrons was Frank Bradley, a handsome young fellow in the twenties, with the physique of an athlete and the clean-cut features of a typical Anglo-Saxon. And early in the afternoon of that day on which Rex had taken to the hills, Frank Bradley might have been seen at the edge of the polo ground talking to Mr. Bruce, owner of the establishment, and the latter's attractive daughter, Dorothy.

They were discussing the prospects of a game which had been arranged for that afternoon, and it was while they were on this subject that a man known as Jensen hove into sight.

He was a stable-hand and something of a character, and, on perceiving him, Frank Bradley nodded genially. Then, suddenly noticing a dog which was trotting at Jensen's side, the young polo enthusiast spoke in an appraising tone. "Say, that's a nice pal you've got with you," he remarked. "Where did you buy him, Jensen?"

The stable-hand grinned, and stooped to caress his four-footed companion, a magnificent police dog with upright ears that spelled alertness and a pair of soft brown eyes which told of an affectionate nature, though there was something in them to suggest that it might go hard with anyone whom he had cause to dislike.

"I didn't buy this dog, Mr. Bradley," said Jensen. "He's a stray. Wandered in here a couple days ago, and I've been feedin' him ever since. He seemed to take a likin' to me right from the start. I call him Rinty, and I think he's gettin' to know his name already. Believe me, he has a lot more sense than some human beings I know."

The stable-hand passed on with his new-found friend, and Frank Bradley forgot the dog which had been introduced to him as Rinty. Yet in less than half an hour the wolfhound was again brought to his notice—this time during the polo match that had been scheduled to take place.

The fixture had been organised by Frank and Crawford, who had each raised a team for the event, and it was while the first chukker was in full swing that a canine form streaked unexpectedly on to the field of play and raced straight for the ball.

Crawford was galloping for that ball to strike at it with his mallet and send it towards the Bradley goal, but Rinty beat him to it, and provided a few minutes' diversion by having round the pitch with it.

It was an incident that thoroughly amused the majority of the players on both sides, Frank included. But it did not amuse Crawford, whose face wore an ugly expression as he rode across to Jensen, after the latter had succeeded in calling Rinty to the touch-line and forcing the dog to drop the ball from his mouth.

"What's that cursed wolfhound doing here?" the raucher blazed.

"I'm—I'm sorry, Mr. Crawford, sir," the stable-hand faltered. "I—I was watchin' the game with him, an' never dreamed he'd rush on to the field like that. It won't—won't happen again, sir."

Crawford eyed man and dog savagely. "You bet it won't," he rasped. "Do you realise that cur probably robbed me of a score? Now get him out of here before I break his skull with this mallet!"

Taking Rinty along with him, Jensen made himself scarce and the game was restarted. But, though it was played at high pressure, there was never any doubt as to which was the superior team, and Crawford and his colleagues came off that field a well-beaten side.

From the pitch Crawford strode in the direction of the car park, to reach which he had to go round by the stables, and it was as he was turning a corner that the dog known as Rinty scampered into view and dashed between his legs.

Immediately after it came Jensen, who had been romping with the wolfhound, and it must have been the stable-hand's unlucky day, for he bumped full-tilt into the big rancher.

Now Crawford was in a particularly unpleasant mood. In the first place he was still brooding over the loss of the good horse Rex. Secondly, he was a bad sportsman and was ranking under the defeat that had been inflicted on his team—a defeat for which Frank Bradley had been largely responsible as Number 3 man on the other side.

"Confound you!" shouted Crawford, gripping Jensen by the collar. "Why don't you look where you're going?"

He accompanied the words with a blow of his fist, and it was a blow that was seen by Rinty. In another moment the dog was hurling himself upon the rancher to defend the stable-hand who had won his friendship, and as the animal leapt to the attack those soft brown eyes of his were no longer mild in their expression, but burning with a primitive fury.

Snarling, with fangs bared for action, he must have inflicted severe injuries on Crawford if Jensen had not recovered himself and intervened. As it was, the rancher experienced nothing more serious than a pretty bad fright, which was succeeded by an outburst of rage when he saw that Jensen had obtained a secure hold on Rinty and was quietening him down.

"Listen!" he bit out. "Get rid of that wolfhound, Jensen! D'you hear me? Get rid of it! For if I ever set eyes on it around here again I'll have the brute shot!"

Crawford was not in the habit of making idle threats, and, knowing that full well, Jensen drove Rinty away from the neighbourhood of the Bruce Academy some five minutes later. It well-nigh broke his heart to do it, especially as the dog was reluctant to go, but the stable-hand was determined to send him forth homeless again rather than see him butchered, and thus his four-footed friend became a stray once more.

Out into the open country wandered Rinty, for experience had told him that cities were not always kind to a waif, and late in the afternoon of that same day he was drifting at random through the quiet hills.

The sun was beginning to set when, entering a narrow canyon, Rinty spotted a dark, yawning cavern in the right-hand wall of the ravine. It was the tunnel of an abandoned mine, but the dog knew nothing of the gold-reefs which had once been discovered in this section of country and which had long since "petered out." He only knew that strange sounds were issuing from that cavern, and, with his curiosity aroused, he trotted inquisitively in the direction of it.

He passed into the tunnel, and had moved twenty or thirty yards along it when he saw a black stallion plunging and rearing ahead of him, a stallion which had apparently roamed into the mine and snared himself in some coils of rope lying on the floor of the gallery.

The stallion was Rex, god horse of Sujan, and in his efforts to free himself he had only entangled his forefeet more securely in the rope, which was fastened to one of the timber props that supported the roof of the mine.

Rinty drew closer and for the space of several seconds he watched the stallion's frenzied, but useless, attempts to regain his liberty. Then, as the horse desisted for a brief interval, the wolfhound padded still nearer to him, and sniffed at the hemp coils which had imprisoned his front legs.

Presently, Rinty began to see if his sharp canine teeth could make any impression on the snare, but he had to give up, for soon the stallion resumed his desperate struggles, and in order to avoid a kick from his hoofs the dog was forced to scuttle out of reach.

From a safe distance he again watched the antics of the black Arabian. After a moment or two, however, he suddenly turned and ran out of the mine, then sped from the canyon and as if by instinct dashed along the trail by which he had come.

It was a trail that would eventually bring him back to the Bruce Academy, and perhaps it was natural that Rinty should make for that establishment, where he had seen so many creatures similar to the trapped stallion in the mine. Yet before the dog had travelled a couple of miles he heard someone call him by the name that Jensen had given him, and, halting, he observed a girl approaching him on horseback from a cleft in the hills.

The girl was Dorothy Bruce, blonde, blue-eyed and pretty as a picture, and she had been enjoying a canter through the mountain country when she had caught sight of the wolfhound.

"Why, Rinty!" she exclaimed, pulling up within a few paces of the dog. "What are you doing here?"

Every line of Rinty's splendid body seemed to betray agitation. Wheeling, he darted back along the trail for a short distance—stopped—returned—then set off again; and by the time he had repeated this performance two or three times it had dawned on Dorothy Bruce that he was trying to persuade her to follow him.

The moment this conviction had taken a grip on her mind she gave her pony the spur and rode after the dog, who promptly raced for the mine as hard as he could go. But, though it was Rinty's intention to lead her to the scene of a dumb animal's plight, fate decreed otherwise, for a jack-rabbit's scrape in the path of Dorothy's horse caused the girl to stumble, and in an instant the girl was thrown heavily to the trail.

She lay where she had fallen, and, unaware of the accident she had sustained, Rinty held on at top pace until he reached the canyon in which the mine was situated. Then, even as he swung into the ravine, he saw four men ahead of him.

They were strangers to Rinty, but, if the dog had been acquainted with any of Crawford's employees, he would have recognised them as Jones, Mitchell, Martin and a fellow known as Anderson.

They were riding towards the cavern in which Rex was trapped, and Jones was talking in an animated voice.

"Here's where I spotted that black Arabian," he was saying to his comrades. "He went into that abandoned mine, like I told you, but I was scared to tackle him alone. Maybe he's still there, an' even if he ain't there's always a chance he'll come back."

"He's there all right," jerked Mitchell all at once. "Listen!"

The four men drew rein, and, pausing, they distinctly heard the stallion whinnying—heard, too, the stamping of hoofs somewhere within the dark interior of the mine. They did not know, however, that their prize was trapped in that gloomy cavern, and after unlatching their lariats and dismounting from their broncs they sneaked up to the tunnel-entrance with exaggerated caution.

"Hold it, boys," said Jones, as they gained the mouth of the cave. "We'd better not go in there. You know what that devil is. Our best plan is to get him in the open so we can throw our ropes on him. How about smokin' him out?"

It was a suggestion that met with approval, and a mass of dry thicket near the main entrance was set alight, the wind carrying the smoke of the conflagration directly into the cavern.

Meanwhile, Rinty had been watching the activities of the four men, and now he seemed to realise that they were up to some mischief, for suddenly he dashed straight across to them and started to bark at them loudly.

"Get outa here!" snapped Mitchell, aiming a kick at the dog.

He could not have adopted a worse method of dealing with Rinty, for with his spirit aroused the wolfhound sprang at him, and buffeting him solidly in the chest, knocked him flying to the ground.

Rinty fell atop of him, and the dog's gleaming teeth were at the man's throat in another instant. Only by clutching the thick fur around the wolfhound's neck did Mitchell save himself from deadly injury, and as it was he was badly bitten about the wrists before Jones came to his rescue and clubbed the senses out of the dog with the butt of a gun.

Paunting, Mitchell rose to his feet and spurred the huddled body of his attacker viciously. Then he turned towards the entrance of the cave with Jones and the other two men.

Smoke was pouring into the tunnel, and out of the darkness of the interior there came the sound of Rex whinnying and stamping frantically.

"That stallion can sure take punishment," Martin gasped. "But he's bound to make a rush for the open soon. Be ready to lasso him, fellers."

Even as the words were spoken there was a sharp splintering of wood, and to the dismay of Crawford's hirelings it was followed by a thunder of falling earth and rock. Inside the mine, the desperate struggles of the god horse Rex had torn down the prop to which he was fastened, and a section of the roof had caved in disastrously!

"BENGAL TIGER"

The wild-animal trainer had no fear of Satan, the fiercest man-eating tiger in captivity, but the creature hated its master and longed to tear the big man to pieces with rendering claws and fangs. A thrilling drama of the circus, starring Barton MacLane

Satan Escapes

THE "Hinsdale-Clark Combined Circus and Wild-animal Show" was packed with spectators. All were tensely watching Cliff Ballenger's animal act.

Cliff Ballenger was an aggressive, dynamic man of forty, radiating self-confidence and mastery over the beasts. He wore a khaki uniform and a pith helmet to give the impression of being a big-game hunter.

A small, elderly man was his assistant. Carl Homan always had a dread that something would go wrong, and he watched with bated breath as Cliff made a huge lion obey his commands. The part that the assistant feared most of all was the act with Satan, the man-eating tiger. A venomous, snarling eat that glared hatred at his master. Amidst thunders of applause the act came to an end, and after bowing to the audience Cliff and his assistant went out of the arena.

"Nice going, Cliff!" cried Carl. "You had them cats eating out of your hand."

"And why not?" shouted Cliff true-ly. "I've got 'em where I want 'em."

The two men paused as the ringmaster loudly announced: "Joe Larson, world's greatest aerialist, with the De Largos, aristocrats of the flying trapeze, in their death-defying act."

Cliff pointed to the figure perched on a trapeze.

"Get a load of that crazy lug, Joe Larson," he muttered admiringly. "That takes nerve. They couldn't hire me to risk my neck like that."

As they came out of the big tent to go to their quarters they had to pass the cage that housed Satan, the wildest tiger in captivity. The creature was quietly, disdainfully peering through the bars, but at sight of the animal trainer Satan sprang to his feet, bared his fangs and roared terribly.

Cliff roared with laughter, grabbed up a pole and made a pass at the tiger, who thrust a paw through the bars, scratching and roaring.

"That pussy sure loves you, Cliff."

The anger of the tiger seemed to infuriate Cliff, who gave the animal a violent dig with the pole.

"Think you can bluff Cliff Ballenger?" he bellowed. "Think you're a man-eater. Well, you're nothing but an alley eat to me."

"Why don't you lay off that killer?"

"They say nobody in show business can work Satan," Cliff gave a sardonic grin. "Well, I'll work him, and he'll like it."

Carl shuddered.

"I hope you're right."

The tiger flung himself vainly against the bars as the two men turned their backs and walked away.

In the sleeping quarters Cliff began to drag off his uniform.

"Why don't you change your mind and come into town with me and Joe?"

Carl smiled and shook his head.

"No, thanks—think I'll hit the hay."

"We've had a good week. Why not come with us—we're going places."

"Can't afford it, Cliff."

Cliff clapped a hand on the smaller man's shoulder.

"It won't cost you a dime." His voice was gruff.

"Nope—when I play I pay—and I got something better to do with my few bucks."

"That daughter, eh?" Cliff gave his assistant a knowing glance. "How's she getting along?"

"Better—left the hospital yesterday."

Carl took out a letter. "She is on her way to Los Angeles by now. The sun'll fix her up—she's gonna keep house for me when we get to winter quarters. Had this letter this morning—she sent her picture."

"Say," Cliff Ballenger's eyes opened wide. "She's a good-looker. She don't look much like her old man."

"No—she favours her mother." Carl's smile was sad.

"Hey, Cliff! Snap into it—I'm thirsty!" a voice cried. It was Joe Larson. He was a good-looking, husky young fellow. "Never known anybody like you two for jabbering."

"Better wrap up warm." Old Carl loved to mother the man he admired. "Looks like a storm."

"Water outside won't do us any harm," chuckled Cliff.

It was blowing a gale when the two men set out for the centre of the town. They were going to make it a night out, and within the hour both men were very merry. They had found hectic company at a saloon, and they were attempting to finish up the stock. Meantime the gale had increased to a hurricane, and several of the tents where the circus was pitched had collapsed.

The storm increased in fury and drove the animals into a wild panic. A huge pole that supported the main tent snapped and crashed down on the tiger's cage.

The bars were stove in and Satan managed to escape. It was Carl who saw the big cat leap a hedge and disappear down a street. The little man clutched at his heart as he heard a wild scream of fear.

Carl ran towards the town to try to find Cliff. At last he came to the saloon where the two men were making merry. Joe was at the bar, and swaying drunkenly.

"Hollo, Carl, have a drink?"

"Where's Cliff?"

"What's up?"

"The tiger's loose! Uptown!"

That sobered Joe Larson like a pail of water. He pushed the people away and grabbed Carl's arm. Sprawled across a table was Cliff Ballenger.

"Satan's broken out!" Carl cried.

But Cliff only grunted, and fell out of his chair to the floor. They got him back, they shook him and yelled at him, but the big head just waggled about and the eyes gave a glassy stare.

"He's out!" cried Joe.

A man rushed into the saloon, shouting that a tiger was loose in town, had mauled a young fellow and had gone to ground in the basement of a butcher's shop.

"Cliff—Cliff—it's the tiger—wake up!" bellowed Joe; but Cliff only groaned.

Carl touched Joe on the arm.

"Okay, I'll take care of it!"

Joe did not realize for a moment what the little man meant, then he realised that Carl was carrying a long whip. He shook the drunken man with desperate frenzy.

"Cliff—Carl's gone after that tiger—he'll be killed!"

Cliff Ballenger's eyes opened.

"The tiger's loose!" Joe yelled.

"Carl's gone after him."

The light of intelligence came back to the big man's face, and he swayed to his feet.

"Satan loose," he muttered thickly, "where?"

"Uptown—and Carl's gone after him."

"Carl!" cried Cliff. "Why, that cat'll tear him to pieces!" He flung the table away. "C'mon!"

Swaying drunkenly, Cliff Ballenger reached the door, but the cool air and the rain seemed to sober him at once, and, guided by a man who knew where the butcher's shop was situated, he began to run.

There was quite a crowd outside the butcher's shop. Hinsdale, who owned the circus, was there and so were the police—the latter armed with guns and very scared. An ambulance clanked its way to the scene and took away a man who had been clawed by the beast.

"That tiger's a menace!" cried Hinsdale, who was a kindly man. "I want that tiger killed."

"You can't do that, sir!" shouted old Carl. "Cliff'll never forgive you if you kill that cat."

"Who's running this circus," flared the owner, "me or Cliff?"

"Let me try to get him!" pleaded Carl. "I'll take a gun—you can set the gillie cage at the door. I got a whip, and when the tiger—"

"Carl!" It was a bellow, and Cliff Ballenger hurled himself through the crowd.

"Say, it's about time—" began Hinsdale.

"Don't bother me!" Cliff pushed the owner to one side. "Gimme that." He snatched the whip from Carl.

"But, Cliff—you're drunk," Carl had the courage to say.

"Drunk or sober, I'm the only man alive that can handle that cat," Cliff muttered fiercely. He saw Joe snatch a gun from an attendant and grinned.

"Good for you, Joe. But be careful, I want that cat alive, see?"

"Okay!" grumbled Joe, who would have died rather than admit he was scared. "Let's go!"

A trap cover was raised to reveal steps down. Without hesitation, Cliff Ballenger went down the steps into the cellar. Joe followed.

The butcher's underground store was littered with boxes and odds and ends. For some while they could not see Satan, who had seen them all right, and was lurking in hiding.

"Look out!" Cliff shouted a warning as the tiger made a spring from behind a packing-case at Joe's back. The whip slashed across the creature's face and broke the spring. Joe was glad to get behind the animal trainer.

"Get back, there!" raged Cliff. "Back, Satan!" Unmercifully he began to ply the whip with all the strength of his mighty arm.

Time and again Satan tried to charge, but the whip and the man's gleaming eyes daunted the beast.

"Don't shoot!" Cliff shouted over his shoulder. "I got this kitten licked!"

The tiger roared and then slunk away, snarling furiously. Cliff drove Satan towards some stairs, and with tail between his legs the wild cat retreated before his master. A cut of the whip made Satan scream with pain, and turn, but that whip checked him. A moment later he was safe in the gillie cage.

"Man-eater, eh?" roared Cliff. "Untamable. Haw, haw, haw!"

"Good work, Cliff!" Hinsdale cried, when the two men appeared. "But I'm through with Satan—he's for sale!"

Cliff Ballenger shoved his big face within about two inches of the owner's florid features. "You sell that cat and I quit!"

"What?" gasped Hinsdale.

Joe Larson took the owner's arm.

"You wouldn't take Junior's kitten away from him, would you?"

Hinsdale had to laugh.

"Guess both you guys are nuts. But if this ever happens again, Cliff, I'll have that beast destroyed!"

Cliff Ballenger linked up with Joe.

"I'm as dry as the desert after all that." He was wet enough outwardly. "Let's celebrate—c'mon."

They went back to the saloon, and very soon Cliff was if anything in a worse state than he was before. They stayed there until they were forcibly ejected in the small hours of the morning. Arm-in-arm, singing raucously, they staggered back to the circus.

Satan's Chance

THE cool air had a sobering effect on the star performers of the circus, but they were still in a very merry mood when they got back to their quarters. They were so happy they had to sing and tell everybody the good news, but unfortunately the world, especially those asleep at the circus, was not a bit pleased.

"Pipe down!" raged one angry man.

"We're trying to sleep!" yelled another.

Whereupon the two regarded each other and made husky sounds, which were supposed to be indications for each to be silent. Their shushing was almost as loud as their singing. At last they reached the caravan that Cliff shared with Carl Homan.

"G'night!" muttered Joe.

The two men solemnly shook hands, then Joe entered one caravan and Cliff the next. After much fumbling the big man found the light and switched it on.

"Hey, Carl, you asleep?" he cried hoarsely.

"Who could sleep with you barging all over the place?" came the weary voice of his assistant. "Thank goodness this don't happen more than once a week."

Cliff Ballenger made the huge lion obey his commands.

Carl climbed down from his bunk, and propped led to help the animal-trainer off with his coat.

"Good old Carl!" Cliff lurched. "What'd I do without you?"

"Listen, Cliff, you got a matinee—it's now four in the morning—you're a mug—"

"Gimme two hours' sleep," fiercely interrupted Cliff, "and I'll be fresh as a daisy."

"That's what you think." Carl shook his head. "But I've been in the racket a long time—longer than you have—I've seen plenty of guys crack up."

The other laughed contemptuously.

"Well, you'll never see me crack up."

"Listen, Cliff," Carl argued. "The cats are smarter than you think—they know when a guy's got the jitters. You can't fool 'em."

"I don't have to fool 'em!" Cliff scowled. "They know who's boss, hooze or no hooze. I done all right to-night, didn't I?"

"Yeah—you done fine—but in a cage it's different."

"What's different about it?" argued Cliff in his belligerent, stubborn manner.

"Let's not argue—go to bed, Cliff!"

"You think I'm afraid to go in a cage with him?"

"Oh, go to bed!" Carl cried wearily.

"Not till I've shown you something," Cliff pushed the little man away, and from the wall grabbed down his whip.

"And that darned eat."

Carl Homan shouted to Cliff not to be a fool, but the big fellow had gone. Quickly Carl put on his pants and hastened out of the caravan.

Cliff reached the big tent, switched on the lights and staggered towards the arena. Satan was housed in a small cage that had a chute leading to the iron-barred arena. The tiger snarled and roared at sight of him, and Cliff slashed at the creature with his whip. He drove the tiger into the chute down into the arena.

"Blasted cat, I'll show you!" raged Cliff, who seemed beside himself with rage. "So you're different in a cage, eh? Well, we'll see." He started to open the door of the arena.

"Cliff!" Carl rushed up and seized his arm.

"Wassa matter?"

"You can't go in there!"

It was like a red rag to a bull. He would show Carl he wasn't scared. A wrench and the door was open, and next moment Cliff Ballenger was in the arena.

"Get back there, tom-cat!" He cracked the whip savagely. "Lucky you know who's boss here."

Carl Homan watched in an agony of suspense as Ballenger drove the tiger round the ring, but Cliff would not finish. He was still in a drunken rage, and he was going to show Carl Homan he could scare this cat so that it cringed in fear. Carl's pleas for him to stop it and come out of the cage only incensed Cliff all the more.

The cat, finally cornered and utterly desperate, finally sprang from the corner at his enemy. Cliff, surprised, took a backward step, slipped and fell. The cat overjumped him, whistled like a flash, and as Cliff staggered to his feet leaped again. As man and beast rolled to the ground Carl Homan stared in horror. Fearlessly he picked up a chair and opened the arena door.

The tiger was raking Cliff with his claws, as Carl crashed the chair down on the great cat.

Satan whirled away from the drunken Ballenger and sprang at his new aggressor, and Carl backed away keeping the chair up. The tiger had been enraged to the point of madness and sprang suddenly, hurling Carl and the chair to the floor.

The bloody Cliff got unsteadily to his feet. He was still clutching his whip, but he was bemused. A shrill scream of agony startled him, and he spun round to see the tiger on top of Carl, mauling and clawing.

In a fury Cliff leaped forward and lashed out with his whip, but Satan had tasted blood and would not leave his victim. Cliff flung away his whip, and with his bare hands grappled the tiger, desperately wrestling the cat away from Carl.

Over and over on the floor rolled Cliff and the tiger, but the man had fingers of steel.

By this time the whole circus was awake. Hinsdale, Joe Larson, and a number of the artists appeared on the scene. It was Hinsdale and Larson who entered the arena and dragged out the limp figure of Carl Homan. Then attendants with prongs and poles rushed in to get the tiger away from Cliff.

An ambulance took the two men to hospital. Both men were swathed in bandages, but though Cliff was conscious there seemed no movement from the figure on the other stretcher.

"Carl!" hoarsely whispered Cliff.

"Shhh!"

The ambulance orderly shook his head.

"Is he all right?" Cliff asked.

"No."

Stunned, Cliff stared at the bandaged figure of his assistant, and as he watched Carl's lips began to move.

"Laura—my child—"

The bandaged hands went out in a pleading sort of gesture, then flopped. The head rolled limply.

"He's dead," whispered the orderly.

"And I killed him!" sobbed Cliff. "I killed him!"

"Take it easy."

The orderly pushed him back.

All the way to the hospital Cliff Ballenger lay on his back. Of his own wounds he had no interest. Whether he lived or died meant nothing to him.

"I killed him!" he muttered, and lapsed into merciful oblivion.

She Stole to Live

CLIFF BALLENGER hobbled down the corridor of the hospital with the aid of crutches. His face showed the marks of the scars made by Satan's claws, and his right leg had had to be amputated above the knee, but in spite of all this Cliff looked cheerful. He knocked on the door of the superintendent's room and was told to enter.

"Well, Mr. Ballenger, so you're leaving us?" smiled the kindly superintendent.

"That's right. Just thought I'd drop in to thank you people for the swell care you gave me."

"You had a close call, but I think you're going to be all right." He picked up a buff envelope. "By the way, this telegram has just come for you."

"Thanks." Cliff opened it, and then grinned in a shame-faced manner. "Would you mind reading it for me? I don't read so good."

He had never been taught to read or write. He had been brought up in the slums, deserted by his parents at an early age, and become a circus run-around at twelve.

The superintendent took the telegram.

"Los Angeles, March 25th.

"Cliff Ballenger, General Hospital, White Plains, Ohio.

Congratulations on your recovery.

Hope you will rejoin us winter quarters. We open April 2nd. Will work something out for you. Entire show joins me in wishing you good luck.

"BILL HINSDALE."

"That's my boss." Cliff blinked his eyes. Grand to get a message like this. He pointed to his leg. "I suppose a guy with one gammy leg could sweep out cages."

"Oh, I'm sure they'll find a better job for you than that, Mr. Ballenger!"

"Well, right now I got something more important to worry about—Carl Homan's kid. She's dropped out-a sight, and so I'm hopping out to Los Angeles to make a personal search." He held out his large hand. "Thanks for all you've done."

"Good luck." The superintendent tried not to wince under that mighty grip. "I hope you find her."

It took Cliff a three-day search before he traced her.

In a prison cell sat a good-looking young woman whose face was filled with brooding bitterness. A clanking of keys, and she looked up wearily to see the matron. The door opened.

"A visitor to see you."

Cliff Ballenger hobbled into the cell, and the door was closed.

"A friend of your father's," called the matron. "You can have ten minutes."

"Miss Homan—Laura?"

"Yes."

Cliff looked down.

"I'm—I was a friend of your father's." He glanced at her now. "Maybe he's spoken of me—Cliff Ballenger."

"Oh, yes, Mr. Ballenger!" A slight spark of interest showed in the dull, lifeless expression of her pale face.

"I sure had a tough job finding you."

Her smile was twisted.

"I don't wonder. How did you—"

"I went to the cops," he admitted. "They told me. You've had a tough time, kid. What happened?"

She sat down on a hard bench and made a place for him at her side.

"Well, the day I arrived in Los Angeles I got the telegram about father—it sort of knocked the props from under me. I'd been sick, and I didn't have any money. Mr. Hinsdale sent me father's things and a month's salary, but I couldn't work yet, and when I could I couldn't find a job. Then the money gave out."

"You should have let us know."

"I didn't know any of you, and the show was on tour. I did try hard about that job, but I had no decent clothes."

Her voice became faint. "Soon I was starving, and one day I took some—"

She looked at him in misery. "You see, I'm just a common thief."

"Forget it—you were in a spot,"

A mocking laugh.

"And now I'm in a worse one." She looked at the small cell window. "I've got thirty days more here—a gaolbird."

"Listen, thirty days ain't for ever." He patted her hands. "There's afterwards—your dad's insurance money will get you started."

"He didn't carry any insurance."

"Of course he did." He tried to make his voice hearty. "I was his insurance company. Every time he had a few bucks extra he'd turn it over to me to keep for you in case anything ever happened—it was that kind of an insurance."

Her eyes were misty.

"Mr. Ballenger, you're lying. You're trying to be kind. I appreciate it, but I can't let you do it. I don't mean anything to you."

"Carl meant a lot to me," Cliff told her, "and if he hadn't tried to pull that cat off me he'd be here to-day instead of me. I guess if anybody in this world has got a right to do something for Carl Homan's kid, it's me. You've got to have some dough when you get outa here. You need sunshine and fresh air, and I'm gonna see you get it. It's little enough to do for a guy that saved my life—and lost his own. It's—” He tilted up her chin so she could look at him through tear-filled eyes. “Please, don't you see it's the only way I can sort of square things? I'm to blame for what happened to Carl.”

“I'm sure he wouldn't have blamed you, and—I don't want charity, Mr. Ballenger.”

“What do you mean, charity?” Cliff changed to his old, truculent manner. “You've got a few breaks coming. I've got plenty of money, Laura, and you're gonna have some of it.”

“I guess I'll have to take it.” She looked wondrously beautiful to Cliff when she smiled. “Coming from you—it won't be so hard.”

“Say, I'm glad you said that.” He grinned like a delighted child. “It sorta makes me feel good.”

“How do you think it makes me feel—the girl dabbed at her eyes—“to have someone—a friend?”

“Everything is going to be jake,” he assured her. “You've had a rotten deal, and I—well, I ain't had any piecies these last three months since that cat clawed me. In a way you might say we was kinda in the same boat, but it's gonna be different from now on. Now here's the angle. The show's here—in winter quarters. I haven't even been near it yet, on account of wanting to find you first. But they got a job waiting for me, and I'm gonna take it, and get ready to go out with 'em next month. I'll come to see you every visitors' day, bring you things, so you keep your spirit up, because when you get outa here it's gonna be a new deal all round.”

“Sorry—time's up.”

It was the matron.

Laura helped him to his feet.

“Okay, good-bye, Laura!” He laughed happily. “I'll be seeing you.”

“Good-bye, Cliff.” She gripped his hand. “I've got something to look forward to now.”

Cliff winked and waved his hand, and hobbled away.

Satan's Master

SOME days later Cliff Ballenger went to certain railway sidings where the circus train had been shunted. During the winter the circus folk lived in the train or in tents, training and working for the summer season. Cliff smiled as he saw the huge board proclaiming: “WINTER QUARTERS, CLARK AND HINSDALE COMBINED SHOWS.”

It was like coming back to home. Cliff stood there and watched acrobats doing their jumps, jugglers manipulating clubs, clowns fooling around, and a girl doing bare-back riding. He hobbled into a huge tent, and, staring upwards, watched Joe Larson and the De Largos trying out a new trapeze act.

Cliff no longer used crutches. He had a peg-leg fitted to his stump, and with the aid of a cane he could move quite fast. When the act was finished he applauded lustily.

“Hey, Joe!”

“Cliff!” It was Joe's glad cry. “Be right with you.”

“Howdy, kid?”

chuckled Cliff, when the slim figure in tights had reached the earth.

“Cliff, you old son-of-a-gun!” Joe flung an arm around his old friend. “It's sure swell to see you.”

“It's swell to be back.”

Joe stood away and studied him.

“You look great.”

“How do you like my new leg?” Cliff raised his peg. “Just got it.”

“Why, you're as good as new.”

“Sure I am,” grinned Cliff. “I'm itching for another shot at those cats. Think I could work 'em with one pin?”

Joe's hesitation was but momentary.

“Say, you could put those cats over the jumps in a wheel chair. C'mon, let's go and roust Bill out.”

“Just the guy I wanna see,” answered Cliff.

Hinsdale was in his office, and when Cliff and Joe entered motioned them to seats. On the floor lay a squirming figure.

“But I'm only asking five more bucks, Bill,” said the figure.

“A new clown,” whispered Joe in Cliff's ear.

“Not another dime!” cried Hinsdale.

“But I got a new gag—it's worth double. I box with myself,” replied the clown.

Cliff and Joe had to laugh as the clown proceeded to tie himself in knots and punch or kick himself in the jaw with his feet. The man did his act so realistically that he was quite dizzy when he did manage to stagger to his feet.

“Okay. You get your raise,” laughed Hinsdale, and as the clown went out all smiles turned to Ballenger.

“Hallo, Cliff! This sure is a great surprise. How are you?”

“Good as new.”

Cliff gripped the outstretched hand. “Well, it's grand seeing you again.”

Hinsdale smiled his welcome. “What are your plans, Cliff?”

“Why, I'm coming back with the snow, of course,” Cliff answered in his gruff way.

“Sure. I can figure out something.”

“You don't need to do much figuring. I wanna work the cats again.”

“Work the cats?” Hinsdale was astonished. He shook his head. “Cliff, don't make it tough for me. Don't ask me that.”

“That's just what I am asking you, Bill,” retorted Cliff. “You know I was the best animal man in the show business.”

“Sure, Cliff—you was.”

“And I still am! Oh, I know what you're thinking—that I wouldn't have the nerve after what Satan did.”

A vigorous shake of the head by Hinsdale. “I know you've got the nerve. It ain't that; it's—well, a guy can't do a cat routine with a wooden leg.”

“Here's one guy that can!” Cliff shouted.

“Sure he can.” It was Joe. “Why the peg-leg makes the act. Think of the exploitation. Cliff Ballenger—the one-legged animal trainer. It'll be a sensation.”

“Sure, Joe's right.” Cliff pointed to his leg. “This ain't any handicap to me. I can get around as quick as I ever could—see?” It was painful to watch the big man's stumbling movements. Cliff grinned rather shamefaced. “I ain't completely used to it, but in a day or two—”

“It's no good, Cliff,” interrupted Hinsdale. “The cats'd be too quick for you.”

“No, they wouldn't!” It was a vehement denial. “Listen, Bill, I've only just got this leg—I'll get used to it. I got to have that job.”

“I'll give you another job.”

“Another job won't do. I got to come back—all the way.” Cliff came close to his old chief. “Listen, Bill! It ain't for myself I'm asking—it's for somebody else; Carl's kid. She's up against it—in gaol.” The two looked astounded. “Yeah, thought that would surprise you. Yes, and I put her there. I was the cause of Carl's death. It left her stranded, high and dry, and she had to steal.”

Carl crashed the chair down on the great cat.

"Takes more than a fire to lick me!" boasted Cliff.

"We never knew," cried Joe.

"Cliff, we'll lend her a hand," added Hinsdale.

"No, you keep outa this—both of you!" Fiercely Cliff looked at his two friends. "It's my job, and I owe it to her. It's an obligation, and I got to shoulder it. And you've got to gimme a chance to do it."

"If you went in that cage with that peg, the cats'd tear you apart."

"Bill, I ain't ever asked many favours, but I'm asking one now," pleaded Cliff hoarsely. "I want my job back. Gimme a chance to show you I still got them cats buffaloed. Because I have. The cat never lived that could get my goat. Gimme a whip—they'll work all right. And if they don't—well, you can put me to sweeping out cages, and I won't kick. What do you say? Do I get a chance?"

"You got to do it, Bill," urged Joe.

A moment's hesitation.

"Okay, Cliff, you get your chance, and if you flop I'm to hear no more of it."

"But if I pull it off?"

"You get your old job back."

Cliff squared his shoulders, and, glancing round, saw a whip on the wall. He took it down.

"Let's get going. Come on!"

Cliff, whip in hand, fairly swaggering, stumped along between Joe and Hinsdale, who was carrying a rifle. Soon they came abreast of Satan's cage.

"Hallo, Snarler!" leered Cliff.

The animal recognised the voice of the man he hated, and in a flash was on his feet. With a roar Satan hurled himself against the bars, and, in spite of himself, Cliff flinched. But the big man knew that the eyes of Hinsdale and Joe were on him, and straightened his shoulders.

"Get back there!" he roared, and crashed the whip in Satan's face. "Your turn is coming, big boy."

The three men moved down towards the big rehearsal cage, whilst Satan snarled and flung himself against the bars of his cage.

A few sharp orders from Hinsdale and attendants brought the lions into the chutes leading into the big cage. The lions roared. Cliff gripped the whip-handle tensely.

"Okay," Cliff looked at Hinsdale.

"I'm all set."

"Cliff, are you sure you can do it?"

"Never surer in my life."

Outside the cage Hinsdale, gun ready, and Joe with a revolver, watched Cliff Ballenger open the grilled door and enter the cage. Other circus men began to crowd round.

The nine lions one after another rushed into the cage. Cliff stumped forward and cracked his whip. The lions roared their menace and turned towards him. Cliff did not hesitate, but faced them fearlessly. With expert skill his whip cracked, hurting but not harming. The lions saw those blazing eyes and backed away; they were recognising Cliff's mastery, and they began to work. Hinsdale and Joe breathed sighs of relief.

Cliff, with remarkable agility, put the lions through their paces, and Hinsdale had to admit that he had never seen the big man work the animals so well.

But Hinsdale was anxious again when Satan was loosed down the chute after the lions had been taken back to their cages. Satan sprang straight at Cliff Ballenger, but it did not seem to daunt the animal trainer, who moved to one side and lashed out with his whip. Cliff held a chair in his left hand as an extra guard. Satan sprang again, but not so fiercely, and received a flicking whip across the eyes. Snarling and spitting, the great cat rushed round the cage, trying to get an opportunity to get past that whip.

Finally, exhausted, Satan slunk into a corner, but Cliff Ballenger went after the cat.

"Come outa that, you furry rat!" he roared. "Get going!"

Cliff actually managed to make Satan, after a lot of whip-cracking, jump on to one of the stands.

"Okay, Cliff," Hinsdale called out.

"You get that job."

"Yeah, but I'll show—"

"You'll come out," raged Hinsdale.

"You can do all the showing when you got a bit more skill with that peg-leg. I ain't taking chances with a guy that's going to top the bill."

Cliff grinned at Hinsdale and Joe, and then with cunning skill drove Satan towards the chute. The tiger scurried back to his cage, spitting and snarling, but with his tail between his legs.

A Matrimonial Tangle

WHEN Laura was released from prison, Cliff Ballenger was there in the waiting-room. He took her bag and extended his hand in greeting.

"Hallo, Cliff." Her eyes showed her gratitude.

"Hallo, kid." He studied her. "You look a little peaked, but I guess a week or two of sunshine will soon fix that up. Well, come on."

"Where are we going?" she asked as the prison gates shut behind them.

"I got a little surprise for you," Cliff winked. "Now, don't ask any questions."

Cliff hailed a car, and soon they were being driven out of town. On the outskirts the car pulled up in a quiet lane, and Cliff paid off the fare. Then, taking her arm, he led her down the lane till they reached a neat, small cottage. There was a little yard, and there was grass and some flowers. He let go of her arm to point to the cottage.

"Well, how do you like it?"

"Fine!" She was puzzled.

"Of course, it ain't much." He opened the gate. "It ain't got any curtains, and the furniture ain't all it should be. It sure needs a woman's touch, and it'll be grand. Come on in." Laura thought the cottage was delightful.

"Convenient," Cliff told her. "Right near our winter quarters. You can turn this joint into a real home I can come over most days and see you."

It was some while before Laura could realise this cottage was her very own.

"Cliff, you've been grand to me." Tears streamed unashamed down her cheeks. "I don't think I could have stood this last month if it hadn't been for you."

"Aw, forget it!" he cried. "That's all done with, kid. Just act as if it never happened."

"I can't forget it, and I'm so grateful." Laura's voice broke with emotion. "I can never repay you for all you've done for me. You've given me something to live for."

Cliff Ballenger went away walking on air, because of the gratitude of this girl. To him Laura was the most wonderful girl he had ever met. Ever since the time he had seen the girl in prison he had been in love with her, and it was obvious that she liked him. She could repay him by marrying him. Cliff would not dream of suggesting such a thing, but in his frequent visits he did drop an odd hint or two about his feeling towards her.

One day he plucked up courage and asked her if she could marry an ugly looking guy with only one leg.

Frankly she confessed that she was not in love with him, though she thought him the finest man she had ever met. Did he still want to marry her?

"I'll make you learn to love me." Cliff drew her close.

"I'll try, Cliff—I'll try."
 "What more could a guy ask?" cried Cliff. "Say, we had better go along to the City Hall at once."
 "City Hall?"
 "Sure, we got to file our intention."
 "Intention?"
 "Our intention to get married," chuckled Cliff. "It's the law in California—we can't get hitched for three days. That means Thursday will be our wedding-day."

Cliff Ballenger had been very secretive about Laura Homan. The girl was pale, thin and in a highly nervous state. She was not strong enough to meet anybody, and besides, Cliff wanted the circus folk to see the girl looking her best. Moreover, it was wise to let time pass so that no mention be made of the girl having gone to prison. But after rushing Laura off to the City Hall before she had a chance to change her mind Cliff decided that he could break the news to Joe and Hinsdale.

Joe Larson was incensed when he heard the news, and finding out the address of the cottage, took it upon himself to pay a personal visit when he knew Cliff was busy with a rehearsal. It was a shock for Joe to find Carl's daughter was such a good-looker.

"I'm Joe Larson," he explained. "Maybe Cliff's mentioned my name to you?"

"You're his best friend. Won't you come inside?"

So Joe Larson entered the cottage and wondered at its neat and good taste. He explained that as he was Cliff's best friend he had come to see her because he had heard they were going to get married. Hadn't Cliff done enough for her without her wanting to marry him?

"You think I'm marrying him for his money?"

"Yes, I do," Joe told her frankly. "Cliff's a great guy. He's been darned white to you. Came back to the show to work the cats just to get dough to help you out. It ain't just the dough." Joe hesitated. "It's—well, after all, you've been in stir—you're marked."

"Yes, I'm marked." Her laughter was bitter. "But so is Cliff. That tiger marked him, and it isn't easy for a man like that to find a girl. I admit I'm not in love with him, and I told him so."

"You did?" gasped Joe. "Then just what is your idea in hooking Cliff?"

"I'm marrying Cliff because he wants me to—because anything he wants that I can give is his. You can't imagine what he has done for me. I was sunk when he came along, and he made me want to live. There's nothing I wouldn't do for a man like that, and the only thing I can do is try to make him happy. Does that answer you?"

Joe looked crestfallen.

"I guess it does."

"You're satisfied?"

"Yes."

Her eyes flashed.

"Then get out!"

"Wait a minute, kid." Joe had something of Cliff's truculence. "I'm sorry I spoke out a turn. But—well—that guy means a lot to me. They don't make many like Cliff."

"You don't have to tell me that."

Her voice was gentler.

"I'm glad you're going to marry him." Joe held out his hand. "I know now he'll be in good hands. He's a lucky guy."

"You really mean that?"

"All the way. I think you're grand, Laura."

"Thanks." She gripped his hand.

"Then we're friends."

"You bet," cried Joe heartily. "We understand each other. Mum's the word about my coming to see you."

On the next day Cliff went with Joe to an artificial-limb store to have the final fitting of the latest and most elaborate type of cork leg. When Cliff stood up and looked down at his trousered leg he gave a great grin of delight.

"Say—that's swell. Why, nobody'd hardly know."

"Does it feel comfortable?" asked the assistant.

"So good that I don't know which is my gammy leg," beamed Cliff. "Sorry I had to rush you so much on this job, but I'm getting married to-morrow."

All the circus came to the wedding, and afterwards Cliff gave a big party at a roadhouse not far from the circus' winter quarters.

It was an ordeal for Laura. She was the centre of all eyes. She had to submit to the boisterous embrace of her husband, who would insist upon most of the circus, including the giant, kissing her. Joe was best man, and when he kissed her a strange thrill went through Laura, and they stared at each other as if they were finding out something for the first time. Cliff was not a man given to continual drinking, but he enjoyed a binge. A good "blind-o" was good fun once a month, and as Cliff had missed several months through his injuries, he made up for it that day. Joe Larson and Laura took Cliff home in a taxi, and between them they carried the big man into the cottage. They dumped him like a sack of coals on the bed, and stared down at the inanimate figure.

"You take it easy," Joe tried to push her away. "I'll take care of him. He doesn't get this way very often. It's just that he's feeling especially happy to-night."

"I'm not blaming Cliff. I want him to be happy." Unexpectedly, she buried her face in her hands. "Oh, Joe, I can't stand it."

"Laura."

"I thought I could, but I just can't."

"He'll be okay to-morrow."

She looked at him through tears. "There'll be to-morrow and the days after. Oh, Joe, I can't go through with it. I hoped I could love him—I want to—but I can't. What shall I do, Joe?"

"Laura, it's too late now." Joe laid a comforting hand on her shoulder. "I know you married Cliff to try and pay him back for all the kindness he had shown you, and I can understand that to-night has been a bit of a shock for a sensitive girl like you. But you mustn't forget that we've all got our faults, and Cliff is a swell guy at heart. We gotta do our best for him. Try, Laura."

"Yes, Joe, I'll try," sobbed the girl.

Joe gave her shoulder a reassuring squeeze and then moved on tiptoe to the door.

"Let him sleep it off. He'll be okay in the morning. Good-night."

"Good-night!" Laura whispered sadly, and there was a yearning look in the brown eyes.

Cliff woke in the morning feeling pretty shaky and very apologetic. He apologised so much that Laura got tired of saying that she did not mind him getting a little merry once in a while.

He had a cold bath and announced that he felt as fit as a fiddle. That day was the last day of winter quarters. Hinsdale had sent round a notice that directly after the night rehearsal the show would break camp, and that the circus train would leave promptly at midnight. Everybody to be aboard by eleven forty-five.

No wives were allowed on the tour, which was going to last six months. The Clark-Hinsdale show was not only touring America, but going to Europe. Wives would have been a nuisance and an expense. Cliff would not have taken Laura if wives had been allowed, because she was still far from fit.

"Get him out," rapped out Cliff, "while I keep Satan off!"

Laura hated to admit the fact, but it was a great relief to think that she would not see her husband for six months.

"Best of luck, Cliff," she said at the station. "You won't forget to write, will you?"

"Write?" Cliff spoke sharply, then remembering himself, gave a great grin. "Oh, sure I'll write."

Laura had no idea that her husband could not read or write. She had to smile and look happy when he kissed her effusively.

Over her head Cliff suddenly spotted a slim figure.

"Hey, Joe!" he called. "Come here!"

Joe Larson did not look at Laura as he pushed his way through the crowd.

"Say, you weren't leaving without saying good-bye to Laura?"

"Why—no—I—of course not," stammered Joe. "Good-bye."

"Good-bye, Joe." They shook hands and their eyes met in a lingering glance.

"All aboard!" came the warning shout.

"Well, so long, honey," bellowed Cliff. "We'll be back in October, and we wanna see you strong enough to wrestle an elephant—eh, Joe?"

"You bet," cried Joe, forcing a smile.

Laura waved her handkerchief as the train moved slowly from the station. Her husband and the man she knew she loved waved back.

Through the Flames

ALMOST six months later the circus train was heading for Los Angeles. It was a hot night, and two men sat in their shirtsleeves at a small table in their own private compartment. Cliff and Joe had bunked together all the trip.

Cliff was sprawled back, staring out at the moonlit scenery as it flitted past, whilst Joe leaned over the table, busy with pen and paper.

"And in all we had a pretty good season," Cliff dictated. He gave a throaty chuckle. "And here's the part I like." Joe looked up. "Just say: 'And Laura darling, I got good news for you. We make just one more two-day show, and then we head for home. I'm sure dying to see you, and hold you in my arms—'" He paused, and when Joe glanced at him. "That sound too mushy?"

"I don't see why. She's your wife."

"Sure." Cliff gave a decisive nod. "Expect us Saturday afternoon—we'll be looking for your face." Guess that'll be all, Joe. Just finish it with 'Love and kisses, your Cliff.'"

"Okay."

"Oh, and add to that," Cliff suddenly cried: "P.S. Joe sends his love, too."

Joe hesitated before he added the postscript.

The circus had their own siding station, which was specially reserved for them during the winter months, and on the Saturday afternoon Clark and Hinsdale's combined shows pulled in on time. A crowd of people, mostly women and children, the wives, families and sweethearts of the circus folk, shouted their welcome as the circus train steamed into the platform. The front cars carried the animals and the circus equipment.

Laura was there to meet the train. She looked the picture of health. She was simply but becomingly dressed.

The train jolted to a stop, and instantly there was a wild rush forward by the women. On the steps of one car stood two men, Joe in front, with Cliff peering over his shoulder.

"There she is!" Cliff pointed. "Laura!"

As Cliff drew his wife close to him and kissed her clumsily he kept one hand behind his back.

"Honey, you sure look swell." Cliff pushed her away to look at her. Then from behind his back he produced a small cage. "C'mere, Oscar. Meet your mamma. Laura, this is Oscar." Laura stared at a tiny tiger cub that spat and snarled. "Take him—he's a coming-home present."

"He is kind of cute," Laura murmured doubtfully.

"So are you, honey. You look a million dollars. Don't she, Joe?"

The two young people solemnly eyed each other, trying to read what each was thinking.

"She sure looks great," mumbled Joe.

"Hallo, Joe." Laura shook his hand. "You don't look so bad yourself."

Cliff suddenly linked arms with Laura and Joe.

"Come on, let's get outa this mush and get home. You, too, Joe—we're gonna celebrate."

Joe tried in vain to free himself from that mighty grip.

"I got a date in 'Frisco," he spluttered.

"That can wait." Cliff brushed the excuse to one side. "Don't argue—you're staying with us. At least, for the week-end. We won't take no for an answer, will we, Laura?"

"We'd love to have you, Joe." "Well, if I won't be in the way," Joe felt like some poor, trapped creature.

"Listen to him," bellowed Cliff. "In the way! Haw, haw! In the way indeed! Come on!" He began to propel them forward.

Joe had hoped that in the six months he could have banished Laura from his mind, but he found that he loved her more than ever, and it did not help matters to find that Laura felt just the same about himself. Cliff was so happy and proud of his wife; they both liked him so much that they had to suppress their own emotions. Joe tried very hard to find excuses to go and live somewhere else, but Cliff got so huffy and offended that Joe gave up the struggle.

One night Joe could not stand it any longer. The unhappiness that he saw in Laura's eyes was more than he could endure.

"I can't stay on here for ever, Cliff," Joe said over a glass of brandy. "I'm not outstaying my welcome for anyone, and besides, I'm thinking of heading East."

"East? What for?" growled Cliff.

"I'm thinking of hooking up with Brown Brothers next season."

"You're leaving this show?" Cliff could not believe his ears.

"Yeah." Joe could not look at Cliff. "Eight years in one outfit's a long hitch."

"Say, what is this?" Cliff stared closely at his friend. "I bet a woman's at the bottom of it."

"Women don't mean a thing to me," Joe answered, with an apologetic glance at the white-faced Laura. "You know that."

"What's the trouble then? You've been my side-kick for eight years."

"You won't be lonely—you got Laura." Joe shrugged his shoulders. "I got that wanderlust feeling on me. Maybe I'll just take one season with Brown Brothers, and that'll make me want to get back here."

Cliff argued and argued, but Joe was very stubborn, and they were still at it when a sound made them look up. It was the distant wail of fire-engines. Laura ran to the window.

"I can see flames!" she cried. Cliff was on his feet and at the window.

"It's our winter quarters!" he gasped out. "Joe, we gotta make it quick!"

The fire was blazing furiously when the two panting men arrived on the scene. Uniformed firemen were directing streams of water on the burning animal-shed. The circus crew were working frantically to get the animals out. Several cages of lions, elephants, leopards, and monkeys had already been pulled out of the burning building. There was a pandemonium of noise. The police were keeping back the fast-gathering crowd. Bill Hinsdale, smoke-begrimed, appeared with a number of men—another cage of lions saved.

"Did you get 'em all out?" demanded Cliff.

"All but a couple of leopards and the big tiger!" panted Hinsdale.

"Satan?"

"Yeah. 'Fraid they're goners. Like a blow-torch in there."

"We got to get that tiger out!" Cliff turned to some of the men. "Hey, you—and you—you, too—come on!"

"Don't be foolish, Cliff," warned Hinsdale.

Cliff made no answer, but piloted his men towards the flaming building. Joe ran up and caught his arm.

"Don't be a sap, Cliff. It's an inferno in there."

"Think I'm going to let a fire lick that cat?—That's my job!" Cliff rasped out. "C'mon!"

Cliff Ballenger dashed into the flames. The men hesitated to follow, but Joe plunged after the animal trainer. And Laura, who had followed the two men to the scene of the fire was in time to see him vanish in the flames.

"Joe!" she screamed.

In the blazing building the tiger's cage was surrounded by leaping flames. Satan, mad with fright, was pounding against the bars. Cliff, three of the volunteers, and Joe made their way to the cage. They gripped the woodwork that blistered their hands and pushed. The cage started to move on its wheels. The flames seemed to sweep down as if angry at anyone trying to rob them of their prey.

Through the smoke and fire the five men propelled the cage towards the door. The roars of the frightened animal blended with the increasing tumult of the fire. The men gasped and choked. The rafters of the building fell all around them. Joe was straining with all his might against one side of the cage when a heavy rafter fell on his shoulders and knocked him away from the cage. Neither Cliff nor the other men noticed.

What a shout went up when out of the smoke and flame came the cage with its blackened heroes. Men rushed forward to relieve them of their task, but Cliff would not leave the cage until it was out of range of the flames. He leant against the bars dazedly wiping his forehead.

Laura and Hinsdale hurried to his side.

"Are you all right?" asked the owner.

"Yeah, takes more than a fire to lick me!" bragged Cliff.

The girl looked round wildly. "Where's Joe?"

"Joe! Ain't he here?" Cliff cried.

"He was with us!" gasped one of the helpers. "But he ain't now. Maybe he didn't make it."

Having acquired the controlling interest in the Eureka Discovery Corporation for five hundred dollars, and sold half of it to a detective for two hundred dollars, Bob Harvey sets off with his new partner to find the buried treasure of San Capello—with very strange consequences. A first-rate yarn of high adventure, starring Richard Arlen and Cecilia Parker

"The MINE with the IRON DOOR"

Pitkin Makes an Offer

THE offices of the Eureka Discovery Corporation consisted of two rooms on the fifteenth floor of a skyscraper at the lower end of Broadway, not very far from famous Wall Street, and they adjoined one another, possessing a communicating door between them and separate doors opening on to a wide corridor.

At a desk in the room which bore the word "Private" on the ground-glass panel of its outer door, James Horace Pitkin was signing share certificates purchased by glib members of the general public.

He was president of the corporation which he himself had created, and a full-bodied president at that, tipping the scale at thirteen stone eight and filling the chair of carved oak and cane in which he was seated. His greying hair was brushed well back from a more or less noble brow, and his thick neck bulged over the edge of his collar.

The fountain-pen in his hand splashed ink upon one of the certificates, and he had just screwed up the printed sheet of paper and flung it into a wastepaper basket when Bob Harvey walked in upon him from the other room, which formed the general office.

Bob was young, good-looking, and determined. He had waved aside Pitkin's attractive girl secretary, who would have intercepted him, to enter unannounced.

"Hallo, Mr. Pitkin," he said briskly, closing the communicating door behind him with a bang.

Pitkin looked up from the pile of share certificates as yet unsigned, put down the refractory fountain-pen, and summoned a feeble smile.

"Ah, good-morning," he returned with an utter lack of heartiness.

"Sorry to keep pestering you," said Bob, walking over to the desk and presenting a legal-looking document, "but I've got to collect the balance due on your car."

"Isn't that paid yet?" exclaimed Pitkin with a wholly unconvincing air of surprise, and he took the document and frowned at it. "Seems perfectly correct."

He wrote on a slip of paper which he tore from a scribbling-pad, and he handed the slip to Bob in company with the document.

"There," he said, "you just leave that with Miss Dailey on your way out."

Bob pocketed the document, but rejected the slip.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Pitkin," he said with a grimace, "but I've been doing that for the past three months."

"Three months?" The president of the Eureka Discovery Corporation affected intense surprise. "Is it that long?"

"Yeah," Bob replied unhappily, "and it looks like the company's going to stick me with the non-payments."

"Oh, my boy, of course we couldn't have that! I—I'm really sorry for this delay, but, of course, launching a company such as this one has taken all my available funds. You can understand that."

"Yeah, sure," began Bob dismally, "but—"

The bell of a telephone on the desk interrupted him stridently, and Pitkin reached across to the instrument.

"Oh, pardon me!" he said, and then: "Hallo! What? Who? Oh, go ahead!"

An expression of alarm, which was in no way assumed, spread over his very full face as he listened to what a man in a telephone-box had to say to him.

"Well, well, that's very distressing," he gulped. "Are you sure it's serious?"

"I'll say it's serious," was the emphatic reply. "He claims that you're using the money for yourself instead of the company. I think they're wise that the whole thing is a fake. Anyway, they're sending a dick up after you!"

"Oh!" Pitkin's flabby cheeks lost their habitual colour. "Well, then, maybe I'd better leave at once. Thank you—thank you very much. I—I really appreciate your calling me up. Yes, I'll take the first train."

He put down the telephone and mopped his brow with a handkerchief.

"Bad news?" inquired Bob.

"Yes, very." Pitkin looked at him in a strained fashion. "My wife. She—she's been taken suddenly ill in Memphis. That was a long-distance call from the hospital."

"Gee!" exclaimed Bob sympathetically. "I'm sorry to hear that!"

"It's very awkward, coming at a time like this." Pitkin put away the handkerchief and stood up. "Of course I—I'll have to go right on there at once. I'm afraid I'll have to give the car back to the company."

"Oh, I wouldn't like to see you lose what you've already paid on it, Mr.

Pitkin," said Bob. "Maybe I could get you an extension."

"Thank you, Harvey. That's very kind of you, and I appreciate it. Say, how would you like to make a lot of money?"

"Who, me?"

Pitkin nodded.

"Would you be interested in searching for a buried treasure?"

"Eh?" Bob blinked. "I should say not!"

"Well, real estate, maybe?"

"No, I—I don't know anything about that."

It seemed to Bob that the bad news must have upset Pitkin's mental balance, as well as his nerves, and he turned to go. But Pitkin swept round the desk and caught hold of his arm.

"Wait a minute!" he said, almost imploringly. "My wife's got to have a very expensive operation, and I must dispose of my holdings in this company in order to pay for it. Here! Come over here a minute!"

He led Bob to a framed map of Arizona, which occupied a prominent position on one of the walls of the room.

"Do you see that?" he asked, pointing to a portion of the map round which a red line had been drawn. "This Corporation owns all of that land—five thousand acres of it! Now I'm willing to sell the controlling interest at a very nominal figure. Why don't you pick it up?"

"Who, me?" gasped Bob.

"Yes, you! Think of what you're getting, my boy! Do you know anything about Arizona?"

"No, I don't."

"Ah, but you should, you should! It's the garden spot of the Union! Now come here, my boy!"

Bob was whisked away from the map to the desk and pushed down into the chair of carved oak and cane behind the desk.

"Let me give you a little fatherly advice," said Pitkin impressively. "Harvey, the basis of all wealth is real estate. Every successful man in this country has started out by owning land. You can't lose on that, Harvey—and I need the money. Some day you'll thank me!"

"Yeah," protested Bob, "but even if I wanted to invest I couldn't. All I've got to my name is five hundred bucks!"

Pitkin sighed, but was desperate.

"Harvey," he said, "under no other circumstances would I part with such valuable property for so foolish a sum, but I need the money—I must get to my wife!"

Dempsey Becomes Excited

HALF-WAY along the broad corridor in which the offices of the Eureka Discovery Corporation were situated the gate of a lift was opened, and a man in a dark suit and a bowler hat stepped forth from the cage and looked about him.

He was an inch taller than James Horace Pitkin, and considerably more than a stone heavier, but he was less bulky. His face was clean-shaven and ugly; his lips were thick, and his nose was widespread and not a good shape. He might have been a prize-fighter or a low comedian, but he happened to be neither, although his name was Dempsey.

He reached the door of Pitkin's private office, hesitated there for a few moments, then plunged into the room that adjoined it.

"Is Mr. Pitkin in?" he demanded gruffly of the very attractive secretary who looked up at him from her desk.

"Whom shall I say is calling?" she asked, half-rising from her chair.

November 7th, 1930.

"Hi, don't try nothin' o' that!" he rapped at her, and from his coat-pocket produced a metal shield at which she stared with horrified eyes. "Where is he?"

"That's his office," she replied, and pointed to the communicating door.

The metal shield was thrust back into the pocket from which it had been removed so dramatically, and Howard Dempsey burst into the other room.

Bob was sitting in the chair of carved oak and cane, smoking a cigarette and trying to realise exactly what had happened in the last few minutes. There was nobody else in the room, and Dempsey advanced towards him, stabbing the air with a finger.

"Hi, are you the head of this layout?" he barked.

Bob dropped the end of his cigarette in an ash-tray before he answered, then:

"Yeah," he said slowly. "Yeah, I guess I am. What can I do for you?"

"You can take a walk with me down to the District Attorney's office!"

"The District Attorney's office?" Bob stared blankly at his visitor. "What for?"

"For selling phoney stock!" snapped Dempsey. "Get your hat!"

Bob's hat was on the desk, but he did not touch it.

"Wait a minute!" he expostulated. "I—I didn't sell any stock—I just bought some!"

Dempsey strode round to him.

"Who are you tryin' to kid, Pitkin?" he jeered.

"My name isn't Pitkin," protested Bob. "It's Harvey."

"Harvey?" The detective repeated the name incredulously. "Well, what're you doin' in this office, then?"

"I just bought Pitkin out."

"You bought Pitkin out?"

"Yeah."

Pitkin who had left his office by way of the door that opened on to the corridor and fled down fifteen flights of stairs while the cage of the lift was ascending with Dempsey, was at that moment cashing Bob's cheque for five hundred dollars in a Broadway bank. Dempsey, confronted with the counterfoil of the cheque and a transfer of the controlling interest in the Eureka Discovery Corporation to Robert Harvey, became convinced that a clever crook had taken advantage of yet another victim.

He permitted Bob to conduct him to the map on the wall.

"I don't know why I did it," confessed the purchaser, "but it's land, and how can I lose? There it is! Five thousand acres of virgin soil in sun-drenched Arizona! Say, you know, it's pretty cheap at that!"

"You're loony!" quoth Dempsey with a pitying chuckle. "What's it good for?"

"Eh?" Bob hadn't thought about that. "I'll find out."

He went back to the desk, and by means of a dictaphone which stood upon it he summoned Miss Dailey, who entered with a notebook in one hand and a pencil in the other, a puzzled expression upon her beautiful face as she looked in vain for the man who owed her several weeks' salary.

"Oh, Miss Dailey," said Bob, holding out his hand, "shake with your new boss."

"New boss?" Miss Dailey was obviously bewildered.

"Yeah, I just bought Pitkin out."

"You bought Mr. Pitkin out?"

"Uhuh."

"Well, where is he?"

"He's gone home to be with his sick wife."

"Sick wife?" Miss Dailey seemed to be more bewildered than ever. "Why, I didn't know Mr. Pitkin was married!"

Dempsey gave vent to a derisive laugh, and Bob abandoned the sick wife, ceasing to believe in her existence. He pointed to the map.

"Can you tell us what that Arizona property is good for?" he asked.

"What do you mean by 'good for'?" Miss Dailey challenged.

"What kind of a game was Pitkin running?"

She frowned severely at him.

"Well, I don't know what you're talking about," she said, "but Mr. Pitkin believed that the mine with the iron door was located on that property, and he was raising funds to find it."

"The mine with the iron door?" echoed Bob. "What kind of a racket is that?"

Dempsey had picked up an illustrated pamphlet which was lying on the desk and had sat down in the chair to study it.

"Listen here," he said. "The mine with the iron door! To the average man this means nothing, but to the smart investor it means the treasure of San Capello, more than a king's ransom."

Miss Dailey smiled; Bob leaned over the back of the chair, staring down at pictures of the property he had partly acquired, while the detective epitomised the rest of the printed matter in the pamphlet:

"Millions in gold—buried by the monks of the old Spanish mission. This is not a legend, it's authentic. Records prove it. For three hundred years the treasure has lain buried in the mountains of Arizona. The Eureka Discovery Corporation will find it."

Bob turned to the girl beside him.

"You mean to say that people bought stock in a phoney proposition like that?" he exclaimed disgustedly.

"There's nothing phoney about the mine!" she retorted. "Why, I bought ninety dollars' worth of stock myself!"

"I'm sorry, Miss Dailey," said Bob, "but you may just as well kiss your ninety bucks good-bye."

"You mean the search for the mine is off?" she asked blankly.

"So far as I'm concerned it is," he declared. "And I've lost five hundred bucks!"

Howard Dempsey rose up with the illustrated pamphlet in his hands and a strange expression on his face.

"Say, I wonder how much dough them monks planted down there, anyway?" he said in an awed voice.

"Don't tell me you're going for that hooey!" scoffed Bob.

"Well, I don't know," mused the detective. "It just goes to show you. Here's a guy like Pitkin, taking a load of money from suckers, but if I'd been him I'd have taken a chance and gone down there and looked for it myself. Just think if he'd found it!"

Bob laughed with scorn.

"I'll tell you what I'll do with you," he said. "I'll sell you the whole thing for five hundred bucks, and you go look for it!"

"Why don't you do it?" suggested Miss Dailey.

"Yeah, why don't I do it?" Bob reached for his hat and rammed it on his head. "Why don't I?"

"Aw, wait a minute!" growled Dempsey. "There might be something to it! If I had five hundred bucks I believe I might buy you out!"

"Yeah?" derided Bob. "Who's loony now?"

"Well," challenged Dempsey, "it ain't any worse than lookin' for oil, is it?"

"Mr. Pitkin did a lot of research work concerning the treasure," stated Miss Dailey. "Why, we have letters from Professor Turner, of Stanford University, and he's an authority on early American missions."

"Gee," breathed Dempsey, "I wish I had five hundred bucks!"

"How much have you got?" asked Bob.

"Oh, I gotta couple o' hundred," was the reply.

"All right—I'll sell you a half-interest for two hundred dollars."

"Eh?" Dempsey looked up from a document Miss Dailey had handed him from a drawer on the desk. "You will? Good!" He scanned a paragraph or two of the document and his brown eyes widened. "Gee, millions in gold!"

"What?" cried Bob, bounding over to him. "Let me have a look at that!"

He possessed himself of the document and studied it, while Miss Dailey opened the door of a safe.

"You know, people do find a lot of things," said the excited detective. "Look at all that stuff they dug up in Egypt! And I know a guy who was digging a well, one time, and he dug up a pot of gold! So, you see, it ain't so crazy at that!"

"Mr. Pitkin bought the property from an old Spanish family," said Miss Dailey, and she returned from the safe with an imposing-looking deed written on parchment and decorated with seals.

"See?" exulted Dempsey. "They got records and everything! Hi, I gotta hunch! Let's go down there together and try to find it!"

But Bob was not altogether satisfied, in spite of the secretary's faith and the evidence she produced.

"If there was anything to it, why did Pitkin run out on it?" he wanted to know.

"Aw, did you ever see a crook that done anything right?" Dempsey retorted. "Besides, it wouldn't cost much. I'll give you the two hundred bucks for the half-interest, and that'll pretty nearly cover our expenses."

Bob was tempted. After all, he had acquired the controlling interest in the corporation and it would be an adventure. But he knew nothing of the detective who wanted to be his partner.

"Are you on the level?" he asked dubiously.

"Sure!" boomed Dempsey with undisguised eagerness. "I'm a good sport."

A Change of Raiment

TEN days later a long train drew up beside a railway platform that seemed to be miles from anywhere in particular, and Bob and Dempsey stepped down from it, Bob carrying a suitcase and Dempsey a bag. They had burned their boats, or in other words, had given up their respective jobs to search for buried treasure.

A long board supported on two posts proclaimed the station to be that of Ralston, Arizona, but there was no sign of a house in the landscape. Bob raised his head and sniffed appreciatively as the train steamed off and left them behind.

"Smell that air, will you?" he said. "Makes you feel like living, doesn't it?"

"Yeah," said Dempsey, frowning at the waste of sandy scrub on either side of the track. "But where's the town?"

Away in the distance, towards the west, trees were visible. From the station a dusty road stretched towards the trees.

"Over there, I guess," Bob replied. "There was no one about to guide them, so they trudged off along the road. The sun blazed down upon them, and they were glad to reach the trees;

but even after the trees had been reached there was still a full mile to go to the little town of Ralston.

They took it in turns to carry the suitcase and the bag, and Dempsey was carrying them when a typical Western main street of frame-buildings and boardwalks loomed up ahead.

"You better keep it dark what we're down here for," he said warningly. "If you don't, we're gonna have a mob trailing after us. And don't say a word about the mine with the iron door!"

A blacksmith's shop was reached and passed, and suddenly Bob burst out laughing.

"What's the matter?" demanded his companion.

Bob pointed mutely to a sign on the window of a shop: "Iron Door Radio Shoppe. Gifts."

"Aw, that's nothing!" growled Dempsey. But adjoining the radio "shoppe" was an "Iron Door Delicatessen," and on the other side of the street was a store with a balcony over its entrance and a board on the front of the balcony upon which was painted in large letters: "The Treasure Hunters' Supply Company. Expeditions outfitted. Embalming and Undertaking."

Dempsey blinked at that sign; the suggestion seemed to be that the treasure hunters died.

"Maybe it is a little over-advertised," he growled, "but if that mine's down here we're gonna find it!"

"Yeah," said Bob, and added in quite a scornful voice: "Genius!"

A little farther along the street they came to a garage outside which a moon-faced old fellow was lolling in a wooden armchair with a pipe in his mouth. He was in his shirtsleeves, his waistcoat was unfastened, and a broad-brimmed hat shielded his eyes from the sun.

"Howdy?" said he, removing the pipe from his mouth.

"Howdy?" returned Bob. "Can we rent a car here?"

"Sure." The proprietor of the garage stood up. "How long d'you want it?"

"Well," said Bob, "that all depends." He took from a pocket the pamphlet issued by the Eureka Discovery Corporation and exhibited the map which occupied its two centre pages. "Do you know where this property is?"

One glance at the map was sufficient for the garage man.

"Yeah," he replied. "That's down in Monk's Canyon."

"Well, that's where I want to go," said Bob.

"Yeah, me, too," chimed in Dempsey. "Then you won't want no car!"

"Why not?" asked Bob in surprise. "How far is it?"

"About twenty-five miles."

"What do you mean, we won't need a car?" demanded Dempsey, who was already tired of walking. "How are we gonna get there?"

"Walk," was the reply, and the garage man looked down at two pairs of shoes wholly unsuitable for the wilds of sun-drenched Arizona. "Huh!"

The grunt was caused, doubtless, by Dempsey's comic expression of dismay, coupled with disapproval of the city clothes the two would-be customers were wearing.

"Well, that's the only way you can get there," declared the man, puffing at his pipe. "There ain't no road that a car can get over. You'll just have to get yourselves a couple o' pack burros and a campin' outfit, and hoof it. You're lookin' for the mine with the iron door, ain't cha?"

Dempsey gaped at him.

"Who told you?" he gasped.

"Well, what else would a couple tenderfeet be wantin' to go out to Monk's Canyon for?"

Bob felt inclined to laugh, though it was no laughing matter.

"Say, is there any truth in that story?" he asked.

A slow grin spread over the wide countenance of the garage man.

"Well," he drawled, "a lot of people think there is. I go out there, now an' then, and kinda take a look myself."

"Are you serious?" Bob was astounded.

"To walk twenty-five miles," said the garage man emphatically, "a fella's got to be serious."

"Did you ever find any trace of it?" asked Dempsey with considerable anxiety.

"No." The garage man shook his head. "But that ain't no sign it ain't there. Say, d'you wanna buy a map?"

"What good is a map?" growled Bob.

"That won't tell us where it is."

"No, but it'll tell you where it ain't!"

The garage man disappeared into a little wooden office and returned with a map which Bob bought for twenty-five cents although he didn't want it. Useful advice was thrown in free of charge, however, and the two partners then repaired to the balconied establishment of the Treasure Hunters' Supply Company.

From that establishment Bob emerged without any great delay comfortably attired in a loose shirt with pockets, riding breeches, a grey sombrero, and high boots. Dempsey, who had gone all cowboy in his ideas of suitable raiment, was still picking and choosing, so Bob went off to acquire two pack-donkeys of the type known as "burros."

He returned with them to the Treasure Hunters' Supply Company's premises and was loading them with part of the burden they were to carry when Dempsey came out on to the veranda under the balcony looking like a cowboy out of a comic opera.

High-heeled boots were on his feet, a ten-gallon hat was on his head, a decorated belt was round his waist—if it could be called a waist—and not even Solomon, in all his glory, had ever been arrayed in such a shirt as he had chosen. It was covered with spots—spots of all sorts and sizes and all sorts of colours—and it was a shirt which no one had dreamed of buying till he had clapped eyes on it.

With the spotted shirt went a spotted neckerchief, and the only thing that Dempsey lacked in all his gorgeous outfit were chaps. His trousers were unadorned, and almost sombre by comparison with the shirt.

"Well, how am I doing?" he asked proudly, executing a pirouette upon the boards of the veranda.

"Great!" declared Bob; and Dempsey became aware of the two donkeys.

"Say, where did you get them two bureaus?" he inquired.

"Around the corner at the Mine with the Iron Door Stables," Bob replied. "That one's Rose, and this is Rebecca. Rebecca is yours."

Rebecca was white and the more attractive of the two animals in appearance, but when Dempsey endeavoured to pat her head she made a nasty noise at him.

"How are you?" said Dempsey.

The nasty noise was repeated, and the placid grey Rose glanced round to see what it was all about—and joined in the chorus.

"Say, I don't think me and Rebecca's gonna get along," complained Dempsey.

November 7th, 1936.

"Can she help it if she's got a sense of humour?" laughed Bob.

Dempsey picked up some packages containing oddments suitable for camping.

"Aw, well," he said, "we'll see it her sense of humour holds up under all this junk!"

A Tiring Journey

THE way to Monk's Canyon, according to the map in the pamphlet and the map acquired from the garage man, stretched uphill to the south-east of Ralston. For some little way the two partners plodded along in the dust of a very rough road with their two burros, a sandy waste, littered with scrub on either side of them. Then the road became a mere track, ascending steeply to rocky regions.

Upwards they progressed slowly, under a very hot sun, and trees became scarce and boulders of shale and sandstone numerous. All around them were mountains, scarred by dry gullies, pierced by the beds of dried-up streams, and here and there a stretch of sunken desert became visible, and here and there a pine wood; but there was no comfort among the rocks, and very little shade, and Dempsey found his newly acquired garments quite as irksome as the double-breasted suit and bowler hat he had discarded, and the high boots none too easy on his feet.

"Say, how far d'you think we've come?" he asked dismally, as Bob stopped his donkey and sat down on a rock.

"About ten miles," decided Bob.

"You mean to say we've got fifteen miles more o' this?" Dempsey took off his cow-hat and mopped his streaming brow with a bandanna almost more gaily coloured than his shirt. "Oh, and my feet are killing me already!"

"You must have made a swell cop!" jeered Bob.

Dempsey ignored that insult, surveyed with gloom the unfriendly expanse of scenery in which not a single chimney smoked nor any human being moved, and had it in his mind to abandon the quest of untold wealth then and there.

"Say, d'you know what I was thinking?" he said, licking his dry lips and taking off one of his boots. "If there's a lot o' people come up here to look for this mine and they never find it—"

"That makes it all the better for us," Bob completed for him.

"Huh?" Dempsey looked startled.

"The more people who've come up here to look for the mine and haven't found it," expounded Bob, "the better off we are. Look, we'll figure it out in mathematics. Let 'x' equal the number of people who have searched for it in vain—"

"What are you talking about?"

"I'm trying to figure it out in algebra."

"Aw, well you needn't mind about that. It's gonna be tough enough as it is, without any algebra."

They went on again after a while, following the narrow and winding trail that led up towards the sky-line, and sometimes, where the way was very steep among the rocks, the loaded donkeys stopped short and had to be coaxed, or tugged, into fresh activity.

"Come on, sweetheart, put some fire in it!" Bob urged on one such occasion, spanking the grey Rose with the flat of his hand. "You can make it if I can! That's a good girl! Watch me, and you'll be a mountain climber. Come on!"

Rose yielded to his blandishments, but Rebecca was more fractious and Dempsey's methods were rougher. Just below a sort of tableland of bush-strewn sand the animal tried to turn about instead of climbing bare rock, and Dempsey used a stick upon her.

"Get up there, you rat!" he shouted.

Rebecca defied him in spite of the stick, and he tried to pull her up over the rock, but she jerked her head so violently that he lost his balance and sat down with a thud. Bob looked back and laughed, and Dempsey rose up in anger.

"All right, stay there!" he howled at the donkey, and turned his back on her and climbed up to Bob; whereupon Rebecca uttered complaining noises at being left behind and scrambled up after him.

The going was easier on the butte, and from it there was a slight descent to a great stretch of high grassland. In the distance were trees and a stream. Dempsey could hardly believe his eyes.

"Hi, Bob, is that water over there?" he cried. "Or is it another one o' them marriages?"

Bob did not trouble to correct his mispronunciation of the word "mirages."

"That's water all right," he replied.

"Oh, wait till I dunk my dogs in that drink!" Dempsey caught hold of Rebecca's bridle. "Come on, baby, come on!"

The river was reached, and with a whoop of joy he squatted on its bank and plunged his feet into the water, boots and all. The two burros drank and munched herbage. Time passed, and then Bob—who had bared his own feet to batho them—relaced his boots and stood up.

"How do you feel?" he inquired.

Dempsey gurgled and splashed.

"Say, this is a great country!" he declared.

"Well, don't get too comfortable," said Bob.

"No?"

"No! See that peak over there?"

Dempsey looked in the direction indicated by a pointing finger and nodded. The peak looked very high and a long way off.

"Well, we've got to get to that by nightfall!"

"Aw, no we don't!" objected Dempsey. "This is where I was going! This is the best place I've struck yet!"

"Don't tell me you're going to weaken now," chided Bob. "Think of Rockefeller—think of Henry Ford! D'you suppose they'd give up at a time like this?"

"They would if their feet were as sore as mine," said Dempsey; but he rose and went back to Rebecca, and the journey was resumed.

It continued all through the hot afternoon, along the bank of the river, but the peak still seemed remote when the sun sank down behind the mountains and the light faded. By that time they had come to a little patch of stunted oaks, and the grass near the oaks was very green.

"Say, how about campin' right here?" suggested Dempsey. "Look, nice and roomy with plenty o' running water—and, you know, that treasure could be right here as well as any place else."

Bob stopped his burro and surveyed the spot, then began to sniff.

"What's the matter?" Dempsey asked. "You got a cold?"

"I smell ham!" said Bob.

"Ham?" Dempsey sniffed prodigiously. "Say, that is ham, isn't it? Yeah, it is ham!"

They moved on past the oaks, and they stared in astonishment at the first human habitation they had seen since the town of Ralston had been left behind. It was a cabin, built mainly of wood, with a thatched roof, and there was a wide porch in front of it.

"Boy, ain't bad, eh?" said Dempsey, sniffing again.

"Looks like home to me," said Bob.

"D'you think we'll be welcome?"

"We'll soon find out!"

Bob stepped on to the porch and knocked at the front door with his fist, and presently the door was opened by an old fellow who blinked at him and at Dempsey through the lenses of steel-rimmed spectacles. Close beside him stood another man, thin of body and thin and lined of face, and it was he who was the first to speak.

"Good-evening," he said rather stiffly.

"Good-evening," said Bob.

The appetising odour of frying ham was stronger than ever. Dempsey stared into what was evidently a living-room, meagrely furnished, and saw a table set for a meal.

"Come in, folks, come in," welcomed the opener of the door, pulling down his spectacles to view the visitors over the top of the steel rims.

Rebecca tried to follow Dempsey into the room, but was driven away.

"My name's Harvey," said Bob.

"Robert Harvey."

"My name's Thad Hill," returned the old fellow, and shook hands. "How are you, Mr. Harvey? This is Dr. Burton."

The thin-faced man, with his mane of grey hair, received Bob's greeting in silence. Dempsey beamed at him when he was introduced, but all he got for the beam was a stiff little bow.

Through an open doorway at the side of the room a girl in a check frock appeared, her face flushed from bending over a stove.

"The supper's read—" she began, and broke off at the sight of the two strangers.

"Oh, this is my granddaughter,

Marta," said Thad Hill. "Marta, this is Mr. Harvey, and this is Mr. Dempsey."

Marta smiled at Bob, who immediately decided that she was the most beautiful girl he had ever seen. Her hair was a little darker than gold, her eyes were hazel and very bright. Dr. Burton stepped back as she wiped a hand on the pinafore tied over her frock and offered it to Bob and Dempsey in turn.

"Have you folks eaten?" inquired her grandfather hospitably.

Bob hesitated, but Dempsey was far too hungry to have any scruples.

"We have not," he said emphatically. "Then pull up some chairs and sit right down!"

"I'm afraid we're intruding," Bob demurred, addressing the girl.

"Oh, not at all!" she responded, almost eagerly. "I mean we're glad to have you."

Dr. Burton tugged at his clipped moustache and frowned.

"I'll get some plates," she added, and disappeared into the kitchen while Dempsey carried a very rough chair to the table for his own occupation, and Thad Hill placed one in position for Bob.

The four became seated, and Marta smoothed her bobbed hair in front of a little mirror on the wall of the kitchen before she returned with the extra plates.

The fried ham was served in conjunction with vegetables, and she was shedding her pinafore when Dr. Burton looked across the table at Bob and asked:

"Are you gentlemen tourists, or are you on business?"

"We're looking for the Eureka property," Bob replied.

"Why, you're on it right now!" exclaimed Thad Hill.

"We are?" Dempsey sat bolt upright.

"Your feet will be glad to hear that," laughed Bob.

Dr. Burton's Philosophy

THE meal was a thoroughly enjoyable one, especially to the two weary travellers. Marta sat beside Bob, and he appreciated her proximity even more than the fried ham; but Dempsey had a second helping.

"This mountain air sure gives you an appetite," said he.

After the table had been cleared Marta sat down at it again with a sewing-basket and a coat of her grandfather's which was in need of repair. Dr. Burton dropped into an armchair by the fireplace, and Thad took the only other armchair in the room and filled a pipe.

"Well, now that you've located your property, Mr. Harvey," said Burton slowly, "what do you intend to do with it?"

Bob drifted over to the fireplace, which was in a corner, and leaned his back against its curved shelf of stone.

"I haven't decided," he replied, folding his arms. "I had a chance to pick it up at a very good bargain, so Mr. Dempsey and I came down to look it over."

"Well, what do you know about that?" exclaimed Thad Hill, puffing a cloud of smoke from his pipe. "We've been livin' on your property!"

Marta looked round, and Bob promptly grinned.

"That's perfectly all right," he declared, mainly for her benefit. "I didn't come down here to be a landlord."

"Well, that's fine," said Thad in manifest relief. "But what about the gold I've been gettin' out o' the creek? That's yours, too, ain't it?"

"Gold?" Dempsey slewed round in his chair at the table. "How much did you get?"

"Not very much," replied the old fellow with a shrug. "Just about enough to eat on."

Bob pointed to the sign on the window. "Aw, that's nothing!" growled Dempsey.

"That's all anybody should be allowed to have," stated Dr. Burton in a very definite and almost dogmatic sort of way, and he looked up at Bob. "I have an idea you gentlemen really came here to find the mine with the iron door."

"Of course," confessed Bob. "So you've heard the story, doctor? Is there any truth in it?"

"None," was the emphatic reply. "I've been over every square inch of these mountains in the last fifteen years. I'm an archæologist."

Dempsey stared blankly at him.

"Well, what's your religion got to do with it?" he asked.

Marta was tempted to laugh, but refrained.

"David means he collects Indian relics," she explained.

"Oh!" said Dempsey.

"You don't seem to have much faith in the story, doctor," commented Bob.

"About as much as I have in Aladdin and his lamp!" Burton retorted. "The country round here has been gone over by hundreds of deluded treasure-seekers. Many companies have been formed to find the mine, and people have been gullible enough to invest money in them."

"Yeah," endorsed Dempsey, "and you're lookin' at one o' them gullible guys right now!"

"Too bad you folks came all this way on a wild-goose chase," sympathised Thad, and Bob smiled rather wryly across at Marta.

"How do you feel about it, Miss Hill?" he inquired.

"It's a lovely story," she replied, "and I don't like to give up believing in it."

"The confidence of youth, Mr. Harvey," said the doctor with a wave of his hand. "I thought I'd convinced you otherwise, Marta. For my part, I've often wondered why so many people scramble for gold. Why shouldn't one be satisfied if his daily needs are met?"

He waved his hand again.

"Take the three of us here in these mountains," he went on. "I've no desire for more of the world's goods than I possess, Thad pans enough gold to live without worry, Marta looks after us both. To my mind, ours is an ideal existence."

"That's one way of looking at it, doctor," conceded Bob; but Dempsey exploded:

"Well, if I gotta worry I can think o' nothin' nicer to worry about than a million bucks!"

Dr. David Burton looked at his watch.

"I see my philosophy is wasted," he said regretfully, and stood up. "If you'll excuse me, it's past my bedtime."

"Then you don't think we have a chance, doctor?" asked Bob.

"Unfortunately, no!"

Thad Hill rose slowly from his armchair.

"Sorry, Mr. Harvey," he said, "that we can't put you and Mr. Dempsey up."

"I'm afraid we've imposed on you long enough as it is," returned Bob. "We have a tent, and I'm sure we'll get along all right."

The doctor offered his hand.

"Are you very disappointed, Mr. Harvey?" he asked.

Bob shrugged his shoulders; Dempsey said with gloom:

"Looks like we counted them golden geese before they was hatched!"

"That," said Burton, taking his hat

November 7th, 1936.

from a peg on the wall, "seems to be a habit of humanity, Mr. Dempsey."

He went out into the night, and he was striding off along the bank of the river when Bob and his partner left the cabin.

They made their camp on the site that had seemed so suitable for the purpose, lighting a fire under the stars to keep wild creatures away. Their tent proved capacious enough, but Dempsey complained about the blankets.

"They wouldn't even cover a midget," he growled.

They were glad to lie down, but sleep did not come readily, and they talked across the tent to one another after Dempsey had extinguished the lantern he had fastened to the pole.

"How did those people strike you?" asked Bob.

"Oh, they were nice and friendly, all right!" returned Dempsey. "You gotta say that about them. But I'm not so sure o' that doctor."

"He seemed to resent our presence here, didn't he?"

"Yeah, and he didn't try to hide it, neither! Say, we own this property here, don't we? Well, we could be charging rent to these people."

"Yeah," said Bob, "we could do that—if we wanted to." He changed the subject. "Say, that girl was pretty, wasn't she?"

"You did notice that, didn't ya?" There was silence for a little while, broken only by the far-off cry of a coyote, and then Bob emitted a chuckle.

"What are you laughin' at?" Dempsey sat up to ask.

"Why," replied Bob, "can you imagine a couple of guys in their right minds up here looking for hidden treasure?"

Dempsey stretched himself at full length again and wrestled with the inadequate blanket.

"Yeah," he drawled. "Looks like I'm gonna get stuck for two hundred bucks, too!"

"God's Pinnacle"

CAMP life seemed quite a novelty for the first few days, and it certainly was healthy. Bob and Dempsey spent a lot of time wandering about the plateau and climbing the mountains in quest of the mine with the iron door, but all their efforts proved unavailing. Dempsey became disheartened, and after about a week of exploring decided to pan for gold in the river with Thad Hill.

He found that less fatiguing, and after half an hour of it he said to Thad:

"You know I wish I'd started this when I first came here. At least you've got a chance to find something. How 'n I doin', Thad?"

Thad, who had instructed him in the art of panning, watched him as he knelt on the edge of the bank, scooped up some of the bed-soil, and tilted the water away.

"You're gettin' the knack pretty quick for a beginner," he encouraged. "Find anything?"

"Naw, just a swell lot o' gravel," grunted Dempsey, and he flung the contents of his pan back into the river and reached down to scoop up some more. "You know there don't seem to be no action here. How much gold do you get out, anyway?"

"Well, it kinda runs in streaks," the old fellow replied, squatting on his haunches with his own pan between his knees. "Sometimes I have a right good day—as much as ten dollars. Then it sorta peters out, and I don't find anything for a couple weeks. And then, all of a sudden like, it'll pick up again and run pretty good for a spell."

"Well," decided Dempsey, "this must be one of them lean weeks!"

The panning operations continued uneventfully for quite a while, and then the beginner cried out excitedly:

"Hi, come here! Look!"

"Found something?"

Thad put down his own pan of sheet-iron to peer into the one Dempsey was holding, and there amongst the sand he saw a silver watch.

"Wonder where that came from!" he exclaimed.

"I dunno," said Dempsey. "Somebody musta dropped it." He fished the watch out from the pan. "It's stopped."

"Too bad," said Thad. "It musta been a pretty good watch once."

"Yeah. It looks a little like mine. Lemme see."

He thrust finger and thumb into the pocket of his waistcoat where he kept his watch, and Thad burst out laughing at the comical look of utter dismay which spread over his face. The pocket was empty; the watch had fallen from it at some time when its owner was reaching down to the water!

"Guess I'd better go and dry it on your stove," Dempsey said disgustedly, and he was walking towards the cabin when he encountered Dr. David Burton, who had just emerged from it.

"Where's Harvey?" asked the doctor rather sharply.

"Oh, I ain't seen him in nearly an hour!" Dempsey replied.

"Where did he go?"

"Takin' a walk."

Burton's deep-set eyes narrowed.

"Where's Marta?" he demanded.

"I ain't seen her in nearly an hour, neither."

"Where did she go?"

"Takin' a walk."

"Did they go together?"

Dempsey resented the doctor's tone, but replied in his own way to the question.

"Well," he said, "they were sorta walkin' in the same direction."

As a matter of fact, Bob and Marta were very close together at that moment, resting side by side upon a granite boulder to which they had climbed high above a pine-wood.

"David calls this 'God's Pinnacle,'" Marta informed Bob. "You can see everything from here."

Bob surveyed the majestic landscape, then filled his pipe and lit it.

"Well," he said, "I can't see anything that Dempsey and I haven't been over during the past week." He pointed with the stem of the pipe. "Unless it's the top of that mountain over there."

"Poor Mr. Dempsey," said she, "he seems so discouraged, doesn't he?"

Bob nodded.

"There are only two things that keep Dempsey from going home to-morrow," he told her, "and both of them are his feet! You can't blame him at that. So far, all we've seen are places where people have looked for the treasure and never found it." He puffed at his pipe and smiled at her. "Peaceful here, isn't it?"

"This is my favourite spot," she declared. "David and I often come here to read."

"Do you? Dr. Burton's a strange sort of man, isn't he?"

"Yes, a little," she agreed. "But he's been wonderful. He helped grandpa build our cabin and showed him where to pan for gold in the creek."

"How did you happen to locate here?" asked Bob curiously.

"Well, grandpa prospected all through the country, and then we met David, and he persuaded grandpa to settle here near him."

While they were talking together on the boulder, Thad Hill went back to the cabin to get his midday meal. Dempsey had dried his watch, but had failed to make it tick, and had gone off with it. Burton was striding up and down the living-room, and he rapped out at the old fellow for letting his granddaughter go off with Bob so frequently.

"I think you're takin' this too serious, David," Thad protested mildly. "Marta's gotta marry some day, and we gotta look at this thing sensible like. Young Harvey seems to me to be a nice fella. If Marta got to care for him, I don't see there's anything we can do about it."

"Why did he have to come here, anyway?" raged Burton.

"Well, it's his property, ain't it?" "What if it is?" The doctor's brown eyes blazed. "Does that give him the right to destroy everything I've tried to build up? Marta was happy, wasn't she? She was satisfied."

"You're makin' a mountain out of a molehill," said Thad. "Why, she's only known him a week."

But the doctor was in a strange mood and seemed almost beside himself.

"This was our little world, all our own!" he cried. "We built it up with our own hands, and he destroys everything by his stupid search for gold! Well, he'll never find it!"

"I know that," nodded Thad. "And the chances are he'll be goin' away pretty soon."

Burton calmed down considerably.

"I'm sorry," he said in his usual quiet voice. "I didn't mean to let myself go. But you know how I feel about Marta."

"Of course I do, David. She's just like your own child."

Burton scowled at a picture on the wall over a little desk.

"Yes," he said, and strode out from the cabin.

Up on the boulder the doctor had named "God's Pinnacle," Bob had told Marta quite a lot about himself because she seemed interested.

"And now you're about ready to give up, aren't you?" she said.

"Well, it seems kind of foolish looking for this mine a thousand people have never found," he returned defensively.

"But you've only been here a little over a week," she reminded him, "and there are a lot of places you haven't seen. The night after you arrived you promised me you wouldn't let David discourage you."

"That's right," he admitted, "I did. How would you like to play for a little while?"

"I think it would be fun."

"All right, when do we start?"

"Right away."

"I'll take a look under that rock."

He slid down from the boulder and turned over a little lump of rock almost at their feet.

"Don't be silly!" she admonished.

"Silly? It might be any place!" But there was nothing under the little rock except more rock. "No, it's not there!" he exclaimed, for all the world as though he had really expected it to be.

"Of course not," she laughed. "It wants a lot more finding than that."

The Arrow and the Eye

DR. DAVID BURTON lived in a cabin he had built for himself not very far from the one he had helped to build for Thad Hill and his granddaughter. It was situated in a hollow, with its back to a wall of rock, and inside its front door steps descended to a long and narrow living-room.

Bob knocked on the door soon after he had returned with Marta that evening, and the voice of Burton called out to him to enter.

He opened the door and descended the four steps to a floor of concrete on which Indian rugs were spread. The walls were of white adobe, and there were bookshelves upon them, and books upon the table from which the doctor had risen.

"Good-evening!" said Bob pleasantly. "Dempsey told me, when I got back to camp, that you were looking for me."

"I was," confirmed Burton. "Sit down, won't you?"

Bob dropped into a chair near the table, and Burton reseated himself, pushing aside a microscope he evidently had been using.

"You're a very patient young man, aren't you?" he said, leaning forward. "More so than the average man who comes here."

Bob smiled and crossed his long legs. "I'm very much afraid, doctor," he returned, "that you're going to have to put up with us a little while longer."

"So you are really convinced that the story of the mine is not a myth, are you?"

"I don't know," Bob confessed. "I must admit that when I first heard the story I thought it was a fairy tale, but since I've been here on the ground it's sort of got under my skin."

"You seem to be enjoying yourself."

"The more people who've come up here to look for the mine and haven't found it," expounded Bob, "the better off we are."

"Oh, I'm having a great time! But poor old Dempsey's discouraged—he's quite sure there's no treasure."

"You're not staying here because of any treasure!" said Burton with sudden sternness.

"I beg your pardon?"

"I'll come right to the point. What may be a pleasant interlude to you may prove to be serious to someone else. I'm talking about Marta."

"What about her?" challenged Bob

"I'd advise you, young man, to pack up and leave us in peace!"

It sounded very much like a threat, and Bob burned with resentment. But he said, quietly, enough, as he got to his feet:

"I'll think that over. Good-night."

Bob and Dempsey had supper with Thad and his granddaughter that evening, and the atmosphere was all the pleasanter for the absence of the doctor; but Bob was not his usual cheerful self. Burton's last words had disturbed him.

It was arranged over the supper table that he and Marta should go looking for the treasure next morning, and Marta was preparing food to take with them when he called for her. Thad and Dempsey were out on the bank of the river, panning for gold.

Bob had almost a second breakfast in the cabin, and during one of her numerous journeys between the kitchen and the living-room Marta showed him a little flat cross of copper upon one side of which an eye, an arrow, and a sun were engraved.

She told him that Dr. Burton had given it to her, and he studied it with interest.

"When did he give it to you?" he asked.

"When first we came here," she replied.

"Evidently he didn't attach much importance to it."

"I don't think that," she demurred. "It's part of his Indian collection."

"The figures are Indian all right," said Bob, "but the cross is strictly Spanish."

"I never thought of that."

"The eye, the arrow, and the sun."

She left him with the cross to make some coffee, and he was still studying it when she returned.

"What'll you do if you really find the mine?" she asked.

"I'm wondering what I'll do if I don't," said he.

"You won't be any worse off than you were before."

"Won't I?"

"I mean you can still sell automobiles."

"Yes," he agreed, "I can do that. You know, when I first came down here from New York it was a sort of a lark, but now I've been here on the ground"

"You've got the gold fever," she suggested. "Is that it?"

"That's right." He handed her back the cross. "I wonder what Carrie Dailey would think if we found it?"

"Who's Carrie Dailey?" she asked quickly.

"Oh, she was the secretary in Pitkin's office!" he replied.

"Oh!"

"She invested everything she had in the Eureka Corporation. Ninety dollars. You know, I don't really care very much about the gold myself. I always managed to get along somehow."

"That's how I feel about it," said Marta. "It's not so terrible being poor."

"No?" Bob looked up at her. "You're the first one I've ever heard say so."

"What I mean," she explained, "is that if you've never had anything you don't miss it."

"That may be right," said he, "but if I'd never come down here, I—I'd

"What?" she asked; and then a hissing noise from the kitchen sent her flying out to the stove.

The coffee was boiling over.

There were two horses in a stable at the back of the cabin, presents from Dr. Burton, and very docile creatures. They rode away on them across the grassy plateau and the scrub beyond it, and in a fertile canyon they came to the ruins of a monastery.

Marta, who made an excellent guide, informed Bob that the broken walls and arches had been part of the Mission of San Capello. They were of stone hewn from the mountains, but there was no vestige of any roof left anywhere.

They picnicked on the grass-grown floor of what might at one time have been a refectory, and Bob remarked:

"I can't ever remember eating a sandwich in a monastery before!"

"Have another?" suggested Marta.

The two horses were nibbling quite contentedly. Bob had another sandwich, and then he and Marta wandered about among the extensive ruins.

"You know, I'm getting a great kick out of this," he confided.

"I'm glad," said she. "You were so quiet at supper last night that I began to think you had changed your mind about staying."

"I should say not!" he declared fervently. "I was just thinking about something else."

She did not ask him what the "something else" was, but as they went out under an archway into the canyon, she said:

"This must be quite a change from New York."

"That's what I like about it," he assured her.

"But I don't suppose you'd care to stay here indefinitely, would you?"

"Well, of course, that—that would depend."

They came to the foot of some rocks which formed part of the wall of the canyon, and Bob looked up at one more prominent than the rest.

"That's Arrow Rock," said Marta.

The rock had a bluntly pointed top, and was obviously of granite.

"The fellow who named that certainly had a vivid imagination," said Bob.

"It doesn't look much like an arrow to me."

"The arrow's on the top of it," said Marta.

They climbed adjacent rocks, and from them clambered on to the rock itself and reached its summit.

"There it is!" Marta pointed.

"David said the Indians carved it."

Cut deeply into the granite was a perfectly good representation of an arrow, the barb pointing upwards.

"Dr. Burton knows a lot about this country, doesn't he?" growled Bob.

"Yes, he does," she confirmed.

"Those Indians were pretty good carvers. Let's see where it points."

He put his eye to the shaft of the arrow and looked upwards along its length.

"Do you see anything?" asked Marta.

"Yeah, a lot of blue sky," he replied disappointedly. "Shall we go?"

They started to climb down again, but Marta suddenly stopped.

"Come to think of it," she exclaimed, "that arrow is just like the one on my cross!"

"You don't think there's any connection between the arrow and the cross, do you?" asked Bob.

"I don't know."

"Let's go back and give it another once-over—just for fun, eh?"

They went back to the arrow, and Bob gazed at it thoughtfully.

"I wonder if that old carver was smart and turned it the wrong way on purpose," he mused, and then he clambered up to the very top of the rock to apply an eye to the barb of the arrow.

"What do you see now?" inquired Marta cagerly.

Bob descended to her, and instead of answering her question pointed across the canyon to a very high rock.

"What's that big crag over there?" he asked.

"I don't know," she replied. "It's just a crag."

"Have you ever been up there?"

"No—why?"

"Well, that's the way the shaft of the arrow points. It's worth taking a look at, don't you think?"

They crossed the canyon on the horses they had left in the ruins, and they rode up a rocky slope as far as it was possible to ride, then proceeded on foot amongst clustered boulders.

But the way was steep and slippery, and Marta was cumbered by her skirts, so Bob went back to the horses and returned with a lariat, fastened one end of it round her waist, and clumbed ahead of her, so that she could hold on to the rope and be sure of not slipping backwards.

"At least, we're getting a little higher," he said, after he had helped to haul her up on to a ledge.

The crag was above them, its side like a wall and presenting no foothold whatever.

"I wonder how the monks got up there?" said Marta.

"I'm beginning to believe they didn't," said Bob.

"How do you expect to get up there?" said Marta.

Bob contemplated a fissure in the crag and rubbed his chin.

"Wait a minute, and I'll show you."

He unfastened the rope from her waist and made a noose which he passed round a little loose piece of rock and drew tight. Then he picked up the piece of rock and tried to throw it over the fissure. "It's an old Swiss custom," he said. "Look out, below!"

The missile failed to reach the fissure, and came rolling down to their feet. But a second attempt was more successful; the little piece of rock went over the crag, the rope went down the fissure, and Bob tugged at the rope and found it secure.

"Will it hold?" asked Marta in a half-scared fashion.

"I hope so," replied Bob, and started to pull himself up the face of the crag while she looked on in fear and trembling.

For the greater part of the ascent he was almost at right angles to the rock; but the rope held, and he reached the top and straddled it.

She gave a little gasp of relief and called out to him:

"Bob, what's up there?"

"A swell view!" he called back.

"Anything else?"

"Nothing! Just me!"

"Well, come on down!"

"Wait till I see if I can find another arrow. Yeah, yeah, there is something here!"

"What is it?" she cried excitedly.

"A hole in the rock—just like an eye! I'll take a look!"

He wriggled himself round on the very top of the crag and stooped to look through the hole he had likened to an eye.

"What do you see?" Marta called out.

"God's Pinnacle," he replied.

Away on the scrub beyond the ruins of the Mission of San Capello, Dr. David Burton stopped the horse upon which he had ridden from his cabin in the hollow near the river and applied a pair of powerful binoculars to his eyes.

He saw Bob, straddling the crag against the skyline, and he saw Marta below him among the boulders. His lean face was distorted with rage as he put away the binoculars and turned his horse about.

A Shock for Thad Hill

TWO hours later Bob and Marta reached the front door of the doctor's cabin and Bob banged a fist upon it. Burton, who had been pacing his living-room in a fury, admitted them with a bow.

"David," cried Marta excitedly. "I think we've found a clue to the mine. We were at the monastery, and Bob got the idea of connecting Arrow Rock with the arrow on my cross. Then he thought of looking the wrong way on the arrow—and where do you think it pointed?"

"Where?" asked Burton coldly.

"To Jupiter's Crag, across the canyon. And on the top of the crag was an eyehole, and when Bob looked through it he saw God's Pinnacle!"

"Humph!" grunted the doctor. "I followed that theory myself, but it never led anywhere."

"We haven't been up to God's Pinnacle yet," said Bob. "but at least it would be interesting to take a look."

"We came to borrow your binoculars," said Marta. "You don't mind, do you?"

"Of course not," replied the doctor in a voice he tried to render cordial. "Go ahead."

Marta snatched up the binoculars from the table where he had placed them and caught at Bob's arm.

"Come on!" she cried. "Let's hurry!"

They went out into the afternoon sunlight, and as the door was latched behind them Barton gave vent to his feelings by snatching up a valued Indian bowl and hurling it to the floor.

Bob and Marta hastened to the boulder where they had talked the day before, and through the binoculars they studied the landscape in turn; but they saw nothing more than rugged beauty all about them, drenched with sunlight, and they were badly disappointed.

In the tent that night Bob described the adventures of the day to Dempsey while the disgruntled seeker after alluvial gold was trying to make himself comfortable beneath the blanket that was too small for him.

"Aw," quoth Dempsey scornfully. "I still say it's the bunk. An eye, an arrow, and the sun. It don't make sense!"

"There must be some connection," insisted Bob. "It was on the cross that Dr. Burton gave Marta, and first I found the arrow, and then the eyehole in the rock. But the thing that had us fooled, when we got to God's Pinnacle, was the sun."

"Wasn't there no sun when you got there?" asked Dempsey with derision.

"It was covered all over with sun," replied Bob. "That was what had us stumped."

"Yeah," drawled Dempsey. "I tell you the whole thing's phony, Bob."

"Oh, Bob," she cried, clinging to him, "he—he was going to keep me here with the gold!"

I got it all doped out. Now, listen; this Dr. Burton's cracked, ain't he? The mine with the iron door has got 'em all hopped up. That cross is phony—the doc planted all this stuff around here. I've known a lot o' loony guys in my time, but, believe me, Bob, this Burton is tops!"

Marta had just retired to her bedroom, which was at the back of the cabin and opened out of the living-room. She was combing her hair in front of the mirror of her dressing-table when Burton peered into the room round a curtain over an open window and saw the cross he had given her lying on the dressing-table within reach of his hand.

Crouching back against the outer wall, so that she could not see him if she turned, he thrust his hand in over the sill and secured the cross. Then, slipping it into his pocket, he went round to the front of the cabin and knocked at the door.

A few minutes later Thad shouted at the door of Marta's room:

"Oh, Marta! David's here, and he wants to see you!"

Marta put down the brush and comb she was using and went out into the living-room, and she stared in surprise at Burton, for he was standing by the table with folded arms and his eyes were fierce.

"Why, David, what's the matter?" she exclaimed.

He gripped her right arm with both hands, and he said masterfully:

"Marta, I don't want you to have anything more to do with Harvey!"

"Why?" she asked wonderingly.

"You're not going to see him! Do you understand?" His double grip on her arm tightened, and his voice became harsh. "You're going to tell him to go away from here!"

"You're hurting my arm!" cried Marta.

"Are you going to do as I say?" he rasped.

Thad stepped forward in high concern.

"Hold on a minute, David!" he pleaded.

"You keep out of this!" roared Burton, whirling round on him. "I warned you of what was going to happen. Do you understand, Marta?"

"No, I don't understand," she replied, almost in tears. "Why should I ask him to go away?"

"Because you're in love with him!"

"Is that so wrong?"

"Why, it's only natural," declared her grandfather.

"Keep quiet, you old fool!" Burton flamed at him. "How could you have lived without me? You both came here starving. I gave you food and a cabin, and blankets to keep you warm. I found a place where you could scrape up a little of the gold you loved so much!"

"That ain't no thanks to you!" bridled Thad. "The gold was there for anybody. Year in and year out I've worked down in that creek."

"You've worked? A fine lot of gold you'd have found if it hadn't been for me. There's never been any gold in there, except what I put there for you to find!"

"You?" gasped Thad, and Marta looked horrified.

"That's what I said!" snarled Burton. "I put it there at night—just enough to keep you going—and the next day you found it!"

"Where did you get it?" asked Marta.

"I—I bought it," he replied, and his voice was shrill and unnatural. "You can buy gold, you know, and throw it away, just like bones to a dog." He turned again to Thad. "You think you worked for it? Well, go ahead and look for it now. Look for it now!"

He snatched up his hat, rammed it on his head, and went out from the cabin and slammed the door behind him.

The Iron Door

EARLY the next morning Bob and Dempsey climbed up to God's Pinnacle, Dempsey complaining loudly long before the boulder was reached, though the day was too young to be very hot.

"Hi, I thought you said this wasn't far?" he shouted, labouring upwards behind his more energetic companion. "You got a great idea o' distance!"

The boulder was reached, but he scanned the wonderful view without any enthusiasm whatever.

"Is this what you brought me up here to see?" he demanded.

"This is the spot the eye points to," said Bob. "Now what we've got to do is to figure what it has to do with the other sign. What does the sun mean to you?"

"Oh, a place to lay down in," replied the unimaginative one.

"The arrow, the eye, the sun." Bob gazed thoughtfully in every direction.

"Yeah," snorted Dempsey, "and when you put 'em all together they spell 'hooey.' Hi, where ya goin'?"

Bob had started to climb some rocks higher than the boulder.

"I'll be right back," he said over his shoulder, and reached a shelf of rock upon which a length of decaying pole lay. He examined the pole and saw that one end of it had been broken off as though from a hole in which the rest of it had stood, and he searched about the rock for the rest of the pole.

There was no actual hole, but he found the rest of the pole in what had been a hole, and he tried to wriggle it loose. Dempsey looked up and saw him hard at work.

"Hi, what're you doin'?" he shouted. "Diggin' for a bone?"

"Come up here!" Bob shouted back. Pulling and blowing, Dempsey struggled up the rocks and joined him on the shelf.

"Aw, you've certainly got a grudge against my feet," he grumbled. "This is sure a great country!"

Bob had managed to pull up the end of the pole he had worked loose. It was about two feet long.

"What's this?" he asked, rising to his feet and holding it out.

"Wood," replied Dempsey.

"You're supposed to be a smart detective. What was it before?"

"A tree."

Bob flung down the piece of wood and pointed to the cavity it had occupied.

"What was in that hole?" he asked.

Dempsey picked up the rest of the pole and thrust the end of it into the hole.

November 7th, 1936.

"A telegraph pole," he said. "Now ask me another one!"

Bob looked from the pole across the intervening country to the crag he had sealed the afternoon before, and taking a line from the crag looked down to the plateau. He found himself staring at a window of Dr. Burton's cabin which seemed to be ablaze because the sun was shining on the glass.

"Aw, it doesn't make any sense!" he growled.

The doctor was in the living-room of his cabin, bending over an open book upon the table with the light of insanity in his eyes. It was a book of verses, and he read aloud, over and over again, the first line of one particular poem:

"Yet each man kills the thing he loves! Each man kills the thing he loves."

Finally, as though he had reached a decision, he put on his hat and went out into the sunlight.

Thad Hill had had no appetite for breakfast that morning, and even his beloved pipe failed to soothe him as he sat smoking it in a chair on the porch. Marta found him there, looking a picture of dejection, and she suggested that he should take a little walk.

"Walkin' ain't goin' to help me a bit, Marta," he said sadly. "I can't even go and pan in the creek any more. Every day I figured that to-morrow, maybe, I'd strike it rich."

"We'll go somewhere else," she said; but he shook his head at her.

"Twenty years ago I coulda done that, but when you get to be my age you can't start all over again. No, Marta, I just ain't got the heart."

"Don't worry, dear," she urged, and coaxed him back into the living-room, where she was trying to induce him to eat some of his neglected breakfast when Dr. Burton walked in upon them.

Thad scowled at him, and Marta did not even utter a greeting, but stood defensively beside her grandfather. The doctor, however, seemed to be in quite a chastened mood.

"I've come to say I'm sorry about last night," he began. "I shouldn't have said the things I did."

"It's a little late to be sorry, ain't it?" growled Thad.

"Yes," admitted the doctor, "but it's silly to let a misunderstanding come between old friends. Please forget about last night."

"That was a low-down trick you played on us. How do you think Marta and I feel, livin' on you all these years?"

"I didn't want to play a trick on you," Burton declared with feeling. "I wanted you both to stay here. It was my way of trying to make you happy."

"I believe that, David," said Marta.

"I knew you would." He took her hand and held it gently in his own. "I'd like to talk to you, Marta, if you'll walk a little way with me."

"Why, certainly, David." She went with him to the door. "I'll be right back, grandpa."

While these two were walking together along the bank of the river towards the doctor's cabin, Bob and Dempsey were descending from God's Pinnacle, and Dempsey was speaking his mind.

"You can go on makin' a fool of yourself," he said, "and you can talk till you're blue in the face, but my mind is made up. I'm no glutton—I know when I've had enough."

"Wait a minute, you big sap!" exploded Bob. "You're the guy that talked me into coming out here, aren't you?"

"Yeah," confirmed Dempsey. "And I'm the guy that'll talk you into going back, too! This thing's a bust, just like I told you, and I'm gonna pack my things and get out of here!"

"What would you do if you did go back home?" inquired Bob pointedly.

"Aw, say, there's a lot o' things that I could do I never thought of before," was the confident reply, "and one of 'em will be to get that guy Pitkin!"

"Pitkin?"

"Yeah," raged the footsore detective. "If it hadn't been for him I wouldn't be down here now!"

"Temper, temper, Mr. Dempsey!" reproved Bob. "D'you know what Horace Greeley said?"

"No."

"He said, 'Go West, young man, go West!'"

"Oh, he did, eh?" Dempsey was not aware that Greeley was a famous American journalist and statesman who died in 1872. "Well, I'll get that guy, too!"

Long before they had reached the plateau, Burton and his beautiful companion had reached the cabin in the hollow and stopped outside its front door.

"Are you sure you love this young man?" asked the doctor.

"Yes," Marta replied emphatically. "quite sure."

"I can't imagine living here without you!"

She did not want to discuss that subject, and she did not want to leave her grandfather too long.

"I must go back now, David," she said.

"Oh, come in for a moment, won't you?" he pleaded. "You're not afraid of me, are you?"

She was half-afraid of him, after his outbreak of the night before, but she assured him to the contrary, and she went into the cabin with him.

The book of verses was still open on the table, and he smiled as she turned the pages while he put his hat away.

"I'm afraid I've been a great disappointment to you," she said, noticing the sadness of his smile, but he walked over to her and offered his hand.

"After all," he said, "why shouldn't you be in love with this young man? You're both young, and should have many years of happiness before you."

"David," she murmured gratefully, "you're sweet."

"Oh, no!" He shook his head.

"I've been stupid, Marta. I thought I could keep you untouched by the world, away from everything and everybody. I should have known I was wrong."

She closed the book of verses and rested a hand upon its cover.

"David, you'll like Bob when you really know him," she said.

"Yes, of course I will." He walked towards a door facing the window upon which the sun had shone, but turned abruptly away from it again. "Marta, I lied when I said I'd bought the gold I threw in the creek. That gold was part of the treasure of San Capello."

She stared at him in amazement.

"The treasure?" she cried. "But, David, I don't understand! Where did you—"

"I found it fifteen years ago," he interrupted, "and the cross that I gave you was the key to its whereabouts."

"Then Bob was right!" she exclaimed.

"Yes," he replied solemnly. "Bob was right, and I was angry, so I took your cross last night."

He produced the cross from his pocket and exhibited it on the palm of his hand.

EPISODE 2—

“Sport of Kings”

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

READ THIS FIRST

Rex, a black Arabian stallion, is worshipped by a strange race of people on the remote tropical isle of Sujan.

To Sujan come three white men who are agents of a Californian rancher named Crawford. They steal Rex, realising the fortune he can make for their employer, but one of them is captured by the Sujanese. This man, Wheeler, only earns his life and liberty by promising to recover the god horse, and travels to America in company with a native known as Pasha.

Meanwhile Rex is delivered to Crawford, but breaks free and takes to the hills. Later that day the rancher plays in a polo game at the Bruce Riding Academy, but his team loses to a side led by Frank Bradley, a popular young sportsman, and after the game Crawford vents some of his spite on a stray police dog that has roamed into the district.

The dog, Rinty, wanders off into the mountains, and there discovers Rex trapped in an abandoned mine. Meeting Dorothy Bruce, daughter of the riding academy's owner, Rinty tries to lead her to the mine, but she falls from her horse and is stunned.

In the meantime, some of Crawford's men have traced the stallion, and unaware that he is a prisoner, they attempt to smoke him out into the open. Rinty attacks them, but is struck senseless, and at that same moment the roof of the mine caves in as Rex, in his struggles, brings down a timber support!

Now Read On

A False Conclusion

B LANK dismay was written on the faces of Crawford's men as they saw the mine gallery caving in before their eyes.

The very entrance of the tunnel was affected by the collapse, rocks and dirt tumbling at the feet of the ranch employees while they stood listening to the thunder of the slide. Then, as the tumult died away, the four men reeled into the mouth of the cavern and brought up short before a mass of debris that blocked its interior from floor to ceiling.

"I guess that's the end of the black stallion, Mitchell!" Anderson said huskily.

In the deathly silence that now prevailed, the ranch-hand's voice sounded hollow and sepulchral.

"Yeah," breathed Mitchell. "Trapped under a mountain of earth! A fortune in horseflesh buried alive!"

"Maybe he still is alive," Martin exclaimed querulously. "We'd better make sure, anyway."

The idea was rejected by his comrades, Jones being the foremost in declaiming it.

"Don't be crazy, Martin," the latter scoffed. "The stallion's a goner all right. Yeah, and it would take a steam shovel to reach his body. Come on, we'd better get back to the outfit an' report to Crawford. And Mitchell, you'll have to have them wrists o' yours attended to. That wolfhound's teeth have ripped 'em a-plenty."

The four men turned and walked out into the open again, where Mitchell spurned the prostrate body of Rinty in passing. Then, striding through the smoke that still hovered about the scene, the ranch-hands made for their broncos, and soon they were riding off at a gallop.

They had scarcely disappeared when Rinty began to show signs of returning consciousness, and a few minutes later he managed to regain his feet, after which he moved somewhat shakily towards the mine entrance.

It was as the dog was standing there that he heard a voice hailing him from the far end of the canyon, and, pricking up his ears, he turned to see Dorothy Bruce, tottering in his direction.

The girl joined him at the mouth of the cavern, and knelt down beside him.

"What is it, boy?" she asked gently. "Why did you want me to follow you?"

Rinty looked at her with his soft brown eyes, then faced the pile of debris that blocked the tunnel and gave vent to a piteous whine; and suddenly, from somewhere inside the mine, the wolfhound's plaintive voice was answered by the neighing of a horse.

Dorothy Bruce straightened up with a jerk, and for a moment she stood staring at the mountain of rubble that had filled the cavern. Then all at once she remembered that there was another entrance to this mine, and calling upon Rinty to accompany her, she hurried out of the canyon.

Mitchell and his associates had been unaware that there was any alternative means of gaining the interior of the abandoned workings, and Dorothy herself would probably have been ignorant of the fact if a relative of hers had not been connected with the mine when it had been a paying proposition. It so happened, however, that this relative had once shown her over the claim, and now the girl was able to put her knowledge to good account.

Leaving the canyon, she made her way round to a rock-strewn hillside, and Rinty was close on her heels when she eventually stepped into the gloom of a cave that pierced the slope. Then, with the aid of matches which the girl possessed, they hastened deep into the core of the mountain until at last they perceived the figure of a struggling horse ahead of them.

The animal was Rex, and he was lying on the floor of the tunnel at the base of a heap of stones and earth. By amazing good luck, he had escaped the brunt of the collapse which had taken place, and which had been confined to that portion of the roof between him and the canyon entrance of the mine.

Yet, though he had escaped serious injury, his neck was pinned under the broken prop which he had brought down, and as the end of this was wedged amongst the debris it took Dorothy some time to lever it upwards.

Rex scrambled from the ground then. There was a wound on his head—nothing very severe, but no doubt it had laid him out for a spell. He seemed perfectly all right now, however, and as Dorothy and Rinty began to retrace their steps along the cavern, he followed slowly after them.

Indeed, he continued to follow them when they came out into the open. It was for all the world as if he appreciated that they were friends and wished to remain with them, and when at length Dorothy picked up the trail which led to the academy she could not help smiling at the manner in which the black stallion plodded after her, while Rinty trotted alongside her like a shadow.

In this fashion the three of them must have covered a considerable distance when a horseman appeared unexpectedly round a bend in the road, and as the girl recognised Frank Bradley she uttered a cry of welcome.

Two or three seconds later Frank was drawing rein before her.

"What happened, Dorothy?" he asked quickly. "Your riderless horse came back to the academy, and I realised something must be wrong. Then Jensen told me that you'd mentioned you were going out to Bear Creek, and I hit the trail to see if I could find you."

Dorothy proceeded to relate all that had occurred, and when she had finished her story Frank looked at Rex with keen admiration.

"Gee, he's a beauty, too, isn't he?" he said, moving forward and stroking the stallion's muzzle.

Rex remained passive under his touch. It was strange how mild his disposition could be with some men, whereas with others he was as savage as any outlaw brone. It was as if some instinct told him which human beings were to be trusted, and which were not.

"What are you going to do with him, Dorothy?" Frank asked.

"Well, he seems intent on following me," the girl replied, "so I figured on keeping him at the academy until his owner claims him—whoever the owner may be."

"A good idea," Frank commented. "Here, come on up beside me."

He lent her a hand and helped her up into his saddle. Then he looked down at Rinty.

"By the way, Dorothy," he said "Jensen was telling me that Crawford had threatened to shoot that dog if he caught him around the academy any more."

"Shoot Rinty?" the girl exclaimed with mingled horror and indignation. "I'd like to see him try it!"

"That's exactly what I told Jensen," Frank remarked grinning. "All right, Rinty, you're trailing along with us, too."

With a dig of his heels the wealthy young sportsman sent his pony forward along the road, and Rex did not have to be coaxed into accompanying the other animal. Nor did Rinty for that matter, and with Frank's mount carrying double and the god horse of Suján cantering abreast, the high-spirited wolfhound brought up the rear at a scampering run.

They reached the riding academy an hour afterwards, and here Rinty was made to understand that he could regard this establishment as his home, after all. For Jensen quickly provided him with a platter that was brimful of meat and biscuits, and fondled him joyously while he was eating the meal.

In the meantime, Rex had been led to a vacant stable, and it was while the stallion was being given a feed of oats that Dorothy's father appeared on the scene.

He, too, was informed of the circumstances in which Dorothy had found the noble-looking creature, and, as Frank had done before him, he scrutinised the horse with an appreciative eye.

"He's certainly a magnificent specimen," Bruce declared. "I've never seen a finer. You know, if he weren't coal-black I'd say he was a full-blooded Arabian."

"I wish we could keep him, dad," Dorothy murmured.

Her father shrugged his shoulders.

"At least, we can give him a home until we locate his owner," he observed. "I wonder who he does belong to, anyway? And I wonder how he came to stray into that abandoned mine where you found him?"

"I don't know," Dorothy rejoined, "but it looked as if someone had been trying to smoke him out. For the brush had been set on fire, and there were men's footprints around the mouth of the tunnel—where it had caved in. I wish Rinty could talk. He might be able to tell us something about the whole business."

There was a silence, and then Frank Bradley spoke again.

"You know something?" he announced. "That stallion seems gentle enough, but somehow I've got an idea he's never been broken to a saddle."

"I wonder," Dorothy's father mused.

"Well, if my hunch is right I'd sure like to have the training of him," Frank said. "What a polo horse he'd make."

Bruce favoured him with a smile.

"Maybe you'll get the chance of training him," he stated, "if nobody lays any claim to him. He couldn't be in better hands. No one knows more about horses than you do, Frank, and no one I've ever seen has a better way with them."

"Coming from an old hand like you, Mr. Bruce," the younger man answered genially, "that's praise calculated to turn a fellow's head."

They moved away from the stall in which Rex had been lodged, and in which he seemed quite content to remain, and a little later they were again speculating on the ownership of the stallion.

They did not know that the horse had been stolen and transported from a far tropical island that was the abode of a curious race of people. Only Crawford and his hirelings could have told them that—Crawford, who at this very moment was driving his high-powered automobile along the rough track which led to his distant ranch.

It was as Crawford drew up outside his house that Mitchell came across from the corral, followed by Jones, Martin and Anderson. And before long the rancher was listening to an account of the disaster which had supposedly overtaken Rex.

"You—you mean the god horse was killed?" Crawford jerked, as soon as he had heard the story. "Couldn't you have saved him?"

"We didn't have a chance, boss," said Jones. "Besides, we was mighty anxious about gettin' Mitchell to the nearest town and lettin' a doctor look him over."

For the first time Crawford noticed that Mitchell's wrists were heavily bandaged.

"What happened to you, then?" he demanded.

"Some big wolf dog nearly killed me while we was tryin' to smoke out that stallion, boss," Mitchell explained.

Crawford thought of the stray he had encountered at the Bruce Academy, and wondered if it were the same wolfhound as that which had attacked his employee. Then his mind veered round to the god horse of Suján, and a look of distress crossed his heavy features—not the distress which a lover of animals might have experienced, but the distress of a man who felt that a fortune had been lost by the death of that splendid creature.

"I'd have given every polo pony I own," he said, "to have had that black Arabian in my stable."

Wheeler Again

A WEEK had elapsed, a week during which pressure of business had kept Crawford from the Bruce Riding Academy, or he might have discovered that the god horse Rex was very much alive and in process of being trained by Frank Bradley.

For, as no inquiries had been made regarding the stallion, Frank had eagerly taken on the task of introducing him to a saddle and generally preparing him for a career as a polo pony.

It was a task that had presented many difficulties, for Rex had shown a tremendous amount of stubbornness at first. However, Frank had persevered—and without attempting to break his spirit, but rather by dint of great patience and unflinching kindness, the young sportsman had finally overcome the horse's obstinacy.

And now, at the end of a week, Rex was not only perfectly willing to carry him on his back, but was answering to the rein as if he had been used to a master all his life. Also, he had become accustomed to galloping around a polo field and vying with other thoroughbreds in the pursuit of a white ball. For Frank had got the length of giving him frequent "work-outs" in practice matches during the afternoons.

It was after one of these work-outs that Frank was joined by Dorothy Bruce, who had been looking on from the touchline.

"Well," the girl said, "you seem to be able to handle him now all right."

"Yes," Frank told her, "he's coming along swell. I think I'll give him his first real chance to-morrow."

Dorothy's eyes lit up.

"You mean—you're going to use him in the game against Crawford's team?"

"Yes, I haven't seen Crawford for a week, but I presume the fixture's still on. He suggested it himself, after that last match. Seemed mighty anxious to have an early chance of turning the tables on my team, in fact. Anyway, I'll 'phone him up this evening, and if the game takes place I'll give the stallion a break in the first chukker."

The girl turned to watch Rex for a moment as he was being led away by Jensen, the stable-hand.

"It's marvellous, the way you've trained that horse in such a short time, Frank," she murmured presently. "Gee, you'd take it pretty hard if someone showed up now and claimed him, wouldn't you?"

Frank toyed thoughtfully with the polo mallet that he was carrying.

"If his real owner showed up I'd have to surrender the stallion, of course," he said. "But the ownership would have to be proved right up to the hilt before I'd let him go. Bill of sale, pedigree, and all the rest of it."

Neither Frank nor Dorothy realised it, but a man was hovering within earshot of them, and that man was Mitchell, who had quite recovered from the injuries Rinty had inflicted on him and who had dropped in casually at the Bruce Field while on his way to Crawford's ranch from the city.

He had seen the practice match, and to his utter amazement had recognised Rex; and now, after hearing the conversation that had passed between Frank Bradley and Dorothy, he turned sharply on his heel and made for the car park, where he had left a sedan in which he had been travelling.

Some time later Mitchell could have been seen driving up to the Crawford ranch-house in a cloud of dust, and on bringing the automobile to a halt and entering the well-appointed residence he located his employer in the lounge.

Quickly he related what he had seen and overheard, and his story left Crawford agape.

"Are you sure it was the god horse of Sujan, Mitchell?" the rancher demanded incredulously.

"I couldn't mistake that stallion," the other replied. "Don't ask me how he got outa that mine, boss—I only know that he's at the Bruce Academy. Yeah, and I know that you're gonna have a hard time claimin' him. Bradley says he won't give him up without a bona fide bill of sale."

Crawford gritted his teeth.

"After you fellers bringing that horse all the way from Sujan," he said, "I don't mean to let Bradley or anyone else take him away from me. We'll get Rex back, Mitchell—without a bill of sale. Yep, and once he's safe in my stables here, no one will ever be able to prove he doesn't belong to me. Now listen—"

He stopped abruptly, and all at once Mitchell saw that his glance had travelled towards the doorway—saw, too, that his eyes had widened extraordinarily and that his face had blanched, as if he had suddenly found himself looking upon a ghost.

Mitchell turned, and next instant he was wearing the same stricken expression as that which had dawned on the features of his employer. For there on the threshold stood a man who had been given up for dead, a man whose silent arrival was as uncanny as a visitation from the world beyond the grave.

"Wheeler!" Mitchell gasped.

There was a pause, and then the newcomer moved fairly into the room.

"Kinda surprised to see me, ain't you?" he sneered, looking from one to the other of the two men whom he had surprised.

His voice had the effect of convincing them that he was of human flesh and blood, and Crawford managed to speak, though with an obvious effort.

"Why, Mitchell told me you were dead!"

"Yeah," blurted Mitchell, "we thought you were dead, Wheeler. We thought them natives would be certain to finish you."

Wheeler eyed him grimly.

"That didn't prevent you from leavin' me to their tender mercies, did it?" he ground out.

"But we hadn't any choice," Mitchell protested. "Martin and I wouldn't have deserted you willingly, Wheeler. You know that. The fact was we were both plenty scared, and we thought we heard somebody givin' the alarm."

Wheeler's lip curled slightly. Then, after a brief silence, he spoke again.

"Well, the natives didn't kill me," he stated. "I managed to fool them and make my get-away from the island. My next port o' call was Zembla, where I hopped a transoceanic plane for the States. And here I am, Crawford—so what about my cut for helping to get that god horse?"

The rancher pursed his lips.

"That stallion got away from us," he grunted. "We're aiming to grab him to-morrow during a polo game at the Bruce Field."

"Meaning what?" Wheeler asked with a frown.

"Meaning that as soon as I get the horso you and Mitchell and Martin will collect your dough," answered Crawford. "But you've got to throw in with us on this job, Wheeler—that's understood, I guess."

A look of cunning appeared on Wheeler's features.

"Any plan in mind?" he queried.

"Yeah," said Crawford. "I've got a kind of a hunch. Sit down and let's discuss it."

For the next ten minutes there was a low-toned drone of conversation in the lounge of the ranch-house, and at the end of that time Crawford's scheme had been arranged in every detail. Then, making a somewhat vague excuse, Wheeler took his leave, and from the ranch-house walked westwards along the road until he came to a grove of trees.

Amongst those trees stood an open car. It was a car which the man had hired on landing in America, and in it a swarthy individual of foreign appearance was seated, an individual who was none other than Pasha.

"Well?" the Sujanese asked as Wheeler joined him.

The pair of them were dragging Jensen to the far end of the stable.

"The god horse wasn't there," Wheeler muttered. "He's at a place known as the Bruce Ridin' Academy, and Crawford aims to get him back to-morrow."

Pasha looked at him keenly. "What did you say to this man Crawford?" he demanded in his queer, halting English.

"I told him that I'd managed to escape from Sujan," came the reply. "My story was correct in most of its details, but I didn't tell him that I'd struck a bargain with Tanaga, the high priest of your race. Nor did I tell him that you were with me, Pasha. He musn't know that, because I've pretended to join up with him again."

The native directed an ominous glance at him.

"Wheeler," he said, "I warn you once more that you had better not try any tricks. If Tanaga should cease to hear from me, he will send someone here to take my place and hound you to your doom."

Wheeler gestured impatiently. "Now listen," he expostulated. "What have I to gain by double-crossin' you and Tanaga? Didn't Tanaga promise me that if I brought the stallion back to Sujan I'd be richly rewarded in gold an' jewels? Yeah, and all that Crawford would pay me is a mangy coupla hundred dollars. So, naturally, I ain't gonna let you down, am I? Naturally, I'm gonna play straight with the highest bidder, ain't I?"

Pasha eyed him steadfastly for a moment, and then he inclined his head.

"Good!" he murmured. "I only wished to make sure that you understood the position fully, Wheeler."

Behind the Scenes

IT was Saturday afternoon, and a crowd of enthusiastic spectators was watching the first chukker of the game between Frank Bradley's team and a side raised by Crawford.

The match was being played at top pace, and every man in both teams seemed to be inspired by a tremendous keenness. Clods of earth were being thrown up by the thundering hoofs of their ponies as they galloped hither and thither, and the crack of mallet against ball resounded across the field at intervals of every two or three seconds.

The interest of the onlookers, however, was largely concentrated upon the rival skippers, Crawford and Frank Bradley. For again and again these two figured prominently in the play, matching their skill with the mallet and their talents as horsemen one against the other.

The mounts which carried them seemed to have a perfect understanding with their riders. Indeed, it was as if men and beasts were acting to the impulse of the same mind, so swiftly was a movement of the rein or a touch of the heel obeyed. Yet, in those sharp duels which took place between Frank and Crawford, it was generally the younger man who came off with the honours.

Playing at position No. 3, which is the most important berth in any polo team, Frank was giving an exhibition that could not have been surpassed. Up with his two forwards in attack or helping No. 4 to defend the goal just as the run of the game required, he had the spectators on their toes time after time with the sheer brilliance of his tactics.

Roek-like in defence, dangerously thrustful whenever he dashed up-field to attempt a score, he dominated that first chukker from the start to finish, and earned the acclaim of the crowd. At the same time he was well aware that the impressive performance which he was giving was due in no small measure to the stallion he was riding.

He had been pretty certain before the game had begun that the black would acquit himself well. But the animal was exceeding all expectations, and it was small wonder that Crawford was beaten so frequently in his efforts to obtain a shot at goal. Frank Bradley's superiority as a player was not entirely responsible for that—a fair proportion of the credit was merited by Rex.

As for Crawford, he had realised from the first moment of setting eyes on the stallion that Mitchell's information had not been false. It was the god horse of Sujan all right, and the sight of Frank Bradley on it had aroused in him a savage anger, an anger which had been fanned during those occasions when the younger man had outshone him.

He had never liked Frank Bradley. Prior to Frank joining the Bruce Riding Academy and taking up polo, the name of Crawford had been mentioned in tones of awe by followers of the game. But now it was Bradley who was the favourite with the crowd, and Crawford was almost a back number.

And to-day, seeing Frank astride the god horse, Rex, Crawford's antagonism was heightened considerably, even though he knew that the stallion would not be long in the younger man's possession if all went well.

With such ugly reflections passing through his mind, it was scarcely surprising that Crawford resorted to unsavoury measures during the closing stages of the chukker. A thoroughly bad sportsman at heart, the man had never shown any scruples regarding the methods he adopted when an opponent proved too clever for him.

The spectators were quick to notice the streak of viciousness that revealed itself in his play, and none observed it more quickly than Bruce, the head of the academy, who was occupying a grand-stand seat in the directors' box.

Dorothy was beside him, and he spoke to her in a grim undertone.

"Crawford's at it again," he said. "I don't like those rough tactics he's so fond of using. There! Did you see him then—trying to crowd young Bradley off the ball? That's what I call dangerous play. It's liable to cause a bad accident."

The girl compressed her lips. "I know, dad," she agreed. "And Crawford's always the same when he's up against Frank. I haven't any time for that man. He's a good player on his day, but he just hates to be on the losing side."

She continued to watch the game—a trifle anxiously, for Crawford was making a nerve-racking spectacle of it now, and she could not help uttering a sigh of relief when that first chukker ended without any serious spill taking place.

Down on the field, Frank Bradley centered to the side-line and dismounted from Rex, surrendering him to the care of Jensen. Then, even as the wealthy young sportsman was in the act of climbing astride a fresh pony, he heard the familiar voice of Crawford behind him.

"A goal up in the first chukker," the rancher grunted, referring to a score that Frank had made. "You're kind of lucky to-day, aren't you, Bradley?"

Frank grinned at him. He was completely unperturbed by the ominous tactics that Crawford had been employing.

"Anybody would be lucky with a horse like that stallion," he commented. Swinging himself into the saddle of the horse that was his second string, he spurred close to Rex and caressed the black Arabian's sleek muzzle while Crawford looked on venomously.

"Yes," Frank said to the magnificent creature that had carried him through the opening chukker, "anybody would be lucky with a horse like you—wouldn't they, old boy?"

Rex whinnied gently, and with a smile Frank turned to address Jensen.

"Make sure that you give him a good rub down," he declared. "He's certainly earned it."

"I'll give him a good rub down all right, Mr. Bradley, sir," the stable-hand answered, and a moment later Frank was riding back on to the pitch for the next chukker.

The other three members of his team centered out to their positions as well, and Crawford and his colleagues also took the field. At the touchline Jensen paused to watch the commencement of the second period. Then, as the game was resumed, he marched Rex off in the direction of the stables.

No one else was visible in the neighbourhood of the stables as Jensen led the god horse into his stall, for everyone was interested in the match that was in progress. But Jensen had scarcely disappeared when three men slunk round a corner into view.

They were Wheeler, Jones, and Mitchell, the last-named carrying three ropes that had been gathered into coils, and with wary tread they began to move along the front of the stables.

"That guy Jensen took the black Arabian into the end stall," Mitchell whispered to his accomplices. "When we get there, you fellows can handle him while I keep watch outside. Is that clear?"

The others nodded, and the three men crept on. Then, just as they were passing a stall which they imagined to be empty, they heard a menacing growl and looked in to see a grey wolfhound glaring up at them from behind the lower half of a double door.

The dog had been eating some food that was heaped on a platter, but had raised his alert head at the sound of footsteps, and now, on perceiving the animal, Jones and Mitchell recognised him immediately as the wolfhound which had attacked them at the entrance to the abandoned mine.

Rinty recognised them, too, and his growl quickened to a threatening, hostile bark. Another instant and he would have been leaping over the transom in an irresistible onslaught, but remembering the damage that had been done to his wrists Mitchell acted with the promptness of a badly frightened man.

Giving vent to a hoarse ejaculation, he clutched the top half of the stable door and slammed it shut. Then, fastening it, he exchanged a scared glance with Jones.

"That same cursed dog!" he panted. "Yeah, an' listen to the racket he's kickin' up!" Jones bit out. "It's liable to make Jensen suspicious. We'd better hurry up an' get this job over."

Within the locked stable Rinty was hurling himself bodily at the door and barking furiously, and, gritting their teeth as they realised that the din would most probably spoil their plans, Mitchell and Jones hastened forward with Wheeler close behind them.

They reached the stall into which Jensen had taken Rex, and as they peered into it cautiously they saw the stable-hand standing beside the black Arabian. He had a chamois rag in his fist, and was wiping away the perspiration that lathered the horse's sleek but powerful form, and, while engrossed upon this task, he was quietly humming the refrain of a popular melody.

The barking of Rinty was still audible to Mitchell, Jones, and Wheeler, but the stable-hand apparently did not hear it, or, if he did, he certainly paid no heed to it.

Mitchell looked at Wheeler and Jones in a satisfied manner, and then he made a sign, whereupon his confederates drew out a couple of heavy revolvers and grasped them by the barrels, club-fashion.

Next moment they had pushed open the door of the stall, and even as it was swinging back on its hinges they pounced on the unsuspecting Jensen and struck him down.

The stable-hand was taken completely unawares. He had no time even to look round and catch as much as a glimpse of his assailants before Jones' gun-butt descended upon his skull, and as he was going down he received a second blow—from Wheeler this time.

Falling, Jensen lay in the straw that matted the floor of the stable. Yet he was still partially conscious, and with a groan on his lips he was feebly attempting to rise when Jones hit him again.

The sickening impact of that third blow was too much for the stable-hand, and his mind became a blank. He was quite limp when Jones and Wheeler pulled him to his feet and wrapped his arms around their necks, supporting him between them.

"All right, get him over in that corner," jerked Wheeler.

Mitchell had remained just outside the stable door and was glancing to and fro, ready to give the alarm if anyone approached. But the coast was clear, and after a second or two he peered into the stall to follow the movements of his confederates.

The pair of them were dragging Jensen to the far end of the stable, and they dumped him down beside the manger. Then they returned to the door at which Mitchell was standing, being careful to steer clear of Rex, for the stallion had become restive.

"Quick, the ropes!" said Jones.

Mitchell handed over a couple of lariats, one to Jones and one to Wheeler, and soon Rex's head was snared by the nooses of those lariats. And though the horse began to resist immediately it felt the rawhide thongs tightening upon it, it was hauled out into the open after a brief struggle.

Mitchell now threw his own lasso over it, and joined his accomplices in the tussle, which was sharp and fierce while it lasted. But the three men contrived to manoeuvre Rex round the stable to a hitch-rail where three other horses were standing.

The horses in question belonged to the thieves, and Jones and Wheeler mounted theirs, then closed in on the captive stallion and sandwiched the plunging animal.

"Can you handle him?" gasped Mitchell, still on foot.

Jones and Wheeler were shortening their grip on their lassoes.

"Yeah," the former said tersely. "We can handle him all right. Slip your lariat, Mitchell, an' stand clear. We're practically on our way."

Deftly Mitchell disengaged his rope and coiled it on his arm.

"Okay, boys!" he stated, moving aside. "I'll stick around and tip off Crawford that the job's done."

"And will he be pleased!" Jones chuckled. "Come on, Wheeler. See you later at the ranch, Mitchell."

Pressing against Rex's flanks, the two horsemen rode off with him and took the east trail. As for Mitchell, he stood and watched them until a dip in the road had hidden them from sight, and then, hanging his lasso on his brone's saddle-peg, he sauntered casually round to the front of the stables again.

In one of the stalls he could hear Rinty barking vociferously, but as he walked on in the direction of the polo field the sound grew faint, and in its place there arose to the ears of Mitchell the confused tumult of the crowd which was watching the game between Crawford's team and the side led by Frank Bradley.

There was a lull in that tumult even as Mitchell was approaching the pitch, however, and on arrival at the touchline he saw Crawford appealing for the match to be held up. It was an appeal which was immediately allowed when it was discovered that the rancher had broken his mallet in an encounter with Frank a moment before, and as he cantered to the side of the field to obtain a fresh stick Mitchell succeeded in drawing close to him.

Crawford observed him at once, and, while a new mallet was being fetched, he leaned down from the saddle and addressed his hireling in an undertone.

"Any news for me?" he grunted.

"Yeah," Mitchell answered out of the corner of his mouth. "Jones and Wheeler are on the way to the ranch with the black Arabian, boss."

Crawford's eyes gleamed with satisfaction, and then he bent still closer to the other man.

"Did you have any trouble at all?" he asked.

Mitchell shook his head and smiled a twisted smile.

"Nope," was his reply. "Leastways, none to speak of. Jensen the stable-hand never saw us. We sneaked up on him and knocked him cold afore he could even turn around, boss."

A look of keen approval crossed the rancher's face, and he laid a hand on his employee's shoulder.

"Nico work," he said. "All right, I'll see you after the match."

Thirty seconds later Crawford was back in midfield and play was in progress again, and, seeking the best vantage point that was available, Mitchell settled down to follow the remainder of the second chukker.

The score was still in the Bradley team's favour, and it was not long before Mitchell formed the opinion that Crawford's side had little chance of drawing level, for even though Frank was no longer on Rex he was as great a menace as ever to his opponents.

Nor was it long before Mitchell realised that Crawford was out to beat Frank Bradley by fair means or foul. He was obviously making a mark of the younger fellow, and was bearing down on him with dangerous foolhardiness every time he was anywhere near the ball.

Mitchell fingered his chin thoughtfully. He himself was no prude, to quibble at dirty play. But he reckoned Crawford might show a little more cleverness in his methods. Funny how Crawford seemed to lose his self-control on occasion—a man who was pretty smart in the usual way, too. He just hated anyone to get the better of him, whether it was in sport or in business.

Well, Frank Bradley could certainly make rings around him at polo, Mitchell reflected. Nobody could deny that.

"That guy Crawford is deliberately following Bradley!" Mitchell heard an irate bystander exclaim. "Look at him! He's trying to bullock him down whenever Bradley seems like making a score."

There was an angry murmur of agreement from several other spectators.

"He's playing the man, not the ball!" one of them snapped. "That's not polo—not as the average sportsman knows it, anyhow. Crawford ought to be ruled out of the game!"

"You're dead right," a third on-looker declared. "He's a menace, and if he goes on like this there's liable to be a nasty spill."

Even as those words were spoken Frank Bradley and Crawford were racing for the ball, which had just been driven in the direction of the losing team's goal. They were galloping neck and neck at the moment, but in the course of that swift dash down the centre of the field Frank seemed to pull slightly ahead, and he was lifting his mallet to send in a shot when his opponent swerved into him.

It was a heavy charge, and both horses reeled from the shock. Next second Frank's pony was crashing to earth, and a gasp of horror went up from the crowd as the animal was seen to roll over the prostrate figure of its rider.

Beery's Broad-jumping Frogs Give Hollywood New Sport

Hollywood film folk have taken up the sport of frog-racing and broad-jumping. The new fad was introduced by Wallace Beery, who captured six giant frogs, ranging from one foot to two feet in length, in the lake of the C. C. Moore estate in Santa Cruz, where scenes for "Old Hutch" were being filmed.

Spencer Tracy, Robert Montgomery, James Stewart, and Director J. Walter Ruben are searching all Southern California in the hope of finding frogs that can beat Beery's best broad-jumper. To date, Stewart and Ruben have the largest "racing" stable of all, with ten frogs apiece.

The Frog Handicap was to be held at once, but several of the owners have asked for added time to get their "steeds" in condition.

Walk on Hands to Keep Waist

Hollywood's stars have told the world about a hundred and one ways to keep in physical condition and retain slim waist-lines, but it remained for Henry Fonda to spring a new one, which he claims is best of all.

He walks on his hands ten minutes a day!

Fonda learned the trick several years ago when a student at the University of Minnesota.

"You don't have to be an acrobat to do it," says the Walter Wanger Paramount star, who has everybody in the unit filming "Spendthrift" trying his system.

Hand-walking is like learning to ride a bicycle, declares Fonda. You take a few tumbles until you acquire the knack of it—and then it's simple.

His tip to beginners' is to start on a lawn or a thick rug and bar spectators.

They Seek Him Here

At the rate of more than one hundred a day, two thousand children have been interviewed by David O. Selznick in the search for child actors to portray the leading rôles in "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer." So far only four aspirants have merited screen tests.

While Selznick and William Wellman, the director, conduct studio interviews, other Selznick International executives are touring all parts of California, visiting swimming pools, playgrounds, beaches, parks, and similar spots where children are found. Even the newsboys delivering papers in the studio have been given interviews. But still the hunt goes on.

Selznick is taking great pains to ensure that Mark Twain's admirers should have no cause for complaint on the grounds of authenticity. A camera unit has just returned by plane to Hollywood from a 1,863-mile tour along the banks of the Mississippi, where scenes described in the book were filmed.

"Old Hutch" Company Transforms Rented Farm

Wallace Beery can have the job of foreman on any ranch in Santa Cruz November 7th, 1936.

County, and not because he's a motion-picture star!

When the owners of the Bartlett Ranch in Isabel Grove, situated in Northern California, rented the estate to the "Old Hutch" company, they didn't expect the Hollywood city folk to prove such expert farmers.

Returning from a vacation, the owners found a great change in their ranch. Many acres of fallow field had been ploughed and sown, fences had been set up, and the whole film location acreage had taken on the appearance of a model farm.

Director J. Walter Ruben explained that the script for the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture called for Beery to make a complete change in the farm, including the ploughing and sowing.

To the ranchers' amazement that film folk could farm so expertly, Beery explained that he owned and supervised two farms of his own in San Fernando Valley.

Business as Usual

Here's another of those unusual circumstances that make history at motion-picture studios.

For several of the most important scenes for Paramount's "Johnny Gets His Gun," a practical machine shop was required. One was found in Los Angeles and moved to the studio.

It took four days to transport it, set it up, and get it into perfect working order. The machinery, which included a four-ton lathe, is the property of Harry Reynolds, who leased it to the studio because his business was slack.

No sooner had he parted with it than orders began pouring into his office. One was from his best customer, an aeroplane factory, which demanded the immediate delivery of a number of parts.

Reynolds was temporarily stuck, but solved his problem by making arrangements to turn out the parts at the studio at night after the company, including Ralph Bellamy, Katherine Locke, little David Holt, and Andy Clyde, had quit work for the day.

Chimp Needs Make-up

"Jiggs," chimpanzee who has worked with a score of stars and featured players during his four years on the screen, has had an attack of temperament since going to work with Dorothy Lamour, Ray Milland, and Sir Guy Standing in Paramount's "Girl of the Jungle," now on location at Brent's Crag, in the Santa Monica mountains.

He refuses to work unless properly made-up.

Jiggs, who knows and reacts to all motion-picture terminology, such as "camera," "cut," and "wrap 'em up"—the latter meaning to finish work for the day—insists on the following make-up before going into a scene with Miss Lamour:

Lamp black to darken his coat.
Mineral oil to make it shiny.

Brown make-up on his face to lighten it up and make him stand out among other monkeys working in the production.

Enraged Indians Make Trouble on Location

A dramatic story of facing a horde of enraged Indians, worked up to a near-frenzy by the beating of an improvised war-drum, was told by a handful of relieved Hollywood movie men on their return from the Montana location for Cecil B. DeMille's picture, "The Plainsman," the other day.

It was, they say, the last day of filming. The rest of the Hollywood troupe including the stars, Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur, had been sent home the day before. Shooting was finished; the big quartermaster's tent where the props were housed on the banks of the Tongue River was being torn down, and the 1,000 Cheyenne braves who worked in the picture were gathered to receive their final pay.

An argument arose between the chiefs and Eugene Hornbostel, business manager for the location company. Voices were raised. Epithets were shouted in the Cheyenne tongue. Spears were brandished and fists raised. Hornbostel tells that he felt a curiously hot rage rising in his own breast. Then Harry Woodward, a transportation man, pulled him aside.

"Listen," said Woodward. "Hear that?"

"Hear what?" And then Hornbostel was conscious of the rhythmic beating of a drum, hollow and relentless, in the near distance.

"Look!" said the man at his side.

Hornbostel saw pointed out to him an Indian, dressed in the war paint and feathered bonnet he had worn in the movie scene, beating steadily on the top of a gasoline drum. The sound, almost inaudible in the hubbub at the prop tent, had been working subtly at the nerves of everyone within hearing distance.

Hornbostel picked up a revolver and twirled it on his thumb over a table piled with notes totalling more than 3,000 dollars.

"Get out of here, all of you!" he told the Indians. "I'll give your pay to Dusty Buffalo, president of your council, and you can get it from him. Clear out!"

In the meantime Woodward had chased the drumming Indian from his improvised tom-tom—chased him all the way across the river.

On hearing Hornbostel's ultimatum, not an Indian at the prop tent moved. Then, as he gripped the butt of the revolver in his hand and levelled the barrel at them, they began to drift away. In fifteen minutes they had gone and the handful of tense white men surrounding Hornbostel began to breathe easier.

As they tell the story now, they believed themselves in one of the tightest spots of their lives.

“THE MINE WITH THE IRON DOOR”

“You took it, David?” she gasped, staring at him. “But why?”

“I wanted to keep the gold shut away from the world for the harm it might do.” He shrugged his shoulders with an air of resignation. “But that was wrong, so, Marta, I’m going to give you the treasure of San Capello. Come, I’ll show you!”

He opened the door of what appeared to be a clothes cupboard, and from a shelf in it he slipped a six-shooter into his pocket, then went back to her with an electric torch in his left hand.

“I built this house to conceal the entrance to the mine,” he said, leading her into the cupboard. “I was very foolish then.”

“You mean it’s here?”

“You shall see.”

He pulled aside some coats and overcoats suspended on hangers, and opened a rough door they had concealed. Beyond it was a room hardly any larger than the cupboard, and on the other side of it another door. He motioned to her to precede him, then closed the cupboard door and opened the inner one.

The light of the torch shone upon uneven steps of rock that led downwards between walls of rock, and he helped her down the steps into an atmosphere that seemed stale and unpleasant.

More than fifty steps were descended, and then the rays of the torch lit up a great door of iron set in the solid rock before them, its rusty surface quaintly covered with a lattice-work of bars.

“The Iron Door!” cried Marta.

“Yes,” said Burton.

“Oh, Bob will be so happy!”

“Yes, Bob will be happy.” Burton inserted a key in the lock of the door and turned it, then tugged at the handle below the lock and the heavy door opened. “Come, Marta!”

Saved!

THAD HILL was sitting on the porch of his cabin, snoking his pipe, when Bob and Dempsey returned from their climb. Dempsey went on to the camp with the avowed intention of packing his things, but Bob stepped up on to the porch.

“Where’s Marta?” he inquired.

“She left a while ago with David,” Thad replied.

“Will she be back soon?”

“Well, she oughta be—they’ve been gone some time now. Sit down, boy.”

There was a second chair on the porch, and Bob was not sorry to sink down on it after his exertions. He took out his own pipe and filled it, and Thad presently explained to him why he was idling away the morning.

“And do you really believe Dr. Burton threw that gold in the stream?” asked Bob.

“Well,” said Thad, “I never did find much there at a time. Just kinda dribs and drabs, like it mighta been ladled out.”

“Do you suppose that—?”

“What?”

Bob was afraid it was rather a wild idea that had entered his head, born of the blazing sunlight he had seen on the panes of one of the windows of Burton’s cabin, and decided not to mention it.

“Oh, nothing,” he said. “I was just wondering.”

He sat turning the idea over in his mind for several minutes, then rose abruptly to his feet.

“I think I’ll have a little talk with Dr. Burton,” he decided.

“Uhuh,” nodded Thad. “And bring Marta back with you.”

Marta, at that moment, had passed beyond the iron door into what seemed to be a great subterranean cavern rather than a mine, and she shivered a little as she waited in the darkness while the doctor closed the door.

“Spooky, isn’t it?” she murmured.

“Don’t be afraid,” said he.

“I’m not,” she assured him. “I’m just excited. I—I can’t believe it, David. It’s just like a dream!”

“We must have plenty of light,” he said. “Don’t move!”

She remained perfectly still while he struck matches and lit a number of candles, some of which stood upon ledges of rock and some upon great wooden chests and boxes.

The size of the cavern surprised her; as it became illuminated the presence of the treasure became manifest. Chests and boxes and caskets were littered all over the vast floor, and some of them were open, and their contents glittered.

“Wonderful!” she breathed.

“We must have plenty of light,” Burton said again. “You can’t see the gold in the dark.”

He lit more candles, till at least a dozen were flaring, and then Marta looked down into one of the open chests and cried:

“Oh, look, David!”

“Pick it up,” said Burton, “it can’t hurt you.”

She picked up a nugget of pure gold—one of a thousand nuggets in the chest—and she was gazing at it with rapture when he stooped over another chest and began to toss nuggets and ancient Spanish gold coins in all directions. She dropped the nugget and covered her back against a tall box, alarmed by the strange expression on his face.

“What frightened you, Marta?” he asked, walking towards the other side of the box.

“You—you look so strange in that light, David,” she faltered.

He ruffled his grey hair with his hands and leaned an arm on the box, facing her. A candle flared between them, and there was madness in his eyes.

“There it is!” he said in a voice that rose almost to a screech. “Gold! Gold that everyone wants so much! There! The cause of greed, treachery, hate, murder! Gold! Take it—touch it! It’s yours! But you can’t eat it! You can’t drink it! You can’t breathe it! You must learn about this gold—I must teach you!”

He raised his hands.

“This gold—all this gold that you see here—isn’t worth one little ray of sunshine—one clean breath of air—one glimpse of the blue sky!”

Bob was hammering on the front door of the cabin, but the noise did not penetrate to that remote and underground place. Marta gazed fearfully at the man whose eyes were boring into her own, and she was filled with fear of him.

“I never harmed you, David,” she said shakily. “You’ve always told me you love me.”

“Each man kills the thing he loves,” Burton quoted in a way that made her blood run cold, “by each let this be heard. Some do it with a bitter look, some with a gentle word. The coward does it with a kiss, the brave man with a sword—” He broke off and moved round the box to her.

“Each man kills the thing he loves!” Bob had entered the cabin, calling Burton’s name, but he found the living-room deserted, and on the table lay the cross. He picked it up, wondering how it got there, and he looked at the symbols engraved upon it, then mounted the steps again and stood in the front doorway, looking up to the pole he had left in the hole in the ledge of rock above God's Pinnacle.

He looked at the window upon which the sun had shone, and he went to it and peered through its panes. In a direct line from the pole, through the window, stood the door of the cupboard.

Re-entering the cabin, he made straight for the cupboard and dived into it. He pulled aside the coats and overcoats, just as Burton had done, and he found the door they had concealed.

He found the inner door and opened it, and in the light of matches which he struck, he saw the steps and descended them to the door of iron.

Burton had caught hold of Marta, and she was struggling to free herself from his grip.

"Let me go, David!" she screamed. "Let me go! Let me go!"

Bob heard and was alarmed.

"Marta!" he shouted, and tried to open the iron door.

"Let me go! Let me go! Let me go!" shrieked Marta, fighting frantically to get away from the madman who held her; and then Bob banged on the iron door, and Burton let go of her to snatch out his gun.

The gun was levelled at her, but she flew to the door and tugged back the bolt that held it.

"Look out, Bob!" she shrieked. "He's insane!"

The door swung wide, and the gun in Burton's hand blazed again and again. But Bob had heard Marta's warning and was down on his hands and knees, so that the bullets whizzed harmlessly over his head.

He heard the trigger click on an empty chamber of the gun, and then he was up in a flash, and hurled himself bodily upon the man who had tried to kill him.

They crashed down together upon the uneven floor of rock, but Bob was uppermost and suffered no hurt, whereas Burton struck the back of his head against a spike of granite that tore a jagged wound and knocked him out.

Bob wrenched the gun from the hand that held it, tossed it on to a nearby chest and got to his knees. Burton's eyes were closed.

"Marta, are you all right?" Bob called out anxiously.

Marta ran to him from the iron door, behind which she had crouched as it was opened, and he sprang up and took her in his arms.

"Oh, Bob," she cried, clinging to him, "he—he was going to keep me here with the gold!"

A Wonderful Occasion

A FORTNIGHT after that eventful morning a crowd of considerable size congregated outside the Ralston City Hall, and a band played. Inside the hall, Bob and Marta were being married with much pomp and ceremony which had been thrust upon them against their wishes. The whole town was making holiday.

Flags and banners were waving in the streets; flags decorated the porch of the City Hall, and reporters and newspaper photographers had arrived from all over the country.

"Here they come!" cried a voice.

Bob emerged from the City Hall with his bride on his arm, and the judge who had married them was close behind them. The crowd cheered; the reporters and the Press photographers surged to the steps.

"Have a heart, Mr. Harvey!" shouted

the first of the reporters to reach Bob's side. "Give us a break, will you? My paper expects me to get a story, and the 'Ralston City News' certainly deserves first chance. Can you tell us how you uncovered the mine?"

Cameras clicked; and other newspaper men gathered round, clamouring for information.

"Now wait a minute, gentlemen," pleaded Bob. "I've already told you everything I know."

"Well, what about Dr. Burton?" demanded the representative of the "Ralston City News." "Is he going to come in for some of the fortune? Where is he?"

"Dr. Burton," Bob replied, "is in a private sanatorium, recovering from a nervous breakdown. We hope he'll be well very soon."

He forced his way down the steps with Marta, making for an open car that was waiting to convey them to the City of Phoenix. Thad Hill followed them.

The car was reached, and Thad scrambled up beside the driver. But Marta was photographed several times upon the running-board before she was permitted to take her seat in the hack, and a reporter from Tucson grabbed hold of Bob.

"What are you going to do with all that gold, Mr. Harvey?" he inquired.

"Take it to the Mint," Bob replied with a grin.

"How're you gonna get it there?"

"My partner, Mr. Dempsey, will take care of that," said Bob. "Oh, here he comes now!"

Along the street, from the general direction of Monk's Canyon, came a string of armoured cars, escorted by motor-cycle policemen. Inside the armoured cars was the treasure of San Capello, and the crowd knew it and shouted. Howard Dempsey jumped down from beside the uniformed driver of the leading car and scrambled into the open tourer, beaming all over his fat face.

"How am I doin'?" he boomed.

He was wearing his lounge suit and bowler hat, in conjunction with a brand-new dove-grey waistcoat, and two white roses were in his buttonhole.

"Neat, but gaudy," said Bob.

The armoured cars were all lined up, waiting for the touring car to lead the way to the capital of the sun-drenched State of Arizona.

"Well, we're all set, aren't we?" Bob shouted. "You all right, grandpa?"

"I'm fine," Thad replied over his shoulder, and the driver was about to start the engine when the local postmaster came squeezing his way to the side of the car with quite a pile of telegrams in his hand.

"Oh, Mr. Harvey!" he cried.

"Right here," said Bob.

"A bunch o' wires for you, sir."

Dempsey rewarded the postmaster and took the telegrams. Marta helped to open them, as well as Bob, and nearly all of them proved to be from delighted shareholders in the Eureka Discovery Corporation.

Bob read one of them aloud:

"Proud to be your secretary. On behalf of myself and the other shareholders, I offer my heartiest congratulations. How much will I make on my ninety dollars?—CARRIE DAILEY."

"Step on it, driver!" urged Bob; and amid the plaudits of the crowd the touring car moved on along the street, the armoured cars followed, and the police escort brought up the rear.

"BENGAL TIGER"

Without wasting time on words Cliff darted towards the blazing building, and firemen, seeing his intention, rushed forward to try to stop him, but he swept them to one side.

Valiantly he fought his way through the flames.

"Joe! Where are you?" he shouted hoarsely. He might not have found Joe if he had not stumbled. Looking down, a flame showed him a huge rafter across a still figure. Cliff flung the rafter to one side and lifted Joe Larson to his feet. Coughing violently the big man threw Joe across his shoulders. He staggered back through the flames with his burden.

Blazing beams and rafters missed them by inches. What a cheer went up when Cliff lunged out of the smoke and fire, carrying Joe. He stumbled and fell. Firemen rushed forward and dragged the two badly burnt men away from the flames.

Laura flung herself down beside Joe Larson.

Cliff Ballenger staggered to his feet.

"Cliff, are you hurt?" demanded Hinsdale.

"I'm all right." Cliff managed a smile. "Joe's the guy that needs help." Then he glowered round. "What are you guys standing round gaping at me for? Come on, get Joe to my house and call a doctor."

Joe Larson's eyes flickered open, they looked at Laura, and then the acrobatic star lapsed into unconsciousness.

Joe Larson was carried to Cliff's house, undressed and got into bed. The doctor arrived and at once got busy. Though blood trickled down Cliff's face he would not tend to his own hurts.

At last the doctor got up.

"He's pretty well banged about, but he'll pull through," he reported. "He has a badly smashed shoulder and very deep burns. He must have absolute quiet and constant attention."

"He'll get it," Cliff said at once. "He'll have everything he needs here. Just leave instructions about what's to be done."

"All right." The doctor saw Cliff sway. "Now I want to have a look at you."

"Say, there's nothing wrong with me, doc—just toasted a little."

"Please, Cliff," begged Laura. "Let the doctor look at you. I'll sit here with Joe."

"Okay!"

The doctor went out of the room, and Cliff was about to close the door when he heard a faint whisper: "Laura!" Cliff turned and saw that Laura was bending over the bed.

"I'm here, Joe."

"Take good care of him!" Cliff called out and closed the door.

"Laura—Laura darling!" muttered Joe feverishly.

"Hush, Joe!" Laura gave an apprehensive glance at the closed door. Very gently she began to caress Joe's forehead with her soft fingers. The patient relaxed and began to breathe evenly.

Thrown to the Tiger

IT was a tough fight saving Joe Larson, and Laura was with the sick man most of the day and the night. She would not let Cliff get in another nurse. At last the doctor reported Joe out of danger, though he must not get out of bed for at least a week.

Cliff Ballenger was moody these days. The big fellow seemed to sense that something was wrong, and yet did not know what it was. Actually he was jealous of the tremendous fuss that Laura was making over Joe, and yet the next moment blaming himself for daring to be jealous of his friend.

Satan had reverted to type after the fire, and was so dangerous that Hinsdale almost thought about selling the beast. Cliff Ballenger decided that by making the tiger work he might banish the jealousy that was eating at his soul. Day after day he tried to subdue the snarling creature.

"Why don't you forget it, Cliff?" Hinsdale said one evening. "That cat's no good. He won't work."

"He'll work!" Cliff gritted out between clenched teeth. "I'll break him if I have to kill him."

One night Joe Larson, almost recovered, except for a bandaged head, and arm in a sling, paced his bed-room smoking furiously. He turned quickly as there came a light tap on his door and Laura appeared in a dressing-gown. Joe crushed out his cigarette.

"I thought you were asleep."
"I couldn't sleep!" She clutched at his shoulders. "Joe, it's driving me crazy. Cliff's out there again—trying to break that tiger—night and day he's at it. It's—it's not human. He's getting worse, Joe. It's become an obsession with him—he's getting to be like they are—like the animals—brutal—terrible!"

"Laura, you musn't feel that way about him."

"I can't help it, Joe. I've tried—you knew that." She stared at him beseechingly. "Take me away from here, Joe!"

"Laura, it would kill him if you left him." Joe needed all his strength to speak so calmly. "Think what he's done for both of us. He not only saved my life—"

"Don't you think I realise what he's done?" Piercely Laura interrupted.

"He took me out of a cell—gave me everything he had to give, but I don't—I can't love him, Joe."

Joe pushed her gently away.
"There's only one thing to do." He spoke with resolution. "I'm clearing out of here—to-night!"

"And leave me here?" sobbed Laura.
"Yes."

"That'll be grand for me."

"Do you think it'll be easy for me?" He spoke angrily. "Wherever I go I'll see you with him." He looked intently down at her. "But, Laura, you've got your duty to do by Cliff. You've got to stick."

"You're right, Joe." She gave a resigned sigh. "I'll stick." Tears trickled down her cheeks, but she managed a little smile. "I'll help you pack."

That night Cliff Ballenger, by sheer daring and harsh ruthlessness, forced the tiger to obey his will. He lashed the whip and shouted threats until Satan at last obeyed his commands. He rushed out of the cage to tell Laura and Joe the news—he had licked the cat at last.

Joe's bag was packed.
"Keep your chin up, kid." Joe tried to speak casually. He held out his hand. "So-long, Laura!"

She took his hand and tried to smile bravely.

"So-long!"
Then they stared at each other, unable to keep up the gallant pretence.

"Oh, Joe, we can't say good-bye like that!" cried the girl, and held out her arms. "Joe!"

He held her close for a long moment. A sound made them break apart and stare towards the door. There stood Cliff Ballenger. Slowly they saw incredulity give way to murderous rage.

"You dirty, double-crossing—"

Cliff strode forward, his fists clenched and his jaw stuck out aggressively.

"Now wait a minute, Cliff—" began Joe.

"What for?" raged Ballenger, and, mad with jealous rage, he felled Joe with a murderous hook.

"Cliff!" screamed Laura.

The animal trainer pushed his wife violently away, leaned down, picked up Larson, and slung the limp body across his shoulders.

"Cliff, are you crazy? What are you going to do?"

"Shut up!" he blazed at her, and charged out of the room with his unconscious burden.

Cliff Ballenger ran all the way to the circus. Revengo made him oblivious of the wickedness of his action, and an evil genius had whispered a revenge that should satisfy any man.

The practice cage was empty, and so was the great rehearsal tent, except for its cages of animals. Cliff flung open the door and dumped Larson on the sawdust, then slammed the door. He stumped away to Satan's cage, which had the chute to the practice cage connected. The tiger snarled at him, and that made Cliff laugh hoarsely. He opened the door of the chute.

"Okay, Satan—we'll let you settle this!"

With a long pole he prodded the sleepy tiger into activity, and grinned as Satan went down the chute into the practice cage.

Laura, wild and distraught, rushed up to her husband.

"Cliff!" She gripped his arm. "You've got to listen to me. It was my fault. Joe was leaving." She shook him with hysterical strength. "Do you hear—leaving? Because he wouldn't double-cross you. I begged him to take me away, but he wouldn't—even though he loves me—because he loves you, too, Cliff."

"You're lying!"

"What you saw was good-bye. He had his bag packed—I helped him pack it. I—" Suddenly she saw through the bars the prone figure of Joe Larson and creeping slowly towards the body the smister form of Satan. "Cliff, you've got to save him!" screamed Laura. "I love him! Do you understand? I love him!"

Frantic, she rushed to the cage door and tried to tear it open. That seemed to bring Cliff to his senses, for he rushed up to her and dragged her away. He wrenched open the door, and, with the pole as his only weapon, entered the cage.

"Get back there, Satan!" he rapped out.

The tiger backed away from the body, snarling a defiance. Cliff poked the pole at the tiger, and, reaching down, got a grip of Larson's collar. Satan clawed at the pole. Laura, terror-stricken, clung to the bars of the cage.

Slowly Cliff backed towards the door, dragging Larson and keeping the tiger off with the pole. Laura opened the cage door and waited. Satan made a leap, but the pole jarred against his teeth. Spitting and snarling, the tiger crouched, sensing that something was different—the brute man had not got his whip.

Cliff jerked Larson, who was now half-conscious, to his feet, and with his left arm round the aerial star shuffled him towards the open door. Laura used her strong arms to help support Joe.

"Get him out!" rapped out Cliff, "while I keep Satan off!"

Satan stalked forward, preparing for another leap. Cliff released his grip of Larson, and, exerting all her strength, Laura drew the half-conscious man out of the cage. As Ballenger turned to see if everything was all right, the tiger leapt, and, taken momentarily by surprise, the big man reeled away from the open door.

Laura's scream brought Hinsdale and several of the men. The owner was armed with a gun. He slammed the door shut, and then raised his weapon. The tiger had got Ballenger pinned to the floor, but the big man managed to fling Satan from him and staggered to his feet. Before Hinsdale could fire the tiger leapt again, and the animal trainer was flung backwards. Hinsdale fired, but the shot seemed to have no effect on Satan, who clawed savagely at the man he hated. Hinsdale fired again and again, and at last the tiger sank limply across the body of his victim.

With agonised eyes Laura and Joe, who had recovered his senses on being dragged out of the cage, watched the unequal struggle. What relief when Satan was at last fatally injured! Hinsdale would let no one go into the cage until he was quite sure the cat was dead. Then they dragged the tiger away and gently carried Cliff Ballenger out of the cage. He was terribly injured.

After a while the dying man's eyes opened, and, seeing Laura and Joe, he smiled.

"We sure got all messed up, didn't we?" he muttered. "But the cat settled everything, and I guess he settled it all right." He looked at Joe, and when he spoke his voice was feeble. "You'll take good care of her, fella?"

Not trusting himself to speak, Joe nodded and put his hand over one of Cliff's. Laura laid her hand on Cliff's forehead.

A happy smile appeared on the drawn features.

"Then I guess—that—just—about—takes care—of—everything."

Ballenger's eyes closed, and his head sank back.

It was Hinsdale who put a comforting arm round the sobbing Laura, whilst Joe stared, heartbroken, at the face of his dead friend.

REVENGE RIDER

A THRILLING MYSTERY OF THE WEST

The News Reels

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 218, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Fields' Murder Story

Not even his long illness has been able to keep W. C. Fields totally on the shelf. Still in bed at Las Encinas Sanatorium, Pasadena, the Paramount comedian is writing a book—and a hospital murder story at that!

The idea came to him actually as he lay under an oxygen tent at Riverside Hospital before his transfer to Las Encinas some weeks ago, he says. Later he developed it, and recently began dictating the story to his secretary, Miss Mickey Michaelson, as he began his convalescence from pneumonia.

So far he hasn't thought of a definite title for it, but for need of a good working name just calls it "Murder in the Hospital, or Keep Those Horses Out of the Sun Parlour." Despite this, however, it isn't a burlesque, although Miss Michaelson says it contains plenty of the typical Fieldsian humour.

His physicians don't allow him to dictate more than an hour a day. But reports are that he has been gaining steadily and chafing continually against his prolonged confinement. He has even done some work on the script of his next Paramount picture, "Bag of Tricks," and the doctors expect him to be able to return to the studio in about three months, provided his improvement continues.

"Prop" Man's Headache

"Forty-eight vultures, 12 machine-guns, 100 crickets, one horse, one dead dog, one monkey, one Mandarin dinner, Dubonnet cocktail, blood, live fish, Jacob's ladder, tiger meat, field-telegraph instrument—"

That will give you a rough idea why being a movie prop man is no picnic. It's just part of the list of things Harry Caplan had to get for "The General Died at Dawn," with Gary Cooper and Madeleine Carroll in the leading rôles.

In addition, Caplan had to work in conjunction with the art and set-dressing departments in furnishing an extensive Chinese street scene that had to be authentic in every detail.

Acting as technical adviser on this job was Count Andre Tolstoy, great grand-nephew of the writer, veteran of the White Russian counter rebellion of 1919, and ex-machine-gun instructor for the troops of the Chinese war lord, Chang Tze Lin. And final results were checked by General Ting Hsiu Tu, official representative of the Chinese Government.

The vultures and the crickets gave Caplan the severest headaches. The big scavenger birds must be captured alive, and because of a State law forbidding this in California, arrangements were made to obtain them in Texas. They were released over a location set at Chatsworth, Los Angeles county, and their picture taken.

Caplan and two associates spent a whole afternoon in a local hayfield rounding up the 100 crickets. Cricket fighting being a popular form of gambling in China, they are used in a sporting event among soldiers of General November 14th, 1936.

Survival of the Fittest

Life may be just a bowl of cherries to the songwriter, but to the screen actor it's enough to give a fellow the pip. Take, for example, the case of the players in the Pickford-Lasky production, "The Gay Desperado," in which Nino Martini, the operatic tenor, is starring.

In one scene Martini was given the privilege of using a boot on Leo Carrillo—which seemed too bad for Carrillo. But somehow Martini's spurs became entangled and the singer spent the next three days in hospital. The same afternoon Carrillo fractured a finger when he took a sock at a pugilist extra, hired because he could take it.

Later during production, Ida Lupino, the leading lady, played a light-hearted love scene with Martini and was carried off to have three stitches put in her forehead. Anxious to join in the fun, Director Rouben Mamoulian put his foot beneath a horse's hoof and had it badly crushed. The horse has now been taken off Mamoulian's casting list.

He Sticks to Sticks

Most directors use chalk lines to show their artistes where they must stand or move during a scene, but Albert Parker is different. He uses sticks.

Parker has been using sticks since the days he directed Valentino and Douglas Fairbanks, and offers the very sensible explanation that whereas artistes have to look for a chalk line, they can feel a stick with their feet to check their positions.

Parker is very fond of sticks, and will have as many as ten to fifteen put down for one take, so "Props" is always sure that, on a Parker picture, he is bound to spend a good deal of his time on his hands and knees nailing sticks to the floor.

Albert Parker is making "Strange Experiment" at the Fox Film Studios, Wembley, at present, and the other day he was shooting a scene which demanded that the artistes should be here, there and everywhere, consequently Mr. Parker was using more than the average number of sticks.

Props got up off his knees, having just hammered down another couple, and looking sulkily at the director, murmured—

"Ten more sticks and you'll have a 'parque' floor!"

Hired Luxury

Making films is not the only profitable business carried on in Hollywood. For example, a certain Joe Wilharber makes thousands of pounds a year merely by supplying the film people with second-hand cars.

Recently, Samuel Goldwyn needed a very expensive car of not-too-recent design for his new production, "Love Under Fire," in which the star, Merle Oberon, is supposed to ride down a London street. Wilharber supplied the car. It was a stately Delage, purchased in Paris some years ago by Mary Pickford for £4,800. For years it was the wheeled wonder of Hollywood—now it is being hired out at £15 a day.

For Goldwyn's "Dodsworth" it was necessary to get automobiles of various foreign manufacture. One which figures prominently in the picture is a beautiful Isotta Fraschini which Rudolph Valentino purchased soon after he achieved his greatest fame. Another car seen in the film, a Fiat limousine, was once owned by Alexander Korda.

Not only does Wilharber do business with film companies, but on nights when there is an important première nearly every car is rented. Small-part players and extras, eager to make an impression, hire these foreign cars, and often the crêmes to go with them, and drive in regal style to the theatre, hoping to catch the attention of a producer or director.

On returning to his home town after a long absence, Tim O'Neil finds that his brother, sheriff of Red Rock, has been shot dead. At the inquest he declares his intention of tracking down the murderer—and from that moment his own life is in danger till the mystery is solved. A Western drama of blazing guns.

TIM M'COY

in

By Whose Hand ?

GREY-HAIRED Jed Harmon was standing in the road, close to the garden fence of his ranch-house, when his son Chad drove the wagonette out from the yard, and Myra, his daughter, was standing bareheaded beside him.

There was a dead body in the wagonette, under a blanket—the body of Jerry O'Neil, sheriff of Red Rock, who had been shot through the heart that morning.

"Better drop a line to his brother Tim, sis," said Chad, dropping the reins and looking across at the girl. "You can probably break the news to him a little easier than anyone else."

"But I don't know where Tim is," she lamented. "I haven't heard from him in nearly a month."

Chad compressed his lips. He was a handsome young fellow, but a badly troubled one.

"Well, maybe we can find out from someone in town," he said, and shifted his gaze to the drooping figure of his father. "Ready, dad?"

The rancher shook his head.

"I didn't figure on going in with you, son," he said heavily.

"Well, there'll be an inquest, more'n likely, and a heap o' questions to answer."

"I reckon you can tell 'em all they need to know."

Chad sprang down from the wagonette.

"So you're not going in?" he challenged. "Well, you'd better get your hat and coat on, Myra."

Myra nodded, went in at the gate, and ran up the garden path to the house, a slim and shapely figure in a dark-blue skirt and a white blouse.

"What d'you want her to go along for?" growled Jed Harmon.

"So she can bring the team back," replied Chad. "I'm pulling out! I'm through with this ranch and everything on it!"

"Through with the ranch?" exclaimed his father, staring at him. "What do you mean, son?"

"I can't ride straight on your range, dad, knowing what I know," was the bitter response.

"I—I don't think I quite understand you, Chad," stammered the rancher in a manner which suggested that he understood only too well; and Chad burst out at him:

"Oh, what's the use of pretending? I ain't a kid any longer—I know what's goin' on, and I— Oh, dad, what's come over you lately?"

"Ain't you kinda steppin' over the traces, son?"

"Why shouldn't I?" Chad retorted. "There hasn't been an honest puncher on this ranch in months! Brand-blotting and cattle rustling! I reckon I could stand for that, 'cause I know Kramer's forcing it on you! But when it comes to cold-blooded killing—"

"Stop!" cried his father in an anguished voice. "Are you accusing me of murder?"

"I ain't accusing anyone of anything," snapped Chad. "All I know is Sheriff O'Neil was our friend, and so is his brother. I can't stand by, holdin' my tongue, and knowin' that you—"

"Hold your tongue till I tell you to talk, or—"

The sound of horses' hoofs caused the rancher to break off abruptly and to stare along the tree-fringed road in the opposite direction from the town. A buckboard was approaching, two horses attached to its shaft, three horses trailing behind. Holding the reins in the driving-seat was a man whom Jed Harmon recognised, even at that distance.

"Tim O'Neil!" he exclaimed. "Quick, son, we can't let him find his brother like this! Get started! Get started!"

He rushed his son towards the wagonette and helped him up into it, and the wagonette was careering along the road that led to Red Rock when Myra emerged from the house with a white felt hat on her head and a little coat that went with her skirt over her blouse.

She reached the gate just as the buckboard arrived, and its driver stopped the horses and swept off his ten-gallon sombrero. He was a splendid specimen of young manhood, some years older than Chad, clean-shaven, fair-haired and loose-limbed. His eyes were blue and very keen; but he was too excited at the moment to realise that anything was wrong.

"Hallo, Myra!" he cried. "How are you, Mr. Harmon? Oh, it's good to be back among home folks again after trading horses with Injuns all the way from Laramie to Fort Worth!"

He jumped lightly to the ground, and as Myra stepped out at the gate, lifted her up in the air and set her down again, and then took off a glove to shake hands with her father.

"How's Chad?" he asked. "Chad's all right," Jed Harmon replied, "same as always."

"And my big brother Jerry—have you seen him lately?"

"Why, yes." The rancher endeavored to control his voice. "That is, I—"

But Tim had turned again to the beautiful girl and caught hold of her arms.

"Oh, it's good to see you, Myra!" he rejoiced.

Her brown eyes fell before his gaze and it seemed to him that she shivered slightly.

"You don't seem particularly pleased to see me!" he exclaimed in surprise. "What's the matter?"

"I'm always glad to see you, Tim," she declared. "Always."

"Well, you'd better be," said he, "cause you're gonna see a lot o' me around here in future!"

"What do you mean?"

"Didn't Jerry tell you? About a month ago he wrote me— Oh, wait till I put up these horses—they're makin' an awful fuss. Then I'll tell you all about it."

He released her to go back to the buckboard, but she stopped him.

"I don't think I'll have time to listen now, Tim," she said in a strained fashion.

"Why?" he inquired.

"Myra's fixin' to drive into town," her father interposed.

"Well, that's great," said Tim. "I'll drive you in, and I'll bring you back. Come on!"

He picked her up and deposited her on the driving-seat of the vehicle, then hoisted himself beside her and took the reins.

"Shall I shove your horses in the corral?" asked Jed Harmon.

"Yes, if you will," Tim returned, then grinned at Myra and changed his mind. "Oh, wait! Maybe you'd better let 'em drag behind—it'll give me an excuse for driving slower!"

He gave a little tug at the reins, and the horses harnessed to the buckboard set off along the road, the other three following behind as their halters dragged them into reluctant movement.

Jed Harmon looked over the fence that edged the yard and saw two riders enter the corral from the open range beyond it. He hurried down the yard to intercept them.

"Hallo!" he hailed.

They were two of his men, but they were not employed by him of his own desire. One of them, Ned Lynch by name, was a lean-jawed and shifty-eyed fellow, conspicuous for his plaid shirt; the other was Mike Rankin, a slightly shorter man than his companion, but thicker set and swarthy, with a moustache as black as his hair.

"Hallo, boss," said Lynch.

"Where've you two fellows been?" demanded Harmon.

"Over by the South Fork," Lynch replied. "Fence was down."

"I suppose you know the sheriff was here this morning?"

Again it was Lynch who replied.

"Yeah," he said, "he was here when me and Mike rode away. Why?"

"Sheriff O'Neil was killed this morning! Shot off his horse!"

"You don't mean it!" Lynch appeared to be surprised. "D'you hear that, Rankin? The sheriff's been killed."

"Who could have done it?" said Rankin.

"I was about to ask you that question!" snapped Harmon.

Rankin scowled, and Lynch stepped in front of him.

"I don't like the way you said that, Harmon," he snarled. "You start any such hints around, and we'll refer the matter to the Cattlemen's Association. You wouldn't want them to look too close to some o' your brands, would you, boss? They might think you had reasons to want the sheriff out o' the way!"

The Inquest

THE horses attached to the buckboard climbed a hill at their own pace, in the winding road that led to Red Rock, and Tim turned to Myra. "Well, honey," he said, "my wandering days are over. Jerry's bought the Martin ranch, and we're gonna—"

"Wait, Tim," she broke in, "there's something I've got to tell you."

"Oh, your story'll keep," said he with a wave of his free hand, "but if I don't tell mine I'm gonna bust! Now, as I started out to say, Jerry's bought the old Martin ranch, and I'm gonna run it. That means no more travellin' around trading horses—no more sitting on corral fences swapping stories—"

"Oh, Tim, please don't!" she pleaded.

"I know," he chuckled. "You think I won't be able to settle down. But I will—I'll fool you! Of course, I dessey in the spring o' the year it's gonna be kinda hard. My feet'll start itchin' when the grass gets green and I'll want to wander again."

He drew on the reins to negotiate a sharp bend.

"Oh, but it'll be worth it," he declared. "After I got new curtains on the windows, a new stove, and the place all fixed up, I'm thinkin' of gettin' married—if you're willing."

There were sudden tears in Myra's brown eyes and she averted her face lest he should see them.

"The whole thing was Jerry's idea to start with," he went on, after waiting a moment for her to make some response. "Jerry's been more than a brother to me. He's been father, mother—well, just like a friend. I'd like to have him come and live with us after we're married."

It was more than she could bear, and she cried miserably:

"Oh, Tim, please don't!"

"I'm sorry," he said, glancing round at her, "I didn't realise you felt that way about Jerry."

"Oh, it isn't that, Tim," she faltered.

"We—we're on our way to an inquest."

"Inquest?" He slewed round on the seat. "You don't mean—Jerry?"

The answer was in her eyes, but she nodded her head as well, and for a few minutes he sat almost stunned. Then, suddenly, he snatched up the whip and lashed at the horses.

The body of Jerry O'Neil had been conveyed to the undertaker's shop in Red Rock's main street and an inquest was in progress in the assembly room of the Cattlemen's Association when Tim drove into the town. A number of men, congregated upon the porch of the big frame building, recognised him as the buckboard came swaying round the corner of Mountain Street, but he took no notice of anyone in his distress.

Straight to the door of the building he drove, and there, stopping the horses, sprang down on to the boardwalk and gave a hand to Myra. The crowd made room for them and they mounted the steps and squeezed into a room already filled to overflowing.

All the chairs were occupied, and in twelve of them, set sideways near a table at the top of the room, a jury composed of ranchers and cow-hands were listening to the evidence of a white-haired doctor of venerable appearance who occupied a seat on a platform beside the table of the self-appointed coroner.

That coroner was Martin Kramer, chairman of the Cattlemen's Protective Association, and one of the biggest ranchers in the district, a masterful man by nature, clean-shaven, middle-aged, and not without a certain dignity when he chose to assume it.

Just now he was filling his rôle of coroner with becoming solemnity, enforcing silence from time to time with the gavel used by the judge of the county when that official visited the town to try wrongdoers in the adjacent courthouse.

"Is it your opinion, Dr. Lindsay," he inquired, "that Sheriff O'Neil came to his death by a gunshot wound?"

"A forty-one calibre rifle fired at a distance," stated the doctor. "The bullet mushroomed against the breast-bone and passed directly through the heart. I should say that death was almost instantaneous."

Kramer looked across at the twelve assorted men who formed the jury and asked if there were any questions they wished to put to the witness. The foreman shook his head, after consulting his colleagues, and the doctor was dismissed.

As he made his way down the room Kramer became aware of Tim, near the door with Myra, and he said loudly:

"If you'll step forward, Mr. O'Neil, I'm sure one of these gentlemen will be pleased to make room for you."

"Thanks," said Tim, and he piloted Myra through the crowd and along a gangway between the rows of chairs to the very front of the improvised court, where two men rose to make room for them in seats facing the platform.

"Would you like me to review our findings thus far?" inquired Kramer.

"It won't be necessary," Tim replied.

"There will be only one more witness—Chad Harmon."

Chad stood up, just behind Myra, with an expression of grim determination on his face.

"Will you take the stand?" said Kramer.

"I'll take the stand," Chad returned. "not because you say so, but because Tim has a right to know the facts."

"That is the purpose of this hearing."

Chad walked over to the platform and seated himself on the chair beside the table, and all faces were turned in his direction.

No oath was administered. Kramer stopped a scuffling of feet and a murmur of voices by banging on the table with the borrowed gavel and addressed the witness.

"You brought the sheriff's body into town?"

"I did," agreed Chad.

"And it was you who found him on the scene of the shooting?"

"I was with him when he was shot!"

"Would you mind telling us exactly—"

"Would you mind keeping your questions to yourself and letting me tell what happened in my own way?" Chad shouted at him.

"If you prefer," Kramer's eyes betrayed his annoyance, but his voice was smooth enough.

"I do prefer!" Chad looked straight across at Tim. "Your brother," he said, "came out to our place this morning, Tim, and he wanted dad to ride out on the range with him. Dad wasn't feeling well, so I went instead."

Tim leaned forward in his chair with his hands on his knees, listening intently.

"About three or four miles from the house we dropped down into a little gulch. The trail up the other side was narrow, and Jerry rode on ahead. When he reached the top I heard a shot, and I saw him sort of stiffenin' in the saddle, and— Oh, I—I don't want to go on, Tim. It was awful!"

"Go ahead, Chad," encouraged Tim. "It's got to be told."

Chad bit his lip, clenched his hands, and went on again:

"I saw him sorta stiffen, and one hand jerked up to his breast. The other went for his gun, but he never got it out. Then—then something inside him seemed to give way and he tumbled out of the saddle."

"Go on, Chad," said Tim. "What then?"

"I spurred up the slope, and I saw two men ride into the brush at a run, a couple o' hundred yards ahead. I fired after them and started to chase 'em, but I couldn't leave Jerry, so I turned back, and—and—well, I—I reckon that's about all there is to tell."

"Did Jerry say what he was looking for out on your range?"

"No," said Chad slowly, "he didn't."

"Have you any idea of your own what he was after?"

"I couldn't be sure, but I—"

"Mr. O'Neil," interrupted Kramer, with a rap of the gavel, "it is not in order for a witness to state other than the true facts."

A middle-aged rancher named Saunders rose up from his chair in the silence that followed, and he flung out a hand at Chad.

"Are you sure your father wasn't feeling good this morning?" he demanded harshly.

"That's what he said," Chad replied.

"Are you sure he didn't leave the ranch?"

"I don't know what he did after I left the ranch-house."

"Well," drawled Saunders, "are you sure you rode with the sheriff yourself?"

"Certainly I rode with the—" Chad broke off, furious at the suggestion underlying the question. "Say, what are you driving at, Saunders?" he roared.

"You say two men ambushed O'Neil. How do we know it wasn't you and your father?"

Myra sprang indignantly to her feet, holding her hat.

"I can prove that's not true!" she cried. "I was there when Chad and the sheriff left the house, and I was there when they brought him back!"

"Then why don't he name the men that killed Jerry O'Neil?" challenged the rancher. "He says he saw 'em!"

Chad bounded up from the witness-chair.

"They were half-hid in the brush," he shouted, "but if you want to know who I think it was—"

"Careful, Harmon!" thundered Kramer. "You're not permitted to state an opinion you can't verify!"

"Why can't I?" Chad blazed at him. "This ain't a court o' law!"

"In the absence of the sheriff," Kramer retorted, "the Cattlemen's Protective Association represents the law."

"The Cattlemen's Protective Association!" scoffed Chad. "A gang of gunmen gathered from every pest-hole along the border to—"

"Yes!" Kramer smote the table with his fists and rose. "Yes, gunmen that I brought in to stamp out rustling in this district!"

"That's what you say!" Chad snapped at him. "You collect big fees from cattlemen to protect them, and those that can't afford to pay lose their cattle! Well, I think I know who get-them!"

He addressed the assembly at large. "If you want to know who killed Sheriff O'Neil, ask the Cattlemen's Association!"

A burly and bushy-browed fellow who was one of Kramer's importations leapt to his feet on Myra's left.

"That's enough out of you!" he rasped. "I belong to the association!"

"Yes," retorted Chad, "and you're one of the men I had in mind, Connors!"

Connors reached for his gun, and

Chad reached for his; but Tim was up like lightning and his left fist smashed into Connor's wide jaw, knocking him down against the edge of the platform, and his own gun was in his hand as he snatched up the one dropped by the man he had knocked out.

"Don't shoot, Chad!" he cried, and then as some of the others gathered round the fallen crook he backed away to the side of the room so that everybody in it was more or less covered by the two weapons he held.

"This meeting," he said seathingly, "is a fine example of the law and order it's supposed to uphold!"

"It was orderly enough till young Harmon got started," retorted the foreman of the jury.

"I don't care who's to blame," rapped Tim. "I haven't any quarrel with anyone in this room—not yet. But if Chad can prove the things he says, I'm apt to declared open season on a lot of you!"

He spoke over his shoulder to Kramer:

"If you have to make any notes on this meeting, just say 'Death caused by parties unknown—temporarily unknown.' As far as I'm concerned it can be adjourned."

"We can't adjourn yet," protested Kramer. "We've got to elect a temporary sheriff."

"You can appoint all the sheriffs you like," retorted Tim, "but as far as my brother is concerned I'm a kind of an alias 'John Law,' and I don't want anyone mixin' in until he's invited! Chad, take Myra to the door and wait there, just in case someone doesn't like my back!"

Chad stepped down from the platform, and Myra went with him to the door. There he turned about, with his gun in his hand, and in a dead silence Tim walked along past the rows of chairs to him.

"Give this to Connors, when he comes to," he said, and tossed the six-shooter he had appropriated to one of the bystanders.

"I thought I said I didn't want anyone meddlin' in my affairs until he was invited," said Tim sharply
November 14th, 1936.

The Letter from Sioux City

ON the boardwalk outside the building he had left so dramatically, Tim looked across at the undertaker's premises and put away his gun.

"Chad," he said, "will you take my horses to the town corral for me?"

"Glad to," Chad responded quite readily.

"Meet me at the sheriff's office afterwards."

"I was aimin' to do that."

Myra knew that Tim was going to take a last look at his dead brother, and she started after him as he began to cross the street; but Chad caught hold of her arm.

"You'd better drive the wagonetto back to the ranch, sis," he said. "I've left it outside the hotel. Dad isn't expecting me, anyway."

She gazed at him with troubled eyes, but she went off in the direction of the Bonanza Hotel without a word, hoping that Tim would dissuade him from leaving home.

In the assembly room tension had relaxed. Connors, who had regained consciousness, stumbled back to his chair and sat down on it, nursing his aching jaw. Martin Kramer rapped on the table with the gavel.

"The death of Sheriff O'Neil," he said, "leaves us with no guardian of the peace, except the agents of the Cattlemen's Protective Association. Will such agents as are present please stand up?"

Nearly a dozen men, in different parts of the room, got to their feet. There was nothing inspiring about the appearance of any one of them.

"As you know," said Kramer, "these men were brought into the district to stamp out rustling. They are not actual officers, but they are sworn defenders of the law—tried, trusted, and true. I propose that one of these men be appointed to act as sheriff until such time as one can be appointed by law."

Samders, who liked the look of the "sworn defenders" not at all, raised a protest.

"T'aint legal, is it?"

"It may be a little irregular," admitted Kramer, "but it's better than having no guardian of the peace."

One of his hirelings raised a hand.

"I move that Matt Ludlow be appointed as temporary sheriff," he said loudly.

"I'll second that motion," boomed another man.

"Matt Ludlow, step up here," directed Kramer; and a round-faced man slouched over to the platform and stood on the edge of it with his cow-hat in his hand. He had a snub nose, a long upper lip, beady brown eyes, a mop of untidy black hair, and he looked in need of a shave.

"It is moved and seconded," said Kramer, "that Matt Ludlow be appointed temporary sheriff. All those in favour will signify in the usual manner."

Quite a number of hands were raised.

"Those against," said Kramer.

No hands were shown, and Matt Ludlow beamed all over his ugly face as Kramer pronounced solemnly:

"It is so ordered."

Tim, in a back room of the undertaker's premises, looked long and sadly at the body of his brother, then went to a chair upon which a bloodstained waistcoat had been hung. Pinned to the waistcoat, near a hole in the cloth made by the fatal bullet, was the metal badge of Jerry O'Neil's sheriffdom. Tim unfastened it and put it in his pocket, determined that no unworthy successor should ever wear it.

While he was still at the undertaker's, November 14th, 1936.

Matt Ludlow went up the street with two other men and entered the sheriff's office, in haste to invest himself with authority.

Against the wall, opposite the front door, stood a roll-top desk, surmounted by an old-fashioned copying-press. The desk was open, and Ludlow seated himself in a swivel-chair at it and proceeded to look in pigeon-holes and drawers for a German-silver star with which to decorate himself.

His companions, two of the "agents" appointed by the Cattlemen's Association, scattered reward bills and letters about the floor in an endeavour to assist him, and finally a star with the word "Deputy" engraved upon it was discovered.

"I oughta have something better than a deputy's badge," growled Ludlow, "but I guess that'll have to do."

This Coloured Postcard of VICTOR McLAGEN.

He attached it to his waistcoat, and he was contemplating it with a certain amount of pride, when one of his helpers—a man named Peters—held out a sheet of paper, exclaiming:

"Look what I found! I reckon this explains a lot o' things, don't it?"

Ludlow snatched the sheet of paper from his hand and read the letter which was typewritten upon it.

"Say," he began, "it's a good thing we found this before—"

He broke off abruptly because Tim had walked in at the door, and he tried to hide the letter by dropping the hand that held it behind an arm of the chair.

"I thought I said I didn't want anyone meddlin' in my affairs until he was invited," said Tim sharply.

"Your affairs?" blustered Ludlow. "Why, I've been appointed sheriff!"

Tim did not seem to be at all impressed.

"You can take possession," he said, "after I've finished lookin' things over. There may be something in that desk that'll give me an idea who killed my brother."

"More than likely there is," conceded Ludlow, "and if we find it we'll be glad to turn it right over to you."

"If there's anything there," Tim retorted, "I can find it without any help."

Ludlow screwed up the letter he was holding and rose from the chair.

"Well, I'm sorry if you don't trust me," he said gruffly, "but if you feel that way about it we'll get out until you've looked things over."

He started towards the door, motioning to the other two, but Tim barred the way.

"Before you leave," he said, "I'd like to have a look at that letter you've got in your hand."

"That?" Ludlow exhibited the screwed-up sheet of paper. "That's just an ad. for some liver pills."

"I said I wanted to see it!"

Ludlow adopted a rueful air.

"I've been tryin' to be friendly with you, O'Neil," he said, "but you just won't have it so. There's nothing in this thing that concerns you, but I'm gonna take it, now, just on general principles!"

"You'll give me that letter," thundered Tim, "or make the fastest draw ever seen in Red Rock!"

Ludlow reached for his gun, but even as he drew it it was shot out of his hand, and he dropped the letter to clutch at a wrist that had been grazed by a bullet. The other two changed their minds about reaching for their guns, and Chad burst in from the street.

"Pick up that letter, Chad, will you?" said Tim.

Chad picked up the letter, opened it out, and began to read it. Tim picked up the newly appointed sheriff's gun and thrust it back into its owner's holster.

"Now get out," he commanded. "Come back in an hour or so, and I'll turn this place over to you."

Without a word the crestfallen Ludlow went out with his two companions, and then:

"What's in that letter, Chad?" asked Tim.

Chad screwed the sheet of paper into a ball and tossed it into a waste-paper basket.

"It's nothing," he declared hoarsely. "Just a circular of some sort."

Tim looked at him for more than a second, then stooped over the basket and retrieved the letter.

"Don't read it, Tim!" implored Chad.

"Why?" Tim looked at him again.

"It'll only make trouble for some innocent folks."

"If they're innocent," said Tim, "they have nothing to fear from me." And he began to straighten out the sheet of paper.

"Don't read it I tell you!" cried Chad agitatedly. "It'll start a war, and you and me'll be on opposite sides!"

"I'd be sorry to have anything like that happen," said Tim; but he continued to straighten the sheet of paper, and Chad suddenly rushed out from the office and slammed the door behind him.

Tim's eyes narrowed, but the letter was readable now, and he read it. The printed heading was: "Sioux City Stockyards, Sioux City, Iowa." The letter was addressed to Sheriff O'Neil, Red Rock, Arizona, and it ran:

"The last shipment of cattle from Jed Harmon contained a surprising number of brands that have been altered, at least twenty per cent. Thinking that you might want to investigate this matter, I am passing the information on to you."

He folded the crumpled sheet across and across, tucked it in the breast-pocket of his shirt, and went slowly to the door.

By this time the ranchers, cow-hands, and members of the general public who had attended the inquest had left the headquarters of the Cattleman's Protective Association; but Martin Kramer was still at the table on the platform of the assembly room, and Ludlow and his two companions had found him there and poured into his ears the story of Tim's interference.

"I tell you," raged Ludlow, "that letter is gonna send O'Neil direct to Harmon for a show-down."

"Yeah," said Peters, "we gotta go down and stop that old fool before he does any talkin'!"

"That would be easy," remarked Kramer, "if he wasn't so valuable to us alive. We need his brand in our business."

"Why worry about Harmon?" growled Ludlow, putting his hand significantly on the butt of his gun. "O'Neil's the fellow we gotta stop before he gets started!"

But Kramer shook his head.

"I don't mind gun-play," he said, "but a wise man never starts up until he has to. We'll handle this thing peaceful, if we can. If we can't, it'll be just too bad for both of 'em!"

Tim Finds Some Keys

MYRA had driven the wagonette back to the ranch-house and had left it in the yard with Rankin and Lynch for the horses to be put away, and she was in the sunny living-room with her father when Chad came galloping in at the gateway on a borrowed horse.

She ran out on to the porch to meet him, and Rankin and Lynch sneaked along the side wall of the adobe building as they heard her cry out:

"What's happened, Chad?"

Chad left the horse in the yard and reached the steps of the porch.

"I want to talk to dad alone," he said brusquely as he mounted them; but she went with him into the living-room, considerably disturbed by his manner, and she asked in alarm:

"What is it, dad?"

"I don't rightly know myself, honey," replied her father in a voice that by no means reassured her, and then Chad caught hold of her arm and swept her towards the door of her own bed-room.

"Listen, I'll tell you all about it later, Myra," he said, "but not now."

He pushed her into the bed-room and closed the door; but she stooped to listen at the keyhole as he went back to his father, and she heard the conversation that followed. Rankin and Lynch heard some of it, too, for a window in the side wall was open and they crouched below its sill.

"When I left the ranch, this morning," said Chad, putting a hand on his father's shoulder, "I told you I wasn't coming back, dad—but I just had to! Tim's found out about the rustling, and he's probably on his way out by now!"

Jed Harmon sighed.

"It was bound to happen, sooner or later," he muttered.

"You've got to saddle up and start ridin'! I'll hold Tim somehow."

But Jed Harmon sank wearily into his favourite armchair.

"No, son," he said definitely, "I'm through with runnin' away from things. I've tried it—it won't work."

"There's no other way out!" insisted Chad.

"Oh, yes, there is! Tim's got a right to know who killed his brother, and I'm goin' to tell everything I know."

That was enough for Rankin and Lynch. They went off to get their horses, and they rode away on them across the ranch to a hill above the coach road.

"Dad," protested Chad, "if you put Tim on Kramer's trail your life won't be worth a rickel."

"Better that," returned his father, "than livin' as I have in the past two years, afraid of my own shadow, ashamed to look people in the face, and doin' the things you reminded me of this morning."

"Oh, I didn't mean what I said, dad!"

"Yes, you did, son, and I'm glad of it. It woke me up to a lot of things—and that's why I'm gonna stand my ground."

Myra went out from the bed-room. Her father had buried his face in his hands, and Chad was standing by the fireplace with an arm on the shelf, staring down into the empty hearth. She slipped out past them to the porch, and a few minutes later was riding off along the road to intercept Tim.

Behind some bushes on the hill Rankin and Lynch dismounted, but Lynch became ill-at-ease as his swarthy companion knelt in the grass with a short-barrelled rifle in his hand.

"We're liable to get ourselves in a mess of trouble," he complained, "doin' this without orders."

"We'll get ourselves in more trouble," retorted Rankin, "if we let O'Neil get to Harmon."

"Well, maybe so, but I tell you I think—"

"Shut up!" rasped Rankin. "Here he comes now!"

Tim was riding his own white horse, which he had left in his brother's charge during his absence on the trading expedition and had saddled in the stables behind the town goal. Rankin had sighted him between the trees that fringed the road, and he took aim with the rifle; but just as Tim came into full view at the bottom of the hill Myra came galloping towards him from the ranch-house, and the would-be murderer held his fire.

Tim stopped his horse as Myra reached him, and the one she was riding reared up at the suddenness with which it was turned.

"I know why you're going to the ranch, Tim," she cried, "and you mustn't do it!"

Tim eyed her sharply.

"Did your father send you down here to turn me back?" he asked.

She shook her head.

"Dad's ready to tell you everything he knows," she said, "but you mustn't ask him."

"I've got to find out who killed my brother," gritted Tim. "You know that!"

"Dad had nothing to do with Jerry's death," she declared. "Oh, Tim, you've got to believe me!"

"I do believe you," he returned, "but your father knows certain things I've got to find out."

"If you make him talk they'll kill both of you, just as they did Jerry!"

"Who d'you mean by 'they'?"

"Tim, that's what I don't dare to tell you."

"Then I'll have to ask your father." He made as though to ride on, but

The key fitted, and the padlock was removed. "Looks as though Mr. Rankin was one of 'em!" Tim said, with grim satisfaction.

she whipped out a six-gun from the pocket of her skirt and held it very close to his heart.

"Wait!" she shrieked. "You're not going on, Tim!"

He looked at the gun and he looked at her very strained face.

"Even if I thought you meant that," he said, "I'd still have to ride on."

He rode on, and she did not fire. But Rankin, up among the bushes on the top of the hill, then seized his opportunity. His rifle cracked, and Tim pitched sideways from the saddle and sprawled in the dust.

Myra slid down from her horse in horror and flew to him.

"Tim, are you hurt bad?" she asked, bending over him.

"I'm not hit at all," he replied. "Get back!"

She retreated to the shelter of a massive tree-trunk only a few feet away, and Tim took out his gun without appearing to move a limb.

"Friends o' yours?" he asked decisively.

"You know they're not!" she stormed.

He crawled over to her, got one knee behind the tree-trunk, and looked up the hill.

"It might be smarter to make them think they got me," he said.

He detected a movement in the bushes, and then he saw the figures of two horsemen riding away over the brow of the hill, too remote to be identifiable.

"Well, now that you know I'm not hurt," he said, "you can go back to hating me again."

"No." She shook her head. "No, Tim, I thought I could hate you, but I guess I can't."

He put away his gun and stood up, and he helped her to her feet.

"That's the way it ought to be, Myra," he said, holding her hands and smiling at her. "That's what it's goin' to be—always!"

Her hat had fallen from her head and was hanging over her shoulders on its band; the afternoon sunlight was in her light-brown hair. He kissed her fondly, and then he glanced at the two horses munching grass at the side of the road.

"Let's go up and see if they left any trail worth following," he suggested; and together they climbed the hill.

Between two bushes Tim picked up a spent cartridge, which he stowed away in his pocket, and a few minutes later he called Myra over to him.

"Look!" he said. "One of those fellows must have snagged his key-ring on the branches as he rode out!"

There were two keys on the ring that hung from a spiky branch of a screw-pod mesquite, and one of them obviously fitted a padlock.

"Ever seen those before?" he asked. Myra was quite certain that she hadn't.

"Well," he said, taking the ring from the branch and putting it in his pocket with the spent cartridge, "let's get our horses and be on our way."

In the Bunkhouse

CHAD was still in the living-room with his father when Tim rode into the yard with Myra, but it was not till he heard the sound of footsteps upon the gravel path leading to the porch that he looked out of the window.

"Dad, it's Tim!" he exclaimed, and went over to the bowed figure in the armchair. "Listen, there's still time. I'll hold him till you get away."

But Jed Harmon was not to be persuaded.

November 14th, 1936.

"I told you I'm through running" he said doggedly.

At the foot of the steps leading up to the porch Tim stopped Myra.

"I think maybe you'd better not go in," he said. "It might be easier on your father if I talked to him alone."

She nodded submissively and wandered down to the garden gate while he ascended to the porch and entered the living-room.

"I suppose Chad told you why I was comin' out?" he said to the rancher from just inside the door.

"I've been waitin' you," was the comparatively calm reply, and Tim took the crumpled and folded sheet of paper from the pocket of his shirt.

"Thought this letter might throw some light on my brother's death" he said, holding it out.

"I reckon you're right," returned Harmon, with no more than a glance for the letter. "I know what it says."

"Is there any truth in it?"

"Yes. A lot of the cattle I've been selling lately is stolen stock."

Tim raised his brows; Chad cried out:

"But he didn't steal 'em, Tim! I did it!"

Jed Harmon reached out a hand and gripped Chad's arm.

"You're a mighty poor liar, Chad," he said with emotion, "but a mighty fine son!" He turned to Tim. "He didn't steal 'em, and neither did I, but I've done something almost as bad. I've been lettin' my brand be used to market stolen cattle."

"Is that what brought my brother out on to your range?" asked Tim. "To examine your brand?"

"He didn't say so, but I figured it was."

"And he was killed before he could do it?"

"Yes." Jed Harmon stood up. "But I swear to you, Tim, I had nothing whatever to do with it."

"I know that," said Tim. "If ever you shot a man, it'd be out in the open, not from behind a rock."

"Thanks," Harmon murmured appreciatively, and he dropped back into the chair.

"But I figured you could put me on the trail of the man who did kill Jerry."

"Yes, I can do that."

"But they'll get you if you talk, dad!" cried Chad.

"More'n likely they will," agreed his father. "They're a mighty hard crowd, but that can't be helped. I've stood for cattle rustlin' and I've let 'em use my brand because I couldn't help myself; but when it comes to protectin' a murderer I draw the line. The man who killed your brother, Tim, was—"

The door swung wide and Kramer strode into the room with Ludlow, Peters, and another man close behind him, in time to prevent a name being mentioned.

"We came up kinda quiet like," said Kramer, "to avoid gun-play if possible."

Tim whirled round on him.

"What made you think there might be gun-play?" he demanded.

"Well," Kramer replied, "Ludlow says you haven't got much respect for the law."

"Ludlow?" Tim shifted his gaze to the rascally looking sheriff. "What does he know about respect for the law?"

"I am the law," retorted Ludlow angrily, "and I'm arresting Jed Harmon on suspicion of cattle rustlin'!"

"On whose authority?"

It was Kramer who answered the question.

"The Cattlemen's Association," he stated. "I took action as soon as I heard about that letter from the stock-yards."

Chad stepped in front of his father with clenched fists.

"Why don't you tell the truth, Kramer?" he roared. "You're doin' it because you're afraid my father may—"

"Easy, Chad," interrupted Tim. "It's no use startin' anything now."

"But you don't understand!" raged the boy. "If they take dad—"

"Maybe we'd better take the boy along, too, and keep him out of trouble," barked Ludlow.

"That won't be necessary," Tim said sternly. "I'll answer for him—and I'm holding you responsible for Mr. Harmon's safety, too!"

"The law can be relied on to protect its prisoners," said Kramer.

"The law!" Tim flipped a scornful hand. "Why, what has—"

He checked himself and addressed Ludlow: "You're no more the law than I am," he said, "but as long as you're posing as sheriff, you'd better act like one!"

He turned to the seated rancher.

"I guess you'll have to go along with them, Mr. Harmon," he said regretfully. "We'll do what we can, though."

Harmon rose, and Ludlow promptly took hold of his arm.

"Come along!" he growled. "We're just wastin' time here! Come on!"

He marched his prisoner out at the door, and Kramer and the other two followed. Myra was on the porch as they went down the steps, and she rushed into the living-room in a panic.

"What's happened?" she cried.

"Where are they taking daddy?"

"They're takin' him away to keep him from talkin'," Tim replied, and Chad snatched up his black cow-hat, declaring that he was going with them to see that nothing happened.

"Wait!" commanded Tim. "Let Myra go—I need you here!"

"What good can she do?" howled Chad.

"They won't dare hurt him as long as anyone's watching. Go on, Myra!"

Myra ran off to mount the horse she had ridden before, and at the open window Tim watched her canter out from the yard after her father's captors.

"I told you that letter would mean war!" Chad exploded.

"Yes," said Tim, turning away from the window, "but we're not on opposite sides. We're working together, now, and we've got to work fast."

He fished out the ring of keys.

"Did you ever see these before?" he asked.

Chad took the ring, but it was the broken cord attached to the ring, rather than the keys, that engaged his attention. There was a red thread in the cord.

"Seems to me somebody on the ranch wears a cord like that," he said, handing back the ring. "Why?"

"Show me where ho bunks"

Chad led the way out from the house and round the side of it into the yard and then along this to a bunkhouse adjoining the corral. Rankin and Lynch were on their horses in the homo pasture, not very far away, and they recognised the loose-limbed figure of Tim, with his black shirt and white hat.

"I thought you got him?" exclaimed Lynch.

"So did I!" returned Rankin blankly.

Tim and Chad entered the bunkhouse, and Tim proceeded to try the larger of the two keys in the padlocks of boxes and trunks belonging to members of Jed Harmon's outfit.

"Well, that doesn't fit," he remarked glumly after a fifth attempt, and straightened his back.

He had peered under all the lower bunks, working systematically from the door towards the end of the long room. A tin trunk on the floor beyond the bunks caught his eye and he pointed to it.

"Who does that belong to?" he asked. "Belongs to a puncher named Rankin," replied Chad. "What's it all about, Tim?"

"A couple o' fellows ambushed me comin' out of town this afternoon."

Tim went down on one knee in front of the trunk, and Chad stooped beside him while the key was tried in its padlock.

The key fitted, and as the padlock was removed Tim added with grim satisfaction:

"Looks as though Mr. Rankin was one of 'em!"

He raised the lid of the trunk, turned over a quantity of clothing, most of which was distinctly odorous of cattle, and found a half-filled box of cartridges. He compared one of the cartridges with the spent cartridge he had found in the grass among the bushes on the hill, and they tallied.

"Is Rankin an Association man?" he inquired.

"Well," hesitated Chad, "I—I couldn't say for sure."

"If he is," said Tim, dropping the live cartridge back into the box and closing the lid of the trunk, "one of these keys oughta fit Kramer's office at the assembly room. Let's rido into town and find out."

Rankin and Lynch had dismantled in the yard and had crept to the door of the bunkhouse. They dived in over the step, and Lynch shouted fiercely:

"You ain't goin' nowhere, and you ain't gonna find out nothin'!"

Chad looked round, saw that the two had guns in their hands, and raised his own hands above his head. Tim got slowly to his feet, taking full stock of the pair.

"You two men," continued Lynch in a nasal drawl, "are gonna have a quarrel and kill each other. What started the fight we can't imagine. All we know is we heard shootin', and when we got in here your guns were hot and both of you was dead!"

Tim had half-raised his hands, his face a blank; but Chad was scared.

"You can't get away with a frame-up like this, Lynch!" he cried.

"Oh, yes, we can," Lynch retorted evilly, "because we'll be the only witnesses!"

He took deliberate aim at Chad, and Rankin advanced towards Tim. But Tim's right arm swept downwards more quickly than the eye could see, and his own six-gun was out and blazing before either of them could jerk a trigger.

Rankin sagged forward and collapsed with a bullet in his chest, and Lynch dropped his weapon, clutched at a wounded arm, and fell sideways.

Unexpected Prisoners!

IN the town gaol, at the back of the sheriff's office, Jed Harmon was locked in a cell divided from other cells by bars of iron, and Ludlow locked the door. Peters and the other "agent" looked on with grinning faces; Kramer took a cigar from his pocket, bit off the end and spat it in the floor, then struck a match.

"I brought you in, Harmon," he said as he lit the cigar and puffed at it,

"because you seem inclined to talk too much."

He dropped the flaming match on the floor, stamped on it and stepped nearer to the bars.

"Now you can't hurt us," he went on, "because you can't prove anything. But you can help us, and I'm willing to make a bargain."

He contemplated the glowing end of the cigar, blew a cloud of smoke, and spoke again.

"When Tim O'Neil comes in," he said, "I want you to steer him as far away from us as possible—and I'll hush up everything I've got on you."

Jed Harmon held two of the bars and looked defiantly out at him between two others.

"I'm through takin' orders, Kramer," he declared hoarsely, "and I'm not goin' to protect the men who killed Tim's brother."

"Then you'll probably swing for it yourself!"

"I had nothin' to do with it, and you know it!"

"Sure," purred Kramer, "but the evidence is all against you. He was killed on your ranch, examining your crooked brands. Why, I might even find two men to swear they saw you do it."

"It won't work, Kramer!" gritted the rancher. "You may hang me, but you won't fool Tim. He'll stick to the trail, and sooner or later he'll get the men he's after."

"You think so," Kramer waved the cigar. "But I've got two men watchin' him. I know what he's doing every minute!"

The voice of Tim rang out from the doorway of the office, startling him even more than the others, and belying his boast.

"Don't you worry, dad," Chad said to his father, who was looking down between the bars at Rankin.

November 14th, 1936.

"I brought you a couple o' your gunners for repairs," stated the voice quite cheerfully.

Five assorted pairs of eyes stared at him. He was carrying the limp body of Mike Rankin over his shoulder, and behind him stumbled Ned Lynch, holding his wounded arm, closely followed by Chad with a six-shooter in his hand.

"What happened?" gasped Kramer.

"They took a shot at me when I was goin' out to the ranch, and missed," replied Tim.

"That's a lie!" bellowed Lynch. "We caught him breakin' into Rankin's trunk!"

"That was afterwards." Tim advanced to a cell on the right of the one in which Jed Harmon had been locked. Its door was open, and he went in and dumped the unconscious form of Rankin on a bunk, whereupon Chad drove Lynch in, too.

"Don't you worry, dad," he said to his father, who was looking down between the bars at Rankin.

He backed out from the cell with his gun, and Tim followed and slammed the door, then faced Kramer.
