So it is with Princess Pat Face Powder. Always there has been face powder "of a fineness," as the French say. But what of the face powder that some alchemy of loving care should transform into spun moonbeams and the allure of azure nights. What of the face powder which should call forth all the feminine superlatives, which would be as smooth as the satin skin it adorned, as delicate as the rose tints of dawn.

Truly, of such a powder, you would say it is different—and delectable. And that is what women do say of Princess Pat. It is no more possible to try Princess Pat Face Powder and miss its excellences than it is to deny the spring its flowers.

Yet patient chemists working steadfastly for months brought into being this new kind of face powder—and not some inspired being from fairyland.

The secret of inimitable softness in Princess Pat is Almond—Almond used as a base instead of all those ingredients which have gone before, since the remote days when chemistry was but the crude hint of today's knowledge.

Princess Pat—because of Almond—is a more clinging powder. Its affinity for the skin is productive of marvelous smoothness. It seems to blend with and become part of the skin texture—not so much something put on as some new quality of fineness added to the flesh. And Princess Pat, correctly applied, resists moisture. Face and neck and arms once given the loveliness of Princess Pat Powder retain their beauty for hours. It is even possible to powder with Princess Pat so that it withstands the supreme test of a plunge in salt or fresh water.

Then there is the exquisite fragrance of Princess Pat. It is not an aggressive perfume, but one that steals forth modestly and captures the senses with suggestion, with allurements and delicacy. It speaks the language of refinement.

But best of all perhaps, Princess Pat is a new kind of powder in that it is good for the skin. Almond again! For this happy choice of an exclusive base possesses all the soothing qualities that women well know. It lends pliancy to the skin and helps keep it free of blemish. Hence it is the powder for those whose skin ordinary powder dries and roughens.

In short Princess Pat Face Powder is a genuine achievement, with a real reason for being different. It is the only powder with an Almond Base, and the qualities this beneficent ingredient makes possible.

So that you may know this distinctly better powder—without the obligation of investment—you will be sent a generous supply for thorough trial. It comes in a little metal container ideally suited for the purse. The makers of Princess Pat will esteem it a favor to have you use the coupon right speedily and obtain your complimentary supply.

followed we may be spared. The woman was beaten and the man was free. It is always this way, the only pity is that women have not learned it. Goaded to desperation by Carlotta's persistence, Max had flung out of the room in his excitement, saying, "I'm thru with you, thru, understand," all the way down stairs.

Poor, frantic Joe waiting at the foot of the stairs overheard the angry threat and thought naturally that it applied to Sidney. The boy's mind snapped. He pulled out a gun and closed his eyes and fired twice. The doctor dropped untidily to the floor and slipped in a ghastly comic sprawl down the stairs. "You dirty cad!" screamed Joe, mad with excitement and terror. "You dirty cad—to treat a decent girl so!"

"Never mind that, young man," said the proprietor, "just come along with me."

Doctor Max still breathed and he was carried thru the excited diners to an ambulance from St. Luke's that Carlotta had summoned. She followed him to the hospital to await the verdict of the staff who discussed the case in shocked excited whispers. One by one they came away from the sick room, each one graver than the other. "No hope," was the verdict Carlotta read on every face, but Carlotta knew there was one man who could save him.

Throwing a shawl over her evening gown, she ran panting thru the dark quiet streets of sleeping Charlottetown to the home of Sidney Page, but it was not Sidney she wanted, Sidney was at the hospital. It was K. Le Moyne, K., the unknown.

"I cannot—I cannot," groaned the man in response to her frantic pleading.

"You've got to," said the woman doggedly, "you're the only man who can save him. You're in my power, 'K. Le Moyne.' Do you want your past to kill your present? Do you want those dead—?"

"Stop!" cried the tortured man.

"The price of my—my silence then," went on the woman, "is that you operate at once on Max Wilson."

"All right," agreed the man wearily yet with a note of hope in his voice.

"There is everything you need at the hospital," said Carlotta. "I'll explain. I can fix it. Come."

"Gentlemen," she said a few breathless moments later, standing with K. before an astonished group of physicians, "here is a surgeon, incognito for the moment, who can save the life of our Doctor Max. I will stake my life on that. Max is dearer to me than anything in the world—" her voice broke, but she went on, "I know this man can save him. He must be allowed to operate at once."

Desperate measures require desperate remedies, and it was not long before patient and doctor and a fascinated group of nurses and internes were assembled in the operating-room. Carlotta was not allowed to enter and after pacing the corridor outside in a frenzy of anxiety, she went down to the restroom where Sidney lay asleep on a couch all unconscious of the mad excitement on the top floor. She woke her savagely.

"Doctor Max is upstairs being operated on by K. Le Moyné," she began cruelly. "He was shot by Joe Drummond because he thought you were in a private room with him at Schwitters. I was with him. He loved me once. We lived together for years before he came here. He was going to marry me and then you came along. I got you suspended from the hospital and while you were gone he was mine again—my lover, do you understand?"

Sidney went white and red by turns. No words came to her trembling lips. She could only stare at the agitated woman dumbly while many sharp disjointed phrases tore thru her stunned brain: "Max shot—dying—K.—Joe Drummond—K. Le Moyné—he was a doctor—a surgeon—but what terrible thing had he done that the law wanted him—she was his dear—he had said it—Max, Carlotta's lover—oh, misery—she must tell K.—he would know what to do—but he was operating on Max—where—"

Two men entered the room at the same moment. "He lives?" breathed Carlotta to one of them.

"Yes, he'll be all right," answered K. "Sidney, dear," he said, turning toward her, "will you let me tell you a story—"

"Oh, K.," wept Sidney in his arms. "Carlotta has told me that Max is her—her—"

"Not so fast, young woman," said the second man, to Carlotta who was trying to leave the room. "We want everybody to stay right here." Several excited doctors and nurses had pushed their way into the room and the group was rigid with expectation. "Which one of you calls himself, 'K. Le Moyné?'" he asked suddenly.

K. stepped forward and Sidney with him clinging to his hand.

"You are wanted for manslaughter, Dr. Edwardes," said the detective, showing his badge with the flamboyant gesture such persons always employ.

The roomful gasped with one

"I Knew You'd Make Good"

"I ALWAYS felt you had it in you to get ahead. But for a time I was afraid your natural ability would be wasted because you had never trained yourself to do any one thing well.

"But the minute you decided to study in your spare time I knew you'd make good. You seemed more ambitious—more cheerful—more confident of the future. I knew your employers couldn't help but notice the difference in your work.

"Think what this last promotion means! More money—more comforts—more of everything worth while. Tom, those hours you spent on that I. C. S. course were the best investment you ever made."

HOW about you? Are you always going to work for a small salary? Are you going to waste your natural ability all your life? Or are you going to get ahead in a big way? It all depends on what you do with your spare time.

Opportunity knocks—this time in the form of that familiar I. C. S. coupon. It may seem like a little thing, but it has been the means of bringing better jobs and bigger salaries to thousands of men.

breath. Dr. Edwardes! The famous, infamous Dr. Edwardes! The finest surgeon that ever lived who had suddenly gone off, and killed one patient after another by a criminal carelessness that had forced him finally to flee for his life, a harried fugitive. But no wonder he had been able to save Max Wilson's life. There had never been anyone to equal him. Carlotta should be grateful. . . .

Carlotta was grateful, just how grateful she was soon to disclose.

K. gently released Sidney's hand. "It is true," he said, "but I wanted to tell you first. There were things I could never understand and I—I lost my nerve. Good-bye, little—friend—"

"Oh, I can't believe this," cried Sidney, suddenly seizing his hand again.

"You don't have to," said a voice. "I alone am responsible for the death of Dr. Edwardes' patients. I did it so that Max Wilson would get his place on the staff at Flower Hospital. I loved him so—I loved him so—he said he'd marry me when he got on the staff—and now—oh, God! I still love him—" Carlotta's voice broke in rasping sobs. The detective touched her gently on the shoulder and she mercifully lost consciousness.

The first thing Dr. Edwardes did after his public exoneration was to get into trouble again—at least some folks call it trouble. What he did was get married. And Charlottetown forgot that he had held himself aloof from them and they from him and turned out to the last man to see the stranger ride away in the biggest limousine its collective eyes had ever witnessed, appropriately placarded and properly burdened with its favorite daughter, Sidney Page—no—Sidney Edwardes.

Rex, King of Wild Horses

thereafter as the cue in working the horse. After each successful scene, where the horse performed as was wanted, Morrison gave him a carrot as a reward. If he was obstinate and would not work properly, he was denied this reward, instead of being beaten. If this picture is the box-office success that is anticipated, and that present returns indicate it will be, Hal Roach is deeply in debt, first to Morrison, then to the lowly carrot which played such an important rôle in this production.

After the picture "King of Wild Horses" had been completed, a great amount of trouble seemed to brew regarding its release to the public. Several persons interested in the prevention of cruelty to animals emphatically announced that they would seek an injunction against its showing. They knew, so they stated, that no animal could do the work that Rex had done, unless some inhumane treatment was used. They would take no one's word for it that the horse had not been beaten, yet they refused to have it proved to them that he had not. After much persuasion they at last consented to go to the Roach ranch and see Rex work.

At the ranch, Morrison had Rex do all of his stunts. The man was empty-handed, save for a few carrots with which he rewarded the animal. When seeing this, the men remarked that they would like to see how the animal acted when a club or a whip was used. Morrison told them that he did not even want to try working the horse with a weapon of any sort. They became suspicious and cast insinuations that the horse might show his mistreatment by acting cowed when a whip was produced.

"I will willingly show you this," said Morrison, "but I would prefer one of you gentlemen acting as both trainer and judge."

The men refused to do this and told Morrison that it was useless for him to do it as they had arrived at their conclusions and their minds could not be changed.

After having sacrificed and struggled for months in the making of the picture, to say nothing of the huge expenditures, Morrison naturally became somewhat peeved.

"I'll show you gentlemen that it would be a physical impossibility as well as near suicide for a man to try and beat this horse."

He released Rex from his stall. The horse bounded out into the corral and trotted down to the end opposite from which the two men were standing. Morrison walked over to an old motion-picture set and picked up a piece of two-by-four. Coming back he walked toward Rex. When within a few feet of the stallion, he started cursing the animal and raised the club over his head as if to strike. In an instant Rex turned to a demon. Rising on his hind feet he rushed toward Morrison, pawing the air as he came. His ears lay straight back on his head. His eyes burned with the hatred that he had always harbored for man. By this time Morrison had jumped out of his path. It was not Morrison in particular that Rex was after. He had again been offended and he hated all men. He trudged on toward the two visitors. Much to the mirth of Hal Roach and Morrison, who stood on the side lines, the two men who claimed that Rex was cowed, tried to climb into a small feed box about large enough for a good-sized kitten. With a well-placed roping, Morrison rescued them from their plight. The two men left and have not been heard from since.

Rex is still wild. His new environment has not changed him with exception of his love for Morrison.

NOTE TO EDITOR.—Since the writing of this article, Morrison was killed in a tragic accident, while riding the horse that was to have played the villain in Rex's next picture. This will upset considerably the plans for the next picture and it is rumored that Hal Roach is having considerable trouble finding a man to handle the horse, which is natural, under the circumstances. Morrison's brother, Carl, will probably be selected to fill the vacancy left by Chick.—T. R.

AUTUMN

By FAITH BALDWIN

The hills are warrior monks; with sandaled feet,

With tattered cloak, and cowl of piety, They march, brown pilgrims, bravely glad, to greet

The wild blue dawn above the wild blue sea.

From crystal cups they offer praise with wine,

Sun-wine, as yellow as The Black Flag's loot;

Chill, silver brew of moons which, distant, shine,

And sharp, sweet wine which reddens in the fruit.

Their many lifted altars proudly bear

The scarlet-saffron torches of the trees, And thru the flaming splendor of the air

The incense smoke of brush perfumes the breeze.

arm. "Is that your puling parson?" His face still bore a polite smile for the world's gaze but his eyes were suddenly red and bloodshot. "Sit still! Where d'you think you're going? Back to the arms of a fellow who threw you away like a broken toy? By Heaven, I won't be made a fool of! You're coming with me—now!"

"I told you that some day maybe I'd be able to feel sommat again," said Tess in a still little voice, "and now I can! I hate you—if you knew how much you would be afeared—"

It was two hours before Angel Clare, by dint of desperate seeking, stood outside the door of the apartment which Alec D'Urberville had taken for his love nest. The bell, under his trembling fingers rang with a resonant sound like a bell in an empty house. And then without warning, the door opened slowly and Tess stood framed against the thick darkness within. She looked very small and tired in the shabby coat that she had worn down to London, and she answered Angel Clare's haggard eyes with a faint, pitiful smile. "I—killed him," she pointed into the blackness behind. "I suppose they will hang me, wont they?" Her lips quivered childishly, "'tis proper queer how things come—I never wanted to be wicked and now I must be hung—"

"Oh God!" groaned Angel Clare, "Oh my poor Tess! I am to blame! It was my sinful pride which brought us to this—" with that little word "us" he took her burden of guilt upon his shoulders. Like terrified children they clung together while he whispered his fantastic plan. There was an empty house he knew near his own village. They would go there now, taking food with them and have their honeymoon until the end came—as they both knew quite clearly the end must come.

By some kind miracle of a pitiful God they were able to forget—for hours together—the horror that hung over them, and there in the deserted house on the edge of the wind-swept downs they were happy, as other lovers who find the world shut out in each other's arms. Tess bloomed to new beauty under Angel's worshiping eyes like a rosebud opening to the sun, and day-lights and darks passed them by without their knowing. But presently, by the waiting look of her eyes, he knew that she had remembered

EARLE E. LIEDERMAN
The Muscle Builder

How Strong Are You? Can You Do These Things?

Lift 200 lbs. or more overhead with one arm;
Bend and break a horse-shoe; Tear two decks of playing cards; Bend spires;
Chin yourself with one hand?

Can you do any of them? I can and many of my pupils can. It is remarkable the things a man can do if he will make up his mind to be strong. It is natural for the human body to be strong. It is unnatural to be weak. I have taken men who were ridiculed because of their frail make-up and developed them into the strongest men of their locality.

I Want You For 90 Days

These are the days that call for speed. It once took four weeks to cross the ocean—now it takes less than one. In olden days it took years to develop a strong, healthy body. I can completely transform you in 90 days. Yes, make a complete change in your entire physical make-up. In 30 days I guarantee to increase your biceps one full inch. I also guarantee to increase your chest two inches. But I don't stop till you're a finished athlete—a real strong man. I will broaden your shoulders, deepen your chest, and strengthen your neck. I will give you the arms and legs of a Hercules. I will put an armor plate of muscle over your entire body. But with it comes the strong, powerful lungs which enrich the blood, putting new life into your entire being. You will be bubbling over with strength, pep and vitality.

A Doctor Who Takes His Own Medicine

Many say that any form of exercise is good, but this is not true. I have seen men working in factories literally kill themselves with exercise. They ruined their hearts or other vital organs, ruptured themselves or killed off what little vitality they possessed.

I was a frail weakling myself in search of health and strength. I spent years in study and research, analyzing my own defects to find what I needed. After many experiments I discovered a secret of progressive exercising. I increased my arms over six and a half inches, my neck three inches and other parts of my body in proportion. I decided to become a public benefactor, and impart this knowledge to others. Physicians and authorities on physical culture have tested my system and pronounced it to be the surest means of acquiring perfect manhood. Do you crave a strong, well proportioned body and the abundance of health that goes with it? If so spend a pleasant half hour in learning how to attain it. The knowledge is yours for the asking.

Send for my new 64-page book "MUSCULAR DEVELOPMENT"

It contains forty-three full-page photographs of myself and my many prize-winning pupils. Some of these came to me as pitiful weaklings, imploring me to help them. Look them over now, and you will marvel at their present physiques. This book will prove an impetus and an inspiration to you. All I ask is 10 cents to cover the cost of wrapping and mailing. This will not obligate you at all, but for the sake of your future health and happiness, do not put it off. Send today—right now, before you turn this page.

Anna O. Nilsson, famous for her beautiful eyes and all his passionate kisses could not drive the shadow away.

And then one night she woke trembling and told him of her old dream of tall stones, towering above her, threatening to crush her. Angel Clare listened, holding her close.

"You are describing Stonehenge!" he said, "the old Druid temple not three miles away from us!"

Tess sighed, "Then—all my life I've been coming here—I didn't tell 'ee, Angel, but yesterday I saw strange men about the downs. We will wait among the stones——"

In the grey dawnlight they stood among the great granite columns whose mystery will never be solved, hand clasped in hand. "I was always afeared here before," Tess smiled, "but not now. And I wont be afeared when they put the black cap over my eyes for I'll know you'll be there outside the prison——"

"Oh, God!" cried Angel Clare. "Oh, my dearest, I cant bear it!"

It was for her in that last few moments to comfort him. "There, there, my deary! I've been happy—so happy with you. Of course, I'm not saying it wouldn't have been sweet to live, and maybe had another child in my arms some day——"

He sobbed aloud, kneeling beside her, head on her breast; but Tess' face was lifted to the first rays of sunlight slanting thru the old grey stones. "It all seems so queer like——" Tess said, "but 'tis as if it's meant! That makes it right——"

And then she saw the men coming toward them across the downs, and pointed them out to Angel Clare. And with her hand in his and her head high like the daughter of a proud race, Tess of the D'Urbervilles went to meet them as calmly as in other days she had ever walked thru the sparkle of morning meadows with her milk-pail on her arm.

Behind them the wind from across the downs tossed a handful of autumn leaves into a crevice among the tall grey stones. . . .

have you? You will have to get in touch with the stars direct for their pictures. Jack Holt is playing in "North of 36." Norma Shearer is to have the leading feminine rôle in "The Snob," for Metro-Goldwyn.

DUTCHY L.—Yes, Colleen Moore played in "The Ninety-Nine." Pola Negri is twenty-seven. So is Corinne Griffith. Mildred Davis is Mrs. Harold Lloyd.

CATHERINE L.—No, that was my error. Lucille Ricksen is not married. Natacha Rambova has reddish brown hair. T. Roy Barnes is playing in "Reckless Romance." Earle Foxe has been cast in the lead in the Richard Harding Davis series, which are being filmed by Fox. Florence Gilbert is the leading lady.

ALICE L.—Mildred June and Bobby Agnew in "Troubles of a Bride." Jacqueline Logan has been engaged to play opposite Richard Dix in "Manhattan." Conrad Nagel and Claire Windsor in "So This Is Marriage."

GLEN.—El Dorado is given as a name to any wealthy country. It was really a fabulous region in South America, which surpassed other countries in the production of famous gems and precious metals. Leatrice Joy is twenty-five and Dorothy Mackaill is twenty. Blanche Sweet and Lew Cody in "The Sporting Venus."

MARGIE.—That was some letter of yours. Malcolm MacGregor is married and a father. Write me any time.

BETTIE AND JOIN.—How charming. No, Richard Dix is not married. Valentino is twenty-nine. Barbara La Marr is playing in "Sandra."

RICHARD T.—Douglas Fairbanks' last picture was "The Thief of Bagdad," which is still running on Broadway. Walter McGrail is playing with Rosemary Theby in "Souls Adrift."

JEANNE.—"The Humming Bird" was released January, 1924. Gloria Swanson has had her hair bobbed for over a year now. Charlotte Merriam, due to her splendid work in "The Code of the Wilderness," has signed a long term contract with Vitagraph.

DOROTHY W.—Sir James Barrie has decided upon Lillian Gish to play in "Peter Pan." If she can be released from her Inspiration Contract, she will probably play in it for Famous Players. Mae Marsh is second choice. Address Conrad Nagel with Metro-Goldwyn.

HELEN J.—Colleen Moore's real name is Kathleen Morrison, so she is no relation to the Moore boys. Frank Mayo, Mabel Ballin, Harry Morey, Wanda Hawley and Arline Pretty are playing in "Barriers Burned Away."

IRIS L.—Men may as well expect to grow stronger by always eating, as wiser by always reading. Too much overcharges nature, and turns more into disease than nourishment. 'Tis thought and digestion which makes books serviceable and gives health and vigor to the mind. So take heed, and don't read too much. Monte Blue is not married.

M. R. F.—Well, twenty years of romance make a woman look like a ruin; but twenty years of marriage make her something like a public building. Corinne Griffith was born November 24, 1897, and her real name is Corinne Scott. She is playing in "Wilderness." Mahlon Hamilton and May Allison are playing the leads in "The River Road." Alma Rubens and Frank Mayo in "The Lawful Cheater."

SLIM JIM.—Hoot Gibson is married to Helen Johnson. Laura LaPlante is not married. Someone once said that the man

See how this side of face denotes the woman's age, 64 years.

Now, fold this side of picture over, along dotted line, and see how facial filming restored youth. Time of treatment 25 minutes.

Is this a Miracle?

Faces restored while you wait! Facial tissues revitalized in an hour! To remove all traces of time from the face is now a matter of moments!

A miracle? Yes. The modern miracle of facial filming.

To realize what this discovery means, study the photograph. If you think it cannot cope with age—the lady in the picture is 64 years old! If you doubt that face filming always works, on any human skin—and will work on yours—read of the arrangements for letting you try it.

Facial Film was born in France. Because of the tremendous cost, its use has been restricted until now. Its base is neoplasma, worth $5,000 a pound! The perfecting of this film in solution has brought it to America in affordable form, giving beauty power which forever solves the problem of perfect complexion. A face with telltale lines is now inexcusable. Even deep furrows may now be removed from the countenance: wrinkles succumb to a single application of neoplasma film; every minor blemish in skin young or old dissolve almost with the first touch.

When women realize the full significance of this discovery there will be no "old" young faces—no "withered" faces at any age—no old eyes in young heads—or "sacks" beneath the eyes in middle age. Lines from the corners of the mouth to nose, and down to chin are dispelled by this regeneration of tissue. So are the fine lines that cause necks to look old before their time. It makes no difference what caused these wrinkles—whether due to the general condition of age, organic trouble, under-nourishment, or just nervous strain—the filming process revitalizes and makes firm the whole skin structure and flesh beneath. It "takes up the slack" and draws sagging tissues as taut and smooth as in early youth. (Filming naturally has the same effect on hands, and on any part of the body.)

In this age of creams and clays, and endless other "beautifiers," it is hoped that neoplasma film will not be regarded as a cosmetic. It is gentle, to be sure, but it is a physical re-agent accomplishing the same astonishing changes for which women have undergone plastic surgery. The results are the same—without the risk, discomfort, or expense. You have read of the remarkable results of "face-lifting;" neoplasma is just as effective and being Nature's way is vastly safer and more satisfactory. Facial filming brings a new era of beauty and beauty methods. It dooms the superficial, surface preparations which are of no scientific activity, for this process of rejuvenating the tissues puts a swift—almost instantaneous—end to skin impurities of all kinds. It renders pores clear, clean and pliant.

And now for the proof: neoplasma sufficient to supply in solution to as many as respond to this first public announcement will be distributed by mail from the Dr. Egan manufactory in Chicago. The film is used without special knowledge or skill; it is effective in the hands of anybody using the simple instructions issued with each supply. It is a liquid film and comes in a vescule which seals the contents against any deterioration even while in use. Your skin may require one adrenalizing, or several, depending on its condition, your age, etc. But your first filming will bring such youth to your skin as will astound you. It is a fresh wonder of Science that is comparable to radium. It is the true neoplasma which in other forms has been found in the practice of medicine to restore the activity of a heart that has ceased beating. All-powerful but harmless. Skin regeneration is a discovery so far reaching that preparations which merely pamper the complexion, even rouge, will soon be abandoned.

Druggists have not been supplied yet. For a full vescule of neoplasma film write to Dr. Egan laboratory. You need not enclose the fee (two dollars) unless you choose; payment may be made on arrival. You don't pay anything unless your gratitude for benefits knows no bounds. Women have voluntarily tendered twenty-five and fifty dollars at the laboratory for the same results guaranteed you. Seeing is believing; use coupon printed here:

PHARMACEUTICAL PRODUCTS, LTD. 2C
(Division of the Dr. Egan Manufactory)
310 So. Michigan Ave., Chicago.

Please send full vescule of Facial Film for free trial. I will pay postman $2 and postage subject to return unless filming brings the remarkable benefits described. (If handier, enclose two dollars and save the postage; same money-back guarantee applies).

The Play of the Month

completely wrong, even in the company of Heywood Brown, makes me less those coryphæes of the Kurfuerstendamm in whose company I dallied.

And seeing "Abie's Irish Rose," for the first time on its nine hundred and sixty-eighth performance, permits me to be as superior as Ludwig Lewisohn to the opinions of Alexander Woolcott. The dailies roasted "Abie." Now I can roast the dailies by discovering the extraordinary virtues of that interracial masterpiece.

As a matter of fact, I feel very much like doing just that. The play is no worse than most of our failures and decidedly better than many of our successes. In May, 1922, I suppose I would have been hot enough and tired enough, after a season of just such trash, to ignore the fact that Miss Nichols knows as much about playwrighting as Aaron Hoffmann and a great deal more than George Middleton. In August, 1924, I recognize that the only trouble with "Abie's Irish Rose" is that Sam Harris didn't produce it.

The secret of the success of "Abie's Irish Rose" is simple enough—theo that doesn't mean that any playwright or manager can achieve it. To begin with, it has a topic full of natural dramatic effects—the conflict of Irish bigotry with Jewish bigotry. Either race can ordinarily be depended upon to supply plenty of amusing hokum. Link them together by the secret marriage of their children and the result is bound to be effective—so long as the playwright is a good critic. If he can choose between the less and the more entertaining, then he will have incidents just a little more theatrically amusing than those of "Welcome, Stranger!" Aaron Hoffmann's comedy about the Jew who invaded a small New England town.

It is hard to present on paper any concrete evidences of Miss Nichols' virtue as a playwright. They are clear enough on the stage. But her faults—or, rather, her main fault—is another matter. It cries out at you. It shrieks: "I ain't got no style!" That is the secret of "Abie's" inferiority—and some of its popularity. It is common—in a common way. It ought to be common in a fashionable way. If Sam Harris had produced it, it might be as ordinary in its emotions, ideas, and wit as it pleased, but it would be fashionable. It would ride along with the procession. The hokum Takes Off 41 Lbs In Exactly 7 Weeks!

The lady in the picture is close to an ideal weight. Yet two months ago she was far too stout—was heavier by more than forty pounds! Mrs. Ella Carpenter, New Orleans, explains how she reduced with such success:

"I had long wished for some means of reducing my 170 lbs. Being a business woman I had no time nor money to waste on fads; but two months ago I decided to try a method that somehow seemed sensible. The trial didn't cost anything, it required only a week—so I gave Wallace reducing records a chance and here is what happened.

"Easiest Thing I Ever Did"

"Fifteen minutes each evening I took the reducing movements—to music. It was uncommonly interesting; I felt better from the start. But I watched my weight, and that is what thrilled me; I lost 6½ lbs. that first week. Naturally, I went on with it. The second week I lost 8 lbs. more.

"I didn't do a thing to supplement my course with Wallace—no Turkish baths—no starving, nor patent foods or drugs—I just got thin to music as the offer said I would. It was delightfully easy. Today, my bathroom scale said 129—not bad for my 5 ft. 5 inches!"

Reduce without punishment; without any "reduced look!" Proof that you can cost nothing. The trial is really free. Coupon brings the full first lesson—record and all—without payment now or on delivery.

stage play the better to enjoy a hero's sufferings, you will appreciate William de Mille's thoughtfulness in bringing the camera close to his characters' faces when they are registering grief or despair or love. The closeup is the screen substitute for the opera-glass habit, and Mr. de Mille has a telescopic camera grinding with every scene he shoots as well as the regular machine; then when he wishes to use a near view at any particular point the cutting from the full scene to the closeup face will be perfectly smooth. His brother Cecil recently used seven cameras simultaneously in taking a small but important shot centering about a blackboard, thus giving an unbroken sequence of the action from every possible angle. When the scene is flashed on the screen, the girl will not have a lock of hair loose in the long view and be wearing a hair net in the closeup, and the man will not be smoking a fresh cigaret at a distance and a butt in the nearer shot, as happens so often when the two views are taken at different times.

James Cruze, however, uses but one, or at the most two cameras in shooting a scene and leaves the matter of its position to his cameraman, Carl Brown, giving him carte blanche to work out his own ideas. Before taking "The Fighting Coward," Mr. Brown studied the art form of the period, steel engravings, and discovered that they were all made from a low angle of vision, the artist sitting on a stool below the scene he was depicting and looking slightly up at it. By straddling the tripod of his camera to its full width, he was able to reproduce the engraver's viewpoint, giving a quaintness to the picture which the audiences will not understand but will feel.

"Taking motion pictures isn't quite the same thing as turning an ice-cream freezer or cranking a Ford engine, tho the motion may seem similar!" says he. "Personally I believe a cameraman should try to interpret the spirit of the action by his photography. There was a scene in 'Stella Maris' I have always remembered, the one where the little drudge has killed the woman who tortured her. The lighting was flat and dead and the camera angle deliberately distorted to give a feeling of despair. Mechanically it was bad photography, but artistically it was great work!"

To Cecil De Mille a motion picture is first of all a picture, something to look at. Detail, finish, beauty of setting, clearness of background characterize his work and he has a director of photography, Bert Glennon, as well as a cameraman. Chummy camera angles have no place in a Cecil De Mille picture; to his mind the audience belongs in its seats, not on the screen. When there are more than two or three people on a set, his camera is raised above their heads.

In the great mob scenes in "The Ten Commandments," the cameras were hoisted thirty feet from the ground on scaffoldings, in order to obtain the widest possible range of vision. A telescopic lens caught the closeups of Rod La Rocque's face as he stood in the tossing motor-boat from the top of a breakwater half a mile away, while the Ackley camera, a machine arranged on ball bearings so that it can lie down, roll over and over and stand on its head, was used to follow Leatrice Joy to the roof of the cathedral and to panorama the pursuing chariots of the Egyptians.

Most screen players have a "bad angle." Perhaps one side view is not so good as the other, perhaps the profile is better than the full face. It is said that even Mary Pickford has one angle which is never shown on the screen. The camera can perform miracles for them, flattering their good points, concealing their not-so-good ones and aiding them to put their best faces forward as it were. A low camera angle combined with a high background has often made short actors like Henry Walthall appear supernaturally tall, while the reverse of the trick is called upon to conceal the sudden alarming tendency to legginess of some screen-child.

Nowadays the crash of breaking traditions is heard on the movie lots. The actors turn their backs upon the lens, or look straight into it. The chalk marks which kept them toeing the line are gone and they may now emote without fear that when they fling themselves in despair upon the floor perhaps their heads will be missing from the finished pictures. The migratory camera is at home in autos and aeroplanes. It burrows into the ground or hides in a concrete dug-out thru which its single eye may watch a stampede of buffalo thunder by overhead and it climbs nimbly above the heads of a society dinner.

It conspires with the stunt actor to make him seem to do that which cannot be done. It makes bricks of straw, silk purses of sow's ears, builds Rome in a day, creates a mighty ocean from little drops of water, and a sheiky desert from little grains of sand and—greatest miracle of all—it makes stars out of ordinary mortals and dreams for a whole world from a dingy strip of celluloid.

Into the attic

FEW youngsters to-day ever saw a horsehair sofa. They wouldn't know what to do with a fire taper, carpet stretcher, or coal-oil lamp. They couldn't braid rags into a rug, or wind yarn without tangling. But they know the how and why of typewriters, phonographs, telephones, automobiles; what happens when a push of the button gives light, or a kodak's flash fixes their image on paper.

Their education is as modern as the advertisements they see. They have no more use for the lamp and chimney of yesterday than you for the wick and tallow of the day before.

Advertisements induce such progress. They urge wide use that means improvement. They help you lift the out-of-date into the attic—rid you of the water buckets and soap kettles of slavery. They bring late improvements within your reach.

Read the advertisements regularly. Keep alert to the new.

Have You Wondered Why Some Toilet Goods Clerks So Persistently Push One Line?

A REPRESENTATIVE of the Federal Trade Commission made an address at the last convention of the National Association of Toilet Goods Manufacturers calling their attention to a situation which threatens the good faith between department stores and their customers. Now that the spotlight has been turned on this evil practice which has grown up slowly, it must inevitably disappear.

Many women have, no doubt, been at a loss to understand the persistent and often adroit methods by which clerks at toilet goods counters in department stores attempt to make them take some brand other than the one they had intended. They are frequently irritated by this, but how completely they would resent it if they knew the real facts. The young woman who is trying to substitute is not an unbiased clerk of the store, but in truth, the employe of a manufacturer masquerading as a clerk.

In a great many department stores of this country the salaries of all the clerks at the toilet goods counter are paid by individual manufacturers. The advantage to the manufacturer is that the young woman so employed will divert to his brand all wavering or undecided customers, and within the limits laid down by the store rules, switch from other brands.

There can be no objections to the open demonstrator. She often serves to perform a useful demonstrating and sampling job. But the hidden demonstrator—who masquerades as an unprejudiced clerk speaking in the interests of the store and with its authority—tends to break down the good will that is the greatest fundamental asset which the department store possesses.

At present the only real protection the customer has is to know what she wants and insist upon getting it.

would be the latest thing. It would be just a little smarter, just a little more exclusive. When the Jewish hero had to invent a kosher name for his bride, Rosemary Murphy, it wouldn't be so obviously impossible as "Murphysky." The verbal humor would run above the following: "For why you want to get Abie married? He's heppy."

The final fact about this play's success is that it appeals to the non-theatergoing populace. The theory has been that, between the Irish and the Jews, it was bound to make a mint of money. It happens that outside New York and Boston there aren't so very many of these peoples. It happens, also, that the audiences—if mine was any sample—are shy on both varieties. The people who go to "Abie's Irish Rose" are mainly the kind of people who went to "Ben-Hur" and "Experience." The fact that the gentlemen frequently bring a two-pound box of candy as well as a girl defines their familiarity with the ways of the theater. They like a certain amount of religion in their plays, and a certain amount of good old-fashioned hokum. But above all they need the obvious. And they get it from "Abie's Irish Rose."

down to earth. He puts before us human characters in real places.

"Manhandled" might be criticized on the ground that there is just a little too much space given its star. Perhaps such is the case, but at least Miss Swanson deserves more space here than ever before. She is a real actress—and demonstrates here that she is a gifted comédienne as well as an accomplished mimic. And she offers a distinctly new touch in hairdress. She wears a bob like no other bob—with the front ends long enough to curl forward in a crescent over the cheek. It adds more color to her personality and makes her characterization sure. Is she a real actress? We offer in proof of this the fact that she wears a dingy dress thru half of the picture and still holds the attention.

There are others who give good performances. Tom Moore is a perfect representation of what he pretends to be—an every-day youth of the workshop, and Ian Keith (with profile), Arthur Housman, Frank Morgan, Lilyan Tashman and Paul McAllister act with authority.

It is amazing what publicity stunts are worked to exploit films. The ingenuity of the angles and tie-ups—to say nothing of the turn-overs and overheads, is sufficient to arouse one's competitive spirit even if the Olympic Championships don't. Here's what this department suggests for the following:

"The Red Lily." Give the patrons of the theater in which it is playing a pot of fresh mint.

"Neglected Women." Have a big register in the lobby and make all the lady patrons put down their names and telephone numbers.

"Feet of Clay." Arrange with the Mayor of Cincinnati to have him jump in Lake Michigan.

"Excitement." Set the house on fire on alternate evenings, but don't give out the dates in advance.

"That French Lady." Hire a Chinese Orchestra to go thru the streets on skis playing bagpipes and zithers.

"The Warrens of Virginia." Give out pet rabbits. (This will be a wow in Chicago.)

American-made movies have invaded England to the extent of putting the native products out of business. Which proves beyond all question that the English can certainly take a joke.

We certainly are a demon for up-lifting the silent drama this issue. And here goes our last bit of friendly counsel. To Mr. Hal Roach, sponsor of the "Our Gang" comedies, Sir—Don't ever, ever let that nasty little fat boy keep losing his pants again.

Making sweet mystery of the dark.

Have You the Urge to Write?

If you have a creative imagination and the natural ability to write, there is no reason why you cannot learn the established technique of writing and sell your stories.

The best proof that this can be done is that scores of men and women like yourself are actually doing it. Many of them did not dream that they could ever break into the ranks of the professional writers until the Palmer Institute of Authorship showed them the secrets of story building.

Unknown Writer Receives $10,000 for One Story

Miss Winifred Kimball, a Palmer student living in Apalachicola, Florida, won the $10,000 prize in the scenario contest conducted by the Chicago Daily News in collaboration with the Goldwyn Pictures Corporation.

Mrs. Anna Blake Mezquida, another Palmer student, won the second prize of $1000, and seven $500 prizes were also won by Palmer students.

"Judgment of the Storm" and "The White Sin" were also written by Palmer students. These two pictures were produced by us, through the Palmer Photoplay Corporation, and are now appearing in motion picture theatres throughout the country. Each author received $1000 in advance and will share in the profits on a royalty basis.

Mrs. Frances White Elijah won a $2500 prize for her story, "The One Man Woman," and we sold her earlier screen story, "Wagered Love," to D. W. Griffith. Our Sales Department has sold two stories for Winsor Josselyn so far this year.

Well-known Writers Help You

The success of Palmer students is due simply and solely to the fact that you study under the personal direction of men who are themselves well-known authors, dramatists and motion picture writers.

You learn to write by writing. You are given the manuscript and continuity of famous motion picture scenarios to analyze and study at home in spare time. You write actual stories and photoplays which we help you to sell through our Story Sales Department right here in Hollywood, with branches in New York and Chicago.

Distinguished Men at Helm

Aiding in the work of discovering and training new writers are such distinguished men as Frederic: Palmer, author and educator; Clayton Hamilton, well-known playwright and author-educator; Russell Doubleday, publisher; Brian Hooker, formerly of the faculty of Yale and Columbia Universities; Dr. Frederic Taber Cooper, author-educator; C. The Celluloid Critic who says and does the obvious things. This actor who flashed such talent in "Beau Brummel" is a good likeness, but there the comparison ends. He seems to be as much in the dark as the director in how to draw the character vividly and compellingly and sympathetically.

The picture will arouse discussion—for Lewis is either liked or tossed aside. It may be that some readers, disappointed in the novel, will admire the film—and those who like the story will probably be disappointed in the screen version. More lightness and humor would have made it more human.

"HOW to Educate a Wife" (Warner Brothers) is one of those satires on modern married life written by no less an authority than Elinor Glyn. She doesn't tread on the sob pedal this time—and somehow by getting away from sermonizing on this eternal subject she comes closer to the truth than what is usually revealed under her signature. It's extremely light fare, but pleasant withal—and the idea points out the impossibility of educating one's spouse when she wants to become contrary. Most any husband will agree with this.

The story offers a lot of little pretensions. There is a scheme afoot here when the husband's friend advises him to use his wife for vamping purposes. He can't see the plot at all. But she steps out and vamps one of the customers. And there's an end to the love nest. The rest of the fun deals with hubby trying to run his house single-handed—enjoyable incident interlaced with some delicate make-believe tactics toward reconciliation.

Marie Prevost and Monte Blue, who are much together in pictures these days, make an excellent pair of battling lovers. And Claude Gillingwater furnishes some of that fine character talent as the "fall guy." The piece moves at a lively pace, keeps its sparks lighted thruout—and exudes more than a share of realities. Monta Bell, who directed "Broadway After Dark," shows that he hasn't worked with Chaplin in vain. There is subtlety in his work.

"FOOLS in the Dark" (F. B. O.) is as near an approach to clever melodramatic satire as we've caught on the screen in some time. We who have grown accustomed to seeing the old situations with the regulation characters—all of them developed in the same old way, have cause to sing praises here when they become refurbished so that they are scarcely recognizable.

In other words, the director here (Al Sentell, take your bow), has kidded the life out of the conventional stuff and furnishes us with a rapid-fire satire on such tried and true elements as romance, mystery and suspense. The mystery is ever dominant, brought out and held thru the high jinks that occur in a house where the hero and his companions are given to spooky carryings-on. Behind the melodrama runs this comedy vein, which is heightened with sparkling scenes. The heroine is kidnapped, the hero is assaulted—and the rescue comes in time when the marines jump in at the finish.

No trick is forgotten in poking fun at the old situations. There are some thrills to balance the laughs. And it is smartly acted by Matt Moore whose restraint aids in building the suspense. He gets the most from every scene—and does it by touching the soft pedal—acting not easy to accomplish. The girl is Patsy Ruth Miller—and her plastic expressions of fright, anger—and other emotions also help in carrying on the plot. She is a charming heroine. Tom Wilson who has won his laurels in blackface rôles, comes forth again in burnt cork, and furnishes the comedy.

There should be more such efforts. Melodramas have become altogether too standardized. And satirizing them occasionally one may respond to something different.

JUST what the Germans intended to convey in "Between Worlds" (Weiss Brothers) is a subject for argumentative discussion. It attempts to be a spectacle without much success—and it tries to trespass in fantastic fields after the manner of "Caligari." And the comparison is weak. It is heavy and somber—and often tiresome because it appears so incomprehensible. The German mind theorizes that a woman cannot find true love until she sacrifices all base motives. A pretty heavy subject and not worthy of argument in this world of erring humans.

The picture touches upon allegory, too. It also becomes fanciful when the heroine (we are reasoning from the way we saw it) goes into a sort of dream and visualizes herself and her lover as reincarnated figures of the Venetian Republic, Byzantium and Old China—both of them stalking thru tragic scenes suggesting something of the Montague-Capulet scrap. An uncanny figure shadows the girl—a figure similar to the sleep-walker in "Caligari." He has lured her lover away—and always bobs up to pass judgment on her. In the end the tragic youth awakes. The story wanders too much in the clouds and doesn't descend to the simple emotions until vengeance is meted out to the youth. If you look beyond this incoherent story and follow the actors, you'll be entertained with some fine pantomime (the Germans can act) executed by Bernard Goetzle, the uncanny stranger. And there is some creditable atmosphere. Its plot is as difficult to fathom as the fourth dimension.

THE youngest and smallest brunette on the screen, Baby Peggy, comes bidding for favors in "Captain January" (Principal)—a picture not much bigger than herself in regard to its plot, but capable of interesting any type of audience thru the tender appeal of the captivating Peg—and the sentiment which projects her. It's an old story, but one that never grows tiresome. One can't be bored over watching the play of affection between a kindly old man and a little tot—one can't be bored if the heart is right. So the old lighthouse keeper picks up his little piece of human flotsam and adopts her.

The lighthouse is a picturesque setting—and the aged keeper is a lovable character. And because Director Eddie Cline has painted him half-way human—with Hobart Bosworth portraying him to command sympathy, we feel mighty sorry when the child is taken away. But she comes bounding back into his life—and together they sail the seven seas.

Peggy under appreciative direction acts like any normal active six-year-old kid. We take off our faded straw to Cline—and make an additional bow to Peg herself. She is natural—not a bit precocious—and acts with a sincerity that should be adopted by many of her adult contemporaries.

It may be an old story—this "Captain January"—but it is told with fine restraint, there being no stepping on the sob pedal—and Peggy makes the little waif so lovable that we take her and the film in the most friendly manner. The children will love it.

WHEN a play goes thru such a metamorphosis as "Along Came Ruth"—which came from France, found a haven in a Broadway theater—and eventually joined screen circles as a Metro production, there can't be much left of its original thought. There isn't much to it. All the racy atmosphere has been lifted—and what is substituted goes under the name of rustic hokum—the kind of hokum which Dr. Sennett strings thru his comedies—meaning, of course, that it is exaggerated and far from being a replica of rural existence.

How I Ended Superfluous Hair
At Once And For All
BY AN ENTIRELY NEW SYSTEM OF MY OWN

Only a woman who has felt the horror and humiliation of a disgusting hairy growth on the face, neck, arms and limbs can possibly know what joy and happiness came over me when first I realized that at last all trace of superfluous hair had gone and my skin was clear, soft and smooth like that of a babe. And this after years of disappointment with almost everything that I had ever heard of. Before I hit upon the simple, easy, harmless new way which has given me such amazing and lasting relief from my affliction, the ugly hair always came right back thicker and heavier than ever. When I confided to some of my friends how I had at last solved the age-old problem of getting rid of superfluous hair—at once and for all—they said it would be selfish not to share my secret with others. So I have decided to explain to anyone interested exactly how I succeeded, ABSOLUTELY FREE, if you will simply send me your name and address with a stamp for sealed reply.

The Music-Man Tells It

IT'S a crisis. What's to be done when a screen actress, or actor, just cannot summon a tear, or perhaps a spontaneous laugh? You know what happens; the director summons the musicians to work on the feelings. Then quite naturally the tears respond to the call of the sobbing violins, or the "ha-ha's" ring out with the laughing saxophone.

These musicians see a totally different, tho no less pleasant, side of the screen personalities. MOTION PICTURE has the inside story according to the musicians, and with amusing comments by the Talmadges, Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks, Pola Negri, Conway Tearle, Monte Blue, and all the other favorites.

There is so much to tell, and so many new pictures of stars, and directors, orchestras and things that this story will have to appear in three parts. It begins in the November number.

Is the Silent Drama Silent? is part of your motion picture education. But unlike some knowledge which is acquired painfully, this is "easy and pleasant to take."

HOPE BROWN certainly seemed to be well started in the general direction of being "bad." She had rather a qualm, despite her resolution, when she was escorted by the owner, very early in the morning, to Stanton Braithwaite's bachelor apartment. And Stanton himself was a bit puzzled to know what to do with this girl. She was bold, in some ways, and then again, she was so bashful.

But it was a most unconventional hour, and the girl had no place to go. So this rich young man decided that, for his good and her good . . . But you'll find Stanton Braithwaite asleep in a Morris chair when you read the SOMETIMES I wonder what makes women beautiful. I try to figure out whether it is the features, the complexion, the skin, the hairdress, the poise, the clothes or one of any of a score of attributes. But the more I think about it, the more I am convinced that after all it is one's skin—the clear alluring tender skin, the fine skin, without a blemish, without suggestion of masculinity.

And whether you look at one's face, arms, legs, body or limbs—the same principle applies. As a Specialist, I cannot commend too highly the need for eliminating every tiny unwanted hair you have—if you really crave beauty!

Quick as a Wink

you can free yourself of superfluous hair. And remember, you are not merely removing surface hair—you actually lift out the roots with the hairs, gently and painlessly, and in this way destroy the growth. The process seems almost miraculous, but my eighteen years of success in giving treatments with ZIP and the thousands of women who are now using it prove that ZIP is the scientifically correct way to destroy the growth.

"A SKIN YOU LOVE TO TOUCH," BY T. K. HANNA

"Science and everyday experience teach that a beautiful skin does not depend on youth"

How long can a woman keep the charm of "A skin you love to Touch"?

AT TWENTY—is a woman's skin always fresh and fair?

At thirty—must it begin to fade?

In romance—yes. But not in actual life.

Science and the woman of forty

Tell What They Think About Motion Pictures

When Beauty is at Stake —take care

Use a soap made for ONE purpose only: to safeguard good complexions

FOR your sake and for ours, we publish this in the interest of all concerned who value a good complexion. Some people, we learn, think ordinary toilet soaps, soaps claiming to be "for the complexion," have Palmolive effects on the skin.

That is wrong. They don't. Palmolive complexions come only from Palmolive.

In old days, women were told, "Use no soaps on the face." For all soaps then were said to be too harsh.

Then came Palmolive. It was made with cosmetic oils famous since the days of Cleopatra. It was made to be used freely, lavishly on the skin. Its ONE and SOLE purpose was to foster good complexions.

That soap changed previous ideas of soaps. Largely on expert advice, women tried it. And the results it brought in new beauty and new youth attracted millions to its use.

Palmolive soon became the leading toilet soap of the world. In France, home of cosmetics, it supplanted French soaps by the score. It is one of the two largest selling soaps in France today. French women find Palmolive their ideal of a soap. Its cosmetic qualities hold a supreme place in French beauty culture.

Now you may be tempted by rival claims to try unproved soaps on your skin. Think, please, before you do.

60 years of soap study, in the interest of skin beauty, stand behind Palmolive. It is made to do ONE thing well. That is to gently protect your complexion; to guard your youth and charm.

No other claims are made for it. Palmolive is not intended for other than toilet purposes. It is too neutral to be effective for fabrics. To make it good for other than complexion use its cosmetic qualities would be much reduced. Good complexions are too priceless to be endangered, and, frankly, we don't know how to make a beauty soap that is also effective for general use.

There are complexion soaps at 25c and more, we admit, that approach Palmolive quality. We know of some. But Palmolive sells at 10c—no more than ordinary soaps. Enormous production brings you this modest cost.

Carry that in mind, for your own sake, when asked to "try" another soap that claims Palmolive results. When beauty is at stake, use Palmolive, a soap you know is safe to use. It is nature's formula to "Keep That Schoolgirl Complexion."

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY (Del. Corp.), Chicago, Ill.

French soaps have largely failed to please French women

Palmolive is one of the two largest selling toilet soaps in France today. When you are tempted with French claims for a soap, Madam, please remember that in France, the home of cosmetics, French toilet soaps by the score have given way to Palmolive.

In France, Palmolive Soap is the "imported" soap. French women gladly pay more for it than you pay. The cosmetic qualities of Palmolive Soap hold supreme today in French beauty culture.

Don't buy soaps with "French" claims and expect Palmolive results.

*Palmolive Soap is untouched by human hands until you break the wrapper
— it is never sold unwrapped*

Soap from Trees

The only oils in Palmolive Soap are the soothing beauty oils from the olive tree, the African palm and the coconut palm—and no other fats whatsoever.

That is why Palmolive Soap is the natural color that it is—for palm and olive oils, nothing else, give Palmolive its green color!

The only secret to Palmolive is its exclusive blend—and that is one of the world's priceless beauty secrets.

All Work and No Play doesn't suit the World Today

Paramount provides more and better entertainment for the people of today than any human beings ever saw before.

Let your own theatre show you Paramount Pictures and keep your dates with the good time houses.

When you know what Paramount has
You seek what Paramount shows

Anyone who enjoys great motion pictures and checks up where they come from, keeps a sharp eye on Paramount's production program.

Seeing great entertainment is merely a question of knowing what is being released and "when will it reach my theatre?" Here are six current Paramount Pictures you will enjoy to the last fade-out:

"BEHIND THE FRONT"

MARY BRIAN

WALLACE BEERY • RAYMOND HATTON

An Edward Sutherland Production from a story by Hugh Wiley.

Here is the comic side of Army life in wartime picturized in a way that is making all America hold its sides.

Somehow these two scapegrace doughboys win the audiences more than regular heroes, and the way they make love and war is the last word in irresponsible sincerity.

Produced by FAMOUS PLAYERS-LASKY CORP.
Adolph Zukor, Pres., New York City

Harold Lloyd in "For Heaven's Sake"

Directed by Sam Taylor

Here is the prize surprise package of the season, laughter, laughter all the way! Go to the theatre as gloomy as a mummy and stay that way if you can! This star's pictures are produced by the Harold Lloyd Corporation and released by Paramount.

"The Grand Duchess and the Waiter"

A Malcolm St. Clair Production with Adolphe Menjou and Florence Vidor. From the play by Alfred Savoir. An aristocratic love-comedy set in the midst of the brilliant carnival of Paris night life. Here's a trip to Paris that gives you more of the gay city than many a traveller gets.

Zane Grey's "The Vanishing American" with RICHARD DIX, Lois Wilson, Noah Beery and Malcolm McGregor. Directed by George B. Seitz. Zane Grey's epic of the Indian ranks with The Covered Wagon in fateful power and excitement. Don't miss the mighty duel of Copperskin and White Man!

"The Song and Dance Man"

A Herbert Brenon Production

with Tom Moore, Bessie Love and Harrison Ford. From George M. Cohan's famous comedy success. Real romance lives and throbs within the make-believe of stage life, human beings loving and fighting and hoping behind the grease-paint.

"DANCING MOTHERS"

A Herbert Brenon Production. Starring Conway Tearle, Alice Joyce and Clara Bow. This is the Paramount picturization of the famous stage play by Edgar Selwyn and Edmund Goulding which set all New York talking about the neglected wife who dances her way to freedom and love. Mere material prosperity divorced from happy, human comradeship will never chain any real woman, and "Dancing Mothers" shows you why in a show worthy of Paramount's greatest traditions.

Paramount Pictures

"If it's a Paramount Picture it's the best show in town!"

Romeo-Juliet Contest Winners

THE Great Lover Contest, the winners of which were announced last month, attracted much attention, but this was as nothing compared to the widespread interest aroused by the Romeo and Juliet Contest, originally announced in the January issue of THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC.

The Romeo and Juliet Contest brought an avalanche of letters and votes to the editorial offices of THE CLASSIC. Every one of THE CLASSIC's vast army of readers seemed to want to express herself or himself on the subject of the screen's ideal Romeo and Juliet.

When the letters and votes were finally tabulated, Ramon Novarro was found to be chosen as THE CLASSIC's Romeo, altho John Gilbert was a comparatively close second. Some distance back, Ronald Colman and Rudolph Valentino were practically tied for third place. Then came John Barrymore, Ben Lyon and Richard Barthelmess.

THE CLASSIC readers selected Lillian Gish as their ideal Juliet, altho, as in the case of the Romeos, there was a close second. This was Vilma Banky. Mary Philbin was safely entrenched in third place, while, some distance behind, came Betty Bronson, Norma Talmadge, Greta Nissen, Mary Astor and Mary Pickford in close formation.

So THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC presents its congratulations to Miss Gish and Mr. Novarro. Long may they reign as the perfect cinema Juliet and Romeo.

The first prize letter, which, by the way, was a telegram, is published on this page. The first prize was twenty-five dollars. The second prize, of fifteen dollars, went to Karlene A. Armstrong for the following letter:

Second Prize Letter

The qualifications of Romeo are: youth, idealized fervor of youth, romance, beauty, chivalry and courage—thus Ramon Novarro.

The qualifications for Juliet are: youth, idealized fervor of youth, romance, beauty, innocence and abandon — thus Vilma Banky.

KARLENE A. ARMSTRONG,
8th Street and 64th Ave.,
Oak Lane Park, Phila., Pa.

The third prize, ten dollars, was awarded to Margaret H. Johnson, for the following letter:

Third Prize Letter

Because she is ethereally beautiful and he is stalwartly handsome; because

First Prize Letter

The romance of Romeo and Juliet carries a lyric quality of spiritual passion. Ramon Novarro and Mary Astor reflect no modernity, no haphazard tricks, but play with dignity and glowing beauty. They have the youth, intensity, personal thrill and imagination to portray the old-world charm of Romeo and Juliet.

ELIZABETH CARMICHAEL,

her art would complement his and his supplement hers; because they are both intelligent, sincere, and blessed with eternal youth — Lillian Gish and Ramon Novarro would make an ideal couple to play Romeo and Juliet.

MARGARET H. JOHNSON,
3518 Fulton St.,
Chicago.

Honorable Mention

I choose Lillian Gish and Ramon Novarro, because—

1. She has the deep-feeling, everlasting youth, and the keen sense of romance so necessary to any Juliet.

2. He has romance, spiritual quality. He has glow and sweet fire.

3. The work of both would thus bring the fine spirit of fire and youth necessary to the rôles.

CATHERINE LUKSIC,
1505 Warner Street,
N. S. Pittsburgh, Pa.

Honorable Mention

Romeo and Juliet were young, but with maturity of feeling of the Italian race; were of brilliant and strong character, of sweet, generous soul, passionate, but not daring or devilish.

Thus my selection would be: Norma Talmadge and Rudolph Valentino.

Both are fine artists with depth of expression, romantic appeal, splendid physical appearance and illusion of youth.

FLORENCE SHANNON,
2428 Park Avenue, Apt. 3,
Indianapolis, Indiana.

Honorable Mention

For her incomparable youth and beauty of face and youthful figure—even among the youngest rivals—Lillian Gish's superior ability to interpret the fourteen-year-old Shakespearean Juliet should be an inspiration for the romantic, dashing, fiery Ramon Novarro, the Adonis of the screen — thus vying with the great tragedienne, the one object of his screen admiration—to play the rôle of Romeo à la Shakespeare opposite her Juliet, so increasing the already excellent histrionic powers of the two greatest artists.

D. J. ALLEN,
2661 Valdez Street,
Oakland, Cal.

Real Life

The Inside FACTS

By PERCY KNIGHTON

WITH the exception of a few nationally important topics of the day, "Have you a chance in the movies?" is close running in majority to the world's greatest problems.

So far as an accurate record shows, there are many examples of those who began at the bottom and soared gradually to the top, a portion of their success is, of course, due to the rapid growth of the motion picture industry from obscurity to fourth or fifth place in the world's gigantic affairs.

But it is true that those same men and women who achieved fame as stars came by it honestly. In most cases it was sweat and blood, ability and the spirit of the conqueror, that did the trick—not pull or "stand in." And to the exception of this rule embracing phenomenal rises, such as, stars being made overnight, is a matter of circumstances and luck.

Five Days' Work a Month

AT present, however, we are only concerned with those who are working from five to ten days a month as extra people—and they are lucky and glad to get that much. But especially are we concerned with you whose eyes may be turning toward the great Golden Gate with a hopeful gleam of their future stardom; their visionary dream turning to reality.

Who will be the Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford of tomorrow? The John Barrymore and the Gloria Swanson? And who will be the thousands of other stars? Who will gradually slide into the thousands of vacancies which Time makes inevitable? Who will fill the mechanical, technical and business places in the annals of our great, great movies?

You may guess the answer, you may solve the riddle, you may be right or wrong in calculating the solution to the above questions. You may even be the very one who will make the grade from the ranks of the thousands. But whatever the answer, whosoever you may be, please take along a few of these facts and stamp them indelibly in a remote corner of your brain—that is, if you are movie-struck, if you are an "extra" or prospective material for the mill—the mill, it grinds slowly and too often with deadly accuracy.

In the first place, tho, if you happen to be "one of the family" with a chip on your shoulder, you may hoot and sneer at some of the things I tell you. But if you are considering a trip to Fairyland—California, where a large part of the world's movies are made, then consider, my dear little innocent one, some true situations existing here—before you take the leap.

I am only speaking to you whose future is bent upon a berth in the movies, and maybe a grave, too. Otherwise, go to California, lots of other fine men and women conduct other lines of legitimate business. For instance, real estate. The climate is unsurpassed, the cafeterias unlimited. No! I am not advertising California, Florida might get jealous, besides, I am only a poor "extra" character in a land where, perhaps, fifty thousand other folks are working—mostly not working. In the movies, I mean.

I happen to be here. I am among those present. I am one of those queer "odd" creatures better known as "extras." I am out here in "Californy" taking pot-luck and uneven lunches and playing rôles from a Bolshevik to a Roman soldier, also doing odd jobs—odd indeed! But I love it just the same.

How men and women by the thousands can clamor into a stuffy room and receive the daily stab of rejection is beyond the power of reasoning

About the EXTRA

The Heartaches Behind

The Story of a Real Extra

So here goes for better or worse!

Lure Like a Drug

As a warning, let me tell you that if once you ever work in a picture, it is worse than a high-powered drug, it gets in your blood, it is a very contagious habit. Immediately, an uncanny, unbelievable sense of fascination seizes you, grips you; in fact, strikes you with such force that your endurance to run the race is surprising. But too often it is the other way round. However, you find to your amazement that at times you really have a chance—which is the first symptom of the hobo's disease. I call it mental inertia. But when reaching this stage you have advanced to the first degree in the Royal Order of Moviedom, you have been permanently annexed, and, you are prepared to make any sacrifice for your art, sometimes you have many to make, too. But the struggle is on.

Without the slightest shadow of doubt, this business of playing the movies as an actor—extra—is the greatest game of chance ever invented by man. The uncertainty of it is heart-breaking, sickening at times, often beyond endurance. It holds first place in the baffling elements of a minus average. It is the most bitter, ironic and cruel, peculiar and unusual topic to discuss. And yet, despite this, there is no end of material on which to base true and helpful illustrations.

There are no groups of people working in any other business in the world, any other trade, who would tolerate the fateful result, the usual failure, the treatment received (sometimes while engaged on the production of a picture). I do not mean that you are ill-treated or horse-whipped, nothing of the sort. I do mean, tho, in a mob scene that the dismal existence gained, the action one has to do, the delay and foolishness of it all would never be accepted as a road to success by many men and women in other walks of life. Your patience is put to the supreme test by the minute. It appears a losing game.

Hard to Get a Job

It is often much harder work getting a job than working after you get it. And the discouragement that goes with the business is almost beyond the understanding of an otherwise intelligent person. Really, the whole scope is far too technical to give in complete detail. But a few points will serve as examples.

How in the name of Moses, men and women by the thousands, can clamor into a stuffy, musty and dirty little room or shed and receive the daily stab of rejection is beyond the power of reasoning. Especially, after waiting for hours to get a peep at the assistant casting director, possibly only an office boy.

How day in and out those starving souls tread wearily from Universal City in the early morning, then to Hollywood by noon, thence to Culver City by the waning afternoon with the tiny spark of Hope burning dimly in their heaving bosoms merely to ask the fatal words, "Anything doing today," and get the fatal blow, is, so far as I know, too problematical in the sphere of normalcy for one so insignificant as I to render a correct reply.

But if one-half the energy expended in trying to break the almost impossible barrier would be applied to

IF William Boyd ever decides to become president of these United States, they had better get the White House ready, for he'll be there!

Bill—he's the kind of man one cant call "William"—is in the great American tradition.

He's the Satevepost chap who started out with nothing, worked before he was in his teens, did anything and everything—steel-mills, oil-fields, orange groves, groceries, driving trucks—and, having tried all sorts of jobs, finally picked out a profession and followed it doggedly to success.

No Acting Temperament

"I HAVEN'T an actor's temperament at all, so I'm afraid I cant talk like one," he apologized, as we strolled along the sunny gallery at the De Mille studios.

"In fact, I'm not an actor. You don't have to act on the screen. You have to understand the technique, know about spacing, timing, camera angles, lights, make-up and all that, and you have to understand the character you're playing and simply live him. The camera will show you up if you're just acting. You have to be terribly sincere and natural. You must have the whole personality and history of your character inside your head and then just open up your face and let your audience see what's going on in there. You're not acting then. You just are!

"When I was getting ready for 'The Volga Boatman,' I was worried about what to do with him. I had read the script and knew he was a Russian peasant, and I'd read Russian stories—Tolstoy—and Russian history, and I thought I knew what was back of this fellow, all the centuries of oppression and injustice—the revolt he felt inside.

"Victor Varconi played the other male rôle, which made mine more difficult, since he and I are about the same height, build and coloring. Varconi was an officer and would, of course, play it straight, I must be 'character.'

"First, I decided against wearing a wig and had my hair curled. I had misgivings about that,—afraid it would weaken my face,—but it didn't. And then, the very night before we began to shoot, the thing came to me.

"I was walking up and down in my room, like this——” He paced the length of the dressing-room we had appropriated, three strides taking him from one wall to the other, and suddenly stopped, standing with his head lowered a trifle, looking up from under sullen lids, a figure tense and yet quiet, as of terrific power held in leash. “There! It came like that. I saw him in the mirror and recognized him.”

Bill Boyd has a splendid body under perfect control. He isn't vain of it, but he takes care of it because it is part of his stock in trade.

Worked in Oil-Fields

“GOR my strength swinging a sledge-hammer ten hours a day in the oil-fields,” he explained, “I was sixteen. I began to work when I was twelve, when my father died, but the oil-field was the hardest job I ever had. I used to get so tired. But I wouldn't let it tear me down because I had too much spirit. It wasn't going to beat me!

“I think any boy who wants to grow up into a he-man ought to go out and get himself kicked around all over the place and fight and struggle and endure—that is, if he has spirit. If he hasn't, he'll go under.

“But I've never done anything that hasn't been of use to me in pictures afterwards. Strength from the oil-fields. In ‘Steel Preferred’ I was at ease among the ladles of molten metal because I had worked in a rolling-mill when I was thirteen. I knew how to handle myself so that I would never be in danger. . . . Oh, I could go on indefinitely!

“I've always worked. I didn't care what kind of job it was, but I tried to get one that would take me among educated people so that I could learn by listening to them talk. That's the way I got all the education I have. Associating with people who knew things helped a lot. I wanted to know so desperately that I couldn't help remembering.

At sixteen William Boyd swung a sledge-hammer in the oil-fields for ten hours a day. He has driven trucks and delivered groceries. Now he is a film favorite “Seven years ago, I ran out of things to do. I had some money that I'd made in a summer resort I had conducted in Arizona and at the Post Exchange I ran in March Fields, and I bought a good wardrobe. I was in California and everybody was talking pictures, so I decided to try them. I asked Frank Miller of the Mission Inn how you got in.

A Note to De Mille

“OH, Bill, you wont like pictures!” he said, but he gave me a letter to Cecil B. De Mille. I didn't know who Mr. De Mille was—he might have been the janitor at Lasky's—that was how ignorant I was then!

HAMLET

By DON RYAN

John Barrymore as the immortal fourteenth-century libertine, Don Juan

JOHN BARRYMORE says he is crazy about the movies. He must be—literally—otherwise he would not immerse himself in a tank of cold and mucid water—suffering tortures that would make a starving stuntman throw up his job—in order to inject the serum of reality into the final scenes of “Don Juan.”

This is no pabulum of praise for a movie star—none of that belly-wash about the handsome chappie who is so keen for art that he insists on crocheting his own doily for the big tea-room scene. I saw Barrymore go under this stinking, algid flood, with a wind-machine playing against his soaking back—saw him go under and remain two minutes by the watch. Then saw a hand come up—a groping, abysmal hand—the hand of a drowning man, clutching at the rotted straws floating on the surface.

The Aquatic Barrymore

AFTER the hand had registered, the head and shoulders emerged and Barrymore—in the character of the great fourteenth-century libertine—struggled thru the torrent to safety. I am still sneezing and sniffing from the mere sight of it. For the scene was made at night and the nights in this land of sunshine and roses are frequently the chilliest, clammiest, most dismal monsters ever loosed from Erebus.

Attendant figures—actors, property-men, electricians, wearing oilskin trousers belted about their waists—said, yes, that was Barrymore’s way. When they suggested a double in some of the scenes of “The Sea Beast,” Barrymore snorted, “Double, fudge!” (Only he didn’t say fudge.) “I’d have to do it myself anyway!” And thereupon plunged into the sea to grapple with a whale or something of that sort.

Standing in dripping tights with his back against a salamander—a small, charcoal-burning heater thoughtfully provided by the Warner Brothers—Barrymore had the nerve to tell me that he considered the movies a fascinating game—lots of fun—more fun, he implied than the stage.

Far From the Greenroom

HE was a long stride removed from the subtleties of “The Jest.” A far cry from Barrymore emerging by the stage door after a comfortable performance of “Hamlet”—emerging into a scented crowd of women who ogled and fluttered like a barnyard when the ruler of the roost appears.

Barrymore had yet to re-enter the tank. Waiting for the next set-up, he sipped a cup of coffee—he is on the wagon—smoked a Tareyton, and gave me his opinion of pictures.

The modern demiurge who manufactures Rotarians wholesale also gave us John Barrymore, and he must have been a bit under the Greek influence when he modeled this un-American-looking young American. It is a compliment to the designer that, in spite of a bedraggled figure, in spite of the ugly cut with pendant streams of dried blood which had been painted on the forehead of the actor, Barrymore was superbly handsome. The water-soaked garments clung to a figure proudly delicate and strong: the line of forehead and nose in the steamy light as pure and radiant as anything in classic sculpture.

I attempted, evilly, to trick the defendant into some sort of delation against the movies. But he loyally and adroitly defended his favorite mistress. This scion of the oldest and most celebrated acting family in America was on the stage at nineteen. A few years later he entered pictures, working in comedies for Famous Players. At that time he was struck by the possibilities of this brand-new medium. He is still thinking about them—these immeasurable possibilities—as yet only scratched by a few of the more daring and imaginative producers.

The Amazing Possibilities

“It’s an amazing thing,” he said, “these possibilities of the pictures. The pictures are not inferior to the stage—different. Truly I have been more moved by good pictures than by anything seen on the stage. ‘The Birth of a Nation,’ ‘The Four Horsemen’—pictures such as these are as fine as anything ever performed on the legitimate stage.

“You hear a lot of talk about inferiority of the screen—how childish the stories, how happy the endings must be. But they dont have to be. It is true that many producers have not realized this fact. But I think when the story is authentic—when the audience can smell it—they will not only stand for an unhappy ending, they will actually enjoy it, if it is the real and logical ending for the story. The public is the same in both instances—the moving picture public is just as intelligent as the stage public.

"In 'The Sea Beast'—a classic story by a great author—we retained the integrity of it absolutely. This was a difficult thing to do, because we had to impose a love-story which wasn't in the book, 'Moby Dick,' at all. I think we performed the trick without doing violence to Melville."

In doing "Don Juan," a different problem confronted him: how to show the hero as the "personification of amorousness," as Barrymore explained—and, at the same time polish him off with a satisfactorily sympathetic ending.

"The way we did it," elucidated the creator of Don Juan, "was to make him funny during the first part of the picture. After he is disillusioned he becomes a sinister character. But he is regenerated in the end.

"Here we met our greatest difficulty. It would not do to make Don Juan put on carpet slippers and have the

Thomas Burke

IN the small group of photodramas that stand out in my mind and memory under the selective title of "the greatest," I always include "Broken Blossoms." In fact, it tops the list. So, then, it was but natural that I should seek out Thomas Burke, the author of "The Chink and the Child," which furnished D. W. Griffith with the story of such unique blend of character—brute and bully, tender, helpless innocence and inscrutable Oriental passion—that made "Broken Blossoms" the most delicate and poignant study of character that the screen has ever seen.

"The Chink and the Child" is among the stories that make up one of the most remarkable books in the English language—"Limehouse Nights." The reason of the popularity and appeal of both the book and photodrama is to be found in the fact that it is so largely the life story of Thomas Burke himself.

As you may have gathered from "Broken Blossoms," Limehouse is one of the worst—if not the worst—districts of London. Here I found the dock rats and dives, dope and dissipation just as he had described it, and lived it. For Thomas Burke was born and bred in this environment, and his best friend thruout years

Sir Anthony Hope

I FOUND Sir Anthony Hope (Hawkins) of quite a different mind in regard to American films. It was a cold, foggy night and Sir Anthony talked standing with his back quite close to the small English grate.

"I think the films are interesting, very interesting. I go to see them often. They give you so many things the stage cant. They read between the lines of stories and speak undertones that the stage actor cannot utter. Too, the stage cant bring in the perfect sequence the way they do it, nor the novel, for that matter. But they never move me so deeply as the stage performance does. They are, after all, 'the shadow show,' I call them!" He laughed in that voice which is the deepest I have ever heard. "Yes, one misses the personality of the actor, which is, after all, the personality of the author."

I was particularly interested in "The Prisoner of Zenda," the most popular of all the pseudo-romances that was ever written.

"Rex Ingram directed the last production made of my 'Prisoner of Zenda'—this is the third time, by the way, that they have made it into films. I have watched Ingram's work in other films and I am inclined to think that he is as good as any they have produced. I was tremendously

—Sir Arthur Conan Doyle.

Ralph D. Blumenfeld

RALPH D. BLUMENFELD, editor-in-chief of "The London Daily Express," and accounted one of the greatest journalists in the world, is an American, by the way. It was none other than this same Blumenfeld who, with Stanford White, built the Herald Building in Herald Square under the financial leadership of James Gordon Bennett. Mr. Blumenfeld has been an editor in London now for more than thirty years.

"The films," he told me, "particularly the American films, have done much to lower the literary and artistic tastes of the whole world. There is usually a cowboy story or a thoroly bad story in which crime more often than not triumphs. An audience is tied down in their seats—for it is not like a book you can toss aside—and cant escape the bad influence. From a British standpoint they are intensely annoying from the fact that they all have an American background—I speak now of nine out of ten—and an American story—which is no credit, by the way, to anyone concerned. The stories are seldom big enough for universal application, which is the test of great literature or drama."

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE is as different from Burke as day is from night, which is a fitting simile. He is a great big, smiling, spontaneous fellow; enthusiastic about everything, particularly some new "finds" he had made in the spirit world, of which he showed me the negatives. Then he showed me some alleged photographs of fairies that had recently come into his hands.

All movie fans will readily recall "The Lost World," taken from a book of the same name by Doyle, by the way. It is no more the story of a group of scientists who went out and stumbled over a lost world of still-existing prehistoric uncivilization than it is a spectacle of the drama in the lives of those mastodonic animals under the pressure of a great catastrophe. The marvelous feature of the picture lies in the reproduction of all the antediluvian—"auruses"—dinosauruses, ichtyosauruses, etc.—in the life.

"How did you like the filming of 'The Lost World'?" I asked Sir Arthur.

"Oh, the films did it very well, very well," he said enthusiastically.

"Do you go to the cinema much?"

The FILM STARS TELL

Here Are Facts that Will Help You This Summer

By ALICE L. TILDESLEY

Spring is in the air!

That is, for most of America. Californians get more than their share of sunshine, but they miss the lure of Springtime, too.

Right now everyone is thinking of his or her garden. The screen folk are just like everyone else. THE CLASSIC assigned Miss Tildesley to ascertain the favorite flowers of the stellar celebrities—and how they grow them. Here are her findings, of genuine interest to every garden lover everywhere.—THE EDITOR.

Colleen Moore

COLLEEN MOORE is a tulip fan.

"I plant my tulips in the spring. Some people put their bulbs in water with enough stones to hold them upright, but I prefer to plant mine in rich soil in the garden. I think they thrive better. They should be covered with about four inches of earth and watered daily. Keep the soil loose around them, so they can breathe.

"A lovely effect is achieved by planting them in beds alongside tuberose, iris and other flowers of the same family."

Estelle Taylor

ESTELLE TAYLOR:

"I like trees better than flowers for my garden. One of my favorites is the English myrtle, probably because we had a hedge of them around my home in Delaware, brought from England by my grandfather, so they always seem like old friends.

"You can keep myrtle trimmed down to a hedge two feet high; but give it plenty of room, sunlight and water and it will grow to ten feet. It stands intense heat well and can live for three weeks without water, altho I advise frequent watering. Black scale is its great enemy. The tree should be protected by tanglefoot to prevent the ants from carrying this plague, and I use a spray of whale-oil soap dissolved in hot water with kerosene and a green coloring matter that prevents it from being seen on the leaves. After forty-eight hours, I wash off the spray."

Willard Louis

WILLARD-LOUIS is known at all California flower shows as a champion dahlia grower. He has created several new varieties of his favorite flower and has taken many prizes for his choice blooms.

"After your dahlias have been cut for the season, get your tubers out of the ground and let them stand thirty days before you separate them from the root and 'mother bulb.' Keep in a cool, dark place. In getting tubers ready for the next planting, saw them—dont break them—from the root. Be sure each one has an eye and a neck. This is most important, as the slip must have an eye in order to bud, and planting tubers without a neck is a waste of time—you will not have plants.

"I plant the tubers in furrows in ground that has been carefully cultivated and enriched. I plant in April or May—for late season flowers, as late as June. You need a careful eye in the selection of tubers, little ones are likely to be much better than big ones, but this does not always follow.

"Do not water until the plants are up, and then water the ground, not the top of the plants.

"Deep, soft loam is necessary. Different soils demand different treatment, but it is important not to use the same ground year after year—virgin soil gives better dahlias. It takes three or four years to produce a good new variety. Pollenization has everything to do with this, but anyone by constant care can raise very fine flowers.

"I have named my new varieties after favorite parts—Babbitt, Wales, etc., and one for my little girl, Dorothy."

Marshall Neilan

MARSHALL NEILAN is so fond of the blooms that his studio is a bower of roses.

"Roses require three things—good soil, sun and water. But remember to water around the roots, never touching the leaves. Watering the leaves will cause a mildew to appear. If your roses mildew, however, you can treat them by wetting the leaves again and sprinkling them with sulphur."

Irene Rich

IRENE RICH, whose favorite flower is also the rose, has a "Tausendschoen" rose climbing over the pillars of her home.

"I agree with Mr. Neilan about the essentials of rose culture, but I keep the ground loose about the roots, water only after the sun goes down and believe in careful pruning. A broken or scarred branch is cut off cleanly and the wound covered with tree salve."

Seena Owen

"OLD-FASHIONED stocks are my delight.

"Of course, in California we plant them almost any season, and aside from watering them, leave them to grow as they will; but in cold climates they should be grown from seed planted in a hotbed early in March. The seedlings should be transplanted several times, each time in a richer soil, and when they are about ten inches high, they may be set out in the garden.

"The biennial variety should be sown the season previous to that in which the flowers are desired, the plants wintered in a cool house and grown the following spring."

Noah Beery

To Noah Beery, the pale-blue water hyacinth has a fascination. He grows them in a pool in his sunken garden.

They add tremendously to the striking effect of his rock garden.

"They grow best in from nine to twelve inches of still water, thrusting their roots into the rich soil under the water. A miniature waterfall keeps the pool full of still water, and the rest I leave to Nature."

Clara Bow and her father, who now manages his daughter

FATHERS are the unknown quantity in the movies. You read all about the stars' motor-cars, their bungalows, their Pomeranians, their man servants and their maid servants. You wipe a sentimental tear from your eyes as you gaze upon pictures of them sitting on the edge of Mother's armchair, or perched on Mother's knee, their cheeks laid against the dear silver that shines in Mother's permanent wave. But you would not think that the stars ever had any fathers, tho that seems biologically probable.

In some cases, picture players, in their swift rise to fortune, have discarded their male parents on the same general principle that they discard four-cylinder cars, cotton hosiery, and ready-made clothing, as being unsuitable to their new way of living. Many of these fathers do not fit into the splendor of their daughters' careers.

The Unknown Fathers

WHEN motion picture fans discovered a brief note in their newspapers recently announcing the sudden death in Los Angeles of the father of Norma and Constance Talmadge, they were surprised. Mr. Talmadge never had achieved a line of publicity, altho Ma Talmadge has appeared in scores of newspaper and magazine interviews, besides being the author of a book about her famous daughters. Indeed, Mr. Talmadge never had his picture taken.

Research reveals that most movie fathers are inconspicuous by their own wish. Business and professional men, they have their own work and have no desire to borrow any of their offsprings' glory, proud as they are of it.

There are movie fathers who have helped their children as faithfully as any mothers could have done. There is J. Darsie Lloyd, for instance, who, in the lean days of Harold's movie career, used to cook their dinners over a two-burner gas-stove, mend his son's coat, patch his trousers and set clumsy darns into the heels of stockings trodden thin with the search for work.

Treasurer of Lloyd Corporation

Now he is treasurer of the Harold Lloyd Corporation and, by a newly discovered talent for real estate, he has increased his son's fortune many fold. But proud as he is of his famous son, he has his own little prides, too. "Joe," he said not long ago to the Lloyd publicity man, Joe Reddy, showing him a clipping from a newspaper story, "I see here that you say that I used to be a sewing-machine salesman.

An Attempt to Turn the Spotlight Upon Dad

Now, of course, it's not especially important but, Joe, the next story you write, you might just mention the fact that before I got thru I was appointed agent for a whole territory!"

Clara Bow's papa used to be a waiter in a restaurant at Coney Island. Things weren't very prosperous with the Bow household just then. The mother of the family was sick in bed, and Clara, a pigtailed youngster in high school, by right should have worked in a department store or a factory to help increase the family budget.

But Robert Bow dreamed of better things for his little girl. Ever since she was a child, Clara had shown unmistakable dramatic talent and he resolved that she should have her chance. To save her from the drudgery of housework he would hurry home after his work was over, wash dishes and scrub floors. His wife remonstrated, his relatives and neighbors scoffed and said that he was filling Clara's head with nonsense, but Mr. Bow went on encouraging his daughter to try for a foothold in the pictures.

The winning of a screen contest (conducted, by the way, by the Brewster Publications) gave Clara her chance. She was given a leading rôle in "Down to the Sea in Ships," and the Bow ship had come in as well. Soon after the completion of the picture Clara's mother died. When she went West, her father went too, to play mother and father and business adviser to the little girl who had wanted to be an actress.

June Marlowe's Dad

JUNE MARLOWE'S father moved to Hollywood because of his own business as a banker, and not because he had the faintest idea of having his daughter become a picture player. When she begged to try her luck at the studios, he was dubious and tried to discourage her. But he told her to decide for herself and if she showed the right stuff for a movie career he would help her in every possible way. She did, and he has.

Patsy Ruth Miller's father was a manufacturer back in the Middle West. He brought his family to California for a vacation, with a round-trip ticket. But while he was attending a convention in San Francisco, Patsy Ruth telegraphed him that she had a moving picture job. Now if Oscar Miller has a weak spot, Patsy Ruth is it. In his secret heart he hadn't a doubt that his little girl could become as big a star as any of them, but he spoke to his daughter with parental sternness. "Look here, young lady," said he, "before I go home and sell my car and my home and my business, I want to know whether you are serious about this thing. Are you going to be somebody in the movies or is this just for fun? I'll take your word for it, but I must know."

And when Patsy Ruth opened her big brown eyes earnestly and assured him that she was going to be a star, Mr. Miller believed her and moved his family to Hollywood. He has made his daughter's career his business and put into managing it the same attention to details that he once put into the manufacture of brooms.

Louise Fazenda's Father

LOUISE FAZENDA, on the other hand, did not ask Dad when she decided to abandon the future of school-teaching he had decreed for her in favor of falling down-stairs with trays of dishes and being sideswiped with custard pies. Tho Mr. Fazenda is in the brokerage business, his interests are distinctly scholarly. He speaks a dozen languages, including Japanese, delves into philosophy and reads science in preference to the daily paper. Louise sneaked her comedy costumes out of the house in a suitcase for weeks to avoid the discovery of her low-brow occupation by her high-brow father. It wasn't until she began to make a real success that she confessed one evening that the awkward girl in tow-colored pigtailed and spectacles who had made him laugh so heartily at the picture show that evening was his own daughter.

"And even now," laughs Louise, "I sometimes think that he is secretly sorry that I'm not a school-teacher on a salary of two thousand a year."

Perhaps the oldest father in Hollywood is Myrtle Steadman's, an eighty-year-old Grand Army man. Twenty-five years ago he sold his wholesale grocery in Chicago and came to Southern California to end his days. Now he raises choice roses in Myrtle's garden and entertains her friends with reminiscences of Antioch and Gettysburg.

In spite of the "Junior" after his name, William Collier, Jr., is only the stepson of the famous Broadway star, but he received all his stage training from him.

Among the picture people who have followed in their father's footsteps, are the Costello sisters, daughters of the former screen idol, Maurice. Then, too, there is Lillian Rich, whose father, J. C. Rich, has spent the greater part of his seventy years behind the footlights as an English variety actor. In her childhood, Lillian's father kept her carefully away from the theater, and she was never permitted to see a play, but she had inherited a gift for comedy from her father. Now, living in retirement in a suburb of London, the old actor goes to see all his daughter's pictures.

Joseph Schildkraut is another who adopted his father's profession. The two Schildkrauts are working in the pictures now, and Rudolph, tho he has been a prominent figure in the theatrical world all his life, is willing to hear himself referred to as "the father of Joseph Schildkraut."

Keaton, Senior

"It was my father who is responsible for my wooden face," says Buster Keaton, "when I was a tiny kid working with him on the vaudeville circuit. I used to burst out laughing on the stage whenever we did something funny; but he cured me—by the laying on of hands where they would do most good. 'Never laugh at your own comedy,' he told me, 'keep a solemn face, no matter what happens.'"

The elder Keaton occasionally takes a part in one of his son's pictures—but now it's Buster who gives the orders.

Conrad Nagel's father was, for many years, the director of a school of music in Des Moines. Now he has a studio in Los Angeles. He is a composer and a musician.

Small Bennie Alexander is jealously anxious that his own fame shall not outstrip his adored father's. Now managing a department store as Daddy Alexander does is a fine business, but Bennie felt that it needed a little dressing up to sound sufficiently important.

When one of his boy friends was coming to dinner, Bennie approached his father in some embarrassment. "If Tony should speak about the store, Daddy," he hesitated, "don't seem surprised whatever he says. I maybe let him think the store was a little bigger than it is, and when he got the idea that you were the owner of it instead of the manager I didn't just exactly deny it."

Joseph Ralston wanted a son who would be called "Junior," but when a daughter came to his little Tennessee farm she was named after her father, so far as possible, "Jobyna." He didn't take much stock in "Joby's" stage yearnings

MILTON HOWE

MAKING fun of Hollywood's greatest director is a precarious thing to do, as a chorus of ten thousand Hollywood "yes" men will tell you. Edward Martindel took a chance on being bounced completely from the good graces of those who worship at the shrine of Lubitsch when he took the job of Lord Augustus in "Lady Windermere's Fan." He dared to make fun of the little German genius of the films.

"When I read the script which Lubitsch had written, it seemed that all the actors turned to stone," said Martindel. "I would read a scene in which 'Lord Darlington turned to stone.' Another excerpt from another scene would read, 'And then Lady Windermere turned to stone,' and finally I came to a scene in which I turned to stone! When I saw Lubitsch I told him that we didn't seem to do anything but turn to stone. He laughed and said he would use salt next time. It was his way of telling the actor to assume an air of severe silence.

How Lubitsch Directs

"I COULD ape Lubitsch and make fun of him, and that may be the reason we got along so well. He has a marvelous sense of humor. He would say, 'Eddie, you walk so funny. Do it like this . . . you know . . . just walk right in.' And he would illustrate by walking into the scene himself. When he rehearsed the scene again, I aped his peculiar walk. 'Is that the way I walk!' he exclaimed when he saw me waddling into the room. 'My, my, my! Well, walk your own way, Eddie.'

"The cameras were grinding on another scene when suddenly I heard his voice from the directorial chair. 'Pick up that cigar, Eddie.' I couldn't see any cigar and finally termi-

IT is such a relief, for interviewing, as it is called, a lady of the lenses is not always what it is cracked up to be. In fact, it is something of an uncertainty, similar to opening a can of oysters in July, an adventure calling for more than a modicum of courage, if not genuine intestinal fortitude.

One usually heaves a sigh and phones the lens lady’s terrapin or press-agent for an encounter with the desired dazzler. Press-agents are now called terrapins because of their impenetrable shell or crust and also because they are never

If the demand for an encounter is not frowned upon and a rendezvous is arranged, the scribe heaves two sighs in rapid succession and prays for something to happen, even to the extent of being so disloyal as to hope for an earthquake to hit Hollywood.

But Fortune is never kind, so the scribe, at something near the appointed time, draws near the appointed shrine carrying a goat-skin bursting with applesauce and Tamar Lane’s “Questions and Answers for Timid Twinklers,” also bound in goat-skin.

This book is a great help. The following are culled, hit or miss, from its pages, so you can get an idea as to its worth.

I've No Particular Ambitions, says Laura La Plante

Question: Do you genuinely love your work?

Answer: It thrills me beyond words. (Clasp the hands ecstatically; roll the eyes upward and squeeze the last drop of fervor out of this conversational sponge.)

Question: Who do you believe is the greatest director since Moses?

Answer: O-o-o-o-oh! (Cross between a sigh and a gargle). Why, Mister — (here insert the name of your present director—if any—or the name of the one for whom you want to work). He thrills me beyond words!

Question: Who is your severest critic?

Answer: (Be yourself and answer simply). My wife, mother, brother, sweetheart, butter-and-egg man, or what have you. (Be sure and cross out undesirable words, remembering what your press-agent has said about the policy of your studio.

SHE was as free from gush as a deaf and dumb débutante. With one hand she despoiled me of Tamar Lane's tome and whisked my goat-skin of guff from under my arm with the other. After an introduction and a single sniff of disdain, said b. f. stalked heavily from the room, leaving me alone with Laura.

The Master Mind of the

By H. W. HANEMANN

HIS face displayed the serenity of a Buddha along with the eagle eyes of a traffic policeman, the pinched nostrils of an artist, the firm mouth of a bank manager and that schoolgirl complexion. He was attired in Oxford bags and a Russian blouse. He reclined on a divan and toyed intermittently with a hookah. On his head he had placed a silk hat and his toes were hennaed.

The All-in-All Speaks

HE had been indicated to me as the Man at the Top, whose scratchings on the surface of the motion picture industry were historical. It was whispered about that he was the Power, the All in All, the Fountain Head from which gushed the millions of celluloid feet of the past and present and from whom the billions of celluloid feet of the future were trustfully expected. He was, to make myself plain, the projected personality of all the people that make the movies what they are.

"You have come," he said.

"Yes, Master," I replied. "Yes," is an extremely handy word about the industry.

"You have come because I have summoned you. My Eyes watched your progress, my Hands made smooth your way. There was a door that was not a door and yet . . . There was a ceiling, which, if one understood, was not so much a ceiling as a path. . . ."

"And so's your old Michael Arlen's recent visit to Hollywood," I put in. I knew whence had come that "door-not-a-door" speech.

"Dont interrupt," he said severely. "You are a worm."

"Yes, Master," I said.

"And stop saying 'yes' all the time. You are not on my pay-roll." He paused, and tossed a lump of lakoum to a spotted ocelot that lay drowsing on the rug.

The Interview Background

"PRETTY nice place you have here," I remarked, feeling that we didn't seem to be getting anywhere.

"Hah!" he replied, "I know of what you are thinking. This milieu is not Here is an interview with the Arch-Master of the movies.

Here is the man whose scratchings have done so much to the surface of the industry.

Here speaks the director who first used the United States cavalry in a picture, who held apart the Red Sea in "The Ten Commandments," and who created the floating bed in the middle of a lily-pond boudoir.

He wrote that immortal subtitle: "Came the dawn to gild with its rosy fingers the snow-clad peaks of the Sierras."

You will want to know the Master's real thoughts.

what you had expected. You would have me in a bare walled cell, pierced with high, narrow, heavily barred windows—"

"That's not a bad idea," I agreed politely.

"You would dress me in the habit of a monk and shave my pate. You would surround me with sterilized asceticism—me, the first man who ever used the United States cavalry in a picture, who held apart the Red Sea in 'The Ten Commandments,' and who dreamed 'Broken Blossoms' and wrote it down ten minutes after I woke up!"

"You did all that?" I asked.

"My child," he replied, "that is nothing. I have as many facets as a diamond, as many moods as April. The colors of the rainbow are mine, and my overtones—ah! my overtones!" he shuddered and clasped his hands about his head. "Shall I, then, breathe in an empty cask, or shall I permit my surroundings"—he indicated the room—"to vibrate with my soul?"

"Yes," I replied, risking another reprimand.

"Tomorrow," he continued, "my mood will have changed. Accordingly, this divan will become a swinging hammock, this water-pipe a long black cigar. I shall change my Russian blouse for the coat of a Japanese fisherman and my Oxford bags for a kilt. I shall wear ballet slippers. The day after—who knows? Girt cap-a-pie in a full suit of armor, I may ride about on a small velocipede. And why?"

"Why?" I echoed.

The Master Mind at Work

"THAT I may create. Do you remember a picture in which the bed of the dissolute beauty was a boat floating in a lily pond in the middle of her boudoir?"

"If there are cabaret scenes, swimming pools, orgies, romping flappers and faces that appear in the heart of a rose," says the Master Mind, "it is because I wish to have cabaret scenes, swimming pools, orgies, romping flappers and faces that appear in the heart of a rose"

"Can I ever forget it?" I assured him.

"I thought of that. Like Jonah, I was inside the whale in 'Down to the Sea in Ships.' It was I who sent Martin Johnson into the heart of Borneo and who sent the gunboat to his timely rescue. I timed the gunboat. I introduced Flaherty to Nanook of the North and told them they ought to get to know each other better. I told von Stroheim he was a man I loved to hate. I taught each one of the Four Horsemen to ride. . . ."

"I am beginning to understand," I murmured. "And the scenery in the 'Cabinet of Dr. Caligari'?"

"A joke of mine. One must have one's relaxations. That was the day my house was being done over. Fools! They took it seriously. I built the castle in 'Robin Hood.' I created the cathedral in 'The Hunchback.' Do you know why 'The Last Laugh' had no subtitles?"

"No," I said.

"Because I couldn't bother to write them."

"Oh," I said, "you do those, too?"

"Who else? 'Came the dawn to gild with its rosy fingers the snow-clad peaks of the Sierras—only a mother's love can save that tiny atom of humanity from Eternity's brink.' Those are mine—mine—mine!"

"Movies Are Thus and So"

"THAT accounts for it," I said. "A good many people have wondered. . . ."

"The entire world has wondered. They say, 'the movies are thus and thus—and why?' I answer, 'because of me.' Quinn Martin, Harriette Underhill, Robert Sherwood, what do they understand?"

"Not much," I replied. Merely to be agreeable, I assure you.

"In 'The Gold Rush,' I held on to the end of the rope that kept the cabin from falling over the cliff. I held on by my will-power. I taught Lon Chaney to make faces and Gloria Swanson to speak French. I breathed passion down Pola Negri's neck in her cradle. I curled Mary Pickford's hair."

"Did you——" I began.

"I did," he replied. "I don't know to what you are referring, but I did it. Other producers, director, actors may have assumed the credit, but it is because I have chosen to have them do so. 'Thrice Cæsar refused a crown; Charles the First had his Cromwell; remember the Maine!'"

Renée Makes GOOD

CAROL WHITE

Miss Adorée was not particularly wonderful in the picture, but she wasn't so bad. She was good enough to be signed up for leading rôles at a satisfactory salary. She was engaged to play leads in a series of comedies that Tom Moore was then making for the Goldwyn company.

Instead of heading back to Paris, Miss Adorée went to California and became so delighted with the movies, the climate and her new opportunities, that she promptly married Tom Moore, just by way of sealing herself definitely

SIX years ago, William Fox produced a motion picture from a story written by Georges Clemenceau, then premier of France. It was called "Les Plus Forts," which, translated in English for the billboards, meant "The Strongest." There was a great fuss over the picture and the Tiger himself was delighted because, being only human, he aspired to scenario writing.

But the picture now is important in movie annals not because it was written by Clemenceau but because it marked the début of Renée Adorée. At the time "The Strongest" was produced, Miss Adorée was completely unknown and obscure. She fell into the leading rôle of an important picture quite by accident. The Fox company wanted a French actress in the cast, probably out of deference to Clemenceau. And Miss Adorée, having been a circus performer, a dancer, a vaudeville artist, a cabaret singer and a small-time actress, saw no reason why she shouldn't take a fling at the movies.

Renée Adorée's performance in "The Big Parade" took her from the ranks of the second-raters and put her in the ranks of those who belong. Right, as Musette in "La Bohème"

CELLA LLOYD Crashes

WHAT'S GONE ON BEFORE

Only a few months ago Cella Lloyd stood behind a counter in Blatz's Emporium. She dreamed of Screen Stardom, but, alas, Fame seemed far away. Then Cella won first prize in a Big Bathing Girl Contest—and the peaceful existence of the Blatz Maison was tossed Topsy-Turvy. Cella told Siegmund Blatz what she thought of him and departed for Hollywood. There the inventor of the Babylonian Flashback, the great director, Horace De Grind, took over her artistic career. The eminent De Grind encountered difficulties until it occurred to him to put Cella in her one-piece bathing suit. So the great super-special, "Passions of the Younger Set," got under way. Now read on!

Scene I

The Sap, Cella's home-town sweetheart, accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Lloyd, comes to visit the young star in her Hollywood bungalow. The Sap, in a rented tuxedo, wonders where all the money comes from. Also he figures his chances at winning Cella to be nil

Scene II

In honor of her father and mother, Cella throws a regular Hollywood bathing party. The great De Grind comes—and so, too, does Rolly Quixote, the screen colony's newest sheik. The Sap dopes out his chances to be less than nil

Super-Realism in the Movies

By MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

Mr. Josephson is a well-known young radical writer, who has been taking a profound interest in motion pictures. He has contributed to GARGOYLE, THE DOUBLE DEALER, THE NEW REPUBLIC, THE NATION and other publications. He was an editor of THE BROOM and SECESSION.

ONE returns as from a Robinson Crusoe sojourn of several years' absence from the cinema temples to find that the movies have unconsciously, and by imperceptible stages, grown up. Curious, quiet, bloodless revolutions have come and gone under the surface.

The last winter season offered such spectacles as "Stella Dallas," "The Big Parade," "The Merry Widow," "Lady Windermere's Fan." Names that are already conjured with as landmarks in the history of this new art. And it is astonishing also how clearly the directors, Henry King, King Vidor, von Stroheim, Lubitsch, emerge as the dominating spirits of these dramas in black and white. It is as if you had been listening to the same orchestra play the same music for a long time, and then suddenly became aware of a more competent and inspiring leadership, of an unflagging spirit knitting it all together, intensifying the shadows and the lights. . . .

And quite as gradually it dawns upon your Robinson Crusoe of the brief nap away from the movies that the technique of them is now cleaner and firmer than that of the older pictures. Both directors and actors seem to know more about what they want to do, and to have profited silently by their own experiences or errors. The camera itself has undoubtedly become a more devilishly accurate instrument. And there are so few waste motions: every piece of furniture, every bit of foliage is properly placed or composed within a design; the directors seem to realize that even their stars are only tools, things that reflect so much moving light and shade back to the camera-lens, so that if a book or a hat is more important to the whole effect than the expensive and temperamental actress, the book or hat has its own bright holiday.

SEVERAL years ago, in the winter of 1922-1923, I chanced to visit, in Berlin, the sumptuous studios of UFA, where I saw that brilliant fermentation out of which came so many famous German pictures. Talking to the German directors, I became aware of the rapid developments that were taking place. They were proud of their historical romances, "Henry VIII," "Peter the Great," "Othello," all lavish with perfected detail, scientific atmosphere, and artfully composed studio sets. Also of that weird and imaginative "Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," black flower of post-war Expressionism, which I had already seen in Paris in the guise of a Swedish masterpiece. And yet, much as I respect and hope for from the Germans' gift for the theater, the drama, I come to America for certain qualities and achievements in the film that are inimitable and unrivaled. . . .

FOR my own part, I never forget that the motion picture means just that: it involves motion. It has seemed necessary to me that the forms in the screen be always in an eternal movement. The moment they stopped, or had the effect of stopping, I lost interest. Now even in the best German films at times, the directors had a way of getting lost in the "literary" content of some clever or ironical book or play. The picture suddenly became static (i.e. motionless), and I found myself watching a dull, reasonable-looking set that rarely changed or assumed any fresh meanings for me, while the wise or witty problems of life were being worked out between conscientious actors and overworked subtitles.

Now our restless and animated Americans, with their spectacular American scene, make the most admirable subjects for the film. American pictures still hugely outbid all others abroad because of the magnetic attraction of their vivid movement and energy. Always the American films seemed to "follow the ball," even in those innocent pictures of Western life as it never was, there were things that escaped them, moments of a tremendous reality that the eye as it watched knew was deeper and more revealing than any reality it had ever seen!

Motion we have never actually seen before. The mass of a face spread over twenty feet of screen in mobile lights and shadows we have never been able to study with so much composure. The spinning of a wheel, the gallop of a horse—all these commonplace things have for us a super-reality that no other art ever presented; and since we know so little about the world we live in, and are assured now that all is relative (!) we hunger incessantly to see more of this world we never really see. In every direction and every corner of our daily lives the screen brings such illumination that unconscious habits or gestures or expressions of the mouth and hand become tremendously important things. To me this has always been the genius of the films.

Is it not time to take stock, then, of the present-day films? Do the directors on whom the whole business depends realize these qualities? Delighting in the competence, orderliness and intelligence of these men, Cruze, Lubitsch,

Says Mr. Josephson

"It is astonishing how clearly Henry King, King Vidor, von Stroheim and Lubitsch emerge as the dominant spirits of these dramas in black and white.

"American pictures outbid all others abroad because of their vivid movement and energy.

"Lubitsch I regard frankly as a dangerous influence.

"Henry King's 'Stella Dallas' was undoubtedly the outstanding achievement of the winter."

LAST month we picked some flaws in the skill displayed by the Pacific coast organization of press-agents, the Wampas, in selecting baby stars. If we remember correctly, their selecting average, running over a period of five years, ran to exactly .138.

Modesty prevents us from making a comparison with the discerning ability of the Wampas. However (business of blushing), in the August issue of THE CLASSIC we mentioned the fact that during the coming year 950 motion picture dramas would be produced but that just twenty of them would be of consequence.

Yes, we named the twenty. And all but one of the box-office hits of the subsequent months were in that twenty. For our chosen twenty included: "The Big Parade," "The Merry Widow," "Ben-Hur," "The Gold Rush," "The Freshman," "Don Q," "The Pony Express," "Sally of the Sawdust," and "The Unholy Three." Our list included too, "La Bohème," "Mare Nostrum," and "Moana of the South Seas," the fates of which remain to be seen. We missed guessing just one big hit, "Stella Dallas."

Pretty soon we are going to select our chosen list of next year's hits. Producers and exhibitors are welcome to look over the list — and reap their respective fortunes.

Yes, come to think of it, with nine hits out of twenty selections to date, our guessing average is .450.

Naturally, it is the easiest thing in the world to make lists and predictions. We plead guilty again in selecting the sex best sellers of the screen at the present moment of palpitating to press:

Vilma Banky
Norma Shearer
Dolores Costello
Renée Adorée
Greta Nissen
Esther Ralston

Everybody loves to imagine things. We have an imaginary film magazine in which we publish (mentally) all the things that we (personally) like.

By F. J. S.

The magazine is called NICKELODEON MASTERPIECES and it is given over to the best thought in the industry.

For instance, we would publish contributions from all the leading New York screen critics. We would have F. Mordaunt Hall, of The Times; contribute one of his characteristic reviews, except that we would insist that he tell the plot in detail of the film in question. And we would have Quinn Martin, of The World, tell exactly how he discovered Harold Lloyd some years ago.

We would get an article from Fannie Hurst telling the literary throes of creating such a great story as "Mannequin." This would be a fine help to people planning to enter future scenario contests.

We would answer everyone who attacked the screen by declaring, with as much heat as we could generate offhand, that the aforementioned attacker was just a disappointed person who had tried to sell scenarios.

We would run a lot of pictures of Hollywood stars' backyards, showing the complete extent of the bathing-pool vogue. And we would have Marie Prevost pose on the edge of everyone of the pools.

We would run a lot of pictures of the young ladies mentioned in the preceding item on this page. And we would throw all pictures of Ernest Torrence et al. into the wastepaper basket.

We would run only such interviews as the one in this CLASSIC with Laura La Plante; i.e., chats with frank cuties who did not try to palm off the idea that they loved Strindberg.

We would only review productions by King

Vidor, Ernst Lubitsch, Eric von Stroheim and John Robertson, or, upon favorable report, those of certain German directors, Rex Ingram and Henry King.

We would review more pictures starring Richard Barthelmess and Richard Dix because, in NICKELODEON MASTERPIECES, we wouldn't care how much our personal liking for these chaps brought superlatives rushing to our typewriters.

We may go on baring our editorial soul (or lack of it) next month. We'll see.

Last month we handed out a lot of medals to the unsung heroes of the screen, the men who do the real work and never get the credit. Somehow we overlooked the unhappy fellow who did the cutting of "Ben-Hur."

Imagine trimming the thousands of feet of original negative down to the mere twelve reels of the "Ben-Hur" as it is being shown now! The cutter's name, by the way, is Lloyd Nosler, and something ought to be done about getting folks to rush some fan mail his way.

My spies report to me that 1,600,000 feet of negative were shot in making "Ben-Hur," from which 800,000 feet of positive were printed. Nosler cut this 800,000 down to 12,000.

The Joppa Gate sequence, shot in Italy, was trimmed from 100,000 to 1,000 feet, while the Roman galley sequence was lopped from about 132,000 feet to 1,500. The chariot race occupied originally 200,000 feet of negative. The race now runs 1,000 feet.

Nosler must have cut his film like a dyspeptic city editor.

Probably the most interesting event of the autumn screen season will be the launching of Gloria Swanson as a star in special productions. As Miss Swanson herself pointed out in a recent CLASSIC, she has been starring in moderate-priced program pictures, altho critics have frequently commented upon these as if they were specials.

Gloria lifted these to prominence by sheer personality. We doubt if there is a more vivid feminine figure in all picturedom than Miss Swanson. She has gone through a number of eras in the development of her career, be it noted.

She was under the De Mille influence for a time and then after that she was a devotee of Elinor Glyn, the lady who discovered the asterisk. She threw off these influences, began to develop rapidly and hit her stride in "The Humming Bird."

Up to that time she had been looked upon as a wearer of picturesque attire. In brief, she was a clothes horse. But she has used her brain in developing herself and she has forced her acceptance by the public as a big star.

Miss Swanson's first vehicle, we understand, is to be an ornate adaptation of "The Miracle," the Max Reinhardt spectacle which was imported a year or so ago with a great deal of theatrical hokus-pocus by Morris Gest. This is a version of the old medieval legend which also served as the basis of Maeterlinck's "Sister Beatrice."

This old Dutch legend is a delicate subject for the screen. It relates of a nun who is seduced away from her convent by a brash crusader. When she returns, she finds that her place has been assumed by the Virgin, so that her absence has passed without notice. The legend points the moral that love extenuates all.

We suspect that Miss Swanson will play the runaway and the image of the Virgin which comes to life and assumes the rôle of the nun. In the Reinhardt production these parts were played by two actresses, Lady Diana Manners being the (Continued on page 86)

MASTERPIECES of the SCREEN

By EUGENE V. BREWSTER

If anybody were to ask who was the greatest general that ever lived, who was the greatest philosopher, or the greatest prize-fighter, or what was the greatest painting, or novel, or poem, how could one answer? How can one compare a race-horse with a reindeer, both being perfect animals of their kind? And so, how are we to compare "The Birth of a Nation" with "The Last Laugh"? We have no yardstick with which to measure the qualities of a picture and, therefore, we cannot compare pictures with scientific accuracy. Again, a picture may not please us and yet be a masterpiece. Likewise, a picture may be very bad technically and yet please us immensely. Let us see if we cannot formulate some sort of diagram, chart or schedule of qualities that a one hundred per cent. picture should have. First, it must have story interest. While pictures of a mere rose, and a simple "scenic" might be masterpieces of their kind, they could not be rated as one hundred per cent. pictures because they do not include many of the qualities that a one hundred per cent. picture must contain. Strictly speaking, a one hundred per cent. picture must have all the elements and qualities that a picture could possibly contain. Let me try to name some of those qualities:

- | | |
|-------------------|--------------------|
| Story interest | Construction |
| Direction | Universal interest |
| Theme | Suspense |
| Acting | Spectacle |
| Heart interest | Box-office value |
| Beauty | Photography |
| Instructive value | Cast |
| Characterization | Morals |
| Dramatics | Historic Value |
| Titles | Finesse |

The One Hundred Per Cent. Picture

There are other qualities, but these will suffice. Some of these may not be necessary to a one hundred per cent. picture, you may say, such as "morals"—a picture need not preach or point a moral to be one hundred per cent. Yes, but if it does contain this quality, is it not so much the better? A one hundred per cent. picture, you may say, need not be a spectacle and have gorgeous sets and stupendous mobs; but, if it does, is it not a greater picture with than without? The theme of "The Last Laugh" was very simple, while the theme of "Ben-Hur" was the greatest, perhaps, that has ever been conceived; therefore, if other things were equal the latter is by far the greater picture. The former might be one hundred per cent. of its kind, just as a picture of a rose might be, but the "kind" is not the greatest possible and, therefore, these cannot be classed as one hundred per cent. pictures. The first movie drama ever produced, "The Great Train Robbery," was a masterpiece of its kind and for its time, and so was "The Birth of a Nation," which came a dozen or so years later; but neither of these would be a masterpiece today. Here is a group of dramas that were masterpieces of their kind and for their time:

Driven
The Jack-Knife Man
The Lady
Tol'able David Broken Blossoms Revelation
A Tale of Two Cities

Masterpieces of Their Kind

But the same class of picture has since been equaled and surpassed; therefore, they are not one hundred per cent. pictures. "The Lost World" was a masterpiece of its kind and unique, but it did not contain all of the elements of a one hundred per cent. picture. "Shoulder Arms," "The Kid," "Safety Last," "Introduce Me," "Seven Chances" and other comedies were masterpieces of their kind, but they were not of the one hundred per cent. kind and could not possibly contain all of the elements of a one hundred per cent. masterpiece. "The Miracle Man" and "The Four Horsemen" were also great, but they were not of the one hundred per cent. kind. Several of the pictures of Mr. Fairbanks were masterpieces of their kind, notably "Robin Hood," and so were some of the "historics" like "The Thundering Herd" and "The Pony Express," but none of them contained all of the elements of a one hundred per cent. picture, even tho they were perfect so far as they went and even if it were impossible to have added any of these elements without marring the picture. There is still another group of great pictures:

THE CELLULOID CRITIC

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

A WEEKLY magazine recently conducted a contest in conjunction with the Famous Players, offering a prize of $50,000 for the best story adaptable to motion pictures.

The fifty thousand smackers were awarded to Fannie Hurst for a story called "Mannequin." The story, in brief, is the old hokum of the baby stolen from her crib and later reunited to her real parents. Even the old situation, of the girl being tried in a court, of which her own real father is the judge, is trotted out for inspection.

That Winning Story

IF this ancient dramatic wheeze was the best story turned in by the magazine contestants, then motion picture companies probably are right in refusing to read unsolicited scripts. Miss Hurst must have chortled in her Paquin sleeve upon receiving the $50,000 for this venerable junk.

"Mannequin" was a darn sight better produced than it deserved to be. Doubtless, the eminent Famous Players realized the weakness of their prize and decided to dress it up as best they could. Director James Cruze gives the creaky tale a whole lot of human atmosphere. And he gets superb assistance from Dolores Costello as the girl and Alice Joyce as the mother of the kidnaped kiddie.

I am not going to go further in exposing the bones of this ancient plot for your ribald laughter. I will explain that the stolen child is raised in the tenements, becomes a clothes model and is unjustly accused of murder, everything being explained by a deathbed confession. Personally, I think Miss Hurst ought to donate at least a part of her $50,000 to the great-great-grandchildren of the original author of this plot, provided he can be traced.

As I have intimated, Miss Costello gives a striking performance of the girl, Joan. This Miss Costello is going to be a big star of the screen, or I shall miss my guess. She looks a bit like Elsie Ferguson when she first dawned upon the theatrical horizon and she possesses a singular sympathetic charm. With any sort of break, Miss Costello is going to do big things.

Miss Joyce gives one of those understanding performances audiences have come to expect of her. And Director Cruze has injected a human note here and there. For all its antique machinery, "Mannequin" will touch you now and then, thanks to Miss Costello and Miss Joyce.

Watch Miss Costello!

A New Dorothy Gish

I VIEWED "Nell Gwyn," an English product, at a special showing. It may not reach the general public of America, which will be regrettable, since it reveals a Dorothy Gish you have never suspected heretofore.

"Nell Gwyn" tells, in leisurely English film fashion, the story of the orange girl who became an actress and who won a portion of the flitting affections of the gay Charles II. It is practically a film monolog, barely sketching the gay court of those dissolute roistering days.

"Nell Gwyn" is singularly lacking in drama, altho the period was vibrant with color, as any reader of Samuel Pepys' diary will testify.

I suppose the producer-director,

James Kirkwood and Carol Dempster in "That Royle Girl"

Dolores Costello and Alice Joyce in "Mannequin"

Esther Ralston and Laurence Grey in "The American Venus"

The New Photoplays in Review

Herbert Wilcox, would explain that he did not wish to distort history with the injection of romance or dramatic climax. But his story has plenty of distortion, as, for instance, the metamorphosis of the Duke of York into a dour-faced Puritan. And there are inaccuracies galore.

I have said that "Nell Gwyn" reveals a new Dorothy Gish. I use the word literally. Nell's attire leaves little to the imagination. However, Miss Gish stands the revelation admirably. Her playing has gusto, buoyancy and humor. The roistering spirit of the real Nell, as she must have existed in those rough and merry days, isn't there. But the characterization has more breadth and verve than anything Miss Gish has given the screen. If her work is repetitious, it is because the direction is decidedly amateurish. The work of Randle Ayrton as Charles II is good, but, outside of Miss Gish, the real honors go to Roy Overbaugh, an American cameraman, for his photography.

Those Dempster Limbs

I HAVE noted Miss Gish's revelations. Then there are those of Carol Dempster in "That Royle Girl" to be considered. If I may say so, Miss Dempster's legs are the real features of this decidedly mediocre effort by D. W. Griffith.

"That Royle Girl" is adapted from a magazine serial by Edwin Balmer. It concerns the tribulations of a cutie whose father is a lazy student of prohibition and whose sweetheart is unjustly accused of murder. It moves thru the underworld of Chicago and terminates with a cyclone somewhere in the outskirts of that metropolis. The cyclone is mildly interesting, wrecking the roadhouse where Daisy Royle is held prisoner. There is a certain unsavory element running thru "That Royle Girl," principally centering about the chief villain who carries a little whip and is palpably a subject for Dr. Krafft-Ebing. Miss Dempster's histrionic contribution to "That Royle Girl" isn't much, altho that is the fault of a rushing and false melodramatic story, but she does lead piquant support to the tottering tale. No one can ever say that this Griffith picture hasn't a leg to stand on. W. C. Fields is in the story, playing the father, but he is only allowed to catch the camera once or twice. Even in those flashes, he reveals his fine comic spirit. Fields is going to be as great as Chaplin in three years. Wait and see.

To continue the revelations of the month, let me next consider "The American Venus," an original story built around the late lamented national bathing-girl contest at Atlantic City. I resent "The American Venus" because it is essentially cheap and tawdry, being built obviously upon the idea, already a success at Atlantic City, of exploiting gals in brief bathing attire. Like everyone else, I like pulchritude, but I hate to see it retailed in circus and chautauqua fashion.

© E. O. Hoppe

The plot of "The American Venus" almost makes "Mannequin" look like a literary masterpiece. This tremendous mental effort of Mr. Townsend Martin discloses how the daughter of the owner of a small town beauty-cream factory enters the beauty contest. The proprietor of a rival cream works holds a mortgage on the plant and is going to foreclose unless the gal will marry his son. Honest, that is the story.

Another Literary Gem

YOU will have to go to see "The American Venus" if you wish to know the denouement. I left, but not until the camera had proved to my satisfaction that Esther Ralston, in a one-piece suit, completely eclipses Fay Lanphere, the real winner of the 1925 contest, who also appears in this big literary gem. Ford Sterling was showing signs of stealing the picture when I left the theater. The much-exploited Broadway chorus beauty, Louise Brooks, is in the piece. She has a provocative face, but she hasn't learned yet how to make her knees behave.

"Womanhandled," Richard Dix's newest starring effort, amused me a lot. A great deal of the credit for the diverting qualities of this comedy goes to one was barely six years of age. And, strange to say, the fact of his being the famous journalist's son did more to impede than to help the boy's own journalistic career. In the big publishing house, where years ago his father had played such an important part, it was not at all easy for that young and highly ambitious journalist to be recognized on his own merits. He had literally to force himself on these people by writing under an assumed name before they at last accepted "Old Dupont's son" as an editor who had won his way thru sheer efficiency.

CERTAINLY Ewald Andre Dupont can be called one of the most interesting personalities in motion pictures. In Germany he is the most popular of all film directors and in Berlin they are predicting that it won't be long until his name will be just as popular in the United States. He has had a contract with Universal for many months and he is now in California about to start his first American picture.

Dupont was born in 1891. He comes from one of those old Huguenot families which emigrated from France in the eighteenth century and became the special pets of Frederic the Great, who strongly favored their immigration into Prussia. The Duponts, during two centuries, have yielded quite a number of strong personalities in all walks of life. Since the second half of the last century they have gone in mostly for newspaper work and many of them have played important parts in German journalism.

Born Into Journalism

DUPONT's father was editor-in-chief of the then most popular Berlin daily. He died, however, when young Andre, or Ewald as he is generally called by his friends,

Very soon (this was about fifteen years ago, at the time when film production was at its very infancy in Germany) the young editor began to revolutionize his columns by starting a thing unheard of at that time. He began to take the movie seriously. He was the first man who ever wrote a film review in Germany.

First German Film Critic

ANY amount of ridicule was showered upon the young editor for giving serious thought and valuable space to so silly and unimportant a thing. But Dupont was not to be discouraged. Once he had recognized the importance of the new silent art, he considered it his duty to do all he could towards improving it.

Much as the trade and the film producers were delighted to see their work taken seriously in an important newspaper and by a recognized journalist, they very soon began to be rather scared by that young man's frankly outspoken criticism.

It was mostly the story and still more the continuity of those pioneer films which elicited those severe and highly dreaded criticisms from the young reviewer. And it certainly was not a bad idea when one of the producers approached the young editor with the request that he try to write a continuity himself instead of condemning every story he saw on the screen.

Writes His First Script

DUPONT jumped at this opportunity. Within the next year or so he wrote more than thirty scenarios. For the first one he received a salary of $10. Very soon, however, he was considered by the steadily growing trade to be a crack scenario writer or, as a matter of fact, almost the only one of his time and he was paid the then enormous weekly salary of $250 for continuity. Indeed, this was a great deal, considering the fact that at that time the cost of production hardly ever reached the $2,000 mark. The leading stars, mostly famous Berlin stage actors, were quite contented with a salary of $25 a day, plus second-class railway expenses in case of exteriors.

who was just twenty-two at that time, went in for the production of a film and not merely continuity writing. He was successful from the very start. Altho he has already produced more than thirty films, there has hardly been one failure among them. Most of them have been artistic successes and have scored high in box-office receipts in Germany and other European countries.

A Successful Director

I SHALL not mention the titles of all those pictures, but it is interesting that in one of them the producer intentionally did not use a single star, preferring to take into the cast only "quite new faces." In this he was successful and he has always laid special stress on giving a chance to young artists.

Dupont has long been keenly interested in vaudeville business. He even went to the extent of running a big vaudeville organization some two years ago. There isn't anything worth knowing about the business that he doesn't know. Surely this intimate knowledge was useful to him last year when he directed the biggest and most ambitious of his productions, the one which Berlin believes will make him popular in America as well. This was "Vaudeville," featuring Emil Jannings. His Universal contract was made, however, before this picture was released, which implies that it was offered on the strength of former merit.

It is not necessary to mention here any details about "Vaudeville," featuring Jannings and Lya de Putti, since the picture will be released soon in America.

Ewald Andre Dupont comes of a long line of journalists and he was himself a prominent Berlin editor before he became interested in the screen

Quiet Home Life

E WALD DUPONT's private life is and always has been a rather quiet one. He is a married man and he likes his home in town as well as in the pretty little bungalow he owns near one of the beautiful Bavarian lakes. Here he retreats for a quiet spell of recreation whenever he finds a short time from his work. He likes gardening and he is also quite a keen motorist.

He told me, before leaving Berlin, that he was looking forward to his American trip and all the possibilities for work which seem to be in store for him there.

RANDOM IMPRESSIONS

[Eugene V. Brewster, the editor-in-chief of the Brewster Publications, has been visiting the Coast studios. You will be interested in reading his impressions of the Western capital of Celluloidia.]

IN front of the Fox studio in Hollywood is a small grass plot on which is a little black and gold sign reading thus:

I AM GRASS, NOT GAS;
DONT STEP ON ME

WHO do you think is Hollywood's greatest pianist? No, it is not Eleanor Boardman, altho she seems artistic and looks very much like a musical artiste of some kind. It isn't a woman, anyway—it's a man. No, not Ramon Novarro, altho he plays the piano very well indeed and sings excellently. Yes, and he looks the part, too. Nor is it the suave, polished Valentino, nor yet Ronald Colman, who might well be a musician. No, you are not even warm.

Well, I'll let you in on it. Remember "Tol'able David"? Remember that terrible, gigantic tramp who oozed villainy and wickedness from every pore? And that big, ugly, raw-boned chap who nearly ran away with "The Covered Wagon"? And that monstrosity who ran a blacksmith shop with one hand while holding a Bible in the other in "The Pony Express"? Yes, that's the chap—Ernest Torrence! But who would think it? And he carries a big gold medal as the star opera-singer of the Royal Academy of Music in London, too!

AND speaking of anomalies, of queer freaks of unnatural selection, who do you think is the star master of ceremonies, toast-master, etc., on the Coast? You will at once think of all the handsome, dignified, cultured, polished, suave, smooth-voiced men you have heard of, but you'll never guess, because he is the lowest of low comedians, always playing absurd comedy parts, and you picture him as a conical Irish hod-carrier. Yes, it's Charles Murray, and he always makes a hit.

DO you remember Virginia Pearson of the dim and distant past? That vivid, beautiful brunette who was right up among the leaders a dozen years ago? Well, at a Preview of Commodore Blackton's latest picture the other night, there was a very striking blonde, young and beautiful, the observed of all observers, and her hair was a shimmering gold. It was the same Virginia Pearson. And her husband, Sheldon Lewis, sat by her side, looking much too old for her.

OVER at Fox's studio they think they have the coming greatest star of all. I had a good look at her and she looks the part. It is Olive Borden.

THE finest speaking voice I ever heard issue from a human throat came out of the face of Noah Beery the other day while I was dining with him at the Montmartre. It is rich, deep, resonant, clear and what I would call perfect. He says he can sing several notes below lower C, and I doubt not. And yet the poor man cannot (or will not) make a public speech. What a pity! Charles Murray and he should do some swapping.

YOU may not believe it, but Hollywood goes to sleep about 9 P. M. It is really a quiet town. During the day it is all bustle and hustle like any other big city.

The film folks work hard all day and they take it easy all night. They have to.

HANDSOME Jack Gilbert looked anything but handsome fixed up as a burlesque Red Grange at Marion Davies' costume ball. And he didn't try to look pretty, and he wasn't, and I told him so, and he liked it and I liked it.

CHARLIE CHAPLIN certainly enjoyed taking off Napoleon at the ball, and he looked the part amazingly. I told him if he could find some humorous incidents in Napoleon's life and play the part straight, in a feature high-class comedy, it would be a knock-out. And it would.

YOU can ride around Hollywood for hours and never know but what you are in Philadelphia, or Atlanta, or Chicago. You might come across some players and a studio or two, and you might not.

I WALKED in on a set at First National and saw Norma Talmadge in a suit of men's striped pajamas doing "Kiki." The previous night I had seen a Vitagraph revival which Commodore Blackton put on at "The Writers," in which Norma appeared in a 1912 picture, and I swear that Norma looked far younger in 1926 than she did in 1912.

AT the Lasky studio I saw them making a miniature elevated railroad structure with real cars and engines. It was about one hundred feet long and the cars each about a foot long. The whole thing was complete and perfect in every little detail and many men will work many days to complete this railroad. When you see it on the screen, you will feel sure that it is the real thing, rearing up some twenty feet in the air with full-size cars and everything. And this scene, costing thousands of dollars, will be on the screen perhaps less than one minute.

WARNER Brothers have the handsomest studio from the outside and First National has the handsomest inside. The Fifth Avenue of First National (exclusive section) is about two hundred feet long and contains three bungalows—Norma Talmadge's, Colleen Moore's and Valentino's. Warner's studio looks like one of those stately government buildings in Washington with a dozen big pillars running all the way up in front, Colonial style, and very picturesque.

KING VIDOR, who did "The Big Parade" and who is therefore one of the world's greatest directors even if he did nothing else, looks to me like a big, overgrown boy, simple and unaffected. Seems to me nearly all the great directors are young fellows now.

COLLEEN MOORE is very pleased with her little studio bungalow and garden, and well she might be. She proudly showed me thru, and pointed out every item of interest, including her stove and cooking utensils. And, by the way, she is one of the sweetest and most charming little ladies I ever met. Everybody loves her. She gets everybody. Yes, her eyes are not quite the same color, but almost. She laughingly let me look into them—and I still live!

I RAN into Maurice Costello on Hollywood Boulevard and had a chat with him. No, he is not directing his daughter Dolores as reported, and doesn't intend to. He is, of course, proud of her and everybody else seems to be. Maurice is free-lancing. Not working just now but hopeful. And this is the first great screen idol the world ever saw!

ON almost the same spot an hour later I met my old friend, Edgar Norton, who made a hit in "The King on Main Street." He was once stage manager, for the great Richard Mansfield, and is now the champion butler of the screen and a mighty good all-around character man.

HOLLYWOOD is surrounded with hills or young mountains, and your chauffeur keeps saying: "That's Mary Pickford's house up there," "That's Tom Mix's," "Up over there is where Fitzmaurice is going to build," etc. Every hill is represented by one or more players and their places all look like money. All the hills are not yet working, but from the looks of things they soon will be. They are building roads and things everywhere. Talk about Florida, everybody here is land crazy. Everybody is making money buying and selling lots. Prices are already tremendously high and they are going up every day. The players are all dipping in, too, and Rockefeller and Ford will soon be poor men in comparison.

IF you want to be very smart and proper, call a studio a "lot." That's the correct word, "On the lot"—"He's not on the lot," etc.

That Chaplin Complex

By HARRIETTE UNDERHILL

DON QUIXOTE without a windmill; a mute diletante; a faun or a sprite; a will o' the wisp; just a fantastic cuss; a marionette with Charlie Chaplin on the other end of the wires; a grown-up Peter Pan; a phantom; a wraith with a sense of humor; a nomad; Charlie Chaplin, himself, but a Charlie Chaplin known only to himself.

These are some of the answers we have received to the question we have been putting to our friends recently. For we have been going about like the inquiring reporter; and these answers we have had to dig up from divers places, for we had them jotted down on the backs of envelopes, on calling cards, margins of newspapers and on theater tickets.

One of the most popular fallacies in the world is the belief, culled from the movies, no doubt, that newspaper reporters carry notebooks. They don't. We kept one once when we were young, but what good was it? None. For in consulting it, how could anyone guess that T.S.O.M.D. might mean, "Tell story on Marion Davies," or that T.C. rec. P.N. could possibly mean, "Traffic cop recognized Pola Negri"? Along with the answers to our question was a scrap of paper with these letters scribbled on it: "Get C. St. R. by the 5," and we had sense enough to know that that meant "Get the CLASSIC story ready by the fifth." So here it is.

The question we have been eagerly asking each one we meet is, "What is your idea of the funny little man which Charlie Chaplin has put on the screen? Is he a character study? Is he the same character in each picture? Is he a real person or a figment of the brain?"

And the answers are all here at the start of this article.

We think the man who said, "It is Chaplin, himself," comes nearest to the truth. For, when finally we put the question to Mr. Chaplin, he replied without hesitation, "He is an inferiority complex." And what a simple solution that is; especially now, when nearly everybody has at least one in the family. It seems to be one of those cases where, after he learns the answer, anybody will exclaim, "Of course! I might have known that all the time!"

And it is quite apparent, too, to anyone who believes in signs, that that inferiority complex is dwindling with the years. In Chaplin's earlier pictures the funny little man on the screen never had any happy endings to cheer him on his way. And how well we remember the first time that the "phantom lover" was permitted to enjoy requited affection. It was in "The Immigrant" that he married Edna Purviance in the office of the justice of the peace and that was the first ray of sunshine allowed to creep into his sad life. The first time one felt that Mr. Chaplin was going to attempt a "materialization" and allow love to awaken a soul in the lonely little marionette.

Recently, Mr. Chaplin was a guest at a house party where we were. Someone accused him of being the most famous person in the whole world, not excepting the Prince of Wales, himself. To prove this, the man who made the assertion said that when they were traveling thru China, one of the coolies grabbed up a derby lying on the ground, stuck it on the side of his head, and, twirling a stick in his hand, gave a Chinese imitation of the Chaplin walk.

"He laughed that funny head with a pig-tail nearly off, and seemed to feel that one touch of Chaplin makes the whole world kin," said the narrator.

"Well," replied Mr. Chaplin, "it is something, isn't it, to unearth a Chinese sense of humor!"

While Mr. Chaplin is a very friendly person, he is, withal, so modest that it is difficult to tell him that he is the most famous man in the world. He doesn't give the usual polite protest, which means, "Let any man deny it if he dares!" He just blushes and begins to talk about something else.

During supper we sat next to Mr. Chaplin, and it was then we determined to ask him about his elusive character that is known all over the world, yet with whom none is acquainted.

"You give us no clew," we said. "Because your 'Wanderer,' your 'Prospector,' your 'Immigrant,' never yet has spoken a word on the screen. If only you would let him say, 'When I was in England last year,' or 'Mother is waiting for me,' I was sensitive about these big feet when I was a kid in school, you would give one something to work on. But was he ever in England, this nomad of yours? Was he born here, one hundred per cent. American? Has he a mother? Does he worry because his feet are large? Did he ever go to school?"

Mr. Chaplin shook his head, and then it was that he said: "He is just an inferiority complex." He did not add, "my own," but what he told us later made us realize that that was what he meant.

"I became terribly unhappy," he said, "when first I began to be well known on the screen; and I shall tell you why. It was because people insisted on lionizing me. I was invited out everywhere, and if I accepted, as I often had to do, I would

Miss Underhill says the Charlie Chaplin you and I laugh at is just an inferiority complex.

Chaplin is an egoist, she says, and what he has put on the screen is the thing he once feared he was, at least in the eyes of others. Thus his inferiority complex became a shadow for the whole world to laugh at.

EVOLUTION of a LAUGH

Harold Lloyd as he was some years ago, just after discarding the Lonesome Luke character and donning the glasses destined to make him famous

Those shell-rimmed, but glassless, glasses that Harold Lloyd wears in all his comedies are not just a happy thought. They are the result of a study of the psychology of laughter.

Laughter and life are two of the commonest, simplest things. In its purest form laughter is life. The more life the more laughter. And in the weakness of human nature is to be found the most humor.

In life it is a laughing matter to see a dignified person lose his dignity, such as a frozen-faced individual slipping on a banana peel. It is a laughing matter to see an efficient person make a mistake—for instance, a deft waiter spilling soup on an irate guest.

Because at one time shell-rimmed glasses were always synonymous with learned people, as professors or scientists, they acquired a dignity that even their present popularity cannot dispel.

Worn by Harold Lloyd, as his only make-up, they make of him a serious-minded youth, and accordingly magnify the humor.

Remember when Bebe Daniels played with Harold Lloyd in the old Rolin comedies about eight years ago? Here is a scene from one of the old laugh makers

HOLLYWOOD.

Dear Majesty:

I should advise against Your Majesty coming to Hollywood at this time. Hollywood is not yet ready to embrace Your Majesty's daring design of making motion pictures that would show human beings acting as human beings act in real life. Hollywood would give Your Majesty the loud guffaw if you proposed such a radical departure from the accepted tradition of the cinema in the place of its birth.

There are hopeful signs, however, which indicate that at some future time Your Majesty's ideas may be put into practice. Louis H. Tolhurst has been making pictures showing the lives of insects. It is possible that somebody may take a chance and show the lives of men and women just for the novelty of it.

But I am not so optimistic about the future of the films as Laurence Stallings, who has not lived in Hollywood so long as I have. Stallings thinks they have a brilliant future—ah, where have I heard that phrase before?

Meanwhile, in accord with the expressed desire of Your Majesty, I shall keep you informed of what is happening in Hollywood from day to day, so that Your Majesty may judge for yourself the trend of celluloid culture.

New York.

Dear King:

Richard Barthelmess, who has been ill in a New York hospital with ear trouble, as Your Majesty has probably heard, has departed for California to make one picture in Hollywood. This will be Richard Harding Davis' "Ransom's Folly," which you may remember as a story of an army post in the old days when an army review looked like a parade of the Smith Brothers. Not that Dick is going to wear whiskers in this piece. No, no!

All sorts of rumors are current regarding Dick's next stellar plains. His present contract with Inspiration Pictures expires in September. Dick has been doing consistently good work and his next contract will carry a whole lot more of mazuma for the young star.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

Since I last wrote, Hollywood has been elevated by the presence of young Anthony Asquith, son of Lord Asquith, former Premier of Great Britain and Earl of Oxford and Asquith. I think Your Majesty will recall the father from certain negotiations relative to oil concessions in Your Majesty's beautiful Island of Oz, which were abruptly terminated by Your Majesty when a radio set and two strings of glass beads were not forthcoming as promised.

Your Majesty may also recall the mother, Margot, whose memoirs caused many a monocle to drop from many an eye and many a teacup to fall from many a knee when they burst upon poor old Mayfair.

However that may be, young Asquith is the latest lion to be captured in our jungles and he roars complacently from his suite at Pickfair, the Beverly Hills estate of Mary and Douglas. His sister, the wife of the Roumanian Ambassador, the Prince Something-or-Other, is also a guest at Pickfair. Anthony is here to learn the moving picture business. He hopes to become a director. He is a very intelligent and studious lad, homely even for an Englishman, with a pair of trousers quite like Charlie Chaplin's and his collar much too big for his neck. He has delicate and aristocratic hands.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

The Laurence Stallings whom I mentioned in a previous letter is back in Hollywood, lending the luster of his name to the script for Paramount's production of "Old Ironsides."

Your Majesty will recall Stallings as the one-legged soldier who co-authored in "What Price Glory?" the realistic war comedy that pleased you when Your Majesty was on a tear last winter in New York. He also did "The Big Parade" for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Stallings' name will go on "Old Ironsides" as the author, altho the real author is our mutual friend, Harry Carr, who conceived and hatched this astonishing movie. Harry put over the greatest tie-up in celluloid history when he got Secretary of the Navy Wilbur to back the production with the co-operation of the United States Navy. The frigate Constitution, now at dock in Boston Harbor, will be the principal prop used in reconstructing a chapter from our naval history dealing with the war with the Tripolitan pirates.

The Government is raising funds to restore the old vessel; hence the tie-up. All the kiddies who give pennies will go to see the picture. This is what Will Hays might call super-salesmanship.

Jesse L. Lasky thinks it safe to spend unlimited millions on making "Old Ironsides." It will take about a year to do the thing right, that is, to out-Benjamin Ben-Hur. Already a fleet of eighteen sailing ships has been built and some two thousand extras are assured of cakes for some months to come.

Jimmie Cruze, who is directing this spectacle, spent many weary weeks in toilsome research work among the bazaars of Tripoli, along the Riviera, at the Folies Bergères, the Casino, the Crystal Palace and other dull and out-of-the-way places, just to make the picture authentic.

Your Majesty:

If you follow the public prints, your royal highness has doubtlessly noticed that Adolphe Menjou has filed suit for divorce from his wife, Katherine Menjou. Menjou charges cruelty.

It takes a brave man to chance public disfavor like this and I hope Your Majesty will reward Menjou with a special proclamation of your appreciation. Menjou alleges that his wife scolded and found fault with him, calling him "good-for-nothing, puffed-up and conceited," and charged his mother with being a prevaricator.

Thus does the famous screen-understander-of-women get his troubles off his chest. I'm with him heart and soul and I trust Your Majesty will back me up. We men must stand together.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

I should like to call Your Majesty's attention to the career of Roy D'Arcy, because it offers the finest example I could cite of the way to get ahead in pictures.

This competent actor had knocked about for many years in Shubert musical shows, working under his real name, which was Roy Guisti. When he was working in Los Angeles he was seen by Eric von Stroheim, who, out of a clear sky, presented him with the part of the Crown Prince in "The Merry Widow."

Roy used to drive up to the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios in his little Chevrolet coop, accompanied sometimes by Jean, the girl who had liked him for himself—before he got a big part in pictures. Towards the end of his first engagement Roy began to appear in a huge, roaring touring-car with the top down and smartly enclosed in a patent-leather boot. He had been signed for a five-year contract.

Recently the studio was visited by Mrs. Laura Rhinock Duffy, widow, the daughter of old J. L. Rhinock, vice-president of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer outfit, and, oddly enough, president and treasurer of the Shubert organization. The widow had seen a photograph of Roy as the Crown Prince. When she saw him in real life, wearing the cute little whisker cultivated for the heavy rôle in "Graustark," the daughter of the vice-president and treasurer gave her heart to the actor.

They are married. Roy D'Arcy—the other name was considered too tough for the fans—smiles to himself when he remembers how he used to caper and cavort on tired dogs because he had to please Jake Shubert. From a performer in musical road shows he has jumped into

The real barber-shop chord. Director Mal St. Claire, Louise Brooks (getting the bob) and Adolphe Menjou at the Famous studio. Next!

Colleen Moore gets telegrams from all parts of the world on her birthday. What one? Now that would be telling the same as part ownership of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer interests. As for Jean, by-gones are by-gones. She merely liked him for himself—before he got a big part in pictures.

Hollywood.
Dear Majesty:

At this time of writing the pictures are really moving. The Paramount Studios are being transferred to the lot formerly occupied by the United Studios. The property of Paramount, occupying two blocks at Sunset Boulevard and Vine Street, became too valuable for studio purposes and will be subdivided into business lots.

Among both classes of the population—I mean movie actors and realtors—there is considerable speculation about what Joe Schenck will do. Schenck, who formerly functioned extensively at the United Studios, is ensconcing himself temporarily at the Pickford-Fairbanks Studio. But those who speculate in futures say he will build.

Schenck has just effected a combination with Sam Goldwyn to produce "The Garden of Allah" on large scale, using Norma Talmadge as the vamp and Ronald Colman as the priest. Henry King, who made "Stella Dallas," will direct.

Norma has finished "Kiki," in which she played the part of a French gamine. The script called for one sequence in which she works as a chorus girl.

New York.
Sire:

Movie ranks have been a bit upset recently at what is called the entrance of nudity into pictures. Famous Players tried some undress in "The American Venus" and Universal has gone a step or two further with "The Midnight Sun." Critics have wondered why your prime minister, Will Hays, permits this and then draws the line at the production of a seriously written drama such as "Rain," f' instance

Meanwhile, the speaking stage goes right along its lurid way. David Belasco has just revealed Leonore Ulric in a drama of the New York negro cabarets. Indeed, Leonore plays a "high yaller" who dances her way from the Harlem gutters into the home of a French nobleman. The dialog, too, is what even you would call profane.

Dont think I am advocating this sort of thing for the screen. I'm just mentioning it to show the broader scope of the speaking stage.

Hollywood.
Dear Majesty:

Your Majesty has graciously requested me to give you some idea of the sports and pastimes of movie actors in Hollywood. The movie actor always endeavors to live what we call "La Vie d'Hollywood," no matter where he happens to be, for he realizes instinctively that if he once permits himself to get out of this atmosphere he may be compelled to think.

William Powell, who has just come in from location on the Painted Desert, told me about a New Year's celebration he attended while working with the Paramount company engaged in embalming Zane Grey's "Desert Gold" in celluloid.

Bill said he had been impressed. Nature in the Painted Desert is rather splendid. The sets she has reared of twisted rocks and the mighty back-drop of desert sky which she has hung there are rather awe-inspiring. They made a man feel very small, Bill said, and as if he would like to be alone with himself for a while.

But on New Year's Eve there was a pleasant surprise for the company arranged by Eddie Brandstetter, the caterer for this trip. Eddie had been busy all day in the closed dining tent. When evening came he flung it open and invited them inside.

The tent had been decorated just like the Montmartre, Eddie's celebrated boulevard café. There were paper caps for everybody, tin horns to blow, turkey to eat, things to throw at each other—everything to make them think they were back in dear old Hollywood. And at the conclusion of the riotous evening, Bill said, they all went out and sang and the cowboys discharged their six-guns at the silent desert sky.

Yes, they beat the desert, Bill said. They made themselves forget they weren't in Hollywood. But, for some reason or other Bill said he wished he could have been alone that night, under the blazing stars that made the sand strangely white, listening to the coyotes howling in the distance, imbibing something that is not for sale in Hollywood.

Mr. and Mrs. Douglas MacLean return to Hollywood after a trip East via the Panama Canal and Cuba

Florence Reed drops in between scenes of "The Light Eternal" and is received by Director Benjamin Christian-son, Norma Shearer and Carmel Myers

New York.
Your Majesty:

There are all sorts of denials, but I feel that your royal highness should know of the reported tribulations in the Jack Pickford-Marilyn Miller marriage. The domestic bonds in this instance are likely to be severed when Miss Miller goes abroad next summer, if reports are to be believed.

Do you know who has been taking Miss Miller to social events about New York? No other than your loyal subject, Ben Lyon. Not so long ago Ben was squiring Barbara La Marr. How time flies.

Hollywood.
Dear Majesty:

The craze for things Russian, which has passed over London, Paris, and Your Majesty's own capital of Oz, has just hit Hollywood. Cecil De Mille, who successfully transferred the Ten Commandments to the screen, has just performed the same office for Chaliapin's song about the Volga Boatman. Not to be outdone, William Fox sicked Victor Schertzinger on to a Russian revival of "Siberia," the old melodrama that Your Majesty no doubt witnessed as a child when it was being performed by touring repertoire companies.

The making of these pictures revealed the fact that there are hundreds of Russian exiles in Hollywood, ranging from dukes, thru exiled bureaucrats and intelligentsia, down to droshky drivers—tho I have never met one who admitted to the latter occupation.

Pola Negri, who cherishes a warm feeling for the icy steppes, assembled all of the Slavs in Hollywood for a Russian musicale. Chaliapin who was appearing at the Philharmonic, was a guest. The great basso sat at the piano for two hours playing and singing Slavic airs, the longest time on record for him.

The Negri mansion in Beverly Hills was the scene of this affair, at which Pola incidentally displayed the wealth that accrues so easily in this land of great opportunity to progressive actresses. The house is colonial, the appointments French and Spanish, the gardens Japanese. Amid this potpourri of luxury the hungry exiles consumed thousands of cakes and unlimited gallons of tea.

Hollywood.
Dear Majesty:

I have neglected previously to tell you about the annual Wampas Frolic and Ball which was held this year in the ultra-smart atmosphere of the new Shriners' Auditorium.

The new auditorium is much nicer than the Odd Fellows' Hall. And Sid Grauman, a notorious showman, put on a series of acts that were almost worth the five dollars Your Majesty would have had to expend to gain a seat.

Many of the acts presented actual scenes or prolog effects based on feature pictures of the various studios. De Mille's act was a rendition of the "Volga Boatman" by a large chorus; Universal gave "Custer's Last Stand" from "The Flaming Frontier," and so on.

The movie stars were presented in a manner that only Sid Grauman could conceive. The stage represented the court of Grauman's Egyptian Theater. The stars drove on in their private purple limousines, just as they do at an opening.

There were a great many sarcastic snickers among us wisecracs when the thirteen Baby Stars of 1926 were introduced. These infant prodigies, discovered by the astute press-agents who compose the Wampas, turned out to be for the most part already well known in pictures. At least half of them had been billed as stars already by some of the studios where they were working.

To predict that these talented young women will become stars during 1926 is like betting that Cal Coolidge will continue to steer the ship of state, that Wayne B. Wheeler will denounce the demon rum, or that Gilda Gray will perform a dance called the shimmy during the same period of time. The truth is that the press-agents were unable to agree in the annual log-rolling contest that preceded the ball and had to compromise on these candidates already practically elected to stardom.

Next month I shall write Your Majesty more fully concerning the affairs of Hollywood. Meanwhile I remain Your Majesty's humble and obedient secret agent in this curious country—

"Where cowboys are made But actors are few."

HIGH HAT

Now that the surface of the industry really has been scratched, the silk topper is coming to be quite the thing. All the stars are wearing 'em.

Not that the films are becoming Ritzy. They are heading toward the smart, the ultra and all that sort of thing referred to so glibly by our noble opponent, Vanity Fair.

Alas, gone is the good old custard-pie era when mortar was mortar and tomatoes were tomatoes.

Replies to CLASSIC Readers

MILDRED N.—Greetings! Did the March winds blow you in? So you think John Gilbert was wonderful in "The Merry Widow." Most everybody thought so. He was born in Logan, Utah, but so far as I know he has had only one wife, Leatrice Joy, from whom he is divorced.

BOBBIE.—Yes, it was woman who first tempted man to eat, but he took to drink on his own account afterwards. William Haines was Joe Kelly in "Little Annie Rooney."

Pola Negri is playing in "Because I Love You," which Dimitri Buchowetzki is directing. A rather fitting title for Madame Pola.

MARJORIE S.—Bull Montana is now an American citizen but was once an Italian, because he was born in Voghera, Italy, ten days after our Fourth of July, thirty-seven years ago. You refer to Youcca Troubetzkoy.

ME.—Oh, is that you? You know the Venus of Milo derives its name from the island of Milo where it was discovered by a peasant in 1820, who was trying to uproot a pistachio-tree. Mary Brian is eighteen years old. Irene Rich has two children, Jane and Frances, who are now at school in Switzerland.

ALMA.—Well, it is supposed to be a secret, but you know nothing travels so fast as a secret. Right now Richard Barthelmess is making a picture in California. It was Douglas Fairbanks who gave Barbara La Marr her first real part in pictures.

W. M. J.—I should say I do drink buttermilk. I couldn't answer these questions without it. You refer to Ivor Novello opposite Mae Marsh in "The White Rose." Alfred Lunt opposite Carol Dempster in "Sally of the Sawdust."

LEONE C. SCOTT.—I should say I do go out in the fresh air, it is the king of physicians. Sure I go ice skating—that's how I retain my equilibrium. Bert Lytell was Baron Madox in "Eve's Lover," with Clara Bow and Irene Rich. And now Gloria Swanson and Eugene O'Brien as her leading man are playing in "Fine Manners."

SASSY SUSIE.—Never write what you dare not sign. You refer to Gwen Lee as the stenographer in "His Secretary." Yes, I thought Norma Shearer was beautiful in that picture.

E. B. C.—So you always plant a tree on Arbor Day. Governor Morton of Nebraska first created Arbor Day, and the first was April 20, 1872, when twelve million trees were planted. You refer to Templar Powell in "Monsieur Beaucaire."

THE OL' LADY.—Ara! Ara!! Your letter sure was all about villains. You want to know who the fellow with the Persian lamb fez was in "The Phantom of the Opera." Guess you refer to Arthur Edmund Carewe. Come on down to Brooklyn.

LARENA, FORT WORTH.—You want the whole truth about Valentino. Well, he and Winifred Hudnut are divorced. Absolutely, and finally. Norma Talmadge is thirty-one, Constance is twenty-six and Natalie is twenty-eight. So you think I must be terribly nice, and young. Ouch—you know I am over eighty years old.

IRENE'S FAN.—Well, no woman has faith in another, but she insists that man shall have faith in her. Viola Dana is playing in "Wild Oats Lane" now, she was born right here in Brooklyn, and her sisters are Edna Flugrath and Shirley Mason.

RUTH A.—Here, write this in your album—
Absence makes the heart grow fonder,
For a day, perhaps a week,
After that we're prone to wonder,
At our love for the antique.

Hear ye, hear ye! All you folks who have questions to ask, come this way and you shall be heard—and answered. I have learnt a lot during the last eighty-two years, and it's all yours for the asking. Been answering ??? for the last fourteen years, and still going strong. If you want an answer by mail, enclose a stamped addressed envelope. If you wish the answer to appear here, write at the top of your letter the name you want printed, and at the bottom your full name and address, and mail to me. The Answer Man, care of Classic, 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

You refer to Eileen Sedgwick in "The Riddle Rider." You can get a picture of Richard Barthelmess at Inspiration Pictures, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York. So you liked him in "Shore Leave."

D. M. & M. D.—I agree with you, a word to the wise is not sufficient; take a club. That was Jack Joyce in "New Lives for Old." No, I draw the line on the Charleston—you think St. Vitus must have originated it. Pauline Frederick is working on "The Nest" at the Whitman Bennett Studios, in Brooklyn, New York.

AGATHA D. J.—That sure was pretty peach paper you used. So you think THE CLASSIC is a great magazine. So do I—why dont you tell your friends about it. Sure, that's my salary—$15.00 a week.

RUTHIE.—Perhaps I was too frank. In the language of the poet, I see my dooty and I done it. Rod La Rocque is playing in "Bachelor's Brides" from the stage-play and also in "The Dancing Man" from the Edna Ferber novel. See you later.

SIGHNED SHORTIE.—Well, I never really have taken the time to figure out how old Douglas, Sr., was when Douglas, Jr., was born, but for your benefit, Shortie, Douglas, Jr., is about nineteen and Douglas, Sr., is forty-three, so that makes Doug, Sr., twenty-four when he was born. Righto!

BROWN EYES.—Dont be too sure, the well-fed are not always the well-bred. You want to know who receives the higher salary—Norma Talmadge or Gloria Swanson. Well, I'm betting on Norma.

SWEET SIXTEEN.—Well, I dont want for a dull moment, I'll tell you that. Only the scissors-grinder invariably finds things dull. You refer to "The New Commandment" with Ben Lyon. Louise Fazenda made her debut in pictures with the Keystone Company in 1915.

HELEN.—I sure was glad to hear from you. Fire away. So you would like to see Carol Dempster stop the kiddish pictures and appear in something that fits her noble personality. I'll speak to Miss Dempster. D. W. Griffith paid Monte Blue his first screen salary, which was just $1.50 for the day's work. His birthday was January 11th. He has made lots of hits, but his first home run was in the part of Danton in "Orphans of the Storm."

LEO H. G.—Well, there isn't much history to Clara Bow, except that she was born in Brooklyn in 1905 and won a contest that this magazine started, thereby getting into pictures. As I understand it, she is doing very well.

SEE A. WHY.—What do you bet I dont look like the picture at the top of the page? Well, I should say on the first of the month there is no female or anything else more deadly than the mail. Blanche Mehaffey who was formerly in the Follies and with Mack Sennett has signed a long-term contract with Universal. See you later.

CLARA R.—You refer to Colleen Moore in "Broken Chains" and not Lillian Gish.

RONALD B.—Hello there, thanks for yours. Maurice Costello played in "The Fast Pace." Johnnie Walker isn't playing now. Run in again some time.

PEACHES.—So you would like to have me for a pal. I wont object—I like peaches. Antonio Moreno is playing in "The Temptress" directed by Mauritz Stiller.

BILLY S.—The only sweeping reform that has succeeded is the of poverty and squalor was a "Chink."

I expected to meet a great big husky—thinking probably that only a big rough man could have weathered the hard life it had been his fate to live. But Burke is a little man with a delicate, sensitive face and a habit of licking his lips before he speaks, which is usually after hesitating to think a moment. There was something about him that reminded me of Charlie Chaplin.

Burke took me to The Ivy for lunch. It is a sort of Hotel Algonquin of Soho—the Great White Way area of London—where actors, artists and writers congregate and tell each other what they are going to do "some day."

"I never knew an author who didn't spit at the films," said Burke quietly.

"But didn't you like the production Griffith gave your 'Broken Blossoms'?"

"Yes. I think it was extremely good—but extremely overdone as well."

"Were you allowed to pass any judgment on it before it came out?"

He suppressed a smile and hesitated, licking his lips for a moment. "I didn't know it had been sold until it had been produced."

"You didn't receive any exorbitant price then—in five figures?"

Mr. Burke smiled ironically. His silence was eloquent and I would not be surprised to learn that he had received almost literally as well as figuratively—next to nothing. And this for what I consider the finest picturization on the screen! But you see this is ancient history. While they have just paid $100,000—and an additional percentage—for the film rights of "Is Zat So!"

"I like the German pictures best—or the Swedish. In them you will always find skill, background, finesse of story, maturity, mellowness. The American pictures are all the same. Once they were all Indian pictures, then cowboy, then all pictures either featuring Mary Pickford or a thousand like her trying to imitate her. Now they are all of a peculiar brand of jazz life that has no lines of society, breeding, taste or aristocracy to hold them back. Is that what you would call jazz?"

"Yes," I told him, "as possibly applied to the melodies of life."

"I really try to see and enjoy your films—but I cant, really. They sicken me."

"What about Chaplin?"

"Ah, that is different," he replied more quickly than usual. "There is only one Charlie. He is all Art—especially his feet. When Charlie came over the last time, I was one of the first persons he came to see. Strangely, we both worked our way up from the bottom, climbed out of the hell of English lower-class life at about the same time. We came here to The Ivy and had a bottle of wine together just like you and I are doing and had a jolly talk over old times—and new ones."

duction—action, romance, plenty of incident, costume and a rapid dash of plot. One reason for its success as a story of the films was that it is so foreign to common experience—which is all there is to romance in a way, isn't it? People read or see films to gratify one of two desires usually; that the story shall be absolutely different from their own personal story—or just like it! That is the difference between Romanticism and Realism."

When I asked him if he had collaborated in any way, he shook his head.

"They just took the book, you might say without my knowledge—which is all the more to their credit, if they made a go of it. I have heard that the more an author interferes with the production, with his attempted collaboration, the worse he makes the resultant screen picture. Why bother?"

And that phrase, I find, sums up the diffident English character in relation to almost everything American—except the films.

And I wonder sometimes if they could—or would—produce film pictures of a higher, better and finer tone than we are producing. I hope so. But I am of the opinion that they did not consistently do so, when they had their fling at it. And why did their industry collapse before the assault of our bad pictures?

I reminded Mr. Blumenfeld that not a few of the books filmed were from the pens of English authors.

"You may be right, but the ones I see are all turned out in the same mold. What do you suppose the great uncontrollable inland populations of the colored races of India, Japan, China, the Philippines, Africa, must be set to thinking when they see the 'superior' white man reeling about their civilization with dope and drink, intent on crime, being kicked about, handcuffed and imprisoned by inferior policemen. Doesn't tend to lighten the White Man's Burden, do you think? Rather helps to make a menace of the 'rising tide of color' we hear so much about, and not without foundation. In these populous centers of China and the Uganda they have never seen, never conceived of the white man being so easily handcuffed and made prisoner. I tell you, these low-toned films complicate the world problem, which heaven knows, is bad enough already."

I confessed that this was a fresh viewpoint that demanded serious consideration.

"Mind you, I dont say you are not turning out any good pictures, but what makes the British well-wisher mad is that for every good film you put forward you demand that the exhibitor take six duds! Block booking, that's what makes all the trouble. I am working and my paper is working to make block-booking illegal."

I was a little skeptical of the drastic carrying out of this idea as he pictured it.

Whereupon Blumenfeld seized the latest edition of his paper that had been laid on his desk a moment before. "This is what I mean," he said, beginning to run his finger down the list of cinema theaters. "'Too Many Kisses,' 'Too Many Kisses,'" he read over and over again. "Now, unless the exhibitor takes 'Too Many Kisses'"—he smiled at the patness of the title—"he gets one big kick from Hollywood and finally gets nothing. And that's just the sort of film the whole world would be better off without—'Too Many Kisses'—England is sick of that sort of film, but cant help herself—yet."

"I cant spare much time for them—you see, I have my own little shows to carry on." He indicated a long box full of slides he was looking over. "I'm on my way to Brighton now to give a lantern-slide lecture. This little box has been all over America with me—competing with the films." He laughed good-naturedly.

"Did you collaborate at all in the making of 'The Lost World'?"

"Oh, no. Why should I? They know their work amazingly well, it's a great art in itself. They made an amazing thing out of my book, I should say. Dont you think so? Altho I confess, I dont think it will ever add much to my reputation—you know what I mean—it's not the sort of thing I'm really doing, you know."

I thought I knew what he meant and I told him that I did not think that anything could ever add to his reputation after doing "Sherlock Holmes." But Sir Arthur did not know that Holmes had been filmed.

He shook his head uncertainly about it. "What I am looking forward to is the appearance of moving—that is, animated—photographs of the fairy and spirit world. They are bound to come!"

He always came back to his fairies or his spirits. "It's my life-work," he added later in explanation. "But there is no doubt whatever that the films reach a great audience and their power for good—and evil—is enormous. For that reason alone they all ought to be good—I mean well conceived, well done and bring about well being. Come, wouldn't you like to run down and see my Psychic Book Show which I have just opened in conjunction with Sir Oliver Lodge? I'll call a taxi.

Science has produced an invention that reads your hair

The Nestle Meter Scale Tests Your Hair in Advance

The Nestle Laboratory in New York offers a personal service by mail that aids your Nestle Permanent Waver to produce the perfect Permanent Wave.

MR. C. NESTLE, international authority on hair, has solved the problem of permanent waving. Among other famous men, Professor Metchnikoff, of the Pasteur Institute of Paris, declared in 1909 that Mr. Nestle's invention of the permanent wave "is the greatest step forward in hair science ever made for the comfort of women."

The New Nestle Meter Scale— a great advance

Now, Mr. Nestle brings forth an invention of as much importance to the study of human hair as the X-Ray is to the human body.

This is a machine that literally "reads" your hair—that reveals its special characteristics and forever takes the guess out of the permanent wave.

The Nestle Meter Scale removes a great responsibility from the operator. Guided by its readings, the permanent waver knows exactly what kind of hair you really have and exactly how to wave it for perfect results.

These readings give him insight and foresight, discover what the eye cannot see, and so make possible a new system of permanent waving that is adaptable to every head of hair:—

The Nestle Circuline Process for perfect permanent waving

This is a personalized treatment—designed to carry out "to the letter," the readings of the Nestle Meter Scale.

Whether your hair be normal, snow-white, black, bleached or dyed—whether you want a tight, medium or loose wave—any one of the 6,000 Nestle Wavers can produce it.

Know your hair before you have it waved—the reading and recommendation cost you nothing

Just fill out the coupon below—and send a small strand of your hair, at least 5" long and about the thickness of a pencil lead—with $1 deposit to cover cost of testing. Do not send combings!

The Nestle Laboratories will then send you a card giving the result of the analysis of your hair. This $1 Deposit will be deducted from the price of your next permanent wave given anywhere in the United States where the Nestle Circuline Process is used. The Nestle Company guarantees the refund of this deposit. Over 6,000 hair dressers and beauty parlors in the United States use Nestle Permanent Waving apparatus.

HAMLET AND THE FILMS

The Two Mediums

BARRYMORE explained more in detail his theory regarding the differences between the two mediums—stage and screen.

"It is chiefly a difference of dimension, isn't it?" he postulated. "Take a thing such as 'The New Sin.' A genre piece. The characters are all men. You can do that in a play—you can take a morsel of life and hold it up and analyze it before an audience for two hours at a stretch and make it interesting. The most exciting scene I ever saw in a play was one of Bernard Shaw's scenes in which three men sit at a table and talk. On the stage it was more exciting than a Mexican bull-fight.

"In pictures it is very different. You cannot photograph a thesis. You do not have the flesh and blood and the voice to work for you. But the reality is just as great. The picture is purely ocular, isn't it? In a play there are more facets working—more dimensions presented. But in a picture there is greater scope, a broader sweep—more power—a larger canvas. On the stage a certain artificiality may not detract, but in the pictures it is fatal. They are so damned alive!"

Barrymore illustrated his point by referring to scenes from pictures of the past, incidentally paying high compliment to the pictorial acting of Mary Pickford, Lillian Gish and John Gilbert. The scene in "The Big Parade," in which Gilbert as a dough-boy teaches Renée Adorée, the village mademoiselle, to chew gum, was mentioned by Barrymore as one of the best pieces of acting he has ever encountered.

Contrary to a general impression, Barrymore is not at all cynical about his contemporaries. I even fell flat in trying to draw from him a sneer for poor old Robert Mantell. Barrymore said he thought Mantell's soliloquies in "Macbeth" were "great."

And he fairly glowed when he spoke of the cast which tramped with him thru "Don Juan." Mary Astor, who plays opposite as Adriana; Warner Oland as Cesar Borgia; Estelle Taylor as Lucrezia Borgia; Nigel DeBrulier as Marcus Rinaldo—those and all the others were "great."

The Modest Barrymore

It was rather surprising to hear Barrymore talk this way, because there is an opinion abroad that the brother of Ethel and Lionel is inclined to feel his own importance. If he does so, John Barrymore is a greater actor even than I thought him. To all appearances he was as earnest, as honest, as simple in his enthusiasms as if he were a little girl from Medina, Ohio, who had just won a beauty contest and was working in her first picture. I am almost inclined to believe that envy has given rise to rumors about Barrymore being high hat, autocratic, temperamental.

Temperamental—my stars! If any director had asked an average group of extras to get into that slimy, chilly tank, the ensuing outburst of temperament would have reverberated thru all filmdom. Of course, Barrymore's check is larger than an extra's. But by the same token, a star drawing such a check as Barrymore's is not usually expected to do such stunts, while extras are. Jove! I would give an eye to be there when some director asks Mae Murray to take a similar plunge!

"And the comedians!" exclaimed Barrymore, enthusiastically. "I think they are wonderful—Chaplin, Lloyd, Keaton. The Mack Sennett comedies are the greatest thing in drama!"

"I remember a scene from a Sennett picture where a coon is beset by a crowd of

The strenuous movies are quite different from the speaking theater. The studio is a far cry from "Hamlet's" stage door comedy highwaymen. He cries 'God hep me!' And a clock falls down from its tower, squashing the bandits. 'That's what I call service!' exclaims the coon. There's nothing in 'Hamlet' any better than that!

"For this reason I like pictures. They're so real—so fresh—so new. Making 'The Sea Beast' didn't seem like a movie at all. It seemed absolutely real.

No More "Sweet-Scented Jackasses"

"I CONSIDER 'The Sea Beast' and 'Don Juan' the first decent things I have done in pictures since 'Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.' That was the only thing I had ever made before that was any good. I got so tired of these sweet-scented jackasses I had been playing that I wanted to do some character with intestines. They were good enough to let me take the story of 'Moby Dick.'"

I reminded him that other less celebrated actors were less fortunate. Barrymore admitted the existence of purblind producers, unable to see the possibilities of screen characterizations. He said he got a chance to play Jekyll and Hyde by a ruse. He made a strip of film showing two characters—one sinister, one benevolent—and presented it to the head official of Famous Players. This gentleman swallowed the bait, thinking he had made a great discovery—Barrymore for Jekyll and Hyde! And he trotted off to persuade the actor he ought to tackle the dual rôle.

"Pictures are fascinating," resumed Barrymore, "because in pictures we produce things of fantasy such as 'Siegfried' and 'The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari.' This mighty field is just beginning to be explored. The possibilities are limitless.

Years ago, I was asked by a producer what kind of picture I wished to make next and I said, 'I want to do a picture in which I have a fight with a horned toad.' He told me I was crazy. But I am going to make that picture some day—I hope before very long.

And Then Next—

"THERE is already the beginning of a new movement in pictures—evidences of it in such pictures as Fairbanks' 'Thief of Bagdad,' and 'The Lost World.' I hope that my next picture—"

Whatever Barrymore hoped for his next picture must wait, for at this juncture a loud voice called out to inform us that the water was ready for the last shot of "Don Juan."

The man of the movies shed the army blanket he had wrapped around his shoulders and with a grim smile plunged into the slimy depths.

The scene represented an escape from prison—a ghastly chaos of rushing water and struggling arms beneath the cold glare of studio lamps.

Don Juan, confined in a dungeon a Rome, had loosened a stone and burst his bars. But his efforts also had loosed a flood of murky water from the Tiber. Under gaunt, cobwebbed arches swept the foaming cataract, while from the grate cell adjoining, he whose wife the philanderer had filched—the character played by DeBrulier—screamed imprecations at the wounded, struggling swimmer.

I waited long enough to see Barrymore fished out and headed for a warm dressing room with a bath, a rub-down and a month's fishing trip ahead of him. He deserves them all.

THAT POISE

which comes from knowing that your complexion is noticed but your powder is not

By MADAME JEANNETTE

Famous cosmetician, retained by The Pompeian Laboratories as a consultant to give authentic advice regarding the care of the skin and the proper use of beauty preparations.

It is at the "belle" evening affairs that you are under the closest scrutiny. Are you careful to choose the right shade of powder to match your skin exactly?

A SOFT, delicate texture—a lovely satiny face—yet not a sign of powder. What is the secret of her alluring complexion? Does she use powder? She does, but a shade that matches so perfectly the tone of her skin that she secures the good effects of powder without seeming to use it.

All smart women strive for a natural complexion, but all do not achieve it. Not all women have found a powder that really matches their skin—a powder that reveals their natural coloring. These women thank me for telling them about Pompeian Beauty Powder. Complexions are not composed of single colors, but a blend of different colors. So it is only natural that powder to match your complexion must also be a blend.

Pompeian Beauty Powder is scientifically blended from different colors. Whatever the tone of your complexion, some one shade of this powder matches it perfectly.

Choose the correct shade for your complexion from the shade chart. In case of doubt about the shade you require, write a description of your skin, hair and eyes to me for special advice.

SHADE CHART for selecting your shade of Pompeian Beauty Powder

Medium Skin: The average American skin tone is medium, neither decidedly light nor definitely olive. This skin should use the Naturelle shade.

Olive Skin: Women with this type of skin are apt to have dark hair and eyes. This skin should use the Rachel shade to match its rich tones.

Pink Skin: This is the youthful, rose-tinted skin (not the florid skin) and should use Flesh shade.

White Skin: This skin is unusual, but if you have it you should use White powder in the daytime.

Pompeian Beauty Powder is 60c a box. (Slightly higher in Canada.) Satisfaction guaranteed.

Adolphe Menjou

ADOLPHE MENJOU'S especial pride is an oleander hedge (Nerium Oleander).

"I had a nurseryman set out the plants where they would have plenty of sun. I don't allow them too much water. Each spring the soil is enriched and each autumn I carefully prune the hedge.

"I do not recommend the oleander except for climates like ours, since it will 'winter kill.'"

Raymond Hatton

RAY HATTON rejoices in a flowering almond-tree.

"I planted it four years ago, when it was no more than a lonesome shoot, setting it carefully in sheep manure. Since then it has had no attention except yearly pruning and fertilizing."

Anita Stewart

TO ANITA STEWART there is a charm about the "Shasta daisy."

"If you live in California, plant your seed in January, or set out your seedlings in February. For a hedge of daisies, scratch a groove an inch deep in moist, fine soil. Keep the ground soaked until the shoots appear, then thin out the plants to a distance of five inches apart. Be careful to mulch them in hot weather until the root-stem becomes woody close to the ground, or they will be burned and die."

Dorothy Phillips

DOROTHY PHILLIPS: "Calla lilies are a satisfaction because they are easy to raise and so decorative.

"Bulbs should be planted early in the spring. If arranged in a hedge, they bloom best. When the bulbs send out shoots, dig very carefully around the plants; then give them plenty of water and—that's all there is to it!"

Warner Baxter

WARNER BAXTER thinks his Spanish-style house is best set off with Amaryllidacea, a cactus of Mexican origin, better known as the century-plant.

"The beauty of these plants is that you put them in and let them alone for fifty years. They need nothing but sun and water."

H. B. Warner

H. B. WARNER has been in California only long enough to buy a house, but he has already planted some tiny pansy plants.

"I know that all that is necessary to grow pansies, once they are planted in good, rich soil, is to keep them

Warner Baxter devotes his spare time to cultivating a cactus of Mexican origin watered and carefully pick off the blooms. The more you pick them, the more they will bloom."

Mildred Davis Lloyd

MILDRED DAVIS LLOYD: "Poinsettias begin to bloom in November. During the blooming season, supply with plenty of water, and when they have finished the flowering, cut down almost to the ground. Plant these cuttings in rich soil in another part of your garden and they will bear flowers the next year."

Charlie Chase

CHARLIE CHASE: "The silver daisy makes a very decorative flower border. It has a faintly purple-silver bloom and each daisy lasts a long time. I raised mine from seeds, planted in soil that is rather sandy early in February. If you set out plants, be sure you set them well apart, as the daisies spread and you may have to spend with the lovely sweet alyssum."

Ten years from October 26, she will be eighteen and he will be twenty-two, so it is quite possible, you see.

CAROLYN G. H.—So you are going to Scotland, and you want your CLASSIC sent there to you. It shall be done! I didn't know you were right around the corner from me.

GERALD FROM MOVIE-LAND.—Well, the best way to be contented with your lot is to build a house on it. Shirley Mason is not playing now. Sally O'Neil has been loaned to Buster Keaton for the lead in his next picture, "Battling Butler," from the stage-play.

Avoid Gray Hair

as these women do

No need now to grow old before your time—to allow gray, faded or unbecomingly bleached hair to age you. For Brownatone, used so successfully for years by thousands of women throughout the United States and Canada, brightens and beautifies—tints any shade. Mrs. A. B. Jordan of Woodland, W. Va., who has used Brownatone satisfactorily for several years, remarks that "No gray haired woman can afford to let such a golden opportunity go by as Brownatone offers. I recommend it to any one."

The antiseptic qualities of Brownatone are assurance of its perfect safety. So there's no need to fear results. Brownatone is guaranteed to be absolutely harmless to hair growth or skin. Mrs. Marie James of 339 Nixon Street, Biloxi, Miss., even remarks that "When I started using Brownatone, six years ago, my hair was thin and short. But now it is beautifully long and heavy. I like my hair a chestnut brown, and have had no difficulty in getting it the right shade, since using Brownatone. I must say it is a wonderful tint for gray and faded hair."

As Brownatone permeates each entire hair itself, it cannot rub off or wash out. There's no interference whatsoever with shampooing—or even with permanent waving, marcelling or scalp treatments. For the color is lasting. You need apply it again only as the hair grows. And it is so simple to use that you can apply it yourself at home. Merely brush the color through. Which is, of course, one reason why Dora Paserk of 811 St. Catherine Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, says, "I prefer Brownatone to any other hair tint I have ever used."

There are two colors in Brownatone from which any shade may be obtained—one from Blonde to Medium Brown; the other Dark Brown to Black. Sold at drug and toilet counters everywhere, 50 cents and $1.50. Use Brownatone and you will say as does Mrs. R. H. Staebli, 836 North Lafayette Park Place, Los Angeles, Cal., "It is the best hair tint I ever used."

King, von Stroheim, Vidor, Ingram, I am nevertheless worried about their attitude. Lubitsch I regard frankly as a dangerous influence, much as I admire his sophistication and his wizardry. Stroheim is a tortured, unhappy spirit, who plainly never does what he is after, but has a boundless genius for cinema composition; he has been developing downward from the dynamic "Greed" to the virtually static "Merry Widow." Vidor in part of the "Big Parade" creates something of sheer perfection. Henry King's "Stella Dallas" was undoubtedly the outstanding achievement, the master stroke, a picture which, like "The Last Laugh," seemed to have absolutely everything the motion picture could give us.

WHAT I fear much is the influence of the Lubitsch of "Lady Windermere's Fan." Mind you, he is amazingly clever and sure of himself. But to me he seems to depart steadily from the true character of the motion picture. People sit in a salon, or in a hotel room, weeping their closet dramas sardonically over each other's shoulders, and one of them, behind the other's back, grimaces, mocks. On these subtle gestures of people in a London drawing-room he centers the spotlight of your attention. The beauty of these stunts is not of motion, or of dynamic forms, it is "literary" and stationary. The movies become a vehicle for his particular brand of skepticism. But I can't bear watching merely skepticism spread over a large screen. I must see things, people, in related motion. Here they stay in a room, the tempo is slow, and everything is reduced to little smiles and grimaces, or hand waves that move back and forth to each other. . . . I would rather read Lubitsch.

I do not question the all-important business of the director (conductor of the whole symphony) to select, to arrange the order of things, to relate the movements, to compose his "shots" in order to gain the utmost effect or atmosphere.

"I prefer to suggest ideas and situations in my pictures," says Lubitsch, "rather than to load them down with nothing but the starkly realistic."

And Rex Ingram says likewise:

"The most convincing atmosphere is often far from realistic. Because the director aims to get over the effect of the atmosphere he desires, rather than the actual atmosphere which exists in such scenes . . . which, reduced literally to the screen, would be quite unconvincing."

Yes, this is all very sensible and very clever, when it does not go too far. But you must not get away from the camera; you must give it space to roam and work in, room to breathe. Otherwise, you lose (1) the particular revealing super-realism that the motion picture has, and (2) the significance and beauty of objects in related motion which is the very soul of the cinema.

It is fashionable to be subtle and "arty" just now. To be suggestive. In "The Merry Widow," von Stroheim blurred the film every time Mae Murray wept. I was like the false impressionism of painter some years ago. Why should we look at colors or faces thru a fog, if we were near sighted. In the same film there were marvelous shots of John Gilbert's head, isolate in a close-up, as he reacted to some shock. Here the firm, clear tones of the picture made it seem like a great piece of sculpture. The effect of the unabused camera was infinitely stronger than the fake impressionism they go for when they try to color a touch up a picture, or when there is sunset, or moonlight over water. And just as bad as the gushingly sentimental fade-outs of the end are the places where the sets have too definitely the air of being fresh from the scene factory. I know,

The lines and coarse pores, worse than birthdays, to betray a woman's age.

Now—This fine "hard-milled" soap keeps your skin smooth ··fragrant ··youthful

Look closely at an exquisite complexion. Notice its clean, fine texture. Pores are practically invisible.

The Safest Beauty Treatment

Cleanliness is the surest way to enviable skin. But cleanliness is not mere application of soap and water. Care in the soap you use is most important. Choose Cashmere Bouquet as the soap for your face and hands. It is "hard-milled," which means the cake is hard and firm—not the least bit squdgy. With Cashmere Bouquet only enough soap penetrates the pores to cleanse them. Thus no soap stays in the pores. It all dissolves bringing dust and dirt out with it, leaving the pores clean and unstified.

Expert dermatologists, physicians who know all about skin, say water and the right soap should be used every day to keep skin smooth and youthful.

Cashmere Bouquet is the right soap. Its fragrant lather is so gentle, so cleansing, that it fairly caresses your skin and leaves it soft and lovely.

Careful special processes make Cashmere Bouquet safe for your daily use. This "hard-milled" cake is pressed into almost marble firmness. Secret essences are added to give that indescribable fragrance.

Try this Treatment—Watch Results

Wet the face with warm water. Work up a thick Cashmere Bouquet lather. Massage this into the skin with the fingertips until the skin feels refreshed and alive.

Rinse in warm water. Then a dash of cold. Pat the face dry with a soft towel. If the skin is inclined to be dry, rub in a little Colgate's Charmis Cold Cream.

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which is really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

actors running around loose, going to and from restaurants and soda fountains with their make-up on. Elsewhere the city is just like any other.

HARRY CARR is very popular here with everybody and much beloved. He is now doing a little work for Lasky, but Brewster Publications still have a lien on him and hope soon to haul in on the chain.

I SAW "Don Q" in New York last spring, and in London last August, but it just arrived in Hollywood late in January. "Ben-Hur" and "Lady Windermere's Fan" are not here yet. Yet they were all made here.

FOX is fixing up their lot. It now looks like a rubbish heap—part of it—but they're going to make all the other studios take a back seat. The outside of Lasky's looks like a lot of old sheds and barns nailed together. They are going to move out soon and take over First National, and First National is going elsewhere.

IN every studio now they have at least two cameras on every scene, and they take every scene twice, which makes four negatives of every scene. You folks see only the best of the four.

JACK HOLT has the prettiest cigar-lighter in Hollywood. He works it with one hand, which he can't do with a match. He was smoking a cigaret and I said, "For shame—you should smoke a pipe." He admitted it, adding that he does so at home, but at the studio a pipe is awkward and is likely to be mislaid.

WHEN I first saw Esther Ralston on a First National set, I said, "Hello, I haven't see you since 1913 at the old Kalem studio when I was photographed with you and Alice Joyce and the Answer Man." She looked puzzled and said "Y-e-s." Then I discovered that I was not speaking to Anna Q. Nilsson, and we all laughed, including Anna Q., when I told her a moment later. They do look something alike, now don't they? Only I guess Esther doesn't date back quite so far.

SINCE I have been in Hollywood I have kept my lamps trimmed and burning, and I think that Tom Mix is the finest specimen of He-manhood I have yet discovered. He looks good to me, and he talks even better than he looks. He is a mature man of well-thought-out ideas.

OF course, anybody would recognize the six feet three of Ernest Torrence a mile off. When I got within hailing distance, I said, "Come hitherward, little one, I wouldst make speech with thee." He came hitherward with knitted brows and piercing eyes and pierced me. "Ah, 'tis thee," he answered and then we shook hands. Mine is sore yet.

ONE who has traveled thru France and Belgium observes at once when traveling thru America the striking difference in the houses of the poorer classes. Abroad the poorest and humblest are picturesquely beautiful; in America they are monstrosities of ugliness—until you get near Los Angeles. There are very few ugly houses around here, and I guess those were built by Easterners.

"PARDON my persistency of vision—" I said gravely to Constance Talmadge when I found myself in the same elevator with her at the Great Western Costume Company. "To what fortunate circumstance do I owe the honor of this impertinence?" she replied haughtily. Then we both laughed heartily and shook hands. You see we were old friends—at least of nine years' standing.

WHEN I was introduced to Ricardo Cortez, he greeted me with all the gallantry of a cavalier and knight errant but quite naturally. He looked quite as handsome and polished as ever Valentino did and he has those dreamy eyes with the whites showing under them that always makes feminine hearts flutter. I think this man will perhaps be counted among the screen idols of the near future.

"IN thy arms let me taste the delights of paradise," I greeted Alec Francis on the Lasky lot, and then we embraced like two Frenchmen. I had not seen him for twelve long years, and he looks younger now than then.

IF I were asked to name the most popular player in Hollywood, I would hesitate between Florence Vidor and Marion Davies. Neither is at all up-stage, and both are charming.

IF you think you have a few automobiles in your town, wait till you see Hollywood and these parts. Everybody has one—even the cook. Cars are as important here as shoes—more so.

EVERY day a Santa Fé train leaves Chicago for California, and each train has four long sections full. Returning, two sections are usually empty. Soon everybody will be in California and Florida. There are real-estate offices on nearly every business block, and some have men out in front laying for you.

ASSISTANT directors are more important here than directors. At least, they think they are.

THERE are 2,479,781 directors here (approx.). Nearly everybody has directed or thinks he can direct, and wants to try. Multiply this by five and you have the exact number of those who can act or think they can act and want to try. If you thought of coming, too—well, don't and remained behind to till his fields when his wife and daughter went to Hollywood, expecting them home soon. But instead they sent for him!

When Norma Shearer was a girl in Montreal, her father was master of the hunt. A picture of him in his hunting regalia hangs over her Hollywood dressing-table, but Norma hasn't seen her father for three years. His business keeps him in Montreal and Mrs. Shearer travels across the continent twice a year to be with him a few days—so the movies are responsible for the breaking up of one happy home.

Fathers in All Walks of Life

FROM all walks of life the players have come; from the New England factory town where Neil Hamilton's father worked as a metal polisher ("But I took Dad out of the shops last year," says Neil happily); from Pennsylvania coal-fields, where the elder O'Malley toiled and Pat himself was a breaker boy; from the Chicago apartment house where Mary Philbin's father in his street-railway uniform brought the newspaper announcing that his little girl had won a beauty contest. Mr. Reynolds, Vera's father, is a Los Angeles politician. Howard Davis, father of Mildred, is a newspaper man. Marion Davies' dad is a justice in New York City.

In the war George Arthur's father had to salute his own son. He is a contractor, formerly of London, now of Hollywood. At first the Arthurs did not like the blaze of California sunshine after London fog and returned home. Ten days later they cabled that they were sailing for America.

Sometimes a screen star does not add luster to the paternal name, when that name is not considered dressy enough for electric lights. J. Cronk found his surname no hindrance in the banking business, but his laughter changed her name to Claire Windsor.

One evening last year Hollywood observed Mae Busch dining at the Coconut Grove with a handsome, grey-haired man who seemed very devoted. The next morning's paper announced her engagement—to an "Australian millionaire." It was a week before the mischievous Mae revealed the fact that it was her own father. For many years Mr. Busch had lost trace of his daughter. Mae had left Australia with a traveling road show. Then one day he read an interview with her in a fan magazine, and that very night took a boat for Los Angeles.

A favorite movie plot in the early days of the movies was that in which a locket identified a long-lost child. Life has quite as impossible plots, as Jack Gilbert discovered last spring, when a perfect stranger came to his dressing-room and holding out his arms in the fashion beloved of melodrama greeted him with, "My boy! My boy!" Papers he carried proved unmistakably that he was Jack's real father, whom his mother had divorced when he was a baby, and of whom he had never been told!

In the eyes of the fathers of the stars, as they gaze at their famous children, is pride—and something else, bewilderment. Are they thinking, perhaps, of the days when these glorious beings were not screen stars, but little boys with grubby hands, and little girls with missing front teeth, to be taken care of and scolded and loved—and spanked?

Every woman—no matter what her age—by observing the laws of nature in the care of her skin can prevent fading color, blotches, and other blemishes, and keep ever fresh the charm of youth to which she is entitled.

New York.

Dear King:

Your Majesty must begin giving a thought to your wardrobe at once. I have just seen Rudolph Valentino upon his return from Europe and I realize that your regal raiment is sadly out of date.

Valentino came back with a dozen or so fur-lined bathrobes. Scores of pleated trousers. (A lot of Italian relatives, too.) He still wears his slave bracelet. On the other wrist a watch held in place with a second slave bracelet. A couple of platinum chains across his decorative waistcoat complete the ultra touch.

With his new divorce, Rudy was decidedly happy. There's just one cloud upon his horizon. His pictures have been barred in Italy because of his recent plan to become a naturalized American. Suppose this international problem should ultimately lead to war, Your Majesty! Just suppose. Imagine your subjects rushing into enlistment camps with the cry "Make the world safe for Valentino!"

New York.

Your Majesty.

Reports have filtered all the way to Manhattan anent one Greta Garbo, a luxurious appearing Scandinavian actress who is yet to make her debut on your majesty's screen. When the Metro-Goldwyn powers looked over Ibañez's "Torrent," in which Miss Garbo makes her American debut, their eyes glistened. "Here," they chuckled, "is the sensation of the next film year." "Torrent," I am reliably informed, is but an indifferent production of Monte Bell but Miss Garbo flashes like a bolt of lightning from the silver screen. So plans for the immediate making of Miss Garbo's next picture, "The Temptress," also an Ibañez effort, have been held up temporarily while the aforementioned powers consider how best they can embellish Miss Garbo's vibrant dramatic qualities.

Hollywood.

Dear King:

By this time Your Majesty will know definitely whether or not your subjects have taken a fancy to "La Bohème," in which Lillian Gish makes her first celluloid appearance since that turgid effort, "Romola." Doubtless Your Majesty has heard of the tribulations encountered in meeting Miss Gish's insistence upon lengthy rehearsals before each scene. Miss Gish was developed in the Griffith school, which calls for weeks and weeks of rehearsal before anyone unpacks a camera. Director King Vidor, on the other hand, likes to shoot spontaneous stuff.

Miss Gish had her way and "La Bohème" was made as she wished it. Now reports are leaking out of Metro-Goldwyn that Victor Seastrom is having his difficulties with Miss Gish in "The Scarlet Letter."

Still Miss Gish, who starts for Art with a capital A, always has her way.

The Answer Man

per for. Leatrice Joy's first under her contract with Cecil De Mille was "Hell's Highroad," in which Edmund Burns played opposite her.

MISS RUTH.—Yes, it is true that Vitagraph sold out to the Warner Company. Thus disappeared from the movie landscape a landmark of antiquity.

JERE DE L.—Corinne Griffith was born November 24, 1897. Wallace Beery in "Devil's Cargo."

GILL, MEXICO.—Listen here, you must not include your questions in letters intended for other departments. When you do, I have to put on roller skates and skip all over the map. May McAvoy is twenty-four, single, and address her at First National. Yes, Barbara Bedford is married to Albert Roscoe. See you again.

NELLIE E. O.—Your letter was a gem, and I'm sure I understand. Anyway, some of us have to suffer more than others. I will be glad to hear from you any time.

KATHARINE L. P.—Yes, there is a Kathryn Perry who is married to Owen Moore. Marshall Neilan left Metro-Goldwyn to start his own producing company. His first picture was "Skyrocket," with Peggy Hopkins Joyce and Owen Moore, which had its première on the U. S. S. Leviathan. I have never computed the number of times Peggy Joyce has been married.

A MOVIE GIRL.—Johnny Walker has black hair and brown eyes. Percy Marmont played the lead in "The Shining Adventure," directed by Hugo Ballin.

BETTY.—David Powell's last picture before his death was "Back to Life," in which Patsy Ruth Miller also appears. Mr. Powell died of pneumonia April 16, 1925, and left a wife, living in this country, and a child, now attending school in England.

THISTLEDOWN.—Wrong! My nose is not red. But in winter it is like one of Oppenheim's novels—read to the very end. Holmes Herbert was born in Dublin, Ireland, in 1882. He is six feet tall.

M. T.—Warner Brothers have been busy developing the new "sheik," Don Alvarado, and he has been signed under a long-term contract with them. He is twenty-two; a Spaniard, five feet eleven, weighs 160 pounds, and has black hair and eyes, of course. Did you ever see a blond sheik? Richard Barthelmess in "Just Suppose." No, I pass.

MILDRED C.—Most of the players you mentioned are with Famous Players.

ROY S. O.—A new camera was used for the first time in this country for Bebe Daniels' picture, "The Manicure Girl." It is called the gyroscope, and by using this camera the cameraman can follow the player from room to room and thus get the effect of continuous action. It was first used on the German picture, "The Last Laugh." Tom Mix is forty-six. Hoo Gibson is married to Helen Johnson, and Marion Nixon is with Universal. I'll see you in my dreams. Good night!

FRENCHIE.—Thank you for the drawing. It looked just like Pola Negri. She would be flattered at seeing it, I'm sure. Ramon Navarro is twenty-seven. No, I never argue. I find that those who argue most are those who know least.

THE OL' LADY.—Hello there, you here again? So you received a picture from John Gilbert. And you have ridden in our Times Square shuttle and know what it is—yes, just like the subway scene in "Manhandled."

ROSE D.—That was a great letter, Rose. You must write me again, but you must ask some questions.

course, that it is generally better to produce even exteriors under the perfectly controlled light of the studio, and that some of the most triumphantly realistic scenes have been worked out indoors. But what I applaud is the realistic spirit with which von Stroheim, in "Greed," reproduces a dentist's office. Because here he seems to realize how varied, fantastic and lovely all the "business" of such a room can become when translated to the black and white of the screen.

But when the director orders a certain kind of bedroom, shaped like a gondola, let us say, a bit of fantastic Orientalism, whose formal beauty is created not by the camera, but by the art-director, then I protest, and become unhappy.

THE more high-handed the director becomes, the more he tampers with the camera, and so much the more stogy dives, cafés and boudoirs do you get. You get more and more uncomfortable-looking actors and more blots and blurs and glazings on the film. It all seems inevitably cheap and offensive, and really harks back to the trick film that so completely went out of fashion. The "expressionistic" of "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" was really this same stuff on a much higher plane. Now "Caligari" was actually a series of tableaux invented in the hot-house imagination of the art-director. Everything was distorted and twisted, in accordance with the demands of some other art—except the more or less life-like players, who really should have worn masks. It was a bizarre and fascinating experiment, but led us in the wrong direction entirely. For, once you begin suggesting and touching up, once you stop photographing people in natural settings and place them in a distorted cheese-cloth paradise (whether distorted by sentimentalism or "expressionistic" fantasy, it does not matter) you may as well go on scene-painting everything in your photoplay. And the further you go in this direction the further you get away from the important and particular qualities of the motion picture.

THE camera is a greater artist than any property-man! He may try a daring stunt in the way he handles the perspective of a building or a wall or a window. But the camera with its super-human powers beats him; it is far more daring in what it discovers. For it is an instrument which, left to itself, seems to have a soul of its own.

In "The Last Laugh," direct clear camera shots of a revolving hotel door made a more beautifully fantastic picture or symbol than any painted contraption in "Caligari."

I have heard of times when the camera turned up with effects that the director scarcely counted on or hoped for. James Cruze and his colleagues, in making "The Covered Wagon," became a little afraid lest the endless trains crawling over the desert might draw the picture out too monotonously. But in the act of cutting and editing it, they realized suddenly that it was the long line of wagons winding slowly and rhythmically that carried the whole picture and even became the hero of it.

REALISM. Realism. More Realism. The movie camera when used in connection with real or natural forms is always capable of giving us something better and more imaginative than when taking formal scenes which have been deprived of their "natural" character thru the interference of the scene-painter. Scene-painters, when they are merely that, should go back to the theater, and let the camera do its own work. Directors in their composition of interior as well as exterior scenes should cling to natural forms as much as possible. They should especially try to get away from the bad tendency of dressing up rich people's homes in the most elaborate and horrible bad taste.

IN von Stroheim's "Merry Widow" there were exquisite cinema compositions. But in their weaker moments they had two defects: at times they seemed completely artificial and stuffy; at other times they would seem to stop, like motionless tableaux.

The early portions of "The Big Parade" had an amazingly natural quality. Life in the French village behind the lines was as if in a strange new home; one placidly lovely picture moved into the other. And when the big kick of the story came, it came thru the energy, the motion. There was a scene where Mélanide rushes upstream, against the mad torrent of motor transports, looking for her doughboy. In constant motion, her frail human anxiety is centered always against a background of madly rushing force—"The Big Parade!" I doubt whether anything better has ever been done with the movie camera.

One remembers also for such beauty the scene in "Stella Dallas," where Stella goes into the comfort station: the square window to the right, the hard bench, upon which she sits weeping so miserably that the mascara dribbles down her face, and the hard young woman beside her smoking a cigarette. Supremely imaginative treatment of real detail.

"STELLA DALLAS" is perhaps the ideal picture so far. It has the barest thread of a story, and resembles the "Last Laugh" in being essentially the portrait of a character. In the progression of the film there was an illusion of reality which only fragments of other pictures attain. Nothing seemed artificially "composed"; the director never thrusts his ideas at you. He seems so restrained that you have the illusion of watching, unobserved, from a window, a life. The vulgar, weak, sympathetic soul of Stella is revealed by a hundred little gestures and objects: the cheap, bric-à-brac of her flat, the shiny glassware, the posies and favors that her addle-pated mind loves, assume the greatest meaning and arrange themselves into the most intricate and beautiful patterns. Her predicament is tremendously real and becomes steadily more and more intense as the film clings steadfastly to the single, poignant idea of Stella Dallas, until she becomes one of the most tragic figures that any part has ever presented. I saw no sentimentalism here; I felt only that the director had helped the camera to find its soul in its realistic searching of depths such as we only suspect and pass by every day in our own lives.

No "off-color" teeth
—no toneless gums
when that dingy film is removed

Accept this remarkable dental test.
You'll gain the dazzling white teeth and coral-like gums that make smiles attractive and inviting.

MODERN dental science has made important, recent discoveries in lightening cloudy teeth.

Run your tongue across your teeth, and you will feel a film, a viscous coat that covers them.

That film is an enemy to your teeth—and your gums. You must remove it. It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It absorbs discolorations, gives teeth a cloudy, "off-color" look.

Germs by the millions breed in it and lay your teeth open to decay. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and gum disorders.

Tooth troubles and gum troubles now are largely traced to that film.

New methods remove it,
And Firm the Gums

Now, in a new-type dentifrice called Pepsodent, dental science has discovered effective combatants. Their action is to curdle the film and remove it, then to firm the gums.

No Book Learnin'

at the bottom at seven-fifty a day (when I could get it) and if I worked, studied, watched and learned all about every department of the studio.

"Mr. De Mille is the most wonderful man in the world! I'm all alone. I haven't anyone belonging to me and no one to work for. He is the reason I didn't go under in those seven years, because I wanted to show him I could top anything he had said I might do if I stuck.

"I use psychology on myself. I talk to myself and make myself follow what I decide is best. I knew that I very likely wouldn't stick to such a disheartening business if I had money back of me. I was only twenty-one and I had twenty-five hundred dollars.

"You've got to get rid of that money," I told myself. So I stayed at the Alexandria for five weeks and spent the money right and left, only keeping the wardrobe which I needed for pictures. Then I went as extra for weeks, sometimes one day a week, sometimes three, sometimes not at all.

"The first day on the lot I was absolutely bewildered. There's never been such a green extra! Didn't know anything about make-up and I looked so funny after I got it on that I was afraid to go out.

"After three months of this, I was down to twenty cents and knew something had to be done. I met Goodstadt, the casting director, and asked him if he wouldn't let me go up north with the men who were to make 'The Sea Wolf.'

"Bill, we want men on this picture!" he said.

"I'm a man!" I told him.

"But these are tough birds."

"I can raise a beard in a week. I can look so tough you wouldn't know me! Just let me go!"

His First Contract

"HE looked at me a minute and said: 'Come into the office!' And there he gave me a contract beginning at thirty dollars a week! I was so happy—I thought I was sitting on the world. I walked all the way from the Lasky Studios to Los Angeles, stopping every five blocks to take out the little pink paper that had 'contract' written on it. You see, De Mille had said I might be a jobless extra for years and this was only three months!

"Every time I had a chance I talked to Mr. De Mille. Half the time I didn't know what the devil he was talking about, but I thought about it and wondered and finally some of it began to seep in. After two or three years I realized what he meant by timing, spacing, and other cryptic remarks. For instance, he might say: 'This will be a six-foot fade-in.' I had to know when six feet had been ground and start the action then.

"Skip over the center—we're going to put a title in these.' I must know how long to hold it for the title and when to go on."

But after the first few years, the Fates who sit up yonder spinning destinies began to get the thread of Bill's life snarled and knotted. Everything went wrong.

Then—Hard Luck

ONE day, after a period of hard luck, Fox gave Bill a contract for two pictures. The wolf was so uncomfortably near the door that Bill looked on the slip of paper as a gun to keep the animal away. . . . That night—of all nights!—there was an automobile accident and "William Boyd—broken leg" was entered in reporters' notebooks. . . . The contract was as useless as an unloaded gun!

For nine months the leg refused to mend.

"The first three months I felt sorry for myself," said Bill, "I thought I was getting a raw deal and it wasn't fair and so on. Then one day, as I sat with my leg propped up, I said to myself: 'See here, this isn't getting you anywhere. I know you haven't had anything to eat for two days, but you've gone without eating longer than that before this, and it didn't kill you. You came up then, and you can come up now!'

"I think that experience helped me develop my spirit. Anyway, a man must have ideals and ambition and never let go if he's going to get to the place he's headed for!"

It's Bill's ability to get something from every experience, his willingness to learn even from the most unintelligent fan letter that has brought him from the rolling mill of fifteen years ago to screen prominence.

"Oh, but there is no part that isn't worth playing!" he cried. "Somebody had to think in order to write the part, no matter how small it is, and if it was worth creating in print, it's surely worth creating on the screen. Perhaps you can develop it so that it stands out. My part in 'The Road to Yesterday' was developed. It wasn't much to begin with.

"Sincerity is the whole thing. If you are sincere and know what you want to do, go to it and let 'em stop you if they can!"

They cant stop Bill.

KIMPEI SHEBA, of the Japan Times, of TOKIO has written a remarkable article

THE MOTION PICTURE IN JAPAN

for the May CLASSIC—it is illustrated with some striking pictures of Japanese film favorites

Of these, "The Vanishing American" came nearest to being a masterpiece, yet it contained several glaring defects that take it out of the one hundred per cent. class. "The Merry Widow," "He Who Gets Slapped" and "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" could hardly be improved on, for their kind, and yet they fall short of the one hundred per cent. rating. "Kiss Me Again" comes in the same class with "Lady Windermere's Fan," both almost perfect in their way, but the latter had more of the one hundred per cent. elements, so that the former cannot be rated quite at one hundred per cent. As for "The Sea Hawk," "Ben-Hur" contains all the fine points that "The Sea Hawk" contained plus many more, hence it is not in the one hundred per cent. class. There are possibly several dozen more great pictures that I have overlooked, but these will suffice. That leaves us the following, which I nominate as the great masterpieces of the screen:

Ben-Hur
The Wanderer
The Ten Commandments
Stella Dallas
The Big Parade
Lady Windermere's Fan

The Six Great Films

Of these, according to my lights, "Ben-Hur" is the greatest. Far greater than "The Wanderer," which falls in the same class, much better than "The Ten Commandments," also of the same class; it seems to contain all the qualities and elements of a one hundred per cent. picture, and, therefore, I award it first honors. I cannot conceive of a more masterful production. Next to it I place "Stella Dallas," altho it lacks many of the qualities of a one hundred per cent. picture. And yet it is certainly the greatest emotional drama ever produced and a greater picture of its kind is beyond my wildest hopes and dreams. "The Big Parade" is a war picture and stands in a class by itself unapproached. One can hardly compare "The Big Parade" with "Stella Dallas," they being so different in scope and theme, and they both come very close to the one hundred per cent. mark because the great qualities they do possess are far beyond one hundred per cent.—if that is possible. According to our chart, "Lady Windermere's Fan" falls considerably below the two last mentioned, but yet it is so wonderful of its kind that it must be rated as a masterpiece.

When you have seen "Ben-Hur," I am asking you kindly to look again at the chart in the first part of this article and check up. If any reader can name any other picture that contains anywhere near the number of qualities that "Ben-Hur" contains, I will be very, very much surprised. You may prefer "Stella Dallas," or even "The Big Parade" if you have not seen enough of the horrors of war, but I think you will have to agree with me that "Ben-Hur," all things considered, is the great masterpiece of the screen.

The Candid Kid

My first cast elicited the information that Laura was in pictures for the do-re-mi as well as for art's sake, and that is not her boy friend's name either. Since she is a blonde, this was entirely unexpected, as only brunettes are supposed to carve the gold out of one's teeth or tooth, as the case may be.

Not for Art Alone

THE next throw produced the return that she is entirely satisfied with doing pleasant parts with Reginald Denny and not parts unknown and attempted by aspirants with a burning ambition and adenoids.

As a matter of fact, Laura does not think that she can put the Great Elcanora Bernhardt on the bum. She deposes that since she seems to be fated to be an actress until death or matrimony doth intervene, that she may as well try to be a fair to middling performer and a good trouper.

Next she proved to be a genuine girl by almost lapsing into an emotional coma at the mere mention of the name of Ronald Colman. She said she got the best weep of her life from "The Dark Angel."

A Film Fan Herself

THEN she proved that she was different by not becoming delirious at being questioned anent her views of that bold, bad boulevardier, Lew Cody. In fact, she even defied him by saying that she was going to move out into his Beverly Hills neighborhood where all the husbands wear the marksmanship medals they won in the war all over their vests.

Laura was full of candor. She said she felt sorry for Lew. She might even be called the candid kid even tho being sorry, for Lew has been known to be serious if not fatal.

Of this she was informed, so the responsibility is her own.

The conversation progressed thru police dogs to the carelessness of latter-day vestals, cigaret smoking and psycho-analysis, even to nearing the last hope of all interviewers, the Volstead law. Then the b. i. returned and started to wind his watch.

Laura got her start in pictures with her candor. After taking a flicker at the flickers as an extra, Laura braced Al Christie for a job in stock as an ingénue. She got the job.

Laura's Career

SINCE then her rise has been rapid. She is now one of the best bets out at Uncle Carl Laemmle's Universal joint. But she has not even dropped back into second.

You will note that I have not attempted to describe her. Who has been able to dissect a dimple with a typewriter or catch the lilt of a liquid laugh. You are able to look at the pictures. If you are not satisfied with Laura's looks, you are a sap.

If you would read and believe a lot of applesauce that I might write about her rise to success, you would be a still greater apsay.

It has never been a question of Laura's getting into the movies. They could not keep her out.

The Candid Kid's got what it takes.

The Master Mind of the Movies Speaks

"You are great, Master," I breathed. "In motion pictures," he replied modestly, "I am Everything. All that has been, that is I. All that is being, that is I. My thoughts, my plans, my direction, from the sun-kissed slopes of California, to to to . . ."

"The rock-bound coasts of Maine," I completed, glad to be of any assistance.

The Alpha and Omega

"EXACTLY," he said. "That also is mine. I am the Alpha and Omega. If anything is so, it is because I have said it must be so. If there are cabaret scenes, swimming pools, orgies, romping flappers and faces that appear in the heart of a rose, it is because I wish to have cabaret scenes, swimming pools, orgies, romping flappers and faces that appear in the heart of a rose."

"And that lets out a lot of people," I said.

"People!" he puffed, "what people? Lubitsch, Griffith, De Mille, Ingram, Neilan, Robertson, Brenon, Fox, Goldwyn, Lasky—pawns, tools, puppets of my genius; my raw materials, my clay, my canvas, my tubes of color, the keys of my piano. I direct, I undertake, I dispose. I tell them what to do, and they do it!"

"Indeed they do, Master," I agreed, politely.

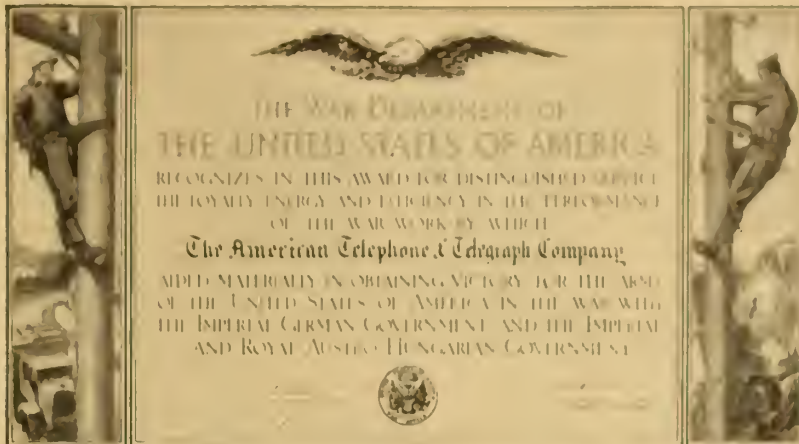

"And now," he said, with a vague gesture of finality, "you know what you know. Which is not much. And you may tell the World. Which is also not much."

"Thank you, Master," I said. "Shall I go back the same way I came?"

"You have seen ME!" he replied. "You cannot possibly go back the same way that you came."

The Master is right. I am a changed man. Now, whenever I look upon a super-special extra gold star fifty-two jewel feature picture, I lose my appetite and black spots appear before my eyes.

And sometimes I have to carry a heavy cane.

Telephone Preparedness

NINE years ago, when this nation was preparing for war, it found the Bell Telephone System ready for service at home and abroad. The war found the Bell System prepared. From its technical forces so needful to meet our war-time activities in this country, fourteen battalions were organized to carry to the front the highest developments of the telephone art. No other nation had so complete a system of communication to aid in mobilizing its resources. No other nation was able to put into the field a military communication, system of equal effectiveness.

Fifty years ago Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, gave to the world a new art. He had the vision of a nation-wide telephone system by which people near at hand and far apart could talk to one another as if face to face. He foresaw a usefulness for the telephone which could not be achieved without innumerable developments, inventions and improvements, to him unknown. But not even he foresaw the marvelous applications of telephony which gave to the American armies that fighting efficiency which is possible only when there is instant exchange of complete information.

Since the completion of its service in time of war, the Bell System has devoted itself to the extension of the telephone art as one of the great agencies for the development of the pursuits of peace.

Romeo and Juliet? Why, Mary and Doug, of course. Mary's loveliness combined with her years of acting experience make her an ideal choice for Juliet. And Doug! Why, he is the only actor I know of who could put the necessary verve and dash into the rôle of Romeo. I'd give up a whole year of picture-going, if, by doing so, I could see these two favorites make "Romeo and Juliet," a real classic of the screen.

Sincerely,
MISS TONA SWAN,
2496 Fulton St.,
San Francisco.

Honorable Mention

John Barrymore and Mary Pickford as Romeo and Juliet would be an achievement for the screen.

Barrymore, the polished artiste, giving us love, grace, physical charm, and intense passion.

Mary, with her ethereal beauty, sincerity, and natural ability of emotional expression.

"Romeo and Juliet" calls for sweet romance, intense love, blended with fire and passion.

Barrymore and Pickford can give us all these.

VIRGINIA KELLER,
112 Ea. 40,
Tacoma, Washington.

Honorable Mention

It is a trite but nevertheless true statement that Lillian Gish and Ramon Novarro possess the complete lyrical beauty of an ageless classic. They alone, among us of the earthly earth, seem to have caught the perfection of eternal youth. To them love would be the unquenchable fire of Zoroaster.

JESSIE LIVINGSTON BUTLER,
1523 East Boulevard,
Cleveland, Ohio.

Honorable Mention

Since I first saw a picture of Ramon Novarro, he has been my ideal of the perfect Romeo. I shall be deeply disappointed if anyone else is cast in that rôle. Quoting Harry Carr: "He has romance without physical taint."

Mary Astor has wistfulness, dark beauty, purity, youth! What else is necessary for the perfect Juliet?

MRS. H. L. KINGTON,
248 W. Broadway,
Madisonville, Kentucky.

Honorable Mention

One must bring to the rôles of Romeo and Juliet not only physical beauty and charm, but deep intelligence. Lillian Gish is the perfect Juliet. She is convincing in pathos, has youth and a great spiritual beauty. The ideal Romeo would be Ronald Colman. He has fire, romance and sincerity.

Very truly yours,
C. G. GOTSHALL,
153 Prospect St., Ashtabula, Ohio.

Honorable Mention

Richard Barthelmess and Mary Pickford are my choice. Both are the very spirit of youth and masters of its screen technique. Both artists sincere and true. Sweet and pretty and sixteen as any is Mary, while something tells me charming Romeo had beautiful dark eyes and a lovable, crooked smile.

SUSAN WYNNE,
Care W. G. Harvie,
"Dogwood Farm,"

The Inside Facts About the Extra

mental labor, then, no doubt, greater prosperity would come to the extra.

I have met at least five hundred persons in the motion picture industry in the past eighteen months. I have purposely talked with or interviewed these people, inside and outside, everywhere, in order to get the real truth as to your chance in the movies. I have particularly concerned myself with the problems of the extra character. Fortunately, I have closely observed the ways and means of the biggest men and greatest stars in the game today. But this does not make me immune from error. Any other extra character had the same, or almost the same, chance to put his or her observations down on paper for the benefit of his or her fellow workers, as I am doing here.

But back to the subject.

The Element of Chance

Do not be discouraged yet. I will give you the sunny side in a moment. In our discussion, let us not fail to recognize that there are always two view-points to every subject. The matter of chance is simply being balanced by the weights of a scale whose springs and point of accuracy are so often uncertain, having no fixed destination. Now read on.

It is true that there are hundreds of people who get work. I have gotten lots of it myself. But by no means is the average up to a fairly good weekly salary. Say, thirty-five to fifty dollars a week would be a figure unheard of as an average—it would really be a catastrophe for an extra to average this amount of money for one month straight. Of course, there are some men and women who get fifty to five hundred dollars a day; perhaps they work four or five days a month, depending on the person, the circumstance and the picture. But we are only dealing with the extra and the newcomer at present.

Let us assume; then, that you have joined The Great Parade, whose carriers bear the banners of the extra. In other words, you are here in our fair land and are ready to begin your journey for work. You have turned your back upon the rest of the world (which is a grievous mistake) and your heart is throbbing with the romantic hope of the brilliant future ahead. Good enough, that's the spirit, all right, but there is a saying about ignorance being bliss, etc., etc.

You've just begun, we'll say. You have a few dollars in your pocket, and mighty lucky if you have. Let us say that you are on your way from Los Angeles headed toward Culver City, where one of the largest studios in the world is situated. And you are happy; the flowers and the sunshine on a December morning will make you that way.

As you enter the vicinity you see a huge electric sign telling that your Golden Gate is near—but they are iron gates. And as the saying goes, you walk down the street, all the little birds go tweet, tweet, tweet. You see a great line of struggling humanity forming to the right of the iron gates. And one by one you see the line move forward! forward! forward! And around to the left and right there are huddled with deathlike grips upon each other, men and women clustered in a mass that only a machine gun could disperse—much less you, who must get thru that mob for a job.

But that's nothing, you join your fellow workers and add another struggle and push to the already angry forces. Presently you arrive fourth or fifth from the casting window, where you see a man giving out cards in different colors. You wonder what the devil they are. Alas! it is not long before you learn. In another breathless second you are hurled in front of the man who gives you your job. You'll probably grin and blush. It takes but a glance to see that you are a novice. "Your name," the man will say. Johnny Jones or Mary Smith.

The Beginner

QUICKLY as a flash, the man's fingers will scale his card-file box. Ah! your name is not there. Well, you didn't know. You are told to wait for prospects. Yes, wait in case some poor devil is late or is trampled to death. But that never happens—there are too many ready to grab a job accidentally left vacant. But you sit, if there is any place for you, and you watch the faces pass by you. One after another the worn faces move on and the nervous hands grab their checks—extra pass-checks they are called. Among them you see old and young, high and low, rich and poor; with the rare exception, it is mostly the latter.

Among this queer, fascinating line you may see a face whose earlier day may have held the envious gaze of countless thousands. You may see the poor soul that once played Hamlet or Julius Caesar or Henry VIII. And you come to learn later that the same face smiles and the same hands gesture deep gratitude when the paltry five dollars is given as a reward for a day's work as an extra. Just an extra! Funny, isn't it? And in the next breath, while you are waiting! waiting! in comes a regular Hollywood Sheik whose white shirt is carelessly flung open about the neck, whose hair is pasted back with some glossy fluid. But he is tall and good-looking; he is smoking a cigaret nervously, importantly and nonchalantly.

Your breath is taken, you are amazed, by gad! You recognize him, maybe you do. Why, it's that chap who rescued Gloria Blank Blank in Madame Glyn's "Great Moment." No, it really wasn't, after all—but he was a double for the hero. For the real heroes do not enter the studio that way—not often, at any rate. However, the casting, or assistant casting, director looks up and with recognition comes a smile. You hear a click and the door swings open. All doors are electrically manipulated. And the young man has gone thru the Great Barriers, leaving behind him hungry hearts, saddened eyes and shrunken souls casting furtive glances, as tho peering at mystic shadows.

But, fear not, for you may be in his shoes tomorrow, and he may be in yours. And so on and on—the chance you have. But you gladly take it, and thousands of others along with you at least afford consolation in some form.

The Extra and the Phone

Now you have filed your photograph and registered at all the different studios. And on the back of your photo you have written all the information required by a studio. Of course, you may lie a little, but use discretion. As the Englishman said, it will do no 'arm. But all your accomplishments are put down, your type, your experience, whether you have a complete wardrobe or not, and, most of all, your telephone number. Old man Bell did a great thing for movie actors when he invented the telephone. For upon the telephone you must depend as your only little middleman. It is true, too, that your number often changes, due to troublesome land-ladies. You know what I mean. But stranger things happen in the movies than in fiction. Both good and bad greet you. But such is life in all its roads.

Finally you land a job. Hurray! Yes, sir, be thru the gates at 7.30 A.M., made up and on the lot or set at 8 A.M., costumes furnished. That's your call. Great guns! at last the Golden Gate has swung about, gracefully admitting you to cherish its mysteries. What few friends and many enemies you have hear you shout aloud your triumph. At last! at last! You kiss the dirty rug in grateful pose to the god of chance.

Of course, it is understood that you know how to make up; you have, in fact, a complete make-up case. With full equipment, it is known as straight make-up, which includes grease-paint and powder, puff, cold-cream, pencil, brush and comb, lining, loquaro, rouge and toning brush, mirror, towels and many other items which you will learn about as you go on; yes, many! It is true, too, that you could "get by" without such things—but not an actor. Never! Besides, suppose the director should select you out of the mob of three or four hundred, more or less, to do a little part which is called a "bit." Or suppose you are a camera hog and are prone to getting close-ups—not to have make-up would be terrible! It would be ruinous! Nay! your career is at an end before starting.

But no such luck, either with or without make-up. The little "bit" you may do is obtained from the outside; you are written in for the part before you ever go on the lot or set. However, the director was very busy that day and had no time for personal interviews, and if such were asked for the result would be what you didn't ask for. But maybe, perhaps, tomorrow! ah, tomorrow! will bring better luck.

Your First Work

WHEN the day's work is finished, you draw your three dollars, five or seven-fifty, as the case might be, and you are happy. But when told that you are done for the day, not so good. It means that you have to do the same thing all over again to get another job on another picture. You waste two days, often a week, to get one day's work.

Now comes the chance you have. Briefly, here it is:

Hard work and persistence, backed by a fitting and proper motive, based on a normal and correct source, plus a lot of patience, nerve and iron ability, mingled with tons of brains—should help some.

Good appearance, possible photographic qualities, a complete wardrobe, the art of knowing how to make up, which in itself is a great accomplishment, wearing a clean-cut smile, with loads of PERSONALITY, go a long way in time. In time!

And the natural process of elimination among your competitors—those who cannot stand the grind, those who fall by the roadside of failure for one reason or another, and being a sticker yourself—all will push you several rounds up the ladder.

And last, but not the least, sticking to it, facing the seemingly impossible, doing the grim task of hounding the casting directors to distraction, never slackening one minute on the ropes of discouragement and disappointment—regardless of anything short of death itself—will, in time, put you over the big hill where a new world will arise to greet you and shake you by the hand—success loves success. And by that time you will have other difficulties which need

Start Today, Take Off from 10 to 50 Pounds, as I did—Simple, Easy, Harmless Way—HERE IT IS

If you are ashamed of your figure, especially in a bathing suit, decide to take off that extra fat and look your best on the beach this summer. You can do it. I did. I am glad to be able to explain to you how to go about it—I am not going to tell you to go through strenuous exercises or weakening diets. I will not recommend you to rub your body with absurd creams or wear reducing girdles or garments, as I KNOW THEY ARE ABSOLUTELY WORTHLESS. I am giving you here the new way found out in Paris and which is the most marvelous discovery ever made to easily and safely take off fat. I suffered for years with all the troubles well known to fat people—time after time, I deprived myself from all pleasures—bathing, dancing, riding or golfing because of my ridiculously fat figure. I turned, down parties and friends to avoid the dreaded, "Here comes fatty," until one day, after I had tried everything known to reduce and failed, I hit upon SAN-GRI-NA with which I made myself over. SAN-GRI-NA is the discovery of a French scientist who has solved the problem of obesity. SAN-GRI-NA is put up in small tasteless tablets. You take two before each meal and watch your weight go down. With this simple, easy, marvelous new way, I reduced from 180 to 130 pounds in eight weeks and have never regained since. The reducing I went through was gradual and easy—did not leave me flabby or wrinkled—with every pound of fat lost, I felt a steady increase in strength and vitality. Now my health is splendid and I look and feel years younger. SAN-GRI-NA is guaranteed absolutely harmless, and is sold with money back guarantee. Nothing like SAN-GRI-NA was ever before offered to you—Try it Today.

NOTE: Since I have given out this wonderful secret to the American public, the demand has been so tremendous, that every good drug or department store is supplied with SAN-GRI-NA. Get your package today and watch your fat disappear.

The Men at the Top

BUT by no means do I wish to give even the slightest insinuation that the men who are the executives of the movies are wrong or in any way have the responsibility for the creation of the great law of compensation in the game.

Undoubtedly some of the finest men and women in our land are highly associated with the movies. We know that. Some of the best people, morally, are holding down responsible positions in a hundred different departments of the great industry. One could not meet finer men and women, in my opinion. And this embraces the row from producer to extra. And, of course, one oftentimes will meet the opposite—so it is in any walk of life. "The Movie" is still a big baby—that's why a lot of people love the screen.

To repeat, as in every walk of life, we meet folks who are not so good—the movies are not to blame for their share of the minority. So, good luck to you, Mr., Mrs. and Miss Extra. As Billy Evans, the famous baseball umpire, said, "The hours are from three to five and the game is always on the lookout for good, intelligent and honest men." So it is with the movies—the camera is on the lookout, too, and it pays from three dollars a day to many, many of them, as the case may be.

most prominent of the footlight Virgins. Our bet is that Gloria will get away with "The Miracle" neatly. We don't know who will direct, but Fritz Lang, the man who made "Siegfried," would be a good selection.

Now that Dolores Costello seems to have arrived definitely as a potential star, the usual discoverers are advancing their claims. The Warner Brothers, the producers, for instance, lay claim to her discovery.

Actually, the credit goes to John Barrymore. It is true that the Warners noted a picture of the Costello sisters in a Chicago paper when they were chorus girls in a musical revue.

Small film rôles were offered them—and the two girls, daughters of the first film idol, Maurice Costello, arrived in Hollywood. Dolores began to play tiny rôles, those of maids and so on. Then Barrymore reached the Coast to start work on "The Sea Beast." The leading feminine rôle hung between several actresses, but Barrymore insisted upon the untried Miss Costello for the part.

In this fashion came her first hit. Meanwhile, Dolores's sister is still playing obscure parts. Thus luck in the movies.

time everyone had the feeling that he could have been a whole lot better. It is this encouragement that fires one with the enthusiasm to give him more and better work.

"When we had finished the picture, Lubitsch said, 'See, Eddie, I made you an Englishman.' Because of his cheerful manner, one at first wonders if he knows what he is doing. It is not long before one finds out. Lubitsch has that artistic instinct that knows the right thing from the wrong. He inoculates you with the scene so thoroly that you are amazed at yourself on the screen. You begin to wonder, did that man make me do that? I believe that if I had a few more pictures with him I would be a good actor."

Martindel's Career

MARTINDEL has been in the theatrical business all his life, and says he hopes to live to be a hundred that he might eventually learn all there is to know about acting. His career has been mostly on the legitimate stage in New York. He has a rich bass voice which may be remembered by many who saw the New York productions of "Naughty Marietta" and "The Firefly." Numerous other light operas and musical comedies have his name on the original cast sheets. His career in the film realm has been varied. Eddie has worked in everything from comedy and horse opera to "Lady Windermere's Fan," under the direction of Lubitsch. It is in this picture that he scores his first real bit in the movies.

"When I was given the part of Lord Augustus, I wondered if I hadn't been miscast," continued Eddie. "According to Oscar Wilde's play, I could not understand how I would fit the character. When I came under the thumb of Lubitsch, I found out. He had changed the character. He understood what he was doing, and had allotted me my proper niche in the cast. During the filming of the picture I felt like one of these light-hearted individuals who breezes into a scene and out again with a happy good morning and a hearty farewell. It was delightful work, in fact, the happiest work I have had during my six years in pictures.

"When I came to Hollywood and the picture business, I did not expect to stay. I thought I would take my fling at the movies and return to the stage. For six years I have been working in the studios. I have been cataloged. By that I mean I have been placed as a character, going down on the casting books as a typical business man or banker type. Because of my grey hair and my size I get the part of the man of wealth. I wish the same parts were wished on me in civil life. I lost one job because I made up my mind not to play bankers any more. I was called to a studio and appeared with a couple days' growth of beard, an army shirt and old trousers. I lost the job. They wanted a rich man . . . banker type."

Martindel is a big man of commanding presence and aristocratic bearing. Another great Hollywood rumor that he bemoans is that most people think he is an Englishman.

Hails from Ohio

"I CANNOT understand why I create the impression that I am English. I was born in Hamilton, Ohio, and anyone who has talked to me knows that I manipulate my 'r's' like any good old backwoodsman. I experienced the same thing when I was working on the stage. When an English gentleman was needed, I was assigned the part."

Martindel admits he is forty-eight years old. He's not a juvenile, but there are few juveniles who appear more youthful. Six years ago he came to Hollywood to play with Earle Williams in "Captain Swift." When he arrived, Eddie said he saw ex-chorus men from New York riding around in automobiles and buying houses. He made up his mind to stay and get some of the swag, if a mere chorus man could bowl over such a heavy pay check. He has succeeded in getting the house and the automobile. How he ever did it, Eddie says he does not know, for he has no conception of business, despite the fact that he plays the parts of American bankers. A few weeks ago he discovered a salary check which was dated 1922, and was made out to him by the old Goldwyn company. It was lying in the bottom of an old wardrobe trunk. Fortunately, he was still able to get it cashed. If nothing else, this little episode should give out the impression that he is not a base commercial artist. Like Lord Augustus, he is the blythe young blade of forty-eight who never counts his pennies nor his dollars, but flits thru the films playing the parts of severe bankers and rich old moneybags of the business world.

leading rôles, success didn't rush out to Miss Adorée and throw its arms around her neck. In the first place, Miss Adorée was a stranger in a strange land, and the fact that she married into citizenship didn't make her any less a foreigner.

And then there were thousands of pretty girls in Hollywood. Miss Adorée is not a great beauty; she is attractive, she is magnetic and her face is alive and sparkling. But there are far prettier girls to play pretty rôles in little pictures.

So Hollywood thought she was awfully lucky to get on at all and directors chose her for rôles because she was amiable, quick and easy to work with, rather than because they suspected she had a definite and unusual quality to bring to the screen.

Then came "The Big Parade"—and King Vidor selected her to play the rôle of Melisande, the French peasant girl who falls in love with the gum-chewing dough-boy. And when Miss Adorée began work in "The Big Parade," she began to remember her life back in France, before she ever heard of the movies. She forgot her six years in America and all the things she had learned that a movie heroine must do, and she played the rôle the way she felt it.

Renée Adorée's performance in "The Big Parade" takes her from the ranks of the confirmed second-raters—those who merely "get by"—and puts her in the ranks of those who belong. It was not merely a rôle, played before the camera, it was the summing up of a series of authentic experiences.

Besides her work before the camera, Miss Adorée played an important part in the making of "The Big Parade." She was one of Vidor's most valuable assistants. It was Miss Adorée who supplied the details of the scenes in the French peasant home. It was Miss Adorée who explained the whole psychology of the peasant tossed in the midst of unthinkable chaos. Without her, "The Big Parade" would have been a less vital, less stirring picture.

Gregory La Cava, a new director. This La Cava not only has directed an entertaining satire upon the life-time pictures of the great open spaces, but, I am reliably informed, he rewrote the story into its present form. Other gentlemen get the program credit, thus fulfilling one of the unwritten laws of the cinema.

The highly popular Dix plays Bill Dana, who goes West at the instigation of his Blonde Inspiration, no other than Esther Ralston. Out where men are men, however, he finds that the West has changed. Fords and modern plumbing are now the thing. All goes well until the Blonde Inspiration decides to go West for a visit. Then Bill and the boys have to hunt around for mustangs, board up the bathroom and hide the flivvers. Dix is excellent and the whole effort is breezy and amusing. You will like it. While I am on the subject, let me suggest that you keep an eye on La Cava.

The Blonde Miss Joyce

"THE SKYROCKET," starring the much talked-about Peggy Hopkins Joyce, has a whole lot of what they called box-office value. It is likely to do a land-office business thruout America, I am told. Probably it will.

The story itself is built from a novel of movieland life by Adela Rogers St. John, the local Edith Wharton of Hollywood. It is the story of a bathing girl extra who ascends to the heights of screen stardom. Then, in the glamorous confusion of fan letters, billboard superlatives, bills and general adulation, she loses her viewpoint and almost loses the one man who cares for her.

Like all of Miss St. John's stories, "The Skyrocket" is said to be based upon a real Hollywood tale. It is whispered . . . But why repeat gossip. You can probably guess the real life counterpart of Miss St. John's Sharon Kimm. Oddly, Miss Joyce rather intrigues me as Sharon. Anyway, she is very blonde and not at all uninteresting. The direction of Marshall Neilan isn't very good. Mickey, I fear, was more concerned with the injection of a bitter thrust at certain people and things than with his direction.

The question has been raised as to whether or not "The Skyrocket" hurts the Coast screen colony because it shows that prohibition isn't being completely enforced thereabouts. Well, what about it? To ask fans to believe that everything is as Will Hays would have it, is to ask them to believe in Santa Claus.

Mickey Neilan Again

HERE I can turn to another Neilan effort, "Mike." This, I believe, is the story in which Mr. Neilan originally was slated to direct Mary Pickford. Then Colleen Moore started work on "The Desert Flower" and Miss Pickford changed her plans, fearing a conflict of pictures. Neilan persuaded Metro-Goldwyn to let him make the comedy with his discovery, Sally O'Neil.

Mike is the eldest of three children. The father is a comedy railroad section boss. Mike foils a robbery and wins the love of a young hobo. All this is done after the fashion of the old Mabel Normand comedies, with Charlie Murray and Ford Sterling as slapstick foils for Miss O'Neil. Far be it from me to say whether or not Sally O'Neil is a successor to Mabel Normand. Miss Normand, I must admit, never won much laughter from me. However, her screen comedy seems in a fair way to become a legend and even a tradition. Personally, I don't care for Miss O'Neil. Her personality is too hard. You can chip the laughs from her beaded eyelashes.

In "Hands Up," Raymond Griffith dons a silk topper of the Civil War vintage. In fact, the brash Mr. Griffith plays a spy who sets out to foil the attempt of the Union to get gold from a Nevada mine. Thus he hopes to save the Confederacy.

Griffith does a whole lot of foiling, including taking the beads away from a bloodthirsty Indian in a crap game, but he finally falls in love with two girls. The war ends, but Griffith can't decide. Then Brigham Young drives by in a crowded covered wagon. Griffith assists the two girls into the wagon, headed for Salt Lake City—and the picture ends. "Hands Up" is hardly hilarious, but it has funny moments. Griffith knows his business as a farceur, but the comedy seems long.

A No. 2 "Stella Dallas"

I DON'T know the original novel by Sir Philip Gibbs, but the film version, "The Reckless Lady," turns out to be a feeble imitation of "Stella Dallas." Here is the deserted mother caring for her daughter, in the new background of the Continent, it is true, but doing all the "Stella Dallas" stuff. The scoundrel who has attempted to seduce the wife finally jumps off a cliff—really!—and mother and daughter are reunited with daddy. Altho Belle Bennett and Lois Moran, the two players of "Stella Dallas," play in "The Reckless Lady," the piece doesn't register. It is just dull and tedious. An observation of the two in this new piece will lead you to give new laurels to Henry King for his fine direction of "Stella Dallas." With the same players, Director Howard Higgin is helpless.

The leather medal of the month goes to "The Ancient Mariner." This version isn't wholly Coleridge's poem. Not by a long shot. It seems that a wealthy rounder is about to win a gal away from her true love when an old sailor takes the silk-hatted scoundrel aside and tells him the story of "The Ancient Mariner." Don't ask why. I can tell you. The film adaptation of the old salt's tale seems to concern the Ancient Mariner, two symbolical figures labeled Life and Death, and a flock of bathing girls. So the wealthy rake, overcome by the bathing girls or something, renounces the girl to her true lover and all ends well.

stand at the portals of the rich homes, after having timidly knocked at the front door, and, as a butler would approach to let me in, the urge to seek safety in flight was almost too strong to be overcome. I felt that my feet were larger than anyone's else, my arms were dangling, and I was painfully conscious of the fact that I might have a cockney accent, having been reared in the streets of London. Sometimes I was obsessed by a horrible idea: What if I should lose part of my clothing!

Of course, the funny little man on the screen does lose a part of his clothing. It has happened before and it happens in the latest picture, "The Gold Rush." And by the way, if one may judge by their reviews of this picture, the critics feared that Chaplin might be about to bestow a real personality on his vague and elusive little marionette. They expressed the belief that here was a character study rather than a farcical presentation. We, however, had not felt that way about it. To us the lonely prospector in "The Gold Rush" was as much of a mystery as ever. There still remains between him and the humans the great divide.

"One night I was invited to dine at the home of one of England's greatest actors," continued Mr. Chaplin, mentioning his name, which we shall not. "I was shown into the library. He was rehearsing 'King Lear,' but I did not know that, and was so much agitated when he looked straight at me and cried in agonized tones: 'How sharper than a serpent's tooth it is to have a thankless child. Sit down.'

"I sat down. I sat on the edge of my chair. I was frightened. Red spots danced before my eyes. Again he stared at me and cried, 'Tremble, thou wretch, that hast within thee undivulged crimes. Are you quite comfortable?'

"Presently, the great actor's daughter entered. I was introduced. She looked at me and said sadly, 'Mr. Chaplin, I never have seen one of your pictures.' That didn't help a bit. Then we were seated at the dinner table. There were hundreds of forks and spoons and knives, it seemed to me, at either side of my plate. I wanted to say gaily, 'Let's use the brassie for this shot,' and attack my food with any one of the implements I could seize first; but my hands were clammy with embarrassment. I just kept on drinking water; at least the glasses were the same as the ones I was used to at home."

Mr. Chaplin declares that it is difficult to realize how many people suffer from shyness and how often what is called 'upstagniness' is merely an aggravated form of bashfulness.

"'Success has spoiled him,' everyone declares as soon as a man begins to be known at all," resumed Mr. Chaplin. "It may only be, as it certainly was in my case, a desire to shield oneself from a hurt. It is a terrible thing to feel that you are surely going to be the most awkward and stupid person at a party, that the others have had advantages which you have not had, and that you are making yourself ridiculous."

This sounds strange from the most famous man in the world, a man who has been treated like a king all over the world. Why, Mr. Chaplin even gives other people the credit for his pictures!

"I never can say," Mr. Chaplin added, sweeping toward a conclusion, "'Now I'm going to make a new film,' and then go ahead and make it. I have to receive my inspiration from someone else. It was because I saw Edna Purviance as a woman of Paris that I was able to work out that story. Jackie Coogan immediately suggested 'The Kid' in every detail; and I had no idea of making an Alaskan picture until I saw Georgia Hale as a dance-hall girl. I cannot make another one until I suddenly see some character which interests me, and then I suppose I shall involuntarily weave a story around that character."

And there you have the origin of Charlie Chaplin's contribution to the art of the cinema—a nomad, a lovable mute dilettante, his own inferiority complex, spread out on the screen, a shadow for the whole world to laugh at.

Like most sensitive and imaginative persons, Mr. Chaplin is an egoist, and what he has put on the screen is the thing that he once feared he was; at least, in the eyes of others. In the happy and prosperous endings he now allows his down-trodden hero, one can trace a dawning complacency, a breaking up of complexes. But Mr. Chaplin will, at least, we hope he will, remain to the end what he is now—a modest, whimsical, lovable person, who is never quite happy, always a little dis-trait and a little sad.

These are indeed ingratiating attributes!

Cure That Spring Fever!

There are just two cures for that spring fever. Sulphur and molasses—and THE CLASSIC! One is old fashioned, the other is the 1926 remedy. Everybody likes motion pictures—and THE CLASSIC is the one de luxe magazine of the film field. Aside from being the most beautiful publication of the screen, it is the most intelligently edited and the most brilliantly written. It is free from fan bunk and slush. It treats of pictures and picture people accurately, brightly and fearlessly.

* * * *

Glance over its list of contributors and you will realize that THE CLASSIC is the magazine of the screen. Eugene V. Brewster, the founder of The Brewster Publications, Frederick James Smith, Agnes Smith, Robert E. Sherwood, Don Ryan, Alice Tildesley, Dorothy Donnell, Milton Howe, Verne Kibbe, Sara Redway, Harriette Underhill, H. W. Hanemann, Tamar Lane, Harry Carr. All big names in the world of motion pictures—and they all write for THE CLASSIC—most of them exclusively.

* * * *

The May issue is going to be unusually bright and attractive. There's a stunning cover of Colleen Moore, redolent of spring. Tamar Lane has written an article, FAMOUS BLUNDERS, which is destined to cause a lot of talk. It relates—fearlessly—of the notable errors made in motion pictures, the big mistakes of business and judgment which unmade stars.

Henry Albert Phillips will continue his interviews with famous European writers on motion pictures. You can't afford to miss this!

Lya de Putti, the famous German star and idol of Berlin, is coming to America. THE MAY CLASSIC will present the first interview with Miss de Putti, secured in Berlin. You doubtless have noticed that THE CLASSIC has been covering German film activities thoroly and interestingly. In Berlin THE CLASSIC has scored one journalistic beat after another.

And some fifteen other sensational features!

"Let Us Taste Life While We May"

"Doushka," he whispered, "Life is so short. Let us taste it while we may!" And the princely stranger, who had suddenly appeared out of the soft shadow of the warm, sensuous Egyptian night, bent and kissed her lips.

She struggled against the intoxicating emotion—tried vainly to resist—to push him away—but he again gathered her into his arms and most tenderly kissed her.

All power of movement seemed to desert her. She only knew that she was wildly happy, that this was heaven, and she wished it would never end.

Jobyna Ralston, subject of an interview in this issue, was loaned to the M. C. Levee-First National production. She plays the leading rôle opposite Jack Mulhall in "Sweet Daddies."

George Sidney selected for David Warfield's rôle of Simon Levi in William Fox production of "The Auctioneer." Frank Borzage directing and Madge Bellamy playing the feminine lead, done years ago behind the footlights by Antionette Walker.

Work started by Director Mauritz Stiller on Ibanez's "The Temptress," starring the highly promising Greta Garbo. Antonio Moreno plays opposite Miss Garbo.

Josef von Sternberg, the maker of the ill-fated "Salvation Hunters," is back at work again. He went to Europe after his break with Metro-Goldwyn and now has returned to work, making "The Sea Gull," starring Edna Purviance, for Charlie Chaplin. Chaplin, it would seem, still believes in the erratic von Sternberg.

Alla Nazimova returning to stage.

Cecil De Mille planning big million-and-a-half dollar special to be made during the coming year. Announced this during New York visit. Believes he has biggest bet of the screen in William Boyd.

Report that Mary Pickford may make a picture during her European trip with Doug. Said to have negotiated with Ernst Lubitsch to make the picture in Germany.

Mae Murray signed again by Metro-Goldwyn. Sam Taylor has ended five years directorial association with Harold Lloyd. His last comedy for Lloyd was "For Heaven's Sake."

Buster Keaton has completed his Metro-Goldwyn contract and all future comedies will be released thru United Artists.

Doug Fairbanks' "The Black Pirate" is a big New York hit. Biggest advance sale of any Fairbanks picture yet produced. Apparently a London hit, too, judging from the critical notices of the English press.

W. C. Fields' first Paramount starring comedy, "The Old Army Game," filmed at Ocala, Florida, with Eddie Sutherland directing.

Charles Brabin signed by First National to direct Doris Kenyon in "Mismates" for First National. Picture now being made in New York.

Ann Nichols, author and producer of the stage success, "Abie's Irish Rose," announces suit against Universal Pictures claiming that "The Cohens and Kellys" strongly resembles her play.

Clarence Brown selecting his cast for the Metro-Goldwyn spectacle, "The Trail of '98."

Harry Langdon visits New York.

Victor McLaglen gets coveted rôle of Captain Flagg in Fox production of "What Price Glory."

Conrad Nagel and William Haines renew contracts with Metro-Goldwyn.

LAST MINUTE REVIEW

"The Black Pirate"

"Fifteen men on a dead man's chest, Yo-ho, and a bottle of rum."

Buccaneers, cut-throats, desert islands, black flags, captive princesses in despair, boats scuttled on lonely seas, prisoners walking the plank—they're all in Doug Fairbanks' newest effort, "The Black Pirate."

There is a fine boyish spirit to "The Black Pirate." Here is a rampantly wild tale told with a superb sense of youthful exaggeration. It is the great imaginary adventure of boyhood—the sort of thing that for generations has set boys building rafts on old mill ponds. "The Black Pirate" isn't just an interesting experiment in subdued color photography. Actually, it is a much finer thing. It is a roystering adventure pictured thru the eyes of a boy.

The black pirate sets out to avenge his father's death at the hands of sea marauders. He masquerades as a pirate—and, of course, outwits the whole brood. There is a superb incident where the black pirate, in his false rôle, demonstrates how he can capture a merchantman single-handed. He puts the rudder out of commission and slides down the sails, ripping them to bits with his sheath-knife.

Doug never had a better rôle than the Black Pirate. In fact, he never had a better picture. A great deal of the credit should go to the director, Albert Parker. Here is direction superb in its directness and simplicity, capturing and retaining the fine spirit of youth. It ought to put Parker at the top of the directorial heap.

Editor, CLASSIC:

I have a recent issue of THE CLASSIC you have an article: "What Counts at the Box Office." In this article you call attention to the fact that "There are a lot of players of mysterious popularity, difficult to define." Particular mention is made of Milton Sills and by inference Conway Tearle and Thomas Meighan are included in the same category.

Then in another part of the magazine is an article, "Simplicity Is Being Paged." Does not this article explain and define the question propounded in the former article. Dont you think, just as the public is demanding more simplicity and realism in their pictures, they are also demanding the same thing in those who interpret the pictures?

Once upon a time not so long ago moving pictures as a form of entertainment were almost the exclusive prerogative of women and more particularly the very young women or the older and more disillusioned ones.

Times have changed. The saloon is gone. So is the café. Only the man of wealth can afford clubs. Therefore the ordinary man, the everyday fellow in the street, has had to find some way to pass his evenings. Some have found the radio a means of passing their evenings. Still more, and of these I am one, and I believe a typical one, have become movie fans.

This trend of men toward the movie theaters has been evolutionary. The movies, however, have not exactly kept up with these changing times and changing class of audience. That is, not until lately. Now the change is beginning to work almost without their knowledge and they do not seem to realize what it means.

Well, to me it seems simple. Sills, Meighan, Tearle, Wallace Beery and such players are just every-day sort of men—that is, men such as you and I. Possibly I take a liberty in classing you with the rest of us, but you are a newspaperman even as I, and I have found that newspapermen the world over are pretty much the same.

Now look about you. Have you any friends that look like or act like Valentino, Navarro, Cortez, Lou Tellegen, Charles De Roche or any of the other Mexican, Spanish, Italian or metamorphosed Jewish boys who for so long have been the "heroes" and sheiks of the films?

But surely among the doctors, lawyers, businessmen and other ordinary mortals whom you know you can recall a double of either Sills, Meighan or Tearle. Tearle, during my work as a newspaperman, I have met. I found him just a regular unaffected human being. Sills and Meighan I have never met personally.

Now as for the acting of these players. Stop and think. Take the man whom you know who is the double of any of these players. Does he not in a given situation act just about as they do on the screen. In other words, does it not occur that their unaffected, natural way of carrying themselves—they do not act—carries a greater semblance of reality to grown men than does the sheik stuff that the Latin "actors" try to foist upon a too credulous world?

Dont you think that possibly movie magazines give too much credit to the gushing letters which they receive from the flapper admirers of these so-called sheiks? Do you really believe that young girls are in the preponderance among movie audiences? Of course, I never have the opportunity to go to a movie in the afternoon, but I do attend at least two evening performances a week.

And what do I find? That the audience is about evenly divided as between men and women and that the flapper type is greatly in the minority. In fact, such as I see of them there, judging by their interest in the various acts of the program, are more interested in the contortions of the so-called director of the "Super-Jazz Soloists" who stands with his back to the audience and beats time with his hips and knees than they are in the feature picture.

Therefore, do not overlook the fact that men have become a real factor in the popularity of any given picture or actor. After dinner the wife or the sweetheart suggests a movie. She wants, in many instances, to go and see one of the sheiks because he has such languishing eyes and they just thrill you thru when he gives the heroine a hypnotic glare.

Hubby, however, is all fed up on this stuff. He is not jealous, as some people think. He just is a realist. He never saw any sheiks in actual life. He thinks sheiks are the bunk. He prefers to see Tommy Meighan, Conway Tearle or Milton Sills win the loved one in the real old-fashioned ordinary way. Dont forget, men are just as romantic, if not more so, than women. They, however, want realism with their romance. They want the kind of romance they can believe in. They want to forget their humdrum business cares and the lack of joy in this blue, dry land. But it destroys their sense of romance to unreel before them an impossibly pretty boy taking the world and the hearts of all the ladies by storm with such action and such a manner of making love as was never seen either on land or sea.

So please give us ordinary, every-day men a little consideration also in the future. We like the movies, we want to be entertained, but we want life to be depicted somewhere near as it is—that is, real life just smeared over with sufficient romance to make it interesting and real men to portray it for us.

As for the women, I have little to say. Leave them, with the exception of Mae Murray, as they are, God Bless Them. We want them to be exotic, different, strange and mysterious. In other words, just the opposite of the men and with all of those attributes which we do not want in the men.

As for Miss Murray, cannot you use your influence to have her stop pouting her lips and posing all over the scene like a dressed-up doll? Because she is, for some unexplained reason, sometimes cast in real pictures, we have to see her. Voicing the opinion of all of my men friends, it is painful to say the least.

Sincerely,

EDWIN MYERS.

Editor, CLASSIC:

I have just read an article in the CLASSIC for February. The article closes with the following sentence:

"The CLASSIC is in favor of the old-fashioned film theater at decent admission prices. We would like to know what our readers think about it."

I have not been appointed by many of my friends to tell their opinions, but I know what they are, nevertheless. We most emphatically are in favor of a theater where FILMS are shown; not a higgledy-piggledy combination of cheap vaudeville and a picture, cut in half or three-quarters, separated by an hour's parade of cheap singing or worse dancing, so that one completely loses the thread of the story, all interest.

Our big theaters have been getting worse and worse, to our way of thinking. Admission is fifty cents. The feature picture is just an hour long. There are screeching females, almost bare; there are child WONDERS, singing "I'm the Hottest Baby in Town"; there are dancers who leap around the stage with no clothes on, and no art, not even talent. We sit thru all this. Then we decide that "this week we wont go down-town. We'll go to the neighborhood theater."

Ye gods, they're bitten, too. Either it is a grocery-store night, and we have to wait one-half hour while sugar and rolled oats are handed to the winner of the door prizes; or the KIDDIES' REVUE tortures us for another half hour. We want a picture house. Yes.

ED. BLAKEY.

THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC is going to devote a page each month to the best letters from its readers.

Fifteen dollars will be paid each month for the best letter, ten dollars for the second and five dollars for the third. If two or more letters are found of equal merit, the full prize will go to each writer.

Letters must be constructive and interesting. They must deal with pictures or screen personalities. And—please note—they should be typewritten.

AGAIN the master magician De Mille has waved the magic wand of his directorial genius and brought to life on the screen a mighty, epochal drama that sounds a new and triumphant note in the history of motion picture entertainment.

Brushing aside the cobwebs of motion picture tradition, he has approached the subject of the Russian reign of terror with a sympathetic and human understanding. In "The Volga Boatman" is depicted the heart-beat of a nation in revolt—pulsating—human—dramatic—irresistible.

And from this maelstrom of flame and strife emerges a heroic and sublime story of love and devotion involving a Prince, a Princess and a Volga Boatman. Never in the history of the cinema has there been depicted a more fascinating, thrilling and never-to-be-forgotten theme—A Veritable Achievement.

The most famous of early blunders was made by the Biograph Company when it gave the wizard, D. W. Griffith, his release, rather than grant him a small increase in salary

BY Their Blunders Ye Shall Know Them." These few words, paraphrasing a well-known proverb, sum up to a large degree the successes and failures of most of our film personages and companies.

The Blunder Mile-Stones

To blunder is human, and the careers of nearly all of our famous stars, directors and producers are marked with blunders of one sort or another that have played an important part in their professional lives.

In many cases it has not been the blunder itself which has had such a disastrous effect upon their careers, but the celebrity's failure to perceive quickly the effects of his blunder and take drastic steps to offset it by corrective measures.

Blunders have been in vogue with the motion picture world almost from the very inception of the industry. In fact, hardly a year passes that one or two of our most prominent film personages do not commit a faux pas of some kind which does them great and lasting damage. This is but natural with such institutions as the screen or stage, catering as they do to the fickle public.

The Griffith Blunder

ONE of the most famous of early blunders was that made by the Biograph Company when it gave the wizard, D. W. Griffith, his release, rather than grant him a small increase in salary. Griffith was then in the heyday of his career and had built the Biograph Company into the greatest film organization of its time.

The advance in salary which Griffith had demanded would have amounted to a few thousand dollars in the course of a year. By not granting it to him Biograph Company eventually lost millions. When Griffith left the concern, along with him went not only most of the firm's most popular players, but the master mind which had been really responsible for the company's success. After "D. W.'s" departure, Biograph went rapidly into decline until finally it passed entirely out of existence.

Vitagraph was another of the old companies whose successful career was vitally affected by lack of foresight and poor business judgment. At one time Vitagraph had what many consider the greatest aggregation of screen favorites the film industry has ever known. This was in the day of the one- and two-reeler.

Vitagraph's decline came with the arrival of the feature-length photoplay. The Famous Players-Lasky had just come into existence and were presenting famous Broadway stars in films produced on a more lavish scale. The five- and six-reel pictures featuring famous stage stars quickly became the vogue. Vitagraph failed to see the importance in the new trend of affairs and stuck to its old policies.

Vitagraph's Error

THE company's films soon lost their popularity with exhibitors, because they could not compete with the elaborate productions being presented by Famous Players-Lasky and other new companies that had rushed in to offer features. Vitagraph finally saw its mistake and took hasty steps to get into the swim. But it had waited too long and never regained its lost prestige. Vitagraph also erred in releasing several of its best players, rather than raise their salaries.

Other Company Mistakes

THE other famous film concerns of bygone days, Edison, Lubin, Essanay, Selig, Kalem, etc., all fell by the wayside thru the mistake of adhering to ancient policy, instead of keeping abreast of changing conditions.

Generally speaking, film concerns rise or fall upon the strength or weakness of the personalities in their organization. Producers must know just what stars and directors to hold onto, and just which ones to release. This requires both analytical powers and foresight, two qualities which are noticeably lacking in most production outfits.

Conversely, stars and players, rise or fall thru their ability to perceive what companies to remain with and what companies to abandon, when a contract terminates. Many players have made the fatal mistake of quitting a company or producer merely because a little more money was in immediate sight, when they would have profited more in the long run by remaining with the outfit that could have carried them to greater success.

Ray's Famous Blunder

CHARLES RAY'S quitting of Thomas Ince is marked down in film history as one of the greatest blunders ever made by a star. At the very height of his career, Ray deserted the Ince guiding hand to shift for himself. In spite of his tremendous popularity and talent which amounted almost to genius, Ray was never able to make a go of it on his own hook. One or two of his independent efforts were successful, but slowly and surely he slipped farther and farther down the ladder, until finally he was forced to return to the Ince banner. Misfortune continued to dog his footsteps however; Thomas Ince died; and his company also passed out of existence. Ray is now trying to stage a comeback with M-G-M.

Dorothy Dalton was another noted star who tried to leave Ince's guiding hand, and failed. Dorothy maintained her popularity for a short time after leaving Ince, due to the prestige she had gained while working under the Ince banner, but a year or two later she passed off the screen entirely.

The Case of Mae Marsh

SEVERAL players made the blunder of leaving D. W. Griffith. Mae Marsh is the most noted case. Under Griffith's direction Mae Marsh gave performances that were rated among the finest in the annals of the silent drama. Away from his megaphone her portrayals were but mediocre. There were many who predicted that Lillian Gish would rapidly decline after leaving "D. W." While Lillian by no means has done as fine work in the past two years as with Griffith, nevertheless, she has succeeded in holding her popularity to a great extent. It will take one or two more films to ascertain definitely whether Lillian has blundered or not.

Lya de Putti really comes of the Hungarian aristocracy. Her father was the Baron Hoyos von Büxenstein, and she herself was married to a Hungarian baron ALTHO not yet twenty-five years of age, Lya de Putti can boast of being the most popular of all European film actresses at the present moment.

Hers has been an adventurous and interesting career. To begin with, Lya de Putti is her real name, altho most people consider it far too well sounding to be real. But it cant be helped. It is so. And she can prove it documentarily if you would dare to doubt it to her face — which I am sure you wouldn't.

As a matter of fact, she comes from one of the best families of Hungarian aristocracy. Her father was the Baron Hoyos von Büxenstein, and young Lya was married to Baron de Putti, Colonel in the Hungarian army, just be-

Her father was a Hungarian baron. At the age of sixteen she married the Baron de Putti, a colonel in the Hungarian army. Her married life was brief. At eighteen she married again—an attaché of the Norwegian embassy in Berlin. Her husband died two years ago.

She was discovered by Joe May, the German director, while dancing in a Berlin music-hall.

In view of the Hungarian revolution, however, she could not go back to Budapest to get her visé and, having to stay in Berlin much longer than she had expected, young Lya accepted an offer to dance at a leading Berlin music-hall.

Here she was "discovered" by Joe May, the famous German film producer. He instantly recognized the immense "screen value" of her beautiful face and gave her a good part in the picture he was just embarking on: "Das Indische Grabmahl," which has also been shown in other parts of the world under the title "The Indian Tomb."

It was a tremendous success for the young débutante and offers to star in pictures were virtually showered upon the youngster, who had hardly dreamed of going in for screen work.

An Amazing Career

AS a matter of fact, she was launched now upon her amazing career. Since "The Indian Tomb," she has worked in at least three or four pictures a year and, as befits her strong energy and restless temperament, has hardly ever had any spare time except a week or two in between her films; especially

Has the GREAT LOVER

By DON RYAN

AND yet, Rudolph Valentino, né Guglielmi, is a very creditable actor.

* * * * *

Audiences are strange birds, as Valentino has found. America will fondle a movie actor, but its embrace is half mockery, like that of the grubby little cash-girl of the department store, who gives herself giggling into your arms.

She is kidding. America is always kidding like that. Valentino acts for it, but America doesn't care for any. It craves him for a public character.

And yet, Valentino is really a very creditable actor.

Rudy and American Men

HE used to be, if we may believe the various stories, a bus boy in a hotel. He was earning his living in a new country, having come from Italy to make his fortune in America. Many compatriots of high and low degree have been bus boys and bootblacks in America. Why not? I know a count, who drives a laundry wagon.

But the men of America dislike Valentino.

They like to say, when they are compelled to sit beside their dames and see the fire and grace of Valentino as a lover—they like to say, "Once a bus boy, always a bus boy."

They also like to sneer at Valentino as "Vaselino." Then they sneak home and rub more grease into their own stubborn cowlicks in futile emulation of the shining sheik.

It is Valentino's misfortune to have been the innocent cause of more fads than any man since Volstead. Sideboards (miscalled sideburns), peon pants (the wide-bottomed corduroys since supplanted by those that are wide all the way up), the very word sheik, applied to pubescent lovers—such are his contributions to the transient foibles of youth. As these fads go out of fashion, Valentino likewise goes out. He has to swim hard against the current to keep abreast of his public, which is more interested in his divorce cases than in his screen performances.

And yet, Valentino is quite a good actor.

It is no longer smart to live in Hollywood. I suppose you know that? So Valentino lives in a stucco house on a minor peak of the Beverly Hills, surrounded, for his immediate neighbors, by Jack Gilbert and Frances Marion.

The place is approached by a winding road going up, up, till it seems about to lose itself in the rain clouds hanging low above the hills, and then ends within the walled enclosure of the mansion.

From the wide window of Valentino's library the hills are seen to raise their backs below—dark and glistening in the recent deluge, like seals just risen from the sea. Far out, on the plain, the lights of the city are warm, yellow. The red roof of his stables

Waxman

Valentino has been the cause of more fads than any man since Volstead is straight down at the base of the greater eminence. In the stables Valentino has quartered five horses and about the same number of dogs. Most of his leisure time is spent with them. He has the taste of a country gentleman in these things. (Continued on page 69)

MEN

Peggy Hopkins Joyce has just stepped from the newspaper front pages to the screen in "The Skyrocket"

(In the March issue of THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC Adolphe Menjou told what he thought about WOMEN. Mr. Menjou spoke as an authority, at least cinematically speaking. This month Peggy Hopkins Joyce tells what she thinks of MEN. And Miss Joyce may be considered an authority!)

THE lecture hall is crowded. Professor Ennelbesser has just finished his brilliant lecture on ichthyology. "And now if there are any questions you wish to ask," he adds in conclusion, "I will be glad to answer them."

Someone helps the oldest lady to her feet. "I have a question to ask, Professor," she says in a quavering voice.

The Eternal Question

THE professor is flushed with pleasure. He has reached the peak of his career after a lifetime of study. He has followed fish from North Pole to South studying them carefully, and now he feels that no matter what the question is, he cannot fail to know the answer. "Certainly, certainly, my dear Madame," is his kindly reply. "What do you wish to know?"

The old lady adjusts her ear trumpet in order to hear more clearly what his reply will be. "Well, I want to know just what you think of marriage as an institution," she trembles. "My nephew has been going to see a young lady lately——" But there is a sharp retort. The professor has beaten himself unconscious with the jaw-bone of a whale.

And so it goes. If a banker after years of sacrifice and toil, years of wearing rubbers to save the wear and tear on his shoes, so far forgets himself as to talk about banking at a dinner-party, he is labeled an old bore, and in the future is left severely to himself to eat his crackers, milk and a baked apple in the gloomy silence of his own dining-room. But let him talk about women, brilliantly or stupidly, and even the most correct salad fork will pause on its way to the mouth.

Moving pictures, magazines and books tell us how to hold our husbands or our wives. But they don't tell us how to lose them. The most popular column in the newspaper begins, "Dear Miss Banana Oil: For two years I have been keeping company with a young man four years my senior. He seems to like me, but whenever we go out he wears a false mustache. What shall I do?" And the answer always comes, "Keep his respect, my dear, and he will tire of the others and eventually return to you."

But there is so little good advice on men, so little authentic news, that most of us are content to rely on a good pack of fortune-telling cards to tell us, "Be true, he is a good friend."

For pretty girls, beautiful women, will not talk about men. They leave all that to visiting celebrities, for they are too busy with their own affairs to generalize, too much a part of the world's romances to get a perspective on love. But every now and then, there is a famous beauty with intelligence, and she will have a few ideas on what is wrong with the picture, and why four out of five of us are psycho-analyzed before we are forty.

Probably most of you have not seen a picture called "The Skyrocket" yet, and therefore you have not seen its star, Peggy Hopkins Joyce. Miss Joyce is a lovely blonde, slender, with blue eyes, and a large thickly coated aura of romance and charm enveloping her. And having reached the heights of moving picture stardom, she must be submitted to the acid test, "What, Miss Joyce, do you think about men?"

Men Have Changed

"OF course, I can't very well say anything general about them," Miss Joyce replies. "But I think it is very obvious that men have changed. I don't mean in your time or in my time exactly, but it seems to me that with all the discussions about the women of today, there ought to be at least one word said about the man.

"Recently women have been cast into a part formerly

Says Peggy Hopkins Joyce:

"I think it is very obvious that men have changed.

"Financially, women have been forced from the home. Twenty-five years ago a girl helped about the house spasmodically until she got married. Once married, her rôle changed only slightly. The house was still her setting.

"Now a girl goes to work at seventeen or eighteen. She is thrown with all sorts of men. Her judgment grows sharper. She learns the value of money, so her demands grow larger.

"I believe in marriage. It is absolutely necessary, of course. It is the world's greatest convention. We do it to please our mothers, our friends, ourselves, but it seems to me that right now something is wrong with it."

Once married, her rôle changed only slightly. The house was still her setting. She did not have to look about for new material. She did not have to keep up with the times. She could settle back, grow fat, raise children, be supported pleasantly, and her position was assured.

"You hear a good deal about the work the old-fashioned woman had to do. I do not believe it was so bad. There was more room in which to raise a family. A tiny baby in the country taking its air on a sunny veranda, is not the care and responsibility that a child raised in the city is, one who must be taken to a park and watched, actually watched, every second of his play time or nap time.

"Then, too, there were more servants in proportion to the population, and their wages were cheaper. Life was not so exacting. If a husband or so strayed away, it was usually temporary, he returned home after a while, the incident was ignored, and every thing ended happily. Women were divided into two classes, good and bad. Think then of the irreproachable position of a good wife and mother. She was where she was. Her stand was as strong as Gibraltar's. The rest of the world came around to her way of thinking.

SILVERSCREEN:

By H. W. HANEMANN

COMPLETELY surrounded by an exact reproduction of the Great Wall of China, Silver-screen—the Community Super-Beautiful, the Home of Cinema Art and the Playground of the Public's Darlings—nestles against vine-clad hills, drowsing the while to the murmur of the opalescent sea fringing its palm-shot shores. Here nature conspires with man to create the ultimate in beauty. Fresh-water lakes set like sparkling sapphires in the green gold of the lush foliage that leans above mossy marges to kiss (but only in the most Platonic fashion) each sun-caught ripple, reflect the glory of Switzerland. The cleanest and purest possible are filters from the Formaminted firmament to assail the clear-cut nostril as the headiest of rare wines ever guaranteed to contain less than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol by volume. At night, the very constellations lean closer, beguiled from their places in the Heavens by this Earth-Paradise. Here it never rains rain, but violets—and frequently orchids.

Decorum Plus

SUCH, then is Silver-screen. Which is saying absolutely nothing of its shady, broad walks and its orderly, dignified business district, wherein traffic moves with the suavity of a symphony orchestra under the baton of a super-maestro. Decorum is more than perfectly maintained by the Sennett comedy police force to whom is given this opportunity for serious work toward which the heart of every true comedian secretly yearns. In the realization of this opportunity, the police may be strict, but they are ever just. Bootlegging, drug-running and husband-shooting are unknown to Silver-screen.

A new arrival from the farms of Iowa is arrested while the Sennett beauties register "Shocking!"

Sponsored by Will Hays, arbiter of the cinema, a model movie community has been on the celluloid horizon for a long time. Most reports have placed its probable location on Long Island.

Mr. Hanemann has taken Mr. Hays' idea and developed it along practical—and humorous—lines.

Here, then, is Silver-screen, the Community Super-Beautiful and Super-Moral.

Accommodations, and Manner of Living

LIFE, in Silver-screen, is based on the old patriarchal system of "we are all just one happy family" upon which has been superimposed the guiding principle of the Marshal Stillman Movement—"give the movie artist a square deal."

The girls and boys are housed in separate dormitories, situated at the opposite ends of the community and further safeguarded by wide moats filled with broken glass and sulphuric acid. Each "dorm," however, has a large, well-ventilated and sunny community room, where, under proper supervision, girls and boys may on occasion gather to sing hymns, pull taffy or indulge in such stimulating games as "Logomachy," "Clap in and Clap out" or "Going to William Fox's." Further classification is made by housing those actors and actresses whose similar types give them interests in common. Thus we find the sinister sisters living happily together along the "Avenue des Vampires," while gay girlish giggles may be heard at almost any time of day emanating from the rose-clad purlieus of "Flapper Terrace." Over on the boys' side, all the Western types listen in to the radio at "The Ranch House," while the fan mail of the Sheiks may be addressed care of "The Mosque" on the corner of Coogan Street and Mae Murray Avenue.

With the curfew-bell ringing regularly at ten o'clock, it is readily seen how easily any particular member of the community may be located, when wanted. Furthermore, there is no marriage or giving in marriage in Silver-screen. The major portion of the success of the community has been ascribed to this admirable precept. True, many of the Supervisors are married, and live in pretty little cottages dotted about the landscape. But the Supervisors are in reality beings apart, busy with the administration of the community and like the gods on high Olympus rarely mingle with the less exalted inhabitants. And when they do, you can jolly well rest assured that they are as closely watched as anybody else.

Places of Interest, Buildings

CARRIED out to the smallest detail in the finest example of Cecil B. De Mille architecture, each building in Silver-screen is a veritable "thing of beauty." Space scarce permits detailed description of the many studios and permanent sets which, as Mme. De Montespan said of the Grand Cañon of Arizona, "need to be seen to be appreciated." One might mention, however, the gigantic cafeteria-automat where all of Silver-screen takes its simple but wholesome meals. The exterior of the cafeteria is patterned after Mont St. Michel (with improvements and additions), while the interior blends the best features of the Blue Grotto at Capri, the grand ballroom at Versailles and the lobby of the Pennsylvania Hotel. Another building of note is the Silver-screen Museum, which contains (among other things) a collection of canes loaned by Mr. Charles Spencer Chaplin, a curl shorn from the infant head of Mary Pickford, the original illuminated subtitle, "Came the Dawn," and the first pair of puttees ever worn by David Wark Griffith. The Administration Committee is now negotiating for the purchase of the 1920 Robert E. Sherwood derby, which, if secured, will be encrusted with a quarter-inch layer of twenty-two-carat gold-leaf and mounted on the head of a Milesean Venus, sculptured by Mr. Ferdinand Pinney Earle and posed by Miss Bebe Daniels.

Even of greater interest, perhaps, is the Artcrafts Building hard by, which contains the Playtime exhibition of the actors and actresses. Here may be seen the beautifully wrought samplers and knitted woolen goods, done by the girls in their spare moments, while the boys show their ingenuity in examples of chip carving, model boat building and pottery. A handsome medal is given every year for the best work, and competition is always at a feverish heat.

Making "THE BIG PARADE"

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

KING VIDOR believes the motion picture comes nearer music than any of the other arts. He sees the photoplay as breaking away steadily from the drama and literature. Whether or not you believe this, you will find Vidor's theories to be highly interesting.

"The motion picture play must have a rhythmic flow, a steady movement, a genuine musical beat," he says. "I believe that 'The Big Parade' is successful largely because we kept to this idea.

"Every scene of 'The Big Parade' was done to the music of the doughboy song, 'You're in the Army Now.' There is, indeed, a very real reason for its use in the subtitles.

The Belleau March

"To most audiences, the big moment of 'The Big Parade' is the march thru Belleau Woods in the face of German machine-gun fire. That march evolved in an unusual way. Before we started shooting 'The Big Parade' I had studied a mass of official war film made at the front. Each time this mass of film was projected, one brief stretch of celluloid hit me between the eyes. It shows the burial of a young officer in a small French town.

"Now there was nothing particularly gruesome about that scene and yet it chilled me each time it flashed upon the screen. In fact, it annoyed me so much that I told my assistant to cut it from the film before running it off again.

"Then I began to wonder why that bit of film got to me. I had it projected—and suddenly I realized it was the slow march of the soldiers that chilled me. The doughboys were schooled, of course, to move at a normal drill time and the funeral march slowed them down to half that. Each time a man lifted his foot there was an odd, hesitating, gruesome second. It symbolized the doubt of death.

"I'll try that on the march thru the woods," I thought. "So when the march was filmed—and it was the first episode we made—I had a drummer beat the slow time. Involuntarily, the men moved thru the woods with the slow shambling yet steady march that stands out so strongly as picturing the destruction, terror and mental drunkenness of war.

"The first day we tried the drum the military experts rushed up to me. 'That's all wrong,' they protested. 'It's impossible.' 'I know it,' I said, 'but we're going to do it that way.'

SAYS KING VIDOR:

"The motion picture play must have a rhythmic flow, a steady movement, a genuine musical beat.

"Every scene of 'The Big Parade' was filmed to the music of the doughboy song, 'You're in the Army Now.'

"It isn't possible to achieve complete realism on the screen. In fact, the photoplay can never become an art if it tries to."

Complete Realism Impossible

"It isn't possible to achieve complete realism on the screen. In fact, the photoplay can never become an art if it tries to. The films must translate life, even idealize and temper it. They must give the feeling rather than the photograph of a scene.

"Suppose," said Vidor, pointing to a table in the Ambassador dining-room, "suppose John Gilbert were sitting there. Suppose he looked out the hotel window and saw the girl he loved. In real life he would mask his feelings and go on with his bread and butter. On the screen he would have to mirror a half-dozen emotions. It is the same way with the picture of any happening."

Vidor returned to his description of the making of "The Big Parade." "After the march sequence," he went on, "we realized we were right. We shot every scene to march music. In fact, we went thru the continuity and, with the aid of a metronome, marked the time of every scene.

"The parting of the lovers was filmed to this march. When the drama speeded up and the men were sweeping away to the front, the action speeded up to double time. The beat doubled—and you unconsciously feel that in watching the boy torn away from his French sweetheart. Thru all those scenes of Rénée Adorée seeking for Gilbert, a squad of soldiers ran up and down at double time."

Pictures Plus Music

VIDOR continued. "You are going to find a steady movement toward the blending of pictures and music. Every successful picture must have its rhythm. I am (Con. on page 71)

How Fairbanks Took

Doug Fairbanks, as the adventurous hero of "The Black Pirate," watches the buccaneers on their lonely treasure island

THE motto: "Take color out of color" would hardly seem an apt choice for a picture in which there is not one single foot of black and white; yet Albert Parker, the director of Douglas Fairbanks' latest picture, swears this was "The Black Pirate" slogan from six months before the first scene was shot until the last scene of the last print was dry. An incessant battle was fought from the beginning to the end; and the enemy was—color!

If you and I were to speculate upon the making of a colored picture, our first thought would most likely be to push to the furthest extreme what we considered its most obvious potentialities. A thought somewhat like the following would undoubtedly be the first to enter our minds: "Color?—ah, sunsets and rainbows! Brilliance!—play it to the limit!" But what would we find as our result? In all probability a product that could only be fittingly described by some such burlesque title as "The Cullud Buccahneah." But it was not so with these pioneers in the field of what we might well call "controlled" color—after the first they took the precaution to have a second thought.

But I'm getting ahead of my story.

The Color Idea

THE inescapable impression made by Mr. Parker when one first met him—an impression strengthened by each succeeding moment—was of a man bursting with enthusiasm for this new idea, but trying hard to control it for fear that, being so close to his subject, he could not focus sharply, nor get a true

Doug Fairbanks experimented for six months before he started shooting "The Black Pirate" in color.

First a definite color scheme was worked out, green and brown. Costumes, make-up, even wigs, harmonize to this color scheme.

Fairbanks followed the precepts of art in idealizing nature. His skies are almost white, with a tinge of warm brown.

It was found that twice as much light was needed as in black-and-white photography.

the Color Out of Color perspective. But, before even a very few moments had passed, a second enthusiasm, of a strength sufficient to wage lusty battle with the first, appeared and made itself observed. And this enthusiasm focused sharply in the person of one man: Douglas Fairbanks.

"It's a revelation to work with him. For a director, even one who thinks he has a thoro knowledge of the industry, it's like going to college after completing school!"

And the reason for this interesting statement is undoubtedly admiration for the throness with which everything is undertaken—the "second thought" alluded to above being an excellent example.

"Mr. Fairbanks' first reaction to the mention of color was:

'Would you rouge the lips of the Venus de Milo?' But then he had a second, and that was to find out why color should seem to be an unnecessary 'painting of the lily.'"

Six Months' Preparation

AND this simple second thought meant work, and plenty of it. In fact, it was six months before the labor entailed by this little "why" was considered sufficiently advanced for them to feel justified in starting work upon the first scene. Six months!—how many of the usual "feature" pictures could they have made in this time spent in preparation for just one? But, also, which would we rather see? This six months' period was spent in searching new and entirely unexplored fields. At first, all the fields explored seemed barren deserts; not one yielded a single kernel

Fairbanks holds off the villainous pirate crew in "The Black Pirate" to protect the heroine, Billie Dove of even the poorest grain. But, at last, one was found that seemed to hold magnificent promise of a fruitful harvest—and this was a study of the Old Masters.

Mr. Parker's enthusiasm grew beyond all bounds as he started to illustrate the reason.

"If I show you a Rembrandt, then take it away and ask you the color scheme, what would you say? 'Black and white,' most likely."

"Yes—or 'light and shade.'"

"Exactly! But it isn't! It's simply that the whole composition is in harmony. There may be reds, blues, and greens in it—but they are so harmonized it is the picture, and not a spot here and there, that impresses itself on your mind.

The Color Scheme

"OF course, we had to deal with movement as well, so we found it necessary to

MORE IMPRESSIONS

WE arrived at noon and Mary Pickford welcomed us cordially. They were setting the table in a little white cottage on the Fairbanks-Pickford studio lot, and Mary took us across the lawn to her beautiful bungalow. She showed us thru with some pride, and well she might, because it was a completely and elegantly furnished little home with every convenience, including bedrooms, kitchen, baths, etc. After that, Doug came up and shook hands with Corliss Palmer and me, then introduced Joseph Schenck and another man, all dressed in athletic clothes. Doug looked very fit, but Mr. Schenck looked quite undertrained and a trifle overfed. Doug announced that they must have their daily dozens before luncheon, which consists of a mile and a half canter around the course which bordered the lawn. Doug led them a merry chase, but Joe Schenck was right there with the goods. At our backs were some of the walls used in "Robin Hood," the huge ship used in "The Thief of Bagdad," and other massive "props" that figured in recent productions, including "The Black Pirate," which had just been finished.

"Now that the United Artists are to use this studio," Mary said, "I think we should change the name of the studio, because it would not be fair to the other producers."

"No," I said, "you and Mr. Fairbanks are the pioneers, and the others should honor you by recognizing that fact and letting the name Fairbanks-Pickford Studio remain as a landmark for all time."

* * *

IT is quite obvious to any visitor that Mary is very fond and proud of her husband. As Doug and the others were cantering around the running course, she pointed out to us the youthfulness of his figure and the splendor of his muscles. "You know," she said, "I never noticed muscles until I married Doug."

WHEN the runners had completed their mile and a half, and taken their shower and donned citizen's clothes, we sat down to luncheon. The table was wide enough to permit the host and hostess to sit at one end of it, side by side. I sat at Mary's right, on the side, and Miss Palmer at Doug's left, opposite; next to me sat Mr. Schenck, who is perhaps the wealthiest and most prominent picture magnate in the world, but one would never suspect it from his manner, because he is just as democratic, good-natured, and unassuming as a man could be. "Ah, liver and bacon!" shouted Doug joyfully, and the way he sailed into it indicated that it was a favorite dish in the Fairbanks-Pickford family. And we all enjoyed it, also the many delicacies that Mary had provided.

THEN for three hours we talked. If you think that Doug is merely an acrobat, you are very much in error. He is a highly educated, thoughtful man and his command of language is remarkable. They say that he is the best "showman" in the business, but this word should never be applied to a gentleman and a scholar of the attainments of Douglas Fairbanks. And Little Mary is in the same class. She is a far-seeing, wise, thoughtful little woman with high ideals, and her principal worry just now is about the way they are destroying beautiful Hollywood by cutting down so many trees in order to widen the streets, and because people are allowed to build houses that are not in keeping with the character of the community. But—more about this later. Also, more about the several other topics of conversation, which proved to be very enlightening.

MARY is very proud of Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., and is anxious for him to make good. "How fortunate," she said, "that he can sit here and listen to all you learned men. These boys will be the men of the future who will shape and guide the destinies of the future movies."

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS is the champion perfume collector and consumer of Hollywood. He has fifty-seven varieties and then some, and he is a connoisseur. I told him that I was glad to know at least one he-man who had the nerve to defy the conventions, and he said that he did not intend to deprive himself of the luxury of cultivating one of his senses simply because somebody once said "They're not doing it." There is a wonderful fragrance in the atmosphere in residential Hollywood, particularly in the evening, due to the orange-trees and every variety of flowers that bloom winter and summer, but Doug likes to have his fragrance all the time—at home and at work. Shall we call it æsthetic taste, or one of the eccentricities of genius? And Doug certainly is a genius, and from many different angles.

Mr. Brewster visits Norma Talmadge, Ronald Colman and Director Clarence Brown of HOLLYWOOD

By EUGENE
V. BREWSTER

ONE peculiarity about Doug is that he seldom wears jewelry. Perhaps he can't afford it. He carries his cigarets loose in his pockets, there is no stick-pin in his scarf and no rings on his fingers except a tiny wedding-ring. Instead of an elaborate, gold, diamond-studded scarf-clasp such as most men of wealth wear, he uses an ordinary, common pin.

* * *

I WAS curious to know if Mary was like most wives and permitted her husband to manage her business. I soon found that she was not. She manages her own productions and Doug manages his. And they even have quarrels about them, but in a perfectly good-natured way. I even imagine that Mary is a wee bit jealous of Doug's successful methods of exploiting a picture, altho she refuses to copy them. However, she thinks she has a masterpiece in "Sparrows," her latest picture, just finished, which deserves a "première" on Broadway commensurate with its importance, and I think she intends to hold it back until late summer and put it on in a big way for a limited run before it is released generally.

"I FEAR," said Mary, "that my public is not the same as Doug's. He appeals to the people of all classes, particularly the boys, while I appeal to the poorer classes such as those we see in 'Little Annie Rooney.'" We all assured her that this was not true, that her appeal is universal. And it is.

* * *

I WISH that I had had a stenographer present taking notes at this remarkable luncheon. Mary, Doug and Joe Schenck are about the wisest trio I ever encountered, and a report of their remarks would make an interesting and valuable book. I shall try to give the gist of it to our readers in later issues.

* * *

At the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studio they showed me a few reels of Greta Garbo's unfinished picture. This striking young Swedish actress will doubtless appeal to many, but somehow I could not see the great coming star in her that her company expects.

I WANT all the young ladies and young men everywhere to know that, just because they can get a photographer to pose and light them so that a good photograph will result, this does not mean that they will screen well. The photographer may spend hours in getting just the right angle, lighting and expression to show the subject at his or her best, but this is quite different from appearing before a movie camera which sees all the bad angles and expressions as well as the good. It is a hard game, my dear boys and girls, as you would soon believe if you could be here with me and see the thousands who can't break in, in spite of the wonderful photographs that they have had made in a photo gallery.

THERE are several large studios well outside the limits of Hollywood, such as Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and De Mille's at Culver City and Universal at Universal City. Real estate is getting too valuable in Hollywood for a company to own several acres right in the heart of the city. First National is moving out near Universal City between Burbank and Lankershim, and several other movie magnates including Harold Lloyd and Cecil De Mille are buying acreage out that way, indicating that this locality may perhaps be the studio center of the future. Famous Players-Lasky have already arranged to vacate Hollywood's business center, but they are moving only about half a mile away. Fox is contemplating moving from Western Avenue, which is another crowded business street where real estate is high. But Hollywood will always be the residential center for movie people of all kinds.

* * *

THEY have all sorts of research experts in Hollywood who are prepared to tell what color Cæsar's eyes were, what size sandals Cleopatra wore and the height of Joan of Arc's horse, etc., and they will show you photographs of houses, streets and people in the Fiji Islands or in any part of the world. But with all this, the directors sometimes make mistakes, and sometimes it is not their fault, because once in a while the star will refuse to wear a certain kind of head-dress or body-gear just because it is not becoming.

* * *

LAND in and around Los Angeles seems to be almost as high-priced as it is on Broadway, New York, and yet the Universal lot comprises no less than six hundred acres of it—and a mile across it.

RIGHT near the Universal lot at Burbank will soon be the new First National. They have already started building, and it will cost about a million and a half.

TH O subjected to every species of police restriction and censorship during the last half a dozen years, the motion picture industry has, nevertheless, made such tremendous headway in the land of chrysanthemums and cherry blossoms that today the movie is by far and away the most popular national amusement in the country.

Three-fourths of the number of the population of the empire go to the picture theaters every thirty days, altho most productions are scissored mercilessly by the censors, rendering the stories in some instances almost incomprehensible.

When one considers that the average Japanese fan is unable to read English, he begins to understand the subtleness of the Oriental mind, which is trained to perceive in mere suggestions the hidden meaning of things and the added complication he encounters.

The fans of staid Pennsylvania are well off compared with those in Japan. Kissing scenes have long been taboo. Hold-ups and ardent love scenes very often do not get by the censors, who consider such acts injurious to public peace and morality. Views of revolutions, especially those of the overthrow of a crowned ruler, are frowned upon by the police.

Yet, with all the limitations and obstacles in its path, the popularity of the movies grows rather than declines. Scarcely a month passes in any of the larger cities in which a new playhouse is not opened. There are six hundred theaters today showing motion pictures exclusively in the tiny island empire. Fifteen years ago there was none. The theaters are, however, with a few exceptions, tiny affairs.

Every motion picture house is divided into three sections—one for men and boys, another for women and girls, and a third for married couples. Police officers are assigned to each theater to see that the regulations are observed. Regardless of how crowded the men's section may be and how vacant the women's is, no male is permitted to sit in the enclosure reserved for ladies. This was done some years ago to safeguard public morals, when it was discovered that love scenes on the screen caused the more emotional among the audience to behave improperly.

A Japanese generally sees at least twice the number of photoplays that an American does, for the reason that whenever he goes to a show he views a "double bill." Two or three feature pictures, besides a newsreel and a comedy, are run by practically all houses. Recently, in an effort to safeguard the eyesight of the people, the police have issued a regulation to playhouses forbidding them to exhibit more than thirty reels of film at a performance.

A thirty-reel performance, however, is a comparatively short program for a Japanese theatergoer who is a habitual viewer of stage plays, for that person has been in the custom of entering a playhouse at four o'clock in the afternoon and remaining until eleven at night. In fact, until comparatively recently, it required three days to stage certain lengthy spoken plays, the performers acting several hours a day, and the audience bringing along dinners with them. Even at present every stage theater has a café, where meals are served during the intermissions, while in practically every playhouse hawkers carry candies and soft drinks up and down the aisles.

In America the loud subtitle reader is a menace. In Japan he is a blessing. Subtitle readers are hired by the dozen by each theater to translate the titles as they appear, and to shout their translations to the audience. There are more than eight thousand regularly paid subtitle readers in the country, and a skilful interpreter increases the value of a picture to a great extent. Imagination is employed by some of the men, who succeed frequently in altering a weak story.

Photoplays were first produced in Japan about twelve years ago. Shortly thereafter, an ingenious stage director chanced on the idea of taking close-ups and long shots of stage scenes in studios and out on location. His actors and actresses would begin a performance on the stage, but as the story progressed and necessitated a broader field of action, or the registering of emotion by the players, that particular scene would be flashed on the screen.

Miss Tsukuba, again, this time as she appears in a Japanese Mack Sennett comedy

Kayoko Saijo, another popular Japanese actress, in American and native dress

This, however, while still occasionally seen, is gradually disappearing, for the reason that many of the stage celebrities do not photograph well, and those that do register satisfactorily become movie actors and actresses.

While on the stage, the majority of feminine rôles are played by men, women have from the very beginning established themselves firmly in motion pictures. At the Kabuki-za, the largest theater in Tokyo, no actresses are employed. On the other hand, while there are only a handful of male film stars, all studios are crowded with actresses.

Love, such as is known in the West, was something little known in the Far East until the advent of the photoplay. Marriages were invariably arranged by parents and friends. This system was agreeable until American movies were introduced. Then, the Japanese, being great imitators, decided to give Cupid a tryout. He turned out to be a comparative success.

Unlike in the Occident, however, the happy ending of Western love in Japan seems to be death, and as an indication of the rapid spread of this variety of "love," one has but to note the tremendous increase in the number of "double suicides," in which a couple binds itself, the man and woman facing each other, with a rope or sash, and jumps into the ocean, the pit of a waterfall or into a lake. Thus, a certain percentage of photoplays end with a double suicide scene, for it is difficult to produce a picture that is not based on love, while it is difficult to portray a "happy ending" on the screen in Japan owing to the censorship ban on kissing and embracing.

Recently the censors lifted the ban on kissing, so far as American and European actors and actresses were concerned, to see the effect this move towards Westernization would have on public morals.

Should the result be satisfactory, it is likely greater freedom will be permitted Japanese actors.

Today special scenarios are being written for Oriental players, and it is a question of time when Japan will produce a "Passion," bring forth a Pola Negri, or perhaps another Sessue Hayakawa, who, by the way, with Madame Miura of operatic fame, is extremely unpopular in his native country because of the parts he and Madame Miura have played in stage and motion picture productions.

Motion picture theaters in Japan are divided into three parts: one for women, one for men and a third for married couples.

The average program numbers thirty reels.

Since few can read English, subtitle readers are employed by the theaters. There are eight thousand regularly paid subtitle readers in Japan.

Film kisses are now permitted in Japan for the first time.

MOANA: A Poem of the Cinema

By MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

ON certain notable occasions the cinema, but recently elevated to a place among the Seven Lively Arts, has positively suggested the strongest claims for a place in the major arts, where "liveliness" is utterly beside the point.

Such a case is Robert Flaherty's poetic film of the South Seas, "Moana." In the unique hour of beauty, understanding of life, peace-with-one-self, that it gave, this film rivaled some of the highest flights of any human arts.

Unique Production

AFTER all, the supreme quality of any art is to create so powerfully the illusion of your living another's life, or within another man's vision of the world, that you swiftly forget the disagreeable breakfast only this morning, the day's quarrel, the bills at the end of the month—in your own complete absorption or merging with what is going on before you.

"Moana" will probably remain the unique picture of this season. There was no plot! No Hollywood stars! Only beautiful savages living their simple lives in a far-off tropical island that might very well have been the Garden of Eden. . . . I do not propose to review it here. I should like only to extract, if I can, some of its magnificent hints of what can be done on the screen. Men have progressed only thru great gambles or experiments with the unknown. The cinema perhaps may read its future greatness in such things as "Moana."

Robert J. Flaherty

Fq-an-ga-se, the heroine of "Moana of the South Seas"

"Moana" begins in the upper branches of two kava-trees, weird, feathery, luxuriant

Well, what is it that Flaherty tried to do—he who had given us something so different from the usual Hollywood product in "Nanook." Different and yet universal in its appeal.

"The art of life," Flaherty said to me, "interests people everywhere, more than anything else—how people live, fight, suffer, worship God, anywhere in the world, Alaska, New York, or the South Seas."

I think Flaherty has touched the heart of it all right here. This is evidently what "Moana" had that made it so thrilling to watch, altho lacking in more obvious tricks of the screen or the stage.

Study in Physical Beauty

IN every film you feel the style of the director dominating players, sets, sequence, photography; you feel whether he is sentimental or cynical, intelligent or frivolous or sensitive. Flaherty, then, seems more than anybody else to respond to the physical beauty of trees, human figures, water, sky. He dwells on these things lovingly; they have meaning for him, and he goes from one to another in such wise that they take meaning for us. He is a poet, and in Samoa he found and brought back almost more beauty than a single film could hold.

But above all he is a thinker—how few directors are that!—and in "Moana" he has touched on certain ideas which at this moment concern us all very deeply.

If the public flocked to "Moana," I ascribe it to the Florida boom and the rage for the Charleston. These things seem to

JOB Y From the Tennessee HILLS

By
ALICE L. TILDESLEY

WHEN Jobyna Ralston has all the money she wants and needn't worry about parts in pictures, she knows what she is going to do.

"There's a woman who drives around Hollywood in a perfect wreck of a car, wearing a man's battered hat and a flannel shirt. The car has a peach of an engine, and the woman always looks comfortable and seems absolutely happy. Whenever I see her, I say to myself: 'There I go—some day!' Wouldn't it be fun?"

"She's terribly attractive and so free! Makes me remember when I was a little girl on our Tennessee farm going coon-hunting in the dark of the moon. I never wore anything but overalls then. My brother was no more of a boy than I was. He's a year younger but we were about the same size.

Back in Tennessee

"I WENT back last summer. Everything here is clean and new and beautiful, and in five years I'd forgotten how old and dirty and ugly it is back there—only what God made was lovely. California spoils you!

"When I came here, I was very much of a kid and I didn't want to be. I saw important stars at Cocoanut Grove, sitting back—not dancing—but wearing terribly smart, sophisticated clothes, and I yearned to be like them.

"After I'd been working awhile and had some money, I went to town one day and bought a gown. Not a dress, but a gown minus a back and with practically no front. I looked like the Queen of Sheba or Theda Bara before she went into comedies. But before I could get out of the house I had to pass inspection by my mother, and by the time I got away from her, I had bibs and shawls and guimpes tacked in the gown and nothing could have persuaded me to go out in it!

"Don't I look the perfect ingénue today?"

Beneath her black poke bonnet with its shell-pink lining, her face looked out demurely, chestnut curls framing its pink and white. Blue eyes starry, lips a Cupid's bow. A rose caught the fichu of shell pink above the black satin skirt. She might have stepped from an 1830 painting.

Clothes Make the Girl

"CLOTHES give me a different feeling. In these, I'm almost useless. Somebody has to pick up the things I drop. That's why I brought him."

The pronoun referred to Roy Brooks, one-time comedian on the Roach lot, now making himself invaluable with Harold Lloyd.

"I like sports things. If I had on a sports dress that I felt right in, I could meet the Prince of Wales and never quiver. . . . There goes something else, Roy."

"Your purse— Oh, wait—here's your handkerchief! The trouble with you is you have too many props," complained Mr. Brooks, as we entered the dining-room. "Count 'em and I'll gather 'em up when we leave. I warn you I won't go bouncing back after anything. Four. Sure that's all?"

"I make five," observed Jobyna. Her mind returned to wearing apparel.

"The second part I had after I arrived in Hollywood, was leading lady to Max Linder in a burlesque of 'The Three Musketeers.' I wore the wide skirts Marguerite de la Motte wore with Douglas Fairbanks, but I was so very flat in the tight bodice that I looked like a broom-handle sticking up out of a straw stack. I was just a kid.

"Take Her—and Pad Her!"

"MAX LINDER took one look at me, tore his hair and cried: 'Am I to make love to a child? Take her away and pad her!' They did—rolls of it—I swear I was like a sausage tied in the middle, or a washwoman out on a holiday!

"After that, I went to the Hal Roach lot and did one reelers for a year. One a week. Every Saturday we'd finish the current picture at two or four or six o'clock, and dash down to the wardrobe rental house to get fitted out for next week.

"Great training—this week a South Sea islander, next week a Quakeress, the week after a Turkish princess and then a circus girl with a trained seal."

"Remember the Arab picture and how nobody knew how to put on the costumes?" broke in Roy Brooks. "They were mostly pieces of cloth and we hung them around our waists or over our heads or wherever seemed likeliest."

"Remember how the lion got away in the African picture? What was I that day? Something with a lot of heavy clothes, I know, for I could hardly run!" laughed

The tender flower with the curls finds herself disappearing over the horizon

MOVIE weather indications are for less ice Especially in heroines.

Fashions in girls change just about as often as fashions in shoes and skirts. And they are on the edge of another change. And two girls have made the change. Dolores Costello and Renée Adorée.

The tender flower with the little corkscrew curls dangling like Christmas tree decorations over her shoulders finds herself disappearing over the horizon.

The Girl Cycles

AND the extreme haughty and distant young icicle has an uncomfortable premonition that moving day is coming for her also.

I have seen all the girl cycles come and go; and this was the order of their coming and going:

Mary Pickford started the first spasm. She created a cult—an order of movie sisterhood, so to speak. This was so well recognized that the producers were entirely frank about it. For years, no producer ever said that he had found a new star. He said that he “found another Mary Pickford.”

Good heavens, they used to drop in from everywhere. They came not only from Chicago, Montreal and way stations; but there also were Swedish, Norwegian, Argentine, Greek and Chinese Mary Pickfords.

That none of them ever completely succeeded in being a Mary Pickford is another matter. But they were Mary Pickfords in so far as they had curls and round faces and innocent eyes—relatively innocent, anyhow.

There was a reason for them. When Mary Pickford first blossomed forth, all movie lighting was extremely crude. It was so raw and unrestrained that only the youngest face, with the rounded contours of babyhood could stand the fierce glare. The slightest suspicion of a line or a wrinkle looked like the moat of a castle. As a consequence, a movie actress at twenty years looked like an old hag tottering on the edge of eternity.

The Mary Pickfords faded away in herds for two reasons. One was better lights.

It was discovered that the real Mary Pickford had the soul of a great actress under the dangling curls; and most of the imitation Marys were just sappy. They were nothing but corkscrew curls to their backbones—and beyond. They affected baby stares and canines.

But nevertheless, Mary started a cult that lasted a long time. This was, in fact, the first movie species.

Came Lillian Gish

THE next raging sensation of the screen was the Lillian Gish kind.

She didn't really start a cult like Mary. But she started a technique.

Even to this day, I very rarely see a big emotional picture that I do not trace back some of the stuff to this or that play of Lillian Gish.

That futile beating of the hands on the locked door.

Harry Carr says that the fashions in film heroines have changed as often as the vogue in shoes and gowns. Mr. Carr divides the girl cycles as follows:

1. The Mary Pickford.
2. The Lillian Gish.
3. The Pola Negri.
4. The Gloria Swanson.
5. The peppy, unrestrained type of 1926.

That spasmodic clutching of the throat.

That maimed twitching of the lips. Perhaps it was unconscious on Miss Murray's part; but the pitiful movement of the corners of her mouth as she lay broken hearted on the bed in "The Merry Widow" was taken directly from Lillian Gish's death scene in "Broken Blossoms." It was so like it that I half expected to see Dick Barthelmess come in, dressed in Chinese clothes.

Some girls have tried to copy Lillian's funny way of running around in circles; but nobody has ever been able to get away with that except Lillian herself; and even she doesn't always. She says she got the idea from the fact that animals, when overjoyed, all run around in furious circles to show their joy.

Lillian did not start a cult because there weren't any more Lillians.

Now that I think of it, however, I observe that three of the most popular women ever seen on the screen have had no imitators. They stand alone.

They are Pola Negri, Gloria Swanson and Lillian Gish.

Oddly enough, it happens that these three are devotedly admired by other actresses. The most passionate "fans" I have ever known are movie girls themselves. They follow Mary

Three Stars With No Imitators

THEY are little Pola Negri gangs; little Swansons gangs and Gish gangs.

They burn incense before one or the other of these; but they do not try to imitate them.

You might as well try to imitate Yosemite Valley or a storm at sea as Pola. She is as much a thing apart as the smell of mountain sage, or the flash of sea phosphorus. She is just Pola; that's all.

The recent popular hits of the screen have not been scored by flappers, says Mr. Carr.

It is impossible for anyone to be like Gloria; because Gloria is a strange combination of the exotic with the downright practical. Just when you decide that Gloria is a cafeteria cashier stepping out, you suddenly change your mind and decide she is the Queen of Sheba come back to life. No one knows well enough where one begins and the other ends ever to make as much as an attempt to imitate the lady.

Just so, nobody knows what the real Lillian Gish behind the technique is like, well enough to imitate her.

So none of these ever created a cult.

The next cults that came along were the Norma Shearers and the Corinne Griffiths. They brought a new note. The aristocratic air. They frankly upstaged us; they ritized us. They had a little the air of "You can look; but mustn't touch."

And how we loved it!

The Ritzy Cult

THEY were a relief from the Pollyanna girls who tried to look like Mary. These Pollyanna young ladies were perpetually making round eyes at the world—oh so wistfully. And they thought that

The NATION of the Happy ENDING

So Ernest Vajda describes America

By FRANCIS L. PERRETT

Hollywood is the only city in America where kissing is properly done.

It is also the city of "too many too beautiful girls": they fall on one.

American life makes up in vigor and enthusiasm what it lacks in sophistication and intrigue.

American women dress better and have more social ambition than the women of any other nation, but they don't know how to WEAR their clothes.

The most interesting woman in Hollywood is a homely one. (Unnamed)

The stage perpetuates the author; the screen, the actor. If movies had existed in Shakespeare's time, the Bard of Avon wouldn't be known today, but the actors and actresses who played Romeo and Juliet, Portia and Hamlet, would have been immortalized instead.

WHOA! Just a minute! Shall Ernest Vajda be shot at sunrise for heresy, or shall he be fêted in the drawing-rooms of fashionable society for his "novel view-point"?

Ernest Vajda

Hollywood hasn't decided yet, but it is still getting a tremendous kick out of the opinions of Mr. Vajda. (Pronounced Voya—no one knows why.)

Mr. Vajda is the Hungarian dramatist who set Europe on fire not so long ago with a number of extremely brilliant plays. "Fata Morgana" was foremost among them. It has played for long runs in most American cities recently.

Furthermore, it appears that the classic line—"I used to be a newspaper man once myself"—isn't confined to the United States. Mr. Vajda used to be a newspaper man once himself—he tells you—in Budapest, the capital of Hungary. Being a newspaper man—or journalist as he calls it—in Hungary is merely another way of saying that one has starved in one's day.

On to Hollywood

SEVERAL months ago Ernest Vajda came to New York where he had three plays successfully running on Broadway. His idea was to write another, one particularly suited to American life. He took up the study of English and progressed rapidly. Meanwhile, Brother Victor, his business manager, was always at his elbow. Brother Victor doesn't write plays. But he does know English.

Paramount had purchased the picture rights to one of his plays, "Grounds For Divorce." Soon after his arrival in New York, Jesse L. Lasky had a talk with him at lunch. Jesse has a poker face, you know, so Mr. Vajda thought nothing of the conversation. It was just a nice social chat.

About three days later Mr. Lasky requested that Mr. Vajda's "The Cat's Pajamas"

"HAVE the films changed in the last year?" said Irving Thalberg, the little czar of the Metro-Goldwyn organization, repeating my question. "I'll say they have. The photoplay has been totally transformed during the last twelve months.

"A year ago our best stars, directors and players were moving along in a mass. Today a few stars, directors and players are galloping ahead. The rest of the army is straggling behind. Feature pictures today are really feature pictures, with better acting and better direction than was visible anywhere on the screen a year ago. And, when I say acting, I mean acting all the way thru a picture, to the smallest rôle.

"Audiences are no longer content with the average program picture of yesterday," continued Mr. Thalberg, in paying his tribute to the present tendency, in many film theaters, to subordinate the film to cheap vaudeville. "That seems to me a confession of weakness in picture making," he said. "It can not last. It is just a passing incident, an attempt to substitute something a theater manager can get easily for something he can't get. Pictures are here to stay. Nothing can stop their progress."

Thalberg's belief in the progress of pictures seems to be proved, on Broadway at least, by the presence at this writing of a number of highly successful features: "The Big Parade," "Stella Dallas," "The Black Pirate," "Ben-Hur" and "The Merry Widow."

The weakness of Rex Ingram's "Mare Nostrum" is another proof of Thalberg's argument. The Ibañez tragedy seems four or five years behind current productions in directorial technique. Yet Ingram has been away from America hardly two years. In those two years, however, the cinema has burst its bonds, as Mr. Thalberg contends.

Last month we named the six best sellers of the screen. At that moment of mental stress we had not observed Greta Garbo, who makes her American début in "The Torrent," by the Spanish Elinor Glyn, Señor Ibañez.

FLASH

By F. J. S.

We hasten to add Miss Garbo to our list. Since Pola Negri flashed her smile over Louis XV's boudoir screen, the films have had no one so vivid as Miss Garbo promises to be.

Again the American films seem to have safely disposed of the German menace. Once before German productions frightened our native screen strongholds. We can recall when Hollywood threatened to arm itself against "Passion," "Dr. Caligari" and kindred decadent films.

However, screendom solved the problem by engaging Pola Negri and Herr Lubitsch.

Now, with another German advance on the horizon, our film fathers have signed Emil Jannings, Lya de Putti, F. W. Murnau and other threatening figures of celluloidia.

Herr Jannings will be playing Bebe Daniels' father before long, Miss de Putti will be getting engaged to Rudolph Valentino, and Murnau will be directing Tom Mix. Screendom is like the ancient Chinese empire. It swallows up its enemies and never loses its bland and guileless smile.

Last month we modestly mentioned the fact that, in the August, 1925, Classic, we had selected twenty pictures out of the year's 950 productions as the probable hits for the next twelve months. Out of the twenty selections, we hit ten positive hits, "La Bohème," having romped home a box-office success since last month. Thus our guessing average advanced to .500. We missed just one hit of the year, "Stella Dallas."

For next year, we're going to select twenty-five, of which fourteen are here given:

James Cruze's "Old Ironsides."

Fritz Lang's German special, "Metropolis."
We'll add the rest next month—when the next special of King Vidor, whatever it is, will be included.

We base our selections, as you may note, largely upon directors' past performances. Making a list of possible hits, consequently, gives an interesting insight into the shortage of good directors. It is possible almost to name them on the fingers of your hands.

Of native directors, we would name King Vidor, D. W. Griffith, Henry King, John Robertson, James Cruze, Clarence Brown, Malcolm St. Claire and possibly Gregory La Cava.

Of the foreign contingent: Erich von Stroheim, Ernst Lubitsch, F. W. Murnau, Fritz Lang and possibly Ewald Dupont.

Gone are the Dwans and Neilans. The list seems to shrink each year.

Now that the first pupils of the Paramount School have been graduated, it is possible to take stock of actual results. We have even viewed a complete motion picture play made by the students under the direction of an experienced puttee wearer, Sam Wood.

One thing is proved clearly: it isn't possible to turn out players this way. The first class of the school reveals one boy of promise, Buddy Rogers. But almost any set of twenty aspirants selected with any sort of care would disclose one possibility.

The truth is, as we have said, you can't make actors this way. The right sort of experience can only be gained in actual studio work. True, the students are taught etiquette, proper deportment, swimming, fencing, dancing, how to fall gracefully, and other of the finer arts.

We can't help being reminded of the remark made by Richard Dix when he glanced over the school's graduation program. "Why, I wouldn't have lasted a week at the school," he sighed. "I can swim but I can't fall down with any sort of grace. I can't fence, I'm a rotten dancer and what I don't know about etiquette would fill a book. I certainly was lucky to land in pictures before they started schools!"

Since this page is largely devoted to predictions, let's venture another.

John Robertson has just joined the Metro-Goldwyn directorial staff. Robertson has made at least two pictures hovering on the edge of greatness: "Sentimental Tommy" and "The Enchanted Cottage." Thalberg, who helped lift the promising King Vidor to practical leadership of our films, will be able to bring out the best in Robertson.

Robertson is one of our best screen stylists. He has charm, singular appreciation of beauty and a whimsical imagination. He has been handicapped by having to make star pictures. Now he is going to do something really big—or we'll miss our guess.

Here is a bit of fresh comment by George Bernard Shaw upon the movies:

"The danger of the cinema is not the danger of immorality but the danger of morality. People like myself who frequent the movies testify to their desolating, romantic morality. There is no criticism of morals by

THE CELLULOID CRITIC

THE cinema ides of March have come and gone, leaving the laurel wreath more than slightly askew on the brow of the silverscreen Duse, Lillian Gish.

The histrionic talents of Miss Gish have come to be a sort of film tradition. We have been told of her genius by everyone from George Jean Nathan (not recently, however) to Joseph Hergeheimer. She was the lily maid who walked the lonely heights.

At various times I have been impressed with the Gish abilities. However, they have never dazzled me since Miss Gish departed from the Mamaroneck plantation of Marse Griffith. I looked upon both "The White Sister" and "Romola" as mediocre tests of genius.

It remained for "La Bohème," built from the Henri Murger story from which the Puccini opera was constructed, to disillusion me completely. Not, mind you, that "La Bohème" wont be a box-office smash. But it discloses the limitations of La Gish in ghastly fashion.

Lillian Gish's Limitations

MURGER, you know, was the first to write of the Latin Quarter's glammers. Du Maurier and others followed, but Murger was the pioneer in exploiting Bohemia, with its amours, its starving artists, its beautiful models and its gay abandon.

In "La Bohème" Mimi loves the poet, Rodolphe, she sacrifices everything for her love and she dies—a Camille of the Paris garrets.

My complaint about Miss Gish is that she does not fill the rôle of Mimi. She is pathetic, she is wistful, she is a Broken Blossoms waif, but she is never the little sister of the four Bohemians—Rodolphe, Coline, Marcel and Schaunard—who gave her all for love. She has good moments—Miss Gish is too good a technician to fail utterly—but she is never Mimi. The performance sharply defines her limitations. She can play suffering, broken heroines—but genius seems to me something else again.

The actual honors of "La Bohème" are captured by John Gilbert. Here is an actor with three astonishing characterizations in a row: the prince of "The Merry Widow," the doughboy of "The Big Parade," and now the poet of "La Bohème." Any one of these would make an unknown into a star. I am not sure but that his Rodolphe is the best of the trio. It has more breadth, swing and surety. It is a corking performance. Renée Adorée is a delightful Musetta and George Haskell, ex-musical comedy comedian, makes the rôle of Schaunard stand out. But the major credit of "La Bohème" must go to King Vidor, the director.

Vidor has now pretty definitely proved himself the best of our native directors. He injects a spirit and movement into "La Bohème." The tragic romance has both color and verve. Music lovers are likely to quarrel with the celluloid "La Bohème" because it fumbles favorite situations of the opera. This can be laid to the scenarist, Fred de Gresac, who doubtless was endeavoring to fit the romance to the milk-and-water way Miss Gish intended to interpret Mimi. This is not the fault of Vidor, who took his materials and achieved admirable results.

"La Bohème" will doubtless be a popular picture. But I can not forget the Broadway première giggles that greeted Miss Gish when, as Mimi, she fled thru the woods of the Bois de Boulogne on that gay spring day with her passionate Rodolphe in pursuit. Mimi was just a New England schoolma'am fleeting with her histrionic traditions. Miss Gish will have to do a lot of cinematic suffering before I can forget that.

Greta Garbo Arrives

WHILE it is painful to detail the eclipse of Miss Gish, it is pleasant to report the appearance of a new luminary on our screen horizon. The newcomer is a somber-eyed Norsewoman, one Greta Garbo, who seems to me to have more possibilities than anyone since the Pola Negri of "Passion." This Garbo has a fine abandon, a splendid fire, a surprising sense of characterization. She isn't afraid to act. That she was able to stand out of an inferior story, poorly directed, is all the more to her credit.

Miss Garbo makes her début in Vicente Blasco Ibañez's "Torrent," directed by Monta Bell. The Ibañez story is a cumbersome tale, of a Spanish girl tossed aside by a young Castilian dandy. She goes away, becomes a great singer and comes back to the little town, drawn by the old love. But, because of his mother, Don Rafael Brull repulses her again and she goes back to her footlights and her high notes. So La Brunno goes on her glittering way and Don Rafael putters about his fireside in carpet slippers, sighing for his lost romance. Ibañez points the un-Haysian moral that one should seize one's moment of happiness when and where one can.

The Ibañez story is full of claptrap, including the dam that bursts without having anything in particular to do with the story. Monta Bell has tossed it into film form without taking any apparent interest. It is just a mediocre production.

Still, as I have said, it has Miss Garbo as La Brunno. Here is a genuine spark. Miss Garbo ought to burn up the screen with any sort of logical rôle. Ricardo Cortez is pretty colorless as the drab Don Rafael.

"The Torrent" wasn't the only Ibañez novel to arrive during March. "Mare Nostrum," which Rex Ingram has been building casually between sun-baths on the beach at Nice, reached Broadway at last.

Another Ibañez Story

"MARE NOSTRUM" unfortunately came along about six years too late. Translated, "Mare Nostrum" means "Our Sea," the sea in question being the Mediterranean. Its story deals with a young Spanish sea-captain who forgets his wife and his son when he falls in love with a beautiful German spy. He becomes a tool of the German U-boats and, when he comes to his senses, he finds that he has unwittingly helped kill his own son. The spy comes to her death before the rifles of a French firing squad and Don Esteban Ferragut himself dies when his vessel is torpedoed by a German submarine.

The tragedy is studded with the old war hokum. Once again German spies rush about with satchels of germs. The story itself is pretty inferior. Ibañez arrived in the midst of the war hysteria, an excited third-rate novelist who wanted to achieve publicity and to force his neutral homeland into the world war. With the return of sanity, it is possible to view Ibañez clearly.

This is, of course, beside the point. Our case against "Mare Nostrum" concerns its unhealthy note. There is an extended love scene before a glass tank in an Italian aquarium. Here the passion of the heroine is awakened by her observance of the way live crabs are fed to an octopus. The heroine thruout the story borders on the edge of being a case for Dr. Kraft-Ebbing. The director, Mr. Ingram, takes a left-handed swing at religion by playing upon an ignorant and drunken servant and his faith in sacred emblems.

I credit most of the unsavory nature of the "Mare Nostrum" to Ingram. I doubt if any picture has ever nauseated me as did this production. I don't think the screen is the place for even a long-distance study in perversions. True, there are several interludes in "Mare Nostrum" that are very well done. One comes when the spy, Freya Talberg, faces the firing squad. The other develops in the bowels of the German U-boat.

But these are off balanced by one of the worst continuities that has ever reached the screen — and by Ingram's general insistence upon harping upon an unhealthy note.

Miss Terry plays Freya Talberg rather well. She far overtops Antonio Moreno, who plays Don Esteban Ferragut. In fact, I cannot understand how Moreno (Cont'd on page 70)

YOU have not seen Greta Garbo unless you have seen her in a storm.

True daughter of the sea-kings—tall, white-browed, and most divinely fair—her face lifted to the sweep of the rain, with a sort of exultation, water dripping from her yellow curls, lashes impearled, a strange light in her blue, blue eyes.

But you may not walk with her then. She walks in a storm "a-lone."

She Loves the Sea

SHE lives by the ocean, and spends all her time away from the studio beside it.

"I love the sea, yes. It understands me, I think. It is like the Old World, it is not happy, it is always yearning for something that it cannot have. . . . Here you are all so gay—you laugh—you talk, always very high—you run about—you live in lights and music, this jazz music—you are never still.

"Me—poor little Sweden girl—I come from a leetle con-tree where all things do not make for happiness. You—you would go mad if you live there. No jazz—no party—always quiet, yes? What would you do?

"American girls, they are wonderful! They can do everything. They ride, they dance, they play the games, they drive the car, they make their pictures, they run to parties, and—they fall in love. So-o, is not that am-azing?

"Me—poor little Sweden girl—can do on-ly one thing at a time. Now, for my new picture I must learn to dance the tango and to ride the horse."

She looked down at her trim riding suit, ruefully. She had just come in from riding the horse, and her strong, slim hands turned her black tricorne hat, slowly.

"That horse! He is so beeg. They bring him to me, and I look at him and he look at me. 'You are so beeg, I will never get on you,' I tell him. They put me on him and he stands still. 'How do you make him go?' I ask. American girls, you see, they do not have to ask. They know. Always they know.

"A Strange Con-tree"

"It is a ver' strange con-tree to me. But nize. You are all so happy. Everybody smiles and makes a joyful noise. I hear mothers say to their children: 'Are you happy, dear?' That is what is to you important, yes. Happiness. In the Old World, we do not think of happiness at all."

A moody young thing, Greta Garbo, with the true temperament of the artist and no idea that the present fad in Hollywood is to be "just folks."

The Screen's Newest Meteor Is a Moody Daughter of Sweden

Ruth Harriet Louise

Greta Garbo has corn-colored hair and somber blue eyes. She is naïve, oblivious yet of her success. And she is not yet twenty "Tell me," she said, suddenly, reaching for the package of letters that had just been thrust into her dressing-room. "what is this fan mail? I do not understand, no? These people, why do they write to me? Why do they want my picture? They do not know me. In Sweden, we do not have letters from people we do not know. Tell me, tell me what I must do?"

She is so helpless—so charmingly helpless—when she widens those almond-shaped eyes at you! ("She has the longest lashes in the world!" sighs an enamoured youth.)

Seafaring Family

SHE does not come of a theatrical family. Indeed, so far as Greta knows, not one of the Garbos before her ever trod the boards on any stage. They were seafaring men, who must, like Greta, have loved "the feel of the wind in their hair."

Greta went to dramatic school in her native city of Stockholm. Why? She cannot tell you, altho she has learned much English since that fatal day when she appeared on the set of "The Torrent" with her first American word—and so proud of it—"Hell!"

The dramatic school, like all such schools in Sweden, put on an Ibsen play. Greta was cast in a small rôle. While she waited in the wings for her cue, she could see a shadow on the wall back of the boxes. It looked like the shadow of a giant.

"That's Mauritz Stiller!" one of the other players hissed in her ear.

But Greta thought more of what she would do on the stage than of those who might be watching her. She gave all she had to give. The tall man standing in the door of the box was forgotten. . . . Until the next day when Greta Garbo was summoned to his office.

In Swedish Films

PRESENTLY the school was electrified at the announcement that Mauritz Stiller—the great Mauritz Stiller—had made little Greta Garbo the ingénue lead in "Gösta Borling's Saga."

So young she is—not twenty—half-woman, half-child. Naïve. Oblivious of the sensation of her passing. Greta alone fails to note that most of the men on the lot have found something to do on Stage One when Greta is called there, and that they stay there long after that something is done.

Manuel, Paris

Sessue Hayakawa has just returned to the New York speaking stage after four years abroad. He may return to the screen

IT has been said that, when a tree falls in the absolute solitude of a forest, it makes no sound. And a supposition such as this undoubtedly planted the devastating thought in the human brain that nothing we do is important unless it is seen or heard by someone else.

When we are very small and rock over backwards in a rocking-chair, we cast a canny eye about to see whether or not mother is about before we begin the first blood-curdling yell. If she is not in sight, and not in hearing distance, we get up and try it all over again. As we grow older, we may begin to paint what we honestly believe to be a masterpiece. And when a careless circle of friends shouts "raspberries," we pretend we were only fooling all along and take up stenography.

Eternal Longing

IF the friends do happen to find the painting good, our desire for praise becomes insatiable. We want the critics, the world, to give us their attention, too. The streets of New York, St. Louis and points west may be filled with pretty girls, and we may know it, but the big thrill doesn't come to us until some dusty English lecturer who has never looked into anything except thru a telescope, tells us that American women are the prettiest women in the world.

Fortune-tellers are swamped by intelligent men and women waiting to hear, "You're very sensitive, aren't you, dearie? And you brood too much."

The docks are crowded with reporters waiting to ask visiting celebrities who have never set eyes on us before what they think of us. Every now and then a prodigal son returns to the old home town after a few years' stay in Paris or London. And then how we rush to ask, because we feel pretty sure that he, knowing the native pulse, will find it in his heart to approve of us.

Just recently Sessue Hayakawa landed in the United States after three or four years abroad. He has been touring England in a play by the late William Archer, the author of "The Green Goddess," with considerable success. He has been making moving pictures in France with a French company. "La Bataille" is the most successful one. I have proof of his popularity there, for one night when I visited that ridiculously expensive and aloof resort, Charlot's Rendezvous, to watch Beatrice Lille, Gertrude Lawrence, and Jack Buchanan disport before the merry villagers, I noticed that the attentions of the entire company were turned toward the enigmatic Mr. Hayakawa. He even had songs sung in his direction. That's fame.

Hayakawa decried the modern tendency to standardize everything. Clothes, houses, even whole towns are exactly alike these days

Screen Dramas are Bigger and More Expensive, says Sessue Hayakawa, but They are Not Different

By SARA REDWAY

MR. HAYAKAWA is playing in "The Love City" at present and later, I hope, he intends to start west to make more pictures. And he, being an old hand at the picture business, must surely, I thought, be amazed at the progress made by them in the last few years.

"Well, what do you think of all our fine new movies?" I asked, "'The Big Parade,' 'Stella Dallas,' 'The Merry Widow,' to only name a few."

"Very nice, very, very nice," answered the imperturbable Mr. Hayakawa, "but not so very different from anything that has been done before. After all, the ideas are not new nor startling."

"But the productions are different," I protested.

"Yes, they are bigger and more expensive than they used to be. But to make my meaning clear, please do not think that I take an aloof and haughty tone of these undoubtedly fine pictures. I merely say they are not different. After all, there are not a great many plots in the world. There is always a heroine, a hero, a villain. There is always the struggle between good and evil. The hero may not be a person, it may be a situation; the villain may be a war, or some form of treachery, but the idea of the conflict must be present.

Shakespeare and the Danes

"YEARS ago, when Shakespeare was writing his immortal plays, he wrote them not so much for everyone as for a selected few. The queen and the court wanted something they alone could understand and appreciate, something that the common mind would find tiresome or baffling.

"So his plays were not written to make money by getting it from the multitude; they were not written to please all of England, they were written to please a chosen few.

"The thing then was to have something that no one else had. A house that was different; a gown made solely for you; a bit of music or a poem written for you and to you.

"But now that is all gone. Everyone now must be like

Mishkin

Sessue Hayakawa believes that to centralize the making of pictures in one place, as Hollywood, is dangerous. To form a community is death, he says everyone else. To wear a long dress when a short dress is in vogue is a sacrilege, all tastes must be alike. A man will say, 'I wish I had a house like So and So's'; he doesn't think of saying, 'I wish I had my house to my own taste and of my own design.' With the result that many of our cities look as tho they were scattered with row after row of match boxes, all alike, all tiresome. You find your way to your house by its number, not because it is different in design.

"Before the war in France, there was much more individuality. Now with the new houses being built, the reconstruction going on, the match boxes are creeping in everywhere.

The Match Box Rush

"THE reason for this is simple. French taste has not changed, but the French are suddenly forced to face the world commercially. They have not time to play with ideas any longer, they must get out and hustle. And to compete with the rest of the world they must hurry, hurry,

Letters to King Dodo

HOLLYWOOD.

Dear Majesty:

Obedient to your request to be kept informed upon the march of progress in Hollywood, I am writing to apprise Your Majesty that our immediate craze is war pictures.

Your Majesty well knows the ovine nature of movie producers, who all follow each other like sheep when some bell-wether happens to show the way. It was inevitable that the success of "The Big Parade" should set loose an avalanche of war pictures, altho if anybody had shown the script of a war story to a producer six months ago the unfortunate author would have been thrown out of the office.

But the amazing particular of this situation is the way in which the various arms of the United States military organization have been put to work for the movies. Lasky had barely completed "Behind the Front," with Raymond Hatton and Noah Beery co-featured; Warner Brothers had no more than christened their war baby, "The Sap," featuring Kenneth Harlan, than William Fox went them one better by purchasing the original stage play, "What Price Glory?"—the play that was responsible for launching the craze for war-time stuff.

But Metro-Goldwyn had been quietly preparing for the filming of a leatherneck epic to be called "Tell It To the Marines." And M.-G. had a contract with Major General John A. Lejeune, the commandant, giving the exclusive right for one year to film marines for photoplay purposes!

"What Price Glory?" is about marines at the front. Fox expected to take scenes of the real leathernecks in camp, on the drill field, at combat practice—thus cutting the cost of extra talent. So Saul E. Roger, his lawyer, proposes now to sue the United States Marine Corps. He will allege monopoly, conspiracy in restraint of trade, and so on.

Our military establishment has never boasted any great dignity, but the Marines have a tradition to maintain. The tie-up with the studio must have been made for publicity purposes, tho why General Lejeune desired publicity for his leathernecks when there are more applicants than can be recruited under congressional appropriation is puzzling to decide.

A dreadful thought comes to me. Suppose it should be necessary to call out our military again, to make the world safe for democracy, and we should find that all our forces had been farmed out to the movies and were unavailable!

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

I am happy to say that now I can supply Your Majesty with the data on Elinor Glyn requested in your gracious communication of recent date.

Your Majesty sought to know why Madame Glyn's characters so rarely die with their boots on, as is the usual fashion in movies, but endure long, lingering death agonies in bed. The reason is explained, I think, by the circumstance that Madame Glyn receives one dollar a word for her scripts. At a dollar a word Madame's characters can well afford to utter an ah, an oh and a couple of ughs before passing into the great beyond. Even a series of inarticulate gurgles just at the end will rate a dollar a gurgle.

When I visited Madame Glyn on the set, it was her Tea Hour. Everybody had stopped work to sip. The electricians, I noted, satisfied themselves with an extra chew of scrap.

Your Majesty may recall my mentioning that Madame Glyn is accustomed to select potential star material by means of a subtle quality which she is able to perceive and which she calls for short—It. In "Love's Blindness," the film on which she was engaged, Madame had need of a child for certain scenes. Before her in review passed the infant genius of Hollywood.

Suddenly Madame exclaimed: "That's the one! She has It!" A consultation with the mother, and then the little girl, who had been instructed to "be very nice to Madame and be sure and thank her," approached the presence.

"How would you like to play in my picture?" interrogated la Glyn, with a gracious smile.

Only for a moment did the child hesitate. Then—"I don't think I care so much about it—thank you!" she replied shrilly.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

Your study of the cinematic art has already made Your Majesty familiar with peculiar slogans which rapidly succeed one another in the mouths of the movie publicity managers. Your Majesty will remember how in times past, various parts of a picture have been acclaimed "the thing." First it was "The star's the thing!" Then story, director, and all the other elements were so lauded, each in turn.

But now a new slogan sweeps the boulevards. With the purchase of the Ella Cinders series from Bill Counselman and Charles Plumb as a vehicle for Colleen Moore, the press-agents have raised the shout: "The comic strip's the thing!"

Very likely they are right, for it has been demonstrated that more Americans read the comic strips of the newspapers than any other literature. In fact, they are the chief intellectual stimulation of our population, from the Tiny Tot at his mother's knee to the Big Business Man at his flat-topped desk of fumed oak.

One astute press-agent, who figured slightly in the Ella Cinders deal—a young man with vision, as we say in our country—hopped a train for New York and proceeded to sew up the sales rights on all available comic strips. The Ella Cinders strip will be utilized by First National. Andy Gump, the popular national hero, has already been immortalized by Universal. In a short time we may expect to see Mutt and Jeff, Jiggs, Barney Google and other hundred-per-cent. Americans imperishably embalmed in celluloid.

And Your Majesty need not fear that any evil effect will come out of this daring excursion into the realm of fantasy. For the young press-agent—the one with vision—has eliminated any such possibility. Let this idealist speak for himself.

"I have," he says, "eliminated those comic strips in which the sordid and disagreeable predominate and retained only those that possess all the touching, lovable and human things so dear to the hearts of the great American public."

Will Hays will bestow his papal blessing on that young man.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

Suing Harold Lloyd has become the favorite pastime of American authors—to such an extent that the popular comedian has been compelled in self-defense to issue a decree. Hereafter no stories, published or unpublished, received from outsiders, will be given a reading at the Harold Lloyd establishment.

As I am in the act of preparing this report to submit to Your Majesty, the news comes that Lloyd has filed an answer to the suit in which Owen Davis asks for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars damages, representing that the comedian palmed off the playwright's "Nervous Wreck" as a movie comedy entitled "Why Worry?" The suit of Mr. Davis is based chiefly on the circumstance that in both stories the hero is constantly taking pills—a favorite laugh-getting device, as Your Majesty no doubt recalls, in the days of the Elizabethan dramatists.

H. C. Witwer, writer of sporting tales, has also brought suit for two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, laying claim to Lloyd's comedy, "The Freshman," on the ground that it is an infringement of a football story he published in 1908 entitled, "The Emancipation of Rodney." Mr. Witwer bases his claim chiefly on the fact that in both stories the fool substitute goes in and wins the game.

Now if Burt L. Standish were still alive, he would have sufficient grounds for action. For Your Majesty will recall in the Frank Merriwell stories, which were read with such pleasure in your boyhood, that the substitute always went in at the last minute of play and saved the game. And very likely the only reason Cecil De Mille is not a bankrupt today is that Moses had gone to his reward long before the Great Director filmed "The Ten Commandments."

Lloyd is now engaged in making "For Heaven's Sake," in which he is probably safe from legal action, because Anatole France died last year and so far as is known the author of "The Revolt of the Angels" left no heirs.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

It is improbable to a degree that the fame of Horace Wade, Hollywood's youngest scenarist, should have penetrated as far as Your Majesty's distant Island of Oz. But in America we are prone to make much of what Darwin and his successors designate as sports—any creature divergent from the norm. Infant prodigies are our especial delight.

Master Horace, who is just turned seventeen, recently achieved a quantity of publicity by writing for the newspapers. In these days a seventeen-year-old who can put an English sentence together is indeed a novelty—of a piece with the horse that can count—altho William Cullen Bryant composed "Thanatopsis" at eighteen, and (which is much worse) Conrad Nagel recited it last summer in the Hollywood Bowl.

Pardon this digression, Your Majesty. What I mean to state is that Metro-Goldwyn, sensing the publicity value accruing to his name, snapped up Master Horace as a scenarist and put him under long-term contract—to the envy, it may well be imagined, of Joseph Hergesheimer and others.

Master Horace signed the contract just before luncheon. At 1 P. M. he received the assignment for his first story. He was to do a script for Peter the Great, the M.-G.-M. dog-star, and bring it back to the studio in the morning.

I must crave Your Majesty's pardon again, for, in spite of most assiduous efforts, I have as yet been unable to ascertain whether or not the finished story received the star's O. K.

Hollywood:

Dear Majesty:

I have the honor today of imparting to Your Majesty a piece of advance information that has not yet been promulgated by the Paramount press-agents, but which I happen to know is well authenticated.

Mary Brian will play Mitsi, the persecuted heroine of "The Wedding March," the story which Erich (correct) von Stroheim will soon begin making. The story was written by von Stroheim and he will play in it. Mitsi is his wife, the unappreciated spouse of a philandering scion of the Austrian nobility.

Needless to say, if she plays with von Stroheim, this young woman, now trembling on the brink of stardom or oblivion, will be securely tethered and Paramount will cash in on their investment in Mary. Mae Busch, Dale Fuller, Mary Philbin and Zasu Pitts all are von Stroheim discoveries. The truth of the matter is that von Stroheim can make any woman act.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

The latest mot in the Montmartre is the one designating Phyllis Haver as the eighty-thousand-dollar baby. It is a good laugh on the boulevard and a startling jolt for those benighted beings who believe that movie damsels are beautiful but dumb.

Pauline Starke is playing the leading rôle in Elinor Glyn's "Love's Blindness." Here they are having tea between scenes. Quite English, y' know!

Miss Haver outlicked a retired Omaha business man in a real-estate deal so badly that the speculator from the hinterland is crawfishing on his deal. He has brought suit against the bathing beauty for the aforementioned sum. Miss Haver, having long since laid aside the one-piece suit, is struggling towards stardom in dramatic rôles and investing her earnings in shrewd realty transactions. The Hollywood Chamber of Commerce is proud of her.

There is another indication that movie beauties are developing intellectually. One of them recently appeared on the speaking stage in a very advanced drama. Leatrice Joy it was who made her stage début in a production of Karl Schoenherr's play, "The Children's Tragedy," which, for bedtime reasons, was retitled "The Candle." It was shown with some success at the Potboilers' Theater. Miss Joy is under contract to Cecil De Mille and the press-agent took due notice of her excursion into the realms of art for art's sake.

I hope that Your Majesty will visit us soon and see for yourself the wonders of Hollywood.

Hollywood.

Your Majesty:

Corinne Griffith is in line for a big contract when her existing one with E. M. Ascher, releasing thru First National, expires in October, and it is known that she has been approached already with several big offers.

An executive of the Paramount organization offered her a cash bonus of fifty thousand dollars if she would permit him to buy up the existing contract, provided it could be negotiated with Ascher, and the signing of her services for a period of years. Miss Griffith rejected this because she does not want to sign for more than one or two years. Had it gone thru, she would have had her own unit releasing probably thru Paramount.

Warner Brothers made her an offer some time ago of ten thousand a week on a contract to start upon the expiration of the present one. As Miss Griffith's husband, Walter Morosco, has been made a director by Warners recently, it is thought that company has a good chance of interesting, altho it is said the star favors an independent unit and that Joseph Schenck is interested in her as an acquisition for United Artists.

Miss Griffith's pulling power has steadily developed in about as bad pictures as any star has had. With "Classified," a real box-office attraction, she has shown what she can do with good material. She has completed work in "Mlle. Modiste" for First National and is starting soon on a Russian story, "Into Her Kingdom." She has two besides this to make before the termination of her contract.

New York.

Dear King:

Doug and Mary arrived in town in time for the opening of "The Black Pirate." The usual mob surged about the Selwyn theater to watch the stars enter, while policemen shoved, pushed and punched the crowd back. Patrons with first night tickets literally had to fight their way into the theater. The New York police department seems unable to handle a screen opening.

When Cecil De Mille had to jam his way thru the struggling coppers and film fans, he said: "We do this much better in Los Angeles." "Well," snarled one of Manhattan's finest, "why don't you go back there then!"

Hollywood. iornia.

Gregory La Cava

Meet LA CAVA

With Two Richard Dix
Comedies This Young Director Has Established Himself

By DUNHAM THORP

“IN early youth a young man’s fancy lightly turns to thoughts of ART”—thus might we well start an extra verse to be added to that famous song. Thus also, begins the story of Gregory La Cava, the director “found” by that smiling brute, Richard Dix. Once the young artist leaves the “ivory tower” and enters the turbulent waters of the sea of life, the lightness of his fancy may perhaps be seen—and then comes that groping for firmer and more concrete foundations upon which to build the structure of a life. So, again, it was with Gregory La Cava—the man who, when first he embarked upon this sea, took the name of George Gregory, that he might not hurt that other Gregory who dwelt within the tower—but more of this anon.

The place was the basement restaurant of the Famous Players’ Astoria studio; and the time, lunch hour. Richard Dix gave his director a warning outline of the questions I would probably ask (birthplace and date, ideals, scarlet past, ambition, struggle to win, age, weight, pets, etc); and then, with one fell sweeping blow, smote me mightily upon the back—undoubtedly on the theory that this counter-irritant would take my mind from any possible sting his words might have carried.

Now that the background is indicated, let us focus our attention upon that central figure who is our subject.

Starting in Rochester, La Cava soon moved to Chicago, and there entered the schools and pursued his quest with great intentness. And, being an artist, naturally with great poverty.

“Three of us lived in a room we rented for eight dollars a month; with housekeeping privileges — when the landlady was absent.”

La Cava, Richard Dix and Esther Ralston between scenes of “Womanhandled”

At this time his one means of earning a livelihood—for, of course, his art could not support him—was job as usher in the Garrick, a theater owned by the Shuberts. His salary was the truly munificent sum of ten dollars a week. His job was, under all circumstances, to bar every person not possessed of a ticket of the proper date, size, and color. One day a man entered who insisted that the trivial matter of a missing slip of cardboard should not bar him—nevertheless, he was barred. And this man was Jake Shubert! He waxed wroth; and then gained peace in contemplation of this magnificent example of the steadfast devotion of a lowly menial to his duty. The usher La Cava’s salary was raised to twelve dollars a week! He was now the wealthiest member of his circle!

Still he painted on (“I believe I destroyed more

Replies to CLASSIC Readers

MAMIE S.—Greetings to thee, friend; come hither and I will conduct thee on a pleasant journey. Come! Let us reason together. Ronald Colman is married, but separated, and Norma Shearer was born in 1903.

RENEE B.—Well, you know what Shakespeare said, "'Tis beauty doth oft make woman proud; 'tis virtue that doth make them most admired; 'tis modesty that makes them seem divine." Jackie Coogan's first was "The Kid."

LOIS M. M.—Yes, I have heard that, but music is the language of the soul; jazz is its profanity. Bert Lytell was David in "The Eternal City." Yes, George O'Brien is playing in "Rustlin' for Cupid" with Anita Stewart.

PIL.—You can write the UFA films at 1540 Broadway, New York City. I haven't their Berlin address.

JEANNE M. S.—Righto, but moving day comes on May 1st, but every day in the year is movie day. Vilma Banky in "The Son of the Sheik." Yes, it is true that Harold Shaw, director and husband of Edna Flugrath, was killed in an automobile accident last January. He was a brother-in-law to Viola Dana and Shirley Mason. The husbands of all three sisters have died, but Viola remarried recently and is now Mrs. Maurice B. Flynn.

SHORTY.—So you think I am getting thinner. I'm on a diet, you know. Plenty of buttermilk, but no butter or milk. Bert Lytell is playing on the stage in California. Doris Kenyon in "Mismates."

ACCORDION W.—Well, I asked that player how old he was once, and this is what he said: "As old as my tongue and a little older than my teeth." Most of the players you mentioned are with Famous Players-Lasky, 1520 Vine Street, Los Angeles, California.

UNA S.—Well, you know Harry Carey's father was a judge and Harry came near being one. Henry B. Walthall got him to go with him and see Griffith at the old Biograph and that was the beginning of his screen career some fifteen years ago. Yes, you should see "Stella Dallas." Take plenty of handkerchiefs with you.

EVA R.—But every why has a wherefore. No, Richard Talmadge is not related to the Talmadge sisters. Georgia Hale and William Collier, Jr., in "The Rain Maker."

ELVA.—Colorado Springs first became famous by having Lon Chaney born there. Ten years later the stage claimed him, not as an actor, but as a stage-hand, then later a chorus boy, then a comedian, and then came "The Miracle Man" and Lon started on his way up the screen ladder and never stopped climbing.

JUST S. B. T.—Yours was mighty interesting. Someday I will run up and see you. Well, Ronald Colman, who recently completed "Kiki" with Norma Talmadge, is to play the leading rôle in "Beau Geste." Herbert Brenon is directing and Alice Joyce has the feminine lead, with Neil Hamilton, Mary Brian and Wallace Beery in the cast.

JULIUS A. P.—Gloria Swanson was born in Chicago. I dont know what her father ever did for a living. Richard Barthelmess is playing in "Ransom's Folly."

LADY VIOLET.—That's some violet correspondence card you have. Claire Windsor and not Mae Murray in "Dance Madness." Billie Dove, Francis X. Bushman and Grace Darmond are playing in "The Star Maker."

JULIET J.—Please, please dont send me any more chain letters. I have all I can do to answer my regular correspondence. HELP!

Hear ye, hear ye! All you folks who have questions to ask, come this way and you shall be heard—and answered. I have learnt a lot during the last eighty-two years, and it's all yours for the asking. Been answering ??? for the last fourteen years, and still going strong. If you want an answer by mail, enclose a stamped addressed envelope. If you wish the answer to appear here, write at the top of your letter the name you want printed, and at the bottom your full name and address, and mail to me. THE PRODIGAL DAUGHTER.—What's that you say about me—"You're darn, dog-gone, ding-busted clev-ah." Thanks, my child. No, I am not related to George Ade, First Aid or Lemonade. You just pronounce it Clive, with long "I," as in hive.

V. S.—All right, win your $10. Lillian Gish is not and never has been married. Jackie Coogan's twelfth birthday will come off on October 26, next. He started his career at the age of twenty months, but it was an accident. His father was on the vaudeville stage dancing and singing when the youngster walked out unexpectedly. The audience laughed and so daddy made him do his bit right there and then. Charlie Chaplin made him a screen star by getting him for "The Kid."

JEAN M.—I envy your going to California. Best wishes.

CLARISSA.—So you think Percy Marmont is a great actor and has a beautiful personality. Madge Bellamy was born in Hillsboro, Texas, June 30, 1903, so now you know her birthday and can send her a Rolls-Royce. She went on the stage in New York at the age of five.

RUTH L.—I dont see why it takes any courage to write to me. You want Richard Dix to choose the right one when he gets married. How can he do that? Gloria Swanson played in the following for 1925: "Madame Sans-Gêne," "The Coast of Folly" and "Stage Struck."

SEÑORA DE A.—Your letter certainly was full of comment for James Kirkwood. Norma Shearer's next will be "The Devil's Circus." "Kathleen Mavourneen" was written by Louise Crawford, an American writer of the nineteenth century. The music was written by F. N. Crouch.

QUENTIN F., Hong Kong.—How are you? So you think Mary Astor is the prettiest woman in all the world? To begin with, she was born in Quincy, Illinois, on May 3, 1906, and is playing in "High Steppers" with Lloyd Hughes. I haven't the address of Lucas Kanarian.

DOLORES 19.—Thanks for the gum. You know you can no longer put a man in jail because he owes money. For that matter, you can hardly put him in jail if he has money. Your letter was very interesting. Write me again.

VICTORINE V.—Railroads killed only 149 persons in the United States during 1924, while automobiles killed more than 10,000. So take your foot off the gas. I think you are a very good type. But try and get in.

ROSE A.—Well, I think you are a very nice girl from your letter. When girls are young they play with jacks, and when they get older they play with Jacks. You have the right idea. Vilma Banky and Ronald Colman in "Beauty and the Beast." Betty Bronson and Ricardo Cortez in "The Cat's Pajamas."

DOR.—Does that end it? Thanks for all you say. John Barrymore is playing in "The Tavern Knight." Yes, they do say that Eddie Cantor, the stage comedian, is going to play in "Kid Boots" in the movies. Run in again some time.

THE CAT.—Well, are you that curious? No, Lillian Gish is not married, and she never played opposite Ramon Novarro. That's that.

ALMA, England.—So you think THE CLASSIC does not use enough pictures of Pauline Frederick and Alma Rubens? Mr. Smith, N. B. Well, I guess you are the only one I've heard of who didn't like John Gilbert in "The Merry Widow." *

Vajda come to his office for another talk. It was a nice little talk. Mr. Vajda explained that he had come to New York to write a play of American life, and was leaving again for Europe.

But Mr. Lasky felt that travel broadens one, and that surely Mr. Vajda shouldn't go back home without seeing Hollywood. Anyhow, the upshot of the pleasant little conference was that Mr. Vajda and Brother Victor found themselves getting acquainted with the Pennsylvania railroad—en route to Hollywood. Mr. Vajda was enabled to make the trip because he had a contract in his pocket which called for four original screen stories at a price reputed to be $20,000 per story—on delivery.

Vajda an Exception

Now famous authors have come and gone in Hollywood. They come with a blare of trumpets. They address the women's clubs. They have offices at one studio or another. But they go, oh, so quietly. One hardly knows they have done. Witness Michael Arlen, who came to write an original story for the screen, stayed long enough to give various luncheons and get acquainted with his office, and next was heard of back in dear old London, giving interviews—albeit very flattering ones—on the subject of Hollywood. No, Mr. Arlen didn't get around to writing a story for the screen. But he did like his little trip to Hollywood.

But the story of Michael Arlen is not a new one. It has been done before, very often. In fact, it has been done since the days when Sir Gilbert Parker and a score of other noted authors were imported to Hollywood to write for the screen. They lived at the best hotels—on expense accounts. Sir Gilbert, he of the magnificent whiskers, stayed a whole year trying to get an inspiration, and then he, too, disappeared. He lent an air of distinction to the promenade at the Lasky studio—but he wrote nothing.

So when Ernest Vajda hopped off the train in Los Angeles, with the usual blare of trumpets, Hollywood merely said, "Ho, hum. Another famous author." Hollywood waited for Ernest Vajda to fade out quietly and be heard of next in Budapest, giving interviews on the subject of Hollywood.

A Story for Pola

MR. VAJDA went thru all the motions. He was asked to speak before women's clubs, and did. He was asked what he thought of Hollywood and the California climate, and he said yes—as he was supposed to. He stopped at the Ambassador hotel, and it was announced that he would write an original screen story for Pola Negri. It is nearly always announced that famous authors will write stories for Pola Negri. But they seldom do.

But then quite startling things began to happen. The rumor got around somehow that Ernest Vajda was working. He also moved out of the Ambassador hotel because he said it was too expensive. This, too was strange, because the studio was paying the bills. Authors seldom move out of the Ambassador as long as the studio pays the bills. He moved into a big spacious house, but not a fashionable one.

Mr. Vajda also liked the air and the scenery. Motoring was such a pleasure on California's fine roads. So he had Brother Victor, the business manager,

This was what really brought Hollywood to life. Authors and actors on their arrival in Hollywood, usually buy a Rolls-Royce or at least a Lincoln—on the installment plan. Mr. Vajda bought a second-hand, medium-priced coach, and paid cash for it.

Meanwhile Pola Negri, who had been to Albuquerque, or some similar place, on "business," returned. Mr. Vajda talked with her, and was seen no more for three days. Then he appeared at the studio with a seventy-six-page story, in "treatment" form, written especially for her. The studio officials liked it immensely. It was turned into a scenario, "The Crown of Lies," and Pola was starred in it. Brother Victor rang up the cash-register.

Then—"The Cat's Pajamas"

THEN he met Betty Bronson. She was a nice girl—so typically American. Mr. Vajda decided to write a story especially for her. He appeared a week later with it. It was called "The Cat's Pajamas," and was a delightful story of American life. The studio immediately accepted it, and co-starred Betty and Ricardo Cortez in it. And Brother Victor, the business manager, rang up another $20,000.

Mr. Vajda had originally planned to go back to Hungary when he completed the four stories. But it is now reported he has a new contract in his pocket for four more stories, and will remain in Hollywood for some time to come.

He has just completed his third screen original, "The Great Illusion," probably the greatest story of the three. He wrote it in two weeks. Hollywood hasn't caught its breath yet from astonishment.

Incidentally, an amusing story is told about the experience of the amazing Mr. Vajda with a publishing firm which desired to turn "The Crown of Lies" into a novel. They asked him what he would take for the book rights, or if he would let them have them for nothing.

"But I am not a business man, I am an author," said Mr. Vajda. "Why is it you should ask me to say how much?"

"It will be wonderful publicity for you," they said.

"Oh, will it?" explained Mr. Vajda. "But, alas, I am not a business man."

"Think of the publicity," they said. "What will you take?"

"I am not a business man," deplored Mr. Vajda, "but on account of all the good publicity, if you want the story I will let you have it for $20,000."

The story rights, needless to say, still remain intact.

Mr. Vajda's reactions to American life are startling Hollywood.

His Reactions to America

"KISSING in America is very badly done," he declared shortly after his arrival. "It seems your American men do not understand how to kiss. They give their wives a perfunctory kiss when they leave in the morning. I have seen men, quite as an afterthought on boarding a moving train lean back and take a random shot at a kiss in parting from their wives—never minding where it landed. It was an afterthought to business. Kisses are usually given in haste, in such public places as subways and railroad stations, or on the front-door step.

"Hollywood is the only city where kissing is properly done. A kiss properly done should be a long and lingering caress of affection and deep significance, not a casual salutation. Kissing is done properly in Hollywood because the movies know the technique. It is a beneficial thing, and I hope the vogue will spread thruout the nation.

"Hollywood is a city of too many too beautiful women. It is not alone in the movies, but in every walk of life—I do not know why. Venus de Milo waits on you in a café. Cleopatra checks your hat at the hotel. Beauty is everywhere. Beautiful girls no longer mean anything. They fall on one.

"The most interesting woman I have met in Hollywood is a homely one. She has a fascinating personality and a splendid mind. She was such a novelty that I was entranced. I shall not mention her name. That would be unfair.

Nation of the Happy Ending

"AMERICA is the nation of the happy ending. This is frequently criticized. But I believe it is a good thing, because it expresses a national view-point, a spirit of youth and strength and enthusiasm. American life is vigorous, ambitious, idealistic. In Europe a man is what he is. If a man is born in a middle-class family, he expects to remain middle-class. If he is a beggar, he expects to remain a beggar, and everyone expects him to remain one. In America he would be ambitious to become a capitalist in a few years, and no one would be surprised if he did so. America makes up in its youth and strength and idealism what it lacks in the charm of intrigue and contemplation.

"American women of all classes have the most beautiful clothes in the world. Even the stenographers dress well, and wives of all classes are always well gowned. But, alas, American women have not learned that half the art of beautiful clothes is in the wearing. They buy more beautiful things, but they do not wear them so well as European women wear simpler clothes. This is mostly due to lack of bearing, lack of taste, or the belief that spending money will buy anything, and that good clothes automatically look good.

"Screen authorship means but little in the realm of immortality. This is because the screen author thinks in pictures, not in written words. On the stage, the play lives, the player dies. Shakespeare will be living a thousand years from now, after every great actor who has played the rôles he has created has sunk into an oblivion that is beyond redemption.

"The great actors of the screen will continue to live thru centuries, but the screen authors will be forgotten. I doubt if Ernest Torrence will ever be forgotten. Charles Chaplin, Pola Negri, Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, Wallace Beery, all are sure of their niche in the hall of fame. Yet even a quarter of a century hence I doubt if more than a handful of people will know who were the authors of the great screen stories of today, even though they gave these players their rôles which made them famous.

"Authors who think only in pictures and who do not write in words are courting oblivion. I believe stage authorship should always parallel screen authorship, and I shall always continue it, and strive for greatness in the realm of the theater. We all desire our meed of immortality."

canvases than Rembrandt ever painted"), and still he lived in poverty.

About this time, he moved to New York; thinking, perhaps, that in a larger city a larger market for his paintings might lie hidden. But it was not so—in New York as well as in Chicago, he failed to make a living from his art. But still he persevered. The National Academy, The Art Students' League, and a battering from one odd job to another constituted his life at this time. And when the bills began to get a bit too heavy, he resorted to his mother.

"I thought nothing of it—there was money there, to be had when I wanted it."

But soon the pressure grew too heavy—it became absolutely necessary for him to find some way of earning livable income. He looked about, and, after some looking, the field of newspaper cartooning seemed to offer the greatest opportunities.

But that would mean the degradation of his art!—making of her a vehicle for existence, rather than expression! And later, when he would become a famous artist, the critics would know of his dark past, and trace the influence of the comic strip thruout all his most serious work. This second thought was more than could be born—so, to circumvent it, he took his second name as a surname; and blossomed forth as the cartoonist, George Gregory.

As he entered further in this work he had at first thought of as only a lesser species of "pot-boiling," he became aware of the fact that one cannot serve two gods at one and the same time—that, if he was to be a cartoonist of any importance, he must devote his whole time and energy to it—and let the dreams of his painting go the way of all other dreams. The dream faded, until at last the reality absorbed all his interest, as well as time and energy.

He was not long in the newspaper game before the field of animated cartoons—then in its wailing infancy—began to draw him. Here it was that he first made acquaintance with the camera—and gained knowledge that is now invaluable.

"Timing, for instance. I can almost always tell just how many frames it will take to make a given gesture."

It was natural that he should use the animated cartoon only as an entering wedge into the wider range of the film industry as a whole, and not as an end in itself. From cartoons to directing comedies for Johnny Hines was but the first step. And from there his rise was, for a time at least, steady—to culminate in a production that was remarkable.

This was a picture called "Restless Wives" that he made for C. C. Burr, a producer in the states-rights' field. We have all heard of the impossibility of making a presentable picture for the paltry sum of $125,000—of the inability to get actors who can act, decent sets, costumes—but you know all this fully as well as I. Well, the cast of this picture was: Doris Kenyon, James Rennie, Naomi Childers, Montague Love, Edmund Breese, Burr MacIntosh, Russell Griffith, Edna May Oliver, and others—and it was finished for the exorbitant sum of $35,000!—and was made in seventeen days!—which, of course, is the answer to the seeming riddle.

"In the early stages of his career," says La Cava, "one picture may well ruin a director. Making pictures with so small a budget was—well, to say the least, risky. If, for an extra five dollars I could make the picture look as tho another thousand had been spent on it, the picture had to remain looking a thousand dollars cheaper!"

"But the risk was the main thing. For, one breaking into the game must watch his step. If it rains, they fire the director!"

And so it was that, instead of jubilation, he turned back to groping. And to grope with any prospect of finding anything, he must give his whole time and thought to it. So he decided to quit the industry entirely until such a time as the course to be followed should become clear in his mind.

And—there was another consideration. "You know how it is with one of my type—you get a little money ahead, and you're not happy until it's spent and you're broke again—you'd throw the whole world down for $7.80!"

"I had married a short time before. So now I took the $7.80, my wife, and the Buick—and the four of us set forth on a belated honeymoon."

His groping was not aimless; nor was it directed to no point. After a time of searching, he found a course he felt satisfied might lead him up the mountain. This was: to return and become a director for Famous Players (there is no vagueness here—to decide definitely on one company, and that one of the largest in the field!)

But, one cannot walk into Famous and say: "Good Morning, I want a job directing."

So he pulled the few strings he had access to, and secured a job as a sort of general handy writing- and gag-man. As gag-man, he was assigned to the Richard Dix pictures. He met the star and liked him—and was, in turn, liked by him. But the course he had set himself called for the position of director, not gag-man.

An opportunity came: "The Shock Punch" was dropping badly behind schedule—La Cava was told to do the last two reels to help speed up the work. Upon examination, these last two reels proved not bad at all—so he was given two in "The Lucky Devil." He had done two-reelers in the early days—now he was a two-reel director in five-reel productions!

Here, Richard Dix took Fate in his own hands and choked the lady into acquiescence. He requested that La Cava be given entire charge of his next picture—this request after the exertion of a steady pressure, was granted.

La Cava made "Womanhandled" and "Let's Get Married."

SELMY.—I envy you when you say you planted some watermelons. Yum, yum! They ought to have plenty of water in them if you planted them in the spring. Lloyd Hughes was born in 1899, and he is with First National.

JANE T.—The quotation, "Frailty, thy name is woman," is from Shakespeare's "Hamlet." Joseph Schildkraut in "The Road to Yesterday." Ricardo Cortez was born in Alsace-Lorraine, France. So they tell me.

FIPPIE TWO.—I'm sorry, but I haven't a cast for "The Tenth Woman." Why pick out the tenth? Elliott Roth was Harold. Poor little Farina! Of course, he is a boy, and his name is Allen Clayton Hoskins. Now will you be good?

M. T.—Well, it isn't the way you look at other girls that spoils you with your sweetheart, but the way you dont look at her. Conrad Nagel is playing in "Memory Lane."

F. F.—So you are for Richard Dix, and you say you have four of his pictures on your walls. Richard should feel flattered, but what will Rudolph and the others say?

PRETTY PEGGY.—Oh, my! You know Dolores Costello won one of our popular contests ten or twelve years ago. So you really saw Alan Forrest and Marion Mack taking pictures of "The Whip-hand" right under your window. That must have been thrilling.

Marvelous New Spanish Liquid

Makes any hair beautifully curly in 20 minutes

THE SPANISH BEGGAR'S PRICELESS GIFT

By Winnifred Ralston

FROM the day we started to school, Charity Winthrop and I were called the touseled-hair twins. Tom Harvey nicknamed us that—horrid, red-headed Tom Harvey, who used to put burrs in our pigtails and angle worms in our inkwells.

Our mothers despaired of us. Our hair simply wouldn't behave. There were Martha Brown, Helen Stahl, Betty Davis and Leah Cohen—all with wonderful curly hair. But Charity and I could never coax ours out of a straight line.

As we grew older the hated name still clung to us. It followed us through the grades and into boarding school. Then Charity's family moved to Spain, where her father was in diplomatic service, and I didn't see her again for five years—not until last New Year's Eve.

A party of us had gone to the Drake Hotel for dinner that night. As usual I was terribly embarrassed and ashamed of my hair. When the bobbing vogue first came in I had my hair cut, hoping against hope that would improve its looks. Realizing my mistake, I permitted it to grow again and by New Year's Eve it was just long enough to be unmanageable.

Horribly self-conscious I was sitting at the table, scarcely touching my food, wishing I were home. It seemed that everyone had wonderful, lustrous, curly hair but me and I felt they were all laughing or, worse, pitying me behind my back.

My eyes strayed to the dance floor and there I saw a beautiful girl dancing with Tom Harvey. Her eye caught mine and, to my surprise, she smiled and started toward me.

While there was something strangely familiar about her face I didn't recognize her—then. No—it—it couldn't be. About this girl's face was a halo of golden curls. I think she had the most beautiful hair I ever saw. My face must have turned scarlet as I compared it mentally with my own estragely, ugly mop. I had never been so thoroughly ashamed of my hair before.

Of course you have guessed her identity—for it was really she—Charity Winthrop who once had dull straight hair like mine.

It had been five long years since I had seen her. There was everything to talk about, but I simply couldn't wait. I blurted out—"Charity Winthrop—tell me—what miracle has happened to your hair?"

She smiled and said mysteriously, "Come to my room and I will tell you the whole story." She was stopping at the hotel. We excused ourselves and rushed to Charity's room. I listened breathless while she told me this strange story:

Charity tells of the beggar's gift.

"Our house in Madrid faced a little, old plaza, where I often strolled after my siesta.

Miguel, the beggar, always occupied the end bench of the south end of the plaza. There he sat all day long, asking alms from the passersby. I always dropped a few centavos in his hat when I passed and he soon grew to know me.

"The day before I was leaving Madrid I stopped to bid him good-bye and nipped a gold coin in his palm. That was the best investment I ever made.

"Hija mia," he said, "You have been very kind to an old man. Digame (tell me) senorita, what it is your heart most desires."

"I laughed at the idea, then said jokingly, 'Miguel, my hair is straight and dull. I would have it lustrous and curly.'

"Oigame, senorita," he said—"what you wish is even simpler than I thought. Many years ago—a Castilian prince was wedded to a Moorish beauty. Her hair was black as a raven's wing and straight as an arrow. Like you, this lady wanted los pelos rizos (curly hair). Her husband offered thousands of pesos to the man who would fulfil her wish. The prize fell to Pedro, the droguero. Out of roots and herbs he brewed a potion that converted the princess' straight, unruly hair into a glorious mass of ringlet curls.

"Pedro, son of the son of Pedro, has that secret today. Years ago I did him a great service. Here you will find him,—go to him and tell your wish. Adios, senorita, voya con Dios."

"You can't imagine, Winnifred, how funny it made me feel. I did not take it seriously, of course. I never expected to look up this mysterious Pedro, but some whim changed my mind and I called a coche and gave the driver the address Miguel had given me.

"At the door of the apothecary shop, Pedro, a funny old hawk-nosed Spaniard, met me. Nervously I stammered out my explanation. When I had finished, he bowed and vanished into the rear of his store. Presently he returned with a bottle which he handed to me.

"By this time I was terribly excited—could hardly wait until I reached home. When I was finally in my room alone, I took down my hair and applied the liquid as directed. In twenty minutes, not one second more, the transformation, which you have noted, had taken place.

"Come, Winnifred—apply it to your own hair and see what it can do for you.

Breathlessly I watched Charity take a bottle from her wardrobe trunk. Tremblingly my fingers undid my hair and applied the liquid.

Twenty minutes later, as I looked into Charity's mirror, I could hardly believe my eyes. The impossible had happened. My dull, straight hair had wound itself into curling tendrils. My head was a mass of ringlets and waves. It shone with a lustre it never had before.

You can imagine the amazement of the others in the party when I returned to the hall-room. Everybody noticed the change. Never did I have such a glorious night. I was popular. Men clustered about me. I had never been so happy.

The next morning when I awoke, I hardly dared look in my mirror, fearing it had all been a dream. But it was true—gloriously true. My hair was curly and beautiful.

Then the thought came to me I had no right to keep this great secret to myself. There were thousands of women just like me who would give anything to know my precious secret.

So it has been made available through the Century Chemists. They have agreed to act as distributors under a most liberal offer, which places this new found beauty secret within reach of all women, regardless of their financial status.

CASHMERE

BOUQUET

Close-up of a velvet smooth skin. No "age-lines" or coarse pores.

The lines and coarse pores, worse than birthdays to betray a woman's age.

Now — This "hard-milled" soap, used every day
.... keeps skin young and lovely

There is radiant, happy beauty in a skin that has the fresh satin-smoothness that Nature gave it—and intended it to keep.

But so many skins have been robbed of their fine-textured loveliness. So many show coarsened pores, and blemishes, instead of the clear, smooth beauty that every girl longs for. And, Oh, the heartaches and the disappointments that result from poor complexions! Only the girl who suffers, knows.

Soap, of Course—But the Right Soap

All up-to-date scientific advice on the care of the skin urges the daily use of soap and water. It is the kind of soap you use that makes all the difference between safe cleansing and the danger of coarsened, blemished skin.

Cashmere Bouquet is made especially for the face, hands and tender skin of the neck. It is "hard milled," which means that it is put through special pressing and drying processes that give each cake an almost marble firmness. It is not the least bit sudgy. This special hardness is what makes it safe. Cashmere Bouquet lather penetrates deep into the pores, searches out dust and dirt and rinses away instantly and completely. No undissolved soap remains in the pores to mix with dirt and stifle the tiny openings. That is why skins cared for with Cashmere Bouquet keep their youthful texture and remain beautiful.

*Try This Treatment—

Wet the face with warm water. Work up a thick Cashmere Bouquet lather on the hands. A wash cloth is too harsh for some skins. Massage this soothing lather into the skin with the fingertips until the skin feels refreshed and alive. Rinse in warm water, in order to remove all traces of soap while the pores are still open. Follow with a dash of clear, cold water. Pat the face dry with a soft towel. If the skin is inclined to be naturally dry, rub in a little Colgate's Charmis cold cream.

Has the Great Lover Become Just a Celebrity?

In the library his Arabian wolfhound persistently thrusts her muzzle into your hands, lying together in your lap, and a black, serious Pincher-Doberman waits with more dignity for the caress.

The room is dominated by two portraits of Valentino, made much larger than life, standing from floor to ceiling. They are by Beltran-Masses, court painter of Spain, who was a guest of the movie actor last summer.

One picture represents Valentino in a Spanish or South American rig, suggesting the character in which he suddenly popped into fame—Julio in "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse." The other portrait—and the more interesting—shows the actor as El Mansor, the first Moorish conqueror of Cordova. The soldier stands in fine armor, the point of his drawn simitar resting on the ground as he looks into the distance over his camp toward the Spanish city, his quarry. Beside him kneels a dark-eyed girl. The sensual mouth of the chieftain takes cognizance of her presence, but the eyes look out regardless, filled with the larger purpose.

Valentino Abroad

VALENTINO is an accomplished swordsman. He loves steel—the fiery point that licks in and out in fencing; the finely wrought intricacies of old armor, alternately dull and bright.

Exquisite figurines in silver cover his tables. Mounted knights jousting. On a cabinet is a gauntlet from the suit of armor presented by the Count of Nieva to Philip II of Spain. It is gold damaskeen.

Valentino has brought back from Italy his brother, Alberto, who resembles him, lacking the grace and finer lines of figure. Alberto is squattier, more stolid. His wife is with him and their son, Jean, a boy of about twelve. Mario Carillo, the well-known Italian actor, is one of the company in Valentino's home this late afternoon.

than because of, the low exchange and the consequent horde of Americans. Valentino left two Fraschini cars abroad when he returned. One will do a hundred and eighty kilos an hour.

And so on.

Valentino's House Is Slipping

VALENTINO'S hill is slipping. Engineers have been up to see it and to rack their brains for a defense.

The stucco mansion so recently acquired is cracking. Something must be done. The situation is symbolic—after the fashion of motion picture symbolism. Valentino's fame is full of cracks. Can it be repaired?

He bought the estate in Beverly Hills with money garnered from the fickle public. The sullen winter rains assaulted it, and like everything in the capital of movie-land it proved unsubstantial. A reputation in pictures is likewise subject to caprice and may crack and easily crumble beneath the obloquy of the mob.

could give such a completely colorless performance. I liked Mlle. Kithnou as Ferragut's wife.

The Lyric "Moana"

HAVING disposed of "Mare Nostrum," I can turn to "Moana," Robert J. Flaherty's study in Samoan tribal life, with a sigh of relief. Here is beauty such as you are not likely to encounter on the screen in many a day. It is lyric—and thrilling.

You will recall Flaherty as the man who did "Nanook of the North," that study of man's primitive struggle for existence when the Arctic winds sweep across the desolate stretches of Northern ice. "Moana" presents another—and totally different—study in man's fight for life under the tropical sun.

Here the natives of the South Pacific fish, trap wild animals, transform roots into bread and win a living from nature. I doubt if the motion picture camera will ever catch anything more beautiful than the way the boy, Péa, climbs lofty palm-trees in quest of coconuts or the way Moana and his father master a giant turtle in the deep, clear waters of a coral reef. Thru this picturing of the daily native life runs the thread of a romance, the love of Moana for Fa'angase. Here is the lyric note, for the two are utterly unmindful of cameras, of conventions, of self-consciousness. I understand some Canadian censors have barred "Moana" because Fa'angase does not wear a brassiere. I can only say that these censors would be able to see evil in anything.

The native love dance—the Siva—of Moana and Fa'angase is an exquisite thing. The film reaches its high point when the stoical Moana undergoes three weeks of tattooing, signifying the passing of the threshold of manhood. Coloring is cut into the skin by means of needles of bone. This may seem cruel—but I doubt if it is any more painful than the broken bones our own Moanas encounter upon the grid-iron or the hockey ice. It's all in the point of view.

An Adult Comedy

"THE Grand Duchess and the Waiter," a Malcolm St. Clair effort featuring the suave Adolphe Menjou and charming Florence Vidor, possesses genuine sparkle. This is built upon a French farce by Alfred Savoir and revolves around a Russian grand duchess, traveling with her entourage but little real money, and a gay and wealthy man-about-town. The gay dog masquerades as a waiter and wins the duchess' heart just as she is pawning her last royal jewel. The comedy is an adult one, done with intelligence and delicacy. I congratulate St. Clair for his direction, and Menjou and Miss Vidor for their shrewd playing.

In contrast to "The Grand Duchess and the Waiter," "Irene," Colleen Moore's adaptation of the musical comedy of some years ago, is just comic strip hokum. The story? A wealthy young man falls in love with an Irish hoyden who delivers bundles. Your liking for "Irene" will depend upon whether or not you like Miss Moore's hoydenisms. I don't. I know I am in the minority because Miss Moore's comedies are what they call box-office wallops. So you must use your own judgment here. Personally, I think this comedy, directed by Al Green, is slower than some of this star's recent efforts.

I liked Richard Dix's newest comedy, "Let's Get Married," immensely. This is just the story of a rich and rough playboy who gets sent to jail for thirty days. Dix keeps improving in his comedy and Edna Mae Oliver scores a real hit as one J. W. Smith, the world's biggest buyer of Bibles, who likes to play in cabarets when she isn't following the straight and narrow purchasing path. Lois Wilson is a pleasant heroine. A whole lot of the credit for "Let's Get Married" goes to the young director, Gregory La Cava. Better watch this La Cava!

New York.
Dear Majesty:

Lya de Putti has arrived in New York, slightly upsetting the placid calm of Manhattan.

She was taken ill right after her arrival, finally going to a New York hospital for an operation. In the interim she received reporters while reclining in bed, strikingly negligée and smoking a cigaret.

Anyway, Lya gets the rôle in Griffith's "Sorrows of Satan" for which so many actresses were considered. Greta Nissen had it once, before the quarrel that removed her to Universal.

Hollywood.
Your Dear King:

The screen colony out here is all agog over the Pola Negri-Rudolph Valentino "engagement."

You know, of course, that Pola announced her engagement to Rudy, stating that it was in the nature of a "four months' trial engagement," covering the period of her coming trip to Europe.

This announcement was followed by several days of dead silence from the slipping Maison of the Sheik. Then came Rudy's statement that he had never mentioned marriage to Pola at all. Moreover, he said the engagement was news to him.

And there you are, Your Majesty. Maybe they're engaged. Maybe they're not. Maybe it's just press stuff. And, again, maybe Pola is interested and Rudy isn't—now.

ridicule or otherwise; no exposure of the unpleasant consequences of romantic sentimentality in real life; nothing that would give a disagreeable shock to the stupid or shake the self-complacency of the smug."

Meanwhile, the censors of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kansas, Virginia, Maryland and Florida still are busy with their scissors.

going to use this principle in another big picture this year, I hope, and I shall apply it so far as possible to all my pictures.

The question of the development of "The Big Parade's" story has been raised frequently since the picture scored on Broadway. The story is credited—on the screen—to Laurence Stallings, who was co-author of the spoken war play, "What Price Glory."

It can be said with authority (and I am not quoting Vidor here) that few hundreds of Stallings' original story outline remain in "The Big Parade" as it stands on celluloid form.

"I owe to Stallings the courage to go ahead and make 'The Big Parade,'" says Vidor. "I might have doubted or faltered otherwise. He gave me the enthusiasm to do it."

How "The Big Parade" Grew

THERE was, for instance, no march thru Belleau Woods in Stallings' original story. The shell-hole episode was there, but the cigaret-sharing moment was not. Stallings contributed the early doughboy bath scenes, but other important incidents, such as the gum-chewing interlude, were devised as the scenes were developed before the camera. That the hero ends with but one leg was created by the scenarist. Perhaps it was suggested by the fact that Stallings lost a leg in the World War.

In other words, Stallings supplied the idea that a story of the war could be told without the usual saccharine bunk about militarism. He contributed the requisite enthusiasm.

The rest of the success of "The Big Parade" is due to King Vidor and the able and sincere assistance of John Gilbert and Renée Adorée. Vidor had been making good—and, in several cases, extraordinary—pictures for years, but he hadn't caught the eye of the public.

"Why should they look at me? They do not know me."

She wears her corn-colored hair straight back from her classic brow in a long bob that curls at the ends. She uses no make-up and the California sun has not had time to spoil the wild rose and lily white of her complexion. Nothing can take away the haunting sadness of her eyes.

Perhaps it was her eyes, perhaps her sensitive lips, perhaps her very real charm—or it may have been something deeper that Mauritz Stiller caught and imprisoned on the screen in the "Saga."

Whatever it was, it reached out magic hands and transported the young unknown from the snowy shores of Sweden to the sunny beaches of California. And here is the way of the thing:

Louis B. Mayer makes it his business or his pleasure to view in his private projection-room all important foreign films. Sitting in his easy chair one day, Mr. Mayer saw Greta Garbo looking tragically out at him.

Signed for America

"Run that again," he directed, when the film was finished. And then: "We'll get that girl."

Fred Niblo was then in Rome working on "Ben-Hur," and Mr. Mayer had planned to go to see him. On that same trip, the M-G-M head proceeded to Stockholm,

The Girl of Today

"BUT now a girl goes to work at seventeen or eighteen. I am not speaking of girls from well-to-do families, altho sometimes they work, too, but I am speaking of the average girl. She is thrown with all sorts of men. Her judgment grows sharper. She learns the value of money, so her demands grow larger. But it is not her fault that she is working. Her parents can not give her the pretty things she craves. Organdies and dimities made by the village dressmaker do not look well when placed side by side with Patou's latest sport creation.

"The terrible tragedy of girlhood must not defeat her, the tragedy of being different from the rest of her world. So she goes out to seek her fortune, like the princess in the fairy-tales. And like them, she dreams that by some magic, she will land on her feet.

"And she, too, has her idea of an ideal man. At least, she has at first. But her desire to have a good time, to see what she can while she can, the latest play, the newest cabaret, leads her to accept all kinds of invitations from boys earning very little more than she is. They are not exactly what she wants, but they are the only youth with which she has any contact. The pleasant, lazy, good-natured young boy who drives up in the latest sport model, and blows the horn as a signal that she must hurry down and make it snappy. He doesn't get out and come to her door. And she doesn't demand it. If she did, he would drive to the very next house, and get another girl just as pretty, just as smartly dressed and her evening would be lost. An evening is a very long time when you are eighteen.

Toll of Propinquity

"PRETTY soon propinquity takes its toll. The young couple get married. They feel that the beautiful excitement of their youth must keep up. Her husband spends a good bit on his clothes, and she knows that she must not get frumpish herself. Hasn't she read of the horrid fate that will be hers if she once lets down. Money is scarce. The good-looking young boy just doesn't seem to grow older. He doesn't develop into the man she hoped he might be. His father gives him a small allowance and it seems enough to him, but not to her. She has been out in the world and knows better. There is no use being mistress of a home that consists of two rooms and a kitchenette. All very well to pour tea from the old family silver, polish the priceless walnut, wash the egg-shell china with your very own hands, and graciously administer to the lovely romping children. But if the family teapot is a cocktail shaker, the Lya de Putti as the acrobat heroine of "Vaudeville"

The Toast of Berlin

o in the first year after her husband's death, some two years ago, when she actually plunged into work and hardly ever had (or wanted) a single day out of the studio for more than a year.

Her latest productions have been for UFA. The first of these, "Vaudeville," directed by E. A. Dupont and co-starring her with Emil Jannings, will be seen on Broadway before long. And the same will probably hold good for her latest picture, just finished. This is "Manon Lescaut," directed by Dr. Robinson. This, indeed, has been a part most ideally suited to this artist.

As regards her private life, I should mention at first the fact that she is a very good Catholic and never fails to go to church regularly. It would, however, be wrong to suppose that pious as she is she would be averse to any joie de vivre. On the contrary, she likes to have a good time and to spend her evenings in merry company, dancing and enjoying herself. As a matter of fact, she is known to be the life and soul of every party, and altho she has learned German quite well by now, there is no end of teasing her for her rather pretty Hungarian accent.

Up to the moment of leaving Berlin, she was busily learning English, everybody helping her to accomplish this task as quickly as possible. As a matter of fact, she was taking this work just as seriously as her screen work—and that seems a lot! And she had mastered quite a nice smattering of the language.

As regards her private hobbies, the best one could say of her would be that she is a "sportsman" in every sense of the word. Practically speaking, she is quite a keen (and rather reckless) motorist, and she also likes to go up into the air, and even knows how to pilot an aeroplane, altho, between us, I would not advise anybody to entrust himself to her aerial abilities before having closed a considerable insurance deal.

She told me that she is looking forward to her American trip. She will be accompanied by her mother, whom she is very devoted to, and, as regards blessed old California, she is expecting a fine chance to do a lot of good work.

Something DIFFERENT for Bobbed Hair

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well— which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25¢ direct to J.W. KOBEL CO., 656 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

Jobyna, "Poor old Sam was blind and when he heard us all yelling and running, he ran, too, but he ran toward the lion. When we were all paralyzed with fear he'd be hurt, one of the spear-bearers jabbed it at the lion and it went the other way. We thought him a hero, that boy."

"But he wasn't really," said Roy, "he was too scared to move and when the lion got near him he started to drop the spear and the lion thought he was brave."

Jobyna and her mother

Doing a Hula-Hula Girl

"Do you remember the day I was a hula-hula girl and you were in my tribe and we were working by the ocean?" cried Jobyna, "We'd made up our arms and legs with brown powder before we left the studio. The day was so hot we said: 'Let's go swimming!' and when we came out we were white, instead of brown and had to play the rest of our scenes that way?"

"Whenever the script called for anything exotic in the way of shoes," explained the temporary guardian of Jobyna's "props," "I wore bedroom slippers."

"And I wore a pair of sandals thru everything!" bubbled Jobyna. "They were so comfortable! They went tripping over desert sands, into slum cellars, up palace stairs and into the ballet. Even the girl of the wide-open spaces and the pert French maid wore them. It didn't matter."

"After a year of that—my, how I thrill now when I think of it! They called me up one morning and told me to come to the lot. I thought I was to do another one-reeler, but when I arrived, they said: 'Get into Mildred's clothes, quick. You're to be Harold Lloyd's leading lady!'"

Selected By Lloyd

"I'd met Harold on the lot, of course. I remember how delighted I was the first time when he shook hands and smiled. I didn't know then that it was his regular company smile and wasn't specially for me! I didn't wash my hand for a week!

"It seemed that Mildred had expected to be able to work in Harold's picture and in a feature outside but she had too much to do and couldn't make it, so Harold said: 'Get the little Ralston girl!'"

"Most girls who are to be leading ladies to stars have to go after the job, take screen tests, and worry for weeks for fear somebody else will get the job, so that when they are signed, they are too exhausted to care.

"Mildred's clothes were a good fit except that the sleeves were too short, and there I was being pinned into them, two people lengthening my cuffs, more people fixing my hair, putting on my shoes and the whole lot shouting: 'Hey, Joby's going to be Harold's leading lady!'"

"I'll bet Jobyna ran up and down the stairs ninety times before she was ready," chuckled Roy. "Buzz-buzz came from every dressing-room and office. It was halleluia day for us all, we were so tickled about Joby!"

"I was so scared!" remembered Jobyna. "We began with the blue pills scene in 'Why Worry' and my hand shook so that I spilled most of them. I heard my teeth chatter. No doubt Harold heard them, too... And now I've been working with him for four years!"

Four Years as Leading Woman

"It's great. I'm the only girl on the lot and they've practically ruined me. I don't know what I'd do on another lot. I was visiting Bebe Daniels the other day and if she wanted anything, she called a maid and it was brought, just like that!... If I want anything, I can go get it!"

"We work so long on a picture—six or seven months—that every dress I have has to be duplicated, or triplicated, and I get

Aided by the natural topography, the community literally abounds with tennis-courts, golf courses, trout pools, toboggan slides, bowling-alleys, polo fields, hull-rings, velodromes, cricket pitches, gridirons, diamonds, pearls, emeralds and aquamarines. Clambakes are the rule rather than the exception.

A feature of the sporting side of Silverscreen is its "May Walk." Led by the house mothers and flanked by a troop of lancers in full-dress uniform, the girls from the various dormitories, dressed in white lawn, march in a column of two's to the great statue of Will H. Hays, which is found exactly in the middle of Cecil B. De Mille Boulevard, the principal thoroughfare. Wreathing the statue with smilax, they march singing back to their quarters, where for the rest of the day "open house" is held, culminating at eight o'clock in the evening with a wild weenie roast. Each girl may invite a "boy friend," for whose behavior the management is not accounted responsible. Saturday afternoons mixed bathing is held in the huge Byzantine Swimming Pool in the fashionable Faubourg de la Marquise de la Falaise de la Coudraie. Armed guards patrol the pool.

Other amusements are occasional lectures in the Town Hall, going to the movies, "yessing" the producers and compulsory chapel attendance. Sunday is given over to meditation and catching up with correspondence. The town bell tolls every half-hour for prayers.

The Amusement Committee is always on the watch for suggestions for additional healthy, clean amusements, preferably with an educational value. Suggestions should be made out in triplicate, and will go thru the usual channels—the Gowanus Canal and the Culebra Cut—to be acted upon in order of their receipt.

As was stated previously, Silverscreen is run on the patriarchal system, or "Papa is always right." Thus, the inhabitants are virtually all brothers and sisters, and, being such, the breath of scandal is completely hushed by the Listerine of public approval. Outside of the house mothers, the Police Bureau, the Supervisors, the various Administrating Committees, the Board of Censorship, the Supreme Council, the militia, the inquisition, the articles of the constitution, the by-laws and the sixteen hundred and eighty-two commandments (expanded and improved from the original Ten), there is practically no government. An effort is made to give every inhabitant the opportunity to enjoy existence to the full. If the criticism is passed that Silverscreen goes out of its way to be secluded and cloistered, that full machine-gun crews are posted night and day at three-foot intervals on its Great Wall, answer is made that quite likely the bars in front of the cages of a zoo are placed there for the protection of the animals.

As a matter of fact, visitors are welcome, nay urged, to visit Silverscreen. Visiting days are Tuesdays and Fridays and informative guides are always ready to conduct groups over the premises, explaining fully, where explanation is necessary. Not that much is necessary, for Silverscreen—the Cradle of Celluloid Culture—speaks for itself in a fine, clear tongue, discoursing books in its running brooks and sweet sermons in every one of the semiprecious stones that compose the ornate façade of its First National Bank.

"You owe it to yourself to visit our marvel-city," says Morris F. X. Horsbach, Chairman of the Reception Committee, from whose brochure this abstract has been made. "Don't be a short-sighted fool and miss the wonderful chance."

"Or," concludes Mr. Horsbach, "in the words of the Neapolitans' favorite quotation—'See Silverscreen and drop dead!'" where he not only signed Greta Garbo, but Mauritz Stiller and Lars Hanson, the leading man. Contracts delayed their coming, but a year later all three could answer roll-call on the Culver City lot.

Mauritz Stiller is scheduled to direct Greta in "The Temptress," for which she is thankful.

"I shall be at home with him. My first picture I make with an interpreter and it is not easy, no. I am not sure I have always what the director is saying.

"In American everything is so beeg. Our whole studio in Sweden was not so beeg as one of these stages. Its top was open so that when it rained or snowed—oh, we have snow in Sweden!" (How her blue eyes glow!) "When it rained or snowed, we could not work. It som-times took six months to make a picture. But everybody does not hurry so there. We can, as I say, do but one thing at a time.

"Here I can do but one thing, yes. I make pictures. I give my life to that. I wish my pictures to be good. I wish to learn how to do all these things American girls do so ver' easily.

"I swim, yes. I tell you I lof the sea. But I swim a-lone."

That aloofness of hers is intriguing.

Messrs. Seastrom, Stiller and Hanson, who live in the Swedish colony down by the sea, also, speak of seeing Greta taking her lonely walks where the sunset stains the Pacific and its glory of gold and rose silhouettes her straight young figure as she moves with rhythmic Viking grace over the silver sands. . . .

Greta—and Love

"SO-O, you wish I would talk about love?"

"I do not know about it. I have said how it amazes me that these American girls can manage so many things at one time—pictures, society and love.

"Me—little Sweden girl—can do one thing on-ly. Som-day I shall leave pictures, perhaps, and give all to this love. . . . Or I shall learn to do two things together, as you do. . . . But I do not know.

"I tell you. . . . How I would like to have a leetle cabin high up in the mountains som-where! How I would love to have that leetle cabin, all to myself, where I could be a-lone! It should have beeg trees about it and no other houses—no. . . . But I could see the sea, yes. . . . I could see the sea!"

Teeth clouded with the dingy film that ordinary brushing won't remove UNKNOWN to yourself, you are probably hiding the gleam and clearness of your teeth beneath a dingy film coat—but that now you can easily remove. A coating that ordinary washing won't combat successfully.

In a few days you can make a great difference in the color of your teeth. Can literally change your whole appearance. Can restore "off-color" teeth to gleaming beauty. Can firm your gums and give them healthy, natural color.

Hidden by film

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles to a germ-laden film that forms on your teeth. Run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel it . . . a slippery, viscous coating.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It lays your gums open to bacterial attack and your teeth open to decay. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea.

Now new methods are being used. A dentifrice called Pepsodent—different in formula, action and effect from any other known.

It accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. No grit, judged dangerous to enamel.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Send the coupon. Clip it now.

The Valentino engineers have been racking their brains for a defense of fame. In "The Eagle" they tried comedy, which was not altogether successful. Now they will go back to the greatest hit of Valentino's career, on the principle that what pleased the public once will be enjoyed a second time.

Valentino will start soon on "The Son of the Sheik," a sequel, by the woman who concocted that aphrodisiac for high-school girls. He is hopeful about making a complete come-back with it.

The same machinery of excitement will be employed: that delicious, masochistic appeal of the fair girl in the strong hands of the ruthless desert tyrant. But in the second opus the young sheik does not abduct the beauty because he desires her. He hates her at first, but comes to love her. This is a far less original idea than the first of E. M. Hull, elderly authoress of the passion-in-a-desert books.

Vilma Banky will do the girl. She is blonde and the heroine is described as a dark French beauty. They are making a test of Vilma wearing a black wig for the part.

Frances Marion, who has a reputation second to none as a scenarist, will do the script. George Fitzmaurice, with a number of recent successes under his belt, will direct. Valentino said frankly that the first sheik picture was abominably done. He hopes for a more artistic product in the next.

BUT will the movie public appreciate a more artistic product from Valentino? Or can the same machinery of excitement again arouse the stolid damsels of the hinterland igloos?

That remains to be seen. I am afraid Valentino is on the wrong track. His success as a sheik is so wrapped up with the outworn fancies of a few years ago. The very word sheik is falling into disuse—a transient slang term gone to its early grave. Sheik, because of its former universal usage, has acquired the half-humorous, half-contemptuous insignificance of all such words.

Valentino's fame rests upon his physical charm. He was the first man in the movies to whom the term sex appeal was applied. Postmeridian maidens, baffled wives of husbands who have never learned the ABC's of love, and adolescent girls, feeling the first powerful surge of Mother Eve's blood in their veins—these were the materials ready to his hand.

These thwarted women had been treated in the movies to strong, noble heroes—chaste Nordics who could fight like hell, but made love like butcher-boys.

Suddenly there dropped a burning meteor from the skies. The thrilled and astonished womanhood of America saw for the first time a real Latin lover—not the respectful pachyderm they were accustomed to, but an oily, jungle python of a lover, who mastered you with silken cruelties, who went after you with the appetite of a hungry but well-bred dog.

Worsting the Nordic

No wonder American manhood sneered at "Vaselino." The poor Nordic was sadly worsted. Ungraceful, overfed, with his uncouth hands and feet—the fellow who had always accepted the credo of manliness as synonym for awkwardness was out of the running. What good was it that he could sell more automobiles in a day than the rest of the sales force put together? What mattered it that his lapel glittered with the recognized symbol of the Nobility of North America? Beside this sleek-haired son of satan he was an oaf.

So the Nordic sneered. And his girl giggled—and the next time went to see Valentino alone, or with Mabel, her girl friend.

And in the subtle way that is inexplicable, the admiration for Valentino as an actor was transferred to a personal interest among the women. His divorce from Jean Acker came to fan this interest into a flame. Again the worsted Nordic sneered about "Vaselino" to his girl.

Valentino married once more and the newspapers made capital of "artistic temperament." Valentino's second divorce has had the effect of destroying the last shred of interest in him as an actor. Whatever he appears in next he will be viewed, not as the son of the sheik, but as the ex-hu band of Natacha Rambova—and wonder if he'll marry Pola Negri?

Pola has a curious faculty of becoming involved with famous fellow craftsmen. First Chaplin, who outwitted her. Valentino, it is true, is being more or less obviously pursued. I don't think he is greatly interested.

Helpless Before Popularity

If Valentino could gradually have risen to fame, in the cautious, substantial way of Jack Gilbert, for example, his future would be more secure. But he was helpless in the jet of popularity that shot him up to the zenith. He has taken his fame where he found it—as every movie actor has to do.

Unpopular in his native Italy—because he recently became an American citizen—he faces, in the land of his adoption, the uncertainty of a star making a come-back in the midst of keen competition. For the vogue set by Valentino has produced a whole flock of dark-eyed lovers, equipped with sex appeal and suave address and the advantage of new faces.

The son of the sheik must win his way under the severest handicap in the world—that of having a famous father. It is a pity. Today the Great Lover is chiefly a celebrity.

* * * * *
AND yet, Rudolph Valentino, née Guglielmi, is really a very good actor.

and build faster, and faster, factories, houses, stores. They must join the parade.

"They haven't made many pictures nor have they made very good ones. Conditions haven't been satisfactory, and they weren't very interested in doing it. But now they see that there is great money to be made in pictures, and that the United States and Germany are making better ones than they are. So now they are beginning to try.

"But I do not believe that any country can compete successfully with this one. We have the money, the climate, the studios, and the best stars. You can not a success of it. In fact, since leaving "D. W.'s" guidance, Barthelmess has done greater work than ever before. Mary Pickford, of course, is another who successfully broke away from her sponsor.

Among the comedians, the most noted blunder was made by Ford Sterling. Back in the old Mack Sennett-Keystone days, Sterling was the king-pin of all screen comedians. His films drew packed houses wherever shown. It seemed as if there would be no stopping him from becoming the idol of the day.

Mistakes of the Comedians

THRU some cause or other, Sterling suddenly terminated his contract with Mack Sennett and started in to make his own comedies. Away from the Sennett studios, however, Sterling seemed to lose much of his former power and personality. It wasn't long before he was down among the "also-rans."

In the meantime, Sennett, casting about for someone to take Sterling's place, began to feature a young man by the name of Charlie Chaplin. Chaplin's rise was as rapid as Sterling's fall, and soon the little comedian with the funny feet was all the rage. Sterling was never able to regain the same popularity. If he had remained with Sennett, Sterling would today have been one of the foremost comedians on the screen.

There are some who are of the opinion that Harry Langdon has made a mistake in leaving Sennett. Langdon, however, is a creative artist and there is little doubt but that he will make good, now that he is producing for himself.

Nazimova's Deseent

ONE of the most sudden stellar deseents in the film heavens was made by Nazimova. Thru dint of excellent pictures and remarkable performances, Nazimova had risen a few years ago to the point where she was considered one of the six biggest attractions on the silver-sheet. Suddenly, and for no cause apparent to the general public, Nazimova began to skid rapidly down grade. Her films were inferior and her playing lacked the old fire. The answer was, Nazimova had blundered into the idea that she was not only a great actress but a great producer, director and business woman combined. Attempting to give too much attention to production matters, which should have been left to others, she neglected the talent and screen personality that would have placed her at the top. Screen disaster was the result.

Once a star starts to slip backwards in the public's esteem, it is almost impossible for him to recover and go forward again. Several have tried, few have succeeded.

Valentino is now faced with this very task. Rudy made two great blunders, each in itself enough to sink completely the average star. His first mistake was in allowing the term of "Sheik" to become too firmly attached to him. The Sheik error was but a momentary fad and the American public quickly set themselves against it. Valentino is still suffering, however, from his connection with this term.

Valentino's Slips

RUDY's other error was in quitting the screen at the moment when all things were working favorably for him. During his absence, Novarro and Gilbert all forged to the front and won many hearts

Men relate this simple way to get a new thrill in shaving

Men the nation over are awakening to the fact that there is a general switch to the Valet AutoStrop Razor.

Its sales have pyramided in an astounding manner.

All because men are discovering that a sharp blade for every shave is a genuine luxury.

The Valet AutoStrop is the only razor that sharpens its own blades. A few strokes on its strop restore a blade to new-like keenness.

Sharpen it, then shave, then clean—all in a jiffy, and without removing the blade from the holder.

This is a different principle. The blade doesn't get duller and duller until it must be thrown away.

Every shave can be with a blade of super-keenness.

Have you fallen into a habit? Do you continue your old way of shaving?

Then join the thousands upon thousands who have turned to a new and better way and whose enthusiasm never wanes.

A speedy, comfortable shave every time—uniformly perfect. An end to "pulling." An end to wasting time.

"There's no shave like it," men say. Why miss this supreme improvement?

that were formerly Valentino's. According to late announcements, Valentino is going to make another Sheik picture. This film may be momentarily successful, but it will have an after-effect that will do the star irreparable damage.

William S. Hart also made the mistake of quitting the screen at an inopportune time. The Western film was just coming in vogue, and during Hart's absence from the silversheet, Tom Mix, Buck Jones, Hoot Gibson and others stepped into the limelight he formerly monopolized and the famous "two-gunner" will find that he has now a battle on his hands to win back his lost popularity. So far as actual merit and ability go, however, Hart is the greatest portrayer of Western rôles the screen has ever had.

It is well-known truism in the silent drama that it is not the getting to the top that is so difficult—it is the staying there. To the star, director or producer who has reached a prominent position in the film industry, there are all kinds of pitfalls that must be avoided, if he would continue safely along the road to fame. The big stars and directors are those who, in addition to possessing unusual talent, are also gifted with the ability actually to feel the public pulse and make their films accordingly.

To keep a short step ahead of the public taste is the ideal arrangement for best results, and will bring even greater rewards than keeping directly abreast of the public demands. To step too far ahead of the public, however, is one of the worst blunders that can be made and always brings direful results. It is in some instances worse than falling behind the times.

To cite three examples: Theda Bara went into oblivion because she persisted in playing vampire parts on the screen long after the public had tired of them. She fell too far behind the public's taste in entertainment.

Anent Colleen Moore

IN "Flaming Youth" Colleen Moore for the first time portrayed a daring ultra-modern flapper. Previously, Colleen had been playing simple and demure rôles with only average success. When "Flaming Youth" was made, the time was ripe for flapper rôles, the public knew all about them, but they had never been presented graphically on the screen. Colleen Moore and "Flaming Youth" were an immense success, because the star had only slightly anticipated the trend of public thought. Flapper films immediately became the vogue and Colleen became one of the leading stars on the screen.

Gloria Swanson, on the other hand, has now stepped too far ahead of her public. She is playing too many different types of parts. Gloria is by all means the greatest actress that the silent drama has ever had. With the instincts of a real artist, Gloria does not wish to confine herself to any particular type of rôle. She desires to attempt something different each time, to give a new characterization in every production. This should be the aim of every great actor and actress.

To follow this line of action on the screen, however, is playing with fire. The film-going public is slow thinking and once a player has established herself, or himself, in a certain kind of rôle to the satisfaction of the public, the latter prefers the star to remain in that type of rôle consistently. Gloria's sudden switches from emotional drama to fine character work, and from character work to slapstick has been too rapid for theatergoers.

Gloria Ahead of Her Public

GLORIA may lose a lot of her old admirers—many of whom are well lost—thru her commendable efforts to break away from old screen traditions, but in the long run she will win admirers to the silent drama who have hitherto looked with contempt upon our fair institution and the popular players whom the general public is prone to look upon as "artistes."

Eric von Stroheim and, to some extent, Ernst Lubitsch, may also be classed among those who have suffered more or less thru being too far in advance of the public. These men have blundered in thinking that American theatergoers—that is, those who make up the bulk of film fan, thruout the country—are really desirous of something fine and worthwhile in the way of screen entertainment.

Von Stroheim's "Foolish Wives," which was a great picture in spite of disparaging remarks to the contrary, failed with the American public simply because it was ahead of its time. Von Stroheim's "Greed," one of the finest films of all times, flivvered simply because it was really a "bigger and better" picture.

Lubitsch's films are doing well in some of the big cities, but are very little appreciated in the small town. It will take Terre Haute and Kalamazoo about five years to catch up with the superiority of Lubitsch's direction.

Von Stroheim's "The Merry Widow" will meet with general success because, while it is a superbly directed and finely embroidered affair, it is at bottom an ordinary, second-rate story, filled with just the kind of hokum that the public loves.

The He-Vamp Boomerang

LEW CODY was the featured player in a historical blunder a few years ago. Lew had been playing "heavy" rôles with marked success and was forging rapidly to the top. It was in the latter days of the era when vampires were still in vogue. Somebody conceived the brilliant idea of dubbing Cody "The He-vamp." It sounded like a good publicity idea and brought the actor much free space in the papers and magazines.

After a few months the "he-vamp" appellation began to rebound against Cody. The male theatergoers refused to patronize his films, and the women, with typical female psychology, lost interest in an actor who appeared to be boasting of his charms. Cody, himself, of course, had nothing to do with the idea. He felt its ill effects, however, and for two or three years was almost taboo on the screen.

In a similar manner Eugene O'Brien's future was dimmed for a while, due to a publicity blunder which at the time of its conception seemed to be a great idea. As leading man opposite Norma Talmadge, Gene had gradually forged his way to the front until he was finally the most adored screen lover in the films. This was about five or six years ago. The Selznick company decided to make a star of him and in searching about for a slogan to attach to their new satellite they hit upon the appellation "The Perfect Lover."

While the female population of the country was ready to admit that Gene just about fitted their ideals as to what a perfect lover should be, and as a matter of fact they were already terming him that of their own volition, they strenuously objected to any man's openly heralding his superiority as a lover. The term "perfect lover" almost ruined O'Brien's brilliant career. Only by dropping the appellation altogether and delivering a series of fine romantic performances has Gene been able to overcome it. As in the case of Cody, O'Brien had nothing to do with the selection of the slogan.

Norma Talmadge's big blunder has been in adhering too closely to goody-goody rôles. They have stifled her personality and killed the fire that formerly flamed so brightly in her earlier work, at which time she played all types and rôles. If her portrayal of "Kiki" is well done, this will revive her old popularity.

The Case of Doug Fairbanks

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS was heading himself into an ominous blunder a year or so ago. In his ambition to produce immense spectacles, such as "Robin Hood" and "The Thief of Bagdad," Doug was smothering the magnetic screen personality that had made him the biggest star of the day. Two more spectacles like the above mentioned and Doug would have been looked upon by the public as a producer rather than a screen idol. Apparently, the star sensed this, for he is now returning to his old style of work with such films as "Don Q" and "The Black Pirate."

Mary Pickford made the commendable blunder of trying to give the public something different. For years many theatergoers and critics had been accusing Mary of sameness. They asserted she could play nothing but kid parts. So Mary gave the public a few grown-up characters. In spite of the excellence of her playing, the Pickford admirers immediately turned thumbs down. Mary is back at kid parts and will probably stay there.

Pola Negri's blunder was made in coming to the United States. At least, it was made after she came to the U. S. A. In her German-made films Pola won a reputation for herself in this country because of remarkable acting ability. Her work was so natural and devoid of the usual posing and reserve which marked our own screen actresses that Pola quickly had her American theatergoers in the palm of her hand. Upon arriving in this country, Pola underwent a metamorphosis and instead of continuing to rely upon her acting ability, which left her few competitors, she decided to take advantage of American photography and become a screen beauty. In this branch of the game Pola could not hope to compete with more than a score of our own fair damsels. All of Pola's recent films show that she is thinking of camera angles instead of working spontaneously.

And Now Cecil De Mille!

MANY are of the opinion that the greatest blunder in recent years was Cecil B. De Mille's cutting loose from Paramount. At the present moment it appears that this contention is correct and that "C. B." has made a grave mistake in taking so much responsibility upon his own shoulders. It will take a little more time, however, to decide this definitely.

Blunders will continue in the silent drama as long as the industry exists. There is no way of stopping them. As a rule, there is no way of definitely knowing a blunder until it has been proved so, and then it is too late to do anything about the matter.

At the present moment there are several stars who stand in danger of making blunders that will vitally affect their careers. Principal among these are Ronald Colman, Jack Gilbert, Betty Bronson, Mary Philbin and Adolphe Menjou.

Stars at the top, or those just arriving at the top, are the ones who require the most expert handling. One misstep may send them toppling down the ladder into the Down-and-Out Club.

furniture not quite paid for, the china Japanese, and the baby asleep on the fire-escape, life becomes a little different.

"So rather than lose all her ideals of what the future should bring, she goes back to work to get them. She has talked about it to her young husband and he doesn't seem to care. Why should he? Most all his friends' wives work.

"That is the beginning of the end. When a woman finds out she doesn't need a man, she just doesn't need him. The youthful glamour is gone. She has found what romance is made of.

"And yet I believe in marriage. It is absolutely necessary, of course. It is the world's greatest convention. We do it to please our mothers, our friends, ourselves, but it seems to me that right now something is wrong with it.

"And I believe that the main difficulty is with the man of today and not the girl. He is not awake. He is not mature. And still my advice is, get married, and stick it out if that is what you want. If you are in love, stay home. Insist upon a home, take no substitutes, make it your fortress, and do not seek a career. There are a few talented women who should not be stifled, a few brilliant and lovely women who are more valuable as themselves than as wives. But the average woman who leaves home for a job in an office, as a clerk, stenographer, or saleswoman, is a million times more of a person as a wife. Some people can do both well, but the great majority can not. Stick to your homes, for the older you get, the more they will mean to you, and at fifty, the new dress will seem a very little thing beside the security of a successful marriage."

The Answer Man

HAROLD L. D.—So you think I am a pretty big mystery? Yes, they do say Jewel Carmen will return to the screen after six years' absence in "The Bat." Ford Sterling is playing the lead for "The Show-Off" from the stage-play.

MARY T.—Yes, Eugene O'Brien will play opposite Gloria Swanson in "Fine Manners." It is reported that Robert Leonard is to marry Gertrude Olmstead. Yes, and Louise Glaum, erstwhile vamp, was married last January to Zachary M. Harris, a theatrical promoter.

LILLIE 17.—I should say H. B. Warner has a full name. It is Henry Byron Warner. William Boyd and Elinor Fair were married last winter, and now they're playing in "The Volga Boatman" together.

MAYBELLE H.—Listen here, I can't very well undertake to give you the names and addresses of some forty players here. It would take much too much room. Give somebody else a chance. Don't lay it on too thick, Maybelle.

FRENCHY.—So you think that Alma Rubens is a Classic beauty. She played in "The Winding Stair" with Jack Mulhall.

SHEBA.—Douglas MacLean signed a contract whereby he will make several pictures for Famous Players-Lasky, "Twenty-three and a Half Hours' Leave," which is his most outstanding success and his first important picture, was made under the Lasky banner.

How Much Do Artists Earn?

WOULD you like to earn $100 a week as a commercial artist? If you like to draw, you should develop your talent, for well-trained artists earn $75, $100, $150 a week and sometimes even more. Beginners who can do practical work soon command $50 a week.

The Federal home-study course develops your talent on a sure foundation by the quickest possible method, and makes the work truly a pleasure. It is the original, practical course in commercial art, created by men with more than 25 years' experience in the field, and after 12 years of unequalled success today stands supreme as America's Foremost Course in Commercial Designing. It contains exclusive lessons from leading American artists, gives you individual personal criticisms on all lessons, and teaches you the methods that make your drawings worth real money.

FEDERAL STUDENTS MAKE GOOD INCOMES

These are typical letters from many hundreds in our files:

Byron C. Robertson, a Federal School graduate, says:

"The reason why I enrolled with the Federal School was that they had many students to point to who had made good. Today I am on the art staff of one of the largest illustrating concerns in America, receiving a salary of $3,000.00 a year. It was indeed a lucky day when I enrolled. The lessons by such great contributors as Coles Phillips, Edwin V. Brewer, Chas. F. Chambers, and others equally well known, are an inspiration and a decided help."

D. L. Rogers says:

"I found only one school that had real, sound backing for all its statements and that was the Federal School.

"From my experience I am satisfied the Federal School has the quality of education to offer that paves the road to success. I wish to recommend this course very highly and my advice to those who are earnest and 'game' enough to work for bigger things in the commercial art field is, 'Take the Federal Course.'"

Florinda E. Kiester writes us:

"Besides the good training I have received from the course when I took it, you people have always given me such wonderful help in my work that I shall be proud to be able to say I am a graduate of the Federal School."

A letter from Mr. Lloyd Shirley:

"I feel as though my old days of drudgery were a bad dream. Now I am earning $3800 a year and I have just started. This commercial drawing is work I love to do. If it had not been for the opportunity of studying art in my spare time and the kindly interest of the Federal faculty, I would never have gotten out of the rut I was in. The practical, thorough, short course I took with the Federal School made my success possible."

have no connection on the surface, but actually the rage for the Charleston suggests, for one thing, that Americans everywhere realize down in their hearts that they are savage, just as savage as the Samoans; and for another, that making money and "getting ahead" are not enough, and that they want to live a fuller and more beautiful life, in Florida, for instance, where they can take things easy, bask in the sunlight, or lap in the blue Southern water.

"Moana," for people who have been thinking about these things—nearly all of us, at some time or other—was a spectacle of life beautifully lived. When I walk into a theater to see a film by the cleverest of our directors, I say to myself, I am going to look at a play, a wonderful game that somebody has devised to stimulate or amuse me, all artfully put together. But Flaherty, tho he devised a form for his "Moana" in order to give it unity, tho he caught an overtone of story or drama, must have said, "I am going to take them so close to this thing that they will forget that they were looking at actors in a film and think only that they were looking at life, that they were peering out of some hiding-place into a world that is just as natural and strange as the world always is. . . ."

The Samoans are a handsome race, brave, high-spirited, instinctively artistic in their most natural expressions. Art is not something they go to museums or concerts for; it is a feeling for beauty, as they block out designs on their sparse clothing, as they adorn themselves with a flower in the ear, a wreath in the hair; as they dance; as they carve their boats or their totem-poles.

Epic of Samoan Life

WE look at a day in the life of Moana, his girl, Fa-an-ga-se, and his little brother, P'ea. The film begins poetically enough with a shot of the upper branches of two kava-trees; weird, feathery, luxuriant, they set the mood for the whole symphony which begins. It is hard to believe that photography alone can be so moving that it holds our interest without the aid of any cheap melodrama—no shipwrecked American yacht anywhere on the horizon. The huge, sinister, tropical plants and leaves fill the picture, wave in the warm southern wind. Out of these moving forms, the Samoan boy emerges, quite naturally a part of them, like some animal or bird. We watch Moana and his companions hunt, fish, play, swim. The simplest gestures seem very important, and reasonable. These people are instinctively graceful and natural as we can never be, in the movements of their muscles and limbs, in their expressions to one another. It is very much as if they were not acting at all. Flaherty has caught a marvelous overtone.

"Have you ever noticed," he said, "how animals and children in the film never seem to be acting. They just live or play."

The utterly strange overtone of reality, which some news reels catch, "Moana" has to an amazing degree.

But the loveliness of the woods, and of the sunlit beach, the marvelous feeling of water, the beauty of Moana swimming in it, the dignity of his dancing—these are not enough.

Suddenly, drama: the swift, sure rise to a tremendous, nerve-shattering climax, comes in a way that is absolutely unique in the films, and touched only in great music.

All this delightful "business," these episodes that we have been watching with so much tranquil pleasure, we see now are only preparations for the great event of Moana's life, the ordeal of tattooing, which to the Samoan is the test of supreme pain, the religious experience, thru which Moana must win to manhood, "the spirit and virility that makes for the fiber . . . the integrity of the race."

A Fine Art of Pain

TATTOOING, "the Polynesians have developed into a fine art of grueling pain and decorative loveliness." The meaning of it is most astonishing when we realize that with nature so favorable and life so easy out there, Moana willingly submits to this ancient tribal rite in order to assert his manhood. The realism of this sequence is something unsurpassed in the record of the movies.

It is the high moment of the film. Moana at first bears the ordeal stoically, grimly. Then his features twist involuntarily; the tears, the perspiration, start against his will!

Why does Flaherty try to transmit so much pain after the light-hearted beauty of the early sequences? Why does he dwell on this so long, so morbidly?

"Because the religious emotion is always associated in my mind with pain, supreme suffering," he answered to my question.

And now Moana, first thru work and play, then thru the torture of this—to us, inhuman and barbarous rite—has won the pride and strength of manhood, the privilege of wooing Fa-an-ga-se. The picture ends with Moana, well, after weeks of recovery, dancing with Fa-an-ga-se, the strangely sensuous dance of the Siva, which is the expression of their courtship and love.

An extraordinary thing about this simple drama has been the perfectly caught and perfectly sustained atmosphere; not a single element that belonged outside of the conception of life in the South Seas has so much as peeped in. There is nothing to jar your sense of good taste, to waken you from your dream.

Another point that must be made is that the plan or form of this film, by which it develops to its climax, is utterly simple and is woven from the materials which actually compose life here. You could never argue with or question the course of events. It has the inevitable simplicity of life itself, as Mr. Frederick James Smith pointed out in a recent issue of the CLASSIC in connection with such notable films as "The Last Laugh," "Stella Dallas," "The Big Parade."

Take "The Covered Wagon": there is a hopeless love interest in it that has nothing to do with the progress of the pioneers themselves across the prairies, which forms the real spectacle of the film. And the villain is only a professional villain; he is not forced into villainy by anything in the situation itself. From this point of view, "Moana" is pure of all the silly trapping and devices that are supposed to make people palpitate willy-nilly and its effectiveness despite this gives much room for thought.

The Art of Life

But Flaherty has done more than to give us only a beautiful spectacle. With his broad vision he has suddenly made us think seriously, in between the so tired of them. There are other drawbacks to so much time, too. In 'Girl Shy,' I had to cry steadily for ten days."

"They always played the same thing for those scenes," observed Roy. "When we heard them strike up 'I Love You Truly,' we'd say: 'Joby's crying again!'"

"After that, Harold wanted me to look as if I'd cried myself out and couldn't weep another tear, but was going on, broken-hearted. Try and do it—especially for two weeks!

"But I loved the part. I'm not so keen about this one. I am a painfully good girl who feeds the poor coffee and doughnuts and goes about with a sickening smile."

Odd thing about Jobyna. In the space of half an hour she can remind you of Lillian Gish, of Mary Pickford, of Mabel Normand and of Betty Bronson, and all the time be her own inimitable self—wistful, merry, tender or sad. They say that producers have eager eyes on the end of her contract, not so far away. . . .

realize how crude a foreign studio seems compared to an American one. The lights, the camera, the antiquated methods, are amazing. Yet one must realize what a drawback the war has been to pictures over there and overlook most of these inconveniences.

Film Community Danger

"AMERICA might learn something in the congenial atmosphere of the foreign studios. It is more like the stage, not so automatic, a little more personal. And another thing I firmly believe is, that no one city should make all the pictures. To form a community is death. All ideas, new impulses, die; everything becomes stereotyped. It is too bad we cannot have a studio in every state.

"In spite of this, I like California. New York is more stimulating, of course, but California is a very lovely place in which to work."

And now, leaving Mr. Hayakawa talking like a realtor, I will brush up a little bit on his past history in case you have forgotten.

He was born in Japan, and as soon as he grew old enough to think at all, he decided that the thing he wanted to do most was to come to America, and study for the stage in order to bring Shakespeare to Japan. He went to the University of Chicago, and won his letters playing quarterback on the football team. I also believe that he is a wonderful swimmer. For a while he played on the legitimate stage, and eventually drifted into pictures. He made an instantaneous success and was more often than not a perfectly villainous villain.

Mr. Hayakawa would like very much to go back to pictures. I personally think he is a fine actor, but I think he would be an even finer director, even if he has nothing better to piece together than a half dozen old match boxes.

How Fairbanks Took the Color Out of Color

work out a definite color scheme (green and brown) and abide by it—rigidly excluding every note that might distract attention from the whole. Rembrandt might put a bright color in shadow, for then it is toned down; we might do much the same in the background—but we must be forever on our guard that it did not come so near the fore as to distract your eye from the whole. For instance, we always had painters ready, so that if a light-costumed man was forced by the necessities of the action to come closer to the camera, he could immediately be dusted down with powder of a darker shade—wig, costume, and all.

"In other words: we had to compose in color as well as form."

And to this interesting theory they strictly adhered throughout every scene. If, in the hurry of outfitting a mob of extras, a scarlet bandanna was allowed to reach the set, it was immediately returned and locked up in a closet, never to see the light of day again! In fact, only one spot of brilliant color was allowed to enter the whole picture—a green parrot. And this only because it was absolutely necessary. For a pirate picture without a parrot would hardly do right by our historical traditions—or pass the censorship of Robert Louis Stevenson.

And again, perhaps, there is the red flash when the powder-magazine explodes; but this is so short—it only runs about eighteen inches—that the effect is sure to be mental rather than visual.

Purple and Blue Impossible

"WE found it impossible to do anything at all with purple, and that blue cannot be satisfactorily handled, as it takes a greenish tinge. This latter presented quite a difficulty—for, as perhaps you know, skies are blue. But," here Mr. Parker pointed to an etching of a New York street, "that is not a New York street as you and I see it—it is a street idealized thru the personality of an artist. We found this true of all art, that it idealizes nature. So we did the same—our skies are almost white, with just the slightest suggestion of a warm tinge of brown.

"Toward the end there is a scene where it was necessary that the sky be blue—when you see it, I think you will agree with me that it is far less pleasing than the others."

Perhaps the ultimate in this "idealization" is the oiling of the bodies of all concerned so as to give their skin the soft and velvet sheen of the ideal "skin you love to touch"—but never find.

The sparkle in his eyes grew gayer as he continued to tell about their findings.

"Green and brown is our scheme thru-out; greens of all the softer shades, and brown running the whole gamut from the lightest tint of old ivory to the deepest tone of mahogany. Other combinations are, of course, possible, but we found this the one best suited to our needs."

Color as a Background

THE reason for the seemingly unnecessary attention given to even the most trivial of details is quite peculiar—it was so you would get a picture in which color is not the dominating interest! They fought color so as to get a picture of a pirate story—with color as a background. The attempt aimed at—and everyone who has seen the picture swears it has been achieved—is to make you forget entirely that the picture is in color! In other words: they have tackled color from an angle directly opposite to that of all who went before them. Drama, not color, is the important thing!

To find if they had succeeded in their aim, Mr. Parker not only asked for criticism from those who saw it—he even eavesdropped while they were seeing the picture, so as to get their comments amongst themselves!

"At first, I would hear comments of 'Beautiful!' and 'Ah!'—but from the middle of the first reel on there would be silence.

"When, after they had seen it, I asked them how they liked the color, they would say: 'Color? Oh, yes, it was in color, wasn't it?'"

To gain this end, it had been necessary that there should not be a single detail that went wrong—no spot where you could have the slightest feeling that color had fallen down.

For this, it was imperative that the story be of the utmost simplicity, and of a sustained interest, with not one lull from the beginning to the end. Because of this, Mr. Fairbanks wrote every scene with color in mind—not to make the most of color, but to work story and color together in such a manner that each would make the utmost of the other.

"And, because of this, we received the greatest of all possible compliments—complaint that the picture was too short! As a matter of fact, it runs to 8,500 feet."

Long Color Tests

THEN it was necessary that the sets, make-up, and costumes be tested for this new medium. This work occupied every spare moment of Mr. Fairbanks and Mr. Parker—as well as the artists they had called in for consultation, Dwight Franklin and Oscar Borg—for the full preparatory period of six months. They would evolve a costume that would seem marvelous in the studio—only to find that on exteriors it would not go at all!

And with make-up it was, if possible, even more difficult. Doug has a very heavy beard, and, try as they would, they could not overcome its tendency to go green when flashed upon the screen in color. It took them a whole month before they hit upon a way to conquer this single detail—the application of a more reddish powder to that part of his face than elsewhere. Nor could Billie Dove use the usual "peaches and cream" of the leading lady; again Rembrandt was called in, and her skin was toned a mellow ivory. It was found that Sam de Grasse had no need of any make-up whatever—tho in black and white he has!

And, while we are on this subject of faces, there is another interesting detail to be mentioned. I am sure it has struck the attention of everyone who has ever seen a colored picture that every once in a while the faces take on a greenish tinge—as when a crap-shooting office force first sees the entrance of the boss. This was found to happen whenever a carbon in the lights went blue. The cause being found, the remedy was simple—watchfulness.

Twice as Much Light Needed

IN lighting, it was found that color requires just twice as much light as black and white. This meant that lights had to be used even in the shooting of exteriors. But, when someone suggested that they use colored lights to help in heightening the effects, this was vetoed, for, tho sets and skies could be idealized, no artificiality of color was allowed. The only thing that might be called a departure from this rule, the mahogany, rather than red, spurt of flame in the powder trains, is really not, for it was obtained thru the actual mixture of the powder, and not by any trick use of filters and colored gelatine.

The density of the color in any given scene could be varied within quite a large margin by the film on which they chose to print it—depending on whether they chose a green, red, or neutral emulsion.

In the handling of the crowds, many new and interesting elements were encountered. For a scene in the early part of the work, a large and varied crowd of buccaneers was called for. One hundred and fifty men were used—and then this scene was flashed upon the screen. It proved a mess!—the perfect summing-up was in a comment by Joe Schenck:

"It looks like an Italian wedding."

And this was true, a hundred and fifty men in color produce an effect equal to at least five hundred in black and white. The scene was retaken, and fifty men proved ample. This is possibly because of the greater stereoptic values possessed by color than by black and white.

Color as Emphasis

ANOTHER item was the great emphasizing value to which color can be put. In compositions where one man should stand out from all the others, the old masters put him in light and the others in shadow—so that the lighter tones would stand out against the darker. In a picture where movement has to be considered, this handling of high light and shade cannot be followed; but a similar effect was gained by the dyeing of the shirts: light for the important characters, and darker for those who were to constitute the background.

For the same reason, it was found necessary to dull the surfaces of the silver and brass mountings of the pistols and cannon, and all the ironwork upon the ship, so that they would not distract the eye, nor even be noticed, until brought into use. Even the gold and jewels of the looted ships could not make these firm ascetics lose their heads!

Another most interesting item of this work is an experiment the results of which should be of benefit to the picture industry as a whole. Under supervision of professors of the University of Southern California, a test of the comparative eye-strain of standard print, black-and-white film, and colored film was made. For this test, subjects of various ages and occupations were carefully selected: professors, students, and stenographers, carpenters, cooks, and gentlemen of leisure—people from almost every conceivable walk of life. On one night a few reels of colored film were run before them—tests were made, and then they were freed for three or four days. At the end of this time, a similar length of black-and-white film was shown them; tests were made, and they were freed again. And then they were made to read from books of standard type for the same period of time the films had been run before them; again tests were made—and then the three sets were brought together for comparison. The results were these: the strain was the most severe from reading; next from films of black and white, and least of all from films in natural color!

The goal aimed at in this production is to project an adventure story of the buccaneers against a background like an old painting brought from the cellar of some ancient castle and then revarnished. Tho they have taken every bit of praise with the largest mine of salt procurable, Mr. Parker feels that this has been accomplished. But ultimate judgment has not yet been passed—your verdict as a member of the final jury is awaited with almost "bated breath."

New Styles in Screen Girls

babies were left under the bushes in the garden by the dear little rabbits; and they believed in Santa Claus; and they believed that girls should never be kissed until the minister said the last word.

And they got darn tiresome—if anybody should ask you.

These haughty young ladies were even a relief from the girls who tried to do what Lillian Gish did—even tho they didn't.

These young ladies lived, apparently, to be chased by villains. They were at their very best when a Walter Long sort of person was chasing them round, upsetting the tables, chairs and other parlor appurtenances. Personally, I never could get up much sympathy for the fugitive young lady; but my heart bled for the villain. It must be a great nuisance to spend your life galloping around the tipped-over furniture in pursuit of young ladies whom you never catch.

And so the Norma Shearers and the Corinne Griffiths were a great relief. No villain ever chased them around the parlor furniture: well, hardly ever. They would just have annihilated a villain with a look.

They were always somewhat distant and looked like thoroughbreds. They came to the "love clinch" at the end with an air of condescension.

You knew when they were married what kind of wives they were going to be. They were going to be the kind that interrupted hubby's best story with the crushing remark: "No, my dear, you have it all wrong. It was Wednesday, not Thursday."

Of course, I refer to the screen version of these two young ladies. Off the screen they are quite different. Witty, pally, friendly girls—both of them. With gay hearts and sound, level heads.

Then—Renée Adorée

THE new girls came in with Renée Adorée in "The Big Parade."

In my opinion, it was the love story that made it one of the great pictures of all time. It wasn't the war stuff. It was one of the few great love stories of motion picture history. Mostly, it was Renée Adorée.

She brought something new and vital and real to the business of screen love-making. Something warm and vibrant. You knew that the chap who married her would have a lot of quarrels over the family gas bills. But a lot of sympathy, too.

Dolores Costello has the same impulsive, tender qualities in a somewhat more delicate mold.

I think these two girls are the best bets that have come to the screen for many years. Two others—Betty Bronson and Vilma Banky—give promise; but in a different way.

But they are warm and human, too.

Still, I doubt if the lovely Vilma will ever seem quite our own. Betty Bronson will always appeal to the head more than the heart. She is likely to make herself a great actress, however.

I go back to Renée, however. A physiognomist—a student of telling character from faces—told me once that she had the actress face—more than any other girl in Hollywood—sympathy, impulse—the ability to "let herself go"; almost no inhibitions; great intuition. She doesn't have to think what to do. She just does it as naturally as a cat strikes at a ball of yarn.

There is every probability that Renée

Adorée will be the forerunner of still another type.

As sure as shooting, you'll see that older and more mature women will become popular on the screen. Lillian Gish at forty (many years hence) will be more popular than now.

The Day of the Real Actress

In other words, the day of the real actress is coming in. The vision of youth and beauty is slipping out.

There are two or three reasons for this. After all, no real story is possible to a very young girl—especially the little ice maidens we have adored in the past. You know that they have had no experiences and that they have lived thru no stories. All that has ever happened to them was when a dentist pulled one of their wisdom teeth. Their idea of heavy tragedy is to forget to give some one a Christmas present or to get a run in a silk stocking at a dance.

If you will look over the hits of the year—aside from "The Big Parade"—you will see that most of them have been made by women no longer in the flapper class.

Irene Rich in "Lady Windermere's Fan," Louise Dresser in "The Goose Woman," Pauline Frederick in "Smouldering Fires."

As screen lighting continues to improve, little, round, youthful faces will no longer be in demand. In fact, they will be rather sniffed at.

The day of the great actress—the trained expert—with natural emotion and tenderness and the skill to show it to the folks.

The slim white lilies will give way to the full-blown rose.

Florida boom and our hunting for bread and butter in Wall Street, about the art of life. Here, he says to us, are people who are successful in the art of life. Are we that, with our motor-cars, factories, sky-scrapers, radio-receivers?

He has been an artist who interprets life. He says:

"I wanted to get closer to the things that mean so much in our lives, the sea, the forest, an uplifted arm, the texture of a face. . . . I wish we could experiment more with this wonderful instrument that we have in the cinema." And leaning forward to peer down from the high perch in the Babylonian tower of mid-Manhattan, where we sat talking, he exclaimed with a sudden intensity, "if I could only give the actual life of that policeman down there, in the maze of traffic, as it is, with all its fantastic overtones, just as barbarous as the life of Moana or Nanook!"

CECIL DE MILLE selects "The Deluge" as his next big superspecial. The selection was made as the result of a contest conducted by Mr. De Mille, the first award for the idea going to Catherine Comstock, 1625 East Street, Long Beach, California. Mr. De Mille hopes to duplicate the success of "The Ten Commandments" in this new production, which will have a lengthy prolog showing what the director's press-agent describes as "the mightiest cataclysm in all the world's known history."

Richard Dix breaks his hand in a prize-fight scene of "Take a Chance," directed by Gregory La Cava. Production held up for a week.

Famous Players-Lasky announce seventy-five productions for release between August 1, 1926, and July 31, 1927. The greatest of these appears to be "Old Ironsides." The proclamation officially promotes Florence Vidor and Esther Ralston to stardom.

Gregory La Cava signed under two-year contract by Famous Players-Lasky.

Universal announces "Love Me and the World Is Mine" to be directed by E. A. Dupont, former Ufa director. This is based upon a novel, "The Affairs of Hannerl." Mary Philbin and Norman Kerry will have the leading rôles.

Lillian Gish will do "Annie Laurie" next, with John Robertson directing. Miss Gish is also considering a story of early California in the old Spanish days.

Gene Tunney, contender for the heavyweight pugilistic championship, has been won over to the films. Pathé has signed Tunney for the leading rôle in a serial film going into immediate production.

William Fox signs Belle Bennett to play the leading rôle in his production of David Belasco's "The Lily." Victor Schertzinger will direct.

Famous Players-Lasky buys Anita Loos' amusing novelette, "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes." This has just passed its hundred thousand in book form.

Clive Brook playing opposite Florence Vidor in her first Paramount starring vehicle, written by Ernest Vajda.

"Kiki" breaks house record at Capitol Theater in New York, playing to $74,241 in one week.

Edmund Lowe selected for rôle of Sergeant Quirt in William Fox production of "What Price Glory." Victor McLaglen is Captain Flagg and Dolores Del Rio is Charmaine. J. Farrel MacDonald will play a comedy company cook.

Svend Gade and Universal sever relations. Gade is to direct Corinne Griffith in her next picture. Miss Griffith's future plans still indefinite. First National wants to re-sign her at a big advance and a number of other companies, including United Artists, are after her.

Jack Hoxie's contract with Universal expired on March 20. Hoxie's future plans unknown.

House Peters being considered for lead in "The Trail of '98," Metro-Goldwyn's big special to be made by Clarence Brown.

Lewis Stone and Anna Q. Nilsson playing leads in June Mathis' new picture, "Sinners in Paradise," based upon Clarence Buddington Kelland's "Nazareth." Charles Murray also in cast.

Metro-Goldwyn buys New York stage success, "Twelve Miles Out," for $40,000. This is a thriller of bootlegging and hijackers.

Cecil De Mille to do an all-negro feature, suggested perhaps by the success of David Belasco's stage hit, "Lulu Belle."

Dimitri Buchowetski to direct Emil Jannings' first American picture, "The Thief of Dreams," based upon Richard Connell's "A Friend of Napoleon." Jannings scheduled to arrive in September.

Ben Lyon to be featured in Robert Kane's production of "The Great Deception." Aileen Pringle also featured.

Mary Alden playing Mrs. Wiggs in Metro-Goldwyn's "Lovey Mary." Bessie Love has title rôle.

Helen Ferguson signed to play lead in Universal serial, "The Fire Fighter." Jack Dougherty has leading male rôle.

Reported that Norma Talmadge plans to do "Camille" with Sidney Franklin directing. "Camille" was done some years ago by Nazimova.

Harry Pollard recovering from critical illness in New York. Taken sick while filming version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

John Barrymore shelves plans to do Sabatini's "The Tavern Knight" and substitutes "Manon Lescaut." Dolores Costello will have the lead.

Buster Keaton doing Civil War comedy, "The General."

THEY SAY—

Editor, CLASSIC:

I was very much interested in the article in your March MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC entitled, "What Counts at the Box-Office?" Several stars were mentioned in the article and several "box-office puzzles." It may be of interest to you to hear from an outsider and from a moving-picture theatergoer, who has no particular favorite among the stars of featured players, why I think that certain of the men who are mentioned as "box-office puzzles" always draw large receipts from the public.

When the average person goes to the movies he likes to see life depicted in a natural human existence. The trouble with a good many of the stars is that they overdo the special part they are trying to depict and thus make the world and the story so idealistic that it is not real. Some of us theatergoers wonder why outside of their good looks or beauty some ever rise to the heights of stardom. Douglas Fairbanks is, of course, a great exception and, of course, there are others. Rudolph Valentino is supposed to be a perfect lover. He probably would be in the Elysian Fields, where we all hope to go some day, but in this every-day world how many men are there who go to the extremes that Valentino does in making love? Consequently he, to me, is not natural. Even the Frenchman, who is the dernier cri in the art of love-making, does it with greater finesse and at the same time with a finer sense of feeling than our perfect lover. I believe the reason for Gloria Swanson's popularity is that, like Fairbanks, she takes the part as the world sees it and not sometimes as she would like to do it herself.

And now we come to the Box-Office Puzzles. The writer of the article speaks of Thomas Meighan and wonders at his popularity. In the first place, he is a red-blooded man. Every woman and every man admires that type. In the second place, his plays are true to life and they don't overestimate the joys or sorrows of every-day existence. People can see themselves thru his acting. When he fights, he fights like a man and when he makes love he can be at the same time tender and strong. Those two things, strength and gentleness combined, are the two most human and therefore most popular characteristics found in a person. Consequently, I believe that is the reason of Thomas Meighan's popularity in gate receipts.

The same thing is true of Milton Sills. While in some ways he is a little colder than Thomas Meighan, he puts across to the public the idea of a red-blooded fighting man and also that of a wonderful lover, but not wishy-washy, as is sometimes the case with Valentino and the old favorite, Eugene O'Brien.

There is one other who is not mentioned in this article and I have no idea whether he ranks among stars or not. That one is Bert Lytell. To me these three men, above most of the others I can think of, can give the public what they want. They are all strong masculine types that both men and women like, and at the same time are able to show in their pictures the gentleness and kindness which will always be a strong drawing card with women.

Therefore I cannot see why any of these three should be a puzzle to the box-office.

Very truly yours,

MARY SMITH.

Box 515,
Carmel, California.

Editor, CLASSIC:

The article in "Flashbacks," by F. J. S., in the February number of your magazine on "The Menace of the Super-screen Theater," gives me the opportunity I have wanted for months, to voice my ideas and opinions on the subject.

It is with increasing dismay that I have watched the growth of vaudeville and variety show houses, and the corresponding decline of the houses devoted to motion pictures only.

As an ardent, intelligent and more or less elderly "fan" who believes in the motion picture and in its far-reaching and artistic possibilities, I am convinced that a continued policy which includes any other form of entertainment on same bill, is not conducive to the well-being, or indeed, to the life itself of the moving picture.

In a recent issue of The Boston Herald I read that "Peter Pan" and "A Kiss for Cinderella" have been adjudged not a "success." These pictures are only two of many others which have been placed in the same category, and which are, in themselves, perfect, as artistic achievements, giving joy and inspiration to the intelligent beholder as incomparable triumphs of artistic and lyric beauty.

Can it be that we must draw the conclusion that such pictures are unappreciated and not wanted by the majority?

To illustrate why, in my opinion, we cannot continue to have the "bigger" and "better" movies while present conditions prevail, or even have any assurances that the industry can continue to exist, I will give the following statistics as to standing of Boston theaters.

There are three theaters only which give first-run shows and that are, so-called, all-movie houses. All three give the same pictures weekly—usually—but not the same bill entirely, one of the three being a de luxe Paramount house, giving more or less variety, usually music, the two others being under same management and giving only pictures.

Besides these houses there are four which give all-movies, not first-run shows. And, at least nine vaudeville houses showing only one picture (and not always a first-run one) which is sandwiched in between the cheaper form of entertainment, consisting of vulgar skits—and short acts, acrobats, dancing, third-rate music—the usual variety show. The people continually passing in and out interrupt and obstruct the view, and disturb the enjoyment of the picture. Added to which, in these houses, because they were not originally designed for moving pictures, the screen is usually in the wrong place—either too high or too low—seats are not placed conveniently for seeing of moving pictures properly, which, added to other disadvantages too numerous to mention (poor ventilating among them) also disagreeable behavior of uncultivated people and other such joys make the seeing of a picture to any advantage an impossibility, a hideous travesty in many cases, and prevents an intelligent or enjoyable appreciation of plot or picture. If one, as in my own case, dislikes the "variety" form of entertainment, it is a real punishment to have to sit thru the few minutes impossible to avoid and necessary in order to see the whole of a picture. No wonder the "people" are indifferent to the latter, under such conditions, and that the majority who haven't sufficient intelligence to appreciate the best in anything pass the movie by and make it a secondary consideration.

I assure you that the inconvenience and discomfort of trying to take in a screen play under the above conditions is more than a handicap. It is a calamity! I speak from positive knowledge gained by long observation and experience.

So, it would seem that in Boston, at least, the "box-office" majority (if that phrase means what I think it does) are of the lower class of intelligence.

What is the remedy? It certainly does seem that something drastic ought to be done—but what? To attempt the impossible task of educating the "people" so that they will know and enjoy a sincere performance of the better class when they see it? Or, must we allow the worst only in the movies to survive because it is the only kind desired by the majority? It is a tremendous problem.

A case in point to illustrate the passing of a movie theater. Up to a week ago Loew's "State" was one of our best, but they then inaugurated a new form of entertainment, giving only one picture, in the usual way, interspersed with the usual variety and vaudeville performances. I wrote the management that they would lose one regular patron, in me, but that I knew what a small minority I, unfortunately, represented, and since it must be a "box-office" matter with them,

THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC is going to devote a page each month to the best letters from its readers.

Fifteen dollars will be paid each month for the best letter, ten dollars for the second and five dollars for the third. If two or more letters are found of equal merit, the full prize will go to each writer.

Letters must be constructive and interesting. They must deal with pictures or screen personalities. And—please note—they should be typewritten.

Marvelous New Spanish Liquid

Makes any hair beautifully curly in 20 minutes

THE SPANISH BEGGAR'S PRICELESS GIFT

By Winnifred Ralston

FROM the day we started to school, Charity Winthrop and I were called the touseled-hair twins. Tom Harvey nicknamed us that—horrid, red-bearded Tom Harvey, who used to put burrs in our pigtails and angle worms in our inkwells.

Our mothers despaired of us. Our hair simply wouldn't behave. There were Martha Brown, Helen Stahl, Betty Davis and Leah Cohen—all with wonderful curly hair. But Charity and I could never coax ours out of a straight line.

As we grew older the hated name still clung to us. It followed us through the grades and into boarding school. Then Charity's family moved to Spain, where her father was in diplomatic service, and I didn't see her again for five years—not until last New Year's Eve.

A party of us had gone to the Drake Hotel for dinner that night. As usual I was terribly embarrassed and ashamed of my hair. When the bobbing vogue first came in I had my hair cut, hoping against hope that would improve its looks. Realizing my mistake, I permitted it to grow again and by New Year's Eve it was just long enough to be unmanageable.

Horribly self-conscious I was sitting at the table, scarcely touching my food, wishing I were home. It seemed that everyone had wonderful, lustrous, curly hair but me and I felt they were all laughing or, worse, pitying me behind my back.

My eyes strayed to the dance floor and there I saw a beautiful girl dancing with Tom Harvey. Her eye caught mine and, to my surprise, she smiled and started toward me.

While there was something strangely familiar about her face I didn't recognize her—then, No—it—it couldn't be. About this girl's face was a halo of golden curls. I think she had the most beautiful hair I ever saw. My face must have turned scarlet as I compared it mentally with my own straggly, ugly mop. I had never been so thoroughly ashamed of my hair before.

Of course you have guessed her identity—for it was really she—Charity Winthrop who once had dull straight hair like mine.

It had been five long years since I had seen her. There was everything to talk about, but I simply couldn't wait. I blurted out—"Charity Winthrop—tell me—what miracle has happened to your hair?"

She smiled and said mysteriously, "Come to my room and I will tell you the whole story." She was stopping at the hotel. We excused ourselves and rushed to Charity's room. I listened breathless while she told me this strange story:

Charity tells of the beggar's gift.

"Our house in Madrid faced a little, old plaza, where I often strolled after my siesta.

"Miguel, the beggar, always occupied the end bench of the south end of the plaza. There he sat all day long, asking alms from the passersby. I always dropped a few centavos in his hat when I passed and he soon grew to know me.

"The day before I was leaving Madrid I stooped to bid him good-bye and pressed a gold coin in his palm. That was the best investment I ever made.

"I laughed at the idea, then said jokingly, 'Miguel, my hair is straight and dull. I would have it lustrous and curly.'

"'Oigame, senorita,' he said—'what you wish is even simpler than I thought. Many years ago—a Castilian prince was wedded to a Moorish beauty. Her hair was black as a raven's wing and straight as an arrow. Like you, this lady wanted los pelos rizos (curly hair). Her husband offered thousands of pesos to the man who would fulfil her wish. The prize led to Pedro, the droguero. Out of roots and herbs he brewed a potion that converted the princess' straight, unruly hair into a glorious mass of ringlets curls.

"Pedro, son of the son of Pedro, has that secret today. Years ago I did him a great service. Here you will find him,—go to him and tell your wish. Adios, senorita, con los Tios.'

"You can't imagine, Winnifred, how funny it made me feel. I did not take it seriously, of course. I never expected to look up this mysterious Pedro, but some whim changed my mind and I called a coche and gave the driver the address Miguel had given me.

"At the door of the apothecary shop, Pedro, a funny old hawk-nosed Spaniard, met me. Nervously I stammered out my explanation. When I had finished, he bowed and vanished into the rear of his store. Presently he returned with a bottle which he handed to me.

"By this time I was terribly excited—could hardly wait until I reached home. When I was finally in my room alone, I took down my hair and applied the liquid as directed. In twenty minutes, not one second more, the transformation, which you have noted, had taken place.

"Come, Winnifred—apply it to your own hair and see what it can do for you."

Breathlessly I watched Charity take a bottle from her wardrobe trunk. Tremblingly my fingers undid my hair and applied the liquid.

Twenty minutes later, as I looked into Charity's mirror, I could hardly believe my eyes. The impossible had happened. My dull, straight hair had wound itself into curling tendrils. My head was a mass of ringlets and waves. It shone with a lustre it never had before.

You can imagine the amazement of the others in the party when I returned to the hall-room. Everybody noticed the change. Never did I have such a glorious night. I was popular. Men clustered about me. I had never been so happy.

The next morning when I awoke, I hardly dared look in my mirror, fearing it had all been a dream. But it was true—gloriously true. My hair was curly and beautiful.

Then the thought came to me I had no right to keep this great secret to myself. There were thousands of women just like me who would give anything to know my precious secret.

The TRUTH About

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH AND TAMAR LANE

WHEN THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC revealed the inside facts about screen salaries a year ago, there was general astonishment. The figures were exact, disclosing the astonishing fact that the motion picture pay-roll ran to $750,000,000 every seven days, exclusive of extra players. This huge figure appears to have shot up a little further during the past prosperous twelve months.

Not that slumps haven't occurred among stellar salaries. But, in the main, the trend has been upward. There have been some slight changes among the ten big money-makers of the screen. Harold Lloyd is still the biggest earner of filmdom. Last year his earnings were estimated to run to $30,000 a week, or $1,500,000 on the year. They have advanced since that to about $40,000 a week or, in other words, two millions a year. Here we might disclose a bit of inside information. Lloyd's "The Freshman" had passed the two-million mark last March, an unprecedented record for a comedy.

Harold Lloyd's Earnings

It must be pointed out that Lloyd finances his own picture organization, makes his own pictures, and actively heads the company. Thus everything his comedies make over and above expenses is his own. Then, too, the revenue from his old comedies continues, providing added royalties.

Charlie Chaplin had a good year. To all the royalties from all his old successes must be added the amount earned this year by "The Gold Rush," probably well over a million and a quarter.

Third place in earning power, as last year, goes to Doug Fairbanks, who is the super-showman of the screen. Fairbanks has had a big year. His "Don Q" was a big success at the box-offices of the country and, judging from its New York hit, "The Black Pirate" seems likely to be Doug's biggest success. Fairbanks' earnings ought to run around $20,000 a week easily.

With her shift to United Artists, Gloria Swanson slips still further upward in the ten big money-makers of celluloidia. Miss Swanson was getting about $8,000 a week from Famous Players at the finish. It is said that she was offered $20,000 a week to remain. Instead, however, she accepted the offer from United Artists. This, we are told, provides a guarantee of $10,000 a week and a percentage of the profits. Miss Swanson must have estimated this total to be greater than the Famous offer, for she accepted it. Like other United Artists, Miss Swanson will head her own unit.

Mary Pickford's Million

MARY PICKFORD'S earnings on the year ought to run better than a million. Her "Little Annie Rooney" has been doing exceedingly well at the box-office of America at large and her next picture, "Sparrows," may be another winner. Indeed, the Fairbanks-Pickford menage has been doing itself proud.

A year ago the general theory was that Thomas Meighan had passed his crest as a money earner. He was getting about $8,000 a week then. Perhaps, Meighan had some doubts himself about a contract renewal, for he signed to co-star with Norma Talmadge in a single picture. Then the wisecracks had to eat their words. Meighan was offered a million dollars by Famous for six pictures more. He signed—and the plan to co-star with Miss Talmadge was shelved. Meighan will make about four of these six pictures during the twelve months. Which gives him better than $12,000 a week.

FILM SALARIES

Inside Facts About the Stars' Earnings

Lillian Gish is in the big-money class again. Her Metro-Goldwyn contract is estimated to run variously at $8,000 to $10,000 a week. This will be a crisis year for Miss Gish. Her "La Bohème" was a personal disappointment. She must do better during 1926 to continue among the big ten.

Norma and Colleen

At least two of the big stars, Norma Talmadge and Colleen Moore, owe their tremendous money-making capacities to their husbands. Norma Talmadge is managed by her husband, Joseph Schenck, who is a power in the picture world and who also directs the activities of Constance Talmadge, Buster Keaton and Rudolph Valentino. He has just added John Barrymore to his screen string.

Mr. Schenck has been shifting gradually his stars to United Artists. Norma Talmadge's earnings can be placed at over a million. Here we may as well present the earnings of the rest of the Schenck string. Constance Talmadge has earned as high as $3,000 a week, when she is working steadily. Buster Keaton probably averages over $4,000 a week. Valentino has been paid $100,000 per picture by Schenck. "Son of the Sheik" is the last production under this arrangement and doubtless the reception of this film will decide Rudy's future contracts. In boxing parlance, Valentino won a decision with "The Eagle," but the result was no knock-out. Rudy's result with "Son of the Sheik" will have to be more decisive to earn a continuance of a $100,000-per-picture arrangement.

Mr. Schenck is placing Barrymore upon the same $100,000-a-picture basis. His "The Sea Beast" has been a box-office clean-up for the Warner Brothers, who had Barrymore under contract, and doubtless won the attention of the astute Mr. Schenck.

The Biggest Flat Salary

TOM MIX still continues to receive the largest straight salary. (Most of the salaries we are enumerating are the combined results of salary guarantees and percentages of profits.) Mix gets $15,000 each week, week in and week out, from William Fox.

Under her Metro-Goldwyn arrangement, Marion Davies receives $10,000 a week.

There are a number of high-power money-making players close behind the leaders. We have mentioned Colleen Moore. Lifted to prominence by the success of one picture, "Flaming Youth," Miss Moore has been jockeyed to the big money by her husband, John McCormick, one of the executives of First National. Miss Moore was in the $800 class when she did "Flaming Youth." Now she is getting around $8,000.

Pola Negri is receiving around $4,000 a week, having recently renewed a contract.

It is an interesting commentary upon the haphazard business methods of pictures that the four most popular men on the screen today, Richard Dix, John Gilbert, Ramon Novarro and Ronald Colman, receive less than a half-dozen or so leading men and character players.

Surprising Film-Salary Facts

The four most popular men on the screen today—Richard Dix, John Gilbert, Ramon Novarro and Ronald Colman—receive less than a half dozen or so leading men and character players. These four, however, have placed rôles and opportunities ahead of remuneration.

At $3,000 a week, Conway Tearle, Eugene O'Brien and Lewis Stone are the highest paid screen leading men.

Wallace Beery is the highest-paid character actor. He gets $3,000 a week.

Among the smallest star salaries are Betty Bronson's $500, Dolores Costello's $300, and Vilma Banky's $500.

Hollywood for Beverly Hills

DON RYAN

Don John Gilbert's mountain-top hacienda, viewed from his drape-protected Dougledyas court and swimming pool

*The costly homes of Moviedom
How solemnly they stand!
Amidst their tall, transplanted trees
On subdivided land.*

THIS blasphemous parody may cause Mrs. Hemans, pale poetess of the Victorian cachexia, to heave feebly beneath the sward. But then Mrs. Hemans was never in Hollywood.

I say in Hollywood advisably. Hollywood is not a place. It is a symbol. Try to find it. As for living there—that is no longer being done either.

The outside world inconsiderately considers Hollywood a place, and a quite definite place—to the bitter disappointment of each arriving visitor. Hollywood thinks Paris a very wicked city; but what Paris thinks of Hollywood—ooh, la, la!

Persistent rumors have given the world this conception of Hollywood: a place where one may expect to see a motion picture director and some other scoundrel engaged in fist-cuffs on the corner of the Boulevard, until a couple of gentlemen come out of an adjoining hop-joint and stop them.

But if you ask the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce, it will tell you indignantly that Hollywood is the business center of multifarious industry. The Hollywood Chamber of Commerce wears knickers and its collective head is bared to the kiss of the California sun. But these outward symbols do not mean that it ever gets frivolous. The Hollywood Chamber of Commerce is deadly serious.

A State of Mind

THE truth is that Hollywood is a state of mind. Of course, there is an undersized Gopher Prairie which on the maps is labeled with the name. This place—as such—has become the Deserted Village of Moviedom. It no longer houses the élite of the so-called movie colony. The studios remain, but even they are going—to make room for office-buildings. The only substantial remnants of the Twelve Tribes of Moviedom still tenting on the old ground are camp followers such as poor devils of writers.

I myself live in what had been a chapel consecrated to one of the legion of strange religions that spring up and die down like mushrooms in this sunny land. Before the exodus, in demand as a Studio Apartment, it brought a rental of $150 a month. I get it for $50.

Krotona, sacred to the concepts of the lamented Mme. Blavatsky, have moved away to Beverly. There we see their expensive new houses perched each on its separate crag, a monument to the emolument of popular public entertainment.

If you should come out here to see the sights, you would be obliged to hire a large automobile—with good brakes; be sure of that—and drive thru the lonely slopes and canyons of Beverly Hills, observing here and there the widely spaced dots of white or pink which index the tastes of those various architects employed by various stars to concoct The Home Beautiful.

All Period Residences

If you took the trouble to drive up closely enough to examine each house separately, you would be pained to make this observation: all these places are period dumps Italian villas, English country homes, Spanish haciendas. You look in vain for an American house. You realize there isn't any such thing; that a rich American, casting about for a genteel way to spend his dough, must of necessity go in for some damned period or other. This is not the fault of the movie actors. We haven't any more a national architecture than we have a national literature—even less.

If you must choose a period, choose wisely. What style of architecture is most consonant with California? You win! The Spanish. Those who have followed in the footsteps of the Dons have chosen best of all. And here we are, at the entrance of John Gilbert's new Spanish Colonial residence.

Jack Gilbert's Home

JACK lives at the top of Tower Road. The tower that named it broods on the apex of this range; crenelated and roofed above the ramparts, stained with time in the manner the studio sets are treated—dark streaks applied with a crafty brush. The tower shelters no robber baron's troop. It supplies Beverly Hills with water for purely domestic purposes.

The rains that threatened to wash Valentino's hill from under him have subsided. Swiftly in their wake the great desert that is California has gone from brown to green—rioting in its one brief period of verdancy. From Gilbert's hill you can see fifty miles along the teeming plains and raise the Island of Catalina away at sea.

The country unrolls at your feet like a green plush rug, pushed up into many hillocks where the baby has left his blocks under it; with the spikes of oil derricks over near the coast-line door, where baby has been playing with Erector.

To the left, handful after handful of tiny toy houses have been tossed around and left in confusion: Los Angeles. And twenty-five miles across the room the significant hand of Mr. Heintz has chalked in gigantic white against the sloping green the numerals—57.

You can watch the sea—confides Emil—sometimes so near, sometimes so far away.

Emil is the sommelier, a Belgian, a good butler, not above being a bit of a poet.

He conducts us thru the walled patio planted with palms dug up and transported from San Juan Capistrano—palms a hundred and fifty years old. The frieze on the wall is a trifling thing, but it lets us have at once the feel of the place—the giveadam atmosphere which is of its proprietor. The frieze presents a shrouded Mexican slouched on a horse before a ruined mission, behind him an indifferent cactus and an impracticable ox-cart. Manaña, says the frieze. Jack Gilbert is himself a poet.

Proud of His House

EMIL has drawn up leather chairs before the window which displays a twenty-foot canvas of the world below, beginning to be covered now with the pale gauze of evening. Yellow stars twinkle into life, a handful at a time—the lights of towns along the sea.

Jack is talking to us lazily, with the boyish candor which always charms me. He is proud of his house. He has just two things—this house and the studio to interest him.

"OLD IRONSIDES" Sails

The battered old Constitution as she lies in Boston harbor. A replica has been built at Catalina from the navy's original plans

How a Screen Spectacle Is Being Built About the Famous Old Constitution Off Catalina

Everything conspired to create the right occasion for the production of "Old Ironsides." Just whether the film will be good publicity for the navy and help to restore the nation's pride in this governmental branch, or whether the government's activities in inviting school children's pennies for the restoration of the fine old boat will prove dashed good publicity for the film, doesn't much matter. The god of Destiny is probably smiling in content.

The idea of making "Old Ironsides" the feature of a picture had been simmering in the brain of Harry Carr for years. Then one day his old school friend, Secretary

WELL, anyway masculinity is having a first-class renaissance in motion pictures, wherever else it is under a cloud.

We have rather had our fill of the flapper girlie-girlie, pretty-dear films, haven't we?

The motion picture industry may be still in its infancy—but hurrah, perhaps it's a boy, after all!

This story, written around good "Old Ironsides," the famous old frigate, the U. S. S. Constitution, is thoroly and completely masculine. It is much more than just another super-special put out by the Lasky studio. It is much more than a fine patriotic film reviving American national sentiment in its navy, reminding us of its proud beginnings way back in 1804 A. D. and of the highly creditable exploits of the third vessel built by a newly independent nation that was to rise in mighty world power a century later.

It's all that, but it is also a magnificent masculine gesture, designed, I suspect, to jolly well help in the new vogue to put femininity back in its place.

Epic in Masculinity

WAR, the sea, hard pioneering in remote lands—these are still masculine strongholds. So behold, they have given us war in "The Big Parade," in "What Price Glory?" Not much éclat for the flappers in those. And they have given us pioneering in "The Covered Wagon," "The Iron Horse," "The Pony Express." They have given us the "Sea Hawk," "The Sea Beast," and "Down to the Sea in Ships." And now they are going to give us "Old Ironsides"—the sea, bilge-water, rope, seamanship, masculinity in daring and endurance, masculinity in courageous patriotism, masculinity in heroic endeavor, mean masculinity, great masculinity, fond but strong masculinity, clean and dirty masculinity—but masculinity all thru in an undiluted masculine setting.

George Bancroft, plus real whiskers, plays the chief gunner of the U. S. S. Constitution. Bancroft saw actual service in the navy for six years

the Seven Seas Again

By ALMA

A painting, by Duncan Gleason, of the U. S. S. Constitution, under full sail. Below, James Cruze, who is directing the film production of "Old Ironsides"

Curtis Wilbur of the Navy Department, talked of his dream of restoring the noble old boat. Harry Carr was thereby moved to read up on its history—and glowed to envision it as a film.

Harry Carr's Idea

PERHAPS Jesse Lasky was inspired to prompt receptiveness of the idea because of the navy's "Old Ironsides" fund. But, anyway, Walter Wood, he who wrote the script for "The Covered Wagon," "The Pony Express," and other achievements of Director James Cruze, was called in. Equipped with Harry Carr's research labors, he made a fine faithful historical record. At this stage it was undiluted veritable history, with Admiral Decatur of the U. S. S. Constitution as the arch hero. But the wiseheads who knew their box-office tastes felt that straight history would not quite do.

So here we find Laurence Stallings, co-author of "What Price Glory?" called in to add the box-office touch. It was Laurence who suggested the injection of the good ship Esther, and of The Boy and The Girl. It meant side-tracking Admiral Decatur a trifle—but even admirals must make way for love's young dream. But dont you suppose for a moment that love's young dream subtracts one iota from its masculinity—it only completes it. It is so advantageous to have a sweet quivering maiden around to show masculinity off at its best.

So there is just one maiden in it—the fair sweet Esther Ralston, and her name is Esther in the play (and Esther is a name associated with dutiful enchantment!). Esther is permitted to have a mother in a few brief glimpses, but beyond that the only other female who has anything to do with it is Dorothy Osler, who will "cut" the picture for James Cruze—and she has a boyish bob and wears sailor trousers on the lot!

A novelty that is injected is that all the players bear their own names in the play. Thus the villainous and disreputable old bo's'n of the good ship Esther is programmed as W. Beery. The chief gunner of the U. S. S. Constitution is G. Bancroft. The first mate is Fred L. Kohler, and George Godfrey, the heavyweight colored prize-fighter of the real-life sport sections, is the cook on the Esther. Eddie Featherstone will play Commodore Somers of the U. S. S. Constitution and Johnny Walker will masquerade as Admiral Decatur.

The Boy is to be played by an almost unknown young man—Charles Ferrell—until very recently a mere "extra" of over two years' sighing standing. He is only twenty-four now. He was an extra in "The Ten Commandments" and ever since, until he slid over to Fox and better pay and a five-year contract a brief couple of months ago. So altho Lasky once had him, they have had to hire him from Fox for this rôle.

And the film opens with The Boy, gazing at a navy recruiting placard of those far-off days—an actual one, borrowed from government archives in Washington:

ENCOURAGEMENT TO SEAMEN

All GENTLEMEN ADVENTURERS and able-bodied seamen wishing to share in the honors of war and the spoils of victory in the present heroic venture of the magnificent new ship "Constitution" against the Barbary pirates at Tripoli . . ." etc.

Reviewing Pictures on Broadway

By MORDAUNT HALL

PICTURES are presented on Broadway every week during the four seasons of the year and therefore with the regularity of a postman who brings the morning mail the newspaper critic goes forth two or three days a week to look at the films and write his impressions of them. Sometimes the work is amusing, sometimes it is even inspiring, and then there are also times when it is incredibly dull. Conventional themes of the wide-open spaces and melodramatic mixtures of the Great Northwest are not apt to act as a mental stimulus.

In the last three years I have written criticisms on more than six hundred productions, and like a number of other persons I have thus beheld hosts of men slain, countless heroes emerge triumphant from very nasty predicaments, scores of maidens captured, rescued and kissed with terrific violence, innumerable tornadoes, cyclones, floods, fires and other types of so-called thrills. I can't say how many times I have seen the heroine's father reach into the right-hand drawer of his desk and pull out a revolver because he had met with financial reverses. This situation has lost its tragic touch, and become almost comic. I have mentally measured great rooms and figured out their rental in Park Avenue. I have seen bathrooms large enough for a company of soldiers. Then there have been scented fountains, after-dinner bathing parties and tales of hysterical flappers, whose chief activities are drinking cocktails, speeding in Rolls-Royces and dancing the Charleston. I have seen the birth, and I trust the death, of comedy situations. For instance, there is the crack-brained young man who tries to create laughter by not knowing whether to use a knife, fork or a spoon on his grapefruit, and there is his prototype who thinks it funny to shake hands with the butler.

The Reviewer's View-Point

BUT with all its shortcomings, this work is not uninteresting. I have reached the stage when I realize that a producer, after all, may not have intentionally made a dry production to annoy me. And then there are the broad comedies, which have made me sigh, but which nevertheless have appealed to the majority in the audience. Molasses poured on a man's head always brings down the house, and so does the idea of the character falling over some obstacle into a pool of mud. Pictures are made to appeal to as many people as possible, and if you don't like them, somebody will.

When it comes to writing criticisms on some dreary mile of film, one becomes bored with even one's own combinations of words. There is "mildly entertaining," employed to let a production down lightly. You really mean that the readers can take it or leave it. "Quite diverting," refers to something a little better, but the "quite" qualifies the entertainment value of the effort. "Told with his tongue in his cheek" once had its appeal, but now it has taken on the semblance of a bromide. "The fabric of this story" is threadbare, and so are "clap-trap," "tawdry," "sloppy bit of sentimentality," "contraption," "slow-moving," "adequate acting," "trashy," "sparkling," "interesting" and even "attractive." "Historionic," "opus," "whilom," chef-d'œuvre and such like make you think you are posing as you write. "Quite the most interesting" sounds as if you have stolen it from a paragraph in "Town Topics" and "sustained suspense" seems as if it were water-logged.

An ambiguous story is one of my chief bugbears, especially when the production has some excellent photographic effects. As you can't make head or tail of the plot, you can dismiss the beauty of the scenes in a word or two. The acting may be negligible and likewise the titles. You feel as if you would like to write:

"This is an awful picture with some good scenes," and fading out on that.

The Mediocre Pictures

SEVERAL months ago there was put on one of the Broadway cinemas a picture which had so many characters and was so bewildering that it would have made three different stories and perhaps four. Then the hero in the first chapter showed himself to be a gullible numskull, and the heroine was no better than the young man, with whom she falls gradually in love, while her caddish husband, whom she had not seen for years, turns up at the psychological moment. The story went on and on, dragging most of the time, then picking up a bit, and finally it was with intense relief that one perceived the ending. As one man who seldom went to see pictures remarked, it was the sort of picture which could have gone on forever. There was no reason why it should have ceased even when it did.

Soon after I began writing motion picture criticisms, James Montgomery Flagg took offense at my review of William S. Hart's "Wild Bill Hickok." Mr. Flagg said that it seemed to him that I was a pale-faced spaghetti hound, and he insisted that Mr. Hart's picture was worthy in many respects. I thought that the best thing to do with this letter was to print it, which I did, and the head on it was very simple. It read: "He Does Not Agree With Us."

On another occasion I wrote a sort of reminiscent review of the last picturization of "The Light That Failed." It was a fair picture, but it had not caught much of the author's spirit. Somebody wrote, upbraiding me for having made him come all the way in town to see what he thought was an execrable bit of work. Another reader objected to my review of the "Pony Express." He wondered why I had not referred to the easy way in which the hero polished off the villain's underlings. But I must say that frequently I receive some rather nice

E. Temple Thurston

E. TEMPLE THURSTON I shall always remember as the author of "The City of Beautiful Nonsense," a book that for sheer whimsicality captured my fancy completely. Mr. Thurston's first wife—now deceased—was Katherine Cecil Thurston, the brilliant author of that fascinating novel, "The Masquerader."

Mr. Thurston told me that he had considered seriously plunging in and learning the photoplay technique in the studios, but that conditions were not receptive.

"The American films are so infinitely superior to the British that I don't wonder at the state of things here and the poverty in English film circles. English producers never really studied the thing. In the main they are made up of cheap photographers. Not one that I can think of who has the faintest conception of what a story is, let alone of how to tell it when he has it. All they want to put on are pretty pictures. In storytelling, a certain approach of mind is necessary, lacking which one is unable to tell a story well. The English film people don't begin to have that talent. I might compare the British film producer with that taxi driver down yonder."

A. A. Milne

A. A. MILNE is the author of one of the most delightful books of the century—"When We Were Very Young." When I saw him in his charming home in Chelsea, London's Latin Quarter, he told me that his publishers had just reported British sales of this book more than one hundred thousand and American sales even in advance of that number. So it is quite possible that many of those who read these lines may have enjoyed Mr. Milne's little book as well. Or, you may have had the privilege of seeing on the boards—as well as on the screen—that play of rare charm, "Mr. Pim Passes By."

"I think the average film drama is most ghastly," replied Mr. Milne. Then like all the others, he partially reversed himself so as to say that he liked the film as a medium, but not the sort of things called the "film drama." "You see what I mean is, I like Chaplin—and Harold Lloyd. They are no end of amusement. And that—uh—what is it called? 'The Adventures of Felix!' And seeing plants grow before your eyes—and stunts of that sort—I'm all for them!"

The Second of a Series of Talks About Motion Pictures With Famous English and Continental Writers

Frank Swinnerton

FRANK SWINNERTON is generally recognized as one of the most promising novelists of the younger generation. H. G. Wells and Arnold Bennett openly acknowledge his genius and hint that their mantle of greatness will probably fall on his shoulders. All of which bothers Frank Swinnerton not a jot. He goes right along his own sweet way doing what he pleases and gets there just the same.

The first time I met him, in London this was, I asked him offhand what he thought of the "films," as they call them in England, he said, "I think they're a bore. I never go unless I have to. I think they're awful!"

I learned later that he had been annoyed into this ruthless statement by the several "inside" contacts he had had with the cinema. "Wells and Bennett go to see the films all the time tho," he added almost penitently, to show that he wanted his statement to be taken impersonally. "However, I adore Chaplin," he went on conciliatorily. "I think he is the one genius they have produced as an actor. Just to see him doing the tiniest bit is a pleasure. It does not matter how subtle your mind may be, you will

E. Phillips Oppenheim

E. PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM has always been my idea of the supreme story-teller.

I had always hoped to meet Oppenheim some day in or near the realm in which he creates his literary and dramatic beings. If you will recall, most of his stories are concerned with "foreigners" of high degree or of low villainous motives, which sooner or later brings us into the midst of some breath-taking international intrigue. And the scene of most of these exploits is the Riviera and Monte Carlo, of course.

Here, at Monte Carlo, where I am writing these words, I have seen ALL of Mr. Oppenheim's characters—either taking tea on the terrace in front of the Café de Paris, at the Royal Opera, in the gaming rooms of the Casino or at one of Baroness Orczy's famous receptions at her Villa Bijou. Russian princesses financially embarrassed, swarthy Italian counts, Hungarian nobles with long beards and monocles in one eye, Austrian barons looking for jobs and, of course, suave Englishmen—they are all here! And here is where Oppenheim comes to get his wonderful local color and to pick up these characters at random—and does it so successfully Filming "BEAU GESTE"

By ALICE L. TILDESLEY

TWENTY-EIGHT miles out of Yuma, Arizona, across the shifting sands of America's Sahara, a plank road leads to a valley where a dream is coming true.

The dream is Herbert Brenon's, but over seventeen hundred men are laboring with a hearty good will to bring it to realization.

A year ago, when Mr. Brenon was mourning the loss of his second and dearest brother—the first having passed on to Elysian fields some years before—someone put into his hands the tale of the devotion of three "gay romantics."

And "Beau Geste" of the screen—this dream of a director's heart—is to be in the nature of a memorial of those elder Brenons, an offering of fraternal love, dedicated to all brothers everywhere.

*"Allons, Brenon, voici la Legion.
Tiens, Voila les Français; Voila les Anglais; les Americains,
Qui combattent les Touaregs Nord Africain.*

We come from the East;
we come from the West;
We'll work like Hell and never rest.
I say, Old Chap,
we'll do our best
To help you make
'Beau Geste'!"

The Foreign Legion

WITH this paraphrased version of the famous "Song of the Foreign Legion," composed in his honor, the legionnaires of the picture greeted the chief when he entered the African fort which has been built on the sand dune crest. . . . And the spirit of the song is the spirit of the making of the picture. It's "Beau Geste."

The war of the Riffs is responsible for the largest location in history: since the company could not go to Algiers, Algiers must come to the company. And who will deny that it has come? Sand dunes—great golden powder-fine heaps of dust stretching interminably to one horizon—piling up in shifting outline toward a distant range of purple mountains, to another: sand dunes a-bloom with desert primrose, silhouetting ungainly camels against a blue, blue sky!

The finding, building and running of this camp for nearly two thousand men is a story in itself. Imagine digging a well in a desert, establishing two electric light plants, a complete telephone service, five miles of water pipes, six miles of wire, twenty carloads of lumber—to mention just a few figures in the staggering total.

Keeping in the spirit of the story, the location camp is a military one. A bugler wakes us at dawn and punctuates the day with calls from assembly to retreat.

A captain commands the army, four mounted orderlies stand by day and night, and three flags fly in "Beau Geste Square."

To Play Czar's Daughter

THE illusion of moonlight and music that she brings to the screen is as real when you meet her face to face. She is as stately and exquisite as one of her own white iris fringing the woodland pool beneath her pepper-trees.

When Walter Morosco took her to Hawaii as a bride, the islanders recognized this quality, instinctively, and paid it tribute. There was a pier stretching out over the waters that caress Hawaiian shores—a pier overlooked by the honeymoon bower—and here, under a tropic moon, the grounds fairly teeming with gardeners requiring advice! Yet there was Corinne Griffith, clad in April green touched with buttercup yellow, maintaining perfect poise in situations that would at least have furrowed the brow of any other cinema star.

A private projection room is being built in the Beverly Hills home. The mistress of the house stood in the half-finished place, among pots of paint and cans of varnish, surrounded by inquiring workmen—making swift decisions, settling unexpected problems, with a despatch and efficiency to be envied by a queen at court.

Somehow aloof from the pettiness of housekeeping, she seems still beautifully capable of home-making. For her home is the darling of her heart.

"We're going to have a well, a rustic well," she explained, bringing out a drawing of it, "The rocks are coming this afternoon. I wish I could stay here and watch them build the wall. Going back to work in a picture after a vacation is like going back to school. I have that sinking sensation—that vision of long weeks of hard labor!

"Of course, I wouldn't give up pictures, any more than I'd have given up an education, but—there you are!

The Fun of Planning

"It's such fun to plan things. This is the first vacation Mr. Morosco and I have had together for a long time, and we've spent most of it on the house and grounds. We have an unwritten rule that pictures are not to be discussed at home—we have enough of them all day long. So we have a fascinating time with furniture and furnishings and landscaping.

"We have put in the most delightful hours reading about periods of furniture and delving into the histories of kings from whose reigns they date. You can almost tell the disposition and habits of monarchs from the look of furniture made under their rule. Remember the intrigue of France's courts at the time most of the French dressing-tables and desks had secret drawers!"

The Grass Is Delivered

AT this point, Japanese grass was delivered, and we adjourned to the gardens to superintend its planting.

The sun brought out the gold in her brown hair as she stood under the lime-tree, giving her serene directions. That lime-tree, the row of eucalypti, and the gnarled peppers that edge the drive are all part of the old estate founded by the fortunate soul who was presented with the land by the government. But the rustic lookout house high up in a tree—the trickling fountain cunningly arranged among the rocks and giant stump to make a bird bath for her feathered courtiers—the tea-house by its shaded pool, and the flowers that paint the gentle slopes, are all Princess Corinne's.

White and yellow jasmine, purple wistaria, narcissus and heliotrope are among the fragrant blooms.

Celebrities of the theatrical world gave that advice to a pint-size vaudeville performer a quarter of a century ago.

The prophecy has been fulfilled, but on a scale exceeding the expectations of the most wildly imaginative trouper. Fate has given the youth the world for a stage and an audience of millions.

It was ten years ago that young Keaton cast his fortunes with the "movies," after traveling hundreds of thousands of miles and trouping all over the United States and in foreign lands since babyhood. chuckles and Mack Sennett's only claim to fame might be that he gave to the screen Charlie Chaplin, Mabel Normand, Ford Sterling, Charley Murray, Fatt Arbuckle, Gloria Swanson, Marie Prevost and a few other fairly well-known actors and actresses.

Which reminds me of the fact that this

IT'S a far cry from a second-hand clothing store, in the grime which makes Sixth Avenue, New York, to the old Keystone company studio on Allesandro Street, Hollywood, but it serves to prove that a fellow named Kipling, who once made the wise crack, "East is East and West is West," was wrong.

All of which gives me a running start on the "inside story" of how the Keystone cops came to be—those amazing gentry of the law (in movies only) who aroused, at one and the same time, the mirth of a nation and the ire of numerous police heads throught the country. There was a time when folks resented the affront to the dignity and majesty of the law offered by the spectacle of cops who never caught anything (except a pie), cops who believed they were cops because they wore a cop's uniform, cops who always ran the wrong way, cops who fell out of windows (yes, you're right, always into a tub of water or a bed of mortar), cops whose uniforms made the conductor of the Toonerville trolley look like a fashion-plate, cops whose clubs were made of rubber and who always were run over by their own patrol wagons.

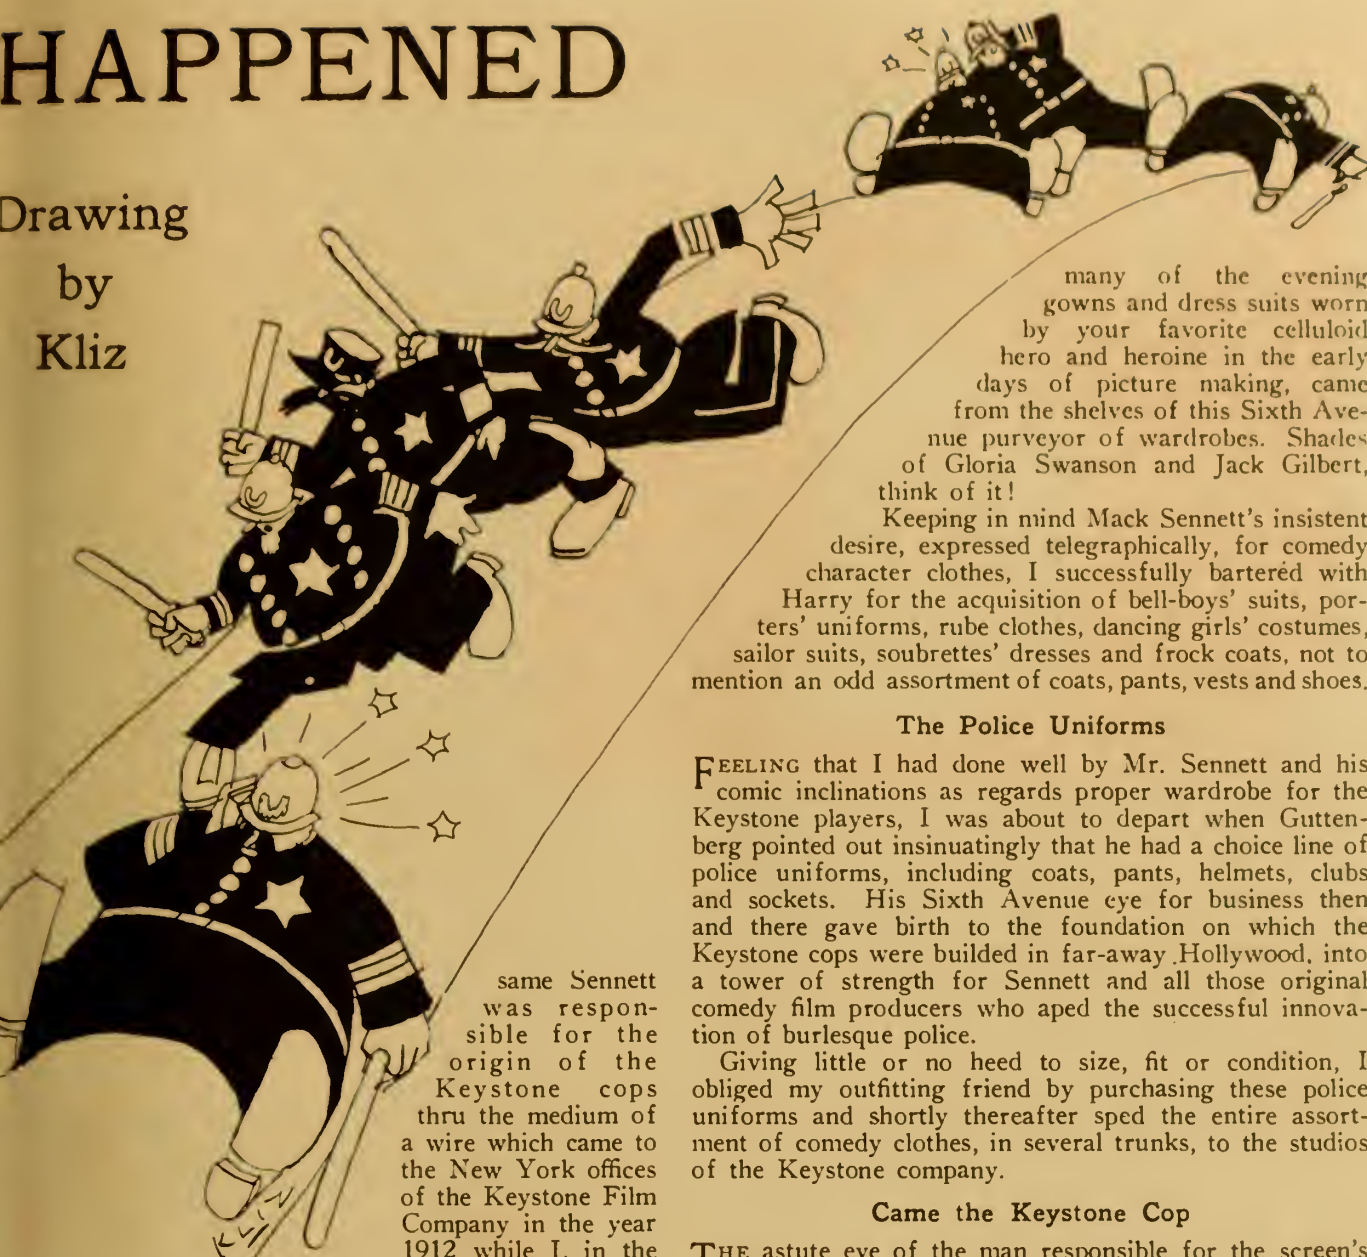

The Inside Story

AND still, if it were not for the aforesaid Sixth Avenue palace of second-hand wardrobes, our own guardians of the law might never have risen in a body against their burlesquers of the screen, the chucklers of the world would have missed millions of same Sennett was responsible for the origin of the Keystone cops thru the medium of a wire which came to the New York offices of the Keystone Film Company in the year 1912 while I, in the rôle of press-agent, was begging editors to print the then unknown names of the afore-said Chaplins, Arbuckles, Normands, et al. In those hardy days of the leaping tintypes many duties devolved upon the press-agent (they call them directors of publicity now) and therefore it was entirely in keeping that Mack Sennett's wire, which requested the urgent shipment of a quantity of "comedy character clothes for ladies and gentlemen," should be turned over to the chronicler.

The Second-hand Store

LITTLE thinking that the result of my attention to duty was to bring about a new era in laughs, I hid myself, wire in hand, to the establishment of Harry Guttenberg, who ran one of the most remarkable clothing emporiums that has ever been my good fortune to see. Guttenberg made a specialty, and a most profitable one, of buying and selling the wardrobes of various theatrical productions which suffered "box-office anemia," a disease, which, by the way, will cause rotund, healthy magnates of the screen and theater to turn pale and shudder at its mere mention. The Guttenberg establishment dealt in costumes of every description, both straight and comic, and incidentally, many of the evening gowns and dress suits worn by your favorite celluloid hero and heroine in the early days of picture making, came from the shelves of this Sixth Avenue purveyor of wardrobes. Shades of Gloria Swanson and Jack Gilbert, think of it!

Keeping in mind Mack Sennett's insistent desire, expressed telegraphically, for comedy character clothes, I successfully bartered with Harry for the acquisition of bell-boys' suits, porters' uniforms, rube clothes, dancing girls' costumes, sailor suits, soubrettes' dresses and frock coats, not to mention an odd assortment of coats, pants, vests and shoes.

The Police Uniforms

FEELING that I had done well by Mr. Sennett and his comic inclinations as regards proper wardrobe for the Keystone players, I was about to depart when Guttenberg pointed out insinuatingly that he had a choice line of police uniforms, including coats, pants, helmets, clubs and sockets. His Sixth Avenue eye for business then and there gave birth to the foundation on which the Keystone cops were builded in far-away Hollywood, into a tower of strength for Sennett and all those original comedy film producers who aped the successful innovation of burlesque police.

Giving little or no heed to size, fit or condition, I obliged my outfitting friend by purchasing these police uniforms and shortly thereafter sped the entire assortment of comedy clothes, in several trunks, to the studios of the Keystone company.

Came the Keystone Cop

THE astute eye of the man responsible for the screen's first bathing beauties fell upon the conglomerate assortment of uniforms, helmets and clubs, and delighted to find that the oversized garments worn by the law's representatives lent an especially ludicrous appearance to undersized extras in the rôles of policemen, it took him little or no time to direct a comedy in which the now famous Keystone cops played an important part. Movie goers everywhere greeted the crazily dressed, awkward police squad with howls of glee. Justly proud of his comedy bull's-eye, Sennett delved farther into the trunks and unearthed the balance of the police raiment. Keystone cops ran riot in every Sennett production. They were fooled by the wily Chaplin, tripped by the innocent Arbuckle, vamped by the scintillating Mabel—and they became an institution.

It may interest readers of this magazine to glimpse a copy of the clothing contained in the shipment which helped to make film history, and it so happens that the writer of this story saved a list of the contents of the various trunks which went to the Keystone Company in 1912.

She has been called variously, a "little roughneck," "the screen's madcap," and "the flappiest flapper of them all."

But she is a human dynamo, overcharged with ambition and energy—a frank and amusing child possessing the grit and determination of an army.

"I got there at noon and sat in the front row until he came on at half past seven," remembered Clara. "I wanted to see him close up—and I did. I thought he was marvelous. I decided that I'd like to act, too, and I knew I'd do it, some day.

"I don't know why I had the nerve to think I could. I was fat and short and funny-looking—sort of an ugly little thing."

The dark-eyed young beauty on the chaise-longue in the studio bungalow hugged her tweed-knickered knees and tossed back the red-gold glory of her hair. The ugly duckling has repeated the history of the swan.

"The minute the fan magazines were on the stands I bought 'em. I read CLASSIC and Motion Picture and Shadowland and all of 'em—and 'one day I saw a Brewster contest mentioned. It said, 'Send in your picture'—and I went to a cheap photographer that very day.

"The pictures were rather bad, I thought, but I sent 'em anyway.

I waited. I don't think I even hoped very much. I could see what I looked like in the mirror.

"One day I went down-stairs for the mail and saw the postman standing with a long envelope in his hand. Before I took it I called up-stairs: 'Daddy, I've got in pictures!'—It was marked 'Brewster Publications' and it read that I was to come to the office for a test.

The Contest Test

"I was fifteen and I hadn't any fancy clothes. I wore a gingham dress and went with my father on the street-car. When I got there, other girls were getting out of automobiles. They all seemed to be wearing silk or velvet or chiffon. I wanted to go home, but my father wouldn't let me.

"The judges were there—Mr. Brewster and some others. I suppose they were surprised to see me but they didn't say anything. They had someone make us up for the screen tests.

"I watched the others. They looked at me as if I was Orphan Annie—sort of down the side of their noses—but I saw what they did and when the director said: 'Don't do this or that,' to them, I thought 'I'll remember that's a bad thing to do.' The trouble was, I thought, that they were all trying to do it like somebody they had seen on the screen, not the way they'd do it—the way they'd feel themselves. When it came my turn, I did it the way I'd do it myself.

"Nobody said anything. We all went home. Pretty soon there were more tests—eight in all—and finally nearly everybody was eliminated.

Clara Wins!

"ALL this time I had to go to school, but I was late and never knew my lessons. I was always kept in and I simply couldn't study. All I could think of was pictures! I figured out what to do for tests and what tests they might give me—I was a nervous wreck from hoping and worrying.

MORE IMPRESSIONS

AT the Pickford-Fairbanks studio they have an Arabian desert so perfect that the sun seemed to beat down upon my bare head, the sand got in my shoes, and many miles away (apparently) I could see shadowy trees and mountains of sand. Arabs and all kinds of queer characters were wandering around, and it was for all the world just like the edge of the great desert I saw last spring.

It was a scene in "Son of the Sheik," and Fitzmaurice was directing. Vilma Banky and Rudolph Valentino soon appeared, and after a few rehearsals Rudy made violent love to the fair and voluptuous Vilma and carried her not unwillingly off while the camera clicked. But one of the rocks overturned and they both fell down in a heap. They tried it again, but this time they got tangled up in some of Rudy's flowing robes and Vilma's gauzy draperies and again they sprawled in the sand. They both took it good-naturedly and even Fitzmaurice enjoyed it. Four more times they tried it and at last they did it perfectly.

"I doubt if you have ever had or ever will have a handsomer couple than that to direct," I said to Fitz.

"Quite true," he replied, "and they are both splendid to work with. Rudy is a fine fellow and a true artist. He's always ready to work and he likes the rough stuff as well as these tender scenes. He's as strong as an ox, too, and he loves to get in the fights and treat 'em rough. Vilma is also one hundred per cent. and it is a pleasure to work with such artists."

AT the Fox studio the other night they gave a little reception and dinner to some of the stars and a few invited guests, and there I met lots of my old friends, including Paul Panzer, and made a few new ones, including Edmund Lowe. It was hard to believe that this was the tall, handsome, straight, dark Edmund that I have admired so much on the screen. He gave me the impression of being a blonde, or red-headed, and blue-eyed—quite different than I expected, and not so good-looking. Yet, he was very democratic, unassuming and likable. Olive Borden was also there, a vivid brunette and beautiful, but what attracted me most was a pair of midget stars—Georgie Harris (male) and Barbara Ludder. They are both well under five feet and they were like grown-up children not yet grown up. Georgie was terribly "cute" and conversed sparkingly and all the women were flocking around him. Barbara was equally so and very charming and pretty, and all the men were flocking around her. They are playing together in two-reel comedies and are getting quite popular I'm told.

NOT a great way from Los Angeles is Arrow Head Lake on the top of a huge mountain where many players go for the week-end. The lake is over a mile higher than the road at the base of the mountain, and it is some climb in a car, the narrow road winding up like a snake going up a telegraph pole. And it makes your ear-drums sing. Before you are half-way up you begin to gasp for breath, but you soon forget this when you look out upon the gorgeous scenery and the towering mountain peaks and the placid Pacific in the distance. And it is thrilling because you realize that one little slip of the steering-gear or a moment of inattention by the driver and you all will go plunging down the abyss over the rocks and cliff below for perhaps half a mile, where you will wake up and find yourself in Heaven—or the other place.

BOBBY VERNON took me out for a day's outing last Sunday in his beautiful motor yacht. We sailed all around the harbor, and out in the Pacific nearly to Catalina Island and he pointed out all the yachts of film celebrities and others, many of which were very pretentious, indeed. Bobby himself was at the wheel, in yachting costume, and he made a jolly and capable captain. His yacht is about fifty feet over all and contains every modern convenience including sleeping accommodations for about a dozen. In the party were his charming little wife, Mr. and Mrs. Pat Dowling, of Christie Comedies, Corliss Palmer, the skipper, and myself, but Bobby was the life of the party. He is a regular fellow in every way, a good host and quite a wit. His boat was so spick and span everywhere that it gave the impression of having never been used—even the engine-room where the brass work shone like gold with not a speck of dirt or grease anywhere.

RECENTLY where some four hundred guests were assembled to do honor to Carl Laemmle, J. Stuart Blackton made a splendid speech, followed by Edwin Carewe, Bert Lytell and others. They also showed some movies mimicking "Uncle Carl" and doings at Universal City. Among the jokes was a topical song satirizing the fact that there are several dozen Laemmles employed at Universal, the chorus being:

"Send all the extras off the lot,
Only Laemmles will be in this shot."

There was also a movie of several thousand men walking in procession, introduced by a title:

I looked them all over before holding out my hand and then said, "Which one?" They all laughed and one of them held out his hand. "You dont mean it!" said I. But he did mean it. It was really he. He wore a regular Fedora hat with the brim pulled down over his forehead, and glasses. I would never have believed that it was Harry or any other actor. We talked about the picture and he showed that he was about as wise as they make them, and thoroly businesslike. Furthermore, there was nothing funny about him. But wait till you see that picture! If you dont get a thousand laughs out of it, you haven't got a funny-bone.

Eugene V. Brewster drops in to call upon Mary Philbin

I DINED with Larry Semon and his wife, Dorothy Dwan, at their fine home which is, of course, up on top of a hill. Why is it that so many players always try to get as high as possible in the world? Perhaps because they want to get near Heaven. Larry is very happy, in spite of the fact that he reached the high spots in picturedom a few years ago and has not been able to keep himself there. But he told me that he was only thirty-five and full of fight and that the world would soon hear from him again in a big way. He is now doing another feature-length picture and is full of hopes. So am I. He deserves to win out.

RUDOLPH VALENTINO invited Pola Negri, Corliss Palmer and me to dinner recently, but at the last minute Pola phoned that she had been vaccinated the previous day and that she was sick in bed with a fever. I found a large photo of Pola in Rudy's bedroom, however, and it was the only one! Rudy has a fine Italian villa on a mountain top in Beverly Hills, and while it is all white within and without, the hangings are mostly of a brilliant red everywhere, and the woodwork in his bedroom is bright dark green. His brother and sister-in-law were the only other guests and we enjoyed a pleasant evening together.

BOBBY VERNON will have his little joke. In all seriousness the other day at luncheon he said he had picked up quite a little money by teaching Spanish. He said he got a dollar a lesson and guaranteed to teach the language in one lesson. I bit, paid him a dollar, and took a lesson. Pointing to a knife, fork, spoon, etc., he said: el knifo, el forko, el spoono, etc., and now I am a full-fledged Spaniard.

VALENTINO is considering whether he will play a double rôle in "Sor of the Sheik," and he has been making some tests as the old father. He is strongly in favor of playing both parts, but Director Fitzmaurice fears that double rôles are inclined to detract from the story and destroy reality. However, if the tests prove excellent, he will probably yield the point. Hence, I think you will see Rudy playing both parts. And you will see a newer Valentino than you saw in "The Eagle." He is full of confidence now, and chuck-full of enthusiasm and ambition, which is plainly showing in his work.

Right out of the Polytechnic High School in Los Angeles, Vera Reynolds started her screen career in Mack Sennett and Al Christie comedies. Vera had read all the stories of the screen stars and she knew just the right place to start. Her first mild hit was scored as Gloria Swanson's daughter in "Prodigal Daughters." Then Cecil B. De Mille found her. She was in "Feet of Clay." And recently in "The Road to Yesterday"

Starring LADY LUCK

By
NORMA JOHNSTONE

JANE WINTON is a favorite of the god of Chance—possesses a potent rabbit's foot—or is vibrating on the right plane.

Take your choice.

To most of us Luck is a fugitive elf, never around when needed, but to Jane

Melbourne Spurr

Luck has played a big part in Jane Winton's career. A few years ago she ran away from school. Now she has a prominent rôle in John Barrymore's "Don Juan"

Winton he is constant as a shadow on a sunny day.

She had never studied dancing, yet she was in the Fokine ballet. She had no stage experience, yet Ziegfeld put her in his "Follies"; no screen training, yet Lasky made her sign a contract; no rôles of any importance, yet John Barrymore gave her a coveted part in "Don Juan."

And so it goes.

Her loveliness may account for Luck's faithfulness.

Her hair is bright brown, her eyes long-lashed and gray, her features perfect, and her hands have been a sculptor's inspiration. But besides beauty, she has brains, and besides brains, she has ambition. . . .

Makes the Ballet

WHEN Jane was a little lonely girl in New York, a runaway from Philadelphia, trying to make two dollars do the work of six, she heard that Fokine was selecting girls for his ballet.

She had not had a lesson in her life, but she had always danced. Attired in a one-piece bathing suit, Jane sat in the orchestra of the theater, watching the other applicants being tried out on the bare stage.

"Oh, why did I come?" she kept saying to herself, as girl after girl, attired in delicately beautiful ballet costume, and carrying her own special music, appeared behind the "foots."

Jane had just decided to vanish unobtrusively when her name was called.

"Where's your music?" asked the pianist.

"It's—I thought you'd know how to play it," she sparred, struggling to think of some music—any music! "I didn't bring it. It—it's 'Kiss Me Again.'"

NOW that Hollywood has satisfactorily disposed of the German film menace, a new screen ogre has arisen. The new bugbear has its habitat in Russia and isn't going to be dislodged so easily.

The ogre, to be exact, is the Russian Goskinprom producing practically all the Russian motion pictures. This organization has the backing of the Soviet Government, which, for a long time, has been studying the screen from both propaganda and amusement angles. Only recently it is said that an invitation was extended to Charlie Chaplin to come to Russia for a single picture. Just before Doug Fairbanks and Mary Pickford sailed for their European vacation, which, by the way, will take them into Russia, it is said an invitation came from the Russian Goskinprom.

We doubt that the Russians will win over Mary, Doug or Charlie right now. But there is no question but that the Russians are reaching out for stars and directors. Fritz Lang, the director of "Siegfried," has just accepted an offer from the Russian Goskinprom and has gone into the land of the Soviets to produce.

We can imagine the problem the offer presented to Lang, torn between the adventure of Russia and the lure of money in America. Lang, incidentally, has just completed "Metropolis," which, if reports from Berlin are to be believed, is likely to prove a sensation. It is a mingling of satire and fantasy, a picture of a strange utopia of the future.

Lang's first Russian picture is adapted from a native story and will be called "Panther Skin."

Meanwhile, the film industry has due warning of its latest menace. We doubt if it will swallow the Russian Goskinprom as easily as it downed the Ufa organization. The Soviet Government stands in the way.

Speaking of Ufa reminds us that the local film magnates are at present tinkering with "Variety," the last Emil Jannings picture to be made before Ufa became a subsidiary of the American film industry. "Variety" was a story of the circus, the romance of an acrobat and a pretty aerialist. In the German story the acrobat was married and had several children. This original film was shown with success in London, without, we think, seriously damaging the morals of the British Empire.

However, the story is being reconstructed for our delicate tastes. The acrobat no longer will be guilty of moral turpitude. In fact, he will be the father of the pretty aerialist, who, by the way, is no other than Lya de Putti. This probably isn't going to help the story any, but it will keep the screen safe for Americans.

It is interesting to note that one of the last Ufa films was "Manon Lescaut," starring Miss de Putti. Is this screen version to be shelved now that John Barrymore is to do the story? Or are we to have two "Manons," one with the ornate de Putti and the other rebuilt to fit the needs of a highly paid male star.

Right now the metropolitan critics are greatly exercised over the fact that D. W. Griffith is to film Theodore Dreiser's two-volume "American Tragedy." Many of the commentators appear to have thought of a number of other directors they would like to have direct the Dreiser tale.

This story, by the way, concerns the son of an evangelist who, upon ruining and killing a girl, dies in the electric chair. It is a tragedy of small-town morals, being based upon an actual murder case up York State.

As we have said, some of the critics have taken it upon themselves to worry about Griffith's probable treatment. They intimate that he may even insert a ride to the rescue and point out that he has already saved a gangster from the chair in the modern episode of "Intolerance."

Hollywood now has a baseball team in the Pacific Coast League. Clara Bow is its mascot. The gent behind the bars is Lester Cook

Personally, we can't see anything wrong with the choice of Griffith. In fact, there's a lot in common between the two. Surely both are distinctly American. Both have the same weaknesses and strengths. They weave loosely, insert a lot of extraneous matter, love to dawdle over details, and every now and then evolve a crashing, tearing interlude.

We would like to see a Griffith discovery of the past, Charles Emmett Mack, in the rôle of Clyde Griffiths. George Hackathorne would be our second choice.

Anyway, here is an interesting slant upon changing public opinion. In 1900 or thereabouts Dreiser's first novel, "Sister Carrie," was throttled by its frightened publishers. Fifteen years later his "The Genius" was the storm center of a concerted attack by the Comstockians of the day. American literary tastes developed in the interim. Now Dreiser is to be filmed.

Incidentally, the Devil's advocate of twenty-six years ago receives $90,000 for his "American Tragedy" and a pretty definite guarantee from Herr Lasky that it is to be produced as is.

Only a few months ago the screen authorities were naming the incoming season as the great comedy year. The twelve months were to be devoted to laughter and giggles, it was to be the year in which our comedians came into their own. The good old drama was to be crowned with a custard pie.

Let's pause to consider how these predictions have made out. No, not so good. Take "The Big Parade," without much comic relief. And the hero loses a leg. "Ben-Hur"? An orgy of Chautauqua religious emo- tion. No comedy, unless you got a chuckle out of Francis X. Bushman in armor. "The Sea Beast"? Another leg lost here and the whole effort studded with Barrymore's ga-ga emotionalism on the loose. Not a chuckle, unless you got one out of the whale. "La Bohème"? A gal doing a Camille while Jack Gilbert slides in and out of scenes after the fashion of Ty Cobb making third base. A mild giggle in this. "Stella Dallas"? A veritable handkerchief extravaganza.

No, we'd hardly call it comedy year.

Last month we started naming our twenty-five hits of the oncoming screen year. We presented fourteen of them and postponed predictions as to the remaining eleven to this issue. The added eleven:

Ernst Lubitsch's "Revillon."

W. C. Fields' three comedies.

Pola Negri's film directed by von Stroheim.

Griffith's "American Tragedy."

James Cruze's version of Copek's "R. U. R."

Harold Lloyd's next comedy, said to be a mountaineer story. But Lloyd's next comedy, whether or not it is a mountaineer story.

The other three places we reserve for whatever big pictures are attempted by King Vidor and John Robertson.

While we're on the subject of screen authorities, we want to take up the subject of "The Tower of Lies." Every time the critics want to take a crack at the lowly taste of our film audiences, they comment upon the lukewarm reception achieved by this picture produced by Victor Seastrom.

Even my confrere, Tamar Lane, is upset about this. "That the movie industry itself has allowed the fineness, the beauty, the brilliancy of 'The Tower of Lies' to pass by unnoticed is not unusual," he sobs—but he can't arouse an answering sob in our flint-like bosom.

We considered "The Tower of Lies" to be pseudo-arty. It was the story of an old peasant who became the local

THE CELLULOID CRITIC

HAROLD LLOYD has hit the comedy gong again with his newest laugh effort, "For Heaven's Sake." This comedy isn't another "Freshman," it should be explained. "The Freshman" is still the high point in Lloyd's humbrous career.

"For Heaven's Sake," however, is highly diverting. If anyone but Lloyd were its star, it would be looked upon as a sensation. This time the spectacled Boy, otherwise Lloyd, is a young millionaire without an aim in life until he meets the Girl. The Girl is the daughter of an East Side evangelist. There are a half-dozen amusing episodes, starting with the way the Boy gets the tough gangsters of the neighborhood into the newly opened mission. The Boy, of course, becomes eventually the pal of the East Side gentry. There is a hilarious finish when the Boy attempts to keep together his wedding reception committee of five gangsters, in hired dress suits and expensively acquired buns.

Lloyd is admirable in this comedy and he is given excellent assistance by Jobyna Ralston. You will find "For Heaven's Sake" well up among Lloyd's second-best comedies.

Lardner's Baseball Hero

I LIKED Thomas Meighan's "The New Klondike" immensely. This is far and away ahead of anything this star has contributed to the screen in a long time.

"The New Klondike" is an amusing story of the devastating effect the Florida real-estate madness has upon a baseball team. It is written with a fine sense of humor by Ring Lardner, who knows more about ball players than anyone I know. The story itself—of a baseball star who is canned by a crooked manager and who wins his place on the team along with the managership—isn't much. The Lardner slant upon these grown-up children of the diamond and upon the Florida Klondike (that was) makes it diverting. The direction of Lewis Milestone, too, is excellent.

Thomas Meighan plays Tom Kelly, the baseball star who is so basely treated by the scoundrelly manager. Meighan is just himself in a rôle that shrieks for characterization. This star was once an excellent actor. Remember his work in "The Miracle Man"? Now he seems afraid to characterize.

The real honors of the comedy go to Paul Kelly, as a boob bush leaguer breaking into big company. There is a delightfully done bit, of a real-estate shark at work upon the boobery, by an unnamed comedian. The manager is well played by J. W. Johnston, an actor capable of far better rôles than this.

Norma Talmadge's Kiki

PROBABLY Norma Talmadge's screen version of the André Picard's comedy, "Kiki," will be highly popular. We had difficulty getting into the huge Capitol Theater in New York to view it. Furthermore, the observers about me gave every evidence of liking the celluloid "Kiki" immensely.

Unfortunately, when Lenore Ulric played Kiki, some seasons ago, we fell captive to her performance. Kiki, you know, is a little gutter gamine who works her way into the chorus of a Paris music hall, sets her queer little cap for the handsome manager, and actually outwits the prima donna who has him in her train. In fact, Kiki ends by winning the manager completely.

Miss Ulric made Kiki, for all her sordid gamine trickiness, saucy, sparkling and wholly captivating. Miss Talmadge follows the Ulric interpretation in every detail, even to the costume and the queer little walk. There the comparison ends. She sugars Kiki and sentimentalizes her. The Ulric verve isn't there.

Still, as we have said, picture audiences will probably like Miss Talmadge's Kiki. All of which can not keep us from thinking of other players who could have done so much better with Kiki. Constance Talmadge, for instance.

In one thing the silver screen "Kiki" far surpasses the stage version. The footlight "Kiki" certainly did not have Ronald Colman. And Marc MacDermott does very well with the rôle of Baron Rapp. The direction of Clarence Brown is adequate, revealing a fine variety of camera shots. It is workmanlike but not distinguished.

Harold Lloyd and Jobyna Ralston in "For Heaven's Sake"

1926 "Taming of the Shrew"

FANNIE HURST received $50,000 for writing "Mannequin." We don't know how much she got for "The Untamed Lady," but she owes some of it to Will Shakespeare, since the story is a modern adaptation of "The Taming of the Shrew." Yes, this comedy has been modernized before.

The only item of interest in "The Untamed Lady" is Gloria Swanson. The star plays the self-willed St. Claire Van Tassel, spoiled young lady of wealth. Larry Gastlen starts out to break her spirit and, having accomplished this, marries her.

The comedy limps along under the direction of Frank Tuttle. Nor does Lawrence Gray, the over-praised leading man, add anything to the general effect. Miss Swanson has a few interesting moments—and that's all.

"The Dancer of Paris," based upon a story by the much-talked-about Michael Arlen, is just a carefully devised boob shocker. Altho Arlen has passed from the center of the spotlight in the literary and stage world, the remnants of his fame will still carry a screen story or two to success in the hinterland.

Arlen's Boob Shocker

"THE DANCER OF PARIS" is the ornate yarn of a rich spendthrift flapper, who, upon being spurned by a sick Englishman, starts out to wreak her vengeance. She becomes a professional dancer and follows him about the world, taunting him with her unattainable loveliness which, if we may believe Arlen, is "like the gold dust that lies on the floors of the dungeons of gaiety." Furthermore, her laughter is "like lightning against a tortured sky." (Continued on page 83)

MASTERS OF THE

By MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

AFTER all, the motion picture is only at the beginning of its greater career. It has its own medium of motion within pictorial beauty, to which it adds whatever it can use from literature, painting, dancing, drama, and, above all, music. But we are still groping, and we are simply going to take ideas, wherever they come from and whenever we think we can apply them. . . ."

Thus, King Vidor, one of our most talented and far-sighted directors. At which the writer conceived the somewhat ambitious design of setting forth thru a longish ramble over the ground of the past and present "masterpieces" of the cinema, trusting that by means of a fair and reasonable analysis of them, a sifting to the bottom of their actual accomplishments, some light might be thrown on what the movies have gone thru and where they are going.

What Are Masterpieces?

LET us consider the great films of the past as explorations in an unknown land. We are looking at them only from the point of view of the more or less sensitive animal who sits in the darkened theater peering at the dancing black and white of the screen. After all, the powers that be in the movies are concerned with what happens in the brain of him who consumes their millions of feet of reel.

And what is a "masterpiece" of the cinema? Is it not one of those pictures that is hard to forget, perhaps impossible to forget? As to the qualities that force us to remember them, we shall recognize them better by examining the pictures we have not been able to forget.

"The Birth of a Nation" is still running somewhere in the United States; it must be nearly a decade since it was made. In some respects, the movies during this time (and Griffith himself) have never exceeded it.

This picture marks a period, when the movies ceased to be a form of cheap entertainment, nickelodeon, a "joke," a "lot of photography." Griffith, the pioneer, gave the world a new shudder; that is, a thrill such as they could not have got out of books, plays, operas. He had a big enough mind to deal with a universal theme, war and peace, in a big and serious way, altho in the movies. First, he utilized the ability of the cinema to spread over a large slice of history and over a vast panorama of events, armies, men, dramas. To realize graphically the sweep and power of a story that spread over many years and many states was a new "effect" that the book which gave germ to the film never approached. It was a revelation, and showed that you could do serious pictures on a heroic scale, and that you could hold a public a whole evening thru ten or a dozen reels. The handling of groups, mobs, in order to secure the utmost emphasis on the action they symbolized; the composing of these pictures, some of them so precise that they are of historical value; the intelligent direction of the actors, so that they were deeply convincing and never looked like foolish movie people—all this marked a great forward step.

Griffith's Film Dramatics

ALTHO Griffith thru this picture and afterward became a master of tempo, a wizard at building up everything to the single concentration point of action, "The Birth of a Nation" seemed to fall distinctly into two episodes: the Civil War, and the post-war reconstruction period. The war period was very loosely put together, and weakened the structure of the whole film, to my mind, by providing an anti-climax. But in the second episode Griffith did some amazing things in the way of film dramatics. He had three or four stories going on at the same time, all working to their common climax, in their various ways. The besieging of the little party of whites in the cabin; the attempted violation of the girl; the rising disorder and debauchery among the blacks; all are brought to a happy and just (it is supposed) solution by the tremendous raid of the Klansmen. And as for the Klansmen, he had created them dramatically by providing in a logical sequence one scene after another of mounting horror, calculated to make revolt and violence inevitable for the down-trodden whites.

Early Chaplin Comedies

AMONG the things we must drag back out of the past are the early Chaplin films.

Chaplin in "A Dog's Life," "The Rink," "The Immigrant," presented the dance of life. He was the greatest dancer of all; and in his pictures, everything danced, his walking stick, his splay feet, his mouth, his mustache, his hands.

MOTION PICTURE

his trousers. It was not the minuet, or the old-fashioned waltz, or even the fox-trot. It was the rhythm and balance of an infinite variety of movements and gestures, from the wildest shocks and rebounds to the most delicate twirlings or nuances of his facial muscles. It was such a mirroring of life as we would rather look at in the films than read in a book, or hear in music, or look at in a painting. In his own style he was a poet of motion; and his own energy, his dynamo of a figure was hurled against a world that was inert and insensitive, the world of Mack Swains, of policemen, of order and peace. Sometimes he set everything to dancing about him, as in "The Immigrant" where we are convulsed by the backward and forward sliding of the food on the steerage table. But always he possessed this secret of skidding, skating, careening thru life at a pace, or rhythm that created a new laughter, a new happiness, that we should all have been much poorer not to have had.

Nobody, of course, could ever duplicate the personality which Chaplin created as well—the Mona Lisa like smile, a certain wistfulness combined with insolence toward all the things that are proper and sacred.

Harold Lloyd adopted cunningly all the farcial machinery Chaplin used, which had really been hatched in Mack Sennett's studios. Here we have again an uproarious poetry of motion, which is inimitably of the cinema. It is exquisitely created in the elaborate farces of Lloyd; and, characteristically enough, his face is a perfect mask while his body never stops moving. Lloyd developing from Chaplin mastered also some of the secrets of tempo. That is, starting at a given speed, he would work up to a frenzy of motion in different directions, when until we were convulsed he would devastate us by a still more outrageous combination.

One of those German scientists who write books on the cinema said: "The reason why the American comedies are so infinitely superior to European comedies, is that they realize the humor of motion, kinetic farce."

READERS of THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC will recall that the typical products of 1915-1920 were the old Triangle society drama, the cowboy films of William S. Hart, and an occasionally high-minded piece of work, such as John Barrymore's "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "The Miracle Man," or "The Spoilers."

Many of the old thrillers realized the beauty of motion unconsciously. The cowboy pictures more than the others. The attraction of a William S. Hart as a desperado fleeing from justice, or as an avenging force, was that of the primitive animal power in men, which the cinema could already give so graphically. It was wholly visual. As to the literary content of these old thrillers, those of us who still can, sometimes blush over it. But if they could be revived, and the titles rewritten by such wits as Marc Connelly and George Kaufman, I imagine that they might reveal a native and ingenious charm all their own.

"The Spoilers," based on Rex Beach's novel, and again exceeding the literary work, had one of those herculean struggles that we are glad enough to witness from a safe seat. But the fight was perfectly logical, in the film at any rate. Moreover, the villain in this case had a perfectly sound chance of getting away with the hero's gold mine, in view of his power and the lawlessness that prevailed in Alaska.

The same sense of a struggle on a heroic scale is found in "The Miracle Man," altho in this case the hero, played by Thomas Meighan at his very best, seems to be in opposition to a supernatural force, spiritual faith.

"Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," belonging to approximately this same period which ended five years ago, was a piece of serious film-drama, seriously conceived, intelligently directed by John Robertson and cast, so that everyone played with great skill and sincerity. However, we seem now to have gone very far from even the acting of John Barrymore, which completely lacked that "movie-way" that the stars have now.

None of the three films just mentioned overcomes the handicap which exists in our minds now as a result of the tremendous strides made in camera technique. None of them is equal to modern pictures in the firm, clear beauty of their cinema compositions.

It is impossible to have seen everything; life is too short for that. Altho it is now possible to revive nearly everything, thanks to the enlightened Film Guild. We can recall enough from the already dim past of the movies to feel that the early work realized a tiny part of the broad medium which the cinema offers. They kept things moving before our eyes, in (Con. on page 72)

The SHEIK Returns

With the big Fairbanks-Pickford lot transformed into a sandy stretch of the Sahara, Rudolph Valentino has been at work upon his "Son of the Sheik" for some time.

"Son of the Sheik" is E. M. Hull's attempt to duplicate her best-selling shocker of several years ago. The film version, bad as it was, helped to lift Rudy to his meteoric popularity.

Will "Son of the Sheik" turn the trick of denting the box-office for Valentino? We shall see. Anyway, Rudy will have the glamorous assistance of Vilma Banky, who has been termed the Hungarian rhapsody. And the superb directorial aid of George Fitzmaurice.

The OFF-STAGE LAUGH

The Part Played by Mrs. Raymond Hatton in Her Husband's Career

By GLENN CHAFFIN

THE thing began when the Hattons were youngsters together "on the road." They had been married only a short time, but had already missed a few meals together. They played a different show and a different town every week. Sometimes the changes were more often than that. Pay envelopes were at a premium.

One night when Raymond was doing a comedy bit in a play his humor failed to create more than a mild ripple of enthusiasm from the Middle-Western audience. He had gone without dinner and he felt more like playing for tears than laughs.

Suddenly from the wings off stage he heard the half-hushed laugh of a girl. A laugh subdued, but intoxicating.

Its effect on the comedian was electric. He told me the other night that it was as cheering as tho somebody had tossed him a ham sandwich, or a five-dollar bill.

"That's a left-handed tribute to Frances," he added, "but you see in those days we got most of our inspiration from a lunch counter. It's all right for the philosophers to parade the theory that genius is born of want, but it's hard to act funny when the thing you want is a square meal.

Then Frances Laughed

"I GLANCED off stage and there stood Frances, laughing to beat the band. I dont know yet just what my reaction was, but in a few minutes I had everybody in the house roaring. Say, neighbor, I swaggered off that stage with the world at my feet. And, no joking, I could have taken bows out there for an hour."

Aside from the fact that I spent a great many of my week-ends last summer as the guest of the Hattons and Milt Howe, who have adjoining beach cabins near Santa Barbara, I have never actually been a neighbor of Ray's. But it is a term that he uses frequently to his friends and he has a way of saying it that makes you feel as tho you'd fought Indians with him. Or homesteaded by his side in the great open spaces. The kind of fellow you feel that you can ask for a free meal without losing his friendship.

The idea for this exposé of the Hatton professional alliance originated in an incident which occurred on a stage at the Famous Players-Lasky studio in Hollywood a short time ago. Ray was playing a scene with Mary Brian in "Behind the Front," a war comedy in which Hatton and Wallace Beery clown their way thru barbed wire entanglements, shell holes and what-not.

"Behind the Front"

FRANCES and I were standing off stage watching Ray fill his coat sleeves full of silverware. The thing was funny, but at first I confined my enjoyment to a grin, figuring that my cue was to be neither seen nor heard while there was action in the air.

Not so Mrs. Hatton. She laughed outright and heartily. The camera was grinding away and I made the faux pas of my young life by trying to "shush" her.

She looked at me in amazement.

"Dont shush me, silly. I'm doing this for Raymond's benefit. This is my contribution to his art. I'm the 'off-stage' laugh that you hear so much about in the 'speakies' realm."

Just as soon as the scene was finished, Ray came over to where we were standing.

At fifteen Elinor Fair made her début as the little cripple girl in "The Miracle Man." Remember that touching performance?

THERE is much controversy in Hollywood—and elsewhere—concerning careers versus matrimony, and many and varied are the opinions advanced on the subject.

But there is one girl in town who found the passport to success in both lines handed to her because a director spent one spare hour in a certain picture house.

The girl is Elinor Fair, the director is Cecil B. De Mille, and the picture was one starring Buck Jones and with scenes laid in a Western lumber camp.

Found by De Mille

ONCE during the picture, Elinor in a sudden flare of mimic temper slapped Buck Jones in the face; at another time, she opened a door, smiling, and before she had closed it her expression had changed from joy to bitter tragedy. Mr. De Mille observed and made mental note at nine o'clock one evening.

At ten next morning, the brown-eyed Elinor was informed over the telephone that Mr. Goodstadt, casting director for De Mille productions, wished to see her.

How Elinor Fair Met and Married Bill Boyd

"I thought he wanted to see me about a lead with Rod La Rocque," said Elinor, dimples dancing in the rose of her cheeks, "but instead he took me up to Mr. De Mille's office, and I learned I was being considered for the part of the princess in 'The Volga Boatman.'

"No, I wasn't nervous. I've never been afraid to meet anyone. I believe I could go and talk to the president and feel no more impressed than if I were conversing with the doorman of the studio.

"Sign Her Up!"

MR. DE MILLE told me the story of the picture, asked me a few questions about work, and then we discussed foreign countries and men, women and dogs. At the end of half an hour, he called Mr. Goodstadt and said: 'Take

The two young people looked at one another briefly, bowed, and walked away—one to her place before the Kleigs, the other—but where Bill Boyd went, Elinor doesn't know, for she was so little interested that she failed to notice whether or not he was still on the set when the test was over.

your girl down-stairs and sign her up,' and that's all there was to it."

It was her work in this picture that caused Mr. De Mille to give her a contract calling for featured rôles. But the most important development of her signature on the dotted line, according to Elinor herself, was the acquiring of a bridegroom.

Shortly after the name "Elinor Fair" had been appended to the paper on Mr. Goodstadt's desk, the owner of it was given a screen test for hair-dressing and costume.

As she stepped up on the set, she noticed a tall, fair youth standing near the camera, doing nothing in particular.

"Miss Fair, let me present Mr. William Boyd," mumbled the director of the test, and in the same breath began to explain the action of the scene.

So much for love at first sight.

They met again when Mr. De Mille read the story to the cast, and a week later found them together on location near Sacramento.

"We played around with each other, as leading players of a picture always do," admitted Elinor, "but until the last day of our stay there was no more to it. Then—it happened."

What "it" was is to be interpreted by those who have been in love.

"We were to leave that day, and Mr. De Mille hoped to make one last shot of me by the river, so I had my make-up and costume on, while Bill was in civilian clothes ready to go home. We were waiting for the sun to come out, you see, so we sat on the barge by the river with the clouds hanging low and a chill wind blowing.

Dear Majesty:

ONE of the strangest phenomena of Hollywood is the Writers' Club of the Screen Writers' Guild of the Authors' League of America. I hope to have the pleasure of conducting Your Majesty to dine there incognito when you visit this country. The busy writers do not frequent the club by day, but in the cool of the evening they come down to feed on the tender asparagus tips and the young squabs provided under the careful management of Major Hughes, Our President.

Here Your Majesty will observe a discreet nook, reserved for the celluloid samurai, palpitant with well-bred interest. A Maker of Stars is revealing to a chosen few the secret of her success. Voluminous in a batiked frock that encloses her as in the nimbus of an ample sunset cloud, she rolls her eyes expressively.

"I take no credit to myself. I realize that my hand is guided by the souls of generations long since departed!"

The table stiffens, gaping.

"Well do I remember those wonderful nights on the Nile!"

She sighs voluptuously.

"I was his mother in that incarnation. But I wronged him."

The table buzzes with respectful comment.

"And listen! I take no credit for my wonderful screen stories. They are all written for me. I go to bed at night and promptly at 4 A. M. the subconscious mind—heritage of generations of the best brains of all lands—begins to work for me. When I wake up, the story has been completed."

The table twitters its appreciation.

"But this gift of recalling the past so vividly has its drawbacks."

She looks coyly sidewise.

"Just the other day on the set a tall, dark, East Indian gentleman stepped up to me. He looked me right in the eye and in a deep, magnetic voice he said, as he held my hand: 'Do you remember that night in Babylon four thousand years ago?'"

"I was so embarrassed!"

Dear King:

DOUBTLESS, you are interested in knowing about Alastair Mackintosh, who married your favorite, Constance Talmadge. The Hon. Alastair departed from California shortly after the wedding, sojourning in Palm Beach and other Florida points for a time. Thus Connie spent part of her honeymoon alone.

My spies report to me that the Hon. Alastair is a personal friend of the Prince of Wales and a former captain in the Seaforth Highlanders. He is a member of the prominent Inverness family and was at one time equerry to Princess Beatrice. Later he acted as A. D. C. to the governor of Bombay.

Still, that doesn't explain to your highness, I know, how a bridegroom could ramble off to Palm Beach, leaving the fair Connie behind.

Dear Majesty:

JEAN HERSHOLT told me the other day that he hopes to be able to work with Erich Von Stroheim and also to play "The Return of Peter Grimm" for Fox. If he performs this feat, Fox will have to hurry Peter's return to enable Jean to begin with Von the next month.

The sudden but determined rise of Jean Hersholt will interest Your Majesty, because it was not an accident as most movie careers happen to be, but was actually engineered by the climber, who used business methods on the business men who make the pictures. His salary is now something scandalous.

Hersholt had been a small-fry director for years. He played the villain with Mary Pickford in "Tess of the Storm Country." The shrewd eyes of Von Stroheim noticed him and gave him the part of Martin Schuler in "Greed." Hersholt scored and was promptly deluged with demands that he play the identical character in other pictures—this is the system when an actor makes a hit in a certain part.

But Jean was not to be caught in this vicious system. He managed to slip in some characterizations that were not Martin Schuler's but were equally good ones. And his last impersonation, that of The Old Soak, places him definitely as the first character actor of the screen. I am excepting Lon Chaney, whose genius lies in the direction of eccentric characterizations.

"It's a joke," laughed Hersholt, telling me about his sensational arrival.

"If I had suggested playing a Warfield rôle a few years ago, the producers would have laughed at me. Yesterday I found myself up against this situation. Von wants me to be co-starred in 'The Wedding March.' Fox wants me to play 'The Return of Peter Grimm.' Lasky wants me for 'The Rough Rider,' a story about Roosevelt—all at the same time."

If necessary, Jean will choose to go with Von Stroheim, the director who really made him, and sacrifice the other parts. His part in "The Wedding March" is a butcher, the rival of the aristocratic militarist to be played by Von himself.

"In The Old Soak," said Jean, with the remnants of a Danish accent, "I had to laugh. They were afraid to keep the ending of Don Marquis' play because the play was a flop in the middle of America where the sentiment is dry. So they added a scene to the picture in which the old man repents and sits there crying—smashing all his whisky bottles! It may satisfy the censors, but the old soak would never have done that in real life."

Your Highness:

YOUR telegram for further facts about Lya de Putti was acted upon at once. Lya, as you know has recovered from her operation and is working in the Griffith effort, "The Sorrows of Satan." My spy No. 47, located in Berlin, tells me that Lya's real name isn't de Putti, after all. It's Amalia Janke. She was at work at the Ufa studios when she signed up with Famous Players. She finished the film on a Saturday, whereupon she boarded a train without informing anyone.

Various claims as to debts were advanced immediately. These claims amounted to eighty thousand gold marks. One of the creditors complained to the police and Lya was held up at Cologne. She was allowed to continue, however, after depositing five thousand gold marks.

Other alleged creditors appeared, but Lya was across the border. Her motor car and other valuables left behind in Berlin were seized. For a time it seemed that Lya might not sail to these shores. Finally, some sort of arrangement was made and Lya departed.

The fair Lya is reported to be getting $1,000 a week at Famous.

Dear Majesty:

IN my last epistle I had the honor to comment to Your Majesty upon the bizarre practice in moviedom of altering the intention of a play in order to escape censorship. Better not make it, at all, you would think—but the producers believe they must have the play for its name.

Buster Keaton gets encouragement during the filming of the comedy, "Battling Butler," from Mickey Walker, welterweight champion

Alice Lloyd, the English comedian, calls upon Charlie Chaplin. Years ago they played on the same bills in the English music-halls

The Puritan thread which runs thru American life is evidently just as tough as it was in the days of the Salem witchcraft. There always has been, of course, plenty of opposition. But Your Majesty could never guess the quarter from which the latest anti-Puritan propaganda is coming. Lillian Gish is making "The Scarlet Letter" into a picture for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, acting on her own initiative. Her own ancestors were New England roundheads and she always wished to reproduce Hawthorne's masterpiece as a movie.

Securely hidden behind a tall "nigger," I watched the frail Lillian making a scene for the picture—the scene in which Hester Prynne meets her husband after she has been decorated with the letter of shame. I never saw so much pains being taken with any scene—and I have watched Von Stroheim at work again and again. Lillian was rehearsing her own scene apparently without any direction from Victor Seastrom, who was just sitting on the side-lines.

But the most pains were being taken with the lights. The lights were the invention of Lillian's own camera wizard, the former Herr Professor Hendrik Sartov, of Rotterdam. This physicist, weaned from his university, but not from his long pipe and flowing tie, was putting one band of light over Lillian's eyes while with another arrangement he was getting rid of her cheek-bones. He is undoubtedly a monumental asset.

Lillian and her friends are going to make "The Scarlet Letter" without softening the hard Puritan character, I was told. It will be a lesson for the long-hairs of today, the same lesson that Griffith attempted to convey in "Intolerance" and failed magnificently in the doing.

This picture begins to look like another big success for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer; and with such a bright young man as Joseph Hergesheimer for her press-agent, I see a bright future for Lillian.

Hollywood.
Dear Majesty:

JOHN GILBERT is being fitted at the Western Costume Company for the trunk-hose, the doublets, the velvets and laces and armor he will wear as the hero of a piece the title of which, when he pronounced it for me, sounded like a savory sauce: "Bordelaise, the Magnificent," or something of the sort—by Rafael Sabatini, the modern romancer of the Middle Ages.

I am inclined to agree with the opinion, expressed after viewing "The Big Parade" at Your Majesty's theater in Oz, that Jack Gilbert eclipses in sheer histrionics, any leading man who heretofore has graced the celluloid drama. In answer to Your Majesty's question anent the secret of his outstanding superiority, it seems to me that Jack possesses all the qualities of the others with the addition of a more subtle personality. He is of a finer grain. His acting never jars. Watching Gilbert gives the same satisfaction as riding in a perfect foreign-built motor-car.

It is almost impossible to believe that the drab and wrinkled extra whom I encountered the other day waiting for some scrap to be thrown from the casting window at the Fox Studio could be Jack Gilbert's father. Yet such is his claim, and Jack himself does not attempt to deny it. The son sends a monthly check, but he does not wish any closer contact with the man who says he is his father.

"He didn't show himself till I was on top," said Jack. "When I needed a father, he wasn't there. To save my neck I cannot feel any affection for this man who is a stranger to me."

Physically, there is no resemblance between the mouse-colored old stock actor, whose name is John Pringle, and the dark, vivid, romantic-looking Gilbert, who resembles his mother. She was Ida Adair, once a favorite on Broadway—a flower that quickly withered and died in the hectic glare of the calciums. As a boy, Jack knew little of either parent. He was indeed a David Copperfield of the stage.

Dear Majesty:

HERE is one of the odds and ends of movie life which may afford Your Majesty some amusement. Three years ago a girl named Gladys McConnell graduated from Hollywood High School and tried to break into pictures. For weeks she haunted Fred Datig's antechamber at Universal City—without any result.

It happened then that her sister Hazel, a leading woman in West Coast stock theaters, took a six-hundred-foot test of herself to show to Datig. In the last scene Gladys, the sister, appeared as a maid, handing a wrap to the aspiring screen actress. After the test Datig said to Hazel:

"I don't think we can use you but—who was that girl who appeared in the last scene?"

"My sister," replied Hazel.

"Send her out," said the Universal official, and the girl who had given up hope of ever getting a job, was placed under contract.

Gladys has been playing leads for Hal Roach. She recently signed a five-year contract with Fox. What happened to Hazel? Oh, she got married.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

THERE was a time when Hollywood looked with some contempt upon the comedy producer. Comedies were still fill-ins. However, a new comedy era threatens to make the bathing-girl motif an antique, according to plans that are blooming at Hal Roach's plant. Roach possesses in Katherine Grant, Martha Sleeper, Glenn Tyron and others some very possible feature material. Whereas they were merely comedians yesterday, they have now become factors worthy of more than passing consideration. For under the new régime, Hal Roach has inaugurated a series of all-star comedies in which such personages as Virginia Pearson, Eva Novak and Lionel Barrymore have already appeared. The astute producer recently signed Ethel Clayton and will, no doubt, close his negotiations with Irene Bordoni to come West and make a two-reel comedy.

It may soon be possible for the big studios to farm out their contract players to Roach, and there are few companies that will not seize this opportunity to let the comedy producer pay for their players' idle hours. The actors realize that it is a means of getting a greater number of film appearances, and while comedies are comedies, business is business.

Before long we may see Norma Shearer, Jack Gilbert, Madge Bellamy, Leatrice Joy, Belle Bennett, Francis X.

Bushman, even John Barrymore, engaging in the idle-hour game.

Why not? Many of Mack Sennett's comedies are better than the heavy dramas they burlesque.

New York.

Dear Rex:

I KNOW your highness will be amused at the way an executive of a big New York newspaper whipped a certain motion picture company into line.

A former member of this paper's editorial staff had been a scenarist in Hollywood. The company advanced the writer to the post of director. In the course of events something happened. The writer-director, on location, was relieved of his post and ordered back to the studio. Someone in power hadn't taken a fancy to him, it seems.

Back at the studio, the writer-director resigned. By chance he told his story to the executive of his old newspaper, who happened to be visiting in Los Angeles. The executive dropped around to see the president of the film company, also in town. He intimated that the whole thing was unethical, and that the writer ought to be paid the full amount of his contract. The film president stalled—but the executive was obdurate. Finally, the writer-director was paid in full.

Unfortunately, your highness, few screen workers have powerful friends. If they did, there would be fewer dirty tricks pulled in what we pleasantly term the fifth great industry.

Hollywood.

picture, as we watched the lowering of the colors at sundown—two Americans folding the Stars and Stripes, two Englishmen folding the Union Jack, and two Frenchmen the flag of France.

A Cast of Veterans

Most of the cast are veterans of the World War and take to soldiering naturally.

Victor McLaglen, Hank of the picture, was captain of police in the city of Bagdad, and has dealt with the children of the desert first hand.

"Killing a white man brings an Arab nearer his heaven," he explained, his eyes on the long line of mounted Arabs, whose flowing robes and giant shields no longer terrified their trained steeds.

Training the horses to bear such garbed and yelling riders was part of the task of Jack Moore, in charge of all stock used in the picture. His was also the feat of "breaking" the 150 mules ridden by the Senegalese troops, bringing them within two weeks from the status of wild mules on the range to army steeds working in formation.

It was the war that put Victor McLaglen in close sympathy with Herbert Brenon on the making of "Beau Geste." Victor is one of eight brothers all over six feet tall, and England's declaration of war brought all of them home from various parts of the world to enlist.

Fred was Victor's elder and favorite brother.

"He used to be always talking about 'my young brother Vic,'" remembered Victor, "and people would expect to meet a youngster about thirteen. Then I'd come in—bigger than the side of a house! Well, anyway, when I left home the first time, I was seventeen and Fred took me to the boat. . . ."

"I met him, when we gathered to enlist, on a corner in Piccadilly. 'Leaving tomorrow for Mesopotamia!' he greeted me, and presently: 'I say, do you remember how I took you to the boat when you first went away? I'd like you to do the same for me tomorrow, Vic. That will be our last good-bye.'"

"I was horrified. 'Oh, you'll come back, old man!' I assured him. He shook his head. . . . He was right. He never did come back."

There are brothers of the blood—and there are brothers of the heart. Of the latter are Ronald Colman and William

Powell, who share a tent on "Beau Geste Square." (The twenty-five streets in camp are named for the various pictures made by Director Brenon.)

Not since the filming of "Romola," when the two spent an idyllic year together in Italy, have they appeared in the same cast.

There is a certain tender memory belonging to these two concerning a table at a sidewalk café—a table always reserved for them. It was here they sat on their last day in Italy, under the budding green of an April now two years past. Ronald was called back to New York, William was headed for the North.

"When shall we two meet again?" was the burden of their thoughts.

"Beau Geste" is the answer.

Wherever Noah Beery goes, the records of Tito Schipa, that brother of his heart, go also. When the terrible Lejaune of the picture rests in the shade of his tent, the golden voice of the tenor is heard. And so wherever Tito Schipa travels, the first thing he does on arrival in a town is to scan the theatrical bill of fare and choose one of Noah's pictures. . . .

Norman Trevor, Beaujolais of the story, was born in India; when he was grown he visited Morocco and saw the Foreign Legion in its desert forts.

"The only difference between our location here and the country there," he observed, "is the color of the sand. Ours is a rich gold—theirs is paler. But in the dawn or at sunset you note the same effects. At sunrise the dunes take on a rosy tint with a faint blue in the shadows; at the close of day they are a strange Nile green, deepening to purple."

Difference in Deserts

ANOTHER difference in deserts was pointed out by Paul McAllister (St. André)—the trail of a bobcat over the hills!

"You can dig down in our desert and strike water—so men and animals lost on it can live," explained Mr. Trevor, "but in Africa, except in an oasis, you would dig in vain."

One of the laws of the Foreign Legion is that when something is stolen, the man from whom it is stolen is punished instead of the thief.

"I have watched a légionnaire wash his hands," said Mr. Trevor. "Not daring to lay down his soap, he holds it in his mouth. An article of clothing he is not wearing is securely fastened to a board. If by chance someone gets his belt or button, he promptly steals from another."

But we need not depend on second-hand tales on this location, for Leo Sleeman is a seven years' veteran of the real Foreign Legion and carries with him his "Livre de la Légion Etrangère."

The little book contains the "thou shalt nots" of the legion and the grim word "Mort" follows twenty-six of the commandments.

Three medals of the legion decorate the breast of this genuine légionnaire, but one of his hands is minus a finger.

"Arab," he explained, to the listening group lounging in the oasis beyond the fort. "I am smoking the cigaret in the night outside the walls. I have come off from sentry-go. I take the cigaret from my lips and hold it out—so—while I blow forth the smoke. Ping! An Arab sharpshooter from the great dark aims at the light and gets my finger."

And once, when Sleeman was guard on duty in the barrack room, a fellow soldier got "le cafard," drank too deeply, and in a drunken rage killed a comrade.

The commandant of the fort called the clerk, had him read above the unconscious form of the murderer, who had slumped down over a table in a stupor, the legion rule pertaining to his offense—one of those

A workshop—a home—by Gad! He seeks a reference for something. We rise and follow him into his bedroom where Jack has a few immediate books. His library has not yet arrived.

The door turns at the clutch of a great black key three feet long, duplicated from the product of a sixteenth-century workshop. The books are in a small rack at the foot of the bed, a massive four-poster, heavily hung in rose brocade. The books Jack has just been reading—"Arrow-smith," "The World's Illusion," "Haunch, Paunch and Jowl," "Husbands and Lovers," Sadakichi Hartmann's mad "Confucius."

Yes, presented by the author. The old satyr had presented me likewise, then called and carried away two books written and presented by Ben DeCasseres. There is a method in his madness, for he played on Jack the same trick.

Typical of Gilbert

JACK belongs—in this house of neo-Spanish feeling. His brown, liquid eyes, his hair with the oily gloss of a raven's back, definitely place him here. One lock of long hair is falling carelessly down his forehead, curling like a dark, lively vine—a graveyard vine, somber with youth matured before its time. For Gilbert, a poet at heart, an actor by the gift of a great power of feeling, has a mottled groundwork of backstage life instead of a boyhood.

He benefited in that he grew up an unconscious philosopher. It is give and take with Jack, in that elegant casualness which, the world over, betokens a gentleman aware.

Casually talking, we stroll thru Jack's rooms, joking about his saints and virgins which adorn ceiling and niche. Jack's bathroom is what an ancient Roman would have done with modern plumbing.

Nobody except Jack Gilbert, who doesn't give a damn what the lady fan writers write, could get away with his breakfast-room—canary yellow, with a window full of yellow canaries. Out in his garden, up a pathway, is the waterfall and Jack's beloved fish. At hand, an athletic diversion—a new Hollywood perversion—a court for the game called Dougledyas, invented by the inimitable Fairbanks. A big swimming-pool with its miniature beach of shingle and dressing-rooms labeled Señoritas, Caballeros.

Casually talking about women, a plaything of which we have grown sufficiently contemptuous, but, unwilling to abandon it, continue to experiment with new color series. Agreeing that light browns are most desirable but arguing about which browns, Jack extolling the Plantation entertainers of the Great White Way while I am all for Creole Carolynne's gals of the local Cotton Club.

Out at the gate, poised on the ledge, from which, if he felt temperamental, the star could hurl empty bottles down on the mansion of his director, King Vidor, peacefully slumbering beneath him. And so along the steep Tower Road descending toward the scattered settlements.

Evening. The white Spanish house cool without and dark within, touched by fulgurous streaks in rich tapestries and occasional glints of steel. Repose. Meditation. And a hint of melancholy.

The Ray Home

IF early evening is the time to visit Gilbert's house, then early morning is the only possible hour to invade the English cottage inhabited by Mr. and Mrs. Charles Ray.

It stands down on the level, still in Beverly, but actually on Sunset Boulevard. The rubber-neck busses ploughing by merely slow up while the distant voice of the megaphone shouter is wafted over the hedge to those within.

Ray's garden is the dream of a nostalgic Anglo-Saxon made to come true as nearly as possible in the unfitting, semitropic flora of Southern California. Hedges and fountains and velvet turf. A swimming-pool like a four-leaf clover, designed by Charley himself.

Mrs. Hemans would have loved his place. Of Charley's place we can repeat reverently the original of the parody with which I led this story:

*The stately homes of England,
How beautiful they stand!
Amidst their tall, ancestral trees
O'er all the smiling land.*

An English maid in stiff white peers thru the wicket. Charley comes down—in carpet slippers and flowered bath-robe, with his thin tenor voice which seems to fit the drawing-room admirably. It is the same voice as that possessed by his marvelous glass clock, a bower of thin-spun fragile posies in which a pair of shepherd lovers nest.

The clock speaks the early hour of nine in its thin, melodious voice. Light, light, pale, fair, English rooms. Cupids and dolphins, filigree. A priceless fan of Watteau's in a glass case. Even the piano painted after the style of Louis Quinze with one of the absurd scenes in which lords and ladies play at being shepherds and shepherdesses.

There are a few books scattered neatly about. Most of them relate to the theater. Charley takes his work seriously. There are no books about movies. There is a copy of The House Beautiful and Theatre Magazine, which, I recall bitterly, still owes me for that story on Hollywood that Papa Hornblow printed in 1924. The

Just, Canton.—Dolores Costello's first starring picture for Warner will be an adaptation of Winston Churchill's "The Crisis." I say little, but I think more. A flow of words is no proof of wisdom.

K. A. MED.—You say, if I am a bachelor, I must be a singular man. Quite right. I have never married. You see, I didn't want to marry when I was young, and when I got old, no one wanted to marry me. Madge Evans has gone to Europe to travel and study. Her last picture was "Classmates."

MARY L. P.—Thanks for the drawings. So you really dont think I am an old man of some eighty years. You'll have to take my word, Mary. Buster Keaton in "The Engine Driver."

Then I would have to get milk instead of buttermilk. Why, Mae Murray is playing in "Altars of Desire," directed by Christy Cabanne.

MARY S.—I have stopped at the Plaza, Havana. Couldn't afford the Sevilla-Biltmore. Yes, Lon Chaney is married. Baby Peggy is playing in "April Fool."

BILL, U. S. N.—Heave ho, my lads, heave ho. Wait until you see "The Black Pirate." It certainly is thrilling, and Doug is marvelous in it. Mary Astor at First National, 5341 Melrose Avenue, Los Angeles, California. Maria Eugenia Reachi is the daughter of Agnes Ayres, born March 25, 1926.

NEIL.—I should say you are ambitious. Keep it up. Ambition is an appetite never satisfied, a spur that never spares us. You know that courtship is a bow-knot that matrimony pulls into a hard knot. Renée Adorée does not give her age. Your letter was a gem, and it had some sparkle.

SARAH K.—See here, what's this. Why is a dog biting his tail a good manager? Because he makes both ends meet. No, William Haines is not married. And some men are known by the company they cant get into.

E. K., N. Y. C.—No, I never get tired. This is the time of the year I like to take a hike out into the woods. But try and find the woods around here. Yes, it is true that D. W. Griffith is to do Theodore Dreiser's "An American Tragedy" for Famous Players-Lasky, with Glenn Hunter in the lead. Famous will guarantee Dreiser that the book will be filmed exactly as it was written. Write Richard Dix direct.

SLIPPERY SUE.—Put on your brakes. You're skidding. William Boyd is married to Elinor Fair. You know they met while playing together in "The Volga Boatman" and were married about six weeks after. Harry Pollard directed "The Cohens & Kellys."

DE W.—No. Edwin Carewe and Arthur Edmund Carewe are not one and the same person. The former is a director. Roy D'Arcy doesn't give his age. Lou Tellegen was born in Greece. Harold Lloyd's next picture will be laid in the Kentucky hills. We'll probably see some stills.

BETTY S.—Your joke was like the little boy who asked his father if the Zebra was a black animal with white stripes or a white animal with black stripes. What is that which is put on the table and cut, but never eaten? A pack of cards. That's splendoriferous. So you want a picture of Irene Rich and Aileen

THE ANSWER MAN is at your service. If you want an answer by mail, enclose a stamped addressed envelope. If you wish the answer to appear in THE CLASSIC, write at the top of your letter the name you want printed, and at the bottom your full name and address. Pringle in THE CLASSIC soon. You also want to know what salutation to be used when writing to Rin-Tin-Tin. Well, you can address him "Dear Sir" and he wont know the difference.

GLORIA.—Noah Beery is an old-timer, having made his first screen appearance some fifteen years ago, and he got five dollars a day for it. He now gets more than that an hour. Yes, George O'Brien had the lead in "The Iron Horse." Esther Ralston in "Old Ironsides."

HAMILTON W. W.—Here is a list of pictures Ramon Novarro has played in:

- Thy Name is Woman
- The Arab
- The Midshipman
- Ben-Hur
- The Lover's Oath
- Trifling Women
- Prisoner of Zenda
- Scaramouche
- Where the Pavement Ends

He is playing in a new picture with Sally O'Neil which is untitled. CECIL S.—I hardly think we will start either Shadowland or Beauty again. Have you seen a copy of Movie Monthly?

MAURICE E. N.—This is for you—during the past year more than 21,000,000 letters and 803,000 parcels went to the Dead Letter Office of the post-office because of carelessness in addressing. It has been estimated by the postal officials that every year more than 100,000 letters are sent thru the mails in perfectly blank envelopes. During the same period about $55,000 in cash, and about $12,000 in postage stamps, are removed from misdirected envelopes. On account of misdirected letters, during the course of a year, some $3,000,000 in checks, drafts and postal money orders never reach their proper parties. Write to Maurice E. Neel, Route 3, Forrester City, Arkansas, for the Carol Dempster Club.

W. J. H., Hongkong.—You show good taste in selecting your favorites. And you think Esther Ralston is more beautiful than a rose. George O'Hara and Ralph Lewis are playing in "Bigger Than Barnum." Write me again some time.

SUSIE.—I dont quite understand.

D. O. M.—Emil Jannings is to play in Paramount's "The Thief of Dreams," with Betty Bronson and Ricardo Cortez. This will be his first American screen debut. Dolores Del Rio, one of the Wampas Baby stars, is playing in "What Price Glory." This is just the time for buttermilk. I have mine every day.

FOSTER J. B.—"The Fighting Heart" was adapted from the novel "Once to Every Man," by Larry Evans.

ALABAMA BOUND.—Why all this demand for birthdays? Birthday presents, eh? Colleen Moore's will come off August 12th, so you will have plenty of time to buy her a diamond necklace, Rolls-Royce, yacht, castle, or anything like that, but I guess she would be just as pleased with a rose or a card. She will then be the ripe old age of twenty-four. You want a cover of Esther Ralston. No, Jack Gilbert is not married now. See you later.

N. D. P.—Well, the last time I heard of Kitty Gordon she was on the stage playing in vaudeville.

MARY L. M.—So you are reducing. You know more than half the human body is composed of water. Keep up the good work. Just write to D. W. Griffith at the Paramount Studio, Astoria, Long Island. Cecil De Mille at Culver City, California.

The X-Ray of the Hair

This machine tests a small strand of your hair. It gives your Permanent Waver advance facts that insure Safety and Perfect Results.

Nestle's new invention takes the guess out of permanent waving

NO greater step forward in hair science can be imagined than the NESTLE METER SCALE. It determines the character of your hair in advance of your permanent wave—and eliminates all guesswork.

Gone is the possibility of individual error, over-curling or under-curling. Gone is the era when all hair was put through the waving-machine as though all hair were alike.

Each head of hair is now waved permanently as if Nature, herself, had performed the duty.

As Revealing as the X-Ray

The Nestle Meter Scale discloses an amazing variety of hair qualities. It analyzes the individual characteristics of your hair—and your permanent wave is prescribed in advance from the Nestle Laboratory in New York.

From this examination and "prescription," the Nestle Permanent Waver in your own community will then wave your hair by the

Nestle Circuline Process

The Circuline Process of Permanent Waving carries out, "to the letter," the readings of the Nestle Meter Scale—so that each head of hair is waved according to its individual needs.

To have a perfect permanent wave is a reasonable expectation. With Circuline you will not be disappointed no matter what kind of hair you may have—whether it be normal, snow-white, black, blond, bleached or dyed—whether you want a tight, medium or loose wave.

Have Your Hair "Read" Before You Have It Waved

The Reading and Recommendation Cost You Nothing

Just fill out the coupon below and send a small strand of your hair

(about as thick as the lead in any ordinary pencil and at least 5 inches long.) Do not send combings. Enclose $1 deposit to cover cost of testing.

The Nestle Laboratories will then send you a card showing the result of your hair test. This card contains directions to your Permanent Waver, giving the exact Circuline lotion required for any type of wave you may want.

Your $1 deposit will be deducted from the price of your next permanent wave—given anywhere in the United States where the Circuline Process is used. The Nestle Company guarantees the refund of this deposit. Over 6,000 hair dressers and beauty parlors use Nestle permanent waving apparatus.

The Scarlet Letter

Lillian Gish has just completed Nathaniel Hawthorne's romance of Puritan days, "The Scarlet Letter." Who doesn't remember the tragic story of Hester Prynne, doomed to wear a scarlet "A" embroidered on her breast as a penalty for her adultery with her husband's friend? Miss Gish's Hester should be an interesting addition to her gallery of suffering heroines

On this page are three striking moments of "The Scarlet Letter." At left, Miss Gish with Lars Hanson, who plays the Puritan clergyman, Arthur Dimmesdale, who shares Hester's illicit romance

Beauty is a Matter of — Common Sense and Judgment

LETTUCE

CREAM

BEAUTY is not a question of miracles and magic. It is the result of common sense, good judgment, and everyday habit, just the same as other successful things.

For instance, in the care of your skin, the perfectly logical first step is cleansing. And the logical cream to use is one specially and particularly designed to cleanse—and nothing else.

Marinello Lettuce Cream does but one thing—keeps your skin clean. Does it expertly and thoroughly as a specialist should. And that clean skin is the place to begin to build beauty. Without this habit of cleanliness, beauty will neither develop nor continue.

The common-sense thing to do, then, is to make a habit of this cleansing. At the end of every day—and always before make-up, use Lettuce Cream. There are 9000 Marinello Beauty Shops using Marinello Lettuce Cream daily in preparing the skin for almost every sort of treatment.

After the cleansing the next logical step is nourishing with Marinello Tissue Cream. A skin food with but one purpose—to keep the skin nourished so that it can be beautiful. Each of the Marinello Creams—one for every skin condition—has one specific thing to do—and does it.

Marinello Creams may be had at Marinello Shops, drug stores and department stores.

Four Writers Condemn the Films

always find Charlie doing something you had never thought of."

That was all I could get out of him at the time. Later, however, when I spent the day with him at St. Raphael on the Riviera, he explained some of his reactions. The surroundings were less trying, for one thing; we sat out on a balcony over the Mediterranean. Instead of the cold and penetrating London fog surrounding us, we were bathed in a warm Riviera sun over a cigar and cognac after a French dinner that does not grow in London.

"English films are smashed," he said regretfully. "That is due largely to the fact that there is no duty on American films which come into England cheap, to say the least. On the other hand, English films never did quite arrive. The producers never seemed quite to realize what a stupendous job they had attempted. For one thing, they started on insufficient capital. For another thing, while they may have spent a great deal of money—ask the stockholders and they will tell you they did!—they did not give either enough thought or money to organization. That is wherein you Americans excel in business—in your organization; we depend on tradition. Only in the case of the films, there was no tradition. And now, England has not the money to spend—we are all poor over there in trying to pay our debts. It shocks us to see how much America spends."

He waited until the band in the near-by stand finished its piece of American jazz. This seemed to bring him back to his original belligerent strain of thought. I confess that I felt a bit irritated at the musical selection myself. Neither of us had come over here for that sort of thing.

"I think the movies are a menace to civilization!" He held up his hand. "What I mean is, the average motion picture that I have had the misfortune to see points in that direction. They malign life." (Bear in mind that Mr. Swinnerton is a realist in fiction.)

"They mislead the simple-minded—I mean that in a commendatory sense—into leading the same tawdry, artificial life they see portrayed on the screen several nights a week.

"It is all made so attractive, so easy and so alluring. I think in that way, the films are molding half the universe today in a way that is bound to lead to universal mischief as time goes on."

When asked if any of his novels had been filmed, he said, "Nocturne" was sold and will be put on shortly—but I hope they never put it on, unless they intend to portray my story and not do what I understand they have done to the works of so many others."

who wrote "When We Were Very Young" would talk and go on? And Milne is just like that—a great big young fellow with the spirit and imagination of a child; but the mind of a man, decidedly.

"Now, when they came to put on 'Mr. Pim'—that was from the novel, by the way, not the play—they never asked me either to see it or have anything to do with hill. Artists and natives live together amidst considerable unsanitariness here. The new town—where Mr. Oppenheim lives—is disappointingly like a modern suburban development on the environs of any of our large American cities. The Nice golf course runs right back of his house.

"Ah, the films?" he said blandly, as we sat over coffee after dinner on his open-air veranda that overlooked the gardens in which the February roses were blooming and the trees were hanging heavy with oranges, tangerines and lemons. "Well, I find the films enormously disappointing—I mean in actual progress. That is, they seem to have fallen back, got into a rut, instead of getting on."

I knew that he had many of his stories screened and I wanted to hear his experience in that particular.

"Oh, but no firm will allow you to put on your own story. A novelist is always encumbered by someone who must be paid for mutilating his story. It is an unfortunate fact that the film heads seem to be under some mysterious obligation to people in their employ to mutilate one's story. Take my most recent film—called 'Monte Carlo,' I believe. Why, to suit their ulterior purpose they actually had my heroine marry a different man from the husband I had chosen for her and many of my principal characters they did not see fit to use at all. In the construction of my stories, it so happens that all the characters are necessary to the plausibility of the tale. However, when the film appeared, the papers remarked something to the effect that 'the picture was good, but story poor!'"

Mr. Oppenheim passed me some fat English cigarettes with a cynical smile and a shake of the head. "No, there is something wrong. The creator should at least be asked about such changes.

A technical adviser to the author is what is wanted by authors—someone to bridge the gap that now exists in such a ghastly manner."

He pointed down to Queen's Gate Road, where a taxi driver sat in his cab surveying passers-by for a possible fare.

"The only view-point in life that he has—and it is perfectly right and normal for him—is a fare, a paying passenger. The British producer has his eye only on fares. And the English author's attitude is equally culpable, his is one of lucrative indifference.

"He knows that it won't affect the sales on the production of his work and doesn't as a rule even go to see its production—possibly because he might be ashamed of it."

SAYS HENRY ALBERT PHILLIPS:

ON this particular trip in foreign lands, I am more impressed than ever by the appreciable advance that the motion picture has taken in the mind, the imagination and amusement of the world, since I was last abroad. I find that London at last has a real cinema palace, American financed and built; that Paris is cinema mad; that even Portugal howls itself hoarse for Charlie Chaplin; that Vienna could never do without its kinema, and that in Monte Carlo the movie attracts the fashionable crowd from the Hotel de Paris and plays second fiddle only to the gaming tables in the world-famous Casino.

But, the significant point is that nine-tenths of all the pictures are American! Most of those produced by other nations are very bad—with the possible exception of Germany. And, from my point of view, a large percentage of those produced by America are not so good as they might be.

The moment we probe behind the scenes, we find or hear three discordant cries. The first is a perfect wail from the producers: "Stories! For heaven's sake, give us more stories!" It is the cry of a famished and waterless man in a barren desert. I don't think that they qualify their demand by asking for better stories, altho I am positive they are always asking for bigger names.

The second cry behind the scenes is also in the minor key, and it comes from many really excellent writers who may have a good story to sell, but have not the big name. The name being the thing, and not the "play"—as Shakespeare would insist—they cannot sell their work as often as they really should. So, I contend, that there is really no dearth of good stories, if producers would take stories more seriously per se, and the big names less so. But they pass the buck and tell you that the Public demands the Big Names! So there you are.

The third cry comes from the Big Names. They make no complaint about the eager acceptance of their stories and the prices paid for them, but they do object to what the producers do with their brain children.

it. It was typical of them, wasn't it? Wouldn't even let me see it privately!"

It was plain that he was piqued.

"And when it did appear, they didn't bother either to spell or punctuate the text in the captions. So the errors in story and composition stood without my having a word to say in the matter. And to nine out of ten who saw that atrocious misrepresentation that bore my name, that was my work!"

But Mr. Oppenheim's home—he has given up England as his residence, he told me—is at Cagnes, a little town lying on the Mediterranean, half-way between Nice, the Atlantic City of the Riviera, and Cannes, the Newport. Cagnes is divided into two parts: the old town which looks like a mass of ancient plastered houses all scrambling up the sides of a single precipitous

Even the trying light of afternoon does not dismay the woman who uses her correct tone of Pompeian Bloom for the desired note of color in her cheeks.

The blonde with very fair skin finds a natural tone for her cheeks in the Light Bloom or the new Oriental tint.

Perfectly Natural

Pompeian Bloom gives your cheeks a color exquisitely natural

By MADAME JEANNETTE

Famous cosmetician, retained by The Pompeian Laboratories as a consultant to give authentic advice regarding the care of the skin and the proper use of beauty preparations.

I RECENTLY overheard one of my friends say to another: "You, for one, need no rouge, my dear. What lovely natural coloring!" But the truth was this—like thousands of other women, she had found a rouge that gave her cheeks the exquisite natural coloring of a girl in her teens. That rouge is Pompeian Bloom.

Today women everywhere realize the necessity of using rouge that matches perfectly their natural skin-tones. And when they use the right shade of Bloom the wholly natural effect is achieved.

From the shade chart you can easily select the particular shade of Pompeian Bloom for your type of complexion.

SHADE CHART for selecting your correct tone of Pompeian Bloom

Medium Skin: The average American woman has the medium skin-tone—pleasantly warm in tone, with a faint suggestion of old ivory or sun-kissed russet. The Medium tone of Pompeian Bloom just suits this type of skin.

If you are slightly tanned, you may find the Orange tint more becoming. And sometimes women with medium skin who have very dark hair get a brilliant result with the Oriental tint.

Olive Skin: Women with the true olive skin are generally dark of eyes and hair—and require the Dark tone of Pompeian Bloom. If you wish to accent the brilliancy of your complexion, the Oriental tint will accomplish it.

Pink Skin: This is the youthful skin, most often found in blondes or red-haired women, and should use the Oriental tint.

White Skin: If you have this rare type of skin, use the Light tone of Bloom.

Special Note: An unusual coloring of hair and eyes sometimes demands a different selection of Bloom-tone from those above. If in doubt, write a description of your skin, hair and eyes to me for special advice.

The Truth About Film Salaries

Dix is receiving about $2,000 on a contract which has almost a year and a half to run. Famous Players is offering a new contract for considerably more, but for a long period of time.

John Gilbert is getting $2,000 from Metro-Goldwyn. Ramon Novarro is receiving the same amount from the same company. Ronald Colman is said to be getting but $1,700 from Samuel Goldwyn.

Against this, check the fact that Conway Tearle and Eugene O'Brien get $3,000 a week. So, too, does Lewis Stone. Wallace Beery gets $3,000, likewise. On the other hand, William Boyd is paid but $300.

The Underpaid Favorites

THERE are several reasons for this odd difference in earning capacity. Dix is working out a long-term contract. Like Gilbert, Colman and Novarro, he is more concerned in getting good rôles than with a top-heavy remuneration. These shrewd young men have studied the elemental lesson of the screen, that a big star salary lasts but briefly. They want to stay, develop and progress in pictures. Hence, their willingness to work at what is really a moderate celluloid salary.

Consider the case of the ill-fated Barbara La Marr. When she was overtaken by her fatal illness, Miss La Marr was earning $2,000 a week. Yet, after her death, it was found that she had saved but $6,000 out of her entire life's earnings. She had nothing to show for her meteoric success.

Corinne Griffith is receiving more than $3,000 a week. Milton Sills gets $2,500. Florence Vidor is said to get $2,000 a week under her new Famous starring contract. Bebe Daniels gets $2,000 as a Famous star. This same amount is earned weekly by Owen Moore, Antonio Moreno, Nita Naldi and Anna Q. Nilsson. Adolphe Menjou draws $2,500. As a First National star, Dorothy Mackaill gets about $1,200. As a free-lance, she got $1,500.

The Character Players

CONSIDER the character men. Jean Hersholt gets $1,500, altho he is frequently loaned by Universal for as high as $2,500. Noah Beery gets $1,500. Ernest Torrence finds $1,750 in his Saturday-night pay envelope. George Siegmann finds that film villainy pays, to the tune of $1,000. Walter Long also gets this for his realistic leers. Lon Chaney gets $3,000.

Francis X. Bushman leads the old-timers in earning capacity. He is asking and receiving $2,000 a week. True, he didn't get this for his work in "Ben-Hur," but he is now considered a strong comeback. Hence, the $2,000. Henry B. Walthall, the "little colonel" of unforgettable memory, receives $1,500. Bryant Washburn gets $750. Charles Ray receives $1,500.

Turn to the comedians. Harry Langdon is getting $50,000 per comedy as a First National star. Raymond Griffith has maneuvered his salary at Famous to $3,000 as a comedian. Sydney Chaplin receives $2,000. It is interesting to note that his "Charley's Aunt" was one of the big comedy hits of last year. It earned $1,500,000. Mack Swain gets $750 as a comedy foil. Charley Murray and Chester Conklin draw down $800 to $1,000 as first aids to screen dramas. Louise Fazenda earns $1,250.

The Freak Salaries

THERE are still some freak salaries in filmdom, relics of old high salaries of the earlier days. Pauline Frederick still gets $3,500 to $4,000 when she works before the camera. Lionel Barrymore asks and receives $2,500. Mae Murray is said to get $3,000 under her new Metro-Goldwyn arrangement. Betty Compson is asking $4,000 a week. Since she has put aside a good bank-account and is the wife of a successful director, she doesn't have to worry about working steadily.

Pause to compare some of these abnormal salaries with the small sums paid some recent foreign newcomers. Vilma Banky is reported to receive $500 from Samuel Goldwyn, altho she is loaned to other producers for as high as $1,500. Cecil De Mille offered $50,000 for her contract. Greta Nissen had climbed from $75 to $500 when Famous dropped her contract. On the day she was released Universal offered to borrow her for $1,500. Now Universal has her, at a reported salary of $750. Greta Garbo is getting so little that Hollywood jokingly remarks that she is being paid in kroner and canned sardines. Miss Garbo really receives $400.

Dolores Costello is under a $300-a-week contract to the Warners.

Norma Shearer is said to be getting $1,500. Sally O'Neil is receiving but $300. Metro-Goldwyn discovered her—and signed her under a long contract. Lillian Rich is getting $350 from Cecil De Mille. She is loaned frequently for $1,000. Clara Bow gets $750 a week from Benjamin Schulberg, now an official of Famous, altho she is frequently loaned for far in excess of this. When the loan figure goes over the thousand mark, Schulberg and Miss Bow split the difference.

The $2,500 Class

LET us return for a moment to the $2,500 class. Reginald Denny is now receiving this from Universal. This, too, is the figure earned per week by Bert Lytell, Anita Stewart, Viola Dana and Mae McAvoy.

Kenneth Harlan draws down $1,750. Lew Cody, Irene Rich, Monte Blue and Helene Chadwick each earn $1,700. The $1,500 class is larger, including Jacqueline Logan, Norman Kerry, Harrison Ford, Bessie Love, Mae Busch, John Bowers, Marguerite de la Motte, Huntly Gordon, Leatrice Joy, Matt Moore, Rod La Rocque, Conrad Nagel, Marie Prevost and Alice Terry.

Billie Dove and Patsy Ruth Miller get $1,250 each week. Receiving $1,200 we find Clive Brook, Jetta Goudal, Neil Hamilton, Pauline Starke, Lois Wilson, Robert Frazier, Pat O'Malley and Virginia Valli.

Belle Bennett and Louise Dresser were getting $1,000 per week when they scored their hits of last year. Doubtless they are getting more now. Still in the $1,000 class are Wanda Hawley, Barbara Bedford, Allan Forrest, Ricardo Cortez, Dorothy Devore, Laura La Plante, Aileen Pringle and Claire Windsor.

Lois Moran, the recent find, gets about $750. So, too, does Margaret Livingston, Claire Adams, Warner Baxter, Charles Emmett Mack, Herbert Rawlinson and George O'Brien. Mary Philbin is now receiving $800 from Universal. A year ago she was the poorest paid of all the stars, getting $300. Betty Bronson receives about $500 from Famous. She was getting $300 a year ago.

Western Melodrama Remunerative

STARRING in Western melodramas pays better. Against the $15,000 received by Mix, check the $7,000 earned by Fred Thomson and the $4,000 by Buck Jones. Hoot Gibson is trailing a bit at $2,500 a week.

Now for the directors. No one knows exactly what D. W. Griffith receives, but

CATHERINE M.—Yes, that was my error. Claire Windsor and not Mae Murray in "Dance Madness." Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., is Douglas Fairbanks, Sr.'s son, and they are nineteen and forty-three years old. Mae Murray is five feet three.

MARTHA P.—So you want to see more of Mabel Normand. I dont blame you. Mabel's birthday will be on November 10th, and she started in pictures at the old Biograph under Griffith in 1910. For ten years at least she was noted for her beautiful figure and she certainly could dive and swim. You say you were vaccinated with a phonograph needle. It's no secret. Anyway, I enjoyed yours.

LUCILLE.—Be careful how you put others under heavy obligation to you—it often causes them to detest you. Vilma Banky was born in Budapest, January 9, 1902. Rudolph Valentino has been married twice, once to Jean Acker and then to Winifred Hudnut, but isn't now.

THEDA BIRDIE.—Yes, Pauline Frederick is going to appear in "Uncle Tom's Cabin" for Universal. Margarita Fisher is to play Eliza. No, I dont think I will ever trim my whiskers. If I did I would lose all my personality, and then I wouldn't be able to answer questions. May Allison has blonde hair and blue eyes.

TERRIBLE KIT.—You certainly are. You know the fool often succeeds where the wise man fails, for the former usually has the courage of his folly, the latter fear of his wisdom. Jack Mulhall and Carl Miller in "We Moderns." Fay Lanphier is with Famous Players-Lasky at Astoria, Long Island. This is the shortest poem I know:

JOHN C., Alexandria, Egypt.—So Pearl White is in Egypt with the French troupe, "La Cigale," and you say you were disappointed in her. Glad to hear you liked "The Gold Rush." Right now Charlie Chaplin is playing in "The Circus." Write me again soon.

NAN C.—So you like the green and brown tints in the CLASSIC. Theodore Roberts will celebrate his sixty-fifth birthday on October 8th. His eyes are blue and they generally twinkle with humor. Rin-Tin-Tin has a son called "Gin-Gin-Gin."

HOPE.—You say you are compelled to go to church every Sunday, that your preacher is very dull, and you want me to suggest what he should preach about. I would say about twenty minutes. Tell him to read Hendrik Van Loon's "Story of the Bible" and learn how the best story ever told can be told in the best possible way. He will never be dull after that. So you like the CLASSIC, but you want more about Ernest Torrence and Ricardo Cortez, but less of Swanson and Valentino. Aye, aye, sir! I'll tell Mr. Smith.

RUTH G.—Well, my business consists in answering a few fool questions, and a few thousand sensible ones. No, Ben Lyon is not married. Madge Evans is only seventeen and she has brown hair. Win Beauty and keep it—as I did

For 40 years I have searched the world for the utmost in beauty helps. In that quest I have made 34 trips to France, have consulted famous beauties and great experts everywhere.

Thus I acquired, I believe, the greatest beauty aids in existence. By their help I gained a glorious career as a beauty of the stage and films. By their help I have preserved my youth. At a grandmother's age I still look a girl of 19.

Now I have placed these supreme helps at every woman's call. All drug and toilet counters supply them as Edna Wallace Hopper's Beauty Helps. And I am doing my best to bring to millions what they brought to me.

Edna Wallace Hopper

My Gift to Girls — who want more beauty — and to women who love youth

By Edna Wallace Hopper

These are my chief beauty aids. Each combines from six to sixteen of the greatest helps I found. Each is so efficient that the very first use amazes and delights. This is to offer you a test of any at my cost. I want you to know what they mean.

White Youth Clay

This is a new-type clay, the final results of 20 years of scientific study. It is white, refined and dainty. It combines with three clays other factors which every skin requires. So don't confuse it with the old-type crude and muddy clays.

Youth Clay purges the skin of all that clogs and mars it. It draws out the causes of blackheads and blemishes. It combats all lines and wrinkles. It brings the blood to the skin to nourish and revive it. The quick result is a rosy afterglow.

I have seen Youth Clay bring to countless girls new beauty in half an hour. Older women often seem to drop ten years. The sample will prove to you that no girl or woman can appear at her best without it.

A Multiple Cream

My Youth Cream comes in two types—cold cream and vanishing. One is for night use, the other for day. No skin should ever be an hour without it.

My Youth Cream applies many valuable factors, all in one application. These include products of both lemon and strawberry. Also all the best that science knows to foster, feed and preserve the skin.

The first night's use of my Youth Cream will be a revelation to you. And my baby-like complexion shows what daily use can do.

My Facial Youth

My Facial Youth is a liquid cleanser which I found in France. Today this formula is recognized everywhere as the greatest of skin cleansers. The leading beauty experts advise and employ it, for nothing else known can compare. But my Facial Youth is first to offer this great cleanser at a modest price.

Facial Youth contains no animal, no vegetable fat. It cannot assimilate in any way with the skin. It simply cleans to the depths, then departs. And with it goes all the grime and dirt, dead skin and clogging matter.

I never knew what a clean skin meant until I found this product. Nor will you. And a clean skin is the foundation of beauty. I urge you to learn what it means.

My Hair Youth

Millions marvel at my hair. It is thick and lustrous, far more luxuriant than 40 years ago. I have never had falling hair or dandruff and never a touch of gray.

This I also owe to France. Her great experts gave me what is now combined in my Hair Youth. The product is concentrated, so I apply it with an eye-dropper directly to the scalp. There it combats the hardened oil and dandruff which stifle the hair roots. It tones and stimulates the scalp. You feel that instantly. Hair thrives on a scalp so cared for as flowers thrive in a well-kept garden.

The sample bottle which I send with eye-dropper will show you what Hair Youth does.

This coupon will bring you a sample of the help you most desire. My Beauty Book will come with it, also some samples of my products. Clip it and send it to me.

the slap-sticks or the Western pictures; or, they gave us a huge, eye-filling spectacle; and finally they had begun to realize that they were not merely translating books or plays into a sort of dumb play of what happened in a book or a theater, but that their business was to catch the "movie way" of representing life, so that it was quite clear enough and forceful enough without the words.

Compared to what we choose to call the modern era of films, they were still, however, giving us a "lot of photography." There was a great deal of unnecessary and unimportant detail in even the best pictures. And as for the handling of the camera itself, their technique might be likened to the thin tone of the harpsichord of two hundred years ago, before Bach invented the piano with its immense range and richness.

Flexibility of Today

THE modern film as we know it today, which may be compared to a full orchestra, with its variety of shade or tone, its deepened graphic power, its lightness of touch, its complete flexibility to the will or whim of the director, was ushered in by the foreign invasion of about five years ago.

"The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," which I saw in 1921, made a profound impression on the film people here. Its weird continuity, which might have been taken from one of Poe's alcohol nightmares, prompted the director, a certain Herr Wien, to seek the most uncanny and fantastic effects. He did this, on the one hand, by using "expressionistic" studio sets that transmitted the exact degree of insanity he wanted to put over; then by keying up his players to chime with the "expressionistic" sets; and, finally, by the multitude of camera angles which he resorted to in order to get a startling effect of unreality.

It was a marvelous experiment if we consider merely the manipulation or control of the camera. I had often heard directors here complain about the "babylike" mind of the movie camera. It was maddening, the way it included and featured things that had simply escaped the director's eye as he shot his sequence—things that had nothing to do with his scheme. And if you blurred or touched up the film, the whole thing looked rotten. And now came "Caligari," with all its "distortions" and its completely sustained atmosphere of unreality. The inspired acting of Conrad Veidt as Cesare, the somnambulist, and Werner Krauss as Caligari, was easily superior to any work we had yet seen. And as for the staging, a police station was a mad dream of leaning walls and masked officials sitting on absurdly high stools; a prison cell was a high, vaulted room, whose toppling pillars seemed to be falling eternally upon the prisoner bound in massive chains to a painted disc on the floor. There were bursts of poetic motion in it: Cesare carrying off the girl, leaps thru an arched window, her dress opening like a great fan and describing an arc, as they disappear; Cesare dancing across the jaggedly pointed roofs of the village, with her swooned body in his arm. . . . Throughout there was the perfection of related movements.

"Caligari" suggested immediately the amazing degree to which you could control the camera to secure any desired effect of fantasy or suggestion. It suggested also a complete control over the material photographed: the use not only of artfully selected background, but of synthetic background, this latter stunt being taken over bodily from the modernistic German theater of Gordon Craig and Max Reinhardt.

In its use of artificial studio sets, "Caligari" went too far, in the opinion of many keen observers, from the genius of the motion picture. The completely artificial sets have the same effect as trick photography, and become after a while very stuffy and boring.

With the immense improvement of the beside which was the dreadful "Mort." Then the commandant drew his pistol, handed it to Sleeman, said: "Légionnaire, do your duty!" and Sleeman put the pistol to the drunken man's temple and fired. . . . And more. Much more.

"The Katzenjammers"

THERE is a lighter side of camp life, too.

"The Katzenjammers"—Neil Hamilton and Donald Stewart (Digby and Buddy)—earned their title thus:

The first night in camp, Ronald Colman and William Powell were called outside their tent by an ingenuous Neil Hamilton, who detained them for some five minutes suggesting starlight walks, a raid on the mess tent (in charge, incidentally, of Hollywood's smartest café—Brandstatter's Montmartre), and a visit to the commissary.

When the two pals, having refused all lures, re-entered their tent, Ronald's bed was missing (via Donald Stewart)—not to be recovered until the dunes about the camp had been secretly searched and the east was beginning to brighten.

They are all boys in camp, planning snipe hunts for the uninitiated, seasoning one another's coffee with olives, toothpicks or cheese, constantly joking. "Childish idea of humor," they scoff, but they all indulge in it, from the enigmatic Ronald Colman to Neil Hamilton of the "spiritual" face.

Until the bugle blows "assembly." . . . The "Beau Geste" cast hits the trail over the sand-dunes eagerly.

The picture is something more than a picture to them and to Herbert Brenon, an indefatigable figure in white under a great shade hat, who waits their coming in the shadow of the fort.

The song of the legion of Arizona comes ringing back to camp:

"Allons, Brenon, voici la légion!"

The dream is coming true.

Hollywood Impressions

Kathleen recently married a banker and all of their friends brought presents. There were about sixty present. Mrs. Mix makes a charming hostess and Handsome Tom an interesting host. He was dressed in a double-breasted black-velvet suit, and he took delight in showing me and others the numerous relics, trophies and curios in his gun-room, which is about 20 x 30, with an arched ceiling about twenty-five feet high, filled with guns, pistols, saddles, lariats, steer horns, and so on. There was no entertainment except conversation and occasionally a little dancing. The ladies arrived at seven for dinner, and the men at nine-thirty. At twelve I left and was nearly the last to go. Another one of those famous wild Hollywood parties!

EVERYBODY out here seems to have a joke about the international fame and wickedness of Hollywood. And this alleged wickedness is a joke. According to these soothsayers, every sheik on the Desert of Sahara, every potentate in Asia Minor, and every cannibal chief in Central Africa knows more about Hollywood than Hollywood herself knows. Thus the little lies founded on false facts go from place to place, getting bigger and fouler as they go, like a snowball rolling down-hill, which picks up all manner of dirt as it rolls.

Something DIFFERENT for Bobbed Hair

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which is really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25¢ direct to J. W. KOBİ Co., 656 Rainier Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

How the Keystone Kops Happened

Mack Sennett as the police sergeant and the late Fred Mace as the copper in an early Sennett comedy helmets, caps, clubs and sockets and belts.

Gentlemen's warbrode.—Odd coats, pants, vests, shirts, shoes, bell-boys' suits, tragedian's clothes, porters' uniforms, Mexican costumes, tennis blazers, hunting suits, rube clothes, railroad jumpers, eccentric frock coats.

Ladies' wardrobe.—Dancing girls' costumes, Spanish costumes, soubrette dresses, bathing suits, old maids' costumes, shirt-waists, wrappers, kimonos, waitress' uniforms, nurses' uniforms, wigs, hats and shoes.

Incidentally, Mack Sennett was not above appearing in Keystone comedies himself in those days, and it is undoubtedly in the reader's memory that Mr. Sennett was a laugh producer par excellence, working with Ford Sterling and the late Fred Mace, and in these pictures he wore one of the police uniforms which has played so prominent a part in this little story. (As a captain, always, of course, in charge of the Keystone police.)

A battered police club, which the writer has hanging beside his bed (in the interests of self-defense only, of course) and given to him by Harry Guttenberg the day he purchased the Keystone wardrobe, is a mute and constant reminder of those dear old days—the cheery era of the Keystone cops.

letters, which, of course, are uninteresting.

The Big Films

PICTURES like "The Black Pirate," "The Big Parade," "La Bohème," "Stella Dallas," "The Gold Rush" are not only an entertainment to the writer, but also an inspiration in writing of them. There are, it is true, numerous other bright spots in a critic's life that come on at the regular change cinemas. Poor ones come along like poor plays, but there are more of them than the stage efforts. And even if a picture be wearying, so long as it contains a glimpse of originality here and there, the review of it can be approached in a humble and hopeful mood. You don't have to wiggle on your seat and look at your typewriter and wonder, after all, if you could not do better with a pencil or a pen and ink or mayhap an old-fashioned quill.

No matter whether it is a delightful spring day, or a blizzard is blowing, or it is as hot as Yuma in the summer, you always find plenty of persons in the motion picture theaters. Sometimes you wonder why the people don't go out of town and on other occasions you wonder why they don't stay home. When I take my seat (to work) in a picture theater, I have a hope for comparative quiet, and, as a rule, I get it. But now and again one is bothered by prattling patrons or sighing fat men and women who seem to be more stirred by pathos than by the comedy. One afternoon I found the theater pretty crowded and during the screening of the feature one small boy became so excited that he jumped up once in a while and came down on my foot. Above me was another of his ilk who sat with the toes of his shoes quite near my neck. But taking it all in all, I have enjoyed the youngsters in a theater because of their buoyant spirits. There was nothing more inspiring than the children's laughter at "Peter Pan" and "A Kiss for Cinderella," which were presented during the Christmas holidays.

"More Stars Than There Are In Heaven"

Only a few bars of the music had been played and Jane had gone thru not more than half a dozen movements, when Fokine said: "That'll do!" She crept away to dress, crestfallen, but when she was scurrying down the aisle to leave the theater, the ballet-master's secretary ran after her.

"Fokine wants to see you. Wait!"

Jane waited, and discovered that she had been engaged.

"Never," cried Fokine, "have I seen such beautiful arms!"

Hired by Ziegfeld

It was luck who led her to the building wherein Ziegfeld has his offices, on a day when that connoisseur of beauty was selecting girls for his "Follies" shows. Girls of all sizes, nationalities and complexions filled the theater, the lobby, and spilled out into the hallways of the office-building.

Jane stood among an anxious throng on the eleventh floor, punching the elevator bell and hoping nobody would think she was in and of the mob. The elevator didn't come, but Ziegfeld did—merely passing from one office to another. He looked at Jane. Jane jabbed the bell. He disappeared into an office and returned with a companion just as the elevator door rolled back to admit the girl.

The door closed after her, and its closing was followed by an imperious knock.

"They want me!" thought Jane, but she was too shy to say so, and the elevator boy, with the arrogance of his kind, paid the knock no attention.

The main floor reached, Jane lingered in the lobby, a moment, then took her way leisurely to the door. A boy ran after her.

"Hey—Ziegfeld wants you!"

"How do you know?"

"Well, he phoned down to stop the girl with the red roses and you're her!" said the boy, more emphatically than grammatically.

Even so.

Jane signed with the "Follies" and played with them nine months.

Zukor Sees Her

It was a bitter winter and scanty attire on drafty stages went hard with the latest "Follies" beauty. Cold after cold kept her weak and ill.

"I wasn't getting anywhere," she explains, "I didn't feel that I would ever make a great singer, and I knew I had started too late to be a first-rank dancer. I should have begun when I was five! I wanted to act. I have such terrific ambition."

An aunt, Jane's sole living relative, hearing that the girl had decided not to go on with the "Follies," expressed regret at never having seen her niece on the stage, and was promptly invited to New York as a guest for the last night.

Such a night! The girls all sang their songs, smiled and blew kisses at the visitor. She had a marvelous time. All stage and screen talk seemed wonderful to her and she pressed Jane to take her to places where the celebrities might be seen.

"We'll go to the Ritz Grill for lunch Monday," promised Jane.

Little god Luck was guiding them. They had to wait for a table and while they waited, in came Adolph Zukor and Jesse L. Lasky to wait for one, too.

Mr. Zukor spoke to Jane. "Still with the 'Follies,' eh?"

All thru luncheon, she felt the eyes of the two men upon her, and as she left the room Mr. Zukor came to her again.

"Mr. Lasky would like to meet you," he said. "Ever thought of going into pictures?" Resulting in a year's contract with Paramount!

Then—"Don Juan"

HOLLYWOOD brought back jeopardized health, but at first it seemed to offer no opportunity. Month after month went by. Fitzmaurice borrowed Jane for "His Supreme Moment" and she was condemned to "other woman" rôles.

Later, Barrymore's "Don Juan" was in production. Alan Crosland, the director, sent for Jane. "All you'll have to do is to look gorgeous," he was explaining, "magnificent clothes, you know, that will show off your figure—"

"Oh, no!" cried Jane. "I hate that! Anybody can look gorgeous. Isn't there something with acting in it?"

"There's Beatrice in the prolog—but you've had so little experience, and that's a heavy part—"

"Let me try!"

Barrymore, consulted, gave her an appraising look. "Surely," he said, "she's Beatrice!"

A screen test confirmed his judgment, and her work in the part won her a new and remunerative contract with Warner Brothers!

"I'm to play leads," she confided, eagerly. "I'm so happy! I hate being an imitation Nita Naldi—first because there's only one Nita, and second because I don't fit the part."

"There's no good reason why being tall should make one a vamp, is there? Vamps usually are no more than clothes-horses. I want to do emotional scenes. I'll be getting somewhere if I can do real acting. I'll be building toward a future, don't you know?"

She has ambition, as has been said before!

About a year ago I went to the Colony Theater to review Norma Talmadge's film version of the play, "The Lady." I had been sitting watching the newsreel when two grey-haired ladies passed by me and took seats near me. Their conversation, as the feature was unwound, was soft and interesting. They were evidently harking back to the period of the picture, some thirty-five years ago. They found Miss Talmadge reminded them of a relative, and they referred gently to other incidents in the picture. In my review I mentioned these two grey-haired ladies several times, and when I came to the end of my article I wrote: "Take it from the two grey-haired ladies, this is an admirable production."

Unusual Experiences

Two days later I received a charming letter, in which the person, who signed it "Two Grey-haired Ladies," told of the

To Whiten Dull Teeth

A NEW WAY, based on advanced scientific principles, that lightens cloudy teeth; that restores off-color teeth to charming clearness

IF you want whiter teeth, please make this remarkable test. It will prove your teeth are not naturally "off color" or dull, but far whiter than you know.

It will give them clear and beautiful whiteness. It will firm your gums to a healthy coral color.

You are hiding your teeth with a film coat . . . that is all

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles to a germ-laden film that forms on your teeth.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It lays your gums open to bacterial attack and your teeth open to decay. Germs by the millions breed in it. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea.

Now new methods are being used. A dentifrice called Pepsodent—different in formula, action and effect from any other known. Largely on dental advice the world has turned to this method.

Mere brushing won't do

It accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. No harsh grit, judged dangerous to enamel.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Send the coupon. Clip it now before you forget.

All's Fair in Love

"Then—It Happened"

"WE had just been playmates before, laughing and joking together, but suddenly we became serious. He told me all about himself and I told him all about myself. We talked for three hours, mostly about ourselves and our ideas on life—and oh, all the things people do say in such a case."

The sun did not come out at all that day, but a certain small god who wears little or nothing and carries a bow and arrow did. Two arrows reached their marks.

"After that, we went everywhere together," beamed the happy bride, "and two months and four days after the first time we met, we were married. It was this way: We'd talked about it, of course, off and on, but when it came it was as sudden as our falling in love.

"The picture was finished and we were driving thru the little town of Santa Ana one day. We passed a sign reading: 'Justice of the Peace.'

"'How about it?' said Bill. 'Shall we get it over?'

"'Surely,' I replied.

"'O. K.,' I said, and right there and then we did it!"

Married in Santa Ana

THE lovely Elinor admits that before the fatal day when she set her hand and seal to the contract to play the princess, she had belonged to the Hollywood faction which asserts: "No, I would not marry an actor!"

"I thought that two actors married to each other had less than half a chance at happiness," confessed Elinor. "I used to say that the jealousy of a husband who was in the same business would work against us, that he would probably criticize my love scenes with other men, and resent it if, for some reason, I secured better parts or better pictures than fell to his lot.

"But I don't have to worry about Bill. There's not an ounce of jealousy in him, and as I have none and we trust each other— Oh, well, Bill is such a dear!"

Elinor and Bill have just taken a new house and the things uppermost in her mind are draperies, lamps and matching the bedroom curtains.

"The living-room is thirty-four by twenty," she was confiding, eagerly. "We are so anxious to get it fixed up before Bill has to go away on location. He may be gone a month. Isn't that terrible?"

It was all she could do to bring her mind back from the fascinations of the new house to a consideration of advice to girl fans who would like to get into a studio and appear before the camera.

But when she had left the dear "honeymoon house," Elinor had sound advice to offer.

Simplicity and Dignity

"SIMPLICITY is the one vital thing," she said. "A little while ago it was the girl who jazzed in and tried to get over a piquant personality who got the chance to try out. Anything striking enough to attract attention helped, whether it was make-up, dress or a certain 'line.'

"But not today. Producers are looking for girls who can look and behave like real ladies. Anyone can take on the manners of a tough, but no one not a gentlewoman can show breeding.

"Be as simple as you can in clothes, colors and actions. Select plain little dresses that become you, in colors that set off your particular personality. Carry yourself well and speak in a low, clear voice.

"Simplicity goes in acting, too. It is far more effective than chewing the scenery. For example, in the 'Volga Boatman,' Victor Varconi has to strike Bill with a whip, after showing an ungovernable temper. Bill does no more than narrow his eyes while a ghost of a smile plays around his mouth. But there is more menace in his single glance than in all the raging of Varconi."

That Elinor Fair follows her own good advice was shown by the dress of fine Alice-blue flannel she was wearing—a dress simply trimmed in the daintiest of narrow braid, and matched by the plain felt hat.

And talking of careers, when Elinor was a tiny baby in Richmond, Virginia, her mother dedicated her to fame. The baby learned to dance almost as soon as she began to walk. When she was eight, her mother took her to Leipsic, Germany, to study the violin. From Leipsic they found their way to Paris, France, where the little girl was given masters to teach her voice culture. She can remember walking with her nurse in the Luxembourg springtime doing breathing exercises as they went.

Studied Abroad

THEN came Brighton, England, and a course at a girls' school.

But always she danced, and at length at the ripe age of fourteen Elinor appeared on the stage of the Alcazar Theater in San Francisco doing two solo dances in a musical comedy.

Moving pictures seemed to offer greater opportunity than anything else, so presently the mother and daughter journeyed to Hollywood. Fewer girls were storming casting directors' offices then, and presently, on Elinor's fifteenth birthday, she received the plum of the part of the little cripple girl in "The Miracle Man."

"Lon Chaney used to make me up," remembered Elinor, "and I learned so much from him. That picture made him famous. Then I had a part with Adolphe Menjou in Mary Pickford's 'Through the Back Door'—and right after that Menjou became famous. I was a mascot, they said.

"And so it went—I worked nearly always, but rarely had good parts in good pictures. I was beginning to be terribly discouraged when I was cast to play the girl with Buck Jones. . . . And see what happened!"

There we were back again at the new house, discussing the right place to find those clear red bowls that add a touch of color to one's living-room, measuring the width of a window-seat, and arguing about the best shade for the summer slip-over covers—if one should decide to use such things.

"Marriage and careers mix very well," observed Elinor. "We've been married two months and I still think of Bill as my 'boy friend.' Isn't that wonderful?"

camera itself, directors learned to secure brilliant effects of distortion or interpretation, from nature alone, merely by the angles at which the camera approached its material.

But by now the cinema had become an instrument which lent itself flexibly to the highest imagination. With the flood of great German pictures, such as Lubitsch's "Deception" and "Passion," with the making of Stroheim's "Greed," the modern era had been ushered in. Instead of being a means for spending an evening gazing at some star's agreeable physiognomy, the cinema became a vehicle for the expression of pictorial beauty, relating movement, and rising and falling tempo. In works such as Chaplin's "A Woman of Paris," or Cruze's "Covered Wagon," the photography had become so clear and logical that the clean lines of a picture always converged directly upon the thing or figure that should hold our attention. Their touch was more delicate and more intimate than ever before. The shutting of a door, a nudge, the grip of a hand—such things acquire tremendous significance in the new photography and the new directorial technique. The inventions and experiments of Lubitsch alone can bear the fullest examination. "Greed" is an imposing chapter in the history of the new art.

It is interesting to note, however, that James Cruze had followed clearly the American tradition of Griffith, as well as that of Sennett, in "The Covered Wagon" and "Hollywood." And thru Cruze you arrive finally at the superb achievement of King Vidor in "The Big Parade."

enjoyment of reading about themselves, adding how gratified they were to observe that they had "modulated, cultured voices." The writing-paper showed that they were living in a Fifth Avenue hotel.

A reviewer's life, as you may have gathered, is not all beer and skittles. There are days when the theaters are terribly crowded and when the management has forgotten all about the critics. At the opening of "The Freshman," the best they could do for me was to give me a seat in a box, from which Harold Lloyd looked to me about twenty feet tall and a foot wide. I explained to the manager that my review from that position would be hardly what he wanted to see next morning. He then escorted me to the other side of the house, where there was a similar seat in the opposite box. I was indignant and the manager was anything but happy. Nevertheless, we were surrounded by the merriest crowd one could hope to see. Finally they found a seat for me, and I soon joined in the laughter of the packed theater.

Just to be a little original, a New York theater manager decided to present "The Gold Rush" a little before midnight last August. Hence, the critics, after their day's work, had to get down to business at the witching hour. Mr. Chaplin, looking spry and cheerful, was greeted by

Mme. Blanche Arral, Opera Star Finds, in Java, New Way to Reduce Fat

Grand Opera Star Reduces

34 pounds in 4 weeks without Drugs, Diet or Exercises

Javanese Woman

The secret of the Javanese women's slender beauty is out at last. The method by which Madame Arral reduced so surprisingly has been used in Java for years.

It is simple and harmless yet thoroughly scientific. No medicines, starvation diets, violent exercises—no Turkish baths, dangerous purging nor reducing garments.

This method, it is said, removes fat at the rate of about one pound a day, and at the same time strengthens the body and benefits the general health.

"The results were astonishing," says Mme. Arral. "Just this pleasant simple native treatment took away my surplus flesh, restored my voice and my health. Today my mind is clear and buoyant, and I truly feel as though I had stepped from a hazy darkness into bright, glorious sunlight."

"I had previously tried, I believe, every method of flesh reduction known to medical science. I used drugs, starvation diets, purging, rolling, exercising, long walks, rubber garments, etc., but they did me more harm than good."

When Blanche Arral appeared in this country some time ago she was so stout that only her marvelous voice kept her from being actually amusing in such rôles as Carmen and Juliet.

She returned from abroad with a figure as beautiful as her voice. The transformation is amazing. She has reduced 34 pounds, lost a double chin and looks fifteen years younger.

"I had gained flesh, oh, so rapidly," says Mme. Arral, "I was ashamed to appear on the stage. Fat made my health miserable and affected my voice. I was dull, heavy, stupid, unable to digest food or sleep."

"Finally while touring Australia my health broke down completely, my voice failed and I was obliged to take a long rest. I went for a vacation to the little island of Java where, at the hands of a Javanese priest, I found a complete cure."

In response to a deluge of requests for information regarding this wonderful method, Mme. Arral has written a charming little book about her experience in Java and how she got rid of excess flesh by this method which can be practiced at home by anyone.

For a short time a copy of this book will be sent free to anyone who desires to reduce. Send name and address to Blanche Arral, Suite 478 E, 35 E. Flagler St., Miami, Florida.

Tint Those Gray Hairs to Their Original Shade and look 5 to 10 years younger

The advantage of Brownatone is that your closest friends—your own family—cannot detect its use. Other preparations may give your hair some strikingly different and unbecoming color, but Brownatone reproduces its exact original, youthful shade, making you look from five to ten years younger. Mrs. E. Neighbors of Sonora, Kentucky, is one of hundreds of thousands of Brownatone users. She writes: "I have tried other preparations but none has given the satisfaction that Brownatone has."

Everybody knows the woman who spends much money and time in caring for her complexion and who still looks old, not because she is old or feels old but because her hair is faded, streaked and gray. They do not realize that beauty is youth while gray, dingy hair is the badge of age. "Brownatone," says Hattie B. Tucker of Greensboro, Ala., "is easily the best preparation I have ever used for gray hair. It cannot help giving perfect satisfaction."

Brownatone does not merely coat or cover each strand of hair. It does not rub off or wash out because it is absorbed; each strand is saturated. And, although used by hundreds of thousands of women for many years past no report has ever come to us of the slightest injury to the most delicate hair. Marcelling, shampooing, waving and scalp treatments have no effect upon it. You merely brush the color through and do not need to apply it again until new hair grows out. No wonder Mrs. Ida Gilbert, 1653 Addison St., Chicago, says, "I am a constant booster for Brownatone."

From one or the other of Brownatone's two colors any exact shade can be obtained. Ask either for Blonde to Medium Brown, or for Dark Brown to Black. To be had at drug and toilet goods counters everywhere in two sizes, 50c and $1.50. "Please write to my druggist. I have recommended Brownatone to him as the finest hair tint that anyone can use. I know he can sell a great deal of it."—Mrs. Walter Reed, Brighton, Mich.

They Told Buster to Stick to It play in Los Angeles, Buster is still "a kid."

Buster's Autograph Album

GETTING Keaton to talk about himself or his early career is as difficult as getting him to smile. It can't be done. He shuns the limelight, a trait which becomes more pronounced each year. Perhaps the most prized memento of his early days is a travel-worn diary and autograph album. It contains signatures, verses and tributes of Elsie Janis, McIntyre and Heath, Louise Dresser, John L. Sullivan, James J. Corbett, Will Cressy, Fred Niblo, J. K. Emmett, Jack Norworth, Flo Irwin, Tom Sharkey, Lew Dockstader, Tony Pastor, Charles K. Harris, Robert Hilliard, George Monroe, Cheridah Simpson, Banks Winter and hundreds of others, many of them long since dead and others who have risen to still greater fame on the stage and screen and various walks of life.

The late Lew Dockstader made one of the first entries in Buster's book, naming the place of the future screen star's debut in the following rhyme:

"Buster, you're a dandy; Buster, you're a brick; Buster, you can make all juveniles look sick; Some day you'll be a great one, the captain of the crew, But don't forget old Wilmington, the place of your debut."

Fred Niblo first met young Keaton on Christmas Day, 1904. By this time nine-year-old Buster, as a member of the Three Keatons, was famous thruout the vaudeville circuits. The director of "Ben-Hur" then was with the variety team of Newell and Niblo.

Niblo recorded in the youthful fun-maker's album:

"Some day, Buster, you will be one of our greatest comedians. I predict a great future for you."

During 1904 Elsie Janis made this entry: "There's a dear little man we know quite well, Who around our hearts has cast a spell: If he made a mistake you never could tell, For he's a mimic, comedian and acrobat as well."

Another generation will recall "Bill Bailey" as one of the song hits of 1903. The vaudeville team of Girard and Gardner wrote the following in Buster's book on February 27 of that year, while the Three Keatons were playing in Detroit:

"The audience was cold
And we worked twice daily,
Did all we knew, including 'Bill Bailey';
But it was easy for Buster,
And the house laughed gaily
At the smart little man
With the strut of Dan Daly."

Old John L. Predicts

OLD John L. Sullivan wrote in gigantic letters in Buster's album:

"Little Buster, you may be a big Buster some day. May 21, 1903."

Jim Corbett predicted, in the parlance of the ring:

"Buster, you're a knock-out."

Tom Sharkey waxed philosophical and made this entry:

"To my little friend, Buster, from his old friend, Tom Sharkey. And after all, life is but one sweet dream. Let us be blithe and gay, for tomorrow is another day. Yours truly, Thomas J. Good boy!"

Bert Howard didn't know anything about motion pictures when he wrote, back in 1903, at Indianapolis:

"Buster, you will be America's foremost comedian. Read this book forty years from now and see if I am not right."

McIntyre and Heath were responsible for the following:

"Buster, you are the biggest of them all, tho not in size. But for wit you get the prize."

And Digby Bell wrote:

"Be good, Buster, and you'll be eccentric."

At that, Buster ought to be good, in more than one sense. He was born in a church, on November 4, 1895.

The town in which he made his worldly debut isn't even on the map today. A cyclone put it in the missing column, and they've never taken the trouble to rebuild it.

Born in a Cyclone

THE Pickway, Kansas, "that was," was forty miles north of the Oklahoma line, west of Coffeyville, and not far from Cherryvale. Father and Mother Keaton, Joe and Myra, and Harry Houdini, now the famous magician and escape artist, were touring the country with a tent show. On the Saturday night before Buster was born, a wind-storm blew down the tent. While Keaton, Houdini and a few townspeople were trying to get the show house up again, a cyclone hit the community. That was the last anyone ever saw of the tent.

The only clergyman in the village, a Catholic priest, heard of the visitors' plight and of the expected visit of the stork. He volunteered to go for a doctor, and suggested that Joe Keaton bring his wife to the little home next door to the tiny church.

Keaton and Houdini started for the priest's house with Mrs. Keaton at one o'clock Sunday morning. In the darkness they mistook the church for the house, and Mrs. Keaton was taken into the sacristy. There the priest and the doctor found the trouper, and there Buster Keaton was brought into the world.

Buster—altho his name was then Joseph Francis—became a trouper that day and remained one until he went into pictures twenty-one years later. One day when he was about six months old, the lusty youngster demonstrated his tumbling proclivities by falling all the way down-stairs. The mishap failed to injure him, and Houdini exclaimed: "What a Buster!" And that's why the bill-boards today do not read "Joseph Francis Keaton."

How Buster ever arrived at man's estate without crippling himself for life, or worse, has always been a mystery to his family. The boy was continually getting into trouble. He had an advantage over most youngsters in this respect, for the family was forever on the move, and each town presented new adventures—new places to get lost, new ways to get hurt, and new boys to fight.

The Three Keatons

A FEW years later, after the elder Keaton and Houdini had dissolved their tent-show partnership, Buster and his father and mother toured the country as the Three Keatons.

One of the inducements which prompted Buster to try his luck in motion pictures late in 1916, at a salary of forty dollars a week, instead of accepting an offer to headline Shubert's Winter Garden show in New York at several hundred dollars a week, was the prospect of settling in one place for more than two weeks.

Fate again intervened, and Buster wasn't yet ready to settle down. A few months

"How was that, Mama?" he asked. He appeared really concerned about it, too.

"Pretty good, Raymond, but timed a bit slowly, I'd say. Speed it up a little next time."

Ray turned to me.

"Did you get a laugh, neighbor?"

"Sure," I admitted. "I thought it was darned funny."

This was all between-scenes conversation, entirely out of earshot to the rest of the troupe. Eddie Sutherland, who was directing the picture, was discussing a matter of lighting with his cameraman. He called for a retake.

"Another one for Mr. Zukor," he said. "That was fine, folks, but let's speed the tempo up a little this time." And so and so and so—

Frances nudged me.

"Papa will give me a bouquet for that one," she laughed.

"How long has this thing been going on?" I asked her.

"Oh, years and years," she said.

And she told me the story. How in the old trouping days her off-stage laugh developed into constructive criticism that has carried on with the years, which have brought fame to her husband.

"At first there was no motivation behind my off-stage applause beyond the natural admiration of a girl for her sweetheart," she said. "His antics were always funny to me and I'd laugh whether anyone else laughed or not.

"Gradually as we traveled over the country, hungry half the time and wearing diamonds and eating filet mignon the other half, the realization came to me that Raymond was depending on my moral support from off stage. If I was depressed, as I often was in those hectic days, and failed to respond to his act, his humor seemed leaden and his audience would freeze right up on him.

"Then I got it. He was playing to me, off stage, instead of to the crowd out in front. In other words, he was trying to make me laugh and was cheating the people who were paying to see the show. I resolved to hold out my support until he actually made me laugh, as he had when we had first started trouping together. This attitude toward his work I still hold. Now when I laugh, he doesn't feel flattered at all. But my laughter gives him confidence in himself, for he knows that I'm not laughing just to cheer him, but because I am convulsed with the humor of the thing."

Ray once wanted to quit the stage and go to work on a farm.

"You're a good actor, Ray, but you'd be a terrible farmer," Frances told him. "From now on you do the family acting and I'll do the off-stage shouting. And if you don't learn your lines I'll quit you cold. Then you'll starve. What do you think of that?"

"I knew she was right, so I learned my lines and she stuck with me," said Ray. "I could never have made the grade without her."

She has never taken any active part in the direction of his screen work. Her part is all sub-rosa—off stage. But as a favor to him, Ray asks that she be permitted to see the daily "rushes" of the scenes in which he plays. At home they talk it over. And Ray respects her judgment to the last chuckle.

"Frances is a big-hearted gal," Ray has often told me. "But her sense of humor has had quite a strain. And believe me, neighbor, when she laughs at me I'm a riot."

The Telephone at the Centennial

ONE hundred years after the signing of the Declaration of Independence, the infant telephone was first exhibited at the Philadelphia Exposition.

Since the dawn of civilization, mankind had sought some means of communicating over distances which unaided human speech could not bridge. Drums, signal fires, runners, the pony express, and finally the electric telegraph were means to get the message through. It remained for the telephone to convey a speaker's words and tones over thousands of miles.

"My God, it talks!" exclaimed the Emperor of Brazil before a group of scientists at the Philadelphia Exposition, as he recognized the voice of Alexander Graham Bell, demonstrating the new invention.

Today, after a brief half-century, the telephone lines of the Bell System have become the nerves of the nation. The telephone connects citizen with citizen, city with city, state with state for the peace and prosperity of all.

Leases His Own Place

It is a queer line of speculation—to think how, like a partridge, this pure Nordic who originated, I believe, somewhere in Iowa, has found his exact coloration in environment. Perhaps his wife has helped—I dont know.

But Charley loves his English cottage home. Smilingly, but with a certain tightness at the lips, he speaks about his straitened finances, and the joke which was played on him.

Charley had attained great popularity as a star. He had built and furnished this cherished home of his. Then he tried to make his own pictures—artistic pictures— independent pictures. The trust squeezed him—crushed him—flattened him out a helpless midge on the ground. Creditors took his home—like a flash. But they were not quite so cruel as creditors are in moving pictures. They allowed Charley to lease the place—his place—from them, while he began, slowly, painfully, to mend his shattered fortune.

He is working now in a picture called "Paris" for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. But it will be a long time before Charley can buy his cottage back.

CHARLEY is exactly like the china shepherd lad that stands by the door. To have ousted him from his home would have been as cruel a procedure as to dash down the pretty boy from his pedestal.

The shepherd lad has a cocked hat, blue hair, white ruffled collar, a long-tailed coat of mulberry, and tight green knickerbockers with large gold roses all over them. His dainty feet in black pumps are crossed at the ankles and at his feet crouches a long-eared dog.

Morning. The birds singing shrilly in the garden. The hedges smelling like an English lane. The fountains with their chubby cupids that match the chubby cupids on the andirons in the fireplace. Costly, dainty, spicky beauty. Arrogantly cheerful. Maddening really, unless you are a Nordic yourself.

A Borgia Bungalow

THE Countess Domski, being of Polish extraction, selected the American Colonial for her Beverly home. Pola Negri's house is white, high-pillared, and marked by two austere sentinel palms.

The interior frankly discards the Colonial. It is Italian Renaissance. Paintings and hangings in tints of dull wine and dark smoke, dark brocades, tables and chairs carved in the severe rectangular style bequeathed by the papal aristocracy; coffin-like chests that rest on claw feet and ornaments of beaten bronze and brass.

Before the stone fireplace, giving tea to Chaliapin, the mistress might be a Borgia in her dark, sensual beauty. Pola is as decisive a type as the Italian interior of her Colonial house.

Above her fireplace Pola has her own portrait by an expensive portrait painter. But May McAvoy, one of the few who still cling to a home in Hollywood, has hung above hers some Rembrandts purchased in Paris while she was making "Ben Hur." So why should the spirit of Pola be proud?

Moreover, I remember seeing, in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Schenck (Norma Talmadge) a most interesting example of a batik, which seemed unusually right in this conglomerate house. An Aztec warrior caught in a blind canyon, poised to cast his spear at an animal resembling a tiger, which was leaping down upon him from the wall; from behind a rock the tiger's mate slinking out to attack his unprotected rear.

A piece of great spirit. It hangs on the stairway—half way up, where there is a broad landing. Framed by a heavily corded material woven with strands of pure gold. It cost Joe Schenck $10,000 and shows what can be done without recourse to period stuff.

The Schenck Residence

THE Schenck residence is indeed the only house I know in Beverly which does not cling desperately to its period. At best it shows a slight Italian influence on the exterior. Within, it is what a business man and his wife would make it.

The grounds are comfortably modern. A winding cement walk leads to a large canary house. Back of it the dog kennels, and beyond a latticed place full of all kinds of ferns. They hang from the roof and the sides. Creepers are entwined with the lattice walls, weaving a solid pattern in greenery.

To the right the inevitable swimming-pool. Bright awnings—canvas chairs. And tennis-court enclosed in poultry netting, with electric lights so you can play at night.

A practical, comfortable home that in no wise dissembles the tastes of its owners. The radio is not camouflaged as a plumed knight, nor the telephone as a Dresden doll. Joe Schenck's desk is brazenly a desk.

Isn't it possible that after sufficient years have passed some nouveau riche of the day may copy this home as a fine example of twentieth-century American?

The scoundrel collapses eventually and the dancer relents. She dons a couple of golden saucers and several beads and does a very modified Oriental dance before the dying man's eyes.

Of course, all this is just garish drivel in the best style of the overpraised Arlen, who, according to the caustic George Jean Nathan, writes like an overeducated coon. Here you will find a bit of Paris revelry in which the statues come to life. The whole thing is cheap and tawdry.

Dorothy Mackaill is rather better than usual as the girl Consuelo. Personally, I am beginning to revolt at Conway Tearle, who plays a wooden gentleman who loves Consuelo from afar. That forehead with its quizzical uptilt of the eyebrows is palling on me. Tearle hasn't acted in two or three years.

"Devil's Circus" Overpraised

SOME of the metropolitan critics were impressed with Benjamin Christianson's first American film, "The Devil's Circus." To me it was just early Griffith plus a dash of Seastrom pseudo-symbolism.

Christianson is responsible for both the story and the direction. The thing is awkwardly, even crudely, told. The locale is North Europe, probably Germany. A little girl, Mary, comes to the city and is persuaded to go to a disreputable hotel. The persuader is a gangster whose intentions aren't all the censors of Pennsylvania or Kansas might desire. The girl's innocence, however, makes a man of the weakling.

everybody who could get near him as he walked down the aisle. It was one of those occasions that cling to one's memory. Fortunately, the writers did not have to go back that night to give their impressions of the picture.

A New York theater was so crowded on the afternoon Valentino's "The Eagle" was first presented that the newspaper writers had to be escorted to their seats via the stage door. Another unforgettable opening was that of "The Thief of Bagdad," because everybody had to battle their way to the theater lobby, and even Douglas Fairbanks had a hard time in carrying Mary Pickford thru the curious and pressing throng. Morris Gest had gone one better than the usual presentation, for in addition to the great arc lights and periodical flashlights, there was the Arabian, dirge-like music in the lobby and wafted to the sidewalk there came the perfume of incense.

The Rush of Reviewing

It is no wonder that the critics are enthusiastic about an afternoon pre-showing of a picture, for after the evening performance, which finishes, as a rule, well after eleven-thirty, the reviewers have to hurry back to their offices and turn out a carefully written impression of the film.

There is romance and glamor about a great newspaper office just before midnight. Boys are hastening here and there to the call of "copy," and carrying the sheets of paper to the telegraph and city desks. The reporters, with telephones at their elbows, are beating on their typewriters, and the copyreaders, seated around two great semi-circular desks, are absorbed in their work. Cables from all parts of the world and telegrams from many different points of the country are coming in, and shortly before the dead-line every effort is made to send the late stories up to the composing room to catch the first edition. As a rule, the critics of music, the drama and motion pictures do not have to worry themselves about the first edition, but they must have their articles in the second edition, which is from three-quarters of an hour to an hour later than the first. Hence, you will see the critics from the three departments coming into the office, usually in dinner jackets, peeling off their coats and sitting down at typewriters in their respective offices. The programs are before them, and they sit for a while in thought conjuring up the first few sentences and then go ahead with the effort. Sometimes a review may be only eight hundred words, and on other occasions it may be nearly twice that length. It is something you can read very quickly, but an effort which requires painstaking thought to transcribe.

The critic invariably waits in the office to read the proofs of his work, and then he goes home with his mind filled with thoughts of what he has seen. His dreams at times are possibly infinitely more involved and more flighty than any film that has been made, as while he sleeps he may have the heroine of one picture mixed up with the hero of another and the villain of another production turned into a nice young man. And the comedy character may, in this sleeping thought, turn out to be a minister of the Gospel who never slips when he treads on a banana peel.

And then next morning this critic who has written the stuff, and read it on his typewritten sheets and also in proof, glances at the news of the world on the first page and then turns to look at his yarn as it is in the paper. Another review has been written and other pictures to see.

Eighty feet under the paving-stones of Rome, haunted by the togaed ghosts of citizens once buried there, the Bragaglia, he said, is peopled by tall houris—slender, black-eyed, dark-faced, always dressed in white, wearing no stockings, in the most extreme décolletée and the most exotic of make-ups. Item: empurpled eyes.

A rickety, medieval, wrought-iron balcony is woven around the interior. Dark-browed gentlemen carry knives that spring out of the handle. Futuristic paintings deck the time-stained walls.

"Old Ironsides" Sails the Seven Seas Again

And to think the authors had never heard of applied psychology in those days! Applied masculine psychology!

Because, you see, in that hectic day those bold, bad Tripoli pirates had become so terrible and powerful that they were challenging the navies of the world and compelling tribute from them. Oh, but it was a matter of international ridicule when the new struggling independent colony across the Atlantic thought to build a navy and defy them.

Came "Old Ironsides"

BUT that new ship was built of extraordinarily hard wood—wood that later proved impervious to gunshot and earned her the title of "Old Ironsides"—wood so wonderful that the old boat exists today, still capable of restoration to life and romance.

And she had been built on the "expense be damned" theory which the United States Navy has followed ever since, inspiring that famous cry, "Nothing for tribute but millions for defense."

However, for the purposes of the picture she was not yet restored to seaworthy endurance, so the Lasky studio has built a faithful replica of "Old Ironsides." They had the navy's old original plans to work from, lent by the government, and her mainmast stands 217 feet high from the water-line, higher than a twenty-story building!

And she reeks of rope—oh, but there is something so intensely masculine about rope. Even today note the scorn of the reef-knot sailor for the landlubber's "granny." And such mighty ropes were needed for this old sailing frigate that none are made of such dimensions today. Special ropes, nigh thirty inches in circumference, have been specially woven for the purpose, 100,000 pounds of it.

But there was still another difficulty. The race of men who sailed these mighty sailing ships, who "know the ropes," have become extremely rare. So they have been culled one by one from Canada, San Francisco, Baltimore, to man the mimic "Old Ironsides." Of course, there must be two crews—the professional sailors and the actors. But lots of the real sailors will take part as well. Fortunately, several of the actors, like Wally Beery, who owns his own yacht, and George Bancroft, who served six years in the United States Navy, are good seamen, too.

The Baltimore sailors are bringing round the dozen or more old sailing boats that have been searched for and discovered in Eastern ports—ships heavy with mighty sails, huge masts, calling for prodigious skill of seamanship that engine-driven vessels don't demand, all of which will take part in this oh, so masculine, glorious sea-fight in the Mediterranean (off Catalina Island in the Pacific).

Catalina as Salem

JAMES CRUZE himself visited Tripoli to note the landscape, the type of architecture, that its replica on Catalina Island, California, might be faithfully exact. Every tiny detail is compared with geography and history. The old wharf at Salem erected on the Isthmus Bay on Catalina Island is a faithful reproduction of an old print. And here it is interesting to note that Charles Farrell, who plays The Boy in the story, actually lives at Cape Cod, and has haunted old Salem many times in his boyhood and is steeped in its traditions.

The real "Old Ironsides" was built like a racing sloop, a tremendous innovation in naval ships in those days, and designed for speed—speed, which America has lived up to ever since. It was her speed, her seamanship, her tough old hide, that defeated the pirates at Tripoli in 1804 A. D. and started magnificent tradition for the great United States Navy that was to be. Her copper sheathing was made by Paul Revere, and her first flag by Betsy Ross herself.

I have just spent a week-end with the "Old Ironsides" company on that Isthmus end of Catalina Island, which has been transformed for the occasion. Here James Cruze, director, is king. There is an old home, built years ago by an old California family, perched high on a hill. Here King James and the stars of the company are accommodated, with a first-class cook to take care of their precious innards. Swift machines race up and down the perilous winding road at meal-time and bed-time.

Below in an amazing camp created for the purpose, are accommodated all the lesser persons of the cast, the cameramen, electricians, carpenters, plumbers, ships' crews, etc. Their meals are served in a large mess hall—and incidentally their cooking is no less worthy. I ate with both the stars aloft and the crew beneath, and I know.

On Location

KING JAMES wears a bright scarlet coat of the English hunting order during the relaxation period. But for the out-at-sea shots he has provided himself with a pair of violently new seaman's overalls. He is more impressive, either way, than the Admirable Crichton of Barrie's play of that name—when reigning over his island.

Wally Beery keeps in his rascally old bo's'n character most of the time, grinning wickedly thru a week's growth of beard, and from beneath a shaggy, ill-kept wig with one of those funny pigtails. His wide and willowy old pants and the disreputable-looking short coat of the day, and the screamingly funny blob of a sailor cap are his regular attire while on this "location" stunt. He spends all his spare time fishing for tuna, which hadn't bitten to date.

George Bancroft, too, has an amazing growth of his own hair, a weird orang-outang beard, and what we should now consider a child's round straw sailor hat on his head.

Esther Ralston, whose new husband, Mr. Webb, accompanies the party, is droopingly adorable in a long empire gown to her ankles, a queer little poke bonnet, a funny little puffed sleeve coat and a huge muff—but she dons a cute modern sport costume for the evening dinner and the dancing to the company's orchestra afterwards, up in that stylish house aloft on the hill.

For the rest, the island seems peopled with a vast company of amazing ruffians, with a few civilized modern workmen thrown in—for they wear their wild and ancient costumes most of the time, and the men have all grown fierce hair for the picture. One can imagine the emotions of an uninformed visitor to the island upon striking this astonishing-looking band.

But in spite of the hair and the funny pigtail wigs, in spite of the fact that all the picturesque old boats are respectfully and nautically called "she," the whole place reeks of dominating, virile masculinity, looks, listens and smells masculinity. It feels like Eugene O'Neill's earlier days, reeking of hard-boiled, realistic he-man stuff, of John Masefield's raw-meat sea poetry, of Captain Marryat's salty old yarns, of Conrad and McFee.

And this young Ferrell that plays The Ray—he is at once so manly, so young, yet so almost feminine withal. There is just a something reminiscent of Charlie Ray about him, especially in the first scenes there on the New England farm, reading that gentlemen Adventurers' appeal

A Costly Venture

Which reminds us of Charlie Ray's "Courtship of Miles Standish" and the tremendous hopes (and wealth) he expended on that faithful reproduction of the Mayflower, which proved such a mournful failure! It ought to have been a success, but somehow just missed it. I don't believe "Old Ironsides" is going to miss a thing. It is going to cost like the very dickens, but I think they know what they are doing.

A wonderful contrivance has been concocted for the placing of the cameras out beyond the stern of the boats, for getting the scenes out at sea of every bit of wildly exciting action. It is a built-out scaffolding equipped with swinging weights that keep the camera erect no matter how much the boats rock—and gosh, how those old sailing vessels can rock!

There are almost no subtitles in the film and, because the actors bear their own names in the story, there will be few screen credits necessary. But I suspect the world is going to be allowed to know that Harry Carr conceived it, James Cruze directed it, and the Lasky Studio produced it—and that it is all about that selfsame dear "Old Ironsides" which Secretary Wilbur of the United States Navy is going to have restored if the school children's pennies come in bountifully enough.

Ah, yes, and a whispered confidence. If those pennies do lack being sufficient for the great purpose, you can wager your bottom dollar that the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation will make up the deficit. But that, of course, is sub rosa. It did not prevent my letting my boys take their pennies to school.

it can be estimated at least at $100,000 a picture. Henry King is receiving this figure for each of his productions. George Fitzmaurice gets $75,000 a picture. Ernst Lubitsch receives $60,000, altho the Warner Brothers have asked $100,000 to loan him. Eric von Stroheim was getting $15,000 a picture when he made "The Merry Widow." Now he has climbed to $50,000 a production. What a difference one hit makes!

King Vidor is receiving considerably in excess of $2,500 per week since the hit of "The Big Parade." Clarence Brown is climbing past the $2,500 figure. James Cruze gets $8,000 a week and has received this ever since the success of "The Covered Wagon." Sidney Olcott was getting $3,700 from Famous Players. He is now receiving $2,500 from Inspiration Pictures. Robert Vignola gets $2,500. So, too, does Monta Bell and Malcolm St. Claire. Harry Pollard receives $2,000. William Seiter gets $1,500. Alan Dwan runs to $60,000 a picture, plus a bonus for speed. Dimitri Buchowetzki gets $30,000.

A year ago, when he left Famous Players-Lasky, Cecil De Mille was one of the big ten money-makers. As director-general of his own producing organization, it is doubtful if he made an equal amount. It costs a great sum of money to launch a new organization. This coming year we wouldn't be surprised to see De Mille return to the big money.

observed, as she led the way over flagstones set in the velvet grass.

They succeeded. It is like Keats' garden:

"Where the daisies are rose-scented

Began as a Vamp

WE were back on the daffodil yellow of the twin sofas that face each other across the hearth, talking about the beginning of pictures for her. She entered the magic country by way of a beauty contest; her first important picture was Elinor Glyn's "Six Days," her first big success, "Black Oxen."

"I began as a vamp," she remembered, with a glint of amusement in her blue-green eyes. "I used to die tragic deaths in order that the virtuoso might triumph. One of those deaths came near being actual.

"We were in Truckee, in a deep snow. My death was to occur on a toboggan on which the villain carried me to a watery grave under the ice. First, they wanted to get close-ups showing my terror when I realized his purpose; so director, actors and cameras were all crowded on the sled, which was attached by a rope to a team that was to pull us to the top of the slide.

"The rope broke when we had almost reached the top and we went careering down backwards. How we stopped I don't know, but we did stop, and presently the villain and I were on the toboggan together headed for the river far below. The plan was to stop before we reached the river and let doubles do the crashing thru the ice, but plans are apparently nothing in a toboggan's life. It was the villain and I who went crashing thru the ice, and we were half-drowned when they fished us out again!

"But I was much more frightened one day in Honolulu when I was out surfing and the native boys began to shout, 'A shark! A shark!'

"I can stay up in deep water, but I don't swim well enough to get anywhere. In all the hullabaloo over the shark, I swam steadily and got about ten feet in half an hour. Then the boys realized I was terrified and took me to shore on a surf-boat.

"He won't touch us—he wants white meat! they kept saying, but that didn't help me a bit. I was white meat!"

Tolerant Husbands

IT was just after the making of "Black Oxen" that Miss Griffith changed her name in private life to Mrs. Walter Morosco, but there has never been any question of giving up her career.

"With some husbands, pursuing an absorbing occupation might be disastrous," she admitted, "but a woman with an ambition should be careful to select a man who has a tolerant attitude toward her career. It sometimes seems to me, too, that it is well not to let a man feel that a woman is absolutely dependent upon him."

A truly royal way to look at it!

Royal, too, is Miss Griffith in her choice of favored colors. She loves purples in all their shades, because "they make me feel so regal.

"Colors affect most of us, I think. I remember in one picture I made the director had all the sets in gray. At first I thought it rather restful, but before the picture was finished we were all dragging our feet and feeling depressed and dispirited.

"Tatiana is to 'blossom in purple and red.' In spite of hating to leave my house, I'm going to love doing her. I've always had a little secret hope that after all they'd find out she wasn't murdered. I wouldn't be surprised even now. . . ."

That Personal Appearance

THE girl who is going to create Tatiana made her first personal appearance in Elizabeth, New Jersey, when she was very new to the screen. She had bought a new dress for the affair, her very first smart gown, and she had spent nervous hours before the glass assuring herself that she knew exactly how to wear it.

The great moment came. The manager of the theater went before the curtain and told the audience about the young actress who had come there to meet them, etc., at rather greater length than seemed necessary to the girl who waited in the wings. Then he came off, handed her on, went to the switchboard with the intention of increasing the footlight power, and turned them off instead. The lights in the audience went on and from the shadowed stage Corinne Griffith made her little speech to what seemed like ten thousand faces—the very smart gown and the beautiful girl inside it nothing but a blur and a voice in the dark.

But I think that with only the clue of her voice it should not be hard to imagine Hollywood's real princess.

The Answer Man

October 26, 1914. His right name is Edward Gibson and not Hoot. Baby Peggy was born October 26, 1918. Yes, it would be fine to have her play opposite Jackie Coogan.

A. M. K.—Well, I guess someone evidently was playing a joke on you. The picture is very good-looking, and I wish you luck on the screen.

DOROTHY M.—No, I won't desert you—I'm always on the ship. Adelina Patti was born in Madrid, Spain, in 1843, but was of Italian extraction. Her debut took place in London in 1861 and she lived at Craig Nos Castle, Wales. She never appeared in pictures. Alice Joyce is playing in "Beau Geste." She is one of the old-timers and is holding on very well indeed.

LEON B.—I have the list of stars you wish gallery pictures of and shall send them along to our editor.

YOUNGS-HONOLULU.—Your letter was great. You say Miss Windsor is quite neat and shockingly smart. Only the unwise claim to be wise. The wise are content otherwise. (Continued on page 89)

They Told Buster to Stick to It

after Keaton had begun to make a name for himself in Hollywood, America entered the World War. Joining the infantry, he went to France and served as a private until the Armistice, after which he was detailed to help entertain the troops, remaining abroad for five months following the end of hostilities.

Finally returning from France, Buster spent some time in a New York hospital. His hearing had been affected, and when Joseph M. Schenck, producer of the pictures in which Buster had appeared, visited the hospital to tell the young comedian that a job awaited him in Hollywood, the conversation had to be carried on in writing.

Physicians soon restored Buster to normal; he went back to the Pacific Coast, played in a couple of two-reel comedies, and then was starred in feature-length pictures.

The rest is recent history. Even his severest critic will admit he "stuck to it and became a great comedian."

Flash Backs

idiot when his daughter went away to the wicked city, and it might have had poignancy if Scastrom hadn't cluttered it up with bunk symbolism and turgid direction. These two faults paralyzed the acting. The result was cardboard pathos.

DIXIE.—Last I heard of Ivo Novello he was playing in England. Richard Dix is at the Famous Players Studio, Astoria, Long Island. No, he is not married. Dolores Costello is very popular. I remember her, too, when she was a little girl.

ELSIE C., LONDON.—So you are a stenographer and want to come to New York. I'm afraid I can't help you. Jackie Coogan is coming back in the rôle of a jockey in an exciting and thrilling race-horse drama. He is to have his own "grown-up" leading lady and has had his hair cut like a real boy's.

MARY C. K.—You ask, why are ships called she? Well, because they always keep a man on the lookout. William Boyd is at the Cecil de Mille Studios, Culver City, California. Lloyd Hughes was born October 21, 1899. He is six feet, 155 pounds and has brown hair and gray eyes.

KATIE C.—So you are a baseball fan. So am I. Did you see what the Dodgers did to the Giants in the opening game? William Collier, Jr., is with Famous Players-Lasky, 1520 Vine Street, Los Angeles, California. Pola Negri's picture, "Naughty Cinderella," will be released as "Good But Naughty."

JOHN B., NEW HAVEN.—Sorry, but I haven't any information about Mickey McBan. You might consult Movic, Jr., in Motion Picture Magazine.

BLUE JAY.—Ruth Roland is not playing in pictures right now. Thackeray is the well-known English novelist who signed himself Michael Angelo Titmarsh. I should say Nita Naldi is very tall—she is over five foot eight.

She Wants to Succeed

"At last I was sent for. Mr. Brewster was sitting at his desk. He didn't look up. He said: 'Well, I guess you win!' I nearly fainted.

"Business was bad that year and most of the companies weren't working. My prize was to be a contract for one picture and we had a hard time finding the picture. At last, Christy Cabanne said he'd use me as a little sister in a picture he was making. They wrote the part in and I went over.

"I didn't know how to make up. I'd always been made up for the tests. The girls I dressed with wouldn't show me. 'Find out for yourself, the way we did,' they said. I was dark and they were fair and I imitated what I saw them do and was all wrong. The director swore at me. I sat around the set for a week, doing nothing. Then I had three days' work and my part was over.

"When the picture was shown, I took two girls I'd gone to school with to see it. I'd been cut out! It nearly broke my heart. 'I thought you were in it,' they kept saying. . . .

"Nothing to do then but go back to school. I couldn't stand it. I made myself sick worrying about it and I suppose I lost weight—and besides, I grew a little.

Then "Down to the Sea"

"FINALLY Elmer Clifton, about to start on 'Down to the Sea in Ships,' happened to see one of my test stills. He wanted a tomboy type of girl to do a part in the picture. They called me up and told me to come over.

"Well, I didn't know what they wanted. I'd tried so long and I had heard people say I was too young and too short all the time. So I wore a dress I'd borrowed from somebody a lot older, fixed my hair sort of sophisticated and put on a lot of make-up.

"When the man saw me he said: 'You're older than I expected—you're too old for the part.' I could have cried. I said: 'I'm not sixteen,' but he didn't believe it.

"At last he said he'd send me up to New England for two weeks at fifty dollars. If I made good, I could stay. I was there thirteen weeks.

"There's where luck came in. It turned out to be a good picture; it ran twenty-two weeks at the Cameo Theater and I got wonderful notices. If it had been a flop, I might have been in Brooklyn today."

Next, "Black Oxen"

THE flapper in "Black Oxen" gave Clara her first big chance. She was a sensation. Her triumph in that picture made B. P. Schulberg renew the five-year contract he had been on the point of canceling. But the sparkling little ingénue represented an investment. An investment must be profitable. Clara had to make a picture in twelve days—very nearly thirty pictures a year.

"I don't blame them for getting their money's worth, but it made it hard to think out the parts—I hadn't time—and I was going back—until 'Kiss Me Again' came along. Lubitsch was a godsend. I learned so much.

"Then our coming to Lasky meant a lot to me. Good directors are what I need.

I want to learn and you can't learn from a poor director. I've just finished my first emotional part in 'The Runaway.' It was better than a college course.

"I always read what the critics say. If they don't like me, I always figure that it might be true and I see that it doesn't happen again. I sit in the theaters where my pictures are showing and listen to what people say. If four women say 'I don't like her hair that way' or 'She's too tough,' and two say it's all right, I take what the four say and remember it for my next scene.

"I study my pictures and other girls' pictures to see how to get sympathy. If people don't like you, you won't get on. In the stage-play, 'Dancing Mothers,' I saw that the girl got no sympathy because she played her drinking and smoking scenes with a sort of 'This is my business—I have a right to do as I like and I'll do it' air. I played her as a girl out for a new adventure—sort of kiddish folly—'I'm just having fun' idea. When I said mean things I tried to put over the idea with a look after I'd said the thing: 'Oh, why did I say that? I didn't really mean it.'"

The "Little Roughneck"

THE "little roughneck" has her first two weeks' vacation in years. Imagine how she spends it?

She has a French teacher and a Spanish instructor—from each of whom she learns the desired language in conversation as she hikes over the hills of her home canyon. She rides, too.

Exercise keeps her slim—for her ambition. She never wears a hat—her hair must be kept in good condition—for her ambition. She reads almost feverishly. She must catch up with lost education—for her ambition!

She hasn't time to bother with love now.

"I don't see how that silly rumor about Donald Keith and me ever started," she cried, bouncing up on the cushions, her curls flying like banners about the rose of her face. "We played together in New York and I suppose somebody thought it would be good publicity. We didn't know a thing about it until Donald was called on long distance by the girl he's engaged to marry. She thought he had been deceiving her. The boy I'd been going with here had a hemorrhage when he heard it.

"I used to think I'd marry outside the profession when the time came, but I've changed my mind. They don't understand. They're jealous of the men you play with and they don't believe it when you are late because you have to work at night. And when it comes to a love scene—

"When I'm working with a man in a love scene, I never think of him as a person. He's just a prop I'm using. I am conscious of the camera, the angle of my face, the lighting and my chance of getting sympathy—his kiss might as well be a sponge in a bathtub sequence.

"If it comes to it some day, I'll take an actor, a producer or a director. They know a screen lover is just so many inches of skin and pounds of bone.

"I'm never going to give up the screen. I have to have an outlet for all this energy. I can pour it into pictures—and I love pictures! You wait!"

The top of the heap seems to be waiting, too, expectantly. I think it won't have to wait very long.

I could not, much as I deplored the fact, expect them to do anything different. But I told them what I thought of the mis-called "Super-Screen" theater. I don't know why it is called such—can anyone tell me? In Boston it is not "Super-Screen" in any sense but is merely a slightly different form, perhaps at the "State"—for instance, of the usual variety show. I wish to add that the nine houses I have mentioned are ones I know as having been in them. There are many more in other places in Greater Boston that I would never get to. Of course, I have not mentioned any of the legitimate stage theaters, of which there are a number. At present two of them are showing "The Big Parade" and "Stella Dallas" respectively, at higher than usual movie prices, a custom prevalent for the first showing of bigger productions. This policy is entirely outside my argument, as you will understand.

What can we do to preserve the high standard of motion pictures and help to make the work, money, time expended and talent of directors, producers and actors worth while?

It all lies in that nutshell and it is sincerely to be hoped that some one will find a way out.

I would like to broadcast my sentiments. Perhaps CLASSIC, which is a movie magazine I admire and rely upon, will publish some of my ideas. In my humble opinion, we can't start our propaganda too soon!

Very sincerely,
E. M. S.,
Brookline, Massachusetts.

Mary gets work in a circus and becomes an aerialist. There is a villainous lion-tamer who seduces the girl. The man's wife shifts the mechanism of a trapeze and Mary falls from the top of the circus arena into the lion's cage. She is saved, but the fall cripples her.

The war comes. The boy, Carl, is in the German army. With the return of peace he searches for Mary, finally finding her. Then he starts out to wreak vengeance upon her betrayer. The lion-tamer, however, has been blinded in the war and is now a penniless peddler. So Carl gives up his ideas of vengeance. He returns to Mary on Christmas Eve and—lo—she can walk. A miracle has occurred.

This is obviously a story belonging to the past generation of pictures. If an unknown sent it to a producer, he would get it back instantly. But because the story comes to town decked out with what we call the Continental treatment and plus a dash of symbolism, the critics look upon it as something to be praised.

There are moments of effectiveness, particularly when Carl finds Mary after the searing years of the war. This is because of the admirable acting of Norma Shearer and Charles Emmett Mack. Both these players are excellent thruout "The Devil's Circus." But if there is any worse screen acting than that of Carmel Myers as the lion tamer's jealous wife, I want to be warned in time to avoid it.

What Does it Cost to go Into the Movies?

IS the motion picture profession a paying one for the beginner? Is it possible for a young man or young woman to become self-supporting by doing "extra" work? How much financial capital should an ambitious beginner have in order to test his or her talents in the movie studios?

Mignon Rittenhouse, an experienced newspaper writer, has investigated the working conditions in the New York studios. She has made a study of the thousands of "extra" players in and around New York who are trying to make a living from the movies.

In the July issue of MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, Miss Rittenhouse will tell you all about the conditions that surround "extra" work in New York. It is a fair, impartial survey, written by a girl who knows her subject intimately.

Be sure to read Miss Rittenhouse's article in the July issue of MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

How Do They Become Stars?

What is the trick of personality that lifts one actor above another in the race for fame? Why are some players popular for years while others enjoy only a brief period of fame? What are the new styles in favorites? Jesse L. Lasky, vice-president of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, talks about this starring problem, as it is viewed by the business men of the companies, in the July issue of MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

More About Jewels

You have enjoyed "Twinkle, Twinkle, Little Star," by Holmer Little in this issue of MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE. Mrs. Little will continue to write about this fascinating subject in our July issue. Watch for her article next month. It tells you about the jewels owned by Marion Davies, Norma Talmadge, Aileen Pringle and May McAvoy.

And Also

More of Eugene V. Brewster's "Impressions of Hollywood," will appear in our July issue. And there is a fascinating story on Screen Tests, written by Selma Robinson. Sara Redway and Laurence Reid have contributed humorous articles.

Every-day magic

CHAIRS that flop into beds . . . bags that suck up dirt . . . tiny ticking things that count all day long for you. Daylight any night just by pushing a button. A stream that never stops till you turn off a faucet. Any voice you want, talking to you from a cage on your desk or wall. Actions of yesterday, of people miles away, going on on a curtain before you. Stilled throats singing to you from discs; distant throats singing to you from nothing!

Uncanny, daily magic—this, due to national advertising. Advertisements have given you flashlights, telephones, typewriters, automobiles, cold creams, motion pictures. They have given you new eyes, new ears, new hands, new feet, new faces, new emotions. They have urged such wide use, so lowered prices, that almost wishes are autos, almost beggars can ride. Through advertisements you've laid down the shovel and the hoe. You can buy a whole harvest ready-to-eat in cans. You've hung up the fiddle and the bow, for a radio. There's little old-time work left in this age of amazing short-cuts.

CASHMERE

BOUQUET

Close-up of a velvet smooth skin. No "age-lines" or coarse pores

The lines and coarse pores, worse than birthdays to bet a woman's age.

Now—This fine "hard-milled" soap keeps your skin smooth · fragrant · youthful

Look closely at an exquisite complexion—the kind you'd wish for if you had a fairy god-mother. Notice its clean, fine texture, delicate as the petals of a flower. Pores are practically invisible.

The Safest Beauty Treatment

Cleanliness is the surest way to enviable skin. But cleanliness is not mere application of soap and water. Care in the soap you use is most important.

Choose Cashmere Bouquet as the soap for your face and hands. It is "hard-milled," which means the cake is hard and firm—not the list bit sudy. With Cashmere Bouquet only enough soap penetrates the pores to cleanse them. Thus no soap stays in the pores. It all dissolves bringing dust and dirt out with it, leaving the pores as nature meant them to be.

Expert dermatologists, physicians who know all about skin treatments, say that water and the right soap should be used every day to keep the skin smooth and youthful.

Cashmere Bouquet is the right soap. Its fragrant lather is so gentle, so cleansing, that it fairly caresses your skin and leaves it soft and lovely.

We wish you could see the careful special processes which make Cashmere Bouquet so safe for your daily use. Before this "hard-milled" cake is ready for you it is pressed into almost marble firmness. Secret essence are added to give that indescribable fragrance that prompts so many to lay a cake of Cashmere Bouquet among their choicest silks and other fabric treasures.

But let's get back to the subject of Cashmere Bouquet and your skin.

Try this Treatment— Watch Results

Wet the face with warm water. Work up a thick Cashmere Bouquet lather. Massage this lather into the skin with the fingertips until the skin feels refreshed and alive. Rinse in warm water. Then a dash of cold water. Pat the face dry with a soft towel. If the skin is inclined to be dry, rub in a little Colgate's Charmis Cold Cream. Other beauty secrets in booklet.

Gloria Swanson's Own Defense of Herself

Will others he meets outrival you in natural charm?

The allure of natural skin beauty, as thousands will tell you, follows a simple, daily care

PALMOLIVE is a beauty soap made solely for one purpose; to foster good complexions.

In France, home of cosmetics, it has supplanted French soaps by the score. In beauty-wise Paris, Palmolive is the "imported" soap.

Blended of cosmetic oils, famous since the days of Cleopatra, Palmolive is made to be used freely; on the skin.

Remember these facts when tempted to risk an unproved soap on your skin.

TO be charming today, one strives for natural beauty. All of modern beauty culture is directed to that end.

Every day, on every side, one sees the result . . . beauty that stands in contrast to the artificial allure of yesterday.

Skin care has become a simple matter, with cleanliness and healthfully open pores its basis. Natural beauty thus is safeguarded and protected.

The rule is one anyone can follow with little effort or bother . . . just the daily use of the soothing lather of olive and palm oils as embodied in Palmolive.

Natural beauty . . . the daily care that fosters it is this:

Wash your face gently with soothing Palmolive. Then massage it softly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly, first with warm water then with cold. If your skin is inclined to dry, apply a touch of good cold cream—that is all. Do this regularly, and particularly the evening.

Use powder and rouge if you wish. But never leave them on over night. They clog the pores, often enlarge them. Blackheads and disfigurements often follow. They must be washed away.

Avoid this mistake

Do not use ordinary soaps in the treatment given above. Do not think any green soap or represented as of olive and palm oils, the same as Palmolive.

And it costs but 10c the cake!—so little that millions let it do for their bodies what it does for their faces. Obtain a cake today. Then note what an amazing difference one week makes.

You, Too, Can Realize Your Dreams

By Developing a Strong Rich Voice

More than 20,000 men and women all over the country have developed powerful, beautiful voices by Physical Voice Culture. You, too, can build up a strong, magnetic, compelling voice that will be the marvel of your friends, and your key to success and fame.

Read the letters on this page from men and women who have made their dreams come true by this wonderful, scientific method of voice culture. You can continue your present occupation and mode of life while you study in your own home—and the cost is nominal—only a very small amount each month as you study.

100% Improvement Guaranteed

It makes no difference whether you wish to improve your voice for your own pleasure or for professional singing. The man or woman singing in the home—the opera or concert singer—the choir singer—all can improve their voices 100%, at the very least, by Physical Voice Culture.

We absolutely guarantee 100% improvement or your tuition will be gladly refunded. You alone are to be the judge.

Gives Physical Voice Culture Credit for Grand Opera Voice

Each 24 hours brings me a stronger and better hold on my voice. I feel like telling you of it each day when I think back to six years ago when catarrh had just about finished my hearing and voice. I joined the Los Angeles Opera Company this Spring and we will have five Operas ready in September. It is really pathetic to see the star pupils from the great voice masters try for a place in the Company. Some very pretty, but weak, palate attacks, throat and lip attacks. I work hard all day and your silent exercises are a wonderful rest.—Bert Longtre.

Harry Lompierre Finds the "Right Way"

I wish to give credit where credit is due. The past twelve years have been spent in professional singing.

Believing that I had at last found "the right way," I cancelled an entire season's bookings to apply myself diligently to your idea.

Today my voice is completely new. Formerly, I could sing only a fair "F" (fifth line). Now I can sing high "B" flat, with a rich, resonant, manly tone.—Harry Lompierre.

Church Singer Delights Congregation

I cannot help but say "Thank God" for everything you have done for me. As I sang in church yesterday people turned to see who was singing.

I hope you will always think of me as one who has made a big success in the work I chose to do.—Carolyn Baker.

For obvious reasons the names signed to these letters have been changed. But the letters are all true and the real names of writers will be sent on request.

Singer Triumphs Over Discouragement

Did you think one year ago that I would now be singing as high as high "C"? I am very sure that I didn't.

I often think of that hopeless first letter I wrote to you and I want to thank you for the help you have given me and especially for the cheering letters at the beginning when I needed boosting along the worst way.

Hoping that you will believe me to be ever your grateful friend.—Mrs. Mary Brown.

CLASSIC'S Late News PAGE

COSMOPOLITAN will film a motion picture based upon Beatrice Fairfax's "Advice to the Lovelorn."

Cecil B. De Mille liked H. B. Warner's acting in "Silence" so much that he signed him for three years.

Mary Philbin engaged to play the feminine lead in "The Man Who Laughs," based upon Victor Hugo's story, "L'Homme Qui Rit."

Gaston Glass arrived in New York to play opposite Dorothy Mackaill and Jack Mulhall in First National's "Subway Sadie."

Lillian Gish's mother has so improved in health that the star will return from England to begin work on "Annie Laurie," which will be made in Hollywood. John Robertson will direct. It is possible that Owen Moore will be Lillian's leading man.

May McAvoy has been signed to play the feminine lead in "The First Brigade," opposite Charles Ray. The film will be a Metro-Goldwyn special and will be built around the life of a fireman. H. B. Warner is also in the cast.

Norma Shearer's next starring picture is "Upstage," a story of the footlights. Monta Bell will handle the megaphone.

Marion Davies has decided to star in a screen version of "The Miracle," playing the rôle that Lady Diana Manners created on the stage. Due to her present production schedule, Miss Davies will not start work on "The Miracle" for quite a while.

Premier Mussolini received Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford in a half-hour audience at the Chigi Palace in Rome—and expressed his admiration for the stars and the movies.

William Haines signed for the romantic lead in "Tell It to the Marines," the George Hill production which will star Lon Chaney in the rôle of a leather-neck sergeant.

"The Show-Off," from the George Kelly play of the same name, has been started at the Paramount Eastern studio under the direction of Mal St. Clair. Ford Sterling will be featured and Gregory Kelly who has played leading rôles in many stage successes has been added to the cast. There is a rumor that if his work registers O. K. in this film he will probably be given the rôle of Clyde Griffiths in Dreiser's "An American Tragedy," assuming that the novel will be produced.

Lloyd Bacon, son of the late Frank Bacon of "Lightnin'" fame, has been signed as a director by Warner Brothers. His first production will be "Broken Hearts of Hollywood," which will feature Louise Dresser, whose Goose Woman has made her one of the most-sought-after character women in recent years.

Eric Pommer, European director, is on his way to Hollywood to take charge of Pola Negri pictures. Pommer is the producer of "The Last Laugh," "Siegfried," "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," and several other pictures which have never been shown in America.

Louise Brooks selected to play title rôle in the Ziegfeld production, "Glorifying the American Girl." Edward Sutherland, who will direct, is busy assembling a cast which will include William Collier, Jr.

Eddie Cantor, the comedian, will put "Kid Boots" on the screen. Lawrence Gray will have the juvenile rôle in the film while the leading feminine rôles will be enacted by Clara Bow and Esther Ralston.

Having recovered from her illness, Gloria Swanson has returned to work on "Fine Manners."

Glenn Hunter to return to screen in "The Romance of a Million Dollars." Jacqueline Logan will play the heroine. Tom Terriss will direct.

Harrison Ford is now a featured player for Metropolitan productions. His first rôle will be that of "The Nervous Wreck," an adaptation of the successful play of last season.

"For Alimony Only" is the title of a new Leatrice Joy film which William de Mille will direct as his first effort on joining brother Cecil in the independent field. Clive Brook will appear opposite the star.

Evelyn Brent, who has been waiting for a suitable story, has been rewarded with "The Flame of the Argentine."

LAST MINUTE REVIEW

"Aloma of the South Seas"

ASIDE from the personality and talent of Gilda Gray so capably expressed in her film début, this picture hardly comes up to the mark. As a play it didn't create any emphatic impression—and transferred to the screen it doesn't manage to be very sustaining because of the absence of dramatic movement and suspense.

As a result, its appeal rests entirely with the characterization and the settings. The director, Maurice Tourneur, took the company to Porto Rico, and having a good photographic eye he succeeded in capturing some beautiful exteriors. The breakers rolling in on the shores, the expanse of foliage and the atmosphere of Nature in her most generous mood—all of these lend a pictorial quality which compensates somewhat for the shortcomings of the plot.

The idea is simply a romance of a native South Sea maiden who grows to love a broken-hearted American—the latter exiling himself in order to find solace for his unhappiness. There is a native youth who has figured as Aloma's lover up to the arrival of the American. When other white trespassers interfere, the brown-skin boy suffers them to be captured by sharks—who prefer white meat in place of dark. And thus William Powell, who had caused the other American's tragic romance, is exterminated. The girl who had innocently responded to the villain visits the isle and becomes reconciled to the unhappy youth—while Aloma turns again to the brown man.

The story is feeble, is always obvious and is minus any dramatic punch. And aside from Miss Gray, Warner Baxter as the native youth, and Harry Morey as a rough Yankee, the cast has not been well selected. Percy Marmont, usually restrained in his acting, is allowed to overemphasize his rôle. The picture is wholly Gilda Gray's and she makes the heroine a whimsical, wistful character. Her South Sea dance electrifies the audience and her romantic moments are touched with sympathy and understanding. Inasmuch as her acting registers a success, she needs a story with a bigger "kick" in it than this conventional yarn.

THEY SAY—

A Practical Woman's Practical Husband Enjoys the Romantic Actors

Editor, CLASSIC:

In Edwin Meyer's letter appearing in the May CLASSIC, he revealed the reaction of "every-day" men to specific men players of our films today and to women players en masse. I cannot help but believe that Mr. Meyers is too sweeping in his statements. I shall use my husband as one example. He is the most practical of men without pretense or affectations whatsoever. His friends include business men, lawyers, doctors—yes, and newspaper men! (He has no friends of the Latin type who are spoken of as "sheiks" by Mr. Meyers.) He is completely absorbed in the unromantic and very unidealistic business of buying and selling cement. Pages and pages of his kodak books are filled with pictures of cement roads and bridges. I am positive that he would immediately be included in the category of every-day men. He even resembles Conway Tearle to a remarkable degree in features, coloring and physique, while his mannerisms are much like those of Milton Sills'. These are actual facts and are not manufactured to make them fit in with Mr. Meyers' words as to "doubles."

Strange to relate, Tearle's presence in a picture interests my husband not at all, in fact, he is thoroly bored sitting thru the type of pictures that Tearle, Sills or Meighan is seen in. His greatest pleasure is in costume pictures of olden times and in foreign countries. He was delighted with "Monsieur Beaucaire" with Valentino, and "Scaramouche" with Novarro. In fact, he spoke of the natural grace and ease of these two so-called "sheiks." It really would seem more logical that the "every-day" type of man could forget his humdrum business cares by seeing on the screen types of men who did not remind him of his business associates.

The case of my husband is not as uppermost in my mind tho as is the simple fact that America is and has been a great Melting Pot. There is a large group of American men—yes, "every-day" men—whose ancestors were of the warm-blooded races. Ah, so we need Melting Pot screen heroes, the Valentinos and Novarros, as well as the Meighans and Tearles.

Mr. Meyers confesses that the men want the women players of the screen to be "exotic, different, strange and mysterious." And he pokes fun at the feminine movie goers for enjoying the "sheik" type of hero. Well, you know we women—including "every-day" women—want the men players of the screen to be "exotic, different, strange and mysterious!!"

However, I fully agree with Mr. Meyers regarding Mae Murray's pout.

MRS. A. STILES,
Minneapolis, Minn.

Needed—Less Bunk and More Realities

Editor, CLASSIC:

Being a firm believer in the efficacy of criticism in obtaining results in any field of endeavor (including filmdom), I take this opportunity of telling you that you have adopted the right method in making your criticisms in an outspoken manner; there are times when gentleness availeth not.

My abode is in a town of 2,000 inhabitants, more than one hundred miles from our railway point. The sole source of amusement for one who attends neither dances nor parties, and I am in that class, is the local movie house which gives two shows on six nights every week. I have been a patron of the movies for the past twenty years, yet I do not attend six nights a week here. The reason of this is that each week we have what is locally known as "howler nights"—nights on which the audience consists mainly of children and two-thirds grown hoodlums who howl their heads off at the unspeakable silly heroics and antics of dude-glove, Main-Street cowboys and gunmen who lay out their enemies in lots of dozens and pile 'em up in tiers. I and many others go to the movies for entertainment and relaxation, and not to be annoyed by howling dervishes.

Of course, there are Western pictures which are masterpieces of the films, and there are screen players who are master artists in the portrayal of Western characters of both old and modern days. One need think only of "The Covered Wagon," "North of 36," "The Pony Express," and of Jack Holt, Bill Hart, Noah and Wallace Beery, Ernest Torrence, Lois Wilson, Betty Compson, Billie Dove, to be convinced that the story of the West can be, has been, presented in an intelligent manner on the screen.

Recently a Western, a very good one, was presented here two nights. The manager of the local movie house told me that this picture, "Wild Horse Mesa," took in barely enough to pay expenses.

Yet it was a splendid film, with three of the major stars—Jack Holt, Noah Beery, Billie Dove—in the leading rôles. Never have I seen Billie Dove play with greater loveliness and sincerity (and I have often seen her on the screen, sometimes in plays worthy her great talent and sometimes in plays unworthy); Jack Holt was at his best, and Noah Beery played the villain so realistically that an old lady sitting beside me remarked, as the Indian was aiming his rifle at the fleeing Noah: "Oh, dear, he'll miss that devil." I saw the play both nights, and enjoyed it as much the second night as I did the first. Yet the play lacked deserved patronage here; you see, it was above the heads of the hokum-loving beholders of the cheap bunk termed "Westerns."

I am strong in the faith that the movies will attain a higher level of uniform excellence. The consummation of that wish may be slow in arriving, but it will come. And when it does arrive I hope that the villain-devastating, dude-glove, chasm-leaping, smirking abominations masquerading as portrayals of the Western character will be scarcer than feathers on the back of a newly hatched rainbow trout. Improvement in the movies necessitates elimination of bunk, and the abominations mentioned are just that—bunk.

There are other features now prevailing in filmdom which will not be missed when they disappear. One of these is the carrying and caressing of pet dogs, monkeys, cats, and other four-footed, pampered, flea-harboring pests. Audiences are not interested in pooches and simians. If it is proper to carry them about in ordinary plays, then it would have been proper for Estelle Taylor to have carried a pup or a monkey around while playing in the "Ten Commandments," and hand him over to Theodore Roberts now and then to hold, while he was portraying Moses. At that it would have been an event of note to have seen the grim face of Theodore Roberts if this had happened. It is a certainty not many of the commandments would have remained intact.

Often have I thought of some portrayals on the screen I would like to see. Would like to see Noah and Wallace Beery in a play surrounded by children and flowers, peace, not a gun or a cartridge-belt in sight; would like to see Betty Compson, Lois Wilson and Billie Dove in more of the "home-spun" characters they know so blessedly well to depict; would like to see Jack Holt, Ernest Torrence, Bill Hart, in more of their characteristic stuff; would like to see the inane so-called comedies used as openers displaced by two-reel short stories of the screen; would like to see a real screen play based on the Spanish-American War (that war which is lost in the memory of most people); would like to see more of real life realistically depicted on the

ALICE JOYCE

In many ways Richard Dix's life story parallels that of Harold Lloyd. Like Lloyd, his rise in popularity has been steady, slow and sane. He made no sudden success in a big, spectacular picture.

Like Lloyd, his work has been consistently good and consistently satisfying also. His career has been a steady record of improvement. Also, like Lloyd, he has no enemies—only friends. Stars may be unmade by their enemies within the business. Neither Dix nor Lloyd has anyone to fear.

He's Elected!

By CAROL WHITE

may be unmade by their enemies within the business. Neither Dix nor Lloyd has anyone to fear.

The story of Richard Dix's rise is an undramatic, unspectacular, but pleasant record of achievement. He was born in St. Paul of well-to-do parents. He graduated from the St. Paul Central High School and then attended the University of Minnesota for one year.

Almost a Surgeon

DIX's father wanted him to be a surgeon, but the boy was mostly interested in sports and dramatics. He was a good football player, a member of the baseball team and a fine amateur boxer. And he also played the leading rôles in the school and college dramatic productions. But the thought of going on the stage didn't enter his mind, until a few unhappy circumstances forced him to decide upon a career for himself.

Just as he was preparing to study medicine, he visited a clinic with his elder brother, who was a surgeon. And he watched three operations. The sight of blood sickened him and he felt that he never could become a doctor.

And then his father suffered financial reverses. Dix realized that, if he wished to continue at college, he would have to work his way thru. He got a job, at a small salary, with a summer stock company playing in St. Paul.

His success was greater than he had expected. It was, indeed, greater than the manager of the company had expected. Altho he only played small parts, he drew large audiences. All his classmates at high school and college watched his career with breathless interest.

Started in Stock

FOR the newspapers of his town, he was a good story. It was another case of a "local boy making good." True, he knew little about acting and, true, his parts were only minor ones. Nevertheless, he was a home-town boy with plenty of friends and his presence in the company added new interest to the performances of the stock company.

The small, local success looked very big to Richard. He was terribly and almost pathetically serious about his work. Every performance was an event; every new rôle—no matter how small—was a momentous undertaking.

THE readers of the Brewster Publications have voted him their favorite actor.

For months, more letters about him have reached the editors of the Brewster Publications than about any other player on the screen.

And, for months, not a single adverse criticism from a "fan" has been registered against him.

No wonder, then, that Richard Dix gets a place on CLASSIC's cover.

There are all kinds of screen popularity. There are stars who put on a pin-wheel display for a year or so and then burn out. There are stars who "get by" because they happen to be in the business and because the public doesn't care violently enough about them, one way or another, to ask them to leave.

Stars Who Mean Something

AND then there are the stars who mean something to the public—Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, Harold Lloyd, Norma Talmadge and so few others that you can almost count them on your fingers. It is into this select circle that Richard Dix has stepped.

And he landed painlessly and quietly, without agitation or propaganda.

In a great many ways, Dix's story parallels that of Harold Lloyd. Like Lloyd, his rise in popularity has been steady, slow and sane. He made no sudden success in a big, spectacular picture. Like Lloyd, his work has been consistently good and consistently satisfying. Also his career has been a steady record of improvement. Again like Lloyd, he has no enemies—only friends. Stars

Richard Dix Wins Brewster Popularity Contest

The manager and his fellow players gave him some encouragement. He had his salary raised once during the season and several of the actors urged him to go to New York, if he wished to keep on with his own career.

Dix's arrival on Broadway was the old story of small-time talent in a big town. He had very little money and quite a few notions about breaking into a New York production. All in all, he was one of the greenest beginners ever to land on Broadway.

Reaches Broadway

IN the first place, he was backed by no family tradition. None of his relatives ever had been on the stage. He had little experience and no slant on the theatrical situation. He was just a nice home boy from the Middle West and he knew less about the world than the average ten-year-old East Side kid.

It didn't take Richard long to find out that he hadn't a Chinaman's chance of breaking

Boris

More letters come to the Brewster Publications about Richard Dix than about any other player. Left, Dix in his first prominent rôle—John Storm in "The Christian" into a New York production. Considerably downcast, he decided to look for work in a stock company. None of the directors of the stock companies seemed particularly eager to engage a beginner.

Finally, after months of waiting, he was overjoyed to get an engagement in Pittsburgh at thirty-five dollars a week.

In spite of a small salary and repeated assurances that he was the rottenest actor in the world, Dix stuck to it. It was, after all, a happy, care-free life, except on the days that the rent came due.

Then Came Tragedy

BUT then two tragedies came to him that forced him to settle down to business in grim earnest whether he liked it or not. His father and his brother died and Richard found himself the head of his family, with a mother and a sister to support.

It was his first experience at accepting real responsibility and he went at the task manfully. In those few, bitter years of poverty in New York his character was formed. He learned the lesson of self-sacrifice.

The struggle was hard while it lasted but Richard emerged from it with some valuable assets. He had acquired self-control, a sense of responsibility, and a capacity for hard work.

The turning point of his career came when Oliver Morosco gave him a job in his Los Angeles stock company. After a short time with Morosco, Hollywood discovered a new leading man. Richard began to make pictures and he began to make friends. Stardom sneaked up on him—altho his great work in "The Christian" gave him the final push.

Just Regular!

THE insidious blight of success never has touched Richard in any way. He owns no polo ponies, neither has he a fur-lined bathtub. He has no social ambitions to pal around with the Prince of Wales. His salary is not enormous; in fact, he might make four times as much and still be worth it to any company. He lives well, but not extravagantly. A new suit is still something of an event to him. He doesn't care much for show or swank.

Dix isn't married but he has no prejudices against the institution. He's afraid of making any mistakes and he doesn't believe in divorce. He is burdened by an old-fashioned devil, called Conscience, and works hard on his pictures. And, last but not least, he is one of the few actors on the screen who think in the terms of achievement, not money.

What My Experiences

By

Gloria Swanson

Two glimpses of Miss Swanson in pictures which revealed a distinct progress. Top, "The Humming Bird," and, below, "Beyond the Rocks" with Rudolph Valentino

I DON'T know whether my father guessed that I would become an actress. Certainly he couldn't have given me better training for my profession if he had. He told me often: "No person can be a greater artist than he is a human being, because all art is based on an understanding of humanity."

He impressed upon me the need for experience if I was to understand people, tho he didn't tell it to me exactly that way. I cant remember how he taught me these things, except that he made me feel them. I learned somehow that it was wrong to whimper when I hurt myself and the hurt had been brought about by my own will. I learned that that will was something that belonged to me and must be cared for so that it shouldn't grow into spinelessness on the one hand, or obstinacy on the other. I learned that when I had little problems, I must figure out for myself which way to act, not ask my parents to decide them for me, tho they would be always ready and glad to talk them over with me.

Her Father's Influence

I HAD no brothers or sisters, and father lavished upon me all the companionship he would have given a son. There were long walks with him, and long talks. Even when I was very young, he would talk with me not as tho I were a child, but a thinking individual; neither he nor my mother encouraged me to talk baby talk nor answered my questions with the air of bantering fantasy that many parents adopt toward their children.

But the most important part of my early training and the one for which I am most grateful was my father's insistence that I take all things that come my way.

"There isn't an experience in the world that cant do you some good. You can learn something from everything you do and even the most foolish experience can teach you not to repeat it," he said. Could there be any better training for an actress or a writer or any person whose profession is the portrayal of human emotions?

He gave me such a respect for experience that I prayed I would have all sorts of adventures—shipwrecks, tornadoes, fires, earthquakes, almost fatal illnesses—so that when I died, I would at least have tasted life. Tho many of those childish wishes have come true, I still pray that I may taste much more of life than I have already known—that new friends, new work, new places will open themselves to me.

Painful Experiences

THERE have been many times when I felt like running away from some of the experiences I have had, but I realized that that wouldn't help matters much. Besides, I was always curious to see what the lesson would be, what nugget of wisdom I could rescue from the débris. Lots of times, I must confess, I learned nothing and lots of other times I discovered truths

Have TAUGHT ME

that will be of service for the rest of my days. For this reason, I hate to speak of having made mistakes: I think of them as unfortunate or unhappy experiences, and let it go at that.

One of the first lessons I learned was to be extremely circumspect and not say or do anything that might reflect against me. Actresses are so much in the public eye, especially movie actresses, whose features are known in every town of the country, that what they do is naturally of greater interest than the actions of Miss Jones or Mrs. Smith. Newspapers realize that actresses make good "copy" and they will give more space to our doings than to the average woman's.

Of the newspapers there is a small but important minority that prints "yellow" news, facts slightly off color, or perhaps I ought to say facts slightly too colorful. You see, there is a tradition about actresses—that they're wild and exotic, that they should be ridiculed or admonished whenever the occasion presents itself. I don't suppose there's a human being in the world, actresses included, whose actions could absolutely escape criticism, and the yellow journals are quick to snap at little, unimportant fragments and develop them into national scandals, if an actress or any other public character is involved. I don't want to give the impression that newspapers as a class treat actresses unfairly. Just a few do, but they can make themselves very unpleasant. Most papers have been exceedingly generous and friendly toward me and my work, and it is their kind, sincere criticism that has showed me how my work could be improved. The reviews of my pictures in the newspapers are mirrors where I can get a sane, unbiased conception of my characterizations.

Newspaper Exaggerations

ACTRESSES are said to do all sorts of impossible things and earn salaries large enough to support a dozen presidents at the White House. There have been so many exaggerations about money in the motion picture industry that another million or two won't matter anyway. The same is true of the money we are supposed to spend. That's only one example of exaggeration. I could think of dozens of others.

Have THEY Got IT?

By AGNES SMITH

IN every good little boy there is just a bit of Florenz Ziegfeld. That is to say, there isn't a man in the world who doesn't think that he couldn't pick an A-No.-1 Beauty Chorus, if he were given a good chance.

And in every little girl—good or otherwise—there is just a bit of the old Elinor Glyn. There isn't a girl this side of the Old Ladies' Home who isn't sure that she can tell at a glance whether or not a man has IT.

Everybody's Talking About IT

SINCE four out of five are discussing IT, there isn't any reason why we shouldn't enter into a discussion of the faults or virtues of those charming gentlemen of the screen, known as America's Dream Princes. We might as well be frank about it at the start; there will be no idle and irrelevant talk of the artistic abilities—if any—of any of these gentlemen. They will be considered simply as movie stars.

In the first place, there is Richard Dix. The readers of the Brewster Publications have chosen Mr. Dix as their most popular form of entertainment. Dix is also called the "typical American man."

"The Typical American"

BUT that is the most arrant sort of flattery—to the typical American man. If Dix were the typical American man, there would be no demand for thirteen and a half collars, fat reducers, horn-rimmed glasses or arch supporters. Every girl in the country knows that Dix is not the typical American man—but she wishes he were.

The secret of the Dix popularity is really very simple. He is the sort of man that every girl hopes to marry until she reaches the age of twenty-five, after which she gets discouraged and takes the first willing fellow that comes along. And he is what every mother hopes her son will be, if he doesn't take to smoking too soon.

Dix has the sunny nature of the late Wallace Reid plus a certain kindness and a certain strength of character. And he doesn't look too temperamental or too exotic for everyday friendship.

Novarro at Other Extreme

AT the other extreme is Ramon Novarro. While Dix is a believable person and a not too faint hope, every girl knows that there really is no such person as Ramon Novarro. Of all the figures on the screen, he is the most shadowy, the most remote. Nevertheless, even those women who go to see "Ben-Hur" because it is a religious story, cannot fail to notice that Mr. Novarro has very handsome legs.

Novarro came on the screen shortly after the Valentino craze. He was falsely called a "Latin Lover." More truly is he the Greek type—a mythical and, indeed, an improbable person. But, oh, what a perfect example of a Suppressed Desire.

Our Expert Answers the Question

A Bad Case of IT

JOHN GILBERT is supposed to have a very bad case of IT. John is, indeed, hot stuff and can look at a girl in a way that is far from spiritual. His chief charm is that he looks a little unwholesome—for all the world like the fascinating suitor who is not encouraged by the family because he is known to have wild ways. A dangerous boy—a radical—a fellow who never has attended Sunday School—a Bohemian—not a man to be trusted or relied upon. Thank goodness!

John appeals to nice, conventional girls. He looks like a great field for missionary work—a grand Heathen to be reformed. But try and do it!

The Blond Bill Boyd

A NEWCOMER in the field is William Boyd. He's beautiful and dumb—just like Siegfried. And yet not too dumb to steal a picture, right away from some mean troupers. Cecil De Mille discovered Boyd. He has blue eyes and no mustache to deceive. He isn't sophisticated or subtle and his acting is innocent of guile. Mr. Boyd is easy to look at and he will never trouble his public by any unruly ambitions to play Hamlet.

I hope Noah gives Mr. Boyd a nice ride in the Ark when Mr. De Mille films "The Deluge." He would be a pleasant and steady fellow to have around in a Flood.

Adolphe Menjou is another Suppressed Desire. But the girls like him in a nice way. He looks like the sort of fellow who knows how to order a good dinner, who gets along with

William Davis Pearsall
With blue eyes and no mustache to deceive, Bill Boyd is beautiful and dumb—like Siegfried

M. J. Boris
Adolphe Menjou is another Suppressed Desire who isn't embarrassed in the presence of an artichoke

Russell Ball
Ronald Colman gives you the impression he would be the meanest of the lot, if he weren't a gentleman head waiters, who is not embarrassed in the presence of an artichoke. He's the sort of man who doesn't have to be browbeaten into wearing striped trousers and an afternoon coat to a wedding. He's the boy who wouldn't put sugar on lettuce, drink champagne out of a tumbler or serve beer with the soup course.

Another Suppressed Desire

IN fact, little Adolphe is just the walking book of etiquette. He's the boy who could be trusted not to go native in an Art Museum, not to go insane at a morning musicale, not to applaud after the first act of "Parsifal." He's the man who can wear a high hat without looking as tho he were going to a Lodge funeral. To sum up, Menjou is the fellow who is adored by Wives Who Have Suffered.

Ronald Colman's British Reserve has almost thrown him into the class of dependable leading men. But Ronald gives you the impression that he could be the meanest of the lot, if he weren't a gentleman. But Britannia rules the waves and he should make a fool of himself! The sun never sets on English soil, so why be a matinée idol! Ronald kills 'em by his indifference. But they always come back to see him.

After being a good actor for many years, John Barrymore has suddenly emerged as a fellow who has IT. That is to say, he is being paid a salary that only goes to young men who have IT. Altho this poor wretch saw Mr. Barrymore in "The Jest," she cannot see his fatal fascination. Nevertheless, it must be there. Will some one in the audience please rise and explain?

DON RYAN

Tom Mix personifies the American cowboy—brother of the riders of the race: the Amazons, the Valkyries, the Tartars, the Indians on pinto ponies, sweeping in dim procession down from the past “EARL JELICOE was scarcely recognized at Tillybury docks,” ran the indignant leading article of The London Times.

In fancy I can see the writer of the leader—a worn, bald, graying man, wearing a morning coat with tails which conceal the delinquencies of his trousers in the lumbar-region; and spats that hold a pair of broken shoes triumphantly together.

“The commander of His Majesty’s naval forces was scarcely recognized, the crowd all running off to see an American cowboy disembark from the Aquitania.”

I can see the shabby old journalist—so he would be called—adjusting his pincenez and bristling at the occiput, where the thin, gray-yellow hair is parted down the back and brushed upward. Writing his leading article with a pen and pushing in his indignation so hard against the paper that the stub buries itself with a sputter of ink and breaks under his hand.

“Edward! Oh, Edward!” And to the deferential youth who promptly presents himself: “Ascertain for me the name of that American cowboy—”

“Mix, sir! Thomas Mix, sir!”

“My word! You know it at once, it seems.”

“Oh, yes, sir. I’ve seen him riding in the films, sir. Many’s the time I’ve—”

“That will do, Edward. Gad! You too.” And when Edward has retired: “Extraordinary this infection by American films. I”—helplessly to himself—“I just cawnt understand it. . . . And the Earl . . . scarcely recognized . . . at Til’bry docks. . . .”

Mix and Europe

the bungalow and there are three large scrapbooks labeled "European Trip," 1, 2 and 3, in the custody of a secretary.

The books are full of clippings from the press of London, Paris, Berlin and the lesser capitals of Europe. The tone of the clippings is that of amused—sometimes indignant—surprise. You gather from a perusal of them that an American cowboy named Tom Mix, mounted on a trained horse and wearing an extraordinary native American costume, had ridden down the main thoroughfares of Europe, like the Pied Piper of Hamelin, drawing the cheering populace in his train. You gather that, while the ruling classes for the most part looked on with amusement, there were signs of alarm in some quarters at the ease with which the proletariat surrendered its heart to this barbarian invader.

"That Yankee!" — "Cet Américain!" — "Das Amerikaner!"

There is photographic proof of the fact that Europe's proletariat did surrender itself to an orgy of hero-worship when Tom Mix rode by. There is a picture of Mix trotting along Rotten Row with a regiment of bobbies trying to keep the crowd back. There is a dim picture of Mix riding in a foggy drizzle along the historic London road frequented in time past by Dick Turpin and still haunted by a shadowy ghost mounted on a great black horse. That morning the road was lined for seven miles with a crowd of 250,000 rain-soaked proletarians. And there is a picture of Mix seated in a visitor's chair, talking to the Lord Mayor of London, who is seated in a great, carved throne-chair; a tête-à-tête for which the Lord Mayor was severely criticized in some quarters.

"I Like the English"

"But he didn't give-a-damn," confided the American cowboy. "The Lord Mayor was a good scout.

"I got so I liked the English all right," he went on. "They are something like us, only harder to get acquainted with. They're for you when they find out you're on the level. They're like me in that respect—you've got to show 'em—and they hate a faker. Some of them can ride a little, too.

"Oh, yes," he continued, grinning. "I met enough of these lords and dooks and duchesses to make me dizzy. One reception they kept callin' 'em off there till I thought everybody in London was a dook.

"Yes," reminiscently, "I liked the English. The French didn't impress me so much—they're kinda hysterical, you know. They don't exactly know what it's all about. They're still arguin' (Cont'd on page 64)

Vicente Blasco Ibañez

W. B. Maxwell

By HENRY ALBERT PHILLIPS

Vicente Blasco Ibañez

VICENTE BLASCO IBANÉZ is a notable example—in many ways an equally notable exception—of my remarks in another column. "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," four years ago, elevated motion pictures to an indisputable position as a distinctive and distinguished art. But who performed this miracle? Blasco Ibañez or Rex Ingram? Could not a bad director with no vision have blighted this story? And again, what touches of visibility and vision did Ingram add to the printed pages?

All of which is theoretical. The facts stand in all their glory in a fairyland villa—the Villa Fontana Rosa—just outside the quaint and ancient town of Mentone in France, not far from the Italian border and overlooking the Mediterranean Sea. Within the spacious grounds of the villa are no less than seven sizable buildings and a score of workmen are daily laboring and adding other luxuries that only a lavish fortune could buy. It would be unfair to say that. Here are the mansions that the movies have built, but without question, their contribution to it all must have been enormous.

W. B. Maxwell

W B. MAXWELL wrote at least two books that have always stood out among the many modern books I have read. The first was entitled, "The Devil's Garden"; the other, several years later, was "Spinster of This Parish." I had always had a strong desire to meet the man who had given me so many pleasant hours by writing these absorbing stories. And now I have just read his current novel, "Fernande," and derived an equal amount of pleasure from that.

If you have not read these particular novels from among the twenty or so that he has written, it is more than likely you have seen some of them on the screen, particularly "A Madonna of the Streets," with Nazimova in the title-rôle. This story was taken from his novel, "The Ragged Messenger."

Mr. Maxwell is at the moment the chairman of the British Society of Authors and is taking a serious interest in trying to adjust the relationship between authors and film producers, hoping to iron out many of the disturbing wrinkles that appear in these articles.

"Let us begin here in England," he told me as

DISCUSS the FILMS

VICENTE BLASCO IBAÑEZ:

"The future of the cinema is limitless. Now it is not going ahead very fast. There is no standard in the cinema. Why do the artists not get together and set up standards?"

WILLIAM J. LOCKE:

"One can't be too hard on the films—no more than one can unjustly scold a child."

W. B. MAXWELL:

"The film as a vehicle for the transmission of letters to the multitude has really never begun to be tested."

William J. Locke

The Third of a Series of Talks About Motion Pictures With Famous English and Continental Writers

*I*N my humble opinion, the great writers with whom I have had the honor of talking quite miss the point when they come either to bless or curse the motion picture and what it gives to them and takes away from them.

They fail to realize that the motion picture producers, and the public in its turn too, are really buying their name, not their story. The story must, of course, have motion picture possibilities, but if that were all it had to recommend it, its chance for sale at any price would be very—infinitiesmally—small. In other words, the great writers—in nine cases out of ten, at least—are being paid large sums for an intangible, unviewable reputation.

To put it in terms of slang, what the great writer makes from the motion picture is "velvet"—it is unearned increment. If he gets the dividends multiplied, he should not be too inclined to cry "wolf," or watered stock! For instance, I have a novelist friend whose novel in book form netted him something more than ten thousand dollars. The motion picture people gave him twenty-five thousand dollars for "film rights"—which compared somewhat to slaughter-house

William J. Locke

*W*ILLIAM J. LOCKE is another great writer who lives in a palace by the sea—also the Mediterranean Sea, on the Riviera, where summer prevails all year round and winter is lugged in only by the visitors who retail over the tea-table in the sunshine on the open terraces weird tales of actual snow and ice and cold they have experienced not long since in Paris, London or New York.

I found Mr. Locke out on his terrace in white flannels, blue coat, hatless, and with an alarming sunburn on his face and a slightly bald head. We stood and smoked a cigaret before we went into his study.

"After all, there is beauty in the world!" he said, looking over the palms and rows of eucalyptus growing among the villas below us; then on toward the sea, over Cannes and then beyond toward the Esterelles, one of the most noble groups of mountains in the world. "And just as there is beauty here in Nature, so it may be found in humanity."

If you will recall any of the picture plays taken from Locke's books, or the books themselves,

Menjou will make Satan a polished, cynical man of the world, known as Prince Lucio Rimanez. Above, Ricardo Cortez as Geoffrey Tempest, who falls victim to Satan, and Carol Dempster as Mavis Claire, his sweetheart

The Story of REX

By HAL K. WELLS

"The Killer" is the villain in Rex's pictures. In real life he is a harmless pinto, but his enmity to Rex is deep-rooted and genuine

ELEVEN hundred pounds of magnificent horse-flesh thundered around the sawdust-covered floor of the enclosed barn areaway, head tossing and eyes flashing in the exuberance of release from the confines of his stall

Rex, "King of the Wild Horses," was being given his daily dozen over at the Hal Roach ranch on Pruess Boulevard.

The big stallion's seal-brown coat—that appears nearly jet-black on the screen—shone with that satiny sheen that only perfect physical condition and expert grooming can give. Beneath that velvet coat lithe muscles rippled and played in stark beauty.

It is a safe bet that more than one of the small audience huddled against an end wall of the locked enclosure would have willingly traded his post at the moment for several more desirable spots in Southern California. A volcano eruption is interesting to watch, but it loses some of its charm if the spectator happens to be sitting with his feet dangling over the edge of the crater at the time.

The Volcanic Rex

REX is reminiscent of a volcano in more ways than one. Whatever else he may be, he is distinctly not a parlor pet. He is a figure that comes only once in several equine generations, an aristocratic barbarian, a gloriously untrammelled and utterly unconquerable king of the open range.

Elinor Glyn says that Rex has "It." If the Madame means what I think she does, I agree with her. In fact, Rex has more "It" to the square inch than a dill pickle has freckles.

Sheer power, vivid appeal to the primitive, the surging vitality of physical perfection, flaming life, imperious with the blue blood of thoroughbred ancestors, as wild and unbroken a child of Nature as the four winds of Heaven—those are qualities which the cryptic word "It" probably covers as well as any other available section of the English language.

Rex is wild. He has less use for civilization than a hermit has for a silk hat. The big Morgan stallion is a genuine wild horse, always has been, and always, will be. No one has ever successfully trained a cyclone to do parlor tricks without utterly wrecking the parlor during the process, and no one will ever tame Rex into mediocrity, unless they kill him first.

Trained in Tiger Fashion

IN many ways the routine followed by Rex's trainer in his short daily work-out was suggestive of that used by a lion-trainer in handling a particularly temperamental jungle cat. Careful never to make a sudden movement

Fred Jackman is Rex's trainer and his screen discoverer. "About all we actually do," he says, "is to let Rex do the things he really wants to do and then fit the resulting scenes into our story"

Rex is a genuine wild horse, always has been, and always will be. He has less use for civilization than a hermit has for a silk hat or sound that might startle his restive pupil, and never giving an inch even when the big stallion threatened to charge him, the trainer kept the tufted lash of a long buggy-whip flicking almost constantly between himself and the horse.

The whip was never actually used. It was merely a symbol of authority. One light cut from it on those glossy flanks would have been equivalent to suicide. Rex has already killed one man in his spectacular career, and seriously injured several others.

The training routine was short. The big stallion was drilled in "Let's go!" "Stop!" and "Hold it!" He muzzled a dummy figure of a man along a wire. He closed an open door. Finally he was made to clamber on a small upturned tub and pose there after the fashion of the picture, "The End of the Trail." Rex is not a "trained" horse in any sense of the word, and never will be. His training stunts are largely disciplinary, given to make him realize some slight authority.

The session over, the stallion was returned to his home in Stall No. 13, and we adjourned to the open air. Fred Jackman and I parked ourselves on the top rail of the corral fence and rolled brown-paper cigarets while Jackman told me of Rex's rather lurid life history, and some of the unique methods used in making the "wild horse" pictures.

Jackman is the director who has handled Rex in every picture made so far with the big stallion. He is a quiet, whimsical Westerner, with an understanding of animals that is at times uncanny.

Jackman has a genuine love for animals and his attachment for the wild Rex is a deep one.

Rex's early life is more or less of a mystery. He was born on a large ranch in Eastern Colorado; of pure Morgan stock. The colt was registered under the name of "Casey Jones," which is the official title on his pedigree today. He took to the wilds early, and eluded every searching party that sought to capture him. Roaming the farthest recesses of the big ranch, during the next five years he became a genuine monarch of the open range, with a herd of subjects, and a contemptuous disdain for the luckless horsemen who occasionally tried to capture him.

The Story of Rex

THEN when the stallion was five years old, he was finally taken. It was a costly battle. One man was killed outright, and another so badly injured that he went to the hospital for months. Believing the stallion to be incurably vicious, the ranch superintendent ordered him shot.

A reprieve came from an unexpected quarter. Nearby was the ranch establishment of the Colorado State Reformatory for Children. Breeding of fine horses was a specialty of this ranch, and Rex was an unusually fine specimen of the Morgan breed, a strain that was being rapidly depleted. The big stallion was accordingly transferred to the Reformatory stables.

His life there did very little to improve a temper that was already far from sweet. Mischievous urchins tormented him by making faces at him until even today to grimace at Rex is to start something exceedingly hard to stop. His fame spread and tourists often went out of their Rex is a real killer.

He was born on a large ranch in eastern Colorado, being registered under the name of "Casey Jones."

He took to the wilds and became a genuine monarch of the open range.

At the age of five he was captured, after a costly battle. One man was killed and another badly hurt.

Ordered shot, he was reprieved and given to the Colorado State Reformatory for breeding purposes.

His fame as a killer spread—and the great wild stallion was brought to Hollywood.

Just above, you see the fervid love scene as the movie audience sees it—later.

Below, you may note the Great Lover taking a lesson or two in the Romeo stuff from the director.

A BLONDE From Pittsburgh

By DAVID BALCH

ALYCE MILLS has risen from an obscurity only slightly less dense and harrowing than that which is popularly supposed to attend the struggles of the rising young author or artist (and probably does) and she has retained all of the gentle gravity that early distinguished her in our memory as a very sweet girl, indeed.

That was three years ago. Now she is leading woman to that most popular of popular gentlemen stars, Richard Dix, and is sharing with him

William Potter

Alyce Mills won a beauty contest in Pittsburgh. She had a hard struggle to get a film hearing, Elmer Clifton finally giving her a screen opportunity in part the responsibility for making "Say It Again," Dix's latest picture, easy for folks to look at. And we have an idea that she is going to succeed.

But three years ago, when we first knew her, Miss Mills was just trying to get somewhere, by all the devious means of endeavor open to personable young women, which included posing for photographic illustrations and for the various advertising mediums which think that "the pretty girl's head, gentlemen, will sell the article." The movies, then, were a long way off, long, that is, in one sense, that the only screen work worth while was the "big time" variety that seemed always to be just a little way the other side of sundown.

Beauty Contest Winner

A BEAUTY contest started it all, she told us. It was in Pittsburgh, her home town, and a certain newspaper had canvassed the city for the prettiest girl, a sort of Miss Pittsburgh. It so happened (quite logically, we think) that Miss Mills was the choice. For a fortnight she dwelt in fairy-land, even as any other girl would have done. Then, the contest, or the local advertising stunt, or whatever else it was, over, Miss Mills descended to earth again and began to live with her memories.

She Reached for the MOON

"People are always wishing for the moon," says Florence Vidor.

"When I was a little girl growing up in Texas, I used to be laughed at by the family when I mentioned being an actress.

"In spite of the family laughter, here I am. By luck, I sometimes think.

"I haven't had time to find out yet how it feels to be a star. It's a little like what I imagine a general feels when he's given charge of an army.

"Rather frightening, isn't it?"

Florence Vidor has just been promoted to stardom by Famous Players—a long step from her first hit, Mimi, in "The Tale of Two Cities." Left, Miss Vidor at the entrance of her Beverly Hills home

THE scene was a Texas movie house—characters, Florence Vidor, of schoolgirl age, and a boy a little older.

They had been watching the picture heroine go thru thrilling adventures, advance from a little nobody on a bleak farm to a dazzling and irresistible queen in a palace. Gowns, too. Jewels. And an altogether satisfactory hero!

The lights flared up and the girl sighed.

"Oh!" she breathed. "I wish I could be in pictures!"

The boy was horrified. She mustn't say such a thing! Suppose somebody heard her!

"There's no chance in the world of my ever getting in, considering how many miles I live from California and how little I know about acting," she defended herself, "but I can wish it, cant I? People are always wishing for the moon!"

Now She's a Star

TODAY, Florence Vidor has the moon. She has just been elevated to stardom and her first starring picture is under way.

The story for this picture was written by the Hungarian playwright, Ernest Vadja, and the production promises to be one of the most interesting of the year.

On one of the great stages at the Paramount studio in Hollywood, an entire theater seating twelve hundred, with balconies, boxes and full stage has been erected. A dozen of the highest-paid acts on the vaudeville circuit have been engaged; special scenery has been designed and gorgeous costumes created; for the play deals with a company modeled after the Chauve-Souris of the Moscow Art Theater.

"All this for our new star!" commented one of the players, above the music of the Russian balalaika orchestra playing native instruments in the orchestra pit. His gesture went from the Arabian tumblers pyramided against the backdrop, to the Russian dancers executing intricate figures on the apron of the stage—from the acrobats, clowns and comedians doing their stuff in appointed spaces to Clive Brook, in his midnight-black velvet throwing knives at the gilded screen against which the new star posed.

"So few people ever get their hands on their coveted moon. How do you suppose it feels when you do?"

Florence Vidor smiled when I asked her.

How It Feels to Star

"I HAVEN'T really had time to find out," she confessed in that deep low voice of hers, "At first it's a little like what I imagine a general feels when he's given charge of an army. Tremendous responsibility, you know. Only the general gives orders that other people carry out, and a star can do just her part of the picture and yet feel responsible for everything in the production.

Florence Vidor's first real rôle was opposite Sessue Hayakawa. Luck played its part—and luck has played an important part in Miss Vidor's career ever since

Kenneth Alexander

"I was so much freer when I was merely a featured player, for then I was cast for a part for the simple reason that I seemed to fit it, and I was concerned with no more than my own performance. Now that I am a star a special story is written around me by a famous man, the cast is selected in reference to me, and if for any reason the picture is unsuccessful, the failure will reflect on me.

"Rather frightening, isn't it?"

She sat in the bungalow dressing-room, a gay figure in pink silhouetted against the leaf-green of its walls, the velvet of her "back stage" dressing-room gown decorated with symbols of the "magic" in which she indulges in her starring rôle.

"I'm hoping a lot for this picture, of course, but I wonder sometimes if I shall ever find a part that I'll love as I did my first 'bit.' It was Mimi in 'Tale of Two Cities.' Not much of a part. I worked two days only, but it's the one thing I've done that I haven't said: 'Oh, why didn't I

Dorothy Sebastian's Southern drawl won her a place in George White's "Scandals." Dolores and Helene Costello were in the chorus, too. Then Miss Sebastian's drawl got her a place in pictures

THERE is sure magic in a Southern drawl. "Are you from Dixie?" is more than a song; the line, "Yes, I'm from Dixie!" is the open sesame to the hearts of the world.

So Dorothy Sebastian found it. . . . Dorothy, with her youth and grace and loveliness, supplementing that distracting Alabama speech.

Nobody ever wanted her to use her enticing drawl; the positions it helped her into were those of show girl, dancer and screen actress, but it was the way she spoke that gained them for her. . . .

When Dorothy was a curly-headed mite in ruffled dresses and pin socks, the proud family used to take her out in Birmingham's tree-lined avenues, no doubt enjoying the sensation she must have made.

"And what are you going to be when you grow up?" people who stopped to greet her elders would ask the child.

"An actress!" crowed Dorothy, before her scandalized guardian of the moment had time to reply for her: "Dot's going to be a missionary." (There was a missionary in the family.)

A bit later, Dorothy used to draw flamboyant figures of dancing girls on sheets of wrapping-paper, pin them up on the barn as posters, and give "one-man shows" inside.

Wanted to Be an Artist

BUT when she had finished high school, another branch of art claimed her. Her mother was an artist and Dorothy was clever with crayons and colors. The girl opened her own studio in an apartment in town,

How Charlie Chaplin caught the eye of the old Keystone Company while appearing in "A Night in an English Music-Hall" is a matter of history. Here is the untold success of the queer way he made a hit in films

THERE have been stories without number in present-day magazines which devote their pages to "success" stories and, according to these engaging biographies of our big men, they were the first ones at their desks in the morning, the last ones to put out the light (and also the cat) at night, spent their evenings acquiring twenty years' knowledge from the perusal of a correspondence course in twelve lessons, eschewed drink, tobacco and night clubs, and did all the other amazing things which successful men usually do, according to the chroniclers of this pleasing type of fiction.

Always, despite these beloved bromidic high lights which feature the stories of the rise of our leading citizens, those who buy their theater seats from speculators and have their garters made to order, no writer of "success" essays considers he has done a professional job unless he dilates on the fact that "John H. Muchmoney got his real start in life thru the borrowing of a dollar from a friend," with which sturdy capital he proceeded to obtain an interest in the business of making dog-collars, with the result that twenty years later we find our friend, Mr. Muchmoney,

FAME Came to CHAPLIN with Borrowed CLOTHES

By BERT ENNIS

in sole control of the industry which has a monopoly on the manufacture of ornaments for canine necks.

Charlie's Success Story

THAT'S the way the stories of success usually run. At least, it seems that way to this writer. Never has he seen recorded anywhere a story setting forth that the successful one borrowed an old derby hat, a pair of shoes, a cane and a garment sometimes politely referred to as trousers, and thus equipped with an odd sort of capital, started blithely down the road to fortune and fan mail with an asset which only dealers in old clothes hold in esteem.

No, the stories of achievement must always be written according to Hoyle, and therefore they always borrow money. Disturbing as it may be to those fellow scribblers who insist that the conventions be observed when it comes to the rules governing success and how to achieve it, this story deals thru the temporary acquisition of the ordinary articles of dress just mentioned—Charlie Chaplin. The little man, who from the time he stuck to the hat, shoes, cane, et al., which he borrowed at the outset of his dash after success, was the screen idol of the entire world, and the funniest man in pictures. This statement can be made without detracting in any way from the consummate artistry and remarkable talents which he has displayed in recent films of a totally un-Keystone-like nature. The fact remains that the Chaplin of the ludicrous dignity and jauntily disreputable attire rocked the box-office records and risibilities of a nation at one and the same time.

In Old Keystone Days

IN 1913, the Keystone Company, then dominant in the field of movie comedy, acquired the services of an obscure vaudeville player, who was being paid an insignificant sum weekly for tumbling in and out of a stage box while watching the rollicking performance which formed the basis of the skit of which he was a part—Karno's "Night in an English Music-Hall." The obscure actor, who answered to the name of Charles Chaplin, was in America only thru an accident. His brother, Syd Chaplin, had been scheduled to play the part of the boy in the box in the Karno vaudeville act, but at the last minute had decided to give his brother, Charlie, a chance to see America first. So Chaplin hid himself to his new employer at the small studio of the Keystone Company in Hollywood where a certain gentleman named Mack Sennett proceeded to put him thru his comedy paces via those comedy classics of the old days. The English importation was seen in a few pictures filled with custard pies, runaway

The Inside Story of How the Comedian Borrowed Arbuckle's Pants and Ford Sterling's Shoes, Thereby Achieving Success

A scene from an early Keystone comedy with Mabel Normand as the heroine and Mack Sennett himself as the yokel. The comedy was called "The Rube and the Baron" automobiles and pretty girls, causing no undue commotion with his antics on the part of producer or public. In these pictures he appeared before the camera in rather conventional make-up, approximating somewhat his attire when amusing patrons of the two-a-day by his putty-blowing abilities and tumbling proclivities.

It so happened that at the time Chaplin made his screen debut in Hollywood there prevailed in that city of tourists and tinsel a custom of holding annually an event known as the Baby Parade, a display in which fond mothers trundled thru the streets in perambulators of all shapes and sizes their beloved offspring, seeking the prize which was awarded to the most beautiful infant. Since the advent of the movies, undoubtedly, many of these prize-seeking infants are the same girls who enter every beauty contest staged in the town where the bathing girls never see the ocean and traffic signals are not.

There also prevailed a custom on the part of Mack Sennett and other makers of comedy films, which helped in "keeping the negative cost down," of seizing the opportunity to film the Baby Parade and other current events thru the simple process of sending a cameraman and a few actors to the scene, with instructions to "grab off some shots of this thing and we'll work it up into a comedy release." Among the events used in this manner by the astute Sennett may be mentioned the Pasadena Floral Parade, the Old-field auto races, the visit of Sir Thomas Lipton to Hollywood, and other affairs of the kind.

The Baby Parade

Another pioneer Keystone comedy with Fatty Arbuckle as the country bumpkin. The comedy was "Help, Help, Hydrophobia," but, alas, the name of the heroine is forgotten

THEFORE, when the event featuring the infant population of Southern California was brought to the attention of the Keystone producer, it was not strange that he (Cont'd on page 76)

WHAT'S GONE ON BEFORE:

Cella Lloyd, winner of a bathing-girl contest, has successfully invaded Hollywood. She took along Pa and Ma Lloyd—but Pa was shipped home. He couldn't acclimate himself to the celluloid world. Cella hasn't actually appeared in a super-special yet, but she is the talk of Hollywood. How to continue to be—ah, that's the problem. Now read on!

Scene I

In quest of publicity, Cella gets herself arrested for speeding by a snappy Pasadena traffic cop. The judge, however, has seen Cella's bathing pictures and she gets a suspended sentence.

Scene II

Cella feels that adopting a baby may help. Besides, it will lend color to her interviews about longing for a little home in the country far from the tinsel of screen stardom.

WORRY CELLA LLOYD

Scene III

Cella contemplates getting herself engaged to Charlie Chaplin, but that's out, now that the comedian is the much publicized father of two sons. Cella calls up Valentino, but Rudy refuses to come to the 'phone

Scene IV

There's nothing left for Cella to do. So she sues her mother—and breaks on the front pages. Ma Lloyd doesn't quite understand. Who does? The ways of publicity are indeed strange

"Passion" was voted the most popular picture ever produced. It should be noted here that Miss Negri's followers voted heavily for "Passion" and for "Forbidden Paradise," which received the second heaviest vote among all pictures. "Monsieur Beaucaire," "The Birth of a Nation" and "The Covered Wagon" were next, in the order named.

THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC is glad to present the full results of the now famous Your Opinion Contest, conducted by the Brewster Publications. The results are announced by Eugene V. Brewster, editor-in-chief and publisher of the Brewster Publications.

Interest was almost equally divided between writing motion picture reviews for the various prizes and in voting for favorite players and screen plays. It is interesting to note that Richard Dix received the most votes among the actors, with Rudolph Valentino, Richard Barthelmess, Eugene O'Brien and Ramon Novarro following in the order named.

Pola Negri received the most votes among the actresses—and, incidentally, the heaviest vote polled by any player. Mary Pickford was second, with Gloria Swanson, Norma Talmadge, Lillian Gish and Colleen Moore following.

First prize, for the best motion picture review, goes to Mrs. Karlene A. Armstrong, of Oak Lane Park, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. Mrs. Armstrong's review covered "The Big Parade." Mrs. Armstrong writes THE CLASSIC: "I feel that a prize was scarcely ever offered which will be more appreciated or more opportune than this one. You see, shortly after my marriage last summer, I was taken ill and spent a dreary winter recuperating from the subsequent operations, altogether incapacitated for work. It was during these long and disheartening weeks that I amused myself writing letters and articles to various magazines, for, being unable to participate in active pleasures, I sought the picture world as a means of diversion. The Your Opinion Contest appealed to me as unique and I entered it in a spirit of pure enjoyment."

Mrs. Armstrong is twenty-two years of age and, at various times, has been interested in kindergarten and settlement work. She writes that she was one of the first readers of The Motion Picture Magazine, starting to read

The second prize winner, M. Seklemian, of Los Angeles, California, is a native Californian, twenty-six years of age. His father was a newspaper man and at one time a college instructor. Mr. Seklemian himself is a commercial artist engaged in the advertising business in Los Angeles. Yes, he has ambitions to be a motion picture director. Here's hoping he has as much luck as he had in Your Opinion Contest.

Theodore A. Baxt, of 1121 Morris Avenue, New York City, third prize winner, likes contests. He has won several contests. Mr. Baxt is but twenty and he is employed in a clerical capacity on a big New York newspaper. Incidentally, he has found time to play minor bits before the motion picture camera as well as on the stage. Like Mr. Seklemian, he wants to be a director.

The fourth prize winner, A. L. Shands, of 96 Ward Street, Orange, New Jersey, was born in Russia. His parents brought him to America at the age of three. He went to school in New York City. Then he struck out for himself, being at various times a telegraph operator, teacher, hobo, and writer. Finally, he entered the employ of Thomas A. Edison, contributing his winning review while stationed at New London, Wisconsin.

Marcia Sanguin, of 1120 North Stevens Street, El Paso, Texas, receives fifth prize. Miss Sanguin is twenty-one years of age and at present is the cub reporter on The El Paso Post.

The complete list of winners is as follows:

First Prize—$1,000.00—Karlene A. Armstrong, Oak Lane Park, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

Cecil De Mille has announced his next Biblical invasion. It will be "the Deluge," and naturally it will center around that pioneer house-boat captain, Noah. The betting is fifty to one that the flood will come just as a super-orgy is at its height. Thus "the mightiest cataclysm in all the world's known history," as Mr. De Mille expresses it, will collide with the greatest orgy this director has yet attempted

Cecil De Mille wants it understood that his plans to produce "The Deluge" have no reflection upon the California rainy season. Mr. De Mille has not announced his cast yet, but it is anticipated that there will be a lot of competition in Hollywood over the rôle of Noah. Big Pictures and Little Ones

By ROBERT E. SHERWOOD

THE season which has just passed has produced a veritable tidal wave of BIG pictures—extra-special-super features, of ten or more reels, that are sold to the public at advance prices.

Starting with "The Merry Widow," "The Wanderer," "The Phantom of the Opera," and "Don Q," there have appeared, subsequently, such extensive offerings as "The Big Parade," "Stella Dallas," "The Vanishing American," "Ben-Hur," "The Sea Beast," "La Bohème," "The Flaming Frontier," "Mare Nostrum," "The Black Pirate," "The Midnight Sun," "The Volga Boatman," "Sparrows" and "Aloma of the South Seas."

The money invested in this group of offerings would be sufficient to launch a medium-sized war. The revenue that will eventually be derived from them would put Germany on its feet again, with enough left over to rehabilitate Russia.

Tidal Wave of Specials

FOR the season ahead, the tidal wave of super-specials threatens to assume the proportions of a deluge. There will be "Old Ironsides," "What Price Glory," "Tell It to the Marines," "The Scarlet Letter," "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Garden of Allah," "The Greatest Show on Earth," "Don Juan" and some dozens of others.

In fact, the old six- or seven-reel picture seems to be going out of style. Today, any director who manages to gather unto himself a reputation demands twelve crowded reels or he wont play.

This brings us up to a consideration of the problem: what makes a big picture big? Is it the footage of celluloid that is consumed, or the size of the sets, or the number of extras employed in the mob scenes, or the amount of money expended by a generous producer?

To answer this question, we must delve into the machinery of the movie industry itself (and if you aren't interested in machinery, you can drop off at this point and take a run thru the rotogravure section).

The Program Picture

WHEN the movies first started to gain their universal popularity and to earn their fabulous dividends, a few astute magnates decided that it would be easier to sell films in groups rather than as individual offerings.

Thus, the "program picture" was born—and the program picture, as subsequent events have proved, is the curse of the silent drama.

To explain what a program picture is, I may take the case of Famous Players-Lasky, which was the pioneer in this particular field of endeavor. Famous Players decides to produce forty pictures in six months, which will be divided up among its various stars and directors; there may be two Thomas Meighan productions, two Gloria Swanson productions, three Raymond Griffith productions, two James Cruze productions, and so forth.

The stars, stories, directors and casts for these forty pictures will be lined up in advance, and then the high-powered salesmen will start out to sell the entire program to exhibitors—sight unseen. The exhibitor will be sold on the strength of the titles of the pictures, the box-office reputations of the stars, directors and authors, and the salesman's own personal ability to hoist the cow's husband. Thus, an exhibitor who wants to book a strong feature, like a Harold Lloyd comedy, will have to accept a number of weaker sisters, on the same program, along with it.

Since most of the selling is done before the pictures are even made, the actual work of production becomes of minor importance. Program pictures must be ground out on schedule time, of scheduled length and at a scheduled cost.

Factory Products

WITH the result that program pictures are apt to be slipshod in form, hazy in story and played in a listless, peppless manner. They are factory products, and they look it.

A special production—one which is made on the side, regardless of the prearranged program—is much more likely to represent careful, sustained, intelligent effort. Its producers spend more time and money on it, and they dont have to be restricted by an early release date.

All the independent comedians—Chaplin, Lloyd and Keaton, in particular—make their pictures in this way. They work over each production until they are convinced that it is right, or as close to right as they and their collaborators can possibly make it.

Douglas Fairbanks works in the same way. So does Mary Pickford. So do Ernst Lubitsch, Erich von Stroheim, John Barrymore, Norma Talmadge, Lillian Gish and a few others. So will Gloria Swanson, whenever and if ever she is given the chance to do so.

It is obvious that pictures made in this way will be superior to pictures that are ejected, at tediously regular intervals, from a sausage machine.

There are two productions which illustrate this point effectively: one is "The Covered Wagon," the other, "The Big Parade."

Unexpected Specials

BOTH of these pictures were intended, originally, to conform to the requirements of the program. Both,

Two such hits as "The Covered Wagon" and "The Big Parade" started as program pictures. Both unexpectedly grew out of bounds.

Just what makes a big picture big?

William Boyd and Elinor Fair in "The Volga Boatman"

THE real romance of Russia has yet to be written. The country of the communists surges too strongly with emotions to be understood completely by those who would translate its life into terms of screen drama. The song of Russia is pitched in a tragic key and some fine day a director may be given carte blanche to give an authentic version of it.

Cecil B. De Mille romanticizes Russia in his "Volga Boatman," which is nothing but a love triangle that seldom approaches moving drama. It is flavored with the military touch and there is a first-rate element of contrast present which depicts the lowly peasant as the conquering hero in affairs of the heart. But in showing his conflict of the Reds against the Whites, De Mille makes opulent excursions into sentimental and erotic pastures. In other words, he introduces his own personality to create pictorial effects and so his story gets away from him. He is all for the color of the thing.

The trouble with "The Volga Boatman" as I see it is its lack of a gripping climax which should have shown the inexorable march of pathos and tragedy. Still in giving De Mille credit, it is best to call this an experiment. He has played with Russian conflict as it concerns peasant and aristocrat—artistically, there is nothing to criticize here.

It is only in his subject matter that he falters. Russia may sing joyously, but there is a tear behind the song—a tear symbolic of a people who look with tremendous seriousness upon life.

There are Hollywoodian touches in the picture, too, which, while gratifying in a pictorial way, are, nevertheless, out of harmony with the theme. The points which will be remembered here are the highly creditable atmosphere, the detail—and the sincere performances contributed by William Boyd as the Red, Victor Varconi as the Prince and Julia Faye as a Tartar maid. Elinor Fair does not realize the full possibilities of the character of the princess. It is a part which fairly cried for the release of pent-up emotions.

Marion's Princely Rôle

EVER since Marion Davies discovered that her forte is light comedy, she has given her public some highly mirthful character studies. There's no room for argument that she cannot masquerade as a youth—and get away with it. There is spirit in her acting—and conviction too.

So what does it matter if they have changed "Beverly of Graustark" to fit her talent and personality? What matters if the girl dons princely attire, if the creaking plot can be spiced up a little? The good, old Graustark pattern has gone to the movie well many many times since the birth of the five reeler. If it can be changed in its stock situations—well, so much the better for those patrons who are shouting for originality or novelty.

Broad liberties are taken here with McCutcheon's yarn. Which gives Miss Davies her chance to masquerade. Accordingly, the scenarist, the director and possibly Marion, herself, have adopted the by-words of the magician—Presto, Chango—and the star comes forth resplendent in princely attire. Her mannerisms, her playfulness—these are the factors toward this picture's popularity—for it is destined to be popular.

It contains oodles of sentiment and romance—and quite a spark of adventure. The Davies personality is stamped all over it. She wears her clothes quite as well as David, Prince of Wales. Roy D'Arcy is present, but not so versatile as I anticipated. His performance differs in no respect from his work in "The Merry Widow." Antonio Moreno plays the hero in the approved story-book and stage manner. Altogether, the picture has plenty of appeal.

Mostly a Fashion Show

SOMETIMES musical comedy adaptations turn out very well on the screen, but at best it is a gamble whether they will succeed or not. "Sally" and "Irene" turned out fair enough, principally because they contained some sprightly fun. To get right down to brass tacks, it all depends upon whether there is enough plot and gags after the music is eliminated.

In remembering the twosome above—and their entertaining qualities brings to mind the shortcomings of "Mlle Modiste." True, the decorative Corinne Griffith enhances the piece with her presence. She is resplendent in some striking sartorial effects. Otherwise, it is a long and tedious fashion show—one bolstered up with wise-cracking subtitles which lose their power to provoke laughter thru their constant repetition and lack of spontaneity.

I cannot see any reason for adapting it in the first place. It wasn't so much a plotty comic affair as it was a medium to express Victor Herbert's melodious score. The original offered a perfect synchronization of plot, characterization and music. Thus, with the operatic matter removed, Miss Griffith was deprived of a chance to do anything else than display a complete wardrobe of glad rags.

There is but an inkling of the plot. It shows itself when the star, impersonating a Paris mannequin, is set up in business by a butter-and-egg man from America. Naturally, this piques the French count who loves her and who believes the worst. There's your story—and your picture, too.

What remains is a fashion parade—with Corinne Griffith wearing her gowns exceedingly well. The only bit of characterization is offered by Willard Louis as the afore-mentioned b. and e. man. He looks the part, but the gags supplied him are weak. Norman Kerry looks spick and span in some gay uniforms. In other words, it is a talky picture in which the players walk on and off the sets.

This MacLean Fellow

IN watching a Douglas MacLean comedy I always recall his memorable effort, "Twenty-three and a Half Hours' Leave." That's the penalty he pays for ringing the bell a few seasons ago. With each succeeding picture I've anticipated something as delightfully human and amusing, but none has quite reached the mark. The new contribution, "That's My Baby," comes as close as any—without trespassing on its plot. This is another way of saying that it has its rollicking moments.

The piece runs dry at the start—but the minute the Baby is introduced it picks up momentum and finishes in a volley of laughter. This baby, incidentally, is played by Harry Earles, who you will remember as the midget in "The Unho'ly Three." He is the chap who, really more than MacLean, changes the complexion of the story. And why not, since the plot motivates around him?

There is no great shakes about the story—which concerns a couple of bachelors. One of them, Mr. Hero, falls in love so badly that his partner becomes disgusted with him. But the bride elopes, thus giving the disappointed swain the opportunity to renounce the opposite sex.

This chap, however, is made of sentiment and sympathy. So when a damsel sprains her ankle, he promptly renders first aid.

There is slap-stick here—quite a lot of it, but it doesn't spoil the idea. The piece is consistently funny. MacLean, acting in his customary bewildered manner, extracts an adequate amount of humor, while Claude Gillingwater, wearing his exaggerated scowls, makes a praiseworthy foil.

The War Comes to Vienna

A LOT of money has been spent on "The Greater Glory," but the result is negligible. Whatever those in charge were driving at is difficult to discern as it is impossible to make anything out of it. There is a little bit of everything in the story and the effort to make it clear has brought forth nothing but confusion.

The original tale, "The Viennese Medley," was scheduled for the big theaters. But it became swallowed up in a mass of detail during production and emerging as "The Greater Glory" it has just been allowed to swim or sink by itself.

The four horsemen are resurrected again. They gallop across the sky, while on terra firma the spectator sees a lot of movement in Vienna before, during and after the war.

It is all very much to the hodge-podge. One reason for the rambling, shambling plot may be found in the wealth of characters, there being no less than two dozen relatives who are difficult to identify because of their Teutonic names—and the fact that they appear, disappear and re-appear without rhyme or reason.

I get the general impression that the author tried to duplicate "The Four Horsemen" from the Germanic side of the argument—and that the director attempted to reproduce that memorable effort.

MORE IMPRESSIONS

POLA NEGRI was one of the surprises of my life. When invited recently to a little dinner-party at her home, I hesitated about accepting because I dislike to waste an evening and hate to be bored. I had never met Pola Negri but I had heard and read a lot about her, and was not anxious to meet her. This only shows how we get wrong impressions, and how Dame Rumor and General Publicity often blunder and do grave injustice. And so I accepted the invitation with some reluctance, for I fully believed that I would be required to sit for an hour in the drawing-room while the guests were assembling and until the stately Pola should slowly descend the grand stairway with queenly dignity while we guests should rise and bow and scrape and do her homage.

I had pictured her there in all her glory, the observed of all observers, and as she finally seated herself on her throne I saw myself among her satellites sitting around her highness as she haughtily told us what a great artiste she was. I could hear them all saying "yes, yes" to the self-centered tragedy queen, and I saw myself at the dinner-table listening to her subjects' praise and adulation. I felt sure she was temperamental, Ritzy, up-stage, and all that sort of thing, and I had been told that she never suffered from inferiority complex. And there are other things I thought and believed about Pola Negri off the screen which made me anything but an admirer.

But how different it all was. The stage was not set for a grand-stand entrance, there was no throne, no idol-worshipping, no attempt to be the center of attraction. Pola Negri was seated among some guests when I entered. She rose, came forward and greeted me cordially. She was dressed simply but elegantly, with no signs of gaudiness. Her manner was natural and without affectation. She has a pleasant voice, and rather a strong one, and speaks with a slight foreign accent. If she had any make-up on, it was not obvious. At no time during the whole evening did I see any attempt on her part to monopolize attention or conversation, and she succeeded in making everybody feel perfectly at ease without any apparent effort. I feel sure that the Pola Negri I saw was the real Pola and not an artificial one. Bluff, hypocrisy, posing, coquetry and artifice are evidently not on her program nor in her nature.

She presided over the dinner table gracefully, naturally and unaffectedly, and nobody felt that it was necessary to include her in the conversation altho she often joined in. I asked her opinion of Americans in general and of many plays and players in particular, and she seemed always to have a good word rather than a bad one. If she hates anybody, she keeps it a secret; if she admires anybody, she does not hesitate to say so. And yet she is far from being a "yes man." She has decided opinions on everything and expresses them with candor, but somehow she gives the impression that she finds something in everything and in everybody to admire and nothing to condemn. In other words, she is not at all "catty" nor envious, nor jealous, and I want to remark right here that these are rare virtues out here in Hollywood.

But the one thing that surprised me most was the mentality of Pola Negri. I soon felt myself in the presence of a great woman. She has a very wise head on her fair shoulders and her process of deduction and induction are nothing short of masculine, because one rarely sees such a logical and profound insight into things in a feminine brain. I'll wager that she is seldom wrong in her estimate and analysis of the affairs of life. Women usually depend on their intuition, in which faculty they always excel the male, but Pola Negri seems to be guided more by logic and reason than by guesswork. And she is a student—she goes into the whys and wherefores of things. And her library is the finest I have yet seen out here. She reads much, but she thinks more. She is sociable but I imagine she is somewhat bored by the general run of light conversation that is so common among players. To make oneself agreeable to Pola Negri one must talk about something deeper than clothes and the weather, and yet she is graciously tolerant. Just to show how generous and whole-hearted she is, one of the first remarks she made to Corliss Palmer in the presence of several people was: "I have several times been told that you were the most beautiful girl in Hollywood, and I was prepared to doubt it, but now I am free to admit that the report was not exaggerated."

I believe that Pola Negri is one of the most admired of all women of the screen, but I am now inclined to think that she will never be so popular in real life as are many others, because the average man does not usually fall in love with intellectual women, and women don't often take kindly to those of their sex who are smarter than they are. While Pola is not a masculine woman, she is the exact opposite of the Lillian Gish type. One would never liken Pola to the fragile lily nor to the delicate violet. She is more than a flower—she is a sturdy oak, full of life, strength and power. If one had never seen her on the stage or screen, one would feel safe to bet that she was a great artiste. And that she will be just that, long after many others now in her general class are dead and buried.

VICTOR VARCONI, known as the Hungarian Romeo, and his charming wife, who was recently a celebrated musical comedy star in Europe, entertained me at a sort of five-o'clock tea the other day, but it turned out to be an informal musicale. Corliss Palmer and Dorothy Dwan went with me, and we had to enter thru the kitchen door because the heavy rains had washed away some of the hills up above their dwelling and washed them down on their lawns and gardens. I told him that "The Volga Boatman" should have established a ferry across the lawns and that I was thinking of building an ark for myself. It doesn't rain very often here but when it does, it certainly docs. And the hill-dwellers get the worst of it. But the rainy season is over now and we shall have sunshine for about nine months. But it seldom rains all day. It rains so hard that it gets tired, and stops for a few hours, and the sun comes out. Victor is a handsome young Hungarian about six feet, thirty years old. He is full of humor and good nature. When he laughs, his eyes almost close, like slits. He is very frank, wholesome, polite and likable. He speaks "broken English" very well indeed and it is a delight to listen to him. A Hungarian musician was there, and how he could play the piano! I think the hills round about are still echoing. And then they all sang some rollicking Hungarian folk-songs, and they put a lot of feeling and emotion in them. These foreigners certainly have us poor Americans beaten a mile and a half when it comes to music and expression of the emotions. And I think we are going to hear from this Victor Varconi. Cecil De Mille has signed him to do leads, and he has a fine personality. I think you are going to like him immensely. More later.

It's a funny thing, but Hollywood is about the worst place I know of to see pictures. One would think that right where they are made one could see anything almost any time. But theaters are scarce and far between and they run old pictures and poor ones most of the time. Several new and big theaters are planned, however. Grauman's Egyptian is here, of course, but they have been running "The Big Parade" ever since I have been here. Of course, there are many big theaters downtown in Los Angeles, but it takes half an hour to motor there and half an hour more to find a parking place for one's car, and another half-hour to get a pair of seats.

RUDOLPH VALENTINO is certainly a different young man from what he was a few years ago. Perhaps you noticed when you saw him last that he looked worried and careworn. Well, now he is full of confidence and he looks younger than ever. He is a type that became a standard and his name a household word a few years ago, and as such he has never had a competitor. I figure that from now on Rudy will go up and stay up at the top. There can be Gilberts and Colmans and so on, but there can be only one Valentino.

I HAD luncheon with dear old Uncle Carl Laemmle at Universal the other day and I am afraid he wont invite me again. Unfortunately I am not a "yes man," of which characters Hollywood is full—I mean those who say only nice things and who never dare to offer a friendly criticism. Poor Uncle Carl is and always has been surrounded with "yes men" and I doubt if he really knows what is going on and just where his company stands. He knows he's making money and that's about all. I want to see Universal "come back" and get in with the big ones and do things, but I fear they never will.

BEFORE any picture goes out of Hollywood it is given a try-out at one of the smaller theaters, and sometimes at two or three. They plant scouts around and a few dozen "yes men," and try to find out how the picture "goes," then they take it back to the studio and correct it accordingly. They try to keep me and other critics away from these preliminary previews, because

Charles Emmett Mack was raised among the Pennsylvania miners. He was a member of the Griffith studio crew when the dean of directors selected him for a rôle in "Dream Street"

SOUNDS like the title of an old-fashioned dime novel, doesn't it? But it is the true story of Charles Emmett Mack. . . .

The young actor has just finished making "The Unknown Soldier," a rôle for which leading men fought and bled even as feminine stars once struggled over Peter Pan, yet it is not so long ago that directors were calling:

"Oh, Charlie, get me a kitten that will look like this one did before she grew up!" Or—

"Say, I've gotta have a knife that'll look dangerous, but the baby has to pick it up, so it mustn't be dangerous—and a couple calves marked alike—yes, and a lamp from a forty-niner stage coach, by one o'clock, Charlie!"

Before that, tho, Charles Emmett Mack was a studio guide in the Griffith Mamaroneck Studios. He used to take parties of visitors over the sets.

Griffith's Prop Boy

"I WAS allowed five minutes on each set," he explained, "and I used to think up new jokes every night to spring on them next day. We went on Mr. Griffith's set whenever he was working, because that was the real thrill. He'd look at me when we'd come in, but he'd never speak. I always thought that he'd manage to worry along if I never came back.

"Then I got into the property room. Naturally, I saw more of Mr. Griffith. He wasn't like the others—he always made it easy to get things from him. You know the definition of a prop man: 'A fellow who wants to borrow something.' And you know how popular that makes one.

"One day, I'd gone down to his set for some reason, and was sitting on the curb waiting for a bus to go back, when Mr. Griffith came out after me.

"'Come and rehearse this scene,'" he invited me.

"I was just a kid and I thought he was making fun of me. 'No thanks,' I said, 'I came to this studio to learn to be a director.

Abbe

Griffith Made Charles Emmett Mack Into an Actor

I couldn't consider being an actor.'

"He looked at me then—hard—and smiled.

"So you're going to be a director! Well, you come and rehearse this scene for me, Charlie,' he said. That was the first time he had called me 'Charlie,' so I went.

Then—"Dream Street"

"MR. GRIFFITH always rehearsed for weeks before he turned one crank of the camera. I rehearsed the part in 'Dream Street' with everyone on the set kidding me. I didn't know whether or not it was all a joke, sometimes. But I'd been around a studio two years and I'd picked up a little. I liked the part and Mr. Griffith was wonderful.

"One day, after we'd rehearsed the last scene, Carol Dempster, Ralph Graves and I were sitting in a row on a bench when Mr. Griffith came up.

"Got your clothes for the picture?" he asked. Carol and Ralph both said 'Yes,' and Mr. Griffith turned to me and said: 'That suit'll do, Charlie.'

"Oh, no! This isn't the kind of suit I want,' I returned. You see, I was born and brought up in the anthracite region where immigrants come in just 'as is,' and I knew exactly what the boy as I saw him should wear. Mr. Griffith let me have my way. I think he was pleased that I had ideas. At any rate, that was the first time I was absolutely sure there was no mistake about my playing the part.

"The first time I saw myself on the screen I thought I couldn't stand it. We were all in the projection room looking at the rushes of my first day's work. I couldn't think of the shadow on the screen as myself—I thought of it as 'It.' I saw this thing sneak in. It had such big ears and such a strange nose. Its mouth seemed to be all over its face. And then suddenly it turned around on me and I bolted out of the room.

"Mr. Griffith sent for me and had me sit by him while he showed me what was wrong and why. I thought it all terrible, but he seemed to think it good, and so I kept on acting instead of going back to the property room."

Raised Among the Miners

THE Macks were Irish, which was possibly the reason Charles could wheedle anything from crested card trays to the gardener's baby out of reluctant "prospects" when he was a prop boy. The Irish tongue was also no doubt the cause of his forgivable alibis when black swans or thirteenth century swords failed to measure up to directorial desires.

But when Charles was little, his playmates were as likely to be Czechs or Poles or Russians as native Pennsylvanians.

The KID From CAPE COD

DAREOS, Hollywood's favorite crystal-gazer, left the table of well-known stars at Marion Davies' party and walked across the room to one at which sat an obscure young player named Charles Farrell.

"You should be happy," Dareos observed, in that far-away voice of his. "Your future holds the biggest promise of any man's on the screen."

Charles Farrell beamed at the seer, as he would, I believe, beam at an enemy if it were possible to conceive of Charles as having an enemy. But he didn't pay much attention to the prophecy. He thought it was just part of the party. . . .

Opportunity in "Old Ironsides"

AND now Charles Farrell is playing the most coveted juvenile lead of the year, the part of the Commodore in "Old Ironsides," after nearly three years in extra rôles.

He sat on the rocky beach at Catalina, stripped to the waist and barefoot, chained with an iron chain to George Bancroft, who was similarly bound to Wallace Beery, in turn manacled to George Godfrey, negro champion of the ring. The rocks were sharp, the sun was blistering, and leg-irons chafed and cut in the rougher action of their scenes. First aid was continually being called on between clicks of the cameras as the four escaping captives fought and struggled, slipped and scrambled among the jagged boulders at the edge of the blue sea.

"Isn't it great?" cried Charles, in an interval between shots. "We've been inseparable for two weeks—we four—and soon we have to swim out to the Esther, chains and all!"

He seemed pleased at the prospect.

"We've done about everything else—been lost at sea, almost wrecked on Dead Man's Island, dropped over walls, been in every kind of fight—oh, yes, we still have the big battle scenes and the explosions! After I had worked in the picture for three days, I went out and got my life insured for twenty-five thousand dollars, took accident insurance and everything, so it doesn't matter.

Charles Farrell played extras for Fox and small rôles with Warner. Now James Cruze has given him the leading rôle in "Old Ironsides." Farrell's opportunity is here. Left, as he appears in "Old Ironsides"

"I'm having the time of my life!" He looked it, too, with his laughing brown eyes, his hair wind-blown and his disarming smile. His is truly "the face of one who's steppin' to a fair," as the Irish say.

Distinct Irish Type

PEOPLE are always picking out a successor to the beloved Wallace Reid—so why shouldn't I?

Part of Wallie's hold on fans was his hold on those immediately around him. Charles has that fascination off the screen—now if he can get it over on the screen!

When he played his scenes in the rigging of the Esther, a sailor stood by. Not that he could do anything if Charles fell but just for "moral support." An ex-prize-fighter waited with a warm robe during Charles' scenes in the storm and had a berth and hot coffee ready for the almost frozen young actor. They used to do things like that for Wallie.

And Wallie used to do the sort of things Charles does.

The Esther went out looking for a storm, for far be it from Jim Cruze to use wind-machines! They looked for ten days and returned disappointed. No sooner had supplies been removed from the ship and everyone landed than clouds appeared on the horizon and the Pacific began to belie its name.

"Everybody with me?" asked Mr. Cruze.

"Aye, aye, sir!" chorused the cast, in proper seagoing style.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

I HAVE just returned to the twentieth century after living for a few days in the early part of the nineteenth. Your Majesty is familiar with the theory advanced by Bergson, Ousprensky and other mystic philosophers—the theory that time and space do not really exist, and everything that ever was or ever will be is accessible, if we have the key.

My experience in the last few days leads me almost to accept this theory. For I was as completely isolated in the period of 1812 as if I had never lived at any other time.

I was aboard the good ship Esther, which sailed from Salem, Massachusetts, in the spring of 1812 and was captured by Barbary pirates and rescued by the frigate Constitution. The Esther lay at dock on the Isthmus at Catalina Island. This side of the island was deserted except for the Paramount players who represented the village life of that earlier day and the crews of the thirty-odd ships which are being used in the filming of "Old Ironsides."

The Cabrillo, one of the largest of the ships in this fleet, on which the cast of "Old Ironsides" is quartered, was afloat for two weeks without landing. During this time she was caught in one of the violent storms that have scourged the peaceful waters of the Pacific this last spring, and for hours she ran before the wind, a toy in the hands of Providence.

The village at the Isthmus is a picturesque collection of wharves, warehouses, and roistering taverns. Sailors of a hundred and fifty years ago swagger thru its streets in ballooning trousers and straw hats from which long ribbons float. In a sunny nook on the docks an old salt—Wallace Beery or George Bancroft—will be lounging. At the entrance of the Pilgrim's Inn a noisy group will stand, persuading a recruit, well plied with grog, to ship for foreign ports.

Altogether, it was an amazing experience for 1926. And when I returned to my native habitat of Hollywood, the sight of speeding automobiles and the flappers in their abbreviated skirts struck me with dumb wonder.

Dear Majesty:

FROM the maritime scene of the early nineteenth century, which I endeavored to picture for Your Majesty in my last letter, I took a radical departure and went with another Paramount company into the midst of the Arizona desert.

Here, on a waste of sand, stretching as far as we could see, under a sun which caused the thermometer to register as high as 115 degrees in the shade, a square mud fortress had been erected for the battle scenes of "Beau Geste." There was a grimness about this desert which impressed us immediately upon arrival. And before we left, the desert had taken its toll. Diphtheria and dysentery—dread monsters that had lurked concealed among our company, came out now and boldly attacked us. One extra player died; many were ill for days. The disabled were removed to hospitals in the nearest towns and everything was done to alleviate their suffering.

The picture went on—for pictures must go on, just as a circus performance must continue, altho the lions have eaten their trainer. At night, after work, some of us would gather in Ronald Colman's tent and try to drive away the evil genius of the desert by making disagreeable sounds on musical instruments. Ron torments the harmonica, Ralph Forbes can blow an eery blast on the bugle, and Neil Hamilton is able to torture a saxophone until it groans in agony.

"Beau Geste," as Your Majesty may know, is a story of the French Foreign Legion. Much of the action takes place in the Egyptian desert. There is a Bedouin attack on the fort, a spectacle rendered more grisly by the silent, beating sun and the vast expanse of deathly wasteland.

Dear Majesty:

KNOWING well the interest Your Majesty has expressed at various times in the social life of Hollywood—so different from the quiet evenings on Your Majesty's beautiful Island of Oz—I shall endeavor to remember something of what occurred on the fête of St. Patrick's Day, as it was celebrated at the Beverly Hills domicile of Lew Cody.

Lew is one of those rare bohemians who appreciate comforts. His place is called the Old Boot and Goat. This name conveys the atmosphere of the house. It is like an English inn of a past generation. Stairs lead downward to a rathskeller, half under ground, the walls are hung with rare old theater programs and photographs of famous players long since dead.

The élite of the film world—as the society editor would say—were present that evening. Around the oaken table in the center of the room were gathered Renée Adorée, Renée's sister comique, Priscilla Dean, Gaston Glass, Hoot Gibson, and Charley Ray, wearing a dinner suit with a green necktie. In an angle-nook sat John Gilbert and Jack Pickford, exchanging confidences. John Steel came over from the Orpheum and sang for us. The fare provided by the hospitable Lew was none of the cream-puff-and-tea variety such as Pola Negri might dispense, but rather good baked beans and onions, roast fowls, a shoulder of ham and scuttles heaped with corned-beef hash.

Lew had to excuse himself at midnight and retire to his chamber. He had just received a call to "be on the set at nine o'clock." Lew was engaged at that time on Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's picturization of "Toto," the stage-play immortalized by Leo Dietrichstein. Lew in the beard and earrings of Othello should be a new thrill for his many girl admirers. There is plenty of subtle, sophisticated acting in the story, the sort of acting in which Lew Cody excels, but M-G-M has been careful to give it a nice sweet ending, which successfully demolishes the spirit of the original.

Dear Majesty:

IF I may be pardoned the pun in Your Majesty's presence, I should say that John Gilbert promises to be truly magnificent in "Bardelys the Magnificent," the story from Rafael Sabatini's novel which is being directed by King Vidor for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

I saw Jack working in one of the scenes as Bardelys and was impressed by the perfection of his art. The hero of "The Big Parade" was in quite different dress and mood. His dress was a leather jerkin trimmed with silver braid and a sword at his side. He was stained with mud and gore, having just come thru one of the numerous encounters in which this story of adventure in the picturesque years of the seventeenth century abounds.

As I sidled up to the scene, the fugitive Bardelys, hiding in the house of his prospective father-in-law, came to the grilled door separating his lady's bedchamber from the balcony on which he stood, and peered thru.

The eyes of the wounded lover, hungry with desire, searched the room. His eyes sent their appeal thru the grilled aperture so potently that his glance seemed fairly to crackle in the charged air. The door opened slowly as his hand moved the latch and the splendid, bedraggled figure crossed the threshold—moving into the camera for a close-up—large, passionate, yearning. Not acting—living. From the hardened juicer at a stand of lights a sigh and “Gee!” Highest tribute to acting that takes its place with the best on the screen today.

Under Vidor’s direction “Bardelys the Magnificent” is taking form as a dashing, romantic piece—no effort to psycho-analyze anybody—merely a rattling good adventure story, but done with artistry and authenticity that should attract the discriminating as well as the indiscriminate of movie-goers.

Dear Majesty:

WE weary writers of the screen have our moments of relaxation. I have already told Your Majesty somewhat flippantly how we enjoy these precious moments at the Writers’ Club.

But joking aside, the Writers have been producing a string of excellent one-act plays. Indeed, these theatrical inventions of the Writers are about the only amusement for sophisticated amusement-seekers in a desert of plays and pictures designed to capture the interest of the eight-year-old mind. Harry Singer, head of the Orpheum circuit, went so far as to remark to me recently that the Writers’ plays present the best acting in America at the present time.

There was an amusing evening at the Club on April 1. The announcement said that Washington’s Birthday and the return of Major Hughes (who is being groomed for a colonel of reserves) from the War College would be celebrated simultaneously on this evening. Indignant protests were received from Sons and Daughters of the Revolution, but the celebration went on just the same.

After dinner the curtain went up and on the stage at the end of the assembly room was presented the Washington’s Birthday Exercises of the Rupert Hughes Grammar School. Donald Ogden Stewart, that uncanny Scot, was the principal. Our President—the Major—responded by telling us the low-down on his widely quoted Washington’s Birthday speech in Washington. Major Hughes said that his speech, describing the Father of Our Country as a Good Scout, was well received by all the Sons of the Revolution present except one Son who was slightly stewed. And it was this old boy who made the holler because Major Hughes described George Washington as a gentleman who would take a drink occasionally!

Dear Majesty:

YOUR Majesty has often graciously expressed his curiosity at the amazing methods of motion picture manufacture. Here is another example of the mysterious workings of studio minds.

William Fox is making “What Price Glory.” Now when M-G-M filmed “The Big Parade,” by Laurence Stallings, joint-author of “What Price Glory,” they had the good taste to shoot the works. Titles and action gave a realistic picture of the war. True, those movie-goers unfortunate enough to live under censorship lost much of the picture, but those fortunate enough to live where there is still liberty of thought, enjoyed a cinematic masterpiece.

It is Fox policy to make nothing that can be censored. Now “What Price Glory” is all highly censorable—from the distorted view-point of the average movie censor. You would naturally suppose that Fox would select an uncensorable piece to begin with, but that is not the way things are done in the movies. Instead, we shall see an expurgated version of “What Price Glory” with most of the kick taken out. Fox is filming a series of stage successes and it is not beyond the range of probability that he may get around to some of the masterpieces of Shakespeare and other Elizabethan dramatists. If so—God help the Elizabethan dramatists!

On the other hand, Fox can take a stage-play such as “Pigs,” have it adapted by a clever fellow such as Al Cohen, and produce a passable picture: In “Pigs” the leading man is Richard Walling. He was shooting still-camera on the Fox lot when somebody grabbed him off for the type-hero of this piece. Every film juvenile in Hollywood had been tested and found wanting when this youth, who never acted before, stepped into the part.

Dear Majesty:

It looks as tho Warner Brothers are over the hill—for the time being. The creators of Classics of the Screen were very close to the rocks during recent months. They have just been subsidized by Los Angeles bankers to the extent of two millions—not a large sum as money goes in the movies, but enough, perhaps, to enable them to break the strangle-hold which the Lasky-Zukor-Loew combine had on their throats.

The Warner boys did a shrewd piece of business in signing Raymond L. Shrock as associate executive to function with Jack Warner in charge of production. Shrock, formerly head of Universal, is that rare combination in pictures, a business man who knows literature and dramatic art. I am expecting a consequent improvement in the quality of Warner Brothers Classics.

The Warners will lose John Barrymore after the picture on which he is now engaged. They have a flashing new star in Dolores Costello, whom they wisely sewed up with a long-term contract when the other studios would have none of her.

Strange to relate, Helene Costello is a much prettier girl and possesses about the same talent as her favored sister, Dolores. But Dolores got the breaks in pictures. Helene has the best part she ever was given with Raymond Griffith in "Wet Paint" for Paramount. Both the sisters were working as extras with Paramount at the Eastern studio when the Warners picked them up and put them under contract. Now the Warners have the pleasure of lending Helene at a goodly sum to her former employers.

Dear Majesty:

THE first pieces to come out of the Universal-Ufa mill are being awaited with curiosity by the celluloid critics hereabout. One of the first of the new series to be made under the hands-across-the-sea arrangement for exchanging directors with Germany is to be called "Love Me and the World is Mine."

The title is indicative of a result that will be a strange conglomeration. The title is American—the director is the celebrated Continental, A. E. Dupont—and the original story was "The Affairs of Hannerl," by Rudolph Hans Bartsch, an Austrian novelist.

Mary Philbin and Betty Compson have leading rôles. The picture will be in the nature of a sequel to "The Merry-Go-Round."

The German cinema has shown promise of a high artistry. Is it going to be Americanized thru the efforts of Carl Laemmle, or will it maintain its own integrity while elevating the tone of Uncle Carl's American product?

Your Majesty can well understand why we await the first of the cross-bred pictures with curiosity and some little alarm.

Hollywood.

Dear Majesty:

NOT to be outdone by Metro-Goldwyn, Paramount and First National, who have established their own houses or made arrangements with chain theaters to display their pictures, Producers Distributing Corporation have been studying this merger business ever since they embarked upon the idea of making Bigger and Better Films.

Your Majesty has seen the way the wind was blowing from the time Cecil B. De Mille became Producers' guiding spirit. The Ince studios were acquired—and then the Metropolitan. And just to keep the pot a-boiling, the Christies hopped on the P. D. C. band wagon.

What was the result, Your Majesty? Why the realization of one of the biggest producing plants in Hollywood.

But that is not all. The B. F. Keith vaudeville interests have wanted to get into the picture field for many years. For forty years the Keith organization has been engaged in vaudeville, which under E. F. Albee's régime has established itself solidly in all the cities of the country. What did this man Albee do? Why, he took his time and realized that his opportunity arrived with Producers. So the powers higher up signed on the dotted line and the film company as a result of signing their "John Hancock" will have approximately four hundred theaters in a chain extending from coast to coast.

With such an extensive chain Producers are assured of exhibiting their product in first-run theaters everywhere.

and Mary Philbin in "Love Me and the World Is Mine," with Norman Kerry.

LORETTA P.—Here we are. I tried not to disappoint you. Walter Miller is Allene Ray's leading man. Ronald Colman and Neil Hamilton in "Beau Geste." Conway Tearle is playing with Mae Murray in "Altars of Desire."

PANSY.—Well, I guess I had a raise since that time. Anyway, I am getting $15 per now. You want to see more of Rockcliffe Fellowes. Louise Fazenda has brown hair. But wait until you see John Gilbert and Greta Garbo playing together in "The Flesh and the Devil."

S. O. S. LASSIE.—Well, I've come to the rescue. Richard Barthelmess is playing in "The Amateur Gentleman." That reminds me. A man is known not so much by the company he keeps as the company he keeps out of. You want a picture of Jack Mulhall.

LOUISE.—No, I won't tell you whether Betty Bronson is Catholic. I don't know, and what's the difference, anyway. Next!

BABY B.—Yes, Anita Stewart is playing in "Rustling for Cupid" for Fox. Standing still may be easy, but it means stagnation. There is a lot I have to learn before I die. Antonio Moreno in "Love's Blindness" with Pauline Starke.

HELEN K.—My dear girl, remember that there is a warm, life-giving sun behind that dark cloud, and that it must soon break thru. That was Ronald Colman in "The White Sister." Mary Brian and Buddy Rogers are playing the leads in the Peter B. Kyne story, "More Pay, Less Work." Run in again some time.

SHEIKESS.—You want a picture of Dorothy Seastrom. She has been in the mountains for several months due to illness, but is back playing in "Delicatessen." Isn't such a nice title for a sick girl.

MR. AND MRS.—Well, speaking of love, there is no house so small that it hath not room for love; there is no castle so wide that it cannot be filled with it. Love can glorify mean things and make lowly things lovely. Thomas Meighan is happily married to Frances Ring. His next picture will be "Tin Gods" and Metro-Goldwyn have loaned Renée Adorée to play opposite him. Aileen Pringle and Norman Trevor also in the cast.

POLLY LEE.—Well, the first picture in the world refers to "The Transfiguration," by Raphael. Virginia Valli is playing in "The Family Upstairs." Lois Wilson is to play with Ford Sterling in "The Show-Off." No, "Rose-Marie" has not been produced yet, but Arthur Hammerstein intends to do it next year himself with Renée Adorée as the lead.

FLORENCE L.—Just write to Richard Dix at the Famous Players Studio, Astoria, Long Island. I understand that Ernst Lubitsch is to produce three pictures a year, for a period of five years, and he is to receive a minimum of $150,000 per picture. Never mind figuring how wealthy he will be at the end of the five years.

CUTIE.—George Lewis is playing in "His People." Blanche Sweet is being directed by her husband, Marshall Neilan, in "Diplomacy." I wonder if that is diplomacy.

ZOE C.—So this is your first offense. Welcome to the throne. You say among those who bring undesirables into America are smugglers and the stork. Yes, I guess it is often true.

MINNIE.—We might as well get acquainted right now. Rudolph Schildkraut is playing the lead in "The Music Master." What shape is a kiss? Elliptical. (A-lip-tickle.)

LILY W.—Yes, I certainly do like perfume. It takes about 50,000 roses to produce one ounce of attar of roses. "Morals for

CULLINAN.—Here we are and another month gone. Richard Dix is playing in "Say It Again," which was formerly "Take a Chance." You say "Adam's apple is something Eve handed him that he couldn't swallow." Yes, and that's no apple sauce.

ANOTHER DIXIE FAN.—Your theater is the only one that gave out those Harold Lloyd buttons. "For Heaven's Sake" has been playing at the Rialto Theater on Broadway for the last six weeks and is there at this writing. He surely has no equal. His next will be "The Mountain Lad," with Jobyna Ralston.

MADELINE P. D.—So you think it is warm enough for me to have my beard removed. I wouldn't be able to answer these questions if I did that. William Boyd is playing in "Her Man O' War" with Jetta Goudal.

EDNA D. T.—Your letter reminded me of the old joke—"Are you the mate of this ship?" said a passenger to the cook." "No, sir, I am the man that cooks the mate," said the Irishman. That dates back to when I was a child. James Kirkwood is playing with Laura La Plante in "Butterflies in the Rain."

KANGA.—No, I never counted my vocabulary, but the average man speaks about twelve thousand words a day. George B. Seitz directed "The Vanishing American." See you later.

BLANCHE A. L.—Yes, Mabel Normand is going to play for Hal Roach, and she signed a three-year contract with him. She just finished her first picture, "Raggedy Rose." What's this, another club, "The Better Picture Club, 29 Fernwood Avenue, Rochester, New York," and you want me as an honorary member. Thanks.

ROLLEN.—Batter up! I should say I do go to see the Brooklyn Dodgers. We head the list at this writing. Huntly Gordon is playing with Lillian Rich in "The Golden Web" for Warner. Yes, it is difficult to rise to the heights, but it is more difficult to stay there.

DOROTHY.—He must be a sad fellow that nobody can please. Monte Blue has the lead in "The Brute," from the novel by W. Douglas Newton. So you liked Elinor Fair in "The Volga Boatman." You write a very clever letter. Let me hear from you again.

ANTHONY O. B.—Yes, I often think back to when I was a little boy in short trousers. No, I never ran to school, I ran away from it. You know, he that has led a wicked life is afraid of his own memory. Mae Busch's last picture was "The Perch of the Devil." Belle Bennett and Ian Keith have the leads in the stage success, "The Lily," for Fox.

EDMUND LOWE FAN.—Yes, I have my buttermilk every day. I couldn't live without it. Barbara La Marr was born July 28, 1896. H. B. Warner has signed a contract with Cecil De Mille for one year. Dolores Costello will be starred with John Barrymore in "The Tavern Knight."

DANSEUSE.—Your motto is very good, but here is mine— Do not all you can; spend not all you have; believe not all you hear, and tell not all you know. Well, I used to do the old-fashioned waltz and the two-step. I wouldn't venture the Charleston in public for anything.

BLANCHE B.—Eleanor Boardman's birthday is August 19, and Philadelphia was her birthplace. She was a chorus girl before she made her first screen appearance for the Goldwyn company. Ramon Navarro was born September 20, 1899, and he played in "Where the Pavement Ends."

PEGGY.—You will see John Bowers in "Laddie" with Bess Flowers. Until recently Miss Flowers' hands were photographed in close-ups to be used as those of the stars. Betty Compson about who won the war. They say the taxicab drivers won it, and after ridin' in one of their taxis—say, did you ever ride in one of these Paris taxis?"

We both paid a tribute to the dare-devils who propel trusting Americans about the streets of Paris at maniac speed. Mix went on:

"I was in a taxi there and was ready to go back to the ho-tel. Didn't speak a worda French, but I waved my arm in what I thought was the right direction. There was a square there with a monument in it. I thought I kept passin' that monument too much and come to find out, that taxi driver had been drivin' me around that square even get themselves a monocle. But I noticed the foreigners didn't seem to cater much to these people.

"When I went over there, I didn't have any intention of changin' my ways. I wanted to see what that country was like. I didn't see why I should try and be like those people any more than they should try to be like me if they come over here for a visit."

An Aboriginal American

WHAT I am tryin to say is that Tom Mix is an American—an aboriginal American—undiluted by foreign influence. As such he deserves a great deal more respect and attention than the rest of us Americans who, in spite of our native language and habits, are pale copies, all, of European models.

When I looked at Mix talking to me in his dressing-room and noted the big white sombrero, edged in black—which he was still wearing—the vivid vest, white riding breeches and the polished boots, and then examined my own reflection in the mirror I wondered which of us would look the funnier to a visitor from some other planet. I was wearing a suit that was a Hollywood tailor's endeavor to imitate a New York tai-for twenty minutes—faster 'n a locoed bronc and pumpin' his horn all the time. I had a hell of a time makin' him understand I wanted to go back to the ho-tel."

No Cosmopolite is Mix

THERE was amused disdain in his voice when Mix related the ineffectual efforts of his entourage to be cosmopolites in strange metropolises. Mix is scornful of any efforts by fellow countrymen who in Rome try to do as the Romans.

"My wife and two of the gang bought French dictionaries and tried to learn French. I got along better by talkin' English. I didn't even change any American money into their money. I always had a waiter in the restaurants or the clerk in the ho-tel who spoke English. And I'd ask 'em to turn the check into American money. When I accumulated a lot of small change in French, I'd give it to the kids.

"One day in a restaurant I said to the gang, 'Now, you've been studyin' French so hard, let's see you order something in French.' The three of them set there and tried to order port wine and damned if they didn't get asparagus!"

"It's funny—a lot of Americans go over there—try to talk with an English accent or act Frenchy. Carry a cane and maybe

The Honesty of Mix

THE downright honesty of Mix struck home forcibly as he talked in this fashion. His honesty and a touch of the pride of a man who is sufficient unto himself. A quality that aroused a tardy admiration. A trait that explained a lot.

For instance, the outlandish garb affected by Tom Mix. Come to think of it, his garb is not outlandish—it is his native costume. Buckskins trimmed in beadwork, showing the influence of the plains Indians. Cowboys always wore such fancy garb when they dressed up—overalls for work, usually—but always the great sombrero of finest felt and the boots as costly as the purse could buy.

Mix was and still is a cowboy. The fact that he has made a fortune doing daredevil stunts before a movie camera has not changed him one whit. If he has spent some of this money in childish vanities—in putting his name in colored electrics six feet high on the roof of his cottage at Catalina Island; in doekin riding breeches and a snowy white sombrero to be worn with evening clothes; in purchasing the automobile horn of the unfortunate ex-Kaiser Wilhelm II as a plaything for his small son—if he has committed these and a dozen other barbarities, that, too, is in character.

lor's idea of how an English tailor makes clothes. And I had to admit that the visitor from Mars, if he had good taste, would decide that Mix was dressed more practically and more naturally and much more becomingly than I. His costume fitted the figure. The coloration was bold and symphonic. It was what should have been our native American costume—what the ignorant proletariat of Europe, addicted as it is to the cinema, still believes to be the American national dress.

To the eyes of those worshipful peasants abroad, Tom Mix is the typical American. They do not see the bespectacled, slack-trousered, round-shouldered, paunchy horde who, alas, compose the bulk of our population. Mix is the more modern equivalent of such a figure as Leatherstocking. He is what we might have been in America—except for our accursed "progress."

A Born Plainsman

SOMEBODY told me once that Tom Mix is of Italian parentage. His keen, swart, hawk-like profile would bear out such a conclusion. But his speech and manner are those of the born plainsman and he has a cowboy's provincial, half-humorous contempt for the Latin races which "are kinda hysterical and dont exactly know what it is all about."

The Story of REX

way to see the great wild stallion, the known "killer." He seldom disappointed them. At times his exhibitions of wild fury seemed those of a fiend incarnate.

Famed as a "Killer"

THE word of the stallion was brought to Hollywood by the Morrison brothers, specialists in providing Western atmosphere for motion-picture companies. The word came at an auspicious time on the Hal Roach lot. For months Jackman had been searching for a fit subject for a brand-new story of wild animal life, something that would be entirely out of the beaten path. Rex sounded like a good bet. Jackman went to Colorado to see for himself, and was more than satisfied.

The horse seemed too vicious to be transported to California at that time, so his first picture, "Rex, King of the Wild Horses," was made there in the picturesque terrane of Colorado.

It was originally planned to make only the one picture, but Rex proved such a screen sensation that others soon followed. "Black Cyclone" was filmed in Nevada and, last summer, "The Devil Horse," the most pretentious of the series so far, was filmed in Wyoming. Now preparations are under way for a fourth feature.

"Making a picture with an animal that is really trained," Jackman explained, "is a comparatively easy matter. But with a brute as incurably wild as Rex, it's an entirely different proposition. About all that we can actually do is to let him do the things that he really wants to do, that come natural to him, and then fit the resulting scenes into our story.

"After a long effort, his trainer has finally taught him a few rudimentary commands so that we can at least slightly control his actions before the camera. He knows that 'Get going!' means to start running; that 'Stop' means just that; and that 'Hold it' means to hold his pose of the moment. He chewed four dummies into tatters before he was finally taught to push a man with his nose without taking a sample bite of him.

"In fairly close shots, Rex's trainer directs him from just outside the camera lines. In long shots, which are usually taken in very hilly country, the trainer is usually near the stallion, but out of sight behind the brow of a hill. We carry a portable field telephone outfit on location, and on long shots the trainer gets his directions from me over this phone. This does away with shouting that would only result in making Rex too nervous to handle.

"Often, when you see Rex posed on the crest of a hill far away, looking intently into a hidden valley, there will be a small herd of mares in that valley out of camera range, carefully planted there to attract and hold his attention.

Once Started, Hard to Stop

"SUCH things as galloping madly across country, rounding up a herd of mares, and fighting other stallions, are easy. Those are in line with Rex's natural instincts, and he does them readily. The only difficulty usually is to get him to stop when we are thru. In fight scenes with another stallion, both Rex and his opponent are shod with rubber shoes and a protective leather band fastened across their teeth. This does away with possible injury from biting or kicking. Otherwise, they might kill each other before we could separate them.

Rex, Lady and their colt

"Two expert riders, mounted on very speedy horses, are always nearby when Rex is working. Their task is to herd the stallion back into control after one of his running scenes is over. Sometimes, if he happens to feel playful, he'll lead them on for miles before they finally get him. Making pictures with Rex is far from being either a speedy or an efficient process. I've seen days when we thought we were lucky if we succeeded in getting as many as two or three usable scenes.

"I don't believe that Rex is really vicious. He is only wild, with a genuine and incurable wildness that defies all efforts to tame him. We've never had a serious accident in working with him yet. He isn't handled by fear, but thru respect for his trainer and others working with him. When he is once shown that a person is not afraid of him, and is not an enemy, that person has little to fear from him so long as he uses reasonable caution and common sense when near him. The stallion's judgment of human nature is infallible. Those people whom he dislikes usually prove unpopular with the rest of us eventually.

"Rex has been ridden by three or four men, one of them being Yakima Canutt, but he is almost useless as a saddle-horse.

He doesn't buck or pitch when a rider mounts him. He either stands still, utterly refusing to budge, or else heads for the nearest wall or tree to scrape his rider from his back. He is too inherently wild ever to be saddle-broken."

Rex's Mate, Lady

TWO other star boarders at the Hal Roach ranch on Preuss Boulevard are "Marquis" and "Lady," villain and leading lady respectively of the Rex troupe. "Lady" is a Kentucky thoroughbred and was brought to Hollywood especially to play with Rex. It proved to be an equine case of love at first sight, and the little grey mare has been Rex's mate since.

"Marquis," better known on the screen as "The Killer," is the eternal villain of the wild-horse pictures. Like many screen villains, this vividly marked black-and-white "pinto" is absolutely harmless in real life, and is even somewhat of a clown.

His screen battles with Rex, however, are as deadly serious as rubber shoes and guarded teeth will permit. The enmity between the two is deep-rooted and genuine, in everyday life as well as on the screen.

Four More Authors

rights to what was left of the carcass when the edible meat had been extracted. The residue might make mighty good glue and shaving brushes and imitation ivory. In the case of my friend's novel, it had not a movie in it, and failed as such. The public did not even get good glue or shaving brushes. The author was the only one who got a benefit, handed to him on a silver platter, from the movie heaven—twice the amount he received for his story legitimately.

This indiscriminate by-product industry that has grown up in the production of motion pictures is not particularly appetizing for the box-office public. If they can extract a savory bouillon, or beef-juice, from some beefy book, all well and good, but glue and shaving brushes do not belong in the great public dining-room at all. What the motion picture-hungry public need—and where are they not to be found today!—is a special kind of animal, born, bred and sacrificed for their screen table—that fits their tastes, their palate, their appetite and their needs. Some stories of some well-known authors fill the bill of fare. Many do not. While many artistic motion-picture chefs—like Rex Ingram, for instance—can make a dish fit for the gallery gods out of a little fiction curds and whey!

VICENTE BLASCO IBAÑEZ

Señor Ibañez's secretary met me and told me that Ibañez had given instructions that first I was to be shown all over the place, no doubt so that I should be prepared to tell the world about it. There is a little touch of Hollywood flourish about Señor Ibañez. Imagine a childish quality of pleasure as though showing new toys and then ignite it all with his combustible Spanish temperament, and you will get an idea of Ibañez psychologically.

Chiefly, was I taken to Ibañez's own private motion-picture theater, just finished. Here is an ideal little movie theater that will seat about two hundred people. It is a separate concrete building and is as complete in every detail as the little theater around the corner in America to which you and I go once or twice a week—except for the familiar box-office. The walls were not decorated yet, with the exception of posters in English that announce "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," "Blood and Sand," "Enemies of Women," etc. The same posters that attracted you and me to the original productions. In this little theater, Señor Ibañez will entertain his friends and guests with "personal" reels of his picture plays.

"I like 'The Four Horsemen' best," he told me. "See," he said, leading me to the other end of his long study, "here it is in bronze!" On a stand he had built for the purpose, was a remarkable bronze group showing the terrible four horses over-riding the world. A small plate announced it to be the "Gift of Rex Ingram, Director of 'The Four Horsemen of the Apoc-

"The future of the cinema?" he repeated in very bad French. "Ah, who can say? It is limitless. But, it must come into the hands of the right people. Now—well, now it is not going ahead very fast. You see, there is no standard in the cinema—the American cinema. It is mainly in the hands of workmen and grisettes. There must come a school—a school of definite standards and a school of definite study to attain those standards and maintain them. Now, each man is for himself—and he has little idea where he is going unless he has great genius—like Rex Ingram, for instance. Most of the directors are following something that is being done over and over, year after year. I don't ask that there must always be something new, but I demand that there be something progressive. Here is a fine art being born! There is pain in all birth, so perhaps what is, is right. They always have the convention to sell the films—that is one side of it—they are not the artists, no. Why do the artists not get together and set up standards? It is just as important that we make good pictures as it is that we sell bad ones. In the cinema is a greater Art—hidden. It is waiting for intelligent students and artists to unearth it. For that there must be a school, and standards, and generous co-operation."

you will find that sentiment running strong thruout their length and breadth. There is something clean and joyous about them all.

"I was last in Hollywood when there wasn't a camera in the place," he told me when I asked him if he had ever been in Hollywood.

"Oh, one can't be too hard on the films, I suppose—no more than one can unjustly scold a child. They have done practically all my books at one time or another. 'The Beloved Vagabond,' of course, which is my favorite; 'Stella Maris' was done by Mary Pickford, you may remember? 'The Fortunate Youth,' 'Septimus,' 'Simon the Jester'—you may have seen some of them? I really don't care to go on record with my opinions as to the merits of the productions. I'll leave you and the audiences to judge for yourselves.

"However, I do think that in another fifty years or so, pictures will be taken in such a manner that they will need no captions either to tell the story or even to assist in doing so. They will be more like an act in the theater instead of being chopped up into irritating bits. There is too much going backward and forward. I become confused even in following them about in some of those enormous rooms they always portray in the pictures, where one must get it in segments and sections—and, for the life of me, I can never tell whether or not we are still in the same room. There is quite too much galloping about in them as they are. But as I said, they are only in their infancy, aren't they?"

In which you get a perfect sample of Locke's light, whimsical touch.

we sat before a blazing fire in his luxurious London apartment in Kensington Gardens. "I consider the film situation in England tragic. That is about all one can really say about it—both the best and the worst. And after that, there is nothing but the American film left.

"I am convinced that all Englishmen take a personal delight in seeing a really good film. Most certainly I do. However after seeing a really good one, when naturally return to the cinema expecting a repetition of the treat, I am almost sure to meet with something unutterably bad blankly stupid and unspeakably dull. That makes me renounce the films for months at a time.

"I can't see why there should be these frightful ups and downs in the merit of the films offered to the public. I am well acquainted with many of the leading American potentates in the film world and I know very well that they are actuated by the highest motives and ideals. They want to make great and noble pictures and do not shrink from any expense in the pursuit of their object, which may be remunerative only in the event they achieve their worthy object and ambitious end. A cynic might say that they have already made so much money that they don't mind throwing it away, but personally I think that is very far from the truth.

"It seems to me that, in the American idea of making films, there is too much tendency to concentrate on big pictures, or super-films, and so disregard the requirements of the less ambitious work. And so it is usually the ordinary film that is so atrociously bad.

"Personally—as I said in America once and have been saying ever since—I believe that in the divorce of the film from literature is where the trouble lies. The film as a vehicle for the transmission of letters to the multitude has really never begun to be tested. The opportunity to carry to even the masses of illiterate people the message of the great masterpieces thru the simple medium of pictures—that is the great point, pictures—in motion, is simply incalculable. From a literary point of view, then, I believe the possibility of the films is inexhaustible.

"But I don't mean for a moment that I think authors generally—or most gifted literary people—would be able to write successfully for the films. Evidently the writing of continuity in the construction of film plays is a special and very difficult work, requiring a great deal of study and experience. Nor would it be worth the while nor the time of successful authors to attempt to acquire this art. But when their expressionistic existence is being translated into the film media they should be freely allowed to offer their invaluable advice, both in the preservation of the main theme and the method of its illustration, which is a secret that often belongs alone to them as its creator.

"It is a dreadful thing to see a noble book murdered on the film, as so frequently happens!"

do this?' or 'I wish I had done that!' when I saw it on the screen.

"After all, every picture is simply one scene after another. In any given scene a bit player may have as much to do as a star—but a star has this advantage:

"A bit player must get over her character and her emotion in a single scene—all she knows about it and all she can show. She stands or falls by that brief instant before the camera.

The Latitude of Stardom

"A STAR may do something that is not good in one scene, see it in the projection room, and say to herself: 'That's bad, but just before this scene, or just after it, I'll do so-and-so and that will lift the thing. Maybe no one will notice that one bad bit, anyway, in a host of other scenes.'"

She touched the splashy purple planet painted on the velvet of her sleeve.

"Another item in favor of stars," she laughed, her dark eyes crinkling up in the way that we find so fascinating. "Clothes! An artist in clothes designs mine—Travis Banton. He understands how to dress me. He can take my very nebulous idea for a gown and create one that surpasses my fondest dream. He knows what sort of head-dress I can wear, and I needn't worry about my jewels—I can be sure they'll be exactly right for each costume.

"I have a beautiful black gown—I'd rather wear black than anything else when I'm doing a scene that matters to me. Every player has her favorite color, no doubt, just as she has a special abhorrence—mine is a certain shade of red."

A waiter served us a dainty luncheon on the green-enameled table in the bungalow, and Miss Vidor's eyes crinkled again as she apologized for not serving orchid salad from orchid-decorated plates.

"They tried to call me the 'Orchid Lady,'" she explained. "What have I done to deserve that? But you really can get orchid salad—it's probably made of paraffine but it looks lovely. . . ."

"I prefer human beings to exotic characterizations, don't you? It was the most 'human' casting director in the business who gave me my first lead.

"I'd just done Mimi at the time—Mr. Vidor and I hadn't been in Hollywood very long—but I had confidence in myself, and I wasn't afraid of Mr. Goodstadt—he seemed more like a friend than a casting director.

Florentine Vidor, as she appears in her first starring vehicle, "Love, the Magician"

"I admired Sessue Hayakawa, the Japanese star, who was on this lot then, but I thought him hampered by his leading ladies. I told Mr. Goodstadt so. 'I couldn't be worse than they are!' I said. 'They're perfectly vile and it couldn't do you any harm to let me see if I'll do.'

Won a Rôle with Hayakawa

"HE tried to explain to me that Hayakawa wouldn't need a new leading lady for eight weeks. No doubt he thought me quite mad. But, miraculously enough, the girl who was playing the lead left after working for two weeks and they let me try it.

"I find that people in pictures are usually reasonable about trying to give me a chance at the things I'd like to do.

"I'd love to do artistic pictures always. I have three very special stories in mind that I sometimes dream of doing, and maybe I shall get my chance at them some day. At present producers think them impossible because they'd appeal to such a small percentage of the public.

"I can see the producers' side. Pictures must be made for the people who go to see them. I know Mr. Lasky and Mr. Zukor and many of the others would prefer to give more attention to the artistic thing, but they are not making pictures merely for pleasure.

"A magazine is published for a certain group of readers—but pictures are made for the world.

"Still—one of these days—"

From the latticed window of the bungalow we could see groups of players from her set strolling along "Paradise Alley"—Rue Enos, the "frog man," with El Brendel, featured comedian from the Winter Garden; the "Juggling Rianos," with one of the acrobatic clowns; the scarlet tunic of a drummer flashing against the yellow and green of a Russian dancer.

"Call for work tonight!" somebody said, and a man in white tights echoed him on a higher key.

"That is where our new quarters at United are going to mean something," observed Miss Vidor. "We are to have—or we hope we are to have—real kitchens in our little apartments. We won't have bungalows, but nice little two-room-and-kitchen apartments. Think of the good hot suppers we can get on our little stoves! We won't mind working at night then."

Homey Dressing-Rooms

SHE turned back to the restful green of the little room.

"Isn't it odd how we revel in the little homey things that we used rather to despise when there seemed no danger of our ever getting our hands on our moon?"

"When I was a little girl growing up, I used to be laughed at by the family when I mentioned being an actress. I was shy, you see. I always talked very fast and very much, not waiting for an answer, when I went to parties or found myself in a crowd. So people wouldn't know I was shy!

"But in spite of the family's laughter—here I am. By luck, I sometimes think. I believe Mr. Vidor and I were attracted to each other because we both loved pictures. We lived in Texas and knew nobody else who cared for them as we did. As soon as we were married, we set out for Hollywood. He wanted to be a director, and I wanted to be a star. He worked the hardest—but I had the most luck—and so we each have our moon today."

The Pace That Kills

plays, new movies, new concerts, new inventions, new political situations, new murders, new discoveries, new strides in medicine, surgery, psychology, philosophy; new propaganda for or against Prohibition . . . hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of thick columns that you HAVE to keep up with if you are to be a Modern in any sense of the word. If you are to have any glimmering notion of what the man next to you in the subway is talking about when he addresses a chummy, unwelcome remark to you some evening.

Keeping Up with Things

It would take, for we have estimated it, the entire time and attention of any normal person to keep up with the new magazines. What they are using. What they are aiming at. The fiction and facts set forth in staggering array.

Unless you are to sit like a mouth-open moron when some little creature says to you, "What DID you think of the next-to-the-last article in the next-to-the-last issue of Harpers?" You will have to read Harpers. And ditto, ditto, ditto for all of the magazines treating of general fiction, movies, gland discoveries, et cetera.

It would take the entire time and attention of any normal person to keep up with the unstemmed flood of new books . . . to be able intelligently to discuss Michael Arlen versus Theodore Dreiser or Ethel M. Dell versus Edith Wharton. Not to mention the fact that this same normal person is supposed to dip now and again into the poets ancient and modern.

Try and do it!

It would take any normal person's entire time and attention to see all of the new plays—no, only the "worth while" new plays, operas, concerts, lectures and magic-lantern slides on Palestine.

No human being has three entire times and attentions. No human has more than one.

And assuming that some thrice-gifted individual does keep up with drama, literature, politics and Prohibition, there still remain such items as family obligations. . . Sister Susie having a new baby, which means the gift of a pacifier and a family call . . . shopping, for we must remain covered, if not gowned . . . social pleasures or penalties, as one chooses to regard them . . . the gift of leisure. . .

How is it to be done?

And—the Stars!

Now we come to the stars.

We talked with Douglas Fairbanks the other day and he said, truly, that in and about New York one cannot even have a thrill of one's own making.

"Thrills in New York," he said, "are forced upon you at the rate of one per second."

All of which, as we have remarked, lead us to the long-suffering and too-often maligned screen stars.

Screen stars are expected to know every thing. If they do not know everything they are labeled "Morons" without benefit of a trial by their peers.

They are expected to be immediately able to discuss anything, everything, sacred and profane, at the turning of the interrogative tap.

Interviewers and the Fan Public turn up noses and right about face if the hard working children of the cinema fail to know and orate eloquently about the fundamentals of Theosophy, Freudianism, the precepts of Havelock Ellis, the bases of Capital Punishment, the fifth chapter of Genesis interpreted figuratively and literally.

If John Gilbert cannot discuss the origin of Love, the Lives of Plutarch, "Why We Behave Like Human Beings" (if we do) and the latest best seller by an authoress he is branded as a dumb-bell. "Just another movie actor . . . no brains, no brains at all. . . ."

If Bebe Daniels cannot hold forth in flowing rhetoric about the Montessorri Method, the feudal system, Higher Education for Women, Economics, the hidalgos of Spain and the function of the thyroid gland, the dear Public will say, "Oh, well, those movie stars have sawdust brains . . . we always knew that! . . ."

And . . . if these same stars are not smartly clad, peppy in their various rôles, convivial, friendly, prompt to answer Tottie Toddle about the Best Way to Enter Motion Pictures . . . again they are branded. This time as "high hat," "ritzy," "up-stage," or some such opprobrious term.

The Deadly Pace

It is the pace that kills.

We ask you, how can you expect it? How can you expect it of anyone? How, especially, can you expect it of the stars? We marvel that they know anything save Kleig lights, tissue-paper scripts, location trips, personal appearances, fan mail, the shopping they have to do for every separate production and the way their family might look if they ever had time to look at 'em.

Think it over. It cant be done.

Mary Pickford went to bed when she last reached New York. Barbara La Marr is dead. And in the past six weeks we have personally heard D. W. Griffith, Carol Dempster, Douglas Fairbanks, Mary Pickford, John Gilbert, Adolphe Menjou and Dorothy Gish all cry, "Take me back to the Farm!"

The Celluloid Critic

The big family reunion breaks up into little family reunions, and accompanying their bickerings and sentimentalities the spectator sees the action developing romantic episodes, a triangle or two, a lot of war talk, a party or three given by war profiteers—and plenty of symbolic touches pertaining to the galloping steeds—and what not.

The most tangible scenes are those which involve the handling of the mobs. Naturally, the players are submerged.

They become so lost in the shuffle that not one (not even Jean Hersholt as a pig-gish and priggish profiteer) is able to appear real and convincing.

No Bull's-Eye Here

UNIVERSAL didn't strike the bull's-eye with "The Midnight Sun," which was heavily exploited as a true picture of Russian intrigue—Russ—passion and what-not. To come right down to brass tacks,

"Men" was taken from the story by Gouverneur Morris. Yes, Cecil De Mille is still knocking out big pictures. His next will be "The Deluge," which will be a story of Noah's Ark.

Mae C.—I can see you are all for Alberta Vaughn.

Brutus.—You want to know why a sculptor's death is the most terrible. Because he makes faces and busts! Et tu, Brutus! John Gilbert was born July 10, 1895. Richard Dix's real name is Ernest Brunner.

CLAIRE.—Enjoyed your letter on the blue paper. Write me again.

VIOLET.—Well, I should say next to love, sympathy is the divinest passion of the human heart. Read the interview with Charles Rogers in the May, 1926, Motion Picture Magazine.

MARGUERITE B.—That was Mary Astor in "Don Q." Betty Bronson is playing opposite Milton Sills in "Paradise." Yes, Pola Negri and Erich von Stroheim are to be co-starred some time during the summer in "Hotel Imperial," which von Stroheim is to direct himself. Some combination.

HELEN D. T.—Thanks again for the wonderful book you sent me. So you liked Ramon Novarro in "Ben-Hur." It was a great picture.

MERVELIA.—Sorry I cannot help you.

NORMA.—You want to know which player drinks the most. I have no way of gauging the intake of players' beverages, but if you are referring to pre-Volsteadian spirits, that's out!

ALICE IN WONDERLAND.—You say you are just a plain, common girl, don't dance, smoke, pet or anything like that. You surely selected an appropriate name for yourself. You think Lois Wilson is a ravishing beauty. Wallace Beery is playing in "The Greatest Show on Earth." Sounds like a circus.

MARY C.—That was Carl Miller in "We Moderns."

A. B., Chicago.—Your letter was quite philosophical. He who imagines he can do without the world deceives himself much; but he who fancies the world cannot do without him is still more mistaken. Greta Garbo and Conrad Nagel are playing for Metro-Goldwyn, Culver City, California.

A. B.—So "The Gold Rush" was shown in your leading picture house 252 times straight. That's some record. Chaplin ought to buy that house.

ADELINA.—Oh, Adelina! You say why is the fourth of July like oysters? Because we can't enjoy them without crackers. Bang! No, Valentino didn't use a double in "Blood and Sand." Lois Wilson is to be featured in "New York," by Sinclair Lewis, a romance built around New York's night clubs, cabarets, etc.

APRON STRINGS.—That was Blanche Sweet in "The Sporting Venus."

ROBERT F.—Bull Montana did play the part of the ape in "The Lost World." Ford Sterling is to be featured in "Louie the 14th," which will be personally supervised by Florenz Ziegfeld and which will have in the cast the chorus of Ziegfeld beauties. "Kid Boots" is also being filmed with the Ziegfeld girls prominent.

DAVE H.—Yes, of course, I'm all for Dolores Costello. She's a Brooklynite, you know.

MILICENT P.—Thanks for yours.

BARCELONA.—Yes, Theda Bara has been in a comedy for Hal Roach. She first became famous in "A Fool There Was"

CASHMERE BOUQUET

Close-up of a velvet smooth skin. No "age-lines" or coarse pores.

The lines and coarse pores, worse than birthdays to betray a woman's age.

Now—This fine "hard-milled" soap keeps your skin smooth · fragrant · youthful

Look closely at an exquisite complexion. Notice its clean, fine texture. Pores are practically invisible.

The Safest Beauty Treatment

Cleanliness is the surest way to enviable skin. But cleanliness is not mere application of soap and water. Care in the soap you use is most important.

Choose Cashmere Bouquet as the soap for your face and hands. It is "hard-milled," which means the cake is hard and firm—not the least bit sudy. With Cashmere Bouquet only enough soap penetrates the pores to cleanse them. Thus no soap stays in the pores. It all dissolves bringing dust and dirt out with it, leaving the pores clean and unstified.

Expert dermatologists, physicians who know all about skin, say water and the right soap should be used every day to keep skin smooth and youthful.

Cashmere Bouquet is the right soap. Its fragrant lather is so gentle, so cleansing, that it fairly caresses your skin and leaves it soft and lovely.

Careful special processes make Cashmere Bouquet safe for your daily use. This "hard-milled" cake is pressed into almost marble firmness. Secret essences are added to give that indescribable fragrance.

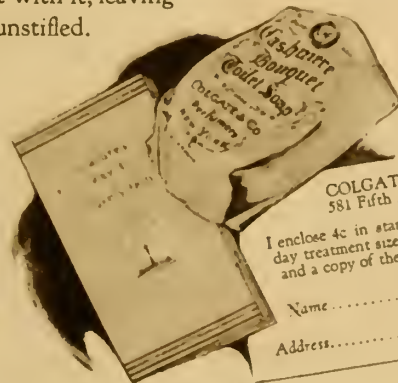

Try this Treatment—Watch Results

Wet the face with warm water. Work up a thick Cashmere Bouquet lather. Massage this into the skin with the fingertips until the skin feels refreshed and alive.

Rinse in warm water. Then a dash of cold. Pat the face dry with a soft towel. If the skin is inclined to be dry, rub in a little Colgate's Charmis Cold Cream.

they don't want us to see the pictures until they are fixed up the best they know how. And even so, they often overlook the very things that have spoiled so many pictures that might otherwise have been excellent. There are two kinds of eyes: the studio eyes and the outside public eyes, and they are just as different as a Ford and a Lincoln. But you can't get any studio man to admit this. They think they know it all.

I TOLD Louis B. Mayer, the Metro chief, that I thought his company's supremacy was to be challenged not by Famous Players-Lasky or First National, but by Joseph Schenck's United Artists. He said that he thought I was right and also that he hoped so. With Norma Talmadge, Constance Talmadge, Buster Keaton, Rudolph Valentino, John Barrymore, Gloria Swanson and so on he has a pretty good start, says I. Louis Mayer is a very wise and far-seeing man, and so is Joe Schenck, and I am telling Jesse Lasky and Adolph Zukor to watch out.

AWAY back in the dark ages, say about 1913, we used to run pictures of Ollie Kirby and George Larkin in our gallery of famous players. They took me out the other night to a preview of "The Wise Guy" at Glendale, and after that a few of us went to their home in the mountains near-by. The picture was very bad and it will need a lot of doctoring before it will be fit for release, but the home of Ollie and George Larkin was one of the cutest affairs I ever saw and very artistic. And neither of them has aged a bit. They have been working in State Rights pictures lately.

VILMA BANKY lives all alone on a quiet street in a beautiful home which she rents furnished. She does not go out much and has but few intimate friends and callers. She was present at two large parties given by Samuel Goldwyn but otherwise she has not been seen out much. On those occasions she did not seem to mix, but kept aloof. She thinks that her foreign accent and difficulty of expressing herself make her society undesirable and she keeps aloof. Yes, she is lonesome at times, and then she reads. Corliss Palmer and I dined with her the other night and we three spent the evening together. She was dressed very simply, almost plainly, and her manner and appearance were that of a lady high-born—a typical princess. She has a soft, sweet voice, a pleasant smile and a winsome personality. She is distinctly feminine, rather quiet than vivacious, and subdued rather than demonstrative. Her foreign accent is captivating, and her good-natured distress at being unable to say what she wants to say is quite enchanting. If she has any deep emotions, any hatred, contempt, hauteur, or anger, it is not obvious. She is nothing like Lillian Gish, yet she is the exact opposite of Pola Negri. Lillian is frail and defenseless and was made to suffer and be batted about; Pola was made to rule a nation, lead an army and put up a fiery fight for her country or for the one she loves; but Vilma was made for a gentle princess, to love and be loved amid sunshine and flowers.

CALIFORNIA is the land of sports, amusements, sunshine, motoring and gaiety and out-of-doors. Prize-fights, yachting, baseball, racing, tennis, dancing, bathing and everything lively and athletic. As for literature, art, sculpture, painting, opera, drama, symphony, lectures, etc.—not so much.

CHARLEY CHASE, who is so funny in those Hal Roach comedies, and who will some day be making five-reel features, is a regular fellow off screen. I lunched with him recently and nobody would ever take him for an actor. He isn't even so funny as I am—and that's not much. He is traveling the same path that Douglas MacLean, Raymond Griffith and Harry Langdon traveled and within a year or so will probably arrive at the same destination—feature stardom.

CLIVE BROOK was in the same luncheon party with Chase and myself and he is an interesting conversation (not "al")ist. He, too, looks nothing like an actor nor does he dress or talk like one. They are both natural, genteel, dignified and likable.

"DON JUAN," with John Barrymore and Estelle Taylor, was finished and previewed some months ago (as I write this) and yet they are taking a few more scenes next Sunday. Warner Brothers have already spent a small fortune on this picture, and let us all hope that they are not "throwing good money after bad."

ONE of the best jokes I have heard is on Corliss Palmer. Some time ago while at a Marion Davies party she chanced to fall in with a funny little foreigner who wore glasses with a black ribbon and spoke poor English. "Are you in pictures?" he asked, and Corliss said that she was just beginning but had played a few parts. "Oh, wont you help me to get in, too?" the foreigner begged. "Please let me go around with you to the different studios, and I know you can help me. I long to be an actor—I must be a great actor."

Not wishing to offend him, altho she saw that he was well-looking and rather pleasing and attractive, Corliss replied: "I suppose you want to play such parts as a musician, or a poet or a professor?"

"Oh, no!" he replied in broken English, "I want to play the great lover like Valentino and Gilbert—I want to make violent love to beautiful women—full of fire and passion."

And thus thruout the evening the villain still pursued her and repeatedly begged Corliss to help him get into the movies. Corliss did not want to hurt the poor man's feelings and she felt sorry for him, but somehow she got out of it, and did not even remember his name, nor he hers, and she did not see him again. The curtain now rises on the last act. The other day Corliss was in my office looking over the latest MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC when I heard her exclaim, "Great Scott!" and then laugh repeatedly. I looked over her shoulder to see what she was reading and it was a long, illustrated article about Ernest Vадja, the famous Hungarian dramatist, who has been writing screen stories for Famous Players at about a million dollars apiece. "Well, what do you think of that!" laughed Corliss, "the mean man! But he certainly did fool me, all right—"

DROPPING in at the Mack Sennett studio I ran across charming little Alice Day who had just finished for the day. She is just as cute and pretty off the screen as on, and I am convinced from what I saw and since heard that she is not only a good girl but one of excellent morals, principles and habits. There is nothing wild or loose about her. She lives with her mother and sister, Marceline, about three miles from the studio, and she is very popular with the younger set of high-class girls of which Mary Philbin is one and who lives only a few blocks away.

Smart women everywhere recognize the importance of a fresh clear skin

THE effect of many a Paris gown has been ruined by a bad complexion. This is an age of absolute cleanliness, freshness, daintiness—when a clear satin-like skin is more to be desired than the latest style creation.

Yet frequently the excessive perspiration of summer combined with dust, powder and the natural oil of the skin makes the charm of daintiness seem impossible. There is one way to attain it. Keep your skin clean by using plenty of pure soap and warm water.

Resinol Soap is ideal for every skin and will stand any test of purity. It has no heavy perfume—just the delightful refreshing Resinol fragrance. This distinctive fragrance, as well as its rich color, is your guarantee for the healthful Resinol properties it contains.

Buy a cake from your druggist or toilet goods dealer, and bathe your face with it tonight. Note how readily it lathers, how gently but thoroughly it cleanses the pores, how easily it rinses, how soft, velvety and refreshed it leaves your skin. Resinol Soap makes you feel clean.

If blackheads, blotches, etc., are already present, apply Resinol Ointment to the irritated spots and see how it clears them away. This soothing, healing preparation has been used for years in treating skin troubles slight or serious. Excellent for the relief of sunburn, chafing, prickly heat, etc.

The Kid from Cape Cod

"Come on, then. Let's shoot it quick and get it over."

On board they went, pell-mell, stopping not for fresh supplies nor changes of garb. Straight into the teeth of the worst storm in years they sailed.

In the brief intervals when the Esther was not attempting to stand on her head, or engaged in inventing a maritime step for a sea-Charleston, it was discovered that the two compasses on board disagreed. They tried following first one, then the other, and ended by becoming hopelessly lost. Instead of the three hours they had anticipated, time stretched to thirty-six.

At eight o'clock on the evening of the first day, Charles, who was of the very, very few who could still think of food as something to be eaten, began to inquire about dinner. The crew—who were, of course, not sick—were also inquiring.

"Let's go down to the cook's lair," suggested Charles. "If he's there, we'll make him give us something—if he isn't, I'll cook."

Takes Cook's Rôle

THERE was nothing to eat in the cook's lair, but there was a box of flapjack flour on a shelf.

"If we can find some maple syrup—" planned Charles.

Somebody did.

From eight o'clock until past one next morning, the juvenile lead of "Old Ironsides" stood by the stove and fried flapjacks for the sailors and those few others who could look on a flapjack without loathing. . . .

When Charles was on the high-school team back in Massachusetts, he once answered the question, "What are you going to do when you leave school?" with the words, "Go into pictures." The rest of the team yelled "Yah—Sissy!" and other things at him. So he prudently decided to become a dentist. Besides, Hollywood is a good many days' walk from Cape Cod.

However, when he was on his way to register at a dental college, he began to consider that all his pals were registering at Boston University. After all, what is life without pals? He registered with them, for a four-year course in business administration.

It appeared that three of these years were to be spent at the U. and the fourth in actual experience. When Charles reached the fourth year, the authorities wished to place him in an office at eighteen dollars a week.

Hails from New England

"I STRUCK for twenty-five," chuckled Charles. "I told 'em I could go to work for my father for that, and his work was more interesting. He's a picture exhibitor and has three theaters. They wouldn't come up to twenty-five, so I left."

A chance to go out with a vaudeville troupe playing one of his father's theaters took the boy as far West as Fort Worth, Texas.

"I had money enough saved either to go home or to go to Hollywood," remembered Charles, his laughing eyes on the sea, giving me thus a profile view of his sideburn-ornamented face, the profile without the scars, which is as different as may be from the profile with the scars.

"I decided on Hollywood. I went to the studios, trying to get extra work, but had no luck. I thought I'd crash the gates, but the gateman always said, 'Where's your check?' and I hadn't one. One day, one of the boys who knew the gateman let me have his check and I flashed it and got by while the other fellow said, 'H'are you, Bill?' and sailed in without showing his.

"I thought I had to have experience—that they'd ask me questions. 'Who directed you?' etc. But they never do ask anything.

"Soon I got in as extra in most big productions—"Ten Commandments,' 'Hunchback of Notre Dame.' I worked a lot in Poverty Row. Small independents would make a picture in a week. Charles Hutchinson was usually the lead, Karl Dane was the heavy and I was the juvenile. Then I'd go back to extra or bits.

"Fox was the first studio to give me a part in a big picture. I was in 'Wings of Youth.' After the first rushes, they offered me a contract, but I thought I must be good, so I wouldn't take it.

Discovered by Cruze

A WEEK later, Mr. Cruze sent for me. I didn't see him the first time I went to Lasky's, so I thought it was just one of those things and let them send for me again. When I went to Mr. Cruze's office, Walter Woods, who wrote the story, was in the room.

"What have you done in pictures?" Mr. Cruze asked me.

"Nothing."

"He talked to me a minute or two. Then he asked: 'How's your physique?'"

"So-so," I said. I felt contrary, because I thought it was all a form and they didn't mean anything.

"He made me take my things off. 'How about your back?' he asked.

"Not so good," I said, but he seemed satisfied with it.

"Would you be afraid to play scenes in the rigging of an old sailing vessel?" he asked.

"No. I was born near Cape Cod, and I used to dive off the riggings of ships in the harbor when I was a kid."

"I noticed they gasped when I spoke of Cape Cod. The chap in the story is from Cape Cod. I didn't know that then. Finally, they decided I was the man they wanted, and after a while Fox let them have me, and here I am.

"And what I'll do when it's all over and I have to go home, I don't know!"

He looked up at the Tripolitan fort, rising in gray-green tiers above us, in the peace of its palms and the menace of its cannon. Pirates in striped turbans and baggy red trousers dangled pointed shoes over the walls, and here and there a ragged slave slept in the shadow of an embrasure. Adventure. Excitement. Romance. . . .

"Come on, Kid!"

JIM CRUZE came back from shooting at an elusive wild duck lurking about the Esther at anchor in the cove. Wallace Beery appeared from beneath the coat where he was sheltering his shaven head from the sun, and George Bancroft tossed his long bob out of his eyes.

"Come on, kid!" bellowed the last named. "Come back to your Uncle George and your Uncle Wallie!"

Charles Farrell, as he was buckled back into his iron belt that bound him to his "Uncle George," smiled his happy smile.

"We've got to stick together, boys!" said the youth, who is said to have the most promising future in Hollywood, as they manacled Champion Godfrey to the other end of the chain.

And the four started gaily into the sea. . . .

Big Pictures and Little Ones

after they had been started, grew out of bounds, and were the objects of extra special care. Both proved to be triumphant successes, artistically and commercially as well.

Here were two cases, then, wherein quality was allowed to predominate. If "The Covered Wagon" and "The Big Parade" had been produced in the usual manner, in four or six weeks' time, and delivered to the exhibitors on a scheduled date, two memorable pictures would have been lost.

As it happened, James Cruze in the one case, and King Vidor in the other, were given free reign and allowed to run. The results of their sprints have been enormously profitable, to producers and public alike.

If you look back thru the list of movies that, for one reason or another, have earned a position in the Hall of Film Fame, you will find almost no program pictures. They are essentially creatures of the moment, sold across the counter for what they would bring—and speedily forgotten.

It is not the money, or the size of the sets, or the number of extras that makes a big picture big. It is the amount of intelligent effort that goes into its production. Artists who are compelled to punch a time-clock cease to be artists, they are converted into machines, and their products become as mechanical and as thoroughly lacking in originality as so many Ford cars.

The great triumphs of the movies are achieved by the craftsmen who take a sincere pride in their work. They are the men and women who produce the big pictures.

They Say—

screen, and less of hokum and bunk; would like more of real womanhood, and less of flapperdom—(every community of the United States, including those located in the "sticks," has plenty of flappers of the home-made variety—in fact, is fed up on the nuisances); would like to see more of "home-folk" and less of the "upper ten" stuff.

Editors alone can not bring this about, nor can patrons alone do so; nor yet producers alone. But I believe that if editors, patrons and producers get together, they can bring about a vast improvement in the movie industry, and do it in a comparatively brief span of time.

Huzzahs for the Handsome Heroes

Editor, CLASSIC:

I think that Mr. Edwin Meyers started something in the May number of CLASSIC when he put up a plea for Milton Sills, Conway Tearle, Thomas Meighan, et al., as against the young and handsome lovers of the screen.

Men just cant understand why women admire young and handsome and romantic men. They do not know that the hero of every woman's dream is young, and handsome, and romantic. And yet, on the other hand, men themselves admire young and lovely girls; and the girl of their dreams, for whom some of them are even should arrive at a decision to make it part of a forthcoming comedy. It so happened that Charlie Chaplin was one of the players picked out to "do his stuff" in the shots which Sennett intended grabbing. The very nature of the manner in which scenes must be filmed made "rush" the order of the day and Chaplin scurried about the studio to don a hasty make-up for the Baby Parade film. In his haste he found no time to put on the clothes he had used in his first Keystone pictures. Hurriedly he annexed a derby hat and a flexible cane. Then came the need of trousers and shoes. There was no time to be lost. Looking around, he spied a pair of pants which belonged to a generously proportioned gentleman known as Fatty Arbuckle. He proceeded to don the trousers, wrapping them ineffectually about his waist in order to reduce the balloonlike effect which they achieved on his slender legs. So much for the trousers. He still required a pair of shoes. At that time a fellow stock-company member of Chaplin's who answered to the name of Ford Sterling happened to be the possessor of a pair of stage-comedy shoes several sizes too large to come under the heading of "natty footwear." Chaplin donned Mr. Sterling's mirth-provoking pedal extremities.

Thus equipped with a borrowed wardrobe, he proceeded to make his way to the scene of the baby-parade activities, where, at odd moments, he ingeniously placed himself in front of the Keystone cameras, always making sure that there were plenty of mothers and babies to serve as a background for his comic capers.

Came Fame

So the shots were secured and, in due course of time, found their way into a single-reel release of the Keystone brand and distributed by the then all-powerful Mutual, a forerunner of the giant distributing companies of today. The picture scored immediately with the exhibitors of the country. Everywhere showmen and exchange managers asked the same question: "Who is the little guy with the funny walk?"

In shoes several sizes too large for him, Chaplin shuffled thru the various scenes in the picture, acquiring a walk which was to become the most imitated of all things of the screen. Children and grown-ups alike sought to ape the Chaplin walk of the actor in the borrowed shoes, which flapped and spread in ridiculous fashion as the comedian shuffled about, cane in hand and shabby derby jauntily perched on his head.

Picture after picture came from the Keystone studio in which the "funny little guy" continued to wear the make-up of the Baby Parade offering. After each picture would come the flood of inquiries from exhibitor, patron and exchange man, demanding the name of the player who wore the flappy pants and the big shoes.

Those were the days when personal publicity was frowned upon by the makers of the various brands of pictures. Very few were the names of the players known to the fans. But the storm of popular approval which greeted each effort of Chaplin finally forced the sponsors of Keystone comedies to accede to public demand, with the result that the comedian received his first public mention in the press and also on the screen.

The Borrowed Costume

FILM history does not reveal whether or not Charlie Chaplin proceeded to secure for himself a replica of the borrowed costume which he wore in the Baby Parade epic. Undoubtedly, Messrs. Sterling and Arbuckle, needing the shoes and pants in their business, reclaimed their borrowed comic paraphernalia. While the clothes used by Chaplin gave him the first emphatic push along the road of success, it is unnecessary to stress the fact that his artistic talents were and still are superior to the mere detail of comedy wardrobe. The flood of Chaplin imitators who assaulted the screen following his first success demonstrated this clearly. Affecting the derby, cane, baggy pants and large shoes, they sadly lacked the pantomimic abilities which mark Chaplin as the greatest of all laugh producers in films, whether wearing the costume he made famous or arrayed in conventional attire.

At some future time, should the greatness of the business of making motion pictures demand a permanent monument for its exposition and propagation as one of modern civilization's most distinguished arts, I believe that alongside of Billy Bitzer's epic camera and Harold Lloyd's historic glassless spectacles should be placed the dilapidated derby and its companion outfit of the original Chaplin make-up.

So, despite the enticing tales of success with which the Pollyanna scribblers regale an aspiring public, I must stick to my story that here is one man who achieved limousines and a million-dollar income on a totally different kind of borrowed capital—old clothes.

The Celluloid Critic

it doesn't offer anything more than a simple triangle—which could just as well have been placed against an American background—say, Hollywood, for instance. There is nothing in common with Russian life here—not even in the atmosphere.

Laura La Plante is the central figure—but she belongs in light comedies. She fails to touch the emotional chords as a temptress who plays a Grand Duke against the crass Croesus of St. Petersburg while she develops a romance with an officer of the G. D.'s guard. And in establishing this romantic element the director misses the dramatic possibilities entirely. He just hints at the tragic note.

I can't remember a picture which has carried more of an old-fashioned finale than this one. It resembles the early Biograph period in its mad melodramatics or heroics.

But through it all Pat O'Malley manages to act with authority and understanding in his rôle of the Grand Duke—and George Siegmund gets plenty of character into the part of the wealthy Tartar.

Alyce Mills, after the beauty contest had come and gone, found herself possessed of its memory only and a few photographs of doubtful value. It is probable, under any circumstances, she had tolerated her migratory flight to New York and the long dreary uphill climb that has landed her now near the top—but, oh, after so many months of continuous disappointment, of appalling discouragement.

In one way, the seeker after movie fame must be like a rubber ball. He or she must learn to rebound, to bounce merrily back, after each time Fate hurls him or her up against the granite wall of shattered hopes.

Miss Mills is a blonde. It is inevitable, perhaps, that she would be, as a foil for the darker charms of her male colleague, for gentlemen screen stars of brunette type, it is said, always prefer blondes or those nearly blonde. It is the law of opposites. It seems, too, to have been a season for blondes, when one considers the spotlight of interest that has been cast upon such golden-haired personalities as Vitma Banky, Norma Shearer, et al.

Playing Opposite Dix

ALYCE MILLS is ideally suited, we think, to the rôle she is playing in "Say It Again," for the picture, as it happens, is a sort of serio-comic treatment of the Princess-Mythical kingdom-American hero hodgepodge that flourished during the early part of the Twentieth Century and has only been heard of since in places like libraries. Miss Mills is the heroine of the opus, while Richard Dix is the heart-smashing hero, and a lovely heroine she is to his masculine charms.

It had been three years at least since we'd seen Miss Mills, and water, we knew, had a way of rolling in great quantities under bridges as time passed.

"You're not married?" we asked, rather thinking that she was.

She shook her head with a luminous smile. "No," she told us. And then, lest we misunderstand, she added brightly, "but I've had lots of chances." Watching her, we found this easy to believe.

"You were wise," we told her, "to stick to your career. Marriage should be secondary."

But she shook her head doubtfully.

"I'd like to think so," she said, "but I'm afraid I'm too much of just plain girl to feel that way. Somehow, marriage has always seemed to me to be the most important business in life—the star to every wandering moth! I'm a predestined wife, I guess. And tho' I've been busy with a career for the past four years, it has always seemed to me as tho' marriage was the real goal toward which I was pointed instead of screen fame.

"I got that rare thing called a chance," she said. "I was doing extra work, here, there, wherever there was extra work to be done, when someone who had seen me recommended me to Elmer Clifton, who was about to start making 'Daughters of the Night' for Fox. Mr. Clifton sent for me, and my engagement followed. After the Fox picture came my real chance with B. P. Schulberg, for this was a contract to appear in five pictures, including 'Faint Perfume,' 'My Lady's Lips' and 'The Keeper of the Bees.' Then came Famous with an offer to appear in 'Say It Again' with Mr. Dix, and you can imagine how pleased I was.

"Curiously," she added, "my chance with B. P. Schulberg followed an Elmer Clifton picture as Clara Bow's did."

HERE'S a test you'll enjoy making. It makes teeth white and gleaming. Run your tongue across your teeth, and you will feel a film, a viscous coat that covers them.

FILM . . . the great enemy of healthy teeth and gums

That film is an enemy to your teeth—and your gums. You must remove it.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It absorbs discolorations and gives your teeth that cloudy "off-color" look. Germs by the millions breed in it and lay your teeth open to decay. And they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and gum disorders.

Tooth troubles and gum troubles now are largely traced to that film. That's why, regardless of the care you take now, your teeth remain dull and unattractive.

Firm the gums

Now, in a new-type dentifrice called Pepsodent, dental science has discovered effective combatants. Their action is to curdle the film and remove it, then to firm the gums.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Mail the coupon. A ten-day tube will be sent you free.

She's from Alabam'

decorated and furnished it herself and began painting parchment lamp-shades.

"It was the best-looking place," smiled Dorothy, from the depths of the overstuffed chair in her newly acquired Hollywood home, "I got old rugs—and the order of this one—and had them dyed black. Then I did the place in robins' egg blue with touches of orange. . . . I bought this house furnished and I think it's terrible. But come back again in three weeks and you'll be surprised! . . ."

"I couldn't take care of all the orders I had at the studio, but all the time in the back of my mind was the idea of being an actress. I used to spend my lunch money on pictures—it was always pictures more than the stage that interested me."

In that strange way most of us have of reaching for the thing we want by pretending to be reaching for something else, Dorothy got to New York. Ostensibly she went to take an art course, but when she arrived, she hurried at once to an agent's office to try for the stage.

Studied Acrobatic Dancing

"You'd better learn acrobatic dancing. You must have some qualification nowadays," one kindly soul told her.

Dorothy counted over her dwindling funds. A course in acrobatic dancing lasted a year at the least. Well, there was enough to try a month at it!

"It was excruciating!" said Dorothy. "They'd put me against a wall and force one leg up over my shoulder until the tears rolled down my cheeks. Then they stretched me and pulled me about while I suffered agonies. I thought: 'It's frightful—but if this is what you have to do to get on the stage, I'll bear it.' And then one morning I woke up and found I couldn't get out of bed!"

While she was struggling with rebellious muscles, a notice to the effect that Ned Wayburn was selecting girls for a fashion show came to her attention, and as soon as she could force herself to dress she made her way to his office, under the mistaken impression that he was seeing them there.

It was drawl that did it, for Dorothy was so weary and discouraged, so sick with the dancing outrage that she didn't look particularly well.

"What's your name?" asked Ned Wayburn, and when she had told him he directed her to the hall.

Arrived there, she stood among all the hundreds of gathered beauties and despaired. Not for long, however. Ned Wayburn appeared, silence descended and his first words were:

"Will Dorothy Sebastian come to the desk?"

"It seemed miles across the long room," confessed Dorothy. "I thought he was probably going to tell me to go home and I was scared. But he told the clerk to O.-K. my name and I walked on air."

The fashion show lasted a week. In the dressing-rooms Dorothy listened avidly to the talk of the proposed George White's "Scandals," the big event of 1924. Erte had designed sets and costumes. It was to overshadow everything that had ever happened. Etc.

The girls were all selected—that was the trouble. But Dorothy marched over to the theater where rehearsals were to begin and entered the stage door with the rest.

Landed in the "Scandals"

A SLIM man in spats, straw hat over one ear and cane over one arm, strolled across the broad expanse of stage on which groups were rehearsing and stopped before Dorothy.

"What are you doing here?" he inquired. "I want to see Mr. White."

"I'm Mr. White."
"Oh, dont kid me! I want to see George White."

"What do you want to say to him? Had any experience?"

"No, I haven't, but I'm going to tell him I have. I'm going to tell him I'm a dancer and a singer and I can do anything—!" (That intriguing "innything"!)

"But suppose he asks you to prove it?" inquired the man in spats.

"I can dance anything anybody teaches me—and I can sing in a chorus. I know I can do whatever he wants me to do—"

"Where are you from?"
"Alabam'."

"Well, Alabam', I am George White and I'm from Dixie, too! Go over there and start rehearsing with the girls!"

Dolores and Helene Costello were in the "Scandals," too.

"That's just the sort of girls we had," exclaimed Dorothy, her hazel eyes shining, "sweet and genuine and talented."

Costellos Also in "Scandals"

It was because Dorothy herself was serious about her future that she came to Hollywood. Pictures seemed to her the only thing that really mattered and she set her brains to work to find the way in.

On the train coming out she heard that Robert Kane was to produce independently and that Henry King was to direct the first picture, "Sackcloth and Scarlet."

"I'll be in 'Sackcloth and Scarlet,'" decided Dorothy; and upon her arrival in the city of stars, she donned her prettiest frock, wrapped herself in the painfully saved-for fur coat and strolled over to United Studios.

It may have been the fur coat, but I am inclined to think it was the Alabama drawl that got her past the gateman and into the office where the director was engaged in casting.

The two gentlemen whose names begin with K were likewise hypnotized into giving the Southern beauty a screen test.

"They had me do everything Polly Freeman does in the story," said Dorothy, "only I had to imagine the top of the mountain and the handsome stranger."

"Next day they telephoned me to come over at once and broke the news to me that I was to be Polly."

"Oh, I couldn't! I cried. 'Of course I'd do my very best and ev'ing but I dont know anything about pictures and I might spoil it.'

"But they persuaded me to try and I did."

"One day they put me up against a wall with a light on one side and dark on the other and told me to suffer. I had nothing to tear, nothing to catch hold of, only the light and the dark. After that scene, Mr. Kane signed me for five years."

"And now—bless them!—they've released me to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer and I'm praying for a chance at sympathetic parts. You see, on the screen I go sort of sleepy-looking and blah, and they call that 'sex appeal' and give me these terrible heavies to do. A heavy may be all very well once in a while, but forever—!"

And I cant help thinking that when Dorothy takes her Alabam' accent and asks the officials out at M-G-M for a sympathetic part—she'll get it!

The Answer Man

and this was really the beginning of film vamps. George O'Brien is playing in "The Black Paradise."

MARY C. B.—Yes, I know where New Rochelle is. Bebe Daniels in "The College Flirt." Well, if men knew all that women think, they would be twenty times more audacious.

RUTH B.—Why Norma Shearer has brown hair and blue eyes, and was born in 1903.

ROSE-MARIE—Well, dentistry seems to appeal to women and already there are more than 1,800 women in the United States practicing the profession. No, Ramon Novarro is not married and never has been.

C. G. LOND.—Valentino's real name is Rudolph Guglielmi.

TOYOKUMI—Thanks for the pretty Japanese card. I am always glad to hear from you.

HENRY L.—Why, Gertrude Olmstead is a beauty-contest winner, and she won right after she came from high school in LaSalle, Indiana. She has chestnut-brown hair and gray-blue eyes, a fair complexion. In Corinne Griffith's next picture, "In Her Kingdom," she plays the part of a twelve-year-old girl. That's going back some—or is it going ahead! I wish you luck, but you know, as a rule the book agent doesn't interrupt a busy man; the man just gets busy to fool him.

SWEET SIXTEEN.—So J. Warren Kerrigan and Clive Brook are your favorites. Who else but Tennyson could have said, "'Tis better to have loved and lost, than never to have loved at all"? Thomas Meighan surely is playing—his next picture will be "Prosperity," a dramatic story of a man who tried to high-hat New York.

JAMES E.—Your letter was a gem. Glad to hear that you are improving. Esther Ralston was born in 1902 and Mary Astor in 1906. Esther Ralston and Clara Bow, Louise Brooks and Fay Lanphier and the Ziegfeld chorus are playing in the cast of "Glorifying the American Girl."

JESSIE.—Creighton Hale was born in Cork, Ireland. Owen Moore was born in the land of Shamrocks, too, and lacks two inches of being a six-footer. So you hope I get a raise. Well, I'm getting $15.00 per week; that keeps me going pretty good. It takes all my money for butter-milk.

GERRY.—Well, the best part of beauty is that which no picture can express. Ronald Colman was born in 1891. Norma Talmadge was born in 1895 and Mary Pickford in 1893.

RICHTER.—I should say I was glad to hear from you. Write to me any time. If you don't write me, I'll lose my job. Larry Semon joined Vitagraph in 1913, and became a star in 1915.

FRANCIS.—Lawrence Gray, Richard Dix and Adolphe Menjou are with Famous Players at Astoria, Long Island, and Ronald Colman and Lewis Stone, First National Productions, 5341 Melrose Avenue, Los Angeles.

TESSE B.—Tom Mix has two children. Ruth, by a former marriage, is sixteen and is in western pictures. Helen Holmes is Mrs. J. P. McGowan.

MARION E. D.—Lloyd Hughes was born in 1899 and is married to Gloria Hope. Richard Dix and Richard Barthelmess not married, at least the latter was once. That was Walter Pidgeon in "Mannequin." See you next month! Station A. M. signing off. It is now eleven-thirty daylight saving time. Good-night.

AILEEN PRINGLE FAN.—It was Oscar Wilde who said, "I believe that at the beginning God made a world for each separate man, and in that world which is within us we should seek to live." Thanksgiving Day occurs on the last Thursday in November. Aileen Pringle isn't married now and hasn't any children. John Gilbert and Ronald Colman are five feet ten.

ONE OF BEBE'S MANY ADMIRERS.—That was Carl Miller in "We Moderns" and George O'Brien in "The Iron Horse." So you want to know the size of Billie Dove's shoe. A bit out of my line, that. Many thanks for the posie.

FLAPPER PEGGY.—Ronald Colman has a wife in England. Born in 1891 and you think he is handsome. So do I. James Kirkwood in "The Wise Guy" and Gloria Swanson in "Personality."

Something DIFFERENT for Bobbed Hair

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25¢ direct to J. W. Kober Co., 656 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

Mix knows what it is all about—within his own world. He makes no effort to reach beyond it. There was in his lazy dignity an unmistakable something with which I was familiar—a something which once known is never to be mistaken.

"In the service?" I suggested.

"Yes."

"Where?"

"Well, I've always followed the wars."

"Well—just what wars?"

"Spanish-American—"

"What!"

"Sure. I'm forty-seven years old."

His straight black hair shows scarcely a thread of gray and the lean, toughened body reveals no secrets.

"I've always kept myself fit. Work out every day in the gym I got here."

It adjoined the dressing-room. A building labeled unobtrusively "Tom Mix Training Quarters," in great white letters. An other petty vanity of the cowboy grown affluent.

"Then I was in the border wars a lot. I was with Madero—"

"Officer?"

"Oh, yes. I was a colonel with Madero. But—" the eyes gleamed. "I was a first sergeant in the U. S. Light Artillery."

There I had it. The something I had recognized. Something in the manner that is recognizable in any man who has served in one of the mounted outfits of the regulars.

An Adventurous Youth

Mix was born in El Paso County, Texas. He was a deputy sheriff in Oklahoma, Colorado, and the Indian Territory. A revenooer in Tennessee for a space. A soldier of fortune in the border wars. After he had attracted some local attention by winning riding contests and taking prizes for bulldogging steers and other cowboy pastimes, he got a job working in a picture for Seelig. It was not a regular picture with a plot—merely an advertising film fostered by the beef packers, designated to show the career of a steer from the time it is turned out on the range until it comes to your table in the guise of a sirloin steak.

Mix played opposite the steer in the early scenes of the picture—while the animal was still lively—before it became a sirloin. From this humble beginning he was taken into one-reel Westerns, playing usually a sheriff, a rôle with which he was most familiar by that time. The astute William Fox signed him for features and suddenly the cowboy saw more money than he ever knew there was.

Mix has never worked for any movie firms except Seelig (which is defunct) and Fox. He has a feeling of loyalty for the man who gave him a career and producers know it is useless to try to tempt him away from the Fox outfit. Yes, it is laughable to us—this idea of loyalty to a movie corporation which has no more conscience than a snake has hips, and which would toss Mix over tomorrow if by some miracle he was shorn of his box-office appeal.

This loyalty is just another of the primitive virtues which soldiers, cowboys and early Americans held in common. Mix is in daily association with—his dressing bungalow adjoins the bungalow office of—Sol Wurtzel, chief executive of the Fox West Coast Studios. But the cowboy remains as free from the contamination of movieitis as if he were still riding the breezy plains. In fact, he does not even know he is being exploited.

Never Uses a Double

I ASKED Mix why he doesn't use a double in the bone-breaking stunts that are featured in his pictures. Tom Mix and Hoot Gibson are about the only movie cowboys who don't protect their own bones in this way. It is significant that both were cowboys before they were movie actors, which most of the others were not.

I asked about the double and he said: "You know, the firm has been at me again and again to do that."

"Well, why don't you? In the long shots, where it couldn't be detected?"

Mix looked embarrassed. "I just can't bring myself to it. It ain't well, you were in the army—you know what I mean. It ain't shootin' fair."

He groped among words, then came out unexpectedly with:

"About all you can photograph is the mental attitude, anyway. If you fight—fight. If you ride—ride. And mean it. If you can't do the things naturally, there's no use doin' them at all.

"I use every physical precaution. I work hard and keep myself fit because there are lots of fights in pictures and you have to be so you can take a punch. And I use every mechanical precaution when I do a stunt. I feel in the kind of a picture I make that I'm carryin' a physical message to the audience—especially to the boys in the audience—and I'm damned if I could double-cross 'em! I take every precaution there is and I trust the rest to God!"

Mix's Chop Suey Film

MIX had been working that afternoon on "Dead Man's Gold," a desert picture—but the day's work had been on a set at the studio. His preceding picture, "Tony Runs Wild," featured the famous trick horse, the same on which the American cowboy rode about the decks of the Aquitania and up the steps of the London city hall.

In making this picture Mix had one of his numerous accidents. He has had so many accidents, all recorded by the cameras, that he has assembled six reels of this stuff, which he calls his Chop Suey—probably the most unique movie in Christendom.

The accident in "Tony Runs Wild" occurred when Mix, falsely accused of bumping off a stage-driver and pursued by a posse, was to have escaped by letting himself down from a high cliff with the aid of his trusty lariat.

"I threw the rope around a rock," he related, "a big rock, weighing about five hundred pounds. The ravine was about four hundred feet deep. When I was half-way down, the rock crumbled. I fell twenty-five feet and hit a ledge. But the rock was comin' down on top of me so I had to jump. I had to roll and turn and landed in the bottom of the ravine. Tore some ligaments in my leg."

I had seen him on crutches a few weeks before: He was laid up for a fortnight. And a double would have suffered the rending of his ligaments for the trifling sum of twenty-five bucks. The studio officials must feel impatient at times about the temperamental idiosyncrasies of their star.

The Moods of Chaplin

A short time ago a writer of repute went to Hollywood with the main purpose of interviewing Charlie Chaplin for a magazine with a huge circulation. He waited. He kicked his heels. He had arrived at a time when Chaplin was in no mood to be asked questions. And he returned to New York without an audience.

This is just one of the incidents which Mordaunt Hall tells in his graphic and understanding character study of Charlie Chaplin. The world comprehends the figure which Chaplin presents upon the screen. But few have ever troubled to understand the man himself.

vanishing American? The American who once was, but who now lives only in the celluloid records of our nation's brave youth?

An American cowboy—clinking his spurs with proper arrogance along the ancient corridors of London's Guildhall—scorning to change his American dollars into French francs—flaunting his outlandish native costume before the bulging eyes of the inhabitants of Berlin. Taking a childish delight in doing tricks with his horse on the lawns of children's hospitals. Preserving untarnished above the mud of the trampled studio lot such quaint, old-fashioned soldier virtues as loyalty, sportsmanship and a belief in God.

An American cowboy. A centaur. Brother of the riders of the race—the Amazons, the Valkyries, the Tartars on their shaggy mounts, the Indians on pinto ponies; sweeping in dim procession down from the past. Rushing along the rim of time with a flight of hoofs such as come from the Roan Stallion of Robinson Jeffers: "Riding the savage and exultant strength of the world."

The Vanishing American. The American we all might have been, except for our accursed progress. The American which the ignorant and trustful proletariat of Europe still fondly believes in, just as we used to believe, when we were children, in Santa Claus.

May Tom Mix keep them long in ignorance! This the prayer of one whose head hatches the futile maunderings of modern America, and whose lax frame is concealed beneath the hideous abortion of a Hollywood tailor.

They Say—

said occasionally to leave home, is certainly never plain nor middle-aged.

A woman may be a good and faithful wife, and she may even be quite honestly in love with her husband. But that doesn't hinder her from admiring a handsome man when she sees him, any more than it means that her husband does not admire a beautiful girl when he sees her. So when the aforesaid wife goes to a picture show and sees handsome Jack Gilbert, or lovable Ronald Colman, or even the exotic and much-maligned Rudy, on the screen, she settles down contentedly in her seat, and sighs blissfully, and forgets all about the dinner dishes which are piled in the kitchen sink awaiting her return. Here at last is the handsome hero of her dreams, she says to herself; and in a rosy dream she sees him wade through interminable and heartbreaking difficulties, and finally get the girl in the end. For women are incurably romantic. That's the trouble with them, Mr. Meyers.

And men are incurably jealous. That's the trouble with them, too. If they weren't jealous they wouldn't care a bean how many handsome Romeos there were on the screen, nor how much their wives and sweethearts admired them. They want their wives and sweethearts to see and admire only safe and sane men, because then they would have no cause to be jealous of them. They forget that we can see all the safe and sane men we want to at home, and that sometimes we become just a little weary of them, and go to the movies to see the other kind. Women don't want men to be safe and sane. They feel that it isn't exactly complimentary to themselves.

We do not go to the movies to see the same sort of thing we can see at home,

What My Experiences Have Taught Me

Fighting back is unavailable. Sometimes the best way to counteract erroneous impressions is to say nothing about them, for very often a denial means that the whole business is stirred up all over again. That's one bitter but valuable lesson I learned some time ago. But the wisest course is to keep my private self within the four walls of my home or the homes of my friends, to give my professional self unrestrainedly to my public, and above all to be very careful not to say anything that may be misconstrued. That's terribly difficult, almost impossible, for as I said before, I don't think there is a person alive who is completely and altogether above reproach.

Of course, there's another problem—knowing just how much of me is my professional self, how much of me I should give to my public. In Paris, I ran into an experience that humiliated me at first—because the friends I was with couldn't quite understand it—and set me thinking seriously afterward about how much of me my audiences owned. We were dancing at one of the hotels when a young American who recognized me rushed up to me, grabbed me by the arm, and calling me by my first name asked me for a dance.

My first impulse was the impulse that any woman would have on being accosted so familiarly by a stranger. I gave him a freezing glance and turned away. My friends were shocked and it angered me that I should have been made the object of this unpleasantness, but now I feel no resentment, except with myself, in a way, for taking down a young man who probably thought of me as one of the girls from back home. Movie stars enter into the home life of America as intimately as books and pictures and funny sheets do. Charlie Chaplin is recognized and loved by boys and girls as much as Tom Sawyer or Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, and Lois Wilson as much as Shaw's Candida or the cartoonical Gumps. I should have been grateful for that feeling in my public and there I was, actually getting "het up" over it. It's really very complex knowing where the dividing line is.

Accused of Being "Up-stage"

I HAVE been accused of being "up-stage" because I looked neither to right nor left of me when I appeared in public. Hasn't it ever occurred to any one that I'm human, too, that I feel embarrassed when people stare at me, as if I were a shadow come to life or a strange specimen of humanity? It makes me so self-conscious to know that the way I dress or talk or walk is being watched, that I go out only when I have to. Experience has taught me that it is advisable to leave the theater a few minutes before the rest of the audience does and to arrive a few minutes later if I want to avoid being stared at. I don't think I've seen the end of any play on Broadway this season.

At the Yale-Harvard football game, I let myself in for what I considered unjust criticism by one of the newspapers simply because I left a little earlier. Throughout the game, I could see heads turning to look in our direction and I knew from past experience, that lots of people would rush up after the game for a close look at a "movie star in person." So my husband and I and the friends who had invited us to the game left shortly after the third quarter. Already a group of twenty or thirty was at the portal thru which we had to pass. When we reached there, the guard was telling the crowd to disperse and we went with the rest of them. Imagine how chagrined I was to read in the paper the next day that I had left earlier to attract attention, that I posed at the portal with my husband, ostensibly to get a last look at the game but actually (so the report said) to let the game get a last look at me, that the guard had cautioned me to move on, that I had looked at him disdainfully and that he had asked me again to move on!

The only contact I can have with my public is thru my pictures and thru my fan mail. From the 300 to 500 letters I get every day from people all over the world, I learn the sort of pictures they want to see me in. It is a sort of conversation—they speak in their letters, I answer in my pictures. An actress on the legitimate stage sees her audiences before her and hears their murmurs, their applause. Film actresses must get their contacts by mail.

The Influence of Others

I BEGAN my career nine years ago, in the popular Mack Sennett comedies, and later I became a featured player in the old Triangle pictures, where Cecil B. De Mille noticed my work and offered me a position as leading woman. For two years I appeared in his pictures as a cross between a vampire and a leading lady, a new breed for those days, when a vamp was all bad and a leading lady was as virtuous as a new-born babe. Tho I had all the trappings of a vamp, mysterious coiffures, loads of jewelry and long, slinky gowns as exotic as any the screen had seen, my parts were essentially sympathetic. I gave myself the appellation that has somehow clung to me all these years, "Clotheshorse." The clothes I designed myself to suit the needs of the pictures, and I want to correct the impression that Elinor Glyn had anything to do with the way I dressed. I know that Mrs. Glyn is said to have taught me how to dress correctly, but the truth of the matter is that Miss Jeanie Macpherson, the scenarist, collaborated with me in designing my screen wardrobe for the De Mille pictures. Those picturesque, trailing gowns were worn only in the studio; they were not part of my private life.

People have asked me whether I regretted playing leads for Mr. De Mille, for the stigma of being a vamp has persisted even down to the present, altho the parts I play now—hoydenish schoolgirls, gâche waitresses, Zazas and Sans-Gènes—are as different from my earlier rôles as characterizations can be. No. I am as glad today of my experience with him as I was the first time he offered me a contract to appear in his pictures—and that was one of the real thrills of my life. I consider Cecil De Mille one of the master minds of the screen. He has probably developed more talent than any man in pictures. He is among the foremost technicians in the entire picture industry and he knows the screen value of every look and gesture, the effectiveness of every color and angle. I learned more about the technique of acting from him than from any other individual. Only recently has it been discovered that I could "act as well as wear clothes." But Mr. De Mille found that out several years ago, and told me about it. While others were accepting me as a Clotheshorse, he complimented me on my emotional work, not on the way I could swish a train or carry a tiara.

Elinor Glyn, as I said, had nothing to do with guiding or establishing my taste in dress, but she taught me one valuable lesson—self-discipline. Mrs. Glyn made a point of doing the things she disliked most to do, simply as a matter of discipline, but very often she applied it to inconsequential things—she hated to write letters, and she forced herself to write five or so a day.

I never consciously tried to shirk responsibilities, or avoid what I knew I had to do, but every once in a while, the weight of them was a little more than I could emotionally stand. Any mother knows the task it is to raise children properly, with attention to their psychological as well as their physical wants. Then, too, I have my family to take care of, property that must be looked after, and of course, my screen work. Yet they were the very factors that have guided me in my career. They have given me the real impetus to go ahead.

Miss Swanson's Marriages

It was the weight of all these responsibilities that prompted my earlier marriages, I think. Unfortunately I was mistaken in my choice. Still, I can't call my matrimonial experiences mistakes. Nothing can be a mistake that gives one a finer appreciation of genteel qualities. Five years ago I wouldn't have been able to recognize, much less appreciate, such traits as kindness and sincerity and loyalty and truthfulness and dependability as I have found in Henry, my husband, but the background of my earlier experience has thrown his qualities into sharp relief, like light against shadow. It is a source of constant wonder and delight to me to see these characteristics, never changing, solid and inborn, not assumed like a pretty mask to be cast aside later.

Henry and I have a mutual love of children, and Baby Gloria and Joseph, my two youngsters, adore him. It takes a certain simplicity of soul and goodness of heart to win the devotion of children; their instinct for judging character is uncanny in its correctness. And it is that combination of goodness and simplicity and genuineness that I prize most highly in the world. That appreciation is the real essence of what I have derived from my experience.

They Say—

as Mr. Meyers suggests we should. Far from it! We go to the movies to get away from our humdrum surroundings, and see something that takes us a million miles away from ourselves, and gives us something pleasant to think about next morning when we are washing those left-over dinner dishes. We love to spend an hour or two with the handsome hero with the marcelled hair and the burning eyes, in the Never-Never-Land of which all women dream, but which, alas, they never find! Of course, we know it's too good to be true, and when the show is over we put on our hats and go resignedly back to our every-day lives and our every-day husbands. But we should worry! There'll be another show next week!

Milton Sills, Conway Tearle, Thomas Meighan, et al., are no doubt very nice men. I have nothing personally against them. I think they would be admirable in their own place, playing nice, plain, pleasant, middle-aged rôles. But I do not think they should be cast as heroes and lovers, playing opposite and making

The Girl They Call Tia Juana Red

Probably no one knows her real name. They call her Tia Juana Red. And only one or two know her story. The crowds applaud and cheer every night when she sings gay songs in that little Mexican dance hall. And it is likely that the proprietor himself knows nothing of the tragedy that occurred when Tia Juana Red took a few months off and went up to Hollywood.

Bert Ennis

knew her when she was in Hollywood. And the story he tells of her is the stuff of which tears are made.

It Is More Than the Funny Walk, Derby and Cane

. . . that make Charlie Chaplin great. It is more than the romantic profile that makes John Gilbert the lover. And more than green eyes and a penchant for wearing gowns that brings Gloria Swanson her high place.

Elizabeth Petersen

goes back into the lives of these and other personalities and brings forth what we believe explains the indefinable something that sets these few apart as great.

A Hollywood Idyl

If Mary's and Doug's life together could be written, it would make the most beautiful love story . . . the most perfect romance . . . ever told. Here are Two with fame and wealth at their command. Yet it is to each other that they look for their contentment and happiness. They have caught something that words cannot set down . . . something that no amount of philosophizing or theorizing can ever explain.

Adele Whitely Fletcher

writes of their life together. She tells how, hand in hand, they face the bitter in life with the sweet and find something in both which makes them better able to cope with their tomorrows. Neither of them is afraid of life.

We especially recommend this story to those who have grown cynical about perfect love . . . and marriage . . . and human beings. If you have such a friend, place this story in his hands.

Would You Like to Live in Hollywood and Move in Motion Picture Circles

Foolish question 9,999,999? Perhaps . . . But you can read Eugene V. Brewster's pages every month. And that is the next best thing. Mr. Brewster's bungalow in Hollywood has become a salon where the movie people gather.

He goes to all the parties, too. He week-ends with the Talmadges at Coronado. He lunches in the dressing-room with Valentino. He goes to the tennis matches with John Gilbert or Colleen Moore . . . And he writes of these good times in a casual, gossipy way which is delightful and entertaining.

There are other features, different and equally attractive, which space forbids enumerating.

Every-day magic

CHAIRS that flop into beds . . . bags that suck up dirt . . . tiny ticking things that count all day long for you. Daylight any night just by pushing a button. A stream that never stops till you turn off a faucet. Any voice you want, talking to you from a cage on your desk or wall. Actions of yesterday, of people miles away, going on on a curtain before you. Stilled throats singing to you from discs; distant throats singing to you from nothing!

Uncanny, daily magic—this, due to national advertising. Advertisements have given you flashlights, telephones, typewriters, automobiles, cold creams, motion pictures. They have given you new eyes, new ears, new hands, new feet, new faces, new emotions. They have urged such wide use, so lowered prices, that almost wishes are autos, almost beggars can ride. Thru advertisements you've laid down the shovel and the hoe. You can buy a whole harvest ready-to-eat in cans. You've hung up the fiddle and the bow, for a radio. There's little old-time work left in this age of amazing short-cuts.

Read the advertisements in MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC—they keep you to the fore of modern life

Prop Boy to Star

In the little coal-mining village, he learned to speak three or four languages. He attended the immigrants' holiday feasts, helped celebrate their weddings, was in and out of their homes, as they were in and out of his. The world beyond the foothills from whence they came intrigued him, and when he was barely high-school age he set forth to see it.

Silhouetted against a great studio window in the Café Lafayette, the subdued music of the orchestra playing for the Fashion Show mannequins drifting across the room, he recalled the days when he was a peanut vender with Ringling Brothers' circus.

Sold Circus Peanuts

"THE clowns that were with us in those days worked in 'The Devil's Circus' last winter. I didn't recognize them at first—it's so hard to tell one clown in make-up from another—and I had no idea they would remember a kid who yelled 'Peanuts, popcorn 'n chewin'-gum! Here y'are for yer peanuts—frish roasted peanuts!' But one day they came on the set in white duck coats with 'Ringling Brothers' written on white rolled hats—exactly the way I used to dress—and walked up and down, pretending to sell peanuts. It certainly handed me a big laugh.

"I couldn't help thinking of the circus when we made that picture, on account of the cats—circus name for lions. The boys around the circus were scared of the cats. You'd never know what they'd do. Couldn't trust 'em. And at night, their eyes shining in the dark and their roars!

"After the circus, I did buck-and-wing dancing in vaudeville.

"When Mr. Griffith was making 'America,' a soldier had his arm blown off. Neil Hamilton and I went to neighboring towns and raised a fund for him—I doing a song and dance and Neil collecting the coin. . . . Parts of my past are always coming up.

On Location in Virginia

"ONE of the nicest things that ever happened to me in pictures was the four weeks we spent on location in Richmond, Virginia, while we were making 'America.' If ever I retire, I'm going to buy a small plantation on the banks of the James River and spend my declining days in the leisurely city where money doesn't matter but good manners do, where darky mummies tyrannize over the best families, and 'Marse Robert' is as real today as he was in the Civil War.

"When we were in Richmond, the play, 'Robert E. Lee,' opened. I'll never forget it. The man who played Lee held the stage for five whole minutes while the people cheered and wept and clapped. Neil and I—Northerners—sat with our hearts almost hopping out of our throats—yes, throats; I felt mine fluttering around right here in my neck!—not daring to look at each other for fear we'd see tears. I swear I never saw anything so moving as that living love those people have for Lee.

"At dawn one morning Neil and I came upon his statue, looking out over the city from his green hill. Both horse and man seemed alive as the sun touched them, and I saluted. Any man who could leave a memory like his!"

A particularly lovely mannequin was displaying a gorgeous gown, or so the applause in the dining-room suggested, but the Irishman's tribute to "the knightliest of a knightly race" made seeing difficult.

His Off-Screen Romance

THE shadow romances on the screen seem pallid to Charles compared to his off-screen love story. The lady in the case was born in Italy. She had been in South America for four years and had come to Mamaroneck on a visit.

"Why don't we go over to Tom's?" a friend suggested to Charles one evening.

A girl—a stranger—was on Tom's porch. Love at first sight claimed another victim. For Charles knew right away that here was the girl for whom he had been looking since he had been old enough to coax the first almost invisible hair on his upper lip. Five months later—delay due to her brother's objection to hasty marriages—the two said "I do" and "I will" in the proper places.

It was Neil Hamilton who insisted that Charles come to Hollywood, and that he was welcomed is attested by the fact that the Macks have bought a home somewhere between the mountains and the sea, and are already inquiring about schools for the sixteen-month-old son of the house!

Charles doesn't go about telling how he rose from prop boy to leading man, but I believe that the reason people gave him their pet poodles or let him use the family heirlooms when he was the first, is the same reason directors now give him a choice of this season's best parts:

Because they know he will take care of them!

They Say—

love to pretty young girls. For no woman from sixteen to sixty could even for one moment imagine any one of them in the rôle of an actual lover.

And see how inconsistent Mr. Meyers is. He says he wants the screen women to be "exotic, different, strange, and mysterious." He thinks it is all right and natural for him to admire lovely heroines, but cannot see that it is also right and natural for his wife or sweetheart to admire handsome heroes. It is a poor rule that won't work both ways, Mr. Meyers. How would you enjoy seeing the plain middle-aged character women taking the place of the young and lovely heroines?

I think the truth of the matter really is that it is neither plausible nor true to life to think that the lovely young heroines could actually fall in love with men like Milton Sills, Conway Tearle, Thomas Meighan, et al. In real life a love affair or a marriage where there is a great disparity of ages is generally looked upon as something unpleasant, if not actually repulsive, and we are always sorry for the girl. I think that is why we instinctively dislike to see it on the screen. It is contrary to nature. Youth calls to youth, not only in real life, but on the screen as well. We have nothing against Milton Sills, Conway Tearle, Thomas Meighan, et al., when appropriately cast. But we do not want to see them cast as the heroes of the play, nor as lovers of young girls. For they certainly are not herolike, and young girls simply can't endure them.

I think men should never set themselves up as judges of what women should or should not admire in other men, because they cannot do so fairly, any more than a woman can do so in the opposite case. Men cannot see other men thru a woman's eyes, and no man who ever lived knew anything about a woman's heart. And then, too, the personal element is bound to creep in, more or less.

How Much Do Artists Earn?

WOULD you like to earn $100 a week as a commercial artist? If you like to draw, you should develop your talent, for well-trained artists earn $75, $100, $150 a week and sometimes even more. Beginners who can do practical work soon command $50 a week.

The Federal home-study course develops your talent on a sure foundation by the quickest possible method, and makes the work truly a pleasure. It is the original, practical course in commercial art, created by men with more than 25 years' experience in the field, and after 12 years of unequalled success today stands supreme as America's Foremost Course in Commercial Designing. It contains exclusive lessons from leading American artists, gives you individual personal criticisms on all lessons, and teaches you the methods that make your drawings worth real money.

FEDERAL STUDENTS MAKE GOOD INCOMES

These are typical letters from many hundreds in our files:

Byron C. Robertson, a Federal School graduate, says:

"The reason why I enrolled with the Federal School was that they had many students to point to who had made good. Today I am on the art staff of one of the largest illustrating concerns in America, receiving a salary of $3,000.00 a year. It was indeed a lucky day when I enrolled. The lessons by such great contributors as Coles Phillips, Edwin V. Brewer, Chas. F. Chambers, and others equally well known, are an inspiration and a decided help."

D. L. Rogers says:

"I found only one school that had real, sound backing for all its statements and that was the Federal School."

"From my experience I am satisfied the Federal School has the quality of education to offer that paves the road to success. I wish to recommend this course very highly and my advice to those who are earnest and 'game' enough to work for bigger things in the commercial art field is, 'Take the Federal Course.'"

Florinda E. Kiester writes us:

"Besides the good training I have received from the course when I took it, you people have always given me such wonderful help in my work that I shall be proud to be able to say I am a graduate of the Federal School."

A letter from Mr. Lloyd Shirley:

"I feel as though my old days of drudgery were a bad dream. Now I am earning $3800 a year and I have just started. This commercial drawing is work I love to do. If it had not been for the opportunity of studying art in my spare time and the kindly interest of the Federal faculty, I would never have gotten out of the rut I was in. The practical, thorough, short course I took with the Federal School made my success possible."

CLASSIC'S Late News PAGE

WESLEY BARRY, having reached eighteen years of age, has gone in for matrimony. The youth who won his right to stardom a few years ago because of his funny face adorned with countless freckles, married Julia Wood of Montclair recently. The bride is five years older than her husband. The young couple will spend their honeymoon in Hollywood.

Constance Talmadge has arrived in New York with her husband, Captain Alastair McIntosh. They will sail to England to spend a belated honeymoon.

George Jessel, Broadway actor, has arrived in Hollywood to begin work in the Warner picture, "Private Izzy Murphy." Vera Gordon will be cast in a character rôle in the same film.

Rumors are busy that perhaps D. W. Griffith will go back to United Artists. He has one more picture to make for Famous Players. D. W. was one of the founders of United Artists along with Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks and Charlie Chaplin.

Norma Talmadge has returned to Hollywood from New York whither she had gone to hunt for new screen material. The star is about to make her last film for release thru First National, "The Sun of Montmartre." After this is completed Miss Talmadge will join United Artists, making as her first offering, "The Dove," from the stage-play of the same name.

Florence Vidor has been engaged to co-star with Adolphe Menjou in the Paramount picture called "The Ace of Cads," written by that fellow who was a nine days' wonder for a while—Michael Arlen.

Metro-Goldwyn has started filming "Tell It to the Marines," with Lon Chaney as the star and George Hill as the director.

Matt Moore has been signed by Marshall Neilan for an important part in "Diplomacy."

The only "Red" Grange is busy in Hollywood in making his first motion picture, "The Half Back," written by Byron Morgan—the author of Wally Reid's auto stories. "Red" will play a football hero—and the plot will be similar to Grange's own spectacular career. Mary McAllister will be the leading woman.

Walter Pidgeon has been engaged to play opposite Norma Talmadge in her next picture.

Helene Chadwick has completed her starring rôle for Hal Roach. This picture was accepted by the star after a perusal of the story convinced her that it would return her to the light comedy at which she proved herself adept in "Dangerous Curves Ahead."

Renée Adorée has announced her engagement to Rudolf Friml, well-known composer of operettas. This will be Renée's third matrimonial adventure and Rudolf will make his fourth march to the altar.

Leatrice Joy has just received her final decree of divorce from Jack Gilbert.

Allan Dwan, the director, has signed with Fox—and will make "Summer Bachelors" as his first production. The story is written by Warner Fabian, the author who gave "Flaming Youth" to the world.

Irene Bordoni, the stage star, had decided to enter pictures. She is in Hollywood at present undergoing tests for some future production.

Lois Wilson has sacrificed her long chestnut hair so that she can play the bobbed heroine in "The Great Gatsby," which is scheduled to go into production shortly. Lois was one of the few in pictures who obeyed the old-fashioned conventions.

F. W. Murnau, the director of "The Last Laugh" has arrived in America. He will proceed to Hollywood to direct George O'Brien and Margaret Livingston in "Trip to Tilsit."

Phyllis Haver, former Sennett beauty, is cast in a featured rôle in "What Price Glory." And Leslie Fenton will also have a part in the same picture. He will fight the world war for a second time—his previous experience having been in "Havoc."

Lowell Sherman, and his wife, Pauline Garon—both prominent in pictures, have sailed for Europe. They expect to be away two months.

LAST MINUTE REVIEW

"Good and Naughty"

THEY'RE still experimenting with Pola Negri. The latest to try his hand in directing her is Mal St. Clair. From the results obtained here, he, at least, seems to be the first of the Americans to understand her moods. Anyway she succeeds in investing her rôle with sympathy and understanding. Perhaps it is because St. Clair directs in the Lubitsch manner. He has something of the German's Continental manner. He approaches his players as if they are sophisticated and able to understand his demands.

To get back to Pola—well, she hasn't been blessed with the best stories in the world. Having tackled emotional rôles and not done so well by them, she takes a fling at comedy. I'll say she emerges as a first-rate comédienne.

Her new entry, "Good and Naughty," is an adaptation of the French farce comedy, "Naughty Cinderella." It is not so senseless as the original and not so funny—but all things considered it manages to be bright and amusing.

You needn't expect to find any new idea back of it. The central figure is one of those dowdy individuals suffering from suppressed desires. She is eager to spare the most likely member of the firm from any scandal. Which means that she is secretly in love with him. So she undergoes a transformation in dress and character. Some may wonder where she got her Paris finery—and who tipped her off to improve her appearance. Aside from these errors the piece contains its share of spice and speed—with St. Clair at his best in projecting some truly marvelous close-ups. He employs his players for pantomime.

The idea develops into a marital mix-up—with everyone having a gay time in a prankish, sophisticated way. There seems to be some nonsense in the situations, but at that they are recognizably real.

The acting honors do not go to Pola—they go to Ford Sterling. He is a constant delight in his efforts to get in and out of trouble. He has his facial expressions under complete control—a lesson he learned in the Sennett college. The titles are pointed and provocative of laughter.

A Plea for "Prunella"

Editor, CLASSIC:

Will you pardon a little reminiscence in order that a tribute may be paid?

Long ago, as screen years are counted, it was apparent to those with seeing eyes that the screen offers a field for fantasy such as fantasy had not known. Absurd sequences, savage satire and grotesque exaggeration are recorded by the camera with equal serenity and the imagination is given a freer rein than was possible before. In "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari," "The Thief of Bagdad," "Peter Pan," "A Kiss for Cinderella" and "Beggar on Horseback" are seen something of a fulfilment of the promise of the wider fields for Pegasus that the screen offers—but I wonder how many film lovers remember a screen fantasy that stands out in my mind as being a pioneer.

I have in mind "Prunella." When has such gossamer fancy been transferred to the screen?—the key which was neither "a door-key, nor a watch-key, but the key to the garden gate"—Pierrot, dead-white, before a dead-white table on which lay a rose—the quay, in the manner of Maxfield Parrish, with its single, floating pennon of chiffon all down across its horizon—the arched bridge over which the players passed, flung high against the sky and resting on the mists which arose from the river—the "grotesquerie" of the strolling players—and Marguerite Clark—not playing Prunella—but Prunella brought down to earth from the poet's imagination, bewitching the camera with undreamed-of loveliness!

Memory is faulty, but I believe that Tourneur directed "Prunella"—and then, in answer to an unmistakable box-office, turned quickly to making Drury Lane melodramas! I suppose Tourneur was French, both from his name and because it would seem that only a Gaul could handle wit and fancy with such unerring delicacy.

That fantasy is a subtle and difficult art is obvious. There are those who say that Christopher Morley, master of fancy that he is, waded out beyond his depth in his latest excursion. Last season Basil Dean, seasoned with many theatrical years, found, when he attempted to stage Flecker's gorgeous Oriental dream, "Hassan," that it simply would not behave and was continually getting out of his grasp. I am one of those who found the latter part of "The Thief of Bagdad" tedious, lacking that airy lightness which fantasy must have if it is to enchant; and yet I know that Mr. Fairbanks exercised the greatest care to preserve its glamour. Ofttimes, fantasy lies just this side absurdity, and if the maker of the fantasy would create wistful loveliness, he dare not step over the dividing line, which is but dimly limned and apparent only to those of rare awareness. The maker of "Prunella" knew the danger and was not guilty of trespassing.

Considering this, is not "Prunella" the greater, both because of the subtlety and complexity of the art of fantasy and because of the difficulties that must have lain in the way in those pioneering days? Merely to recall its beauty and delicacy is to realize the possibilities of the screen in the field of poetic fantasy.

A Voice for Sheer Romance

Editor, CLASSIC:

Even way out here in the untamed West (which in reality is very, very tame in the small towns) we have ideas concerning motion pictures and the actors and actresses thereof. I should like to voice mine in your columns.

A queer little town, this is. I have not lived here always. Perhaps that is the reason I can see the queerness of it. It is built in the forest—shut in from the rest of the world by the mountains on three sides and by the great Pacific on the other. Nearly all the inhabitants are Swiss dairymen, who gather in little groups on the street corners and converse in loud tones in their foreign lingos.

When we speak of the towns and cities beyond our mountains, we use the expression "Outside." We say we are going outside to spend the week-end. It seemed queer to me at first, but now I say it just as the "Switzers" do.

We have one motion picture house in our town. It is by far the best-looking building here. The inside is really quite artistic, and it is considered one of the finest theaters in the state. It is under splendid management, and we are usually able to see the newer pictures as soon as they are seen in Portland.

Here is my opinion—which is not in common with Mary Smith's opinion, as stated in the June CLASSIC—that when the average person goes to the movies he likes to see life depicted in a natural human existence. That is not the case here. We can look out of our windows and see the forests; we can go a few miles out of town and watch a logging camp in operation; we can see the ocean, ships and the lighthouse; we can see cows—hundreds of them; and, we can see common every-day courtships (if you will pardon that homely expression) carried on between the Swiss dairymaids and their unromantic barnyardish lovers; we see people grow up to become professional cheesemakers or real-estate agents.

But, we do not get to see any Peter Pans nor any lovers who act like Rudolph Valentino, John Gilbert or Ronald Colman. We want more of those pictures.

When "Peter Pan" was shown here, the children had a half-holiday from school and were permitted to see the show free, thru the graciousness of the theater managers. My little sister can still tell me every detail of that show, whereas she probably couldn't tell me anything about the Thomas Meighan show which she saw only last week.

Then, too, all the inhabitants of our town always go to a Doug Fairbanks play. Perhaps they lack the what-ever-it-is that makes people appreciate a work of art, but they like those unreal plays for the very reason that they are different from the sordidness of real life. And I believe there are many duplicates of our little town.

More Relief from Reality

Editor, CLASSIC:

I cannot resist taking issue with a contributor to your "They Say—" page in the June CLASSIC, to wit, one Mary Smith. She undertakes to explain why different film actors and actresses are box-office successes, and in addition tells us what the trouble is with some of the stars.

The first statement of hers I wish to take up is the following, "When the average person goes to the movies, he likes to see life depicted in a natural, human existence." Whatever that might mean. If she intends to say that the average person likes to see a true representation of what life actually is in the living thereof, I disagree with her most decidedly. What the average theatergoer wants is not reality, but a relief from reality. They have too much of it in their daily lives, and find a deal of it that is not to their liking.

People receive vicarious gratification of their desires, repressed and otherwise, thru

The Secret of Caruso's Amazing Vocal Power

"The Songbird of the ages," Enrico Caruso. The richness, the fullness, the beauty and the astounding power of his voice was due to the exceptional development of his Hyo-Glossus muscle.

Eugene Feuchtinger, musician-scientist, who discovered the function of Hyo-Glossus in voice production, and whose famous "Perfect Voice" system has developed thousands of voices.

The Hyo-Glossus (Singing) Muscle

Diagram of the Normal Throat showing the Complete Vocal Mechanism. Your throat looks like this. So did the throat of the great Caruso. Professor Feuchtinger's system of silent, scientific exercises will develop your vocal organ to its full strength.

THIS IS AN AGE OF MARVELS. Wonderful scientific discoveries have changed our mode of living and our mode of thinking.

One discovery of tremendous benefit to all humanity is the discovery of the principle of voice control by Eugene Feuchtinger, A. M.

His resulting system of voice development revolutionized old methods, and changes voice development from a little understood art to an exact science.

More than that, it brings a Perfect Voice within the reach of every man and every woman who desires a stronger, richer voice for either singing or speaking.

Prof. Feuchtinger's method is founded on the discovery that the Hyo-Glossus muscle controls the voice; that a strong, beautiful voice, with great range, is due to a well developed Hyo-Glossus—while a weak or a rasping voice is due to underdevelopment of this vital vocal muscle. A post-mortem examination of Caruso's throat showed a superb development of his Hyo-Glossus muscles. But it required years of training under the old method to produce this development.

You can develop your Hyo-Glossus in a much shorter time by Prof. Feuchtinger's wonderful scientific method. You can take this training under the direction of the Professor himself, wherever you may live. And the cost is so low that it is within the reach of every ambitious man or woman.

100% Improvement in Your Voice—Guaranteed

Professor Feuchtinger's method is far simpler, far more rapid, far more certain in results than the tedious, hap hazard methods of ordinary vocal instructors. His unqualified success with thousands of pupils proves the infallibility of his method.

Under his direction, your voice will be made rich, full and vibrant. Its overtones will be greatly multiplied. You will add many notes to its range and have them clear, limpid and alluring. You will have a voice that is rolling and compelling and so strong and magnetic that it will be the marvel of your associates.

Professor Feuchtinger ABSOLUTELY GUARANTEES an improvement of 100 per cent—a REDOUBLEMENT of your voice! If you are not absolutely satisfied that your voice is doubled in volume and quality, your money will be refunded. You are the only judge.

You Do Not Know Your Real Voice

Until you have tried the Feuchtinger system, you cannot know the possibilities of your vocal gifts. Physical Voice Culture PRODUCES as well as DEVELOPS the true voice. It corrects all strain and falsetto and makes clear the wonderful fact that any normal person can develop a fine voice if correctly trained. Thousands of delighted graduates testify to this — many of them great vocal successes who, before coming to Professor Feuchtinger, sang very poorly or not at all. Among Professor Feuchtinger's pupils are grand opera stars, concert singers, speakers, preachers, actors and educators.

The Changeable CHAPLIN

THE first time I saw Charlie Chaplin in the flesh was about five years ago in the Ritz Hotel, in London. Incidentally, to give an idea of what might happen, the day before, Tom Geraghty, the well-known scenarist, had called upon the screen comedian and was much amused when he found Charlie in his bathtub absorbed in reading a chapter from the Bible. When I called upon him, he was fully clad, his interest being centered on the crowds outside the hotel who were waiting to get a fleeting glimpse of their film favorite as he slipped thru the revolving doors and into his Rolls-Royce. His reception in the English metropolis caused me to reflect that with the exception of kings and potentates or home-coming victorious generals and admirals, no man, certainly no actor, had ever received a welcome comparable to that extended to Chaplin by the people of his native country.

Here was a man, still young, who not so many years before considered himself very lucky in being a more or less obscure music-hall performer.

Now he was wealthy and at the top of the tree. Sir Philip Sassoon, private secretary to the Prime Minister, invited Chaplin to spend a few days at his country home, and scores of other notables were eager to have the fun-maker, who was born in squalid Kennington, come to their West End houses.

When Chaplin visited Sir Philip Sassoon, he was asked what color scheme he preferred in furnishings, and the comedian waved his hand and mentioned an effect which he was surprised to discover was to be found in the wealthy Britisher's dwelling. They wheeled his breakfast into the apartment in the morning and he dawdled over his dressing, marveling in his healthy enthusiasm over the change just a few years had made in his surroundings.

Finds His Inspiration

WHEN Chaplin lived in Kennington, he used to walk all the way to Leicester Square, and in his home district there was a public house (a saloon) outside which he often observed an aged, rotund, bent creature, with large spavined feet, whose sphere in life was as humble as anything one could well imagine, for he earned his board and lodging (such as it was) by attaching the feed-bags to the cabbies' horses, while the Jehus were enjoying their 'arf-

and-'arf in the "pub." The flabby old man walked with a waddle, and as young Chaplin passed on his way to look for work, he noticed the funny walk of this bibulous object. On turning the corner, Charlie was wont to imitate the weird walk of the gentleman-in-waiting to the cab horses. It was this derelict who inspired Chaplin's now world-famous waddle. Fancy, if the old man should still be living and Charlie should go to him with the information that he had computed that he owed the bowed specimen of bone and flesh about a quarter of a million dollars! The old man would probably die from shock, or think the well-dressed, lithe young fellow was mad.

There is a great deal of sentiment about Chaplin, and his properties prove this. He chose the attire of a down-and-out toff—a tail coat that had seen better days, a derby that looked too small, a mustache that accentuated his pathetic expression, huge, baggy trousers, with a waist-line much too large, and a natty little stick. Chaplin's waddle and his ridiculous clothes are now known in the isles of the Spanish Main, in far-off Java, from Tahiti to Zanzibar, from imperial India to the storm-ridden Hebrides.

The grimy old man's waddle has been exploited to the youth of Japan; it has been in turn copied by the dirty-faced children in Leith, and the dusky kids of Singapore. Everywhere you go, Chaplin is known, and at one time, while he was dallying around the corner imitating the walk of the feed-bag expert, he longed to become a legitimate stage actor. The nearest he ever got to this aspiration was when he officiated as a page boy in a footlights production of "Sherlock Holmes."

The next time I had the pleasure of gazing at Chaplin was when he was leaving Waterloo station en route for Southampton, to sail back to America. The depot was thronged with people from all walks of life, and special police were there to keep back the pressing crowd of eager men, women and children. It amused Chaplin again, and he frequently smiled as he walked up and down the platform, eyed by all those who were leaving on the same train. The king of all comedians was bound for his adopted home. He had looked upon the grim section of London in which he was born, and alone with Thomas Burke one night he had walked thru Lambeth and Kennington and later he had the Rain," which was about the writer's early life.

A Man of Moods

CHAPLIN is a man of moods, an impulsive person, who changes his mind every hour. Work is not always agreeable to him, and they never know in his studio when he is going to call off activities for the day to go and enjoy fishing at Catalina Island. He is averse to publicity, or, at least, to meeting magazine writers and newspaper correspondents. There is no other screen luminary like him. Some time ago a writer of repute went to Hollywood with the main idea of interviewing Chaplin for a magazine with a huge circulation. He waited. He kicked his heels. He went to Chaplin's studio, but never was able to see Chaplin. The comedian was not in the mood to be asked questions and eventually the writer had to return East without the article he was bent on putting into print. He did not know that the coat tails he once saw leaving a door were those of the comedian, but he did know that scores of other newspaper men had experienced the same disappointment.

It was the afternoon before the presentation in New York of "A Woman of Paris," that I talked with Chaplin again. The picture was being screened and Chaplin, in the gloom of the theater, told me that he did not like the music. He is very partial to a suitable orchestral score for a picture. He made an appointment to see me again one morning in the Ritz Hotel, an appointment which I kept despite the fact that I had had an operation on my foot, which was covered with bandages. Suffice it to say that he did not keep the appointment and nobody could have passed by the inscrutable Japanese, who has to lie for Chaplin in such circumstances. Hence I did not see the comedian again until I went to Hollywood last summer.

No Use for Conventions

IT was July 4th, when I disembarked from the train at Los Angeles, and some friends took me for a long automobile ride. At dinner that evening somebody dropped the remark that Chaplin was going to leave on his way to England the next day. Imagine my anxiety at that moment, seeing that I considered my long journey

Yet, when we closely analyze the success of practically every great player, director, individual or company—I mean the ones who have stood out more prominently than their rivals—we find that their success has not been due to the fact that they followed all the iron-clad rules laid down by the

I can remember even as far back as 1910, when movies were just in the one- and two-reel state, the self-appointed authorities were already beginning to establish all sorts of regulations, altho nobody had asked for them and the public itself did not know anything about them.

Before I begin to enumerate some of the "flaws" and "weaknesses" of various successful celebrities, it should be stated that this is a rather delicate task, and there certainly is no intention on the part of the writer to be ungallant in regard to some of our screen favorites.

My only motive for calling attention to certain so-called defects is not for the purpose of criticizing these various players, but merely to show that it is non

D. W. Showed Them How

D. W. GRIFFITH is one of the few men who have consistently disregarded every rule and regulation of the picture game. Yet he has to his credit the greatest number of successful players in the business.

Griffith developed Lillian and Dorothy Gish, two charming and talented actresses, who would have found it very difficult to secure even extra work in almost any other studio. Both Dorothy and Lillian lack the facial features that are deemed necessary for the silent drama. In fact, Griffith and the two Gish girls met with much opposition when he first presented these two young players in his productions. Nevertheless, in spite of "expert" opinions, Lillian and Dorothy have firmly established themselves upon the silversheet, and Lillian is now considered by many as one of the most beautiful actresses in pictures.

Mae Marsh was another Griffith discovery who rose to great popularity, despite the fact that she failed by a wide margin to measure up to the usual screen face standards. Believe it or not, it has long been one of the most positive assertions in film circles that light eyes are a serious handicap to any screen player. They seem to take pride in forcing their own personalities thru the part always—really smashing it, by the way. That is not the fine art of acting, which consists in effacing yourself in emphasizing the character in the rôle you are essaying. You see, I was on the stage for a while myself and had a grandfather who was director of a theater in Edinburgh, so I am interested in and have some knowledge of what the actor's art should be like.

SHEILA KAYE-SMITH is recognized as one of the most graceful novelists of England. The day that I called on her happened to be just about the time that a play was being produced, drawn from her book, "Joanna Godden." She was in a mild state of excitement over this.

"You know, this novel lends itself much more to the films than to being dramatized," she explained to me. "As a matter of fact, I should say that it was a perfect film. You can follow the story from beginning to end with the same ease and interest that you can a film.

"I like going to the films and there is nothing that entertains me more than a good film. The film conventions often make me very angry, tho. There seems to be no half-way ground in the sort of picture drawn from life itself, presumably. While it is true that romance may take us out of the broad road of every-day life into delightful side-paths occasionally, life still remains in the middle ground. In the films, everyone who is well-off lives in marble halls; the majority of those who have no money to speak of are shown in penury and rags. We call that

The Fourth of a Series of Talks About Motion Pictures With Famous English and Continental Writers

IT was only a few years ago that we used to regard the British woman novelist as a bold, swaggering, advanced-woman sort of creature who could outplay mere man at most any sort of game. I may say that that, at least, was my conception of her. To say that she was "manish" would be putting it very mildly indeed.

But I have been disillusioned in respect to these women writers. They are simply women after all, just as strong and just as weak as their sex. I have yet to meet one who is as bold as my conception of her.

What I cannot always understand about so many writers is, how they can possibly write in such an up-to-date manner in their books when they are so hopelessly behind the time in their lives! It seems a shame to show the feet of clay of public idols this way. But I am not doing it in a spirit of iconoclasm but in a desire to reveal the real flesh-and-blood persons behind their printed-word mask. I think they benefit rather than suffer from it.

In one particular I think every reader will agree with me. That person who makes little

MAY SINCLAIR has written three novels which have stood out prominently as among the most fascinating of modern fiction. These are "Mary Oliver," "The Rector of Wyck" and "Anne Severn and the Field'ngs."

I had always thought of May Sinclair as a tall, spare, bobbed intellectual, wearing a W. G. Locke-ish pair of eye-glasses. I would probably find her sitting in her short skirts, cross-legged on the table, smoking a cigaret and possibly flicking the ashes on the floor (absently, of course).

Who told me all this?

Why she herself did. In "The Divine Fire," for instance.

It was a very foggy, typically London, day when I went out to see the novelist who is winning such literary laurels. I had great difficulty in finding Abbey Road. London is so enormous, so complicated and so unreasonable. There are no long straight streets, running accommodatingly East and West, or North and South, with regular blocks and odd and even numbers to match and bearing numbers for

It is customary with the moguls of the picture industry whenever they promote ideas to take time out for lunch.

Mr. Hanemann was sauntering up Fifth Avenue one noon when he suddenly found himself cornered by the producer of Controversial Pictures. One word led to another until he was encouraged to create "something" like a scenario.

Accordingly the next day at lunch he outlined his story—which was accepted with reservations. But the braised beef tongue was good. The humorist expects to write the perfect picture plot the next time he faces the menu with the movie magnates.

IT all started on Fifth Avenue, a thoroughfare which already has enough to account for. But if this is to be a veracious account, I must insist on the actual locale. Besides, you will agree that anything can happen on Fifth Avenue, and does, from eight to six, daily.

It started from a casual remark dropped by a gentleman to whom I had just been introduced. Our common friend left us to continue our way together. Heretofore conversation between the gentleman and myself had been in the nature of cushion shots, bounding off the friend, as the cushion, to one or to the other of us. From now on, it was apparent that any further conversation would necessarily be right down the table. Which may, or may not have prompted the remark.

"I suppose," said the gentleman, a Mr. Teall, "that you will soon be trekking West, like the rest?"

"I beg your pardon?" I replied. Having barely made Mr. Teall's acquaintance, I had not the remotest idea of his connections, commercial or otherwise. Judging by that crack, it sounded as if he might be a professional song writer, in which case, I am firmly convinced that "I beg your pardon" was a darn good answer.

"Movies," explained Mr. Teall—"if you don't mind my talking about my business."

The Flattering Offer

"OH!" I said, and having that kind of a mind, I was immediately miles ahead of him. For several beautiful, fleeting moments, I had an idea that he was going to suggest my becoming a motion picture actor, and back up his suggestion with a contract. Trust me to pick out a good job for myself, and anyhow, if I don't pick out a good job myself, who, I ask you, is going to? Unfortunately it developed soon enough that Mr. Teall's connection with the motion picture industry was in the scenario department, and it was along that line that I was being considered. It was very flattering, but I still think I would prefer acting, as writing scenarios sounds too much like work. We went, editors being what they are, go into any discussion of my talent for acting in the cinema. To anyone who is interested and means business, I am more than ready to give adequate proof.

However, Mr. Teall dressed up the more somber side of my abilities—my absolute fitness to write slap-stick comedies—in such glowing colors that I found myself eagerly accepting his invitation to drop into his office there and then, and meet the boys. The boys were clamorous in their assurance that I had been sent from above to put the infant industry into its first suit of long trousers and one of them even dispatched a stenographer for some frankincense and myrrh. After a while I sort of got to believe it myself.

When five or six people are steadily insisting that you are a genius, you can't really hold out against them for very long. The upshot of it was that I finally consented to dash off a synopsis for their star comedian and Mr. Whoosis, the owner of Controversial Pictures, and their burra boss, could go home and get the first good night's sleep he had had in two weeks. Having won their point, they extended a cordial invitation to lunch (on the burra boss) the very next day, feeling sure that I would have certainly created "something" in the fifteen or sixteen hours to have elapsed. Well, of course, if they were going to start taking me to lunch. . . .

Backslapped by the Boys

BEFORE I go any further, I want to impress upon you that up to now I had never written a movie scenario or a synopsis nor had I ever considered doing so. Nor had I any idea of how to go about it. The closest I had ever come to writing a scenario was having various friends tell me that I ought to write one. But then they tell me that I ought to go on the stage, and that I ought to shave off my mustache and that I ought to—but you have friends, yourself. So far I had been able to laugh it all off and put it down as the price you pay for friendship, and if you're not stuck that way, you are another, so what difference does it make?

This time, to be sure, it looked as if I had committed myself. And look at the interest they were taking in me. In the face of all tradition that selling a scenario was in the "not that! not that"

Ernst Lubitsch is one of the foremost directorial artists of the screen. He has imagination and feeling and knows all the cinema tricks

Mr. Josephson is a well-known young radical writer, who has been taking a profound interest in motion pictures. He has written interestingly and authoritatively on the screen's greatest achievements. This is the second of the series of Masters of the Motion Picture, in which he gives a critical discussion of the screen's advance.

IN the modern period of the movies, the films of Messrs. Lubitsch, Chaplin, Stroheim, Vidor, Cruze, have developed a complete character of their own as an art, instead of being a mawkish rendering of cheap theatrical successes in photos.

The eye is struck first by the immense improvement in the quality of the camera work, the cleanness of line, the absence of waste detail. All of them manipulate their groups, their sets, as well as the light they spill over the scene, to get a balance, a form that keeps your eye unswervingly on the things that count most.

Not only have they learned to paint with the camera, but also to suggest, by the interplay of sequences, by the terrific power of concentration in a close-up, by the shrewd angles they catch, almost a new understanding of life. The modern film, in short, becomes an instrument fit for artists to express the highest flights of their imaginations, their most delicate and subtle fancies.

That Masterpiece Again

THE one film out of this rich period which you have doubtless heard critics refer to more than any other is "The Last Laugh." It is a German picture, directed by F. W. Murnau, with the great Jannings in the central rôle.

There is virtually no plot at all, no love interest, no sensationalism of any kind. What is the merit of this picture, which failing, as it did, to become a popular success, appealed to insiders, critics, artists, column conductors, everywhere as most nearly approaching the ideal of perfection?

"The Last Laugh" gave us the unique feeling of looking into the interior of a man's life thru some wholly unaccountable peer-hole. We not only watched this man's expressions and movements, we watched the states of his soul. Jannings, who is possessed with some divine understanding of his business, seemed to know more about how to make his whole body expressive than most of the other film folks put together.

The picture forms simply the inside history of a crisis in the life of an old hotel porter who is demoted because of senility to a still more servile occupation, that of lavatory-attendant! And because of the simplicity of his material, because he didn't have to bother with the details of some silly plot, the director was able to bear down upon the pure creation of his character and his awful fix thru cinema technique alone. It is one thing to interest you with pictures of pirate ships, knights-at-arms, society gals. It is another to make you feel with the pride, the hope, the passions of an old derelict like this. Within the hour you have a sustained motion picture which thru its over-tone hands over to you his whole code of living. This idiotic old creature is interpreted with as much éclat, sympathy, intimacy, and frankness, as, let us say, Chaplin interprets Chaplin.

Perfect Technique

THE background, the group of characters, the labor which fills this life are all drawn with a tremendous effort at reality. There are no subtitles at all to interrupt the mood of understanding into which you are thrown. The pictures as Murnau composes them put the stuffy and artificial-looking studio sets of his expressionistic colleagues to shame. He uses every trick of the modern cinema that will help him trap an idea, an effect, and hurls it at you.

For instance, there is a daring full-length flash of a revolving hotel-door, which with its glassy glitter and whirl recurs in the sequence of the film like a

"The Last Laugh" is considered a triumph of camera art, and Emil Jannings in the rôle of the pitiable old doorkeeper gave us the unique feeling of looking into his very soul

There Is a Handful of Directors Who Have Developed a Complete Character of Their Own as an Art. The Discerning Eye Has Caught the Quality of Their Work. They Have Created for Us the Illusion of Absolute Understanding and Sympathy with the Moods Expressed Thru Their Celluloid Figures

By Matthew Josephson

Eric von Stroheim is a master of lights and shadows—as well as atmosphere. He delights in painting realities—to focus his camera on life as it stalks by refrain, a dominant motive in music, setting off the whole idea of this proud and cruel hotel. Or, there is a wedding feast in which the camera, itself, seems to go drunk with wine and contentment and, wandering about the meager North Berlin interiors, drops into a brass instrument and brazens out to you the very music of the occasion in a few inspiring mechanical close-ups.

All the "stunts" and tricks of the director followed his material with absolute faithfulness. They did not stick out like useless fandangles, as in "Caligari." All the shades of joy, grief, desperation, came to you thru the insidious overtones that caught you in their spell.

After all, the secret of any great art is to create in us the illusion of absolute understanding and sympathy with the experiences the artist expresses; thus, to make us forget ourselves, and think only that we are living thru these experiences and that they are just as momentous or tragic as they seem to be to the artist.

Otherwise, the moving picture camera arena seems to be divided for the moment into two camps. One is trying to bring the beauties of painting, the thoughtfulness of good literature and drama and music into the cinema. The other camp, develops out of the movies themselves, and especially the slapstick movies. They want to get over the effect of motion, its humor, its vertigo, its hypnotic thrill and drive. We shall come back to these later.

In the Lubitsch Manner

THE films of Ernst Lubitsch place him practically as a leader of the first group. Again, they do not always pay, but they make him the envy of fellow directors. Their recent successful revival in New York before a serious film following by the International Film Guild shows how much good there is in Lubitsch's Collected Works.

Anyone with half an eye can see that he excels in imagination, delicacy, wit, taste. He has the spirit of the artist, and he brings this to his work in the movies. He has been a profound student of this new art, and like certain other of our late enemies, he has, we gallantly admit, all the cinema tricks at his finger tips.

From his early successes in Germany with historical films such as "Passion," which gave us a plausible and bewitching Dubarry in Pola Negri, Herr Lubitsch was driven to light social comedy by the severe strictures of the box-office.

So far as I know, we had never seen historical characters so appropriately and delightfully gotten up, nor scenes of regal splendor and licentiousness à la Louis Quinze so accurately and tastefully pictured. The action moves deliberately thru the sequences, which show us all the agreeable wickedness of Louis's court at Versailles, then rushes to the miserable death of Mme. Dubarry's great patron and the gathering storm of the French Revolution. This last affair turns out to be a melodramatic hurly-burly, and for convenience's sake is pushed back—some twenty years in history.

Amid this historical business Lubitsch found the most adaptable material for his imagination. He worked for grandiose pictorial composition, and for human types that fitted as plausibly into his setting as the period furniture. Against this, he would throw sudden, hideous contrasts of misery and poverty.

In short, we have something here that we can honestly feast our eyes upon. Glittering chandeliers, mirrors, decorated wall-spaces, savagely drawn faces (that seem to come out of the paintings of Daubigny), whose interesting wrinkles and crow's-feet give us much

Deeply moving experiences were recorded in "Greed"—a work unusually grim and realistic. Stroheim touched the very dregs of life with this ponderous and tragic picture

No one seems to know what became of the chap who played the soldier in the hospital scene for "The Birth of a Nation." His moon-calf expression of a love-stricken youth won him many praises during his brief moment with Lillian Gish

YOU'VE often said it and so have I. Your eye and attention have been captured by a particularly effective "bit" on the part of some unknown—an extra. The picture you have seen often lingers in your memory, not by reason of the story or the artistry of the star, but because some five-dollar-a-day extra has dominated the scene in which he or she appeared. In glancing at a still from the never-to-be-forgotten "Birth of a Nation," I couldn't help but wonder what became of the boy who played that bit with Lillian Gish.

I remembered the player and the scene. Which naturally led me to the speculation of "how many extras make good." How many of those who furnish the "atmosphere" in pictures, and, thru the inspiration of the director, are sometimes singled out to put over an especially effective piece of acting in a few feet of film, pull themselves up from the mob on the strength of this brief flash of ability. The answer is a hard one to arrive at. Concerning the player in D. W. Griffith's masterpiece, he apparently sank back into the ranks of obscurity after his few brilliant moments with Miss Gish.

The curse of "type" has denied many a player of ability his chance to leave the extra fold. He may stand out for a few scenes as a gangster, a detective, a dope fiend, a half breed, an Apache or what not. Simply because he looks the part, his real worth as an actor is overlooked. He is a type who is expected to play nothing else but the fill-in character with which the director associated him in his mind. This, then is one reason why the extra who has impressed you with his work remains an extra.

Some Make the Grade

AGAINST the case of Griffith's soldier and those who are retarded in their upward climb due to their faithfulness to "type" we have many startling examples of present-day stars who made their way rapidly from the background atmosphere to foreground close-ups due to the scintillating flash of merit displayed by them when drawn out of the background by the "bit" intrusted to them by the director.

Barbara La Marr, in many respects one of the most distinctive artists of the present generation of screen stars, started her career as an extra. She was given her chance by Louis B. Mayer in a picture call "Harriet and the Piper," which starred Anita Stewart. At the time the girl who later developed into the films' most noted siren was a gangly, thin youngster whose wistfulness and amazingly beautiful eyes attracted the attention of the present production head of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. A bit of business was built up for the late actress. She performed it so creditably that a small part was soon forthcoming and fandom the world over knows the rest.

Another stellar light of the screen who focused attention upon herself while providing atmosphere in a Vitagraph comedy was Constance Talmadge. Her personality stood out, hemmed in as it was by the "sweet-girl graduates" who, with Norma's talented sister formed the necessary background for the antics of the diminutive Wally Van, and again we find an extra who quickly eliminated herself from the class covered by the query "I wonder what became of her."

You Never Can Tell

SOMETIMES, tho, the extra player whom we size up as of promising caliber answers our question in a startling manner. For example there is Roy D'Arcy, the youthful player who scored so decisively in Stroheim's "Merry Widow." After batting indifferently in the five-dollar-per-day league for some time he found himself refused even as an extra player by the Metro-Goldwyn forces. He turned to the stage for a livelihood, securing a job with "The Clinging Vine," a legitimate attraction holding forth in Los Angeles. Von Stroheim viewed the show and with unerring judgment selected the unknown

The plaintive-looking extra with the long braids in the second row is none other than Constance Talmadge. She played one of the sweet-girl graduates in "The Chicken Inspector," an old two-reel Vitagraph comedy, starring Wally Van actor for a prominent rôle in "The Merry Widow" and D'Arcy found himself playing a leading part in a studio which had refused him extra work.

We also might be wondering about the little girl rapidly rising to fame under the name of Sally O'Neil were it not for the fact that Mary Pickford, exercising the prerogative of a star (and a woman) decided to change her mind. Her change of mind concerned the rôle she was to play in Micky Neilan's "Mike." Sally, whose background personality probably intrigued us more than once, was selected by Neilan to bat for the famous Mary. And she knocked a home run. No speculation concerning what fate holds in store for the extra would be complete without mention of Florence Vidor. The present much-admired and extremely capable Florence, who is, at last, to enter upon a starring contract, caught the fancy of movie patrons as an extra in the picturization of "A Tale of Two Cities." And she has held it ever since.

The Disillusioned DIRECTOR

By MADELINE MATZEN

Hugo Ballin has become discouraged in his effort to make beautiful pictures. Always artistic and idealistic, he has discovered that such qualities are not appreciated by the powers who control the film world. He was a recognized artist before he became associated with picture work. As color is his hobby, he intends to make one color film before he gives up the screen. If he accomplishes his ambition, the fickle producers will doubtless hail him as a genius—and wonder where he has hidden his talent all these years

The Ballins are a happy, contented couple who see color in everything whether it is painted by Mother Nature or by themselves. At the top is the disillusioned director and above is his own favorite painting of his wife, Mabel Ballin

THAT'S Hugo Ballin! You remember Hugo Ballin, dont you? The director who first introduced natural lighting on the screen. The man who gave us real settings in the place of the flimsy, unconvincing affairs that we had been used to. Who gave us the first picture that was ever made without a subtitle. Who made "Becky Sharp" and "Jane Eyre" and other beautiful and simple pictures for us—and who introduced us to Mabel Ballin, she of the demure costumes and the pixie eyes.

Yes, of course, you remember his pictures! And perhaps you have been wondering what has become of him? I was curious, too. I had heard rumors about him—that he was painting murals, gorgeous ones—that he was writing novels, pretty fair novels, too, for a day when everybody is writing novels.

Being curious—I went and called on him.

He lives in a charming and sedate house on a quiet, shady street in Hollywood. There is a garden, beside the house, full of pink roses, blue delphiniums, joyous lilies and other sweet-smelling things. Mabel Ballin was watering the garden. She wore a gay print dress and a big scoop hat.

The hose sent a shower of clear drops across the flowers and the sun made a little rainbow where the water fell, there was a little twinkle in Mrs. Ballin's eyes and I was glad that I had come.

Turns to Other Arts

INSIDE, their house is cool and uncluttered. It is the most restful place I have encountered so far. But perhaps I have grown too used to cinema celebrities who adorn their dwelling-places with plush and lace pillows, incense pots of near-bronze, many kewpie-dolls and other startling "novelties." At any rate, the Ballin home is a refreshing oasis in the jazz-land of filmdom.

A sea-breeze blew the muslin curtains back and forth, there were cigarets in a huge silver box and on the wall facing me was a great mural painting of golden vistas which Mr. Ballin had just completed.

It was hard to tell which thing enthused him the most—the new mural or the new book which he was busily proofreading.

The new book is a sort of revelation and prophecy concerning life in the motion picture colony. A curious compound of colorful truth and theories I guessed as he read some passages from it aloud to me.

Four novels and two delightful murals are the fruits of Mr. Ballin's vacation from film work.

The HAUNTED HOME

The Old Lasky Studio in Hollywood Has Become but a Memory. A New Day—With Its New Demands—Has Dawned. Which Means a Bigger and Better Studio Is Being Erected to Film the Paramount Stories

*"I feel like one who walks alone
Some banquet hall deserted,
Whose lights are fled,
Whose garlands dead,
And all but he departed."*

—THOMAS MOORE.

THE pepper-trees are the same on Vine Street in Hollywood, and even, for the time being, the grey exterior of the wooden two-story office-building that stretches the length of the block is untouched and as placid as ever. To the outward eye, the Famous Players-Lasky studio, for years a Hollywood landmark, is unchanged.

Yet its heart is gone, and today it is haunted by ghosts, musing ghosts in film finery, who hover about watching the busy crews of wreckers as they destroy.

For the old studio is no more. The glass from the enormous roofs over the stages is crashing and falling. A structural steel crane is lifting the great beams from

The floors of the stages, floors that have felt the tread of the panorama of movie great, and have borne the weight of the most lavish sets ever erected by Cecil B. De Mille and Allan Dwan and James Cruze, are being torn up. From one side of the city block to the other, the view is unimpaired, where only yesterday one could not see because of the forest of "sets."

The paneling of Jesse L. Lasky's private office, where contracts that have meant millions to stars have been signed, has been removed and transported to the new studio. Cecil B. De Mille's churchlike private office was converted some time ago into a projection-room. If these offices could only talk!—what tales they would tell of fame and fortune, of tears and heartaches, of gambler's chances that won, and great ideas that failed!

Famous Players-Lasky is moving its studio. A new day, a new need. Their two city blocks in the heart of Hollywood is now too small to handle the immense productions the company is making, and the old facilities have become inadequate. So the United Studios lot, off Melrose Avenue, was purchased. The old Lasky lot had ten acres, the new has sixteen. The new lot will have eleven enormous stages. The old had but six, two of them quite small. While the crash and destruction of the wreckers is heard on Vine Street, the pleasant ringing of hammers is heard on Melrose, where a horde of carpenters, masons and plasterers is preparing the new home.

"I ENVY Bill Hart! There's nothing in this world I'd like better to do than to trade places with Bill for a picture or two, wear a Stetson instead of a silk topper, wave a six-gun in place of a Malacca cane, and in general be a he-man of the well-known open spaces instead of a parlor ornament."

The MAN Who ENVIES BILL HART

Huntly Gordon made the announcement with the utter unexpectedness of the traditional bolt from the blue.

We were parked at a corner table in the dining-room of the Hollywood Athletic Club, trying to order luncheon dishes cool enough to offset the ninety-in-the-shade temperature that was frying the asphalt surface of Sunset Boulevard just outside the window. Up until the time that Huntly dropped the Bill Hart confession into our midst like a verbal bombshell, our conversation had been a reasonably sane one.

Gordon smiled quizzically at the look of blank surprise that I couldn't quite conceal.

The Secret Longing

"I MEAN it," he insisted. "Ever since I've been in pictures I've longed to be allowed to do real outdoor stuff, with flaming six-shooters, hard-riding cowboys, and all the violent and picturesque action that such pictures demand. That is why I say that I envy Bill Hart, Tom Mix, Fred Thomson, and all the rest of the boys who are doing real Westerns.

They are doing just what I have always wanted to do—and what I am going to do some day if I am ever given a chance."

Coming from any one of a half dozen other prominent masculine players of the screen, this Bill Hart ambition might not have seemed so startling. But from Huntly Gordon!

To the great majority of screen fans who are familiar with Gordon's personality only as it is shown in his work before the camera, the announcement will probably create as much amazement as tho the Sphinx were suddenly to state to the world a secret ambition to shake the dust of the centuries from her recumbent form and do an abandoned Charleston over the desert's burning sands.

Because Huntly Gordon's screen rôles have always been so exactly the utter opposite of outdoor stuff. He has always appeared as the very epitome of well-groomed dignity, impeccably attired in the garments of society, with a capital "S," superbly poised, calmly aloof, and as solidly substantial as the Rock of Gibraltar.

When the average man climbs reluctantly into a full-dress suit, the finished product usually looks about as much at ease as a Polar bear in a cauldron of hot soup. Huntly Gordon, however, has the rare faculty of being able to don the most formal of togs and then look as faultlessly comfortable as tho he had been literally poured into them.

This natural ability to wear formal clothes superbly well, together with perfect poise and an innate dignity of manner, has resulted in Gordon's being invariably cast in rôles such as successful brokers, prominent professional men, or staid judges of the higher courts. The drawing-room has been his usual screen setting, and members of the Four Hundred his inevitable associates.

Consequently, when the immaculate Huntly announces a secret ambition to be a wild, rip-snortin', he-terror of the open range, at first thought it seems almost as incongruous as the Statue of Liberty doing three rapid back flips on her lofty pedestal and then yodeling "Here Comes Charlie" in a clear soprano for the edification of an incoming boat-load of immigrants.

On second thought, however, there isn't really anything so very incongruous in Huntly Gordon's desire to play outdoor rôles on the screen. For, off the screen, Huntly is one of the most outstanding outdoor men in Hollywood. He is an ardent golfer, an expert tennis and squash player, an enthusiastic fisherman, and an inveterate hunter.

In real life, the breath of the outdoors is the breath of life to Gordon. He would rather be tramping joyously over some mountain trail, a hundred miles from Nowhere, than loll luxuriously in any drawing-room ever built.

Wants to Wear a Bandanna

"THAT's the reason I envy Bill Hart and the rest of the Western players," Gordon explained to me. "They play day after day, picture after picture, in the outdoor type of stories that appeal to every natural inclination I have. Not that I want to desert the society rôles entirely. But I do want to get just one fling at a real he-rôle once, with all outdoors for my arena of action.

"I want to wear a bandanna handkerchief around my neck instead of a bat-wing collar; riding boots instead of patent-leather pumps; and get in action in an atmosphere that is blue with powder smoke instead of the vapor from perfumed cigarets. In other words, I want to trade the aristocratic tea-cart for the pioneer covered wagon, the parlor for the prairie, and polite acting for real action.

"Then, too, I've got the natural yearning for applause that any normal person has, whether he be actor, doctor, or plumber. Did you ever go to a matinée showing of a Western picture and hear the kids—and some of their elders, for that matter—go half crazy when the hard-riding hero rescued the heroine amid a rain of lead that would have made the Battle of Manila look like an April shower? Well, I'm human enough that I would like to hear those kids applaud me that way just once.

at the other station. The hole causes a sun-spot or shadow to appear and when this rests on the point of the sighting rod at the front of the bar, the flash will be visible at the other station. So delicate is the adjustment, that the mirror has to be moved slightly from time to time by means of thumb-screws so as to follow the movement of the sun. Once adjustment has been secured, the shutter, mounted upon the other tripod, is set up in front of the mirror and then opened and shut so as to show short or long flashes.

Even had the fair one had all this apparatus with her, she would have been in the grasp of the dreaded mask before she could have secured her adjustment, and as for the marvelous speed with which the hero reads the supposed message as it flashed upon the sword-decked walls of his library, I can only hope that the Signal Corps had the benefit of his services during the recent war.

Should Be Shot at Sunrise

AND speaking of war, reminds me that some motion picture directors do many things in battle scenes for which they would be court-martialed if they were in the army. They love to plant "Old Glory" on the breastworks so as to help the enemy get the exact range, and they have a penchant for placing their artillery in nice open lots where in actual warfare they would be put out of action in ten minutes. I have seen in a picture a company of infantry marching to war all armed with rifles and not one of them had a cartridge-belt or even a bayonet. Thank the Lord! all directors are not like this, and a few of them have put on most realistic battle scenes, but the average "battle" in the movies is a confused jumble of which neither the civilian nor the soldier can make head or tail.

So, much for the author and the director. Let us see what the Research Department and the costumer have to offer.

Wrong From the Start

IT can be safely said that very few motion pictures of the costume type are costumed correctly in every respect. This is not altogether the fault of either the research people or the costumer, but is due largely to the failure of most American producers to consult technical experts along specialized lines, as is often done abroad.

From the very nature of their work, both members of a Research Department and costumers need a wide range of knowledge and cannot be expected to have as exact available data as a person who has made an extensive study of a specific subject. When called upon for information which they do not possess, both are, however, prone to fake, rather than admit their ignorance. The speaking stage is no better off in this respect than the motion pictures.

In Channing Pollock's play, "The Enemy," recently on Broadway, one prominent character in it, who was supposed to be an Austrian officer, appeared in a German uniform until I

"Sword play and knife fighting as seen in motion pictures is not usually of a very high order."

"The best knife fight which I ever saw on the screen was in 'Orphans of the Storm'—it was most realistic."

"The further back the supposed period of the picture, the greater seems to be the percentage of error."

EDNA MARIAN

This petite personality, finding herself at the top of the comedy heap in a reasonably short space of time, has proved herself to be unique by buying her contract and calmly seeking new and larger worlds to conquer. Edna made her screen début in New York when but thirteen years of age. Then she went to Hollywood and "crashed the gate." Her initiative led her straight to a neat little part in a Buster Keaton film. She did so well that the gentlemen preferred the blonde as a comedy star

THERE was a time when Hollywood Boulevard swarmed with "jazz" automobiles which, in their weird trappings and elaborate superstructures, looked like a combination of a Welsh rarebit nightmare and an Osage Indian's idea of splendor.

That time has gone, apparently forever. Today the cars of the Film Colony are marked by an almost austere simplicity.

The "well-dressed" car of today is like the well-dressed clubman, neat but not gaudy. However, it is possible to spend a very fair bit of money in merely giving a car the most orthodox of equipment.

For example, the white sport roadster of Reginald Denny, pictured herewith, cost, with all accessories and insurance, just a few dollars short of an even $5,000. The various items are listed above.

Impressions of Hollywood

AS I was leaving the Hal Roach lot the other day, I discovered the "Our Gang" children grouped together on a grass plot near the road where several visitors stood with small Kodaks trying to get a picture of the gang to take home to St. Louis to show to their neighbors. The visitors apparently had some pull, because the studio manager and the matron were there, giving orders to the children and trying to keep them in order. It was obvious that the gang were taking the matter seriously, because they were playfully crowding one another for the best positions in the line-up, and they apparently esteemed it a great honor to be photographed.

Little black Farina was the most obvious. He (you know it is a he—not a she) kept well in the center foreground and, looking from one camera to the other, said: "Say, which of them cameras is goin' ter do the shootin'?" Then he threw off his sweater and laid it aside, remarking that he would look much better without it.

I suppose that Our Gang look upon the regular movie photography as real work, but this was play—something to be proud of—their photos were in demand by visitors—were they not now in the same class with President Coolidge, Jack Dempsey and Valentino?

Foul Work at the Crossroads

JUST as I was leaving the Hal Roach lot, I saw a large bewhiskered man carrying an apparently dead woman across the road. Her head, arms and feet were dragging limply in the dust, and it looked like foul murder. I hastened to the spot ready to do a man's duty, but only to find that it was a dummy. The poor thing had just been beaten up by her husband and thrown from the tower of the castle.

What Price Publicity?

POLA NEGRI was looking at some of the stills showing Valentino making violent love to Vilma Banky in "The Son of the Sheik."

"Ah!" exclaimed Pola, "He make love to Vilma, but all the time he think of me!"

In spite of reports to the contrary, I think I can safely say that there is not and never has been any romance between Vilma Banky and Rudolph Valentino. I have been to the Pickford-Fairbanks studio dozens of times, when they were making "The Son of the Sheik" and talked with both of them many times, and visited their homes and I ought to know. At the studio Rudy dines in a studio cottage, and there are usually two or three men dining with him, including his brother and his manager who have the cottage all to themselves. Vilma dines all alone in her dressing-room.

Connie Talmadge has Mary Pickford's cottage, which is just across the lawn from Valentino's, and she came across the other day and sat down at Rudy's table with us for a while, but Vilma never does so. Whether she doesn't want to, or wont because she fears to create a wrong impression, I dont know, but I do know that Rudy has invited her and that she never goes.

The Battle Continues

THERE are about 20,000 theaters in the U. S. and ninety-seven per cent. of them show motion pictures all or part of the time. Only three per cent. of all the theaters do not show any pictures at all. Twenty-five years ago none of the theaters showed movies. A new movie theater is built somewhere every working hour, while only one a week is the average for the other kind. And thus the battle of Movies vs. Speakies goes on, but it is a very one-sided affair.

Let us hope for the day when there will be more theaters devoted entirely to movies with no vaudeville. And let us hope they make the movies so good that they wont even need a prolog or prelude. All those in favor of more theaters for movies only, please say "I."

Fox Registering Pride

WATCH out for "What Price Glory." The Fox people seem to feel that it is going to beat "The Big Parade." While this is doubtful, you may surely look forward to this picture as one of the big events of the early fall.

Victor McLaglen will probably make a big hit in this picture—even bigger than that of Karl Dane's. Dolores Del Rio is also going strong, and so is Edmund Lowe and all of them. And dont forget that Raoul Walsh is directing, and that this same chap directed "The Thief of Bagdad" and "The Wanderer."

I understand that "The Wanderer" is not a big-money maker, but that is not surprising—it is too great and too good for most people, just as "The Last Laugh" was.

A Good Time Was Had by All

THE FOX Film Corporation gave a dinner and dance recently at the Ambassador Hotel at which I and about 499 others were present. Between courses everybody danced—or tried to, but it was really impossible to do much dancing—one might just as well expect sardines in a box to dance.

All the Fox stars were there, and most conspicuous of all were the midget comedian, George Harris, and his partner, Barbara Luddy, who is equally diminutive, altho there were all sizes and styles present, including Jack Dempsey and Tom Mix who sat at the same table and who danced just like anybody else. Jack dances quite well and he is not at all awkward or clumsy. Tom Mix is almost graceful and he has a fine physique.

Of course, William Fox was very much there, including his black mustache, and when he entered, everybody arose and cheered. Little Georgie Harris was quite popular and ladies twice his height seemed to enjoy dancing with him.

Greetings from Greta

GRETA NISSEN has at last consented to join Universal and play the lead in a big picture that Jack McDermott wrote and will direct. He has been wiring Greta daily for weeks and finally got her consent. He says she is one of the screen's most promising artistes, if not the . . . And he's going to have an all-star cast, including Marc McDermott, Trixi Friganza, Norman Kerry, and so on.

Jack has the funniest house I ever saw. It is way up on top of a mountain, and he made it all himself out of movie scenery and odds and ends from different studios. It is certainly a freak place, but extremely interesting. Corliss Palmer and I had bacon and eggs with him there the other day and he is a charming fellow. But he certainly gave us some thrills going down that steep, muddy, crooked, rocky road in his Ford.

A Bad Break

VIRGINIA BROWN FAIRE is another one of those who have had "a bad break." She got off to a good start in 1919 when at the age of fifteen she won a Beauty Contest given by Brewster Publications, and I remember well her first appearance before me as director. She was a beautiful little brunette and photographed excellently. Later on she got a contract and did very well.

Then came a big part in "Without Benefit of Clergy," which she quite ran away with, and it looked as if Virginia would be a top notcher in another year. But from then on she had ill luck. Poor parts in poor pictures and she was almost lost sight of. The latest is that she has been signed by Sam Sax to play opposite William Fairbanks in "The-Mile-a-Minute Man." This may be all right, but Virginia is entitled to something better.

Among Those Present

NORMA TALMADGE gave a little dinner-party at her palatial home the other night and here's a complete list of "among those present": herself, her husband, Joe Schenck, her mother, "Peg," her sister, Constance, her former leading man, Eugene O'Brien, Buster Collier, the managing editor of the Los Angeles Examiner (Hearst paper), Florence Lawrence, dramatic editor of same, and poor little me. We had arrived at seven but it was about eight before the butler entered the drawing-room with "Dinner's served." It was a fine dinner, excellently served and everybody was jolly, and had a lovely time.

After coffee we all went into a large and elegantly furnished lounging-room where they show pictures. Buster, attired in a huge apron, ran the projection machine and did a good job. But the picture was Corinne Griffith's "Infatuation," and it did not make much of a hit with us. During this, Dick Barthelmess came in and spent the rest of the evening. At twelve-thirty I left for home and I was nearly the last of the guests. And we were all perfectly sober, and there wasn't even any dancing. We simply talked, in small groups, and occasionally listened to the phonograph. Another one of those famous wild Hollywood parties that you hear so much about.

Joseph Schenck is a very rich man, but he did not make it all in pictures. His interests are varied, and he is an exceedingly well-informed man, and a very likable man. He converses freely on every conceivable subject, and his ideas and opinions seem to be carefully thought out.

The Correct Way to Say It

SINCE "Beau Geste" will be talked about a great deal after the picture is released, you may as well learn how it is pronounced. I have heard so many heated arguments on whether it should be jest or guest, that I looked it up.

On page 98 of the novel it says: "'Are you the jester?' 'No, Aunt,' I replied with feeble wit, 'only the Geste.'" Which quite disposes of the matter. It is Bo Jest.

tour than Langdon. I found him very amusing. He doesn't trespass on the lines marked out by other ranking fun-makers. He has an individuality all his own. His best asset is his wistful expression. On most of his journey he sees to it that he suffers like Chaplin, tho he is no imitator.

The Funny Langdon

HE experiences several difficulties which have been well timed to provoke laughter. Still there are moments when the piece pauses occasionally—as if it was out of breath and wanted to catch up with itself. So that is why it loses some of its spontaneity.

I shall dismiss these few errors and pin upon it the blue badge of excellence. For indeed, Langdon releases oodles of fun in his cross-country tramp. There is a worthy thrill in the scene wherein the comedian scales a fence to avoid a flock of sheep. While perched on top, he lets himself down slowly, trying to find a landing place for his feet. But he looks around and discovers himself on the edge of a cliff which has a sheer drop of a few hundred yards. His coat catches on a nail of the fence and soon the structure gives way—with Langdon descending as fast as Mother Earth and gravity can attract him.

This is but one of many ludicrous and original episodes in the picture. The piece is more quiet than "The Gold Rush," and not so effervescent as "The Freshman." But, nevertheless, it has its comicalities. There is a final moment which contains a rollicking bit. It shows by trick photography the gag of Langdon placing himself in a crib — and HARRY LANGDON has finally won his spurs or laurels or colors or what you care to call the honors of stardom. Having been bound to the two-reel comedy, he has come along so fast that he is entitled to a seat among the comedians who have graduated into the feature class. Which means that he deserves to be ranked along with Lloyd, Keaton, et al.

Surely no one is equipped with a sounder knowledge of what makes and sustains the Big Laugh than this same Langdon. He has a firm acquaintance with pantomime and expresses comedy and its allied ingredient, pathos, with fine appreciation of their values. But he waited until he found something good. And it arrived in "Tramp, Tramp, Tramp."

made to represent his own offspring. The comedian's cherubic expression comes in handy for this hilarious finish.

Not Up to Expectations

I DON'T find many pictorial values in "Ranson's Folly."

Richard Barthelmess' new canvas. As fiction it had its appeal when Richard Harding Davis wrote it many years ago. But shaping itself on the screen it doesn't resemble anything but an old-fashioned romantic melodrama —with the obvious al-ways in the offing, so that any quality of suspense is destroyed.

The piece carries Barthelmess and the spectators back to the last century at the time the slippery Sioux had been driven across the border. It gives the star an opportunity to portray one of those dashing lieutenants who, to overcome the boredom of the post, stages a hold-up out of pure mischief.

The plot revolves around the circumstantial evidence piled up against him. And he, in a spirit of self-sacrifice, admits the guilt to spare the father of the girl who captured his heart. This parent, in the meanwhile, has also acted in the same spirit. But it is easy to anticipate that neither will be held accountable for the crime.

That's how hackneyed this picture is—what with a plot that never develops any stirring action. There are some first-rate atmospheric details—the old army uniforms and the flouncing dresses worn by the officers' wives lending a picturesque note. And the backgrounds are praiseworthy, too.

The trouble is the weakness of the picture—for it is not up to the Barthelmess mark. He conducts himself heroically enough, but there are no occasions for him to display any emotional fire. As for Dorothy Mackaill, she wears her hair down her back and affects an innocent appeal. It is just a part—and nothing else. So I catalog this as just an ordinary melodrama. Barthelmess doesn't need these old-fashioned stories with their old-fashioned heroics. He shines best in the unusual characterizations.

A BURLESQUE of the Graustark pattern is on view in "Say It Again" and it shapes up as first-rate entertainment, thanks to Richard Dix's sense of humor and Gregory La Cava's directorial whims. This isn't to say that the picture is perfect. Indeed, it has its flaws. For one thing, it never seems to make up its mind which way it is going. It starts off on a romantic tack, breezes into burlesque—and back to the romantic vein again—before it finishes with an orgy of absurdities.

FLASH

By L. R.

THERE seems to be a jolly little misunderstanding in London over "The Big Parade." Everyone on this side of the big pond predicted a wonderful reception for it when it made its English première. Yet the British critics became bally well wrought up over it. They declared the picture was nothing more or less than American propaganda—conceived and executed on the premise that America won the war.

It strikes us that these Britishers have missed the point entirely. If King Vidor had started out to film episodes of the other Allies' war activities, he wouldn't have finished it yet. Like a gigantic musical theme, the idea belongs to all countries who participated in the Big Push. True, the Americans made a belated appearance, but they had their work cut out for them at Château-Thierry and the Argonne. And these war scenes are not to be considered as any attempt by Vidor and his assistants to glorify the American flag. The British had their representation in "Hearts of the World" and they shouldn't have allowed their exclusion in "The Big Parade" to spoil their sense of fair play.

Certainly the romance could represent any Allied soldier who was billeted on French soil. And the humorous interludes—the hasty preparations to reach the front lines, could be applied to any nation as well as America.

For All Nations

OF course, the picture was made for American patronage, but Vidor never intended it as propaganda. It is as if he set up his camera to record the soldiers' slant on the war—and his soldiers happened to wear the khaki of the United States army. The subjects of other nations should view it in this light. Why the Britons can even recognize the character of Slim as a cousin of their own Old Bill.

If Vidor had wanted to make a propaganda picture, he would have waved the flag all the way—and the subtitles would have been saturated with Yankee patriotism. The London reviewers have not only misunderstood the idea behind it but they also have failed to catch its eloquent spirit.

Had Vidor attempted to show other nations' activities, his plot would have got away from him. It would have become detached and the sure-fire dramatic strokes would have failed. Instead, he employed the simplest measures of dramatic construction. He chose his backgrounds and shot his action against them, using the necessary characters to build a moving story.

Hoffman's War Picture

PERHAPS you remember that tender little film, "Which Shall It Be?" If you do, you will recall that it was made by one of the younger directors—a young man with imagination and feeling by the name of Renaud Hoffman. Kind words were written and uttered in his favor and the prediction was made that he would go far with the megaphone.

So we anticipated something out of the ordinary in "The Unknown Soldier." Well, he kept faith with his ideals in giving what is called in polite circles—an unhappy ending to the picture. But the New York première was too premature. Instead of showing the spiritual ending (that of the marriage of the heroine with the spirit of her departed soldier), the obvious finish was tacked on to it. And so New Yorkers condemned it as just another picture.

Hoffman was consistent all the way. He couldn't be otherwise and keep to his title and his text. Naturally he insisted on the spiritual ending, tho the happy touch was also made for box-office reasons. Thru some unaccountable error the conventional finish was shipped to New York—this, on top of the fine reception accorded the spiritual ending in Los Angeles.

The error has been rectified so that other communities are receiving the picture thoroly in character. Which proves that audiences aren't so unintelligent after all—even if producers are not in the habit of encouraging them.

About Pictures and People

De Mille's Ambitions

CECIL B. DE MILLE is going to see if he can put over a companion picture to "The Ten Commandments." Having turned to the Bible for inspiration in conceiving that eloquent opus, he will open the Good Book again and record the life of Christ.

The Biblical subjects (what few have been visualized on the screen) have received a healthy response from the public. Which indicates something of a spiritual hunger. And the ever-active De Mille, whose effort to create something lasting from the very moving and dramatic pages of the Bible inspired other producers to dip into its pages, will make (what he hopes it to be) the triumph of his career.

De Mille had first intended calling it "The Deluge," the idea to be fashioned around Noah and the Ark. But Warner Brothers have a prior claim on the old man of the sea. Cecil was not to be caught napping, however. He shifted his idea from the Old Testament to the New—and the Christ will be humanized under the title of The King of Kings.

De Mille will go further than any other director has ever gone with the Great Teacher. He will actually show Him in the flesh—and not by means of symbols or shadows. And His life will be drawn in a human manner. In other words, the director will paint the Christ as a human being.

This all raises the very interesting question—who will play the Prince of Men? To get the complete humanities of the man, the actor selected must needs carry out some of His teachings. We suggest that De Mille go to the little village of Ober-Ammergau in Bavaria—made famous for the Passion Play, and enlist one of its highly religious actors. The subject should create a sensation—and De Mille should leave no stone unturned toward making it genuine and moving in all that these words imply.

Cheers for Alec Francis

FOX has displayed good wisdom in selecting Alec B. Francis to play David Warfield's rôle in the screen version of "The Return of Peter Grimm."

This very able character actor has something in common with Warfield's expressions. His name is generally found in the vicinity of the adjective "kindly." And anyone who remembers Peter Grimm will recall that the character was very kindly disposed toward the world.

On the other hand, Fox is still hunting around for Warfield's successors in "The Music Master" and "The Auctioneer." Whoever is selected will have to know the art of pantomime to the tips of his fingers and his eye-lashes—to say nothing of the quivering lower lip.

Gilda's New York Public

GILDA GRAY broke all the records for the Rialto Theater during the run of her picture, "Aloma of the South Seas." This is not surprising in view of her popularity around Times Square. Long recognized as one of the most vivid personalities of the "Follies" and the night clubs, the movie patrons of the metropolis were all curious to see how she fared in her screen début. It must also be mentioned that Gilda made personal appearances with the picture—and executed her shimmering South Sea dance—a dance in which she outclasses the field.

If Gilda accompanies the picture to other cities, doubtless other records will be broken. Her presence is needed, for the film is no "great shakes" as entertainment. Indeed, she is the sole reason for its production—and for a début she gives decided promise of accomplishing something worth while one of these days.

A Real Surprise

THE surprising thing about the record smash at the Rialto is the way "Aloma of the South Seas" topped the latest Harold Lloyd picture, "For Heaven's Sake." The comedy for expensive foreign cars, hats a full size larger, English accents, and an astounding loss of memory in recalling former acquaintances.

Hollywood might have saved itself all worry, so far as George was concerned. Because George doesn't happen to be that kind of fellow. Swank is a quality that ranks just a little below yellow fever in the O'Brien scheme of things. George's grin is today just as genial, his greeting to friends just as warm, and his head just as level, as in the days of not-so-long-ago when he was merely an assistant cameraman with the Tom Mix unit.

FAME doesn't mean a great deal in George's young life, anyway. He is very frankly in pictures for the fun he is getting out of the work.

GEORGE O'BRIEN himself is today about the only person in Hollywood who is not yet aware of the fact that George O'Brien has "arrived."

Every one else in the Film Capital knew that in "The Iron Horse" George scaled the cinematic ladder of fame in one mighty bound and landed very solidly at the top of the heap almost overnight.

The fact that about everyone in Hollywood knew and liked the big, genial young Irishman made them just a bit apprehensive over the spectacular suddenness of his rise to the heights.

Because such "sky rocket" leaps to glory have been known in the past to have rather weird effects in some few cases. Young men who were quite normal and likable before the event have immediately afterwards gone in

George O'Brien is an all-Irish-American who gets variety and thrill out of picture work. He comes honestly by his love for adventure and action, as his father is the Chief of Police in San Francisco. Naturally, he throws himself into every part with a whole-hearted Celtic flavor

The Roost Where ROY Rests

Roy D'Arcy, the screen's most dashing dispenser of dark deeds, has a picturesque home high up in Beverly Hills. He told the designers and decorators to go the limit in making it cozy, comfortable—and compelling to the eye. By placing it up toward heaven, Roy wanted the chance to find recreation and redemption and forget the ways of the flesh and devil—which haunt him when he stalks the sets.

At the top and bottom are the respective rear and front views of the D'Arcy domain, while in the center the head of the house has stepped into the kitchen to show the Missus how to season the sauce with spice.

The Screen Observer

The Warfield Dramas

WILLIAM FOX has purchased all of the Warfield plays and now he is confronted by the sad fact that there are no Warfields to play in them. Every character man in Hollywood has been considered for one or more of the familiar stage parts, but in every case the studio officials perceived that comparison with the original would provoke only laughter from the audience. There is one exception to this situation. George Sydney is perfectly cast as the Hebrew comedy character of the title-rôle in "The Auctioneer."

And Jean Hersholt will play Peter in "The Return of Peter Grimm," if Universal will lend him. Universal, however, shows no great readiness to accommodate rival studios with the services of choice players. Right now there is some difficulty over getting the loan of Hersholt for Erich von Stroheim's "The Wedding March."

Just Heinie

MY sympathy goes out to Heinie, the extra. I think he should have been a star long ago. Heinie—he has no other name, so far as I know—is a dwarfed figure with a head as smooth and hairless as an egg and a mouth into which he can insert three billiard balls at one time without inconvenience. His services are in demand to lend grotesquerie to the scenes of nearly every picture. I never sit in a movie show but I see Heinie performing some tantalizing bit. For Heinie is an actor of no mean ability.

Now Constance Talmadge gave a party for her new husband, Captain Alistair Mackintosh. Heinie was employed to give a fillip to the blasé assembly. Equipped with a pair of wings and a harp, Heinie was suspended from the ceiling and when all the guests were assembled, a curtain was drawn, revealing the most amazing angel that ever trod the golden stair.

After his stunt Heinie descended from his perch and attempted to mingle with the guests. He was repulsed with laughter and informed by the servants that he had been invited to the party solely in a professional capacity. "What the hell?" said Heinie. "I'm as much an actor as they are."

So saying, he took the fifteen bucks—his dole for the evening's antic—and departed in high dudgeon.

For my part, I think Heinie was right. He is as much of an actor as many of those present. And as for social standing—My Word!

Leave It to Lon

IN this wonderful atmosphere of make-believe, as the lady fan writers love to say, it is gratifying once in a while to find an artist who is sincere enough about his work to put himself to some inconvenience in its prosecution.

Such an artist is Lon Chaney. Otherwise he would never have submitted to the going-over which I watched him taking from Sergeant Hoffman of the U. S. Marine Base at San Diego.

Chaney is making a war picture—war pictures are the vogue again, you know—a war picture entitled "Tell It to the Marines." Sergeant Hoffman was employed by the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio with the consent of the Marine Base commandant, to teach the actor the things he ought to know about soldiering. Sergeant Hoffman is six feet tall and he has a jaw of iron. When informed of his new duties, he remarked fervently:

"All my life I've wanted to drill a movie actor."

I watched the sarge putting Chaney and William Haines thru the rudiments of file drill. He had to begin at the beginning by teaching them to stand at attention. Sergeant Hoffman kept up the grilling for better than an hour. Chaney seemed to be standing it all right, but poor Bill Haines, softened by many a studio tea scene,

Here is a scene from "The Marriage Clause," which brings Lois Weber, the only woman director, to the screen. It is a sort of Svengali-Trilby affair with Billie Dove and Francis X. Bushman in the leading rôles was perspiring profusely and the expression on his face was one of real distress.

But he didn't complain. And I predict that Sergeant Hoffman will make leathernecks out of his raw recruits before the picture is over.

Royalty Receives

DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS and Mary Pickford are making the rounds of royalty, as usual. All of the temporal monarchs are honored to receive them, but so far His Holiness, the Pope, has not been at home in the Vatican when they called.

I am informed by Mark Larkin, the Pickford-Fairbanks publicity seneschal, that Doug is looking over the Ufa studio in Germany with an eye to its availability for his use. If he finds it sufficiently equipped for his purpose, Doug expects to make his next picture there. He is keen to try his luck among the cinematic artists of the Old World, who would be his advisers.

But it seems that Doug will have to hurry or Uncle Carl Laemmle will have all the Old World artists corralled in Universal City.

The Busy Von

I've been trying to find out when Erich von Stroheim will actually begin shooting "The Wedding March." As he is considered among the greatest of directors, I have put forth a special effort to discover his activities.

The voice of Von came to me over the telephone the other day for the first time in months. He told me he had been away in the mountains rewriting the script for his story. The wary Paramount officials are making him do all the cutting of scenes in the script instead of in the film. Paper is cheaper than celluloid. It is rumored around that he had written an ending for the picture which didn't suit the powers—no pun upon the name of the redoubtable Pat—that be. When he called me, he had just completed the new ending, which being more cheerful, he hoped would please them.

As the story now stands, the hero, played by von Stroheim himself, will ride away to war, leaving the heroine praying in a nunnery. Whether he comes back to her or not is left to the imagination of the audience.

Von has assembled everything necessary to make this picture one of the masterpieces of realism for which he is famous. Authentic uniforms, which formerly adorned the officers of the Austrian army, were purchased and imported and now lie folded in a mighty heap in the wardrobe room of the Associated Studio, where the picture will be shot. Decorations of every kind, purchased from pawn-brokers and collectors, have been assembled to deck the bosoms of the gentlemen who will compose the von Stroheim army corps.

Among the medals pointed out to me by a former Austrian cavalry officer are the Jubilee medals, the Cross of Merit, the Grand Cross, the War Medal of 1866, Iron Crowns of the first, second and third classes, Medals of the Order of Leopold, the Order of the Golden Fleece, and many others.

Von told me he expected to be under way within four weeks. So by the time this tip reaches the public the picture, no doubt, will have begun.

Loses the Locks

I SAW Jackie Coogan the other day for the first time without the Dutch bob that for six years has caused fat matrons to exclaim, "Ain't he cute!"

Jackie, in fact, has suddenly grown up. When a star of his magnitude is shorn of his infantile locks, it is an event of such importance that it has to be immortalized in a movie. So the next vehicle for Jackie—the one on which he is now engaged—will be entitled "Johnny Get Your Hair Cut."

The Coogan kid plays the rôle of a youthful hobo who

The race-horse story was written for Jackie by Gerald Beaumont. The picture will be released thru Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Not Always Fair Weather

IN spite of propaganda sent out by the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce calling attention to the mean average temperature of the Glorious Southland, we do have a few uncomfortably hot days in this latitude. These days are the ones invariably selected by motion picture directors for the filming of Alaskan or Siberian scenes in which the poor actors are swathed in furs.

On one such day I wandered across the Pickford-Fairbanks lot, now leased to Joe Schenck. The sound of sleigh-bells attracted me to a set where tons of salt covered everything, presenting the illusion of snow.

Two cutters emerged from the courtyard of a castle and stopped in front of the cameras. Swathed in furs, a blonde lady hastily descended from one of the sleighs, shook the prop snow from her shoulders and vanished in the castle. A director shouted, "Cut!" The actress shed her sables, kicked off a pair of galoshes, and began ardently to fan herself. I recognized her then as Constance Talmadge.

Miss Talmadge is making "The Duchess of Buffalo." It may be her last picture. She told me that she may quit the game and be plain Mrs. Mackintosh for the rest of her life.

She is fortunate in having for her leading man in the wintry picture the talented Italian, Tullio Carminati, formerly leading man and managing director for Eleonora Duse. When I saw this young man making love on the stage of a Los Angeles theater, I wondered why in the world some producer didn't nab him. But nobody took the hint until Schenck brought him back to America last fall and placed him under a two-year contract.

A Comeback

IFANCY it will be pleasant to the believers in women's rights to hear that Lois Weber, who, for a long time has been the lone woman director in motion pictures, has staged a comeback.

Miss Weber was out of the running for about five years until she got a job at Universal to make a picture from Dana Burnett's "Technic." The result is called "The Marriage Clause." It is a highly creditable picture, taking into account the limitations to which the feminine director was subjected.

Billie Dove and Francis X. Bushman have the leading parts. It is in the nature of a comeback for Bushman as well as the directress. The story is a Svengali-Tribby affair, in which a young girl, aspiring to stage success, is taken in hand by a director who puts her over. But as she rises he descends. There is a thrilling finish in which the Svengali impresario pulls himself together and by force of his will compels the girl to give a triumphant performance altho she is seriously ill.

Glory for Two

MORE eyebrows have been arched in surprise in Hollywood over the casting of "What Price Glory?" than have been raised since Jackie Coogan proposed playing "Hamlet."

The two principal characters, the rivals of the stage-play, are a most ill-assorted pair. Captain Flagg is played by Victor McLaglen, the giant of "The Unholy Three." Edmund Lowe, esteemed for his suave society types, is cast as the hard-boiled Sergeant Quirk. The girl, Charmaine, is played by Dolores del Rio, the new Mexican beauty, who is of the most decided Spanish type and resembles a village maid of France about as much as she resembles Mrs. Cal Coolidge. The comparison of Señorita del Rio with Renée Adorée of "The Big Parade" will be inevitable, and no matter how well the charming señorita performs, the fact remains that she does not look the part.

Fox has expanded the war play by writing in a

The Light Fantastic

SUMMER in Hollywood is not without entertainment for our lighter moments. "Charlot's Revue" is running at the new El Capitan Theater, the first legitimate theater to be erected in our celluloid metropolis.

At the Orange Grove Theater in Los Angeles—a suburb of Hollywood—the inimitable "Music Hall Revue," staged by Will Morrissey, is attracting crowds of the cognoscenti, as well as those whose occupation is the merchandising of dairy products.

The revue is such a success that Ralph Spence, Will Morrissey and Arthur Freed have incorporated for $100,000 and will put on a series of shows at the Orange Grove. The next will be called "Polly of Hollywood."

Spence is the author of "The Gorilla." Freed is a well-known song writer. Morrissey, himself, is one of the keenest satirists of the American stage. Midgie Miller is to be starred in all the shows of the Orange Grove

Pola's Directors

IT'S just one director after another with Pola Negri. In her effort to find someone who understands her she has employed most of the directors on the Lasky lot. Ever since she stepped on American soil she has not had revealed the talent which marked her work in the German production, "Passion." And the blame has rested equally on the mediocre stories given her and on the directors. The latter have failed to understand her.

About the most successful of the directors who have handled her is Mal St. Clair, who was in charge of Pola's latest picture, "Good and Naughty." At least, he has made her bring out a sympathetic characterization—as well as establishing the fact that she knows a comedy scene when she sees it.

But St. Clair wont linger with her. He has other work cut out for him. So Pola, according to my spies on the Coast, will give Mauritz Stiller a chance to understand her moods and make the best of them. The temperamental Swedish director, who has but recently come to America, has been given a verbal barrage of bouquets by the other foreigners who handle the megaphone. Practically all of them proclaim him the master of them all.

The story goes that when he was assigned by Metro-Goldwyn to direct "The Temptress" he became so violently temperamental that no one could get along with him—and in the middle of the picture he was discharged, Fred Niblo taking his place. Now that he has found another job the public is engaged in watchful waiting to see how Pola fares under his guidance.

Stiller may be the man to lead her out of the Egypt of mediocre pictures. The cry was raised from the start that the Polish star, being a foreigner, needed a foreign director to handle her. Yet Buchowetzki failed to accomplish anything out of the ordinary when he directed her. Maybe it needs temperament to combat temperament. With Stiller having his share of it—as well as Pola, probably they'll get along very well together.

Natural Colors

RUMORS fly thick and fast on the Coast and it's difficult tackling them and bringing them to earth. One of the latest to warrant the chasing of it around the lots concerns Cecil B. De Mille. Ever up on his toes with bright ideas—ever alert as to what constitutes a "scoop" on his neighbors, C. B. is going in for natural colors—and they dont pertain to any technical process, either.

The story goes that having seen how Belasco has profited by introducing colored types in his stage production, "Lulu Belle," he will do a story based on Negro life—carrying the tentative title of "Porgy."

C. B. is ever after novelties. He knows as well as the next man who walks with his eyes open that the dark-skinned South Sea Islander is not so much in popular favor these days—that the public is fed up with the brown Peter Pan of the Pacific. And so, if the story contains an ounce of truth, he will concentrate one of these days on a deep-hued brunette.

But he will have to work fast. Reports have it that Monta Bell has ambitions to make a picture with Negro

H. R. H. the GRAND DUCHESS

Corinne Griffith will know a thing or two about the pomp and ceremony of court life when she finishes "Into Her Kingdom." As the Grand Duchess Tatiana, she is privileged to make her toilette just like Judy O'Grady and all the ladies of lesser rank

A duchess can even be unhappy. When she tries to occupy a throne which is ten sizes too large for her, you wish she could kick over the traces and enjoy herself

Above, Corinne demonstrates that she can wear a crown even if she is unable to see the king with both eyes. Those pesky top-pieces have a way of slipping sideways just like the caps of the Prince of Wales. At the right, Corinne as Tatiana sports a gorgeous pink satin court gown. It is embroidered in brilliants, pearls and silver beads and carries a train made of a thousand ermine tails attached to a high collarette of ermine. Some robe!

BETTIE K.—I should say these whiskers of mine are warm. You can reach Greta Garbo at Metro-Goldwyn Studios, Culver City, California. Alice Joyce is to be featured in the next W. C. Field picture, "So's Your Old Man." Adolphe Menjou in "The Ace of Cads." Vilma Banky and Agnes Ayres in "The Son of the Sheik." Why Dolores Costello weighs about 120 pounds.

HELEN S.—Yes, Monte Blue has a little daughter, Barbara Ann, born on April 5th. Fox are producing "Is Zat So," with Virginia Valli. Wanda Hawley and Gareth Hughes in "The Totem Pole Beggar." Syd Chaplin's next is "The Cuckoo's Nest" from an old English play. See you later, Helen.

CONNIE P.—Just address Corinne Griffith at the United Studios. H. B. Warner has been signed for a lead in Metro-Goldwyn's "The Temptress." Yes, Francis X. Bushman in "Butterflies in the Rain," with Laura LaPlante. Run in again some time, when you can stay longer.

CAROLYN O.—That's all right, there are nearly 1,400 devices patented by women in this country. Peggy Joyce did play in a picture some time ago, "The Skyrocket," and she is to make some more for Associated Exhibitors.

FELIX.—I'm right on hand, always at the question post. You're right, love is the beginning, the middle and the end of everything. Greta Nissen weighs about 110 pounds. You say you know for a positive fact Harold Lloyd likes radishes. Maybe he likes red. John Barrymore in "The Sea Beast," "Don Juan" and "Manon Lescaut."

J. U. C., MANILA.—I dont think Alma Rubens and her husband, Ricardo Cortez, went to Manila on their honeymoon as anticipated. William Cody's initial starring picture for Associated Exhibitors will be "The Galloping Cowboy" with Florence Ulrich, sister to Lenore.

WILD KID, SINGAPORE.—So, F. A. S., 90-B Bukit, Temah Road, Singapore, S. S., would like to join one of the correspondence clubs. Take it easy, girls. I'm sorry, old man, but I dont happen to know the price of Buck Jones' hat. You mean the broad brimmed cowboy hats. Better send for a Sears-Roebuck catalog, Chicago, Illinois. Ruth Clifford is married to James A. Cornelius.

MORRIS K.—Well, to educate a man is to form an individual who leaves nothing behind; to educate a woman is to form future generations. Jackie Coogan was born October 26, 1914, and he is playing in "Johnny-Get-Your-Hair-Cut."

ISABELLE J.—Yes, Leatrice Joy and her brother, Billy, came over to Brooklyn to see us. She was very popular around the magazine offices, Leatrice was quite at home, and we were sorry not to have her with us longer. So you want Ronald Colman to read "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes." Do you think he should?

BLANCHE K.—Well, Natacha Rambova doesn't tell her age, and neither does Jean Acker. Valentino has been married only twice.

MRS. H. M.—You're quite right, the more women have risked the more they are willing to sacrifice. Yes, Valentino lives at Beverly Hills, California. George O'Brien is playing in "The Story of Mother Machree."

EVELYN G.—Well, you know that Richard Barthelmess was

ETNA.—Cherio! So you were right in the midst of the strike in London. Guess it was pretty exciting. John Barrymore and Dolores Costello are to be co-starred in "Manon Lescaut."

MARY A.—Fire away! This is the month for it. You say: "Your brain, methinks, is like an hour-glass, wherein my imaginations run like sands, filling up time." Ricardo Cortez's real name is Jacob Krantz. And now you want the life story of Ramon Novarro. I'll see what I can do. At this writing he is in New York.

HENRY P.—Well, what class of women are most apt to give tone to society? The Belles? You want a picture of Buck Jones. That ought to be easy. And you like Irene Rich in sad love story scenes. She is good at that, isn't she? There's been a change. Eric von Stroheim is not to direct Pola Negri in "Hotel Imperial" after all.

LYNN.—Yes, it is $15.00 per. And you dont believe it. At twenty he thinks he can save the world; at thirty he begins to wish he could save part of his salary. William Boyd is playing in "Man o' War" with Jetta Goudal.

PEGGY F.—Listen here, Peggy. I only answer questions for this magazine and the Motion Picture Magazine, the latter being the first motion picture magazine in existence, and that's not maybe. So you think Mae Murray is really beautiful. I guess you are not alone. Norma Shearer in "Up Stage."

KITTY.—Say, I'm not a weather bureau, how do I know whether Elinor Faire and William Boyd are always going to be happy. You never know when there's going to be a storm. Yes, Norma Talmadge is married to Joseph Schenck. Betty Blythe is expected back in New York in August to fulfill a vaudeville engagement.

BEN C.—I dont know about the greatest battle of screen giants, altho I never will forget the fight between Tom Santschi and Bill Farnum in "The Spoilers" at the opening of the Strand, in New York City, in 1914. I think the greatest would be between Tom and Hobart Bosworth. You know Mary Pickford is in Europe at this writing. Address Buck Jones at Fox Studios, 1402 North Western Avenue, Hollywood, California.

IRENE H.—Well, you know, Irene, the more idle a woman's hand, the more occupied her heart. You remind me of this little verse:

I wish I was a little rock
Away up on a hill;
A doin' nothing all day long
But just a sittin' still.
I wouldn't work, I wouldn't sleep
I wouldn't even wash;
I'd just sit still a thousand years
And rest myself, by gosh!

So your favorites are Douglas Fairbanks and Mae Murray. But you wouldn't want to see them play together, would you? Mae Murray is playing in "Altars of Desire."

BIG BOY.—The "grand dame" you refer to who is so aristocratic as mother, dowager, and royal personages of advanced age is Kate Lester, but she is of the old Suydams of New York and that is her name. She has a firm background, having played with Richard Mansfield, John Drew, Mrs. Fiske, Julia Marlowe, William H. Crane, Henrietta Crossman, Robert Mantell and all the rest of them. Norman Kerry is playing in "Love Me and the World Is Mine."

MONSIEUR G.—Wee, wee, but men love at first and most warmly; women love last and longest. This is natural enough;

On any cruise of the continents you would naturally expect the Germans to be represented. Which accounts for Elga Brink, one of Berlin's leading picture stars

FOR the first time in motion picture history Universal will produce three encircling-the-globe pictures.

The idea is a result of conferences arranged by Carl Laemmle, the chief mogul of Universal, while abroad last year. The company was gathered together in Germany and production has already been started on the first of the films, "The Woman Without a Name."

When the troupers reached New York, they immediately set sail for Havana and environs to take exteriors. Eventually the two-part feature will be finished in San Francisco and Universal City.

The title of the other picture is "Forbidden Kisses" and the itinerary calls for visits to Honolulu, Shanghai, Tokyo and other Oriental cities. The return to Germany, where the interiors will be filmed—will be over the trans-Siberian railroad.

The celluloid tourists will be under the leadership of George Jacoby, the European director. He is known in this country for his production of "Quo Vadis."

stance Talmadge, Eleanor Boardman, Esther Ralston, Colleen Moore, Vilma Banky, Leatrice Joy, Lois Wilson, Claire Windsor, Irene Rich, Nita Naldi, Greta Garbo and Anna Q. Nilsson to relegate this rule into the discard.

By all means, let us not forget regulation No. 316, which states that screen leading men should be smooth-shaven, while screen villains should boast some hirsute adornment. In the past year or so, however, this canon has been smashed to smithereens, thanks to Ronald Colman, John Gilbert, Adolphe Menjou, Lew Cody, Lewis Stone, and even Douglas Fairbanks.

If this sort of thing keeps up, we may even live to see the day when the fashion for heroes will be a complete set of chin-whiskers.

Rules, regulations, laws and dogmas—the film industry is full of them, but they don't mean anything.

They said that comedians couldn't be serious, and Chaplin proved that he could be tragic and make the public like it.

They said that comedians had to wear trick clothes and a funny mustache, and Harold Lloyd became the biggest money-maker in film history without either.

They said that comedians had to have a droll appearance and along comes the good-looking Raymond Griffith.

Why, Buster Keaton proved that a comedian doesn't even have to be funny.

They're Out of the Rut

RUDOLPH VALENTINO'S rise to popularity was another setback for the rule-makers. Rudy had been knocking about Hollywood for several years trying to break into the movies. The best he ever got was a few unimportant rôles. The producers and casting agents declared that he violated rule No. 226-A—he was too foreign-looking.

The experts knew—so they said—the American public did not care for foreign players on the screen. Then came the "Four Horsemen."

Rule No. 226-A was smothered under an avalanche of foreign players who began to flood the American screen, and the panic is still on.

Valentino, who couldn't get a job because he was too foreign-looking, became the idol of the American public and the experts hurried away to draw up some new rules.

Bull Montana

It might also be mentioned that Valentino broke other rules in his ascent to film fame, his eyes being smaller and more closely together than movie dogma allowed.

Norma Shearer might be mentioned as another player who had a long struggle in breaking into the films, because she did not answer the accepted screen requirements. It was only after learning many make-up tricks and much experience before the camera that Norma discovered how to fool the experts and make them think she had a screen face.

When Douglas Fairbanks first tried his hand at the silent drama, it was predicted by many that he would be a big failure. In those days, it was a custom for all screen players to act very slowly. In fact, they moved and walked about before the camera in a very self-conscious and cumbersome manner. The idea was to register everything deliberately and with great importance to the spectator.

Fairbanks didn't know anything about this and he nearly broke the hearts of a number of experts by ignoring one of their most iron-clad rules. Doug moved and jumped about before the camera with an alacrity that made the experts shake their heads and turn thumbs down.

When Doug began to appear on the screens throuout the country, however, the public at once seized upon him as a personality refreshing and different. Instead of slowing down in his movements, Doug put on a little extra steam and soon became the biggest favorite of the day.

Symmetry Does Not Shine

food for thought. Furthermore, he never insults the understanding. Here, since we are all grown-ups, a courtesan is a courtesan; a pander is a pander. We are made to feel the reality of these genre portraits despite their romantic background.

The Art of Satire

LUBITSCH's social satires, such as "The Marriage Circle" and "Kiss Me Again," force themselves even more easily into the category of masterpieces.

There is less glitter to dazzle your eyes. The nature of these films is simpler, as the highest art is nearly always the simplest. While dealing with more trivial moods, "Kiss Me Again," for instance, is created out of much characteristic movie "business." There is a sequence running several thousand feet in which the husband and wife, Monte Blue and Marie Prevost, discuss with their lawyer the most sensible method of getting their divorce. The pantomime here is tremendously funny without having any of the dynamic farce of the Harold Lloyd buffoonery. The face, hands, body of Monte Blue suddenly become an instrument that flickers before the camera lens with infinite fantasy. The film offers a brilliant psychological portrait of these frivolous but extremely human characters.

Instead of being panoramic like Griffith, who gives you a great sweep of thousands of men and horses over a span of years, Lubitsch is analytical, and prefers to film a few highly concentrated moments which have the imaginative fillup of any highly distilled beverage. It all has the effect sometimes of certain dreams in which events unfold themselves with an unearthly clarity, so that every detail of a room, of a person's speech, is imprinted on your mind.

"To see eternity in a grain of sand . . ." said the poet, Blake. And Lubitsch can see and show us eternal truths in a casual gesture, or the oscillations of Mr. Menjou's eyebrows.

Lubitsch's great stunt is that he gets all these effects with such simple means, with such reasonable material; like the framework of the old domestic triangle. He is so intelligent and competent as he moves from one bit of business to another that he makes pantomime, which is too often mere dumb show, have a much greater range of meaning.

There is one side of these films that I object to, however; the overtone of cynicism. Granting that sometimes the fate of an empire rests upon the proportions of a naughty woman's nose or hips, I still feel that that is not the whole story. Nine times out of ten the greatest victories are simply won by sweat, gameness, suffering. Technically, Lubitsch touches the deepest tones of his instrument; emotionally he scratches only the surface of life.

James Cruze is a master of motion. His masterpiece, "The Covered Wagon," presented the unique sight of a huge train of prairie-schooners becoming the heroes of a motion picture while the characters emerged only for moments from their rôles of cogs in a great machine

Stroheim's Grim Shadows

THOSE deeply moving experiences which I demand of a great art that almost leaves wounds and scars in the memory, come in fragments of "Greed," Erich von Stroheim's great picture. To see this is like living thru the night of one of those big storms on the Atlantic.

There were striking differences in method from Lubitsch. First, there is nearly as much shadow in Stroheim's work as there is light in Lubitsch's. Instead of trying for an effect of lightness, he wants to be ponderous and tragic.

McTeague is an uncouth and simple being of the lower classes with a tragic life-story which Stroheim sought to represent, episode after episode. It was not a picture for tenderfeet, for the film in its unflinching realism goes down to the very dregs of life.

In my memory the picture divides itself into two parts: the action in the city up to the murder and the flight of McTeague to the desert. The early scenes were infused with an atmosphere of drab horror and piled up incitements to crime. Stroheim used "camera angles" and light to get the most impressive lines and shadows he could. Above all, he wanted to make each set fairly drip with feeling. A master of atmosphere, he composes each scene with the idea of driving home an emotional effect rather than a picture of action. He focuses his camera from many different angles; he creeps upon things and surprises them; now he lingers over them and seems to wonder about them.

Camera Angles

I DON'T know who first invented these "camera angles." At any rate, Stroheim uses them with telling effect. Finding that you can get startling results by suddenly devoting the whole spread of the screen to a few small things, or even part of one thing, they let it sweep about their material like a huge, superhuman eye, now looking at something from close by, now from below, now from twenty stories above. And these queer "angles," when used with artistry, helped to emphasize some things above others, to fix, in short, certain impressions in your head. It gives the camera an amazing grip on you.

In the early scenes of "Greed" there is a shot of the wedding group advancing up the narrow stairway of McTeague's house, seen from the top of the hallway. From the point at which you see them, they all look peculiarly distorted, flattened. There is something uncanny about this effect, and it gives you a nameless fear, which is just one of the moods Stroheim wants to evoke.

It was these new and terrible sensations of deep shadows and masses, of heavy tragic movements that I got from "Greed."

For cinema compositions that aim at atmosphere, the early scenes of "Greed" have not yet been excelled by American work.

There is a group of films which seem to represent a completely different technique and mood from the Lubitsch-Stroheim variety. I mean the advocates of motion.

An Advocate of Motion

ONE of the classic examples of this type was James Cruze's "The Covered Wagon." It was a unique thing to see a huge train of prairie-schooners become the hero of a motion picture, while the characters emerged only for moments from their minor rôles of cogs in a great machine. The drama of the covered wagons from the formation of the train, thru its trials and quarrels, to its final haven at the sea coast was an amazing spectacle, as miraculous as anything we may read in Marco Polo.

It is pure movie stuff again at its best. In no other form could you have had such a sensation of space, of the infinite sweep of desolation, which these winding trains traversed. It was only because Cruze really cared for those things that he got so much of the magnificent surging movements of this nomadic horde of cattle and men. The journey of the covered wagons is really the whole story of this film. To us it had also the added significance of picturing the barbarous, pioneer side of America, which, recent as it is, is already forgotten.

It is well that Cruze commemorated brilliantly another colorful phase of American life: the rise of the movie industry itself. "Hollywood" was really a much better film than most people imagined. It was a satire upon the life of the preposterous world of Hollywood that made us realize just how topsyturvy and crazy things were over there. The farcical incidents in which the group of innocents who set out to conquer the movie capital are immersed increase in speed and absurdity until it is all perfectly mad.

One of the best sequences was the dream scene, in which the hero rows thru the only partly worth while if I did not see Chaplin. I went to a telephone and called up Samuel Goldwyn, and he endeavored to get in touch with the comedian. He called me back and said that while he had not been able to communicate with Chaplin he had ascertained that the screen celebrity would not leave for several days.

The following afternoon I received a message from Mr. Goldwyn saying that he had made an appointment for me with Chaplin in his studio. I was elated, and punctually I went to the fun-maker's workshop, where I met Chaplin's manager, Alfred Reeves, who has been with the comedian since the nights Chaplin played in "A Night in an English Music Hall." I made known to Mr. Reeves the reason for my presence, but he appeared to be blissfully ignorant of the comedian's whereabouts. He did not say that Charlie would not come, but neither did he appear to think that he would. He was non-committal and evidently he decided to make my visit as interesting as he could. He went over the same description he had obviously done for hosts of others in similar circumstances.

Mr. Reeves and I entered Chaplin's combination office and dressing-room and in a somewhat distracted way the manager pointed to two pairs of very large shoes.

"There are his boots, the ones he wears for the screen," observed Mr. Reeves.

Hanging above the absurd shoes was the little tail coat, the shapeless trousers, and above them, the little derby. It was all very interesting to look at these props, but where was Chaplin? He was almost an hour late. Mr. Reeves still appeared to be wondering why I should think that he would come, and he turned the conversation to stage settings, as his eyes wandered to several telegrams arranged neatly on the comedian's desk.

I was leaning back in Chaplin's favorite chair and Reeves was ascertaining the business done by "The Gold Rush," at Grauman's Egyptian Palace, when a prepossessing, active man, his hair well-touched with grey, sprang up a few steps and threw open the screen door. It was Charlie. He had kept the appointment after all. Telegrams did not interest him, but he was pleased to hear that his latest picture had sold out at the matinee. He was dressed in a well-cut grey, striped suit and wore spotless white shoes, and only when he smiled did he remind one of the sympathetic character one has seen so much on the screen.

He remained only three minutes in his office, and then we left the building, in front of which was waiting his Rolls-Royce runabout and his Japanese chauffeur. The chauffeur jumped up in the back seat and local musical persons and his mimicry made everybody laugh.

Charlie steered the machine to the Montmartre, which, when we entered, was almost empty. Only the head waiter recognized the comedian. We took seats at a table near a window, and soon we were talking of Thomas Burke, of Phil May, the black-and-white artist; of old London, of the Karno comedians and of Charlie's first overcoat with an astrakhan collar.

This man of moods often is the cause of much disappointment, especially to a host or a hostess giving a dinner. It is nice to be able to say that Mr. Chaplin will be present, but when you know that most of the people have come to see Chaplin and he does not put in an appearance, it makes it quite trying for those who are entertaining, especially when, at times, they are well aware that some of the guests have broken previous engagements hoping to meet and talk to the comedian. And it not infrequently happens that Mr. Chaplin's faithful Japanese calls up and says:

"Mister Chaplin very sorry but so ill cannot come to dinner—he very sorry."

Often this results in the host or the hostess not feeling the least compassion regarding Charlie's indisposition.

Enjoys His Moods

CHAPLIN impresses one as if he rather enjoyed his moods. He wants to be different and when it strikes him suddenly that he can't stand going to a certain function nobody could make him change his mind.

I had an engagement with him for dinner on another occasion. The Japanese servant called up and announced that Mr. Chaplin was going to have Sir Henry and Lady Wood with him and that we were all going to see "The Gold Rush" after dinner.

"I will be ready at seven o'clock," I said.

"Very well," said the Japanese, timidly. Ten minutes passed and the telephone rang again.

"Mr. Chaplin say Sir Henry—Lady Wood not coming, but Mr. Chaplin meet you at seven-thirty," breathed the Japanese.

Five more minutes passed. The yellow man was again on the telephone:

"Mr. Chaplin call for you at your hotel at seven-thirty—but you know—Mister Chaplin not always there on time—sometimes he little late."

To my surprise, instead of having to wait that evening for Chaplin, he turned up five minutes early. We went to dinner at a restaurant opened by one of his players, and there I had the experience of listening to Raymond Griffith, who speaks only in a husky whisper, and Charlie talking over picture plays and people. Later we drove to the theater, and hardly a soul (and that was in Hollywood) knew that the good-looking man next to me was the chief player in the feature being screened. He was the only man who did not laugh that evening, his whole mind being wrapt up in the music, which he wanted to change.

"You know I believe in tenderness in stories," Chaplin said in the course of the conversation. "It is a great help in pictures, provided you can express it with sincerity. In 'The Gold Rush,' when I am a millionaire, you will see that I can't resist picking up a cigar butt. This reflects the mood of many persons who have experienced a bitter struggle in early life."

"To this day I fight against extravagance in make-up, as I constantly think what it would have cost me in the old music-hall days, when a shilling was a shilling. Even now I economize on the crêpe hair I use for my mustaches, and when I throw away some of this stuff I recall that I would not have done so in the early London days. This crêpe hair costs about a nickel a yard, but there you are. On the other hand, I sometimes call off work for the day and pay a hundred men who haven't done a stroke, just because I am not in the mood to act or direct."

It was nearly five o'clock when Chaplin drove me to the Ambassador Hotel, and he promised that I would soon see him again.

My next sight of Chaplin was at a dinner where the host served cocktails, and, what is not unusual, Charlie was late. All the other guests had arrived long before he appeared with his wife. He was cheerful, when he appeared, and he looked very fit. He was offered a cocktail, but refused it, asking the servant whether he could have a glass of water. That evening he imitated some of the popular acclaim, ghosts that bow in defeat before the remorselessness of Age—ghosts here and there that bow before the folly of extravagance and riotous living.

As the shadows of the pepper-trees flicker across the fence, it almost seems that the notes from Wally Reid's saxophone can be heard from one of the stages . . . gay, happy, tragic Wally, grinding out eight and nine pictures a year, continuing work when he had to be carried on the set, forcing a smile, making the executives think it was only another irrepressible gag.

In the distance seems to move the enigmatic, courtly figure of William Desmond Taylor, whose murder created one of the unsolved mysteries in recent years . . . and just beyond is a girl in golden curls that he is directing; Mary Miles Minter, another ghost, at the age of twenty-two, her film career ended—because of the tragedy.

Just Memories

JAMES NEILL, the character actor, passes in the flesh. As he looks on the ruins, he murmurs the verse quoted at the beginning of this story—"I feel like one who walks alone, some banquet hall deserted—"

Neill played in the very first picture made on this lot. "What memories! What memories!" he said to me. "I remember the early days, when that old barn at the corner was the whole studio. I owned the only automobile—an old Buick. It was the sole car parked under the pepper-trees of Vine Street, where now there are hundreds. Jesse Lasky walked to work, and so did Cecil De Mille, and Samuel Goldwyn. Dustin Farnum, the star, owned a car in New York, but he hadn't brought it out with him. The studio, for its location trips, had three old Pope-Hartfords. Later Mr. Lasky purchased a small foreign car."

Dustin Farnum! Why, isn't that his name on the Orpheum 24-sheet across the street, advertising him in "The Littlest Rebel"? One rubs one's eyes.

Dustin Farnum, the man who missed an opportunity to make a million on this very spot! He and Lasky and De Mille and Goldwyn were the original four partners in the concern. The other three put in $5,000 apiece. Farnum was to get his quarter interest in stock in return for acting in the first picture, "The Squaw Man." At the last minute he decided he wanted the $5,000 in cash, and gave back the stock, and the other three took it reluctantly because they had a hard time finding the $5,000. Today, if Farnum had retained the stock, it would be worth more than $1,000,000, not to speak of the many dividends. But he took the $5,000 . . . and is still playing on the Orpheum, so the billboard says.

Onward Stalk the Shadows

IN the tide of traffic that swirls by, one sees another ghost, a chastened, somewhat shrunken ghost with a serious face, who passes in an unobtrusive, inexpensive car. He casts a pondering glance at the partially demolished studio. Whatever may be his thoughts, they are well hidden behind the immobile mask of his countenance. It is Fatty Arbuckle, and the door which he is now hurrying past is the same to which he used to drive with a grand flourish in a red-and-gold custom-built automobile. Today he is on his way to the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer lot, where he is directing under the name of William Goodrich.

Bryant Washburn enters the gates—on his way to hold a short conference with Raymond Griffith. Five years ago he was a big star on the lot. Raymond Griffith was then an unknown. Today Griffith is a big star—and Washburn recently returned to the screen, playing a second lead in support of Griffith.

"Life's all right—as long as you have a sense of humor," he smiled in passing.

THE faint ghostly trilling of soprano notes recalls Geraldine Farrar, as famous in pictures as she was on the operatic stage. She is now in retirement so far as both arts go, and is living at Ridgefield, New Jersey.

A shadow from the land of the Rising Sun is Sessue Hayakawa, who recently returned to this country from France, where he has been making pictures. Once he was famous in Hollywood. Today there is a younger generation that scarcely knows him. He is now trying his luck on the stage.

Dapper Charlie Chaplin rides by on his way to his own lot. He casts a passing glance at Pola Negri's bungalow. . . .

A doorway of the star dressing-room building that is being torn down reveals the name of Kathryn Williams . . . she has retired from the screen, and is living abroad with her husband, Charles Eyton. YOUR POWDER WON'T "Show" when you use a scientifically blended shade of Pompeian Beauty Powder to match your skin

By MADAME JEANNETTE

Famous cosmetician, retained by The Pompeian Laboratories as a consultant to give authentic advice regarding the care of the skin and the proper use of beauty preparations.

A SOFT, delicate texture—a lovely satiny face—yet not a sign of powder. What is the secret of her alluring complexion? Does she use powder? She does, but a shade that matches so perfectly the tone of her skin that she secures the good effects of powder without seeming to use it.

All smart women strive for a natural complexion, but all do not achieve it. Not all women have found a powder that really matches their skin—a powder that reveals their natural coloring. Complexions are not composed of single colors, but a blend of different colors. Pompeian Beauty Powder is scientifically blended from different colors.

Whatever the tone of your complexion, some one shade of this powder matches it perfectly. Select this shade from the directions that follow in the Shade Chart.

Pompeian Beauty Powder has gained its remarkable popularity because of its purity, its exceptional consistency, its delicate odor, its quality of adhering well—and its perfection of shades.

SHADE CHART for selecting your shade of Pompeian Beauty Powder

Medium Skin: The average American skin tone is medium, neither decidedly light nor definitely olive. This skin should use the Naturelle shade.

Olive Skin: Women with this type of skin are apt to have the dark hair and eyes characteristic of beautiful Spanish women. This skin should use the Rachel shade to match its rich tones.

Pink Skin: This is the youthful, rose-tinged skin (not the florid skin) and should use the Flesh shade.

This charming type of American beauty, with gray eyes and brown hair, should use Pompeian Beauty Powder in the Naturelle shade to emphasize the lovely tone of her skin.

White Skin: This skin is unusual, but if you have it you are the only type that should use White powder in the daytime.

In the evening under artificial light it may be better to use powder of lighter shade than the one recommended above. In case of doubt, write a description of your skin, hair and eyes to Madame Jeannette for special advice.

If you have experienced the difficulty of having powder look "chalky and unnatural," buy a box of Pompeian Beauty Powder today, in the shade suggested for your special type. At all toilet counters 60c. (Slightly higher in Canada.) Purity and satisfaction guaranteed.

It Is To Laugh

called Mr. Pollock's attention to it and he had the uniform changed. This mistake, I am informed, was entirely due to the costumer. In that delightful musical comedy of German life, "The Student Prince," the military uniforms and court costumes in it are purely fanciful and not in the least accurate. They would have been just as brilliant and much more effective had they been correct.

The most common error seen on both the stage and the screen in connection with military uniforms, is that of side arms worn with foreign military dress. It rarely seems to occur to a producer that each army has regulations of its own regarding the form of the sword and the manner in which it should be worn, so they provide U. S. sabres for all types of foreign officers, and the actors wear them hooked up in the manner prescribed for our officers, regardless of the regulations of the army of which they are supposed to be members. Once in a while a striking exception to this rule is seen. The thing which I enjoyed most in "The Phantom of the Opera" was watching the unconscious ease and correct manner in which the actor who played the part of the lover wore his sword. I wish that I could remember his name so that I could mention it here. In one of the "Zenda" pictures there was also a group of officers who wore their swords in the Continental manner, hanging from a single sling, as if they had so worn them all their lives.

Military Mistakes

Just because our army officers wear their sword belt outside the coat is no reason why producers should consider that officers in all armies do so. As a matter of fact, with many types of uniform, the belt is almost always worn under the coat, and our officers are about the only ones who hook up the sabre when dismounted. With all service uniforms, the belt is, of course, worn over the coat, but the sword in many armies, when worn with it, is passed thru a frog.

Foreign military equipment, other than side arms, is another thing which is often incorrectly worn. Of course, no actor should be expected to know how to wear such articles as arguilletes, sabre-tasches, despatch pouches and sashes, but someone connected with the production should know and see that they are worn properly.

Foreign uniforms, other than those worn in the World War, are rarely correct as shown on the stage or the screen. I have seen "Carmen" several times, both on the stage and in pictures, and I have never yet seen it presented with real Spanish uniforms showing the proper insignia of rank. The usual method of marking the rank of the corporal who is later reduced to a private, is to have him wear a pair of two-bar chevrons in the first act and leave them off in the second. Now in the Spanish army, rank for both officers and non-commissioned officers is indicated by means of bands of gold or silver braid, or scarlet cloth, encircling the cuff, a corporal having three stripes of scarlet cloth.

From about 1750 until 1812, it was the custom in most armies, including our own, for officers to wear one or two epaulets according to rank; general and field officers wearing one on each shoulder; captains, one was full of technical errors. One of the most noticeable of these was the wearing of quivers for arrows suspended from the shoulder, instead of from the hip. Imagine the difficulty of trying to draw quickly a cloth yard shaft from a case hanging down the back!

Sword play and knife fighting as seen in motion pictures is not usually of a very high order, but sometimes really remarkable work is done along these lines. The duel in "Scaramouche" was an excellent example of small sword play, while the fight on horseback in "Under the Red Robe" was certainly a thriller. The best knife fight which I ever saw on the screen was in "Orphans of the Storm." No real knife fighter ever places his thumb on the pommel and strikes downward from the shoulder; he puts it along the flat of the blade and thrusts straight out from the hip. The fight in "Orphans of the Storm" was done by the latter method and was most realistic.

Oh, For the Styles of Yesterday

Coming down to modern days and civil dress, I wonder why it is that in most pictures all clothing since the Civil War is the same as that of today. When I was a boy, the hoopskirt had gone out, but the ladies wore in its place the bustle, and their dresses had long trailing pleated skirts. Men of standing in the community wore high hats, frock coats and striped trousers, and often carried gold-headed canes. As a young man, I remember wearing a short tan overcoat reaching scarcely below the hips, a stiff-bosomed white shirt, and a straight and very high collar. Trousers at that time were rather large and without a crease and the soft hat of today was practically unknown in the East, the derby being the almost universal head covering for the male sex, except in formal dress when the silk hat, or opera hat, was worn. The ladies at that time favored gowns with large puff sleeves, and wore wide-brimmed hats.

In the 90's, when the bicycle rage hit the country, the men took to knickers and the ladies to ankle-length skirts, shirt-waists and straw sailor hats. When the bicycle craze had run its course, the men resumed their long trousers and knickers were not seen again until the popularity of golf brought them once more into use. About 1890, the soft shirt with turn-back cuffs replaced the one with the stiff bosom and cuffs, as an article of wearing apparel for the male sex; and early in the twentieth century the ladies began to tighten and shorten their skirts and reduce the size of their hats until eventually the abbreviated skirt and small head covering of the present time was evolved.

Very few of these changes in dress, which have all occurred within the past fifty years, are shown in motion pictures.

These two officers of the guard imagine they are settling their feud with rolling-pins instead of swords. Such combat is not of a very high order in the films on the right shoulder; and lieutenants, one on the left shoulder. In all of the Colonial and Revolutionary period plays and pictures which I have seen, I can only recall one instance in which all officers, regardless of their rank, did not wear two epaulets.

The further back the supposed period of the picture, the greater seems to be the percentage of error. "When Knighthood Was in Flower," the scenes of which were laid in the time of Henry VIII, was well costumed, while "Robin Hood," a picture of the time of Richard the Lionhearted,

Mr. Blakeslee, the author of "It Is To Laugh," is a Consulting Costume Expert. He is an authority on detail and nothing escapes his vision. Where the rest of us may discover a few irrelevant points, he discovers many. There is scarcely a picture or play which does not need "doctoring" to carry out a similitude with realities. But the producers continue to err—and this calls for him and the rest of us to ask—"What's wrong with this picture?"

Mr. Blakeslee is one of many brilliant writers who have been engaged to write feature articles for the CLASSIC. He knows his subject thoroly—and our readers may look forward to future numbers which will carry his entertaining ideas.

Impressions of Hollywood

sort of church which was formerly occupied by the Theosophists, and it is very picturesque and quaint.

Gardner is quite youthful and prepossessing—particularly in the costume and make-up in which he entered, just having come from a rehearsal of a scene in "The Amateur Gentleman," in which he is giving Dick Barthelme a battle for the honors. He proudly showed me some of his old books and rare prints, which I enjoyed quite as much as viands and cigars.

Drinking Tea With Jack Dempsey

ESTELLE TAYLOR invited me over recently to meet her husband and you can bet I went, because I had not yet met Jack Dempsey, who is perhaps the most popular man on this little ant-hill of ours that we call the world. They sent their Rolls-Royce to take me there, and when we drew up in front of a pretty bungalow in a fine neighborhood I did not realize that this was the house that Jack built. It looked nothing like Jack, outside or in, but it did look like Estelle Taylor. Everything looked nice and neat and tidy, and there were no signs of boxing-gloves or sports. Estelle and a few other ladies were there, but no Jack—he was expected to return from his training camp at any minute.

While we were talking, a green parrot walked in and joined in the conversation. He belonged to Estelle and soon proved that he did. Then a maid wheeled in a tea-wagon full of sandwiches, cakes, tea and other delicacies, and I was informed by one of the ladies that the tea-set (a very choice one) was a Christmas present from Jack to Estelle. And I thought to myself, Jack has mighty good taste. I partook of the delicacies slowly, because I was impatient to prolong things and see Jack.

A Genial Host

I COULD not imagine Jack sitting in that dainty drawing-room drinking tea! I simply couldn't get myself to believe that he was coming. But shortly we heard a car outside, then a key turning in the front door, and then a voice saying to the maid, "It's only me, the iceman." It was not a heavy, bass voice, as I had expected, but quite a boyish one. And then the young giant walked in. He was dressed quite like any other ordinary business man, not loudly, nor coarsely, but neatly. He kissed Estelle affectionately, smilingly shook hands with the other ladies and then grasped my hand. He did not look so big as I expected. He seemed only three or four inches taller than myself and not quite so plump. His figure looked well formed and not overmuscular nor ungainly. He is not handsome but decidedly likable. He has personality and charm, and he talks quite like anybody else, using good language.

Then he sat down by my side, took up a dainty teacup and saucer in his big hand and drank. Then he took an olive and two or three immature sandwiches, a couple of candies and a fancy cake or two, and behaved himself like a Beau Brummel. Not a word about sports and fighting. We talked about pictures some and he said that he liked to see them but believed he wasn't much of an actor. "I was in a picture at Universal and I was supposed to feel very badly about something—in fact, I had to cry, but they couldn't get me to do it, try as I would. They made me look at bright lights, put onions in my eyes, vaseline, and everything else, but I couldn't make myself cry."

Touring the Dempsey Manse

"WELL, I can make you cry, Jack," said I. "You go down and see 'Stella Dallas,' and I'll bet $100 your eyes will moisten." Estelle doubted it, and so she took the bet, and we put up the money. We're all going together, and I'm hoping to get that $200 pot!

After "tea" I was shown thru the house at my request. You just ought to see Jack's bedroom! It is chuck-full of pink silk pillows, fancy dolls, perfumes, dainty laces, and so on, and the bed is ivory-colored with fluffy lace coverings. Of course, this is really Estelle's room, but I know that he bought a lot of the stuff himself, and that he likes it, and that he is just as fond of perfumes as she is.

But in another room there is an athletic device that looks quite masculine, and a big clothes closet containing at least twenty suits of men's clothes hanging on a pole.

Then they showed me a lot of small pet dogs—some beauties, too—and I wondered if these were Jack's. No, they weren't—they were Estelle's. Jack's are huge ones and he has them out in the country.

Jack is running a hotel to keep him busy, and he likes it. He is very much like any other man—except he is the greatest fighter on earth.

That Semon Chap

I RAN across my old friend, Larry Semon, the other day, and he took me over to the F. B. O. studio, where he is doing a five-reel comedy called "Spuds."

Years ago I thought that Larry would by now be giving Lloyd, Chaplin and Keaton a hard run for first place, but he seemed to have gotten a bad break in the last few years and did not progress as he should. I am, however, still betting on him and hope yet to see him quite at the top among the first comedians of the screen. He showed me the first reel of "Spuds," and it is as good as anything I have seen by any of the comedians. If the other four reels are as good as the first, he has a sure winner, but—alas!—he says that they won't give him enough money to finish the picture properly. And that is the way things go. His backers must be blind!

In one of the scenes in "Spuds" is a sequence where Larry is hiding behind a couch near a steam-pipe, when a little monkey comes in and turns on the steam. This little monkey is very clever and gets twenty-five dollars a day—at least, his fat Italian master gets it. I watched them for two hours training this monkey to sneak in and unscrew the handle of the radiator, but of course they did not use the steam during these rehearsals because it would frighten the monkey. His master would make the motions of turning the handle, the monkey would look at him and imitate the movement, all the time cheeping his willingness to do the best he could. He was fastened to the end of a long, thin piece of black silken cord to prevent his getting away, because, I am told, in a previous scene he escaped and for hours had a jolly time aloft among the rafters, finally getting out of the building and quite losing himself several blocks away, much to the distress of his master—but Larry himself rescued him in the back yard of a bungalow.

Irresistible is the charm of a smooth clear skin

NO other element of beauty has the alluring appeal of a fresh, velvety skin, glowing with health and color. Every man admires it and nature intended every woman to possess it.

But no skin, however lovely, will retain its beauty unaided and thousands of women have found the solution of their problem in the daily use of Resinol Soap. There are three excellent reasons why this soap appeals so strongly to the woman who wishes to preserve or restore the fresh, youthful charm of her complexion.

First, it is a decidedly pleasing toilet soap giving a quantity of creamy, pore-searching lather that invigorates while it cleanses.

Then its ingredients are absolutely pure and wholesome. There is no trace of free alkali—that harsh, drying chemical which makes so many ordinary soaps injurious to the skin and hair.

But best of all, it contains the soothing Resinol properties which give it that distinctive, refreshing fragrance and rich color, and cause it to keep the skin clear and velvety.

RESINOL OINTMENT is a ready aid to Resinol Soap. In addition to being widely used for eczema, rashes, chafing, etc., thousands of women find it indispensable for clearing away blackheads, blotches and similar blemishes.

The Disillusioned Director

I asked him why he gave up the most lucrative business of directing pictures.

"I haven't really given up my film work," he said. "To tell the truth, I have been experimenting with a fairy story at the Paramount Studio. Douglas Fairbanks wanted me to make 'The Black Pirate' with him, but I was tied up with the Paramount people and couldn't. I'm sorry, for the setting of that story had tremendous color possibilities.

"However, I intend to make one color picture before I give up my screen work entirely. My hobby is color. I have devoted my life to the study of color and I have a thousand theories about color values on the screen and of course I want to try out some of these theories."

But the note of enthusiasm that was present when he mentioned his books and his murals was absent when he discussed his work for the screen.

A Thankless Task

"MAKING pictures, especially if you are trying to make beautiful pictures, is a thankless task," he volunteered.

"You see before you a very disillusioned person! I love Hollywood and have made firm friendships among the picture people—but as a whole, and this is especially true of the producers, I find the people of the film world to be a fickle lot.

"Who was it that said there was no such thing as true friendship in Hollywood? The newest big name arrives here with a fanfare of trumpets, there is feasting, the Yes-Yes Chorus does its darndest, and the film colony literally hangs on the words of the new arrival. But after the novelty and excitement has died down—the big name becomes a worn toy, one whose secret mechanism has been discovered—then it is time for another big name.

"Such a state of affairs is very discouraging to the real artist, for art thrives best in an atmosphere of appreciation.

"Art and talent are not novelties—they are things which grow richer and more prolific with time. There is little leisure

Seely

Mabel Ballin is one of the real artistes of the screen. She is a mistress of make-up as well as characterization—and never fails to reveal sympathy and sincerity in her performances in Hollywood—that may be the answer to it all! But look what they have done to Pola Negri—to Lubitsch—let us hope that Jannings does not come to America to make pictures!"

We gossiped about the German pictures and agreed that American film production will have to change radically unless we want to be beaten in the end by the very excellence of the German output.

Yes, There Is Subtle Drama

MR. BALLIN is discouraged when he thinks of the future of the American films. I have been discouraged for a long, long while, especially after viewing 'The Last Laugh' and seeing the lack of appreciation accorded the Hugo Ballins and the Maurice Tourneurs of the industry.

"They tell me," Mr. Ballin went on, with a sudden sly humor in his smile, "that I have no feeling for drama—that I 'try' to be artistic. I was a recognized artist before I attempted directing pictures—as for drama—I confess the thriller bores me! But there is such a thing as subtle drama, the kind we find in, say, the Lubitsch pictures."

I asked him for a photograph to go with this article.

"Why do you want to print the picture of a fat, middle-aged gentleman in spectacles?" he protested, and gave me two of Mabel Ballin instead.

And when I remarked upon the charm of his home and his happy domestic life—he explained very simply, "Mrs. Ballin and I are not anxious to be famous—we want always to do the things we enjoy doing. Of course, we like appreciation—who doesn't? But we love most of all to work together—she paints, you know, and paints well."

Mutual interests, no wild bid for fame—that is the secret of one of the most contented ménages in the film colony.

But just the same, Hugo Ballin is a disillusioned gentleman—disillusioned when it comes to things cinematic—but otherwise a happy and contented gentleman.

He believes in himself and his art.

category, that you hadn't the chance of a bottle of iced Canadian ale in a taxicab garage on the eighth of August, they had gone out of their way to welcome me and beseech me and were even relying on that ancient axiom, "the way to a man's heart is thru his stomach." They were taking me to lunch. Consequently, I evolved "something" which started more as an experiment to see if I really could, and ended by being clasped to my bosom with a shrill cry of awakening mother love. In other words, I wrote a movie, and what is more terrible, I liked it after I had written it.

And this, as briefly as possible, is the synopsis that I read to Mr. Teall and to Mr. Turner, the head of the scenario department of Controversial Pictures, (who had sent out for the Spikenard and saf-iron). First we had lunch, and then we entered Mr. Turner's private office, carefully stuffing all the cracks with cotton wool and chloroforming the subordinates in the outside office. Here goes the synopsis, and be it understood that all motion picture rights to it are held by me and me alone—whatever that means!

The Plot Thickens

A HANDSOME youth, bored with his sister's garden-party, finds the photograph of a beautiful girl in the living-room of his sister's house. He falls in love with the photograph. His sister dismisses his inquiries as to who the original may be by saying it is So-and-so and that she left a few days ago for a five-year visit to the Philippines. That being that, the youth is petrified a few days later, while taking a short cut thru the Grand Central Station, to see the object of his adoration about to set forth on her long voyage. Dates have never meant much to his sister, anyway. Lured by the girl's beauty, he follows her down to her train and when it starts off for the Coast, he is on board. He buys a ticket as far as a lone twenty-dollar bill will take him, and establishes himself in the smoking compartment to plan a means of meeting her. Unfortunately, before he can meet her, she meets an old college deadly rival of his and meeting her becomes even more impossible. Desperation over his lack of funds causes the youth to throw the porter off the car as the train reaches the end of his twenty dollars' worth, whereupon, with the aid of a can of friendly shoeblacking and the porter's hat and coat, he becomes the porter. Numerous highly risible scenes ensue which end by the youth's disguise being discovered and his being promptly thrown off the train. Fortunately he stumbles onto a truck that is being hijacked and drives off, beating the train to its destination. His rival again frustrates him and takes the girl to her ship followed by the youth in hot pursuit. Many more extremely risible scenes ensue on board the departing ship which end with the youth throwing the rival into the bay by the slack of his trousers and the boat sailing for the Philippines without the girl, who at last is safe on the pier, clasped in the youth's arms. It's a pretty thing, isn't it?

Came the Conference

PRETTY or not, such it was that I read to Mr. Turner and Mr. Teal while the cuckoos sang to the chloroformed subordinates and the cigaret smoke swirled about the cotton-wool padding. Mr. Turner was the first to break the silence that greeted the ending of my effort.

"Very good," said Mr. Turner, "very good indeed."

"The motivation is excellent," contributed Mr. Teall, "tho not essentially varied. You have the angle, but not quite."

"The conflict is nebulous," continued Mr. Turner, "and the menace is somewhat thin. But the idea is splendid. I mean, I really like it."

"At first," I said, (the more fool I), "I thought I would have this sister giving a garden party because she was going to Reno for her divorce—"

"Now you've got it!" exclaimed Mr. Teall, a demoniacal light coming into each eye. "Everybody at the garden party is going to Reno to get a divorce. And they all get the same train. And then, by some means or other, you show the fellow doing something or other which makes all of them decide they won't get a divorce after all. That," he explained kindly to me, "is what we call human interest."

"Wouldn't it be funnier, Phil," said Mr. Turner to Mr. Teall, "if somehow this chap got to throwing all the officials off the train, first the other porters and then the conductor and finally the engineer until he was practically running the train by himself, first being all the porters, and then the conductor collecting tickets and then the engineer—"

"Great!" exclaimed Mr. Teall. "Now you certainly have it," he said, waving a hand to me. "And you want to get in some more for the girl and for the other fellow to do. They're sort of in the background. You have a great opportunity for chromatic nuance."

"Oh, yes," I replied dully, wondering if there was any chloroform left.

Just a Figurehead

"It's a fine idea," Mr. Turner insisted, with no jot of his enthusiasm gone. "It's the best we've had in months. But you haven't quite got the angle. All you need to do is fix it up along the lines we suggested and you'll have something. You go back and work on it and put in some new ideas—by the way you might make the fellow the president of the railroad, or perhaps it would be better to make the girl's father the president of the railroad—and put in a scene somewhere where he saves somebody's life, or stops the train from getting wrecked—they like that, and then bring it back to us."

"And then what?" I said. At least it sounded vaguely like my voice.

"Why then," said Turner triumphantly, "I'll bet you it gets over!"

"Of course it will," crowed Teall, "it's a great idea. All it needs is a little fixing up—nothing at all. Good-bye," he said, opening the door for me, "don't forget your pathos and your unity and your coherence and your characterization and your sex appeal. . . ."

"Good-bye," said Turner, "be sure to remember your chronological march of events and play up your climacteric values to the full. . . ."

I dont remember saying anything.

But of course there had to be a catch in it. I knew you couldn't just up and write for the movies the way you can for the London Mercury, The Atlantic Monthly or the "Encyclopædia Britannica." And Mr. Teall and Mr. Turner really have your interest at heart and they're very anxious to get ideas from you—tho I dont know why. God knows they seem to have enough of their own.

Just the same, as soon as I get another idea, I'm going over to see them again. The braised beef tongue à l'Anglaise was really awfully good.

Your Smile

can be given dazzling white teeth, and pretty gums quickly, this new way

STUDY attractive people, men or women. Note the tremendous part gleaming, clear teeth play. Off-color teeth are an injustice to one's smile. Don't permit them to mar yours.

And don't believe your teeth are naturally dull and colorless. You can disprove that in a few days. Can work a transformation in your mouth. Millions are doing it today.

New methods remove the film and Firm the Gums

Run your tongue across your teeth, and you will feel a film, a viscous coat that covers them. That film is an enemy to your teeth—and your gums. You must remove it.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It absorbs discolorations and gives teeth that cloudy "off-color" look.

Now, in a new-type dentifrice called Pepsodent, dental science has discovered effective combatants. Their action is to curdle the film and remove it, then to firm the gums.

Now what you see when that film is removed—the whiteness of your teeth—will amaze you. A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt.

The Haunted Home of Movie Ghosts

Cruze, once famous as a leading man, and especially famous in "The Million-Dollar Mystery," in which his ex-wife, Marguerite Snow, played opposite him, is now one of the big directors, and is filming "Old Ironsides." Miss Snow is in vaudeville. Francis X. Bushman is still in pictures, having last appeared in "Ben-Hur." J. Warren Kerrigan occasionally returns to the screen, as in "The Covered Wagon." He is living in semi-retirement in Hollywood.

King Baggott, Francis Ford, Robert Z. Leonard and Alan Hale are all directors, and Marshall Neilan, once tremendously popular as an actor, is now one of the biggest of directors.

Juanita Hansen, once a Sennett bathing beauty and later a dramatic player, is in retirement.

Betty Blythe is making pictures abroad, tho she is scarcely heard of any more. Mae Murray, another old-timer, is still going strong. Beverly Bayne is only seen at intervals on the screen.

Once Upon a Time

LOIS WEBER, once a star, and former wife of Phillips Smalley, who played opposite her in most pictures, is the only woman director in the business, and is making a picture for Universal. Smalley is on the stage.

Irving Cummings, an old-time hero, is directing. Mabel Normand, after a time out of pictures during which she was on the stage, has just returned and signed a half-million-dollar contract with Hal Roach. Another old-time actor is now the king of comedy producers—Mack Sennett. Theda Bara, once the vamp of vamps, is now trying to come back as a comedienne.

Mabel Van Buren, the first leading lady at the studio, has retired altogether from the screen. So have Edith Storey, Pauline Bush, Patty Darwell, Grace Cunard, Bessie Barriscale, Anita King, Marie Doro and Edna Goodrich. Marguerite Clark is married to a very wealthy New Orleans business man, and is no longer in pictures. Mae Marsh recently made a picture in England, but is now practically retired and living at Flintridge, California. She is the wife of Louis Lee Arms, well-known newspaper man, and has two charming children.

The Fast Thinning Line

ALICE JOYCE, once known as the "Kalem Girl," continues her old-time popularity, and recently appeared in "Mannequin" and "Beau Geste." Blanche Sweet, Marshall Neilan's wife, is as popular as ever, and is now appearing in "Diplomacy," which her husband is directing.

Valeska Surratt has retired and is living in New York.

Constance Binney left the atmosphere of the Kleigs some time ago in order to marry a Boston banker.

Henry B. Walthall, famed as the "little colonel" in "The Birth of a Nation," after being out of pictures for some time, recently staged a comeback, as did Katherine McDonald. Marguerite Fisher is married and is playing mother rôles and second leads.

But the passing flicker of film fame, like the verdict between the gladiators and the lions in the old Roman arena, is not always unkind.

Mary Pickford is still at the top of picturedom, and so are Doug Fairbanks and Charlie Chaplin. Owen Moore, Matt Moore and Tom Moore are still high in popularity. Thomas Meighan, another old-timer, so far as picture history goes, is still at the top of the heap, and Gloria Swanson is a star of stars.

Robert Edeson, Hobart Bosworth, James Neill, William S. Hart, Shirley Mason, Viola Dana, Noah Beery, Wallace Beery, Dorothy and Lillian Gish, are all still receiving the rewards of popular favor. Wallace Beery, after many ups and downs, is firmly established as one of the greatest of them all, vying for honors as a character actor only with a comparative newcomer in pictures—Ernest Torrence.

Raymond Hatton is still keeping the even tenor of his way before the cameras. Marjorie Daw is still prospering before the Kleigs.

Some of them have passed clear out of the picture—into new realms. For instance, "Broncho Billy" Anderson is now running a string of race-horses at Tia Juana. And "Texas" Guinan, once famed as a picture star, is a witty ad lib. hostess at a New York night club. Elliott Dexter is on the stage, and so is Robert Warwick. Vivian Martin is in musical comedy.

Dear old Theodore Roberts, the "grand old man" of pictures, is gradually regaining his health after a long siege of illness, and has just appeared in his first picture in two years—"The Cat's Pajamas." He is now making a vaudeville tour. His big house on the hill, at the head of Vine Street, looks sadly down on the wrecked studio, where he came as one of the first actors, and where his portable garage, which he used as a dressing-room, was moved all over the lot as expansion began to take place.

Like Ships That Pass in the Night

GHOSTS . . . ghosts that seem to tread softly in the gathering darkness, ghosts that will soon be homeless, wandering sadly thru a new maze of buildings that will spring up on this site, store buildings, cold, prosy, unromantic; buildings that will not bask gently under the pepper-trees, buildings that will not hide the glitter and pageantry of filmdom; ghosts that will turn over a dead leaf and poke into an odd corner in hope of finding a faded remnant of the studio glory that was. Ghosts that would not feel easy, ghosts who might even be unknown, should they haunt the bright modern buildings of the new studio where the army of film great, ever recruited anew, marches on and on, down the pathways of celluloid fame.

film outweighs the serious. There is where you must look to be entertained. And there are enough mirthful scenes to keep you laughing most of the way. One of them shows Chester Conklin, who is lugged out of a Detroit sausage factory to become the Prince of Spezonja. And Chester

It's the Personality That Counts

Blanche Sweet, Pola Negri, Gloria Swanson, Richard Dix, Renee Adoree, Colleen Moore, Bebe Daniels and several other prominent screen celebrities will immediately discover that these players depart in one feature or another from the usual standards of perfection as set by the studio wisecracks.

While each and every one of them has met with outstanding success on the silver-sheet, any young player having the same alleged defects as one of the above, would have a difficult time landing a contract in a Hollywood studio if the decision depended upon one of these gentlemen who like to rely upon rules and regulations.

Summing up, what do we find? That the greatest and most popular players upon the screen, from Gloria Swanson, Jack Gilbert, Douglas Fairbanks, Ronald Colman, Lillian Gish, Norma Shearer, Rudolph Valentino, Norma Talmadge, Irene Rich and Thomas Meighan down to the general run of film stars, are all breaking one or more of the laws which certain studio professors seek to use in judging new screen talent.

The reason for this phenomenon is apparent to all except the "experts."

The player who appears to have a perfect screen face and other qualifications that approach perfection, according to the "experts," very often makes rapid progress upon the screen, but as a rule their progress is of short duration. This is due to the fact that because of their asserted perfection as screen material, they are given every opportunity for advancement at the start. In the long run they usually fail, because while they may appear technically perfect, they lack that something which might be called "screen personality," which, after all, is the only thing that really counts.

Personality Counts

On the other hand, players who have the potentialities for great favorites and great artists are usually very slow in getting to the top. Once again the blame can be laid at the door of our motion-picture wisecracks who fail to note the possibilities of such players because they are looking only for exterior physical qualifications instead of the divine spark which makes the outstanding and lasting screen favorite.

Such players usually meet with great opposition and suffer many discouragements in their climb upward in the silent drama. They are rebuffed and rejected at almost every turn by men who are merely repeating a lot of chatter they have heard, after the fashion of parrots.

After watching the successful stars and struggling young players and making predictions concerning them for over ten years—predictions which have been fulfilled almost without a solitary exception—I defy any "expert" to forecast with a degree of certainty the future of any young player by means of physical qualifications or standards of any kind.

Judging from my own experiences, which have netted the writer a batting average of almost one thousand per cent. in discovering successful screen talent, there is only one method to use.

That is, watch for magnetic vibrations or what might be termed "screen personality."

If the screen player has this quality, put your money on him and forget everything else.

Joining the wires in a great trunk nerve between New York and Chicago

The Nerves of a Nation

THE magnitude of our present system of telephone communication was beyond the thoughts of men fifty years ago. While at that time Bell, the inventor, had a prophetic vision of places and houses and factories connected by telephone, even he could not have foreseen the American city of skyscrapers with more telephones in one building than are to be found in many a foreign country.

The massed multitudes of the modern city can no longer be served by wires strung in the air. We now have telephone cables no bigger than a man's wrist each containing 2400 thread-like wires, carrying beneath the city streets their millions of spoken messages. Long distance cables overhead and underground connect cities with one another by storm-proof conductors, now being extended into a country-wide network.

At the present time nine-tenths of the 45,000,000 miles of telephone wire in the Bell System are in cable. The service of each telephone user has become more and more reliable with the extension of this cable construction.

Three Women Writers Consider the Films

or no contact with the motion picture today is not keeping abreast of the times. Can a writer afford to ignore the motion picture? One thing is certain, which is, that any writer who keeps his work and product in step with the movies can afford most anything.

Yet, here is a representative group of the foremost women writers in the world, whose opinions on the motion picture should be intelligent, valuable and constructive. Motion pictures are a newer art, but a blood relation to the printed book, which it should be their business at least to become well acquainted with.

Yet here we have the concrete feeling and expression of three great constructive minds upon the art of the motion picture, with particular reference to our method of preserving that art. It is a bitter pill for the British to swallow, this Yankee-izing of the films that once promised so much for the English producer. They make wry faces at the facts. And the facts remain, that America is in control of the world market, and when I compare American pictures with those of any other country—by and large—I find ours do excel.

REBECCA WEST

"All English films are bad. We have no money, cannot pay, like Hollywood, to keep up a reserve of actors for the films. We must depend rather on a group of players that must be doing other things as well. We can't have West End actors at the price we are obliged to offer them, but must take the provincial actor. The provincial actor requires a long training and by the time we had given it to him, the film field was lost to us.

"America does not seem to take seriously—from an art view, I mean—her position in this matter of a world-leader in a field of incalculable influence. We look to America for better things than she has been doing."

SHEILA KAYE-SMITH

sort of literature in England, the 'penny shocker.'

"So, if I were to criticize the films in one particular more than another, I would point to this tendency of taking the life out of their stories and stuffing them with sawdust or candy or bank-notes.

"Life is so interesting, so thrilling! And I mean the ordinary every-day life of every-day people. Why don't the film people take up the middle-class life more? Of course, the middle-class life will need expert handling by accomplished story-tellers. It is so easy for anyone to weave a fanciful tale, an extravagant story, around some happening that seems to demand it. But the curious part of it is, that common, ordinary things are intrinsically interesting—if handled in an artistic manner. And by 'artistic,' I do not mean in some high-falutin way, but inspirationally treated in an honest fashion by some good literary craftsman.

"Oh, I think the films have really their biggest field still before them in this every-day life of every-day people. There will be a great impetus, a sort of renaissance, when they discover real life. Of course, they are bound to do it sooner or later."

MAY SINCLAIR

names. There are Queen's Gates, Queen's Gate Roads and Queen's Courts in every section of London, where some queen or other during the past thousand years has honored the locality by stepping her foot, or possibly sending her Equerry. It is all cut off the same piece of cloth of public sentiment with our "Washington's Headquarters." No locality is going to give up its Washington's Headquarters, even tho some stupidly honest college professor should discover that it was Booker T. Washington.

London is the same. It has its Abbey, or Queen's or King's this or that everywhere, and stubbornly holds on to them. The only way to be sure to locate the one you want is to fix firmly in your mind which section of the great city in which it may lie—W., W. C., E. C., and so on.

Having lost my bearings, it was with great difficulty, then, that I found Abbey Road.

May Sinclair lives in a little house on the corner with a bay window, just like a thousand other houses in long dismal rows. It is not a pretty part of London. There is a latched gate and a small yard in front, a brass door-knob and bell-pull, a cold entrance hall and a hesitating slavey that goes with it—just as there is with all the rest of the little houses in the neighborhood. There is a back parlor in the rear, too, with a handful of fire in the grate. And before this little fire I found May Sinclair—the real May Sinclair, not the one I had imagined.

She seemed very small as she sat perched in a large chair like Alice in "The Looking-Glass," her legs so short that her feet scarcely touched the floor. But that might have been partially an illusion. She wore a shiny black silk dress and held an enormous black silk cat—named Jerry, I learned later—on her lap. She looked just like one of those little side-street persons of whom Sheila Kaye-Smith had suggested that the movies ought to depict their lives.

So this was May Sinclair!
"I would like to tell you only about my experience in relation to my novel, 'The Immortal Moment,' that was done in the films. I may say that they took great pains to get the scenes in Italy. But beyond that, the performance positively made me ill!

"They turned the quiet hotel I had pictured in my novel into a palace. In my story, the chief woman character commits suicide. There seemed no other way out. The man of the story was really quite an impossible person, especially with children, yet in the last scene the door is thrown open and two little children come in and put their little hands in his and he folds them in his arms. If he had suffocated them, it would have been better artistically, I should not have minded. But, just fancy the audience thinking I had done a thing like this!"

applause as a nest of ants at a picnic. I want to get just one chance to go thru six solid reels without having to button my collar even once. I crave just one picture in which I can tear loose to my heart's content, fan a six-gun till the air is blue, ruthlessly slaughter the villain and all his little playmates, and in general disport myself like a true son of the Wide Open Places. Then maybe I can resign myself to going back to the society type of work again."

Outdoor life and acting have always been the two big interests in Huntly Gordon's life. He is a native Canadian, born in Montreal, and educated in London, England.

From Stock Tickers to Studios

THO he hated the thought of a business career, he gave it an arduous tryout in New York City. In the space of a very few years he succeeded in failing with amazing thoroughness and rapidity in half a dozen different business ventures. Then the stage chance for which he had secretly been longing came when he applied for work in "Life," as mellow a drama as ever graced the boards of Broadway, and was given a minor rôle.

The big feature of the play was supposed to be a boat-race between Yale and Harvard. The climax came when the two shells flashed out on the stage, with Yale slightly the winner. Good-looking, husky, young athletes were required to man these boats. Huntly's physique, as well as his face, caused him to be chosen for this, his first rôle, on the stage.

It was soon seen that Gordon was "different." He was well educated and could read lines. His speaking voice was excellent, and physically he was enough to challenge any eye. His well-knit frame had everything the popular matinee idol was supposed to have and, even then, he was sartorially perfect. He advanced rapidly until he was understudying the leading man.

He struggled from one part to another until 1910, when he won a prominent rôle with Ethel Barrymore in the stage-play, "Our Mrs. McChesney." Ralph Ince, the motion picture director, was then on a search for a leading man to appear opposite Anita Stewart. He saw Gordon and made him a very flattering offer. Huntly sought the advice of Miss Barrymore, who advised him to accept the screen proposition. He did, and thus made his picture début with Vitagraph. It is interesting to note that, when Miss Barrymore made "Our Mrs. McChesney" for the movies two years later, she summoned Gordon to play opposite her.

From the date of his screen début until 1922, when he came to Hollywood, Gordon intermittently played on both the stage and the screen. It was Louis B. Mayer who brought Gordon to Hollywood to play the rôle of Jeffrey Fair in "The Famous Mrs. Fair." Critics hailed him as a real find, both for his appearance and his ability. That picture "made" Gordon on the screen. Since then his film career has been a steady march to success, with prominent rôles opposite Pola Negri, Pauline Frederick, Betty Compson, Viola Dana, Helene Chadwick, Irene Rich and half a dozen other leading feminine stars.

Perhaps some day a picture producer will be far-sighted enough to give Huntly Gordon the one chance he craves in an action story with an outdoor setting, where he can start the guns a-popping and draw a bead on the villain.

The Celluloid Critic

when they naturally fail to grasp Conklin as the possible heir to the throne. Then, too, the young man's English is difficult to understand.

Well Burlesqued

HE had met the heroine (the princess) while invalidated on Spezonian soil during the war. The girl does not recognize him, since she had only seen his eyes, the rest of his face being swathed in bandages. But he remembers her—and he is thrust into matrimony with her—tho he doesn't know what it's all about.

There is a lot of good-natured burlesque of court pomp and ceremony—with the funniest sequence revealing the quick-stepping bodyguard going thru their intricate evolutions. The bridal night also has its mirthful moments—while the fight at the finish, in which Dix and "Gunboat" Smith whip all the able-bodied men of Spezonian, is fast and exciting.

In all, "Say It Again" is a rollicking number which only pauses in its journey across the screen to permit a few romantic interludes. The subtitles are rather amusing, tho the constant repetition of spelling them backward to indicate the language of Spezonian becomes somewhat tiresome after a while.

If I were to pick out any particular highlight, I would select Conklin's expression of fright as he turns the pages of the history of Spezonian and discovers how departed kings suffered violent deaths. It is a hilarious scene.

The acting is creditable all the way—with Dix playing his rôle easily and surely. Alyce Mills, his new leading woman, succeeds in being charming—while the "Gunboat" and Conklin take care of the laughs.

Another Farce Comedy

SPONTANEITY should be the cry-word with makers of farce comedies. It hasn't always been remembered in "Money Talks," for the piece slips and slides in its pace quite frequently. Naturally, this tends to make it lose some of its sparkle.

The farcical twists evaporate rather quickly—and what develops is a series of slap-stick gags when Owen Moore, after the style of Syd Chaplin, dons dresses and a wig and proceeds to cut up a few high jinks. Owen appears as a flashy youth engaged in the advertising business. Like a good bluffer, he succeeds in putting up a good front.

The idea—true to most farcical ideas—centers around the youth having tiffs with his wife. She tires of his unfulfilled promises and goes back to mother. However, the author doesn't neglect the happy ending. He sees to it that the youth stumbles upon prosperity. So it all ends merrily and peacefully.

The piece has its high spots. You can't take anything away from Owen Moore. His interpretation is breezy and to the point, while Bert Roach and Claire Windsor handle their rôles to extract all the humor and charm from them.

Hines Helps Himself to a Good One

NO moviegoer who treasures his laughs can go wrong with "The Brown Derby," Johnny Hines' newest essay. Truly, it's a lively, rollicking number—and one that should sky-rocket the comedian right up there on the highroad to popularity. He can look the world in the face and say, "Folks, I've put it over."

The piece is bright with an assortment of brand-new gags—which burst forth and spread the silversheet with liveliness. Spontaneous laughter is developed at the start—and this response continues to the end. There may be some old high jinks here, but if there are they are not recognizable. That's how this comedy has been treated to look novel and neat.

"The Brown Derby" has a "snap and go" about it which keeps it moving with fine speed. Not a scene is shown which loses its pace and gingery quality. We see Hines suffering from an inferiority complex in his "underdog" study of a plumber. He inherits a brown derby from an eccentric uncle—a derby which carried the old fellow to a financial triumph—and it brings him all sorts of good luck as well as enabling him to conquer his inferior fancies.

The head-piece almost has a mind of its own in the manner which it places Hines in one tight jam after another. It skips about of its own accord—and the comedian skips about some himself. The w. k. chase figures for a finish to the merry mix-up—which involves the characters in a marital scene of mistaken identities. I recommend this comedy. It is a sure-fire laugh-getter.

Marie as Mabel

AND still they come—these film farces. The month seems to be devoted to showing them to the exclusion of the straight romantic stuff. One of the newest entries is "Up in Mabel's Room," with Marie Prevost cast as the irrepressible Mabel.

As the title indicates, this farce comedy has to do with a marital mix-up—with the figures making frenzied dashes in and out of Mabel's room. The crisp dialog of the spoken version has been silenced, but, nevertheless, the director knew what he was about. He has timed it well so that the action is projected in gingery fashion.

The piece calls for much activity—and, like all farces, a word of explanation from one of the dozen characters would give it away long before it had run its course. But true to the unwritten law of the theater—these characters keep silent. And so the fun is on as they try to capture the filmy piece of lingerie which is up in Mabel's room.

Now Mabel, mind you, has made up her mind to win her divorced husband over again. She mistrusts the lingerie was intended for another girl. And so it becomes a battle of wits between the quarrelsome love birds—which culminates in a happy reconciliation. The players keep on the move all the time—hence there are no dull pauses.

Marie Prevost demonstrates very capably that she is a clever comédienne—and Harrison Ford plays with that mock seriousness which is necessary to interpret farce correctly. Harry Myers is also in the picture.

Colleen's Comic Strip

A SATISFACTORY job has been done by the comic strip, "Ella Cinders," in converting it into celluloid. While the title spells Cinderella backwards, you can judge for yourself what the theme indicates. Just the same, it is a refreshing little version of the Cinderella pattern—one that carries its measure of hokum, but which, nevertheless, is not spoiled by it.

Colleen Moore's personality is easily adaptable for the rôle of the drudge who becomes movie-mad—and wins a beauty contest to enter the movies. She gives it the requisite amount of wistful appeal, plus

THICK ANKLES SPOIL YOUR APPEARANCE

The Changeable Chaplin

Over a cup of coffee and a roll in the Montmartre, Charlie told some of his experiences with people who breezed up to him and asked him whether he was Charlie Chaplin.

"I say to them," said Charlie, "'Yes, I am Charlie Chaplin.'

"Say, I saw you—saw you in 1908 in vaudeville—AM I RIGHT?' they wind up with a thunderous flourish.

"I pause, nodding, and then this type of individual will repeat so that everybody in the restaurant thinks we are having a frightful argument: 'AM I RIGHT?'

"Do you know that this sort of man is so difficult to get rid of, that I feel like pushing back my chair and leaving myself."

And this Chaplin, the Kennington boy, now better known than Irving, Mansfield, Tree or Bellew, more famous than Adeline Patti, Melba and others, renowned in nooks of the globe that have never heard of the celebrated clown, Grimaldi, is a film genius who basks in the sunshine of his own achievements and is at the same time appreciative of the worthy efforts of others.

congested streets of Los Angeles in a skiff, the next moment pounces upon an arrow-collar man, dressed in BVD's, who is shaving before a chewing-gum mirror, and in the next moment is catapulted into an enchanted garden where film stars are diving backward, full-dressed, out of a swimming pool. . . . The speed of these incidents is skillfully increased by Cruze all the time. He is a master of tempo who understands the compelling power of visualized motion as neither Lubitsch nor Stroheim do. He gave us, moreover, a true impression of the wild, wild American scene with its headlong speed and its unreasonable characters. "Hollywood" was as pure a product of American life as Jim Europe or Ring Lardner or the Krazy Kat cartoons.

Dynamics

I HAVE rated Vidor's "The Big Parade" as a masterpiece in a previous issue of THE CLASSIC. I must add here that it is also a masterpiece of dynamics. So intent was Vidor on controlling the movement of the film that he had each gesture and step taken to the beat of big drums, quickening in time as the action grew more intense.

The greater discoveries will come from this direction, I suspect, rather than from the European school. There are experiments already with machines, whose results look quite terrifying, as yet. But, then, they must never stop experimenting. . . . Altho the movies have already come a great distance forward and have achieved a tremendous range of expression as an art in their own right.

Get the habit and buy the CLASSIC. There is quality in its pages. The September CLASSIC will be another lively, sparkling number.

How I Dress My Hair

By Edna Wallace Hopper

The thousands who see me daily on the stage wonder at my beautiful hair. It is wavy, glossy and abundant. Nearly everyone thinks that some wonderful hair dresser gives it daily care.

Not so—I'm too busy for that. I never go to a hair dresser, have never had a Marcel wave. I simply apply twice weekly a hair dress which great experts made for me. It is not sticky, not greasy. Before they made it I never dreamed a liquid could do so much. Now all toilet counters supply it as Edna Wallace Hopper's Wave and Sheen. The price is 75c.

Nothing else I know gives a girl or woman so much added loveliness at once. No one can resist it when she knows. Let me send you a trial bottle with my Beauty Book.

I Wonder What Became of Him

One of the most remarkable jumps from the background to the "five-foot line," as the privileged space before the lens on which the stars tread is known in studio parlance, has been accomplished right under our respective noses by one Raymond Keane—an extra. Raymond descended upon Hollywood a few months ago from Denver, confident of success only as those who admit to being seventeen or a little over can be confident. He was one of the many extra boys who cluttered up the massive sets on which Norma Talmadge acted in the film "Graustark." But Raymond refused to be mothered.

His personality caught and held the attention of Buchowetzki, one of the contingent of imported directors of which we have quite a few now in Hollywood. The director's interest brought Raymond a part with Laura La Plante in a Universal film, with the result that the young extra is now firmly clutching a contract which calls for his services for the next five years in Universal productions.

But all extras who achieve a rise from the background players are not so fortunate as young Keane. There come to mind instances of several players who forced their way thru the mob to camera recognition, held the spotlight momentarily and then dropped back to the extra class again. Many of you, who sometimes wonder what has become of the player you were beginning to like, can satisfy that curiosity by scanning carefully the crowd scenes and ballroom gatherings as they flash across the screen—they're there, sunk again in obscurity and their big chance gone, probably forever.

Griffith Discovered a Few

It is more cheerful, tho to contemplate some more present screen favorites who, not so long ago, bore the tag of extra. Norma Shearer, for instance. The delightful artist who registered so strongly in "His Secretary" recently, cashed many a five-dollar check as one of those "on the set" with Corinne Griffith, Colleen Moore and other stars with whom she now holds equal rank. Can you wonder, tho, that Norma succeeded in saving you the trouble of asking "I wonder what became of her."

The director to whom belongs the most credit for sensing the possibilities of talent among extras is D. W. Griffith. His selection of Lillian and Dorothy Gish, Mae Marsh, Carol Dempster, Bobby Vernon, Charles Emmett Mack and others too numerous to mention who evolved from the supernumerary contingent is proof conclusive of this. It is strange indeed that the soldier who held the screen with Lillian Gish in those scenes in "The Birth of a Nation" did not find a place with the other extras who have risen to stardom.

A glance at some of the old stills which present various scenes from the first productions of the late Thomas H. Ince reveals the fact that many of the background characters of those early days may be numbered among "extras who have made good." Two who come to mind are Leo Maloney, possessor of a starring contract with Pathé, and Charles Ray. Awhile back we spoke of Wally Van. This same Wally has to his credit the foresight of seeing in a dapper young man fighting for recognition in the old Vitagraph days the makings of a good screen actor. The dapper youth was known as Adolphe Menjou and he was given the chance to display his ability in "The Scarlet Runner," a Vitagraph serial starring Earle Williams, and which Wally directed.

There is one man we know of who broke into the movie studios via the extra route who is now a millionaire. Jack Coogan, Sr. The daddy of the screen's most beloved juvenile star formed part of the line which filed regularly to the paymaster's window at the old Metro studios in Hollywood. In the picture which brought Coogan, Sr., and Jackie from the extra class, "The Kid," starring Charlie Chaplin, the father of Jackie may be discovered as one of "those present," providing atmosphere for Chaplin and his talented offspring.

And so we could go on indefinitely naming players from the extra fold who have made good, but arrayed against those we have mentioned are the hundreds who still remain—extras. We have seen them do an excellent "bit" of acting more than once and in rare instances we have seen them "steal" the scene from the featured player with whom they may be working. And as we file out of our favorite theater we bury them under the blanket of obscurity with the casual "I wonder what became of him."

The Celluloid Critic

a roguish sense of humor. And Ella, as a result, stands out conspicuously, thus winning your sympathy.

There is a scene at the railroad station which contains a bit of pathos. The folks are certain the girl will make good, particularly the young iceman, who believes in her. But the best episodes are found in the journey in the train and later at the studio. The car scene brings a laugh when a small tribe of Indians in full regalia occupy all the seats. One brave commands the girl to smoke a cigar just like the squaws opposite her. And Miss Moore gives play to her plastic expressions in her effort to please the Indian and make her stomach behave. The studio bits reveal some inside stuff regarding productions—and the humorous side of trying to crash the gate makes a bid for a laugh—and gets it.

In all, a pleasing number—one that is capably titled, allowing for a few wise-cracks here and there—and acted and staged up to the best requirements.

Hero-Worship

WARNER BROTHERS have a picture in "Why Girls Go Back Home" that carries all the earmarks in its title of being a preachment. One might imagine it to be one of those home-and-fireside melodramas in which Pop and Mom wait patiently for their erring daughter to return by the light of the parlor lamp. This is true in some respects. Yet the director has refrained from resorting to the obvious. He embroiders it with enough deft touches of humor and humanities to make it bright and interesting most of the way.

The picture—or rather the action—doesn't take itself too seriously even if its plot does get out of hand here and there. Where the director has erred is in pound-

When the monk had been sufficiently rehearsed, the lights were turned on and the camera cranked while the monkey turned the radiator handle. Clouds of something that looked like steam came from the radiator. This frightened the monk and he ran off the set, but fortunately the scene was not spoiled. They wanted a retake, but for the life of them they could not get that monk to go near the radiator again—hissing steam spelled danger to him—but next day they were trying it again and from last reports they finally got the monk to do the stunt successfully.

Another peculiar thing about monkeys is that they are afraid of revolvers. One day this very monk was very much agitated for no known cause and they could not get him to do anything whatever. At last the master said, "There must be a revolver somewhere," and sure enough, on looking around, they found a revolver almost hidden among papers and things on a desk in a distant corner. Monk had spied it and refused to work until it was removed.

Another Fashion Show

FASHION pictures appear to be all the rage just now. The huge set that Colleen Moore had in "Irene" was so successful that they are all doing it now. The last I saw was one at the Fox studio in "Fig Leaves," in which Olive Borden is starring. It is a gorgeous set with marvelous gowns and girls and it is being made in technicolor. I am told they will use about eight hundred feet of this fashion stuff, which means that one-tenth of the picture will be that and nothing else and it is costing a mere trifle of $40,000.00 for this scene.

Doug's Wit

HAROLD LLOYD is not funny at all in real life, and does not try to be witty. Doug likes to make merriment. He was riding on a trolley out on location recently, and the conductor, not recognizing him, said: "I got your fare, didn't I?" "No, I think not," Doug replied. "I believe I saw you ring it up."

Personalities

HARRY CARR, most beloved of all writers on the Coast, is to von Stroheim what soothing syrup is to a baby. And Von is very much of a baby. If handled right, he is not hard to get along with, and as for Harry, anybody could get along with him.

DOROTHY MANNERS and Doris Denbo are two brilliant young Coast writers and just as popular as they are brilliant. They know everything and everybody out here and the Brewster Publications are very lucky to have secured their exclusive services. They are keen-eyed, sharp-witted, and nothing escapes them. Watch out for their comments. They never fail to get just the right angle on things, and furthermore you can always believe what they say.

CHARLES FARRELL, who played in "Sandy" attractively, is doing so well in "Old Ironsides" that he will probably be in the matinee-idol class before long. He belongs to Fox, who loaned him temporarily to Famous Players.

Ample argument

THE OLD CHINESE proverb says, "One picture is worth ten thousand words." By much the same reasoning... and it is sound reasoning, too... the best argument for Fatima is Fatima. Taste one... for just one taste is worth a bookful of description

The O'Brien Boy Gets a Kick Out of Life

those three things happen to be George's favorite dishes.

If he hadn't made good in pictures, there would very probably be a big, muscular, laughing young Irishman writing history in some far corner of the earth right now—driving a sullen crew of Kanakas at the pumps of a pearler in some crystal lagoon, panning raw gold from the virgin gravels of Papua, or else taking joyous chances in one of those South Sea isles where some luckless member of a rival tribe often finds himself included in the salad course at the festive board.

For George O'Brien has the joyous instincts of the born wanderer, the ceaseless thirst for new places and new thrills, that only a certain kind of Irishman can have to the fullest measure. Picture work is giving him that variety and thrill. Consequently, he is happy—for the time being, at least. If pictures ever bore him, however, I have a strong hunch there will be a vacant chair in Hollywood some bright morning.

Has the Gypsy Urge

GEORGE told me of his inborn gypsy urge the other afternoon as we sat chatting on a log at the edge of one of the weirdest sets in Hollywood. It wasn't an interview. Mere personalities were completely forgotten. We compared notes on those parts of the world we had both seen, and then argued the respective merits of those parts we wanted to see. My pet ambition has always been to invade the upper Amazon and collect spider-monkeys and anacondas. George claimed that the unexplored inner part of Borneo promised twice the thrills of the Amazon. And so we argued the matter amicably, there on a property log at the edge of the Garden of Eden.

The Garden set was for a sequence in "Fig Leaves," in which George and Olive Borden are playing. It was far from the conventional idea of Eden. The forest was virgin enough, but the trimmings were weird. The tree bungalow of Adam and Eve had a sign in front, "No. 780—No Peddlers Allowed." A crude street-car track ran nearby, a sort of Stone Age edition of the "Toonerville Trolley."

The single car was drawn by a lumbering brontosaurus. Or it may have been a diplococus. I never could tell the boys apart. Whatever it was, it weighed about a ton, had spines down its back, three horns on its nose, and looked like a mixture of a Chinaman's idea of a dragon, a Medieval concept of Beelzebub, and a gin addict's vision of a lavender-eyed grakkiwampus. Seven men concealed in its interior manipulated its movements with startling realism.

George, as Adam, was clad in a suit of bear-skin lingerie, and had a flowing wig that would have shamed Samson himself before he got his fatal "Delilah bob." Olive Borden, as Eve, wore a gorgeous fur that had cost some luckless leopard all nine of its lives. After gazing at Olive, I realized for the first time why Adam fell for the apple. He was lucky it wasn't a pumpkin.

"There's what I mean when I say that picture work gives me a real kick," George indicated the exotic set before us. "Where else would you find a scene like that? And where else in the civilized world would I get a chance to dress like this and play Adam, without landing in some nice quiet booby-hatch?"

"In pictures I never know what I'll be doing next. Today I'm Adam. Next month I may be playing a lumberjack up in Oregon. The month after that I may be a prospector over in Arizona. In this game you never know what's around the next corner. That suits me in every way. I don't even want to know when I get up in the morning what I'm going to do that day. I hate routine. And I never make plans. They take all the kick out of life.

"I'm glad I've managed to get across in pictures, of course. I worked mighty hard in doing it, and success has brought the same feeling of satisfaction to me that it brings to any normal man who has finally won it after a hard pull up-stream. I like the acting and the other things about the game. If I didn't, I wouldn't be in it.

"But the real appeal of picture work to me is the constant variety and ever-changing life it offers. No two days are ever the same. It's hard work, sure. But what does that matter? It offers travel, thrills, the unexpected, and it's work that I really like. What more could any sane person ask?"

The Son of a Cop

GEORGE O'BRIEN came honestly by his love for adventure and action. His father is Chief of Police in San Francisco, and that is a job not noted for humdrum daily routine. The O'Brien family never knew whether a bulky package in the morning mail was a box of candy or a bomb sent by some affectionate little Nihilist as a holiday token. Death threats were common events.

His parents decided that it was time that the family had at least one quiet member, so they planned for George to be a physician. They might almost as well have tried to grow a morning-glory vine from an acorn. The World War came along very conveniently, and George immediately enlisted in the Navy.

Hostilities over, he returned to college at Santa Clara, and became famous as an all-round athlete. Then he decided that he wanted to be an actor, and the medical profession promptly and permanently lost a promising candidate.

He succeeded in getting occasional work with picture companies on location in San Francisco, and finally entrained for Hollywood with one of them. Actors seemed to be a drug on the local market when he got here, so George became an assistant cameraman with the Tom Mix troupe. He attracted the favorable notice of the cowboy star, and a warm personal friendship began between the two, a friendship that has endured unbroken ever since.

George jumped at the first opportunity to forsake his camera crank for the grease paint, and he was soon back in the dramatic ranks again. He traveled to Panama with the Thomas Meighan company when "The Ne'er-do-well" was filmed, and other fairly substantial parts followed in various studios. Then the one big chance that comes at least once to every player came when Director John Ford started casting for "The Iron Horse."

George won the coveted rôle of the express rider in the Fox epic after camera tests had been taken of half the male population of Hollywood. When the picture was finished, George had "arrived." His work since has held to the same high standard, and the O'Brien star is now very near the top of the movie firmament.

George is a born actor, and a good one. He throws himself into every part with a whole-hearted Celtic fervor that carries everything before it. He is good-looking in a virile, he-man, fashion that appeals to men and women alike.

The Celluloid Critic

ing home his message. It is as if he didn't credit his audience with sufficient intelligence to grasp it.

Yet, all things considered, the film shapes up as moderately good entertainment. Why? Because its high lights far outweigh its flaws.

A Fine Theater Story

I CANNOT recall ever having seen a more absorbing and moving story of the theater than what is revealed in "The Marriage Clause," which brings Lois Weber, the only woman director, back to the Kleigs and the cameras. In the first place it has a real dramatic plot—one charged with deep pathos and tenderness. And carrying such qualities, Miss Weber has asserted a woman's privilege in emphasizing them with fine humanities.

Everyone who is the least bit familiar with the theater knows that certain managers exercise a dominating influence over their stars. If the latter prove to be unusually successful, they are compelled to sign contracts carrying the marriage clause—which stipulates they must not marry during their contractual obligations.

Billie Dove Soars High

FROM this very logical idea this story is established—and it moves along with a well-defined ring of truth. The central figure, played with fine emotion by Billie Dove (it is her greatest rôle and she endows it with great feeling), is signed up by the manager. She is placed under the guidance of the stage director—who exerts a sort of Svengali hypnosis over her. When he is near her, she feels confident and secure—and manages to get the utmost expression. Naturally they fall in love.

You ask where is the conflict? It enters in the element of jealousy manifested by the manager. In other words, he tries to make things unpleasant for his director—and succeeds. The latter, being highly sensitive, broods over his humiliation—and, thinking the girl's ardor for him is beginning to cool, he descends the primrose path. He places wrong conclusions on subsequent events in the girl's life—and yet he loves her well enough to return for her première under the guidance of another director.

The girl, meanwhile, has become despondent—and fails. With her life despaired of, the Svengalian director hastens to be with her. In her delirium he coaches her with the same words he used when he made her a star in the first place. The crisis passes and all ends happily.

Very Real and Human

IN the mere outline of this picture I cannot do credit to the many little touches of humanity which saturate it. The story is poignant and it is treated with a fine appreciation of its heart throbs. The theater side of the plot is ever present—and because the idea is so genuine it will catch everyone's attention and hold it. There is no hokum here. What is revealed could reasonably happen in any large city which caters to stage activities.

Be it said that the manager becomes more pliable to his conscience and the marriage clause is stricken out.

The acting is of a high quality thruout—especially in the performance by Miss Dove—and the excellent support contributed by Francis X. Bushman and Warner Oland as the director and manager, respectively.

Setting the Pace!

It's a difficult matter to set the pace and keep it. Yet that is just what THE CLASSIC has marked out for itself ever since it entered the publication field. It is the one de luxe magazine of the film world. As everyone is interested in motion pictures, THE CLASSIC is the one publication to supply the demand—for brilliantly written articles. It is dedicated to the idea of furnishing its readers with live topics and live pictures. Its contributions are free of bunk but, on the other hand, treat of films and the people associated with films in an authoritative and fearless manner. THE CLASSIC is not only the most beautiful publication of the screen, but it is also the most original.

When you glance over its list of contributors, you will recognize the foremost writers of the screen—writers who know every angle of picture production—and who give you first-hand knowledge of what's going on in the celluloid world. There are Eugene V. Brewster, the founder of the Brewster Publications, Adele Whitely Fletcher, Gladys Hall, Milton Howe, Harry Carr, Tamar Lane, H. W. Hanemann, Don Ryan, Don Eddy—and a host of others. These all write for THE CLASSIC—most of them exclusively.

There will be several fine scintillating articles in the September issue—as well as a complete assortment of beautiful pictures. Don Ryan will tell you about the Foreign Directors. The article places the cards right on the table in regard to the foreign invasion.

The September CLASSIC will also continue Henry Albert Phillips' interviews with famous European writers, in which they talk about their impressions of the screen.

There will also be interesting articles about W. C. Fields, the new comedy star, Reginald Denny, and Lewis Milestone, the director.

And don't fail to read about Hollywood's Pet Extravagances and The Great Athletes of the Screen.

Read the CLASSIC. It supplies you with accurate and interesting information of all the varied activities of the film world.

"Once I Too Was Weak and Ailing"

By Annette Kellermann

MANY people will be surprised to hear that as a child I was so deformed as to be practically a cripple. I was so weak, so puny that I was considered an invalid. I was bow-legged to an extreme degree; I could neither stand nor walk without iron braces which I wore constantly. My mother put long skirts on me, down to my ankles, to hide my bow legs and braces.

No one ever dreamed that some day I would become famous for the perfect proportions of my figure. No one ever thought I would become the champion woman swimmer of the world. No one ever dared to guess that I would be some day starred in great feature films, such as "A Daughter of the Gods," "Neptune's Daughter," etc. No one ever dreamed that I would some day travel the world over, appearing on the stage, at great universities, on lecture platforms, explaining my methods of acquiring and maintaining perfect health and a perfect figure. Yet that is exactly what has happened.

I relate these incidents of my early life and my present success simply to show that no woman need be discouraged with her figure, her health, or her complexion. The truth is tens of thousands of tired, sickly, overweight or underweight women have already proved that a perfect figure and radiant health can be acquired in only fifteen minutes a day through the same methods that I myself use, the methods which have kept my health perfect, and my figure at exactly the same proportions during the past fifteen years.

I invite any woman who is interested to write to me. I will gladly prove to you in 10 days that you can learn to acquire the body beautiful, how to make your complexion rosy from the inside, instead of from the outside, how to stand and walk gracefully, how to add or remove weight at any part of the body; hips, bust, arms, shoulders, chin, limbs, waist, abdomen; how to be full of health, strength and energy so that you can enjoy life to the utmost, how to be free from colds, headaches, neuralgia, nervousness, constipation, weak back, and the many other ailments due to physical inefficiency; in short, how to acquire perfect womanhood.

Just mail me the coupon below or write a letter and I will send you, at once, my interesting, illustrated new book, "The Body Beautiful." I will also explain about my special Demonstration Offer. Just send the coupon or letter now. Do this at once, before my present supply of free books is exhausted. Address, ANNETTE KELLERMANN, Suite 385, 225 West 39th Street, New York City.

Flash Backs

star has invariably had his own way when it came to setting up new records. But his audience was drawn thru the appeal of his characterization plus the all-round excellence of his pictures. Which makes us think that Gilda's personal magnetism is what drew the crowds. They came to see her dance in the flesh and as her celluloid self in the same terpsichorean number.

The Cinema Chair

WILL there be a cinema chair at Yale? That is the question which is agitating the learned professors and the student body. For the first time in the history of motion pictures, a large seat of higher learning gave the honor of its approval to the movies thru the presentation of "The Big Parade" at one of New Haven's theaters recently—under the auspices of the Yale University Dramatic Association. The picture was so honored because of its freedom from artistic defects and its combination of all the qualities deemed great.

The premiere was recognized as a step forward in the recognition of the movie makers by the colleges and may lead to the establishment of a chair of cinematics at Yale.

The Autumn Shower

THE producers are all busy watching one another. Each is awaiting the opportune time to pounce upon the picture public and beat his neighbor in showing the prize production. Having taken a leaf from the legitimate theater magnates, these movie men don't risk their aces during the hot dog-days. As a result, the public is given what the producers please to give them. The big specials are held back for the fall opening. And then they drop into the theaters like so many snowflakes.

If one producer comes along with a big, smashing hit, he is quickly followed by his contemporaries. By Christmas all of the New York residents are out of the apartment-house trenches and trekking toward the big lights—and big pictures.

Among these attractions of large dimensions to be shown soon are "Old Ironsides," "Beau Geste," "Tell It to the Marines," "Don Juan," "Variety" and a host of others.

That Tragedy

THEODORE DREISER'S "An American Tragedy" is still being discussed in its pictorial shadows. The rumor will not down that Monta Bell will be the final choice to direct it, tho D. W. Griffith has first claim. If the master of the close-up cares to take it—well, it is his to do with as he desires. But he is not pressing matters to any extent. First of all, he wants to give all of his time to "The Sorrows of Satan." Mal St. Clair and one or two others have sort of faded into the background as the directors who will film the tragedy.

Personally, we would like Bell to have it—as he's shown what he can do with life-like material that sings all the chords in the human scale of realities. It ought to be a monumental picture—one that soars with heart-beats. And if the director treats it as Dreiser wrote it—there will be no doubt of its appeal. But on the other hand, if it is handled as written, it might possibly take two consecutive evenings to show it in its entirety. On that supposition it is easy to make von Stroheim an entrant among the possible directors. Von Stroheim can surely make them long—but, incidentally, he can also make them gripping.

Dreiser is a realist—and he stalks tragedy as a cat stalks a mouse. He may not be a stylist, but he writes with conviction and honesty—and he always has something to say in his vivid colorings of life. Let's hope that the film version of "An American Tragedy" carries out the soul-searching theme of the novel. Let's hope there are no sentimentalities wasted over the tragic life of Clyde Griffiths.

This brings up another argument—and everyone is arguing over the possible choice for the character. There seems to be a sweepstake on as to who will come under the wire a winner. Glenn Hunter has been chosen to portray Griffiths in the stage version, which will be produced next season. He is also favorably mentioned for the screen portrayal.

In so far as physical characteristics go, he does not approach the youth at all. But he is endowed with the necessary emotional faucets which he can turn on at will. Yet Griffiths is not painted as a dynamic boy. Rather is he painted as one suffering from inhibitions—one who holds himself in restraint, but who temporarily conquers thru his physical attributes.

Gregory Kelly has also been mentioned in a favorable light. And so has Charles Emmett Mack. The latter is our choice of the three mentioned. The latest to be considered seriously is Charles (Buddy) Rogers, a recent graduate of the Paramount school—and one of the few receiving Mr. Lasky's diplomas—who seems destined to go the furthest. He has been given some fair sized rôles—and his acting has earned him steady work in the studios. He, more than any of the other "dark horses," approaches the Clyde Griffiths of the novel. Dreiser's character is something of a young sheik—and surely fascinated the girls. Buddy Rogers has good looks and personality. The question is, can he get the drama out of the rôle? It is a large order, but with the proper coaching he can give a good account of himself.

Greta in the Flesh

GRETA NISSEN has gone back to the stage. When the new Ziegfeld "Follies" opens, the theatergoers will have the opportunity of seeing her do a pantomimic dancing number modeled on the pattern of that which she executed in the stage version of "Beggar on Horseback."

There is a story back of this girl. Somehow she hasn't quite made the grade as a picture actress. Rumors are ever current of how she permits whims and fancies of temperament to guide her thoughts and actions. And there is no doubt that she has caused a director or three a sleepless night or two.

Miss Nissen has not been favored with the most suitable stories for her personality—and her talent doesn't react to vampish rôles at all. It's just another case of a foreign girl who has not been understood. She came to the screen with a distinct style of beauty and expression—and neither the screen nor Miss Nissen has profited.

We think there is a definite place for her—if given stories and parts adaptable to her personality. Then some director should be found who would take into consideration her temperamental flights and handle her sympathetically.

The Screen Observer Has His Say

sequences—also that Josef von Sternberg, who is always original, contemplates producing a picture based on Negro life—one written by Laurence Stallings, entitled "God Himself."

If these ideas are carried out perhaps Eugene O'Neil's plays of the Negro, "Emperor Jones," and "All God's Chillun Got Wings" will bear celluloid fruit.

Some time ago D. W. Griffith tried to put over a comedy with Al Jolson in a blackface rôle. Al, as you may remember, walked out on the director—and Lloyd Hamilton was engaged to take the burnt-cork comedian's place.

The piece didn't make much of a stir in the picture world.

According to the best authorities these stories will not carry any thing offensive to the whites, as they will be produced as comedy dramas. If De Mille is really serious about making a picture of Negro life, I recommend that he engage Paul Robeson, the Negro actor and singer.

If these pictures are really made and become popular it might be possible that the most prominent black man in the public eye will try and talk "turkey" to the producers. I'm paging Harry Wills. If he ever fights Dempsey or Tunney and wins the decision the Senegambian may take up his abode in Hollywood and dare the producers to keep him out of the camera lines.

Peter Fades Out

STRONGHEART and Rin-Tin-Tin have lost their greatest rival, Peter the Great. The big police dog checked off this mortal coil at the Hollywood Dog and Cat Hospital the other day, following an unsuccessful operation for a gunshot wound.

Peter was shot during a dispute between his trainer, Edward Faust, and Fred Cyriacks, dog fancier, at the latter's home. While the dog was valued at $75,000 by his owner, Charles B. Dreyer, he never became so successful on the screen as Strongheart and Rin-Tin-Tin.

An Ardent Lover

CLARA BOW found herself in the headlines the other day when an ardent admirer, Robert S. Savage, former Yale football star, attempted suicide when she refused to marry him.

Clara very firmly stated, according to the press despatches, that he-men didn't attack themselves with razors—they used guns. She also declared that she is engaged to Gilbert Roland, a young film actor.

As for Savage he was taken to a hospital and later forced to face insanity proceedings as the laws of California requires the sanity of any person who attempts suicide to be investigated. The Lunacy Commission examined the youth and pronounced him sane.

The Spanish Songbird

ALL of Hollywood is talking about the reputed offer of seventy-five thousand dollars for the services of Raquel Meller, the Spanish songbird—with an executive of Famous Players as the party holding the contract. This did not sound like a lot of money out Hollywood way until it was learned that the offer was made for Meller's appearance in one picture.

Just what Meller will play is not announced, but it is a cinch she will be given a story with a Spanish setting.

"CHARLIE CHAPLIN and his moods; Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks, drawn together by their complete absorption in pictures; the beginnings of the romance between Geraldine Farrar and Lou Tellegen—and the beginning of its end; the rivalry between Pauline Frederick and Farrar; the fiasco of Mary Garden in films; the discovery of Valentino; the rise of Harold Lloyd; the unhappy isolation of Eric von Stroheim; the eccentricities of Elinor Glyn—these are some of the topics to regale the eager devourer of 'fan' food."

"THERE is intense drama in Mr. Goldwyn's description of the scene in which Geraldine Farrar, sensing the company's disappointment in the results of her pictures, voluntarily tore up a contract worth $250,000."

"IN appearance, so typically feminine, Mary Pickford gives to the romance of business all of a man's response."

Aviation Brings Quick Success

TO young men of daring no other field of work offers such a fascination, such high pay, nor such opportunities for quick success as the field of Aviation. As yet, aviation is practically in its infancy. But now is the time to get in.

Amazing Opportunities in Airplane Industries

In the automobile industry and in the moving picture business hundreds of men got rich by getting in at the start. They made their success before others woke up. Today, these lines offer no greater opportunities than a hundred and one others. BUT AVIATION IS NEW. Get in while the opportunities are big. All over the country there will be a clamor for trained men. It will not be a question of pay but of getting capable men.

Become an Aviation Expert $50 to $100 per Week

The study of aviation is almost as fascinating as the actual work. Every lesson is full of interest. That is why it is easy to learn aviation. You do not have to make yourself study—it is like reading an interesting book that tells you things you have always wanted to know. Only one hour each evening will give you the basic training in a surprisingly short time.

One student, S. F. McNaughton, Chicago, says: "Your lessons are like a romance, and what is more, after one reading, the student gets a thorough understanding. One never tires of reading them." James Powers, Pa., another student, says, "I am indeed surprised that such a valuable course can be had from such practical men for so little cost."

The Answer Man

married to Mary Hay, and that Richard Dix has never been married at all.

EDITH A.—So, you don't believe that I am eighty some odd years old. Honest Injun, Edith. Yes, I liked Jack Gilbert in "The Merry Widow." Anna Q. Nilsson is playing in "The Masked Woman." Tom Mix in "Western Society."

MARY S.—Why Marion Davies had a birthday January 1, and she was born in 1898. You can reach her at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, California. Yes, Norma Talmadge may play in a story based on the life of Gaby Deslys, the French music hall actress, who died a few years ago.

TOOTSIE FROM INDIANA.—Oh, you always want to send twenty-five cents in stamps when asking for a picture.

PEACHES.—What word by changing one letter becomes its opposite? United-Untied. Greta Nissen is not married, and she is to play on the stage in "The Palm Beach Follies" for Ziegfeld. Larry Gray, Clara Bow and Esther Ralston are playing in "Kid Boots." Yes, Marion Davies is to create on the screen the rôle that Lady Diana Manners played on the stage in "The Miracle." See you later.

JEAN.—Thanks for the picture of yourself. Very pretty.

IVAN H.—No, it's not fair. He that cheateth in small things is a fool, but in great things is a rogue. Ramon Novarro is playing in "Bellamy the Magnificent." Yes, Hope Hampton is in Paris where she is starring in a colored film, "A Marriage Under Louis the Fifteenth" which is from the Dumas novel, but which will be released under another title.

BERNEICL.—No, Cecil De Mille isn't going to produce "The Deluge" after all because it would conflict with Warner Brothers' picture "Noah's Ark." Cullin Landis is playing in "Then Came the Woman."

MACDUFF.—Well, it's hard enough to learn how to read, but harder still to learn what to read. Corinne Griffith is playing in "Ashes." She is five feet four inches tall. So you think Valentino is the only one who can play as Mrs. Hull's sheiks.

ANN S.—Here you are. More than 4,000,000 people in Japan are listed as wage earners, and Constantinople has 20,000 women industrial workers. So you saw Mary Anderson in Cleveland. She is not playing in pictures right now.

KATHRYN.—Yes, Georgia Hale in "The Great Gatsby." Mary Astor has been chosen as Milton Sills's leading lady in "Men of the Night." Of course, I'm every bit of eighty years old. You bet, I consume bottles of buttermilk these warm days.

BETTY H.—Virginia Brownne Faire was Tinkerbell in "Peter Pan."

GERTRUDE B.—Yes, indeed, there are many large ranches in the Western United States. Harry Carey has a ranch at Saugus, California. Alyce Mills is playing with Richard Dix in "The Quarterback." Mr. Dix chose her as his leading woman because of her excellent work in his previous picture "Say it again."

CLAIRE G.—You are right, Claire.

ZAK, PARIS.—No, I have never been to Paris, but wait, some day I'll be there. I have seen one or two french films, where the women all shrug their shoulders. You can reach Pola Negri at the Famous Players Studios, 1520 Vine Street, Los Angeles, California. Write me again, your letters are always so interesting.

EVELYN F.—Welcome to the throne. The more the merrier. I like to hear from my readers. Ben Lyon at First National, 807 E. 175th Street, New York City. Agnes Ayres is back in pictures with Valentino in "The Son of the Sheik," a sequel to "The Sheik." Madge Bellamy and Lou Tellegen in "The Way Things Happen."

R. B.—Clara Bow was born in 1905, and she is playing in "Mantrap" and "Kid Boots." Cecil De Mille is producing "Young April," which includes Joseph Schildkraut and Bessie Love.

EVA R. B.—You know, to err is human; to forgive unusual. Richard Dix at the Famous Players Studios, Astoria, Long Island. Where is the stamp you said you were enclosing?

EVA C. A.—See all the Little Evas. You want to know if Jack Mulhall would bother with a girl like you. Well now, Eva, why don't you write to him at First National Studio, 807 E. 175th Street, New York City. Jack Mulhall played opposite Blanche Sweet in "The Far Cry." Yes, Famous Players-Lasky paid $40,000 for the screen rights to "Naughty Cinderella" for Pola Negri. It's to be released as "Good and Naughty."

Yes, Mary and Doug are really going to make a picture and I understand it will be in eight reels. Each player is to have a complete story for four reels and they will then meet and the remaining part of the film will be with the famous couple co-starring. Yours until next month!

A MULE.—Take care, what a man desires, he usually believes. Yes, H. B. Warner is going to play the rôle of the Saviour in Cecil De Mille's "Thirty Pieces of Silver." Richard Dix was born July 18, 1894, and he is not married. His last picture is "The Quarterback." You refer to Joe Cobb, the little fat boy in the "Our Gang Comedies," and he is about eight. Tell your Uncle he had better stay in Richmond.

JOS H. H.—That's what I say, a ripple of laughter is worth a flood of tears. Carlyle Blackwell is playing in Europe right now. I don't know what has happened to June Elvidge. Hoot Gibson is playing in "The Texas Streak."

PAL.—So you like William Boyd. He is very popular right now. He is playing in "Man of War." Richard Barthelmess is playing in "The Amateur Gentleman" with Dorothy Dunbar opposite.

GRACE J.—You refer to Arthur Rankin as Vasila in "The Volga Boatman." You want Theodore Kosloff to have larger parts. You will have to write to Cecil De Mille. Belle Bennett is playing in "The Fifth Commandment." Yes, Gertrude Olmstead and Robert Leonard were married, also Elaine Hammerstein and Walter Hays.

JOSEPHINE D. P.—Lionel Barrymore and Marceline Day will play in "The Mysterious Island," by Jules Verne. It will be done entirely in technicolor, the action to take place on earth, under sea, inside the earth, and up in the air. Well, I can see where they are not going to miss a thing. Lars Hansen in "The Scarlet Letter." Lillian Gish was born in 1896. Renée Adorée is playing in "The Flaming Forest."

JOHN CAIL.—You certainly ask about some old timers. Kate Lester died October 12, 1924, and she was about seventy. Anna Q. Nilsson and Lewis Stone are playing in "Midnight Lovers" with John Roche and Chester Conklin. Herbert Rawlinson in "Conscience."

They Say—

witnessing certain happenings in movie plays. The poor revel in the sight of the little poor girl coming into riches overnight thru some fortunate accident or the modest clerk who becomes president of the company which employs him. The swain sees himself as the perfect lover, and the gawky maiden has hopes of one day becoming an equal of the beautiful heroine. They all see themselves, for the moment at least, as the exception who rises from the mire to a bigger and better place in the world. The rise of the downtrodden and the happy ending still remain the key to popular successes.

She mentions Thomas Meighan, Milton Sills and Bert Lytell as players who give the public what they want. That is probably true to an appreciable degree, but can I be expected to believe that the plays of Thomas Meighan are true to life? Most of them that I can remember, and they are few, altho I have seen dozens of them, seem to smack of Horatio Alger and his philosophy. I do not deny the success of these players from a box-office standpoint, but I do deny their alleged reputations as realists.

Miss Smith pictures Meighan as a gentle caveman who fights and makes love in a forceful and natural manner, as compared to Valentino, whom she brands as wishy-washy and describes him as a handsome lover too perfect for this mundane life, or rather that his strivings toward perfection in love-making make for exaggeration that is incompatible with every-day life. To me the comparison is odious. It is like comparing mules with race-horses.

Valentino has more natural gentleness in his foot than Meighan has in his whole makeup. He epitomizes the instincts of a gentleman. As for red-bloodedness, I think that he possesses as much in quantity and quality as Meighan, but simply does not make public exhibition of it on every slight pretext. Valentino can accomplish more in the way of art with one gesture than Meighan can by manipulating his corporal body thru eight reels of film, to my notion. I wonder if Miss Smith could witness a performance of Valentino's "Beaucaire" without saying, "Here is a man who is an artist; who can portray a red-blooded fighting man who, at times, is infinitely gentle."

Something DIFFERENT for Bobbed Hair

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which is really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25¢ direct to J. W. KOBI Co., 656 Rainier Avenue, Seattle, Washington.

Cashmere Bouquet is made especially for the face, hands and tender skin of the neck. It is “hard-milled,” which means that it is put through special pressing and drying processes that give each cake an almost marble firmness. It is not the least bit squidgy. This special hardness is what makes it safe. Cashmere Bouquet lather penetrates deep into the pores, searches out dust and dirt and rinses away instantly and completely. No undissolved soap remains in the pores to mix with dirt and stifle the tiny openings. That is why skins cared

Face Pores Give Up Their Poisons To New Magic Milk Mask

Men and Women Amazed as New Discovery
Almost Instantly Reveals a Hidden Beauty

ANYONE can now have a fine-textured skin, radiant with the fresh coloring of youth, smooth and firm as a child's. In only 15 minutes, mind you! In this amazingly short time you can have a brand-new, beautiful complexion!

It seems almost magical. Tired lines, enlarged pores, sallowness—all vanish. Blackheads and pimpleheads are lifted right away. Hidden beauty that you never dreamed you possessed is brought to the surface.

What Is This New Kind of Magic?

It's all very simply explained. The face is covered with millions of tiny pores, through which Nature intended impurities to be expelled. But when dust, bits of dead skin, and other harmful accumulations clog these tiny pores, the impurities cannot escape. The skin becomes dull, coarse, colorless. Soon poisons form in the stifled pores, and blackheads and pimples make their appearance.

Only now, after years of research and experiment, has the positive, natural way been found to relieve the condition of clogged pores at once. Certain elements, when combined in just-right proportions, have been found to possess a remarkable potency which acts on the face pores as a magnet acts on a bit of steel. These elements have been blended into a fragrant, cream-like compound, which is as easy and pleasant to use as a face powder.

When you apply it to your face, it seems almost as though millions of tiny magnets were drawing the pore-poisons and accumulations to the surface, absorbing them, lifting away the blackheads and eruptions. The feeling is one of physical relief—refreshing and invigorating.

The MAGIC MILK MASK

(Trade Mark applied for)

That's what it is called, this remarkable discovery—The Magic Milk Mask. It is applied with the tips of the fingers, just as an ordinary cream would be applied. You may read or relax while this fragrant mask is doing its wonderful work. There will be a cool, tingling feeling as the tiny pores awaken—as The Magic Milk Mask draws the clogged-up impurities to the surface.

In fifteen minutes, simply rinse off the mask. With it you will remove every blackhead and pimplehead, every pore-poison and impurity, every bit of dust, dirt and dead skin. Your complexion will be transformed!

You will declare that a fairy must have touched your face, gently removed the blemishes and impurities, and revealed a new beauty!

SEND NO MONEY

The wonderful beautifying effects of milk have long been known. Many famous beauties have used the milk treatment—among them the lovely Lillian Russell. CLASSIC'S Late News PAGE

WALLACE BEERY and Raymond Hatton, who contributed so much mirth to "Behind the Front"—are now making a companion picture to the army story. The next appearance of the character comics will be in "We're in the Navy Now."

Ford Sterling, Lois Wilson and Louise Brooks pleased their sponsors so well in "The Show Off," that they have been cast to play the principal rôles in "Love 'Em and Leave 'Em."

Following the completion of "Flesh and the Devil," which Clarence Brown is directing, John Gilbert will play the starring rôle in "The Day of Souls."

Renée Adorée has returned to Hollywood to play the leading feminine rôle in "The Flaming Forest"—written, as you might expect, by James Oliver Curwood.

Beatrice Lillie, the English musical comedy comédienne and late star of "Charlot's Revue," has signed on the dotted line for Metro-Goldwyn. She will make her screen début under Sam Taylor, the man who helped to direct Harold Lloyd the past five years.

Roland West will produce a screen version of "Two Years Before the Mast," by Richard H. Dana. He intends to encircle the globe in gathering the necessary backgrounds and atmosphere.

Mary Pickford is planning at least four more pictures—which counteracts the impression in certain quarters that after making a film with Douglas Fairbanks she would go into retirement. The star plans a comedy drama entitled "Cash," depicting the experiences of a cash girl in a five-and-ten-cent store.

Larry Semon has given up stardom to become a director. He has been signed by Mack Sennett to direct two-reel comedies—in which Alice Day and Eddie Quillan will be featured.

The next picture in which Shirley Mason will start activities is entitled "Upstream." Dolores Del Rio, the Mexican star, will be in the cast.

Corinne Griffith has purchased the late Thomas Ince's famous yacht, "Edris." The star is having the vessel completely overhauled and furnished, and under its new appearance it will be known as "The Wanderlust."

Lewis Stone, Doris Kenyon and

Tully Marshall have been signed for "The Blonde Saint," an adaptation of Stephen Whitman's novel, "The Isle of Life."

Louise Brooks and William Collier, Jr., have been borrowed by First National from Famous Players so as they might play two important rôles in "The Charleston Kid." Dorothy Mackaill and Jack Mulhall will have the featured rôles.

Betty Blythe has returned to New York from a year's sojourn in Europe. While over there she made two pictures, one being "She," an adaptation of Sir Rider Haggard's great novel, and "Jacob's Well," from Benoit's famous story. Miss Blythe will continue her vaudeville tour until she decides upon a suitable story for the screen.

By special arrangement recently made with Warner Brothers, Patsy Ruth Miller is to be limited to approximately forty weeks of screen work during the coming year. Present plans call for her to star in "The Third Degree" and "What Happened to Father."

Buster Keaton's first full-length feature comedy under the stone-faced comedian's new contract with United Artists, "The General," is now being made in the open spaces of Oregon. Buster, as usual, is directing his own picture.

The cast for the screen version of Harold Bell Wright's best seller (2,000,000 copies—so the statisticians have it), "The Winning of Barbara Worth," is now complete. It comprises Ronald Colman, Vilma Banky, Charles Lane, Clyde Cook, Paul McAllister, E. J. Ratcliffe, Gary Cooper, Erwin Connelly and Sam Blum.

Lois Weber, the only woman director of the screen, who recently completed an excellent picture of theatrical life, "The Marriage Clause," will take the job of finishing "Uncle Tom's Cabin," work upon which was held up thru the illness of the former director, Harry Pollard.

Richard Dix is tramping over them thar hills in Virginia and West Virginia—preparatory to taking up strenuous work in "The Quarterback"—a picture of collegiate life.

Lloyd Hamilton, the comedian with the iron face, is making eight new comedies. In the first he will be seen as a seagoing "gob." Bobby Vernon will also make eight—and so will Al St. John.

LAST MINUTE REVIEW

"Men of Steel"

A GAINST a most impressive background of steel mills—with molten metal serving as its piece de resistance, there is revealed a compelling picture that carries sound logic in it. In reality it presents a character study—a broad symbol being used which projects the inarticulate, but forceful steel worker determined to go thru the crucible of a refining process of his own.

The picture has a tremendous fascination. One doesn't know what is coming, tho it is easy to anticipate many significant dramatic happenings. It builds a compact narrative—which, while involved, is followed easily enough because of its vivid drama of men—and of the steel that molds them as well. The background aids in emphasizing the characters of the plot. In this background the eye catches giant cranes, roaring furnaces, flaming ore, gigantic buckets and shovels. These are the properties which give the film its significance.

The film gives Milton Sills his strongest rôle—one that even eclipses what he had in "The Sea Hawk." And the actor gives a virile, rugged performance, despite the fact that he becomes too immaculate as the story develops. His metamorphosis is too complete. Thus he misses the realities toward the finish.

Sills, however, makes you feel the urge in him to rise above his surroundings. He performs a great self-sacrifice to save the brother of his sweetheart—and runs away. And from this point the narrative grips you with its convincing and moving drama. Its vivid quality is emphasized thru its striking backgrounds.

True, the idea becomes involved yet it is easily grasped—so definitely drawn are the characters and situations. It releases titanic drama—not only in the picturesque conquest of the molten metal, but in the fires which burn in the hearts of men. It offers life in the raw—life which gives much and takes little. The acting is of a high caliber—with Doris Kenyon, Victor McLaglen and George Fawcett doing especially well. L. R.

A Message From E. W. Hammons To the readers of Motion Picture Classic

IF you were connected with the great motion picture industry—if you were a star or a director or a business executive—what would be your greatest ambition? Would your fondest dream be that some day you would be responsible for the “biggest and grandest” spectacle the screen had ever produced?

Perhaps on first thought you will quickly answer “yes, of course.” But that isn’t my chief ambition—and it never has been. I’d like to tell you why.

* * *

The motion picture industry, in my opinion, has one function to perform that is more important than any other consideration—to provide you and the rest of the great picture-loving public with consistently fine, wholesome entertainment and amusement. Of course, you want to see the fine big feature spectacles. But you also want to be sure that whenever you care to spend an evening at the “movies,” you can count on having a fine evening’s entertainment all through the whole show.

And that’s why it always has been my chief ambition to have Educational provide for you the finest possible entertainment in the comedies, novelties and other Short Features that make up “The Spice of the Program.” In the many years that Educational has played a part in the motion picture industry, it has never handled a long feature picture, and I’m mighty proud of the fact that it has grown to its present position among the leaders of the industry through specializing in the briefer pictures that go to balance the ideal picture program and that provide such a large part of your film entertainment.

You have shown that you want—that you demand—the finest entertainment all through the show; and that’s why most of the country’s better theatres are showing Educational Pictures today. That’s also the reason why the Greater Movie Season that is just beginning will bring to the screen for your entertainment a still bigger and finer group of Educational Pictures.

Your favorite theatres can tell you what Short Features they are going to show as well as which longer feature. And if you’ll consider them all in deciding “where to go,” you’ll find that you get more consistent enjoyment out of your movie evenings. You’ll be impressed by the beauty and story value of the Romance Productions in natural colors, such as “The Vision.” You’ll always get a hearty laugh out of any of Educational’s comedies or cartoons. Any program is a better show that includes some of the Short Features that make up “The Spice of the Program.”

FIRST PRIZE

Fair Play for "The Big Parade"

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

I am English. I love my country. But, above all, I love truth and fair play.

I went to the première of "The Big Parade" in London on May 21st, and never have I heard anything to equal the spontaneous and enthusiastic applause which greeted this superb masterpiece. The next day a large section of the most widely read newspapers had headlines to this effect:

"America wins the war—on the films."

"Not a British soldier seen in America's version of the war," etc., etc.

These criticisms were most unfair and prejudiced, and gave a totally false idea of the picture, and have prevented many people going to see it and judging for themselves.

There are no British soldiers in the picture. Why should there be? It is an American film; war episodes as seen thru the eyes of an American doughboy. It distinctly states in the foreword that his experiences might have been those of a soldier of any other nationality. One English newspaper, The Daily Sketch, wrote of it: "It is an international picture, no more American than any other great work of art."

The following is an extract from a letter I wrote to The Sunday Herald, which, amongst other things, had criticised the behavior of the men in billets:

"UNITED STATES AND WAR FILMS

"With reference to your film critic's comments on 'The Big Parade,' I should like to state that during the last eight years I have seen a large number of British war films and do not recollect in one of them that American troops were even remotely referred to.

"In two plays the French were mentioned. Had America seen the British film, 'The Better 'Ole,' they would have concluded that our 'Tommies' were a set of low comedians, whose time was entirely taken up by drinking and kissing French girls, for they did practically nothing else. This film was not redeemed by either fine direction or acting.

"D. G. SHORE."

"The Big Parade" is a supreme work of art, in spite of the extremely simple and conventional story and certain "heroics" which, perhaps, slightly mar the latter half of the picture.

I have seen hundreds of moving pictures, but this is the first living picture. The acting reaches such heights that it ceases to be acting; it becomes life, real, surging, pulsating.

The film critic in The Morning Post wrote, with justice: "We should not condemn a wonderful piece of stagecraft because the producer was jealous of his own country's exploits."

The English are not what a certain section of the press would have the world believe. We are a generous people, and I know many who have seen "The Big Parade" and have come away with the tenderest feelings of gratitude and affection for the happy-go-lucky doughboys who came over to join in the "great adventure." A British Army officer, who had a great deal to do with the Americans in France during the war, said their fearlessness was wonderful.

I am sure that the abolition of war and the world's peace lie in the hands of America and Great Britain, and I, for one, earnestly desire a better understanding between the two countries. There must be mutual generosity, a truce to petty spite and jealousy. I have lived in America and love it and the Americans, and I found that so much of the foolish prejudices that people of one nationality have towards another simply arise from a want of proper understanding.

Owing to the almost moribund condition of the film industry over here, it has not been possible for Americans to see pictures representing real English life and characteristics (which may have something to do with the constant re-appearance on the American screen, of that curious creature—the monocled, mincing Englishman—in spite of Ronald Colman!).

A big movement has now started in order to better conditions and revive the industry, and huge studios are being built.

I hope America will give our pictures of English life a fair showing.

All art, all beauty should be international—universal. Each country should give of her best. The great new art of living pictures ought to be the means of uniting, not of disuniting nations. The movies should be the "entente cordiale" of the world.

SECOND PRIZE

For the Foreign Girls and the Native Sons

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

Since this department is for the benefit of CLASSIC readers in which to express their opinions, I can't refrain from having my little "say so."

Being first and foremost for all things American, it is hard for me to feel compelled to say that the foreign actresses have it all over our own players. Undeniably our leading ladies are the more beautiful, but who among them can compare with the Pola Negri of "Passion" and "Gypsy Blood." Mme. Negri has never been given an opportunity by American directors, or by Famous Players. She was interesting in "Good and Naughty," but Pola Negri is in no wise the comédienne. I should like to see her, not Raquel Meller, as the Empress Josephine to Charles Chaplin's Napoleon.

Then there is Greta Garbo, who, because of her interesting and colorful portrayal in "The Torrent," should be among the most popular players. Not one of our American leading ladies could so subtly express the various emotions as Greta does. And it is gratifying to know that she has so able a director as Niblo for her second American picture and so charming and romantic a leading man as Antonio Moreno.

I must not forget to mention Greta Nissen here. She has had but one real opportunity, in "The Wanderer," a part so unsympathetic as to cause her to lose, rather than gain, admirers, so set are we on having all our heroines of the saccharine variety, in sugar-coated rôles. It is no wonder that Greta Nissen has deserted us for Ziegfeld and the stage.

Perhaps I've seemed too partial to the European players, but the readers of this letter who do not agree with me will forgive me when I say that my vote goes to the American leading men, unanimously, as against the Novarros, Valentinos and De Roches. They are not to be compared with Gilbert, Dix, Haines, Lloyd and the incomparable Wally Reid.

Who on the screen today is there to take Wally's place, and who ever will? His death left a void in all our hearts, one that will never be filled.

John Gilbert deserves a place in the Hall of Fame for his James Apperson in "The Big Parade" and his Danilo in "The Merry Widow." Who can deny Gilbert's ability after seeing him so ably portray two so diversified rôles? I was very happy when I learned that Jack and Greta Garbo will play together—that should be a picture, and Von Stroheim should direct it.

Richard Dix's Indian of "The Vanishing American" was fine, but I like him best in his lighter type of picture—"Take a

H. L. MENCKEN

The Most Quoted Man in America

By B. F. WILSON

LARGE, bitter and copious were the tears shed by the writer during the entire time spent in listening to Mr. Mencken the other afternoon. This is not a sob story, but we fairly groaned for a dictophone to record what he said verbatim, for only in this manner could full justice be given to the interview.

No other man of our acquaintance or hearsay can even approach him in brilliancy of conversation. The picturesque phraseology, the glancing, gleaming flashes of wit, the originality of thought and word, and the deep, underlying current of humor fascinate the listener to the point of hypnosis. The customary grave expression of his face, belied by the twinkle of the bright blue eye, completely puzzles you as to whether, or when, he is speaking seriously. When he finally gets launched on a subject, he handles it in the same fashion a fox-terrier plays with a bone: he harries, he worries it; tosses it up in the air, and catches it deftly on the rebound; gnaws it, and tears it at the end into such minute pieces that not the faintest suspicion of the original idea remains.

Breaks the Long Silence

WHEN he got thru talking about the movies, we felt as tho no one had ever even thought of the subject before. Not that it was easy to make him discuss the motion picture question. Far from it! For some reason or other he has always carefully avoided giving voice to his opinions on the subject. We have had Mencken on Music; Mencken on Art; Mencken on Prohibition; on Politics; on Women, Wine and Song; Mencken on Evolution (will you ever forget it?); Mencken on War, and on Peace; Mencken on Freedom of Speech and Deed—and of course Mencken on Literature, but never, despite golden offers from eager editors, has he uttered or expressed a word about the movies.

When I mentioned the subject: "Flapdoodlery," he replied.

I had to use tactics which would have made Ambassador Hughes bow his head in homage, or Peggy Hopkins squirm with envy, before he would pay attention to the sincerity of my request.

"Have you ever been to a movie?" I demanded.

"How's the weather in Atlantic City?" he replied.

"Will you please answer my question?" I was stern.

"Did you know that Cleopatra was knock-kneed; that Homer was cock-eyed, and that Cæsar suffered from stomach trouble?" he queried with great interest.

I grew subtle.

"Nize Baby," I purred. "Tell momma about de movies, and momma will give you some nize beer mit pretzels."

I had him. I could tell by the rapt look on his face.

"Whatthehell do you want to know?" he inquired gently.

"Have you ever been to a movie?" I repeated, and he could tell from my expression that the "No Fooling" sign was out.

Recalls Two Masterpieces

"I HAVE been to a few," he replied. "Perhaps half a dozen in all. I can recall from them only two—'The Last Laugh' and 'The Big Parade.' I thought them both very entertaining. I know nothing of the ordinary run of romantic movies, made for the rabble."

He sank back into his chair with the well-known "closing the interview" look on his face. He was polite, but I had known him long enough to get over that, so I hinted that he had merely started to talk, not finished.

Breaks the Long Silence

Talks for the First Time on the Movies

"What do you think of the movies as an uplifting influence on the rabble, as you so sweetly put it?" I demanded.

"Why should they be uplifted?" he asked with the slightest elevation of his left eyebrow. You know, the "What are Yonkers?" expression.

"If the rabble likes them as they are, why change them?" He questioned, and I could see that his point was a good one.

"I believe that people have a right to amuse themselves as they please," he added.

"How do you like my suit? Pretty good, eh, for seventeen-fifty? I buy all my clothes ready-made; order as many as three suits at a time thru the Sears and Roebuck catalog; you know, one for each season so when I get them all at once, I dont have to worry about them when the time comes to change."

"Wait a minute," I interrupted. "Please now! Stop your nonsense. This is serious. I want you to talk and say something when you talk, that I can write up as coming from you on a subject of vast importance. Please be serious for a few moments. After that, we'll talk on anything you like."

"All right," he said contritely. "I know what this means to you, what else do you want to know?"

Why Look for Literature?

"Do you see the importance of literature in the movies?"

"No. I dont see any necessary connection between the movies and literature. It is conceivable that a given movie may have some literary quality, but it is surely not likely. But why should it have?" He was quite in earnest now, and as I knew from past experience, the symptoms of his being fairly launched, I carefully restrained the sigh of relief which begged for utterance.

"Some of the most amusing plays that are acted on the stage have no literary quality whatsoever," he continued. "I am strongly against the doctrine that anything that is not literary should be put down by the police. Let the police attend to their proper business of protecting saloon-keepers against prohibition agents."

Most of my readers will recall the recent run-in Mr. Mencken had with the police on this very subject up in Boston. The press made a six-foot head-liner of the story for days. As the editor of The American Mercury, the sale of which had been prohibited, he went up to Boston and personally sold a copy. The case came up in court, and of course, was dismissed: the judge finding no reason for the suppression of the magazine. It was afterwards disclosed that because Mr. Mencken had published an article on the self-appointed vice-crusaders, seeking notoriety by supposedly cleaning up American literature, and in the article naming the chief reformer, that it was this self same reformer who had ordered the sale of the magazine stopped.

But to get back to our subject.

"What do you think of the morals of the movies?" I asked, knowing how he felt on all bigotry and ignorant reformation.

"I dont know anything about them," he answered. "But I do know many intelligent and decent people who go to see them often, and from these people I have never heard any complaint about their immorality."

He chewed the end of his cigar reflectively.

Loose Leeches of Lewdness

"You know, dont you, that such complaints come only from professional Smut-snufflers, most of them looking for jobs. The fact makes me suspicious. I find it hard to take such Smut-snufflers seriously. They are the ones that are always raising a hullabaloo about nothing. These doodlesockers are constantly making it known thru the yellow sheets that seeing a young fellow kiss his gal fills them with an uncontrollable sexual libido. I can only say that the spectacle has no such effect upon me, nor upon anyone I know.

"All the people that read these yellow sheets get het up over the fact that they are being tempted, altho they would never have known it unless it had been pointed out to them. The poor damfools haven't got sense enough to give these rotters a good swift kick in their little August. But anybody with any intelligence whatsoever, would laugh himself sick at the idea of five feet or twenty-five feet, or whatever it is, of celluloid film showing a gal and a man in a clinch, affecting him to the point of indecent desire."

"What do you think of all this Hollywood business?"

Says Mr. Mencken:

"As most of us know, the ordinary run of romantic movies are made for the rabble.

"If the rabble likes them as they are, why change them? I believe that people have a right to amuse themselves as they please.

"I don't see any connection between the movies and literature. It is conceivable that a given movie may have some literary quality, but it is surely not likely.

"Most of the complaints about the morals of the movies come from professional smut-snufflers—who are looking for jobs."

"Some of the movie people get too much money and carry on like American business men at a trade convention, but the majority of them are hard-working people, and take their work very seriously.

"An actor, like any other man, is worth whatever he can earn for his employer."

Hollywood's Pet

The So-Called Human Race Has Its Little Weaknesses. All of Us Are Faithful to Our Foibles—and Among the Most Faithful Is the Celluloid Circle On the Coast. So It's Everyone to His Taste In Riding a Favorite Hobby

By RICHARD COYLE

EVERY human being who is old enough to have learned that the thumb is not really to be taken seriously as an article of food has a pet foible, an amiable little weakness, a bizarre little trait in an otherwise perfectly safe-and-sane character—or, in short, a pet extravagance.

John Ellis

John Barrymore has an expensive craving for books. In his library is a really fine collection of rare old first editions—and he burns much midnight oil in reading them. One of the pet "hobbyists" is Priscilla Dean, on the left—who goes in for all types of dolls

Elmer Fryer

On the left is Syd Chaplin who has a weakness for aviation. Having been a veteran pilot, he is deeply interested in intricate little model planes and their big brothers. Below is Ruth Clifford keeping company with three of her forty-seven dolls. It's her pet extravagance

For its extravagance may consist merely in its lavish demands upon the time and attention of its owner.

It manifests itself in as many different ways as there are different quirks of personality in mankind. With one individual it may consist of a passionate fondness for highly expensive silk neckties of a general color scheme that would drive a Siwash Indian into a delirious ecstasy of envy. With another, it may be a fatal weakness for the ghastly hodge-podge of an auction sale.

Its manifestations may be as weirdly incongruous as an Eskimo in a straw hat. A meekly inoffensive little mouse of a man may go without his lunch in order to satisfy his yearning for lurid volumes of piratical lore, while, on the other hand, Horrible Harvey of the Gashouse Gang may

John Ellis

This pet extravagance is not necessarily a hobby or a recreation, tho it may be closely allied with either or both. Nor does it necessarily demand extravagance in a financial way. It is a foible that even the Scotch may have, and usually do.

EXTRAVAGANCES

have an insatiable secret craving for chocolate-covered peanut bars.

Being Human, They Have Hobbies

HOLLYWOOD, being full of reasonably normal human beings, in spite of occasional propaganda of the yellow press to the contrary, it naturally follows that Hollywood is full of pet extravagances. And, players usually being rather colorful folk, it is only natural that their pet foibles should be colorful above the average.

Not that these foibles are quite so bizarre as they have sometimes been painted by over-zealous press-agents. If half the publicity yarns along this line were true, Hollywood would of necessity be peopled with equal parts of lunatics, kleptomaniacs, and zoo keepers. I have heard it claimed that various players had weaknesses for everything from original Rembrandts to blue-nosed baboons. One hard-working press-agent even spent half an afternoon once trying to convince me that the favorite recreation of one of his clients was putting a small herd of trained eels thru their tricks.

All of which is not only a finely assorted lot of bunk, but rather foolish as well. Because the real pet foibles of some of our leading players are interesting enough in actuality without adding any imaginative garnishes. Giving as they do, such unique and intimate sidelights upon the real tastes and characters of screen favorites, to me these little pet extravagances have always been one of the most interesting minor phases of life in the Film Colony.

They range literally from patent cigaret-lighters to fleets of high-powered and equally high-priced automobiles.

Another Hollywood doll devotee is Claire Windsor—who has a really exquisite collection from all nations. She dresses them up in bizarre costumes and whiles away rainy days in showing them a good time

John Ellis

At the top is a corner of Louise Fazenda's library. She is a genuine book-collector, and is an inveterate follower of all the auctions in the book-shops. In the circles from left to right are Lilyan Tashman and Helene Chadwick. Lilyan admits a weakness for French perfumes—and Helene's hobby is fur coats. She boasts an expensive collection

Among the Collections

WILLIAM BOYD is the possessor of the cigaret-lighter complex. At a conservative estimate, Bill has bought at least forty of the pesky things so far this year. Of every size, every material, and every shape, they have had just one thing in common, an utter failure to continue functioning after the second day. Bill is still hoping, however, and still searching for his goal, a cigaret-lighter that will really light, and keep on lighting.

Automobiles are Tom Mix's pet extravagance. And Tom's present fleet of aristocratic cars is one to constitute a real extravagance, even to a gentleman whose monthly pay check reads like the national debt of Nicaragua.

Here is the list, as nearly as I can remember it offhand:—one Dusenbergl roadster, one Rolls-Royce touring car, one Locomobile limousine, one Buick sedan, and two Packard limousines. Considering that the combined list prices of these cars approximate the forty-thousand-dollar mark, it will readily be granted that Tom's pet extravagance is one worthy the name. At that, I may (Continued on page 72)

E. V. LUCAS, one of the editors of Punch, the humorous weekly, is an author easy to know. And you can see the man just as he is if you will read any one of the many books he has written—some of his "Wanderer" books, for instance: "A Wanderer in Paris," "A Wanderer in Rome," and so on.

If you don't know Punch, then you should meet him, too, at any cosmopolitan news-stand and take him home, for a quarter, I think it is in America. His pages reflect Mr. Lucas perfectly.

Finally, Mr. Lucas is managing director of one of London's biggest and oldest publishing houses, Methuen & Co., and there I met him.

"I write because I like writing and I never write about anything I am not enthusiastic about," said Mr. Lucas somewhere along in the conversation.

I think those few words express more nearly what should be a writer's creed than any others I have ever read or heard.

"I never pretend to be exhaustive, but I make it a point never to become exhausting."

But you get the idea from those two expressions of the sort of man Lucas is and the kind of thing he writes.

BARONESS ORCZY (pronounced Ortsee) is the author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel"—considered one of the best sellers in the world, a book that has sold five million copies in about twenty years—at the rate of two hundred and fifty thousand copies a year!

Here is an ideal story for the motion pictures and yet it has never been presented in the films. And the reason, in part, for its non-production and thus denying to the cinema world one of the most intriguing, thrilling and picturesque stories, is to be found in my preamble. Among other things, the Baroness feels a lack of confidence in the ability of scenarist and director to render with perfect fidelity the story that is so near her heart. She acknowledges her own inability to aid them further than submitting the story "as is."

"We have been offered all sorts of money for 'The Scarlet Pimpernel,'" she told me. "Periodically, someone from the films comes along with a new offer. I have my ideas why I would not yet perhaps sell it, but I am not the sole owner of the rights, outside book rights. Fred Terry, the actor, is my partner in dramatic and other rights and has the idea that a film presen-

The Fifth of a Series of Talks About Motion Pictures With Famous English and Continental Writers

IT is a wise fiction father who knows his own movie child.

And the more I see of Great Writers and hear them talk about the terrible things that happen to their brain children, in the cruel screen world, the more I wonder why they trust their sacred things to the care of roving bands of gypsies—as they seem to consider the cinema in general. They are like those mothers who desert their babies in dark hallways and then turn up to claim them and wail over them when they have been adopted by wealthy persons who shower a fortune on them.

One of the bitterest defamers of the movies that I know, and their ill-treatment of the novelist is one whose book did not go at all well, netting him not more than $4,000. A motion picture company paid him $20,000 for the picture rights. A clever scenarist made a silk purse out of a sow's ear, literally, for the story on the screen was infinitely better than that in the book from which it had been taken—and was different, of course. Hence the wail of the novelist.

In the great majority of cases, the novelist makes more from his picture rights than he does

FORD MADOX FORD is the author of that remarkable book, "No More Parades," which was adjudged the finest novel of the year by several of the leading book reviews.

He lives in Paris in a quaint studio on Rue Notre Dame des Champs, just behind the house in which Balzac once lived and wrote. By good fortune, my pension happened to be almost opposite his studio, so it was an easy matter to drop in. He took me up a rickety stair to a cubby-hole where he said he did most of his writing.

"No," he smiled, when I asked him, "I just haven't any ideas on the films. I find most of them extraordinarily nonsensical."

"But you do go to see them?" I persisted on top of his condemnation.

"Yes. I suppose everyone must go to see them sometimes. Oh, yes, I did go to three bull-fights and two films in one week down in the south of France last summer."

Bull-fights and films! There's a new one. Ford Madox Ford puts them on a par, only he places bull-fights first.

We talked all around the films after that, for he did not want to be caught associating with

PICTURE, PICTURE

ROBERT DONALDSON

Jean Hersholt and Ernest Torrence walked away with the acting honors in "Greed" and "The Covered Wagon"

THE question is—how do they steal it? Picture-stealing is rapidly becoming an eighth art, and one which adds spice to the business of going to the movies. Frequently it is the method by which a new star is whirled into the firmament of filmdom.

Picture-stealing is always eagerly watched both by critics and theatergoers because it partakes of the element of chance, of the unexpected.

One reads the advance notices and advertisements of a movie. Various well-known players are featured, and everything seems according to Hoyle thruout. Yet when one attends the picture, it is obvious—obvious to the veriest dub in the audience—that some unknown, or some minor player, whose name is frequently not even mentioned in the billing—has walked away with the show, has made the impression which is the most lasting on the minds of the audience. Not always is it a newcomer who steals a picture. Often it is a character actor with a relatively small part compared to that of the hero and the heroine.

Such a player very frequently (in the parlance of the film business) just "rolls up the picture and puts it in his vest pocket."

How do they do it? How is a picture stolen?

The writer decided that the best way to discover the technique was to go to some of the notorious picture-stealers in the business.

Not infrequently producers put a confirmed picture-stealer in a cast just to pep things up and spur the other members of the cast to greater effort.

His Back to the Camera!

ONE of the classics of Hollywood is the tale of how Andre de Beranger, with his back to the camera, stole the final scene of "Grounds for Divorce" from Owen Moore and Harry Myers, to whom (the latter two) the scene was supposed to go, and who dont love a camera lens any more than they love their own mothers.

The final scene of the picture featured Beranger, Myers and Moore. Each of the three was trying to take this scene by sheer force of acting, and the battle was one of wit, cleverness, and quick-thinking.

When the fade-out scene came, the honors were about even. Paul Bern, the director, arranged the grouping for the fade-out. And he placed Beranger with his back to the camera!

Moore and Myers chuckled. Beranger, they figured, was out of it. But they reckoned without the swift-thinking cleverness of a real trouper.

Andre de Beranger stole "Grounds for Divorce"

Roy D'Arcy stole "The Merry Widow"

Adolphe Menjou stole "A Woman of Paris"

Who Stole the Picture?

The Pastime of Stealing the Picture Is Indulged In On Many Occasions. While the Star Has the Principal Rôle, It Is Often a Minor Player or Some Gifted Character Actor Who Makes the Most Lasting Impression and Walks Away With the Show

Wallace Beery almost stole "Robin Hood" away from Douglas Fairbanks

As the cameras started to grind, Moore tugged at his coat lapel and Myers tugged at his mustache. And Beranger was left the opportunity to "emote" with the broad of his back!

But Beranger had a pair of white gloves. He clasped these behind his back, and as the scene began to fade out he waved them up and down.

And because they were the whitest thing in the scene, they remained visible longer than anything else—after Myers' mustache and Moore's lapel had been obliterated by the encircling darkness!

An Old Timer At It

ONE of the most brilliant attempts at picture-stealing in recent years occurred in "Robin Hood." This was a Douglas Fairbanks production from start to finish. All the other characters were supposed to be incidental.

And yet—who doesn't remember Wallace Beery as King Richard I?—Richard the Lion-Hearted, seated in his immense palace gnawing lustily on a leg of mutton, and hurling the bone to his henchmen?

It was a great performance, one that will be long remembered. And yet Beery's footage in "Robin Hood" was very small compared to Dong's. Beery worked fast and cleverly, but he didn't quite make the grade, largely for the reason that Doug held the final scissors on the negative when it went to the cutting-room.

"The part of King Richard was the easiest one I have ever played," Wallace told me. "It was a cinch. It simply couldn't fail. I have played much harder parts, put a good deal more into them, and made a great deal smaller impression when it was all over with." And yet one cannot imagine anyone but Beery in the part!

There Are Women in the Game

AMONG the women, picture-stealing seems to be less frequent. Yet it does occur.

For instance, Louise Dresser very nearly walks off with every picture in which she appears. Very little grass has grown under her feet of late in the picture world. One recalls "The Goose Woman" especially. And her work in Victor Fleming's "The Blind Goddess" and Allan Dwan's "Padlocked" is superb. In both pictures she very nearly "wraps up the show and puts it in her pocket"—presuming that women at least have pockets for this purpose. (Continued on page 65)

George Bancroft stole "The Pony Express" quil didn't understand.

She felt that she never would.

So far back as she could drive her mind,
Jonquil had been unhappy.
And she felt that she could remember very far back indeed. There were things to make her remember. Terrible things.
Scourges. Signposts of sadness.

There was, for instance,
her mother. Of course, most girls remember their mothers, but not in just the way nor for just the reasons that Jonquil did.

Most children are made comfortable by their mothers. Soothingly, drowsingly comfortable.
And in the blanketing lap of such warm comfort things become blurred into a pleasant whole.
Things melt in a comfortable reminiscence of sweet sachets and cuddly arms and fragrant kitchens and a lullabying sort of voice. All these things compound and become one's mother.

Not so with Jonquil. She associated no comfort with her mother, no fragrant baking days when she had been allowed to make gingerbread men with raisin eyes, no lullabying voice.

Jonquil had been uncomfortable. She had been uncomfortable twenty-four hours out of the twenty-four. Even when she had slept she had been aware of discomfort, of the fact that the bed was gritty and lumpy, that her mother was sighing and making moany little noises in her sleep, that her father was snorting and sniffing, and that they would have to be up in the pallid dawn hustling thru dim chill streets to another train bound for another dreary town.

Jonquil had had long, head-drooping hours behind the scenes waiting for her mother to make her final dying appearance as Camille or whatever highly flavored rôle she happened to be enacting on that particular night.

The character woman had come into their room and shrieked dreadful things at her father and mother. She had seemed to put herself in the same place with them and called them "poor dupes" and other hideous names —And a Girl's Escape From Herself

Jonquil had had scene shifters or juveniles or character women as temporary and ever shifting nursemaids. Jonquil had subsisted upon fried food, skim milk and lollipops in order to attain to that creature comfort known as "a full stomach."

It was in the rôle of Camille that Jonquil best—or worst—remembered her mother. It had been her mother's favorite part. "I understand, Camille," her mother had said, "I become one with her . . . it is my hope that I shall some day be recognized as having given one of the world's greatest Camilles to the theater."

Jonquil remembered sitting one night in the scant audience, yawning away the time until her mother should have taken Camille's highly emotional departure from the flesh. A man next to her smiled at her unabashed yawns and said, "Don't blame you . . . that woman is the world's worst Camille . . . I congratulate her. I thought I had run the gamut."

Jonquil had felt like crying. Her mother would have been so hurt. Still, he had said that he congratulated her, too. Grown-ups said such mixy things. Congratulate meant something nice. A more prominent part, a raise in salary, a week's stand. Something like that.

Lillian and Percival De Vere were the owners and proprietors of a second-rate stock company playing two-night stands in third-rate towns. Now and then they had a summer engagement but it was only now and then.

They played a catholic and comprehensive repertoire. Their repertoire was a great point of pride with them.

Jonquil had, among her hazier memories of her mother, visions of her in tulle and butterfly wings, a golden Columbine; or again as a languid Juliet lying in a stiffly composed nightdress upon a nightmarish catafalque made of papier mâché. Or, again, as the dismal Camille dismally expiring in her best nightgown which had been duly washed and hung to dry in their bedroom each night before the performance of Camille.

Perhaps, after all, Jonquil's most potent memory of her mother was the last one. She never seemed able completely to efface it. Years later, in the shadow world, this memory would recur to her, the realest thing in the unreal world. And yet she was never quite able to distinguish as to whether it had actually happened in one of their hotel rooms or whether it had been a singularly poignant performance on the stage. Possibly it had been another one of those times in the best nightgown or on the papier mâché catafalque.

She felt sure of the best nightgown, at any rate.

And it must have been in the hotel room because her memory did not conjure up any footlights, but merely the dirty gray wash of early morning. Anyway, her mother had been lying on something or other clad in the best nightgown and breathing more and more heavily with every difficult breath. Jonquil had called her and she hadn't answered—only breathed harder than ever—and then, all at once, she hadn't breathed at all. She had been terribly still. The lace on her breast hadn't stirred even when a puff of icy wind came from nowhere at all and played about the bed.

Jonquil had supposed her sleeping and had slipped out of the room and had gone downstairs to breakfast. She remembered thinking that she would bring her mother something on a tray. Her mother loved to have breakfast brought to her on a tray. She had said that it made her feel "refined." And then they could still catch the train. . . .

Papa had not been in their room all night but he came in to breakfast while Jonquil was having hers. Jonquil had known that he would be "mad" because mama wasn't up and had hastily told him that mama would surely make the train but that she was so tired she hadn't even breathed and that she was going to take her some breakfast on a tray. . . .

Papa had glared at her and she had noticed that his eyes were redder than usual and had thought how horridly his lower lip hung down, almost as tho it were going to drop sloppily off. But it had never hung so low as when she had said that mama wasn't breathing. Papa had turned and left the room when she said that, which was strange, because he never did anything, certainly nothing for mama, until he had eaten himself. She supposed that mama was going to "get it" harder than ever and the thought took away whatever flavor there might have been to the cold bacon and storage eggs.

Jonquil never saw her mother again. They had wanted her to look at her when she was lying in her coffin but she had cried and begged them not to make her. She had felt

CELLA LLOYD BECOMES

By JOHN HELD, JR.

Scene I

Cella's contract with the producers says that she must not weigh over 110 pounds. Money and popularity arrived so quickly that the little minx lost track of her figure. She has strapped herself to the ceiling and dances on the air to make her waistline behave

Scene II

Cella never misses the Roto section of the newspapers. She has noticed that Jack Dempsey trains by skipping the rope—and so she employs a photographer to snap her. She will train down to form and break into the papers at the same time

PLEASINGLY PLUMP

WHAT'S GONE ON BEFORE

With Cella Lloyd safely over with her public, even tho her personal appearance wasn't very successful, she, nevertheless, feels so secure at the top that she has forgotten her slender waist-line. Knowing that her days are numbered unless she keeps in trim, Cella starts reducing thru a course of physical and Brussels sprouts. Now read on!

Scene III

No matter how strenuous the stunt, Cella thoroly believes in trying it out. She claims to have invented this exercise, but her bitter rival, Hebe Jebie, knows better. Hebe saw her at a vaudeville show intently watching the Japanese acrobats juggle the barrel. As for Cella, she has juggled the barrel right out of the picture

Scene IV

To continue the painful pastime of reducing Cella knows she must diet as well as exercise. Accordingly she gives up spinach and pineapple and orders a light luncheon of fried chicken and a tureen of clam chowder. Enters the mysterious stranger. Can he be the producer?

Facing Death

By SCOTT PIERCE

As a result of this insatiable demand for thrills, nerves of chilled steel are as indispensable an adjunct to a modern film comedian as freckles are to a dill pickle. Disregarding the ever-imminent rustle of the Grim

Jimmie Adams made them shudder in the above scene when he reposed flat on his back on a slanting board that projected from the top of an oil derrick. Harold Lloyd surely risked his life in the scene on the right—taken from "Safety Last." The spectators gasped for breath when he did his stuff on the skyscraper

HOLLYWOOD has a number of workers who would never be rated as good risks by any insurance company that was in its right mind, but, taken as a class, there is no single group in the Film Colony that flirts more consistently with death, havoc, and destruction in the course of its daily labors before the camera than do the movie comedians.

In fact, in order for a film comedian to get his name in electric lights over a theater, it is apparently first necessary for him to run imminent chances of getting that same name on a marble slab over a neat, grassy mound.

For reasons known entirely to itself, an American picture audience wishes its hair to stand on end at the same time its funny-bone is being tickled. The nearer a comedian can come to a violent and spectacular exit from this vale of tears, the funnier that comedian apparently is.

If it is funny to see a comedian nearly fall ten feet, it seems to follow necessarily that if the comedian nearly falls a hundred feet it is ten times as funny. A situation that is only mildly mirthful when a comic is being chased by a hungry bulldog becomes really sidesplitting when the pursuer is a man-eating lion.

Chills are an essential running mate to chuckles. Custard pies have given way to boiler explosions, street scenes to skyscraper roof-tops, trick flivvers to racing airplanes, and banana skins to landslides.

Reaper's black robes in the near distance, the successful comedian must not only laugh at Death, but must win still greater laughs in so doing. It is doubtful if any comedian on the screen has equalled Harold Lloyd in number of thrills per foot of celluloid during the last few years. And the thrills have all been legitimate ones. In common with Keaton, Denny, and other big-time laughmakers, Lloyd absolutely refuses to use a double, and relies almost solely upon his own physical ability, and careful planning and timing of the various stunts beforehand.

The American Picture Audience Wishes Its Hair to Stand on End at the Same Time Its Funny-Bone is being Tickled. That's Why the Comedians Must Risk Their Lives in Gathering Thrills and Laughs

Lloyd's Thrills

A TYPICAL Lloyd thrill was filmed in "Girl Shy." Standing on the top of a runaway street-car which was speeding downhill at the rate of nearly thirty miles an hour, Harold grasped the tip of the trolley-pole and was swung clear, dangling over the edge of the car for an instant, then dropping like a plummet into of sheer luck, the feat went off like clockwork, and the comedian did not even receive a scratch.

The HOLLYWOOD of France

I HAVE met—worked with, alas!—many, many motion picture directors, but not one of them bears the slightest resemblance to Rex Ingram, his manner and his methods. Rex Ingram is unique. Where I have seen directors—not all of them—wear their caps with the visors down the back of their necks, array themselves in riding breeches and puttees, bellow thru megaphones, and go striding and swearing all over the lot—Rex doesn't.

Rex Ingram is the quietest—silentest might be the better word—man I met on the whole Riviera. His quiet and silence, however, are impressive. You feel that there is so much he might say, if he chose; so many interesting things he is constantly holding in reserve.

As he sits opposite you, you become conscious of vast potential activities constantly going on in his mind. I have never yet seen him when he was not looking with a far-away gaze at something beyond the problem that was directly in front of him. He has developed a deep crease running down almost into his left eyebrow from peering into space this way.

Rex has a faculty of bringing silence with him wherever he goes. No matter how noisy the studio may be, you can always tell when Rex has entered, for a hush falls on his presence. If the whole place is not quiet, you will always find a little spot surrounding him that is. I remark this in way of contrast to most directors I have worked with who were the Big Noise itself.

At the top of the page is a bird's-eye view of Rex Ingram's studios at Nice. The imposing edifice at the right is the Administration Building—which houses the offices of the director and the various heads of departments. The interior above represents the modeling room where sets and details are designed ment. There probably is not a man in the business of directing and producing motion pictures who cares more for everybody and everything than this same Ingram. I offer as proof of this conclusion everything that he does—and I may say that he does everything. A Rex Ingram picture is Rex Ingram. No, there is no one who thinks more of and works more for the public picture-goer than Rex Ingram. So, this not seeming to care a whoop may be a pose. If it is, it is like everything else he does, artistic!

There are other ways in which Rex Ingram reminds me of Napoleon. One is the manner in which he always dresses in a subdued, quiet costume, while his generals are usually arrayed in gaudy uniforms. Again, he becomes conspicuous because of his marked inconspicuousness. There are only two things that are unusual. One is a little French tight student tam-o'-shanter that he wears. The other is a gold-chain bracelet affected by the young Frenchman of today. Neither seems so extraordinary viewed in France when one has been there for a long while.

If you should ask me what I think is the most remarkable thing about Rex Ingram, I should say it is the fact that he has not become insufferable. That is the miracle for which

Like the Little Theater Movement—the Little Cinema Idea is Spreading Rapidly. Film Guilds Are Sprouting Everywhere and Picture Patrons Are Taking Up the New Art of the Future

By MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

The Rise LITTLE

UNDER the surface, one of the most exciting events of the year in motion pictures has been the spread of the "little cinema" idea. We have had our art theaters and theater guilds; now we are to have Film Guilds and "salons of the cinema."

"A little theater for the films in every community, reviving and introducing only the best American and foreign pictures. Minority of true screen devotees to be organized. Skeptics to be converted." So run the manifestoes of these new film-phobes and pioneers.

The intelligentsia is taking up the films. Society is taking them up too—

Dudley Murphy is one of the figures in the art-film movement. He is home talent which has absorbed the ideas about modern art that are current in Europe not as a secret sin, but frankly avowedly, as the New Art of the Future!

Invited to one of these "film art evenings," I elbowed my way into a pretentious theater lobby thru a cultured mob in evening dress and eight-cylinder cars. It was more like Carnegie Hall or Russian Ballet night at the Metropolitan Opera: artists, professors, all the younger generation and the smart "New Yorkers" were there talking at the top of their voices. As the great foreign film with its famous stars went on the screen, there was wild applause; or, hisses, laughter, organized cheering as some new wrinkle or fandangle appeared on this ultra-modern screen. Verily, like a first night at the Opera! And here were—well several hundred people who had paid some ten dollars in advance to see a few films that were heralded as examples of the modern art of the cinema, not because there were specimens of feminine or masculine pulchritude displayed therein.

They've Come to Stay

OBSERVING this new movement toward "little cinemas" for artistic and seriously wrought pictures, I have been struck not so much by the strangeness of the idea as by its vitality, its staying power. This season we are to have four "little cinemas" in New York instead of two; and a chain of them in other large cities such as Boston, Washington, Chicago, Los Angeles.

The idea of little theaters for exhibiting new, experimental, and unpopular films offers so many possibilities for the future, (if it persists and grows as it seems to be doing), that it is time to look over the field and meet some of the leading figures of this movement which has started from the outside.

Symon Gould, the mainspring of the International Film Arts Guild, has, for instance, never been connected with any of the big producing companies. His group has been the most successful, the most aggressive. It has gained a foothold on Broadway and is at the very moment regaling chosen audiences of New York

A Wave of Revivals is on—Revivals of Worth-While Pictures, Which Are Being Shown With New Impressionistic Ideas. The Public Taste is Changing—It Demands Intelligence and Quality in Its Films

Symon Gould is the main spring of the International Film Arts Guild—which caters to the best in the picture field. It is his purpose to establish the little cinema movement in a score of cities for really fine pictures which are not box-office attractions on a large scale, and that there is a special public for such things. It is slow work because we have to educate more of the general movie-going public into going out of their way to view these fine things.

"However, results in the first year have been surprisingly good. Beyond our hopes. We have arrived, and now we are going to expand. Prominent writers, painters, musicians, film-executives came to our programs. Society people came. Some of our subscription evenings had to be repeated because of the overflow."

"How are you going to expand unless you have a distributing system," I asked. I was thinking of how many well-intentioned ventures of this kind drop into the red-ink side of the ledger. Motion pictures cost so with film masterpieces of the past, or box-office flops, or foreign films of great beauty which might never otherwise see the light here—were it not for the Film Arts Guild.

Gould is a little man with horn-rimmed spectacles, but big with ideas for livening up the motion pictures. His Film Guild has the charming little Cameo Theater which seats only five hundred. Here among the screaming electric signs of Broadway by night the passerby, drawn by the magic name of Lubitsch or Stroheim or Griffith, may turn in for a quiet hour with some enduringly beautiful work of the screen. "The Last Laugh," "The Marriage Circle," "The Miracle Man" and many other immortal works which I have tried to call back to the mind of readers of CLASSIC as outstanding achievements of this new art live again. How absurd that such things should lie rolled up on shelves in dusty storehouses!

The Public Must Be Educated

"I HAVE realized from the beginning," Gould said to me, "that our growth would have to be slow and gradual. I have felt all along that there was a place

The UP-TO-DATE Old TIMER

W. C. Fields has a sound philosophy of the art of making them laugh. As a clowning juggler, he is in a class by himself—and he knows all the tricks of the trade

Fields is what you might call an impromptu comedian. He "ad libs" as he goes along. Below is one of the scenes from "The Old Army Game"—with the mirth-maker having fun with his trick flivver

HIS ideas become memories, and no new ones grow: this is my plaint against that ubiquitous bore who cannot see himself as anything but the fount from which all wisdom flows—for, to him, wisdom is no more than a knowledge of what happened in his intimate circle during the period that started twenty-five years ago, and progressed backwards. I am speaking of that perpetual drag on progress, the (ill-) famed "old-timer."

This burst of petulance is not the result of having met one of these ancients; it's because I've met one who isn't!—and therefore know them to be unnecessary. For no one would have the slightest thought of denying W. C. Fields the right to this title in the ranks of those who amuse—yet he doesn't claim it! Or, rather, he claims it only as a well of experience on which to draw for help in the present and future. His life is of the present and future, with the past as a helpful background; rather than of the past, with the present as an unwelcome intruder. "I wish I knew" rather than "Them were the days" is his attitude to life.

Says W. C. Fields:

"I'm egotistical enough to give the producers a battle when they want to make a character do a thing I don't think he would do naturally.

"A comedian should be given a well-worked out skeleton framework—and then told to add the bricks and ornament as he goes along.

"The basic human types never become old and stale—no more than landscapes do.

"I intend making the character I'm playing more important than the registering of my own personality.

"You can't do anything new. Air-planes, cops, boats, elephants, cows, even cripples—all have been used."

Mind you, I have nothing against the past; I am not advocating a constitutional amendment to prohibit it by law. It's all right in its place. If one makes of it a place where one has been—a place of other manners and customs, like a foreign country—and not a citadel in which to fight to the last gasp the savage horde of new ideas, it may even come in handy.

Here are Chester Conklin and W. C. Fields arguing the respective merits of their methods of fastening movie mustaches. Conklin attaches his walrus appendage with glue while Fields recommends hanging it on his nose with a hook-and-eye arrangement. At the right the comedian demonstrates how a domesticated family man handles a large cake of ice

And so it does with Mr. Fields. As a wise-cracker and clowning juggler, there are very few places where wise-crackers and clowning jugglers cause amusement that he has not been. England, France, Germany, Russia—but no editor would accept an article that is merely a list of names.

Pantomime for All Languages

AND no hidebound and unchanging act could withstand the differing demands of these different countries. As, for instance, in countries where his audience could not understand a word of English

There must be new treatment of old ideas if a comedian would make a success of himself. If there's the slightest similarity, the crowd always mutters — "I've seen that before"

"Of course, where I couldn't speak the language, I had to do my act in silence."

And so, the great silent stretches of the films did not awe him—he had already explored the solitudes, and found them not so desolate.

And, also, because he has written most of the sketches he has used in musical comedy, he hasn't that self-conscious feeling of the newcomer in pictures when it comes to the talking over and working out of scripts.

"I'm egotistical enough to give them a battle when they want to make a character do a thing I don't think he would do naturally.

"And besides that, if you do something you don't think you— as a certain character—should, you cannot chase it from your mind. Days and days later, your mind will still return to that action—it becomes a perpetual mental irritant for the life of the picture.

"Even if the actor is wrong, it's almost worth while letting him have his way so that he'll keep his peace of mind.

"The happy medium we should try for is a well-worked out story without too many restrictions on character development."

"But wasn't 'It's The Old Army Game' made without a detailed script?"

"Yes—and there I see one of the defects of the industry: not enough time is spent in preparation—especially in the working out of stories.

"For instance: in a picture where you just 'ad lib' you may have to bring in an extra character towards the end. And then you look back and see at least a dozen other places where

GREAT ATHLETES

HAL K. WELLS

George O'Brien is a super-athlete in his own right. He has the physical build of a Greek Hercules, the lithe grace of a dancing-master, and the hitting powers of a Missouri mule MOVING picture audiences of the Twentieth Century have one big thing in common with their prehistoric brethren of the Stone Age, and that is an innate and undying admiration for sheer physical prowess.

It is a trait as old as the race itself. It was first born back in the dim days when the world was young and such things as second-hand flivvers and radio sopranos were undreamed-of nightmares of a far distant and decadent future.

The several thousand years that have elapsed since then have only slightly changed our inbred admiration for physical prowess. Today, instead of the hairy Neanderthal man who could give a gorilla the first hug and then crack three of the brute's ribs without half trying, our homage is paid to the athlete, the man who combines skill with his sheer brawn, and adds the quality of a fighting heart to the glory of both. But, fundamentally, our admiration for physical prowess is as strong and sincere as it ever was.

This admiration is the factor that throngs boxing arenas, football stadiums, baseball parks, causes the meeting of two girl tennis players to get first-page headlines in the newspapers of the world—and fills moving picture theaters to the last seat when such super-athletes as Douglas

What It Costs to Be a Well-Dressed Sheik

By JOHN ABBOTT

A LOT of money goes into circulation when an actor equips himself with the clothes and accoutrements of a sheik. Take Rudolph Valentino, for instance. He has spent several thousand dollars to dress himself appropriately and colorfully for his new picture, "Son of the Sheik."

The investment called for a complete wardrobe of hoods, cloaks, vests, turbans, sashes and other apparel—to say nothing of such trimmings as swords, knives, revolvers and jewelry. With all of this outlay of wealth to effect a fitting characterization, there is no doubt about the sheik's being well-dressed.

Impressions of HOLLYWOOD

By EUGENE V. BREWSTER

WHEN Irene Bordoni was playing here recently she was much entertained, and among her hostesses was Mrs. Antonio Moreno, who is a princess among entertainers. There were fourteen at table at the six o'clock dinner—the early hour being due to the fact that the guest of honor had to leave early for her theater.

Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Goldwyn, Fred Niblo, Enid Bennett, Florence Vidor, Corliss Palmer and Ramon Novarro were among the guests, and I had a good chance to compare Moreno and Novarro. They are both dark, and of the same height, but Tony is the stouter and older, and, in real life, the handsomer. He also looks more virile. Ramon seems more ethereal and romantic, and certainly less rugged. Of the two, Tony is the more picturesque.

Those Eating Places

TIME was when Armstrong's was the popular place for movie people, and then the scene shifted down and across the boulevard to a place called Montmartre, which is much more elaborate and showy. But now the latter has got so noisy, and busy and common that the better class of movie people are not seen there so much. It has a large and noisy orchestra with a dance floor in the center and contests are quite the vogue.

When one desires a lively time with plenty of excitement, one goes to the Montmartre; when one wants to enjoy a good, quiet meal and to talk and be heard, one goes to Paulais's, Armstrong's, Frank's, Henry's Ship Ahoy, or one of a dozen others within walking distance. Ship Ahoy, by the way, is fitted up like the saloon of a ship with the waiters in marine uniforms.

There's another called "The Jail," which looks just like one, and the waiters are dressed as convicts. Then there's the "Zulu Hut," where one sits on the floor and is waited on by fake Zulus, the "Plantation," a big "Southern style" resort, and so on and so forth.

Rudy Has a Winner

WHILE at another dinner party I learned from Florence Vidor that Director Fitzmaurice was secretly showing "Son of the Sheik" at a small theater in Glendale—"trying it out on the dog," as it were. I was mildly provoked, because I wanted to help them preview it, and they left me out. I had half a mind to leave the table and run over to Glendale and hunt it up, but I didn't.

Next day I was over on the Schenck lot and I reprimanded Joe for not telling me about it. He said that he knew nothing about it and that he was surprised. I then ran across Rudy himself later and I also called him down for not inviting me to the try-out. He glared at me with fire in his eye and said that he knew nothing about the showing of his picture, that he should have been informed, that he ought to have been consulted, and so on. With that he excused himself and darted off.

Later, Fitz came up to me and said that I had gotten him into a lot of trouble. The fact was that he wanted nobody to see the picture in its present state, that he wanted to cut it and fix it up the best he knew how before the boss and star and critics saw it. "Serves you right," said I, "for not letting me in on it. I know all about unfinished pictures in their raw state, and I want to help you. I have staked my reputation on Rudy's comeback, and I'm just as anxious as you are to make this picture a knockout."

He promised me I should see it in a day or two, and he promised the others ditto, and so now everything is quiet along the Potomac and everybody is happy. And, by the way, it's going to be a great picture!

REG the REGULAR

OF all the host of young men who have passed in review across the silver-screen this past dozen years, two stand out as symbols of high-spirited American youth.

The first was Wallace Reid, whom a pitiful death immortalized.

The second is Reginald Denny, whose star is still in its ascendancy.

There are those in Hollywood and elsewhere who believe that Denny's popularity in five years will be even greater than was ever Wally Reid's. There are still others who believe that Denny would already be a greater figure than was Reid at his prime, had Denny been given Wally's opportunities of story, direction and exhibition.

These however, must always remain matters of conjecture. They are interesting to the men who make pictures and display them. They are questions for the fans to debate. But they have no bearing on the personality of Reginald Denny himself.

Judged by His Nickname

I THINK the best barometer of Denny's personal popularity is his nickname. In the opinion of low-brow America, of which this writer claims to be the greatest living example, Reginald is not much of a name. It smacks of cutaway coats and pink teas. It borders on the effeminate. It is very easy for a man named Reginald to be called "Reggy," in which case he is invariably pictured as wearing a silk hat and nursing a lap-dog.

So far as I know, nobody ever thought of calling Denny, "Reggy." His nickname is Reg, the last letter slurred as in "George." It is an honest name, a blunt, straightforward sort of name; a man's name. It is typical of Denny.

It must have been five years since I first met Reg Denny. Engineered by that splendid actor and intrepid sportsman, Ben Hendricks, a group of us had planned a trip to lonely Santa Cruz Islands off the California Coast, where there were rumored to be mountain sheep and wild boars.

We gathered before dawn of a cold, foggy, miserable morning, on a long pier that stretches into the sea from the town of Santa Monica. A few early-rising gulls screamed overhead, unseen, wraiths in the mist. The heavy rollers of the changing tide thundered against the pilings and cascaded on the beach. Eventually we tired of waiting and dropped gingerly from a rickety ladder to the deck of a fishing-boat that rode the swells like a water-logged cork, one hawser carelessly looped about a barnacled piling.

A Good Sport

WHEN Denny appeared with his duffel; dropping to the deck as the little boat lifted on the crest of a twelve-foot ground-swell, there was a little altercation. Plainly, a storm was making. Some of the more timid souls argued for postponement. Not so Denny. His spirit rode down all objections. We went.

An hour at sea and the gale struck. Thereafter

Reginald Denny is one of the most popular actors in pictures. He believes in doing favors for everyone who comes in contact with him—that is, if they play the game on the square. His home life is particularly happy. On the left he appears with his wife and daughter Barbara until late in the afternoon we rode thru mountainous seas, the mscuppered decks constantly awash, the duffel and rifles soaked, the food a soggy mess. If there was talk of running back to port, who talked it down? Reg Denny! If spirits were low, who was always on hand with the cheery wise crack, the booming laugh? Denny!

I wish I could picture him as he was then, standing straddle-legged on the plunging deck of the little craft, his clothing plastered to his body, his hair soaked and rumpled; roaring high-spirited sea songs, shouting badinage, manufacturing puns, holding up the morale of a pleasure crew that wasn't so pleasant.

Well, we sighted the islands in the late afternoon, and still later located a deceptive cove on the lee side. The cove looked quiet from the sea. We transferred the sodden duffel, dropped into the dingy and started ashore. The cove, as I say, was deceptive. On the beach the rollers were running ten feet

THE CELLULOID CRITIC

A FITTING companion picture to "The Last Laugh" in point of masterly direction, masterly acting and the compelling power of its story, is "Variety." As with the other, it comes straight from the UFA workshop—a finished piece of cinematic art. It tells a sordid triangle that shatters the lives of its tragic figures. These three—a dominating, brutish showman, his mistress and the philanderer, who is taken into the confidence of the others—touch the dregs of life.

Yet so completely fascinating, so absorbing and embracing are its eventful situations that the characters seem to step right out of the frame and confront you with their personalities.

Truly Lifelike

I HAVE never seen a picture which carried a more lifelike touch. I have never seen a picture which brought forth so much titanic force in the logical sequence of its scenes. There have been triangle dramas before, but somehow they have an artificial ring compared with "Variety."

The rough-and-ready showman is content in his wagon home—content with his dowdy wife and their sprawling babe until a sensuous woman enters and seeks shelter. With soft, limpid eyes and rounded curves of figure she conquers him.

Emil Jannings and Lya de Putti have many dramatic and emotional moments in that superb picture, "Variety"

Milton Sills has an interesting picture in "Puppets." Here we find him treating one of his dolls to a flow of melody

He would become the aerialist again—the strong anchor man who catches the lighter acrobat in his flights from the trapeze. And so he runs away with the girl. He is happy, but he is ignorant of the girl's passion for men. And she invites the more attractive member of the troupe with the sex light of her eyes.

Power and Suspense

I GIVE this brief outline of the plot to indicate the motivation.

Laurence Reid Reviews the New Photoplays

Mind you, it is a triangle—and tremendously simple of design. Yet it grips you completely. The suspense is terrific as you wonder what will happen. You know that the Germans are as thoro in their plays as they are in war. There is no sugar-coating here. Does the big play-boy run afoul of some gossiping friend who would inform him of the undue passion that his partners have for each other? No indeed, it isn't done so obviously. Instead, the most, malicious method is used—a method which strikes deep. A caricaturist sketches the triangle in vivid terms. The hatred is engendered in the outraged heart of the anchor man. And he makes his rival pay the supreme penalty.

That's all there is to "Variety." But how graphically it is depicted. The story, told in narrative style, with the protagonist confessing the crime to the magistrate after his long sojourn in prison, builds evenly and logically to its destined climax.

Cinematic Quality

I MUST pay the highest tribute to the superb direction. It is manifested in the lighting, the staging, the grouping and the handling of the various characters and situations. The Wintergarten in Berlin is shown in a kaleidoscopic display—with the several acts dissolving into one another. There is keen suspense as the aerialists go thru their routine high up over the heads of the audience. And the pulse quickens indeed, as you wonder if the anchor man will permit his rival to fall.

The outraged playboy, forgetful of the fact that he is suffering as he permitted his wife to suffer, hesitates whether he should catch his false friend. But he is the showman, after all. And he dearly loves applause.

Jack Holt decorates the backgrounds of the vast open country in "Born to the West," an up-and-at-'em Western Lon Chaney scores another point for realism by his uncanny disguise and performance in "The Road to Mandalay." The gentleman in the garb of the cleric is none other than Henry B. Walthall

Which is a tribute to the lifelike touch of the picture. So he goes on with the act and metes out sterner justice.

Splendid Acting

As in "The Last Laugh" I find Emil Jannings again living his character to the life. He is brutal, playful, boastful, cunning, in turn—and he pretends to be nothing else than what he represents. It is a magnificent performance—a performance which adds new laurels. Lya de Putti is also quite perfect in her rendition of the sex-crazed woman—shading her rôle with true feminine moods and impulses.

Chaney in a New Disguise

THERE is a sordid drama of the East—of primitive passions of Singapore on view in "The Road to Mandalay." As its story unfolds, it presents nothing that can be called enlightened or original. And it took no inspiration to conceive it. What merit it has rests solely with its characterization. In order to effect this Lon Chaney resorts to another of his uncanny disguises. He appears a one-eyed bad man—whose only redeeming virtue is his love for his daughter reared in ignorance of her paternal relative.

Chaney must have suffered to bring about this one-eye effect. It is rumored that he employed some chemical which could only be used two hours at a time—so painful was the task. But that accounts for Chaney, the realist. Anyway, he holds the attention—and gives a vivid performance.

Mostly Atmosphere

OTHERWISE there is no tug at the emotions, spiritual or what you will. Lois Moran doesn't look like the type of girl that would be mixed up in such a plot—a plot that doesn't approximate anything

NO further proof is needed that the Germans produce pictures to make people think than their supreme effort, "Variety." Like "The Last Laugh," it asks you to pay strict attention, which you unconsciously do while you find real stimulation from its drama.

With no attempt at belittling the American product, the truth must prevail. It prevails in the painstaking effort to get away from the banalities, the artificialities which too often saturate our pictures. The serious minded Teuton is out to record life stripped of all its gloss. And "Variety" is typical of the race.

Belongs Among the Best

SOME critics have declared it the best film ever made. Well, if it isn't, it can't be disputed that it belongs among the screen's few masterpieces. Certainly there is no room for argument that it marks the furthest advance in picture technique. Why, even a spectator who never saw over a dozen films in his life can appreciate the difference in the manner of its conception and execution from the standards which have been placed before him. He would appreciate true motion photography—the type of photography that becomes a living force. Consequently he is able to feel that the picture is speaking right out to him in its own incomparable language. Incidentally, it is a language which can be understood in any country, since it establishes perfect pantomime brought forth from a perfect motivation of plot.

Cinematic Art At Its Highest Peak

SO "Variety" expresses cinematic art at its highest development. The film audience outside of the circle of "fans" will be able to understand its top standard of technique. The intelligentsia may come to scoff but they will depart highly respectful over the depth of understanding it conveys.

The picture hasn't a weakness. It is especially well handled in regard to its camera angles. It, moreover, contains an interest and appeal for every type of patron everywhere. Its difference from our mass of pictures lies in its superb construction, plus its painstakingly clever presentation, told in terms of life-like pantomime.

By L. R.

Jannings is Present

MOST everyone is familiar with the name of Emil Jannings. But he isn't "ballyhoo-ed" in Germany as he is here. The advertising medium which is the backbone of selling the picture to the public, has made our star system what it is. The Germans have placed him in their picture because they knew he represented the best man for the part. And the Americans have capitalized his talent. So here he is giving another memorable study which contains all the emotions that a human being could possibly express and still belong on our planet. Lya de Putti is another who contributes a most intelligent performance—a performance of a dozen moods and shadings. She is now in this country and Jannings is on his way. Truly, America may welcome them.

It Was Coming to Him

A TESTIMONY of the high esteem that F. W. Murnau is held in America was proved recently when Fox Films tendered a dinner for the director of "The Last Laugh." Highly paid editorial writers, justices, admirals, generals, professors, bankers—all fared forth to pay homage to the genius who produced one of the greatest (if not the greatest) pictures of the screen. It was a tribute to an artist and his art—that representative men from various walks of life responded with such deep regard and enthusiasm.

Herr Murnau registered a humility befitting of all men who have accomplished something worth while. He paid modest tribute to the culture of Europe, but admitted that the energy, the youth and the vital freshness of America had awakened in him a keen desire to catch its indomitable spirit.

The German has qualified as a thinker with real ideas. Let us hope that he continues to give them the highest expression. Unfettered, he should do it.

About Pictures and People

The James Boy

NOT since the days of the memorable Jesse has a James carried on with such high pressure as Gardner. Jesse's exploits made history—and many of them have been recorded on the screen. Gardner James—no relation—is forging ahead in quite a different way. Possessing a plastic expression of countenance and endowed with a full share of emotional talent, he seized his opportunity to demonstrate some high-class pantomime in "Hell Bent for Heaven."

The picture could not be called anything extraordinary in plot or treatment, but among those who contributed its points of appeal was Gardner James, playing the rôle of a cracked-brained youth. It was a sympathetic rôle—and this young actor extracted every ounce of sympathy from it. As a result of his work, it was perfectly natural that he should begin to scale the ladder. Barthelmess engaged him for an important part in "The Amateur Gentleman," and thru continuing his histrionic gifts Inspiration has signed him to a five-year contract.

This is one instance where true merit has been appreciated. He had to work hard—did Gardner, but when his chance arrived he seized it and put himself over. To prove that romance isn't entirely dead, the young Irishman reached Hollywood just a year ago after a most adventurous life at sea. At one time in his eventful career he was a juvenile actor, but the gods of Thespia didn't smile kindly on him. So he sailed the seven seas—and while he sailed he absorbed life. He left the rolling decks with the necessary poise and confidence to take him along anywhere. In our opinion he is the most promising celluloid "find" that has stalked across the silversheet in a couple of seasons. He should be allowed to develop gradually and not thrust into stardom too quickly.

Types Have Changed

TYPES have truly changed in the movies. Not so very long ago—well not any farther than the last mauve decade—it was the logical plan among producers to select an Adonis to play some character rôle. Tradition had it that the audience would never countenance a player whose face might violate the best standards of the sculptor. It might pass muster if the owner was slated for some comic relief.

Then look what happened? Along came some realistic dramas calling for realistic types. And Wallace Beery, "Bull" Montana, Jack Curtis, Kalla Pasha, Lon Chaney—to say nothing of a host of others—popped up to show Mr. Adonis that they "belonged."

Which is by way of introducing the latest entry, Edward I. "Gunboat" Smith, the former pugilist. Famous Players have given him a contract in view of his colorful performance in "Say It Again," the Richard Dix picture in which the "Gunboat" demonstrated his talented "dukes." Smith's income is said now to compare favorably with his prize-fight earnings.

According to all reports, the contract carries the unusual clause whereby the document is void if "Gunboat" improves his looks in any way.

This extract reads: "It is mutually understood and agreed that the artist's engagement hereunder is based upon his unique and individual features and the appearance and condition upon a continuance thereof and the artist hereby agrees that he will not cause or permit any of his features to be altered by plastic surgery or otherwise."

The "unique and individual features and appearance" which the company's production officials prize so highly that they wish them kept intact are the Gunner's broken and flattened nose, beetling brows that overhang deepset eyes, a wide mouth and jaws that have been walloped out of the alignment intended by nature in some of the most memorable encounters with Jess Willard, Frank Moran, Tommy Burns and Battling Levinsky.

HALE- FELLOW- WELL- MET

Emotions Run Deep

IN "The Salvation Hunters" Miss Hale's emotions were not a pretty, prim, and precious flower—as are those of the elder Gish—rather, she grasped the roots and, controlling them, let grow whatever would—straight and tall or stunted and gnarled, as was decided by the sun and wind of its environment. And she has continued in this way.

From earliest childhood, she has been as she is now. In the years of her schooling, for instance, she got along very well—tho she never did her homework.

She never did her homework for the thoroly sufficient reason that, at the moment, she had other interests, and would not waste her time on any single thing that did not fit in with them.

But, in case the same thing held in the opposite direction! Here, the main interest wrought by her environment was to learn. And she threw herself into the work of the moment with sufficient vigor more than to make up for the lack of interest when other influences were working on her.

She Lives the Moment

AND here we have it! "Live the moment" is the key to which all her life is pitched. When the moment arrives, act as you see fit; not as you planned at some other time, when you could not be aware of just what this moment would contain.

Georgia thoroly lives the moment. It is the key to which all her life is pitched. She has prepared herself to be natural. As a result, everyone hails her as a regular fellow

BUT I cant take fifteen hundred words to write: "She has nothing she considers sufficiently important to say."

What's the matter when a lady wont talk?—and for publicity, at that! Is it because she's simply dumb, and really has nothing to say? Perhaps—but I am one of those peculiar people who thought "The Salvation Hunters" a fine picture, and Georgia Hale's acting excellent. And, again, one who sneered in a sophisticated—or disillusioned—way when the critics failed to appreciate her work in "The Gold Rush." No, she cant be dumb, for then my judgment would be wrong—better the world should end than that! Maybe. . . .

Dig a little deeper, Dunham.

For, when polite maneuvering fails to maneuver, and leading questions fail to lead beyond a "yes" or "no," one must try another tack—must, if he is of that tribe for whom eating is a better builder-up than fasting.

If, when one asks, "What part are you going to play in "The Great Gatsby?" the lady answers: "I dont know yet," and intimates that, furthermore, it doesn't worry her much; what is one to do? Dig!—perhaps even deep enough to find out why she doesn't worry. If one can!

Yes one can if one will be patient and try to coax her into relating her experiences and philosophy of life.

Georgia Hale Lives the Moment by Being Natural and Accepting Gracefully What Life Has to Offer

By DUNHAM THORP

"If you plan beforehand, you see what you thought, and then decided, you would see; rather than what actually exists."

Nor does she think it much more profitable to look back, and try to fit in your present actions with your past—to try to be consistent to an idea at the expense of that truer consistency—the fact that nothing an individual does can possibly be inconsistent with him who does it, even tho at times it may seem inconsistent with the general trend of his actions.

"I always act as the actions of the other actors, and the environment in general, make me think natural.

"What I mean is this: I never stop in the midst of a scene to think that I am not using the same twist of the hand that I used two weeks ago. That wouldn't be life; the actions of any moment are made by the feelings of that moment.

No Mannerisms

"No villain always scowls and heroines sometimes do."

"Then you dont believe in mannerisms?"

"No, no!—not at all! Certainly people have them, but no actor should ever put his own into the character of another person."

That's a fine observation, and one made by very few of those who tread the boards and screen—in fact, most of them act as tho this were an edict of the devil. But it should be modified enough to allow for certain quirks and traits in the character presented, so that the character will have individuality, and as a sort of cord to bind its other, and more diverse, manifestations.

I know she does this, but how does it fit in with her theory?

"But you gave a solid and consistent performance in 'The Salvation Hunters'—you always smoked a cigaret in the same way, and your sneer was never different."

"Certainly! I study my character sufficiently to be at home in it—so as not to have to think what she should do.

"But I didn't always sneer in that picture. I laughed often enough, and in many ways—not only in derision.

"If you study your character well enough to understand it, rather than study the actions of the different scenes she is to appear in, you stand a much better chance of really living her life.

"For, after all, if you are living the moment—and that moment is one in the life of another person—you are acting as that person would, rather than working out a preconceived and rigid plan."

Richee

Georgia Hale came into recognition thru her performance in "The Salvation Hunters," and she lived her character so realistically that Chaplin engaged her for "The Gold Rush." Her next appearance will be in "The Great Gatsby"

The Business of Being Natural

"THEN you never plan your scenes ahead of time?"

"Never! I simply study my character until I feel I have mastered it, and then act as circumstances move me."

And as it is in one facet of her life, so it must be—and is—in all. When she was a ballad-singer in Chicago, Chicago was the world, and ballad-singing the world's only occupation. And when she moved to Hollywood, it seemed Chicago had never existed—the world now

A Director's Whims

MAL ST. CLAIR has become so capricious that Famous Players can hardly keep up with his whims and heart changes. He is admittedly their most promising director, and yet as this is written he is not scheduled for any picture. For months Mal had expected to do "The Ace of Cads" with Adolphe Menjou, but when the moment arrived he was so immersed in other things that the picture was given to Luther Reed. Mal at once decided to direct Thomas Meighan in "The Canadian." He waited until the press-agents had blared forth the news, and then coyly changed his mind, necessitating a flood of denials. Now I hear that Gloria Swanson is contemplating making one more picture for Famous Players, and if she does this, Mal St. Clair will direct her. It is all very uncertain—but, of course, a man as brilliant as St. Clair is privileged to act like a prima donna for awhile, while his success is still new.

A Real Uncle Tom

THE era of the negro in motion pictures has been inaugurated by Carl Laemmle. He has signed Charles Gilpin to play Uncle Tom in the new version of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Gilpin is famous on the New York stage, especially as The Emperor Jones, and Universal has been angling for him for several months—ever since Harry Pollard started production on "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The picture has been greatly delayed by Pollard's illness, and in the meantime the effort to sign Gilpin has brought results, and he will leave for the Coast at once to begin work under Lois Weber. Miss Weber took time out from her work for a wedding and a brief honeymoon with Captain Harry Gantz, and is all ready now to complete "Uncle Tom's Cabin," as Harry Pollard's substitute.

To my knowledge, Charles Gilpin is the first of his race to be given an important rôle in pictures. But he will not be the last, for both Cecil De Mille and Monta Bell seem bent on making pictures of negro life, and Josef von Sternberg also yearns to direct a drama of the colored race.

Mrs. Cheyney in Celluloid

JESSE LASKY bought the screen rights to that clever comedy, "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney," and then couldn't make up his mind whether to use it as a starring vehicle for one of the gentlemen or one of the ladies of his company—as it was equally appropriate for either. So he solved the difficulty by doing both. Florence Vidor and Adolphe Menjou are happily cast in the leading rôles, but production will not start until the stage version has finished its runs in New York, Chicago, and points west.

Meanwhile, both these stars have plenty to occupy them. Florence Vidor is starting work on "Captain Sazarac," and Adolphe Menjou tells me "The Ace of Cads" is about ready to go into production. He recently spent ten days, with his director and scenario writer, at Hot Springs, whence he returned with the script and a very becoming tan. Unless Mr. Menjou's famous enthusiasm has utterly carried him away, this is going to be a very good picture, and the memory of the departed Michael Arlen will be revived more honorably than it recently was by "The Dancer of Paris."

Take That and That and That

WILLIAM BOYD has been slashed with a razor blade—not in an attempt to commit suicide for love of Clara Bow, or anything like that. covered that he had forged about five-hundred-and-seventy-five dollars' worth of checks.

Naturally, when the Boyds and a friend of theirs saw Joseph on Wilshire Boulevard one day, they stopped to inquire politely what he had done with the money. Joseph resented it. He whipped out a knife and a razor and attacked the two men, inflicting a few minor cuts. Of course, after all William's fighting experience in the movies, he got the better of him in the end, and Joseph is now awaiting trial for forgery.

Two Bright Scholars

Two of Metro-Goldwyn's recent releases have brought good fortune to their players. Francis X. Bushman, Jr., that fine upstanding whole-wheat boy who played William Haines' rival in "Brown of Harvard," has been given a five-year contract by Metro as a result of his work in that picture, which will make him a most excellent provider for his wife and child.

Then Bessie Love, who has wandered a little aimlessly among the studios in the past few years, has been recognized for her fine work in "Lovey Mary," in which she out-Pickforded America's Sweetheart. Bessie is now considering long-term contracts with both Cecil De Mille and First National, I hear.

Flaming Youth Conquers

ANOTHER bit of news is that Clara Bow is to be starred by Paramount. Ever since Clara bobbed impertinently out of the stowaway's barrel in "Down to the Sea in Ships," she has never ceased to make an impression on the industry and on the public—even tho sometimes it has been a most disagreeable one. She has probably suffered more than any other girl on the screen from bad taste in clothes and in make-up, bad rôles, and lack of restraint. Yet her flaming personality has triumphed over all these drawbacks, and she has emerged as a really fine actress. Clara has an earthy quality that is rare among our screen luminaries. She has what in a man would be termed virility—and lately she has displayed another talent—a great comedy sense—which, Paramount realizes, makes her star material. Her latest performance is in "Mantrap."

Marital Murmurings

HINTS drift in from the Coast that Bebe Daniels may succeed Marilyn Miller as Mrs. Jack Pickford. Everyone has known for a long time that Marilyn and Jack could hardly call their marriage one of those ideal ones that the film colony loves to boast of. And before Bebe went away to college to make "The Campus Flirt," she and Jack were together enough to cause comment. But that doesn't really prove a thing, for Bebe has been commented on so many times, and Jack is quite a beau in his way.

Other reports from the marriage marts this month reveal the approaching marriage of William De Mille to his scenarist, Clara Beranger. The wedding will be delayed for a time to allow both the bride and groom to take the necessary precaution of divorcing their current mates. They have been contemplating this move for some time, and I do hope they'll find it was worth all that trouble.

They're Calling It Barbara Worth

IMAGINE a piece of land about eighty miles long and twenty miles wide, almost as level as a billiard table, covered with light gray dirt with scarcely a blade of grass or other foliage except on the distant mountains that border this immense plain and you have the desert on which Samuel Goldwyn is filming "The Winning of Barbara Worth." There is not a drop of water anywhere

Jannings and FAUST

Goethe's immortal tragedy, "Faust," has finally been visualized on the screen and its American première, which takes place in October, will be anxiously awaited by picturegoers who worship art in the movies. The Germans have approached the work with deep reverence as well as with characteristic fidelity to detail. The film achieves another fine honor for Ufa in its determination to create something distinctive and noteworthy in celluloid

With such dramatic opportunities available in "Faust," it was necessary to secure the finest talent. Naturally, Emil Jannings was selected to play Mephisto, a rôle which should win him further laurels. The eminent actor appears in characteristic poses at the top and at the left, while at the upper right he enacts a scene with Yvette Guilbert, long recognized as one of the most talented actresses in the world. Mme. Guilbert appears as Martha. At the lower right are Gosta Ekman and Camilla Horn as Dieterle and Marguerite

FLIV' and Let FLIV'

There were no traffic regulations in the early days of the flivver and the bike. When the boys trotted out their horseless carriages or their wheels and gave the girls a spin up and down the road you could depend on the idlers stepping out of the pool parlor to give them the once over. Transportation has surely progressed in the last twenty years, but the comedy gagmen must rely upon these goofy autos and bikes to bring the laughs

There are no laughs in the modern snappy car, so you must hand it to the gagmen for lugging out these weird contraptions. PALMA B.—Just you wait until you see Rudolph Valentino in "The Firebrand," from the story of the life of Benvenuto Cellini. He was born in 1895. You want to know if Tom Mix and Ramon Novarro are Italian. I doubt it. I'll see what I can do about getting more on Ricardo Cortez in the CLASSIC for you.

VERNE H.—You refer to Clive Brook in "Three Faces East." Yes, Raquel Meller has been signed up by Chaplin to play the Empress Josephine to his Napoleon in a picture to be produced some time in 1927. And this is serious, too.

LILY N. P.—Well, I'm glad you did write to me. That's what I'm here for, and if you didn't write I wouldn't earn my $15.00 per. Yes, I still live in the little old hall-room. Norma Talmadge was born in Niagara Falls, New York, May 2, 1895. She is 5 feet 2, has dark hair and eyes. That was Jack Mulhall in "Within the Law."

MARY L.—You want to know who the banker's son was in "Headin' Home." Sorry, but I cannot help you this time.

ROYAL 17.—Well, it is easy to find fault if one is on the lookout; but some people would discover a far greater number if they were on the look-in. George Hackathorne was the son in "The Lady." Madge Bellamy and Edmund Lowe have the leads in "The Monkey Talks."

A. ELIZABETH S.—Well, I'm glad you like me. I like you, too. And now Cecil De Mille is trying to get Gloria Swanson to play the Magdalen in his film version of the story of the Christ.

MR. SHEAN'S PARTNER.—Absolutely, Mr. Gallagher. I'll have to go down to your house and rent that room, mine is pretty warm these days, even if I have so many fans. Well, to settle that argument, it was Constance Talmadge in "East Is West."

GLORIA, AUSTRALIA.—How are things down your way—pretty cold? No, Bebe Daniels is not married. Richard Dix in "The Quarterback."

JERRY A.—Various myself, I like all varieties, and therefore I like you. John Barrymore's first for United Artists will probably be "The Vagabond Lover," which is based on the life of Francois Villon, who is the subject of the play "If I Were King," from which the picture is derived. Write me again any time.

JUANA.—Well if you are 5 feet 8, and only 14, I wonder what you will be when you are 20. I'd give up the idea of pictures for some time yet. So you think William Boyd is adorable. He is 28 and married to Elinor Faire.

IMA FRADE.—So you have finally picked up courage to write me. You say your father is Heeza Frade, the big needle and thread man from so and so. And you dont care to ask about the number of teeth Lew Cody has filled, neither do you want to know whether Lloyd Hamilton wears double grip garters, but you do want to know if I am married. Well now, that's not such a very hard question to answer—I'm not. Milton Sills is playing in "The Legionnaire."

OLE.—It was Agnes Ayres who was once known as "The O. Henry Girl" because she played in 25 O. Henry stories for Vitagraph, and her first starring picture was "The Defeat of the City" in 1917. She is 5 feet 4½ inches, blonde hair and blue eyes.

THE ANSWER MAN is at your service. If you want an answer by mail, enclose a stamped addressed envelope. If you wish the answer to appear in THE CLASSIC, write at the top of your letter the name you want printed, and at the bottom your full name and address. Address: The Answer Man, Motion Picture Classic, 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOB CUSTER FAN.—Wallace Beery was born in Kansas City and stayed there eighteen years, so perhaps you used to play marbles with him. He first played for Essanay, next Universal and then Keystone. He is 72 inches high and weighs about a tenth of a ton. Bob Custer has brown hair and hazel eyes, he is 6 feet and weighs 170 pounds.

EVELINE.—Well the highest praise for a man is to give him responsibility. Norma Talmadge was born in America as I have said up above. Edmund Lowe is married to Lilyan Tashman. Yes, Esther Ralston is married to George Frey. That was Walter Pigeon in "Mannequin." Dolores Costello was born in 1906. No, Dolores is not married. Betty Bronson in "The Wearing of the Green." She's a little early, or should I say late.

BEBE.—Opinions are largely formed from observation, but all observers stand upon different peaks. Your peak may be higher than mine, but I may see down into the valleys which your eyes have never scanned. Neil Hamilton is with Famous Players, Dolores Costello with Warner, and John Barrymore with United Artists. So long, Bebe.

IMA FLIRT.—You better not be. Your flatterer may love you some, but he probably loves himself more. So you like William Boyd. Conway Tearle is playing with Irene Rich in "My Official Wife."

BABE.—Greta Nissen, besides playing on the stage in "The Palm Beach Girl" for Zeigfeld, is to make three pictures for First National next fall. Not so bad. So you like Constance Bennett. So do I.

PAT.—Sure enough, Buster Keaton never smiles. He told us all about it in the June, 1926, issue. Claire Windsor in "Tin Hats."

BOBBY B. COLUMBUS.—Famous Players purchased the former United Studios at 5341 Melrose Avenue, Hollywood, and are producing there. First National has moved out and have their studio at Burbank, California. You can reach William Boyd at the Cecil De Mille Studio, Culver City, California.

ENA A. BIRMINGHAM.—Yes, Ronald Colman is married and his wife is in England and John Gilbert was married to Leatrice Joy, but they aren't now. Norma Talmadge was married in 1917.

ELEANOR.—Could I make you become an actress? Certainly not, Eleanor. In other words, you want me to help you become an actress. Forget it, and stick to your studies this fall.

EDA R.—Ronald Colman and Vilma Banky have finally started work on "The Winning of Barbara Worth" to be released in the fall. Claire Windsor is 5 feet 6, and Dorothy Mackaill is 5 feet 4 and Mary Astor is 5 feet 5. Doris Kenyon's next will be "A Desperate Woman."

BEE FROM SCHURZ.—Ben Lyon was born February 6, 1900. He has dark brown hair and blue eyes. George Walsh's second picture for Excellent Pictures will be "His Rise to Fame."

MARIE M.—Twenty-eight years ago, on September 12, Alice Lake was born in this here little village of Brooklyn. Jane Novak is playing in "Lost at Sea" for Tiffany.

BOOTS.—So this is your first offense at writing to an Answer Man. Why Tim McCoy is a new Westerner who is playing for Metro-Goldwyn.

LUCRETIA.—You say you are not going to give up wanting Richard Dix. I dont blame you. Yes, I am sure he will write to you. His mother has been very ill in California. Theodore Von Eltz has been added to the cast of "The Temptress" in which Greta Garbo stars.

Despite the wonderful work of Belle Bennett and Ronald Colman in "Stella Dallas," seventeen-year-old Lois Moran, an utter newcomer to the American screen, very nearly stole the show. And Jean Hersholt took a very small part, that of Ed Munn, and made it something which will long be remembered.

Some Who Worry the Stars

IN "A Social Celebrity," a Mal St. Clair picture starring Adolphe Menjou, that famous old comedian, Chester Conklin, comes close to stealing the picture—in a part that is more pathetic than it is funny. And speaking of Menjou, who doesn't recall the manner in which he sprang from obscurity to stardom by stealing "A Woman of Paris," Charlie Chaplin's directorial masterpiece, right from under Edna Purviance's nose?

J. Warren Kerrigan and Lois Wilson were billed as the stellar lights of "The Covered Wagon," but an actor who was comparatively unknown at the time, simply "wrapped up the picture and walked away with it." He was Ernest Torrence, and the rôle was that of Bill Jackson, the trapper. It won Torrence fame and fortune. He is one of the most beloved actors on the screen today—and one of the best paid.

Another recent sensational case of picture-stealing was that of George Bancroft in "The Pony Express." Despite competition from such veterans as Wallace Beery, Betty Compson, Ernest Torrence, and Ricardo Cortez, Bancroft, playing the character rôle of Jack Slade, the bad man of Julesburg, made the outstanding impression in the picture. From obscurity it raised him to the rôle of a big featured player, and won him a contract with Paramount which means many thousands of dollars a year to him. And it might be remarked that there aren't two tougher hombres to buck up against in this picture-stealing business than Wallace Beery and Ernest Torrence!

Noah Beery is no slouch, either. He walked away with honors in Pola Negri's starring vehicle, "The Crown of Lies," which also included Robert Ames in its cast, and reports are that he has simply wrapped up "Beau Geste," Paramount's stupendous story of the Foreign Legion in Algeria, and taken it home with him. His competition included Ronald Colman, Neil Hamilton, Ralph Forbes, Norman Trevor, George Rigas, and others.

Determined to find out the exact manner in which pictures are stolen, I went to one of the veteranest of veterans, Wallace Beery.

How Wally Does It

"THE secret lies in making your performance outstanding," said Wally with a reminiscent chuckle. "You have to be a character, and you have to ring true. Your audience must feel that it knows you, intimately. You must produce a positive reaction. If you are a skunk, you must be a thoroughgoing one, with a stripe down your back—the kind of person one hates whole-heartedly. Yet they must understand why they hate you. Such a villain for example, was Roy D'Arcy in

Chester Conklin almost stole "A Social Celebrity," and did steal "A Woman of the World" away from Pola Negri

"The Merry Widow." If you are a bum, a happy-go-lucky character like Rhode Island Red in "The Pony Express," you must be a bum in every movement—not a gentleman masquerading in dilapidated clothes.

"As to the tricks of the trade, there are many of them. One couldn't begin to enumerate them. One of the easiest is the old-fashioned upstage trick. The natural impulse of the inexperienced actor, whether on the stage or screen, is to get as far forward toward the audience as possible. The veteran will simply 'upstage' such a person.

"That is, if the two are in conversation, the veteran will stop a couple of steps behind the eager newcomer. Then when the newcomer has to talk to the old-timer, he will have to turn around to do it—and his back will be to the audience or the camera. You can't do very much acting with your back.

"The way to take a scene is to do something that will attract the eye. Motion of any sort is the thing that attracts the eye the quickest. If six people are standing up in a room and one person is moving about, or even fidgeting, you naturally watch him. If an emotional scene is going on in the foreground and an actor in the background waves his hand up and down, your eye will naturally be attracted to the motion. In this manner—when he is allowed to get away with it—an obscure actor often obtains attention for himself when otherwise he wouldn't be noticed any more than the paper on the wall.

"The principal thing is a bit of business. In other words, motion combined with humanness. If you can be human, if you can do some characteristic bit of acting which your audience instantly recognizes as something he has seen at home, at the club or at the sewing circle, he will be attracted to it and remember it, no matter what else is going on in the scene.

The Champion Picture Thieves

"OH, there are a thousand tricks of the trade. My buddy, Raymond Hatton, who, I might say, is one of the smartest picture-stealers in the business, has a bright trick of his own in all still photographs. He always places himself at the extreme right of the group that is about to be photographed. When the picture is taken, the position is reversed, that is, in the printed photograph he is at the extreme left.

"The names in the caption under a printed photograph always read 'from left to right,' and hence the first name is always 'RAYMOND HATTON.' That's not very dumb, of the little shrimp—not much!" And Wally gave a great chuckle.

Beery and Hatton are known as the greatest catch-as-catch-can picture-stealing team in the business. They are perfectly willing to take their chance with all comers—or with each other.

In "Behind the Front," the rivalry, if genial, was very keen, and these two veterans employed every gag in the business to take the various scenes away from each other. They even tried upstaging each other. For instance, just as the cameras would start grinding, Hatton would step back a step, to try to force Beery to turn around. Not to be outdone, Beery would link his arm thru Hatton's, and pull him forward. To put a stop to these antics, Charles Boyle, first cameraman on the picture, resorted to the practice of having a T-square nailed to the floor—where it didn't show—for the closeups. Then he made both Beery and Hatton toe the mark, one on each side of the T-square.

Razzing Ricardo

ONE of their stunts, which they laugh hardest about, occurred when they were playing in "In the Name of Love." Ricardo Cortez was the hero of the story, and naturally was the one most featured in the foreground. Beery and Hatton determined to get his goat. During a number of scenes they were supposed to be talking in the background. Hence as soon as the cameras started grinding, Beery would lean over to Hatton and say in a loud whisper:

"Now this guy Cortez, buzz . . . buzz . . . buzz—" and his voice would trail his character must be responsible. For here you have a mere boy—thirty, or thereabouts—who has done picture after picture on a staggering scale and with superb mastery that has made motion picture history. Such contributions to the screen as "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," "Turn to the Right," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Scaramouche," "The Arab," "Mare Nostrum"!

Such achievements have brought fame and wealth at an early age. Let me add that he is something of an Adonis. Now a fellow like that should be spoiled by this time. But he isn't—and that is another big thing about him.

Ingram's Paradise

FROM my point of view, there are several more paradisiacal points about the Riviera than there are about Southern California, and that is saying a great deal. The Riviera has the climate, the flowers, the sea, the hills. The people there live a natural artificial life instead of the artificially natural life that one is compelled to live in California. By that, I mean that one has neither to break a law nor a pocket-book if one thinks one would like to serve one or more bottles of genuine spirit. If one wants to gamble—go to it, the Casino is just across the Promenade or in the Place Massena. The hotels are filled with real countesses, Russian princes, terrible Turks, British lords with a strong representation from Ioway and Walla Walla always on hand. There's the boardwalk just like Santa Monica, Venice and Long Beach, only on the Promenade des Anglais in Nice you will find the whole world that the motion picture world attempts to represent on the screen come to life! But in Nice it is all the real thing! You might think you could walk up to that gink with the Lawrence Dorsay mustache and yank it off, but you cant. Both he and the mustache are real. He's an actual Earl of Pawtucket, or something. That fellow with the long black whiskers who is a dead ringer for Charlie Chaplin's foil on the screen, is really some famous French savant and is dead in earnest about it too.

An Arcadia for Artists

NICE, the Capital of the Riviera, is the Los Angeles of St. Augustin, the French Hollywood. The Riviera is the Mecca of the European world. Nice is like a miniature Paris with its multitude of brilliant shops, boulevards with the cafés spread all over the broad sidewalks with monocled men and chic foreign-looking women seated before the painted tables all day long sipping—do I disappoint you when I say, café au lait, mainly. And if one is really too bored, one may motor or bus, tram or train it over to Monte Carlo, only about fifteen miles away along one of the most glorious stretches of coast in the world! At Monte Carlo, as you know from the films, all sorts of things are done—including yourself. That is why people go there.

Finally, all that has been mentioned is either free or shockingly cheap. It costs five francs to enter the fashionable Casino. Five francs are about sixteen cents. This includes a free seat to a stunning musical show, or when the show entr'actes, to dancing. If you choose to drink—which one cant very well avoid, since the only seats you can find are before little round tables—you can get away with coffee, or

This is not a set, but the kitchen of Rex Ingram's studios over on the Riviera. The director has a chef who knows how to appeal to the inner man. He doesn't take orders from the cameraman but from the steward tea, and a brioche and a liberal French tip and get back the change from a quarter. If you are going in for anything spirituous under champagne, by the glass, you can still use your quarter. If you want to visit the Gambling Hell on the right, as they always do in the stories sent in to picturize, it will cost you an additional seven cents to get in, but considerably more to get out, however.

I have mentioned these few facts in case you wondered why Rex Ingram and his faithful band seemed to be staying in such a God-forsaken place as Nice!

They Shall Not Pass

THERE is a great deal of ceremony attendant on a visit to the Rex Ingram Studios. This is due to two causes: first, nearly every American and a large per cent. of foreign visitors in Nice consider Rex Ingram and his studios a legitimate Baedeker attraction. Something had to be done about it. And second, Harry Lachmann, Rex Ingram's dynamic personal and Production Manager, who is perhaps one of the greatest red-tape artists in the world. It is easier for John D. Rockefeller to pass thru the eye of a needle than it is for anyone to enter the Rex Ingram domain.

The first time I went to the studios a limousine and chauffeur were sent to my hotel to take me. St. Augustin lies three miles north of Nice. Half the distance is along the Promenade des Anglais, the fashionable shore front where are all the big hotels and the villas of foreign nobility. The chauffeur they sent for me must have been a taxi driver in Paris at some time during his career, for he proceeded to drive madly and homicidally along the Promenade and head on at the traffic. His chief delight seemed to be in trying to maim pedestrians. Finally, when we did get out of town, he contented himself with trying to force the speedometer to exceed its limit. I sat watching it, fatally fascinated, as it mounted from 40 to 50, 50 to 60, 60 to 70, 70 to—I laid my hand on the maniac's arm and pleaded,

"Qu'est-ce que vous désirez, monsieur?"

He laughed with childish delight and told me that it only registered kilometers, not miles. I had forgotten that. Still, we were doing nearly 60 miles an hour at the moment, and I was in no hurry.

Fortunately, we left the main road and were going round sharp curves up into the hills. We passed the Gaumont Studio, crossed over the railroad tracks and the fast Paris-Rome Express going by at the time, and made a turn on two wheels and were brought before the gates of the studio. Instantly the French guards—three of them—sprang out of the little guard-house and stood stolidly at the ends of the enormous chain that barred the way. A long and unduly excited conversation followed wherein I was being explained, almost unsuccessfully. It seemed I had no pass! However, I was admitted grudgingly. We drove up to the Administration Building.

In Splendid Isolation

THERE were swarms of people all rushing about on obviously important missions. Those who took notice of me glowered at me. I felt de trop. Finally, I asked someone where I could find Mr. Ingram.

"Ingram? You mean Lachmann!"

Still protesting that I did not want to see Lachmann, but Ingram, I was shown toward Lachmann's office. I was bent to it by this time and I said I would like to see Mr. Lachmann.

FACING DEATH For a LAUGH

Harold had the narrowest escape from almost certain death of any time in his career.

At the completion of his climb up the side of a building, Lloyd was to crawl along a narrow ledge at the edge of the roof, where his feet were to become entangled in the rope of a flag-pole. Tripped by the rope, he was to fall over the edge and swing feet down. Needless to say, there was a small protecting net under him. Even as fearless a stunt comedian as Lloyd has no passion for deliberate suicide. The rope about his feet not only looked loosely knotted, but really was.

Lloyd miscalculated the strength of his swing, and was swept into space a full five feet beyond his protecting net. He felt the rope about his ankles begin to slip, and for one frightful moment he dangled there head downward, helpless to avert the disaster. Then, pendulum like, his body swung back over the net just as the ropes finally worked loose—and he dropped to safety, with less than a yard to spare.

The Sky Is His Limit

DOUGLAS MACLEAN has gone even skyscrapers one better in two of his pictures—"Going Up" and "That's My Baby"—and has literally made the sky the limit in his laugh-making efforts by using air-planes for the thrill sequences.

A carefully staged crash furnished one of the best "gags" for "Going Up," a crash that was supposed to occur just as the plane was taking off. A large hole was dug across the runway and filled with soft mud. With MacLean in the back seat and a pilot in the front seat, both firmly strapped in, the plane taxied at full speed down the runway, struck the mud-filled hole, careened crazily for a moment like a rampant cyclone, then crashed with a thoroughness even greater than had been anticipated. Thanks largely to Lady Luck's good offices, neither MacLean nor the pilot was seriously injured, but the way the camera caught them ruefully rubbing bruises as they crawled from the wreckage was not acting—it was the real thing.

In "That's My Baby," MacLean spent an entire afternoon crawling precariously around on the wing surfaces of a plane,

Harold Lloyd, at the top, supplied a typical thrill in "Girl Shy." He grasped the tip of a trolley pole and was carried down hill at thirty miles an hour. The stunt was successful with luck and perfect timing. Below is Douglas MacLean who spent an entire afternoon crawling perilously around the wing surfaces of a plane—while he prevented Harry Earles, the midget who played the baby, from jumping overboard supposedly in an effort to retrieve an over-venturesome baby whose wandering complex had caused it to crawl from the cockpit. The fact that Harry Earles—the midget in "The Unholy Three"—played the rôle of the baby made it possible to have most of the scenes photographed in the air, some being made by a motor-driven camera attached to the wing, and others by a cameraman in the plane itself.

Denny's Risks

A BROKEN wire nearly caused Reginald Denny a broken neck in making "California Straight Ahead." One episode in this picture called for a big, unwieldy, Pullman-like auto trailer to break away from its convoy and rush at breakneck speed down a steep hill. At the time of its flight, the trailer contained Denny and half a dozen other masculine players.

Not caring to take any unnecessary risks, the director had a heavy wire, invisible in the picture, attached between the trailer and a windlass out of camera range. The arrangement worked beautifully until the windlass, with the usual ill-timed perversity of inanimate things, jammed just as the trailer was at the apex of its flight. Unequal to the sudden strain, the wire snapped like thread, and the runaway became the real thing.

Denny and the players with him hurriedly decided that, rather than court certain injury by jumping, they might as well stick with the plunging trailer and trust to a near-miracle to come out of the affair alive. The near-miracle happened and, tho the trailer was smashed into junk on a big boulder near the bottom of the hill, there was not a single serious casualty among its passengers.

Foxe Tells One

A WRECKED speed-boat gave Earle Foxe plenty of excitement and a fair amount of physical damage during the filming of one of the Van Bibber stories.

"We were rounding a buoy just off San Pedro," Foxe told me later, "and I was supposed to gain several yards on my pursuers in another speed-boat as we swung around the buoy. Any motor-boat racing enthusiast will tell you what a thrill it is to whirl past these markers, with one engine pounding straight ahead, and the other in reverse, and the craft making anywhere from twenty to thirty-five miles an hour. The water whizzes past, the spray burns your face, and the little boat trembles in every timber!

"We were making a number of shots and had no trouble until we made the third dash past the buoy. Then I thought I felt a sinister twist in the bottom of the boat. It was a faint grinding, as if something had crunched loose. Right then was when I should have told the pilot to stop,

PAINTED PEOPLE

that mama as Camille was all she could endure by way of memory.

In a sense, too, she was somewhat relieved about mama. She had looked so peaceful after she had stopped breathing. Yes, she was a little bit glad about it. Now she wouldn't ever have to feel that funny clutch at her throat when she woke in the mornings to see her mother standing before the mirror rubbing ice over her thin cheeks and muttering, "I've got to look better than this . . . I've got to . . ."

Or that same cold clutch when her mother and father would interview some new ingénue and her father would pinch the girl's arm, turn her and twist her around with hands that seemed to loiter stickily over the job . . . she hadn't been able to endure the sight of her mother's face at times like that.

Of course, she would miss her. She would miss her frightfully. Her mother had been sweet at times. Times when papa had been in the room every night and when no new ingénues had been forthcoming. At times like these she had really seemed to understand the afraid, hurt little heart that was Jonquil's . . . she would grab hold of her and kiss her all over her little heart-shaped face and say, "You poor little kid, you . . . you poor little kid . . ."

Or she would gather her up in her lap and rock her and tell her stories about when she was a little girl at home with Grandmother Rogers in a white house that smelt of lilacs outside and lavender inside . . . heaven-stories, Jonquil thought.

But, for the most part, Jonquil was glad that mama had gone, gone out of the sight of papa and the other things that hurt her. Jonquil guessed that there had been a lot of things . . .

As for papa, she hated him with a sort of concentrated fury. She mixed him up with her hatred of grease-paint. She couldn't figure out whether papa was to blame for grease-paint or grease-paint was to blame for papa. She knew that she had always hated him.

Papa was known as a hail-fellow-well-met, whatever that might mean. He had a venous, red face and curly, reddish hair and very white teeth, one of which was gold, and big paddy-shoulders, and he wore very splendid clothes of plaids and checks. He usually was to be seen biting on a very thick, black, moist cigar.

He had a loud voice, too, and louder laughter. He was always telling "funny stories," judging from the shouts of laughter that surrounded him when he was among men and the thin, knifey shrieks that surrounded him when he was among women, as he usually was. He always called women "little gull" or "darling" or "sweetheart," no matter how slightly he knew them and providing they wore sheer blouses and make-up.

In some way Jonquil connected her mother's deathly pallor with her father's venous floridity. If papa hadn't been so red, mama wouldn't have been so pale.

She remembered her father as Romeo.

And she often thought that if she had loved papa she would have felt sorrier for him as Romeo than she did for mama as Camille.

There were lots of things she knew and didn't know how she knew them.

Jonquil lived in a day-dream world—a world of whims and fancies. She longed to be understood

Papa as Romeo was still florid and loud and venous. He would bellow forth in mighty tones, "Oh, wer-ould I were the ger-love upon that hand that I might ker-iss that fer-ace!"

She had always wanted to laugh and cry at the same moment. Papa going on like that, with such bulbous eyes and on his knees and everything, and mama standing over him on the balcony, looking so pale and loving. She knew that papa would tell mama to "Shut up, cant you?" in about ten minutes, and that mama would cry herself to sleep because of something connected with papa.

No wonder she hated it!

It always seemed too terrible to Jonquil that mama and papa should be Romeo and Juliet. So singularly terrible.

It didn't seem so bad when mama was Camille and papa was her lover. After all, when mama was dying as Camille, it was in some way connected with papa. That was as it should be. It was his fault. It wasn't quite so silly, even tho papa did put his head down on the yellow lace covering and pretend to cry by shaking the pads in his shoulders and sniffing thru his nose the same as he did when he was shaving.

Oh, well, papa . . .

There were lots of memories connected with papa . . . there was that character woman who had been with the company for five years. Just at first mama had hated the woman. She had called her "that Thing" and had cried whenever she saw papa with her. Then, toward the end, mama had become sort of friendly with her, and Jonquil had come on them once with their heads together, crying . . . sharing . . . something . . .

One dreadful night after the evening performance the character woman had come into their room and had shrieked dreadful things at papa. She had seemed to put herself in the same place with mama and had said something about both of them being "poor dupes" and "discards" and other strange, hideous names.

Miss del Riaz had been the woman's name. Jonquil had never liked her very much. She had always grabbed hold of her and kissed her, and her arms had been convulsive and her kisses sticky and thick. After that scene, Miss del Riaz had been seen no more, and mama had warned Jonquil not to mention her "in front of papa."

Jonquil knew that mama and papa hated one another and she often thought that mama was a very good actress indeed not to hit him across the face when he was trying to be Romeo and smirking at her so that his gold tooth glinted quite beautifully.

Jonquil had had little parts to do, now and then. A child in "East Lynne" . . . Little Eva . . . pale, precocious little creatures. Mama had told her that she must always "enter into her characters," and she had tried hard. When she was Little Eva, she could never manage to die very sadly, because she couldn't seem to feel that there was anything so very sad about dying.

One died and went away amidst a throng of fresh flowers and people dressed up in their Sunday best and was laid away in a field all neat and clean.

Papa always said, after a performance, "The kid's got no temperament . . . she takes after the Rogers, I guess."

Papa didn't know it, but when he said that, Jonquil came as near as she ever came to liking him. "Takes after the Rogers . . ." Oh, if she only did! If only . . . the smell of lilacs outside and lavender inside . . . heaven . . .

She usually had to cry on the stage and she felt that she did that very well. She was so frizzed and fussed and nagged before she went on that she felt like crying, anyway, and it was a real relief to be able to do so without having her ears boxed. Of course, the audiences usually laughed at her just in the wrong places, and that meant that papa would slap her when she came off, but she was so glad to get off that she didn't mind the slap. Mama usually said that she had "done fine." And mama was the best judge . . . having been a Rogers.

Mama often told her that she was getting "good training" and that some of these fine days she would play on Broadway and have her name up in electric. Broadway, it would appear, was mama's idea of an earthly Paradise . . . well, she would like to see Broadway one of these days, but it wasn't Paradise . . . Paradise was where Grandmother Rogers was . . .

The RISE of the LITTLE CINEMA

much to make that they have to be seen by a lot of people somehow.

Like the Little Theater Movement

"We are going to build up on the framework of the Little Theaters thruout the country. In scores of cities there are small groups which are seriously devoted to the stage and good drama. They have theaters and followings. We are interesting them in the better films with the plan of building them up into a distributing system on a small scale. Programs shown in our New York Theater will be shipped around this circuit. To pay the expenses there will be subscription showings. In this way, instead of being seen by a few hundreds, our programs will be seen by thousands."

Symon Gould believes that the work of the Film Guild will eventually be of great value to motion pictures as a whole. Revivals interfere in no way with the work of the big producers and exhibitors. In fact, a new market is created for films which have been rolled up and forgotten. In a way he is simply taking advantage of an awakening interest in movies on the part of another section of the public. Small exhibitors with their tiny financial risks can try new ideas and experiments that big organizations dare not attempt. The very bigness of the film companies has been against their making rapid progress with new ideas. Once there is a small public of say ten thousand with a developed appetite for new ideas in pictures, or for tragic or "serious" film works, it is possible that new talent may be encouraged along more adventurous lines. Men like young von Sternberg, who turned out the "Salvation Hunters" for a few thousand dollars, might get their chance for a public showing much more readily.

Would the "little films" and the "little cinemas" compete in any way with the field of the big companies?

New Ideas for the Big Producers

No, it was pointed out. No more than the Neighborhood Playhouse in New York competes with the Shubert Theaters.

The one is interested in the art of the drama; the others in entertaining the public. The latter have a public ten-thousand times greater. But when the little theater has an actor or an idea that the public take up, the Shuberts will buy them.

So with the Little Cinemas. Their risks will cost little, and their discoveries of new ideas (which anyone who has the interest of the films at heart prays fervently for) will be common property for the motion picture industry and serve to liven up things.

In the meantime the taste of their high-brow public, if it may be called such, is very curious. Chaplin and Harold Lloyd slapsticks are mingled with German expressionist films, and are equally liked.

One of the most enjoyable programs was a showing of old pictures of a dozen or fifteen years back—"antiques" they had become by now. Nothing could have better illuminated the big strides which movies have taken since these old thrillers, nor the improvement in the taste of the general public itself. The directors were bright young men then, but their little tricks were so elementary! There were no "fadeouts." There were all sorts of funny skips and jumps. Titles took the place of action or scenery; everything was done in haste. A dummy instead of a man, is thrown from the train in "The Great Train Robbery" of fifteen years ago, and he is very much a dummy, altho the train is going at five miles an hour.

It was delicious to see Mary Pickford and King Baggot, for instance, in "Going Straight" (1913). The pantomime was primitive. Mary Pickford very pretty, in one of those wide-sweeping skirts, or whenever you could see her face under a huge bonnet. King Baggot most touching as he claps his hand to his head or waves temptation away with his other hand in brisk gestures. That which was sad and tragic is all fun now!

If only some of these old thrillers could be revived with their titles touched up. They would be the most side-splitting farces.

It is only thru looking at these old pictures and comparing them with what we have done since that we will know the true nature of the moving picture. When we know this, there will be films that will never grow old.

Rhythmic Motion Essential

DUDLEY MURPHY thinks that the chief character of the film is motion, or the rhythm of things in motion. I must stop and tell something about Dudley Murphy. He is one of the figures in the art-film movement. His revolutionary "Ballet of the Machine" was booed and hissed and laughed at. A lanky young man, soft spoken and visionary. He is home talent which has absorbed the ideas about modern art that are current in Europe. But some day he may come back from his wild exploits and experiments to give a vision of the great American scene.

"New York, in fact, the whole sweep of the American scene, fascinates me," he said. "Nobody realizes how strange the life that is going on right under our noses is. I am trying to get the fantastic speed and rhythm of this jazz age into a film."

He is working now on a feature film of New York life. It has never been done yet, as Flaherty has done the Eskimos or the South Sea Islanders. Dudley Murphy, if he can work out his ideas, may be heard from in a big way.

His opinions are worth noting: "One of the greatest films made here was James Cruze's 'Hollywood,' Cruze came closer to the very feeling of American life today than anybody I know. King Vidor is probably our greatest director right now. The first half of 'The Big Parade' had some of the finest motion picture technique ever done. The 'business' between Gilbert and Renée Adorée was marvelously carried out and conceived. Vidor has a miraculous sense of timing."

Worthy Revivals and New Ideas

THE other "Little Cinema group," the Film Associates, is headed by a Mr. Montgomery Evans, 2nd. Also an outsider.

A young man who likes to dabble with the arts, and finds more art in the films now than in anything else. The Film Associates do more in the way of introducing new pictures than revivals. On their programs have been some very curious French films, in fact, more French than German. The French have lots of ideas, and some great painters. Among the pictures shown here, "The New Enchantment," directed by l'Herbier, was a fake on a detective thriller and built along the crazy lines of "Dr. Caligari." It had the aid of one of France's greatest modern painters, Fernand Léger, in the making of the sets, which were often very jolly. It was received, however, with mixed feelings and its authors showed on the whole less natural genius for the film than the Ger-world can not make a plausible Sandow of a flabby-muscled parlor lizard. Rippling biceps and flashing athletic skill are things to be bought only by honest sweat, and plenty of it.

GREAT ATHLETES of the SCREEN

The leading athletic stars of the American screen include some of the greatest all-round athletes the world of sport has known in recent years.

An All-round Champ

TAKE the case of Fred Thomson, for example. Thomson is one of those rare athletic marvels that appear only once in a generation, a natural athlete who excels in literally everything. Overflowing with vitality, and blessed with a perfect physique and almost uncanny powers of muscular co-ordination, Thomson first attracted notice in the athletic world while he was a student at Princeton University.

The next ten years brought him the highest honors that any amateur athlete can attain. He won the national ten events championship of the United States in 1910, and came back to win it again in 1911 and in 1913. Later, at the Inter-Allied Games in Paris, he attained the very peak when he again won the decathlon in competition with most of the world's best.

It is to this amazing all-round athletic ability that Thomson to a great extent owes the startling film success that, in a few short years, has advanced him from a comparative unknown to an action star rated in the five-thousand-dollars-a-week class, and well worth it. Only an expert with years of track and field work and gymnasium training could possibly attempt some of Thomson's film exploits, and live to tell about it. Feats that to the average athlete would be little short of impossible are mere routine incidents in the day's work to Fred Thomson.

"Lefty" from Yale

ANOTHER action star who won national fame before he ever thought of entering pictures is Maurice "Lefty" Flynn, once All-American fullback with Yale. Tall, rangy, hard, and fast, Flynn was one of the best Yale backs that ever flipped a forward pass or crashed off tackle thru a stubbornly fighting Harvard line when precious yards were needed.

Today Flynn still keeps in the pink of physical condition, not from a sense of duty, but for the sheer love of it. Slamming a medicine-ball around on the beach and swimming in the surf are daily features of his routine. He is also rated as one of the best hand-ball players in Southern California.

"Lefty" stands six feet two in his silk hosiery and weighs one hundred and ninety-five pounds, nearly every ounce of which is solid bone and muscle. Not content with merely doing the physical feats called for by the scenario, one of "Lefty's" favorite recreations on location is to cause incipient heart failure to bystanders by adding little extemporaneous stunts of his own.

thousand dollars' worth of high-priced picture star sailing thru space to imminent and permanent ruin, Flynn took his own sweet time on the journey and seemed almost sorry it was over when his dangling feet finally touched the platform and safety.

George Wins His Medals

GEORGE O'BRIEN is another prominent screen player who is a super-athlete in his own right. George has the physical build of a Greek Hercules, the lithe grace of a dancing master, and the hitting powers of a Missouri mule.

O'Brien is believed to be the only motion picture actor in this country now holding a membership card in the American Athletic Union. George's record, both before he came on the screen and after, is a genuinely impressive one. He starred as a halfback at Santa Clara University. He holds enough medals won in amateur basketball, track, field, and swimming contests to fill a sizable cabinet.

While in the Navy during the war, he won the middle-weight boxing championship of the Pacific Fleet. Today, swimming and other aquatic sports are his favorites. He is rated as one of the best natators on the Pacific Coast, having beaten many of the fastest amateur swimmers in local meets, and having finished a close second to the celebrated Duke Kohanmoku on two occasions.

O'Brien trains as rigorously as any professional athlete. He is awake virtually every morning at five, and is on the road at six. He does three miles of roadwork with his trainer, and then boxes from four to six rounds. Other items in his training include rope-jumping, short-distance running, shadow boxing, wrestling, and hand-ball.

For his weight, George has as magnificent a physique as any man in pictures. His muscles are flexible and

George Walsh has long been recognized as one of the screen's best athletes. While at Fordham College he indulged in all kinds of sport activities, shining particularly well at baseball and football

A typical incident of this kind occurred recently while scenes were being filmed on a cable carrier suspended at a dizzy height over the rocky gorges of a mining camp in the high Sierras. "Lefty" and the villain engaged in a wrestling match in the frail little carriage a hundred and eighty feet above terra firma with a realism that would have raised gooseflesh on a cigar-store Indian. The director heaved a sigh of relief when the shot was over and the signal given for the carriage to be drawn in.

But the worst was yet to come. The wires jammed and the carriage stuck. Impelled with a sudden daredevil urge, "Lefty" decided not to wait till the tangle was cleared. Leaving the carriage, he calmly started hand-over-hand along the steel cable toward the platform fifty feet away. It was a feat more suited to a Japanese gymnast than to a two-hundred-pound American, but "Lefty" made it.

Grinning at the anguished warnings of the director, who saw visions of several

Hollywood's Pet Extravagances

have overlooked one or two lesser cars parked somewhere in odd corners of the Mix establishment.

Milady's Hats and Shoes

Norma and Constance Talmadge have pet foibles that are about as widely separated as the human anatomy will permit. Norma's pet weakness is hats, and that of Constance is shoes.

Norma can no more resist the lure of a lovely hat than a kitten can a sprig of catnip. She may start out on a shopping trip with the avowed intention of buying anything from a spool of thread to a town car, but it is a moral certainty that somewhere along the line she will acquire at least one new hat before the afternoon is over.

Constance has a weakness fully as fatal for shoes. She has footwear for every conceivable occasion, and some for which she has never been able to find an occasion. Like Norma and her hats, Constance has yet to make a shopping tour without returning with at least one new pair of shoes. Her trips to Europe usually end in a veritable orgy of shoe buying

John Ellis

Willard Louis, at the top, owns up to a weakness for plants and flowers. He buys rare bulbs and shrubs from all over the world—and frequently wins prizes at the floral shows. John Bowers' extravagance is an ambitious one. In the center he is building a $300,000 home on a Hollywood hill, which will be occupied by him and his bride, Marguerite de la Motte, when it is completed. At the left is Seena Owen who goes in for pajamas. Her many acquisitions are extremely exotic—and represent handwork from all parts of the world—including the Scandinavian from the bootmakers of England and the Continent.

Shoes constitute a pet extravagance rather often found among theatrical and screen players. Two other passionate devotees of footwear in Hollywood are Olive Borden and Laura La Plante. In Olive's case, practically every shoe must be made to order, which adds appreciably to the expense involved.

It is inevitable that the various items of milady's wardrobe and jewel-box should rank as pet extravagances with many feminine players in filmdom.

The Fan and Fur Complex

Norma Shearer's pet foible is fans, and she has literally dozens of them. Shawls of elaborate hand-worked designs are things that Gertrude Olmstead can never pass by without making a purchase. Her favorites are two beautifully brocaded silk pieces which she had made in China to her special order. Kathleen Key became an addict to ear-rings while in Italy with the "Ben Hur" company, and is still adding to her extensive collection.

Helene Chadwick and Vera Reynolds have really expensive weaknesses along the wardrobe line, both being addicted to furs. Helene goes in rather heavily for fur coats, her present list including a beautiful Russian sable, an exquisite ermine, and a number of less expensive wraps. Vera finds fur pieces of every kind irresistible—neck pieces, jacquettes, coats—and plays no favorites in variety. Pearls, necklaces and rings made of them, are Aileen Pringle's big weakness. Perfumes are the pet extravagance of Jetta Goudal, Alma Rubens, and Lillian Tashman, while Esther Ralston is an insatiable flower lover.

Faithful to their Foibles

It is claimed that Lew Cody never wears the same neck-tie twice, and this pet foible contributes largely to the support of a certain worthy little tie shop in Los Angeles. Rod La Rocque is a "nut" on amateur photography, and spends prodigious sums on cameras, lenses, and high-priced printing paper.

Pajamas are the rather unique pet extravagance of Seena Owen. Many of Seena's acquisitions along this line are extremely exotic, and represent handwork from nearly all parts of the world. There is a practical side to this foible, as well. Miss Owen has several pajama outfits which are particularly adaptable to studio use, and it is not unusual to see her wearing one of them on the set or round her dressing-room while waiting for the director's call.

Dolls are Ruth Clifford's pet extravagance. I made a little census of the Clifford home not long ago, and counted exactly forty-seven dolls. Ruth has bought many times that number, but whenever they become too numerous she pays a visit to an orphans' home and makes several children happier. Other Hollywood doll devotees are Priscilla Dean and Claire Windsor. Miss Windsor has a really exquisite collection from all nations.

John Bowers has just one extravagance, but it is an ambitious one—a $300,000 home now being built on one of the hills overlooking Hollywood. Marguerite De La Motte is the prospective Mrs. Bowers who will share the home when it is completed.

Rudolph Valentino specializes in dogs and horses. He has five riding mounts, and eleven dogs, the latest addition to his kennels being an Irish wolfhound pup

Painted People

She loathed it for all these reasons and she loathed it because of other little girls and front porches.

This may seem incongruous and irrelevant, but it was definite to Jonquil.

When the company hit town in the morning and she did not have to be on in the evening, she spent the day wandering around the town. She strolled up and down shady residential streets where there were orderly houses with green lawns and flower beds and garden swings and front porches. Where were little girls of her own age playing dolls or games or something. Little girls dressed in clean gingham dresses and nice square-toed shoes.

Jonquil would walk along the sidewalks in her dark silk dress, a little spotted, and trimmed with lace ruffles, and envy the other little girls ferociously.

Their homes. Their front porches. Their mothers, in clean print dresses and shiny, neat hair and pleasant, cool-sounding voices. The smell of baking from an open kitchen window, the tinkle of a piano from an opened parlor window.

Jonquil connected elegance with a front porch. She took an infinite amount of pleasure imagining herself seated on one afternoons, dressed in crisp white, looking up from her book now and again to nod pleasantly at passers-by.

Sometimes the little girls would see her and stare at her, and once or twice they called to her, but before she could open their gates or set foot on their neat gravelly walks between the petunia borders, their mothers or elder sisters would call to them and they would turn away.

Once the company had stayed a week in one town, and she had actually managed to join two little girls at their play. They had called to her and she had gone in. Her heart and her hope had beat high. She felt quite sure that they would like her if they could get to know her. They would find out how nice she was, really. They would be amazed and delighted at all the make-believe things she knew how to do. They wouldn't need to know that her mother was an actress. She would tell them about her Grandmother Rogers and the house with the lilacs and the lavender. She had thought about it so much that she felt quite familiar with it.

They would surely like her when they came to know her. It was merely a matter of taking the first step. They would probably invite her for supper and she would see the inside of the pleasant house, the rooms where the crisp white curtains fluttered and the homey, happy sounds came from. Their mother might pat her head and call her a very nice child, indeed, and ask her to come again. Once she had made such a beginning, there was no knowing where it would end. It might lead to almost anything . . . being adopted, perhaps. . . .

She had gone up the path as swiftly as she could, walking against time. If she could get to them before their mother did. . . . She wished that she had on a gingham frock and clean white socks . . . at that moment she discovered the undesirability of silk . . . later on, much later on, the newspapers carried stories about her "fad" for wearing ginghams and linens and voiles even in winter . . . but once she began to talk to them everything would be all right. . . .

"Hulloa!"

"Hulloa!"

"What's your name?"

"Jonquil."

"Jonquil what?"

"I cant tell the rest. It's a secret." (They might know if she told them . . . they might know.)

"That's silly. It cant be a secret, a name cant. Anyway, it's your daddy's name first, not yours, so it cant be a secret."

"It is, tho. Mine is." (All little girls had secrets . . . she had seen them, in little groups, whispering, bright eyes glancing.)

"Is your daddy dead, then?"

"Yes." (What a lie! But to be dead would be to dispose of him, to put him out of the way, to throw them off the track.)

"Ohhh . . . is your mother dead, too?"

"Yes." (Another lie, but she had to stop them asking her questions. A few more questions and they would find out . . . Lillian de Vere . . . stock company . . . juvenile lead. . . .)

"Oh, that's awful . . . that's too bad . . . well, my name is Meg Travis, and this is my best friend, Harriet Barnes. Harriet's mother nearly died last year when the new baby came, but they saved her with instruments. That's a secret, so dont tell. Is that why you're dressed like you are, because your mother is dead?"

"Dressed like what?"

"In that silk dress. It's not refined to wear silk dresses in the morning. Your mother wouldn't have allowed you to."

(Impossible to say that mama had made the dress to wear mornings.)

"I guess so."

"Only Italian girls and colored girls wear silk dresses in the morning."

This was difficult going. Jonquil was dismayed to feel her eyes fill with tears.

Meg noticed, thought the mention of Jonquil's mother had been too much for her, and changed the subject.

"Where do you live?"

"I dont live any place. I stay places."

This ought to score! She felt, pleasantly, that that was rather neat. "Staying places" had a real air to it. . . .

"I dont know what you mean. Haven't you moved here? Dont you live in a house? Dont you go to school?"

"Oh, no, I never go to school. I have—I have teachers."

"Oh—"

The little girls looked at one another, considered, then they said, with notable respect, "Are you very rich?"

"Oh, not so very. We had quite a good season last year, but this year hasn't been so good. The movies are beginning to cut in on us very badly. Some say that the movies will be the ruination of stock, and the character women are asking for much more than they are worth."

Jonquil stopped short, bit her tongue until the smarting tears actually rolled down her cheeks. She had gone and done it! The patter of the theater, of her life, had overcome her again . . . the smell of grease-paint seemed to rise about her, a thick, malodorous screen, shutting her off from the little girls, hiding the pleasant house from view. Meg spoke first.

"Oh," she said, in a prunes-and-prism voice, "so you are an actress. . . . Well, goodness, I know mother wouldn't want you here. Will you please go away?"

Jonquil walked half-way down the walk. Her pulses were singing, her face was fever-hot. She turned abruptly, passionately, her voice was loud and shrill with sharp pin-pricks of agony. "Yes!" she screamed at them, "I'll go away . . . but some day you'll wish you could know me from his book sales. The question is, Does he earn it? Or, again, Are the picture rights worth the great sums that are paid for them? Some are, without question.

It is my firm conviction, that it is possible to translate any given story—every mood and nuance, every essential emotion felt by the creator of it—from the printed page into pictured portrayal on the screen. That it is seldom done, is quite true. It is the superfine art in the whole range of motion picture production, that surpasses the art of the director by far. For the art of the director would become simplified if there were great interpreters in the scenario departments.

As it is so far, the directors are themselves the greatest interpreters—with a few exceptions—that the screen has. This is not as it should be, because the average director combines in himself the mechanical marshaling genius and aspires to artistic heights and usually ends in a muddle.

The director's present autocratic powers have been come by honestly on his part. From the earliest days he has been called upon to build a stout cable of entertainment from a thin worn thread of plot or story, and in the majority of cases he has proved himself a wizard for results. He has learned literally to make something out of nothing, so he and his colleagues have learned to depend on nothing—revel in their wizardry—until they have come almost to resent it when they are given "too much" to build on. They feel that it reflects on their prowess. They prefer to go it alone—to be handed a silk hat by the author, as it were, into which they break two of their own eggs and produce an omelette! However, too often, the poor author gets his hat handed back to him with the remains of a bad egg inside. The audience does not know this, but audiences are so gullible that the magician would get the credit while failure is blamed on the author and his hat.

And so I think that is where the difficulty lies in the main between author and director today. The director goes entirely too far in depending on both his powers of creation and interpretation. Nor does the average novel go far enough. A Middle Art is requisite in the writing of the Continuity. We need rare interpreters—such as June Mathis, let us say, and her exquisite interpretation of "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse." Here is an instance in which everyone concerned gained thru mastery of the art of interpretation—author, director and producer.

I have come to the conclusion that there ought to be a school for the education of famous writers in the movies. Most of them have not the least conception of what they are driving at, what it is all about. They fail to get the big idea behind the motion picture, or to realize that the motion picture has gone ahead of all other forms of expression in reaching the hearts and the mind of all the peoples of the world, simultaneously. It sometimes makes me feel glad that I am not a Great Author after all.

E. V. LUCAS

At length I switched him over to the subject of the motion picture. "Oh, the films are not good enough. With all the money and other kinds of wealth expended on them they should be infinitely better. So, believing that, I go solely for idle recreation—and to laugh.

"I am of the opinion that the only film story that should be presented, or attempted, is the one invented for the film and never an adaptation and never a play.

"The best thing they do is the supernatural. For instance, Harold Lloyd driving a trolley car thru a crowded city gives me much pleasure to see. The films are the link between poor inadequate human nature and magic. 'Theatre of the Deaf,' I have called it somewhere. And that is really its greatest boon—one can see without having to hear what might be awful sometimes."

tation would smash the play—and that really can't be thought of.

"Many of my Dutch war stories were done in the films; some very well, and others—well, I have reasons for feeling very much afraid of what might be done to a story like 'The Scarlet Pimpernel.' The plot is so complicated and the atmosphere so essential."

The Baroness told me this while sitting at tea in her splendid villa, located in the select section of Monte Carlo far up the heights above the madding crowd, the brilliant white hotels and the gambling Casino. Tho it was February, we were looking out the window of her study on her formal garden with all its wealth of tropical foliage reflected in the pool or seen thru the shimmering fountain playing in its center.

"'The Scarlet Pimpernel' was my second book," she went on. "It was refused by twelve, a round dozen, of publishers. When it was first published it sold exactly ninety copies. I was discouraged and decided to make a play of it. Julia Neilsen and Fred Terry liked it and bought it. And that is how Fred Terry came to have an interest in 'The Scarlet Pimpernel.'"

All of which should be potently interesting to the discouraged writer.

FORD MADOX FORD them after what he had said about them.

We continued our talk that night when he gave a party—one of the sort of parties that are given only in the Latin Quartier of Paris, where a score or more of people drift in dressed as tho they were going to a nonchalant fancy-dress ball—only they mean it and dont mean to be grotesque about it at all. Paris is so amusing when it tries not to be.

Well, James Joyce was expected and didn't come. But Gertrude Stein, author of "Tender Buttons," did. And Gelette Burgess, who gave us "The Purple Cow," and Louis Bromfield, author of that cracking book of the year, "Possession," was there. And a great many artists and regular people and a good time was had by all, I can assure you.

ARE you keeping up with all the goings-on of the stars in Hollywood? Eugene V. Brewster, Editor-in-Chief of the Brewster Publications, contributes every month in the CLASSIC, his impressions of the players and productions on the Coast.

You can't hide a poor complexion

COSMETICS were never intended to conceal facial blemishes, and the woman who tries to cover up blotches, blackheads, redness, roughness, etc., with a coating of rouge and powder, will find the last state of her skin worse than the first.

A dull, splotched, or otherwise unattractive complexion is frequently due to the wrong method of cleansing. The pores have become clogged and they are unable to function properly. Such a skin needs to be stimulated by the pore-searching lather of a pure soap and warm water.

You will like Resinol Soap for this purpose—because it is different. The first time you use it, the distinctive, refreshing Resinol fragrance it gives out will convince you that it contains unusual properties. Its soft lather almost caresses the skin as it sinks into the pores and gently rids them of their impurities. Then it rinses so easily, too—leaving your skin soothed, refreshed and soft and pink as a baby's.

Reg the Regular

while our clothing dried? Denny, of course!

It was three days before we were able to run the dingy thru the surf and return to the fishing-boat. Three days during which we slept on the ground, subsisted on fresh lamb stew seasoned with lobsters and clams we dug at low tide, and a can of hardtack Denny had thoughtfully brought along.

All for the Fun of It

AND who invented games to keep our minds off our troubles, who led us on impossible treks over long-dead volcanoes in search of the elusive wild boar, who took his rifle and left his warm blankets in the biting chill before dawn to hunt the meat for our inevitable lamb stew? Nobody but Denny!

Ah, there's a man for you!

I think to Reg Denny, motion pictures must be just another thing to interfere with his fishing and shooting.

And it's hard for me, knowing the other side of the man, to reconcile myself to seeing him as I saw him on the set at Universal the other day, shooting his new picture, "Take It From Me." He wore a cutaway coat and striped trousers, a wing collar and an impeccable boiled shirt and patent-leather shoes.

He was the center of a massive set representing a fashion show. Beautiful women in all stages of dress and undress surrounded him. He was affable, courteous, polished, suave—yet bewildered in that amusing fashion that is particularly his own brand of comedy.

He watched while lovely models in gorgeous gowns paraded to the edge of a large tiled swimming pool, gave one vigorous wriggle and dropped their gowns to reveal themselves in bathing attire.

He obligingly registered astonishment when he perceived a skull and crossbones painted on the knee of petite Frances Dale, who is one of the most promising of the screen's new crop of actresses and has a leading rôle in the new picture.

Yes, he was quite the man-about-town on the set before the camera, was Reg Denny.

But who, I ask you, was the first to rip off the wing collar, tear off the boiled shirt and kick off the patent-leather shoes when the final scene was taken and he had reached the shelter of his bungalow dressing-room? You're right; it was nobody but Reg Denny!

Just Like a Pal

I THINK it also speaks volumes for Reg's character to relate that I found him sharing his own dressing-room with Ben Hendricks and Lee Moran. Not that there is any shortage of dressing-rooms at Universal City; there must be thousands. I have known quite a few stars in my day in Hollywood, but I never before saw one who would share his dressing-room with another player of less established standing.

He may be a product of merry old England, but I cast my vote for Reg Denny as the most democratic of the stars.

What we talked about while he was getting out of his furbelows and into good old rough tweeds doesn't matter very much. It wasn't a lot of bunk about his desire to make bigger and better pictures, nor about his sacrifices for his art, nor about his wife (Renée, a most charming and vivacious lady) being not only his pal but his severest critic, nor about the gorgeous set he had just quitted, nor about the pleasure he finds in his work, nor about any of the things that interviews are supposed to be about.

If you want to know the honest truth, we talked about the relative values of a Dowaigac minnow and a Shannon lure in snaring the wily bass, and whether a Blue Dragon or a good old Coachman was the best for salmon trout under given conditions, and if a Hispano-Suiza motor was really practical for a thirty-eight-foot cabin cruiser, and all such rot as that. Not interesting in the least, when you sit right down and analyze them.

But all the time I was thinking about other things.

Enjoys the Briny Deep

THERE was that other trip which ended disastrously. A couple of years ago, now; maybe three. Reg and Ben had been out on the sea a night and a day and a night, fishing. They were coming home in the dawn with three hundred pounds of fish in the tonneau of the car. A little girl ran into the street on the outskirts of Hollywood. To avoid hitting her, Reg threw the car headlong into a tree. There wasn't enough of the car left to warrant repairs, and not much more of Reg. It was ten days before they would let me see him, and then I found him smoking a cigaret and planning the sort of fishing-boat he would build when he got well.

Then there was that other trip, just last fall. Reg had, by that time, acquired his boat. It was a cabin cruiser with a fuel radius of three hundred miles. He notified me when he was leaving, but I couldn't go. Their objective, I knew, was a group of islands off the coast of Mexico, approximately three hundred miles south of Los Angeles harbor. They scheduled a stop at Ensenada, en route, for additional fuel.

The morning after their departure, the wind was blowing a gale. My home is twenty miles from the sea, yet the storm even there was terrific. It uprooted a great tree in my yard. We all worried about Reg, of course, but it is impossible to worry very long about him. You always have the feeling that he will bob up after a time, smiling.

A week went by, eight days, nine days—and no word from them. They were long overdue in port. Jim Mitchell, who writes pieces for the paper, was in my office one afternoon. He, too, was worried. "They're gone," he said. "Our wireless reports from the southern shipping say no small boat could live in that storm." An airplane was chartered by the Universal people and flew over the sea for miles with no result. At the end of ten days even the optimists conceded Reg and Ben and Hub Lloyd, their companion, were down with Davy Jones.

Then a couple of days later, or maybe three, the Mexican telegraph brought a laconic message. "Okay," it said simply, and was signed "Reg." They were back in port at Ensenada, and the storm had blown itself out.

Later Reg told the story in a couple of sentences:

"The storm held us back, and we ran out of gas. We made a little cove and anchored. A fisherman came by one day promised to bring us gasoline when he returned. He did, and that's all there was to it."

The Boy in the Man

So that's Reg Denny as nearly as I can picture him to you. It's the Reg Denny that I know, and that you know on the

but I didn't. I didn't know as much about racing boats then as I do now.

"When we lurched toward the buoy the fourth time, I found out what that grinding was—and I got it with a bang. We had sprung the calking, and the entire rear end of the craft dropped out from under me just as we shot fifteen feet in the wake of the buoy. I was abruptly parked there in the water squarely in front of the other speed boat, which was hammering along toward me at thirty miles an hour. I had no time to get even partly out of the way. They tried their best to stop, and did succeed in slowing down, but the boat slammed me against that buoy so hard that when the rescue squad finally fished me out they found that I'd acquired a dislocated shoulder and two broken ribs."

Making You Shudder

REPOSING flat on his back on a steeply slanting board that projected several feet from the top of a towering oil derrick, and trying to appear nonchalantly indifferent to the yawning void just under his recumbent form, gave Jimmie Adams all the thrills any sane man could possibly desire, in the filming of a recent Christie comedy with an oil-field locale.

It is obviously impossible to rig a safety net on so skeleton a structure as an oil derrick, and the shots were taken at a near enough range to preclude the use of concealed wires or other similar appliances. Consequently, Jimmie had to spend the greater part of a memorable afternoon clowning on his precarious perch and hoping fervently that the property-man had been conscientious in nailing the board securely to the derrick scaffolding.

Eight years on the Mack Sennett lot have naturally given Billy Bevan enough thrills to fill a five-foot book-shelf.

"The nearest I ever came to death, tho," Billy told me one day, "was via the pneumonia route. When we were making 'Honeymoon Madness,' there were a lot of rain scenes to be shot. No fooling, I was dripping wet for three solid weeks! I couldn't even change to dry clothes during the lunch hour. Before the three weeks were over I felt like a cross between a water-lily and a drowned cat.

"Only last week I had to walk along a ledge on the sixth floor of a Hollywood bank building, with my eyes shut, and clad principally in a night-gown. I was supposed to be a somnambulist, who walked in his sleep, and tried to play golf on the ledge. I didn't mind the height, but I hated to wander around up there with my eyes shut.

Buster's Nerve

BUSTER KEATON has been called "the little iron man" because of the chances he invariably takes in his comedies. Height stuff is a little out of Buster's line, but when it comes to knockabout thrills, he will try practically everything.

Slugging toe to toe with an ex-pugilist in a ring, getting kicked from speeding trains, trying to ride a wild steer—they are all the same to the indomitable Buster so long as there is a possible laugh involved with the thrill. Keaton has been injured half a dozen times in the last few years, but the mishaps have shaken neither his nonchalance nor his nerve.

Incidentally, Buster gives the danger element as one of the possible reasons for his famous habit of never smiling on the screen. "How is a fellow going to smile," Keaton queries plaintively, "when he never knows whether he'll spend that night safe at home or in the casualty ward of the nearest hospital?"

Painted People

... you'll try to know me, and I—I wont let you—there now!"

She heard a thin trickle of laughter following her . . . refined laughter.

After her mother's death things were much worse. She no longer suffered slights and insults at the hands of "nice" little girls and their starched mothers, because she no longer permitted such opportunities. She had learned to be ashamed of herself and of what she was, and her instinct was to seek cover.

But there were other things. She traveled alone with her father now. The one advantage being that she was given a room apart from his. She usually shared it with the character woman; occasionally she had a cubby-hole alone.

Just at first she had slept in the room with her father and then there were always silly, giggly girls coming home and having supper with her father in their room, and if she didn't turn her face to the wall and pretend to be asleep he threatened to box her ears "then and there."

Of course, it didn't take much sense to pretend to be asleep once she understood what was expected of her. But it was always just pretend, and she couldn't help but hear him and his silly talk and silly stories and the little rushing noises and the high giggling of the girls in the room. There was always a great to-do about orange juice and cracked ice and a great deal of talk about "This is the stuff" and "Dont be a cold potato." At this stage of the game, Jonquil decided that, silly as papa was as Romeo, he was infinitely sillier as himself.

She hated it more and more all the time. She hated it so that she ached inside. She hated her father with his red face and white teeth. The one gold one. She hated the new character woman with her mascoed eyes and thickly reddened lips. She hated the new leading lady, the one who had taken her mother's place, who was named Rosie and smelled of cheap rose perfume.

She hated, with a vast and ever-swelling hatred, the gritty little rooms in the gritty little hotels. She hated getting up early in the mornings and traveling late at night. She hated china toilet sets and soggy mashed potatoes and brown fried eggs and everything she had ever known in her whole life.

She was desperately unhappy. She prayed that she could die. She even hated her own face, pale, with little circles of sleeplessness under her eyes. She hated her frizzy hair and her silk dresses and her long, embarrassed legs.

When she was nearly thirteen, her father suddenly informed her that he was going to take her to Three Trees, Massachusetts, and "give" her to her grandmother. Her mother's mother. Grandmother Rogers.

Jonquil was conscious of a wild pang, first hot, then cold. First delight, then despair, then a commingling of the two. She said:

"Maybe she wont want me."

"Then you'll have to go to a Home," the man said. "I'm going to get married again, and Rosie wont want a kid tagging after her. I dont blame her. Why should she? Besides, you're getting too long and lanky to do kid parts and, if you can do anything, why should you stick around? If you turn out to look like anything in three or four years, you can join up with us again and earn your own bread and butter. Anyway, it wont hurt the old dame to do something for you. Aint you her own flesh and blood?"

Oh, she hoped so! She hoped so. . . . Jonquil, that night, lay awake until dawn. And when the dawn came, it seemed faintly tinted with rose, for the first time in her memory.

She didn't honestly see why the "old dame" should do anything for her and she suspected that she wouldn't, but she agreed with her father that it wouldn't hurt to try. After all, even if it failed, there would be the Home and nothing could be worse than the life she was leading. Really, a "home" had a sweet-smelling sound. And it might have a front porch!

Papa "laid off" for three days between towns, at great loss to himself, so he said, and they journeyed to Three Trees.

At once Jonquil loved the look of Three Trees. She felt passionately that she never wanted to step foot out of it again, not even to see the Leaning Tower of something or other or the Obelisks, about which the male "heavy" had tried to enlighten her when he had undertaken her education a year or so before.

She felt that she would die if Grandmother wouldn't let her stay. The streets were wide and shady. The houses were white and green and spandy clean. They were set far back on velvet lawns and there were old trees over them, faintly murmurous. There was no hotel, only an "Inn," a larger, whiter, shadier-looking place, and a little tablet tacked to a tree informed those who paused that General Washington had once laid his much-pillowed head in the best bedroom of the George Inn.

Papa inquired his way, and they walked along the peaceful New England streets, rather badly incongruous. Jonquil felt that they were, and the ache of fear and misery returned. Papa in his "shepherd's plaid," his Elk's tooth, his gold tooth glinting thru his moist red lips, his way of walking, so actory. . . . She, Jonquil, in the inevitable silk dress with lace ruffles, a "picture" hat, silk socks, silly slippers. Three Trees seemed to stand away from them . . . to draw back . . . to be preparing to eject them. . . .

The "old dame" lived in a white house with green shutters, also set far back from the street. It seemed heaven to Jonquil. Flowers in neat flower-beds. White swiss curtains swish-swishing in a lilac-burdened breeze against scrupulous window panes. A front porch. Geraniums along the rails in shiny green boxes. All orderly. A place to stay. A place to take root in, to call home. She thought desperately that this place would have none of papa and her. They didn't belong.

The old dame herself came to the door. Grandmother Rogers! Spare and trim and dressed in decent black. White hair folded like quiet wings on either side of her head. False teeth, of course, but a rosy skin and faded grey eyes.

Grandmother Rogers (how dared he call her "the old dame"?) looked at them, accusingly, Jonquil thought. It was as if she suspected who they were and was asking them with her steely eyes how they had dared. . . . Papa spoke first. In his best manner. Loudly, with gestures. Jonquil hung her head for shame of him.

Grandmother Rogers asked him to step inside. She asked it grudgingly, against her will. Jonquil found herself alone—on a front porch. She tip-toed over to a chair

H. L. Mencken Breaks the Long Silence

The morals of the movie folk—the various scandals that are constantly upsetting public digestion?" I asked after a pause.

"I know very little about them, except for what I read in the papers," he replied.

"Some of them, getting too much money, seem to carry on like American business men at a trade convention. That is, they get drunk, fight, and disport themselves with harlots. But certainly the majority of them do nothing of the sort. They are hard-working people, and take their work very seriously.

"I can recall meeting two women stars of the films and one man star," he continued. "It would be hard to imagine more charming people, or decenter, I don't know anything about them professionally, save that they are of dignified position. I have never seen them on the screen."

"Have you ever seen yourself on the screen?" I asked.

"No." It was short and emphatic. "Why should anyone put me there?"

I admitted I was nonplussed, and tried again. (You know even the cleverest interviewer has to put his foot in it at least once during an interview.)

On Salaries

"WHAT do I think of movie salaries?" he asked.

"Well, I think an actor, like any other man, is worth whatever he can earn for his employer," and I marvelled at the keen judgment of the man, for not so long ago, Adolph Zukor, president of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, had given me the same cryptic answer when questioned concerning the fabulous salaries paid to stars like Gloria Swanson, John Barrymore, and so on. Now Mr. Zukor's job is the movies, and Mr. Mencken as you can tell from what he has said, is remotely interested in them, and yet he had hit upon the answer to the whole question in the twinkling of an eye.

several years this bright young woman has been uplifting the movies with her witty subtitles or dressing up a plot or three in collaboration with her husband, John Emerson. Both of them have saved many a film story from going to a cold and friendless vault. As the author of "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes," Anita Loos is on the way to becoming one of the richest royalty earners in the world.

A bright little idea and some recognizable characterizations were dovetailed together and the result is the wisest little book of the season—a book to while away an hour or two while the car is being repaired or when you want to restore your tired nerves.

"Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" is already being played on the stage—and it has become a cartoon strip—with Miss Loos furnishing the daily ideas for the cartoonist. And a film will be made of the story and play, and by the time you enter the department store trenches for Christmas you should have it on the screen.

When the idea finally outlives its usefulness and when the book-dealers finally stop from tumbling over themselves in wrapping it up for the customers, Miss Loos should have earned several hundred thousand dollars.

The Rise of the Little Cinema

mans do. I have no doubt, tho, that American directors viewing this and other films of its like can derive some new ideas for their own work. That is, perhaps, one of the most valuable things about a group like the Film Associates. They too are counting on a bigger and more ambitious season, and will show "Rose Bernd," an Ufa picture, featuring Emil Jannings, Werner Kraus and Henny Porten, as their first offering.

Another group headed by Joseph Lawren and Robert A. Sanborn, have secured the tiny Fifth Avenue Playhouse at 66 Fifth Avenue. Lawren is a publisher, and Sanborn an old film hound, once associated with the scenario department of Universal. They have taken over a theater in Greenwich Village which was started with the idea of giving modern drama and will present in it only modern films. Exhibiting rights to the "Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" have been secured, and they are counting on a long run.

It will be amazing if "Caligari" does draw the public. Three or four years ago it was a flop; but taste has changed and things that were impossible then are being tried now. "Caligari" has been referred to so many times by screen critics that it has become a by-word and the public knows much more about it than when it was first shown. Its revival in a theater of its own may have quite an effect.

Uplifting the Public Taste

THE Little Cinemas are doing a great deal of educational work among the public and I know that their efforts are being keenly watched by the big producers and distributors. The "top-price" features which Famous Players, Metro-Goldwyn and the others have developed have done much to raise the public taste. Their greatest worry has been the changing taste of the public; it has been a nightmare for them to spend millions catering to some new fad or craze which will be forgotten next season. Now it looks as if the really great films of the past few seasons have a permanent quality about them that will not be put out of date by some new fad. It is comforting to think that pictures like "The Big Parade," "The Merry Widow," "The Grand Duchess and the Waiter," can be revived and exhibited successfully many years from now. The time is coming when certain feature films will so have mastered their art that they have the eternal value of, let us say, a play by Shakespeare. They will not have to be acted over again; merely taken off the shelves and revived.

The director of the International Film Arts Guild has devised a code for the appreciation of films. With this bright little measure-stick you may decide infallibly whether the movie you have just seen is a "classic" or a nuisance:

Suggested Code for Critics and Public

1. Faithfulness to the individuality of the cinema art. To what degree does the film make use of the particular intrinsic character of this new art?
2. Story. Is it a mere transposition of a novel or a play, or does it attempt to create its tale in terms of true cinema?
3. Cast. Are they merely transposed from the stage with all the routine tricks of the stage, or have they developed the art of pantomime with a true and inspired talent?
4. Photography. Has the cameraman made full use of his instrument, extracting from situations and groupings of characters certain "angles" and "shots" which set off the scene and action most vividly?
5. Composition. Have the groupings, backgrounds, arrangement of objects, etc., been carefully composed to support the full significance of a situation? Do the scenes etch themselves in the memory, or are they merely stereotyped?
6. Direction. To what extent has the director utilized these suggestions in his work? To what extent does the picture bear the imprint of his individuality? To what degree does it differ from the work of any other directors?

revolved around the studio—or the very scene—in which she was working at the moment. And now that she has moved from West to East. . . .

"I feel as tho I had lived here all my life, and hadn't the slightest expectation of ever leaving."

If it is so with places, how about people. Does she strike up an acquaintanceship, become enthusiastic, and, riding it to death, drop all others—to drop it in turn when another comes along?

"No. If I once like a person, I like him always. I know when I first meet a person whether I will like him or not years from now."

"Then you believe in first impressions?"

"Absolutely!"

But I started out to learn why she seems never to worry about the parts that may be assigned to her, nor even as to what pictures they may be in.

"I have never been able to control events —simply able to make the best of them when they came along."

"But dont you become interested in some part, and hope you'll get it?"

"Not particularly. I've always been lucky when I've let things take their course without trying to meddle."

"The only time things ever went seriously wrong was the only time I ever tried to make events take the course I, rather than they, wanted."

"When was that?"

"When I tried to break into pictures. I went out and attempted to be a regular go-getter. I hung around, and pestered people, and pulled strings—and never got anything but the smallest 'bits'—and eight weeks on crutches!

"And that made me realize that I had been trying to work directly opposite to the way my whole life had been molding itself. So I brought up sharply, and ceased to worry."

Reg the Regular

screen so nearly as the celluloid can grasp that vibrant personality, that radiating vitality, that effervescence of spirits that will make him always just a boy grown up.

I think he knows how to play, now that success has come, because he knew how to suffer in the old days. There is one more story I feel it necessary to tell.

Reg, of course, was born in England and of theatrical stock. He toured the world as leading baritone with the Bhandanian Opera Company, and was married, by the way, in Calcutta, India. Later he came to America and was to be starred for the first time in musical comedy in New York when the war broke out.

Naturally, he abandoned all his plans and went to England to enlist. But before he went his friend, the producer to whom he was under contract and who still functions in New York, patted him on the shoulder and cheered him on. "Your show will be waiting when you come back," said he with throaty heartiness.

So Reg went to war, enlisting in the Artists' Rifles, and later joined the Royal Air Force, from which he retired at the end of hostilities with an enviable record. He returned at once to New York to find disaster awaiting him.

A Tragedy and a Happy Ending

His wife had carried on with her stage career until illness came. She became desperately ill and, with her funds running low and no money except the meager allowance from Reg's army pay, was in desperate condition. When Reg reached New York, her life was in the balance and physicians conceded that only the greatest New York surgeon could save her.

Reg was penniless.

He went first, of course, to the manager who had cheered him on to war. He found the office boy hostile and the manager's door closed to him. He needed $1,000 for the surgeon's fee. For days he went up and down Broadway, to all those pals who had stayed at home and prospered, and met much sympathy but never a shekel.

He was desperate, mad. He forgot his pride, told his story everywhere he thought there might be a chance to raise funds. He offered to work for $50 a week if the manager, any manager, would advance him $1,000. In two days everyone on Broadway knew his plight, but he received no financial aid. And Renée, his wife, hourly neared the crisis of her illness.

As a last resort he stumbled one day up the steps to the office of Morris Gest, whom he did not know personally, but who knew of him. He was haggard, worn, on the verge of insanity. He has since told me that he had determined, that night, to do away with himself if his last chance failed. He could stand no more.

Morris Gest's office boy glanced at him indifferently, but carried in his card. He came back in a moment with a frown and a piece of paper. "Mr. Gest says he is sorry he is too busy to see you just now," he reported, "but he said to give you this."

He handed Reg the piece of paper. It was an envelope. Expecting some scribbled refusal, Reg tore it open. A check for $1,000 fluttered to the floor.

Is there any wonder that Reg was a committee of one to welcome Morris Gest when he came to California for a little holiday last fall? Or that he himself was Morris Gest's chauffeur at any hour of the day or night Morris Gest desired a car? Or that Morris Gest has only to command, and Reg Denny will obey?

rippling—never bunchy. He weighs a hundred and seventy-five pounds stripped, and fills a sixteen and a half collar very snugly. His chest measurement is forty-four inches, and his waist thirty. He lives at the Hollywood Athletic Club, where he does most of his training.

A Struggle for Strength

FEW people know that Bill Russell, today one of the most powerfully built men on the screen, was given up as a hopeless cripple when he was a boy of sixteen, with one leg withered and useless and eight inches shorter than the other as the result of a bad fall. The story of his physical rejuvenation has earned for Russell the title of "The Miracle Man."

Discharged as incurable after four years in the hospital, young Russell refused to accept the doctors' verdict. Rigging up an improvised exercising machine from an old bicycle, he set himself to the task of rebuilding his maimed leg. Fighting thru weary hours, days and months with almost superhuman fortitude, he won his battle.

He succeeded so well in making his body whole again that seven years later he became amateur middleweight boxing champion of New York State. Some time after that, at a big sportsman's show in Madison Square Garden, New York City, he was voted second prize in a contest to determine the best-built man in America.

Today Bill's weight is around the two-hundred mark, and there is not an ounce of superfluous flesh on his magnificent body. He is a veritable "nut" on physical training, and works out for at least an hour daily in his own private gymnasium. Two or three times a week of late he has been sparring six fast rounds of an evening at the Hollywood Athletic Club with Gene Tunney, leading contender for Jack Dempsey's crown, and is usually able to give about as much as he receives.

Bill has proved himself a real-life hero on more than one occasion. His most famous act of heroism occurred at the General Slocum boat disaster in New York, in which twelve hundred lost their lives. Russell saved twelve people singlehanded by swimming to shore with them, one after the other, and then secured a row-boat and rescued a score of others. Even Bill's native modesty could not dodge the public attention that this thrilling exploit attracted, and he was shortly afterward awarded the coveted Carnegie Medal.

And Tyler, Too

TOM TYLER, Western star on the F. B. O. lot, is another screen athlete whose physical prowess is very distinctly not of the artificial variety. Tyler had a good build and very fair muscular co-ordination when he took out a membership in the Los Angeles Athletic Club, but no one expected that he would develop into a national champion in less than a year's time.

That, however, is just what young Tyler did. He was introduced to the weight-lifting game and he took to the sport like a sea-going codfish to salt water. He arrived at the top of the local heap in a few months, and then went after greater honors. He got them, and he has been adding steadily to his trophy collection ever since. So far this year, he has won four major weight-lifting medals, including the gold emblem of the grand national championship.

His best records include lifts of two hundred and two and a half pounds in the "one hand clean and jerk" method, and two hundred and seventy-three pounds in the "two hands clean and jerk." Both these lifts include raising the weight cleanly to the height of the shoulders, then jerking it to arm's length overhead and holding it in that position for two full seconds before returning it to the floor. Tom is now going after several new world's records, and will probably attain them before many more months have passed.

On the Athletic Roster

IT was his splendid physical build and boxing ability that brought Reginald Denny his first important picture rôle, that of the hero in H. C. Witwer's "Leather Pushers" series. Denny was well known as an all-round amateur athlete before his screen début. He was one of the crack fliers of the Royal Flying Corps during the war, and soon became boxing champion of the Corps.

Norman Kerry is another six-footer with the trim, powerful build of the trained gymnast. In his school and college days, Kerry starred in both football and basketball, and was rated as an expert on the parallel bars and flying rings.

Edmund Lowe also gained more than average fame as an athlete when a student at Santa Clara University. He was a member of one of the first varsity teams to play Rugby football in the West, and also played on one of the fastest collegiate baseball nines ever developed in this part of the country. Today he keeps in trim by playing a hard game of squash at the Hollywood Athletic Club regularly.

Raymond Keane, Universal's new juvenile "find," was a high-school track star in Denver, with a state-wide reputation. He has a record of ten seconds flat in the hundred-yard dash, and 24.4 seconds in the two-twenty.

George Lewis, another new juvenile, was regarded as one of the best all-round athletes ever developed by a California high school. While at Coronado High he was a three-letter man, captain of the football team, and high scorer of the Southern California basketball conference in 1923.

This list of real athletes of the screen might be continued almost indefinitely. It is obvious that physical prowess, while far from being the sole prerequisite to success in pictures, is a highly important asset.

For the American public, while it may occasionally raise a temporary furore over the sheik and other bizarre types, in the long run wants its heroes to be decidedly of the he-man variety, with the lithe muscles and the erect carriage of an athlete, and the training and ability to make those muscles really effective.

BE sure to read about the players born under the Union Jack—who are accomplishing big things on the screen. And do not miss the story of the News Cameraman whose daring exploits keep you informed of the current events of the world—in the October CLASSIC.

off into an inaudible whisper. And Hatton would reply:

"It certainly is ridiculous, but he hasn't noticed it yet, so why tell him that . . . buzz . . . buzz . . . buzz . . ." and his voice would trail off.

Both knew the human weakness of everyone of wanting to hear what is being said about him. Cortez was no exception, and so strong was this desire that a dozen times he couldn't resist, even with the grinding cameras, and turned his head around to try to hear what they were saying. Just as soon as he did, they, Beery and Hatton, immediately threw in a "bit of business" which attracted attention to themselves. Cortez didn't tumble for several scenes, to the fact that this was an obvious game. Needless to say, he won't be the victim of this old trouper's trick again.

The Stars are Often Eclipsed

A STAR has less chance of having a picture stolen than anyone else, for a star predominates his or her production, and generally has much to say during the editing. But occasionally it does happen. Several examples have been cited. One of the most recent cases is that of a young man named Paul Kelly, who appears in Thomas Meighan's picture, "The New Klondyke." Critics thruout the country immediately hailed this newcomer as having come close to stealing many scenes from Meighan. That is, he is the one that leaves the most lasting impression.

Of course, the various bits of motion, and human-interest gags, vary greatly. Ernest Torrence often pulls his nose, scratches his chin, or purses up his mouth. Lewis Stone pats his lapel. Lew Cody pulls a white handkerchief out of his pocket. Adolphe Menjou has a little yawn of boredom, or a fascinating wink.

Dear old Theodore Roberts, who has just returned to the screen after a long illness, for years held the position of "daddy of 'em all" in the picture stealing business. His famous cigar was one of his greatest assets.

He toyed with the cigar, rolled it from one side of his mouth to the other, or otherwise manipulated it.

Painted People

and sat in it, rocking. Once or twice a neighbor strolled by, and Jonquil peeped at them, almost daring to nod pleasantly and casually—not quite daring. Not yet. Not until she knew. Her heart was thudding against her slender ribs. The way it did when she sat in the ante-room of the dentist. Soon she would know. Soon . . . She could hear papa talking inside, very wordy, very bombastic, in his best stage voice. She could hear Grandmother Rogers, very quiet, saying very little. Papa would spoil it all . . . ruin it . . . he was saying something about "the loss of my child . . . all I have left now . . ." He was saying it in his sob-voice. Jonquil felt like screaming out, "He's a liar . . . he has Rosie!" but she didn't.

She sat quiet, tensed, a rigid strip of a girl. Now they were coming. They were coming out to tell her . . . by the time they reached her she would be dead if her heart did not stop its mad pounding . . . papa was speaking to her. . . .

just about finished "Bardelys the Magnificent" and expects to get a hair cut in about a week, and, what do you think?—he has promised me all the cuttings! Girls, what would you not give for a lock of John Gilbert's hair? Haven't decided yet what I shall do with it—it's quite a bunch, you know, and I don't need another hair mattress just now. Perhaps I shall auction it off and build a hospital with the proceeds.

Enjoys Jam

YOU might think that John Gilbert is ravenously fond of red meat, coarse bread, limburger cheese and all that sort of thing. I sat next him at table recently and I was soon convinced that he is nothing but a big overgrown boy—he ate nothing but bread and jam, mostly jam, and he ate several portions and not much else.

Not knowing that Jack was a real athlete in training, I foolishly challenged him to a jumping contest. Of course, he beat me, but only by an inch or two. Later he and I played together at tennis doubles, and we won easily. Jack can do anything well—even eat.

Warner's Philosophy

"WE have outgrown God," said H. B. Warner to me at the lunch table the other day. No, he is not blasphemous, and he explained the remark quite philosophically. H. B. is a thinker and a man of ideas. I asked him what was man's greatest asset that makes for happiness, and promptly came the answer—"Health." "And what next?" I asked and just as quickly came the answer—"A normal brain." Think it over—there's a lot of food for thought in that answer. I don't know what his normal complexion is, but on this occasion it was red. He had been out fishing, of which sport he is passionately fond, and the sun had certainly been making love to his nose and cheeks.

Everybody seems to like "Silence" except H. B. Warner, its star. He complained to me bitterly about the "happy ending" which, he says, does not belong.

The Busy Harry Carr

HARRY CARR, who for the last four months has been the Chief Ambassador to the Court of von Stroheim, representing the Famous Players-Lasky monarchy, works all night and sleeps all day. Why this pair cant do their work by daylight, like other civilized people, I haven't yet learned, but I do know that they are working hard and expect to have something worth while to show for it. And when it's all over, Harry is again going to make his typewriter talk for Brewster Publications.

The Versatile Victor

VICTOR MCLAGLEN's meteoric career reminds one of that of Carl Dane. He hits the bull's eye in "What Price Glory" and now he has written his autobiography. Very colorful, too—soldier, professional boxer, wrestler, prospector, Chief of Police of old Bagdad, circus performer, vaudeville artist, screen star and now an author.

Beatrice Signs

BEATRICE LILLIE made a big hit in "Charlot's Revue" which was recently playing here and on the strength of her personality she has been signed up by M. G. M. to do comedy features. Beatrice is far from beautiful, but she has personality and charm and a good figure—I saw it in Marion Davies' bathing pool.

A Real Western Star

COLONEL TIM MCCOY, famous as "The friend of the Indian" and one of the most colorful figures of the modern West, has left his Wyoming ranch and signed up with M. G. M. to play the lead in a series of Western pictures. From all accounts we are to expect something new in the way of Westerns—not the old-fashioned kind, but something artistic and high-class as well as stirring.

Items of Interest

STRICTLY confidential—don't breathe a word, but by the time you read this there will probably be a Lloyd Hughes, Jr., or a Gloria Hope, Jr., as the case may be.

Don Ryan, who is well known to our readers (particularly to CLASSIC readers), is writing the titles for "Manon Lescaut," in which John Barrymore is starring for Warner Brothers.

Irene Rich certainly struck twelve in "Lady Windermere's Fan" and now (about July 1-20) she is playing a somewhat similar part in "My Official Wife," which Clara Kimball Young did a dozen years ago. She is fortunate in her leading man—Conway Tearle.

Anxious to repeat his great success in "The Ten Commandments," which he made for Paramount, and being deprived of the right to produce "The Deluge" because Warner Brothers had a prior claim, Cecil B. De Mille has selected "The King of Kings," which will center around the life of Christ. In spite of a remark I made in a previous paragraph I think H. B. Warner will be the Christ.

Warner Brothers think they have a real "find" in Myrna Loy. She is one of the most unusual types in pictures. You will soon see her as the half-caste girl in "Across the Pacific," in which Monte Blue is to star.

Jack Hoxie feels quite at home these days because he is playing the part of Buffalo Bill in "The Last Frontier" for De Mille. Here we have a real Westerner in a real Western, for Jack was once a snow-shoed mailman operating from Thunder Mountain to Pael Lake, Idaho.

Walter Long, they say, introduces a new style of villainy in "West of Broadway," in which Priscilla Dean is starring. Walter works his eyes instead of his muscles, recalling the most villainous eyes that ever were screened—those of Ernest Torrence in "Tol'able David."

Adolphe the Elegant

I never would have looked at another woman had my home life been peaceful and restful . . . peace and rest are what I most desired. . . . A Toiler at his Job . . . a peace-loving, law-abiding soul with whom Little Mabel aforementioned might have gone to Cairo and back. . . .

Third Stage

Adolphe on the Screen and in the Flesh. . . .

Some subtle chemical has been at work . . . a fusion has taken place . . . the suave sophisticate of the screen and the simple kindly man have become subtly and indefinitely blended. . . . The one has become the other . . . Adolphe is to be seen off the screen as well as on, debonaire, dangerous. . . . He is to be seen in a swanky car, a Follies girl at his side . . . that slight, suggestive smile upon his lips. . . . No longer does he huddle in hotel lobbies, the horn-rimmed glasses sliding comfortably down his nose. . . . At the studio, at Sherry's, at tea-time, Adolphe is become one and the same person . . . the Sorrows of Satan may have become Adolphe's sorrows now . . . a Man you would not permit Little Mabel to step out with lest she return with a bruised gardenia in lieu of a heart. . . .

Thus the Menjou.

The Hollywood of France

"Nobody can see Mr. Lachmann today, I'll show you where his secretary is."

"Oh, Mr. Phillips?" said the secretary's secretary. "Why, both Mr. Lachmann and Mr. Ingram waited nearly a half-hour for you. They have gone to Nice!"

I had been there all the time trying to get to them. However, another car was put at my disposal with an American chauffeur and we trailed Rex Ingram to Les Grandes Bleues, the bathing beach, where I chatted with him in his abbreviated bathing suit.

Making "The Magician"

"We are hard at work on a story of W. Somerset Maugham's, 'The Magician,'" he told me. "We did a scene last night that kept us at it until after three this morning. Naturally, we did not work this morning but are going to begin right after lunch. This bath is the thing that will take the sleep out of me."

He took a plunge into the Mediterranean. Later we went up and had lunch in the studio dining-room, where it is cooked by a French chef in hotel style and served by Italian women in a cozy dining-hall. None of your "Beef-and" hand-outs, but a delicious dinner. They charged about thirty cents for it. I forgot to say that this included wine.

The whole company had assembled for dinner prepared to work. Rex Ingram sat silent as usual with Alice Terry, his wife, talking to Petrovich, the leading man of the company, and said to be a remarkable dramatic discovery. Paul Wegener, the "heavy" of the cast, sat next to me on the left, with Lachmann.

We had just lit cigars when a gong rang. It was the signal to get on the set. Suddenly silence descended like a blanket—it was really Rex coming in, and everybody knew it. The entire attention was riveted on him. And that is the magic of Rex Ingram and his remarkable work.

he would have come in handy; and besides, you would have been building him up all the time.

Comedies Should be Built Like a House

"A COMEDIAN should be given a well-worked-out skeleton framework—and then told to add the bricks and ornaments as he goes along."

And "bricks and ornament" are of the greatest interest to Mr. Fields. Wild gags born in the midst of action; little traits and quirks of character, trivial in themselves, but whose sum is a definite and well-drawn character.

His next picture, "So's Your Old Man," is to be one such as this. A good skeleton—Julian Street's "Mr. Bisbee's Princess," the story that won the O. Henry prize—passed thru the hands of Tom Geraghty, whose wild Irish imagination should add something, and then to himself for more "bricks and ornament"—to emerge a tale of the tribulations of a well-defined character, a small-town Babbit jeweler.

But all these plans dont seem, to me, quite to fit in with the character of the typical screen comedian.

"Then you dont intend to do as Chaplin, Lloyd and Keaton—develop a certain character, with set make-up, and carry him thru different adventures?"

Will Submerge His Personality

"No—not at all. I intend to make the development of the character I'm playing more important than the registering of my own personality. But all the characters will probably be more or less related types.

"I might make an instant success if I were to continue making pictures in the make-up of Eustace McGargle, for instance—yet I might be just a fad, and die quickly as they always do. But the basic human types never become old and stale—no more than landscapes do.

"But then again, Chaplin and Lloyd are no fads—they'll never die. I wonder which the public prefers—I wish I knew."

Here we have the key to this man. All that has gone before is merely the effect of a cause. The alert old-timer; the user of past experiences; the reasoner—all these are merely the effect of a cause. And, of course, a cause is always of greater importance than its effects. So, the fact that he is one who wonders and puzzles things out is more important than that it has kept him progressing and looking forward beyond the point where others stop and look behind.

A Sound Philosophy

I AM not drawing the long-bow of exaggeration—I mean it. If a small boy had not wondered why steam made the lid of a tea-kettle dance, we would not have the locomotive; without the locomotive, we would still have had the boy. And he might have turned out other things.

Therefore:

"Why is it that small towns are always harder to please than the larger cities?"

"I didn't know they were."

"They are—very much so. And it isn't only myself—it's true of many other acts and pictures besides my own. Maybe it's because they're not so appreciative; they dont appreciate the differences between two similar things. And you cant do anything new—perhaps a difference in treatment but they dont notice that difference. If there's the slightest similarity, it's always: 'I've seen that before.'

"But, of course, some things are universal. I was in Southampton (perhaps the most 'ultra' of the Long Island resorts) last summer, and who do you think was the reigning screen idol? Tom Mix! All classes—he's universal."

There's no doubt of it!

His grey eyes twinkled.

In Search of New Ideas

"AND where under the sun am I to find a new idea for a chase?"

I murmured a few inarticulate "ers" and "ahs"—but no new idea was born.

"Everything's been done. Of course, everyone who wants to do something new says that; but chases—Lord!

"I wish I knew."

It is a job, when one thinks of it. Air-planes, cops, boats, elephants, cows, even cripples—all have been used.

I could think of nothing and became uncomfortable. I murmured again and prayed to all the gods to exert their influence to have him change the subject. I prayed and waited.

And he did!

"Why is it that in two theaters in the same town one can be a dismal flop and a howling success?"

"I once played in the Olympic—or Olympia, I forget now—in Liverpool and I think I came nearer to being an absolute flop than at any other time in my life.

"While I was there, a benefit performance was staged in another theater, and I was invited to participate. I did—and was a howling success, tho I didn't do a quarter of my stuff!

"I wonder why—I wish I knew."

And, on this note, we end.

that he purchased in London. If the pup continues his present remarkable growth, five years from now he will require very little disguise to pass for an elephant.

Pat O'Malley's pet foible is pipes, and his collection ranges from the native dhudeen of Ireland to Turkish and Persian narghiles and hookahs. Pat celebrated St. Patrick's day last March, by presenting a number of his friends with very doggy little brier pipes made especially to his order by a famous firm in Dublin.

Everyone to His Taste

Golf forms a real extravagance for Huntly Gordon, who spends enough on clothing and clubs to ransom a fairly valuable king. Horses and their trappings are now helping keep Edmund Lowe broke. Willard Louis has a home in Glendale that has all the horticultural attributes of an ancient Roman estate. Louis buys rare shrubs and plants from all over the world, and is a frequent winner in local horticultural and floral shows, as well as having a home that is a miniature Garden of Eden—without the snake.

Syd Chaplin goes in for aviation, being interested both in intricate little model planes and their big brothers. Syd is a veteran pilot, having headed one of the first commercial plane ventures in the West. Louise Fazenda is a genuine book-collector, and is an inveterate follower of all local auctions in which books are liable to be included. John Barrymore has an expensive craving for rare old first editions, and has a really fine collection. Hoot Gibson has a weakness for weapons of warfare, from the armor of the Middle Ages down to the six-gun of today. Jean Herscholt is an enthusiastic stamp-collector.

William Collier, Jr., has for his pet extravagance a valet.

"Sure, I know it's an extravagance," Collier grins when his friends kid him about his man servant.

"Sometimes I get the idea that my valet is the real boss of my household. Then he is a liability.

"Other times, when I have an early morning call for a location trip he becomes a real asset.

Class Will Tell

There's nothing old-fashioned or hackneyed about the CLASSIC. It is dedicated to the purpose of offering unusual, distinctive and sparkling pages. You can't afford to miss a single issue.

The October Classic

will feature the first of a series of absorbing stories about the old days in the movies—entitled "Them Were the Happy Days." There will also be a highly entertaining article about the "Broken Hearts of Hollywood."

Henry Albert Phillips will conclude his series of interesting interviews with leading British and Continental authors on the subject of motion pictures. In the October CLASSIC you will find the opinions of John Galsworthy, Margaret Kennedy and Lord Dunsany.

Another striking feature will present an interview with F. W. Murnau, who has come to America to make pictures. And Mal St. Clair will tell you his impressions of the stars he has directed—together with his own caricatures of them.

And a dozen or so other big features, including the second instalment of Faith Service's interesting Serial Story, "Painted People."

The CLASSIC passes them all. Order your October number now.

The Celluloid Critic

but theatrical melodrama. It contains a kick, nevertheless, since the action must paint the event in crude colors. The father refuses to allow his daughter to marry his erstwhile partner—a man who has found redemption thru love. In the end the girl plunges a knife into her parent's back, discovering too late that she is his daughter.

Italian Sentiment

A TOLERABLY neat little number is exposed in "Puppets," which tells a tale of Italian love, vengeance and sentiment. For half its length it never wavers in its story, but as it progresses it carries too great a burden—and fails to contain the appeal and charm of its early scenes.

There are some good situations in it, however. The central figure, an Italian from New York's East Side, runs a puppet show—and on the eve of his departure for France to fight in the Great War he gives due warning that his sweetheart belongs to him. When he returns he is afflicted with deafness—a touch which will remind you of a much better one in "The Dark Angel," wherein the hero came back, minus his eyesight.

A Wild Western

THERE have been Westerns and Westerns, but I truly believe that "Born to the West" bests them all for the assortment of crowded heroics, gunplay—and what not. This Zane Grey story simply defies all the realities in its approach to theatric melodrama. It spans several years in its plot, starting off with a boyish feud in the crinoline days and continuing the feud after its characters have reached maturity.

The hero is a mauve decade edition of Frank Merriwell. He bobs up everywhere to rescue the distressed heroine or to save his comic pal, played with breezy abandon and picturesque color by Raymond Hatton. Once he locates his erstwhile enemy—who is still pursuing the girl that innocently established the feud—no quarter is given. He escapes from his hand-cuffs by a ruse—and, almost single-handed, routs the conspirators who control and inhabit the honky-tonk. These venders of vice are hopping mad over the strike of gold up there in Nevada's hills. So the climax represents a gun battle between the lucky miners and the idlers who remained behind.

Bebe Daniels Has Adventure

A PRETTY large order was given Bebe Daniels when she was cast for "The Palm Beach Girl," a picture which presents a series of adventurous episodes spiced with hokum humor. Coming from the corn belt to Florida, she starts off on one of Mack Sennett's earliest tricks. Her face is blackened thru looking out of the car window and catching the soot from some smoke-stack. Which isn't a very neat way of introducing oneself to Palm Beach.

The film is pleasant enough and is shot with enough humor to while away anybody's time. Bebe gets into one tight jam after another—and while she is deserving of something more substantial, this particular number should make her feel fairly contented with her lot.

Not So Bright

W. C. FIELDS has reached stardom and "It's the Old Army Game" which starts him off on the high road, cannot be called a masterpiece of comedy. In fact, it is quite inconsequential—and is forced to rely upon a series of gags and slapstick—ideas which formerly decorated the Follies when Fields was the star comedian.

Transplanted to the screen, the episodes are not so productive of laughs. And it may be that the director didn't time them correctly. Fields is one of the best of pantomimists—and he needs the camera all to himself to put him over. Moreover, he needs the camera up close enough so one can appreciate his tomfoolery.

They Say—

Chance" and "Womanhandled," and he will become even more popular in "The Quarterback."

THIRD PRIZE

Votes from Illinois

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

I have recently read that Warner Baxter is to play the leading rôle in Paramount's filming of Scott Fitzgerald's brilliant "The Great Gatsby," which should indeed, in the right hands, make a splendid picture. But Mr. Baxter as Gatsby is absolutely awful. Why buy the rights to the novel at all if he is the only actor they can think of to play Gatsby? I believe Ronald Colman would be the most satisfactory, and I would very much like to see Greta Nissen as Daisy.

Anyway, if Mr. Baxter plays Gatsby, I shall expect to see Warner Brothers present "The Green Hat" with the matronly Irene Rich as Iris March.

And this is the time to repeat what wise persons have already suggested: that Blanche Sweet is the one actress on the screen who could play the rôle of Iris as it should be played. Miss Sweet has the subtlety, the grace, the "tiger tawny" hair, and the mannerisms of Michael Arlen's famous lady. And what a picture it would be if some producer should make "The Green Hat" with Blanche Sweet, directed by George Fitzmaurice, and with Ronald Colman in the part of Napier! If Blanche and Ronald could lift a foolish story like "His Supreme Moment" to the distinction that they did, what couldn't they do to "The Green Hat"?

I think that Gloria Swanson has a legitimate grudge against the critics because of their comments. I'll admit that her performance as the mother in "The Coast of Folly" was bad; she made her much too aged, she exaggerated, she was unconvincing. Why not also admit that she had sincerity and force, and that her acting as the daughter was all that anyone has a right to expect? All that she received from the critics was verbal brickbats.

The Screen Observer Has Her Say

and the nearest railroad station town is about twenty miles away, containing about four hundred inhabitants, but right here on this God-forsaken, desolate plain they are building a city for the sole purpose of making a movie.

From Denver, Reno, Sacramento and everywhere they brought men, women and children and in a night the city of Barbara Worth sprang up, and in ten days they had banks, saloons, churches, stores and dance halls with six or seven hundred people to patronize them. Carloads of ice, huge tanks of water, five thousand tons of food daily, and hundreds of horses, mules, oxen and cattle were brought hither, and all the while the cameras were grinding, and the actors were performing, Samuel Goldwyn was drawing huge checks—just to give you people a great picture. Henry King, who became immortal for having directed "Stella Dallas," the beautiful and charming Vilma Banky who has just finished a wonderfully colorful part in "Son of the Sheik," Ronald Colman, who has gradually gone to the top of the ladder of screen popularity, and a dozen more artists of equal merit in their particular lines are all doing their utmost to make "The Winning of Barbara Worth" an epoch-making picture.

All for the Sake of Realism

THE thermometer registered around 115 degrees in the shade, the sunlight is almost blinding, and the driving clouds of dust are often excruciatingly painful and dangerous to the eyes and ruinous to the complexion, and yet all these people endure it with a smile and without complaint. Yes, the wind blows occasionally, but it is a hot wind and with it comes clouds of dust and sand. The tents in which most of the inhabitants of this mushroom city live are large and comfortable, but in the daytime they are like ovens. During one of these sand storms it is like being in a square-rigger in a squall, so loud is the boom of the flapping canvas, and after it is over, everything, everywhere is covered with fine white sand. But after the sun goes down it is simply glorious, cool, refreshing, invigorating, and you never saw so much sky in your life, or so many stars, unless you have been on the desert. Everybody knows everybody, like one large family, and everybody is happy. And talk about types! When I sat in the one big common dining-room and watched the populace come in, fill up, and go out, I thought to myself that nowhere on earth could one find such a variety of human creatures—every nation, color, size, type and character were represented with no duplication. The exquisite Vilma and the hideous Indian squaw, the aristocratic Ronald and the uncouth mountaineer, negroes and Mexicans, grotesque cowboys and long bearded trappers, all mingle together and partake of the same rations, which, by the way, are far better than most of them ever had before or will ever have again.

Should Be Another Epic

AND in another ten days or so it will all be over. Half a million dollars will have changed hands, the city will have disappeared like Atlantis, or Pompeii, or a mushroom, but the world will have another epoch picture—something on the order of "The Covered Wagon," only covering a later period of our country's growth and development. Why Bancroft and Ridpath, when men like James Cruze, Samuel Goldwyn, Henry King and William Fox can write history in pictures that everybody can understand and enjoy and never forget, and that will make the kiddies scoot to school rather than play hooky? But don't think Sam Goldwyn is so philanthropic as all that—he will get his millions back again and more too, and he knows it. And yet he is one of the world's benefactors. Besides that, he is an awful good fellow and generous to a fault.

Arbuckle Out of Oblivion

IT will be very interesting to see what Roscoe Arbuckle has done with "The Red Mill," in which he has just finished directing Marion Davies. The expenses on this special piled up so that Metro-Goldwyn called in King Vidor and Ulrich Bush to help finish some of the minor scenes of the picture. But Fatty handled all those in which Marion Davies appears. The saving of money can have been the only object in rushing this picture to completion, because Marion's next production is not scheduled to start until September. She has caught the comic-strip fever, and will immortalize "Tillie the Toiler." Frances Marion is scenarioizing Russ Westover's epic of the beautiful dumbbell.

Wanted—A Job

MAURITZ STILLER is out of a job again. When he became too temperamental to linger within the broad walls of Metro-Goldwyn, Paramount welcomed him as the one man who could direct Pola Negri superbly. The idea was to match temperament with temperament, and everyone was sure Pola and Mr. Stiller would understand each other beautifully. It is not told which of them first found it impossible to understand the other—but Pola has a new director, and Mr. Stiller is without a picture. Altho he has been hailed by all the great foreign directors as the real genius among them, he has failed to give evidence of it since coming to America. The inference is that, like D. W. Griffith, he was a great genius. And his preoccupation with Greta Garbo, whom he considers the one superb actress, limits him still further.

Rudy Will Play Italy's Bad Boy

VALENTINO's next picture seems to have a good chance of being another "Monsieur Beaucaire," which fans have been clamoring for. It will be a drama based on the life of Benvenuto Cellini, and the scenario will be written by Edwin Justus Mayer, author of "The Firebrand." Altho Joseph Schenck purchased the screen rights to "The Firebrand," that highly successful stage play was found to be quite censorable and unfit for the screen, so Mr. Mayer has been called upon to produce other incidents from the very full life of Benvenuto.

It is a spirited rôle Rudy will play, said to be ideally suited to his screen personality, altho it has never seemed to me that spirit was the dominant quality in Rudy's acting. The picture will be directed by Fred Niblo, who managed to make Valentino do some real acting in "Blood and Sand"—and what with the lavish production promised by Mr. Schenck, and the flock of beautiful women who must be in any faithful story of Signor Cellini, it bids fair to be at least an entertaining picture.

Every-day magic

CHAIRS that flop into beds . . . bags that suck up dirt . . . tiny ticking things that count all day long for you. Daylight any night just by pushing a button. A stream that never stops till you turn off a faucet. Any voice you want, talking to you from a cage on your desk or wall. Actions of yesterday, of people miles away, going on on a curtain before you. Stilled throats singing to you from discs; distant throats singing to you from nothing!

Uncanny, daily magic—this, due to national advertising. Advertisements have given you flashlights, telephones, typewriters, automobiles, cold creams, motion pictures. They have given you new eyes, new ears, new hands, new feet, new faces, new emotions. They have urged such wide use, so lowered prices, that almost wishes are autos, almost beggars can ride. Through advertisements you've laid down the shovel and the hoe. You can buy a whole harvest ready-to-eat in cans. You've hung up the fiddle and the bow, for a radio. There's little old-time work left in this age of amazing short-cuts.

Read the advertisements—they keep you to the fore of modern life

IDEALS OF BEAUTY

Physical Perfection

That Schoolgirl Complexion

If you wish to gain them, follow nature's laws—and, above all, this natural rule in skin care which has proved its effectiveness to the world

PALMOLIVE is a beauty soap made solely for one purpose; to foster good complexions.

In France, home of cosmetics, Palmolive is the second largest selling soap and has supplanted French soaps by the score. In beauty-wise Paris, Palmolive is the "imported" soap.

RIGHT living, right diet and proper exercise are the factors leading experts urge for physical perfection. For skin perfection these experts urge natural ways in skin care.

Thus, on expert advice, the artificial beauty methods of yesterday have largely been discarded.

Foremost beauty authorities have found beauty insurance starts with proper cleansing of the skin. They urge the soothing lather of olive and palm oils as blended in Palmolive as the safe, natural way in skin care. Most of the pretty skins you see today are due to it.

Use Palmolive according to the simple rule here given. Note the difference a single week will make. It is nature's formula to "Keep That Schoolgirl Complexion."

Start today with this simple care—

Note how your skin improves

Wash your face gently with soothing Palmolive Soap, massaging the lather softly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly, first with warm water, then with cold. If your skin is inclined to be dry, apply a touch of good cold cream—that is all. Do this regularly, and particularly in the evening. Use powder and rouge if you wish. But never leave them on over night. They clog the pores, often enlarge them. Blackheads and disfigurements often follow. They must be washed away.

Avoid this mistake

Do not use ordinary soaps in the treatment given above. Do not think any green soap, or one represented as of olive and palm oils, is the same as Palmolive.

And it costs but 10c the cake! So little that millions let it do for their bodies what it does for their faces. Obtain a cake today. Then note what an amazing difference one week makes.

Soap from trees!

The only oils in Palmolive Soap are the soothing beauty oils from the olive tree, the African palm, and the coconut palm—and no other fats whatsoever. That is why Palmolive Soap is the natural color that it is—for palm and olive oils, nothing else, give Palmolive its natural green color.

The only secret to Palmolive is its exclusive blend—and that is one of the world's priceless beauty secrets.

Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer

"More stars than there are in Heaven"

You can win one of these Valuable Prizes

*Can you answer
Norma Shearer's questions?*

Do you "glance" or Do you really see?

EVERY Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer fan has a chance to win one of the valuable prizes I am offering this month. All you have to do is to keep your eyes open and your mind alert when you go to see a Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture. Don't be a "glimpser"—be a "seeker". You may be one of the winners.

To the person who writes the best answers to all the questions in this column, I will present—if it be one of the fair sex—the hand bag I use in "The Waning Sex" and a cash prize of $50. If a man is the lucky one, Buster Keaton will present and sign the boxing gloves he uses in "Battling Butler" together with a cash prize of $50.

To the next fifty lucky ones, I will send my personally autographed photograph finished in a sepia style suitable for framing.

Go to it and best of luck.

Yours cordially,

Norma Shearer

Norma's six questions

- 1 In what Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture does a Mollusk play a prominent part? Who is the director?
- 2 Who plays Musette in La Boheme?
- 3 In what picture does Sally O'Neil fall for Buster Keaton and why?
- 4 In what Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture does Lon Chaney play the part of Singapore Joe? Describe his "make-up" in not more than fifty words.
- 5 Where are the Metro-Goldwyn Mayer Studios?
- 6 What animal is the King of Beasts and where is he most often seen?

Write your answers on one side of a single sheet of paper and mail to M-G-M, 1542 Broadway, New York. All answers must reach us by October 15th. Winners' names will be published in a later issue of this magazine.

In the event of ties, each tying contestant will be awarded a prize identical in value with that tied for.

CLASSIC'S Late News PAGE

CLIVE BROOK has been signed to a long-term contract by Famous Players. His first rôle will be under the direction of Mal St. Clair in "The Popular Sin."

Incidentally, Famous Players have taken Ernst Lubitsch under their wing. His contract with Warner Brothers has been settled by mutual arrangement and hereafter with the single exception of one production he will handle the megaphone for the Paramount stars.

According to the Associated Press, the movie cowboys resent the use of Government troops in the films and have filed formal protest against it. They declare the troopers to be unfair competition.

Lou Tellegen, who has confined his screen work to acting before the camera, will now concentrate as a director. He will produce "His Wife's Honor" for Fox—with Dolores de Rio in the leading rôle.

Altho, Gloria Swanson has purchased "Eyes of Youth," an entirely new story is being written for her first United Artists production. The story once served Clara Kimball Young—and it is understood it was bought for its central theme.

George Jessel, the stage star, who makes his screen début in "Private Izzy Murphy," will appear in a screen version of his stage hit, "The Jazz Singer," which is soon to strike out on a tour of the principal cities.

Good old "Bertha, the Sewing Machine Girl," is to take up her work in the movies. The Fox forces have bought the rights to the celebrated melodrama — and will present Madge Bellamy in the title rôle.

Which reminds us that another old-timer of the days of the high "bike" will soon reach the celluloid state. We introduce "McFadden's Row of Flats," which will fly the First National banner. Charlie Murray, who figured prominently in the stage-play, will have the same rôle on the screen.

"Hurry - Up" Yost, the famous football coach of the University of Michigan, has arrived in New York to handle some of the football sequences in Richard Dix's new picture, "The Quarterback."

The rôle of Jesus of Nazareth in the Cecil B. De Mille production—to be known as "The King of Kings," has been assigned to H. B. Warner.

Lois Weber, the only woman director in the movies, who divorced Phillips Smalley, has cast her former husband for an appearance in "The Sensation Seekers."

Raymond Hitchcock, the famous "Hitchy" of the stage, has returned to the silversheet after many years' absence. He will play one of the leading rôles in Marshall Neilan's new production, "Everybody's Acting."

The first Milton Sills picture, "Men of the Dawn," to be made on the Coast in over a year, is now in production.

Kathryn Menjou was awarded the largest amount of alimony ever given in Los Angeles courts when Judge Hollzer ordered Adolphe Menjou to pay $500 a week for his wife's support, pending trial of the husband's suit for divorce, set for October.

Famous aces of the A. E. F. will take part in "Wings," the film of the world-war air conflicts which is being produced by Famous on the Coast. Many Americans who flew over the German lines as well as French, British and other flyers will appear in the picture. Charles Farrell and Clara Bow have the leading rôles.

Greta Nissen has been signed to play in "The Popular Sin." She is now appearing in Ziegfeld's Revue.

Lupino Lane has returned from London to resume his comedy career in Hollywood—for Educational.

Production has started on "The Charleston Kid," which is the name for the screen version of "Even Stephen." In the cast are Dorothy Mackaill, Jack Mulhall, Louise Brooks and William Collier, Jr.

The w. k. song hit, "Valencia," is destined for the movies. It will be turned into a screen play for Mae Murray—carrying something of the same flavor as "The Merry Widow." Spain will be the locale.

After "The Red Mill," Marion Davies will appear in "Tillie the Toiler."

LAST MINUTE REVIEW "Don Juan"

THERE is an irresistible glamour about any costume picture which revolves around court intrigue, provided it concerns the adventurous amours of a great lover bent upon defying the powers behind the throne. Such a picture is "Don Juan"—which visualizes with great beauty and compelling sweep and power the sway of the Borgias—with the conflict and drama centering around the Spanish lover and his amours.

It is a far jump from "The Sea Beast"—but John Barrymore has negotiated it with plenty to spare. The film presents him in the type of rôle which is most adaptable to his talent and personality.

The profiled John "goes Valentino and Fairbanks" in the way he conquers the hearts of the ladies and rescues the distressed heroine. If he could restrain himself during a death scene, he would pass the examination without an error. As it is, we give him a mark of 98. From the moment that he, as the elder Don, surprises his faithless wife and commits himself to the pastime of "loving 'em and leaving 'em," the film carries the interest at a high pitch. He dresses the part and his sumptuous quarters are just made for romance.

And so it builds from one intrigue to another—saturated as it is with plot and counterplot. There is no let-down in interest. Barrymore makes the most of his amorous adventures—and the suspense becomes overwhelming as one wonders how he'll fare with Lucretia—who has set her cap for him. To defy a Borgia spells death—and death lurks constantly for the dashing Don. But he makes miraculous escapes and routs his playful enemies.

The duel scene is an exciting moment—and Barrymore and Montague Love are immense in their sword play. Estelle Taylor makes a fascinating Borgia, while the others are perfectly cast.

The film is handsomely mounted—the atmosphere suggesting perfectly the period of its settings.

(Illustrated)

by Samuel Goldwyn, the well-known producer

"CHARLIE CHAPLIN and his moods; Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks, drawn together by their complete absorption in pictures; the beginnings of the romance between Geraldine Farrar and Lou Tellegen—and the beginning of its end; the rivalry between Pauline Frederick and Farrar; the fiasco of Mary Garden in films; the discovery of Valentino; the rise of Harold Lloyd; the unhappy isolation of Eric von Stroheim; the eccentricities of Elinor Glyn—these are some of the topics to regale the eager devourer of 'fan' food."

"THERE is intense drama in Mr. Goldwyn's description of the scene in which Geraldine Farrar, sensing the company's disappointment in the results of her pictures, voluntarily tore up a contract worth $250,000."

"IN appearance, so typically feminine, Mary Pickford gives to the romance of business all of a man's response."

Fair Play

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

The "movies" no longer need anyone to defend them, but it doesn't hurt to point out occasionally the "real" in reels, and that is where I now enter the picture.

The world today runs in three gears: those who take it slow and digest a good movie once a month; those who travel at a steady gait of about two a week; and the real fans who take 'em as they come, thick and fast, good, bad and indifferent. They are the little depositors who have boosted the motion picture business until it is roosting right near the top of the ladder of Successful Business.

This baby of commerce was born about the time Henry Ford pointed his nose towards success and it has been a neck-and-neck race ever since to see which one could grow the faster. Both have had an abundance of ridicule, criticism and hard knocks, but both have proved the old saying that you "cant keep a good man down." Henry is now our richest man and gives work to thousands of men and women and the movies do the same and even makes millionaires of a few overnight, and any industry that can do that cant be all bad, as some people seem to think.

Aside from the three speeds spoken of, there are a few persons who have never seen a motion picture, or who have seen only one or two, "just to see if they were as wicked as they were painted." These are they who ask: "Can any good thing come out of Hollywood?" They think every actress is a cigaret-smoking vamp and every actor a drunken sheik. To them, moving pictures are an invention of the devil, designed to lead the present generation right home to Papa in Hades. And they are sure all films are designed to teach the young hopefuls how to hold up a stage, separate happily married couples and show the human figure à la natural, without going to jail for it. Well, after viewing some pictures one must admit that a life class in a Paris art school could go no further and once in a while the thing looks like a lesson in vamp-ology.

But I fail to recall a single picture that showed where immorality or villainy got away with it. And instructions to writers who hope to break thru the Golden Gate (which, by the way, has been moved from San Francisco to Hollywood), via a high-priced scenario are clear on one point. If you introduce a hold-up, a vamp, murder or immoral feature, dont let 'em get away with it! "The wages of sin is death" in a motion picture and anyone who really studies a movie will see that this is a fact.

Once in a while a character who starts out all wrong because of unfortunate circumstances or environment, may find happiness in the last few feet of film, but only after great suffering and atonement. The villain may "pursue her," and even catch her, but the stalwart hero generally overhauls the coward in the third reel and with well-manicured mitts and a two-by-four jaw firmly set, reduces the cringing cur to a kneeling position begging for his life.

Fair-minded people have to admit the movie is an educator in something besides crime. Now they know that the Esquimo and always-noble Mounted Police lie off to the north; that New York with its Statue of Liberty and its gilded restaurants is situated on our eastern boundary; they know what Mexico and Texas have to offer on the south, and they begin to suspect the Great Open Spaces beyond the Rockies of almost anything.

Movies have shown the dwellers of the cities how some of our big outdoor industries are carried on and the most ignorant New Yorker knows now that shingles dont grow in bunches nor do five-dollar gold pieces come out of the ground all ready to spend.

And manner! The most untrained hick has learned how to rise when a lady enters the room; how to give his sombrero and spurs to the butler and how to enter a lady's boudoir, either as a burglar or a casual caller. Tom Mix has taught every cow-puncher west of the Mississippi just how to treat a lady and if he doesn't look quite like Tom it is because the local tailor is short on style!

There are many pictures which children should not see. Yes, but there are many books in the library which a child should not read. That is one excuse for having parents—they are designed to act as shock absorbers to the youth of the land. The old Hebrew law used to forbid a young man under twenty-one from reading a certain book in the Bible and yet it would be absurd to forbid them the whole Bible on that account.

If young people hold up the stages, murder and go wrong because they saw it done in the motion pictures, they are likewise going to sacrifice themselves for right ideals, be brave and true and loving and kind, for there is a lot of that sort of thing to be seen, too!

Very truly yours,

NELLIE B. PARKER.

Not All Progress

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

In your July issue, Mr. Henry Albert Phillips struck the key-note of one serious trouble that threatens to retard motion picture production, both as an art and as a popular medium of entertainment. He tells us what we have long known, that in buying the works of noted authors for motion pictures, the producer is really "buying their name, not their story."

They may get a good picture story in the transaction, but in nine cases out of ten—perhaps oftener—they get merely a "skeleton," as Mr. Phillips calls it. This skeleton they hand over to their own scenarists, who obligingly reclothe it in suitable screen flesh. And so, the public is cheated, the producer is cheated (altho he seems not to realize it), while the author waxes fat on his reputation.

Now a man may be ever so good a writer of stories, yet be a failure on screen material. For a story may be supported mainly by its psy-

COULD you come home behind yourself from the bridge club some afternoon, what would you see? . . . A lady (a little larger than you thought you were) in the dress you gave so much time and effort to choosing. . . . But hardly the dress you expected you were wearing. This one rises up where it shouldn't, pulls in where it ought not to. Instead of being effective, its lines are—bad. Instead of curves, you can actually see ridges where your corsets end!

If this could happen to you, don't blame your dress or your figure. But do see that you have a foundation garment that fits you perfectly before you wear the dress again.

The new Bon Ton Foundation Garments are perfectly designed, perfectly cut, perfectly finished. They fit your figure and make certain that your clothes will fit. Absolutely smart and in the mode, they are planned each season to suit each season's fashions. Among the girdles and bandeaux, the Brassiere Cor-Sets and the Step-Ins; the Back-lace and Front-lace Models and the special styles is a type of garment for every type of figure.

You will be charmed with the appearance of the garments themselves, as well as their fit and comfort. And in keeping with the tradition of this famous old concern, prices are reasonable for highest quality merchandise. Royal Worcester Corset Company, Worcester, Mass.

F. W. MURNAU

The German Genius of the Films

By MATTHEW JOSEPHSON

"SIMPLICITY!
Greater and greater simplicity—that will be the keynote of the new films."

Murnau was speaking with ardor, gesticulating with his long limbs, whenever his English, altho correct and without foreign accent, failed him.

"Our whole effort," he went on, "must be bent toward ridding motion pictures of all that does not belong to them, of all that is unnecessary and trivial and drawn from other sources—all the tricks, gags, 'business' not of the cinema, but of the stage and the written book. That is what has been accomplished when certain films reached the level of great art. That is what I tried to do in 'The Last Laugh.' We must try for more and more simplicity and devotion to pure motion picture technique and material."

Exactly what I had longed to hear someone say here. Exactly what I hoped this giant of the moving pictures would say. But then Murnau went on to say something which gives his own spirit and personal style completely. Listen:

"In the film you give a picture, for instance, of an object, a thing, and it has drama for the eye; because of the way it has been placed, or photographed, because of its relation to the other people or things in this film, it carries on the melody of the film."

This is Murnau, the man who created the most vivid drama we have ever seen out of the simplest and lowliest things in "The Last Laugh"; who made brass instruments ring with music on the screen, or lit up faces so that they were loud with speech; probably the finest director who has come to us from Germany.

His Influence Is Felt

WHAT will his influence be here, I wondered? It has been very great already. It is not as if we have been backward, for in the last year or two a number of film masterpieces made by American or American-trained directors follow the same tendencies as those of Murnau. They are simple to the utmost and built solidly on the resources of the cinema—pictures like Vidor's "Big Parade," Cruze's "Covered Wagon," Henry King's "Stella Dallas." And yet there are people who grumble at the inroads of foreign film stars and directors. How silly! If they could only see the mountains of inferior American celluloid that are shipped to foreign countries and blissfully consumed by the populace.

Caricature of Murnau by Leo Kober

F. W. Murnau arrives at exactly the psychological moment, as we are on the verge of an era of truly great motion pictures. In his valise he brought with him a new epoch-making film, "Faust," which is to have its first showing in America. At the very moment, "Variety," a seriously inspired German picture, was playing to filled houses with the temperature at ninety. He is deeply interested in America; he has few false ideas about it; least of all that it is impossible to do anything fine over here.

And he is here at the behest of the Fox Film Company, seldom noted hitherto for artistic films, but now going in for bigger things.

He is not merely a giant of the films as I have described him, but in stature towers some six feet and several inches. He is red haired; he has keen, steady eyes and quiet hands. He is a calm man, not easily ruffled or thrown into despair. His manner is unconventional, not at all formal or formidable as that of many Europeans. He is young, not much over thirty-five; his understanding and his knowledge are broad. I think that his abilities will make him respected, and his quiet, personal charm (so happily lacking in useless "temperament") will make him liked.

Murnau was born of good family in a small town of Westphalia. He was well educated. He became interested in the theater a few years before the war, at a time when great things were being done in the theater by men like Gordon Craig, Max Reinhardt and Granville Barker. He worked under the wing of Max Reinhardt as an actor and stage director in the world-famous Grosses Schauspielhaus of Berlin. He was doing small things, but learning much under the brilliant Reinhardt, whose production, "The Miracle," has thrilled so many thousands of Americans. Another young German was working quietly with Murnau under Reinhardt. They became friends, and were destined to become masters of a new art. The other young fellow's name was Ernst Lubitsch.

When the Great War came, young Murnau found himself in the first line of infantry, in the Royal Guards. Then for a year he was an officer in the aviation corps. Like many of us, he was glad when it was all over, and he turned from the art of the theater to the budding motion picture industry.

Some of the most famous German actors, Emil Jannings, Werner Krauss, Paul Wegener, went into motion pictures.

Few Good Ones in Germany

WE talked about the German situation. What Murnau said will surprise many people.

"Contrary to the impression prevailing here, very few good pictures are being made in Germany. There are few good directors or actors; there are few people who know anything about the cinema.

The big companies are loaded with deadwood, sheep. They follow the tide, just as it is followed here. When an interesting experiment turns out to be a hit, as 'Caligari' did over there, they all imitate it. Or 'Variety.' They are all doing circus pictures now. Those who have really been doing things, the talented, far-sighted men, have simply been feeling their way along. The artists who made 'Caligari' had no idea when they started out what their results would be. And yet they discovered some wonderful things, they were pioneers."

"Too much influence of the modern stage," I suggested.

"Exactly. I have had to forget everything I learned about the stage. We have had to throw overboard everything that suggests the theater."

Here, Murnau spoke with utmost feeling and reverence for Max Reinhardt.

"I feel unbounded admiration for him. He knows more about the theater than anybody living. I can never tell in words how much association with him meant to me. He seems to know everything, follow everything. He was the most inspiring of men to work under. He is an old man now and very tired; but he is deeply interested in what we are doing in the screen. What we need is a Max Reinhardt of the cinema."

"Most of the film stars in Europe, like Jannings, come from the stage?" I asked.

"Yes, but that isn't necessary," said Murnau. "We dont need trained stage actors for the movies. There is splendid material everywhere which directors must take over and mold for the purposes of the film."

Like most of the fine German directors, Murnau has a passion for perfecting each detail of his picture. That is one of the distinguishing features of the better importations. In a pinch, Murnau told me, he would rather have a raw, untrained person, who had never played before, than a seasoned star.

Working over his last picture, "Faust," he searched for many months before he found a young female apparition who suited the part of Gretchen; she is the beautiful Camilla Horn, a discovery he is particularly proud of. Her face had just the degree of innocence and child-like beauty he wanted. What a search it must have been in these times!

"In that way," said Murnau, "I get exactly the effect, the feeling I want into the picture.

"For the character of Faust I found a truly old man, a Swede, Gösta Ekman, who had seldom played before on the screen."

High Praise for Jannings

"BUT Jannings is an amazing screen actor," I said.

"Yes, one of the finest in the world, and a dear friend of mine. Do not misunderstand me. Few people really know how to play before the camera. Jannings is superb before it. The secret of his power is that he uses his whole body for suggestion. He is like this — (Murnau was puffing out his chest and throwing up his shoulders) big as a mountain when he is playing a king. And when he

LEST the impression be created thru the title of these stories, together with the atmosphere of the dim movie past which flavors them, that the chronicler is a patriarch with flowing white beard and joints of Ford-like propensities for creaking, may he say now that he, thirty-five, is still recognized as an able-bodied press-agent and manages to cover the distance between his home and the offices of the Brewster magazines without the aid of a wheel-chair. So kaleidoscopic, so fast moving, so ever-changing, is this business of the movies and its personalities that sixteen years in the studios may encompass experiences and mark transitions which a normal industry could bring about only in a stretch of time twice the period set forth.

Looking back thru the years from 1910, the days of the Bunnys, the Costellos, the Turners, the Lawrences, the Johnsons, the Fullers, the Baggotts, the Blacktons, the Inces, the Sennetts, the Broncho Billys and Alkali Ikes, the single stage studio and the double lens camera, the split reel and the custard-pie comics, the cold finger of fact may point and point to the Moores, the Lloyds, the Langdons, the Negris, the Swansons, the Fairbanks, the Stroheims, the Coogans, the magnificent ten-stage studios, the great salaries, the stereoscopic cameras, the huge spectacles—point to it all in its immensity and its improvement. But to those who made the movies in 1910—"Them were the happy days."

Those Early Vitagraph Days

I WAS fortunate enough in that year to join the ranks of those pioneers, Blackton, Rock and Smith, in the capacity of publicity man for the aggregation of movie players known as the Vitagraph stock company. The word publicity then in connection with motion pictures meant simply the bare announcement of the title of the film, a brief synopsis of its story and at rare intervals the names of the players who appeared in it. To Sam Spedon, now dead, must go the credit for being one of the first men of the movies quick to recognize the tremendous public interest evinced in players of the screen and to gratify that interest by acquainting the early fans with the names of their favorite troupers and with information concerning their personalities. As Spedon's assistant, I had a hand in the work of "telling the world" about the early Vitagraph performers, a work which today involves the use of departments of specialized writers, artists and advertising men. Two of us did it then.

The Vitagraph company in 1910 was located in what was then an obscure part of Flatbush, a suburb which existed only so that vaudeville monologists could pull wheezes about it. The studio was a one-stage affair, glassed in. Its entire lighting equipment would be hardly sufficient for the illumination of a single set in one of the average program films of today. Despite this fact I ran thru my fingers recently a strip of old Vitagraph negatives—one of the first pictures in which John Bunny appeared. The images were perfect, the photography clear and sharp, the film itself in excellent condition. The cameras were cumbersome affairs, made more so by the use of double lenses, which meant that two

To the Vitagraph of the old days belongs the greatest credit for making American manufactured movies the most popular in the world. To strengthen the hold which their films were acquiring on the early fans of Great Britain and the Continent, Messrs. Blackton, Rock and Smith on various occasions sent John Bunny and Maurice Costello abroad. The personalities of the rollicking fat comic and the dashing leading man on these tours increased by many thousands the followers of Vitagraph movies in foreign lands.

Many Stars Discovered

AND what a parade of present-day celebrities passed before the lens of those old-fashioned double-action cameras, in many instances making up the meagre handful of extras who supplied the necessary background atmosphere for the work of Florence Turner, Costello, Bunny, Flora Finch, Lillian Walker, Earle Williams, Wally Van, Edith Storey and other former idols of screendom.

I have stood on the sidelines of a set in the old days watching the late and much loved Wally Reid playing atmosphere, the present-day widely known Harry Morey appearing in three small, but distinct characters in the one film (because of his constant portrayal of a policeman Harry was familiarly known around the studio as "the Vitagraph cop"). I have seen Constance Talmadge third in a row of sweet young extras supporting Wally Van in one of his comedies while the then unknown Norma, her sister, was just beginning to attract the watchful eye of J. Stuart Blackton with her promise of dramatic ability in minor rôles.

I have seen Ralph Ince, later to be one of the screen's greatest delineators of Abraham Lincoln and among the present day's most competent directors, nonchalantly assisting in the erection of a set, hammer in belt, and afterwards playing a small rôle in support of Kenneth Casey, the first child artist, on the same set. The bright-eyed, trim little girl who filed her name for work with Harry Mayo, the first casting director of the production field, used a name which goes up regularly today in electric lights on the marquees of the world's biggest movie houses—Norma Shearer. THE newsreel cameraman. Let's give this little boy a hand, folks; Heaven knows he hardly ever gets it. Tho he travels in jungles with snakes trying to pierce his boots, tho he makes his tortuous way on chilblained feet in the north country, tho he climbs mountains, and penetrates fire and water for an unusual picture, nobody ever hears about him, and tho movie audiences sometimes wonder how a certain effect could be achieved in the face of evident danger, they seldom take their curiosity out of the theater with them.

A few months ago, film patrons were thrilled to behold the vast whiteness of the North Pole spread out before them upon the screen; lazy icebergs floating imperceptibly, masses of snow and ice with scarcely a break between, and, like a bee, a swift airplane that darted thru the frozen solitude to write a brilliant page in aerial history.

And a few weeks before that, on the same motion picture screens, a cataract of steaming lava was shown plunging its way down a Hawaiian countryside, sweeping before the terrible majesty of its power native huts and giant palm trees as if they were cardboard toys. Audiences were properly awed to see before them these distant phenomena while they themselves sat safely and comfortably in the upholstered chairs of their favorite theaters.

Always On the Job

WHY is a news cameraman? He, least of anyone, can tell you the reason. I asked half a dozen of the veterans and the only answer I got was, "I dont know. It sort of gets you and first thing you know, you cant get along without it." Anyone who has known the smell of newsprint, or that indefinable odor that exists only backstage, or the acrid aroma of tanbark in the circus, or the particular poignancy of any job that one loves, knows just how the cameraman feels.

celebrities? Being a part of a mad, mad chase for adventure? Variety? Romance? Wanderlust? Not any of these things and yet a mixture of all of them keeps the news photographer on his job in winter or summer, day or night, sun or storm, in all the extremities you can name.

A cat may look at a king, but a cameraman may give him orders. When titled personages visit our shores, they are told how to stand, how to sit, how to smile, to talk and to walk for the benefit of the movie camera. What is more, most of them obey. The cameraman must know not only how to work his machine; he must be able to sell an idea to the person he wants to photograph, for some people are notoriously camera shy.

"Smile, your Majesty," a cameraman told the King of Belgium when he visited Manhattan, and the King smiled. Another directed the Prince of Wales to look up at the Woolworth Building in amazement. You probably remember the shot of his royal shyness doing exactly that. He takes personalities like Gloria Swanson and Suzanne Lenglen, known for their temperament, and makes them do what he wishes by suavely whispered words of advice.

Goes Everywhere, Sees Everything

To attempt to count all the newsreel men in this country would be a pretty hopeless job. The corps of photographers needed by a news film agency spreads like a network over the face of the whole nation, the whole world. A good picture may happen anywhere. A fire, a parade of negro children, a Chinese wedding festival, the birth of quadruplets—if you go to the movies at all, you know that the news camera goes everywhere and sees everything.

Since it would be beyond the power of even million-dollar concerns to employ regularly this immense army of photographers, the newsreel works in much the same way that a newspaper does. A metropolitan newspaper has a staff of reporters who are given assignments in their own city and occasionally sent out of town to "cover" a story. In addition to the regular staff there are district men whose duty it is to keep watch over their particular fields, the police courts, the suburbs and so on. But besides all these men, there are the space writers who are scattered all over the country to report any

MORE INSIDE FACTS

By PERCY KNIGHTON

Drawings by Seymour Ball

THE CLASSIC of the April issue contained an article, "Inside Facts About the Extra." That story covered a portion of the problems of the extra, not all the troubles and trials were mentioned. This is a sequel story.

Since the publication of the article already mentioned, a new method of getting work has been established, it is more difficult now to break down the barriers which lead to even an ordinary day's work. Here goes the blow!

For the first time in the last century I managed to corner a very well-known and attractive young lady who does the greater part of the casting for a large production unit. She was chosen because she handles a great army, an army that outnumbers the World War forces in action and desire, and, after telling her of my purpose, she sighed and said, "Oh, I would like to write a book about the movies and Hollywood!" She sighed again and added, "There is so much, so much, I wonder why people kid themselves, I wonder?"

In case you are in doubt about her deep sigh and her intense desire to write volumes about Hollywood, then, take a few moments and read on, read this artless tale which is written for your guidance, providing of course, you are planning a picture career. And if you are not bent upon the movie profession, if you do not intend to board the movie train, then, read it to see "why people kid themselves!"

The Day of Reckoning

EVIDENTLY, Mr. Will Hays had the same thought, and, the same question to solve. For not very long ago an organization was born overnight. It was The Central Casting Bureau. It is now The Central Casting Bureau. This baby of the movies is owned and operated by the world's largest producers. And it had to be done! Why?

So far, many hundreds of good, intelligent people who hitherto had worked in pictures for a long time, and, those who were fairly successful, now find it almost impossible to get work anywhere. A passport to Heaven would be an easy task in comparison to getting a job, direct or indirect, or thru the Central Office. Herein lies a story—one, which may add insult to indigestion. But I shall tell the truth and go on playing faithfully my rôle—the jackass.

During the "old days" when most of us were doing fairly well, averaging a meal every other day or so, there was in full force and existence a firm known as Screen Service of Los Angeles. This body of classic gentlemen handled an enormous business which seemed legitimate, popular and efficient. Ah! 'twas many a slice of bread Dear Old Screen Service passed the professional extra who knew his or her business. (They couldn't be registrants of "Screen" unless they knew their stuff.)

And Screen Service took seven per cent. (7%) of your salary for getting the job for you. Merely a crumb from the whole loaf. And so far as the eagle eye could see, everybody seemed happy, prosperous and pure. With the exception of a few "favorites" whom screen service officers boosted and kept busy most of the time, there was little reason for kick or complaint from any person. Everything, as the song writer said, is hotsy totsy now—only it was then. You could get work at the studio casting offices then. In exceptional cases some get work that way now. But most every person is gotten from The Great Central Office.

Now there crept thruout the United States a monster serpent of desire among other jackasses who well deserve their title because they wanted "to go to Hollywood and become famous overnight and send Ma and Pa a thousand silver seed the next morning after arrival."

From Every Walk of Life

THE hour of reckoning came when Old Screen Service's files bulged from a burden of thousands of names; names of people who made a list ranging from a Podunk graduate of some dramatic school to a model for neckties and hats. Yes, names! names! names making a crossword puzzle look flimsy. There was the beautiful, golden-curled, perfect stage child, the fancy-vested swain who could tell you the price of butter and eggs.

Indeed, there were the big chicken dealers, hobos, farmhands, cowboys, swindlers, consumptives, tired business men seeking adventure, cripples, safe crackers, weak-minded and brilliant, the society damsel and the dollar divers, the wets and dries, Republicans and Democrats, radicals, black and white, pale and pink, short and long, blondes and brunettes, soldiers, sailors and slackers, prize-fighters, wrestlers, barbers and boiler-makers, and, assuredly, ladies and gentlemen! Ah! ladies and gentlemen. It is true that each of us will believe ourselves the latter. But it will be best for you to take the pair of shoes that fits and take a walk—a walk back home to old trails and past efforts. And you'll succeed, get along in the world.

The tidal-wave brought the thousands from all parts demanding their share of movie fame and fortune.

ABOUT the EXTRA

A Remarkable Real Life Document of the Many Who Call and the Few Who Are Chosen

And some of those thousands descended upon Old Screen Service like a cloudburst. "Why do they kid themselves, I wonder?"

And along came Mr. Will Hays to make the thousandth and one! He left behind a wonderful job (can you beat it?) in Washington, D. C., to join the rest of us. But he came to be the Great Leader. That's different. And he has done well. Not long was it until the people—all those mentioned, made a plea to Mr. Hays to help them. He did, too. He sent a mob "back home and broke." But those who refused lingered on still hoping, still demanding, something which never existed for them. And they had to pick on Screen Service as their objective of Trouble and Turmoil. Why should there be an organization to take from us a percentage of our salaries? (Most of them never drew a dollar from motion pictures.)

Trouble brewed and stewed worse than your home-made beer. Finally, such pressure was brought to surface that only one outlet seemed available; only one avenue of escape or relief seemed near or possible. Yes! kill Screen Service! Ah! there is the Shiver in Screenland; the Shake in the Service; the "nigger" in the wildwood; the odor in Smellville. Or the decomposed nicotine in Copenhagen!—Hollywood. Do away with such graft! We appeal to you, Mr. Hays, to help us. Great problems came to Mr. Hays, greater than some of those in his past affiliations with the Government. Before and After.

Still Kidding Themselves

BUT he did the trick, he gave the poor fools what they wanted—and they're still kicking, crying and belly-aching, and, flocking to Hollywood. Nay, I say unto you, fair little casting director or "directress," "Why do they kid themselves, I wonder?"

On several occasions I have given little talks to people in the movies. In one instance it was a group of aspirants who had never worked a day in pictures. In the other instance it was a group of "old timers" with whom I have worked at different times. And be it known that I really thought these people wanted the truth. Did they? NO!

My popularity probably fell below sea level when I told them that their own predicament was due to their own shortsightedness and stupidity; that their food supply (they do not need coal in California) was diminished because, as that song writer said, they forget to remember. And those who, apparently, have been left in the rain without umbrellas forgot to take a peep at the black sky made that way by means and manners already stated, plus that same complex which daily finances Hollywood-bound trains. They forgot to remember!

When the big day dawned, came reveille tragically spreading its weird note of defeat for those now in hopeless combat with their enemy. And if this is mutely demonstrated, then, it is certainly obvious to those who could help in a way, that to shun an act of "getting them in" is only indicative of a decision in the negative because of the silly, foolish methods of past activities. And on the parts of those mentioned.

It is true that many clubs have been organized, studio-actors-uplift-civic clubs they are

They come from every walk of life—these extras, and their names would make a cross-word puzzle look flimsy. A passport to Heaven would be an easy task in comparison to getting a job in the movies

JOHNS GALSWORDTHY is considered one of England's greatest novelists and playwrights. Without thinking at all, one would think that the whole "rotten" condition of the Movies could be rectified in a twinkling by this biggest-calibred English dramatist of the day. Here was the Hercules who takes the whole movie earth on his shoulders and walks off with it.

For the man who had written novels like "The Forsyte Saga" and "The Patrician," and plays like "Loyalties" and "Justice," surely the writing of a little photoplay would be less than child's play. I determined to run up and have a little chat with Galsworthy about it, since I happened to be in London at the time.

John Galsworthy lives in one of the most charming as well as select suburbs of London, Hampstead. It is a zig-zag journey out there, altho Hampstead is actually in London. You take the Underground at Piccadilly, change at Oxford Circus for the Central London where you ride to Tottenham Court Road and change again for the City and South London Line that takes you straight to Hampstead. I found Miss Kennedy just as retiring and reserved as her book had been forward and loquacious. She confessed almost in the first words that she liked the films.

Weren't they going to film the "Nymph," I asked.

"It cant be filmed—in America, where I believe that practically all of the filming is being done, I understand. You see the book has been censored and therefore cant be done. I cant see what they object to. The children in the story were too young, or something of that sort. Fancy! When I look about and see what they are doing!"

"What? Who?" I asked. "The children or the films?"

"Both," she smiled. "The Film Company has

Consider the Films

"What I resent in the films is that you get thoroly emotionalized sitting there for two or three hours waiting for something worthwhile to happen—and then you find that you have been scuffered. It isn't that they dont try to give you something. They do, and fail!"—John Galsworthy.

"The movies are always making a mistake by writing down, and I dont think anything is ever accomplished by writing down, to the public. It is a backward step to be always underestimating the calibre of the public mind."—Margaret Kennedy.

"Motion pictures are intricacies—and intricacies are concerned with the mind and not the emotions. It is my theory that a good player or story is bound to hold a house full of human people—and human people are bound to be held thruout the portrayal of any great emotion."—Lord Dunsany.

The Sixth and Concluding Talk About Motion Pictures With Famous English and Continental Writers

ALL said and done, the successful production of a gratifying photodrama is a work of Art. In this Anno Domini, this film Art reaches, entertains and moves more people than all the other Arts put together. Finally, the Movies is the simplest of the Arts by far. Neither a special nor even a general education is necessary in order either to understand or be entertained by it. The only equipment requisite for an audience seems to be a normal heart, a set of healthy emotions, a smattering of human interest and a wee bit of imagination. Being gifted with too many brains will often spoil the show.

The above does not sound like a definition of an Art at all. It might be a calisthenic exercise, or an international kindergarten formula. It all seems too low-brow and too easy for an Art thesis. Wherein lies any glory for "artistic" people who are always seeing things in Art works that the common herd never can see—or never want to? Art has always been "difficult," both to make and to understand. Therefore, calling this new upstart of an entertainment an LORD DUNSANY'S plays lend themselves admirably to film translation. "The Gods of the Mountains," "The Golden Doom," and "The Glittering Gate," are gossamer sort of works to which only a "drama of silence and shadows" can do full justice. We have not begun to see and feel the wonders that the screen conceals in its power to portray mysterious, ghostly, far-off things such as Lord Dunsany writes.

I asked Lord Dunsany to explain to me why he always sought out ancient and mysterious problems.

"I portray them because the oldest emotions are the deepest. Things that concern New York and London are no older than New York and London. The whole world is filled with intricacies and intricacies are concerned with the mind and not the emotions."

Among the intricacies I knew that he numbered the motion picture, for he is not sold on the motion picture idea, altho he goes to see them.

Synopsis of Preceding Chapters

JONQUIL is a child of the theater. With parents associated with a traveling repertoire company, the little girl is thrown constantly into a shabby make-believe world that jars her sensibilities. She loathes everything connected with the lives of show people—the ill-smelling dressing-rooms, the grease-paint, the shoddy hotel rooms, the badly cooked meals—and, above all, she cannot take her parents seriously, especially when they play tragic rôles.

Jonquil longs for the things of life associated with velvet lawns and shady trees. She wants to be like other little girls—play with dolls and wear becoming dresses. She has no place she can call home. Her life is spent between watching her parents or playing child rôles—or crying herself to sleep in an unkempt room.

After her mother's death, Jonquil grew out of child rôles and her father, frankly disappointed with her, takes her to her grandmother's country home. He is determined to be rid of her and advises her that if her grandmother doesn't want her, she will have to be sent to an orphanage.

Jonquil's joy at leaving the stage is mixed with sadness. She anticipates an aloofness on the part of the grandmother, whose idea of stage people is something not to be encouraged. Tremblingly she proceeds to make herself at home and wonders over her reception.

Now you can begin with the current instalment.

PAINTED PEOPLE

By FAITH SERVICE

Illustrated by Douglas Ryan

PAPA was speaking in his most sonorous, most portentous voice. He was clearing his throat a great deal and breaking out into little husky silences. It was just as if he were delivering an oration or one of those curtain speeches he made whenever there was, or was not, the faintest opportunity. It did seem as if papa might know that this was the supremely one time NOT to talk like this. It did seem that he might sense that this was not the way to talk in Three Trees, on Grandmother Roger's cleanly swept front porch, in front of Grandmother Rogers herself. It came to Jonquil as a faint far instinct that this was the reason papa had not got very far in his profession. He didn't ever sense anything.

Stories of the theater are ever fascinating. They become particularly fascinating when they depict a highly sensitized character determined to escape the tinsel of the show world. Such a character is the heroine of Faith Service's story, "Painted People." The author has written an absorbing tale of a girl reared in the atmosphere of the theater—who tries to find expression in the things that count in life. Readers of the CLASSIC will find in Faith Service's serial story all the elements that enliven the imagination.

Funny that he didn't see the look of contempt on Grandmother Roger's face—when it was so painfully evident.

Grandmother Roger's face was thinner than the face Jonquil had dreamed of. It had sharp little angles, like pin-pricky places. She had dreamed of a rosier face, more comfy. . . . Oh; well, you cant have everything and after all, it was a great deal to have a Grandmother Rogers with a white and green house in a white and green New England town . . . with nice people . . . particularly a great deal when you happened to be the child of Percival de Vere. . . .

Grandmother Rogers might have called out to you and told you to "run along" when she saw you advancing so fantastically up her garden path. That garden path . . . those glimpses of wallflowers and zinnias and petunias and quaint stiff sweet-william and droopy asters, rosy and violet and white . . . perhaps they would let her help take care of the flowers . . . oh, but what was she thinking? Why did she run on the way she did? When Grandmother might not even be going to let her stay? Her face did look forbidding. Cold. Edged. Her lips a little blue and drawn like a taut thread across the tombiness of her teeth.

Papa was saying, "Well, daughter . . ." (he had never called her daughter before in his life) "Well, daughter . . . ahem . . . your grandmother has very kindly consented to . . . ahem . . . take charge of you for the . . . ahem . . . trial period of one year. Very kindly. Very. She makes the stipulation that you . . . ahem . . . behave yourself like the . . . ahem . . . little lady your poor dear mother and . . . ahem . . . and I have always trained you to be to the best of our . . . ahem . . . poor powers . . . I have told your grandmother that this is the . . . ahem . . . final sacrifice for me . . . the final . . . well, shall we say giving up? But a father's duty . . . paternal protective-ness . . . all those considerations enter in . . . the separation will cut my . . . ahem . . . heart strings . . . will leave me very much alone . . . sadly desolate . . . but I feel it to be the . . . ahem . . . best thing for you . . . I . . ."

It was Grandmother Rogers who finally cut the declamation short. Just in time, too, Jonquil felt. Her father seemed to be working himself up to a bigger "scene" than she had ever seen him portray upon the stage. He seemed to be throwing himself into this suddenly conceived and fantastically executed part with a gusto that was really alarming. The veins on his forehead stood out alarmingly. The pulses in his thick throat seemed to be tiny hammers of horrid force. Again Jonquil had the uncanny intuition that he was doing all this so dramatically because he so much didn't want her, not because he so much did.

She felt an almost unbearable scorn of him. Did he feel that he was deceiving anyone? Did he think that they believed him?

Grandmother Roger's voice when it broke in was like the tinkle of thin ice . . . those long blue slivers of ice that can cut your hands so abominably.

"It isn't necessary, Mr. de Vere," she said, "to draw this preposterous scene out any longer. I have told you that I will take the child. If she is quiet and well behaved she may remain with me—because she is a child, not because she belonged to—your wife. It seems to be my duty. The ways of Almighty God are inscrutable and no one knows this so well as myself. The child may remain—my one stipulation is that you do not put in another appearance unless sent for."

Percival made a gesture intended to be a compound of finally bitter resignation, despair and martyrdom. It was a masterly effort. It occurred to Jonquil that he was playing all this much more professionally than many scenes she had watched him blunder thru behind the footlights. It was because it meant so much to him—to get rid of her. It was so that he could be alone with Rosie, with the girls who smelled of rank perfume and giggled and sent for orange juice. . . .

His footsteps resounded as they departed down the trim garden path. Jonquil supposed that the old-fashioned flowers, the murmurous trees had never seen such another spectacle.

She and Grandmother Rogers were left alone. She felt a sort of yearning well up in her thinly rounding breasts. It wasn't homesickness for her father. Not that. She hoped passionately that she need never see him again. It wasn't anything to do with the old life. . . . It was, rather, the simple craving for human contact. If Grandmother Rogers would open her arms to her . . . fold her against her breast . . . comfort all the little wounds . . . the little insulting wounds that were not little to her . . . the terrible little wounds of childhood. . . .

A Story of the Footlights and Kleigs

She felt heavy tears pressing against her throat and at the backs of her eyes. She knew that they mustn't come thru. That same fine sensitiveness to what was expected of her that was to make her shadow performances such delicate etchings in the years to come restrained her, made her know that Grandmother Rogers would not be tender to heavy, thuddy tears . . . the bursty kind. . . .

She wanted to sob out, "I'm going to stay . . . I'm going to stay. . . ." She wanted to run down and kiss the trim door-step, the tiny bluets, the comforting small faces of the pansies . . . but she felt, surely, that Grandmother Rogers would despise such theatricalism.

You would have to hold yourself in with Grandmother Rogers. You would have to cut a little pattern for yourself. You would have to fit into it and stay fitted into it. Neatly. Nicely.

She looked at her Grandmother with eyes that were clouded densely with the held-back tears.

She went over to her and slipped her hand thru her arm. She couldn't help that one little gesture. She had to allow herself that. She needed human contact so.

"You needn't worry, Grandma," she said, "he wont ever come back."

He never did.

THERE were whole days and weeks and months when Jonquil loved it.

She loved it so that she wanted to take the whole neat green and white town, including the George Inn where General Washington had slept, to her eager little breast.

She loved her Grandmother's house especially. She felt, at first, that it would be enough for her, always, that it would satisfy her, that she would be able to live and dream in it, alone.

The parlor with the dully shining floor and the oval braided rugs and the lovely pieces of old mahogany, dulled, too, to an everlasting polish. Beautiful sheen to them, beautiful to pass your fingers over them, softly. Beautiful dignity, because they had stood just there for so many years, had been so carefully tended.

She loved the white winding stairway and the flowered wall-papers and the tall four-poster beds with their gay patchwork quilts. She could amuse herself for hours figuring over one of the patchwork quilts. That bit of gay damask, that bit of cherry taffeta, that incongruous triangle of percale. . . .

Clean . . . clean . . . the fresh smell of matting and soap-suds and beeswax . . . the fresh swish of laundered curtains in the breeze. . . .

The old attic. Old trunks and chests and corded boxes and piles of magazines. Hoarded things. Things that people had lived with and loved and kept.

She loved the food. The fresh eggs, the home-made bread and pickle and preserve, the smell of cake and pie on baking days. Even the boiled New England dinners.

She took a personal pride in the vegetables, because she often picked them herself from the kitchen garden; because she had helped old Elijah, the hired man, hoe them and weed them. Old Elijah told her stories about her mother when she was a little girl . . . her mother had helped in the garden, too, had planted flower seeds and tended bulbs . . . how could she ever have gone away with Percival de Vere, red-faced, bulbous?

She loved helping Grandmother Rogers in the sunny kitchen in the mornings, wiping the old willow dishes to a shining freshness, laying them away in piles in the white-papered cabinets. Oh, everything was so clean . . . so shiny and sudsy and fresh . . . how could, how could her mother have left such a heaven-life for Percival de Vere with his cheap, silly suits, his loud, put-on voice?

Jonquil never quite knew how it all happened, but she got the stench of dark unhappy things in the gossip that went on among the old ladies. It was cruel gossip that flayed pretty young things and hurt and stung like whip lashes

And How a Girl Solves Her Destiny

She even loved the Bible readings Sunday evenings when she and Grandmother Rogers would sit under the lamp in the parlor and Grandmother would read brimstone passages in her ice-cold trickle of a voice.

Now and again when Grandmother was reading the Bible aloud to her, there came the thin little thread of the thought that Grandmother hated her. But that, of course, was absurd. Grandmothers never hate their grandchildren. It was just Grandmother Roger's way. It was because she was neat and precise and cool and had always looked on peaceful, shiny things. It was because she, Jonquil, had been used to hot greasy kisses, fierce sudden embraces, the smotheration of pet names, and lollipops and gawgaw presents.

Grandmother Rogers took her to church every Sunday, too. It was a long service, but Jonquil didn't mind. She was doing now, what all nice little girls with nice houses and front porches and decent gingham dresses did. Even the sermons didn't seem too dull to her. She could sit very erect in the pew, feel elegant and nice. Some of the other little girls stared at her, but they couldn't stare at her as little girls in other towns had done, because now she was Grandmother Roger's child and had nothing to do with the stock company or Percival de Vere. She wished that her Grandmother would introduce her to some of the little girls. It would be fun to have little girl friends, to go off on berrying parties as she had seen some of the town children doing, on picnics in the woods and to the lakes where there was wading and swimming. But, of course, you can't have everything . . . no doubt Grandmother was waiting to see that she behaved herself like a little lady and then all the rest would follow. . . . Besides, in the fall, she would go to school and then she would get to know the girls . . . there would be little clubs and things. . . .

She didn't like to say anything to Grandmother about little girls, for fear Grandmother would think she was lonely, complaining . . . when she wasn't—very.

How she came to hate it!

Was she always to hate everything? Was there nothing for her to love? No one?

But this hate was worse, if possible, than the hate of the grease-paint and the leading women and her father and the smell of back-stage. This hate was cold and thin like knives running into you. It was frightful because it was love turned to hate and there is no hate quite so frightful as that.

The very things she had loved so . . . the flowers . . . petunias and gladioli and stock and marigold . . . lovely fragrant names turned to gall on her lips . . . smug things that she could not touch, that she was not allowed to touch. . . . "What do you know about flowers, Miss?"

How she hated the house, too. The furniture with its smug self-assurance, its air of being invincibly right, beyond reproach. The priggish clean sheets smelling, self-consciously, of lavender. The smugger little bedroom which was hers, the smell of the matting on the floor, the fresh wall-paper on the wall, the beeswax on the floor. The dampish odor that exuded from it all when it rained out of doors. The plain, wholesome, now-savourless food eaten with that holy air of beneficence and a false air of humility and gratitude. The front porch where you sat and rocked and rocked and then rocked some more and watched the other girls in the town go by, arms locked, in twos and threes and fours, pretending not to see you there when you knew so painfully well that they did see you, that they were talking about you. . . .

The "nice" girls of the town. Too nice for Percival de Vere's daughter. Their sideway glances, their giggles, their titterings.

Their little mean, scimped ways. The ways they were nice to you in school when the teacher was around, when she was looking, the ways they waited to show you that you were an outsider and always would be when they were unobserved.

The insulting way you got invited to some of the bigger parties in town, the school and community parties to which everyone was invited, even the factory girls in the class. The way you were omitted from the small informal gatherings where all the good times were held.

That bold brassy girl, Hilda Helm, who had said to you one day, "Well, you needn't look at us as tho we are crucifiers . . . your own grandmother told our

The Keystone Kop Who Became a DIRECTOR

By PETER MILNE

IT appears to be a popular illusion among magazine editors that motion picture directors are not interesting enough to be brought before the public in a close-up.

As Jesse Lasky would say, let us proceed to debunk this theory.

I hold that Erich von Stroheim is as interesting as Rudolph Valentino; that D. W. Griffith is as interesting as Charles Ray and that Charles Chaplin, the director, is every whit as interesting as Charles Chaplin, the comedian.

In rare instances only do players have the ascendancy of interest over directors. To your own favorite stars add Ben Turpin and you have a complete list.

At present the most interesting director on this side of the horizon is Malcolm St. Clair, the stormy petrel of the Famous Players-Lasky studios.

As one who knew him when he recurrently fell into Echo Park Lake in Los Angeles, dressed up as a Keystone Kop, it's rather hard to call him anything else but Mal. But in the light of "The Show Off," "The Grand Duchess and the Waiter," "A Woman of the World," and "Are Parents People?" I suppose the "I knew him when" stuff should be put aside and the formal Malcolm adopted. Having decided this, I shall continue to call him Mal.

The Keystone Kop Is Hired

AS CANT two years ago Mal was pleading, almost tearfully, for Jesse Lasky to give him a chance directing a Paramount picture. Today only Lubitsch and von Stroheim are ranked above him by photoplay critics voting in a national poll of newspapers and magazines.

A big accomplishment for a man on whom his thirtieth year has not yet set.

And today also he chooses what stories he will direct and what stars. This is because he is pleasantly tyrannical in his directorial method. He will not adapt his style to that of some set star. He has made his high mark by breaking thru old barriers. For a time he followed the revolutionary Lubitsch. Now he follows no one and has his own disciples.

Ten years ago Mal St. Clair was a member of the art department of the old Los Angeles Express. He perpetrated a sport cartoon now and then. But he was a movie fan and, being at the seat of production, naturally yearned to become associated with pictures.

He knew Lige Conley, a present-day comedy star, who was at the time one of Mack Sennett's Keystone Kops.

"Lige told me to come out to the Keystone studio," Mal says. "I went out but Lige couldn't get me beyond the studio gate. He appealed to Owen Moore who was then playing opposite Mabel Normand. Owen got me in and got me in to Sennett. Lige must have sold me good and proper, for Owen said to Sennett: 'Here's a second Rube Goldberg.'"

The First "Gag Man"

IN the words of the ads, I got the job. Sennett was making 'My Valet' then in which Raymond Hitchcock starred and in which Sennett himself played an important part.

Sennett took me out to the location in his automobile. I was then what today is known as 'gag man.' I guess I was the first. I was supposed to suggest funny business to Sennett. Because I rode out to location in his car everybody else in the company thought I was made. They went to location by trolley.

"I was a kid then and didn't know much. All day long, whenever Sennett worked before the camera I burst my sides laughing. When Hitchcock or somebody else did their stuff, I was silent. I wanted to get in right with Sennett.

"When the day's work was done,

Sennett rode home without me. He didn't speak to me for six months. He hates 'yes men.' He had me figured out as one. And that's how I learned not to be one. Instead of a glorified gag man, riding in the boss' car, I was a member of the Keystone Kops and fell into the lake at the end of every picture.

"Still, I was in good company. The other Kops, at that time, were Chaplin, Eddie Cline, Al St. John and Conley. We were permanent. Others came and went."

Mal St. Clair Has Made Big Strides Since His Keystone and Cartoon Days. Here Is a Cameo of His Film Career and Some Impressions of the Players Who Have Worked for Him

Drawings by Mal St. Clair

He Elevated Chester and Ford

As a Kop, Mal St. Clair supported all the comedy stars of the day, notably Chester Conklin and Ford Sterling. And now that he is a feature director he has taken Conklin and Sterling out of the two-reel comedy class and made featured players and stars of them.

Conklin was sick of pictures and about to retire from them to devote all his time to his bean ranch in California when Mal put him in "The Woman of the World" with Pola Negri. Conklin's stock went skyrocketing. Today he is under a feature contract with Paramount and probably will star soon.

Mal insisted that Sterling play the title-rôle in "The Show Off." He is starred in it. He has an abiding faith in the old Keystone players. Incidentally, he told me that Chester Conklin's father looks just like him, only his mustache is real.

Mal is a native Californian but he has so much Irish in him that there's almost a brogue. He is very tall. I don't think anyone has ever measured his full height. He must have snow on his head the year round.

He used to come stooping into my apartment out in Hollywood after the day's work in directing George O'Hara in the "Fighting Blood" series, for after becoming a Sennett director, he branched out. That was only three years ago and he'd never been to New York. He liked to hear about it. Today Mal is known on Park Avenue and Broadway. He draws an enormous salary and gets full value out of it. Yet some of his fondest memories are of the times that Mabel Normand used to buy the entire Keystone company lunch because the rest didn't have the price and because she was—and is—the most generous girl in the world.

Tried His Talents on the Dog

WHEN Mal started directing features, he was given Rintin-Tin as a star. He made two pictures with the dog and then thought it would be nice to have a two-legged star. He got one and made a picture but the company thought it was so bad that he was fired. Later the film was picked as one of the six best of the month in which it was released.

Tom Moore

It was after this that Mal started his campaign on Jesse Lasky. To get this extremely high person out of his way at the studio Lasky finally gave him "Are Parents People?" to direct. The understanding was that if it was good he was to receive a year's contract.

Following the picture's completion, Mal was at liberty. Naturally, no one knew until the picture was released whether or not it was a success. Fans and critics hailed it when it glittered on the silver screens of the nation's theaters.

And then, helter-skelter, came the rush for the director's services. Lasky reached him first, waving his year's contract, but close behind him were the production heads of other companies.

Today Mal St. Clair can write his own ticket with Lasky or with anyone else.

In his directing Mal always takes the unusual angle. Not the unreal. But the refreshing and original way to tell the real. And he sees the unusual angle, the unusual side of people.

What Mal Says About Them

I ASKED him to name the outstanding characteristics of the various stars and players he has directed.

"What about Adolphe Menjou?" I asked.

"Menjou? His enthusiasm and his naïveté are outstanding," Mal said.

The suave and sophisticated Menjou naïve! I almost collapsed.

"Then who is the most sophisticated star you've directed?" I asked, "Pola Negri?"

"Never!" he said. "Pola Negri is the supreme optimist. Every part that Pola gets it's a case of 'Ach, this is the greatest performance of my life!' No, not Pola, the most sophisticated is Betty Bronson."

Menjou naïve! Bronson sophisticated!

Add two more wonders of the world!

EVER since the well-known serpent in the equally well-known Garden served that famous and disastrous dish of applesauce, the Fall of Man has been the one great predominating theme of all broad comedy.

Falls have come to be regarded as the funniest sights life can offer—so long as it is the other fellow who does the falling, of course.

The grotesquely falling comedian has been the mainstay alike of old-time minstrels and modern circus and vaudeville acts. The advent of slapstick moving pictures raised the trick fall to almost the dignity of an institution.

Custard-pies that crash with charming messiness into the heavy's scowling features, bulldogs which, with pertinacity worthy of a better cause, cling to the seat of the hero's pants, grisly skeletons which cause colored servants to tremble and bleach like a coal-pile in a snow-storm—all these time-honored comedy props have an unflinching appeal to the risibilities but, in the last analysis, it is the trick fall that is the real king of the comedy realm.

A film comedian unable to do funny falls would be almost as much of an anachronism as a tongue-tied auctioneer.

Simple If You Know the Trick

FALLING looks like a superbly easy stunt to do. Yet in reality, when done rightly, it is one of the hardest feats in the repertoire of a professional tumbler.

The mere falling is a simple enough matter. One has merely to remove both feet from the ground at the same time and, with an immediate and whole-hearted co-operation, the law of gravity will step in and very promptly take care of the rest of it. But to fall and survive the feat in reasonably good health is another, and more difficult, matter.

It is in seeming to fall hard, yet at the last moment cunningly taking most of the shock of actual contact with the shoulders or hands, that the real art of the "fall comic" lies.

High falls are frowned upon by most successful comedians, and with excellent reason. Too much indulgence in high falls brings a condition much like taking too many wallops in the face during a prize-ring career. A "punch drunk" fighter has his brains so thoroly shaken up that they eventually become about as efficient intellectually as an overdone omelette. In a similar fashion, the shock of too many high falls usually results in making a permanent "goof" of the luckless victim.

How Bevan Does It

THAT was one of the warnings that Billy Bevan stressed to me the other day over on the Mack Sennett lot, while we were discussing some of the sidelights on the fine art of falling. Billy gave me a number of really of FALLING

The Backward Fall

The Trick Fall Has Replaced the Custard Pie as the King of the Comedy Realm. In Order to Execute It the Comedian Must Remove Both Feet from the Ground and Come Down With a Painful Expression interesting pointers. Eight years in slapstick comedy have not only made Bevan a past master in the actual art, but have given him a firm grasp of the fundamental theories involved as well.

"A fall must not look acrobatic in any way," Billy explained, "or its laugh-getting value is lost. When a comedian takes a graceful run, leaps nimbly into the air and spins thru two perfect flips before coming down, he may get a gasp of admiration from his audience, but he'll get very few laughs. In order to be funny, a fall must look natural.

"And, in order to look natural, a fall must be sprawling and awkward. Loss of dignity must go hand in hand with loss of balance. The comedian must kiss the dirt with a throness that leaves little to the imagination. Yet the fall must not be too violent, or it becomes brutal and excites sympathy instead of mirth."

Then, as it happened to be only two o'clock in the afternoon and Director Del Lord had just shot the last scene in the current Bevan comedy, Billy offered to pose for some special shots in order to illustrate the exact technique of some of the better known falls. Accordingly, we borrowed a speed camera, a cameraman, and two assistants, and selected the grassy lawn in front of a bungalow set for our scene of operations.

According to Slow Motion

A SPEED camera, better known outside of studio circles as a "slow motion picture camera," shoots a subject something like eight times faster than normal, with the result that catching accurate shots of a man in mid-air is a comparatively simple feat for it. After the film was developed we would have merely to select the exact "frames" we wanted, and enlarge them to illustrate the various steps in each fall.

While the camera crew was setting up, Billy continued his brief exposition on the technique of falls in general.

What It Costs to Be a Well-Dressed Clubman

(Evening Edition)

By WARREN DOW

THE male of the species is prone to tear his hair, moan in a loud tone of voice and otherwise register grief in large quantities when his wife's bills for millinery and evening gowns come rolling in about the first of the month.

Yet, when the masculine fashion plate steps forth correctly attired for an evening at the opera or other formal functions, the combined cost of the various parts of his costume will easily equal the price tag on a new flivver coupé.

RAMON NOVARRO is noted in Hollywood for being correctly garbed on every conceivable occasion. It costs the star about $430 to be outfitted as he is here—and the end is far from reached. Studs and links remain to be secured to complete the costume. The exact cost of these is a matter of individual preference ranging from a possible minimum of $25 or $50 to well into the thousands.

High silk hat, familiarly known as a "topper," $10

Custom-tailored suit of black broadcloth, including trousers and swallow-tailed coat, $175

Vest, or waistcoat, of white silk material, $25

Gloves, also of white silk, $5

Patent leather pumps, $15

Opera top coat, of black broadcloth, $75

White silk tie and bat-wing collar, $2.50

Stiff-bosom shirt, of linen, $5

White silk handkerchief, $3

Total cost of outfit, minus studs and links is $430

Impressions of HOLLYWOOD

By EUGENE V. BREWSTER

I DROVE over to Westwood the other day and watched the Fox people filming "What Price Glory." Westwood is about ten miles from Hollywood, and it should be called Foxwood, because it is all Fox and their Hollywood studio will eventually move there. Westwood consists of several hundred acres of fields and hills, all of which is owned by Fox, but most of it has been converted into foreign villages. The first I came to was a Spanish city and it was hard to believe that I was not actually in Spain, altho it was devoid of people because nothing was being filmed there just then. The next place was a complete French village with hundreds of dwellings, hotels, churches, saloons, etc., and thousands of French peasants, shop-keepers, children, and soldiers in uniform.

Hurly-Burly Excitement

RAOUL WALSH was directing a scene in "What Price Glory," which, from all accounts, is to excel even "The Big Parade," and those who have seen the gorgeous picture, "The Wanderer," will be inclined to believe that Walsh has the ability to do anything he sets out to do. The soldiers were real veterans of the World War and hence required very little drilling, but not so with the women, children, horses and ducks—the ducks, in particular. A large flock of geese persisted in getting in the way of the marching troops, and some of the girls often failed to wave to the soldiers at just the right moment and to embrace their sweethearts with sufficient ardor.

Just imagine a director standing near the cameras on a platform shouting orders to a thousand people who were scattered about in every nook and corner of a scene that extended nearly half a mile distant! There was the keeper of the geese, the men in charge of the horses and mules, the girls in the windows, the captains and corporals, the men who were letting water from tanks into the stream, the women who were doing their laundry on the banks of the river, the principal players in the cast, and I don't know how many others who had to know just what to do and when to do it.

Yet, in a short while this vast human machine moved like clockwork, the cameras clicked, the regiment marched down the hill thru the village, the populace waved, the geese quacked and scampered to cover, Dolores Del Rio ran along the street in search of her sweetheart soldier, and before I realized it the cameras stopped grinding and the scene was finished.

I had been standing alongside Walsh the while, and I had seen villages in France so near like this one that for the life of me I could not make myself realize that I was not actually in France. It was indeed a masterpiece of composition, assembling and mob-handling, and my hat is off to Director Walsh.

That "It"

ONE of the principal topics for humorous conversation around Hollywood is IT. Elinor Glyn invented this word, and in time it will find a place in the dictionaries with a brand-new meaning. What is It? I really don't know. But if you ask Madame Glyn if you have It, she will tell you frankly whether you have or not. Some think it means what is commonly called sex-appeal, and others think it means something like charm, winsomeness, personality, etc.

At a Marion Davies dinner party the other night Samuel Goldwyn stuck a large gladiolus in his buttonhole, strutted humorously over to Madame Glyn and said: "Have I got It, Madame?" To which the madame gravely replied: "I am sorry, Mr. Goldwyn, you are a very charming man but you haven't—It."

I asked W. R. Hearst what it was and if he thought he had it. He laughed and said he didn't know, and would like to know, but did not dare ask Madame Glyn, for fear she would tell him he did not have it. I felt the same way about it, so I did not ask her, either.

Big VIC a Soldier of FORTUNE

ONE thing about the kleigs: they tell the story of a personality as no other medium can.

In the feature films of recent vintage "characters" have been holding a side-show of their own; scowling "heavies," homely purveyors of atmosphere, have virtually been outbidding their sweeter-looking colleagues in public interest.

Remember Ernest Torrence in "The Covered Wagon," Karl Dane in "The Big Parade," Jean Hersholt in "Stella Dallas"—all "characters," playing minor parts; deeply lined, ugly, warted faces, gum-chewing, tobacco-spitting, hard-swearing, sweaty males. They are no longer held down to minor rôles, so great has been their appeal.

What is it?

My guess is that these expressive and scarred countenances tell the story of a life at a glance. They are not adolescents trembling at the threshold of experience. These ruggedly hewn and chiseled physiognomies are so revealing that we can read the record of their sufferings, joys, misadventures and transgressions only too plainly and draw up the balance. When their faces in a close-up are spread over some 320 square feet of screen, an entirely new kind of game is provided for devotees of the cinema.

A Man of Many Parts

Now there is another face whose deep shadows will loom big in the close-ups of a film—that of Victor McLaglen, playing Captain Flagg in Laurence Stallings' war play, "What Price Glory."

It is not an awfully pleasant face; confined hitherto in "heavy" rôles, of old-fashioned Fox pictures, it has often given us the thrill of veritable wickedness. By the most rigorous possible screen tests it has finally been pronounced to be charged with "character" and so McLaglen has been handed over the most colorful rôle of Stallings' picturesque play. The difficult Stallings declared himself highly pleased with the choice.

Victor McLaglen Has Led the Most Colorful Existence of Any Man in Pictures. His Crazy-Quilt Career Has Carried Him as Miner, Adventurer, Fighter, Soldier and Actor Into All the Far-Off Places of the Globe

By JOSEPH MATTERN .

Small wonder! For Victor McLaglen is a character. He is one of the strangest birds that has come into the movies in many a season. His screen face does not lie, for his life has been a veritable Odyssey of adventure, ranging far wider than that of old Ulysses of the Ægean Sea, since it has traversed the seven seas and girded the globe several times. McLaglen has been a plain British Tommy, a gold-miner, a circus performer, a prize-fighter, an army officer, a ruler over Oriental cities—in short, a real soldier of fortune for a quarter of a century. Now his adventuresome instincts are constricted to the range of the kleigs and the borders of movie lots. At the urgence of friends interested in his colorful career he has finished writing an autobiography of some six hundred pages which the world will some day read with astonishment.

Adventures Everywhere

WHAT is the adventure of stardom in Hollywood, if not an anticlimax, after you have starved in the hinterlands of Australia and Africa, fought the heathens and Germans with guns, Jack Johnson in the squared ring with your fists, been a tyrant over the cities of the Arabian Nights, a companion of princes and waifs, after you have been to Hell and back?

It is one more case of fitting the man to the rôle snugly. Only this one is somewhat exceptional. Captain Flagg in the war play is a hard-boiled

Vic served on all the Far Eastern fronts during the war and was Chief of Police of Bagdad weathered veteran; many-sided, because he is a leader of men, his experiences have made him bitter and philosophical; his views on women, for instance, are, to say the least—interesting. But in a pinch during the great crisis, when the moment no longer calls for the iron front, Flagg turns out human, human to the core! That, of course, is McLaglen.

It is not easy to get the man to talk. The scope of his life story is beyond the fancy of the most artistic press-agent. He has felt much, learned much, thought much. He doesn't wear his heart on his shirt cuff. There are things that can never be told. But for the rest, his autobiography, boiled down, runs like this:

THAT the Germans can dance as well to the tune of light opera as they can weep over tragedy is proved with "The Waltz Dream." If memory serves correctly, this is the first time that something light and amusing has emerged from the UFA studios. Heretofore, heavy drama has stalked across their sets. This new opus is an adaptation of an operatic piece that was presented on the American stage several years ago.

As plots go, it doesn't get away from a familiar pattern—in that it is nothing more or less than the ugly duckling theme. The mythical kingdom background is employed—and against it a Graustarkian type of princess indulges in romantic flights and is made over into a queen of beauty. This occurs after she has tasted a bit of Viennese life.

Sophisticated Touches

THE piece has a sophisticated flavor—noticeable in the scenes prior to and immediately following the marriage ceremony. The princess (played with creditable spirit by Mady Christians) has her heart set on the Archduke. But this discriminating son of royalty catalogs her as impossible. As a result, he wishes her off on his friend, a gay young count.

The latter, however, unconsciously brings out the best in the girl. Under the influence of wine the princess displays some personality. But she reverts to her impossible ways when she marries the youth. He is forced into the ceremony because his kisses are as sacred as an engagement ring.

Laurence Reid Reviews the New Photoplays

The marital episodes are richly amusing—and contain a deal of subtle touches. Rejected by the bride, the husband starts cutting up didoes with a fair Viennese who plays the violin. Which, of course, piques the bride. In order to win him back she ferrets out the blond fiddler and takes lessons in deportment. In the end the princess shows her consort that she can stand out in any crowd.

Well Staged and Acted

THE Germans have kept the spirit of Vienna intact—the atmosphere and incident being thoroly in character. As for the acting—well there are other troupers in the Rhine country besides Emil Jannings. Willy Fritsch, as the gay Viennese, gives a performance that fairly sparkles. It is one of the most adaptable and easy character studies that has ever graced the screen.

Something tells me that Fritsch will soon display his talents out Hollywood way. He is sorely needed in this country. I can think of no one who could have handled the sequence of the wine festival and the subsequent marital episodes with more grace, abandon and polish.

All in all, "The Waltz Dream" spells a most pleasant hour in anyone's nickelodion.

The German Influence

THE German influence in so far as camera technique is concerned is reflected in "You Never Know Women." Here is a picture which shows something new in photography. Like "Variety" it tells a story of the theater, tho the plot doesn't carry the same direct treatment, nor is it so sound in its construction. Where "Variety" progressed straightforward to its inevitable climax, "You Never Know Women" loses its strength before it is half over and the finish is saturated with hokum.

What merits it has rests with its camera work and the acting by Florence Vidor (her first starring film), Lowell Sherman, El Brendel (who contributes an excellent sample of pantomime) and Clive Brook.

It has been said that Director Wellman had not seen "Variety." If not, he has seen other German pictures. His camera never misses a thing and catches the story from all kinds of angles.

A Weak Plot

UNFORTUNATELY the film is burdened with a plot which has gone to the movie mill many, many times. It presents the theme of unrequited love—with the central characters the principal performers in a Russian ballet—a ballet modeled after the lines of the Chauve Souris which created a sensation when touring America. The heroine is swept off her feet by the ardent attentions of a monocled American (played by Lowell Sherman in his best monocled fashion). The Russian lover with a movieish impulse of self-sacrifice is willing to step out of her life via the suicide route.

This is a weak gesture which is anything but convincing. But the most unconvincing touch enters when he returns from his watery grave to chase the American bouncer all over a theater and torture him with knives which he hurls with deadly accuracy.

The spectator must find the appeal of the picture in

I should like to have tramped the earth, to have slept under sun and stars. I should like to have touched at strange ports . . . to have stayed in them just so long as I found color there, Romance, Adventure . . . then sailed on again . . . questing . . . seeking . . . working my way, if necessary . . . with just enough money to get from place to place. . . . It seems to me that that would be living at the quick of life. Really living, you know.

"So few people really live. So very few really live their own lives. They live the lives of dozens of other people. They are circumscribed by this and that, caged, hemmed in, forced to do the thing they really don't want to do, doing it gracefully or ungracefully as they happen to be. Poor things, most of them do it all gracefully. After awhile they don't care. After awhile they become superficially content. That is the saddest time of all.

Carol herself, in dove gray, her gentle face musing, her clear eyes fired with dreams of the venturesome Might-Have-Been . . . if she had been a boy, with the heart of a vagabond. . . .

We feel, now, that we did Carol some sort of injustice. We don't know what kind of injustice, but some kind, we are sure. For we thought that she would say, demurely, "I should like a little rose-vined cottage in the country, with baby faces at the windows and a cow browsing in an adjacent meadow. . . ." Or that she would say, intelligently, as her contemporaries have impressively said before her, "I should like best of all a life of study and meditation . . . a life among my books." Or, possibly, "I live but for my Art . . . I wish to give to the world a Masterpiece. . . ."

Pity the Assistant Director!

By IRENE BURNS

The Assistant Directors Are the Stepchildren of the Screen. They Are the Most Abused Men of the Studios

Their Day Begins With the Rising Sun and Usually Ends at Midnight.
They Receive Poor Pay and Little Credit

At the top is Daniel Keefe, who has been in the business a good many years. He is assistant to Raoul Walsh, the director of "What Price Glory." At the left is Charles Dorian, who has been associated as assistant to Clarence Brown for several seasons. He hopes to become a full-fledged director in the near future. On the right is Victor Schertzinger's assistant, Billie Tummel, who is considered invaluable by his boss

WHO is the most abused man in the studio? The assistant director! He admits it himself—but, what is more important, his director agrees with him.

The assistant director bears most of the responsibility in making a picture—yet he receives poor pay and no credit. His job consists of handling most of the details of the company—he helps choose the cast, arranges for costumes, orders the sets, studies the script, handles mob scenes, takes care of the extras' troubles and that's only the half of it. He has a hundred and one other things to attend to and often saves the producer thousands of dollars by hurrying up the picture.

Assistant directing is a field of its own. There are good and bad assistants just as there are excellent and poor directors. The assistants draw from $50 to $250 a week while most of the directors' salaries run into four figures.

We interviewed a number of the more prominent assistants, chatted with their directors, and watched them work. After that we agreed that the assistant is really to be pitied. He arrives at the studio at 7:30 A. M., sometimes earlier, to begin rounding up his work for the day. Perhaps two members of the cast have sent word they are ill—if they are extras, the assistant gets in touch with the casting director and suggests two suitable ones to take their place.

It is necessary that he be familiar with the extras and also with their wardrobes. If the missing ones happen to be important members of the cast, the assistant plans to shoot scenes in which they are not needed. Then he makes out his reports—in most cases he keeps typewritten records of everyone employed on the set and every scene taken. He puts in a busy day and about 6 P. M. returns home, where he is usually deluged with phone calls pertaining to his job. He spends many of the evenings when he is not working at the studio in conference with the director. We know of one assistant who lost his job because he refused to live at the home of a prominent director where they could confer constantly.

Stepchildren of the Screen

MANY of the assistants came to Hollywood with the idea of being a movie actor. After a long struggle as extras they realized they could never succeed and secured odd jobs about the studios. Then eventually directors noticed them and made them assistants.

The work is most difficult, but they realize that some day if they make good they may become directors. Several of the studios have recently made directors of a few assistants and it is believed that the assistants of today are the big directors of tomorrow.

Clarence Brown, who recently finished directing Norma Talmadge in "Kiki," has had his assistant, Charles Dorian, with him a number of years. Mr. Brown says, "I just could not get along without Charlie—he is as much responsible for the success of my pictures as I am." Incidentally, Mr. Dorian is known as the best assistant in the business and it is thought the time is not far distant

These two photographs show Noah Beery as he is and when he plays one of those villainous heavies. He is one of many who are glad they are making the villain human

VILLAINY

The Leering Heavy Who Crashed Into a Scene Like a Rampant Cyclone Has Faded Out of the Picture

By SCOTT PIERCE

The change is a welcome one. Lunatics, while admittedly spectacular, have certain deficiencies as a steady, dramatic diet.

And, by no stretch of the imagination, could the old-time screen or stage villain be regarded as anything else than a stark, raving lunatic. In sheer reasoning power, he would have run a poor second to a three-weeks-old calf.

The stage edition of the "menace" was bad enough—the suave, bemustached cur who, in the second act, snarled, "Give meh the papers-s-s-s, or I'll tear up the chee-ild!" or words to that general effect; and who sneered heartlessly in the third act as the heartbroken old father quavered pathetically, "Stranger—yuh ain't done right by our little Nell!"

Desperate Desmonds

THEN the movies came along and proceeded to remove what few faint glimmerings of common sense the villain still possessed.

For years there were only two standard types of screen "heavies," and both were lunatics.

The first was the parlor snake, the effeminate degenerate who smoked perfumed cigarets, affected spats and a tiny waxed mustache, and whose sole aim in life was apparently to lead astray as many innocent young women as could be conveniently crowded into a normal working day.

The second was the hairy ape, the hulking moron with the muscular development of a gorilla, who drank nitric acid for a tonic and used kerosene for a chaser, and who beat his brawny chest and furiously engaged in mortal combat anything that came his way, whether it happened to be a stray kitten or a troop of U. S. Cavalry.

The last reel usually found the first type of "heavy" in the penitentiary, and the second type in the cemetery. Both should have been placed in padded cells before the picture even started, and turned over to psychiatrists for a much-needed mental overhauling.

Becoming Human Beings

BUT now the Era of Lunacy has passed. The screen "menace" has become a rational, thinking,

THE past year in Hollywood has produced a film phenomenon so startling and unorthodox that literally reams have been written in efforts to explain the whyfore and the wherefore of it all.

I refer, of course, to the "Renaissance of Villainy"—the startling movement that has, apparently almost overnight, so imbued our leading screen villains with worthy and even likable traits that they seem almost like normal human beings.

As a matter of fact, the causes underlying this "humanizing" of villainy are both simple and inevitable.

The whole thing means merely that the public has become tired of seeing lunatics, and accordingly, for the first time in screen history, has endowed the villain with a brain.

George Siegmann, left, is one of the veteran heavies of the screen. He is also glad to see the villain emerge as a man of brains. Lou Tellegen, right, a polished "menace," declares audiences will soon be rooting for the villain human being, and the result is that he is at last coming into his own in popular favor.

The change is proving as welcome a one to the villains themselves as to their screen audiences.

"No self-respecting actor wants to spend his professional life portraying prospective candidates for an insane asylum," Noah Beery explained succinctly. "And that is just what most of us had to do for years. When I was called on to play one of the old-time 'menace' rôles, I realized that the part was that of a lunatic, and that was exactly the way I played it—portraying a brainless, vindictive sort of idiot whose heinous activities were devoid alike of intelligence, motives, human traits.

"Today everyone realizes that that sort of thing is all wrong. In order to have interest and drama, your audience must have sympathy for the characters. The old-time villain destroyed that quality for both himself and the hero. There's no particular credit due any hero for outwitting a lunatic. The thinking villain is the dangerous villain. His actions can not be foreseen with the mechanical certainty of a phonograph record, and he is thus made a really worthy antagonist for the hero.

"And the fact that he is allowed to be a thinking human being, with motives for his deeds, gives the audience a new insight into his character. They can understand him, even feel a bit of sympathy for him, and the play is lifted from the realm of mere puppets to a flesh-and-blood creation of life itself."

A New Era Has Dawned

A HEARTY second to these sentiments is voiced by George Bancroft, whose Smiling Slade in "The Pony Express" was one of the outstanding pioneer rôles in the new era of villainy.

mere fact, for example, that he was hated by dogs and disliked by children made him automatically a scoundrel of the deepest dye. All of which is the bunk and truly false.

"In 'Devil Horses' my rôle of the hard-drinking, uncouth bucko mate would have shattered every tradition of the old-time heavy, because it happened to be both human and true to life. The mate terrified the tiny girl on shipboard in every one of his clumsy efforts to amuse her, and she screamed in terror at his very approach. Yet it was that same mate who died laughing as he held the natives at bay for the few precious seconds needed to save the life of the rest of the party.

The old screen tradition of the 'killer' (Continued on page 90)

"Not only was the old-time heavy a lunatic," Bancroft told me one day, "but he was a strictly type variety of lunatic as well. He was about as original as a derby hat. The

ing. If it is slanted askew with a sort of half-ashamed bravado, its owner is a four-flusher—he is trying to assume a jauntiness that is really as far from his nature as feathers from an eel.

But if the hat rests rakishly on one ear and its owner is sublimely unconscious of the fact, then that gentleman is very apt to be not only interesting and colorful, but mighty good company, and the kind of citizen upon whom you can safely rely in a pinch.

Irish Thru and Thru

AND that is the way that Pat O'Malley wears his hat, starting just over his left ear and proceeding on a steep slant in a direction about north by northeast; and that is the kind of citizen that Pat O'Malley is—blithe, care-free, natural, generous to a fault, friendly, and independent.

With a name like O'Malley, it should hardly be necessary to add that Pat's eyes are Irish blue, that there is a tinge of red in his hair and a hint of freckles on his face and hands, that his chin has a solid and determined look, and that Pat usually gets just about what he goes after.

An incident that occurred last March 17 is typical of Pat O'Malley. On that particular morning a number of Pat's masculine friends in Hollywood were pleasantly surprised when the postman delivered to them small oblong packages adorned with a weird stamp which closer inspection revealed to be the official postage emblem of Ireland. Inside was a little card: "St. Patrick's Day is Christmas for all good Irishmen. Hope you like the pipe.—Pat."

Freulich

The pipe in question was a small, exquisitely made brier creation, especially manufactured for Pat by a famous old pipe firm in Dublin, a chummy little pipe of the kind that delights the soul of any normal man, whether or not he happens to read the advertisements regarding the unholy joy that great actresses take in seeing men with such adornments parked amid their classic features.

PAT O'MALLEY gives new proof of the interesting fact that one of the best indications of a man's real character is found in the way he wears a straw hat.

As a real indicator of masculine character, the humble hay derby has the Herr Freud and his little play-mates looking like a bunch of bungling amateurs. The Panama hat serves as a suave mask for its wearer, but the stiff straw hat, with its rigid, unyielding lines and unbending demeanor, is a veritable sign-board of character.

If worn with geometrical exactness on a line paralleling the ground, and without so much as tilting a millimeter either way, it is a reasonably safe bet that its wearer also affects tortoise-shell glasses, votes a straight party ticket, and regards three games of chess as a really exciting evening.

If worn belligerently tilted forward over a brow, that brow is very apt to be somewhat beetling, and its owner is somewhat inclined to go into fistic action on rather slight provocation.

But it is when the straw hat is tilted to the side that it really becomes most reveal-

They Called Him a Type Actor, But Being Irish, He's Showing 'Em How

By RALPH SUTTER

Much has been written in recent years of Pat O'Malley, the man, yet, strangely enough, little has ever been said of Pat O'Malley, the artist. This oversight seems all the stranger when it is realized that O'Malley is one of the foremost creative workers in pictures.

He's a "Rough Diamond"

O'MALLEY first made a hit on the screen in types of the "diamond in the rough" variety, playing the rôles of plumbers, East Side toughs, drummers, and Tammany Hall henchmen. In the language of the picture world, he was a "natural" in such parts. He could have continued them almost indefinitely, and have built up an enormous fan following in so doing.

But O'Malley had other ideas in mind. He has an overwhelming dread of getting in a rut, of establishing a type of screen character as standardized as one of Detroit's more famous products. Accordingly, he proceeded to prove to the world in general, and Hollywood in particular, that he was capable of somewhat more ambitious things.

In "My Old Dutch," he essayed one of the most difficult character rôles of recent years, one that took a character almost literally from young manhood to old age and the grave, and did it superbly. Then, to prove that this success was no fluke, he took the part of the Grand Duke in Dimitri

Back in the good old days Pat was a slack-wire performer. Here we find him demonstrating his talent for the benefit of Marion Mixon

Buchowetski's "The Midnight Sun."

This opened a gold-mine of material for the Film Colony's wise-crackers, the fact that a player with so Irish a face as Pat O'Malley's dared to essay a heavy Russian rôle. One wit suggested that Nazimova might next stage a return to the screen in the title-rôle of "Mother Machree." Pat let them laugh. Dyeing his hair black and donning a dark mustache, he proceeded to play the exacting rôle of the Duke Boris in a manner that won him the plaudits of nearly every big film critic in the country, even tho the picture itself was rated as far from a masterpiece.

That Song Hit

ADAPTING that seductive song, "Valencia," to the screen is a task that requires almost too much creative effort in this hot weather. But Alice Duer Miller is bravely undertaking it, for the sake of Mae Murray. "Valencia" was so popular that Mae decided she just must have it for her next picture. Of course, it will be a very Spanish story in which Mae can wear a shawl and a rose in her teeth. Dimitri Buchowetski, the Russian director, who has just returned from a trip to Europe, will begin his Metro-Goldwyn contract with this picture.

Wales Meets Connie

THE film colony is proud that one of its members has broken into the honest-to-goodness society columns. There are reports from London that Constance Talmadge, as the wife of Captain Alastair Mackintosh, has become one of the most important of the younger hostesses there. She has been there only a few weeks, but has already lured the Prince of Wales to one of her interesting dinner parties. In the fall, after she has completely dazzled London society, she will return to make another picture in Hollywood. "The Duchess of Buffalo," her latest effort, has been lately released.

An Uplift Movement

WHEN the young people start reforming, it looks pretty bad for vice and sin. Wickedness is not going to have a chance to rear its head in Hollywood, now that the Thalias have organized, fifty strong. The Thalias are a club, composed of our youngest and purest film stars, who want to keep clean and think they can fight temptation better in groups than singly. All members must be unmarried, about twenty-one years old, identified with the picture industry, and the possessors of spotless reputations.

Raymond Keane was elected president, of course—being very young and very spotless and utterly devoted to noble thoughts and good books and flowers. Jobyna Ralston is vice-president, which probably makes the meetings quite thrilling for Raymond. And the other officers are Virginia Brown Faire, treasurer; Joan Meredith, secretary; and Joan Crawford, corresponding secretary. Charles Farrell, George Lewis, Cleve Moore (brother of Colleen), and Lincoln Stedman are some of the other members.

It is to be hoped that the Thalias will not only clean up the younger generation of screen stars, but will also set a good example to the youth of the nation. Try this in your home town.

A Sister Act

THE Duncan Sisters, who became famous from coast to coast in "Topsy and Eva," have been negotiating with First National for weeks to appear in a screen version of their show. And just when everyone thought the contract was going to be signed, Hime and Jake got capricious and decided to go to United Artists instead. No contract has been signed yet, but they have agreed to join United Artists thru Feature Productions, which produces the Barrymore and Valentino pictures. John Considine, Jr., who is president of Feature Productions, will supervise "Topsy and Eva," scheduled to begin in about eight weeks.

A Secret Marriage

No one suspected that Louise Fazenda was married until they found out that she was going to be married again. Louise is as clever off the screen as she is on, and cagey as well, and even to her close friends her life is more or less of a mystery. So it was quite a surprise to Hollywood when she filed suit for divorce under the name of Louise Smith, with the intention of marrying Hal Wallis as soon as she was free. Hal Wallis is the head of Warner Brothers' publicity department, and almost as nice as

John Barrymore is a skipper as well as an actor. He recently competed in a Los Angeles to Honolulu yacht race

Lewis Stone doesn't take a back seat as a romancer. He is the great lover to Shirley Mason and others in "Don Juan's Three Nights"

Louise, and his devotion to her wasn't much of a secret. But nobody knew that Noel Smith, a director working right under her nose on the Warner lot, was even casually connected with Louise's past. Even he and Louise seemed to forget that he was her husband.

While all this divorcing and remarrying is going on, Louise wends her hilarious way thru picture after picture. Her latest rôle is a puritanical spinster in the First National picture, "Ladies at Play."

Ziegfeld Loses Another

EVERY week there has been a new candidate for the ingénue rôle in Adolphe Menjou's picture, "The Ace of Cads." Even after production had got under way, no one was quite sure whether Lois Moran, or perhaps Clara Bow, would get the part. Well, it's settled at last. Susan Fleming, a graduate of the Ziegfeld chorus, is the lucky lady. She has plenty of pulchritude but no acting experience, but Mr. Menjou seems to have great confidence in her. He personally picked her from a group of Ziegfeld beauties who visited the studio, and he confided to me that she is refined as well as beautiful. And as that is an even rarer quality than acting ability, she was signed up at once.

Is Jackie Becoming Temperamental?

JACKIE COOGAN is having almost as much trouble with his directors as Gloria Swanson had on "Fine Manners." Three men have taken turns wielding Jackie's megaphone, and several thousand feet of film have been shot and thrown away as a result of the changes. King Baggot started out to make "Johnny Get Your Hair Cut," but was scheduled for another picture and had to retire in favor of Millard Webb.

Mr. Webb is one of the youngest directors in the business, and made a great success of "The Sea Beast" for John Barrymore. Just what happened on the Coogan set is not quite clear, but Jack Coogan, Sr., won the battle, whatever it was. Mr. Webb is out, and production is beginning all over again under the direction of Archie Mayo.

Back With Uncle Tom

HARRY POLLARD has at last recovered from the illness which held up the production of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" for many months. Universal had despaired of his recovery and had assigned Lois Weber to finish the picture, when Pollard unexpectedly got better, and he is now back on the job. That leaves Miss Weber free to start work on "Egypt," an adaptation of Ernest Pascal's novel, which will be retitled "The Sensation Seekers."

The Final Fade-Out

THE career of Willard Louis was ended, late in July, when he died of typhoid-pneumonia after a long illness. Mr. Louis had been in pictures for twelve years, and was forty years old, but he was just at the height of his popularity as a comedian. Since his performance as The Prince of Wales in John Barrymore's production, "Beau Brummel," brought him into prominence several years ago, he has been playing steadily and jovially in a great variety of pictures for Warner Brothers, to whom he was under contract, and various other companies. His last picture, "The Door Mat," has not yet been released.

And So It Goes

THE final decree divorcing King and Florence Vidor has been granted, giving them a chance to marry, respectively, Eleanor Boardman and George Fitzmaurice, if they so desire. We will soon know the truth of all the lively rumors that have been going on ever since Florence took the plunge and sued King on the grounds of desertion.

Replies to CLASSIC Readers

BETSY.—School days are on again. Why, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., is about nineteen years old and Sally O'Neill about eighteen. Thomas Meighan was born April 9, 1884.

JUSTINE M. S.—Well, now, I know a few things, but I don't happen to know just when Richard Dix will be in Little Rock, Arkansas. He was born July 18, 1894. You want to know if I think a girl thirteen would have a chance to get into the movies. A very slim one.

MAX E.—Kenneth Harlan is playing opposite Colleen Moore in "Twinkletoes." When is money damp? When it is due in the morning and missed at night. It's not only damp, but always scarce with me.

RUTH DE O.—Oh, you always want to enclose twenty-five cents in two-cent stamps when asking for a photograph. Bessie Love is playing in "Going Crooked" for Fox, and Edmund Burns and Anita Stewart in "Whispering Wires" for Fox.

SACKS.—Thank you, but a man who makes no mistakes does not usually make anything. William Russell, Virginia B. Faire and Reed Howes in "Wings of the Storm" for Fox.

MARION A.—No, I have never been in an aeroplane. I guess my species likes to have all fours on the ground. You say, "An authority on words holds that an airplane should always be referred to as she." Does this also apply to mail planes? Richard Dix's real name is Ernest Brimmer. Thanks for the picture you drew of me.

MARTHA U. K.—Speaking of women generally, they are generally speaking. Why, William Boyd was born in 1898. Agnes Ayres was born in Carbondale, Illinois, April 4, 1901.

CLASSIC CRAZY.—William Boyd is playing in "Her Man o' War," with Jetta Goudal. Florence Vidor is playing in "Wings," with Clara Bow and Charles Emmett Mack. Yes, just write to me any time you feel like it.

MARY C.—You refer to Tullio Carminati.

MOLLYKA.—No, I haven't read "The Man Nobody Knows," but you think H. B. Warner would be splendid in it. Warner Baxter in "The Runway," with Clara Bow.

BOBBY.—You say you have red hair and brown eyes—seventeen. I have no hair, blue eyes, and am past eighty. Are we sufficiently acquainted? Yes, Clive Brook is married and has a daughter, Faith.

A GEORGE O'BRIEN ADMIRER.—Well, you are going to see another von Stroheim picture, "The Wedding March," and Fay Wray is to play the lead. Von Stroheim will also play in it, as well as Zasu Pitts, George Fawcett and Maudie George. George O'Brien attended Santa Clara College in California, and he has blue eyes. "The Iron Horse" was released September, 1924.

MILLIE U.—Yes, go ahead, write to me any time you feel like it. Yes, of course I'm eighty years old. Conway Tearle is married to Adele Rowland.

BOBBIE.—Well, that's hard telling whether you will see Roscoe Arbuckle in pictures again. He's directing now. Greta Nissen and Clive Brook are playing in Malcolm St. Clair's "The Popular Sin."

WILLIE.—I should say I do drink plenty of buttermilk in this warm weather. That's a wonderful trip you have planned. You know, in India, 3,263 people were killed by wild animals last year. Snake bites were responsible for the deaths of 20,000. Well, they do say that Jobyna Ralston is to marry Richard Arlen, and that Ena Gregory is to marry Al Rogers, a director.

BEVERLY J.—Where did you get the green paper? No, Clara Bow is not married. She was born August 8, 1905. Donald

Keith is twenty-three years old. Red Grange's "The Half Back" is to be released as "One Minute to Play."

BERTHA P.—Well, you ask a question, then answer it yourself. There are two things that indicate a weak mind—to be silent when it is proper to speak, and to speak when it is proper to be silent. Mildred Harris is to play opposite Rod La Rocque in "Cruise of the Jasper B."

IRENE R.—You sure are a film fan. Well, you know Mabel Normand was known as Mabel Fortesque when she was with Biograph in 1911. She is playing in Hal Roach comedies right now. Your letter was most interesting, and I hope you write me soon again.

BETTY B.—Don't be so impatient. Hasty climbers usually have sudden falls. So you are fond of Ramon Novarro. He was born September 20, 1899, at Durango, Mexico. No, Mr. Novarro does not go to all the parties, dances and affairs in Hollywood. He rather likes his home.

EVELYN M.—Why, Ben Lyon was born in Atlanta, Georgia. That is his real name. Alberta Vaughn is playing in "The Adorable Deceiver." Billy Sullivan in "Speed Crazy."

BONYA.—You're right; clothes don't make the man, but they make the impression. Colleen Moore is five feet four inches and is married to John McCormick. No, they have no children, and she was born August 9, 1902. Why, James Hall is a newcomer to the screen, and he has an important part in Bebe Daniels' "The Campus Flirt," also the male lead in Pola's "Hotel Imperial."

ELEANOR F.—So you think I am a good listener. You'd be surprised. A bird is known by its notes, and a man by his talk. William Boyd has blue eyes and light hair. He certainly is getting enough mention in this department.

STANLEY H.—Well, it's too late to have my beard shaved now—next December I will have good use for it. You say, after seeing "The Plastic Age" and "Brown of Harvard," you would like to go to college. Why don't you?

ELIZABETH M.—Well, do all you can to be good, and you'll be so. Rudolph Valentino was born May 6, 1895. Hobart Bosworth is about sixty years young, and his birthday was August 11. He is a descendant of Miles Standish.

GRACE K.—You only want the home addresses of about fifteen players. That's out!

MITZI.—What is the most dangerous time of the year to visit the country? When the bull-rushes out, and the cow-slips about, and the little sprigs are shooting all around. Irene Rich did not have her hair bobbed—she wore a wig in "Lady Windermere's Fan." You think Corinne Griffith is the most beautiful actress on the screen. She is very popular. You think I could get a large salary if I came to Kentucky. All right, that's a go.

ELSIE MCN.—Hoot Gibson is with Universal, Universal City, California, and Harrison Ford is at the Metropolitan Studio, 1040 Las Palmas Avenue, Los Angeles, California.

O. G.—Well, if a dime with a hole in it is worth five cents, a dime with two holes in it ought to be worth ten cents. Right? Lewis Stone is playing in "Midnight Lovers." Virginia Valli was married to George Lamson.

PALMA M.—You want to know if I thought it would be a good thing for you to become an actress. Well, now, that is a broad question, in view of the fact that I have never met you. My advice would be for you to stay in school a little longer. Adolphe Menjou in "The Angel Passes." Estelle Taylor is to play opposite Valentino in the life of Cellini. John Gilbert was born July 10, 1895,

Them Were the Happy Days

Norma and her sister were both trying for screen honors in those happy days.

Watching John Bunny nightly on the screens of Flatbush, a Brooklyn undertaker of similar huge proportions, felt the urge to act before the camera. He was the Vitagraph extra whose size dominated every scene in which he appeared. His name was Hughie Mack. It still is, except that today he holds the foreground when he "does his stuff."

I remember also watching with interest the work of a trimly clothed, dapper young man selected by Wally Van to a dance bit in a Vitagraph film. "The Man Behind the Door." His poise was perfect and his work won for him a small part in "The Scarlet Runner," a serial which Van later made. The dapper young man's name was Adolphe Menjou.

The Favorites of Yesteryear

I HAVE stood in the huge courtyard which served for the location of many kinds of exterior scenes for Vitagraph productions, listening patiently while a well-known stage actor poured forth his lament. "Why wouldn't they give him a chance? Why didn't they let him act or direct? Hadn't he appeared in leading rôles of Broadway successes? Wasn't he a recognized exponent of the Shakespearian drama? His wife was a member of the Vitagraph stock company—what was wrong with him? The complainer was James Young, the same James Young who afterwards scored as an actor and director for Vitagraph and other leading companies. His wife was Clara Kimball Young. Yes, they were the happy days. In this same courtyard I have watched Florence Turner, greatest star of her day, paying off extra players.

To the Vitagraph of the misty past belongs the distinction of having introduced the first "vamp" of the screen. Long before Theda Bara essayed her "bad, bad woman" parts, Helen Gardner had established a new type of screen rôle thru her siren efforts as Cleopatra and other characters with a vampish tinge. To the credit of this company also must be chalked up the first presentation of the appealing "mother" character, a character which has played an important part in the success of many later day important productions and the introduction of a child player as the leading figure of a picture play.

Them were the happy days indeed when the benevolent white-haired person of sweet-faced Mary Maurice, the Vitagraph mother, held the screen in stories of honest, homely sentiment—when the precursor of Jackie Coogan, little Kenneth Casey, one of the best known and widely admired figures of the silversheet, opened up a field for the exploitation of juvenile talent on the screen which proved far more lucrative to those who followed him than it did to "the first boy of the films."

Little Money, But Lots of Fun

THE old saying "we don't make much money but we have a lot of fun" applied to the actors and directors of 1910. If memory serves, the celebrated John part of a bank clerk in one of Ince's two-reelers. The rejected actor pulled himself together sufficiently later on to turn out such masterpieces as "The Four Horsemen" and "Mare Nostrum" under the name of Rex Ingram.

No chronicle of the old days dealing with Vitagraph would be complete without reference to Fred "Bing" Thompson, the first director to introduce the present well-known element of "temperament" in the work of movie production. Thompson, who has since passed on, and incidentally, was the first man to use wild animals in photoplays, was quickly irritated when things did not run smoothly under the lights. He had a penchant for breaking derby hats, one of which was always perched on his head. The number of broken derbies at the end of a two-reeler under Bing's direction was indicative of the storm or calm which accompanied its making.

In these days of sumptuously furnished players' dressing-rooms and specially built bungalows for the use of high-salaried stars in preparing for their studio appearances, it is amusing to learn that three such big-timers of the old days as John Bunny, Sidney Drew and Wally Van, comedy aces of the pre-Chaplin era, all shared the same small room together.

In any story of the old days the name of Van looms large. A well-known civil engineer of New York, he was induced to take a fling at film work by J. Stuart Blackton, with whom he was socially intimate. The horrible appellation of "Cutie" wished on Van at the height of his comedy career had its full share in spoiling a promising future. It was this same Van who was responsible for the introduction of Mrs. Sidney Drew to the films. Under the name of Jane Morrow she received considerable extra work thru Van's good offices until Vitagraph officials saw the possibilities of the Drews as the most delightful pair of comedians that ever shook an audience into whole-souled laughter.

Stories Were Cheap

WHEN we read today of the trifling sums paid for the rights to various plays and novels, ranging from $5,000 to $100,000, according to the gullibility of the producer-purchaser, and the insistence of the star that the particular play or novel be secured for the exploitation of his or her screen talents, it is illuminating to consider the manner in which scenario requirements were handled in the old days.

Under the direction of one of the industry's first scenario editors, Beta Brueil, assisted by Rollin Sturgeon and Hal Reid, father of Wally, story after story was purchased for sums ranging from $5.00 to

This building at Sunset Boulevard and Gower Street, Hollywood, was taken over from the Salvation Army by David Horsley, who used it as a studio to make his first motion picture

Bunny began his movie career at $40 per week and at the height of his career, when death cut short his brilliant comedy achievements, he was receiving $500 per week. Nowadays, this salary is regarded as a nominal one in the movies and is received by countless of the lesser lights whose names mean little or nothing at the box-office.

Those bulwarks of the Vitagraph program, Maurice Costello and Florence Turner, who with Bunny helped to establish the fortune which Vitagraph productions earned for Blackton, Rock and Smith thru their countless performances, received correspondingly slim pay envelopes for their efforts. This same trio today would be in the earning class of a Chaplin, a Meighan and a Pickford.

Supplying the "side line" music for these stars of other days was a slight, blond-haired boy who, in between turns at playing his fiddle, did small acting bits in innumerable pictures. His brother was one of the first if not the first "stunt men" in studio work, doubling for the players who appeared in the various epics of the West which Vitagraph turned out in "Arizona," a peaceful Flatbush location. The musician-extra was Dick Rosson, who recently completed the direction of Gloria Swanson's latest picture. The stunt man, his brother Arthur, has to his credit the direction of Douglas Fairbanks and several other top-notchers in the stars' league.

mothers that it would be just as well to keep us away from you."

Her grandmother had done that! Her Grandmother Rogers with her little blue, drawn thread of a mouth!

The little scimped ways of them all. Scimped and mean like her grandmother's mouth, always shut so tightly as tho she were biting back acid words she wanted to say, wanted to say to Jonquil.

The gossip that went on among the old ladies; cruel gossip that flayed soft pretty young things and hurt and stung like whip lashes. That young minister who had taken over the Congregational Church. Earnest eyes he had had and a flame in his voice . . . he had taken tea with young and pretty Mrs. Fielder in her rose garden one afternoon too many . . . Jonquil never quite knew how it all happened, but she got the stench of dark unhappy things in an undercurrent and then the young flame-like man was gone and pretty little Mrs. Fielder went about with a bewildered expression on her child-like face and a streak of gray across her hair and people said that her husband had used to be kind and tender to her but that now he misused her and made her unhappy. . . .

The unkindnesses . . . the thin, lash-like unkindnesses. . . .

Once, once only she had dared to ask her grandmother why the girls in town treated her as they did . . . what was the matter with her . . . what it was all about. . . .

Jonquil never ceased to think that what her grandmother said was horrible. It wasn't so much that she condemned her, that she told her her life had ruined her for "nice" people, that she was a stage child and had lived "Dear knew" what kind of a life and that decent folk have to be particular about the kind of girls their girls go with . . . she could have forgiven her all that. It was the way she talked about Jonquil's mother. About her own daughter. About the girl who had been her little girl, bone of her bone, flesh of her flesh, suckled at her breast. It was the cruel bitter things she said about her. It was the way she took that dead memory and stained it and maimed it.

Sad years.

Solitary. After a time Jonquil ceased to think much about it, came to accept it. She reached the point when, on rare occasions, some girl, some compassionate warm woman, did make some friendly overture to her, she drew away, resented it. She was afraid of it. She was afraid of hurt.

She just knew that she was solitary. That she was a misfit. She went solitary to school and she came solitary home. She helped with the spring cleaning, the mending, the canning and pickling, the general sewing, whatever happened to be in process of work. And there was always something. There was never leisure, never dalliance.

After awhile they didn't hurt any more, the pin-pricks. After a time they lost their power.

She noticed that her Grandmother's nose and mouth seemed to be bending over to meet one another; she thought, amusedly, that she looked rather like the pictures of the Witch of Endor . . . maybe she was. . . .

She thought, now and again, of the things she had planned to do when she had first come to Three Trees. The Jonquil never ceased to think that what her grandmother said was horrible. She talked so bitterly about her own daughter splendid games she would teach to some of the girls she would particularly like . . . most little girls, she found, didn't imagine many things . . . they played such gummy little games . . . but she would teach them to imagine and they would see that she was really a very splendid sort of person . . . they would see what she really was and would tell their mothers and their mothers would say to Grandmother Rogers, "What an unusual child . . . a darling . . . I love to have my little girl play with her, she thinks such beautiful thoughts. . . ."

Once, passionately, Jonquil had told her Grandmother that she knew she would never "get away from it" and her Grandmother had got out the Bible and had read her about "the sins of the fathers" until Jonquil had cringed in reluctant terror.

After all, Lillian de Vere had loved her little girl . . . she had seized her and held her against her cheaply perfumed breast and there had been the warm blood feel of a heart throbbing there . . . she had wanted her to be happy, forlornly, but really and passionately . . . and they hadn't had threads for mouths, those grease-painty people back-stage . . . they had wept generously over their erring dead and they had forgiven their erring living with shrugs of the shoulders and an "Oh, well . . . poor chap . . ."

But of course she hated them. They had marked her so that "nice" girls and their mothers drew aside their skirts and wouldn't speak to her unless it might be to say "Goodday, Jonquil, how is your poor Gran'ma?" It was always as if they pitied Grandmother because of her.

It was as if they hated her.

Funny.

On the stage they hadn't hated her. That much was certain. That had seemed, then, to be the trouble. They had loved her in their slobbery fashions. Ugh. Like that character woman who was forever kissing her hotly all over her face as if she had never kissed a little girl before and was trying to get all the times she had missed into that one time.

Of course, now, the nice girls would never know how she had wanted a front porch and a nice, thin-lipped Grandma—and them.

No, when she cared so dreadfully, during the time she cared so much, when the pin pricks drew little drops of blood, she wouldn't have told them.

And then, later on, she didn't care any more. It was all too much trouble. It was easier to go home, slip into her own room on the pretext of home-work, slip off her stiff prissy clothes, slip into a wrapper, stretch across the bed reading the fiction stories in the old magazines Elijah's wife gave her from time to time. Love stories. There was a door . . . a channel . . . love might come some day . . . slip in one of the narrow crevices of her life . . . set her free . . . ring out her laughter . . . fill her with roses and sunshine. In lots of the stories love came in the most improbable places, to the most improbable people. There was even a saying . . . something about love laughing at bolts and bars. . . . If love came, how supreme it would make her, how triumphant she could be. . . .

But she was growing prettier. She knew that. Even she could see the gentle rhythm, the soft poetry of her own rounding breasts and liling thighs. Her hair was amber colored, too, with the hue of dark honey . . . her skin was soft and in the twilight her face drifted like a flower's face . . . her mouth was clean-cut by day but in the evening it became a soft blur . . . a promise. . . .

When Jonquil was seventeen, all of Three Trees had narrowed and compressed to her vision. It was as if it had shrivelled and shrunk. Funny, but when she walked down the shaded streets she seemed to be walking down prickly, sharp-pronged aisles that closed in upon her at either side, hideously.

Oh, how could love find an entering wedge here . . . here where no sap flowed . . . where no blood ran . . . where people were pale and chalky and streets were narrow and hurt you. . . .

But love did get a foothold . . . in the spring. . . .

More Inside Facts About the Extra

named. These frail, pitiful fast-dying institutions probably furnish keen amusement for the Great Powers. Of course, a jungle flea may annoy an elephant for a time! But the aim of these little clubs is good. The policy is purely civic and for so-called community welfare work among motion picture people. But their only aim in the end is to secure work for their members, regardless of what is said to the contrary. But it is thought that the efforts of such clubs, in some instances, is so much apple dumpling to the producers whose troubles exceed in a minute ten times that of an actor in a week. As a matter of fact, the producer is the maker, the creator of The Central Casting Bureau, and, no doubt these same producers grew damn sick and tired of the rumpus constantly being excavated by groups of radical extras. I know, I am one of them.

But Few Are Chosen

Now comes the great joke! When Old Screen Service was laid away in rosemary and The Central Casting Bureau made its first move in its cradle, what had happened? The same man and officers of the former Screen Service are now the Big Guns of The Central. Laugh that down. And the names! names! and files went along with the rest of the outfit. When you go to a studio for work, you are generally but firmly referred to The Central; when you go to The Central, you are assuredly and roughly and crudely told to go to the studio and get your papers—a letter stating that that certain studio wishes you to work for it. Try and get it! Do they kid themselves?

There are exceptions to the rule, many get work as of old, but they are well known and have been "regulars" for a long time. And of course, when a great boiling mob is used, there are generally the same number who form another line which is called "Spec!" Meaning those who go on speculation, hoping that most all the people who are on regular call will not be there to get their tickets or checks. It is funny, too, most every "spec" believes that he will get a job, get another's ticket, he likes to kid himself.

The system for getting work now is all done by the telephone. You call into the office and give your name! name! and the operator repeats it to the long line of casting directors. If you are properly registered and have good standing in all ways, then, you may get a job. But most of the time it is, "Nothing in yet!" Sometimes it is "Line's busy!" It is stated that an average of over six thousand (6,000) calls go into The Central Office daily. Can you imagine the magnitude, the problems and difficulties arising under and over such sad conditions?

To the person planning a picture career via the extra train, I would say that it is almost impossible to become registered at The Central Office, where the greater part of work is obtained. In fact, a registration may be had, but that does not give you work—you can be killed in the files!

This is not because officials want it that way, or because it is their choice. But it is purely a matter of statistical, business necessity. It is said that if every person worked in pictures who is registered, or who desires to work, then, there would be less than fifty dollars ($50.00) made annually per capita. And the answer is that the desirable list of people, those who are really depending on pictures for a living, must be assorted and given the greater proportion. Yes, to those who are constituted and equipped to fill most any demand made in picture work.

This young girl is disillusioned. She forgot to remember

And Still They Come

DESPITE all this, the fifty thousand folk still march on to nowhere, over this road or under that bridge—bridge of sighs! And each trial, each effort to break thru, only inspires those behind the scenes (the powers that are) to fasten more securely the doors that lead to fame and future and fortune; to shut more coldly the gates wherein the world seems bent upon seeking—the studio. No doubt if studio gates were thrown open to the public, it would take one half the world to escort the other half around the lots and sets, the studio ground with its quaint-looking, half-shelled outbuildings and ruins. I believe all progress would cease.

Not long ago, near Washington Boulevard, just inside a certain studio fence, there were some scenes to be made—"shot." This set could be seen clearly from the boulevard. Would you believe that in less than an hour about one thousand automobiles had stopped, and, people were going mob-mad to get a peep? The police were called to clear the traffic which was piling up like a foreign debt. Just one thimbleful of human ants!

But back to the other truths again.

Perhaps much could be said about the present system of casting people for pictures, extra talent, I mean. Some people would never be pleased with anything, any system or device. But I must repeat, stay away from pictures; the movie has all the help it needs and that much over. And if you care to go contrary to that advice, do not forget that you were told not to forget to remember.

They Forget to Remember

It seems best to await developments on the new angle of The Great Central Casting Bureau. It is only a baby now. With proper nursing and kidding it may grow up and prove a wonderful thing. So far, the organization has done some good. The officials are trying hard to do their best. And if it is a bad thing, an improper way to handle the future situation, only strict and rigid enforcement of that present method will either eliminate it or keep it in force. But it might be said that if The Great Central Office is ever discontinued, then, many, many agents will enter the business of getting jobs for extra talent. Yes, they'll probably hang a sign on their doors reading something like this: "We guarantee you a job when you register with us! If we fail to get a job for you—we'll pay one thousand dollars!" It sounds good, but sound is all. In the old days, however, Screen Service was the ruling monarch in getting work for extra talent. It was a power. It will never be that power again.

Indeed, it is highly improbable that The Central Office will be discontinued. And if it were, there would be castes, clubs and "societies" which would turn the extra talent forces into a red revolution, yes, even more so than they are now. And this is the TRUTH.

Nothing But the Truth

THE Brewster Publications are, of course, world-renowned for their policy of strictly and rigidly following the roads of Truth. And there is a certain trade journal published in the vicinity of Hollywood which also has the same policy. And not very long ago this trade journal published an editorial which struck the "extra" squarely in the guts. It is so truthful, so good, therefore it is necessary to quote it. As follows:

"THE QUITTER"

"A piece of news has just reached us to the effect that an 'extra' is quitting the movies. This fact in itself is insignificant, since many extras starve out daily and sink back into that oblivion from which they sprang. But behind this surrender lurks a story, a story which embodies a moral for every boy and girl entering the game.

"The extra mentioned typifies the highest standard of American manhood. He is an upstanding, two-fisted chap in the prime of youth; one who followed his own barrage into the jaw of hell upon the firing line; he is a graduate of our best universities, a student of law, a legitimate actor and a journalist of merit. A year ago he joined the ranks of extras, being told that picture producers were ever on the lookout for talent and ability—that the man on the bridge could detect a mile away the periscope of genius.

"Well! He joined the movie ranks, has spent a year weltering and poking up his periscope. Now, he is quitting. Not a lightweight. At the same time it can be said of Pauline Garon and Marie Prevost (Canada), Eileen Percy (Ireland) and Flora Le Breton (England), that they rarely fail to come up to the scratch.

Scions of the Empire

IN addition to Mary Pickford, most famous daughter of the historic family of Smiths, Canada sponsored the birth of Norma Shearer and Claire Adams; while Australia, not content with its mustachioed masterpiece, Marc McDermott, freehandedly threw in Louise Lovely and Enid Bennett. England's quota, in addition to those whose names have been mentioned, includes players of every conceivable type, notably Charlie Chaplin, George K. Arthur, Henry Vibart, Flora Finch, Gibson Gowland, the late David Powell, the brothers Torrence, and Dorothy Mackaill.

Charlie, of course, received the best education in the world—in the tough school of life—but most of the British-born stars prefer to keep the secret of where they picked up the ABC and any other smatterings of knowledge they may have acquired. Only four confess to an education at the great English Public Schools, which as everybody knows are so-called owing to the exclusive and aristocratic nature of their clientele. The four are Alec Francis (Uppingham School), Cyril Chadwick (Brighton College), Wyndham Standing (St. Paul's, London) and Ralph Forbes (Denstone). And with these carefully nurtured beings we can write "finis" to the long tale of Hollywood's Union Jack Club.

Their Early Vicissitudes

MOST of the British picture players in Hollywood are now generally regarded as thoroughly successful people, but some interesting stories could be told of the years many of them spent in their native land, struggling for the recognition that would not come. England, which has provided far more stars and featured players of Hollywood than any other country except America, easily takes bottom place among all the nations for ability to pick the winners. For years the British film industry, which has never flourished since the war, has been trying to lay the blame for its failure on the lack of stars. In actual fact the number of Britishers who have succeeded in America points to there being more star material in proportion to the population of England than to that of any other country.

Thomas Meighan, who for years has ranked among the highest-paid stars in the world, spent his early days walking on and playing bits in the west end of London. But no manager ever took any notice of him, so he gave up trying to establish himself in England and came to New York, where he made good. Ronald Colman is another who strove in vain for a chance in London, until Henry King chose him to play in "The White Sister" in Italy, when he immediately scored a hit with the American public.

Another similar case is Percy Marmont, who, with a style all his own, has found his services in constant demand since he became known in Hollywood. Altho he did much valuable work in connection with repertory theaters in England, he never met with any degree of financial success. Finally, in desperation to earn some money, he came to New York to try his luck.

There, however, he still found fortune unfavorable for some months. He could get no work, but succeeded in arousing the interest of Small, the casting agent, whose faith in him was so great that he paid his fare to Hollywood. Marmont was chosen to play Mark Sabre in "If Winter Comes," and he returned to England to make some scenes for this picture, having developed in a few months from an unknown repertory actor to a miniature star.

Stars of Two Countries

THE story of these men is the story of many another Englishman who has found success here after years of vain attempts in his own country. Tho it is a highly difficult task to obtain recognition in this country on stage or screen, it is a hundred times as difficult in London, where impresarios are, as a rule, constitutionally opposed to taking a gamble on a new discovery.

On the other hand, in a few cases English players, who have migrated to Hollywood, were already well known and successful in England. Clive Brook, for instance, was probably the most popular male star in England two or three years ago. Originally intended for the army, he succumbed to the lure of movie acting and has never met with any serious reverses in his chosen career. He played leading rôles in England for years, but never faltered in his determination to come to America as soon as an opportunity presented itself. In his unhindered progress he bears comparison with his namesake of the famous Tennysonian poem.

Fortune was on his side, for he was chosen to play opposite Betty Compson in the big British picture, "Woman of Woman," and on the strength of his per-unusual happening in their locality. They do not receive a regular salary, but instead they are paid space rates—so much per word or per column of space they fill.

Newsreels are similarly organized. They have their regulars, their district men, and their "correspondents," the latter paid by the foot only for pictures which are used. Main offices are in New York, but there are branch offices, with regular local staffs in Chicago, Philadelphia, San Francisco, St. Louis and other large cities. In the important centers of Europe, offices are also maintained.

In the foreign offices, natives are employed, tho an American is usually in charge to receive directions from the central office. Thus in China, Chinese cameramen are employed; in Rome, Romans are used, because a native, knowing his own country best, is always awake to any novelty that might appeal to the discriminating tastes of film goers.

Speed and Accuracy Are the Watchwords

THE pictures of the eruption of Mauna Loa, the Hawaiian volcano, are a striking example of what this remarkable organization accomplishes. When Mauna Loa first began to rumble, the International Newsreel cabled its correspondents, Walter J. Tomimaga and John F. Stone in Honolulu, and Frank K. Cody in Hilo, to proceed to the island, more than three hundred miles away, where the volcano is located. But it was several days before the eruption took place. Meanwhile, the New York office had arranged for a seaplane to go from Honolulu to Hilo on the Island of Hawaii whence it afterward flew overland to Kona, across the Island.

There have been few sights more impressive in pictures than the view of Mauna Loa in action, a mountain more than thirteen thousand feet high, its top torn away and clouds of dense smoke and flame rising from its peak. As the great flaming river of lava, some three miles wide and one hundred feet high, rolled over the mountain side, inhabitants fled before it, and whole towns were wiped out.

But the news cameramen pushed closer up the mountainside down which the lava poured. At Hoopuloa they stopped to photograph the mighty spectacle. At one point the lava stream, more than forty feet high, advanced with such rapidity that the men were forced to flee for their lives and tho they all escaped death, one man was severely burned. A convincing proof of the grimness of the scene was the picture that one of the photographers caught showing his colleagues running from the flames, each weighed down by a sixty-pound camera.

The precious film, after it was sent by plane from Kona to Honolulu, was placed aboard the steamer Matsonia for San Francisco. The prints were made there from one of the negatives for distribution on the Pacific Coast while the other was placed aboard an airplane and flown to the International studio in New York.

Early in his career a newsreel photographer is impressed with two important facts, one, that he must get his picture, and secondly, that he must rush the negative back with all possible speed. I compared the organization of the newsreel with that of the newspaper, but there the reel is not always apparent from the results," Mr. Cohen said. "We use only about ten per cent. of the material we go after. Ninety per cent. represents stories covered in all parts of the world that seem big when they happen, tho they dwindle immediately and are not worthy of release, or they are less important than other events that may happen in the meantime. When you see the newsreel in your theater, it is not the production of that reel you have to consider, but the material that has not even been included in it. A newsreel that is an accurate record of world events costs big sums of money to produce."

Three Types of Pictures

NEWS pictures are of three types—the accidental, the anticipated and the scheduled, Mr. Cohen pointed out. In the first class belongs sudden news like the Santa Barbara earthquake, or the Shenandoah disaster. In the second are those events which occur as a natural result of preceding events. Mr. Cohen suggested that the Smyrna fire in 1922 was such an event, for tho no one could have predicted the fire, anyone who had kept track of the war between the Turks and the Greeks knew that some tragic occurrence would be the outcome.

In the class of scheduled events are the inauguration of a president, the opening of a World's Series, the Yale-Harvard football game, the Scopes trial, the arrival of a steamer, beauty parades and the like. Since these events occur in all parts of the world, it is imperative that the news film have representatives stationed everywhere.

No matter where an event occurs, be sure there is some news photographer within reach of that place. Film editors have in their offices extensive maps, showing in detail the tiniest town in the most remote corner of the earth and the photographer stationed near there. No one knows where the next picture will break.

Besides the maps, the editor's offices are equipped with charts showing the transportation resources; the railroads, the airplanes available, power boats, automobiles, steamers and their sailing dates. That is how it is possible to show within twenty-four or forty-eight hours after they occur events of national and international importance. Sometimes the film travels in laboratory trains or ships where it can be developed while it is being shipped.

When Robert E. Peary discovered the North Pole in 1909, it took five months for the news of his achievement to reach this country. But when Byrd hopped off on May 9, 1926, the world knew about it

Pathé

The newsreel cameraman was "Johnny-on-the-spot" during the great Dayton flood in 1913. More than seven hundred lives were lost and millions of dollars in property destroyed comparison ends. Tho the reporter can get his information from people who have been on the scene of an accident, the photographer must actually be there when it occurs. He cant tell about it; he must have it on the film. If there is gun firing in military operations, he must be close enough to get a picture of it. And after the picture is taken, he cannot, as the reporter can, telephone or wire the news. He must send the film itself.

Spare No Expense

THE cameramen are instructed that no expense must be spared in rushing pictures. When they leave for an important assignment they are given enough money to cover all expenses. When Robert Donahue, a Pathé photographer, was sent to northern Ontario to get pictures of newly discovered gold mines, he engaged an airplane for $400 to shoot scenes from the air. "If there is an obstacle that money can overcome, pay for it," seems to be a slogan.

It is obvious, from all this, that newsreels must cost a great deal of money. And they do, tho the scenery is free, and no actors are required. Emanuel Cohen, editor of the Pathé Newsreel, explained why.

"A modern feature picture shows its cost, but the cost of production of a news-are the result of using Pompeian Beauty Powder. It is scientifically blended to match the shade of your skin.

The type of beauty that combines reddish brown hair with sea-gray eyes requires the Naturelle shade of Pompeian Beauty Powder.

WHENEVER you are out-of-doors you should be especially careful to select the correct shade of powder and so apply it evenly.

By MADAME JEANNETTE

Famous cosmetician, retained by The Pompeian Laboratories as a consultant to give authentic advice regarding the care of the skin and the proper use of beauty preparations.

SHADE CHART for selecting your shade of Pompeian Beauty Powder

Medium Skin: The average American skin tone is medium, neither decidedly light nor definitely olive. This skin should use the Naturelle shade.

Olive Skin: Women with this type of skin are apt to have dark hair and eyes. This skin should use the Rachel shade to match its rich tones.

Pink Skin: This is the youthful, rose-tinted skin (not the florid skin) and should use the Flesh shade.

White Skin: This skin is unusual, but if you have it you should use White powder in the daytime.

In case of doubt about the shade you require, write a description of your skin, hair and eyes to me for special advice.

Pompeian Beauty Powder is 60c a box. Also comes in compact form in a dainty, hinge-cover box with mirror and puff. (Slightly higher in Canada.) Satisfaction guaranteed.

Madame Jeannette
Specialist in Beauty

P. S. I also suggest that you use Pompeian Day Cream as a foundation for your Pompeian Beauty Powder.

A SOFT, delicate texture—a lovely satiny face—yet not a sign of powder. What is the secret of her alluring complexion? Does she use powder? She does, but a shade that matches so perfectly the tone of her skin that she secures the good effects of powder without seeming to use it.

All smart women strive for a natural complexion, but all do not achieve it. Nor all women have found a powder that really matches their skin—a powder that reveals their natural coloring. Complexions are not composed of single colors, but a blend of different colors. So it is only natural that the shade of powder to match your complexion must also be a blend.

Pompeian Beauty Powder is scientifically blended from different colors. Whatever the tone of your complexion, some one shade of this powder matches it perfectly. Select this shade from the directions in the shade chart.

Pompeian Beauty Powder has gained its remarkable popularity because of its purity, its exceptional consistency, its delicate odor, its quality of adhering well—and its perfection of shades.

BIG VIC a Soldier of Fortune

A scene from "The Fighting Heart" in which McLaglen played the rôle of a prize-fighter

With the Royal Guards in Africa, the boy McLaglen served thru several stubbornly fought campaigns. He got the hard schooling of the British Tommy. He had no real direction except the desire of his whole powerful body for danger and chance. It is a life described best in the verses of Kipling or A. E. Housman:

*I will go where
I am wanted, for the sergeant does not mind;*

He may be sick to see me, but he treats me very kind....

*I will go where
I am wanted,
where there's room for one or two,*

And the men are none too many for the work there is to do,

Where the standing line wears thinner and the dropping dead lie thick,

And the enemies of England, they shall see me and be sick.

A Crazy-Quilt Career

"I WAS born in England, the son of an Anglican Bishop, whose see was in South Africa. I was one of five brothers, all close to me in age, nearly as big as myself. When I was fourteen, the Boer War broke out in Africa. I was nearly six feet tall then. I was crazy to go in, and I ran away and enlisted in the Queen's Guards at Windsor. I suppose you might say I have been an adventurer ever since. That was my first big thrill. My last, nearly a quarter of a century later, occurred when I met Commodore J. Stuart Blackton in a London club after the Great War, and he started me in the motion pictures. There were many great adventures during that long interval. Many far stranger than any I have gone thru for the camera. Too many almost to tell. . . ."

When he had served out his enlistment, Victor set out for Canada and during his knockabout life in the Dominion joined the wild rush to the Cobalt silver mines. Wandering, the lure of precious metal, the changing fortunes of each new day, the life in the frontier lands—this was all the strapping youth cared for in a prosaic age. In the rough company of the mining camps, he, with his herculean size and strength, could always care for himself in a fair fight and hew his own way toward a quick fortune. But with neither gold nor other man down. Well, his jobs with the circus consisted of rising each night from the audience and challenging the professional boxer and wrestler, one "Monsieur Duval," and giving him the scrap of his life. The sight of the hulking beetle-browed young stranger rising from the crowd to dare on the professional always provided excitement, if not always deception. McLaglen developed as a professional athlete and, taking an engagement with his partner, toured Canada in those rough and tumble days from coast to coast.

One day in Tacoma, Washington, a group of sporting people became interested in him and urged him to be the White Hope against Jack Johnson. He trained and took on the Black soon after for a six-round, no-decision affair. Victor stayed, but he did not stay as a prize-fighter. He took a fling at professional wrestling and managed to pin the celebrated Dr. Roller of Seattle for a fall.

Victor felt the call of the road again and soon he was en tour, this time with his brother Arthur, across the Pacific, stopping for professional performances in Hawaii, the South Sea Islands, finally in Australia.

Adventures In and Out of War

HERE he ran full tilt into another young gold-rush. He threw over his vaudeville engagement and joined the race for silver was he rewarded. Starving, the youth wandered back to the fringes of civilization, and with his wanderlust still unabated, he hooked up with a traveling circus troupe known as the J. W. Parker Carnival Company.

Fights Jack Johnson

HERE began one of the most colorful episodes of McLaglen's crazy-quilted career. You must remember that he weighed over two-hundred pounds and in his soldiering and mining life he had learned much about how to handle his fists and put the interior to Kalgoorlie, in the general excitement. Another chance to hew out a quick fortune! He came out of this wiser and poorer, after months of harrowing experiences, in rags, his tongue hanging out. He had nearly died of starvation in the desert; he had nearly been murdered by the savage Bushmen.

Back to the vaudeville tour and the nightly strong-man act! His route took him round the world thru the East Indies, Ceylon, India and then to South Africa.

"The wanderlust was still strong in me," said McLaglen. "Some men never get over it. I had nearly had my fill of hardships and adventures, when another break came. It was August, 1914, when we landed in Capetown. We learned that a great war had broken out in Europe."

McLaglen took to sea at once for England. There was one of those solemn family reunions of the five McLaglen because he is beaten! Ah, no! The men who blazed our trails across the Mississippi, broke the backbone of a continent and carved an empire from the wilderness; the men whose sons cleared the Argonne and stamped success upon the flag of failure, could not, and can't be beaten. This boy is not whipped, but he is turning his back upon a profession which is sucking the heart's blood from the best boys and girls in America. He has watched them come, buoyed up with hope, and stay to drink the dregs of black despair. He has seen them step down from their high estate and, hollow-eyed and hungry hearted, choose the path which promised easy conquest.

"Now, he is quitting—while he still has it in him to quit. He is returning to the old home town, to the toil-scarred loom of life upon which so many great Americans have woven their Master's plan of destiny. It may not sound heroic, but it takes a strong man to turn his back while the siren beckons forward. This boy is going back, only one of the thirty thousand extras who are searing their wings in the golden dawn of a screen career. And it's a pity to see him cross the mountains alone. Twenty-five thousand other extras might follow him, back to the farm and the old home comforts, and the industry would be better for it."

Personally, I would like to meet this fellow and shake his hand. He is about the first person I've heard about who shows absolute signs of human intelligence. I wish I could quit. Maybe, some day, somewhere, somehow, I will quit this extra game—to play a better one.

An illustration of fact is, of course, the only method upon which we can base any certified result. And so far as the Great Central Office is concerned, it seems that the best known casting directors for the different studios have said that the Central Casting Bureau is the greatest and best way yet realized. The Central can handle two or three enormous sets daily. Not long ago there were several big companies that required from three to six hundred people each—and the Central Office put those two thousand people, more or less, on call within the prescribed few hours. And it was done with remarkable speed and accuracy. It is like a big machine.

You would marvel at the greatness and magnitude of the Central Casting Bureau—which is a baby. And from the best and most authentic reports every person connected with motion pictures, and, especially those who have the duty to cast people for the studios, say that the Central Office has won their hearty approval.

A Tremendous Battle

THEN, it reverts back again to our original topic. If you are planning a picture career, it is best for you to go to Hollywood prepared to make the sacrifice and fight your battle with CHANCE without any assistance; take your turn on the wheel of fortune and be satisfied with whatever lot is given you. On the other hand, it is difficult, it is rather strange and unusual to tell you to stay away from Hollywood. It is hard for me to say to you, "stay away from pictures! You mustn't go to Hollywood and try to get in the movies!"

That statement appears as tho one were

ARTISTIC TALENT + Perseverance = Success

Compare the small drawing at the left made by George Halman Ray before studying with us and the Cover Design at the right, which was made recently. Note the wonderful improvement brought about by the right kind of training.

His is an interesting story. When eighteen, he was employed as Indian interpreter and storekeeper at Hudson's Bay, one hundred miles beyond the railroad. In summer his mail was carried in by canoe; in winter by dog sledge.

Perseverance—Then Success

He says, "My cousin sent me a magazine which contained an advertisement telling about the Federal Course. I was fortunate enough to get several foxes in trapping I was doing with an old Indian. I used the money to start the course. I had absolutely no other art training except the Federal lessons.

"Upon completing the course I got an art job in Winnipeg, then to the St. Paul Dispatch and now I am here in Chicago operating a studio of my own. I owe my start in illustrating entirely to the Federal Course. I am still studying and find Federal text books and co-operation as valuable as ever."

Get Busy

Compare your opportunity with the difficulties under which Ray worked, consider how much easier you can gain success equal to his by studying under Federal tutors, sixty leading artists, such as Sid Smith, Neysa McMein, Fontaine Fox, Charles Livingston Bull, Clare Briggs and many others.

Five thousand publishers are looking for skilled artists at big pay. Step out boldly into the "ROAD TO BIGGER THINGS," like dozens of others have done under Federal tutoring. Just write your name, age and address on the margin, mail it to us and we will send you a copy of the book free. Do it right now while you're thinking about it.

on the following day, and twenty days later, motion pictures of his feat were being shown on Broadway. In these days of speedy accomplishment, twenty days may sound like a long time, but not when one considers the distance covered and the difficulties overcome. And this is how the pictures were rushed to New York: representatives waited at various Norwegian ports and the film was relayed by chartered boats and planes from man to man until they were safely conveyed to Southampton in time to reach a steamer sailing for New York, and at noon, Friday, May 27, the pictures arrived at quarantine!

Endured Hardships

THAT'S the story, told in as few words as possible. But if you wanted to know as I did, the more personal side of it, this is what you would be told: our American photographers were exposed to the same biting frosts, the identical conditions that Commander Byrd endured—but they weren't made national heroes. The crew of the Chantier, the official boat of the North Pole expedition, was permitted to land at Spitzbergen, the cameramen were not allowed to photograph the landing of Byrd from the shore. But that was what they had come all the way from New York to get. Something had to be done and done quickly. So Robert Donahue, Leslie Wyand and Willard Vanderveer, Pathé cameramen, lashed an iceberg and took pictures from that vantage point! These men lived for twenty-one days in the perpetual daylight of the Arctic summer. They were not only photographers, they became members of the crew. They helped assemble the Fokker and shifted coal like anyone else. At any hour they had to be ready to work, tho their fingers were numb and their cameras frozen. In their little plane nicknamed Yellow Peril they took shots of Byrd's plane from the air. (The actual pictures of the Pole were taken for Pathé only by Commander Byrd, of course.) Once Donahue barely escaped death when the radiator of the Yellow Peril broke and froze in mid-air.

Donahue deserves a story all to himself. A little, wiry Irishman, he is given the toughest news assignments in the Pathé organization. Even a wife and children can't keep him from skimming all over the world in search of pictures. He has been to Iceland, Greenland, Labrador and all points north, east, south and west. Donahue had just returned from the gold discovery at Ontario when he was told to get himself some heavy clothing for the North Pole trip. Within two days he was ready to sail. He tells this story about himself with great relish. He breezed into town one day, having been away on a five months' assignment, and telephoned his wife that he would be home shortly. His family was overjoyed to hear from him. Two hours later he telephoned again.

"I'm sorry I won't be able to come," he said, "but I have to leave right away for Scotland."

Last year Donahue had a vacation, the first in two years. Anyone would expect him to spend it lolling around and doing nothing. No. He packed Mrs. Donahue and the children into an automobile, and they rode into Canada and back, a trip of fourteen hundred miles.

Insured by Lloyd's

WHEN the American news cameramen left for the North Pole, they were insured by Lloyd's of London. No American insurance firm would take the risk. However, most of the newsreel firms have an understanding when it comes to caring for their photographers. One official admitted to me that insurance companies preferred not to insure the lives of cameramen, but when I questioned him further, he told me bluntly that he did not wish to discuss the subject.

"It is clear," he said, "that the cameraman must take great risks to obtain a picture. Occasionally one is killed or severely injured, but most of the men seem to have charmed lives. They expose themselves to all sorts of dangers and get away with it. I don't believe the death rate is any higher than among men of any other profession. And no matter what the attitude the insurance companies take toward them, the film companies feel a personal responsibility for the men in their employ."

Dangers Everywhere

"CHARMED lives." Most assuredly, else how could they take the chances they do? There was the photographer, who just for an exclusive stunt, flew an airplane thru the Grand Canyon a few years ago, in the face of a certain and terrible death, thousands of feet below, should any part of his machine so much as brush up against the walls of stone that closed in upon him.

And there was the cameraman who flew with an Italian airman into the very crater of the smoking Mount Etna for pictures of its seething interior. And the man who photographed the Japanese earthquake. And the fellow who caught some magnificent shots of a tornado in action.

There is also John A. Bockhorst, whose own bravery as a cameraman was as distinguished as that of the man he photographed. When Sergeant Randall Bose, in order to make a scientific experiment, dropped eighteen hundred feet before opening his parachute, Bockhorst, seated on a wooden bar with nothing but space before him leaned forward to catch the spectacular fall, as oblivious of his own precarious position as if he sat in an armchair by a fireside.

This same Bockhorst was once covering the war maneuvers of the Naval Air Force sixty miles off Nicaragua when something went wrong with his craft and he found himself thrown into the water. He remained afloat for twelve and a half hours until, at midnight, a destroyer came along and picked him up. To Bockhorst also is ascribed the honor of discovering where the S-51 sank after it was rammed by the City of Rome. He flew in his seaplane until he caught sight of the air bubbles and oil on the surface of the water below which the submarine was buried.

And there are Donahue and Vanderveer, mentioned previously, who as members of Commander Byrd's expedition helped to clear a path for the pontoons bearing the Josephine Ford thru cakes of ice that broke the sides of steel lifeboats.

And there are those countless others who brave the dangers of firing lines, of storms, of uprisings among foreign tribes and crossing oceans by airplane in order that some priceless picture may flicker for a few moments.

When Indian summer days are come—and with gay companions you saunter over the friendly fields
 —have a Camel!

No other cigarette in the world is like Camels. Camels contain the choicest Turkish and Domestic tobaccos. The Camel blend is the triumph of expert blenders. Even the Camel cigarette paper is the finest—made especially in France. Into this one brand of cigarettes is concentrated the experience and skill of the largest tobacco organization in the world.

WHEN Indian summer days are here. And the smoky haze lies over the fields. When the merry notes of the horn, sounding after the coach and four, remind you of other days—have a Camel!

For life is never so complete, so joyous as when a lighted Camel sends up its fragrant smoke. On city street or country road, in any season of the year, no other cigarette was ever so rich and fragrant—so smooth and mellow mild. When you become a Camel smoker, there's no end to your enjoyment, for they never tire the taste. You'll never get choicer tobaccos, more superbly blended, than you get in Camels.

So, this perfect autumn day as your trail leads over the fields or along the turning road—

Have a Camel!

Our highest wish, if you do not yet know Camel quality, is that you try them. We invite you to compare Camels with any other cigarette made at any price.

Three Writers Consider the Films

Art is looked upon as a sacrilegious utterance by those in the know. It is too disgustingly simple!

Eventually, one by one, acknowledged artists in all the other Arts become impatient over the childishness, the inefficacy and the rottenness of the Movies, and decide to pitch in and spend a few weeks or a few months and just put them in their place as a near-Art. You have read about them—well-known Painters, Sculptors, Architects, Interior Decorators, Singers, Dancers, Poets, Short Story Writers, Novelists, Composers, Dramatists and so on—entraining for Los Angeles. Later on, your theater emblazoned as a special feature what one of these bona-fide Artists had done for the Movies. You bought tickets and took the family all keyed up with expectation. "Now!" you told people. "We shall have a real motion picture play, the way it ought to be!"

And what did they all turn out to be? From the artistic point of view, they attempted to make a silk purse out of a sow's ear, actually they succeeded in doing the reverse, making a sow's ear out of a silk purse! With a sigh of relief, you went back to your Movies unhampered by real Artists.

Motion picture plays seen on the screen seem so simple. And they are. They should be! That is the secret of their appeal, their success. That is the secret of all Art appeal. It would seem to argue that the Art of the motion picture has come nearer to approximating pure Art than any other form of esthetic appeal. "But it is a 'mechanical' art!" protests the artistic soul. For answer, I should advise this protestor to try to make a motion picture himself; we will lend him the best mechanical aid in the world. Then he will discover, as they all discover sooner or later, that photodrama is perhaps the most baffling of the Arts. They will learn that the mechanics are as incidental as the sculptor's chisel and the painter's pigments, and that the "picture" differs only in terminology from all other artistic visions and it too is born—surrounded with all the unsolved mystery of Birth—in the soul of the Artist. He will discover that in transmuting the vision into screen pictures there is a technique as hard as the carving of stone and as delicate as the drawing of an eyelash.

Yes, this producing of good motion pictures is most baffling—even to those who do produce them. They know how to do it, but actually they do not know how they do it. That is, they can go on producing pictures and plays but they cannot tell you how to do it, any more than any other kind of Artist can tell you how he does it. You are either born with the talent or you are not.

So, now that I have tried to answer the question, I will now ask it. Why can we not take the most talented authors, for instance, in the world today and turn them loose in the studios and on the lot and expect Masterpieces of screen creations from them? What we need are stories, is the cry. Now here are the greatest living story tellers. Let them solve the problem of the Movies!

I can sum up my findings among the finest talent in the literary world in a few words. So far as the movies are concerned, they are people of the past. There is neither hope nor promise in them. The progress of the Motion Picture is dependent on its own self taught, self-made 'Talent'!

JOHN GALSWORTHY

you arrive at Hampstead you are not at Galsworthy's by a longshot. You must walk up Hollybush Hill, past the old Inn that has done service for three hundred years, by the chimney-sweep's cottage with the rat-catcher next door and finally to the Admiral's House, alongside of which the Galsworthy mansion is tucked in. You peep at it thru an iron gate in which is set a bell that you ring. Then a much-aproned, white-capped maid opens the gate and lets you in as far as the hallway where you stand and gaze at the Galsworthy hat, overcoat and stick on the rack. Then you are shown upstairs and into a pleasant room.

Mr. Galsworthy was not there, but Mrs. Galsworthy was and we had nearly finished our tea before he came in.

Mr. Galsworthy is an extremely quiet sort of man. When he does speak, it is in a low voice and with a half smile.

"I have just come from America," he informed me. "We spent the winter in Arizona."

What a pity! I thought. He might have run over to Los Angeles and fixed up the movies while he was right there in the vicinity.

"The films?"

I fancied he almost turned up his nose at the mention of them.

"I'm pretty well known to be indifferent to the films."

I asked him if anything of his had been screened, hoping perhaps to discover in that, the cause of his distaste.

"Oh, yes, a number of my things have been done in the films—'Justice,' for one thing. Very well done, so far as they can do it. 'The Skin Game,' too, was done. The same company that played it on the stage did it for the films, by the way. I arranged the scenario and we all kept faith with the stage play. Even then it was anything but satisfactory!"

Ah, so that was it! I thought, and would like to have said something about it.

But Mr. Galsworthy continued: "What I object most to in the films—not the real-life films that photographs the facts of life, I like them and approve of them—but the others, films that are made from plays, novels or attempt original stories—those are the kinds I resent! And what I resent is that you get thoroly emotionalized sitting there for two or three hours waiting for something worth while to happen—and then you find that you have been scuffered! For when you come out of one of their theaters, you take nothing with you. It isn't that they dont try to give you something. They do, and fail!"

There is no use trying to do anything with John Galsworthy then, is there?

It is my opinion that he must insist upon a photoplay being a stage play; which it is not, by a jugful. That is why his self-scenariorized "Skin Game" was a failure.

MARGARET KENNEDY

sent up a book to the powers that be, I understand. But there are so many conferences and strings to pull.

"Every now and then I see a film that is good," she said naively, "fearfully good. I have just seen 'Rosenkavalier.'"

Clearing film from teeth whitens surprisingly

Restores cloudy teeth to clearness

THOUSANDS go through life with clouded teeth, needlessly. Dental science proves this true.

Cloudy teeth now are restored to sparkling clearness. A way found that clears the dingy film coats from teeth that old-time dentifrices failed to combat successfully. One's whole appearance is changed.

That stubborn film . . . enemy of pretty teeth and firm gums

Dental science now traces scores of tooth and gum troubles to a germ-laden film that forms on teeth. Run your tongue across your teeth and you will feel it—a slippery, viscous coating.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It lays your gums open to bacterial attack. Germs by the millions breed in it. They, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea and decay.

Pepsodent accomplishes two important things at once: Removes that film, then firms the gums. A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt. Send the coupon. Clip it now before you forget.

Big Vic a Soldier of Fortune

brothers, Victor, Arthur, both back from their world tour, Fred from Winnipeg, Leo from China, and Clifford from Africa. All but Fred, who was killed in East Africa, survived to hold another reunion.

Victor was given a commission as first lieutenant in a crack regiment, the "Die-hards." Altho an old soldier, he underwent training again for the new type of trench warfare. The regiment was not up to full war strength and there were weeks of waiting. Then McLaglen was sent down to London to act as recruiting officer. In one week he enlisted six-hundred men.

Excitement in India

ANOTHER turn of the wheel found him switched to special duty in Mesopotamia under a special commission. He crossed the seas again for Bombay on the way to the Near-Eastern front, where he was assigned to the Royal Irish Fusiliers. At Mawabeeschwa, India, McLaglen had to halt and wait again, dividing his time between hunting and preparing to go to the front. At Poona he made the acquaintance of a great prince, the Rajah of Alcaot. They became fast friends, the Indian potentate admiring the gigantic Englishman. McLaglen remained as a guest at the palace of the young prince. There were strange days and nights in the land of the Brahmans. Some terrible, some funny.

"I was the only white man in a radius of six hundred square miles, and some inhabitants had never seen a white man before," he tells. "One evening I wanted to take a walk, after returning from an antelope hunt with the prince. I had never seen the old Indian town alone by night.

"I'll send an escort with you," the Rajah proposed.

"Pooh," I retorted. "I don't need an escort." I strode off the verandah without looking back.

"I was enjoying my stroll immensely, to the great interest of the inhabitants who stared at me from dimly lighted doors and windows. Then behind me I caught sight of a white-clad figure following me in the darkness. Quite close at my heels, keeping a respectful distance behind me, but nevertheless unmistakably following me, there was a native. I dodged behind a corner and waited for him to come up. I called to him:

"What are you doing?" I had forgotten all about the Rajah's remark.

"He made me a low salaam. 'I am following the Sahib,' he said humbly.

"Follow the Sahib," I said impatiently. "Well, the Sahib doesn't want to be followed. Stop it."

"Very sorry, Sahib," he salaamed again. "His Highness the Rajah orders it."

"Oh! Light broke on me, 'all right then, but don't follow so closely.'

"Soon after, walking on some distance, I nearly stumbled on another man who was dogging me. I turned on him. I was getting jumpy.

"Very sorry, Sahib. His Highness the Rajah say to follow the Sahib."

"Doubling on my tracks I almost stepped on two natives who scurried hastily out of the way. They seemed to be all about in the darkness.

"They salaamed: 'His Highness said not to take our eyes off your honored person.'

"How many did he tell to follow me, anyway? Step up all of you."

"They popped up from all around me. One, two, three, four—from all directions—when I had got them all lined up in front of me I had twelve guardsmen, big and little. I looked them over and burst out laughing. Twelve small and apprehensive natives to guard a husky Englishman who could make any three of them.

"Come on," I cried, "if you're going to be my guard of honor you've got to do it up in style." I formed them into squads and marched them after me around the town, snapping orders they hardly understood, like a drill sergeant. When I got back to the palace I called for my camera.

"The first guard of honor I ever had." It wasn't my last, but it was by far the most impressive."

Tough Assignments

MCLAGLEN was promoted to the rank of Captain and Provost-Marshal, over Sheik Saad, on reaching his detachment. There was an advance against the Turk and furious fighting before Kut-el-Amara in an effort to save the beleaguered forces of General Townsend. The city fell, and they pushed on to Bagdad, which fell after bitter fighting. Here McLaglen became keeper of the peace of the city of the Thousand and One Nights.

"It was one of the strangest and hardest jobs of my whole life as a soldier," he remarked, "to restore the semblance of law and order after the long siege. There were nights when we, after all only a handful of men, waited up hour after hour, expecting the fanatical hordes within the walls to break loose against us. We lingered there for nearly a year, holding a line against the enemy, amid the heat and filth and fever of the war-torn Orient. I got so used to it, that it was a shock to come back to civilization when the war ended."

Back in London again, Victor took part in the boxing tournament of the British Army. He won the heavyweight championship with ease. This prompted him to take up prize-fighting again, engaging in several bouts at the London Sporting Club. But they didn't pan out well and he soon swore off. It was at this time that he met Commodore Blackton and was prompted to try the movies. His first picture, "The Call of the Road," was a success, and before long the erstwhile globetrotter and soldier of fortune found gold in a new kind of adventure. His rise to leading rôles since coming to America has been unusually rapid.

You have come to know his scowling face and violent frame in "The Hunted Woman," "The Fighting Heart," and latterly in "Men of Steel," with Milton Sills.

It is a placid and world-weary adventurer that you see now around the hills of Hollywood in his big car. Recently there was a call from the old days. In his claim-staking period he had clung to a piece of ground in the Mojave Desert. Word was flashed to him that gold had been struck there. But Victor is world-wise now, and stuck right to Fox Hills while he had his partner work the claim.

trying to intrude on another's American right as a citizen. Every person has a legal and moral right to choose a vocation. But there are a great many more CHANCES in the movies than there are in any other businesses or professions. But not the chances of opportunity. And you very seldom hear people say such a thing to other people who wish to follow other lines of work. You never hear a person telling another to stay away from Los Angeles or Hollywood because that other person intends to open a barber shop or a lawyer's office or a doctor's office. Or a dentist. Or anything, in fact, except the movies. There are a great many more certainties and assurances in other professions. And if you disbelieve this, then, try the movies—and report in a year from now!

I say garden?—and the long dining-table about eighteen inches from the grass certainly was cleverly arranged and decorated. As I stood and watched the hungry little chaps and girlies sail into the dainties, I felt like Gulliver among the Lilliputians. Mildred Davis was, of course, the hostess, and a very charming one.

She Likes Him

THERE seems to be no doubt of the fact that the heart of Pola Negri is very warm for Valentino, and that he is her first choice of all men, but there is considerable doubt about the reciprocal relations. Rudy had many admirers among those he admires, but he is apparently heart-free, which does not at all please Pola, who proves it by slapping his face occasionally.

Long Live the King

HENRY KING is long, lean and lanky, and with his present bronze complexion and seated on his horse he looks like a farmer, in spite of his horn-rimmed glasses and immaculate Panama. And he talks something like one, being a Virginian. But he certainly can direct! "The White Sister," "Tol'able David" and "Stella Dallas" are the Derbies he has won, and now it looks as if "Barbara Worth" will be another. And yet, this same man did "Roinola," which apparently lowers the average considerably in spite of the wonderful atmosphere and art in that picture. I asked Henry about that and he proved a perfect alibi. It seems there was a lawsuit on at the finish and poor Henry was not let in on the final editing, titling and cutting, which, as we all know, practically ruined the picture.

Prize Love Scenes

AMONG the best love scenes we have seen during the past year might be mentioned those between Colman and Banky in "The Dark Angel," Valentino and Banky in "The Eagle," and Valentino and Banky in "The Son of the Sheik," which indicates that Vilma is holding her own among the American sweethearts, altho we must not forget Gilbert and Murray in "The Merry Widow," Gilbert and Adorée in "The Big Parade," Lyon and Sweet in "The New Commandment," Nagel and Boardman in "The Only Thing," and Gilbert and Gish in "La Bohème." Gilbert seems to have the best batting average among the great lovers.

Telephoning over a ray of light

Building on the Telephone Principle

FIFTY years ago Alexander Graham Bell discovered the principle of the telephone. His first telephone employed wire as the connecting path over which words passed. Four years later he used a beam of light instead of wire to carry speech between telephone instruments.

Today, both wire and wireless telephony are employed on every hand in the service of the nation. Wire telephony, with its thousands of central offices, its complex switchboards and millions of miles of wire, envelops the country, carrying for the American people 70,000,000 conversations every day. Wireless telephony is broadcasting entertainment and carrying important information to the remotest regions.

But new applications of the telephone principle are still being found. In the loud speaker, in the deaf set, the electrical stethoscope, the improved phonograph, the telephone principle has been adapted by the Bell Telephone Laboratories to the uses of the physician, the public speaker and the musician. The scientific research and engineering skill, which enable America to lead the world in telephone service, are also bringing forth from the telephone principle other devices of great usefulness.

its early theater scenes—with the various acts dissolving into one another. I anticipated a healthy plot, but it is soon dissipated. It degenerates into a large slice of hokum—when the girl appreciates that her Tartar lover is a diamond out of the rough.

Valentino Comes Back

ALL doubt about Rudolph Valentino failing to get back upon his erstwhile pedestal evaporates when under the spell of his personality in "Son of the Sheik." This is a true chip of the old block—and the Italian star knew what he was about when he decided to return to his favorite and most adaptable rôle.

It is a vivid performance he gives—a spirited, carefully wrought performance. Once more he rides recklessly over the landscapes—once more he makes passionate love, balanced with passionate hate toward the object of his devotion. And, to add spice to the seasoning, he even doubles as the original sheik who has become full of years.

Plenty of Action and Color

No one can deny that the picture has animation and color. There is a "snap and go" about it the minute the sheik gets into the clutches of the desert pirates. He believes his beloved has betrayed him to the enemy. Consequently, he metes out revenge upon her. After kidnaping her he discovers that she has played on the level with him. So his anger gives way to avowals of undying love.

Valentino "goes Fairbanks and Mix" in the manner which he conducts himself. Any editor who imagines he is of the powder-puff species need look no further than this film to realize that the star carries on like a he-man. He mixes up in fights—and is agile and athletic enough to pass muster with an audience of lumberjacks.

The plot is not so much, but it never fails to keep one interested. It is well timed, the scenes racing along with the necessary punch. As for the atmosphere—well, it comes up to requirements, the desert backgrounds and detail suggesting the real thing.

A First-Rate Take-Off

THERE'S a first-rate take-off on the romance of primitive love in the open spaces in "Mantrap," adapted from Sinclair Lewis' novel of the same name. It shows right smart imagination on the part of the director in getting away from the stereotyped conventions. There is no lurking villain, nor any vengeful husband. Indeed, the big backwoodsman accepts his wife's flirtations as something a part of her nature—something which cannot be remedied.

This is an "about face" for such a type of story. It could have reeked with melodrama—with the hokum generating a deal of hectic action. Instead, it is treated with humanities—and more than a sparkle of humor.

It serves in bringing Clara Bow right up into the spotlight. She has never been so happily cast. She flavors her rôle with all the whims and fancies of the irrepressible flapper. Not far behind her in the realism of his acting is Ernest Torrence as the backwoods husband. He once again relies upon his inimitable gestures and expressions to humanize the character.

The Drama of Molten Metal

SINCE his "Sea Hawk" days, Milton Sills has been developing in histrionic stature. In "Men of Steel" he has a rugged drama—which sings an elemental song of capital and labor, of strife and love, of raw ore—and men in the raw. It is a rambling plot—one quite involved, yet the spectator must look beyond its ramifications and search for the theme—which concerns the making of a man.

There's a fine background of steel mills, the picture having been "shot" around Birmingham, Alabama, in order to capture a realistic atmosphere. As the Southern city is another Pittsburgh, one must pay credit to the authenticity of its scenes.

A Character Study

MOLTEN metal is the moving spirit, tho the onlooker will doubtless discover the broad symbol behind it—which presents the inarticulate but forceful steel work going thru the crucible of a refining process as it concerns his soul.

The melodramatic leanings of the plot emphasize the atmospheric backgrounds. These include vivid close-ups of giant cranes, furnaces, flaming ore and mighty shovels. One could not help but appreciate that this is something of a titanic drama—which offers life in the raw—life which gives much and takes little.

If it is artificial, it is in those scenes of the steel worker's abrupt change when he becomes affluent. It hardly seems likely that he would become so immaculate without some experience in deportment. Yet this is an insignificant trifle in the virile acting by Sills.

"The Sea Hawk" gave him the necessary confidence in himself to strike out for big things. He is now making good in a type of rôle that is right up his street. Other good performances are rendered by Doris Kenyon, Victor McLaglen and George Fawcett.

Intelligent Treatment

ONCE in a while a picture bobs up which is seemingly treated as if its audience is intelligent. Such a picture is "Padlocked," a rugged, honest piece of celluloid drama. The theme of parental misunderstanding of a child is worked out with real humanities and realities. If it stresses things a bit for melodramatic conveniences, this stressing does not hinder the logical development of the plot.

One will see the daughter of a stern and hypocritical bigot—a man whose heart is padlocked against her tender sentiment and emotions as the central figure. Her mother understands her, but upon the latter's death her new stepmother helps her father in making her cross an exceptionally heavy one to carry.

It is not a tale of sweetness and light—and thus it departs from picture standards. True, it introduces a happy ending, but this finish is reached in a compact and reasonable manner.

The film surely serves in establishing Lois Moran as an actress who must be reckoned with in the future. She conveys in splendid fashion the baffled and bitter girl fighting to win a freedom of expression. And sympathy is engendered from the start for her.

A well-balanced cast aids in no small way in whipping this plot into something approaching a slice of life.

The Keystone Kop Who Became a Director

"Menjou's enthusiasm is irresistible," he continued, "it's infectious. Every member of the cast gets it. And you know sophistication and enthusiasm don't go together.

"Betty Bronson is a sweet girl. But with the sweetness there's a firmness and resolution that can't but help come under the head of sophistication."

Ford Sterling, the director sets down as the world's most charming Baron Munchausen since the original character.

Tom Moore is an Irish playboy. He walks on clouds floating over an Emerald Isle and whether he lets you know it or not there's a song in his heart and poetry on his lips.

Florence Vidor is the sweetest, sincerest and most amiable actress that he has directed. And on the male side he says the same thing of Chester Conklin.

Esther Ralston must prefer strange combinations, he says. One day she brought two books to the set: "Science and Health" and "Jurgen."

Louise Brooks, the ex-Follies girl from the corn belt, Mal believes, will be a real star—when she changes the style of her haircut. She has a beautiful profile but she hides it with a sharp square bob.

A Man of Many Gifts

INCIDENTAL to the man's ability as a director, he has developed his art until he may be set down as something of a caricaturist. Not a picture does he make without jotting down his impressions of his casts, as the illustrations on these pages prove.

Mal St. Clair writes a story now and then and works along with his writer, Pierre Collings, on his scenarios. He directs, he draws, he writes, in a pinch he acts! He is, undeniably, an artist. His urge for expression is so strong that it bursts out in those various channels.

I've never asked him whether he was musical, but I wouldn't be surprised if this channel of expression were open to him also.

no woman can afford to overlook*

THE vital importance of keeping their pores open and active is an accepted and well known fact to most of the intelligent women of today. They know that a sick body and a blemished skin usually result from pores that are clogged and unable to function properly.

There is one fact, however, which many women overlook—the absolute necessity for preserving the natural oil of the skin. Remove this protective oil and the skin becomes dry, cracked, rough—a prey to many of the more serious forms of skin disorder.

The soft, luxuriant lather of Resinol Soap most thoroughly cleanses the tiny pores, yet its action is so gentle the delicate oil is preserved and the skin remains soft and supple. These results are possible only because of the Resinol properties in this delightful toilet soap—those properties which give its rich color and distinctive fragrance. It's the soap that makes and keeps skins lovely.

If little irritations are already present, apply a touch of Resinol—that soothing ointment which doctors have prescribed for years in treating itching, burning skin troubles. Excellent for the rashes and chafings of childhood and as a healing home remedy. At all druggists.

The Fine Art of Falling

Al and Lupino

Two other master craftsmen among Hollywood's "fall comics" are found over on the Educational Studio lot in the persons of Al St. John and Lupino Lane. St. John is a capable exponent of the American style, Lane of the English.

Lane comes from a long line of circus and theatrical performers and his art has literally been handed down to him from his ancestors. Lane's act on the English music hall and American vaudeville stages consisted of an amazing number of "traps," as they are called in England—falls, dives thru "breakaways," etc.—and he had acquired a wonderful proficiency in his work. Al St. John is a natural born tumbler. Much of his prowess is due to the amazing strength in his arms, shoulders, and legs, and his great agility.

"The secret of the successful fall, successful in the sense that the comedian escapes without broken bones or serious bruises," St. John explains, "is the same as that of the successful magician—the hand is quicker than the eye. It is the hands and arms of a tumbler which take the jolt, in the same way that springs and shock-absorbers function on an automobile.

"The fall is broken by the hands and the strain comes upon the arms and shoulder muscles while they are checking the descent of the body. In reality, the body does not hit the floor as hard as it appears to, but it hits plenty hard, at that! The arms and shoulders in a successful fall have checked the force enough that there are no casualties among the bones. But muscles must be hard and in excellent condition, or bruises and stiffness are the lot of the 'bumper.'

Watch Your Neck

Repeated falls, checked by the hands, soon make the wrists very sore. I have worked when my wrists were so tender that it was less painful to take the bump full force than to try to check it with my sore wrists and hands. Then it was just a case of gritting my teeth and taking it, depending on well-conditioned muscles and well-cushioned bones to escape injury."

Lane's instructions to the would-be "bumper" contain the same general technical directions—to check the fall with the hands, arms, or shoulders. Lane is also an advocate of the "rolling fall," well known to acrobats, for falling when running.

The "rolling fall" is merely tucking the head down, rounding the shoulders and back, and keeping the knees, elbows, and feet well out of the way while rolling and tumbling. Lane is so expert at this type of fall that he can dive thru a hoop held at the level of his chin, land on his neck or shoulders, roll like a hoop and come up standing, all without disturbing an item of his immaculate clothing, or even losing his hat.

"you learned to let your body go limp the minute you were tackled. It's the same in taking a fall. Never have your muscles taut. That means almost certain injury. Relax as you fall, and you're in little danger.

"Break the shock of the fall with either your hands, your shoulders, or your hips. Be careful not to let your elbows or knees slam against the ground or you'll get some mighty painful bruises. And, above all things, guard your spine! That is the one big danger spot, and failure to guard it thoroughly can easily result in very serious injury."

Standard Falls

THEN, the preparations completed, Billy went thru three standard falls while the speed camera clattered away at a break-neck pace, and vibrated so strongly that it took both assistants to hold it firmly in place on its tripod. The three falls were the "Forward," the "Backward," and the "Hundred-and-Eight." The illustrations show each of the three in detail.

THE BACKWARD. This is one of the most used falls in comedy work, serving as the aftermath of a wallop on the jaw, a brick on the skull, and other similar impulses. (1) The hands are spread for balance, and the left foot is thrown back to start a swift pendulum swing forward. (2) As the body falls backward, the hands prepare to take the impact. (3) The hands and wrists strike the ground as the feet leave it; the left foot has nearly completed its forward swing. (4) At the end of the fall, the shoulders take the impact from the hands, and the feet fly high in the air, preparatory to the final sprawl.

THE FORWARD. Again the left leg is used as a pendulum, starting from well in front of the body this time. (1) As the left leg swings back, the body is thrown forward. (2) For an instant, as the left leg completes its swing, the right foot leaves the ground and the entire body is in the air. (3) The hands take the impact. (4) The body goes limp and the right shoulder takes the shock of the remainder of the fall, while the face meets the sod harmlessly.

THE "HUNDRED-AND-EIGHT." This is the most spectacular and famous of all comedy falls. It is so old and traditional a stunt that no one even remembers where it got its unique name, tho one Hollywood wag claims that it was named in honor of the first hundred and eight comedians who broke their necks trying to do it.

The left leg is again used as a pendulum, being swung far back first, then (1) far forward. (2) As the leg swings back a second time, the body lurches forward. (3) Midway in its swing, the body is almost exactly parallel to the ground. (4) The hands take the impact for a second. (5) The head is tucked under, the feet fly over, and the full shock is taken on the shoulders. (6) The end of the fall is eased by the left foot and hip.

Three Writers Consider the Films

But all of Hoffmannstahl's wit is gone out of it. It's a pity! And they call it Strass' play, which is a very quaint idea, since Strass had nothing to do with it except to set it to music many years after it appeared as a story and a play.

"The movies are always making a mistake by writing down, and I don't think anything is ever accomplished by writing down, to the public. It is a backward step to be always underestimating the calibre of the public mind.

"'Victory,' which I saw recently, is one of the finest things I've seen. As an actor, I like Jack Holt. He is rather quiet—and very fine."

LORD DUNSANY

bound to hold a house full of human people, and human people are bound to be held through the portrayal of any great human emotion. We are getting over here bright dialog instead of Art. Bright dialog never yet made a work of Art!"

There is a promise for the motion picture, which need never have a word of dialog in it.

The Answer Man

Man." When does a chair dislike you? I don't know—when it can't bear you. Awful!

MARY A.—Well, the difference between perseverance and obstinacy is that one often comes from a strong will, and the other from a strong wont. You can address the Our Gang comedies at Hal Roach Studios, Culver City, California. Anna Mae Wong was born in 1905. Dorothy Hughes, famous beauty, signed a contract with Famous Players because of her splendid acting in "Sorrows of Satan." She is playing in "The Quarterback," with Richard Dix and Esther Ralston.

ETHEL F.—You might write him at the Famous Players Studio. Buck Jones and Kathryn Perry in "Desert Valley." George Lewis in "The Old Soak." Charles Ray in "The Fire Brigade."

MARION F.—I should say I did like meeting Leatrice Joy. She is a very likable girl, and I know she has many friends here at the office. Corinne Griffith was born November 24, 1897. Norma Shearer was born August 10, 1903. Oh, you know, Rockliffe Fellowes was badly hurt in an automobile accident.

MARIE M.—When is a clock on the stairs dangerous? When? When it runs down and strikes one. Time, please. William Boyd was born in 1898; he is six feet tall, 175 pounds, and has light hair and blue eyes. So there.

SYLVIA M. S.—Oh, how many torments lie in the small circle of a wedding-ring. You refer to the Lee children, Katherine and Jane, who used to play for Fox. They were in vaudeville last I heard of them.

WILMA C.—Harry Earle is about twenty-five years old. Tell your family and convince them.

LEATRICE JOY FAX.—Well, I should say your question is a puzzler. "How high is up?" That's as bad as how can you eat a square meal on a round table. I should say you were about eighteen. Yes? You can reach Leatrice Joy at Cecil De Mille Studio, Culver City, California. Lewis

F. W. Murnau Comes to America

is a clown or beggar, he is able to shrink and quiver like the lowest toad. He is absolutely unique. But generally we can train players ourselves."

Murnau is convinced that there is great material for the screen here to work with in his own way. To find new "types" fills him with pleasure. What a chance for some of our film-struck children! Perhaps new life for some of our fading stars, even, under the whip of a brilliant directorial genius, as Irene Rich, for instance, was glorified again under Lubitsch in "Lady Windermere."

The first picture he will work on will be based on "A Trip to Tilsit," a novel by the daring Herman Sudermann, with many interesting situations. This will be done for Fox. Murnau should distinguish himself; everything he does will have his own stamp, his own touch.

Screen authorities, who seldom come near being in agreement, were almost unanimous in pronouncing "The Last Laugh" the "greatest film ever made." Credit for this and for Jannings' superb acting belong almost wholly to Murnau. He spoke of it with unconscious pride:

Talks of "The Last Laugh"

"I WANTED to try a story that you could really tell in five words, an exceedingly simple idea or situation; but the range, the feeling of the film which gave this story was to be limitless in its power of understanding and dramatizing ideas. You can tell the story of 'The Last Laugh' in a sentence, but I wanted the emotions of its central character to become something beyond the power of words to express. I wanted the camera to picture shades of feeling that were totally new and unexpected; in all of us there is a subconscious self which in a crisis may break out in the strangest ways, and this picture at times reached the subconscious man under his hotel livery.

"The whole action of the thing pointed, for instance, to the moment where Jannings takes off his hotel uniform, so that as he removed his coat with its brass buttons the highest point of the drama was reached, a drama that was purely visual. The type of lighting and architecture we used helped a great deal toward this effect; everything superfluous that did not help to carry on the main idea was suppressed and thrown out of the picture."

For his work here Murnau has brought over his own architect, a young man named Rochus Gliese, who has collaborated with him in several pictures toward getting the tripled intensity and directness that he goes for.

"Faust," the large feature film over which Murnau has been working for several years, is to be distributed by Metro-Goldwyn soon. It differs widely from "The Last Laugh." It may be another milestone in the progress of the cinema. For one thing, it is drenched with atmosphere and color. It has been justly heralded as having the most beautiful photography. Murnau has handled his camera as if it were a great Renaissance painter, a Leonardo or an El Greco. For another thing, it is a great story, a universal theme, handled with great originality.

Every red-blooded German has had a yearning to do "Faust." It is part of the native atmosphere; it is somewhere in the flavor of the good beer every German drinks. It is the rollicking legend of a bright, bold, bad man carrying out all his wicked dreams, that has gripped the imagination for centuries. Those who know their Goethe, or the opera of "Faust," will find that Murnau has gone back to the original sources of the legend to create something particularly for the cinema.

"In this film," he said, "what interested me most was the relation between each scene or sequence. Every single shot has an inevitable part in the movement of the whole picture."

We were driving down-town now, toward lunches, banquets, greetings of the Mayor.

Issuing from the quiet, middle-class halls of the great hostelry on Fifth Avenue where Murnau seemed such an odd if good-humored-looking giant, he had shown only a single flash of temperament. This was his demand for a certain luxurious make of American car such as he owned in Berlin. We suggested that it must only be made in Germany.

We still talked movies. His views were of unflinching interest.

Of Pictures and People

WHAT did he think of "Variety"—the hit of the moment, to the happy surprise of all?

"Beautifully done. Photography, playing, direction. The vaudeville stuff is delightful. It was really planned with the hope of an American success, and I am very happy that it is going so well. Not because it is a German film. I don't really think that it marked a step forward for the cinema. But it will improve the taste of the public, arouse them and interest them in this type of work."

"Caligari"? "It was frankly an experiment. It was aufregend (stimulating), aroused wider interest in motion pictures, showed what might be done."

Lubitsch? "A brilliant man. A most interesting director. But I don't think he has entirely cast off the influence of the stage that we both got under Max Reinhardt. Many of his films give you the feeling of watching action on a stage."

Chaplin? "The genius of the screen. His comedies have the most profound appeal. He is always doing something absolutely fresh and unconscious. There were things in 'The Gold Rush' that were revelations; he is a fountain of cinematic ideas. 'A Woman of Paris' was extremely interesting; but, of course, it was in the European tradition."

This reminded me of something I had almost passed up.

"And what do you think of—of—America? I really had to squeeze that in, you know."

"Thoroughly exciting," he laughed. "My second visit, you know, but I am like a child about it. There are wonderful types here, wonderful faces. Tremendous energy. The whole tradition here suggests speed, lightness, wild rhythms. Everything is novel. Sensational. I was in Childs' Restaurant last night. It was an amazing place to me. Tonight I am going to Coney Island. It must be barbarous there. I would like to do a wild picture about Alaska. What was that book they were considering? Something like 'Frozen Nights' or 'Frozen Lights.' It has wonderful possibilities. Wonderful. Wonderful . . ." he murmured as he drove on along the winding road that led thru banquets, receptions, Coney Island, to Hollywood, ultimately.

Something DIFFERENT for Bobbed Hair

THERE is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which is really no more actual color than sunlight. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25¢ direct to J. W. KOBÉ Co., 656 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

Hollywood's Union Jack Club

formance in it he was given a contract with Warner Brothers. He is an isolated case of a British player being given a contract by an American company before crossing the Atlantic.

Bishop's Son a Star

HENRY VIBART was quite famous in England for his interpretation of doctor and priest roles; while Victor McLaglen was a well-known featured player for years before he took the plunge and came to Hollywood, because he was dissatisfied with the small salary he received. His father was a South African bishop, but he himself shone more as athlete and performer than as pious churchman, and he graduated to pictures from an acrobatic vaudeville act. His virile features and fine physique brought him quick recognition on this side.

George K. Arthur, who now has a generous contract with Metro-Goldwyn as a stock featured player, first became known in England when he created the rôle of H. G. Wells' Kipps on the screen. Subsequently he played small parts in pictures and various Shakespearian clown rôles on the stage. It was not until he came to Hollywood, and then only after a desperate struggle which culminated in the notorious "Salvation Hunters," that he succeeded in making a real name for himself.

Ralph Forbes, on the other hand, was a well-known juvenile lead in London, both on the stage and in pictures, and was rapidly becoming famous when Fate altered his life by sending him with an English company to play on the stage in New York. Only a few weeks later he married Ruth Chatterton, and since then has been playing on the stage with her, until a short time ago he was allotted a prominent rôle in Brenon's "Beau Geste."

Pity the Assistant Director!

when he himself will be a prominent director. Mr. Dorian is one of the assistants who first came to Hollywood to be an actor.

Victor Schertzinger has had his assistant, Billie Tummel, with him for a long time and says he is invaluable. Billie Tummel also came to the film capital hoping to become a great actor, but after a bitter struggle as an extra he became discouraged.

Bunnie Dull, who was formerly assistant to Frank Borzage on the Fox lot, has recently been made a director.

Howard Hawks, Fox director, says he could not get along without Jimmie Tingling, his assistant. "Jimmie does most of the real work," he says, "a good assistant director can make a picture."

Danny Keefe, assistant to Raoul Walsh, has been in the business for years and is also recognized as one of the best.

"What makes a good assistant?" we asked some of the leading directors. It's something they could not definitely explain, but the main qualifications seem to be ability to work, thoro knowledge of the motion picture industry, a good business head and ambition.

Them Were the Happy Days

$50. In this connection it may be recorded that Vitagraph paid the unheard-of price of $750 many years ago for a story from the pen of Monte Katterjohn called "The Flame of the Yukon." Not so long ago, Vitagraph, which filmed the story but still retains all screen rights, turned down an offer from Katterjohn of $65,000 to resell him this story.

In those days it was open season for the great American writing public, every member of which cherishes the idea that the story of the average film play can be dashed off casually between meals. A brief synopsis was purchased from the amateur writer for five or ten dollars. A few hours' work served to whip it into shape as a vehicle for Florence Turner, John Bunny and Flora Finch or the famous Costello. The public was encouraged to write directly for the screen by means of a sample scenario which the Vitagraph, as well as other leading film companies of the same period, issued as a guide to its contributors.

What are the methods in vogue today? Why, one highly paid writer makes a treatment (in reality a comprehensive synopsis) from the original play or story, another well-paid writer sets down in scene form from this treatment the continuity of the picture play and the combined efforts of these two writers is turned over to the producer, director and star for emasculation or addition, according to the whims of the latter trio.

They Doubled in Brass

IN these days of specialization in the business of producing and exploiting films, it is interesting to note the many-sided aspects which the duties of a publicity man took on in the days when illustrated songs were the spice of the movie program and producing companies had a habit of firmly affixing to the walls of a set in a most prominent position the trade-mark of the organization. In the ordinary routine of a day's work, the late Sam Spedon thought nothing of acting as technical director in confirming the accuracy of costumes and furniture, placing in effect a crude method of registering applicants for studio work, turning out a special song in honor of the Vitagraph girl, and arranging for the personal appearances of Vitagraph stars at local movie houses.

Incidentally, the casting system employed was a most simple one but productive of the proper results for those days.

The applicant was queried as to whether or not he or she were the owner of evening clothes. If the answer was in the affirmative, the lucky one was pretty certain of immediate work in the innumerable pictures produced in which gentlemen, as well as ladies of the evening, were used.

Today film fans may follow the doings of their favorites in countless magazines, newspapers and trade papers. Even the voice of the radio joins in the chorus of informative data on the doings of the stars. In 1910 the publicity department of the Vitagraph Company issued its publicity material, such as it was, to exactly six papers. Not magazines or newspapers, but those papers confined strictly to the use of the exhibitor.

Remember When—?

AND yet—those were the happy days. Days when audiences received the polite information via a slide that "no pipe smoking, stamping of feet or whistling was allowed," when the film would break just as the villain was about to "get his," when each shot in the scenario was measured before the scene was filmed, in order not to waste footage, when the effect of rain was achieved thru the simple expedient of pin scratches on the surface of the film, when Francis Ford and Grace Cunard were king and queen of the serial field, when Alice Joyce and Guy Coombs were the "perfect lovers" of the screen, when Lillian Walker was known as "Dimples," when Mabel Normand was the first bathing beauty, when comedies were made to be laughed at and dramatic films were taken seriously, when the brands familiar to screen devotees were Kalem, Selig, Lubin, Essanay, when "The Hunchback of Notre Dame" was made in six hundred feet by Vitagraph, when "Treasure Island" was filmed and advertised as "a feature nearly in three reels," when Mack Sennett, Ford Sterling, Charley Murray, Mabel Normand and Charley Chaplin appeared on the same screen.

The next issue will deal with the Keystone era and the days when Thomas H. Ince brought to the screen Charley Ray, William S. Hart, Dorothy Dalton, Mildred Harris, Harold Lockwood,—when Mack Sennett established a school for custard-pie graduates and the inimitable personality of Charley Chaplin made a fortune for those pioneer producers, Kessel and Baumann.

The Gentle Gypsy

But she didn't. The gentle gypsy, toying with lobster salad, and fresh from "The Sorrows of Satan," bespoke a life of vagabondage, a gypsy life, a man's life . . . hardy and adventuresome and free. . . .

"But, as you were not born a boy," we persisted, never knowing when to let well enough alone, "as you have got to be a girl, in this incarnation at any rate, what then?"

"I'd still like best of all to be a vagabond," smiled Carol. "I suppose I'm not inherently domestic. Not yet, at any rate. I wouldn't want to do anything unconventional, however, being a girl. I'm not an admirer of unconventionality. It's usually a pose—or worse. But if I could, even being a girl, I'd love to be a vagabond. . . .

Just a Care-Free Girl

"I SEEM to have no possessive instinct. I mean, I don't care a bit about having things. I hear girls say, 'Oh, I'd give my life to have this . . . or that. . . .' I never feel like that. I'm not crazy about clothes. I don't care a bit about jewels. I haven't the slightest desire to own cars or houses or anything concrete. That may be a part of my vagabonding instinct. Perhaps it is. The thought of owning things, possessing things, tires me. Bore me. The fewer possessions I have to the other day, I asked Pat how he did it, where he acquired the ability to play such exacting character roles.

Standing Pat with O'Malley

Studies Parts by Studying Life

"THERE hard work and plenty of it," he answered simply. "I've been in pictures ever since I was eighteen, and I've always taken the work seriously enough to give it everything I've got. One of the first things I learned was to study every bit of business, every gesture, I made on the screen, and to note their effect on an audience. Those that went over, I jotted down in a note-book. Those that flopped I discarded forever.

"I've practised for hours at home, trying to work out the most effective way of doing a little bit of business that would take less than a minute on the screen. Another thing that I learned was the value of restraint. Don't weep and rave in sad scenes; play the thing in such a way that the audience will do the weeping.

"And, above all things, don't ape other players. What is excellent for Barrymore, for example, may be poison for O'Malley. The only way to play a character so that it will gain conviction in the minds of your audience is to play it naturally, and the only way to know how to play it naturally is to study people.

"There are times between pictures when I disappear for weeks at a time, only returning home at night to eat and sleep. Several months ago, I worked for six weeks as a mechanic in a garage. It wasn't a publicity stunt. No one ever found it out, except the fellows who worked with me, and they kept their promise not to tell. I got more real knowledge of people out of that six weeks than I could have gotten in six years of ordinary living."

Shop Talk Is Out

THE O'Malley home is one of the few places in Hollywood where "shop talk" is absolutely tabu. Pat believes that if a man is forever listening to the professional opinions of others, in time he finds himself unconsciously influenced by those opinions, and sacrifices his own individuality to just that extent.

When Pat has a problem to solve, he usually locks himself up in the garage at his home, gets out a blow-torch and some tools, and proceeds to thresh the matter out while his hands are busy at some mechanical stunt.

The Gentle Gypsy

think about, the more care-free I feel. I never want to have anything really desperately. The instinct of possession is simply left out of me. . . .

Romantic Musings

"I THINK 'The Sorrows of Satan' will be a great picture. I've seen some of the rushes and it looks wonderful. I'm extremely grateful that I had the opportunity to play in it. Ricardo Cortez does the most splendid work . . . I don't think he's ever touched this standard before . . . and Mr. Menjou is marvelous, of course. He is, too, very lovely to work with."

"What do you think about Platonic friendship?" we asked. "We talked to John Gilbert on the subject quite awhile ago, and he said that such a state is not possible between an attractive, unattached man and an equally attractive, unattached woman."

"I'm not qualified to speak in the way Mr. Gilbert is," Carol said. "I never like to make a definite answer to any broad question, because I feel that I don't know."

"Life changes so. People change so. What is true for you today is not true for you tomorrow."

"Besides, I've had so very little experience in the—well, the romantic way. I really feel unable to speak on that subject. But I don't know why there shouldn't be Platonic friendships between men and women. I can't imagine any good reason why not. After all, every man doesn't fall in love with every woman, nor every woman with every man. That element doesn't always enter in, I'm sure. I know quite a few men I enjoy talking with, but wouldn't even think of falling in love with. I'll have to wait, tho, to deliver my final pronunciamento on that score."

Her Secret of Happiness

"I've bought a little farm up in the country . . . outside of Brewster, New York. It's an old house with old things in it . . . big trees . . . a swimming hole . . . I'm going up to it when I'm not working. When I am working I'll live in hotels. . . . Perhaps when I retire from the screen I'll live there permanently . . . unless I go a-vagabonding. . . . I'd rather like to retire in about two years. I know that no one ever has retired when they have said they would—but I hope I do. I think it's such a sad mistake to linger on after your pinnacle is reached. It's a form of death and I am too keen about living. . . ."

"Then, perhaps, I might marry . . . have children. . . . I realize that, for a woman, is the only real life, the only satisfactory life, especially after your first youth is gone. It's a matter of making choices, always, isn't it? We usually want two things very much. To do two things. We've got to take one or the other, never both. Alternatives. I think I'm a bit of a fatalist. I believe in living each day as it comes along . . . doing the best you can . . . waiting for the next day to turn up. It seems to me that that is about all a person can do, really. If we plan—well, most of us know what becomes of plans."

Obeys Her Hunches

"IF I have one talent above another, it's that of being instinctive. Or, in the vernacular, I have 'hunches.' If I obey my hunches I come out all right. If I don't—the reverse. Even in the smallest matters. . . . I've come to trust my hunches. . . ."

The Answer Man

Stone and Anna Q. Nilsson are playing in "Midnight Lovers." Can you imagine it?

MISS NONOBY.—Cheer up, a sunny temper gilds the edges of life's blackest cloud. Ricardo Cortez was born in Alsace-Lorraine, September 19, 1889, and he is six feet one and weighs 175 pounds. He has black hair and brown eyes. He is married to Alma Rubens. Why, he was a shipping broker before he entered the movies, and he also danced in cabarets under the name of Jack Crane.

RUTH L. MAC MURRAY in "Altars of Desire." Yes, Sinclair Lewis' "New York" is being produced with Lois Wilson and Ricardo Cortez.

PFF WEE WILSON.—Hello, there. So you think I ought to earn much more than $15 a week. I do too. Why, Bill Hart was born December 6, 1872. Yes, Universal are producing "Uncle Tom's Cabin" with Charles Gilpin, the noted negro actor, as Uncle Tom. I used to go to see that play every season when I was a child. Do you remember it?

E. A.—So this is your first letter. The more the merrier. Why, "jitney" was a term formerly used by Mexicans in referring to small coins and was introduced into the United States by gamblers from across the Rio Grande as a term of derision for the five-cent piece. Lois Wilson had to bob her hair for her rôle in "The Great Gatsby," in which Georgia Hale, Warner Baxter and Neil Hamilton also appear.

HARRIET D.—Well, I don't know who Duffield Street was named after, but it is one of the old streets of Brooklyn. Bryant Washburn is playing in "Young April."

PIERRE GENDRON FAN.—So you think Pierre Gendron is the handsomest man on the screen. He is not playing right now. Yes, Colleen Moore in "It Must Be Love." You're right; misery loves company, but company does not love misery.

THE MISSING LINK.—Well, if it wasn't for our sense of humor, it would be a pretty dry world. So you didn't care for Mary Astor in "The Fighting Coward." Carol Dempster was born January 16, 1902. I'll be waiting to hear that you have been assigned a part in pictures. Alyce Mills is in "The Romance of a Million Dollars."

FELIX.—Do I drink? Well, now—buttermilk. Hudson Maxim says, "Drinking races have always dominated the world and will always do so." We shall see. Lillian Gish weighs 112 pounds. Yes, Pola Negri speaks with a foreign accent, and Alberta Vaughn has naturally curly hair. Yes, do write me again.

SHORTIE.—Well, I'll do all I can to keep you from being lonesome. Theda Bara says: "Vamping requires no artistry whatever. For me, henceforth, high comedy." So she is playing Hal Roach comedies.

LE ROY.—Yes, I believe Joan Crawford was a Follies girl—and one of Mr. Ziegfeld's. As to Mae Murray, she was born May 10, 1893.

BURKLURNETT GIRLIE.—Wherever that is. So you think I am a very mysterious person. Yes, Malcolm McGregor is married and has a daughter. He attended Yale, you know. Sally O'Neil was born October 28, 1908, and she is five feet two and a half and weighs 105. She has black hair and dark-blue eyes. Her first picture was "Mike."

MARION.—Well, if you are so much in love with Richard Dix, there is nothing I can do for you. You can reach him at the Famous Players-Lasky, Astoria, Long Island.

Ignorance of physical facts never brought happiness

UNLESS there is frank discussion, there can be no real enlightenment on a subject such as feminine hygiene. The recent advances in this branch of hygiene have all come about as an answer to one existing evil. And that is the evil of poisonous antiseptics. Every physician and nurse is familiar with the effects when delicate tissues come in contact with bichloride of mercury or the compounds of carbolic acid. Yet until lately there was no other recourse for fastidious women who demanded an efficient and true surgical cleanliness.

Every woman has reason to welcome Zonite

But no longer need a woman risk the effects of dangerous poisons for the purpose of feminine hygiene. No longer need she fear accidental poisoning in the home. For now she has Zonite. This powerful antiseptic-germicide is a remarkable achievement to contemplate. Though absolutely non-poisonous, Zonite is more than forty times as strong as peroxide of hydrogen and far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that can be safely used on the human body.

No wonder, then, that Zonite has been welcomed with satisfaction. A powerful antiseptic which, in its many uses, is harmless to human tissue! Dentists are using it widely for preventive oral hygiene. Suggestion: ask your physician's opinion of Zonite. Send for dainty booklet on feminine hygiene, frankly written. Zonite Products Co., Postum Bldg., 250 Park Ave., New York, N. Y.

At your druggist's in bottles 25c, 50c and $1
 Use Zonite Ointment for burns, scratches, sunburn, etc. Also as a powerful deodorant in the form of a vanishing cream.

Villainy Versus Lunacy

was another utter fallacy," Bancroft continued. "Killers are not mere maniacs who snarl as continuously and meaninglessly as a dyspeptic bull pup. They may be men who are normal and even likable in every other respect.

"I have known men in real life who were like Smiling Slade—men who could be chatting pleasantly with you one moment, excuse themselves smilingly, step outside the door, shoot an enemy in cold blood, then come nonchalantly back to you and continue their conversation with never a hint that anything in the least out of the way had happened."

He Laughs as Well as Scowls

THE "humanizing" of villainy has brought with it another unique development to the silverscreen—the appearance of the "comedy villain." This humorous individual is nothing more than the orthodox "menace" of several seasons ago, but with just the slightest bit of burlesque added to make him ridiculous.

Walter Long was one of the pioneers in this type of heavy and, strangely enough, he first got the idea in a visit to San Quentin penitentiary, probably the most humorless spot in all California.

"The occasion was an amateur theatrical entertainment given by the prisoners," Long related. "As I sat there watching the performance, the thought suddenly struck me that I had been all wrong in my conceptions of what a villain ought to be.

"Then and there I decided to stage a reform. Since then I've played the heavy for laughs, and got them because of the fact that I'm burlesquing the rôle. Over-accentuated make-up, a hard-boiled attitude just a little too adamant to be quite true—these mark the border line between the triteness of the old-time heavy and the humorous freshness of the new."

One of the most interesting phases in the "comedy villain" line has been the transition of Wallace Beery, once one of the most reliable of all screen "menaces."

Wears a Think Tank Now

GEORGE SEIGMAN, veteran heavy of both stage and screen, believes that the introduction of finesse into the arts of the villain has been one of the most marked phases since that sinister individual has been given both a brain and the privilege of using it.

"No longer does the heavy come crashing into the scene like a rampant cyclone," Seigman explained, "slap the heroine down, and bind her husband in the path of the buzz-saw. Those lunatic methods have been abandoned in favor of more sane and diplomatic means."

Lou Tellegen, polished and efficient "menace" of several years' standing, whimsically forecasts the day when the audience may be rooting for the villain and giving the hero the Bronx cheer.

"His villainous rôle has been so adroitly changed and humanized that it is sometimes hard to tell where the hero leaves off and the heavy begins.

"And this may possibly bring about a strange state of affairs. If the hero continues to be the impossibly good, dummy sort of lay figure that he has so often been in the past, the future may find the audience not only sympathizing with the infinitely more human and understandable villain, but actually rooting for him."

They Say—

chologic values, an important thing in a story, but which producers tell us cannot be reproduced on the screen, tho we doubt the statement—or it may "get across" on account of the fine literary ability of its author, and this is more often than not the case. Yet such types of stories, stripped of all real merit, are continually being imposed upon the public, merely because of their authors' fame.

Nor are we even able to view the original story. It is remade, distorted, twisted, until it becomes something altogether different. What author would be able to recognize his own brain child after it had passed thru a dozen or so reincarnations? The result is a mongrel, a monstrosity; and the public, in the end, pays for it.

I wonder how many times the "Graustark" stories have been done in pictures. A great many others, "Stella Maris," for instance, have been done twice or more. Do they think that we are so fond of these stories that we want to be surfeited with them? Why not give us something different for a change?

Yours for progress,

MRS. F. P. DEVENPORT,

$5.00 LETTER

A "Reel" Indoor Sport

EDITOR, CLASSIC:

"What's at the Movies tonight?" is a more important question in some homes than, "What are we going to have for dinner?" If the title of the picture sounds alluring, it means there will be a quick meal followed by a grand rush to the motion-picture house. This is a "Reel" Indoor Sport, in which most of the public are contestants, and it is one that almost any one can afford. Motion Pictures are a real benefactor, by taking the public's mind off its troubles or cares, and there is usually enough variety to suit all tastes, viz: for the flapper who worships the dashing Sheik with the glistening teeth, the patron who is fond of comedies, so he can let loose his "Hyena"-like laugh, and the fan who dotes on the virile Western pictures, in which "men are sometimes men," but are often just "lazy galoots."

For the morbid individual, some enterprising movie producer might adopt the Chicago lawyer's suggestion that hangings be shown in motion pictures as a deterrent to crime, and go a step further and first picturize a scene of the crime. What excellent entertainment it would make to see a picture of a murderer killing and then sawing up his victim in a half-dozen pieces and in the next scene witness the murderer dangling on the end of a rope.

Such a picture could be recommended to any motion picture producer or theater owner, who has a surplus of patronage and would like to see his box-office receipts fall off about 75 per cent.

With the present craze for breaking into the movies it is not at all unlikely that such scenes as mentioned above might awaken a desire in a would-be criminal's mind that here lies his chance to become a star performer in motion pictures, even tho he would not be able to witness the showing or presentation of the picture in person.

The crippled girl who became the world's most perfectly formed woman

Annette Kellermann's Own Story

When I was a child I was so deformed as to be practically a cripple. I was bow-legged to an extreme degree. I could neither stand nor walk without iron braces. No one ever dreamed that some day I would become famous for the perfect proportions of my figure. No one ever thought I would become the champion woman swimmer of the world. No one ever dared to guess that I would be some day starred in great feature films. Yet that is exactly what has happened.

My experience certainly shows that no woman need be discouraged with her figure, her health, or her complexion. The truth is, very many tired, sickly, over weight or underweight women have already proved that a greatly improved figure and better health can be acquired in only 15 minutes a day, through the same methods as I myself used. These startling, yet simple methods can now be used in your own home.

I invite any woman who is interested to write to me. I will gladly tell you how I can prove to you in 10 days that you can learn to greatly improve your figure, how to make your complexion rosy from the inside instead of from the outside, how to freshen and brighten and clarify a muddy, sallow, blemished face, how to stand and walk gracefully, how to add or remove weight at any part of the body, hips, bust, neck, arms, shoulders, chin, limbs, waist, abdomen, how to have greater health, strength and energy so that you can enjoy life to the utmost; how to be free from many ailments due to physical inefficiency; in short, how to acquire more perfect womanhood.

Just mail the coupon below or write a letter for my free book "The Body Beautiful." I will also explain about my special Demonstration Offer. Mail the coupon now, before my present supply of free books is exhausted. Address, Annette Kellermann, Inc., Dept. 4510, 225 West 39th Street, New York City.

Julia Hoyt . . . Thelma Morgan Converse . . . the Princess de Bourbon.

There have been others, too . . . too numerous to mention.

They have come to the Kleig light kingdom from Newport, Park Avenue, Southampton and other stamping grounds of the élite. And they have returned minus any laurels. Why is it that despite their beautiful clothes . . . their beauty and their charm of manner, they have not made good?

There is an answer!

What Do Men Want?

It is rarely the most beautiful girl who has the most suitors. What is the first thing that a man seeks in the woman he wishes to marry? We have questioned the men in the film circles. And they have been very frank in their answers.

The Haunted House of Hollywood

It is way up in the foothills, perched precariously on a steep slope. One family after another moves in . . . and one family after another moves out. You have read of some of their tragedies. And even if you dont believe in haunted houses you'll agree with the hill neighbors that this isn't an ideal place to live after reading this article.

That Creature!

She was a beautiful movie star who played sirens. And when a wife thought her husband was falling in love with her she evolved a scheme. It was the sort of thing any wife would do . . . yet . . .

Not for just a day—a week—nor a year —but ALWAYS

SUCH was the promise he had made and that she cherished. How worried she had been when her mirror told her that ghastly story that every woman dreads — yet which comes when most unwanted.

She thought that she, like others she had seen, was doomed to have that dreadful, dead, dyed-looking hair — something must be done before he, too, should know!

Now she looks back to that dreadful hour when the grey hairs were discovered and smiles — and well she may — for Rap-I-Dol, the "Master" Hair Coloring, has tinted those grey hairs as though they had never been — no one is the wiser and that naturally glossy shade, nature's rival, is her's—not for just a day, a week, nor a year—but always!

That is why Rap-I-Dol for over fifteen years has been used and recommended by the leading beauty experts in the United States and Europe — they know—their art demands the best that science can give them. That is why women—who know—are using Rap-I-Dol.

The natural gloss of Rap-I-Dol, its ease of application and its permanency are unequalled. It is the hair coloring that almost overnight took away woman's dreadful fear of having her hair tinted.

Rap-I-Dol colors the hair after nature's own fashion—permeating the inner layers and not just coating the outside. This means that hair that has been tinted with Rap-I-Dol may be subjected to any treatment—permanently waved, shampooed, and may be subjected to sunlight and electricity without being detected by the most severe critic.

CASHMERE

BOUQUET

Now—a fine “hard-milled” soap that fairly caresses your skin

You've often watched her in a crowd . . . the girl with the wonderful complexion. Eyes follow wherever she goes, admiring—wistful—a trifle envious, for what girl does not long for a skin with rose-petal tints and texture? Everybody admires a lovely complexion. Beauty inspires the kneeling courtier . . . leads on to romance, love and happiness.

Advice of Skin Specialists

If you go to a reputable dermatologist—a physician who knows all about skin and treatments for it—he will be sure to tell you that water and the right soap should be used every day to keep your skin youthfully fresh and smooth.

But be sure you use the right soap—one that is firm, not squdgy; one that cleanses the pores but does not clog them.

Choose Cashmere Bouquet as the soap for your face, your hands and the delicate skin of your neck and shoulders. Cashmere Bouquet is “hard-milled”, which means that each cake is put through special processes which make it firm and hard—not the least bit squdgy. Its lather is all lather. There is no undissolved soap to crowd into pores, stay there and cause enlarged pores and then—blemishes.

An Indescribable Fragrance

Among the delights of using Cashmere Bouquet is its lasting, dainty fragrance, the result of essences that have been a Colgate secret for generations. It is this fragrance which prompts so many to lay a cake of Cashmere Bouquet among their choicest silks and other fabric treasures.

But let's get back to the subject of Cashmere Bouquet and your skin.

Wet the face with warm water. Work up a thick Cashmere Bouquet lather. Massage this into the skin with the fingertips until the skin feels refreshed and alive. Rinse in warm water. Then a dash of cold. Pat the face dry with a soft towel. If the skin is inclined to be dry, run in a little Colgate's Charmis Cold Cream.
