ie $30,000 mark, and it frequently slips p above $50,000 towards $75,000. But ot often.

"Today the average special feature osts $125,000 to $150,000 and frequently uch more. Let me detail a produc-on, using my 'The Heart of a Fool' as basis. Place the original story cost at 25,000. It required a cast of ten able layers for eight weeks at a salary of 5,000 to $6,000 weekly. This totalled bout $55,000; $10,000 went to players f smaller rôles, extras, etc. The over-ead costs—for staff executives, camera-ten, etc.—ran to about $2,000 for ten eeks, since these people were engaged or a longer period than the players. his then climbed to $20,000. 'The eart of a Fool' necessitated unusually laborate interiors—$25,000 went for the ilding of settings, the renting of props nd the renting of studio space; $5,000 went in furniture; while the electrical epartment required $5,000. The ward-obe cost $10,000, the two principal omen needing unusually lavish gowns.

"In 'shooting' the picture we used omething like 75,000 feet of raw stock. his cost $3,000. Developing and printng some 50,000 feet of final positive cost 2,500 more. Incidental items, such as diting, making titles and cutting, ate up 1,000 more. I have not added in my wn salary as director, because I draw gainst the profits, but this is another big tem, running usually to $20,000 or $30,000 for just an average man and way up for the big directors.

"You can see for yourself how the tems pile up. 'The Heart of a Fool' ere runs over the $160,000 mark. I predict that production costs are going o double themselves in the next year. Producers declare this impossible, that uch photoplays cannot make money. But I know the reverse to be true.

"Today a $150,000 production draws, et us say, $500,000 gross. The middle-nan—the exchange distributor—pulls down half of the profits. Directors and stars are now organizing in combines such as the Associated Directors, to distribute their own pictures. With competent handling, these photoplays can take in $750,000 to $1,000,000. Of that we are confident. So there is no reason why a $250,000 or $300,000 film produc-on isn't feasible—and profitable.

"Indeed, it will be necessary. A good story now costs up to $75,000 or $100,000. Players' salaries are steadily mountng. Other costs are advancing. It will really cost $300,000 to make a big picture very shortly."

Thus has the once lowly movie advanced. And only a few years ago a producer needed only a camera, a haphazard story, a man to operate the machine and a half-dozen actors at five dollars—or less—a day.

Dwan protests against New York as a national première center for this country.

The high cost of water

This is one reason why Quaker Oats will often cut breakfast cost ninety per cent.

Quaker Oats is only 7 per cent water. It yields 1810 calories of food per pound. Many costly foods are largely water. Note this table.

Percentage of water
In Quaker Oats	7%	In hen's eggs	65%
In round steak	60%	In oysters	88%
In veal cutlets	68%	In tomatoes	94%
In fish	60%	In potatoes	62%

The cost of your breakfasts

Here is what a breakfast serving costs in some necessary foods at this writing:

Cost per serving
Dish of Quaker Oats	1c
Serving of meat	8c
Serving of fish	8c
Lamb chop	12c
Two eggs	10c

In cost per serving these other good foods run from 8 to 12 times Quaker Oats.

In cost per 1,000 calories—the energy measure of food value—they will average ten times Quaker Oats.

* * * *

Quaker Oats is the greatest food that you can serve at breakfast. It is nearly the ideal food—almost a complete food.

Young folks need it as food for growth—older folks for vim-food.

Yet it costs only one cent per dish.

Serve the costlier foods at other meals. Start the day on this one-cent dish of the greatest food that grows.

Quaker Oats

World-famed for its flavor

Quaker Oats dominate because of the flavor. They are flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats. We

Every Woman's Depilatory

Removes Hair
Immediately—safely

BY actual test genuine De Miracle is the safest and surest. When you use it you are not experimenting with a new and untried depilatory, because it has been in use for over 20 years, and is the only depilatory that has ever been endorsed by Physicians, Surgeons, Dermatologists, Medical Journals and Prominent Magazines.

De Miracle is the most cleanly; after use there is no mussy mixture to wash away. You simply wet the hair with this nice De Miracle sanitary liquid and it is gone. De Miracle alone devitalizes hair, which is the only common-sense way to remove it from face, neck, arms, underarms or limbs.

"We were always poor," she said, "and those days in London were terrible! We went from manager to manager, but none of them would take a chance on me or pay any attention to the records I had made in Australia. Whenever any one asked our address we used to avoid giving it by saying that we were expecting to move as soon as we could find a suitable place. Of course, anything was better than admitting that we lived in King's Cross!"

At last, when they had only one ha'penny left, she got her chance. The London Daily Mirror offered to back her if she would enter the Channel swimming contest. It was explained to her that she would have to remain in the water long enough to make a showing—at least three hours, and the longer she stayed after that the more money she would get. She suffered from nausea, but whenever she was tempted to give up she reminded herself that the longer she stuck the more she would get, and thinking of that single ha'penny, which was all her worldly wealth, she remained in the water for six and a half hours. (On another occasion, when she attempted to swim the Channel, she remained in the contest for ten and a half hours and got three-quarters of the way across, a record for a woman.) For her first attempt she was given thirty pounds ($150.) But it was not until some time afterward that she began to make a steady income. The real incentive of her many record-breaking endurance swims was her very great horror of extreme poverty. The following year she and her father came to America, and she gave swimming exhibitions at White City Park in Chicago. They charged ten cents admission and gave fifty-five performances a week. Her first vaudeville engagement was at a salary of $300 a week. Her popularity was so tremendous, however, that her salary grew to $1,200 and she worked for two years in the Keith theaters without a day's vacation. But she was denied the joy of sharing prosperity with her father as they had shared their poverty. This was her greatest regret.

At this point, Mr. Sullivan, her husband, came up to ask if I wouldn't like to see the exercise room. It was a perfect little "gym," converted from a screened porch in the back of the house, overlooking the orange grove. This "gym" is large enough and equipped in such a way that she can practice her golf and tennis strokes with ease. She continues to keep in practice with her ballet dancing and tight-rope walking; in fact, with everything that serves to keep her fit.

After a conversation with Annette Kellerman one carries away an impression of bulldog tenacity of purpose, almost awesome in its intensity.

"Tennis means more to me right now than anything else," she said. "I am never so happy as when the Bundys or Mary Browne tell me that I have played my game well."

Tom and May Sutton Bundy, Mary and Nat Browne are her nearest friends.

"Isn't it odd," Annette Kellerman went on, "how, when you really want to do a thing, the importance of it seems to grow and grow until nothing else matters at all? For instance, I spent hours and hours trying to learn how to walk a ball. There wasn't any particular use in my knowing how to walk a ball, but I kept on with it until I could do it quite easily. Of course, it will come in handy now."

We had returned to our favorite spot on the lawn where the sun was warmest.

"No more fairy stories?" I queried, referring to her recent arrangement with Sol Lesser under which she will make moving pictures with her own company which will be exploited and controlled by him.

"Not for a while at least," she answered. "You know, the way this arrangement came about was that I made some one-reel educational pictures on how a woman could keep healthy. I showed these to Mr. Lesser and he liked them so well that he made me this offer to do five-reel comedy-dramas in which I will play a modern athletic girl. I think that it will be something really new!"

"The district between Fifty-ninth and Forty-second streets, wherein lie all the big New York movie houses, is a land of jaded, cynical theatergoers," he maintains. "Their opinion isn't worth anything as a criterion to judge a photoplay's reception by the country at large. They care nothing for the staple realities; they want something to stir their blasé appetites. Hence the enthusiastic reception of 'Broken Blossoms' and the lukewarm way 'The Miracle Man' was received in New York. Producers are coming to avoid New York for film premières."

Which we submit as Mr. Dwan's opinion—and manifestly not our own.

How Every Woman Can Have a Winning Personality

Let Me Introduce Myself

DEAR READER: I wish to tell you how to have a charming, winning personality because all my life I have seen that without it any woman labors under great handicaps. Without personality, it is almost impossible to make desirable friends, or get on in business; and yes, often must a woman give up the man on whom her heart is set because she has not the power to attract or to hold him. During my career here and abroad, I have met a great many people whom I have been able to study under circumstances which have brought out their weak or strong points, like a tiny spot on the lens of a moving picture machine will magnify into a very large blot on the screen. And I have seen so many people, lacking in personality, try to make a success of their plans and fail completely, in a way that has been quite pathetic. I am sure that you also are familiar with one or more such cases.

Success of a Winsome Manner

I saw numerous failures that were so distressing that my thoughts could not help dwelling upon those shattered and vain conditions. I have seen women of education, and culture and natural beauty actually fail where other women minus such advantages, but possessing certain secrets of loveableness, a certain winsomeness, a certain knack of looking right and saying the right word would get ahead delightfully. Nor were they naturally forward women. Nor were they the kind that men call clever. Some of them, if you studied their features closely, were decidedly not handsome; yet they seemed so. They didn't do this by covering their faces with cosmetics; they knew the true means. And often the winning women were in the thirties, forties, or even fifties. Yet they "appealed." You know what I mean. They drew others to them by a subtle power which seemed to emanate from them. Others liked to talk to them and to do things for them. In their presence you felt perfectly at ease—as though you had been good, good friends for very long.

Juliette Fara

French Feminine Charms

The French women among my friends seemed to me more generally endowed with this ability to fascinate, than did my friends among other nationalities. In the years that I lived in Paris, I was amazed to find that most of the women I met were enchanting.

"Is it a part of the French character?" I asked my friends.

"Were you born that way?" I would often ask some charming woman.

And they smilingly told me that "personality," as we know it here in America, is an art, that is studied and acquired by French women just as they would learn to cook, or to sing by cultivating the voice. Every girl and woman possesses latent personality. This includes you, dear reader. There are numerous real secrets for developing your personality. In France, where the women have always outnumbered the men, and where opportunity for our sex is restricted, those who wish to win husbands or shine in society, or succeed in their careers, have no choice but to develop their charms in competition with others.

How Men's Affections Are Held

Lately the newspapers have been telling us that thousands and thousands of our fine young army men have taken French wives. It was no surprise to me, for I know how alluring are the French girls. Nor could I help conceding the truth in the asser-

You may have all those attractive qualities that men adore in women

tion of a competent Franco-American journalist that "American girls are too provincial, formal, cold and unresponsive while the French girls radiate warmth of sympathy, devotion and all those exquisite elements of the heart that men adore in women."

And I who am successful and probably known to you by reputation through my activities on the Faubourg St. Honoré can tell you in all candor, as one woman confiding in another, that these French secrets of personality have been a very important factor in the successes of mine. But it is not my tendency to boast of myself, the Juliette Fara whom I want you to feel that you already know as your sincere friend, but I speak of YOU and for YOU.

French Secrets of Fascination

My continued residence in France enabled me to observe the ways and methods of the women closely. I studied and analyzed the secrets of their fascinating powers.

When I returned to the dear old U. S. A., I set myself at work putting together the facts, methods, secrets and formulae that I had learned while in France.

Of one thing I am absolutely convinced—every woman who wishes it may have a winning personality.

Overcoming Deterrent Timidity

I know I can take any girl of a timid or over-modest disposition, one who lacks self-confidence, or is too self-conscious for her own good, and show her how to become discreetly and charmingly daring, perfectly natural and comfortable in the presence of others. I can show you how to bring out charms which you do not even dream you possess.

Uncouth Boldness—or Tactful Audacity

If you are an assertive woman, the kind that suffers from too great forwardness, I can show you in a way that you will find delightful, how to be gentle and unassuming, to tear away the false fabric of your repelling and ungracious personality and replace it with another that wins and attracts. By this method, you will succeed, oh so well, while by uncouthness or misapplied audacity you meet with setbacks.

I can take the frail girl or woman, the listless one who usually feels that the good things in life are not for her and show her how to become vigorous and strong, tingling with enthusiasm and good cheer and how to see the whole wide world full of splendid things just for her.

Become An Attractive Woman

I can take the girl or woman who is ignorant or careless of her appearance, or the girl who dresses unbecomingly and instill in her a sense of true importance of appearance in personality; I can enlighten her in the ways of women of the world, in making the most of their apparel. All this without any extravagance; and I can show her how to acquire it with originality and taste. You realize, of course, that dressing to show yourself to advantage, is a real art and without that knowledge you will always be under a disadvantage.

For Married Women

There are some very important secrets which married French women know that enables them to hold the love, admiration and fidelity of their men. How the selfish spirit in a man is to be overcome so ingeniously that he does not know what you are accomplishing until some day he awakens to the fact that his character and his manner have undergone a delightful change—that he is not only making you happy, but he is finding far greater pleasure in life than when he was inconsiderate. There are secrets in my compilation that are likely to change a turbulent course of married life for one that is entrancingly ideal. And this power lies within you, my dear Madam.

Acquire Your Life's Victory Now

What we call personality is made up of a number of little things. It is not something vague and indefinable. Personality, charm, good looks, winsomeness and success can be cultivated. If you know the secrets, if you learn the rules and put them into practice, you can be charming, you can have an appealing personality. Don't think it is impossible. Don't think you must be born that way.

Don't even think it ought to be hard to acquire it; because the secrets of charm that I have collated and transcribed for you are more interesting than the most fascinating book you have ever read.

Once you have learned my lessons, they become a kind of second nature to you. When you notice the improvement in your appearance, how you get on easier with people, how your home problems seem to solve themselves, how in numberless little ways (and big ones, too) life gets to hold so many more prizes for you, you will decide to put more and more of the methods in practice in order to obtain still more of life's rewards.

No Fad—the Success of Ages

I am well enough known by the public not to be taken as advancing some new-fangled fad. All my life I have understood the value of plain common sense and practical methods. And what I have put into my course on the cultivation of personality is just as practical as anything can be.

I could go on to tell you more and more about this truly remarkable course, but the space here does not permit. However, I have put some important secrets for you into an inspiring little book called "How" that I want you to read. The Gentlewoman Institute will send it to you entirely free, postpaid, in a plain wrapper, just for the asking.

My advice to you is to send for the free book "HOW" if you want to gain the finest of friends and to possess happiness with contentment that will come to you as the result of a lovely and winning personality.

Confessed Calumny

studying for a chair of oratory. One day he was persuaded to see E. J. Morgan for "extra" work in the latter's production of Hall Caine's "The Christian," merely for training in stage technique. The stage manager wanted a man to sing the baritone solo, "Jesus of Nazareth," and luck would have it that Oland could fill the bill. Result? A year on tour with "The Christian" company, in which he subsequently played a prominent part. After this came a two-year engagement with Viola Ailen in "The Eternal City" and repertoire, followed by a season with Sothern and Marlowe in repertoire.

The next season saw him playing Peer Gynt with Hilda England, the Swedish actress—a year before Richard Mansfield appeared in the celebrated rôle. Closing, he went for a year with Nazimova, her second year in America, at the old Bijou in New York, in Ibsen's "The Master-builder," in which he played Ragnar, the idealistic youth, and in "A Doll's House," where he was first Krogstad and later the male lead.

And, a few weeks ago in Hollywood, he saw Nazimova for the first time in years as she was emerging from a picture theater.

"Ah, Mr. Oland," she said, "do you remember when you used to be the boy in my play? Now you are the villain!"

After the Nazimova engagement he went to Williams College to produce plays for the institution and the Cap and Bells dramatic society. Which he did alternately for three seasons, meanwhile appearing in a production of Edgar Allan Woolf's "House of the Vampire" and one with Helen Ware in "The Price."

Following the latter he put on his own production of "The Father," and followed this by superseding Robert Hilliard in "A Fool There Was" for two years. And ultimately he played the villainous chief of the Okrana in "The Yellow Ticket."

It was then pictures claimed him for the heavy with Theda Bara in "Sin." He did three more with her and others with Fox, at length joining Olga Petrova's company. Other stars he has played with include Clara Kimball Young and Kitty Gordon at the World studio; Mrs. Vernon Castle in "Patria," "Convict 993" and "The Mysterious Client"; Pearl White in "The Fatal Ring" and "The Lightning Raider"; Doraldina in "The Naulahka"; Fannie Ward in "The Yellow Ticket"; and Elsie Ferguson in "The Witness for the Defense" and "The Avalanche." And now he is deep in calumny in a Pathé serial, "The Third Eye," of which he is the star.

And when serialing is finished and he gets a vacation, Oland and Mrs. Oland will retire to their Massachusetts farm, where Mrs. Oland will put onto canvas the beauties of nature, where Warner—"Jack," as she calls him—will callous his hands chopping wood and coaxing the rich, warm milk from his herd of good old New England cows.

The Home-Made Girl

because he said to me, 'Come to the studio and I'll give you a chance.' And I went . . . and that began it.

"I'm the most fortunate as well as the happiest girl in all the world. No one else, it seems to me, ever had so beautiful a beginning, so kind a start. I only want to deserve it, that's all—and work and work and WORK as hard as I can. I can hardly wait to get to the studio in the morning, and I don't care if I ever leave at night. I like to play all sorts of rôles for the love of the experience, but I think the things I like to do most will be the character parts that go right into the hearts of the people and make them go away just a little bit happier, even if they don't quite know why."

"What did mother think of all this?" I asked of the smiling woman, rocking in her chair nearby, who had helped "Sister," as she called her young daughter, with here and there a sympathetic or a reminiscent mood. There was, it was tenderly evident, a great bond between the two.

"There was a great deal of opposition for Sister at first," her mother said; "no one in the family had ever done such a thing before, and I suppose we had the prejudice of the more or less uninformed layman against the stage and what we thought it stood for. Her brother, too, was aghast when he first saw her on the screen. We hadn't dared to tell him by word of mouth, and it wasn't until he saw her in 'How Could You, Caroline?' the first picture she did, with Mr. Thompson, that he knew anything about it. He was outraged. Wrote and said, in part, 'Mother, what can you be thinking of?' But now, with the kindness Alice has been the recipient of, and her own interest in her work and perhaps, too, his better understanding of the whole, he has become a very ardent and assiduous fan, even of Alice herself."

"I think," interpolated Alice, in her gentle little way, "that he really has had a throw-back to our kiddie days in Cleveland, when we played theater in the garage and charged the children of the neighborhood admission to watch us, or rather hear us, declaim."

"It's always been acting with Alice," said Alice's mother.

Then Alice served home-made grape-juice and home-made cookies and dainty little cakes and promised, upon my manifest delight in the delicacies, to invite me some night to a wholly home-cooked dinner. Alice is a home-made girl. One knows that. What she gives to the world via the screen will have had its root in the sincerity bred of home-life and home-love, of a mother who has been first of all a comrade and a friend, by her own natural domestic and womanly tendencies, practical in their demonstrations.

There is nothing in her charming head now save these things of the work and the home she loves with a sort of a blent

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper, "Trados" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct Ill-Shaped Noses without cost if not satisfactory.

coming has created a stir in the film colony, for the Belgian poet is probably the most brilliant and distinguished of the many literary lights who have fallen under the lure of the motion picture.

Before settling down to work he will spend some time studying the cinema art, and already he is deeply interested in the vast possibilities for theme development on the screen.

Genial and charming, with a serenity born of quiet hours spent in contemplation, he talked freely regarding his plans, but as he frequently reverted to French and spoke very rapidly, I was often left far behind except when Mr. Russell smilingly would halt the poet's flow of enthusiasm while he interpreted the conversation.

When I asked what phase of the picture building interested him most, Mr. Maeterlinck wrinkled his brow and, turning to Mr. Russell, inquired the meaning of phase. Then followed a debate between the two while the word was fully explained.

Returning to my question, he replied, "The plot or story. I find there will have to be an entire transposition of method, for previously the author has rendered thought thru the image or force of words, allowing the spec-

It was in the mystic twilight hour—just as the day creeps into the shadows of the night—that I met Maurice Maeterlinck, the famous Belgian poet-dramatist and philosopher.

After the formal greetings in the dusky living-room we drifted toward the open windows, from which could be seen the glory of the sunset's afterglow on the limitless expanse of Pacific Ocean before us. In the distance, deep purple shadows were obscuring the rugged outlines of the Santa Monica mountains and the waiting world seemed poised, breathless, for an instant, before letting the day become one "with yesterday's seven thousand years!"

"This shall be my inspiration," said Mr. Maeterlinck, in slow, precise English, spreading his hands to take in the magnificent view. "I could never grow indifferent to such beauty." And while I watched an inner light suffuse the calm, perfect features of the poet, I wondered what exquisite vision would come to him here.

Mr. Maeterlinck, accompanied by his youthful bride, Madame Maeterlinck, and their two good friends, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Russell, of Monte Carlo, are occupying a lovely home on the Palisades in Santa Monica, fifteen miles from Los Angeles, during their stay in California.

He has recently signed a contract with Goldwyn Pictures Corporation to write one original picture-play a year for this company, and his wear upon your shoulders the mantle of your Glad Returning."

Peyton stared ahead of him, and something saddened the curve of his mouth. "No," he said, "there was no Tower of Faithfulness . . . ever, you see . . . and the returning is not a glad one . . . it is not even a returning . . . it is just a chance meeting . . . of a woman and a man who, very long ago, played at love together . . . and, somehow, lost . . ."

"Love never loses, dear," said Claudia, in her little-mother voice, "not when love is real. And if it isn't real . . ." She paused, while her young eyes clouded over with an immemorial pain . . .

"If it isn't . . ." prompted Peyton, and found himself thinking, "How young she is, how young and how lovely . . ."

"If it isn't," the girl said, "why then, it doesn't very much matter, anyway, does it? . . . no matter, how much it may seem to . . ."

To Claudia, just at first, looking on, it seemed as tho Alice and Peyton must be succeeding, if only because they were so much together. They did, too, all the things they must have done in the fairy-tale days . . . they danced and swam and read the books they had read then and talked and took long, rambling walks . . . and it seemed to Claudia, too, just at the first, that she couldn't possibly nor conceivably stand it. Any day, now, the miracle would occur and Peyton would come to her with his shattered heart all whole and well and all his dreams come true within his eyes.

Then, just a little later, she decided to stay on and take care of him. He looked so tired, so sort of baffled and wearied. He never looked like that, she knew, when he and she played about together. His eyes had a light in them, even over the broken pieces, and his voice had a sort of Glad Returning ring . . . it came to her, suddenly, that they were trying, trying desperately, not to capture that which had eluded them, but to revive that which was coldly dead, which, even more, had never been warmly living . . . they were trying to instill into a corpse the revivifying breath of life, where life had never been . . . and if they should, each of them, know this, abandon the dream for futile, turn, each one, to face a new horizon, why then . . .

After that Claudia determined to fight. Why should she sit by, all palpitant with life, while the bleached bones of a by-gone structure struggled wearily for re-creation? She, who had gifts to give . . . largesse . . . prodigal red roses . . .

It was woman to woman between them, then . . . youth fighting precedent . . . desires fighting dreams . . . and after a week more Alice, rather abruptly, left.

The morning following her departure Peyton breakfasted with Claudia. He had always told her everything and he

A mere touch will end it— So with corns

A spot on your hand is ended with a touch of soap. You don't cover it and keep it.

A touch of Blue-jay ends a corn, as easily and surely. Then why pare and coddle corns, and let them stay for years?

Millions of people nowadays end all corns in this way:

They drop on liquid Blue-jay or apply a Blue-jay plaster.

The ache stops. The toe from that moment is comfortable. And shortly the entire corn loosens and comes out.

The method was perfected in this world-famed laboratory. It is gentle, scientific, sure. It is now the recognized, the model way of dealing with a corn.

It means to those who know it a lifetime without corns

If you let corns spoil happy hours, you should learn the folly of it. Try Blue-jay tonight. Your druggist sells it.

would, she knew, tell her this. After a while, feeling his way carefully, as it were, he did tell her. Mostly, he told her what a fool he had been. He had permitted unrealities to fetter his footsteps and imprison his soul. He had bound himself round with thongs and thews and found them to be, after all, non-existent. "You see," he said, in conclusion, "I found two days after Alice had come that what you said some time ago was utterly true . . . you and I have never needed another living soul. We are complete. We are, each unto the other, sufficient. Only, I did not know that it was . . . love. I have dwelt so long with the semblance of love that I . . . I did not know. Dear, you who have always mothered me so, pity my ignorance, pity my blinded years, which have only been so many years of preparation for this . . . for . . . for you, if some day, some wonderful how, you will have me . . . Claudia . . ."

And then she kist him.

A Rose in the Bud

The staff of the magazines had journeyed en masse to the Grand Central Station to see her and her mother off for sunny California. It seemed fitting, somehow, that she should go there, for California is the land of roses—it would naturally be kind to this little rosebud.

Friends and officials of the Universal Company were gathered about, and she was showered with flowers, baskets of fruit and books and candy. But when "Toodles," her little white dog, ensconced in his traveling basket, set up a howl, apparently anything but pleased at the prospect of his trip across the continent, she knelt down and tried to soothe him, quite oblivious of everything else.

The station master, who, by virtue of being a movie fan, had permitted the party to go thru the gates, a thing ordinarily tabooed, asked her how she felt about the honors thrust upon her.

"I love it. Wouldn't you?" asked Virginia, with her shy little smile.

Later, on the platform of the train, they posed her for the flashlights.

"Please let my flowers show," said Virginia.

All too soon came the familiar sound, "A-l-l A-b-o-a-r-d!"

Slowly the Century Limited pulled out. On the platform stood Virginia and her mumdear, arm in arm.

"Good-by! Good-by!" she smiled, waving her tiny white-gloved hand.

Virginia had started on her journey to stardom—methinks she will not find it a very long journey.

Make room in the cinema firmament for a new and brightly shining star—Virginia Faire!

And perhaps the most interesting fact which we gathered from the overflow of pictures was that they came from all parts of the country. Some from the crowded cities, others from small middle-western towns and others from rural districts where the coming of the old, slow, plodding nag, bearing the postman and his precious burden of Uncle Sam's mail, is watched for with eagerness and expectation.

From 101 Travella Blvd., East End, Pittsburgh, Pa., there comes the portrait of Thelma Goeddel, who has never had any stage or screen experience and who faces a very pleased world with blue eyes, golden-brown hair and very fair complexion.

Anna Kelly, of 284 Clinton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., is the possessor of a large number of huge golden curls. With fair skin and dark blue eyes, she easily deserves a place on the honor roll list.

Chicago has blown us Hazel D. Reeves, of 3972 Ellis Avenue, who has never had any previous stage or screen experience and whose hazel eyes and auburn hair frame a face which 'tis not very difficult to gaze upon.

The home of Alva Ansley, who has played in amateur plays and who swims and dances, is at 217 Pennsylvania Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C. She possesses naturally curly hair of light-brown, blue eyes and fair complexion.

A girl of Manhattan is Kay Bardine, of 1324 St. Nicholas Avenue, who has studied voice with Mario Salvini, and who is a classic and eccentric dancer of no mean talent. With very fair complexion and dark-blue eyes, this little blonde is no mean competitor of the Fame and Fortune Contest.

Again Brooklyn, N. Y., comes to the front with its allotment of beauty in the person of Gertrude Crossman, of 87 Woodruff Avenue, who has done extra work in pictures and who has dark-grey eyes, light-brown hair and fair skin.

All the way from 423 Twenty-third Avenue, South, Seattle, Washington, does America Chedister send in her photograph. Her eyes are a dark grey-green, which shine under a mass of light golden-brown hair.

The Home-Made Girl

and eager impartiality. It is "mother" and the "Vitagraph." These are the two names constantly on her lips.

She has her first doll, too. I asked her whether she played with it yet. "I dont actually play with her," she said, "but I love her just as I always did, and I like to see her in my room when I come home at night."

And so there is a fund of tenderness, too, from which, with the mellowing of youth, many of the fragrant, lovable things of the artistry which is best may come.

tator's mind to form the picture, while now the picture must serve to interpret the thought without words."

"That spiritual quality that has always dominated your writings—can it be transferred to the screen?" I questioned.

After studying the red roses in a tall vase beside him for a moment, he said, "I hope and believe this will be possible. Already some success has followed efforts in this direction. It is not so difficult to express the finer thought in your picture as it is for the public to grasp it.

"The producer says, we want a play that is unusual, different, better; then when the author brings it to him, he reads it, shakes his head and remarks that it is too far away—what do you say?—too high over their heads. So we must develop the thought of the audience gradually, step by step. Therefore, the first thing to do is to select a theme that will appeal to all. It may have a strong material side, but in its treatment the spiritual significance must be retained."

"Do I like California?" and Mr. Maeterlinck laughed boyishly at my foolish question. "How can I help it when I am given such a royal welcome? Here, near the ocean, it reminds me of my home in Nice, only it is warmer. Your season is perhaps six weeks ahead of ours.

"Oh, this prohibition! No more is there pleasure in one's meals—all attraction is gone. In France I have perhaps, one, two glasses of red or white wine, not much—but just enough to bring joy. The Latin countries use light wine and beer, and there is no harm in them. The American banquet consists only of speeches and a glass of water, and sometimes I have gone to four in one day—it is indeed very sad." Smilingly, he shrugged his broad shoulders.

On the following day Maurice Maeterlinck and his party visited the Goldwyn studio, and as they drove thru the imposing entrance he declared that it made him think of a great exposition. He was surprised to find the studio built on such an artistic as well as elaborate scale.

The first point that seemed to arrest the author's attention as he watched a scene from Rupert Hughes' "Scratch My Back," in which Helene Chadwick was depicting the frenzy of fear of a man who was threatening her, were the strains of music coming from an orchestra hidden behind the set. The fine psychology of emotional upbuilding with the aid of music, and also of certain colors used in the set, interested him greatly.

Mme. Maeterlinck, who looks like a fourteen-year-old schoolgirl, danced about in an ecstasy of enthusiasm. She is hoping to play in her husband's new picture and is to have a test made within a few days. She said, "This would be my

Come Back to Your Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

The Cloud is Due to Film

When pearly teeth grow dingy they are coated with a film.

There is on all teeth a slimy film, ever-present, ever-forming. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

Brushing in the usual way does not end this film. That is why so many teeth discolor and decay. Most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Now We Combat It

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat this film. Able authorities have proved this by many careful tests. Leading dentists all over America are now urging its adoption.

For home use the method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And all who ask are sent a ten-day test to show them what it does.

Based on Pepsin

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to constantly combat it.

A recent discovery makes this method possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has now found a harmless activating method. Now active pepsin can be constantly applied.

Pepsodent is now doing for millions of teeth what nothing else has done. We urge you to see what it does for your teeth. Compare it with the old time methods and judge the results for yourself.

The test is free. Make it for your sake and your children's sake. Cut out the coupon now.

home to "the wife." When Mr. Ogle is not ogling for the camera, he's right by his own hearthstone enjoying domesticity to the utmost. Perhaps it is because he has to be at the studio so much of the time that he is so keen on home comforts in the few hours left at his disposal.

Just lately, for instance, Mr. Ogle took his beauty sleep in the dressing-room, in a sort of catch-as-catch-can manner. He was doing "Treasure Island" for Mr. Tourneur and working at nights with Jimmy Cruze in "Hawthorne, U. S. A." The part of the one-legged Stevenson rogue, Long John Silver, was a particularly trying rôle in the Tourneur production; in fact, the most difficult characterization from the physical standpoint yet essayed.

Charles Ogle just takes you. You dont have to acquire a liking for him; it's as contagious as the sympathy which he puts into his voice. You know he's always picking up forlorn curs on corners, and putting small kittens into his ulster pockets to take home to "the wife." Center, an interesting moment in "Jack Straw," and below, as Long John Silver in "Treasure Island"

Photograph by W. R. Scott

Mr. Ogle's left leg was strapped up behind, then the foot strapped again to the right thigh, and with loose trousers the illusion was perfectly preserved. As much of the acting was done on a rough boat, tossed about by gentle currents in the Pacific and only one crutch was utilized, Charles Ogle says he was just about crippled in reality when night came.

"But—everybody was so kind. Two of the boys would strap and unstrap me, and massage my numb muscles into action again. We've gone over the rushes of 'Treasure Island' carefully, and I defy any one to find two legs on Long John Silver," said Mr. Ogle.

Why not some other star? Ah, there's the old-time connection of Charles Ogle, character man with the Chauncey Olcott Company, and the Pickford kiddies who started life in that genial Irishman's "Edmund Burke."

"Why, yes," the deep voice of M'Liss' good friend answered my question as to the Smith children. "We put Jack into his first panties in that very show. And Mary was just as winsome and as good a pal of mine then as now."

Charles Ogle just takes you. You dont have to acquire a liking for him; it's as contagious as the sympathy which he puts into his voice. She Became Famous Overnight!

VIRGINIA FAIRE

Maybe you will be as fortunate as Miss Virginia Faire. She is now a star! And one year ago, she was just a regular movie fan herself;—going often to the movies, and only dreaming about an opportunity to get on the screen.

Her opportunity came with the Fame and Fortune Contest, which was conducted by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND last year. Miss Faire, together with hundreds of others, grasped at the chance. Knowing that she had a perfectly fair and equal chance to win, she entered the contest. There were four winners instead of one,—Miss Faire being one of the four.

They have all signed up with large companies. Their salaries are well up in five figures. Their pictures have appeared in all the magazines and newspapers with write-ups, etc.

You have precisely the same opportunity now. If you have confidence in yourself, or believe that you could make good on the screen, fill out the coupon below, and paste it on the back of your photograph and mail it in immediately.

RULES FOR THE CONTESTANTS

Contestants shall submit one or more portraits. On the back of each photo an entrance coupon must be pasted. The coupon must be from THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, CLASSIC, or SHADOWLAND, or a similar coupon of your own making.

Postal-card pictures and snap-shots not accepted. Tinted photos cannot be reproduced in magazine.

Photos will not be returned to the owner.

Contestants should not write a letter accompanying photo requiring a reply. Thousands of photos will be received and it will be impossible to answer each one. All rules will be printed in all three magazines.

Photos should be mailed to CONTEST MANAGER, 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. Send as many as you like.

The contest is open to everybody, no age limit, except those who have already played prominent screen or stage rôles.

Contest closes Aug. 1, 1920.

Lift Corns Out With Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns or calluses so they lift off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a touchy corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

Women! Keep a tiny bottle of Freezone on your dresser and never let a corn ache twice.

Tiny bottle costs few cents

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

Hello, friends! Once more we meet in the month of flowers and sunshine, after the severe snowstorms of winter. We are now back on schedule time, and if you dont get your answer when you should you are entitled to register a great big "kick."

A SOLDIER'S SWEETHEART.—I hope you're true to him. So your favorites are Sessue Hayakawa, Louis Bannison and Hallam Cooley. No, I haven't tried it yet, but I understand the Mexicans have been making whisky from cactus. It ought to have a sting to it. Cleo Madison, Universal Co., in "The Radium Mystery."

THE MOVIE FANS.—You seem to think that the face is the most valuable requisite for a motion picture actress, yet Mack Sennett and the editor of the CLASSIC seem to prefer pedestals. Of course, Mary Miles Minter's hair is naturally curly. Billie Burke is married. One child. Is that all?

LILY MAY.—Glad to hear you enjoy the department by the Sage in SHADOWLAND. You know, he's kinda uppish on himself now since he became a papa not so long ago. Monte Blue is not married and he is in Los Angeles. King Baggot is to play opposite May Allison in "The Cheater." Yes, come in again any time.

MISS V. SAUNDERS, WAIRARAPA.—Address Pearl White, Fox Company, Fort Lee, N. J.

GERTRUDE T. E.—So you are writing scripts. Did you read where Sir James Barrie has made over $100,000 out of one play alone? Encouraging, isn't it? Valeska Suratt is not playing in pictures now. Virginia Rich is back and she is playing in "Would You Forgive?" (Fox).

LYDIA N.—I dont know that player's salary and wouldn't tell if I did, unless it was public property. Dont believe all you read about salaries. The printer, and sometimes the publicity man, add a figure by mistake, and 100 is made to read 1000. Yes, Mary Pickford will answer you if you write her. Dont know how you can see her acting in a scene unless you go to California.

VIOLA DANA ADMIRER.—So you dont believe that I am nearly 80 and that I get only $9.50 a week, and hence prefer to believe me a lyre. Alas, alack! No, you have me wrong—there's nothing romantic about me. Yes, I think 16 is about the age when most young girls want to become actresses. Ask dad; he knows.

NADE.—No trouble at all. Eric Von Stroheim, Universal Co., Los Angeles, Cal. Wallace Beery with Famous Players. Oh, about 25 cents.

NAZIMOVITE.—You say Herpicide is an excellent hair tonic and want me to try it. Why burden myself with a lot of hair to brush and take care of? If you write direct to our Circulation Department they will be glad to supply you with back issues. Keep up the good work; you're a mighty clever writer.

A. W. P.—Your letter was very bright. The religious Russians do not eat pigeons because of the sanctity conferred on the dove in the Scriptures. The most perfect lover on the screen? Bless your heart, I'm no judge of such things. Wait until I get down to Virginia Lee Corbin and I'll be able to tell. English, you know. Yes, I liked John Cumberland in "The Gay Old Dog." It was very well done, and I dont see how the ending could have been different.

U. DIE I. BURY, UNDERTAKERS.—Say, what's this all about? You're right, I haven't shaved since Noah brought me from the Ark. Well, the whiskers came in mighty handy this past winter, except on occasions when they bore icicles. You want more of Constance Talmadge in the MAGAZINE and CLASSIC. Come to think of it, you're right.

FATTV.—Why dont you diet? Yes, Elliott Dexter is married to Marie Doro. May Allison, Los Angeles, Cal.—Metro, of course.

M. I. WELCOME.—You just bet you are. Yes, it is true; Alice Joyce is married again. She married a New York hotel man. Percy Marmont is playing opposite Billie Burke in "Away Goes Prudence."

M. S. MOBILE.—Just take this little tip—the excesses of youth are drafts on our old age, payable with interest, and sometimes they are payable at sight. From one who knows. Yes, Norma Talmadge is in New York, 313 W. 48th St. Her own studio, of course.

H. V. S.—You are just a little late. Sorry, old dear, very sorry! To Dorothy Davenport. No, William Hart isn't. Mary Pickford was recently married to Doug Fairbanks in Los Angeles. Marjorie Daw was bridesmaid. Yes, Charles Pathé is still alive.

MRS. E. DE M.—Thanks a lot for the fee. I'll do all I can for you.

M. T. GARRET.—There are others! Why is this thus? You say the reason telephone girls are called operators is because they cut you off in the middle of a conversation. More air!

ROGETTE.—Well, yes, I walk very erect, having been straightened by circumstances. Did you think I was old and bent? Will Rogers, Goldwyn Co., Los Angeles, Cal. Well, I didn't have to worry about an income tax. That's one thing nice about this job, and one reason why I have refused better offers.

IMA WALLACE REID FAN.—Yes, Fox are re-issuing "Les Miserables," "Salome," "The Honor System," "A Tale of Two Cities," "Cleopatra" and "A Daughter of the Gods." Sylvia Breamer has signed up with Mayflower. Yes, Ann Little is back with Bill Hart.

BELL DEL C.—Bessie Love is not married, and Tony Moreno at Vitagraph Co., Los Angeles, Cal.

NELL FROM FLORIDA.—Eugene O'Brien, in viewing Niagara, called it "The Pride of Rivers." That pride certainly has a tremendous fall. Yes, I have been to Niagara—but not what you mean. Fritzi Brunette is playing with Warren Kerrigan. Rosemary Theby and Conway Tearle in "Michael and His Lost Angel." Sessue Hayakawa is married. You want D. W. Griffith to produce another "Broken Blossoms." P'raps he cant.

BROWN EVE.—Your letter was true, all right. You know words from the mouth die in the ears, but words from the heart stay there. Yes, Charlie Ray is with Arthur S. Kane Pictures Corp., 452 Fifth Ave., New York. He is coming to New York soon.

Laundry Buttons and Grease-Paint!

"Dont you think that the study of law aided you in dissecting character, in analysis and expression?" we asked.

"Oh, I'm sure of it. You see, I studied for the ministry, because father was an oratorical preacher and dead against the stage. However, my college days gave me plenty of work in theatricals, and so I finally followed the natural bent and took to the boards.

"For fifteen years I acted—out with road companies or at home in stock. After the first few years of acting, and to please my mother, I finished college. I studied law and practiced with my brother—and I know that in those early days I was really acting for the jury, watching what effect my words or gestures had on them.

"But I returned to the stage—and later came back to the law office. I was a regular Klaw and Erlanger pay-roller. Perhaps you remember 'The Blue Mouse'? We did 'Father and Son' also. And I had a good part in Rex Beach's 'The Spoilers.' For three years I traveled with Chauncey Olcott, and altho I again practiced law, it never had any allurements for me after tasting the excitement relative to creating living, pulsating beings of the imagination. So after some years of stage life, I became interested in pictures in 1909 and have been at them ever since."

I had been told that Mr. Ogle makes his first visit in the morning to the offices of the Famous Players-Lasky, there to bury his expressive nose in the stock report of the daily paper. So I ventured another question.

"Do you make a hobby of dabbling in stocks?"

"Well, it's not a fad—I don't like fads. I suppose you might call it a hobby, oom, hoom," (Charles has a habit of saying "oom-hoom" in place of the generally accepted affirmative, and it makes one think of a fat, happy bumble-bee burying its proboscis in a particularly luscious blossom!), "for I have not only invested conservatively—very conservatively—but have had about six hundred students."

"Students? What sort of students?" We had not heard of any financial school of the sort around these parts.

"Oom, hoom; students in investing money carefully. I've tipped off at least that many on this and other lots. You see, I never advise anything—either from the legal standpoint or from my own observation, study and experience—unless I am sure it is very safe. I haven't done anything with oil stocks, for instance. If I were to invest, I should simply take Standard Oil stock and be satisfied with the returns. There are some who make a fortune out of oil—but you'll find thousands who have lost everything in wildcatting.

"Just this morning a chap called and had a lot of the boys excited over oil and tried to interest me. I wont say I never lost a cent on stocks, but the losses

June Mornings

Bubble grains on berries

Mix these airy, flimsy bubbles in every dish of berries. Use Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs. The blend is delightful. It adds what crust adds to a shortcake.

At breakfast, also, serve with cream and sugar—any of these fragile, fascinating grains.

June Evenings

Whole wheat steam exploded

For suppers, float Puffed Wheat in milk. That means whole wheat with every food cell blasted. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size.

They seem like tidbits, but every flaky globule is a grain of wheat made easy to digest.

June Afternoons

Airy, nut-like confections

For hungry children, crisp and douse with melted butter. Then Puffed Grains become nut-like confections, to be eaten like peanuts or popcorn.

Use also like nut-meats as a garnish on ice cream. Use as wafers in your soups.

Don't Be a Sickly Grouch!

STRONGFORT
The Perfect Man

Nobody loves a grouch—nobody likes to meet him in the street, do business with him or have him around. And you can't help being a grouch if your internal machinery is running wrong; if dyspepsia or biliousness make your life miserable; if headaches and backaches take the tuck out of you; if constipation is poisoning your blood and beclouding your brain.

Get Rid of Your Ailments

You are only half a man when you stagger along under such handicaps; you can't win out, you can't make a success of anything; you are bound to be a failure—you know it, your wife knows it, and all your friends know it. Don't lay it on your stomach or liver or lungs—take hold of YOURSELF—build yourself up into a MAN again; turn over a leaf and live life as Nature meant it should be lived.

STRONGFORTISM Will Show You How

Strongfortism is Nature's way, and there isn't the slightest doubt in the world that she can build you up and bring you back to health and strength and the enjoyment of living life again, if you give her half a chance.

Strongfortism has salvaged thousands of human wrecks; has put vigor, vitality, hope, happiness into men who felt they were hopelessly down and out. Strongfortism will help YOU, as it has helped them; will show you Nature's safe, simple, sure way back to health and strength and mental vigor. Don't delay a single day; learn about Strongfortism—the one way to happiness for you.

Send for My Free Book

"Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy" tells you all about Strongfortism. It tells how I became the strongest man in the world by practicing it, and how my pupils in every part of the world have freed themselves from the handicaps that held them back, and are forging ahead in the world. Remember, Strongfortism is Nature's way, the one sure way; no drug store dope or patent medicines—just giving Nature a chance to dispel your ills and build you up. Send three 2c stamps to cover postage and packing and I'll mail you a copy at once. SEND TODAY, using coupon below, indicating your ailment thereon.

were trivial—not worth mentioning at all in view of the fact that I covered them fully in larger returns on other stocks. I have made an intensive study of the stock market for over twenty years. It's not a thing for people to go into as a gamble. It is a study—like chess. If you can't see the difference, you are sure to go wrong." The sage of the stock market nodded solemnly.

Charles Ogle is a musician. He might earn his living in a half-dozen ways; shows marked versatility, has an alert mind sharpened by a college education, extensive travel and constant study.

Every director of note has employed Mr. Ogle at some time. In "The Valley of Giants," as a blind man, fans worshipped this veteran character actor. He has received thousands of letters saying that this sympathetic rôle appealed more than any other part Mr. Ogle has essayed. When asked if it were not more difficult to play a blind than a deaf or lame man, Charles Ogle replied, "No; that one-legged man in 'Treasure Island' gave me more trouble than anything I ever did in my life."

Another doubling feat which Mr. Ogle carried thru was day work in "The Squaw Man" with Cecil de Mille and all-night hustling for "The Dub," in which Wallace Reid was starred and which proved to be one of Charles Ogle's most successful parts. He's an indefatigable worker, his fine mental and physical vitality carrying him thru long sieges on the lot, where cat-naps are the rule and meals are irregular.

So that plain little dressing-room on the third tier at the Lasky lot overlooking the stages, flanked by waving pepper trees and where the sounds of saw and hammer and the strains of Max Fisher's violin blend with swishy little breezes, has become a shrine to many. When there's a business bother or a love-tangle, Daddy Ogle is the legal adviser, confidential friend and ministering angel to the perplexed photoplayer.

The Blue Bird Alights on the Silversheet

ideal of stage life—acting out in the open—the hills for the setting, the audience—the world."

The little bride is called Selysette by her husband in memory of the artistic portrayal of her rôle in his famous play, "Aglavaïne and Selysette," in Paris.

"We are on our honeymoon," she confided demurely, clasping a huge bouquet of roses in her arms. "I think California is the land of 'The Blue Bird,' and I do not like to think of the time that we may leave—after a while."

With this new romance in his life, who can doubt that the famous poet-philosopher, Maurice Maeterlinck, in his sheltered nook among the roses and with the rhythm of the great Pacific in his ears, will produce an inspirational masterpiece which shall set a new mark in the ever rising tide of the art of the motion picture?

Crooked Spines Made Straight

Thousands of Remarkable Cases
 An old lady, 72 years of age, who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horse back and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing a Philo-Burt Apparatus 3 weeks. We have successfully treated more than 80,000 cases the past 17 years.

30 Days' Trial

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photo-graphs show how light, comfortable and easily adjusted the Philo-Burt Apparatus is—how different from the old form in plaster, gutta or steel jackets.
 Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine sees it to himself by investigating the reality. Free within reach of all.

Popularity Contest Awards

Sixth Prize

THE new Popularity Contest, unusual and entertaining, is already the object of great interest — unflinching and rife. If you have entered it or have read the announcements which have appeared, and will appear, from time to time, containing the rules and regulations, you know it is actually a double contest—a contest in which both the public and players are equally interested.

The prizes depicted above and below were selected after much careful thought and attention and each one is destined to make some one happier, from the beautiful Crescent phonograph which suggests a twilight hour with the gems musical geni have given to the world, to the Marble nickel-plated axe which brings to mind a jolly time in some invitingly green woodland.

Perhaps you have not yet decided to enter the contest—if not do so now. Don't lose an opportunity of enjoying the unique entertainment it affords or of capturing one of the lovely and useful awards.

FIRST PRIZE

Crescent Phonograph, piano mahogany finish (value $160). Plays all makes of disc records: Victor, Columbia, Pathe, Edison, Emerson, etc., without the use of extra attachments or intricate adjustments; a simple turn of the sound-box is all that is necessary in changing from a lateral cut record to playing a hill and dale cut record.

A Crescent owner can enjoy a repertoire of the greatest opera singers, popular songs, dance music or anything that is turned out of the disc record. The tone of the Crescent is full, round, deep and mellow. It has a large compartment for records.

SECOND PRIZE

Movette Camera and three packages of films (value $65). Compact, light, efficient, easily operated. Think of the possibilities during your vacation trip — your canoe trip—in pictures —pictures of your family or friends—living pictures that you can project at any time in your home. A priceless record of your life.

THIRD PRIZE

Corona Typewriter with case (value $50); an all-round portable typewriter, light enough and small enough to be carried anywhere, and strong enough to stand any possible condition of travel. It is trim and symmetrical and does not give one's study the atmosphere of a business office. Fold it up and take it with you anywhere.

FOURTH PRIZE

Sheaffer "Giftie" Combination Set, consisting of a Sheaffer Fountain Pen and a Sheaffer Sharp-Point Pencil, in a handsome plush-lined box. Gold filled, warranted twenty years. Cannot blot or leak. A beautiful and perfect writing instrument.

FIFTH PRIZE

Bristol steel Casting Rod agate guide, cork grip, strong and durable. Packed in linen case. Can be easily put in traveling bag.

SIXTH PRIZE

Loughlin Safety Self-Filling Fountain Pen. No extensions to remember, no locks to forget.

SEVENTH PRIZE

Star Vibrator, handsomely finished in nickel-plate with three attachments. Alternating current. Excellent for massage. Use it in your own home.

EIGHTH PRIZE

Same as Seventh Prize.

NINTH PRIZE

Marble nickel-plated pocket axe of tool steel, carefully tempered and sharpened. Indispensable in camp or woods.

Greatest of All Popularity Contests

Unique Competition in Which the Voters Share in the Prizes

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

SHADOWLAND, MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, and MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide-awake and well-informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read SHADOWLAND, the MAGAZINE, and CLASSIC.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2, provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on September 30, 1920.
2. There will be ten ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
July	1920 ballot
August	1920 ballot
September	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for SHADOWLAND every month, and the same for MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and yet again the same for CLASSIC. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

Reel Realities

Mary and Doug, here are our sincerest and deepest congratulations!

The announcement that the honeymooners will make a tour of Europe, doing a photoplay or two en route, arouses all sorts of fancies.

Here is an event well calculated to stir the imagination, for the coming of the two will be unparalleled in history. We can already see Little Mary, almost deified by the cinema, being received by royalty, (what royalty the war has left behind), moving thru crowded streets, for Doug and Mary are known and loved in every land, and are being fêted as no one has ever been.

A picturesque honeymoon, indeed.

Not so long ago theatrical producers used to weep and gnash their teeth when their stars "lowered their prestige" by going into the lowly movies. Who would pay two dollars to see a player after being able to observe her for a quarter or less, they reasoned.

It remained for the present theatrical season to really prove the utter fallacy of this reasoning. A. H. Woods decided to present Theda Bara in a footlight play, "The Blue Flame." Miss Bara promptly shattered records in Washington, Philadelphia and Boston and started her New York run with a smash. Had the play been at all worthy, she would still be breaking records. Instead of detracting from Miss Bara, the screen has built up an enormous following anxious to see her in real life.

Again, consider Elsie Ferguson in her return to the stage after two years' absence. Her vehicle, "Sacred and Profane Love," is attracting capacity New York audiences. Out on the coast, in Los Angeles, to be specific, Wallie Reid has been playing in a stage piece, "The Rotters," with striking success.

And now the stage producers are falling over each other to persuade screen stars to make a theater return.

The times have changed!

Recently American producers offered George Bernard Shaw a million dollars for the film rights to his works. The canny Mr. Shaw sat down and began figuring. Then he rejected the offer, figuring that he would not only not make a million on the deal, but would actually lose $17,000.

Mr. Shaw arrived at his conclusion after considering just what British, United States and New York State taxes would do to such a settlement. So "Arms and the Man," "Candida," "Cæsar and Cleopatra" and the other gems of biting Shavian humor wont reach the films—for a while, anyway.

Despite the fact that New York's newest de luxe house of the films, the Capitol, goes in for extremely long, all evening programs, the trend everywhere in the country is towards shorter bills.

The general impression—and there is no denying its existence—is that theaters have gone the limit in working up de luxe entertainments of music, singers, dancers, short films, etc., to the detriment of the feature. Result, audiences have departed tired and even bored. Naturally, the feature, buried beneath the elaborateness of the program, has suffered severely.

It is an interesting commentary that one of New York's biggest money-making theaters is the New York, an old, out-of-date house, but one presenting only pictures.

Our comments upon program length must not be taken as a slap at the short film, whether dramatic, comic or scenic. Tremendous and most praiseworthy strides are being made in this field of motion picture endeavor.

In short comedy the American motion picture is particularly advancing. We venture to say that Harold Lloyd, for instance, is as popular as any feature star of the cinema, with possibly an exception or two. Remember the way the late Sidney Drew was beloved? On every side these days we see the short comedy, which Mr. and Mrs. Drew so ably pioneered, making splendid advances.

And now London, just as did New York, welcomes "The Miracle Man," following the hit of David Griffith's "Broken Blossoms." There is no doubt that these two productions stand out as milestones in American film progress.

George Loane Tucker is acclaimed as one of the great directors of the cinema. It is interesting to note the enthusiasm of the London press over Betty Compson.

More than 50,000 miles of motion picture film were exported from the United States in the calendar year 1919, or enough to stretch more than twice around the world at the equator, says the New York National City Bank in a circular just issued. To be exact, says the National City Bank, in a discussion of this growing feature of our export trade, the films exported aggregated 273,270,120 linear feet, of which the exposed film was 153,237,260 feet and the unexposed film 120,041,012 feet; the value of the exposed film being $8,066,723, or an average of 5.5c per foot, and of the unexposed film $2,680,000, or an average of 2.2c per foot.

This is by far the largest total, says the bank's statement, of motion picture films exported in a single year, whether measured by quantity or value. In 1918 the total length of films exported was only 151,000,000 feet; in 1917, 166,000,000; 1916, 125,000,000; in 1915, 199,000,000 feet, and in the year prior to the war, 1913, 146,000,000. It was only in

Our New Spring Suit!

Isn't it a joy to throw away that old and shabby winter suit you've been wearing so long that you felt it had become a part of you? Isn't it a g-r-r-rand and glorious feeling to see how everybody turns around to look at you as you pass, and to know that they are all admiring—and, perhaps, envying you a little? We know just how you feel, for we, too, are coming out in our new spring suit—and it's great to shake off the troublesome clothes of the past winter—all full of patches made by the printers' strike, and the paper shortage, and the late schedules.

We have a stunning new cover for our June number of SHADOWLAND, and the latest thing in pictures, and the newest stories about every one on the stage and screen that you like. It will be the best and most interesting number ever issued.

There's Walter Pritchard Eaton's first contribution to SHADOWLAND. One of the foremost writers of the day, he offers a brilliant article on the theater.

Adolph Bolm, Master of Terpsichore, tells Frederick James Smith, in an unusual interview, of the development of the dance in America.

Have you ever thought of the political power of the cinema? Lynde Denig, in his "Will Motion Pictures Elect a President?," gives you much food for meditation.

There are the wonderful color plates of the most popular stars; very clever reviews of the plays and cinema features for the month; the latest offerings of fashion from Paris; the newest novelizations; and, as an added feather in our cap, we have made arrangements with all the leading photographers of America for first use of their best work!

The publication date of the June Shadowland is May 23

Reel Realities

1912 that this class of exports was considered of sufficient importance to justify a separate statement in the record of exports, the total for that year being 62,241,000 feet, valued at $5,502,000. The value of the films exported since the beginning of 1912 is nearly $60,000,000.

A very large proportion in the earlier years went in the unexposed form for use in making photographs in other parts of the world. At present, as above indicated, considerably over one-half, (153,000,000 feet), of the films exported are of the "exposed" class—those films bearing photographs made in the United States—while considerably less than one-half, (120,000,000 feet), are blank films for use in making pictures in other parts of the world.

These 52,000 miles of motion picture films exported in 1919 went to all parts of the world. While the details of 1919 distribution are not available, those of 1918 show that motion picture films of the "exposed" class ready for presentation on the screen went to no less than fifty-three countries and colonies of the world. Thirty-three per cent. went to Europe, 29 per cent. to North America, exclusive of the United States; 14 per cent. to South America, 14 per cent. to Oceania, a little over 7 per cent. to Asia, and 3 per cent. to Africa. Of the unexposed films, of course, a very large proportion went to Europe, 85 per cent., in fact, while the remaining 15 per cent. was distributed to the North American countries other than the United States, Asia, Oceania and South America.

While our exports of motion picture film have mounted, the importations have quite naturally declined, the total number of feet imported in the calendar year 1919 having been but 17,000,000 feet against 26,000,000 in 1918 and 76,000,000 in 1917, which was the high record in importation of films from abroad. The average import price of the exposed film was about 5.5c per foot as against 5.3c per foot of the exposed film exported. Of the 153,000,000 feet of exposed film exported in 1919, 39,000,000 feet went to the United Kingdom, 15,000,000 to Canada, 13,000,000 to Australia, 9,000,000 to France, 7,000,000 to Argentina and nearly 6,000,000 to Brazil. The character of the views presented on the exposed "ready to use" films is quite similar to that of the films in use in the United States, probably three-fourths being photoplays and the remainder travelogs, "news service" and comedies.

While no exact figures are available on the quantity of films now produced in the United States, says The New York Morning Telegraph, an estimate, based upon the known quantity exported, suggests that the entire domestic production nearly exceeds 2,000,000,000 feet, with a value of approximately $75,000,000 per annum when "exposed" and ready for use in the projecting machine.

The Celluloid Critic

No, "The Virgin of Stamboul" is not particularly impressive. It is too long, for one thing. The direction of Tod Browning is cumbersome and H. H. Van Loan's story but trite melodrama. It does, however, reveal the effect of the shimmy upon Turkish life. Miss Dean nowhere achieves the note of spontaneity.

Charles Ray can invest any screen opus, no matter how banal, with the life of reality, which, to our way of thinking, closely approaches something popularly called genius.

Consider "Alarm Clock Andy," (Paramount), the romance of a bashful clerk who develops into a success. It is obviously a made-to-order story, (by Agnes Johnston), but Ray takes it, gilds it here and there with sincerity, and—lo and behold! the thing seems a human document in which the tear is close to the smile. Jerome Storm has directed the theme adequately.

Constance Talmadge makes "In Search of a Sinner," (First National), a piquant and highly diverting comedy. John Emerson and Anita Loos have cleverly adapted Charlotte Thompson's story to the films, giving it a tinge of the risqué. Miss Talmadge seems to be centering upon this note of late. We do not say this in a spirit of censure, for she has the verve to dash with the lightness of thistledown over thin ice thru which most other screen comédiennes would crash disastrously.

"In Search of a Sinner" presents a young widow, one Georgianna Chadbourn, who has been so bored by her first and very moral husband that, upon his demise, she sets out to find a wild-man. When her quest thru New York unearths just one possibility and all sorts of difficulties ensue, Georgianna realizes that wickedness doesn't pay and is quite glad to accept the possibility, even though it turns out to be a head of the Purity League. David Kirkman's direction is spirited and Rockcliffe Fellowes at least looks the caveman-purity leaguer.

"Mary's Ankle," (Paramount), was adapted from May Tully's stage farce for the use of Douglas MacLean and Doris May. A youthful trio, headed by a young doctor in search of patients, is in desperate financial straits. Finally the near-physician sends out wedding announcements in the hope of drawing down a check from his wealthy uncle and possibly salable gifts from here and there. Then a young lady of identically the same name as that of the fictitious bride sprains her ankle in front of his office. Thus begin the complications. It is very broad slapstick farce of the footlight type and not comparable to the MacLean-May gem, "23½ Hours' Leave." When will movie producers discover that stage farces do not lend themselves to the screen?

If it were not for the fact that Dorothy Gish is the star of "Mary Ellen Comes to Town," (Paramount), we'd say something rude about it.

Behind the Screen

Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks were married in Los Angeles, Cal., on Sunday, March 28th, by the Rev. J. Whitcomb Brougher, pastor of the Temple Baptist Church. Robert Fairbanks, a brother of the bridegroom, was best man, and Marjorie Daw was bridesmaid.

John Barrymore's sudden illness—a nervous breakdown—caused the abrupt termination of his engagement in "Richard III" in New York. The revival had scored a sensational success. Mr. Barrymore's illness is said to have been caused by his hard work while rehearsing "Richard III" and doing the film production of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

Billie Burke has postponed her stage revival of "The School for Scandal," in which William Faversham was to have appeared, and will devote her time to the photoplay.

Agnes Ayres is to be starred by Albert A. Kaufman.

William Faversham's forthcoming screen vehicles, starting with "The Man Who Lost Himself," will be released by Myron Selznick.

Constance Talmadge has secured the film rights to the stage success, "Wedding Bells."

Realart's first starring vehicle for Wanda Hawley is a film version of Jerome K. Jerome's "Miss Hobbs," originally played behind the footlights by Annie Russell.

C. Gardner Sullivan, Thomas H. Ince's scenarist-in-chief, has departed on his world tour. Genoa is the first stop.

Thomas Meighan is back on the coast, making a film adaptation of Leonard Merrick's "Conrad in Quest of His Youth" for Paramount.

Ethel Clayton has renewed her Famous Players-Lasky contract. She will make two pictures in London.

Jack Mulhall has been signed under a long-term contract by Paramount-Artcraft.

The Andrew J. Callaghan Productions, Inc., is to star Bessie Love, her first picture being Charles Tenney Jackson's "The Midlanders."

Myron Selznick has signed Louise Huff as one of his stars.

J. Stuart Blackton is doing a story of spiritualism, "The House of the Tolling Bell," by Edith Sessions Tupper. The cast is headed by May McAvoy and Bruce Gordon.

Tsuru Aoki is visiting in Japan.

Pacific Coast Gossip

By FRITZI REMONT

LOS ANGELES, CAL., (Special)—One of the very best raconteurs in the film world is William Duncan. Unlike most Scotchmen, Bill is a good talker and loves to swap anecdotes on the lot.

He related an amusing incident of his early experiences in pictures. Before going on the stage, Mr. Duncan was an exponent for the Bernarr MacFadden exercisers, as well as a good boxer. His younger brother had put on the gloves while in his teens and become a light-weight champion. Thru Bill's early associations, he was able to put his brother "next," and the youngster soon became engaged for well-advertised bouts.

Mr. Duncan's parents were orthodox Scotch, averse to publicity and quite upset over William's theatrical experiences. One day, the newspaper held glowing accounts of the younger Duncan's successful fight, as well as of William's serial. The family read the paper and silently laid it down for Father Duncan to peruse at night. There would be no use in hiding it, for the elder Duncan would merely buy another copy and scold over the carelessness of women who mislaid the publication.

That evening, Father Duncan read his paper after dinner as usual. He said nothing for an hour or so, then suddenly turned to his wife. "Misthress Duncan, dont ye think we should be proof of our bairns? I think we should praise the guid Lord daily for gi'in us sic a fine family. It's not many that be blessed with lads and lassies like ours—nought but d— prize-fighters and actors!"

Some years have passed since that sarcastic outburst, and now that William Duncan is famous thru serials, his father is a first-nighter every week to see the current episode. Moreover, his son has just signed a new contract with Vitagraph and reluctantly Father Duncan admits that after all there is "some guid in play-acting."

Wandering over the Famous Players-Lasky stages, I happened on "Bob" Warwick's set. He is doing "Hunting Trouble," which is an adaptation of "The Man from Blankley's," and is supported by the nineteen-year-old Bebe Daniels.

Of course, Bebe and her stunning evening gown got me. She was wearing a combination of white satin, silver lace, handsome jewels, high-piled coiffure with Spanish combs and silver slippers. As we gossiped, Miss Daniels' jewels attracted attention. One of the men asserted that he could tell the difference between the imitations and her own valuable pins, rings and bracelets, all worn at one time. She laughingly defied him.

She was wearing a long bar pin of diamonds and platinum right over another of different pattern. I happened to view a safety catch under the lower pin, so decided on its worth at once.

"Oh, I forgot that would give me away!" Bebe Daniels laughed, merrily.

Do you seek a way to remove hair without slightest danger to skin or complexion?

SCIENCE has finally solved the problem of removing hair without slightest danger to the skin or complexion.

This with NEET, a dainty cream-lotion, as harmless and mild as your favorite cold cream!

You merely spread it on and then rinse it off with clear water. That's all; the hair will be gone, rinsed away, and the skin left refreshingly cool, smooth and white.

Old methods, the unwomanly blade and severe chemicals, have given way to this remarkable preparation which is already the accepted method of well-groomed women in every metropolitan center from New York to San Francisco. Obtain your supply today.

With NEET, you rinse the hair away!

At all drug and department stores, or direct by mail upon receipt of price; 50c or three times the quantity $1.00

Very Special

If you cannot obtain NEET at your dealer's, mail the coupon below with 50 cents for the small size--or $1.00 for the large--and receive your supply by return post, in unmarked wrapper.

"I bet you can't tell these bracelets apart!" I couldn't, but the connoisseur guessed correctly. The rings baffled us all. Every imitation was perfect, and we finally had to be shown. She had worn the real jewels, lest they be stolen if left in her dressing-room, so fans will have an opportunity to judge for themselves when Bebe's next release appears. The little string of real pearls she wears constantly was a parting gift from the Rolin studio folk.

Running over to the Christie studio, I found that Chic Sale is now doing "The Smart Aleck," by Irvin Cobb, a "Saturday Post" story. Mr. Sale has a vaudeville reputation which is national, so, with Coleen Moore playing leads, the comedy drama should make a hit. There is a new star in the shape of Lucile Ruby, a seventeen-year-old recruited from the Famous Players.

Strange to say, "Smiling Bill" Parsons' comedies will be finished by "Smiling Bill" Jones, said to be a former English grand opera singer. Billie Rhodes has been resting, but has resumed production, now that the Lenten season has passed. A big photograph of the late "Smiling Bill" Parsons hangs over the mantel at the National studio sitting-room, and it seems as if the jolly husband of Billie must come back any day. It has been very hard for the little star alone, and so her absence from the screen is due to her inability to settle down to work since her bereavement.

Henry Walthall, of the National, has been playing at the Community Theater, Hollywood, in a one-act play based on the life of Napoleon.

APOLOGIA

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Altho I garnered no wealth nor fame,
Nor played a hero's gallant part,
Nor bore a sage's honored name,
Nor any place in song or art:

Not all unworthy have I proved,
Life of her joy should make me free--
For I have suffered, I have loved,
And one good woman has loved me.

THE STORM

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

The East Wind rides to war tonight--
I hear his eager steeds,
With rustling panoplies bedight,
Come plunging thru the reeds.

Deep in the wood, where Captain Oak Commands the valiant trees,
The fearsome little primrose folk
Are crouching on their knees.

The gaunt weeds hide in ambushade
Behind the garden wall,
The hollyhocks are sore afraid
Lest Major Sunflower fall.

* * *

Now, hark, the battle has begun--
The East Wind's trumpets blow,
And soldier branches, one by one,
Fall on the ground below.

The hollyhocks drop thick and fast,
Their petals stained and torn,
Where Major Sunflower breathes his last,
Of all his glory shorn.

And overhead the doleful sky
Is weeping tears of rain,
Because the flowers that shattered lie
Will never bloom again!

They Teach the Hard-to-Make-Laugh—How to Laugh

HUMOR is raised to the nth degree in Pathé Comedies. Joyous, care-free laughter bubbles out of audiences at the mere thought of Pathé Comedy stars. No propaganda, no social problem, but just clean fun and the high spirits of youth!

HAROLD LLOYD, who for four years has been teaching the hard-to-make-laugh how to laugh, is presented in a hilarious two reel comedy every month, produced by that master hand, Hal Roach.

MRS. SIDNEY DREW, who is known wherever live people who have not forgotten to smile, is presenting John Cumberland, famous star of the stage, in two reel comedies, one every month, produced by the Christie Film Company.

"BRINGING UP FATHER," the famous George McManus creation, has now been brought to the screen in two reel comedies, one every month, produced by the Christie Film Company.

"ROLIN COMEDIES," each of one reel length, for four years favorites with the public, featuring "Snub" Poffard and "Sunshine Sammy," the cunning little ducky, are shown weekly by a theatre in your vicinity.

The beauty secret of Cleopatra hidden in every cake

How washing your face makes rouge and powder harmless

YOU should not blame your skin imperfections on the rouge and powder you may use. Modern cosmetics are usually harmless enough if applied to a clean skin.

It is only by leaving them on—one application over another—that the damage is done.

Then they combine with dirt, oil secretions and perspiration in an impervious coat. This clogs and poisons the delicate network of pores and glands we call the skin. Coarse texture and ugly blotches are the result.

Wash your face thoroughly once a day with a pure, mild soap and you needn't fear rouge and powder.

Most actresses know this secret, which keeps their complexions fresh, clear and young in spite of the make-up used. It is really the oldest of beauty secrets, discovered by Cleopatra.

But—it all depends on the soap

If you say "but soap is too harsh for my skin," you either haven't found the right soap or have used it the wrong way. This essential cleanliness must be obtained with a mild, soothing cleanser, such as is yours in Palmolive. And the way you use it must be governed by the kind of complexion you have.

For this modern combination of the palm and olive oils Cleopatra used as cleansers is as bland as a lotion. Its profuse creamy lather leaves the skin soft, supple and smooth.

Yet, while money can't buy a more satisfactory facial soap, the price of Palmolive keeps it within reach of all.

Why isn't Palmolive expensive?

Manufactured in small quantities it would be. Palm and olive oils are costly and come from overseas.

Enormous production and factories working night and day—ingredients ordered in gigantic volume—is what reduces production cost.

Thus we are able to keep the price of Palmolive to a very moderate sum—no more than ordinary toilet soaps.

You can therefore afford to use Palmolive for every toilet purpose. Keep it on the washstand for the sake of smooth white hands. Use it for bathing—it is the luxury bath soap.

Sold everywhere by leading dealers.

Two kinds of faces to wash

For an oily skin

For a dry skin

When the skin is inclined to oiliness wash thoroughly with Palmolive. Use warm water for the actual cleansing, rinse with cold. Apply a little Palmolive cold cream, removing all surplus.

If the skin is dry apply Palmolive cold cream first. Then wash thoroughly with Palmolive soap, using warm water followed with cold. This supplements the natural oil needed to keep the skin smooth and supple. An additional touch of cream may also be applied after washing.

How You Can Have a Charming Personality

To Women! Dear Friends of my Sex:— Truly, I have good reason to be one of the happiest women in the world. For every mail brings me so many letters of appreciation. If you were in my place, you would be delighted to know that you were a real help to so many, to feel that you could be a sort of fairy god-mother to someone in need of just the kind of knowledge you had stored up and just the kind of sympathy you have in your heart.

Ob, the letters! How I love them all. They fairly breathe appreciation and friendship for the good things they attribute to me and my work. Here is one from a little woman in Allentown. I remember the first time she wrote me. Such a pathetic little letter it was, a sigh from beginning to end, mingling with a sort of forlorn hope that I, Juliette Fara, might be able to help her.

Yes, to help her. To show her how she might attain success, how she might throw aside the mantle of a gray, uninteresting and even repellent personality and be just what the Creator intended her to be, a glorious, magnetic little woman radiating charm and personality, captivating hearts of men and women alike with a new found power sparkling with the attraction that draws friends like a magnet, compels admiration, respect and all the other things in life worth having.

That's what my little friend wanted and that is what all of us want. Now she writes and tells me that she has attained the desire of her heart, and that to me—think of it, to me—she owes the credit of her success. Can you blame me for being elated and happy?

But hers is not a new story to me. I have dedicated my life to helping women overcome their imperfections, my whole being is wrapped up in a desire to enable you, dear Reader, as well as others of my sex, to attain the success that comes to those who will acquire the exquisite and charming ways which are so necessary if we women are to achieve the feminine success so dear to our hearts.

Perhaps you know that I spent years of my life in Paris, watching, studying, and analyzing the captivating ways of the French woman, she whose fame has spread to every land, she who holds in her hand the destiny of her country and her men, she to whom the power of attraction is an art and a science to be cultivated just as one would learn to play the piano or sing. What secrets have been revealed to me! What amazing things I have found in the French woman's treasure box of personality!

There was Mademoiselle Polaire, for instance, one of the most fascinating little bits of femininity I ever knew. Beautiful? Dear me, no! Mademoiselle was positively ugly of feature. But people raved over her.

JULIETTE FARA

But Mademoiselle Polaire had personality, she understood the very things that I would like to teach to you who are far from being ugly, you,—an American Girl—equipped as no other girl in the

CONSTANCE TALMADGE

THIS esteemable young lady has won a place in the hearts of millions. Study her picture well; it will make you think.

What man, woman or child has not been charmed by her superb acting, her magnetic personality, even as she has captivated you.

Note the tilt of her head, the sweet, quiet unassuming dignity in her easy, graceful pose. Remember—you have never heard her utter a word. She has no opportunity of portraying her thoughts and emotions in vivid, eloquent speech. By pose, motion and facial expression, she holds your attention, thrilling you, amusing you, leaving you with a lingering memory of her charming mannerisms.

All that Juliette Fara teaches, Miss Talmadge employs to her direct personal advantage, so much so that a prominent director said: "Mentally and physically she is able to adopt any attitude with the greatest ease and to express any emotion or shade of feeling. That is why she attained such nation-wide popularity."

Miss Talmadge has heartily indorsed the instructive knowledge which Juliette Fara imparts to women, and what Miss Talmadge indorses you should know. "How" you also can use the secrets which she uses to such advantage is explained to you in the free book "How" which the Gentlewoman Institute will send for the asking.

whole world is equipped, to cultivate a charming personality, to use the secrets I am ready to impart to you so that you can be just the wonderful, admiration-compelling woman you would like to be.

How often have you wished you could reach out your arms and draw close to your heart the devotion, the luxuries of life, the tender love that you see others enjoying! How often have you envied the woman who seemed so supremely happy in the shelter of a wonderful home and perfect love, the woman with scores of admirers at her feet, or another with an enviable position!

You have wondered why, gifted to no particular degree with beauty of either face or form, or endowed with but ordinary intellect or education—why some women attain their desires so easily.

I will answer you. They have personality.

the winsome charm that all women can have, once they know the secrets.

Now, dear Reader, I do not want to seem the least bit mysterious, but you who wish to acquire a winning personality should know the secrets which I have found out. These I would like to whisper in your ear, to tell you confidentially, woman to woman, how I have achieved my success, and how I have helped so many of my sisters achieve theirs.

How many women there are who in some way or other find it desirable and even necessary to use every bit of honest persuasion they can summon to control the love and hold the interest of the men of their hearts! Sometimes they win over the thoughtless, indifferent or erring ones by weeping or arguments. But more often do they fail when they do not understand the true secret of winning personality for women.

Yes, if they only knew. If they would but work with head and heart instead of only the latter, using the knowledge, the secrets which would make the task so easy, the results so wonderful and everlasting. How I have longed to go to these women and say: "Let me teach you," instead of which I must stand aside and await the time they must realize that I have what they want.

Of course, there are all types of women in the world. Among those who have yet to attain a charming personality is the loud, aggressive, rather forward girl. Then there's the woman who is too shy and retiring. If you are either of these types, or if some other imperfection stands between you and your desires, I am sure I can help you. As the beautiful butterfly issues from the homely cocoon so should you emerge from the darkness and obscurity with a new found power at your command, with the alluringly beautiful personality of a woman whose hand is firmly on the throttle of her own destiny.

I want to make you sought after by both men and women. I want you to be the real center around which revolves every social function you attend. I want you to rise in business and make yourself so independent that you can choose your own pathway through life, gain and hold the love of the man of your heart, dispelling your troubles like fog before the bright sunshine. So I want you to learn what I have learned, to share with me the secrets of a winsome manner.

But this is not all I have to tell you. I would like to know you better and have you know me better. So first I suggest that you write for a little book into which I have written some of the wonderful secrets I know.

(Painted by Lea Sielke, Jr., from a Still Photograph.)

The silversheet has no more promising young star than Constance Binney, who first came to the films in Maurice Tourneur's production of "Sporting Life."

While Miss Binney owes her cinema discovery to Mr. Tourneur, she had an unusual measure of stage experience crowded into her two or three years behind the footlights. She first attracted attention as a dancer in the musical comedy, "Oh, Lady, Lady!" After that came screen fame and finally stardom with Realart.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama.

Belasco.—"The Son-Daughter," with Lenore Ulric. George Scarborough and David Belasco's highly colored Chinese melodrama with the vivid Miss Ulric. One of the big hits of the season.

Bijou.—"The Ouija Board." Crane Wilbur's thriller built around spiritism. Real spooks invade a fake séance, solve a murder mystery and provide plenty of surprises. Guaranteed to keep you on edge. Excellent cast includes George Gaul, Howard Lang and Edward Ellis.

Booth.—"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early '70's. Genuinely delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmer and an excellent cast.

Broadhurst.—"Smilin' Through." with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective, drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

Casino.—"Betty, Be Good." Lively summer musical show with a tuneful score by Hugo Riesenfeld, the director of the Rivoli, Rialto and Criterion screen theaters. Josephine Whittell is the life of the entertainment, Frank Crumit scores and Worthington Romaine makes his rôle stand out.

Central.—"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Sam Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

Century.—"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sextette." Here is a revival that really revives.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn is a brilliant Lincoln.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment adapted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of the guileless young publisher of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Eltinge.—"Martinique." A colorful romantic tragedy of the French West Indies, revolving around the exotic Belles Affranchies—mulatto belles—of a certain part of the tropics, the women poetized by Lafcadio Hearn. The cast includes Josephine Victor, Vincent Coleman, Arthur Hohl and Emmett Corrigan.

Forty-Eighth Street.—"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire. Helen MacKellar is admirable as the piquant French-Canadian heroine.

Forty-Fourth Street.—"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Hudson.—"Clarence." Booth Tarkington's delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier reunited a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Little Theater.—"Beyond the Horizon," by Eugene O'Neill. This powerful drama was produced at a series of special matinees and proved so successful that it won a theater all its own. A gripping study of a human being crushed by environment, told with compelling force. One of the biggest native dramas of years. Richard Bennett heads a remarkable cast.

Lyric.—"What's In a Name?" The most beautiful musical entertainment, with the possible exception of the Ziegfeld revues, yet seen on Broadway. Colorful new art stage designs, remarkable use of lights and gorgeous costumes lift it into the realm of the exquisite. Intelligently written and put together, too.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else. Mlle. Spinely, a Parisian favorite, is now in the cast of the two revues. Mary Hay stands out and the entertainers include Fanny Brice, Carl Randall and W. C. Fields.

Nora Bayes Theater.—"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent. Dorothy Dickson and Carl Hyson contribute some delightful dance interludes.

Playhouse.—"The Wonderful Thing." A human play built around a poverty-stricken but blue-blooded English family into which Jeanne Eagels comes as a wealthy heiress and wife of the eldest son. Pleasant if conventional.

Plymouth.—"Three Showers." A musical comedy of Dixie, staged by the Coburns, who produced "The Better 'Ole." Rather dull and not very inspired. Anna Wheaton is the featured member of the cast.

Thirty-Ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

Winter Garden.—"The Passing Show of 1919." A typical girly garden show in which the famous runway gets plenty of use. The revue presents a number of travesties upon current attractions, particularly colorful being that of "The Jest," with Charles Winninger doing a clever burlesque of Lionel Barrymore.

ON TOUR

"The Purple Mask." with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening entertainments of the season. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisquet; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

"The Sign on the Door."—A very good melodrama which boasts many instances of the unexpected—and Marjorie Rambaue in highly emotional scenes.

"The Blue Flame," with Theda Bara. A lurid melodrama with the famous Theda in the dual rôle of an ingénue with and without a soul. It is breaking box-office records, proving that every one wants to see Miss Bara "in person."

In "The Wonder Book for Writers," which we will send to you ABSOLUTELY FREE, these famous Movie Stars point out the easiest way to turn your ideas into stories and photoplays and become a successful writer.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality today.

"The time will come," writes the authority quoted above, "when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of playwrights, novelists, scenario, magazine and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them!" And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—armies of them—young and old, now doing mere clerical work, in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, one pound- ing typewriters, or standing behind counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are The Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the imagination free rein, they might have astonished the world!

BUT two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the flotsam and jetsam of Life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write?" Who says you can't?

LISTEN! A wonderful FREE book has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about the Irving System—a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to develop your "story fancy," weave clever word-pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of Failure. How to WIN!

This surprising book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge. No obligation. YOUR copy is waiting for you. Write for it NOW. GET IT. IT'S YOURS. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing. The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular job. Who says you can't make "easy money" with your brain? Who says you can't turn your Thoughts into cash! Who says you can't make your dreams come true! Nobody knows—BUT THE BOOK WILL TELL YOU.

So why waste any more time wondering, dreaming, waiting? Simply fill out the coupon below—you're not BUYING anything, you're getting it ABSOLUTELY FREE. A book that may prove the Book of Your Destiny. A Magic Book through which men and women, young and old, may learn to turn their spare hours into cash!

"My Golden Girl."—A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

"Shavings."—A pleasant bucolic entertainment based upon Joseph C. Lincoln's familiar Cape Cod stories. Harry Beresford is featured in a gentle, whimsical characterization.

"Mamma's Affair."—Rachel Butler's admirably written comedy—a study of that deadly human specie, the hypochondriac who fancies herself suffering from all sorts of ills. Done with distinction and fine discernment. Ida St. Leon scores and important members of the cast are: Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Katharine Kaelred and George Le Guerre.

"The Little Whopper."—Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

"Wedding Bells."—A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

"Aphrodite."—Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle.

"The Frivolities of 1920."—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue. Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls.

"The Royal Vagabond."—A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor.

"The Girl in the Limousine."—A decidedly daring boulevard farce by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white bed is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening. John Cumberland is very funny and Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, is both pretty and pleasant as the heroine.

"Nightie Night."—Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger and some daring. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

"The Magic Melody."—A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Julia Dean, Earl Benham and Carmel Myers, the last two well known to the screen, head the cast.

"Elsie Janis and 'her gong.'"—Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

E. H. Sothorn and Julio Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire.—These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet" and "The Taming of the Shrew" are distinguished in every sense of the word.

Loew's N. Y. and Loew's American Roof.—Photoplays; first runs. Daily program.

Loew's Metropolitan, Brooklyn.—Feature photoplays and vaudeville.

Capitol.—Photoplay features plus a de luxe program. Superb theater.

Rivoli.—De luxe photoplays with full symphony orchestra. Weekly program.

Rialto.—Photoplays supreme. Program changes every week.

Strand.—Select first-run photoplays. Program changes every week.

MISS ANETHA GETWELL
1919 FAME AND FORTUNE CONTEST WINNER

You Will Admit That This Is a Rare Opportunity!

You have often thought of what you would do if you could only have the chance.
Well, here it is!

The Fame and Fortune Contest being held by The Motion Picture Magazine, The Motion Picture Classic and Shadowland is offering you the realization of your dreams.

It brought success to four young ladies last year; it brought them country-wide publicity thru their appearance in "A DREAM OF FAIR WOMEN," a two-reel feature produced for the purpose of testing their histrionic ability. This feature, which is being released by the Fine Arts Pictures, Inc., of 130 West 46th Street, New York City, proved so interesting that it has been sold to every State in the Union.

"LOVE'S REDEMPTION" is the title of the five-reel feature play that is being produced by us, which will include many of the contestants of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest. Blanche McGarity, winner of last year's contest, has been chosen to play the leading part of "Peggy." Dorian Romero has been selected as the "heavy," and he has a big and strong part to play. Edward Chalmers, Alfred L. Rigali, Mrs. Mayer, Bunty Manly and Erminie Gagnon have also been assigned parts. Among the distinguished men who will probably take part in the play are Edwin Markham, the great poet; Hudson Maxim, the famous inventor, and Judge Frederick E. Crane of the Court of Appeals of New York State. Most of the scenes will be filmed in and around the Brewster place at Roslyn, L. I., and the making of the picture will be continued well into September. Each issue of every one of our several publications will hereafter contain interesting news of the progress of the play.

Put yourself to the test. You have exactly the same chance to make good as any of the very best known stars on the screen today have. Send in your photograph and let us decide whether or not you have screen possibilities.

RULES FOR 1920 CONTESTANTS

Contestants shall submit one or more portraits. On the back of each photo an entrance coupon must be pasted, or a similar coupon of your own making.

Postal-card pictures, tinted photographs and snapshots not accepted. Photographs will not be returned to the owner.

Contestants should not write letters regarding the contest, as it will be impossible to answer them. All rules will be printed in all three magazines.

Photos should be mailed to CONTEST MANAGER, 175 Duffield St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Send as many as you like.

The contest is open to every one, except those who have already played prominent screen or stage rôles.

Contest closes August 1, 1920.

The Possibilities in every Woman's Face

THE soft, appealing charm of a fresh, lovely skin—of course, you want it. Every girl does. Every girl wants to be attractive, lovable, admired—

And unless your skin is right, nothing is right. Haven't you often felt that? What use to wear the prettiest frock, if your skin is pale and lifeless, marred by black-heads or ugly little blemishes?

You can make your skin so noticeably soft, so exquisitely fresh and clear, that at first glance it will awaken admiration and delight. By studying it—learning its possibilities—then giving it every day the kind of care that suits its particular needs, you, too, can win the charm of "a skin you love to touch."

Is your skin pale, sallow, lifeless? Begin tonight to give it the special steam treatment and see how quickly you can rouse it to freshness and color.

One or two nights a week fill your wash-bowl full of hot water—almost boiling hot. Bend over the top of the bowl and cover your head and the basin with a heavy bath towel, so that no steam can escape. Steam your face for thirty seconds:

Now lather a hot cloth with Woodbury's Facial Soap. With this, wash your face thoroughly, rubbing the lather well into your skin with an upward and outward motion. Then rinse your face well, first with warm water, then with cold, and finish by rubbing it for thirty seconds with a piece of ice. Dry carefully.

The other nights of the week wash your face thoroughly in the Woodbury way, with Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water, ending with a dash of cold water.

A special treatment for each different type of skin

You would never guess what Miss Glaum's pet hobby is. Well, to relieve the suspense, it is raising chickens! Nevertheless, she has vamped her way into stardom, and her latest picture, "Sex," has caused quite a flutter in filmland.

automobile as over the script of his next picture. Probably much more. Harron has too many interests to be what you call an actor. An actor has only one interest—himself."

Harron takes himself far from seriously. They tell an interesting story at the Griffith studios anent this quality. The press agent had put over a publicity stunt about Harron and, armed with the newspaper clipping, came in triumph to show it. Harron took the clipping. The back of it caught his eye and he began laughing over a comic story of a police court case. Finishing it, he calmly dropped the clipping and walked back before the camera. Never a thought about himself!

Harron is a difficult subject to interview. He simply won't talk about Bobbie Harron. And yet his story is a fascinating one—for he is a veritable prodigy of the photoplay.

Years ago—we won't be too exact—but it was before the film play of today, Griffith was a struggling playwright-actor who had never heard of the Biograph studio, then located at No. 11 East 14th Street.

Harron was a student at St. Joseph Parochial School close by. The BOBBIE HARRON is soon to be a star. We are violating no confidences in telling, we believe. When the unassuming Bobbie goes into the electric lights it will be the ultimate step in a singular career. For Bobbie has never sought success in the films.

Dame Fortune has literally pounded upon the Harron doors and, finding no response, climbed in a window. Harron has no profound silverscreen ambition.

Do not misunderstand us. Harron does not look down upon the photoplay. He does not belittle the films. He is not forgetful of their favor. Far from it. "Harron isn't a typical actor," some one who knows him well told us. "He is a regular boy. He will go to a football or a baseball game and have just as keen an interest about it as about a scene at the studio. He will be just as absorbed over the mechanism of an Biograph Company secured its minor employees by applying to the academy. In the course of events, Harron and a lad named Jimmie Smith were sent over to the Biograph studio, by the good fathers. That was in 1907. They went to work in the film cutting room. Jimmie Smith is now Griffith's chief cutter.

Harron moved on to doing all sorts of odd jobs around the studio. Acting, however, was far from his thoughts.

"Then Griffith came," he says. "I remember those first days very well. At the start, he wrote scenarios and played as an extra. Then he developed to 'heavies' under the direction of Wallace McCutcheon's father, at that time a Biograph director. Soon he was given a chance to direct and, with his first picture, 'The Adventures of Dolly,' he established himself. That first picture was staged up near City Island, not far from the new Griffith Mamaroneck studios."

From the entrance of Griffith, fortune began to shape Harron's career. He was literally pushed into success. "That boy," as they called Bobbie, was pressed into service in tiny roles. Lillian Gish once told us that her earliest memory of Bobbie was of a queer lad acting a bit and devoting the rest of the day to sweeping up and doing odd chores around the Fourteenth Street studio.

Thus it comes about that a mere boy can speak like a white whiskered patriarch about the screen's palmy days. For instance, he remembers when he "delivered films to a man named Loew running a little place over on Second Avenue." The man named Loew turned out to be Marcus Loew.

He remembers one decidedly interesting incident. It seems that the outer portals of the old Biograph studio were then guarded by an iron-willed feminine tartar who never relented an inch.

One day, David Griffith was coming down the studio steps when he heard the dragon saying in sugary tones, "But, honey, I can't!" Griffith paused in amazement and listened. Then another and very girlish voice—protested. "How is he ever going to know whether or not he wants me when he isn't allowed to see me?" And then the dragon responded: "Well, dearie, I'll do what I can."

unusual beauty, marvelously gowned and displaying the brilliancy and charm of a fairy tale. Glorious ladies and handsome courtiers of dashing animation danced and flirted and loved and sighed to the silent strains of a half-hidden orchestra.

The most glorious of all the glorious ladies and the most dashing of all the courtiers faded slowly from sight, clasped in each other's arms and gazing most deeply into each other's eyes. "The End" was written—and then—the blank white screen. A faint click almost broke the heavy silence and still the figure of the man in the armchair sat quietly, his head resting on his hand. The last word in motion picture production had just been reviewed, and another leaf had been added to the laurel-wreath of fame which he wore as the great director.

The room was still in darkness as a shadowy figure slipped noiselessly behind the armchair and softly closed the door on the luxurious projection-room and on the back of the man who sat lost in the maze of the road which leads back into the past. He gazed long and deeply upon the white sheet, and suddenly the tiny shutter of memory clicked in his

THE room was dark; here and there the dimly white figure of a marble statuette, the polished corner of a mahogany chair, and a soft fold of velvet curtain, glimmered in the half-light. A white screen reflected the high-light at the back of the room. A deep silence of thick, luxurious carpets, of heavy draperies, of perfect understanding between the inanimate and animate objects of the room, quieted the tense nerves of the man seated in the armchair. Silently he gazed upon the screen before him, and to an invisible observer there could be seen a sort of puzzled, half-wistful, half-humorous look in the deep-set eyes.

On the large, white sheet there moved in a magnificently furnished queen's drawing-room figures of brain, and he looked upon a curious picture which now appeared on the screen.

There was a small group of quaintly garbed people moving stiffly about a room so ludicrous in its attempt to imitate with pasteboard, papier-mâché and tinsel the splendor of a queen's drawing-room that it brought the tears of laughter to his eyes. He saw himself, made up as a senile old man, tho at that time he had staggered under the mighty weight of twenty-five years; dashing to and fro on the set, acting, directing and reading from his own manuscript, all at once.

Another picture from the camera of memory flickered across the screen: he saw himself at his desk, writing far into the night, and yet on the following morning, bright and early, he would be down at the studio and, standing before the heads of the company would read his scenario, receiving their approval or disapproval. If the scenario was at all passable, instructions would be given him to start that day, the picture which was to be finished the same afternoon, it being an established rule that all pictures must be finished by the afternoon of the same day on which they were started. It was almost incredible! Where on earth had he been able to find all the energy necessary for the work that he had been able to accomplish in those days? Seven and eight costume and make-up changes during the day; trying out new and strangely awkward aspirants for the recently created ladder of fame; directing the scene, which creaked both in its acting and in its furniture.

A smile crept into the corner of the tired mouth. There appeared a title on the screen of his memory. It read, "Five Minutes to Twelve," and he remembered that it held the record for being the shortest picture that had ever been

She had been gazing intently at a group of actors, and had been so absorbed that she had failed to notice the director as he hurried past her. The child quietly picked herself up and continued her earnest inspection of the players. Her mother was standing nearby, and the director, attracted by the beauty and interest of the child, asked the mother if the child could be used in the picture. The mother consented, and the little girl put her foot on the first rung of the ladder, on the top of which she now sits in undisputed possession and gladdens the world with her talent. The little-girl-of-the-pigtail was Norma Talmadge!

A succession of the old pupils whom he had started on the rocky road to success flashed across the screen. The mobile face of Florence Turner smiled wistfully from the screen, followed by the queenly Julia Swayne Gordon, the intrepid Edith Storey, the blonde head of Claire Williams, the wonderful dimples of Lillian Walker, the agile Mabel Normand, the great-eyed Clara Kimball Young, the unusual beauty of Anita Stewart and the prettiness of little Zena Keefe, all challenging a not-indifferent world with the first flush of their glorious youth. What tremendous screen personality they had possessed! He sighed as he recalled the universal adoration which they had received from all parts of the world.

The sigh vanished promptly as the immortal huge figure of John Bunny ambled across the screen, followed in close pursuit by the angular form of Flora Finch. Every appearance of these two was the occasion of untold mirth, and they had truly caused a grin to circle the globe. He thought of the opportunities which they would have had today and sighed again.

It was pay-day. Florence Turner, who represented the entire stock company of one and also the star cast of one, doffed for the moment her histrionic character and, assuming a much more responsible and important one—that of cashier for the company—laid into eager hands the weekly envelope containing the munificent salaries of the players. A curious look appeared on the face of the man as he remembered the $5.00 per day he himself made; it only covered one hundred and fifty feet of film, and living up to its title, by twelve the showing of it was finished.

He recalled one bright morning when he had hurried across the crowded studio to a large open window and had called out some directions to a group of more or less indifferent carpenters down in the yard who were building Solomon's Temple for the last set, which had to be taken that afternoon. As he turned quickly back, he knocked down a small, dark-eyed child who wore a heavy pigtail of hair down her back.

Side-tracked!

By ELIZABETH PELTRET

Lewis S. Stone has two little girls, one eleven and the other three, and neither one of these children has ever been inside a theater, either to see a play or a moving picture.

"Because," said Stone, "I don't believe in it! I want them to be children while they can. There is time enough for them to learn the things plays will teach them. I want them to grow up as children should grow up; wholesomely interested in their lessons and their games and free from foolish notions. My oldest girl sometimes takes part in little school plays. But she knows nothing of the real theater, and I have nothing about the house that could suggest it to her."

We were standing on a stage at the Goldwyn studio, at Culver City, and Stone wore the costume of John for the first episode of "Milestones." He had just finished a delicate little love scene with Mary Alden as Rose, and now, oddly at variance with her hoop skirts and the quaint house-furnishings of two generations ago, Rose sat gracefully in an old-fashioned arm-chair and puffed at a Melachrino, while her lover sat on a carpenter's "horse" and smoked Fatimas. It was, perhaps, a

Lewis Stone's stage career was the result of the merest caprice of Fate. He dramatized a story from a magazine which he was casually reading one day, and while trying to dispose of it in a booking office he was offered the leading part in a melodrama named "Side-tracked." Center, Mr. Stone in an interesting scene with himself from "The River's End," his biggest success little disillusioning if you wanted to look at it that way. But if you didn't want to look at it that way, everything was entirely as it should be.

There is, around a studio, an air of comradeship . . .

a sort of all-this-is-in-the-family tone that is in every way delightful. Little remarks, made jokingly, that have no meaning whatever unless an outsider hears them, when they suddenly become absurdly important. But to the players themselves scarcely anything is real. It is all a little game they are playing with themselves and with each other. Some even drift so far away from reality that they lose touch with it entirely. Others, more wise, tie themselves to something so genuine that the breath of artificiality can never touch it.

This is what Stone has done in keeping the theater out of his home. Otherwise, he would inevitably see his profession become the principal interest in the lives of his two little girls. He would never, for an instant, be away from its atmosphere . . . nor would they . . . and he would hear talk about it constantly. He knows because he himself came from a theatrical family.

"I was born to the profession," he said.

Lewis Stone is a man of medium height, with greenish brown eyes and brown hair. His voice has a splendid tone, naturally resonant and entirely free from "staginess." His walk, however, a graceful, perfectly even stride, gives evidence of his profession. He is of Scotch-English ancestry. This, perhaps, accounts for the stern, grim expression he is able to assume so well.

"Actually, I have a very cheerful disposition," he said. "In spite of my tin-pan exterior."

He has two houses, one in Los Angeles and the other at Venice. Whenever he finishes work early, he goes to the beach people of rare discernment, but I didn't want to gush. Interviewers are supposed to be blasé and beauty-proof, but I defy any one to look upon the perfect oval of Katherine's countenance, with its serious eyes of grey shaded by the longest and thickest lashes imaginable, a mouth shaped like Eros' bow, for the subjugation of human hearts, and not get a thrill somewhere deep in the left ventricle. Even in the hideous glare of the deceitful Klieg lights she was beautiful. My own face, as I was acutely conscious, was a dyspeptic green, set off with purple lips and magenta eyes. But hers, protected from the spiteful lights by a coating of cosmetic, was a creamy white, and her grey eyes were only deepened in color. Her hair, which is soft and brown, fell about her face in enchanting little waves and lay caressingly on her shoulders in unpremeditated curls. When she turned her face in a certain way, I caught a fleeting resemblance to her sister, Mary McLaren.

"I hope you don't mind my receiving you in my boudoir," she shivered, as she gathered her negligée closer around her and huddled up by a tiny gas stove which was doing its best to dispel the chilly atmosphere of an un-California-like day, while the studio electricians shifted lights on the set.

"We are making 'The Guests of Hercules,'" she went on, tucking a satin-shod foot under her for warmth, "and this is one of the guest rooms of the ancestral castle which is willed to me."

Her voice, I noticed, had none of the inflections or broad a's which characterize so many screen stars—whether b,

Her Japanese fans think the slogan of "The American Beauty" an honorary title, so their fan letters arrive "Katherine MacDonald, A. B."

I was looking over fan mail in the publicity office of the Katherine MacDonald studio, waiting for some one to ascertain if the lovely star was on the lot, and among the envelopes whose postmarks I perused was one addressed to "Miss Katherine MacDonald, A. B."

"Ah, the fair Katherine is a college graduate, and this letter is from a classmate," I Sherlocked to myself, and so sure was I of the accuracy of my deductions that almost the first question I asked of Miss MacDonald, whom I found dressed in negligée in the semi-privacy of an elaborate bedroom set, was, "And where did you take your degree of A. B.?"

Miss MacDonald looked blank. She denied having taken such a thing.

"But it was on a letter!" I insisted. "Right after your name, the initials, 'A. B.'"

The beautiful Katherine—she's exactly the kind of a girl that Shakespeare would have called "my bonny Kate"—threw back her head and laughed merrily and unaffectedly. And the line of her throat when she did it!

"Oh, that!" she said, sobering enough to explain her outburst of mirth; "that was from a Japanese fan. You know, they use my pictures with a rose and the slogan of 'The American Beauty.' My Japanese admirers seem to think it's an honorary title, so they use the initials after my name."

I wanted to tell her that the Japanese were evidently a nature or cultivation I am not prepared to say. There is a quiet sincerity about her, an absolute naturalness, that precludes any idea of pose. In fact, she gives you the impression that she is what she is and that if you do not like her it makes not the slightest bit of difference. I found her attitude refreshing and altogether charming.

"Pictures?" she echoed, as I broached the time-worn but necessary question as to how she "got in."

"Well, to tell the truth, I was pushed in. I never had the slightest idea of going into the movies; in fact, I considered them quite common and altogether unattractive. Of course, I was interested in Mary's work, but for myself—why, I was going to be a school-teacher." She finished with a reminiscent smile.

"That's hard luck for some school," I observed, but she shook her head and gazed into the fire.

"Oh, I don't know—maybe I'd have failed miserably as a teacher. One never knows. But anyway, I came West to straighten out some legal tangles for Mary, and stayed to keep house with her and her mother. The manager of the old Horsley studio asked me if I wouldn't work in some pictures, and he offered me thirty dollars a week. Well, I had nothing else to do, so I started in. For many weeks I played 'atmosphere' bits and held up the back curtain while the real actors emoted in front, but the studio was rather poorly equipped with help, so I was a sort of general property woman. I helped 'dress' the sets, arranged the flowers for all of them, and when extra 'props' were needed, I'd take my car and run over to the house and bring back a load of vases, rugs, curtains and everything you could think of."

I could not help looking about the ultra-modern studio with its elaborate sets, perfect in construction and detail, and reflecting that they were for her very own productions. From thirty a week to empty-steen thousand a week—well, the Lord must love the Scotch as well as the Irish. Katherine is Scotch.

"Then Max Linder offered me one hundred a week to play opposite him in his comedies," she went on. "Of course, it sounded like an immense amount of money, but Mary advised me if I was going to start in pictures, not to break in thru the comedy route. (That was before Gloria Swanson and the rest of the comedy queens broke into drama)," she explained parenthetically. "So I turned down the offer and took a part in Mary's company. I did parts of no special importance for some time, and my first lead was with Douglas Fairbanks in 'Headin' South.' I also played with him in 'Mr. Fixit,' and did two pictures with William Hart, 'Riddle Gawne' and 'Shark Monroe.'

"I never thought I'd have my own company," she smiled, glancing around the studio with a pardonable pride, "but I have—and it's like a dream. I'm afraid I'll wake up."

The first feature in which Katherine MacDonal made her producer's bow to the public was "The Thunderbolt," and the next were "The Beauty Market" and "The Turning Point."

"YOU'RE making a mistake!" chorused the flushed femininities after having showered Janie Wakeman with all the extraordinaries in the way of aluminum they had found purchasable if not practicable; "a terr-i-ble mistake," they intoned.

"Not me!" snapped Janie Wakeman. She had a snappy way, had Janie.

"He's a devil with the ladies!" went on the chief mourners, dolorously.

"He'll have a devil for a wife," came back Janie, with pursed lips; "that'll cure him."

"Not Jack . . . there was the blonde down at the beach summer before last . . . he had a fierce time over that. She"—the fair informant lowered her voice meaningly—"she was married!"

"Old stuff!" said Janie.

"There was the girl on the Pullman car," suggested still another; "her father stepped in . . ."

"There was the girl who waits on the table in Wild's," vouchsafed another; "Jack cant eat there any longer. Oh, Janie, darling, you'll have a fearful life, simply fearful!"

"All this," observed Janie, stirring her chocolate coolly, "was before my time and does not concern me."

"But, Janie," they protested, en masse, "what makes you suppose you will be any different than the others? He is a flirt. He's fickle. He's inconstant and unsteady. Everybody says so."

"Everybody," said Janie, "does not have to marry him. Nor, I might add, has he married everybody. I am the first. I shall be the last. All that is necessary, my dears, is efficiency in the marital relationship. I am young, but oh, how I am wise," she added, softly, "when it comes to Jack." She said, aloud, "Jack shall neither break my heart nor my home. Wait and see!"

They waited. Then they waited some more. It was unbelievable. Jack Valentine had never been known to walk a straight line on the street when a pretty girl was on the other side. After his marriage to Janie he seemed to be of the nature of a sleep-walker; his eyes were fixed. It was magic, they said.

Janie took it calmly and rather irritatingly to many of her prenuptial well-wishers. She had the air of "I told you so!" Some went so far as to say that they pitied poor, dear Jack . . . his home life must be something awful! They began to remember the autocracy of Janie with her humble parents. After Janie's advent, it was recalled, the parents, well-meaning always, had had little if anything to say. Of course, they had seemed to like it, but then, they had been parents . . . that is different . . .

The well-wishers had to admit to an idyllic state. There was every sign. Janie in her pretty room, en negligée, waiting for Jack to run in for early tea . . . which he always did.

Janie undoing her husband's shoe, petulantly pretty. Janie on her husband's knee before the open fire. The pictures were complete.

When the first difficulty came the well-wishers were wholly in the dark. That was Janie's way.

Jack came home for supper one evening half an hour late. He entered with

"Everybody," said Janie, "does not have to marry him. Nor, I might add, has he married everybody. I am the first. I shall be the last. All that is necessary in the marital relationship is efficiency" glib excuses and many kisses. He was greeted by an apparition that made his amative blood congeal. His wife, his Janie, stood on the threshold of the living-room and her blue eyes blazed in her head like twin coals. She was sobbing hot, indignant tears and her small fists were beating the air in a thoroly efficient sort of manner.

"Dont you dare . . . d-d-dont you d-d-dare!" she sputtered, effectively. "I saw you! I did! You w-wretch! You . . . oh, you! No, dont speak, dont dare to speak. You'll lie. I know you'll lie. Of course, you will. You always do . . . husbands always do, I mean. I feel it coming. You'll say that the subway was held up, or you were held up . . . at the office, or . . . or something of the sort. It isn't so . . . no, it isn't so . . . no, I wont stop talking. I've only just begun. I saw you, I tell you. I saw you. With my own eyes. O-o-o-o-h!"

Jack waved a limp hand. It was no use.

"I was on top of a Fifth Avenue bus," stormed on Janie, "riding along and thinking how I'd get down pretty soon and buy you some ties I saw in Budd's. Then, all at once, I saw you go up to a girl on the avenue, a blonde girl, John T. Valentine, and help her into a taxicab. A taxicab, mind you! You know you did. Dont tell me. As if I didn't know what a taxicab means! Haven't I been in 'em?"

"John Valentine, if you say another word I'll hurl every single bit of bric-à-brac in this miserable, violated, desecrated, once-holy home at your infidel head, I will! You just dare to come in here and talk to me like that, to my very face! Oh, you brazen thing, you . . . you . . ."

Janie choked, but waved her fists fiercely to caution the ghastly John to a complete silence.

"You got in after her," she went on, "and I got down and got into another taxi and followed you. You took her to her very door, and at that door, you . . . you . . ."

Something between a groan, a squeak and a whine emanated from the nearly collapsed Valentine. He swayed weakly and rested his palm on the nearest support.

"You kist her," shrieked Janie, "you did! Before my eyes! Kist her! I call heaven to witness if a falser wretch ever lived or breathed! I call on all the gods! I am wronged! I am a wronged woman! Heavens!" Janie gave three tremendous sobs, then she, too, crumpled up and fell into the chair behind her. "John T. Valentine," she said, "what are you going to do?"

John T. Valentine made a desperate endeavor to appear as tho he filled at least some portion of his clothing. During the tirade he seemed perceptibly to have wilted. He felt of his collar, of his hair, even ran his fingers over the outline of his features to make certain they had not altered; then he said, with great adequacy, "Janet, you know I love you."

This produced an emotional Niagara, terrific in its onslaught, to the eye and to the ear. Another hour and Janie demanded, albeit more weakly, "John T. Valentine, what are you going to do?"

John T. Valentine crept over to the couch upon which the sharer of his bosom was, by now, drooping. He tentatively touched the hem of her flowing garment. The night was creeping on apace. He was cowed; he was subdued; he was convinced that he had trod down and splintered the ten commandments and that, no doubt, he would have done damage to ten more had there been that number; but he was also sleepy and he knew that he hated with a frightful and bloodthirsty vengeance the blonde on the Avenue who had seemed to him, at that moment, unable to carry her suitcase, and to whom, probably because she was blonde, he had tendered his assistance, and he knew as clearly that he was violently sleepy and that he adored Janie. If she could know these things, too!

He began to tell her. He began to conjure up their imminent and tender past.

The result was horrific. It produced dolor not unmixed with temper and resulted, all told, in four smashed vases, rather jolly vases at that; the complete destruction of the family album, with all the grandmas and grandpas; three pictures; two glass trifles and various carefully selected books. With each crash Janie would wail, "You've broken my heart, you have! You have, you've broken my heart!" until John T. felt, with a shudder thru his spine, that he could hear the agonizing splintering of Janie's beloved and agonized little heart.

He suffered.

Around morning they fell asleep.

The result was breakfast at noon, with considerable marmalade, a chastened husband, a weepy but picturesquely forgiving little bride.

Of course, a second honeymoon ensued. It was altogether blissful. It had a savor the original one had not. They had, they knew, suffered together and had "come thru." Jack had sinned, had strayed from the fold. It gave him, Janie half admitted it, very secretly, to herself, a sort of glamor, a new, if dangerous, garment of illusion. Janie, on the other hand, had forgiven. In reality, she had fallen asleep, but pshaw! What is reality when one is twenty and very much in love?

There followed another interlude.

"Have you ever," said everybody, "known such an ideal couple as the Jack Valentines? They were made for one another."

Then, abruptly, it became known that Janie Valentine had gone home to mother. Had picked up every belonging she owned and gone clean back.

That was all that did become known. Janie was mum. She took her efficiency and her silence into her father's business offices and proceeded to be successful. The only mail she did not read were the letters she received in John's handwriting. These she tore up into little, vicious bits, lit a match and completely removed from being. The only 'phone messages she did not personally receive were those made by John. These she either did not receive at all or transferred to another line upon recognition of the voice.

Gossip said that Janie Valentine had "changed." There was a little glint in her eyes that had not been there before. There was a slight tightening of her mouth. When she walked, now and then her shoulders drooped as tho she were carrying a burden ever so slightly too much for her strength.

When she awoke in the mornings her pillow was always damp. No one but Janie knew that.

It had all been about a manicure girl. A rather opulent creature with a hearty laugh.

Janie had been in the habit of having the girl come to the house to do her nails every Saturday morning. One day Jack suggested that he rather needed a manicure himself. Janie suggested that her Mabel do them for him. Jack assented. After the first manicure, Jack took to having them as regularly as Janie. At first, Janie was unsuspecting. Jack had been, since the taxicab catastrophe, so completely uxorious. Then, one day, while he was being "done," Janie had caught a look in his eyes. It was the old battle light. At once she was on her guard.

Jack was a transparent person. The next time he had an appointment for a manicure, Janie had occasion to go out . . . for a while . . . When she returned, rather suddenly and very quietly, her husband was not being . . . manicured . . .

One hour later, to the minute, Janie went home to mother.

This time, her methods were very different.

There was no weeping, no wailing, no gnashing of teeth. There was no reviling, no accusations, no protestations. Jack wished, tragically, that there were. Just silence. Grim silence. Glacial. Totally unforgiving. Her small, white face . . . how stern! Her hurried, yet precise preparations, how final! Jack bit his manicure away and cursed the fragile sex! His advances, his pleas, his self-condemnations were met with a frigid aloofness, not so sad as it was sweet, nor so sweet as it was sad. Jack was minded of the lines, "But, sweet, for me, no more of you, not while I live, not tho I die, good-night, good-by!"

His soul was swept and scarred and seared by a knowledge, a revelation, of his torrential love for Janie! Gods, how he loved her! It ached!

Janie became exceedingly businesslike. She took to wearing severe-looking garments and talking like a profiteer. The worse her heartache and the damper her pillow in the morning, the more she talked and the more severe she grew. Her parents led a rather terrible life. They had always been somewhat in awe of Janie, single; now that she was come home in her new state, she was truly terrible. They had not an inkling of the quaking heart within the firmly girded breast.

It took John T. two months to gain admission to the rather important place Janie had made for herself in her father's importing house. He had, finally, to see her by appointment.

It was an ordeal he did not soon forget.

Janie talked to him as his grandmother might have talked, as some remote and distant great-aunt might have talked to a foolish nephew who had foolishly strayed from the safe and beaten way. She didn't talk one bit like his Janie, who had lain, with tumbled curls and love-flushed face, within his cradling arms. He had to focus his vision and pinch himself to make sure this new Janie was also his old Janie, the Janie he loved . . .

" . . . are the paths of righteousness which, alone, bring peace and eventual happiness," Janie was ending up. She had been going it in such a wise for the better part of an hour.

Jack gulped mightily. He had not many resources, had Jack. He was lovable, hut not subtle. If, now, he could only have taken the terribly stern young person and cuddled her and kist her absurd frown away and called her oogly-googly and such like familiar-sounding things, he could have won out. He was, he felt, deprived of his weapons and left defenceless. He could only say, with thinly shredded adequacy, "Janie, I . . . I love you!" Under the stern appraisal of her eyes his own fell and he fidgeted.

"You kist her!" shrieked Janie. "You did! Before my eyes! Kist her! I call to heaven to witness if a falser wretch ever lived or breathed! I call on all the gods! I am wronged! I am a wronged woman!"

"Love, young man," said Janie, "is a science. It should be treated as such. One does not toy with science, lest one toy, inadvertently, with a high explosive. Love, young man, is such an one. Love . . ."

"Oh, Janie," burst forth Jack, "Janie . . . please . . . remember. Janie, that's all I ask of you. Just sit there for five, for ten minutes, and remember. Remember just as hard as ever you can. Our first meeting, Janie, our second, our . . . our third. You do remember our third, dont you, dar . . . er . . . dont you, Janie? We took a walk . . . we . . . we didn't keep on walking . . . you do, Janie, I see it in your face . . . then, that night, you kist the ring I slipped on your hand . . . you were all . . . well, go on, Janie, just for five minutes."

After precisely three and three-quarter minutes Janie had crumpled in her official chair, the crisp attire was flooded with tears and there was none of Janie to be seen at all. She was completely engulfed by John.

An hour after that she had severed her business connections, dispensed with home and mother and was busily rehabilitating herself in her husband's home.

There was, of course, a third honeymoon. There would have had to be. They had become a man and a woman of sorrows. They conducted themselves as such. It was tinged with melancholy, this third honeymoon. There was much talk of the frailty of human nature and, on Janie's part at least, very much talk indeed of the consummate greatness of a woman's enduring and all-forgiving love.

Still, Jack knew, it had been a capitulation on Janie's part. He was only human. He began to give himself airs and, as it were, to look about him. He began to believe that he was, after all Janie's taunts and threats, the master in his own domain. Twice now, with just a little coaxing, Janie had crept back into the fold. She probably always would.

Jack began to strut about. He felt more like other men. His wife, so he attitudinized, was only a woman . . . tish, tosh!

He attitudinized in such a manner for six weeks. One day, presto, change! he found himself a bachelor again. He had a habit of so doing. His Janie was gone off. This time she did not do so temperate a thing as to make it home and mother. She went off, vaguely, but she might, from her sinister notes, have gone 'most anywhere.

Jack had the most hideous nightmares. Now, at last, he had gone and done it. This—this was beyond expectation! He thought of his Janie in all sorts of terrible situations, almost always with a blond man with a Greek-god torso and melting eyes. He had done it this time!

He took to wearing flowing ties and affecting a tragic air. He wrote to the general delivery address Janie had left him the most impassioned, the most desperate, the most suicidal notes. He soared as neither Janie nor he had ever supposed he could soar before. He even quoted poetry and finally got so had that he composed some. He took to playing the piano and hinted at the harp. At this, Janie came home.

Of course, a fourth honeymoon ensued.

On this occasion Jack adopted the attitude, or felt it—who knows—of the desperate lover. He languished at his lady's feet and mooned into her eyes. They talked of their past and of the more than earthly thing their love had become, that it should lead them, as it did, thru the still waters and the dark valleys unto, as always, each other's arms . . .

They impressed upon each other the fact that this was the ultimate reconciliation, inasmuch as only those who had been thru the fires of the crucible of love could really know its deepest meaning. They pledged each other thru the medium of beautiful, fervently sounding phrases, prodigally borrowed for the occasion from the "six best sellers" of the day. They outdid each other; capped each other's highest-flown phrases without even the faintest semblance of a blush.

"Love like ours," chanted Jack, cured and cowed, "has never been . . ."

Janie nodded, solemnly. "Love like ours," she repeated, fixing him with her eyes, "has never been . . ."

It took John T. two months to gain admission to see Janie. He had, finally, to see her by appointment. It was an ordeal he did not soon forget. Janie talked to him as his grandmother might have talked, as some remote and distant great-aunt might have talked to a foolish nephew

"It all depends upon the husband," laughed Miss Bennett, when I spoke of this. "You see, Fred happened to be the right one and I happened to know it before I said 'yes!'"

"Oh, no; it depends upon the wife," gaily challenged Mr. Niblo, smiling at her. "So I refused to accept Enid's 'no,' and she had to say 'yes!'"

"Seriously, it depends upon both husband and wife," went on Miss Bennett, looking like a little girl as she curled up in the corner of the big davenport. "No one's life is complete without love, and marriage should so enrich one's nature that a new dramatic power and a deeper sympathy would be developed thru great happiness. Fred and I share both our work and our play; in fact, we have an absolute understanding and, after all, that is the only basis for a happy marriage, whether there is a career or not."

We were sitting in the drawing-room of the Niblos' beautiful home, situated on a palm-shaded avenue in picturesque Beverly Hills, which lies midway between the ocean and Los Angeles. It is here they are found whenever the duties at the Ince studio will permit, for they have successfully incorporated

THE popular little screen star, Enid Bennett, and her director husband, Fred Niblo, have solved the great problem of how to combine careers and marriage, making a success of both.

In this day of unrest and confusion it is a joy to find a couple so thoroly congenial and happy in each other as are the Niblos. Their tastes and ambitions are essentially the same, while both seem endowed with a definite optimism that keeps their lives moving along peaceful paths. In their quiet, wholesome married life there is nothing of the theatrical or ultra-pretentious, only an atmosphere of good fellowship, of ideal companionship.

their own artistic and hospitable ideas, and it is a real home where they spend their leisure in resting, studying and entertaining their friends.

As she talked, I found myself watching the little star's expressive face, with its delicate coloring, deep blue eyes and lovely blonde hair. She suggests a refined womanliness which gives her a distinct charm.

"I came from a great big country, but a wee little town, for I was born in York, Western Australia," said Miss Bennett, a little later, over tea and cinnamon toast. "Rather a coincidence that Fred was born in York, too, but York, Nebraska, U. S. A., and, much to our chagrin, both Yorks are so small that they are absolutely unknown.

"I went on the stage as soon as I finished school, and I'm sure that I played in every town and hamlet in our country.

Among my first important rôles was Modesty in the big production of 'Everywoman,' over there. Mr. Niblo came to Australia, presenting a repertoire of American comedies, and for three years I played in his company. Later,

I realized that the opportunities at home were limited, so I made a bold dash for the front and came to the United States. I am glad I came, for happiness and success have reached me here." And the blue eyes smiled into the glowing fire.

"My first engagement was most fortunate, for I was with Otis Skinner in 'Cock o' the Walk' for a whole year. He is wonderful, and every one in his company receives their full worth!"

While appearing with Mr. Skinner, Thomas Ince met Miss Bennett and, seeing her possibilities, he engaged her to play in his pictures, with such success that she is now one of this producer's brightest stars.

Then, two years ago, after a romantic courtship, Fred Niblo came West to marry Miss Bennett and found her in the middle of a picture. While waiting for its completion, Mr. Ince Gertrude, became a stage child almost before he could lisp. In 1906, he was a stock actor at the Liberty Stock, in Oakland, California, where he played prattling little girls and stage infants in long clothes, a thing he hated.

To be truly appreciated, Antrim Short should be heard. He is inimitably droll, a born mimic and farceur, quick as a flash at repartee, with a mobile mouth.

"Some one said, Aha, the kid is clever—let us take him to New York that he may be appreciated!" So mother packed the family jewels, meaning Gertie and me, into a tourist car and came to the city of big happenings and miserable failures.

"I had some seasons with Tom Jefferson—regular tank shows. What I don't know about ten, twent', thirt' houses isn't worth chronicling," continued

REAL consciousness and acting were simultaneous with Antrim Short. In fact, his mother says he was born acting.

Antrim was always up to tricks. When his name is mentioned nowadays in cinema circles, people begin to smile and tell you that he is "the cutest kid in the game, a sure comer!" He is as full of life and boyish nonsense as if he still were a schoolboy—and fearless? Whew! About the first story I heard of him was the way he frightened the folks at Metro studio by swooping around in his airship, shooting sparrows and linnets off the telegraph wires in front of the new administration buildings.

Being a generous soul, Antrim Short invited some of the clerical force up for a ride, but, with one accord, they pleaded "important business," and one timid individual said his life insurance policy had not yet arrived from New York.

This chat really should be Short and Sweet, for Antrim is first cousin to Blanche Sweet and has appeared with her frequently on stage and screen. His present release with Miss Sweet is in "Fighting Cressy" and, having watched his clever work during the "shooting," I looked with a pleasurable thrill for the first showing.

What he hasn't essayed in his young life! As I said, he was born acting and, with sister water scenes, which were very thrilling. I was in 'Salvation Nell' with Minnie Maddern Fiske, being three seasons on the road with her. Gertrude went over to Mary Manning, and mother traveled with her, while father held the slipper over me as our paths separated. Fond parent act, and all that, you see.

"Then the idea of pictures struck us very hard. They were doing camera-phone photoplays then, and during a summer season I worked in two 'talkies.' That was before David Griffith began to show the possibilities of the screen.

"The Biograph followed, because Blanche Sweet, who's my first cousin, was with Griffith. I had two months of the movies, then we moved to San Antonio, Texas, and——"

"You must have seen a lot of our country at a very early age," we interrupted, rudely.

"Yep, followed old motto—see America first—one hundred per cent. stuff, youthful patriotism and so on," laughed Antrim, gaily. Then, continuing modestly, "But there's a deal I've not yet seen. Any-way, where was I? Oh, yes, in San Antonio. Let's see—why"—registering great surprise and delight at a brilliant discovery—

Antrim Short, despite his youth, has had worlds of cinema experience, principally with Metro and Universal. He's something of a crack aviator on the side, making flights three times a week. At the left is a glimpse of Mr. Short in "Please Get Married" with Viola Dana

"that will be eighteen years the eighteenth day of this month. Watch your step, Shorty; you're growing ancient."

Such sunshiny blue eyes as he has! It's no wonder they look for his hide-and-go-seek smiles. There is an attraction about this unspoiled, wholesome American boy, born of his broadminded outlook, which gets over on the screen every time.

"At last I came to California with the Biograph, Wilfred Lucas directing. Then back to the New York Biograph I returned to Mr. Morosco's stock, playing at the old Belasco, Los Angeles, and Gertrude had a similar engagement. Later she played at the Alcazar in Frisco. I was cast in 'Mother' with Emma Dunn, with whom I'm now doing 'Old Lady Thirty-One'—it's great to renew old friendships. Helen Leslie had me playing opposite her, and I also did the juvenile in 'The Littlest Rebel' for months and months.

"When the Biograph returned West, I worked with them two years, then left to free-lance, as they were going to New York."

For the Soul of Raphael

Told in story form from the Clara Kimball Young Photoplay

By DOROTHY DONNELL

THE Arteagas had land and gold and jewels, great ranches sweeping to the far foot-hills, money to buy drink and velvet jackets and jewels wherewith to adorn their proud ladies so that they flashed in a multicolored and cold flame. The last of the Arteagas had today won a jewel, more precious than emeralds and diamonds.

Marta Estevan, slim and white as one of the candles she had burned before the Virgin's shrine, sat in the great chamber while the maids arrayed her for her marriage with Raphael Arteaga, the bridegroom whom she had seen once only, and then red-eyed, purple of face, reeking of the wine he had drunk in honor of his convent bride whom his mother was bringing from the Sisters of the Holy Heartbreak that afternoon.

"Yesterday," Marta murmured, wonderingly, "how strange! I have lived a long time since then." She thought of her shrinking disgust at the vinous kisses of her affianced, of old Doña Luisa's burst of anger at the sight of the slim golden slipper under the refectory table, and then the terrible sequel.

Marta shuddered so that one of the girls who sat twisting the veil of the Arteagas above her soft, straight, high-piled hair felt the movement and crossed herself. Mary pity a bride who shudders upon her wedding day! Yet, per Dios, she did not wonder that the poor white lamb feared that black wolf, Raphael. She could tell her tales—

But Marta was not thinking of Raphael. Instead, her brain kept repeating over and over the words that she had whispered after Doña Luisa's stiffening lips in that room of death where the red light of the sunset lay like an angry stain across the counterpane but could not tinge that cold grey face with its glow. "I swear by the Holy Cross and the Sufferings of Our Lord to stand guard over the soul of Raphael while he lives!" A cold wind, with the dank odor of open graves, seemed to blow across her, tho the room was stifling with the odor of roses and lilies, and again she shuddered.

"See, the bride is ready!" the Mexican girls cried, fluttering away like a flock of gaudy parakeets, to admire their work, "but," they whispered, "she is pale—pale as a corpse! Perhaps, who knows, her heart is dead for another—"

Raphael, handsome as a great, black, full-blooded animal, gaudily arrayed in a suit of wine-colored velvet and wearing a huge ring on one finger that flashed with a hard light in the sun, strode up and down the colonnade of his ranch-house, awaiting his bride. A gratified smile twisted one red lip-corner, despite the fact that his mother lay in state within the darkened room in which he had been born. She was dead, but one must die when one is old, of a certainty—when one is young—ah! One lives! Lives hard, hotly—drinking deep of the wine of pleasure.

The smile grew broader. He was remembering Marta, the convent girl who had stepped from the cloisters into his arms, untaught of the meaning of life or of love—a flower unpicked, almost unseen. "Dios!" swore Raphael, licking his curving, glossy lips, "my mother was right. The Arteagas should choose women who have never been handled when they come to wed. The others—they are well enough for loving, but one wants to be sure of one's wife. And Marta has never even seen another man . . ."

Convent walls are high, convent walls are thick, but no walls have ever been built that can keep the eyes of a maid from those of a man. In her girl soul, on an altar among her saints, Marta had enshrined a face with blue eyes like the sky when the sun shines and skin as fair as the waxen faces of the images in the chapel. There had been only one moment for her to remember, a single flash of wonder in two meeting glances, a something that seemed to spring up laughing in her soul. But since

From the noisy merriment of the wedding breakfast, Marta slipped away presently with a sense of escape. Almost without knowing what she did she stepped through the low windows to the balcony; ran along it to the steep stone stairs and then down

Her voice broke, "Today he marries a great lady like himself, and—and if I had not the wee one to care for I should want to die. Oh, Raphael—Raphael mio—" then Marta had known what life could be.

The wedding-bells rang across the hacienda with a brassy sound, as tho they sang of the joy that would be hers with false tongues. She walked among the flowers and the faces, trembling thru all her small, slender frame, with look downcast and cold hands that were displeasing to the man who clasped them at the altar. He liked women with life in them, blood in their veins; women who could laugh loudly and swear a bit. This girl was strangely aloof. She made him feel too large, too clumsy. She reminded him of the chilly saints with their disdainful lips in the sacristy. Even before Marta had worn the name of Arteaga an hour her bridegroom was already looking at another woman, a tall, ripe, blonde thing—a tourist spending the summer in town who had come to the wedding from bold curiosity and who stayed to smile with eyes that held hot blue flames into the eyes of the handsome savage who had married the little grey nun.

From the noisy merriment of the wedding breakfast—the dead woman listening rigidly in that darkened chamber upstairs—Marta slipped away presently with a sense of escape; laid off her sheer gown and the lace veil, light as gossamer, that seemed so heavy a weight on her head. For a time she brooded alone, gazing down into the hot sunshine of the gardens where the roses, steeped in the glare, swung like great censers, flinging off rich incense. Then, hearing an uncertain footstep on the stairs, she sprang to her feet with a sudden sense of suffocation—her husband—Raphael—

Almost without knowing what she did, she stepped thru the low windows to the balcony, ran along it to the steep stone stairs at the end and down. Then crouching in the shadows, the bride of an hour waited until her husband's wine-thickened voice had ceased to call her name. Along the gallery came other footsteps, light ones but dragging. Marta moved from her retreat and came face to face with an Indian girl, almost a child in years, whose slender body was bent sidewise under the weight of the heavy baby she carried on her hip.

There were tears rolling slowly down the olive cheeks, dripping on the stolid little face below, and as Marta looked the girl leaned heavily against the pillar and gave way to a low wailing in her own tongue.

"Is there anything I can do?" she asked her, gently. "You seem unhappy, suffering—"

"No, señorita," the girl answered humbly. She spoke the liquid Spanish gutturally but understandably. "No one can do anything for my baby or for me. Its father"—and she touched the tiny face with tender fingertips—"great gentleman. He love me once. Now he ride by and does not see me in the dust of his horse's feet. Today"—her voice broke—"today he marries a great lady like himself, and—and—if I had not the wee one to care for I should want to die. Oh, Raphael—Raphael mio—"

"Raphael!" Raphael's bride spoke the name in a voice that seemed very far away. She turned, held out her hands and sank to the stone pavement, a crumpled little figure amid the ruins of her life. They lifted her, carried her to her chamber and presently she opened her eyes and shuddered at the sight of the dark face bending over hers.

"Go away!" she begged him; "go away! I would I lay yonder dead beside your mother before I had made that cruel pledge. The Indian girl is your real wife—for she has borne you a child—"

Raphael laughed, with great, square white teeth. "Pah!" he spat. "If life—that carrion wife to an Arteaga! You are insane, or a fool! Come, get control of yourself and come down to my guests."

Marta rose from her pillows. Her skin had the transparent look of a lily that has been broken. Her eyes were great dark bruises under the tumbled wealth of her hair. "Raphael Arteaga," she said quietly, "I have sworn an oath that your mother's soul carried up to God with her to guard you soul while you lived. I shall keep that pledge, but I call on God to witness that if you try to force me to be your wife, as that Indian girl was your wife, I will kill myself with the dagger that all the convent girls wear always here—" and she struck at her bosom with clenched hand.

In that moment, Raphael, bully and braggart that he was, felt the cold touch of fear on his coward soul and turned away and left the bride whom he would not own now or hereafter. But the golden-haired Americano was waiting below-stairs, with the other guests, and there was plenty of wine, and so he quite forgot his grievance—for the while.

And all the night after her wedding Marta knelt with the moonlight bathing her feverish face like cold, clear water, and prayed to the Virgin that she would teach her how to use her broken life and give her the courage to forget the leaping light in two sunny blue eyes.

The days thereafter were blurred, long, aimless stretches of sunshing that made the eyeballs ache, interrupted by velvety black nights, smothering the flat ranchlands with sooty shadows. Marta gradually, because she was young and strong and hopeful, even tho she thought that hope was forever gone, came to accept her life, even to begin to fill it with little, gentle, useless tasks. She gathered the roses in the garden, wove garlands of paler blooms for the chapel and embroidered altar cloths with tiny, invisible stitches, to send to the convent in Mexico from which she had come.

Raphael did not trouble her. He was sullen in his manner toward her, sneered at her tasks—but he did not claim any of the rights she had denied him. On her part, Marta made conscientious efforts to fulfill her pledge to the dead woman who had adopted her when she was a child and placed her in the convent to be reared for her son.

She saw to it that the table was spread with the food he liked, that his silver spurs were always polished until they struck out sparks and that he drank no more wine than she could help. She prayed for him, too, in the long, wakeful hours of the night, that the good saints would touch his soul and that he might be saved from the fires of hell. Of the other, whose face was as an image with a candle burning before it, she tried not to think, yet thought often, wondering where he might be now and whether he ever remembered her.

And then one strange day, that ever afterward remained a sacred one in her calendar of life, Marta Arteaga looked out of the window of the house of a friend in the village, straight into the eyes she had seen once only, yet had seen so many times in dreams. Ana Mendez, her hostess, hearing her stifled exclamation, came to her side and waved her hand.

And all the night after her wedding, Marta knelt with the moonlight bathing her feverish face like cold, clear water and prayed to the Virgin that she would teach her how to use her broken life

"Señor Keith Bryton, an Americano!" she exclaimed. "He is a friend of my husband. He is in Southern California buying mules for the army. Is he not handsome, think you, Marta? With his skin so white as milk and his eyes—"

But Marta heard no more. Both her small hands had crept to her breast, pressing close as tho to prevent some secret thing from escaping. Her face was the waxen white of the magnolia blooms beside it, but then a tinge of rose wakened it to life. For the man who stood in the plaza outside had moved toward them and Ana had hurried to admit him to the room. And now he stood before her, and his hand, big and firm and warm, held hers an instant in formal greeting. She lifted her glance to his, and their eyes met, steadily, as those of friends.

"At last," Keith Bryton said, with a slow breath. "I have waited long for this, Little Nun."

She had a vision of their first and only meeting, she a big-eyed, grey-clad girl looking thru the open gate of the convent wondering at the unfamiliar world, at this tall, straight figure striding along the pavement as tho he owned the world. Then when he came opposite her he had stopped, as if she had called him, and looked at her, long—long—until old Sister Margaret had come up behind and snatched her in and swung the gate to, shutting him outside. She had had to do hard penance for her sin, but she had forgotten the penance and only remembered the wonder of the sin.

"I, too," Marta answered him now. "I have often prayed for you, señor, and prayed that the good God would let me see you again some day."

He laughed, a big, healthy sound. "Some day is here, Marta," he cried, "and so am I and you."

But she had drawn away, suddenly trembling. "I had forgotten," Marta whispered desolately, "I am married. I have taken a vow up to God," and for the first time since her darkened wedding day the slow, hopeless tears rolled down her cheeks. And, with a frightened movement like some wild thing, she turned and ran from the room. But deeper than the tears was the sound of singing, for she knew that she would see him again.

The next time was at the church. Marta, with Raphael beside her, felt his gaze before she dared look for him, but when at length she raised her dark, frightened eyes from her rosary, her heart leaped until she felt that her husband must be aware of its tumult. This time there was no chance for words, yet she went back to the hacienda with the sense of having listened to mad love-making. And that night she prayed to the Virgin that she might never see Keith again and that she might remember always her promise to Doña Luisa and to God.

The next morning she stood, waist deep in June, the great waving heads of the roses in the garden tossing their petals over her dark, uncovered hair, when Keith Bryton strode thru the wicket.

"I have come, Little Nun, to say good-by," he told her, standing before her in the sunshine that dazzled her eyes as she lifted them to his face; "I dont dare to stay any longer. It's too hard to be near you and still so far away. From the moment I saw you in the convent gate I've loved you, but I couldn't touch you then, and"—his great hands clenched—"I cant touch you now."

Marta looked up at him, then down at the crimson rose by her hand. As long as she lived, the scent of red roses was to make her faint and dizzy as she was then. "She was an old woman, and she was dying," she said, as tho pleading an excuse; "she had been good to me . . ." The words caught raggedly on a sob. She looked up at him again, piteously. "You say—you love me. Then promise you will think of me every evening when the first star shines, and I will try to go on living. But if I thought you would forget—I should pray the Virgin to take me to Her, for I, too—I, too—"

"God bless you and keep you, Little Nun!" the man said hoarsely, and suddenly the roses blurred in the wind of his going and fell in a shower of bloody petals at her feet, and the world was empty and the saints had turned their faces away.

Across the fields Marta saw a flock of black that was Raphael and a flock of blue that was the habit of the Americano with golden hair, but they meant nothing to her mind, numb with its grief. They were very close together, these flecks, but Marta did not notice. He was gone. He was gone—

That night, as she was brushing her dark, thick hair, the door was flung suddenly open and her husband stood swaying on the threshold, his eyes, glazed with wine, resting covetously on her uncovered arms and neck. "Damn it!" cried Raphael, "I've a right here—don't look so astonished! I married you, didn't I? And I'll be put off no longer with your pious talk." He lurched toward her, smiling thru glistening lips. "You're—you're devil-ish pretty, Marta. Did you know it? C'mon, give 's a kiss! What! You hell-cat!"

He leaped backward as something flashed in her upraised hand. Her eyes, too, glittered with the hard light of the steel. "Keep away," warned Marta, in a low, tense voice. "I swore to your mother to marry you, but I didn't swear—anything more. And if you come nearer I'll kill you as certainly as I stand here hating you!"

They faced each other in silence, and again, as once before, the man's spirit yielded to hers. He laughed spitefully. "Have your own way! After all, why should I care! There are others who aren't quite so—particular—"

The next day Keith Bryton was brought, wounded well-nigh unto death, into the hacienda. A party of vaqueros had found him lying beneath his dead horse on the mountain trail, stripped even to the silver mounting of his harness by brigands. "He will die," mumbled the old physician, hending over the splendid chest of the wounded man to count the slow heart-beats; "nothing can save him."

"He will live!" Señora Arteaga flamed. "One thing can save him." But she did not say that that one thing was love. In the days of terror that followed she seemed to keep Death at a distance with the bare strength of her beating hands. She literally fought for the life that was dearer to her than her own life. It was as tho she re-created him, until, one day in the late summer, he opened sane eyes on a room filled with the clear wine of sunset, with a woman's face—or was it an angel's?—bending over him. "Marta," he whispered, "beloved—"

But she was gone. And tho he begged the old Mexican nurse who took her place for her, she came no more. The strain of the last weeks had almost sapped her. She was hardly able to walk in the garden, or even to make her daily pilgrimage to lay fresh blooms before the image of the Holy Mother in the chapel. But every evening when the first star twinkled out of the dark blue overhead, she closed her eyes and said a little prayer for the man who was creeping back to life in the great ranch-house.

On a night of late August, sultry, throbbing with stars, she stood in the decaying garden and heard the voice of her husband beyond the wall, speaking passionately. "Your golden hair—a man could drown in it, cara mia! Have mercy!

Tell me when you will go with me—"

And then, cold as ice, a woman's reply. "When you bring me the jewels you have promised, Raphael—the jewels of your house."

"Now! Within the moment!" the man cried hoarsely. "They are in her room, but I will get them if I have to draw the necklace around her throat and strangle her! Wait here! I'm mad for you, Anita—mad enough to wade thru blood to seize you in my arms!"

The Climax

Evidently the possibilities of the contest have reached, in many and various ways, the ears of the entire feminine contingent of the country, for there seems to be no village or county in all the land which hasn't been heard from. A peculiar fact attracts our attention—photographs of the prettiest girls frequently come from the most obscure places. More than once we are reminded of the poet's saying that "many a flower is born to blush unseen, and waste its sweetness on the desert air." This, of course, is the primary object of the contest. To give an opportunity to a girl who, shut away from the world and all that it offers, would otherwise have no chance at all ever to get away from her narrow enclosure. To offer to this girl, if she is one of the winners, every means by which she will arrive at the goal of success.

And not only have the contestants responded from every village and county thruout the country, but we have received pictures from our readers who desire to enter the contest from many foreign countries. This is, perhaps, what is the most interesting factor of the contest. The variety of types of beauty and charm is overwhelming. And not only is it the young girl who dreams about the glory of stardom, but there has been a number of entries from men and women beyond their first youth who desire to try their fortune and who feel that they may make good in the cinema world. This shows the increasing importance that is being attached to the cinema by old and young alike.

We are quite flattered with the results of the contest so far. As you doubtless know, the winners of the contest and also the members of the honor roll took part in a two-reel feature which was aptly named "A Dream of Fair Women," and which proved so successful a film that the Fine Arts Pictures, Inc., of 130 West 46th Street, New York City, has distributed it thruout the entire country. Encouraged by the success of this feature, we have decided to produce a five-reel drama.

THE judges' committee will sit on July 1st and 2nd between the hours of ten and four at 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., to interview personally all contestants who can make it convenient to appear at this time.

Tests will be taken before the motion picture camera at Roslyn, L. I., N. Y., on the following Saturday, Sunday and Monday of all those contestants who seem qualified to be chosen for the final honor roll.

We have now arrived at the most exciting part of the Fame and Fortune Contest being held under the auspices of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND. The climax is, of course, the most interesting and thrilling part of the play, and the audience always thrills to the rising of the curtain on the third act. We have reached the big moments in the contest. Entries are growing more and more excited, (as is shown by the number of photographs submitted, anxious letters pouring into the office, wires, etc.). Indeed, the photographs have doubled in number and flood the office daily.

"Love's Redemption" is the title of the five-reel feature play that is being produced by us, which will include many of the contestants of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest. Blanche McGarity, winner of last year's contest, has been chosen to play the leading part of Peggy. Dorian Romero has been selected as the "heavy," and he has a big and strong part to play. Edward Chalmers, Alfred L. Rigali, Mrs. Mayer, Bunty Manly, Erminie Gagnon and Johanna Huschle have also been assigned parts. Among the distinguished men who will probably take part in the play are Edwin Markham, the great poet; Hudson Maxim, famous inventor; and Judge Frederick E. Crane of the Court of Appeals of New York State. Most of the scenes will be filmed in and around the Brewster place at Roslyn, L. I., and the taking will be continued well into September. Each issue of every one of our several publications will hereafter contain interesting news of the progress of the play.

The judges of the contest will be Mary Pickford, Mme. Olga Petrova, Howard Chandler Christy, Thomas Ince, J. Stuart Blackton, Maurice Tourneur, Samuel Lumiere, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, David Belasco, Blanche Bates and Eugene V. Brewster.

We have the privilege to announce the seventh honor roll winners of the Fame and Fortune Contest:

Martha Carleton Baker, 571 West 139th Street, New York City, has never had any professional experience. She has blue-grey eyes and brown hair. Her complexion is fair.

Another Manhattan beauty is Helen M. Bates of 430 West 119th Street. Miss Bates has appeared in amateur theatricals and is very unusual in appearance. She has blue eyes and dark-brown hair and a very fair complexion.

From 2751 W. Lafayette Avenue, Baltimore, Md., comes a picture of Nan E. MacAllister, who has played minor rôles on the screen. She is an English girl and has dark-brown eyes and hair, while her complexion is olive.

Pauline Anderson of 561 W. 141st Street, New York City, has blue eyes and dark-brown hair and fair complexion. She played a small rôle on the stage last season.

Margaret Peggy Ford, 312 C Street, N. W., Washington, D. C., has a fair complexion, blue eyes and dark-brown hair. Miss Ford has played small rôles on the dramatic stage.

From P. O. Box 1428, New Orleans, La., comes a beautiful photograph of Lady Gay Carrara. This Dixie beauty has been playing a small rôle with the New Orleans French Opera Co. for two months. It is a well-known fact that New Orleans has many beautiful girls—Lady Gay Carrara proves this with her hazel eyes, dark-brown hair and fair complexion.

No one who saw Rex Beach's "The Girl from Outside" could forget "the Curly Kid."

All the way thru the picture you felt Cullen Landis' sincerity, a sincerity that seemed to come out of the screen and grip you. "Why," you thought, "this kid is real; there is no pretense here." And when he stood, frightened and miserable, by the bedside of the sick girl, he made you realize his misery as keenly as tho he were there in person in the place of his shadow.

He was, it seemed, Youth incarnate; impulsive, reckless and on fire with enthusiasm at every new discovery. And this is exactly the impression you get when you meet Cullen Landis in person. He is splendidly, boyishly alive to everything that is romantic in life.

There are people who believe that all day-dreaming is a waste of time. And then there are others who will tell you that all thoughts have an existence of their own, with power to help or harm their creator. That your success depends on your outlook on life and on the way you think more than on anything else. It is on this philosophy that Cullen Landis is molding his life.

"I have always had big dreams," he said; "even when I was property man I used to imagine my name in electric lights above the door of a theater." And now, at twenty-four, his dream seems well on the way to fulfillment. He is under a five-year contract with Goldwyn.

I saw him at the studio on a cold, rainy afternoon in late winter. We sat in one of the little upstairs office rooms. The son, a much-loved character actor). Uncle Ed taught me how to be patient.

"I first met Uncle Ed at the Balboa studio in Long Beach. I was doing a little of everything then, driving a bus, running errands and minding the switchboard. He had lost a boy of about my age, and I suppose that is why he took an interest in me. I used to lose my patience with practically no provocation at all."

Cullen Landis is the romantic type of Irishman. His skin is pale, his eyes a deep blue and his hair black and wavy. He talks in a direct, matter-of-fact way, with just a slight edge to his voice to tell of his natural restlessness. He doesn't like cities. You would notice that his few gestures are always large ones and that they are upward and outward, away from himself.

When I saw him he had just returned to Los Angeles from his first visit to New York, which he made in company with his director, Victor Schertzinger, and Mrs. Schertzinger.

"I had a good time," he said, "but I didn't like New York, really. I like to have lots of room."

He lives in Long Beach, about twenty miles from Los Angeles. James Cullen

Cullen Landis is a young Irishman—and, with all his hard struggle—a dreamer of dreams. "My day dreams have helped me," he says, "and they are helping me every day"

Landis, to give him his full name, was born in Nashville, Tenn., in 1895. There it was that he got his first job. It was as a milkman, and he only kept it for a very short time. After that he bought a newspaper route and rose promptly at three o'clock every morning so that subscribers to The Nashville American would have no reason to complain of their service. He was so successful that he soon rose to the dignity of a regular position in the circulation department. He gave that up when, at the age of sixteen, he came to California.

"My first job here," he said, "was driving a sightseeing bus, so I am quite fitted to point out the beauties of Los Angeles to admiring friends." And then he began doing a little bit of everything at the Balboa studio in Long Beach.

No one can say that he didn't begin his career in moving pictures on the first rung of the ladder, or that he missed any rungs going up, even tho he is climbing so rapidly.

He was a property man, an assistant director, an assistant camera-man and, with it all, a "stunt" actor, but the type of stunt actor who never gets any credit. He was, in other words, a double for stars where the scenario required them to do a stunt so risky that the company

Next month Mr. Smith will review the entire screen year, selecting the twenty leading photoplays of the twelve months and discussing in detail the progress—or lack of progress—of all the leading players and producing units. This annual review has been a CLASSIC feature for three years and is of unusual value as a record of cinema achievement.)

WE have long intended commenting at length upon Charles Ray and his unquestioned genius of the silversheet. Yet there is something so matter-of-fact, so every-day, so humbly devoid of the spectacular about Ray that each month we express our brief appreciation—and pass on.

Ray is deserving of much more. You and I have come to look upon his bashful, awkward, small-town boys as regular incidents of photoplay releases. Yet they are far more. Ray takes the most colorless sort of rôle and galvanizes it into life. There is nothing of the theater or studio about him. He is small-town youth—the sort of youth upon which America depends. He is a master player because he is able to reflect this so humorously, so tenderly, so sincerely.

We know the customary phrase: "He is just playing himself." In answer, we say that Ray is the greatest of all artists, a player who projects himself into a rôle minus all the histrionic trappings and gildings of the actor. Great artists are the simplest. Witness Mary Pickford. Or Charlie Chaplin. Or Ray.

Ray is a genre player of genius. He is typically American. No mere heroic manikins are his screen creations. He turns the characters inside out and shows you the affectations, the weaknesses, the boyish foibles, the very thoughts of his creations, along with the outer shell.

Consider Ray's latest vehicle, "Paris Green," (Paramount). Here he plays a country boy, just back from France and out of khaki, who finds that his sweetheart at home has not waited for him. Just when life seems greyest, along comes a little French girl he met during his forty-five minutes in Paris and to whom he gave his address "in case she ever needs it." With the aid of a French dictionary the boy finds the happiness he seeks.

A creaking skeleton of a story it is. But Ray makes you believe in it. If there is anything more human in recent pictures than his homecoming to the old homestead, we want to see it. Bert Woodruff makes the father stand out, altho he exaggerates the rôle, while Gertrude Claire is effective as the boy's mother.

One other production of the month strongly impressed us. This was "Humoresque," (Paramount), a visualization of Fannie Hurst's short story of a little Jewish boy who finds wealth and acclaim thru his genius in music, who gives up everything to go to France in the uniform of the land his parents adopted, and who returns with one arm crippled. In the end he recovers and his ability to play upon the public's heartstrings via his violin returns. Miss Hurst writes with an unusual understanding of East Side life and the story offers innumerable opportunities for fine naturalistic direction.

Frank Borzage's handling of the theme is unusual enough to make his future work of vivid interest to students of the photoplay. Here is another forerunner of the slice-of-life silent play of tomorrow. True, this striving for human detail becomes apparent here and there thru "Humoresque" and the play drags seriously at times. But, on the whole, it is far and away ahead of the average shallow melodramatic film drama.

The cutting of "Humoresque" is puzzling at times. For instance, there seems to be a deliberate effort to keep the featured player, Alma Rubens, in the background. As the young violinist's sweetheart she should have been a vital link in the story. Here she is a mere inanimate lay figure. A character player, Vera Gordon, who contributes a singularly fine and well-rounded portrayal of the Jewish mother, walks away with the honors of "Humoresque." No mere silversheet shadow is this touching presentation of the immigrant woman whose son, by one of those odd freaks of genius, lifts her from a tenement room and a fire-escape landscape to Riverside Drive and limousines, but who never once loses her primitive balance, her store of mother-love, her unswerving faith. Dore Davidson, too, is excellent as the father. Gaston Glass is quite adequate as the boy.

David Graham Phillips always wrote vigorously. But his "The Cost" is too scattered a tale for a strong film story, unless handled from a more naturalistic view-point than Director Harley Knoles produced it. Herein a young girl overrides the hopes of her parents and marries a young rounder. She soon discovers the downright moral worthlessness of the man and that she really loves another. But she drifts thru years of disillusionment and pain until the death of her husband opens the way to a belated sort of middle-aged happiness. There is really no climax, for Mr. Phillips' characters are very human in their drifting.

Violet Heming is fairly sympathetic as the girl, while Ralph Kellard is actory as her unfortunate selection. "The Cost" is one of those photoplays in which the characters never really age, altho years dash by in the subtitles.

Somehow or other we find ourselves unable to take the very heroic heroics of William S. Hart very seriously. Somehow his de luxe dime novels never impress us as being a significant contribution to either life or literature. "The Toll Gate," (Paramount), is an instance in point. "The Toll Gate" presents Hart as another kindly bad man, Black Deering, who once again encounters regeneration and a cutie at one and the same time. In this opus, Black Deering foregoes the ingénué and rides away alone thru the mountain "toll gate." Hart is himself as the good bad man and Anna Q. Nilsson is an attractive figure as the heroine.

We confess dire disappointment in Marshall Neilan's feature comedy, "Dont Ever Marry," (First National). For Neilan has a fresh Irish sense of humor. In "Dont Ever Marry" he has taken a slender farce idea and tried to develop it into feature length. The result: a tiresome hour and a quarter with only occasional flashes of laughter. It concerns the efforts of a young boards in a play to be staged exclusively for the purpose of letting Broadway theatergoers hear his voice. Lytell has actually wanted to go back to the "legit" for some time. In fact, after each picture he'd say he was thru with films—temporarily—and that he wanted a chance to hear his own voice again en scene. But now, having finished "The Temple of Dawn," he has left for New York to make one more picture before the fatal appearance per se.

And even that champion little child-wife of the screen, Mildred Harris Chaplin, left the camera, very temporarily, however, for the speaking stage. She made her debut here at the Little Theater in a very intricate farce, "Sick-a-Bed," and, even tho she looked beautiful in her stage dresses, her voice was not quite powerful enough. The première fling at spoken dramatics, however, has put the bug into Mrs. Chaplin's ear; she says she'd really like to consider the stage seriously. And, who knows? She's had a very good offer to do so, it seems, but, nevertheless, she's quite busy making a picture which is to be released under the more or less prosaic title of "Old Dad."

The Los Angeles film colony was plunged into sudden sadness on receipt of the news of Clarine Seymour's death. Miss Seymour was one of the best-liked members of cinema-land's younger set. A year ago, before she left for New York with the Griffith players, Miss Seymour was one of the brightest social lights here. Her sparkling personality was in evidence at all of the more exclusive dansants and teas, while her graceful dancing and genial good-fellowship won her a host of admirers. And, by the way, she was one of Eileen Percy's closest friends and, I believe, "stood up" with Eileen at her marriage to the son of Adolphus Busch. When word was received here of her death, a huge portrait of her which stood in the lobby of the Kinema Theater, at which her picture was showing, was draped in crépe and an especially written obituary was flashed on the screen immediately after the announcement of her name on "The Idol Dancer" cast sheet. For Los Angeles was her home, and it was here that she was filmed in the two productions which literally "made" her—"The Girl Who Stayed at Home" and "Scarlet Days."

"CLARINE SEYMOUR died at the Misericordia Hospital, New York, on Sunday evening, April 25, following an illness of only four days."

So spoke the cold, impersonal newspaper columns. Yet in those few lines lay a drama of real life—swift, flashing, tragic—of striving, of success close at hand, of death.

For the screen had no more promising young actress than Miss Seymour. Recall her pathetically brave little jazz girl in David Griffith's "The Girl Who Stayed at Home." Remember her little harum-scarum wife in "True Heart Susie." And her piquant little Mexican girl in "Scarlet Days." But, most of all, her half-caste girl of the tropics—vibrant with the love of life—in "The Idol Dancer." Here Miss Seymour touched a new note—a note that meant quick stardom. She was at work in Mr. Griffith's visualization of "Way Down East" when the fatal ailment—intestinal trouble—asserted itself. An operation was found necessary. For five days she fought a brave fight against impossible odds—and then the end. It is hard now to transcribe even a bit of our last talk with Miss Seymour, which was, indeed, her last interview. For the talk was so full of hope, of gladness, of dreams coming true.

Miss Seymour was born in Brooklyn, altho New Rochelle became her home town. Comparatively close by was the Thanhouser studio. It was inevitable that she should try for screen success. But an opening did not come easily. She went day after day for weeks before she was given a tiny rôle. Heartened by it, Miss Seymour kept on. Small rôles came now and then and finally she was offered a contract with the Rolin Company to play in Toto comedies. Miss Seymour went to the coast, but a disagreement followed soon after. She sued, charging a broken contract, and won her case, altho not until she had played briefly with the

by TRUMAN B. HANDY

Inasmuch as Eva was leaving on the 5:30 train with the Bill Hart company for a location in northern California, the meager details of this interview were gleaned in a hasty and none-too-easily-ridden trip to the studio from the Novak bungalow in Hollywood.

Jane at the wheel of the aforesaid limo, Eva and yours truly in the back seat, Mrs. Novak, the girls' mother, in the front seat with Jane—and all of us permeated with that atmosphere of hurry peculiar to the time previous to boat sailings and the flights from the city of motion picture companies and bank panics.

Eva, as I have hitherto noted, is a blonde—one of those pink-and-white creatures lovers of the aesthetic rave about. Her ever-present smile is contagious, and echoed by the faint, wistful registration of sisterly appreciation as evidenced by sister Jane.

It impressed me that Eva is something of a vamp—one of those harmless kind a mere male simply cant help adoring. I asked her if she thought she was sirenish.

"I dont see why not," she remarked perfunctorily. "Just because you happen to have a taffy thatch isn't any sign that you cant compete with your raven-locked sisters, is it?"

Quite so. Jane admitted it for Eva—and for herself. And she also volunteered the information, in response to my query, that Eva's ambition is not to vamp; that, in fact, her little sister as yet seems to have manifested no particular ambition other than becoming as famous as Mary Pickford.

In Hollywood the pecu-

THIS question of having to live down the reputation of an already famed member of your family is a serious one. In the first place, old ladies inclined to deafness are wont, upon an introduction, to murmur about how much you look like your noted relative and then to give you a dissertation on the various seven cardinal virtues possessed by him.

Or they'll start in to patronize you by saying that so-and-so has done such perfectly splendid things and has a beautiful soul, and that you have the same sort of eyes and therefore have the same beautiful soul and all that. Or else they'll perhaps merely sniff the air, take practically no notice of you at all and insist upon mouthing all the famous doings of the famous one which have already been done.

But Eva Novak, the ever-so-blonde sister of Jane, isn't the sort of person whom doddering old ladies are going to classify as—

"Heh? Jane's sister—oh my, yes!"

Not at all. Eva has a personality quite her own; a vivacity that her demure older sister seems not to affect; a way of burring her "r's" that Jane doesn't have; a liking for athletics and the great out-of-doors, while Jane prefers to stay at home, to sew or to read a book.

Jane likes to go to tea and the theater. Eva doesn't give a whoop about the uplift of the "drammer." She'd rather ride a horse. But—liar ambition of every one of the photo-famous seems to be to "take off,"—weight in some cases and in others aviation. "Taking off," aviatorially speaking, may I explain, means to go up in a plane. Pauline Frederick has "taken off" considerably. So have Mary Pickford and those prime factors of the film colony, the Hayakawas. Eva, however, declares that she knows aviating wouldn't even give her a thrill. She's never figured on buying an aeroplane, nor even considered the matter of Locklearean vol-planing.

Sister Jane, nevertheless, drives the family omnibus. Eva declares that Jane's the better chauffeuse and knows how to fix the darned thing when it's "busted." The omnibus in question is a small limousine, black with yellow wheels. Jane sits at the steering gear like a regular cabby, while Eva rides in state in the back seat.

But, however, her ambitions are in themselves like aviation.

"They go in leaps and bounds," she announced.

"Um-hum," agreed Jane, laconically, "she makes up her mind sometimes that she's a mountaineer. After she's bought a new set of hiking attire, the streak's worn off and I use the stuff in a picture."

"I wouldn't!" exclaimed Eva, vehemently, a little bit ungrammatically, but, nevertheless, vehemently. "I adore the mountains. I'd rather be in the mountains than eat, so there!"

"Once in a while she gets ambitious to fix up the house," added Mrs. Novak. "She sends me out of the kitchen and insists upon cooking all the meals. She knows how to cook if she wants to."

At this juncture our little Eva in true younger-sisterly fashion, registered a protest.

"Jane," she said, "I have to follow you every place, and they say, 'Oh, there's Jane's sister!' It's an awful stigma to be the younger relative of somebody who's well known. I wish I were a boy—no, I don't, either. Boys always have shiny noses and want to fight."

But what is weighing very heavily on the younger Novak mind right now is her attempt to stabilize her memory. She forgets so many things she ought to remember, she declares, that she's simply got to do something.

"We get so used to not remembering that we just forget to remember. The studio writes everything down for us—what we wore in Scene 144 and even how we looked in a close-up. Now, ever since I first started—"

"Which wasn't so long ago," interrupted her sister. Precisely. She was a schoolgirl in St. Louis

The Yellow Typhoon

Told in story form from the Anita Stewart Photoplay

By PEARL MALVERN

IT was not until the blare of publicity had died and been decently interred that Hilda could bear to speak of The Yellow Typhoon. It was not until her own honeymoon was on the wane, and life had assumed, once more, normal proportions, a normal perspective. Then, one evening, before an open grate she began to tell her husband of the twin sister, known to the world, sinisterly, as The Yellow Typhoon. For, looking into the flames, she had begun to see pictures and the impelling need of speech descended upon her. She saw herself and Berta at play, twin sisters, with, at first glance, no appreciable difference save the shade of hair. Her own the dark, somber brown it still was, Berta's a mop of belligerent yellow, which had given to her face a curious stalking look, the look of prey. She could recall little fragmentary odds and ends out of their childhood. Their mother saying, in a worn voice, "I am sure I dont know what will ever become of Berta!" Adding, always, "Hilda is so entirely different, it is difficult even for me to believe that they are twins." Or, vividly, Berta dem a n d i n g from her the doll she most cherished: the part she most wished to play in her favorite game; the desk in school she herself coveted; the share of candy, or fruit, always the major share. Her own remonstrances, gradually weakening under the insidious and generally terrifying threats Berta would make . . . And then, as they grew apace, little by little, the divergence of their interests, the intolerance of their mutual points of view. It was all, seen now, in the still red glare of the recent tragedy, painful in the extreme.

Still, she had always known that the story of The Yellow Typhoon must some day be told, and to one so important as the man at her side, in whose life The Yellow Typhoon had dipped her vulture-like fingers before the end.

And so she began by sketching, in graphic bits, their twin birth, their early apparent dissimilarity of character and disposition, the slow but very sure way in which Berta had broken their mother's heart and ended her gentle and terrified life.

"Mother gave us a complete absorption," Hilda said; "she had, she felt, failed personally in a great many ways. Her vital hope was that we might atone, might shrive that failure. From the beginning, I see it now, and mother, being so wise, must have seen that from the first, Berta gave omen of her end. There was, I know not how, something wicked in Berta. Wicked is the only word for it. The sort of wickedness that, in a woman or a good man, congeals the blood, and in a bad man fires it."

Mathison interpolated: "Hallowell wasn't had—"

Hilda nodded. She knew Mathison's deep devotion for the man who had been his friend as well as his chief. She savored the resentment he must feel for The Yellow Typhoon because of Hallowell. So many people dear to her had suffered because of The Yellow Typhoon! Over that desecrated grave the tears that dropt were said with self-pity.

"No, he wasn't bad," she said, gently, compassionately: "he wasn't. He was good. But I think, dear, that of all who crossed her path in that way, he was the only good one. He was a victim to her, then, untried capacities for evil. Some of the fresh untouchedness of her youth must have lingered about her, with promise, not of evil, but of good. She had a great magnetism, Berta. Poor Hallowell felt that. And feeling that, he was wilfully blind to the other potentialities. The human animal is so frail when its emotions are aroused!"

Mathison turned to study the fire-etched profile. But there was no substratum of meaning in Hilda's words. She was thinking solely of her sister and the havoc she had wrought. She was thinking of the beautiful, cruel, forever unpowered hands, that had taken so many lives and strangled them at will; nothing more.

"Berta ran away with Hallowell, as you know," Hilda went on more briskly; "and two weeks thereafter a body was found in the river dressed in Berta's clothes, wearing Berta's jewels, with Berta's light hair, and, what we could see of her, a general resemblance to Berta in form and feature. Hallowell had dropped from the face of the earth—and we identified the body as Berta's. Mother and I surmised a tragedy, of desertion, probably, or merely an outcome of one of Berta's horrible rages when thwarted. Hallowell had not known how to

She could recall little fragmentary odds and ends out of their childhood. Their mother saying in a worn voice, "I am sure I dont know what will become of Berta"

Still, she had always known that the story of The Yellow Typhoon must some day be told, and to one so important as the man at her side, in whose life The Yellow Typhoon had dipped her vulture-like fingers before the end handle her, we reasoned, and the suicide, in a moment of red rage, had been the result.

"It broke mother's heart. The thought of that unsanctified body preyed on her night and day. She got to the point where she forgot the woman, Berta, and kept harking back to the yellow-headed, beautiful baby whose worst fault was to rip the paper off the walls in a childish gust of passion, unrestrained. She kept holding her, in her imagination, or slapping her tiny, undeveloped hands. Very soon after that, she died. Berta had killed her."

A log separated, split, fell apart, sending into the reduced light of the room a spray of angry gold, not unlike the vanquished head of The Yellow Typhoon. The man and the woman, sensing it, shuddered.

"I began my work in the Washington headquarters of the Secret Service," said Hilda; "I had the power, I believe, of hurling myself into obliteration of other things by work, more work, arduous, concentrated work. By work I lived, and by work I was able to preserve my sanity in the balance, if I had had time to think of those two lives of which I was so integral a part.

"After awhile the work of the Secret Service gripped me. I thrilled to it, every nerve. And . . . I made good at it, as you know."

Mathison squeezed the deliberately relaxed hand hanging over the side of her chair.

"There came my mission to Manila," said Hilda, "as protection for Hollowell on his anticipated trip home with the plans for rendering submarine warfare inutile . . . Do you remember that day?"

"Do I?" Mathison gave a short laugh. "Do you remember the things that I said to you? Oh, my child!"

"The most acute thing, of course," said Hilda, "was the fact you presented to me, indubitably, that Berta was alive. You said, so coldly, John, 'You bear a remarkable resemblance to The Yellow Typhoon,' and you studied my credentials with even more than customary scrutiny as you spoke.

"I said, 'Why; what do you mean? Who is The Yellow Typhoon?' And then you told me of the yellow-haired woman with the cruel mouth and the defiant eyes who was suspected of being in Manila for no good purpose. 'We are of the impression,' you said to me, watching me with sort of lynx eyes, 'we are of the impression that The Yellow Typhoon is in Manila with the express purpose of becoming better acquainted with Mr. Hollowell's general plans.' How cleverly, and with what meaning you said that, dear! I asked you more about The Yellow Typhoon, and you told me of the woman who had, at one time, some connection with Hollowell; who had run a large, a very notorious, a very horrible gambling house in the Orient and who had eloped with one of her patrons, a man called Lysgaard, after staking herself and her place against a priceless diamond necklace—losing. You told me that you did not doubt but that The Yellow Typhoon, having left on her transcontinental trip with Lysgaard, a lurid pathway, was in Manila for huge stakes. 'She has got,' you said, 'to slake her blood with hotter fevers than even the Orient, which she has lapped up, can supply. She has come here for the fevers. You told me other things, little things and big things, and in the telling you etched Berta as perfectly for me as tho you had presented her to me in the flesh. I felt faint, and showed it, and you thought that my being, as it were, found out, had caused the temporary illness. You should have known, dear, that it would take more than a tentative recognition to shake the aplomb of The Yellow Typhoon."

Mathison again interpolated: "And then, again, you showed your credentials from Headquarters at Washington, such bona fide credentials, and I recall thinking what honest hands you had, what steady eyes, what a sweet, reliant mouth. I remember thinking of you as a woman who should not play big stakes, but for whom big stakes might well, might justifiably, be played. I recall a pang of pity that you were, in any capacity, right or wrong, involved in intrigue. We couldn't, of course, ignore your credentials, neither could we ignore the amazing resemblance to the woman who was causing us the uneasiness, and so we accepted your service . . . and waited . . ."

Hilda, tensely now, took up the thread. She knew that Mathison would hesitate to supply the piece that fitted in here.

"That night Hallowell found Lysgaard and Berta rifling his trunk," she said, "and Berta . . . no, not Berta. The Yellow Typhoon, shot . . . and killed him . . . the man who had been her husband, whom she had ruined once . . . then deserted . . . she killed him. She got away, just before I arrived, too late for me to hold her back, soon enough for me to recognize her. When you appeared upon the scene there was Hallowell . . . dead . . . and there was I!"

There was a little silence. The split log dwindled to grey ash. Mathison said, "My first thought was personal rather than professional. I was ashamed, but it was so. I thought, involuntarily, 'God, dont let her be guilty!'"

"You dear," said Hilda.

"Shall we go on with this?" asked Mathison, tenderly. "I am afraid it is too much for you. Is it necessary?"

Hilda nodded. "Yes," she said, "let's talk it

She had a great magnetism, Berta. Poor Hallowell felt that. And, feeling that, he was willfully blind to the other potentialities out, get it, as it were, out of our systems, and then . . . then, perhaps, The Yellow Typhoon will lie still, will not be restless any longer, any longer insatiable . . . oh, I want her to rest; I want rest from her!"

"We couldn't prove anything, of course," Mathison resumed, "but we couldn't prove anything either way, and there we were. I couldn't believe that you were The Yellow Typhoon, but neither could I deny the irrefutable fact of likeness taken in conjunction with the uncanny circumstantial evidence piling up about you and against you. The next day we sailed, leaving poor Hallowell's last rites to be performed by strangers . . . You had the stateroom next ours. I had secreted Hallowell's plans and was taking them to Washington in his stead . . ."

"And all the while," broke in Hilda, unsteadily, "The Yellow Typhoon and Lysgaard were in the steerage, disguised, watching us . . . how far gone Berta must have been, John, her own sister . . . the man who had been her husband . . . what a terrific way she must have gone!"

"Then the attempt on the way over," Mathison filled in the silence that seemed almost to palpitate between them with the strange personality of the dead girl, "and the way you, every time, dear, intervened. And the fight I fought with myself! Against the fascination, the dear warm fascination you held for me, and my shrinking fear of your identity. If Berta had not been, in fact, your sister, dear, I should not be able to forgive myself. Since she was, I feel that my suspicion must necessarily be somewhat condoned. Small wonder that I thought as I did!"

"I used to feel sometimes," said Hilda, rather dreamily, "as tho, even now, Berta was holding from me the thing I wanted most even as she had done in childhood. I knew, too, on that sea voyage, dear. I knew so surely, so sweetly, with such a pang of pleasure and of pain. And I thought that the best and the worst of it would be that I would have to hug my knowledge to my breast, solitarily. I thought you could never care for me . . . because of The Yellow Typhoon."

"And you told me of the woman who had eloped with one of her patrons, a man called Lysgaard, after staking herself and her placc against a priceless diamond necklace . . . losing"

They sat in silence for awhile, and it almost seemed to them in that hushed hour as tho the tumultuous, restless spirit of The Yellow Typhoon breathed between them—was it compassionately?

"Then we landed," whispered Hilda, "and I followed you to your hotel. I took the suite above you. I was not sure but I had every reason to believe that Berta and Lysgaard would also go to the same place. I had a twofold reason then for wishing you to reach Washington safely. My love of my country and my love of . . . my man. I determined that no vigilance ever known should surpass mine. Waking and sleeping you should be under my surveillance. And you were. I knew that night, that red and terrible night, that the sounds I heard in your room beneath my own, were not the sounds you made in preparing for bed. I had come to know your every movement, dear. To anticipate, to follow. I had come to thrill to each sound you made after the key turned in your latch. On that night, things were different. There was no deliberate dropping of two shoes . . . how I used to smile at the same deliberation, my own. There was no soft whistling following the short sharp shower in your bath. There was no shuffling and ruffling of innumerable newspapers before the light was snapped out. I followed the régime that night . . . and it was not the same.

"I knew it was The Yellow Typhoon at work.

"My love of you formed for me, then, a sort of protective barrier against the thing I had to do. If it had not been you I was going to protect, perhaps to save, there might have come to me the chill that I was giving my own sister, my nearest of flesh and blood, over to the law. I might have been halted in my rigorous duty, for the sake of a softer tie. But that night nothing mattered—only you. I thought of your deep friendship for Hallowell—now dead. I thought of the courageous sea trip you had made, guarding those plans, his plans, with your life, for honor's sake. I thought of . . . oh, love, forgive my heart talking to me in that hour . . . I thought of the moon-flooded nights at sea when your dear heart spoke, in your eyes, to me, and your dear mute mouth was still.

"There they were! Berta and Lysgaard, over your trunk, mulling up your papers, throwing your things aside. Berta, my sister, and the man who was the aider and abetter of the crimes that were making her infamous . . . It was a bitter sort of moment, if it had not been for my love of you!"

"And you held them at bay," the man whispered, half inaudibly, "there, in the night, alone, splendidly, until I came with the police who had called me to the desk in order that I might disprove the lies Lysgaard had been spreading about me. The police were with me at a fortuitous moment. They saw The Yellow Typhoon and her mate. They caught them with the papers . . . and I think, dear, oh, I feel certain that after Lysgaard started the firing it was the police who shot them down. Your revolver and mine had nothing to do, Hilda, with the two who are no more.

"It is hard to evolve out of a chaos of shouts and groans and threats and pleas any sort of clear conception, and yet, oddly enough, something told me, some instinct, that I should know just what was transpiring, precisely what was transpiring. The same instinct told me that I should need it. After this is over, ran thru my mind, after this is over I shall need to make some sort of explanation. I think it must have been your valiant courage in holding your own flesh and blood at bay for the greater sake of a greater cause. That fired me, dear. The last doubt, too, had fallen from me. I saw the likeness and I saw the difference . . . the same flesh and the same blood, the same features, the same lines, the color of The Yellow Typhoon that drove men mad for love of her and the spirit of a brooding Madonna in you that made a man worship you. I know that. An instinct deeper than I can fathom tells me that this is so. It is so. Dear . . ."

"It is all over with her now, poor, passionate soul," Hilda murmured. "I hope she is at rest . . . she never was in life. I like to think that that little smile on her mouth was one of commiseration for all the pain she had caused on earth and one of hope for the salvation she was going to find in Heaven."

"Amen to that," said Mathison; "hers was a consummate expiation."

The fire fell away and the room was in darkness. Mathison stooped over and replenished the logs. When he had done, the flames leaped forth again and fell athwart the walls in broad bands of scarlet and gold.

(Fifty-nine)

Hilda lifted her head with the old confidence, the old gladness.

"And then," she said, "we took the plans to Washington and delivered them, just, I know, as Hallowell would have wished us to do. You were so still on that trip. You had seen The Yellow Typhoon. You knew the relationship that had so confused you with its likeness, yet still you kept silence . . ."

"I was so ashamed," whispered the man, "of my doubt of you . . . of you . . ."

"The committee commended you for your loyal services," his wife went on, "and then they asked you my identity. You turned to me, and I must have answered you with eyes and lips and touch, for you bowed and said: 'Gentlemen, my future wife!' and I said, 'Yes,' . . ."

"With the staid Washingtonians not quite sure what it was all about, and I at a loss to reply . . . and then . . ."

"But you did," he said, "you did reply."

How you can have hands as well groomed as these

THE consciousness of unbecoming or unattractive clothes may hurt—but it cannot strike deep down as can the fear that you are judged wanting in real refinement. That you are judged unmistakably lacking in personal nicety.

How uncomfortable this fear can make you! How many times magnified any shortcoming which may cause it becomes in your own eyes!

Of all the indications of personal refinement the most significant, next to personal cleanliness, is well-kept nails. To many, ill-kept nails indicate more than carelessness, they indicate actual vulgarity.

A few minutes of the right kind of care, once or twice a week, will keep your nails and cuticle always exquisite. The most important part of the manicure is the care of the cuticle. You must never cut it, for cutting ruins the cuticle. But with the Cutex way you can always have perfect nails and cuticle.

Wrap a little cotton around the end of an orange stick (both come in the Cutex package). Dip it in the bottle of Cutex and work around the base of the nails. Then wash the hands, gently pushing back the cuticle with a towel. The surplus cuticle will disappear, leaving a firm, even, delicate base.

Cutex quickly and harmlessly softens and removes surplus cuticle

If you like snowy white nail tips apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nail. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish. For an especially brilliant lasting polish, use Cutex Paste Polish first, then the Cutex Cake or Powder Polish.

If your cuticle has a tendency to dry or grow coarse, apply a bit of Cutex Cold Cream each night. This cream was especially prepared to keep the hands and cuticle soft and fine.

Give yourself a Cutex manicure regularly, once or twice a week, and you can have nails that you are always proud of.

Cutex is on sale at all drug and department stores. Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream are each 35 cents—the Cuticle Remover comes also in 65-cent bottles.

just plastered with pictures of movie actresses, and I liked the ones who wore curls and ruffy dresses—like Mary Pickford and Viola Dana. So you can imagine how thrilled I was when I found I was going to play in the same cast with Miss Dana.

Only in his case Minneapolis said he was from St. Paul and St. Paul insisted that he was from Minneapolis.

"WOULDN'T William turn over in his grave if he could see me as a movie actress?" demanded Mildred Davis, Harold Lloyd's petite leading woman, with a giggle that revealed two piquant dimples at once.

"William—'Shakespeare'?" we hazarded vaguely, really knowing nothing about Mildred's forebears.

"William Penn," she corrected me. "Why, yes, I'm a Quakeress—all my people came from Pennsylvania, and I'm a lineal descendant of the dear old Bill who sold the State to the Indians, or bought it from them—or something. I never can remember history."

The famous Quaker probably did turn over in his grave just then; but ancestors cannot expect to be taken seriously by nineteen-year-old descendants with curly gold hair, baby-pink skin and bluish-green eyes. Mildred, supplied the optical adjectives, or I shouldn't have dared. No, she doesn't take her illustrious lineage seriously at all. The past does not concern her—just the present.

In spite of the fact that she has played with Mutual, Metro, Bluebird and Pathé, and has risen to the dignity of co-featuring with Harold Lloyd, she is just a little girl, with the likes and dislikes of young girlhood.

"I began as a movie fan when I was twelve," she said, with her little-girl smile. "I had the walls of my room PROPER SHAMPOOING is what makes beautiful hair. It brings out all the real life, lustre, natural wave and color, and makes it soft, fresh and luxuriant.

Your hair simply needs frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, but it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soap. The free alkali in ordinary soaps, soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it. This is why leading motion picture stars, theatrical people and discriminating women use

WATKINS MULSIFIED REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it. Two or three teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil.

The hair dries quickly and evenly, and has the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is. It leaves the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to do up.

You can get MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO at any drug store. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

"Motion Pictures At Their Best"

It is recorded that to someone who once asked Whistler with what he mixed his colors to achieve such wonderful paintings, the artist replied with the single word, "Brains."

And if we were asked why it is that Pathé Features are so unflinchingly good we should have to reply that it is because of the brains that collaborate in their making.

The best writers, the leading directors, the greatest stars, the most competent producers collaborate in their making and the result is—photoplays of real house and he often spends his Sundays there, that is, of course, when he works in Los Angeles. Working at Culver City, half way between Los Angeles and the beach, he can make his choice, to from there the Venice house is the more easily reached. He absolutely refused to let me describe either place.

"The Venice house is just a camp," he said. "There isn't a thing in it, or in the Rampart Street house in Los Angeles, that belongs to me; all my things are in storage."

"Mine too," said Mary Alden, who had joined us.

"But," I argued, "you can impress your own personality on even a rented house if you live in it long enough. The same is true of motor-cars . . ."

"And of wives," said the irrepressible Rose.

"For instance, you might marry me tomorrow . . . as a matter of fact, he is going to marry me tomorrow, aint you, John?"

"I am if Fate doesn't step in again and prevent," said Stone with very little evidence of enthusiasm. The wedding . . . for picture purposes only . . . was to have taken place that day on "location" in Pasadena, but had been postponed because it was raining steadily and blowing big hurri-anes.

"Anyway," Rose went on, "we might be walking down the street and some one might see us and say: 'Isn't that so-and-so's wife? She looks like him!'"

"I think that's a myth," said Stone. "I don't believe that association ever changes one's physiognomy. Environment might, but not association."

"For instance, I might have been very different in appearance if I had followed my first ambition. I thought that the biggest thing I could be was a captain on an ocean-going liner. I worked on a ship for seven months without pay, only asking to be taught something of navigation. I worked harder then than I have worked at any other time before, or since, in my life.

"Finally, I considered myself qualified, only to learn that I could not get a pilot's license until I was twenty-one years old. As I was then about sixteen, life looked very hopeless to me. Shortly after this, the Spanish-American war began, and I marched away with a crowd of boys as young as myself, all of us feeling very heroic indeed.

"Of course, all of that seems like a very comic-opera sort of little fuss, remembering it in comparison with the war we have just been thru. But it was all very exciting to us then. Incidentally, it was while I was in the army that I went broke for the first time. We had been stationed in Cuba for four months and during that time none of us had been paid. As a result, I hadn't seen anything of the nearby town. At last a regiment arrived from Massachusetts and I went down to look them over and see if I knew any one. (Stone's home is about thirty miles from Boston.) I soon made friends among them and one of the boys asked me what I thought of the town. I said that I hadn't been there. 'Why?' he asked. 'Because,' I said, 'there's no use going there without any money.' He said that he would let me have some money and, in support of his word, let me have an American ten-cent piece. I changed it for centavos, getting ten centavos for every American cent. Then I took my three tent mates with me to town and we had a wonderful time.

"We could get a glass of peculiarly hectic drink for one centavo, and a guava fruit sandwich, which was quite delicious, for the same price. Cigars were two centavos each. So we not only had a feast, we had some money left when we got thru.

"This is in sharp contrast," he remarked, "to the profiteering one has to put up with today.

"For instance," he said, "last Sunday I bought two Los Angeles newspapers in Venice and was charged twelve and a half cents each for them. With Los Angeles only fifteen miles away, this is absurd; I could have gotten the London Times cheaper! It is this type of small profiteering that is so peculiarly exasperating. One is practically helpless to do anything about it." It is characteristic of Stone's lack of self-confidence that he did not choose the stage as his profession, but followed it with splendid success after another man had chosen it for him. This was A. Q. Skannon of New York and the whole incident was, apparently, the result of the merest caprice of Fate.

"I had just left the army," said Stone, "and was looking for work. I visited the navy yard, hoping to find something there, but the only demand was for carpenters, skilled mechanics, etc. I made a list to show to the boys in camp and bought a magazine for myself to read on the way back.

"At this time, vaudeville sketches were just beginning to be shown. Among the stories in the magazine I was reading, was one that I thought would make a good vaudeville sketch. Without knowing anything about dramatic construction, I dramatized it and showed it to an uncle of mine who was in the profession. I suppose he thought it bad enough to be really funny and decided to pass his laugh along. Anyway, he gave me a letter of introduction to a booking agent in New York. While I was in this man's office, Skannon came in. He looked me over. 'What's your line?' he said. I didn't know what he was talking about. 'Juvenile, leads, heavies or what?' he added. I explained that I wasn't an actor." (But here is where the advantage of belonging to a theatrical family comes in.)

"You can read, cant you?" Skannon asked.

made him an offer, and as he had become fascinated with this new art, he promptly accepted. So, instead of carrying his bride back to New York, as he had planned, he remained to direct her pictures and the successful combination of Bennett & Co., Inc., was effected!

"I came to stay two weeks and have remained two years," said Mr. Niblo. "I sent for my belongings, we bought this house, and for the first time in my life I have a real home."

"See what you got by marrying me!" teased Enid.

"The home is only the frame for the picture!" gaily retorted Fred, with his grandest bow.

"Fred's weakness is prowling about the book-stores, and he is on intimate terms with all the book-collectors in the vicinity," remarked Miss Bennett, as we entered the cosy library opening off the drawing-room.

"This room is the heart of the house, for this is where we really live," proudly announced Mr. Niblo. "Here we study our scripts, work out new bits and plan many of the scenes that finally reach the screen."

The mahogany book-cases lining the room contain an extensive and rare collection which is a veritable treasure-house and makes one long for unlimited hours in which to dip into its riches. Above the books are a number of autographed portraits of famous actors, suggesting many happy stage associations.

The third floor of the house is one long room, which they have merrily dubbed the Chamber of Horrors, for here are the remarkable souvenirs and relics which Mr. Niblo collected during his extensive foreign travels.

"Fred and I had such fun arranging these things," said Enid, as we examined the treasures, representing many nations, tribes and peoples, "for he told me the interesting story connected with each one and how and where he secured it."

"Wanderlust!" I exclaimed. "How does he escape its grip?"

"Oh, he doesn't," began Enid. "He longs to be up and away whenever he hears of a boat sailing."

"When we finish our contract we are going on a long, long trip," continued Mr. Niblo. "We will take our cameras and weave one or two reel stories against a background of travel. I was the first to take motion pictures into Africa, and I want to cover the same country again—with Enid."

At the far end of the room is a pool-table, and tho Miss Bennett admits that husband defeats her with tantalizing regularity, yet the lure will not be downed and they indulge in a spirited game every night after dinner.

"And your fads?" I asked the little star, as we returned to the drawing-room.

"I have none except—Fred!" she answered. "I love my work, my home, my garden and my two dogs—here they are now!"

Shorty

almost two years with Harry Pollard, enjoying comedy, since humor appeals to Antrim Short, and finally with Bob Vignola, his close friend and a man whom he fairly worships. I liked his enthusiasm when describing Mr. Vignola.

"There will be a lot of good directors, tho, now that the country has gone dry," Mr. Short said, sagely.

With Vivian Martin, Antrim Short appeared in "The Petticoat Pilot" and "The Third Kiss," later with Constance Talmadge in "Romance and Arabella," and in a propaganda story which came into being a little late, as the armistice was declared—that was "The Yellow Ticket," you remember.

"With Bert Lytell, in 'The Right of Way,' I play a good part. I like 'em to change from crooks to sweethearts, drunken younger brothers to dudish chappies with monocles, boys—like in 'Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm'—and all that stuff, you know," he volunteered.

"Seems to me you you have hit Universal City quite often in your travels," I suggested.

"Always glad to get back home and to mother's cooking," he smiled cheerily again. "Funny how we all hike again to Universal, isn't it? Well, you're sure of a square meal when you belong to that outfit, anyway. I'm welcome at Daddy Laemmle's table any time—quite comforting, that!"

"Do you fly often?" we ventured.

"Three times a week I go to Crescent Junction and Wilshire Boulevard, to the Mercury Field, and it's the one big hobby of my life—nothing on earth can compare with flying," answered the young man, as he described enthusiastic circles with his arms. "I am a speed-crank—and you can't get up speed on earth. I have to walk to the studio every day, because I am so afraid of the speed cops."

"Automobile racing ought to suit you!"

"I want to awfully—I mean race. I think there's less danger of smash-ups in the air than on the track, so, for my part, the ship is good enough for speed. Mother hasn't much time for auto races!"

"And I suppose you're a very obedient son?"

"I should say. Mother says I run a very good average—as boys go."

AN ORIENTAL LOVE SONG

By JAMES FRANKLIN MULLANEY

Your absence turns the light of day to dusk; The sun that laughed to see you hides and grieves;

Your garments hold their lavender and musk. And scent of sandal leaves.

When you are near, my heart that was as cold And sad as winter, sings, and gladly sings, For happy sunlight kisses fields with gold— The joyous poppy brings:

The fragrant tube-rose stars your glistening hair, And perfumes hours, and freely beautifies: Your eyes reflect like pools of silence where

The lotus, sleeping, dies.

As with a cord, thick-twisted, of bamboo, My life is bound to yours till its last breath; E'en then my soul will rise and follow you Across that stream called "Death!"

Then the sound of his footsteps hurrying into the hacienda. Marta lifted her face to the sky. Perhaps—yonder Doña Luisa was peering down, reminding her of her vow—"to save the soul of Raphael—"

She stepped out into the moonlight, facing the hard look of the golden-haired American. "You do not love him—love saves. You would destroy him, body and soul," Marta said steadily. "I will not let you have his soul!"

"What are you going to do about it?" sneered the other woman, secure in the knowledge of her power. "You talk like a third-rate melodrama!"

Marta came close to her. Her eyes flashed, but her voice was low and controlled. "I have made a vow to the Mother of God to stand guard over the soul of Raphael."

A snarl behind them drew their eyes to the figure of Raphael Artega, face convulsed with anger, strange-colored fires flashing from the jewels he held in his hand. "You! I have had enough of you! Take your vow back to God!"

The golden-haired woman laughed softly. After all, marriage would be more of a triumph; then she screamed. For a tall figure, head swathed in bandages, had stepped from the window and seized the arm raised above Marta's head. Raphael whirled, stumbled, tried to save himself and fell, the knife still in his hand. On the ground a shadowy figure writhed once or twice with a hiccupping sound and then lay quite still. The golden-haired woman screamed again and began to laugh insanely as she bent over the dead thing that had been Raphael.

In the bright starlight Marta and Keith Bryton faced one another. "A judgment of God," shuddered Marta, "a judgment—"

"Beloved!" Keith cried, "oh, beloved, thank God I came in time!" And he would have taken her into his arms, but she shook her head.

"Not—yet," she whispered; "we must not think of ourselves now." Her face, pure like that of some waxen saint in a sacristy, was turned upward to the sky. "Mother of Sorrows," prayed Marta, "intercede with Thy Son for the soul of Raphael—"

"Yes," said Stone.
 "Then read this!"
 "This" proved to be the leading part in a melodrama named "Side-tracked."

Stone read it . . . cues and all.

"That will do," said Skannon.

He then explained that he had a company on the road, playing Canada, and that the manager was taking the place of the leading man who was too ill to finish the season. "When can you leave?" he added.

"I had been trying to find work for several weeks and was feeling somewhat at a loss as to what I should do," said Stone. "Here was a decision apparently made for me by heaven. I accepted, and joined the company at Belleville, Canada.

"At first, the company treated me royally. One by one they buttonholed me and told me how much they liked my work and how glad they were that I could finish the season with them. Then one by one they told me what theater I had been playing in when they last saw me and what type of part they were certain suited me best. At last, when I could stand it no longer, I got them all together and informed them that I had never been on the stage before in my life. After this, it was thumbs down. They treated me like the outsider I had announced myself to be."

There was a moment's pause:

"Do you think that luck is the biggest factor of success on the stage?" I asked.

"I think that it is an important factor of success not only on the stage, but everywhere," he said.

"Certainly an actor of no very great ability is often exceedingly successful because he happens to be given exactly the right part under the best possible conditions. But isn't the same thing true of non-professionals? How many men have been given credit for foresight and sagacity when, if the truth were known, all of the credit would be given to luck!"

After finishing his first season, Stone returned to New York, where he appeared in "Bunny" at the Hudson Theater. He came West in 1906 and was leading man at the Belasco Theater in Los Angeles for six years. It was in 1907 that he married Margaret Langham, and she retired from the stage, never to return to it again. Her death occurred three years ago while Stone was at Plattsburg, training to "do his bit" in the world war. Some of Stone's best-known stage parts were in such plays as "The Bird of Paradise," with Laurette Taylor; "The Misleading Lady," "Inside the Lines," and, more recently, "Where Poppies Bloom," with Marjorie Rambeau.

His first picture, made with Thomas H. Ince, was "Honor's Altar." Others are: "The Havoc" and "According to the Code," for Essanay; "Man's Desire" and "The Man of Bronze," from stories which he wrote himself; "The River's End," for Marshall Neilan; "Held by the Enemy," for Lasky, and Goldwyn's "Milestones."

Little Sister, Huh!

when her mother journeyed West to be with Jane, who had been playing in pictures for some time. On graduating, Eva joined her family in Los Angeles, and the day following her arrival was engaged as an extra by the Lois Weher company at Universal for the production "Shoes." She had gone to the studio to visit Jane, who was playing in the "Graft" serial, and the fascination of it all prompted her to register at the employment desk.

She "suped" for some time. Finally she became an ingénue in L-KO comedies, where she supplied the requisite feminine pulchritude for nearly two years. Then, one day, she visited the Vitagraph plant and met Tom Mix, who was also paying a call on Larry Semon. Tom liked her looks and engaged her for the lead opposite him in "The Daredevil," "The Feud," "The Speed Maniac" and "One-Quarter Apache."

House Peters about this time was returning to the screen at the Garson studio, to appear in "Silk Husbands and Calico Wives." Eva was cast opposite him. And finally in a rôle opposite Hart.

Strangely enough, Eva has never had any great difficulties in making strides of progress on the screen. The hardest thing for her to do, she remarks, was learning to do the comedy walk—that little tripping, snappy perambulation indigenous to the custard-pie cuties of the black-and-blue drama. And now, since she's doing legitimate dramatic stuff, she's had to unlearn it for the stately, gowly stride of the tragedy queen.

"Oh, Eve," implored sister Jane, "don't get a dramatic walk! It's worse than a comedy wobble."

But, just the same, Miss Novak, the younger, has gone into the serious stuff for keeps. Temperamentally she's been created for the emotional line. Physically—well, she should just be merely seen by Florenz Ziegfeld. She's overflowing with that concomitant known as "pep," in her mode of doing things, of speech, in her very piquancy and her incisive, keen wit.

She's a unique person. She has a striking personality all her own, and a naively unaffected manner of expressing it. Little sister—huh!

Bashful Bobbie

Any one who could have such an effect on the hardened door guardian must be unusual. And Griffith was right—for the unknown was little Mary Pickford.

Another story relates the way Mary Pickford brought the Gishes to the studio.

Lillian and Dorothy stood outside the office railing while Mary introduced them to Griffith. "Better think this over, Mary," smiled the director, "when they're on that side of the fence you needn't worry—once they're on this side things may be different."

Whereat little Mary looked Griffith in the eye and said: "I'm not afraid of any one on either side of that fence!"

But to return to Harron himself. Bobbie has an odd sense of humor—a sort of quiet appreciation. Most of all, however, he hates formality. "Hey, Griff," is the way he launches his remarks to the man who stands at the forefront of the photoplay. Neither does Harron talk pro and con about the art of the screen. "Oh, this making of motion pictures," he remarks, when the word Act is drawn into the conversation. He hates to be noticed in public. "Dont know what to do with my hands when people begin to look at me," he explains, laconically.

Imagine calling Bobbie Mr. Robert Harron!

When some one commented that Bobbie would be the last person in a crowd to be judged an actor, he sighed with genuine relief and said:

"Thank God!"

Scenes from the Universal Feature Film "Heads Win!"

"Heads Win!"

Traffic jammed at the rush hour! Crowds thronging station platforms! A mile of stalled trains! The swing-bridge would not close and all because down in the power house something had gone wrong and nobody knew what—until Jim came to the rescue.

Each night thousands are seeing unfolded on the screen the thrilling story of Jim Godfrey, who, in the hours after supper, with the help of the International Correspondence Schools, had put a trained head on his shoulders—a head that knew what to do in an emergency.

There are thousands of Jims in real life. You will find them in offices, shops, stores, factories, in mines and on railroads. For in every city and town and in every line of industry there are men who have gained in spare moments, with I. C. S. help, special training in the work of their choice.

There are men like Jesse O. Vincent, who rose from a tool-maker's apprentice to inventor of the Liberty Motor; men like Joseph G. Tynan, the laborer who became the world's greatest ship builder; men like Robert E. Ramsay, the clerk who became editor of Advertising and Selling. There are carpenters' helpers who became architects, bookkeepers who became general managers, men and boys who rose from nothing at all to responsible positions of splendid salaries. It's simply a question of training. Your hands can't earn the money you need, but your head can if you'll give it the chance. "Heads win" every time!

More than two million men and women in the last 28 years have let the I. C. S. help them win better jobs, make more money, enjoy happier homes. Over one hundred thousand right now are turning their spare moments to profit. Hundreds are starting every day.

Can you still go on, putting in your days at the same grind, getting the same pay envelope with the same insufficient amount, keeping up the constant fight against a soaring cost of living, when a little grit on your part could be the means of changing your whole life?

It is easily possible for you to have the position you want in the work you like best, to have a salary that will give you and your family the kind of a home, the comforts, the little luxuries, the enjoyments that you would like them to have. No matter what your age, your occupation, your education or your means—you can do it! All we ask is the chance to prove it. That's fair, isn't it? Then mark and mail this coupon. There's no obligation and not a penny of cost. But it may be the most important step you ever took in your life.

THE NAMBY-PAMBY OF A NUT: DENTISTS

By E. P. Pitzer

Dentists were brought into the world to fill a long-felt want and other cavities at so much per cav.

A dentist always feels happiest when he is down in the mouth and it does not matter whose mouth he is down.

They are generally single, for, while they can alter the face, they hate to face the altar. Dentists always like to hear a false-set voice.

Their favorite card game is "bridge."

They hate hypocrisy and admire an open countenance. The longer it is open the better they like it.

A dentist always likes to look you in the face and then charge you for it.

To put gold caps on teeth is his crowning glory and it angers him a bit when he knows that no charge can be made for capping the climax.

It is a well-known fact that dentistry has been practiced for many decayed.

A dentist can stop the ache in your tooth even tho it takes nerve to do it. But it is your nerve generally.

They make good farmers, for they like to be surrounded by achers.

He is observing and detects the false of others immediately.

Dentists, as a rule, do not like college boys who are good at giving their respective college yells—they prefer poor rooters.

They are generally of good extraction.

A dentist's parlor can properly be referred to as a drawing-room.

While most professions help the world generally, a dentist is always a drawback.

Most men in order to become successful need "push." A dentist needs "pull."

Katherine MacDonald, A.B.

In the one she is now making, "The Guests of Hercules," she depicts a convent-bred girl of France, whose fortunes lead her to the hectic halls of Monte Carlo, where adventure, sorrow and guile way-lay her, with love triumphant in the end.

"And what do you think!" she demanded, enthusiastically. "The Prince of Monaco sent me a special invitation to bring my company over there and film the story in the halls of Monte Carlo itself, which, they tell me, have never been photographed."

"And you are going, of course?" I urged, catching her enthusiasm and almost falling out of my chair in my eagerness.

"Oh, no; I cant. It would be too horribly expensive. Mother was crazy about the trip, and I think she got her things all packed in the expectation that I'd decide to go at the last minute. I'd have to take her along, you know—I'd spend every cent I have over the gambling tables if I didn't have her to hold me down—but then, I'm not going," she finished with a sigh. "We took the Monte Carlo scenes at the Fairmont Hotel in San Francisco, and we inveigled all the guests into working in the picture. And they were wonderful!" she said, with conviction. "Many of them worked all night long, for several nights in succession—and they made it so much more realistic than it would have been with five-dollar-a-day extras."

A studio potentate of some sort paused beside us and asked Miss MacDonald what she desired for luncheon.

"Tea and a tooth-brush," she replied promptly. "I lost mine this morning," she added, to me, in explanation of her remarkable order.

Luncheon time reminded me that food as well as art had a place in Nature's plan.

"Would you mind telling me," I said, hesitatingly, as I rose to leave, "what kind of cold cream you use?"

She laughed again, unfeignedly, but I paused, breathless, ready to jealously treasure forever the recipe of Katherine's beauty.

"I know I ought to say some kind of imported cold cream," she answered, a trifle regretfully, "but if you want the truth—"

In my excitement, I could feel my heart throbbing loudly—so loudly, in fact, that I was afraid I wouldn't be able to hear the glorious secret.

I did! Indeed, yes! I leaned close. She leaned close.

"Well, then," she confided, "I scrub my face and shampoo my hair with Life Buoy tar soap—it costs five cents a cake—and it was first recommended to me as fine for hating dogs!"

So, gentle reader, I went out and bought a case of Life Buoy at five cents per tar cake. Of course, I haven't the natural scenery to work on that Katherine MacDonald, A.B., has, but still—you never can tell. I'm hoping for the best.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are: First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be—gray, brown or blue—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints

To be perfectly frank, it was because I was offered thirty-five dollars a week to do child parts. At first my family was shocked, being Quakers, you know, but they finally let me do a picture for Mutual, called 'Little Miss Innocence.' I was so disappointed when I went to see it, because I was so ugly! I give you my word, I almost cried!

"All the actors treated me just like a child . . . and, of course, I was," she smiled, (it seemed to me she should have said "am" instead of "was"). "and I had a wonderful time. I played with William Stowell, Bryant Washburn, Robert Gordon and Antrim Short. Mother always went with me to the studio and curled my hair, and every one teased me by saying 'thee' and 'thou' to me.

"The other girls at the studio laugh at me because I take such care of my health," she went on, with youthful seriousness. "I always go to bed early, because I know that nothing in the world spoils your looks quicker than late hours. When I have a caller I 'shoo' him out by eleven o'clock, (imagine, if you can, a six-foot Romeo being forcibly ejected by a diminutive Juliet of barely five feet), because I value my complexion more than I do anything else."

"What do you do when you're not working at the studio?" I inquired.

"Why, I sew."

"Not really!" we interrupted, incredulously.

"Yes, I dressed dozens of dolls for the orphans' Christmas tree this year. You know Harold Lloyd was injured about two months ago by a hand-grenade which he thought was harmless, so we haven't been able to do a thing until he is better. It's given me a nice long vacation, tho, and that's how I happened to have time to dress the dolls. Harold will be able to go to work in about two weeks, tho, so then it will be all work.

"I ride horseback, too," she continued, with naive pride, "so I'm just tickled to death that our next picture is going to be a Western. And I play golf and study French," she added, as we complimented her versatility.

"I certainly dont believe in giving up your education just because you dont have time to go to school, do you?"

We agreed with her, but it would be hard to disagree with this magnetic young person on any point.

"But when do you find time to study?" we ventured.

"Oh, I take my books to the studio and study between scenes." (Think of trying to conjugate French verbs in the midst of the noise and bustle of a film studio!) "But that's not any worse," she added, "than trying to study with Jack in the room hurdling chairs à la Doug Fairbanks."

Jack, her small brother, was at that moment leading a parade across the lawn, composed of himself as Harold Lloyd and two playmates made up as Charlie Chaplin and "Fatty" Arbuckle.

Why Creams and Powders are Necessary

Science has proved that fifty percent of all skins are too dry;

Ten percent of all skins are too oily;

Twenty percent of all skins are dingy or freckled;

Ten percent of all skins are pimpled or covered with blackheads;

All skins become darker, dryer, have a tendency to wrinkle and develop age spots unless nourished by proper creams and protected by the right powder.

How to Find the Cream You Need

Stand in a good light; examine your face carefully in a mirror; then study the chart.

The last corn

When you end your corn with Blue-jay, it will be the last corn you let grow.

You will know how to stop the pain. And how to quickly and completely end all corns.

There are millions who use Blue-jay now, and they never let a corn remain.

The new-day way

Blue-jay is the new-day way, the scientific method.

It was perfected in a laboratory world-famed for its surgical dressings.

It is supplanting the many treatments which are harsh and inefficient.

It has made paring as ridiculous as it is unsafe, for paring doesn't end corns.

Do this tonight:

Apply to a corn a Blue-jay

plaster or the liquid Blue-jay— whichever you prefer.

Mark how the pain stops. Then wait a little and the corn will loosen and come out.

What that corn does all corns will do. Some 20 million corns a year are ended in this way.

Don't suffer corns. Don't have your feet disfigured. They can be ended almost as easily as a dirt-spot on your face. They are just as inexcusable.

Don't forget this. It means too much to you.

Ask your druggist for Blue-jay.

For Boys and Girls Also

"Jackie nearly embarrasses me to death when we go to see one of my pictures," she continued. "He gets so worked up over seeing me on the screen that he shouts so everybody can hear, 'Mother, what's sister goin' to do next?'"

"How do you make yourself cry before the camera?" we asked, hoping to learn some of the little secrets of the screen.

"Oh, that's the best thing I do," she laughed. "Just let them play some soft music on a violin, and they have to get a bucket to catch my tears. One day I sobbed so long and so hard that the camera-man got worried. I guess he thought there'd been a death in my family, or at least that I'd lost my job, because he patted me on the back and said, 'Little girl, what are you crying for?' I said, 'Nothing,' and kept right on crying. He looked at me with his face a blank, as if to say, 'Well, women are certainly Chinese puzzles.'

"Of course, it's not always easy to do what they tell you," Mildred continued. "One time I was made to walk on the edge of a roof after the director had threatened and coaxed me for about an hour. I screamed, 'I won't, I won't!' all the time I was doing it."

"Do you ever want to go on the legitimate stage?" we asked.

"No," she answered, emphatically, "unless I get too old and wrinkled to play in pictures. Then," she said, "I'll make my living dancing on the 'legit.'"

"But don't you think if you were too old for pictures, you'd also be too old to dance?" we remonstrated.

"No, indeed; I'm keeping up my dancing now for that very reason," she assured me. "Imagine a nineteen-year-old slip of a girl keeping 'limbered up' against approaching old age!"

When we left, she walked to the front gate with us, with her arm linked in ours. Standing on the front walk was little brother's brand new one-man-power automobile in bright blue splendor, where it had been abandoned for the more interesting diversion of a Chaplin-Lloyd-Arbuckle parade. Mildred pointed to it laughingly. "Our new Stutz," she said. "Want to go for a ride?"

"Git away from our machine!" shouted young Jack, peremptorily calling the parade to a sudden halt in order to look after his property interests, and mistaking our mild interest for covetousness. "Nobody can ride in it but me and Charlie and 'Fatty'!"

You see, a film star's little brother is no different from yours and mine. And far be it from us to try to crowd "Fatty" out of any seat, so we declined with thanks and left Mildred scolding Jackie for his rudeness, just like any big sister, and not a bit like a film star—or a descendant of William Penn.

matinée idol with the old Broncho company? He's back again in pictures, supporting Enid Bennett in "The Incubus." Tom happened to be the first actor who ever donned evening attire for Thomas H. Ince. He hesitates in describing the detail of that eventful day, but he does say that his appearance in the spick-and-span regalia caused no little consternation among the free-and-easy Western "types" which infested Inceville when cowboy and Indian thrillers were the big gag of the day and when soup-and-fish was looked upon as too élite and exclusive to ever make a hit on the screen!

And, speaking of Ince, one recalls that a coterie of New York chorus girls in William Rock's vaudeville revue which played at the Orpheum quite took the Ince studio by storm. Rock, Frances White's late partner, is an Angeleno, quite a friend of Thomas H.'s. The girls were stunning, and even the feminine stars paid considerable attention to their clothes. After wandering about the studio for some time, two of the girls became confused and could not find their party. Seeing them standing helplessly near a "set," a stage-hand volunteered the information that Rock and the rest of his entourage were just over there behind a bank of Cooper Hewitts.

Both choristers stood unimpressed, and at length, one, turning to the stage-hand, remarked, haughtily:

"Speak plainer, please. We're stage ladies and cawnt understawnd yer furrin' lingo."

That good-looking younger brother of Anita Stewart, George, is making rapid strides to stardom, having been cast to play opposite Mildred Harris Chaplin in "Old Dad." George has only been out here a few months, but already has played important parts with both William Russell and Mary Miles Minter. His "pal" at this writing is "Buster" Collier, son of the famed Willie, who has come to Los Angeles on a vacation. George is working on a "set" adjoining his sister's at the studio. Anita is filming Kathleen Norris' magazine story, "Harriet and the Piper," which includes one of the most famous casts ever assembled in a picture. Ward Crane, remembered as the vile villain of "The Luck of the Irish," is the professional devastator of virtue again, while Charles Richman is the leading man and Irving Cummings figures prominently. And Myrtle Steadman plays a vampire.

And, at the same studio, House Peters and Jane Novak are co-stars in an Alaskan tale by Curwood which Edwin Carrewe is producing. Really, these Alaskan dramas made in sunny California are extraordinary. They get the snow effect by sprinkling the stage with a concoction which smells like mothballs and nearly depopulates the studio, while the sled-dogs, which actually hailed from the

Fit YOURSELF For Life's Fight

THERE'S no place in our live-wire business and social life for the weak, sickly man who is of no use to himself or anybody else. Health, Strength, Energy, and the Ability they give a man, to win SUCCESS, are the only qualities that count. Nobody will care anything about you, or even give you a second thought, if you go staggering through life with some miserable ailment, weakness, or bad habit making you a misfit in the busy, wide-awake world; holding you back, keeping you from doing anything worth while and slating you for the shell or junk heap before your time.

Get Out of the Rut

Don't be content to end your life a miserable failure. Don't let a sickly ailment ruin all your chances of success. It won't cure itself. You will never be any better until you exert your will, get hold of yourself, lift yourself out of the rut that is growing deeper every day you travel in it. YOU CAN DO IT. You can free yourself from the Constipation that is destroying the tissues of your body and brain; you can get rid of the Dyspepsia and Indigestion that make you feel as though you carried a millstone in your chest; you can cast off the shackles of any bad habit that is sapping your vitality and making you ashamed to face your fellow men. YOU CAN BE FREE FROM YOUR TROUBLES—strong, well, with every chance of making a success in the world, if you will WAKE UP!—Look the Facts squarely in the Face and ACT AT ONCE.

Win Back Your Health and Strength

I'll show you how to do it, in a way that has never failed. I have made a study of the methods whereby renewed VITALITY—bringing with it Health, Strength and Energy—is restored by Nature's own methods to the human organism. By these methods I built myself up, until today I am called the strongest man in the world. By them I have built up thousands of weak, ailing, despondent men and women, turned the watery fluid in their veins to rich, tissue-building blood; strengthened their vital organs, developed their muscles, external and internal; given them back health, happiness, hope, ambition and the joy to the full of Living Life. "Vivimus dum Vivamus"—"While we live let us LIVE!" the old Romans said; there's no use living at all, unless one can be well and strong and happy and ENJOY life while it lasts.

STRONGFORT
The Perfect Man

What NATURE, through the practice of Strongfortism, has done for others, she will do for YOU, if you will only give her half a chance. There isn't the slightest doubt about it.

STRONGFORTISM

Strongfortism is the Science of Living Life as NATURE meant it to be lived; of taking advantage in the utmost degree of the marvellous recuperative powers she has implanted in the human organism and letting her work the cure of any ills. Nature's way is the only safe, sure way of getting back lost health and strength. Her laws operate for every individual aile, and never fail. The methods I have incorporated in the system of Strongfortism and applied them with unerring success to my pupils in every part of the world. What NATURE, through the practice of Strongfortism, has done for others, she will do for YOU, if you will only give her half a chance. There isn't the slightest doubt about it.

Send for My Free Book. "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy" will tell you all about Strongfortism and show you how it can do for YOU what it has already done and is now doing for other weak, worn-out, ailing men and women. It makes no difference where you live or what your occupation is. You can practice Strongfortism in the privacy of your own bedroom, if you like, and gain the utmost benefit, if you will devote to it as little as fifteen or twenty minutes a day. You will notice the improvement, physically and mentally, within a few days after you begin, and your friends will notice your improved appearance as well. SEND FOR THE BOOK NOW. Don't put it off. Every day counts when your vitality is ebbing away. THE BOOK IS FREE, but you gladly would pay a good price for it, if you knew what it would bring you. Fill out the coupon and enclose it with three 2c stamps to cover packing and postage, and I will mail you with the book a special letter regarding the points you are most interested in.

wouldn't take a chance of their being laid up, even if they wanted to take the chance themselves, which very frequently they did not. He quit doubling when he was given his first part in support of Jackie Saunders. He went from Balboa to Al Christie and then became a "free-lance." He has been married for three years and has an eighteen-months-old baby girl.

"Is her hair curly?" I asked.

"Not as much so as we could wish. Her mother has beautiful hair—auburn—the baby is blonde.

"One thing I am thankful for," he said, "is that I can't imagine myself being handed a part which would be entirely outside my experience in life. I've done a little bit of every kind of work. I've been in fairly comfortable circumstances and I've been very badly up against it." His worst experience of this kind was during the influenza epidemic only a year ago.

"I was free-lancing then," he said, "and, like most actors, I used to spend everything I made as fast as I could make it. Then along came the influenza and closed all the studios. I didn't let my wife know how badly off we were. I simply suggested that she visit her mother while I spend several weeks in Los Angeles looking for some sort of engagement. Of course, there were no engagements to be had anywhere. I began to pawn things. The last to go was my dress-suit. I remember thinking, as I came out of that pawnshop, that if I did get an engagement I wouldn't have anything to wear. But the studios remained closed and I lived for three weeks on oatmeal mush without any sugar or milk to make it more palatable."

But there's no more oatmeal mush ahead of Landis.

BALLADE OF INDIFFERENCE

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

The Phyllis changed grave moods to gay,
And Phoebe's smile made sorrow flee,
The Amaryllis' eyes of grey
And laughing mouth were good to see;
The Chloe dimpled merrily,
And Dolly's glances once were dear,
They left my fickle heart-strings free—
What matter smiles of yesteryear?

Tho once when Gladys said me nay,
I sighed an hour at her decree;
Tho Sybil scorned my wish to stay
And gave no heed unto my plea;
Tho sometimes Julia held the key
That bared my heart to hope and fear,
For these I write no elegy—
What matter woes of yesteryear?

Tho Audrey in her blithesome way
Would quip and jest with roguish glee,
And Alice made the dullest day
Glow bright with wit and jollity,
Tho Jocelyn paid hourly fee
In cleverness that I might hear,
Tho all were charming, I agree—
What matter words of yesteryear?

Dearest, you know I'd rather be Discussing bread and kisses here—
Where other maids mean naught to me—
What matter loves of yesteryear?

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

JUST AGNES.—Why dont you have some good pictures taken and send them in to the Fame and Fortune Contest? There's no use talking to you, because persons in love generally resolve first and reason afterwards. Margaret Shelby is playing opposite her sister in "Jenny Be Good."

MAYOVE S.—Why speak of the North Pole this nice weather? Robert E. Peary, then a commander in the U. S. Navy, reached the North Pole on April 6, 1909. He survived the Arctic winters, but he could not survive ours. The U. S. Government raised him to Rear-Admiral. Is Conway Tearle married? Ha, ha, he, he, and likewise ho, ho! Yes, to Adele Rowland.

PEARL WHITE'S DOUBLE.—Yes, sure, come in any time. You say you would be willing to hide in an ashcan just to get a peep at Robert Leonard. Very well, you have my permission, but you'll have to ask Mae Murray. Yes, May Allison in "The Walk-Offs."

B. E. H.—No, Lewis J. Cody's name is not pronounced like a fish. Both at Los Angeles, Cal. I think they would. By all means enclose the quarter. You say you have named your pet kitten "Tony Lew," alter Tony Moreno and Lew Cody. I'm sure the two gentlemen will feel highly honored. You dont like Tony in serials. Neither do I. He should be vamping in star dramas.

J. T. B.—Figure it out for yourself. According to "Elliott on Usury," one cent, loaned Jan. 1, A. D. 1, drawing interest at six per cent., compounded annually, on Jan. 1, 1895, would amount to $8,497,840,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000. It would take 610,070,000,000,000,000 spheres of gold the size of our earth to pay the debt.

TOODLES.—I'm listening! Yes, and one half of the world doesn't know how the other half lives—until it comes out in the divorce courts. Dot Gish is up at Mamaroneck, N. Y. It would take up too much room to print the cast of "Hearts of the World." Send a stamped, addressed envelope and I will send it to you. Mary Pickford's hair is real, and I might add, her own.

FAGGAY ANN.—So you think I am a pretty good old scout. No, not old scout, for in spite of my 79 winters, I am still a Boy Scout. Oh, I still have my eye teeth and my wisdom teeth, and several others. King Vidor played in "The Turn in the Road" and "The Family Honor." He also produced "The Other Half" and he is now producing "The Jack Knife Man."

LITTLE BROWN-EYED VAMP.—Once and for all, everybody join in the chorus, Richard Barthelmess is not married. You say you have "wonderful limbs and a beautiful form" in a bathing suit. Page Mack Sennett, J. Stuart Blackton produced "The House of the Tolling Bell."

F. P., MILWAUKEE.—A once famous city. From two to five years. Al St. John in "Trouble." He's always in trouble. Mary Miles Minter in "Jenny Be Good." "The More Excellent Way" is an old Vitagraph, but just being released with Anita Stewart.

HELEN A.—Yes, so long as our hearts possess desires, our minds will foster delusions. Harry Morey was in North Carolina. Blanche Sweet in "Leona Goes a-Hunting." Robert Ellis is directing. Couldn't give you that cast here. Takes up too much room.

ALCIDE, VANCOUVER.—Yes, send it in. Mary Pickford and Harold Goodwin played in "Heart of the Hills." Universal produced "The Devil's Passkey." Please, please, do not compare my energy with that of Niagara Falls, nor with perpetual motion. They both started before I did and will not finish till centuries after I am done.

LOONEY.—Write it in English. Reminds me of Garibaldi, Italy's famous patriot, who once wrote a novel which was published in six languages, but never paid in any. Yes, Mary Miles Minter in "Nurse Marjorie." The expression "A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush" is from Don Quixote. I'm sure she will write you.

MOVIE FAN.—You have Norma Talmadge's correct address. Be patient. She is a very busy little lady. Constance Binney, Realart Pictures, 469 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. Bessie Love played in "The Midlanders."

LARGE.—Thanks for the fee, old chappie! Mr. and Mrs. Charlie Chaplin are not Jewish. Neither is Martha Mansfield, but Mr. Florenz Ziegfeld and Mr. Joseph Schenck are. But what difference does it make? Sure write again. Pleasant company is always accepted.

HUGH M. B., WILDSVILLE.—Little late, but the best I could do. You can reach Irene Castle, Fort Lee, N. J. A little advice I had given to me some 70 years ago: Whenever you make an "improvement" in any direction, look out that you do not sacrifice more than it is worth, in some other matter.

JACK HOLT'S FAN.—Yes, it is true that Clarine Seymour died on April 25th at the Misericordia Hospital, New York City, following an operation for intestinal trouble. You will remember her in "The Idol Dancer" and on the cover of March CLASSIC. You want to see more of Jack Holt. Ruth Roland is still on the coast, but is expected East this summer.

KAKI.—Do you know, Kaki, you are a wise little guy? He who learns what is good and embraces it, and what is bad and avoids it, is as wise as Socrates who said it, and that's you, my lad. Yes, Adele Rowland, now playing in "Irene" on Broadway, is Conway Tearle's last wife. Walter McGrail is not married. Dont believe all you hear. Constance Talmadge isn't married at this writing, and is not likely to be at the next.

MISS CURIOSITY.—You see our story is written from the scenario, and very often the director changes the scenes and the scenario is never corrected to conform to the scenes. William Faversham is playing in "The Man Who Lost Himself." Alice Lake is with Western Metro, Los Angeles, Cal. Howard Ralston was Jimmie.

The Shamrock Girl

By FRITZI REMONT

LIKE a shuttle, weaving in and out, the fate line of Thelma Percy caused her earlier years to be spent in Ireland and America. Ireland, the birthplace of their mother, was the strongest attraction Eileen and Thelma knew. Mrs. Percy and the children were quite as well known in Dublin as New York, for the winters spent in the latter, hard at work, and the summers given over to flying trips to Erin's Isle, won them many friends in both cities.

The Percy children really never had a childhood like other kiddies, at least so Thelma relates.

"One day, mother was riding in a street-car in New York, with Eileen sitting beside her and holding me on her lap, when a gentleman moved across and begged mother to let Eileen pose for him, as he was a great artist. The next day found my sister at the studio, with mother and me looking on. And so it went on for

Thelma Percy, just turned sixteen, has been on the stage ever since she could barely walk. She is a Universal favorite, and is bending all her energy toward successful screen portrayals weeks and weeks, until the time when I was barely able to lisp and trot about, when a New York theatrical manager called at the atelier and saw us. He told mother we should be stage children—and the outcome of that interview was that we both went on the stage. We really never had time for play like other children, for I soon began to pose also, and at night we were back of the footlights.

"Our lives weren't eventful; our schooling was greatly interrupted; we learnt as we could, with mother to teach and hear our lessons. I'm sorry we missed school—I often look regretfully at the girls in Hollywood, so carefree, going to high school or some finishing academy!"

Little Thelma Percy, just turned sixteen, sweet-faced, wistful—with her strong personality, the independence of her Irish forebears and the courage which one always associates with her race, looked at me very soberly. We were chatting in a quiet little office at the Universal, while from without came the sounds of neighing nags, cussing cowboys and dozens of laughing extras.

"I wouldn't regret that—you have traveled so much that you have learnt much more than most girls of your age. Reading will do the rest, don't you think so?" I comforted the ambitious little soul.

"That is what mother always said. She told us to keep our eyes open, to study people, to remember what we saw at the art galleries and museums, and to make good use of every moment spent on trains or steamers. I really am in motion pictures just to please mother, for I love the stage life best of all.

"Mother passed away four years ago. She used to pray always that I could get into pictures so that I might not have to travel about alone after she was gone. Eileen had no difficulty in getting in, but you see, I was at the age when I had outgrown childhood and was unable to take little girl parts longer, for I had grown terribly fat! Could anything be worse than a fat little girl of twelve?

"So after mother left us, and I was thirteen, my guardian put me into a private school back East, and I studied hard to catch up with other girls. Then, a year ago, I came here to live with Eileen, and I just simply walked into pictures. Mother's prayers must have made the way easy for me—I don't think mothers forget their children no matter where they are, do you?"

"And you played leads from the start, didn't you?"

"Yes, I guess it was the lucky shamrock that I always carry in my little locket which must have brought me so much good fortune—a lovely home with Eileen, new parents, the dearest little French bulldog, and all the new friends in California. Eileen's mother and father-in-law have simply adopted me—I'm their baby, they say. We didn't have time for play when we were young, but we are all making up for it now. Eileen's home is so jolly and lively," she finished.

"But your pictures look so much older than you, how do you manage that?"

"Oh, I've tried out make-ups over and over again. The directors would suggest something, or one of the players here, and I've changed a number of times. I think in all my photographs I look at least twenty now, for I changed my hair-dressing to give me a grown-up air."

We had been talking about moods, for sundry girls strolled in to share our gos-

"Tonight I'm going Decolleté, thanks to Electric Massage!"

DOES your figure permit you to wear the prettiest of evening frocks? Then resolve that this embarrassing condition is going to be changed! In the privacy of your own boudoir soothing electric massage brings back the roses of youth into your cheeks, keeps your hair and scalp in fine, healthy condition and develops your figure into one of graceful lines and girlish contour.

The woman of fastidious tastes, young or old, realizes that beauty is but a natural reflection of health. Wrinkles, "crow's feet," eyes that have lost their youthful sparkle, obesity and other unwelcome facial blemishes are, to a great extent at least, brought on by what we term "the strenuous life." Muscles are sure to become weary and congested unless they get relaxation. And complexions are certain to suffer unless properly taken care of. Home electric massage is recognized as the building-up process nearest to Nature's.

The Star Vibrator should be your "beauty parlor." Used and endorsed by stage and screen celebrities for beauty helps, and fatigue, nervous headaches, insomnia. Ideal after motoring, golfing or bathing. Keeps your skin at its best! On sale and demonstrated free of charge at most drug, department and electrical stores. Or direct from us. Fitzgerald Mfg. EGERIA GEM CO., C-113 Point St., Providence, R. I.

sipping hour. Several of them confessed to enjoying deep-dyed indigo spells. There were some who loved to irrigate the midnight pillow, others who thought it silly to weep, and so quite a discussion followed.

Thelma Percy listened interestedly. One of her charms is the sympathetic manner in which she shares one's confidences and admissions. When every one had added a personal bit, Miss Percy said, in her sweet contralto voice:

"When I am very happy, I am very quiet. When I am happiest, I cry. There is something very solemn about true happiness, I think."

We all stopped, amazed. I don't think any one had ever pigeonholed bliss in quite so original a fashion.

"Then when you are really sad, do you laugh?" It was a chorus of minds with but a single thought focused on what promised to be a contradictory mood.

"I may not laugh, but I smile. I don't like them to know when I am hurt," confessed the blonde beauty who had beguiled Sessue Hayakawa in the very first photodrama she attempted.

And the queer part of it is, that her courage doesn't extend to stunt acting. They are careful of the Shamrock Girl on the "U" lot; no daredevil riding feats or hard plunges are her share of the work. She swims, drives, plays tennis and enjoys long walks with her little dog, but she's not charmed with horsebacking.

Thelma's days are full of duties. She is not the sort of girl who would shirk any responsibility. The years of work, from the time she had her third birthday cake, have given her a serious trend of thought. At the end of each day she waits for the rushes of her picture; at night she visits motion pictures or the theater. She is studying plot construction, make-up—and most of all—Norma Talmadge. She even goes to old runs of Norma's plays, and has enthroned that popular star as her model actress and the screen's highest art exponent.

"The bystanders on the 'U' lot are a great help to me," broke in Thelma. "They don't bother us—oh, no. But sometimes they say things so worth while. The other day an older woman spoke to a young girl with her, and pointing to me, probably thinking I was not within earshot, said, 'How much better that little girl would look if she pushed her hair off her face.'"

"I had never thought of that, but at the end of the day I tried out her idea and found she was right. In following scenes I wore my hair off the forehead, and everybody said that it looked so much improved. I think impartial observers are very helpful to the photoplayer. I'm often in receipt of very valuable advice from the fans. I don't like serials much, but they say that one becomes well known by appearing weekly, and I do know my fan letters are coming in stronger daily. I would like to do legitimate comedy."

Oh, that delightful, smooth, sweet, clean feeling that comes from using Boncilla Beautifier! No woman desirous of a beautiful skin should ever be without this perfect toilet requisite—Ethel Clayton.

Boncilla Beautifier

Prepared from Mme. Boncilla's famous formula

CLEARs THE COMPLEXION
REMOVES BLACKHEADS
LIFTS OUT THE LINES
CLOSES ENLARGED PORES

Gives the skin a velvety softness and youthful texture. You can now take these treatments yourself by a simple application of this wonderful preparation.

In a few minutes after applied you feel the soothing, lifting sensation that assures you of its work of youthful restoration. It lifts out the lines.

Boncilla Beautifier is more than a skin treatment. It acts on the muscles and tissues of the face, giving a firmness and youthfulness in place of any sagging of the skin or tissues of the face. It also renews the circulation of the blood in the face, giving it a renewed fresh, clear, radiant glow of health.

You will note the improvement from the first treatment. Use twice a week until you get the face free from lines and other imperfections, then occasionally to keep it so.

You shall not be disappointed, for if it does not fully satisfy you, we return to you the full price paid, as per our guarantee with each jar.

If your dealer will not supply you promptly, send $1.56 covering price and Revenue Stamps.

in search of the Great Unknown; in quest of life-around-the-corner; seeking the hidden mystery of life, and the beauty thereof!

Perhaps you hear the Call in the softness of a summer day. The Spirit of Wanderlust dances before you. You feel the fragrant mist of the out-of-doors; you peer into the mystery of unknown places.

Perhaps you are so situated that you are unable to answer the Call—you can only feel it tugging at your heart-strings. To you, SHADOWLAND, The Magazine Beautiful, comes like the magic carpet of the old fairy-tale. It transports you wheresoever you wish to go. You float on the White Sail of Imagery into unknown ports, haunting in their colorful romance, their vividness. It places the world in your hands, your fingers on the pulse of the world of Art, of Literature, of Drama, of Fashion.

We are quite proud of our August number of SHADOWLAND, The Magazine Beautiful, for it is replete with our best literary and artistic efforts. Among them a clever, whimsical review on current books by the inimitable Heywood Brown.

There is a beautiful playlet of reincarnation by Katherine Metcalf Roof.

The much discussed Theater Guild is brought before you in an interesting fashion by the pen of Frederick James Smith, and among the other articles of unusual interest are the "Reflections of a Gentle Cynic," by Lisa Ysaye Tarleau, and a humorous review of the theater season by Louis Raymond Reid.

to have been listening to Miss Percy's voice with pleasure. It's the deep, resonant contralto which one often hears in older women of the stage.

"Dont you sing, Miss Percy?"

"I sang and danced for years on the stage, but now it's just a case of singing when I have time. I want to study voice culture in a few years; as long as I'm only sixteen, I might as well let it develop a bit more, dont you think so?"

Well . . . I think a girl who has worked hard from three to sixteen ought to be free to enjoy youth, dancing, frolics . . . and if Thelma Percy is bending all her energies toward successful screen portrayals, her evenings should be work-free.

But some day, I hope she'll study singing, for she is as sure to return to the speaking stage or light opera as there are stars in a cinema heaven!

Yet the dear colleen doesn't know just how talented she is.

So the career of Thelma Percy from sixteen to twenty will be an interesting psychological study, without doubt.

IN A MOTION PICTURE SHOW

By TED OLSON

A face like yours smiled to me from the screen
One poignant, fleeting moment, and was gone.

I sank down in the seat, and all unseen
The picture changed; a new reel flickered on.

I bowed my head unheeding; thru my tears
The dim gates of the past swung wide apart;
Out of the reek and dust of lonely years
I caught your memory back into my heart.

I had forgotten you. With how much pain
I had built up a wall to bar you out;
Swearing that never could you come again
To drug my life with bitterness and doubt.

And I had won—was free—until that face
Came smiling in, laughed the gates open wide,
And brought you back, in all your old-time grace.

Your song, your youth, your beauty—and your pride.

The pride that broke my heart. And from the screen
That face like yours smiled down at me again,

And suddenly my tired heart was clean—
Purged of its weight of bitterness and pain.

After the weary years of wasted grief
So good it was to think again of you,
I banished doubt, caught back the old belief,
Forgave you, dear, and pledged my love anew.

The last reel flickered past and died. "Good-night"
Flared large upon the screen. I stumbled forth.

The rain was done; the streets were pools of light;
Between the clouds one star laughed in the north.

And in that star your smile . . . Oh, movie maid,

So much like her whom I may never see,
God grant that some day it may be repaid—
The gift you gave—dreams, and a memory.

Portraits of Your Favorites

TWENTY-FOUR LEADING PLAYERS

What is a home without pictures, especially of those one likes or admires? How they brighten up bare walls and lend a touch of human sympathy, alike to the homes of the rich and poor!

And what could better serve the purpose of decoration for the homes of motion picture enthusiasts than portraits of the great film stars, who have become world famous?

The publishers of the three leading motion picture monthlies, the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, have accordingly prepared at great expense, especially for their subscribers, an unusually fine set of portraits of twenty-four of the leading players.

These portraits are 5½" x 8" in size, just right for framing, printed in rich brown tones by rotogravure, a process especially adapted to portrait reproductions, and are artistic, accurate and high-grade in every way.

You will like these portraits, you will enjoy picking out your favorites. You will delight in framing them to be hung where you and your friends may see them often.

had worked for so earnestly, and the fifteen and twenty dollars per week the star players had valued so highly. A little girl, with a mass of golden curls and eager little face reflecting each passing thought, stood in line and held out her hand for her envelope containing her weekly salary of fifteen dollars. The pride and joy on the little face was delightful to behold. A check flashed across the screen. It was the little girl's weekly salary of today, and the face of the director grew slightly pale!

How young they all had been in those days! How full of the joy of life! Obstacles were overthrown before they had really put in an appearance, and nothing had been too difficult to accomplish; with a company of one player and three directors, they were wont to produce anywhere from four to six pictures a week, and such pictures! With the audacity of youth, rushing in where angels feared to tread, they would blithely start about presenting before the public more or less authentic presentations of such plays as "Romeo and Juliet," "Rip Van Winkle," "Pickwick Papers," "Vanity Fair," "The Christian," "Thomas à Becket," "Abraham's Sacrifice," not to mention "The Love of John Ruskin" or "How Washington Crossed the Delaware," "Cardinal Wolsey" and "The Spanish Revolt of 1836." Nothing was beyond their reach! And how really greatly they had acted! Florence Turner, the first leading woman of any company, creating a sensation when her name appeared in conjunction with the name of the play, as hitherto no actor or actress had ever been mentioned by any of the film companies. And the dashing Maurice Costello, the first of the matinée idols and the most popular man in all Christendom, his homage coming from all parts of the world. And then there was the older group, the pioneer players of the silversheet, consisting of Mrs. Mary Maurice, known as the "Sweet old lady of the screen," and Van Dyke Brooke, William Shea and Charles Kent and many others who had grown to be dim shadows in the obliterating passage of time.

Many of these beloved comrades of youth's golden hours had died; many others had grown old and were scattered about the four corners of the earth. Some had disappeared completely; and some, the youngest members of the group, had now come into their own, and were world-famous.

A timid knock sounded on the door, and as a tired man stirs in his sleep, mutely protesting against disturbance, the wanderer on the Road of Memory came reluctantly back from his journey. A sigh slowly fell from his lips. He thought not upon the glory and wonder of his recent achievements, but as he rose to answer the knock and to enter again the world of realities, a suspicious brightness appeared in his eye, and his heart yearned over the gay phantom of Youth now vanishing around the Corner of the Past.

Teach Piano 1/4 Usual Time

I now have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. There isn't a state in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players who obtain their entire training from me by mail.

Yet when I first started in 1891, I was nearly laughed out of business. Could I have overcome this prejudice and increased my students every year for a quarter century unless my method produced "RESULTS"? Send for free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

I use modern methods and time-saving devices which cannot be used by others because they are patented. My invention, the Colorotone, enables you to play interesting pieces in every key, within four lessons. My moving-picture device, Quinn-Dex, shows you every movement of my hand at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move, just as if thrown on the screen. The Colorotone and Quinn-Dex save you months and years of wasted energy. They can be obtained only from me, and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them. Investigate without cost.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—and my lessons cost you only 45 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. Practical and easy to understand.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. Practise in spare time at home. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. Ditions granted. Special reduced terms this month. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 84-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

Miss Seymour was a firm believer in luck. "I was going down to San Diego on a motor trip with friends on the very day Mr. Griffith sent for me. In fact, I was just getting into the car when the message came. I asked my friends to drive by the Griffith studios, telling them it would only take a few minutes to see Mr. Griffith. Then, to my amazement, he signed me on the spot and had me get into make-up for my first scene. So I went out and told my friends." That is how Miss Seymour came to play in "The Girl Who Stayed at Home."

Luck again asserted itself when Mr. Griffith was filming "Scarlet Days." The rôle of the little Mexican was not in the original story at all. Mr. Griffith noted Miss Seymour standing close by, watching some of the scenes, and he said, "Do you want to play a bit in this picture?" Miss Seymour jumped at the chance, and the comedy scene, in which the fiery little native girl bumps her head against that of the goat, was devised. The episode proved so amusing that Mr. Griffith elaborated the rôle until it became the best remembered character in the photoplay.

Miss Seymour remained unaffected and girlish thru her first taste of success. Never will we forget how she said: "I want to go on working and learning for a long time yet. Then if I am worth it, I hope for stardom—like all the rest."

It wasn't to be. Yet film fans are going to keep a place in their heart of hearts for "Cutie Beautiful," who gave her all to the screen. How much that might have been we can only guess. We do know that she had won a place unique upon the silversheet.

Wanted: Screen Faces for the Movies

Hundreds of All Types Needed. You May Have Perfect Screen-Features

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for you to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

Ralph Ince, famous Selznick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his work in directing Mary Pickford, says: "I am convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." P. A. Powers of Universal, says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King, P. A. Powers of Universal, and other picture directors.

This is a fascinating profession paying big salaries. Don't miss this opportunity. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrapping of this new guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-4, Wilmington, Delaware.

"From Within---Without"

By LILLIAN MONTANYE

CHARLES MILLER slumped his big form down on the leather couch in the Realart projection room and inquired, politely, if he could smoke. He also apologized for the immense smoked glasses he was wearing and for his general appearance of all-in-ness.

"Have been working steadily thirty-six hours, cutting film," he said, "and I got mad about something this morning which always makes me sick. No, it's not temperament, it's temper—just as it is when the furnace man gets mad because clinkers clog up his grates. I was not brought up to believe in temperament. It's 'The Law of the Yukon' I'm cutting, you know. My first Mayflower production for Realart."

"And what do you think of it as far as you have gone?"

Charles Miller has been "in harness" all his life. After many years in stock, he played under the management of Charles Frohman, Charles Harris, David Belasco and others. He was a very popular matinee idol at one time, and will long be remembered for his portrayal of the hero in "The Great Divide." Center, Mr. Miller and June Elvidge in an off moment up at Port Henry—while filming "The Law of the Yukon"

"Sick and tired of it. Wish I had never to hear of it again," and then he relaxed, and his face became as the face of a mother who broods over a troublesome and best loved child. Weariness forgotten, the big voice and dominant personality that made him one of the best-known characters of the speaking stage visualized for me the making of "The Law of the Yukon."

"Talk about the 'frozen North.' It was right there at Port Henry, N. Y., where we created our 'Alaskan village'; and while the blizzards worked suffering and financial loss in various

Reel Realities

DE LUXE motion picture theaters continue to be built thruout America.

Each offers its feature photoplay, its symphony orchestra, its program of smaller pictures and its incidental musical interludes. The method of better class motion picture presentation has been standardized.

So it will continue for the present. But we foresee screen theaters devoted to various kind of cinema entertainment, just as various kinds of theatrical entertainment have their differentiated audiences. There will be the smaller motion picture theater devoted to the thought photoplay, the larger house given over to the presentation of the film melodrama, possibly a home for screen comedy. One will know just the type of entertainment one is to see before one enters a theater. All this is still a fantastic bit of imagination, for the photoplay making is merely an industry—yet.

Photoplay producers are beginning to discover the advisability of aping the stage in reviving successful film plays. By reviving we do not mean merely re-releasing revised dramas with new captions.

Companies are purchasing screen plays from other concerns and presenting them in new form with new players. Some day we shall perhaps see "The Birth of a Nation" with a brand new cast, "The Miracle Man" re-done and "Broken Blossoms" reproduced. And, like theater old-timers, we will probably seize our cane, hobble to our feet and declare loudly that the new versions are not nearly so good as the originals—that the palmy days of the films have passed.

The theory that a screen star's average of popularity runs five years is stupid reasoning. There is no reason why players cannot grow old retaining the favor of their fans. Why not?

The photoplay is too young to point to any specific instances. Pioneers of cinema acting are still in their teens. Boys like Bobbie Harron can talk of the very first days of the photoplay from first-hand experiences.

The point is made that many favorites have flashed upon the screen, enjoyed their brief favor and disappeared. But there have been real reasons for each disappearance. Some of these favorites deliberately retired, some dissipated their abilities and some—let's whisper this—had no ability.

For centuries stage players have grown old while retaining their place in the affections of audiences. There are hundreds of instances. Why cannot motion picture stars do the same thing? Just as Ethel Barrymore played ingénues comparatively recently and is now portraying mature women of the world, so will Mary Pickford's art graduate and mellow. Thirty years from now Miss Pickford, Charlie Chaplin and Charlie Ray should be as popular as they are today—if they wish to be. Their rôles will be different, that's all.

Speaking of acting, the histrionic level is far in advance of ten years ago. Remember when a merely handsome hero was accepted, when any sort of fillem cutie passed for feminine genius? The manikin-doll days have gone.

To be sure, movie producers still seize upon every bit of feminine charm and masculine ability that asserts itself above the cinema surface. Witness the quick stardom just accorded Richard Barthelmess, Bebe Daniels and Wanda Hawley. But the ultimate fate of a star rests with the audience. More than mere photographic appeal is necessary. Fans demand acting ability these days.

The organization of motion picture publicity men—the Associated Motion Picture Advertisers—has launched a movement to interest the newspapers of the country in the publication of screen news. They reason—and reason very logically—that newspapers devote page after page to sporting gossip when, at the most, but 75 per cent. of the masculine readers are actively interested in these columns. On the other hand, most newspapers publish absolutely nothing in the way of cinema information, altho 98 per cent. of both masculine and feminine readers go to see pictures and are actively interested. Why?

It is because newspaper proprietors and editors do not comprehend the need and the demand. But it will come.

The frenzied era of the star has just ended. By this we do not mean that stars will cease to be. We do mean that the photoplay does not revolve around them as formerly.

The era of the director is here. It will probably go to the extreme of the previous star period.

The era of the author is dawning, indeed, if it has not already reached its high noon. Producers are paying up to $150,000 for stories. Thirty thousand is but an average screen price for a stage play or novel.

After these periods exhaust themselves and stars, directors and authors have retired to wealth and rest, we hope for the dawn of another era: that of the audience.

We are heartily wearied of hearing producers, stars, directors and scenarioists talking loudly and confidently of what the public wants. Too long the exhibitor has been a stone wall blocking the public on every side. The exhibitor must improve and he must take his audience into his confidence; the present powers-that-be in the film world must cease to think that the photoplay depends wholly upon them individually; and the audience must have an active voice—or we fear for the photoplay of, say, 1925.

For the daily siesta—

The hot nights—

For any of the periods of time in which the body is resting while the mind is wide-awake and keenly alert.

Every reader of this issue will be delighted with the interview which Adele Whitely Fletcher had with Alice Brady not so long ago. Alice has confided to Miss Fletcher her innermost thoughts upon certain interesting phases of life.

There have been so many demands for an interview with Monroe Salisbury that we had to wire our Elizabeth Peltret to see him at once. She did!

Jerome Lachenbruch has written an unusual article on the association and influence of music on the silversheet.

The gloriously vivid Doris Keane, heroine of "Romance," has been interviewed by Gladys Hall.

And the latest follower in the footsteps of the irresistible Anatol, Eric von Stroheim, has been pinned down to a series of unique confessions by James Fredericks.

It goes without saying that the novelizations will be the best to be had—and the photographs likewise.

All the Metro stars got a thrill the other day when the daughter of a real ex-President visited them. She was Helen Taft, daughter of the famous Bill, who is herself president of Bryn Mawr College. She came in an effort to raise an endowment fund for her university and was royally entertained during her stay here. May Allison conducted her on a Cook's tour thru the studio, while Viola Dana hurriedly picked a bunch of daisies—Bryn Mawr's flower—and presented it to Miss Taft. It was Miss Taft's first glimpse of a picture studio.

It pays to be vamped! At least, it paid Rosemary Theby $250 for one day's experience with Lew Cody. There was a difficult part in the Cody story, "The Butterfly Man," which called for an experienced leading lady. Miss Theby had journeyed to the studio to see a friend. Cody was wondering whom he could get for the "ruination" experience and Rosemary said she'd play the part—which she did at the rate of $50 a kiss.

The widely read story, "The Jack-knife Man," by Ellis Parker Butler, has been filmed by King Vidor.

Page a profiteer! Louise Glaum has driven 'em so successfully away from Culver City that there isn't one to be found. Reason? Overalls! By the simple expedient of making the matter of attire a civic function, Miss Glaum has thrown a bombshell into the profiteer ranks. In fact, she threw a bombshell into the community in general when she appeared at luncheon one day clad in overalls. Chief in her support of the mode were James Kirkwood, her leading man; Wesley Ruggles, her director; Joseph Kilgour, and even J. Parker Read, Jr., producer of the Glaum plays. It started quite a fad, and now Mabel Normand asserts that she's gonna wear overalls, too.

Cecil B. de Mille has given us "Something to Think About"—a new picture, different from anything he has ever done before—and also a chance, once again, to view Elliott Dexter. Dexter has been ill and off the screen for more than a year. Nobody seemed to forget him, however, for his "fan" mail deluged the studio continually at the rate of 2,000 letters a week. In the new De Mille picture no one would ever know that Elliott has been an invalid. He's as handsome as ever and the screen love he makes to Gloria Swanson is quite as ardent as of yore.

You can see them everywhere

This new method is used on millions of teeth now. Wherever you look you see the results of it. You see glistening teeth—teeth you envy, probably. And you know they are well cared for.

You can learn the way, without cost, by a simple ten-day test. And we urge you to make it now. There are few things more important.

Those Pretty Teeth

No Cloudy Film-Coat on Them

This is How Millions Now Get Them

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

Millions of people have found the way to whiter, cleaner, safer teeth. This is to urge that you accept a ten-day test. See how it changes your teeth, then decide about it by the visible results.

They fight film

Modern research shows that the cause of most tooth troubles is a viscous film. You can feel it with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. So brushing has left much of it intact. And night and day, on countless teeth, it may do a ceaseless damage.

It is this film-coat which discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So few escape the troubles caused by film.

The way to end it

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat film.

Able authorities have proved its efficiency by clinical and laboratory tests. Now leading dentists everywhere advise it.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And this new-day tooth paste, in all ways, complies with modern dental requirements.

To make it known quickly to the millions who need it, a 10-Day Tube is being sent to everyone who asks.

Based on pepsin

The film is albuminous matter. So Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The object is to dissolve the film, then to constantly combat it.

Pepsin long seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But dental science has now found a harmless activating method. Now pepsin can be every day applied, and forced by the brush where the film goes.

It complies with all modern requirements. So in three great ways this dentifrice surpasses all the former methods. Now every family should at once find out how much this method means.

The results are quick and apparent

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the fixed film disappears.

Pepsodent needs no argument. You will see the results when you try it. And the book we send explains the reason for them.

Compare your teeth now with your teeth in ten days. The facts will be a revelation to you. Decide by those results then between the old ways and the new. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

Popularity Contest Awards

Sixth Prize

THE new Popularity Contest, unusual and entertaining, is already the object of great interest — unflinching and rife. If you have entered it or have read the announcements which have appeared, and will appear, from time to time, containing the rules and regulations, you know it is actually a double contest—a contest in which both the public and players are equally interested.

The prizes depicted above and below were selected after much careful thought and attention and each one is destined to make some one happier, from the beautiful Crescent phonograph which suggests a twilight hour with the gems musical geni have given to the world, to the Marble nickel-plated axe which brings to mind a jolly time in some invitingly green woodland.

Perhaps you have not yet decided to enter the contest—if not do so now. Don't lose an opportunity of enjoying the unique entertainment it affords or of capturing one of the lovely and useful awards.

FIRST PRIZE

Crescent Phonograph, piano mahogany finish (value $160). Plays all makes of disc records: Victor, Columbia, Pathe, Edison, Emerson, etc., without the use of extra attachments or intricate adjustments; a simple turn of the sound-box is all that is necessary in changing from a lateral cut record to playing a hill and dale cut record.

A Crescent owner can enjoy a repertoire of the greatest opera singers, popular songs, dance music or anything that is turned out of the disc record. The tone of the Crescent is full, round, deep and mellow. It has a large compartment for records.

First

SECOND PRIZE

Movette Camera and three packages of films (value $65). Compact, light, efficient, easily operated. Think of the possibilities during your vacation trip — your canoe trip—in pictures — pictures of your family or friends—living pictures that you can project at any time in your home. A priceless record of your life.

THIRD PRIZE

Corona Typewriter with case (value $50); an all-round portable typewriter, light enough and small enough to be carried anywhere, and strong enough to stand any possible condition of travel. It is trim and symmetrical and does not give one's study the atmosphere of a business office. Fold it up and take it with you anywhere.

FOURTH PRIZE

Sheaffer "Giftie" Combination Set, consisting of a Sheaffer Fountain Pen and a Sheaffer Sharp-Point Pencil, in a handsome plush-lined box. Gold filled, warranted twenty years. Cannot blot or leak. A beautiful and perfect writing instrument.

FIFTH PRIZE

Bristol steel Casting Rod agate guide, cork grip, strong and durable. Packed in linen case. Can be easily put in traveling bag.

SIXTH PRIZE

Loughlin Safety Self-Filling Fountain Pen. No extensions to remember, no locks to forget.

SEVENTH PRIZE

Star Vibrator, handsomely finished in nickel plate with three attachments. Altering current. Excellent for massage. Use it in your own home.

EIGHTH PRIZE

Same as Seventh Prize.

NINTH PRIZE

Marble nickel-plated pocket axe of tool steel, carefully tempered and sharpened. Indispensable in camp or woods.

Fifth Prize

Seventh and Eighth Prizes

Greatest of All Popularity Contests

Unique Competition in Which the Voters Share in the Prizes

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

SHADOWLAND, MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, and MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide awake and well informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read SHADOWLAND, the MAGAZINE and CLASSIC.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2 provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on September 30, 1920.
2. There will be ten ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
July	1920 ballot
August	1920 ballot
September	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for SHADOWLAND every month, and the same for MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and yet again the same for CLASSIC. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

cities they were certainly of incalculable value to us in obtaining the Yukon effects we wanted for our picture. We left orders to be called when a storm broke at night and every one would tumble out with enthusiasm, and what wonderful shots of driving storms we did get! Our village was snowed under at one time and we had considerable trouble with the lights. We were up there three months—seventy of us, most of the time in Port Henry's solitary hotel. It is usually a fact that such an experience tries the nerves to the breaking point. But we didn't have a bit of trouble. We were just a big happy family and got along much better than most families!

“And the townspeople—they were more interested in us than we were in ourselves. They entertained us in their homes and clubs. They extended us every assistance and coöperation and when we left, the Chamber of Commerce sent us a letter telling us how pleasant an experience it had been to have us there. I found many types among the natives, too, for the extras I needed in the picture. I used them in the courtroom scenes and in the many dance-hall scenes. They made exactly the right atmosphere, and they didn't act all over the place either!

“This is the Law of the Yukon, that only the strong shall thrive;
That surely the weak shall perish, and only the fit survive.
Dissolute, damned and despairful, crippled and palsied and slain,
This is the Will of the Yukon—Lord, how she makes it plain!”

“It's a powerful story,” said Charles Miller, reflectively, “and, thanks to our wonderful camera men and the coöperation of our splendid company, I don't think anything just like it has ever been caught for the camera before.”

Charles Miller has been “in harness,” as he expresses it, all his life. He began his career in stock, continuing for many years, playing every rôle from comedy and character parts to leads, and was (altho he did not tell me) one of the popular matinée idols of his day. After his stock experience, he played under the management of Charles Frohman, Charles Harris, David Belasco and other big managers. He is singularly reticent about speaking of his success on the speaking stage, but did admit that “The Great Divide,” in which he was starred, was his favorite of all the plays in which he appeared. Following his acting experience he became a stage director of note, having directed many of our best-known stage artists.

Five years ago, he entered the motion picture field. The first year he acted in pictures, playing a part in “Civilization” and one or two other pictures. “Not that I wanted to be a screen actor,” he said, “I wanted to direct; but how could I direct pictures until I had first acted in them?”

"Are you one who thinks that previous stage experience is necessary in order to do your best work for the camera—both in acting and directing?"

"That is a broad question," he smiled. "There are directors who have made a success of pictures who never directed a stage play. Generally speaking, I will say that to succeed on the screen, one should have stage experience—whether acting or directing. Not that this experience is vital, but the artist of the speaking stage has poise, self-confidence and brings to the screen the art and understanding bred of an intimate knowledge of the technique of acting. Of course, there are a number of successful screen stars who never were on the stage—but they had a great deal to learn and a harder road to travel to success than their brethren who stepped from the stage to the screen. And it's the same with directing. There are directors who have made a success of pictures who never directed a stage play. But—usually, it has been a pictorial success rather than a dramatic success.

"Theories? No—I have none. You know how it is with bringing up a family. Before you have any, you have all kinds of theories. But after you get one, you just worry along as best you can and the theories—well, you find out how little theory amounts to. It's doing that counts. There is one thing, tho, that has gone with me since I went into the theatrical business. It's the one thought I have worked with: 'From within, without.' If it's in, it will come out—do you see? When I was on the stage, I had always that thought in mind and tried to work out of myself what was within. In directing, I do the same. And if I can get no response from the actor, I know there is nothing within.

"That is why I am so insistent upon rehearsals. On the speaking stage, the carefully trained and modulated voice has more to do with success than many, not in the profession, realize. But in pictures the voice is out of it and that's where art comes in. The expression of one's face, the eyes, the smile, the use of the hands, one's very walk before the camera must be studied for effect. There are no sound effects, nothing off stage to help along the action. The artist must put it over. And there's such temptation to overact! And so, I rehearse my players over and over, making them speak regular lines too—until they forget they are 'acting' and go thru the scene naturally. My people always know the story thoroly and I encourage them to use their intelligence and make any suggestions that may occur to them as we go along. I never follow a story in cut-and-dried fashion—it's the little bits of spontaneity that add heart interest and often make a corking picture out of a mediocre story.

"Motion pictures have such infinite possibilities. They are going to do what the stage might do but can't do—they couple to keep their marriage a secret from an irascible father, anxious friends and all sorts of other human "complications." Nobody stands out in the farce. Matt Moore and Marjorie Daw play the newly married couple.

If we may judge by the early "Edgar" stories of Booth Tarkington, these short Goldwyn releases are going to be genuinely delightful. "Edgar's Hamlet," for instance, is a decidedly amusing presentation of the youthful Edgar's efforts to produce the Bard's tragedy in the family barn. Tarkington knows youth and enough of Tarkington gets to the screen in these film stories to lift them into the unusual. E. Mason Hopper is directing them very competently.

"A Fool and His Money," (Selznick), is based upon a George Barr McCutcheon romance—one of those things that are a thousand miles from real life. A successful American novelist buys an Austrian castle and forthwith discovers a persecuted American girl living in a deserted wing of the structure. Certain mild adventures launch themselves at once. Eugene O'Brien's whimsical left eyebrow is just as whimsical as ever in this cinema effort. Rubye de Remer is much better as the heroine, to our unsophisticated way of thinking. By adroit camera work, Robert Ellis attains some effects of seemingly limitless baronial castle halls.

Norma Talmadge's most recent vehicle, "The Woman Gives," (First National), is no better or no worse than her recent vehicles. Indeed, they are all bloodless. We understand that an imperial ukase in the Talmadge fold requires highly emotional rôles, stories in which the heroine is absolutely untarnished in thought and action. No wonder Miss Talmadge's vehicles are weak dramas. How can one be emotional about nothing? In "The Woman Gives" she plays a sweet, guileless art model who loves and is beloved by a struggling painter. She chafes the loss of this love—the young chap is very jealous—in order to befriend and help a genius who has slipped to the depths thru his wife's infidelity. Then she returns to the man of her heart and to happiness.

The story reveals no signs of life anywhere. Miss Talmadge photographs as charmingly as ever—but that is about all one can say. There is no plot development and no characterization anywhere. Neither Edmund Lowe nor John Holliday awaken any interest as the lover and the derelict genius.

Nazimova is always vivid enough to lend a certain interest to any screen play. Thus "The Heart of a Child," (Metro), has a measure of appeal. But the whole thing will be quickly forgotten. She plays a little cockney gutter child of the London slums who attracts the eye and love of an English nobleman. Thru his aid she attains stage success and eventually marries her benefactor. The old Cinderella tale is still popular, isn't it?

We are still waiting for Nazimova to equal her unforgettable "Revelation." We can easily understand why she has not. She needs a strong restraining hand—a producer or director with courage and will enough to apply her genius in the right sort of stories. At present she is running rampant.

Geraldine Farrar, being a most popular operatic Carmen, must needs go on playing fiery Spanish cigaret girls in the films. In "The Woman and the Puppet," (Goldwyn), she flirts with a conceited fop who is adulated by less desirous señoritas, taunts him and snaps her fingers in his face until, enraged, he develops into a caveman. Then he slaps her face—and no mild slaps are they—until the tears come. After which she willingly gives him her lips. We must admit that the audience which observed "The Woman and the Puppet" with us laughed outright at Lou-Tellegen as the lover. It has no sympathy for the sickly sentimentalist who was willing to literally—as well as figuratively—kiss the señorita's feet. To our mind, "The Woman and the Puppet" is weak screen stuff.

Scenarioists seem to be fascinated by the idea that the ocean bottom is studded with treasure as a result of U-boat activities in the recent war. "Below the Surface" and "Terror Island," (both Paramounts), revolve around the identical idea.

The first concerns the machinations of a scoundrel and his paramour, who plot to win over a daring young diver that they may use him to recover some of this lost treasure. The diver retains his faith in the adventuress even after her mysterious death in a steamship disaster. But, after he looks thru a porthole of the sunken vessel and sees the woman dead in the arms of the villain, he realizes all, and after the proper period of brain fever, comes back to the village maid who has loved him all along. She is a young woman who was foolish enough to pin her faith in pies rather than rouge.

We call "Below the Surface" unpleasant stuff. That is, unpleasant without any real reason for existing; i. e., pointing a cinema moral.

"Terror Island" exploits Houdini. It is a five-reel drama done with that deep insight into life displayed by a constructor of serial thrills. In other words, it is a series of palpably absurd incidents intended to be ultra-startling. It isn't.

Bert Lytell does not equal his splendid work in "The Right of Way" with his portrayal of the reformed safe opener in "Alias Jimmy Valentine," (Metro). Of course, you remember the stage Valentine, whose nerves were attuned so sensitively that he could open any safe by sandpapering his fingertips and running them over the vault knobs. Lytell, who is steadily advancing, makes a highly likable Jimmy and Vola Vale is a pleasant enough reason for the reformation. Will-ton Taylor is excellent as the hard-boiled detective who finally relents. Why the prison stripes of ten or so years ago when the feminine styles are plainly of 1920?

We admit rather liking Irene Castle in "The Amateur Wife," (Paramount). This we attribute to Miss Castle, for the theme is that ancient one of the unappreciated wife who blossoms forth from an ugly duckling into a swan and awakens her hubby's slumbering affections. Some sordid melodrama has been dragged in to brace up the trite tale. Mrs. Castle isn't emotionally compelling, but she lends a certain pleasant personality to a part of the proceedings. Whether or not you like "The Amateur Wife" will depend upon whether or not you like the star. W. T. Carleton is the husband. We detect a certain Dick Barthelmess quality in Arthur Rankin, who appears briefly in a fearful rôle.

"My Lady's Garter," (Paramount), a Maurice Tourneur production of the late Jacques Futrelle's mystery story, long held awaiting release, is unreal stuff, with a hero who appears for nearly five reels to be a master crook but who develops to be a great detective. The detectives in this affair are as dense as the heavy-footed gentry who have been trailing the eminent Mr. Nicky Arnstein, Esq.

are going to teach the great masses of people. They are going to bring the best of everything within reach of these people. That's why I'm glad that so many of our great stage artists are coming to the screen. And the screen is becoming our greatest educational factor. Strange, isn't it?" he mused, "when we remember that in some communities only a few years ago picture houses were not considered respectable. And now, the very churches are installing projection machines and giving over one or more services a week for the showing of motion pictures—and they are installed in our colleges for the purpose of teaching different subjects—great, isn't it, and a glorious monument to the determination and courage of the few men who saw the vision and followed it?"

"Peter Pan"—"Up in Peter's Tree."
"Othello"—"The Black Barrier."
"Romeo and Juliet"—"Passion."
"Vanity Fair"—"The Lady of Lure."
"As You Like It"—"The Forest Virgin."

It's easy, when you know how.

Why is it that motion picture magnates never merely travel across country? Why must they always "rush" or "dash"?

us farewell for several months when she leaves New York in June for her native Sweden. Miss Nilsson has not seen her parents in nearly a dozen years, due to the war and everything, and, as soon as she finishes playing opposite Hobart Bosworth in "Bucko McAlister," she's going to skip to New York. When Anna Q. came to America she did so with the intention of becoming a school-teacher. But Fate, however, cast her as Penrhyn Stanlaws' model, and an offer of forty dollars a week persuaded her to join a company of Kalem players. In Sweden she'll be considerably feted, inasmuch as she is the only one of her countrywomen who has ever registered a decided success on the English "speaking" stage or screen, and while abroad she will make two pictures at a reputed salary of $4,000 a production.

having finished, is working in a picture for Mayflower.

Priscilla Dean got arrested shortly after the new no-auto-parking ordinance went into effect in town. Under the new law it seems that you can't park your car in the downtown district more than two minutes. Priscilla went into a theater to see herself in "The Virgin of Stamboul," and when she went to start her car she found it tagged. No, it wasn't a surprise to her, inasmuch as it was prearranged by her press agent for a front-page newspaper story.

And a letter received from piquant Tsuru Aoki informs me that she is sojourning happily in her native Japan. She left Los Angeles immediately after completing her Universal contract. Sessue Hayakawa, her husband, was to have accompanied her, but a new contract interfered and Miss Aoki left, accompanied only by her maid. She stopped off for a week in Honolulu, enjoyed its attractions and at length proceeded to Yokohama, her home. Her uncle there, Iso Kawikami, is a theatrical producer. He tried to induce Miss Aoki to sign with his company, but she declined, inasmuch as she is to be back in Hollywood by October to start work under a new, fat contract.

And the marriages! Of course, now that Mrs. Mary Preston Dean, mother of the sparkling Priscilla, has announced it formally, the marriage of Miss Dean to Wheeler Oakman, her leading man in "The Virgin of Stamboul," has ceased to be an item of local gossip. But Priscilla isn't by any means the only film star to commit matrimony. Betty Blythe suddenly issued invitations to her wedding to Paul Scardon, who has been brought West by Goldwyn to direct the Arnold Bennett photoplay, "Milestones." The wedding was solemnized quietly at the Church of the Angels in Garvanza, with less than a hundred close friends of the bride and groom being present. Miss Blythe, since she came to Los Angeles to assume the lead in "The Silver Horde," has been one of the reigning favorites at the studios. She only recently finished the lead opposite Lew Cody in "The Mischief Man" and at present writing is starring in "Nomads of the North," another James Oliver Curwood story, for First National Exhibitors' Circuit. She has, in addition, signed a contract with Fox to play the title rôle in a spectacular production of "The Queen of Sheba." Her marriage, she asserts, will in no way tend toward her retirement from the screen.

Pauline Frederick has left Goldwyn. She has definitely broken into the field of the independent producers, even selecting her own stories and directing herself.

There is a move on foot in Hollywood to start a tennis club exclusively for motion picture celebrities. It is being made by Shirley Mason, who is a tennis enthusiast herself, and who has offered the spacious courts at her new home to the charter members of the organization. These include Viola Dana, her sister, Bernard Durning, Ward Crane, Alice Lake, Anna Q. Nilsson, Buster Keaton, (who, by the way, is Metro's new comedy star), Rex Ingraham and Lottie Pickford. Shirley's plan is eventually to have the film folk erect a handsome club-house in Hollywood and restrict its guest privileges exclusively to those "in the profession"—sort of place, you know, where the film famous can go without being stared at.

Another marriage which surprised everybody was that of Jack Perrin, Universal serial star, and petite Josephine Hill, for some time a comedy star with the "U" and later the little wife in Metro's "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath."

Easterners are journeying West to work before the camera. Wyndham Standing and his wife are nicely domiciled at an Ocean Park hotel, while Raymond McKee has journeyed from New York to again play opposite Shirley Mason at Fox. McKee played Shirley's lead several years ago in a series of her early pictures at Edison and the meeting of the two on the lot was something like the reunion of brother and sister.

A premonition that her former fiancé, who had been reported killed in the war, would return to her, came true recently when Sylvia Breamer greeted Lieut. F. C. Lewis, of the army intelligence corps, upon his arrival in Los Angeles. The officer was gassed in action and believed killed. Not long ago Miss Breamer had a dream which told her he would come back to her. Three weeks later he appeared. Miss Breamer journeyed West to play the title rôle in "Athalia," and,

Monroe Salisbury, that prime emotional star, who severed connections some time ago with Universal, is back on the screen as the star of his own productions. His company is working at Brunton's on a spectacular magazine story which Metro wanted to produce, but didn't, and Salisbury has stated to me that he intends giving every member of his cast quite as much opportunity in the story as he himself will have.

Summer's Greatest Beauty Aid

Keep Your Complexion Fresh and Youthful

A noted New York beauty expert recently made the remark that "no woman will ever be able to rub beauty into her skin as if by magic." Yet there are many, many of the fair sex who seem to disregard this really scientific advice.

To keep the skin fresh, full of natural color and beautifully youthful, something more than lotions and creams must be applied. The best treatment is unquestionably electric massage, for this gently stirs up the circulation, carries off the wastes and invigorates the cells in a way that is the nearest approach to Nature's own re-building process.

Stage and screen women have long since recognized the true merits of electric massage. They do not grow old and unattractive prematurely. Many of them—Corinne Griffith, Martha Hedman, Olive Tell, Gladys Leslie, Evelyn Gosnell, Helen MacKellar, Irene Boyle and scores of others—rely upon The Star Electric Massage Vibrator.

The "Star" is a health-and-beauty adjunct of genuine importance to any woman. You should have one. For your complexion; your hair and scalp; to keep your body fit; for headaches, insomnia, fatigue, nervousness, etc. For sale at drug, department and electrical-goods stores. Demonstrated free. Or direct from us if not at your local dealer's. Price $5. (In Canada, $7.50.) Fitzgerald Mfg. Co., Dept. 216, Torrington, Conn.

Thousands of men find The "Star" equally as necessary as their morning shave. Soothing to the face. Great for the hair and scalp. Helps keep hair from falling out. An ideal toilet requisite for any man. Fits any bag or suitcase.

The STAR Electric Massage VIBRATOR

We also make the Star Massage Shower Spray, the first real portable shower bath. Attaches instantly to ANY faucet. A combination shower, massage, shampoo, rub-down, $7 complete. "Carry your shower bath with you"

Was $100
Now $57

*Price Advances
Aug. 1, 1920, to $64*

Free Trial--No Money Down

No money in advance. No deposit. No obligation to buy. The coupon below brings the Oliver for free trial in your home or office. When it arrives, let it prove its superiority and saving. You be the judge, with no salesman at your elbow to influence you.

If you agree that it is the finest typewriter regardless of price, and want to own it, then pay us at the easy rate of $3 a month until the $57 is paid. If you do not want it, ship it back, express collect. We even refund the outgoing transportation charges. So you can't lose a cent on the free trial.

For $57 you now obtain the identical Oliver Typewriter formerly priced at $100.

We are able to save you nearly half because of our radically new and economical method of distribution. During the war we learned many lessons. We found that it was unnecessary to have such a vast number of traveling salesmen and so many expensive branch houses throughout the country. We were able to discontinue many other superfluous sales methods.

The result is that we can afford to sell at $57 the very same Oliver formerly priced at $100. A clean cash saving to you of $43!

August 1, 1920, the price of the Oliver Typewriter will be $64. We are compelled to make this advance because of the increased cost of production. The Oliver remains the same. We will not lower its quality. The addition in cost insures its superiority. The $57 price of the Oliver has been widely advertised. We want to be entirely fair so we notify you in advance of the change.

Only 10c a Day

You may pay for the Oliver on easy terms—only $3 a month, which averages about 10c a day. And you have the use of the machine while paying.

Since it is so easy to own a brand new Oliver, why should anyone think of renting or buying a second-hand machine?

Our Latest and Best Model

In every particular this Oliver 9 is the finest that 24 years of experience can produce. A better typewriter is impossible. It has all the latest improvements. Its durability and workmanship have given it world-wide fame. It has a standard keyboard, so any one may turn to it without the slightest hesitancy. You can't buy a more satisfactory typewriter at any price. But we do not ask you to take our word for this. We believe that an ounce of PERFORMANCE beats a ton of promise. That is why we say, "Try an Oliver 5 days free."

Only the Coupon

Remember you need not send any money now. Just fill out the coupon and mail it if you wish to get the Oliver for five days free trial in your own home.

If you decide to keep the typewriter you can pay for it on terms so easy that you won't miss the money—only $3 a month. If you prefer to have further information before ordering, fill in the coupon for our free catalog.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a Still Photograph.)

The most recent astronomical discovery to be observed on the silversheet is the blonde Wanda Hawley, who now shines with serene stary rays on the Realart banner.

When Miss Hawley first came to New York it was to sing and play accompaniments, but, not long ago she lost her voice thru some throat trouble and turned her attention to the screen. Her unusual characterizations in Cecil de Mille's "Old Wives for New," and "We Cant Have Everything," as well as other photoplays, will long be remembered by all film-goers.

Shadowland for August

SHADOWLAND is first and foremost a magazine of beauty.

Its purpose and object in the world is to bring beauty to every household which it reaches. It believes wholeheartedly in the development of beauty, and the cultivation of all art. It feels that there is far too little appreciation of beauty in this humdrum, prosaic world.

Therefore, it announces with much pleasure that the August issue is the best yet. Louis Raymond Reid reviews the past theatrical season in a whimsical, satirical article which will delight the reader.

There is a playlet of reincarnation by Katherine Metcalf Roof; "The Reflections of a Gentle Cynic," by Lisa Ysaye Tarleau; a review of current fiction by the always-welcome Heywood Broun, and other articles by Benjamin De Casseres, Frederick James Smith, and others too numerous to mention.

You will remember the literature; you will want to frame the lovely photographs; you will not, we assure you, forget the August issue of SHADOWLAND in a hurry!

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama.

Belasco.—"The Son-Daughter," with Lenore Ulric. George Scarborough and David Belasco's highly colored Chinese melodrama with the vivid Miss Ulric. One of the big hits of the season.

Booth.—"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early seventies. Genuinely delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmer and an excellent cast.

Casino.—"Betty, Be Good." Lively summer musical show with a tuneful score by Hugo Riesenfeld, the director of the Rivoli, Rialto and Criterion screen theaters. Josephine Whittell is the life of the entertainment, Frank Crumit scores and Worthington Romaine makes his rôle stand out.

Central.—"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Sam Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

Century.—"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sextette." Here is a revival that really revives.

Cohan's.—"The Hottentot," with Willie Collier. Typical one-man farce with the inimitable farceur, Collier, at his best. Ann Andrews lends pleasant assistance. Full of laughs.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Amusing entertainment adapted from a Continental farce.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn is a brilliant Lincoln.

Eltinge.—"Martinique." A colorful romantic tragedy of the French West Indies, revolving around the exotic belles affranchies—mulatto belles—of a certain part of the tropics, the women poetized by Lafcadio Hearn. The cast includes Josephine Victor, Vincent Coleman, Arthur Hohl and Emmett Corrigan.

Forty-Eighth Street.—"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire. Helen MacKellar is admirable as the piquant French-Canadian heroine.

Garrick.—"Jane Clegg." St. John Ervine's powerful drama, presented by the Theater Guild, has been running here all season. A drab but brilliant tale of middle-class English life. Superbly acted by the best ensemble in New York.

Greenwich Village.—"Foot-Loose," with Emily Stevens, Norman Trevor and O. P. Heggie. Zoe Akins' well-done modernization of the old melodrama, "Forget-Me-Not." Talulah Bankhead scores in a difficult rôle.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Hudson.—"Clarence." Booth Tarkington's delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier reunited a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Knickerbocker.—"Shavings." Pleasant if conventional dramatization of Joseph C. Lincoln's Cape Cod story. Harry Beresford gives a finely drawn characterization.

Little Theater.—"Beyond the Horizon," by Eugene O'Neill. This powerful drama was produced at a series of special matinées and proved so successful that it won a theater all its own. A gripping study of a human being crushed by environment, told with compelling force. One of the biggest native dramas of years. Richard Bennett heads a remarkable cast.

Lyric.—"What's In a Name?" The most beautiful musical entertainment, with the possible exception of the Ziegfeld revues, yet seen on Broadway. Colorful new art stage designs, remarkable use of lights and gorgeous costumes lift it into the realm of the exquisite. Intelligently written and put together, too.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else. Here, too, are the most beautiful girls in all New York.

Nora Bayes Theater.—"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent. Dorothy Dickson and Carl Hyson contribute some delightful dance interludes.

Playhouse.—"The Wonderful Thing." A human play built around a poverty-stricken but blue-blooded English family into which Jeanne Eagles comes as a wealthy heiress and wife of the eldest son. Pleasant if conventional.

Shubert Theater.—"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

ON TOUR THIS AND NEXT SEASON

"The Purple Mask," with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainments of the season. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisquet; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

"The Sign on the Door."—A very good melodrama which boasts many instances of the unexpected—and Marjorie Rambeau in highly emotional scenes.

"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

"The Ouija Board." Crane Wilbur's thriller built around spiritism. Real spooks invade a fake séance, solve a murder mystery and provide plenty of surprises. Guaranteed to keep you on edge. Excellent cast includes George Gaul, Howard Lang and Edward Ellis.

"Mamma's Affair."—Rachel Butler's admirably written comedy—a study of that deadly human species, the hypochondriac who fancies herself suffering from all sorts of ills. Done with distinction and fine discernment. Ida St. Leon scores and important members of the cast are: Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Katharine Kaelred and George Le Guere.

The Fame and Fortune Contest Speeds Ahead!

Some time ago we announced that there would be produced in conjunction with the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920, which was being held by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC, and SHADOWLAND, a five-reel feature drama entitled "LOVE'S REDEMPTION."

This announcement has aroused the greatest interest among our readers and all those who contemplate entering the contest. The feature, a strong play of dramatic force, is now well under way, and the main scenes have already been filmed. Those appearing in the cast are as follows:

Edwin Markham, Hudson Maxim, Dr. Nichols.

Blanche McGarity, Anetha Getwell, Dorian Romero, Lynne Berry, Katherine Bassett, Wm. Talmadge, Arthur Tuthill, Cecile Edwards, Wm. Castro, Ellsworth Jones, Seymoure Panish, Joseph Murtaugh, Dorothy Taylor, Effie Lawrence Palmer, Bunty Manly, Alfred Rigali.

Erminie Gagnon, Edward Chalmers, Charles Hammer, Wm. White, Clarence Linton, Sophie De Leske, Mrs. J. A. Gagnon, Norbert Hammer, Mr. McCabe, Doris Doree, Mrs. F. Mayer, Colonel Hervey, George Costa, Titus Cello, Mrs. Dale, Marion Dale, The Schwinn Twins, Ruth Higgins, Marjorie Longbotham.

IT'S A SURE WINNER

said the spectators who watched the first showing of some of the scenes in the projection-room.

The Final Honor Roll Members and the Winners of the contest will have ample opportunity to prove whether or not they can act in this picture, for the scenes in which they appear will be filmed as soon as possible after the judges have named them.

All photographs mailed up to and including the date of August 1st, 1920, will be entered in the contest. Send in your photograph at once.

RULES FOR 1920 CONTESTANTS

Contestants shall submit one or more portraits. On the back of each photo an entrance coupon must be pasted, or a similar coupon of your own making.

Postal-card pictures, tinted photographs and snapshots not accepted. Photographs will not be returned to the owner.

Contestants should not write letters regarding the contest, as it will be impossible to answer them. All rules will be printed in all three magazines.

Photos should be mailed, pre-paid with sufficient postage, to CONTEST MANAGER, 175 Duffield St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Send as many as you like.

The contest is open to every one, except those who have already played prominent screen or stage rôles.

Contest closes August 1, 1920.

"My Golden Girl."—A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

"The Little Whopper."—Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

"Wedding Bells."—A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

"Aphrodite."—Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Gallican courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle.

"The Fricolities of 1920."—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue. Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls.

Loew's N. Y. and Loew's American Roof.—Photoplays; first runs. Daily program.

Loew's Metropolitan, Brooklyn.—Feature photoplays and vaudeville.

Capitol.—Photoplay features plus a de luxe program. Superb theater.

Rivoli.—De luxe photoplays with full symphony orchestra. Weekly program.

Rialto.—Photoplays supreme. Program changes every week.

Strand.—Select first-run photoplays. Program changes every week.

THE NEWS MEN

By WALTER E. MAIR

We turn a cool, collected crank
 Where foemen flee the furious yanp;
 We scale the Himalayan peaks to snap a bunch of flowers.
 Or, perching on a biplane's tail,
 We photograph the Airline Mail;
 Then nonchalantly spiral down to "pan" old Gotham's towers.

It may be up in Saskatoon
 We point our guns to shoot the moon,
 Or in some Panamanian cove we coax the gentle shark.
 We leap athwart some skipper's neck
 And focus on his vessel's wreck,
 Then right-about to catch a glimpse of spooners in the park.

We plumb the deep and dreary mines
 And risk extensive trespass fines
 To spot a locomotive spinning sparks from every wheel.
 Perhaps we hie to gloomy glade
 Where lurk mosquitos in the shade,
 To get artistic studies of the Great Brazilian Eel!

We frame a strip of Mandalay,
 Then take a little fly-away
 To where at sunrise ululates the Turkish muez-zin.
 Fingers in ears, we say amen!
 Then hasten forth to crank again
 A crew of Senegambians getting full o' nigger-gin.

Nay, friend, no gang for angel choirs
 Are we: we shine around big fires!
 And yet I have a notion, should you mount the golden stair,
 You'd find a nosy movie guy
 Evading Peter's watchful eye,
 In hopes that yet some Newport dame might find admittance there.

The Popular Popularity Contest

The Popularity Contest is still arousing universal interest. No part of the world is absent in representation. Votes are pouring in—hundreds of them—every day. Mary Pickford still leads the women with a large majority of votes. Wallace Reid heads the men with a not-so-large majority. Others are coming forward so rapidly that it is hard to make any predictions concerning the next report. If you have not already sent in votes for your favorite player, there is still time in which to do so. All rules and regulations, together with a description of the useful and beautiful prizes are presented on another page, and here are the last-minute results of the contest at the time of going to press:

Mary Pickford, 49,600; Norma Talmadge, 29,851; Pearl White, 20,161; Mme. Nazimova, 11,748; Constance Talmadge, 6,907; Bebe Daniels, 4,748; Viola Dana, 3,555; Elsie Ferguson, 3,417; Lillian Gish, 2,801; Mary Miles Minter, 2,412; Theda Bara, 2,249; Dorothy Gish, 2,154; Ruth Roland, 2,017; Olive Thomas, 1,759; Shirley Mason, 1,519; Anita Stewart, 1,506; Marguerite Clark, 1,451; May Allison, 1,412; Ethel Clayton, 1,359; Baby Marie Osborne, 1,206; Dorothy Dalton, 1,114; Gloria Swanson, 1,106; Irene Castle, 1,017; Marion Davies, 916; Pauline Frederick, 861; Geraldine Farrar, 854; Alice Joyce, 816; Ann Little, 747; Alice Lake, 712; Mae Murray, 701; Olga Petrova, 656; Margarita Fisher, 617; Katherine MacDonald, 604; Marie Prevost, 597; Alice Brady, 558; Priscilla Dean, 552; Wanda Hawley, 519; Edith Johnson, 512; Blanche Sweet, 506; June Caprice, 461; Madge Kennedy, 458; Vivian Martin, 452; Kathlyn Williams, 446; Dolores Cassinelli, 421; Doris May, 416; Marie Walcamp, 408; Winifred Westover, 404; Juanita Hansen, 361; Betty Compson, 357; Billie Burke, 334; Violet Heming, 317; Doris Kenyon, 306; Gladys Leslie, 271; Jane Novak, 265; Dorothy Phillips, 254; Clara K. OUR OCCUPATION

By WRIGHT FIELD

Home is a curious place these days;
We only meet and speak at meals,
Or when we go en masse to see
Some thrilling thing in seven reels.
Pa at the office, Ma at home,
Forget their work or let it go,
Absorbed in the great national game
Of "writing a scenario!"

Sister no longer pouts and flirts
And puts on airs to tantalize
The youth who used to waste good ink
In writing sonnets to her eyes;
I'll say she doesn't—for she sits
In solemn silence with her beau,
Both bent above a lengthy script;
They're writing a scenario!

Brother, up in the barn-loft hid,
All smeared with ink and stern of brow,
Hurls out long adjectives and spurts
Of romance to the frightened cow.
He's trying out his favorite scenes:
All het up with creative glow,
For Doug, perhaps, or else for Bill,
He's writing a scenario!

'Tis not the Bible brings that glow
To Grandma's cheek that once was pale;
She's reading now a book about
"The Way to Write a Movie Tale."
Grandpa, his checkers pushed aside,
Devotes himself to row on row
Of stilted, carefully chosen words—
He's writing a scenario!

The chauffeur now forgets the gas
And leaves the radiator dry;
Cook puts wash-powder in the bread
And saleratus in the pie.
They've small regard for present jobs
With small fortunes beck'ning—no,
They scorn to think of humbler things
Than writing a scenario!

And so they go about all day
With lofty brow and solemn mien,
Each figuring how his name will look
When thrown upon the silver screen.
* * * * *

But shucks! Why fool with rhymes like this?
For what to me is rhythmic flow?
"Fade-outs" and "irises" for me,
I'm writing a scenario!

The Woman They Stoned

Two years before she had run away to join a traveling circus.

Now with an angry crowd at her back—driven out of her house—she beat upon her father's door, calling for help. The old man—part of his narrow and bitter village—he too cursed her—and then the greater forces that we cannot understand—put forth a giant relentless hand. Father—and daughter—heartless crowd—all were—but why tell a story better told by

O. HENRY

And as fascinating as this, so are all his two hundred and seventy-four stories. Each and every story in the set of books is new and different—each with a new beginning—a new plot—a new ending—and so human—so full of fun—of pathos—of laughter—of tears.

He finds romance everywhere—around the corner—in the department store—in the shop—in the gutter—in the street car. He laughs when he preaches, and preaches when he laughs. He sees what no one else sees—but he sees what we have all subconsciously seen and makes us wonder why we never thought of it before.

FREE—8 Volumes E. Phillips Oppenheim

Eight splendid volumes, packed full of mystery and adventure, love and intrigue. Here are some of the most wonderfully exciting stories in the literature of the world. Here are eight stories of plot and counter-plot, eight gripping, thrilling tales that will keep you entranced from first word to the very last.

Whether it be in the lonely wastes of the South African veldt—the vague mystery of a London fog—out on the South American pampas—or amid the gay midnight frolics of the Cafe Montmartre in Paris, Oppenheim always has a thrilling, gripping story to tell.

He makes them so real that you forget everything about you in the joy of them. He lets you into secrets that take your breath away. He shows you the real inner workings of European diplomacy. He holds you enthralled with the romance, the mystery of his tale right up to the very last word.

There are not enough of these sets to sell in our usual way, so we have decided that, to the first few hundred who send the enclosed coupon, we will give—entirely free of charge—one of these sets.

Is your skin exceptionally sensitive?

IS your skin exceptionally hard to take care of? Wind, dust, exposure; do they constantly irritate and roughen its delicate texture?

You can correct this extreme sensitiveness. Every night use the following treatment:

Dip a soft washcloth in warm water and hold it to your face. Then make a warm water lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and dip your cloth up and down in it until the cloth is "fluffy" with the soft white lather. Rub this lathered cloth gently over your skin until the pores are thoroughly cleansed. Then rinse first with warm, then with clear, cool water and dry carefully.

Special treatments for each different type of skin are given in the famous booklet that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Woodbury's Facial Soap is on sale at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, and for general cleansing use.

"Your treatment for one week"

A beautiful little set of the Woodbury facial preparations sent to you for 25 cents.

Send 25 cents for this dainty miniature set of Woodbury's facial preparations, containing your complete Woodbury treatment for one week.

You will find, first the little booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," telling you the special treatment your skin needs; then a trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap—enough for seven nights of any treatment; and samples of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream, Facial Powder and Cold Cream.

Write today for this special new Woodbury outfit. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 908 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 908 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario.

Conspicuous nose pores can be corrected. Read the special treatment for this condition given in the famous booklet of treatments, "A Skin You Love to Touch," which is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

ELLIOTT DEXTER

One of the most popular of the screen stars, threatened with the appellation of "Matinée Idol," the career of Elliott Dexter was broken into by a severe illness a year ago. Now that he has quite recovered and returned to the screen, his faithful admirers eagerly await the release of Cecil de Mille's "Something to Think About," in which Mr. Dexter stars.

The Letters of Mary

It isn't every well-known, golden-curved motion picture star who can lay claim to any great literary distinction. Of course, there is no set reason why an actress of remarkable histrionic ability shouldn't possess the great and glorious gift of literature—but just the same, it isn't being done—not often, anyway.

However, be that as it may, Mary Miles Minter, the eighteen-year-old screen wonder, is the golden (haired) exception in this case. Not content with winning the plaudits of an admiring public who watched her dramatic powers with awe, at the hoary age of eight, Miss Minter, while touring the country in "The Littlest Rebel," convinced her fond parents, and those of her friends who were privileged to enjoy her intimate secrets, that she possessed unusual literary ability. Her poems and her correspondence with her fond mother have been carefully preserved, evidently owing to unusual foresight.

Being a very imaginative young lady, her thoughts naturally were expressed thru the trusty form of poetry, and judging from the prolific results, she never labored under the handicap suffered by the immortal Tennyson—"I would that my tongue could utter the thoughts that arise in me," etc. She was observant and quickly formed her own opinions on the various important phases of existence. Most of these opinions were so terrific in their static dignity that few, if any, dared question them.

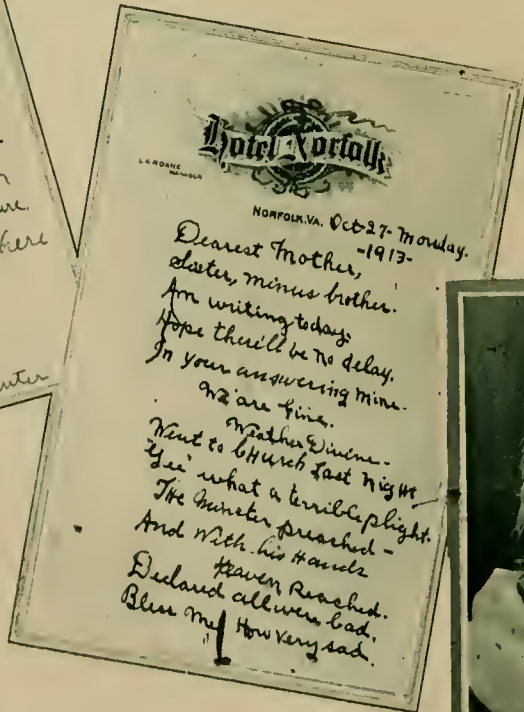

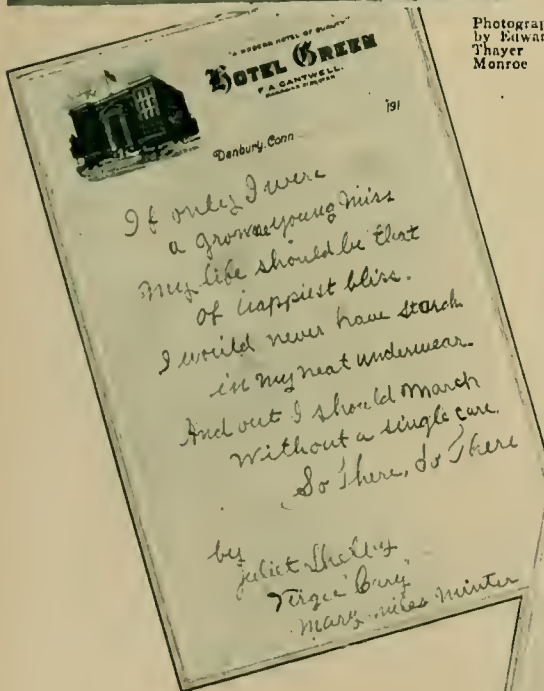

She spent most of her time traveling from one place to another—touring in "The Littlest Rebel"—and gathering vivid impressions of railway stations, dusty coaches, bad hotels and her theatrical companions. All thru this period she had as an inseparable companion a tiny dog whose name was "Tad," and as he is very often mentioned in her writings, we gather that probably all her viewpoints of life were poured into his innocent ears before they were written. She kept up a daily correspondence with her mother, and it is in this correspondence that we have discovered another Daisy Ashford.

She was evidently a very versatile young person. While she was undergoing all the hardships of theatrical life, (about which you will hear more later), she decided that one name was entirely insufficient to express her individuality. So she assumed three, changing them whenever the fancy suited her, (not to mention the numerous pet names with which various members of the company and her friends labeled her). Her real name was Juliet Shelby—she decided upon the more unusual one of Virginia Houston Cary, and eventually, growing somewhat weary of this, she took unto herself the more euphonious one of Mary

We are greatly elated over our newest literary find, Mary Miles Minter. At the age of eight she displayed an understanding of the problems of life, equalled only by the knowledge revealed in "The Young Visitors"—that book of revelations of the past year. Above, a recent portrait of Miss Minter, and, below, as she looked at the age of six'

Miles Minter. The latter turned out to be the favorite, for she has adopted it for good.

Probably at the time she wrote so bountifully, Mary Miles Minter did not realize the powerful influence which the writings of the very young would have upon future literature. We are quite certain that her prophetic soul revealed no vision of Daisy Ashford. We might add that it was fortunate for all concerned that no one else foresaw the arrival of "The Young Visitors." Prefaced by a photograph of a smug-faced child who seemed to be saying, "After all, who was Will Shakespeare, anyway?" this small, innocent-looking volume dropped like a bomb upon the conservative head of literature, and, upsetting all past dignity and tradition, started a hilarious controversy between two nations which almost bordered upon the slapstick.

It became the chief topic of conversation in the subways, on the street, at dinner, in the clubs and even in the sacred precincts of the church. Between prayers, there could be heard the familiar stage whisper, "Dont you really think that Barrie wrote 'The Young Visitors'?" You were innocently introduced to a perfect stranger—before you had uttered the usual inane lie of being pleased to meet—the stranger would rudely interrupt you by eagerly inquiring, "I say, have you read 'The Young Visitors'?" And so it went, developing into an international joke, a playful dig in theory of reincarnation, except Miss Huff herself. She believes, and believes quite thoroly, in reincarnation.

Miss Huff admitted to us that she had never confessed it before. One's inner religious beliefs are perilous things to talk about. "Yet it is such a consistent, logical belief," she confided. "Can you believe that the mind and personality of a Lincoln is lost to humanity? No, I believe that we go on, developing spiritually with each existence.

"One does not admit one's real religious beliefs off-hand for fear of being misunderstood. I don't believe I have talked about them even to my relatives, which, of course, is not odd, since you confide less in relatives than in any one else. A prophet in his own land, you know." And Miss Huff smiled.

"I need my religious theory to sustain me," she went on. "Without religion I could not face the every-day things. Where would I obtain poise, resistance and new hopes?" Miss Huff paused. "I hope I will not be misunderstood. With so much interest in things psychic today, perhaps we are 'on the threshold of genuine spiritual discoveries. I do not mean the ouija board fever, but the investigations of men like Sir Oliver Lodge.

"Let me make a confession about Sir Oliver. I was walking along Fifth Avenue with a girl friend when we saw him pass in a carriage. I don't quite know how we had the courage, but we spoke to him. It seemed just the thing to do. He bowed in response in the most courtly fashion.

"Later that very day we saw him walking meditatively through the crowded Hotel Biltmore lobby and we hurried to overtake him. Do you know, he remembered us? He was very dear

Louise Huff is a bonbon bit of femininity who just isn't. She has very decided views upon life in general. She believes in reincarnation. "It is such a consistent, logical belief," she says. "Can you believe that the mind and personality of a Lincoln is lost to humanity? I believe that we go on developing spiritually with each existence"

If reincarnation be a truth, then we can well imagine Louise Huff as a fair royalist in the cavalier days of Merry England, as a Huguenot maid of the bloody years of the de Medici in Paris or a quaint little Evangeline of old Arcadia. For she is demure, with a touch of devil-may-care twinkling in her eyes—a bonbon bit of femininity who just isn't.

Of course, there is no tangible reason for connecting Miss Huff with the rather pleasant and kind and took us aside to answer all our questions. We talked for an hour. I never hope to meet such a tremendous mind again. With men like Sir Oliver Lodge believing in proof of so-called psychic phenomena, I am sure we shall pull aside the curtain of the infinite."

Do not draw an inaccurate picture of Miss Huff. She is not in the least eccentric. A very human little person she is, with a very evenly balanced view of life. Perhaps you conceive her as fluffily feminine, as ribboned and becurled. Actually she has a sweet and fragile sort of sincerity.

Miss Huff can and does use her mind. She has very decided views upon things. These are not the quickly acquired ideas of others, but come of actual experience. For Miss Huff—youthful as she appears and is—has had her share of dreaming and re-dreaming. But from it all she has built anew. Her little girl, Mary Louise, has grown to interesting childhood. And Miss Huff but recently married again.

Now, marriages are things not to be mentioned in interviews with young and fluffy stars. But Miss Huff's marriage is so vitally a part of her, of her development and her theory of life, that we cannot neatly side-step its importance.

Miss Huff's views upon marriage are brief and to the point. "There is nothing more dangerous than the early marriage," she maintains. "What can be expected of a partnership hastily entered into when the co-partners lack all perspective of life, all knowledge of what it may bring them and all breadth of judgment? One develops, the other does not and—divorce."

Miss Huff admitted she believes in love. But she would not define it. "Unless it is the power to want another for his imperfections as well as his perfections," she ventured. "A perfect marriage?" she repeated. "I doubt its existence. Successful marriage is a matter of marital adjustments and concessions. Possibly of relinquished dreams and hopes."

We talked of the screen. Here, too, Miss Huff is frank in her beliefs. "Brains are not an essential," she theorizes. "You know filmdom from the inside and you know the percentage of "The screen frequently creates a personality that may actually not exist," says Miss Huff. "Sometimes this is accidental, sometimes deliberate. The films have created a certain sugary personality for me, giving me the mental status of Booth Tarkington's 'baby-talk lady' in his Billy Baxter stories"

A Little Bit of Bohemia

THERE are people who have been made believers in the "iron hand of Fate" by their misfortunes. They look at life from dull, tired eyes, convinced that, for them, life can hold nothing but failure, regardless of how hard they try.

And then, again, there are people, fatalists, too, who so firmly believe that the future holds nothing but success for them that they absolutely refuse to take their misfortunes seriously. To this class belong the true Bohemians.

They trust the future so implicitly that they spend every penny they get as fast as they get it. Sometimes they can't spend it fast enough to suit themselves, so they give it away.

They don't give a darn!

They live for today, joyously permitting the past and the future to stay where the past and the future belong. It is with just such a group as this that Teddy Sampson spends her time. She is a Bohemian from Bohemiaville—which doesn't always mean Greenwich Village! On the contrary, in this case it means a bungalow court on Wilcox Avenue in Hollywood, and all around are fresh air and beautiful new houses and the most conventional of lawns and flowers and modern conveniences.

It is only in the arrangement of the houses that this court fails to be conventional. Instead of being placed in parallel rows facing each other, as is usual, they form a triangle with the apex on a little hill. It is in this bungalow, the highest of the bunch, that Teddy Sampson and her chum, Rosemary Theby, keep house together. And such a jolly house! Always the center of a laughing, kidding group of very young people who are famous all over the world and are confidently looking forward to becoming more famous.

In the beginning, this was going to be a nice, quiet interview alone with Teddy Sampson in her little home . . . and it was quiet . . . very much more quiet than usual. Teddy Sampson said so. Only Viola Dana dropped in and Lieut. Ormer Locklear, the famous young aviator who jumps from one plane to another in midair and does other daredevil stunts that make those watching him gasp and exclaim, "He's as crazy as they make 'em!" and Anna Q. Nilsson and Jack Dillon, the director, and Mrs. Dillon. And when it was all over, I had a long talk with Rosemary Theby, who drove me to the Christy studio in her car. As for the bohemianism, that was only suggested by a tone of light-hearted irresponsibility.

I arrived at a quarter of one, to find Teddy Sampson quite by herself, which is really a matter for record. Pag Dowling, of the Christy studio, who had also been asked for lunch, had 'phoned that he couldn't come and Miss Theby had gone to the Garson studio on the trail of a particularly good part. So we made ourselves comfortable and, I suppose because the day was particularly beautiful, talked about Christmas, which had been particularly beautiful, too.

"I don't think that I have ever, in all my life, spent a more perfect day than I spent last Christmas," Teddy Sampson said. "It was perfect in every way! I didn't get a single unwanted present. This"—exhibiting her jeweled cigaret-holder—"from Lottie Pickford. And a vanity case from Rosemary Theby, and a dozen pairs of gloves from Viola Dana and a diamond-studded wrist-watch and a necklace of real pearls . . . the last, especially, something I have wanted all my life." (There were other presents she showed me too numerous to mention.)

"And now," she went on, "I am going to have a month's vacation to spend with my people in New York."

Teddy Sampson is a native of New York; one of a family of eight, all living. Her four brothers made enviable records in the army. The youngest, Revere Sampson, entered the French Foreign Legion in 1914 and has returned with the Croix de Guerre and two palm-leaves.

"Yes, I certainly am proud of my brothers!" she said.

She was the only member of her family to choose the theater as a profession. Her first appearance was in vaudeville with Gus Edwards when she was twelve years old. She met with no opposition from her people.

"My father did not believe in parents trying to live their children's lives for them," she said. "He always let us do very much as we wanted to, only helping where he could." It was D. W. Griffith who introduced her to the screen.

"And it was Mr. Griffith who introduced me to my husband," she remarked, leading the way to the dining-room. (She had decided that we had better not wait for Miss Theby any longer.) It was while we were enjoying a pineapple salad that she told me the story of the romance. She is, you know Mrs. Ford Sterling.

"I was at the Alexandria with Mr. Griffith and a party," she said, "when Ford Sterling came in. He was at that time at his height, and accustomed to being treated

The Low-Brow Playwright Speaks

By FREDERICK

BAYARD VEILLER, the playwright who now heads the Metro scenario staff, is an out-and-out materialist. He has no "illusions," as he terms them, regarding art as applied to the drama or motion pictures. Indeed, he declares that the function of the stage and screen is to entertain and not to educate. But he qualifies all his statements by describing himself frankly as a "low-brow."

Mr. Veiller interestingly compares playwriting and photoplaywriting. "The screen offers a far wider scope, but its technique is more tricky. This is because there is no set way of doing things, no real technique of tradition. In writing for the footlights you know just what you can and cannot do. Seemingly there is nothing you cannot do in the films."

"Whether you write books, plays or scenarios, you must understand the same foundation, which is arousing and holding your audience's interest. That is why experienced writers or dramatists must necessarily make the best scenario writers. They know the basic principles."

Bayard Veiller believes the day of the screen author is dawning. No longer will he be shackled by the star and the director. But he does not think the thought picture will ever come in America. "Here," he says, "the theater is a thing of amusement and not of education. But, of course, I am a very low-brow person. To me the ideal motion picture play is one possessing a measure of beauty and speed with a consistently told story"

"Today the technique of the screen is more and more aping the stage. John Emerson and Anita Loos continue to increase the amount of dialog in their stories for Constance Talmadge via subtitles. This is necessary to present light comedy on the screen. The pictures must literally illustrate the text."

"Cecil de Mille uses a vast amount of titles to tell his sex themes. It is the only way to express thought—and these dramas are discussions of marital relations. You cannot debate in pantomime. Griffith has always tended towards the poetic caption."

We asked Mr. Veiller regarding future developments. "The technique trend tomorrow? I don't know enough about pictures to tell. I was really grabbed by my trousers and thrown into the game without having seen more than twelve pictures in my life. (Continued on page 80)"

Miss Hobbs

By FAITH SERVICE

Told in story form from the Wanda Hawley-Realart Photoplay

Miss Hobbs had bobbed hair and was a vegetarian. She had theories, fads and a passionate philosophy, which dealt, principally, with the total eclipse of the male sex in, at least, the Hobbsian sphere. "Man," she was wont to say to her two, friends first, disciples later, "man is a deterrent. We must, for our better evolution, dispense with man."

She would then relate horrible incidents in which man had served as instruments of some sort of torture. To the initiate the incidents would have savored of having been learned by rote, but the satellites would not so have abjured Miss Hobbs, whom they held in reverence and esteem.

Miss Hobbs was, indeed, estimable.

The opulent legacy left her by an opulent aunt may, and may not, have had something to do with her estimability. Who can say? Too, it may have conduced to the furtherance, the successful furtherance, of her theories.

It takes a legacy (and an opulent one) to have acreage on which to disport one's unclad limbs, far from the saddening crowd, in the dewy hours of the dawning. It takes a legacy to pluck hot-house grapes from under sun-glinted glass and crush them beneath disdainful lips the while reviling the ways of man upon said dewy grass. It takes a very opulent legacy indeed to lure a wife away from a husband, a sweetheart from her love. Yet all these things Miss Hobbs did—and more.

She had an estate. She called it, probably, New Thought, or something grave and purposeful. It was her boast that she never did a thing without a purpose. She would disdain to. The estate was a very beautiful one, and had a little lake, and a sudden brook, and a bit of idyllic woodland and all the requirements for a faddist and two satellites to try out expensive theories.

She had two friends. One was called Beulah Hackett, a timid soul who had been married some three years to a "brute." Miss Hobbs thus indignantly named him. That he deserved the appellation I leave to you. He abjured bobbed hair—in his wife. He sneered at Greenwich Village, free verse, the new poets and all things pertaining and appertaining. He made rather conspicuous fun of Miss Hobbs, her horn-rimmed spectacles, her breakfasts of graham crackers and well water; all, indeed, save her legacy. He told her, supreme insult, that she might be "attractive to some man if she'd cut the comedy." For that last Miss Hobbs never forgave the lesser creature. As a sort of neat retaliation she was later able to persuade Beulah not to waste her precious, purposeful years with the "brute," but to come to New Thought with her, there to live repletely in the state of beautiful, natural self-sufficiency, which is every thinking woman's birthright and heritage. Miss Hobbs had conviction. She was able to spread it. She caught Beulah just after the "brute" had spoken his mind on a woman smoking Russian cigarets in the company of other "unsexed beings" and the rest was easy—Beulah packed her bag and baggage, left a note on the pincushion and betook herself to the acreage of Miss Hobbs', there to discard domesticity, clothing, and reactionism at one, and almost, the same time.

Shortly thereafter, Miss Hobbs converted the second satellite. This was Millicent, a frail thing, and very much in love with one George Jessop, with whom she contemplated matrimony. Millicent was one with a plastic mind. She listened and learned from everyone with whom she came into even momentary contact. Invariably, when in Rome, she did as the Romans did.

Miss Hobbs was aware of this. She had always had a liking for Millicent, who had a mind of sorts when away from the sickening proximity of George Jessop. Now and then she had hinted to Millicent that she was committing a sort of personal hara-kiri in entering into the modern slavery of marriage. "A bondage, my dear," Miss Hobbs would say, thru smoke rings; "a bondage that irks as all bondage does. Very well indeed for the hoi polloi, very well indeed. But for thinking women, for self-sufficient women . . . never. A pity! So far no good." Then Miss Hobbs conceived the notion of inviting Millicent for a night at New Thought. Of course she wouldn't have said so, in so many words, but she had a sneaking notion that it would please Millicent's soul to display her really comely limbs in the dew at the dawning hour. Millicent would hardly be able to resist that.

Nor was she.

She spent the night at New Thought, during the waning hours of which Miss Hobbs and the thoroly converted Beulah reviled man and the fetters, extolled the new woman, scoffed at marriage, groaned over the yoke. In the morning they consumed hothouse grapes clad in a few yards of gauze and much dew. Millicent was enchanted. She had never, she knew, looked so charming or felt so charming. To be sure, she wished George Jessop could have been witness of her triumphal limbs, but then, she had heard so much of self-sufficiency that she mocked at herself for a poor thing at the very thought. No doubt she would get used to the absence of George Jessop and, like Narcissus, be content with self-worship in the mirror of the sudden brook. She said something of the kind to Miss Hobbs, who heartily concurred. Said Miss Hobbs: "The last need of woman for her lesser complement, man, will be dispensed with when woman comes to recognize the fact that she can worship her own beauty much more adequately than can man. Why not?" Miss Hobbs always ended her introspective philosophizings with a tense "Why not?" to which there seemed to be no other answer than an affirmative. It was so in this case. After all, what more could George Jessop say of Millicent than Millicent, with the aid of the brook and no clothing, could say of herself. Then, too, self-praise could be so eminently satisfactory and unfailling. This was the ultimate argument in favor of a manless state. Millicent collapsed and allowed Miss Hobbs to send George Jessop word that Millicent had decided upon a celibate career. It is another story to tell of the receipt of this intelligence by George

Shortly thereafter, Miss Hobbs converted the second satellite. This was Millicent, a frail thing, and very much in love with one George Jessop, with whom she contemplated matrimony. Millicent was of a plastic mind, and invariably when in Rome, she did as the Romans did

Millicent collapsed and allowed Miss Hobbs to send George Jessop word that Millicent had decided upon a celibate career. It is another story to tell of the receipt of this intelligence by George Jessop. That is, the immediate receipt. The upshot was an indignation meeting between George Jessop and the deposed "brute"—he who had dared greatly enough to revile the sacred matter of bobbed hair and platonic friendship and bare-foot dancing.

"She's stolen my wife," said the brute.
 "She's stolen my sweetheart," said George J.
 "Damn her!" they unisoned.

Then, after a pause, "What'll we do?"
 Much frantic smoke, then the brute, "What about Wolff Kingsearl?"

George J. livened up. "Wolff always knows what to do about women," he agreed, with some hope.

"Still, Miss Hobbs . . ."
 Yes, they agreed, Miss Hobbs was different. Damned if she was a woman at all. Damned if they knew what she was. They'd never seen her—but they could imagine. Angular female, with horned glasses and a huge stride. Also, a stentorian voice, no doubt. Oh, they could see Miss Hobbs. Her trouble, they knew, was not contempt of man, but lack of man. A little kiss, a moonlight stroll or two . . . Miss Hobbs would not be Miss Hobbs . . .

Appealed to, Wolff Kingsearl agreed that a man was doubtless the remedy to apply to Miss Hobbs. He had never, he said, known it to fail. Still, where to find a man was the question. The bereft husband, bearing no possible resemblance, in his meek forlornness, to a brute, and the eager lover, joined forces and bet Wolff that no man, however versed in the fairer sex, could even so much as kiss Miss Hobbs after a month's effort. They thought to apply pin-pricks and spurs to the hitherto unassailed prowess of Wolff. The prowess remained unassailed. Wolff admitted the probable efficacy of the prescribed treatment, but hinted at a svelte blonde temporarily occupying the field of his activities . . . was awfully sorry . . . hoped they succeed . . . but Miss Hobbs . . . rather acidulous, wasn't it . . . rather frigid zone . . . ?

Two days later Miss Hobbs found it necessary to call at

It takes a legacy (and an opulent one) to lure a wife away from a husband, a sweetheart from her lover. Yet all this Miss Hobbs did . . . and more on her estate which she probably called New Thought the home of the brute for Beulah's more personal belongings. In keeping with his habitual tactics the creature had dared to retain several of her most prized possessions. Beulah was timid and knew the potency of the brute. Miss Hobbs volunteered.

Wolff Kingsearl happened to be at the house awaiting the lorn return of the brute. Miss Hobbs, seeing him, told him, haughtily, that she was the maid of Miss Hobbs, but Wolff, being versed in feminine tactics, knew that he was gazing upon Miss Hobbs. Knew it, and longed to gaze indefinitely. Knew it, and felt, suddenly, that he could not have his fill of gazing. His heart beat to suffocation and his palms were moist. Miss Hobbs . . . If he had not felt unaccountably serious he could have shrieked . . . He'd let Miss Hobbs steal his wife any day, he thought, and half a dozen sweethearts . . . Even the svelte blonde faded away from the active field and it was, again, and this time, rather definitely, without a tenant.

For, be it said, Miss Hobbs was rounded and fair. Her hair was a baby gold and escaped "in tendrils," as the novelists would say. Her eyes were blue, May-time blue, and implored—at times. Her mouth—but I cannot say what I mean about her mouth. She had a voice—oh, you know—

Wild thoughts, like wild geese, wove patterns in Wolff Kingsearl's mind.

What to do? Here he had gone and fallen in love! Really in love. And with Miss Hobbs, to whom man was not. What to do? Caveman tactics she would resent, repudiate. They would disgust her more effete mentality. Her philosophy, seeing clearly, would know them for what they were and cast them forth into a sea of oblivion. At which thought Wolff Kingsearl shuddered. Sentimentality she would laugh at. He thought he could hear that laughter—like the tinkling of thin ice. What to do? Where to appeal? In the next room he could hear Miss Hobbs packing. Packing Beulah's things. She was doing it very definitely, very efficiently. Of course, she would. It occurred to Wolff, with a pang of wonder, that she was, whatever her theories, efficiency, definiteness, a woman. She was that, inescapably. And women were primarily the mothers of men. That was sound reasoning. Appeal to the mother, the mother-pity, in the most theoretical breast and you've struck the richest vein in the component make-up of the other sex. If there were no pity—but Miss Hobbs did not have those eyes, that mouth, that voice, those hands for nothing . . .

Wolff had one talent. He could play a piano. He could play a piano and make it speak for him. He had done it before on many memorable occasions, and always successfully. There had been the specific instance of the little Lalita—but that is another, and a different sort of story . . . He tried it now. He played Chopin. He could. He played, and as

La Bella Sevilla

SIGHTSEERS from all over the globe knew her—the Spanish dancer at the San Diego Exposition. Daughter of one of the oldest and most distinguished Spanish families resident in California, Beatrice Dominguez, the girl whose eyes sparkled like Burgundy, whose graceful interpretation of the folk-songs charmed thousands, has come to stay in motion pictures.

But it was not without a struggle. Her relatives wished Beatrice to become a doctor or lawyer; there had been no player-folk or dancers of professional tendencies in a long line of ancestry. Frank Dominguez, nationally known as a criminal lawyer of Los Angeles, and whom the girl calls quaintly "my second uncle," since he is grand-uncle to her, would gladly have seen her enter the law.

Dancing was in the blood of her race. Mrs. Dominguez, born in old Sevilla, never had a dancing lesson in her life—she simply danced—danced her way into the heart of a lad in the old country who brought her to California and the life of the great ranchos which covered thousands of acres. Beatrice learnt to dance from her mother, and from her, too, she inherited the priceless mantillas, combs, jewelry and embroidered shawls which she wears.

"You see," said Miss Dominguez, "Spanish dances are all symbolical. One cannot buy the music for them; it is given from one to another. One has visitors—they dance, sing, play the guitar—I say to them, 'Oh, how beautiful is that melody, how I like it!' They say to me, 'You may copy the music if you wish.' In that way, I have about thirty dances. My mother arranges the dances—always she has danced! Myself, I was educated in Sacred Heart Convent for five years—my three older sisters who have married well and who have never worked," (this with an air of conscious pride), "spent most of their lives there. My younger sister has been in a few pictures, but she does not like the life. I would not have her work at anything else—and since she is company for my mother, she does not work at all.

"We were born in San Bernardino, where it is much more Spanish than in Los Angeles now. I dislike the great, bustling crowds on the streets here, so unlike the old town of Los Angeles, or the Spanish section of San Diego, as my mother describes them."

"How did you happen to take the name of 'La Bella Sevilla'?" You should hear Miss Dominguez pronounce that "La Baya Sayveeah" in faultless Castilian. She apologized for her pronunciation, since so much Spanish is spoken in her home that she has quite as much accent as a newly arrived Sevillan señorita.

"It was to do my mother's birthplace honor," she replied quickly. "The name proved a detriment when I used it for registration at the studios. I did not realize that at the time. Always—after I left San Diego, and had danced at the Mission Inn in Riverside—I wished to act. I called at some studios and did not say that I was the première dancer of Balboa Park. I simply registered as 'La Bella Sevilla.' Mr. O. H. Davis, who was a vice-president of the Exposition, was appointed general manager of Universal. One day, when I called there, he suggested that I use my own name, because directors were rather afraid to employ a dancer because they reasoned that she could not act. I was baptized 'Beatriz,' but at the studios they have turned that into the American 'Beatrice.'"

Señorita Dominguez is true to racial type—social but aloof, proud yet gracious, always distinguished by that graceful dignity which one associates with her race.

Miss Dominguez has just finished sittings—or should one say "standings"?—for pictures depicting prehistoric cave-dwellers' habits. Since her work precluded leaving the Angel City, Beatrice posed at the studio. Later, thru double photography, Zion Canyon, Utah, backgrounds were printed in. Hundreds of photographs had been submitted showing models who wished to have the honor of a showing for the New York Art Exhibition; this country was combed from coast to coast before La Bella Sevilla was chosen. A startling photograph of the little dancer is called "The Kill," presenting a cave-woman with one foot firmly planted on the head of a wildcat she has just dispatched with a bone club.

Very beautiful is this young señorita. Remarkable eyebrows, wide at the nose, tapering off to delicately sharpened points, give individuality to her face. A large, generous mouth shaped to a Cupid's bow gives a coquettish air. Eyes with the velvet depths of black pansies change with every emotion. Beatrice's hands are fascinating—photographers are always featuring those beautifully tapered fingers. She wears an odd ring nearly one hundred and ten just to show you what a dutiful wife I am, I'll try to find those pictures."

For a moment after she left us, Mr. Washburn and I smiled at each other as we listened to the click of the little French heels flying down the wide hall, keeping time with the gay, lilting tune she hummed.

It doesn't take very long to discover the two big interests in Bryant Washburn's life—his home and his work. When he is not at the Lasky studio, making those merry farcical comedies which we all so much enjoy, he is at his home a few blocks distant, with his pretty wife, the adorable four-year-old Sonny, whose real name is Franklin Bryant Washburn IV, and the new baby, named for Mr. Washburn's great-uncle, Dwight Ludlow Moody, the famous evangelist.

"You can imagine, with the religious strain so prominent in the family, that I received little encouragement in my desire for a stage career," said Mr. Washburn. "After leaving school, you know, I grew up in Chicago. I dabbled around at a lot of things, even sold insurance, but my heart wasn't in the work. One day my chance came. I put on a dress suit and became head usher in a local theater, and I felt that I was on my way.

"Not long after this I met George Fawcett, and he asked me if I would like a small part in his play, 'The Great John

"WOULD you believe that he used to play dope fiends and heavy villains?" asked Mrs.

Bryant Washburn, nodding at the film star whose rompings with Sonny had sent us into gales of laughter.

"Never!" I exclaimed, emphatically. "He couldn't, not with his merry smiles."

"That was before he was married, so perhaps he didn't have so many nor—such radiant ones," she replied, mischievously.

"We did have some funny old stills of me in those days," began Mr. Washburn, having deposited his happy son on the front veranda. "Once," he added, with a sly wink at his wife, "I had a nice, untidy study where I could lay my hands on everything I wanted—"

"Until one day I was seized with a desperate cleaning streak," she interrupted, "and since then neither of us has been able to find a thing. Now, Ganton.' Would I? Well! You should have seen me prancing onto the stage all dressed up in sport flannels, carrying a tennis racket—at last an actor! The thrills this brought me meant much more than the dollar I received for each performance."

At the end of the season, Mr. Washburn joined a stock company and later went to New York. After a few ups and downs, mostly the latter, and being broke, he signed with Essanay to make pictures, more as a means of getting back to Chicago than as a step upward in his career. This was ten years ago, and he has been in motion pictures ever since—seven years with Essanay, a short period with Pathé and the remainder of the time as a Paramount-Arcraft star.

Mrs. Washburn came flitting back to the drawing-room with the stills, and for half an hour we laughed over the pictures of Bryant, slim and terribly serious, in fearful make-up and grotesque costumes.

"The first time I ever saw him," began Mrs. Washburn, with her characteristic impetuosity, "was at a neighborhood movie, and I kept saying to a girl friend, 'Can he be a real Italian?' Not long after this I went over to Essanay as an 'extra' and Bryant was the first one I saw. Of course, I recognized him, and how I feasted my eyes, for he looked good to me, even if he did wear a green coat and an awful tie. I shall never forget that tie." And she sighed tragically.

"Do you remember how skinny you were? No double chins then,"

Once upon a time he used to be a cinema villain—and because of his influence over the feminine contingent throught the country, a philanthropic director turned him into the hero of the play. she added, saucily.

"Never mind; when I get fat I'll do nice old men rôles," Bryant retorted. "I was making forty-five a week," he went on, cheerfully, "when we met, and with an unexpected raise of ten dollars we decided we could be married. Every one predicted this would hopelessly ruin my career and I was urged to at least keep it quiet. This didn't suit me. I wanted the world to know I had won Mabel and I was determined to be married and publicly, too. On the contrary, I believe it helped my popularity from the first. You would be surprised to know how many romantic girls write that they are glad I acknowledge my marriage and how they enjoy hearing about the family.

"It is the dear old ladies, tho, that are my special pride, for they write wonderful letters, saying I remind them of their sons or the sons they might have had, and it tickles me to pieces.

she told me, raising her voice above the ocean's roar. "It was while living in Honolulu, however, that I became so expert. Why, I almost lived in the water. It is wonderful over there. Duke Kahanamoku, the Hawaiian who has won so many honors in the Stockholm Olympic games, taught me to ride the surf boards. That is absolutely the most fascinating thing in the world, with its breathless sensations, for you seem to go a mile a minute; of course, you do go as fast as the waves, and, oh, it is thrilling!"

IRENE RICH lifted herself out of the surf long enough to shout, "Isn't it great! Wish I could go on swimming forever and ever. Here is where one forgets all worry and trouble," and, with a gay laugh, she plunged into a huge breaker and was lost in the mass of green-and-white spray.

An hour earlier, Irene had said, "It's between pictures and I have a whole day to myself. Let's go down to the ocean for a swim."

"Let's," I responded, "and we can interview en route."

Quickly preparing a little picnic lunch, and gathering together our bathing-suits, we were soon motoring westward in her comfy sedan.

It was a gorgeous morning. Blue sky, bluer ocean, with its dazzling white-crested waves, the exhilarating salt air, all made one glad just to be alive.

We found an exclusive stretch of beach, with only sea-gulls as spectators, and here we splashed and rode breakers, while Irene, in the rôle of a water nymph, furnished a little exhibition of marvelous skill as she swam far out into the ocean with firm, clean strokes.

"I have always known how to swim—can't remember when I didn't,"

Blanche Ring, the well-known theatrical star, gave Irene a letter of introduction to the Lasky studio two years ago—and on the strength of it she got a part as the nurse in "Stella Maria." The part was a tiny one—that is, when you looked again, Irene was gone. Now look where she is! Above, a photographic study of Miss Rich, and, right, as a water nymph on California sands

By MARY KEANE

Miss Rich has been steadily advancing in motion pictures, and has recently won distinct applause for her splendid work as leading woman in Will Rogers' late successes. She is pretty, of that sweet, wholesome feminine type that is so appealing. She is slender, graceful and magnetic, with an active mind in close touch with the vital currents of the life of today.

Resting on the sand in the warm sunshine, she told me of the steps that have marked the way, so far, in her career.

"I have always acted, mentally—do you know what I mean? Whenever I saw a play I found myself submerged in the rôle I particularly admired, following it thru all the scenes, so you see, I am now only making a reality of my dream-acting." And Miss Rich laughed lightly. Too bad the camera cannot catch that silvery laugh.

"Several years ago," she continued, "I became acquainted with Blanche Ring, and I told her of my ambition to get into motion pictures. She's a darling, you know, always doing things for people, so she gave me a letter to the production manager at the Lasky studio, and he, in turn, introduced me to the casting director, who put me in 'Stella Maris' as a nurse. Really, it was just atmosphere, for I could see myself only between blinks when the picture was shown. I was happy, tho, for it was a beginning. That was two years ago last November, so I feel I have made some progress."

After "Stella Maris" there followed a series of pictures in which Irene played wee bits, sometimes very wee indeed. Then, one fine day, it really happened—she made the jump from extra to leading woman. Dustin Farnum was the star, and that in itself was good luck, for think of being even the screen beloved of "Dusty" and the heroine of his thrilling Western dramas.

After this, things moved rapidly; she played opposite to Frank Keenan in "Todd of His Times," and made several pictures with William Farnum, Earle Williams, Gladys Brockwell and Louise Glaum.

"All this was such splendid experience," went on Miss Rich, "and after playing in a couple of Goldwyn films, I signed with them for two years, and it is a very happy association. I made three plays with Will Rogers as his leading woman—'Water, Water, Everywhere,' 'The Strange Boarder' and 'Jes' Call Me Jim.' I was sorry that I didn't fit the type for his new picture, for he is so wonderful to work with. They dont make men like him very often. All his pictures are clean and wholesome—he positively couldn't play any other. In 'Jes' Call Me Jim' there is a beautiful theme, and Mr. Rogers is just himself. I hope there will be others like it. His wife is just as sincere and real as he and they are about the happiest couple I have ever seen. There are four cunning

"Yes or No"

Told in story form from the Norma Talmadge—
First National Photoplay

By
OLGA SHAW

FATE works so obscurely, so irrelevantly, say some of the modernistic philosophies, that it makes little, if any, difference which way one takes when one comes to a turning of the road: the destinations being identically the same. Now and then, there are individual cases disproving—for instance, I am minded of Margaret Vane and Minnie Berry. Analogous, poles apart, one when life pressed upon her saying yes, the other saying no.

Margaret was a type, a rather commonplace type, if one might term a person with the outer seeming of an exotic commonplace. She was much like an extravagant rose, fragrant and beautiful, but to be had in great varieties. The essence of her being was possessed of similarity. Her life was made up, principally, of money and what money can buy; of balls and teas and men and the admiration of men; of indifferent, anemic novels, sex plays and vaguely picturesque charities. She never took off her glove when it became necessary for her to shake hands with life. She didn't know anything about contact. She didn't dream, either, because dreaming is, of all things, the most real. She just frittered, and if the frittering palled upon her, as it necessarily and frequently did, she took it out on the person nearest at hand, petulantly imagining that it was the fault of that person. The person happened to be Donald Vane, her husband.

With the perfect inconsequentiality of the human emotion, Donald Vane loved the hothouse rose he had married. He loved her beauty and he did dream and he injected his own dreams into her, subcutaneously, and they sufficed him. He thought it quite reasonable that she should sleep half the day, dance half the night, flirt the few waking hours she spent, adorn her sumptuous person in the ultra-fruit of the mills and looms and charge it up to him. To make the payment of the charges possible he toiled night and day, and when it became no longer possible for him to supply these things with the toil of his brain and brawn he supplied them with his nerve forces. In the course of time his physician told him that he had gone past a limit. "You're on thin ice," he said; "you'd better tell your wife and ask her to curtail and both of you live more simply . . . the pace that kills, my lad . . ."

Donald Vane shook his head. His physician noted, with a fatherly pang, that there was grey showing in the bright gold. "I don't want to worry her," he said; "I especially don't want to worry her. She—she has such a good time. It's what I work for."

Donald worked harder than ever. Margaret frittered harder than ever. And when she had time to think about it, she lamented the fact that she was a "neglected wife," that her husband gave his all to his work, and took a certain doleful pleasure in the evidently greater appreciation of other men. "Donald," she decided, "was always rather ball. It was to be a brilliant affair, with the young and popular Vanes at something of their ascendency. At the very last moment Donald telephoned that he would be delayed at the office—imperative work—and could not be present.

Margaret had been white with fury. She had told him over the wire, the most venomous things she could think of. He had, she said, disgraced her, humiliated her, made her a laughing-stock. An affair like the ball, and her husband missing — "at the office" — flimsy, absurd excuse!

Donald had been patient, exasperatingly patient. The fact of the matter was, he had had that day another warning from his physician

At first it was just like a breath of salt air, that and nothing more, to have Ted come in with his laughter, his hint of outside things, the tales he told, the things he did dense, rather uninteresting. He is just a machine with no finer sensibilities."

Even when he died she did not suspect that his sensibilities had killed him.

She thought it was failure of the heart. That was, his physician decided, the kindest thing to call it. He thought of some lines of Kipling's:

"Maybe they used him too much at the start, Maybe Fate's weight cloths are breaking his heart."

His death followed, almost immediately, the huge ball given by Margaret. She had really worried herself to death over that

Things had been so hard, the children ailing actually sick, not enough good milk, not enough to pay the doctor's bill, the rent behind, coal going up, Minnie herself with a back-ache, and almost discouraged to avoid excitement at any cost, that if he wished to continue treading the mill of his domestic expenditures he must be a part, undisturbed, without noise or commotion. That the ball might be painlessly paid for, as it were, Donald remained away.

Putting up the receiver he had thought, a little wearily, that the excitement of Margaret's injustice was almost worse than the excitement of the ball would have been . . .

It was on the night of the ball that the affair with Paul Derreck began in good earnest. Paul was an old suitor of Margaret's. He was, incidentally, an old hand at an old game. When Margaret, sore to fury over Donald's imagined neglect of her, poured forth her woes she found Derreck an almost tender listener. His sympathy was as suave as oil, as gentle as silk, as unassuming as a mother's. He said that he "understood." He spoke of a rare spirit. He spoke of loneliness, of lives like ships, passing one another, unhailed . . . the pity of it . . . he spoke of contacts, of might-have-beens . . . he called Margaret "little girl" and "beautiful child." He left her with a craving for more of his talk, for his reassurances.

What she craved she had made a habit of getting. She saw more and more of Paul Derreck. The small, warm comforting of his understanding kindled and grew into a flame. And so, when he asked her to give up everything and come away with him, to another land, another life, she had no stamina of refusal.

She said "Yes."

The same night she told Donald of her decision. "I can't stand your neglect," she explained: "you neither appreciate me nor understand me. I am going away with Paul."

That same night, also, Donald Vane died.

Minnie Berry was also a commonplace type, at least to the outward eye. She was a sort of ragged sailor by the way-side, getting along with the sun when it shone, with the rain when it fell, with the winds when they blew—and they customarily did. She gave little fragrance, and the beauty she had been dowered with rarely shone forth from suds and steam and the fumes of dreary cooking. Yet within there was an essential aroma.

Ever since she could remember, life had been more or less the same for Minnie. Her mother had had many children and, with each one, increasingly bad health. The burdens had thereupon fallen to Minnie, and she, being Minnie, had accepted them. After awhile some of them married, some got jobs, her mother died, her father lived on in a sort of protoplasmic state, and then Jack Berry had come along. There had been a brief period of illusion, spent, mostly, in the movies or at Coney Island. Then marriage. A further and briefer period of illusion, and then the children, drudgery, poverty, the same reiterated thing which had composed the whole of her existence. The illusion, had, perforce, to be put away. There was too much work for very much dreaming. Which was well, for, unlike Margaret Vane, the chances were great that Minnie Berry would have dreamed. But now and then, in brief, snatched intervals, her youth and the prerogatives of her youth would raise their stunted heads and put forth faint, feeble cries for the sustenance of sun and air and recognition. Color and poesy and promise had been so dwarfed, so brief.

It was, therefore, not impossible to understand the temptation that Ted Leach began to possess for the work-worn woman, who was still hardly more than a girl.

Ted was a chauffeur who boarded with the Berrys, with the record of a more or less reckless life. Attractive, particularly to Minnie, chained to her endless toil, her endless worries, her endless disappointments and setbacks. First, it was just like a breath of salt air, that and nothing more, to have Ted come in with his laughter, his hint of outside things, the tales he told, the things he did. Then, it grew more personal. Minnie, unheeding of the meaning, began to put away the wash-tub before it should be time for Ted to return at night. The one period of idleness in her day would be the fifteen minutes of attention she gave Ted when he came in. With Jack, her husband, it was dull and different. Jack never seemed to want to talk to her—never seemed to care to tell her anything, or, in fact, to have anything to tell. He didn't find her good fun any more. She knew this, but didn't resent

She said "No!" Then she said it again, "No, No, No!" She was struggling in his arms, still crying "No!" when Jack came in—and finished the struggle by all but finishing Ted

Derreck, with the contempt he invariably showed for melodrama or the loss of poise, wrenched the thing out of her hand, and then handed it back, telling her to kill herself if she wished to kill anyone or a flower or a few candies. Ted did all these things. After awhile Ted seemed to the girl a sort of glowing bar of light across the drabness of her days, the meanness of her worries and the fears for herself, for Jack, for her children. He was something to turn to when other things pressed too heavily.

He encouraged her about Jack, too, about his inventions. Said he would make good, sure as fate! He was awfully nice and kind about everything. Best of all, it made Minnie know that she was still young, still attractive, that everything glamorous and wonderful need not be over. Somehow, she grew to need the stimulus of it, even tho she never swerved in her innermost heart from Jack, from the children she it, acutely—there wasn't time nor strength. Ted was anxious about her, too. This gave her a sort of thrill, altho she didn't label it as such. It had been a long time since anybody cared whether she were tired, whether she wanted to go out, brought her, now and then, a magazine and finished the struggle by all but finishing Ted

Twelve months. Margaret Vane living alone, in her country home, very much alone. People have a habit of dropping off, after the manner of leaves when the summer of contentment is fled. Margaret found that the many guests she had entertained had been entertained by her very much more for the sake of Donald than for the sake of her own society. Nor did they take kindly to Paul Derreck.

Paul had not married her. For a time after Donald's death he had played the rôle of very ardent lover. Whenever she had, tentatively, suggested marriage he had professed surprise at her eagerness as "bad taste." "So soon," he had said. She had replied that she didn't see that it made any difference—their union was so, in fact. He had been vague. He had kept on being vague. His ardor still persisted—after a fashion. It was a fashion that brought the brand of shame to Margaret's face. She knew now what manner of love the man was offering her.

After awhile she grew desperate. Donald—dead. Loyal, hard-working, honest Donald, who had married, protected her, spun a cocoon of fine silk about her, revered her. And Paul—worshipped and brooded over.

He had been boarding with them for nearly six months before the real temptation came. Things had been so hard, the children ailing, actually sick, not enough good milk, not enough to pay the doctor's bill, the rent behind, coal going up; Minnie herself was backachy and almost discouraged, Jack toiling stupidly, it seemed now, stupidly and endlessly, at the invention that never "invented."

If it hadn't been for Ted—Minnie grew to shudder at the mere idea of losing Ted. The touch of his hand had grown to be the thing that made her day a day.

One of the days Ted came to her and told her that all the past six months had been a game he had played because he loved her, couldn't bear to see her working so, killin' herself, it was; he wanted her to quit the whole business, to come away with him. He could make money, he always had been able to, he would, for her. She could have things . . . pretty things . . . sleep, too, rest and books and auto rides, everything she had been going without. He had to say it . . . he had to have her . . . he . . . He came over to her and held out his arms. His eyes were ablaze and his voice shook. Drabness took hold of Minnie's soul; drabness and this other thing, this pulse-shaking, shameful thing . . . shameful, yes . . . he didn't love her . . . not soberly . . . not in a way that counted . . . Jack, working, the children, the children . . . she would go on, because she must, she must . . .

She said, "No!" Then she said it again, "No, No, No!" She was struggling in his arms, still crying "No!" when Jack came in for whom she felt this insistent, deathly passion that gnawed at her, with redness and remorse, and would not let her be.

She had few resources. For all her super-sophistication, Margaret, like most unthinking, unintrospective souls, was a primitive. She had only a limited measure of retaliation.

She had never been unhappy before. She simply could not accept unhappiness, either philosophically or otherwise. A year after Donald's death she asked Paul Derreck, bluntly, what he intended to do. "I have all but lost caste everywhere," she told him; "my husband died because of this. I am heart-broken, and I am desperate. I advise you to think this thing over."

Derreck gave his light laugh. "There is nothing whatever to think, Margaret," he said; "I intend doing—nothing. Really, now, why should I?"

The newspapers bore varied accounts of the final tragedy, but the facts of the case were that Margaret, growing hysterical, produced a revolver and threatened to shoot if he did not reconsider and right her miserable state by marrying her. Derreck, with the contempt he invariably showed for melodrama or the loss of poise, wrenched the thing out of her hand and then handed it back, telling her to kill herself if she wished to kill anyone.

She did.

She must have lain in that darkening room for a long while after he had left. She must have thought, and for the first hither time, strange, pitiable thoughts. Perhaps she prayed, to Donald, to God, to Heaven, to the lover who had left her, before she put the bullet thru her brain. Who knows—who knows?

Margaret, when life pressed upon her, had said "Yes."

Twelve months. Minnie Berry and Jack and the children in a little cottage, a sort of semi-bungalow, unpretentious but thoroly comfortable, in the woody part of New Jersey. After the apparently ceaseless efforts the washing machine had turned out successfully and there was a steady sum coming in from its wise commercialization. The children, healthy and happy, going to school, flowers growing, hope reborn, love, guarded, still burning upon the tended hearth . . .

Minnie, when life had pressed upon her, had said "No."

"YES OR NO"

Fictionized from the scenario adapted from the play by Arthur Goodrich. Directed by R. William Neill. Produced by Jos. Schenck. Released by First National, starring Norma Talmadge. The cast:

Margaret Vane.....	Norma Talmadge
Donald Vane.....	Frederick Burton
Paul Derreck.....	Lowell Sherman
Doctor Malloy.....	Lionel Adams
Minnie Berry.....	Norma Talmadge
Jack Berry.....	Rockcliffe Fellows
Ted Leach.....	Gladden James
Emma Martin.....	Natalie Talmadge
Tom Martin.....	Edward S. Brophy
Horace Hooker.....	Dudley Clements

The bruise on their lives which there might have been, had the dint of poverty equalled the dent of Minnie's morale, was passed over as an obscuring spot might pass over the sun. Minnie looked back on it now, and shuddered to think that the day could ever have been drab enough for her to pause on such a brink. The children . . . Jack . . . this peace . . . this well-earned peace . . .!

She had never, she felt, been taught to meet things. She had just been a haphazard person, drawing on peradventurous resources for her courage to do or dare. She had it . . . or she did not have it. With the children it would be different . . . she, by reason of her moments of temptation, would make it different. There would be no game of blindman's buff for them to play . . .

The Screen Year in Review

6. Harold Lloyd's comedies.
7. "Jubilo."
8. "Behind the Door."
9. "Scratch My Back."
10. "The Six Best Cellars."

Our biggest disappointment of the year lies in the fact that David Wark Griffith has contributed nothing material to the screen during the twelve months. For the first time in three years he fails to head our list of best photoplays. Just now, when the photoplay needs a courageous leader more than ever before, he has failed to follow his epic of Limehouse, "Broken Blossoms," with anything worthy of himself. "The Idol Dancer," a trite chase melodrama of the tropics, came nearest in points of poetry and beauty, but it fell a thousand miles short. Griffith had his biggest theme in "The Great Question," dealing with the psychic problem of the existence of future life, but he lost his subject in a maze of stale melodrama. "Scarlet Days" belonged to the old Biograph period of Southwest romantic melodrama.

Actually the most important development of the year has been the splitting of the screen world into two factions: independents and—but what shall we term the others? Without question, Wall Street interests are bringing the bigger producing organizations together in what may develop into a gigantic combine, controlling the film theaters of America, or possibly the world. There are indications everywhere of this movement. While this has been under way, the photoplay world has seen a steady breaking away of the bigger forces and the

An infinitely interesting year it has been, one vibrant with fine promises for the future. True, the twelve months possessed their disappointments, but, upon the whole, the production average has been well sustained.

The weakness of the American cinema still remains manifestly the same; i. e., a lack of literary discernment and story discrimination. Most of the stuff produced in this country is absolutely banal.

The photoplay is developing its technique slowly and painfully. Here and there may be detected indications of the film drama of tomorrow; vital, human, close to life and far from the average melodramatic screen entertainment of today.

As for direction, the American average is high—in point of treatment and studio workmanship. But, while the average is uniformly high, the men who can vivify a story into silver-heat fire can easily be numbered upon the fingers of one's hands.

Before we digress further, let us name our selection of the ten best photoplays of the film year ending July 1, 1920:

1. "The Miracle Man."
2. "The Gay Old Dog."
3. "Pollyanna."
4. "Why Change Your Wife?"
5. "On With the Dance."
6. "Male and Female."
7. "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."
8. "23½ Hours' Leave."
9. "Humoresque."
10. Mrs. Drew's "After Thirty" stories.

A second list would consist of:

1. "Romance."
2. "Blind Husbands."
3. "The Right of Way."
4. "The Devil's Passkey."
5. "The Idol Dancer."

formation of independent organizations. This has manifested itself in the United Artists, the Associated Producers, etc. It is very clear that business interests cannot easily tie the hands of artistic development on the silversheet.

But to return to our selection. But six were original stories written for the screen and eleven were photoplays in which there were no stars.

Here let us register another disappointment. King Vidor, who, since he produced "The Turn in the Road," last year, seems to us the most promising single force in films, did not repeat himself. Yet we have not lost faith in this young crusader for the close-to-the-soil drama.

Cecil de Mille continued along his luxurious primrose path of sex and divorce. There is no questioning the popularity of this director, whose eye is that of the theater and not of the sympathetic observer of life. Lavish and picturesque is his style, but the human note of tomorrow is not there. Then, too, De Mille is running rife in boudoir negligée. His dramas are as intimate as a department store window.

The one directorial surprise of the year was Erich von Stroheim, heretofore a player of Teutonic scoundrels in war thrillers. Von Stroheim put over a flashing—if soulless—thing in "Blind Husbands" and then duplicated it with another study in passionate intrigue, "The Devil's Pass-key." Von Stroheim brings a new, Continental and uncannily cynical viewpoint to our screen, hence his sudden success. His is the eye of the Viennese boulevardier who adventures in romance, the Parisian connoisseur in love. He possesses surprising directorial dexterity, technically second only to Griffith. The soul of life itself is alone lacking, for his characters still fall short of the breath of reality.

Here we turn naturally to Mrs. Sidney Drew, who worked with Hobart Henley upon "The Gay Old Dog," that well-nigh perfect visualization of Edna Ferber's story. Mrs. Drew also produced a number of the "After Thirty" stories of Julian Street. These are all marked with a rare human note, a fine insight into life and a splendid ability to reflect it upon the screen. Mr. Henley's work upon "The Gay Old Dog" alone would justify careful observation of his future progress. Here let us draw attention to the fact that "The Gay Old Dog" is not rated as a financial success and that destructive conclusions regarding motion picture audiences have been drawn from it. To which we answer that "The Gay Old Dog" was released thru a channel familiar with the handling of melodramatic serial thrillers and the like. It failed for this reason and none other. We stand firm in our belief that audiences want the best—if they can get it.

It is rather late to comment upon George Loane Tucker, whose "The Miracle Man" holds first place in the screen year. If Tucker does nothing else, he has contributed much to the photoplay's progress. We judge him as possessing a fine sense of the drama, a welcome disregard of non-essentials and a remarkable ability to make players act. Many months have passed and we still await his next production.

George Fitzmaurice, master of screen light and shade, is coming along with splendid strides. He is at the very top of our directorial leaders. Frank Borzage leaped into attention with his "Humoresque," which, if long-drawn-out and tiresome at times, had a promising human touch.

Bill Hart's Dream Home

As we talked, the gay cretonne curtains swayed in the soft breeze, heavy with the fragrance from orchards across the road. To the north, the lengthening shadows were beginning to touch the Hollywood mountains, and over the whole scene brooded the peace and quiet of the late afternoon.

"These twenty-eight pages contain all the action for a picture," remarked William Hart, flipping the closely written pages he held in his hand. "This makes the fourth original scenario I have written since July, 'The Toll Gate' being the first to be filmed. I had that story in my mind for many months before I had the time to make it. I believe a story written especially for the screen starts out with fifty per cent. in its favor. The technique of plot-building is different in novels and pictures, tho many authors have not yet recognized this fact. In writing a book you begin immediately to work away from screen requirements. I enjoy building and working up my stories, but I'll admit that it requires hard work on my part and I dig at it many hours before getting results.

"Genius? Nonsense! There is no such thing. That is the most abused word in the whole language. People who accomplish things grind for them. That is all the genius there is—the determination to stick until you succeed," and the great exponent of Western screen drama flashed one of his rare but hearty smiles across the room at me.

Mr. Hart's study in his little green studio among the Hollywood orchards is crammed with treasures dear to his heart. With boyish enthusiasm he showed me his splendid collection of firearms, explaining the intricate workings of guns and rifles. There are several rare horse-hair lariats decorating the walls, while saddles, chaps and many Indian curios, gifts from the star's devoted primitive friends, fill the room.

Putting the treasures back into their places, Mr. Hart remarked, wistfully, "Seems a great pity to me that the three most romantic and picturesque elements of this great country—the Indian, the hardy frontiersman, the buffalo—must give way to the march of civilization. I am wondering if the exchange pays."

Watching his sensitive face as he spoke, I think I came nearer comprehending the love he bears his West than ever before.

It is always interesting to consider the influences that have combined to make a man what he is. The case of William Hart presents an especially aland yet once included among his acquaintances, the charm and warmth of his winning nature is irresistible. The somber eyes, with their hint of a ceaseless search of ideals, when illuminated with a cordial smile, invites the sincere homage that is showered upon him.

With this thought in mind, as we resumed our seats by the open windows, I asked the question, "What have been the vital influences in your life?"

"There have been three," came the quick reply, "my father, the West and the Sioux Indians. My mother was just—mother, that says it all; I worshipped her!"

"Suppose you had been reared in a small pastoral English village"—his father was English—"instead of the Dakota prairies, what do you suppose you would have been today?"

"So different—so vastly different that the two of us would not have a single thought in common. There is no question that environment is a powerful force," answered Mr. Hart. "Fate seemed to play with me, for it afforded the two elements necessary for me to produce the kind of pictures I want. First, there was the thoro knowledge of the West, gleaned during those impressionable years of youth. Then came sixteen years of active stage training under the greatest theatrical directors of the day. So I feel I came to the screen fully equipped for my work, and I am always grateful to the public who have believed in the West as I know it and am trying to present it."

"How about the new home?" I asked, presently, for he and his sister, Mary, have recently moved into a pretty little English cottage. "Your sister told me that when she inquired how you wanted your bedroom furnished, you replied, 'An iron bed, an Indian rug, that's all!'"

"Sure, what else do I need?" and Mr. Hart laughed, jovially. "For the love of Mike, what does a man want with a lot of fussy things lying around? To tell you the truth, I never feel comfortable in lavish surroundings. Mind you, tho, that isn't a real home; it is merely an abiding-place for Mary and me until my dream comes true. Want me to tell you about that?"

Lighting a fresh cigar and leaning back in his chair, Mr. Hart proceeded to reveal his secret dreams for the future.

"I was fifteen when we left Dakota. Tho I was a big hulk of a lad, I remember how I clung to my father's hand—there was a wonderful bond of affection between us—and as the train pulled out, I asked, 'Dad, when are we coming back?' and he replied, 'Only God knows, son.'"

"You see, I was leaving the only home I had ever known and, in my little-boy heart, the only home I wanted. Well, I'm a man now, but my heart hasn't changed. Always, always, my big desire has been to come back—to build the home I have dreamed about—here in the West.

"Now, with that wish ever in my mind and knowing that I am soon to leave motion pictures, I am constantly forming plans and building air castles as to just what that home shall be—oh, it is great fun.

"It is, of course, to be a ranch out in the big open, far removed from railroads and civilization. I want to transform some great desert waste and give it water—watch the soil become fertile—watch the trees grow. I want to see green pastures take the place of cactus and sagebrush, and I want to see herds of cattle

Thru his portrayal of rugged frontier life, Mr. Hart has kept before the public, a picture of the great West which may be viewed as historical; he has been for a great many years now a connecting link between the traditionally separated East and West justly won their place as contest winners.

Between July fifteenth and August first lies a span of some fifteen days, in which space of time, if you have not already done so, ample opportunity is given for you to go to your photographer and have some pictures made and sent in to us. All photographs mailed before and on August first will be accepted as entries in the contest.

This will be your last notification from the MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC. In our next number, (the September issue), while it will be impossible to announce the winners, owing to the great amount of work involved in the final selection from the thousands of photographs, nevertheless, we shall publish several pictures of some of the leading contestants.

We ask your immediate cooperation. If you have considered entering the contest, if you have thought over it, hesitated, decided to do so, and then hesitated again, we urge your quick response to this the last call for photographs, for any photograph mailed after August first will not be entered in the contest.

We are quite sure that at this writing most of our readers have seen the two-reel feature, "A Dream of Fair Women," which we produced last year, and in which the winners and final honor roll members of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest appeared. This picture was especially constructed for the purpose of giving

Do you remember, when you were a kid, the intense excitement of the games you used to play? Do you remember an especially thrilling game in which one of the crowd hid in a secret hiding-place, and the object of the game was to discover this place, and as you drew nearer and nearer to it, some one would call out, "You're getting warmer!" The contestants are beginning to feel that way now.

This copy of the MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC will not reach your hands until the fifteenth day of July. On the first day of August, the Fame and Fortune Contest, which has been a unique feature in the history of our three magazines, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, will come to a close, and as shortly after August first as possible, the winners of the contest will be announced. Once again we will be starting off on the road to success the fortunate contestants who have direct and immediate opportunity to the contestants to prove their acting ability. It created so much interest, however, that it was turned over to the Fine Arts Pictures, Inc., of 130 West 46th Street, New York City, and it has been released in practically every State thruout the country. If you have not already seen this picture, get your exhibitor to communicate with the above company, and it will be shown at your home town theater.

This two-reel feature will give you some idea of what we are going to do for the winners of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest. We have already started production on a five-reel drama in which the winners and honor roll members of this year's contest will appear.

"Love's Redemption" is the title of the picture, and the story is a strong, gripping one, dealing with the shadows and high lights of life. People of world-wide notability will appear in it; two of them being Edwin Markham, the beloved veteran poet, of international fame, and Hudson Maxim, the great inventor.

Blanche McGarity and Anetha Getwell, two of the winners of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest, have been cast for strong parts in the picture, and some of the others who have also been assigned rôles are Dorian Romero, Edward Chalmers, Erminie Gagnon, William Castro, Seymoure Panish, Alfred Rigali, the Schwinn twins, Mrs. F. Mayer, Titus Cello, Clarence W. Linton, Lynne M. Berry, Dorothy L. Taylor, Arthur W. Tuthill, Joseph F. Murtaugh, Wm. R. Talmadge and Ruth Higgins.

Most of the scenes will be filmed in and around the Brewster estate at Roslyn, L. I., and the taking will be continued well into September. Each issue of every one of our several publications will hereafter contain interesting news of the progress of the play.

We feel assured that this feature will be unique and unusual in every respect, and there will be no expense spared.

The direction will be of the best, and the play is a strong drama with a very unusual plot which will hold the attention all the way thru.

And the greatest attraction it can have for our readers is that it is being produced especially for them and will number many of them in the cast.

We are, not without reason, proud of our list of judges who will decide the winners. These will include such world-famous personages as Mary Pickford, Mme. Olga Petrova, Howard Chandler Christy, Thomas Ince, J. Stuart Blackton, Maurice Tourneur, Samuel Lummere, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, David Belasco, Blanche Bates and Eugene V. Brewster.

This month's honor roll is as follows:

From 2103 Pine Street, Philadelphia, Pa., comes a photograph of the very-easily-regarded Hilda B. Crawford. Miss Crawford has chestnut brown hair, blue eyes and a fair complexion.

Dallas Huntley hails from 25 Maury Street, Des Moines, Iowa. She High Lowe!

By GLADYS HALL

You would like Edmund Lowe. He is the good-fellow sort, with a genial smile and a genial hand-shake and a most hospitable dressing-room, in personal welcome and in point of refreshment, liquidacious and otherwise.

He is obviously in love with life, too, which is always pleasant and more or less inspirational. He's in love with work, in love with love, rather chummy, so to speak, with the world in general.

But—there are other, more profound, less easily taken-account-of reasons for liking Mr. Lowe. To begin with:

He is a philosopher, with a philosophy beyond his years, which are not multitudinous.

I was talking, the other day, with a very famous, a very popular actor of the speaking stage, past, so to speak, the first flush. He told me that age brings with it, as its chief compensation, a philosophy of acceptance. In other words, after youth we cease to rebel against the "sorry state of things." We fold our hands, compose our features and learn to smile.

Mr. Lowe has a philosophy of acceptance note. He appears to be merely fun-making. He appears to be merely working, with no thought of the morrow. He appears to be in and of today, sufficient unto itself. He is doing, has done and will do considerable thinking. He has a clear and reasonable mental equipment. He is not subject to illusions, still less delusions. In the vernacular, he knows what he is doing.

We spoke of old age. I imagined it would hold terrors for this man so vividly young. "Don't you dread it?" I asked. "Don't you hate it?" I felt sort of surgical, sort of vivisectional, as I put the questions.

"Why hate it or dread it?" he asked, with calm. "It comes. We all know that. We can't do anything about it, one way or the other. Why not accept it gracefully, make the most of it, as we should make the most of this, live it in its own way, with its own peculiar flavors, even as we live youth. Why rebel? Waste of energy."

Edmund Lowe has a philosophy of acceptance which embraces comedy as well as tragedy, age as well as youth, the movies as well as the stage, wigs, Confucius—and interviewers. He has been as successful on the screen as he has on the stage; his work with Norma Talmadge, Clara Kimball Young, Olive Tell and others giving him quite a following among movie fans

"What shall you do," I persisted, "when age comes—and 'all this' is out of the picture?"

"I shall step out, too," he said, "from the foreground to the background. I shall do it, I hope, without undue fuss and flurry. I shall give myself in the meantime, tho, a great deal to relive, a great deal to remember. I won't want to be participating—Nature takes care of that. But I shall want to be remembering, vividly, happily, fully. I shall not want MARION AINSWORTH was, in the flesh, precisely what society reporters mean when they write the words, "one of the season's buds." Very charming flesh it was, too, pink and sweetly curved, and like warm soft velvet—so one suspected—to the touch. Any one of a dozen eligibles would have been at her tiny, three-double-A slippers—if it hadn't been for Paul Carrington.

"On dit," hinted the gossip sheets. "Lucky girl!" sighed the other debutantes, still worried with the necessity of getting engaged their first season. "She might have done better," grumbled the dozen, seeking confirmation from their mirrors. "How did that little feather-head ever attract a serious young surgeon like Paul?" marveled the dowagers, shaking dubious grey marceles.

Even Mrs. Ainsworth took the whole affair for granted and absolutely threw her, so Marion bewailed, at Dr. Carrington's sleek, dark, well-shaped head. And yet—the proposal was still forthcoming! Of course, Marion was not in any doubts about Paul's feeling toward her, being able to read the unwritten language of eyes, hands that trembled as they touched her in the dance, tho they were steady enough in the operating room, but still it remained a fact that the momentous words were still to be said and heard. It was, she decided, apparently addressing a bright-green grasshopper sitting on the golf-bag beside her, simply too ridiculous for anything and provoking, too.

"He would have—have—well, he would have in another moment when we were sitting in the conservatory at the Nutleys' dinner-dance last Friday," she told the grasshopper, plaintively, "and then, right in the middle of the most interesting part, that old message had to come from the hospital! And he forgot what he was saying! I must say"—the red lips pouted pettishly—"it's hard to have one's only proposal interrupted by —p-pills! Oh, dear! I wish Paul was a banker or a broker or something pleasant—or I wouldn't mind having him be a doctor if he'd have an office on Park Avenue, all French grey and silver, with a pretty, starchy nurse in uniform to open the door—not too pretty, of course—"

The moving flecks of red and white across the course meant the guests of Mrs. Ainsworth's house party strolling homeward across the links; the far sounds of merriment, Marion decided, sensitively, meant that they were laughing at her unmanned plight.

She felt quite dangerous at the thought of the golden afternoon already beginning to fade into the limbo of the might-have-been with none of its hopes realized because some dirty little newsboy had been inconsiderate enough to break his leg or some totally uninteresting clerk's wife had taken this opportunity to have a baby.

"When I marry Paul," she declared, so vindictively that the startled grasshopper fell headlong off the golf-bags into the clover. "I shall see that he doesn't neglect me for his nasty old patients, but—till I'm married, I doubt see what I'm going to do—"

In the dusty distance the blunt nose of a Rolls-Royce roadster had appeared. Marion sprang to her feet, angry with herself for the absurd thrill of joy that shot thru her at the nearness of him. According to the rules of the game that a woman is supposed to follow, she should not let the man she wants suspect her heart, but keep him, rather, guessing until the final surrender. "He's coming!" cried her heart. "What else matters? We are above the need of rules, he and I. There is no trickery about our love!"

Paul Carrington caught her as she fell. "God, why did you let this woman come here?" he groaned; "hasn't she done me harm enough already?" But, hate her as he did he was a doctor first of all

A discreet cough at her elbow warned her that there were other people in the world, unfortunately. The butler bowed. "I beg your pardon, Miss Ainsworth; I thought that possibly Dr. Carrington had arrived. A telephone message has just come for him."

Marion felt her joy punctured by the swift stab of suspicion. "Give me the message, Parker." She read the slip of paper he handed her, with tightening throat, cast a swift glance at the approaching car and made her decision. "I will give it to Dr. Carrington, Parker—you need not wait. And you may say to whoever was phoning that the message has been delivered."

"I don't care!" she justified herself, as she crumpled the paper into her pocket and turned to meet the car. "I need him worse than anybody else! There are plenty of surgeons who can perform operations, but there's only one surgeon who can propose to me!"

Another moment and all thought of the troublesome bit of paper in the sweater pocket was swallowed up in the high tide of joy that washed over her spirit with the clasp of Paul Carrington's strong, slender hands, the glance of his grey eyes.

"I thought," she laughed, a trifle breathlessly, as they turned back to the car, "that perhaps you didn't care especially for tea. And in that case I might be induced to show you our view. You'd have to see it sometime, anyway. Mamma is very proud of the view and always drags our guests up the mountain to see it, quite as tho she were directly responsible for it."

"I am afraid," Dr. Carrington smiled down at her, "I am very much afraid that I shant see—the view. But I'd love to have you show it to me."

The top of the mountain was quite deserted, save for chattering squirrels and birds, querulous over the trespass into their ancient domain. The pine trees' breath was like incense poured from some swinging censer, and before them the world and the fulness thereof. And there, without interruption, the words Marion had longed for were said, and answered satisfactorily in the way they should be answered, his lips, awed yet eager, pressed upon her lips, quivering and shy.

Afterward they sat long in silence, looking away at the valley, gilded with the late afternoon light, seeing the world with new eyes, as those just born might see it. "And to think," Paul said presently, with a great sigh of content, "to think that I almost missed this. There's a very bad case I've been watching"—he felt her repugnance—"don't worry, dear! I'm not going to bring the poor fellow into our afternoon, only if he'd had a degree more temperature this morning I'd have had to have stayed and operated."

Marion moved uneasily. It seemed to her that she could feel the weight of the bit of paper in her pocket. "I believe," she accused him, "that you care more about your work than you do about—me."

He answered gravely, tenderly, but he did not, as she had wanted him to deny. "My work is me, Marion, the best part of me, the worthiest. It's as much a part of me as my hands or my eyes. If you care for me, you must care for my profession and not be jealous of it." His eyes rested on the bright head, the wistful beauty of her, and he grew all lover. And so the afternoon slipped away.

A merry group on the terrace of Woodwold hailed the late comers with significant strains of "Here Comes the Bride," rendered upon Bobby Shamon's ukulele. Mrs. Ainsworth, exquisite, a composite tribute to her maid, her modiste and corsetiere, moved to meet them and read confession in their faces. A mother feels hardly less triumph than her daughter at such a moment. It is in a subtle way, a delicate compliment to her to love her child. She took Paul's hands in hers, kissed him on the forehead and drew Marion to her side. "Friends," she smiled, "I am delighted that you should be the first to share our happiness."

"I beg your pardon, doctor, but this telegram came an hour ago, sir."

Paul took it indifferently, but his face changed as he read its brief message. "Have waited an hour since I telephoned. If you do not arrive by five, I must operate myself. Patient sinking fast. Do not understand your delay, since servant explicitly said 'phone message had been delivered."

Face stern, the doctor whirled upon the waiting Parker. "What did you mean by saying you delivered a telephone message to me? Some terrible blunder has been made and a man's life may be the price of it."

The butler forgot discretion for a panicky instant. There was that in Paul Carrington's face that would not be lied to. "Miss—Miss Ainsworth—she said for me to say it had been delivered," he stammered in the appalled silence. "I gave the message to her—I saw her read it—"

"Parker!" Mrs. Ainsworth spoke sharply, conscious of her daughter's white silence. "Go into the house at once!"

"Yes, madam," bowed the wretched man, and went, leaving utter rout behind. None of these well-bred men and women had been trained for such a crisis. It simply appalled them, depriving them of the power to move away, or even to avert their eyes from the two most vitally concerned.

"Marion," Paul Carrington said, the tinkle of ice in his tone, "is that true? Did you take a message for me—and keep it from me, a message asking me to return to town and perform an operation?"

She made an effort at nonchalance, even laughing in a high-pitched fashion. "Certainly! There are plenty of surgeons who can look after the patients for one afternoon. It's absurd for you to make a slave of yourself this way—I thought you needed a holiday and so I gave you one. That's all."

"All!" echoed the man, heavily, "all!" He turned abruptly and, without a backward glance, strode down the steps to his car, leaped

He turned his eyes resolutely away from the sight of her, clad in a woven garment of reeds, and drifting light as the foam on the beach—and he saw her always before him than he should have waited, and"—he met the young man's imploring eyes mercilessly—"he died under ether. It was a pity that we interrupted your game of bridge, after all."

"Dont!" Paul begged hoarsely. He sank down upon a chair, not from volition, but because he could not hold himself upright, and sat, staring down at his working hands.

"They told us you got our telephone." The younger intern did not attempt to conceal his scorn. "Perhaps you would care to explain? Or were your society friends more interesting than an intestinal tumor?"

It was incredible that they

CONFESSION

We always go to see Alla Nazimova with the same old anticipation and we always come away with the same old disappointment. Mme. Nazimova has the rare ability to suggest a rare ability.

We detest rural dramas with overdrawn country folk. Because we were raised in the country and realize they aren't overdrawn.

We would walk miles to see Charlie Ray in anything and the same distance to see Marie Prevost in—er—anything.

We adore Jane Novak on the screen, but flappers catch our eye in real life. On the other hand, we cant stand flappers in the films.

We refuse to consider Mary Pickford except in terms of superlatives.

We know May Allison has a sense of humor, even if she is a dazzling blonde.

We wish we could understand the popularity of Priscilla Dean.

nightly on the silversheet, but we would put our bank roll such as it is—in our inner waistcoat pocket if we met a Bebe Daniels in real life. And we'd hasten to accelerate our locomotion, too.

Harold Lloyd, Charles Murray and Ben Turpin are our favorite comedians, but we will come to blows with anyone who intimates Charlie Chaplin isn't funny.

We are strong for delicate, subtle comedy theoretically, but we have a secret failing for Mack Sennett and his bathing squad.

Everybody worships the dramatic beauty of Katherine MacDonald, but we have an unadulterated admiration for Harriet Hammond.

We will sit thru anything Elsie Ferguson does on the screen and revel in it.

We know that Gloria Swanson would probably be arrested in real life if she dressed as she does in the De Mille pictures, but we refuse to admit it. Gloria is the kind of person we'd rob a bank for.

We're sick of seeing celluloid life revolve around sixteen-year-old cuties. Yet we swear by Marjorie Daw.

These days, if a movie producer puts over a screen hit, he becomes a master; if he puts over two hits, he is a genius, and if—
But nobody has.

Judging from Cecil de Mille's recent opus, "Why Change Your Wife?" the biggest motive in modern life is negligée. And love?—it's a mere matter of discriminating purchases.

Speaking of Cecil de Mille, somebody has just gone him one better by producing "Why Change Your Mother-in-law?"

FROM BEHIND THE SCENES

By BARBARA HOLLIS

When Life's great curtain call shall sound,
When at the play's last page,
I hope that Time may find me still
An actor on its stage.

And, be my lot a humble one,
Perchance a servant's part,
I hope I'll still be acting it
With all my mind and heart.

So, when the Prompter gives my cue
With solemn voice intense,
God grant I need not answer Him
From out the audience.

AGNES AYRES was wearing a cunning little frock of pink-and-white gingham, a glorified gingham, softer and lovelier than silk, a big, droopy hat and white, round-toed pumps, and she looked exactly what she is, a wholesome girl.

We found a seat near a big palm, and the fragrance of orange-blossoms and roses filled the air, while the morning sun shone warm and soft.

"This is about the first moment of leisure I have had in five weeks," laughed Miss Ayres, "and I feel like a kitten. I like to sit and blink at the sun, thinking how good the world is to me.

"I've been so busy getting to where I am that really I have not thought much about the steps that brought me here," Miss Ayres told me, quite seriously. "Only an impelling desire to accomplish something really worth while in pictures has ever urged me on.

"Funny," she continued, "how we get started on our careers. Both father and mother were always interested in amateur theatricals, and at one time mother, who gave promise of being a second Maggie Mitchell, slipped away from home and, going to Cairo, Illinois, was about to join a theatrical company when her mother promptly took her home and that ended her career. Perhaps that broken girlish dream has made her more lenient in letting me try my wings. She has always been so wonderful, standing right back of me in everything, and such a comfort. You see, I'm a real mother's girl."

Miss Ayres declares that she had never given the stage any special thought until one fateful day when she visited the Essanay studio—the family lived in Chicago—and a director asked if she didn't want to be in a picture. This sounded like such a lark that she answered yes, and the next minute Agnes Ayres became a part of a mob scene in a Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne film.

So this is the way it all began. She photographed so well that they immediately gave her a place in the studio stock company, and all that summer she played tiny bits in the George Ade comedies which were being filmed. By this time, she confesses, she had the "bug," and when New York, the great Mecca, beckoned, she responded. There she went with the Mutual Film Company, making five pictures with Marjorie Rambeau and one with Nance O'Neil under Frank Powell's direction. Then came Vitagraph and the O. Henry stories.

It was as the original O. Henry girl that Miss Ayres first won recognition, and in the twenty-five pictures she made she succeeded in giving the characters that real and very human touch, with the spirited gaiety or quiet pathos with which the author had invested them.

For two years she free-lanced and early in the winter came to Hollywood to head the cast for the Famous Players-Lasky production of "Held by the Enemy."

It was during this time that Mr. Kaufman became interested in her ability and screen possibilities, signing her as his second star, the Allan Holubar-Dorothy Phillips combination being already under his wing.

"A new studio is being built for us over on Sunset Boulevard," Miss Ayres told me, enthusiastically, "and I am to have my own company and, oh, everything is going to be wonderful. I am doing a picture for Marshall Neilan before making the first one for Agnes Ayres, and I'm thoroly enjoying it. Micky is great to work with, for his good humor and lively spirits keep things humming and he will sacrifice anything for a good laugh.

"In this picture I play the rôle of a girl who owns a newspaper, and we took some night scenes at the Los Angeles Examiner last week. It was quite thrilling—those great presses—they seemed to be alive."

A mocking-bird poised on a palm nearby was practicing some new trills, and we listened to the sweet notes while we enjoyed the beauty of the scene before us.

"It is all so glorious here, how I love it!" Miss Ayres spoke softly, lest we frighten Mr. Mocker. "Of course, I am fond of New York; I had my first chance there and, too, it means theaters. I do miss them, yet here I am really living. You see, I have been shut up in hotels and apartments for so long that it is positively heavenly to Hugging her devoted companion, a lively toy Boston terrier, "Skooks," with his fine markings and button tail, the star declared that he had never lived a real dog's life before—now he has a whole big garden in which to bury choice bones.

"We have accumulated a lot of live stock," remarked Miss Ayres, between "Skook's" playful barks. "There are twelve rabbits, seven chickens, with six eggs each evening for me to find—it's the best fun! Then there are two Persian kittens only a few months old and a mamma cat we call 'Macushla.'"

"There was a time when I thought emotional and dramatic rôles were my forte." She had again settled down to the demands of an interview. "But I am beginning to prefer comedy dramas. They are so interesting and it requires much skill and finesse to steer such a play safely along. I like to study my story, visualize the scenes and then plan my costumes. So much, oh, so very much depends upon the clothes, for there is no doubt of their psychological effect both upon the actors and the audience.

"I remember once while working on an O. Henry story, the girl was poor, and I insisted on wearing an old pair of shoes all run down

From Shorthand to Stardom

THE war did it. If there had been no war, there would have been no Liberty Bonds and Estelle Taylor would now be teaching Wilmington's young how to act.

The new star sat in the new dressing-room of Mr. Fox's new studio over on Tenth Avenue and discussed this new experience, this ascension to stardom. It's a long step from a secretarial school in Wilmington, Delaware, to a featured player with a large picture corporation, especially when one has to walk the ties of a Methodist ancestry, but Estelle took it like a trained athlete. The exercise has left her natural and unspoiled and in possession of the good sense that promises to keep her that way until the final reel of the picture.

"It's queer how a person plans and dreams for years and years about the thing she wants to do most in the whole world, sees not the slightest chance of ever having the opportunity and then something that looks like a big evil turns the knob and says 'Walk in,'" she began, thoughtfully. "There was that nervous breakdown. Now, if you've ever had one you realize that you don't put a 'Welcome' on the door-mat for it. I was attending a secretarial school, studying all the tantalizing dots and dashes and the funny little curlicues when it came my way. I wasn't very cheerful at the interruption. I was anxious to master the art of making a long conversation short and get thru. I had a goal, a secret one, that lay miles and miles beyond being some nice man's nice secretary, and I was impatient of the delay in my progress toward it.

"However, when the physician and the family began to discuss the necessity of a change of surroundings and occupation, I saw the reason for my temporarily discontinued career. I began to speak—timidly at first, but more boldly as time went on—of the restorative qualities of a course at a dramatic school. I was very fond of children, and thru that my parents saw a solution of the problem. They would send me to a dramatic school in New York and when I had completed the course I could hang out my shingle and transfer my learning to the neighbors' children. That was the picture that painted itself upon the family vision. A far different landscape was hanging in my own private gallery, but the only thing that really mattered was that I was to have an opportunity to prepare for the work I was born loving.

"It was smooth sailing while I was at the school, for my checks came regularly. Instead of returning home with the shingle under my arm on finishing the course, I announced my

Your nails tell strangers all about you

How you can keep them always well groomed

IT is not only palmists who read your character by your hands. Wherever you go—whenever you appear in public, strangers are judging you by the appearance of your hands and nails. Some people do so unconsciously. To many it is the one sure key to a person's standing.

Carelessly manicured nails cannot be hidden. The loveliest gown, the most charming manner cannot affect the impression they give.

But there is a way to correct that impression. Your nails can be as lovely as anyone's with very little effort. A few minutes of the right kind of care, once or twice a week, is all that is necessary.

But it must be the right kind of care. Many of the most neglected looking nails are really not neglected; they are badly manicured. The cuticle is ragged and overgrown because it has been cut. The more you cut the cuticle the worse it looks. It grows thicker and thicker, the skin heals in little scars and hangnails form.

With Cutex, the liquid cuticle remover, you can keep your cuticle smooth and unbroken, the nails always lovely.

With a bit of cotton wrapped about an orange stick and dipped in Cutex, work around each nail base. Then wash the hands, pressing back the cuticle with a towel.

For clean, white nail tips, apply a little Cutex Nail White under the nails. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish.

To keep the cuticle soft and pliable so that you need not manicure as often, apply Cutex Cold Cream at night on retiring.

Cutex, the cuticle remover, comes in 35 and 65 cent bottles. Cutex Nail Polish, Nail White, and Cold Cream are each 35 cents.

Six manicures for 20 cents

For two dimes you can get a Cutex Introductory Manicure Set, containing enough of each of the Cutex products for at least six complete manicures. Send for it today. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th Street, New York.

Gossip of the Pacific Coast

By
TRUMAN B. HANDY

LOS ANGELES, CAL. (Special)—Olga Petrova's opening at the Orpheum vaudeville house here was not as auspicious as perhaps it might have been, because nearly half of the film colony has either been away on location or in New York, Australia, France and other parts of the world.

The Orpheum's first-night lacked a number of the picture stars who generally occupy the bald-headed rows on that eventful evening. In a second-tier box I noticed Thomas Holding and his wife, while Carter de Haven, Al Christie and Teddy Sampson sat in the pit. Petrova's dressing-room was banked with flowers sent her by film players.

Can you possibly imagine a picture colony minus nearly one-half of its picture celebrities? It's a paradox, but decidedly the case here. Blame it all on spring fever. Hollywood is practically deserted. The emigration is only temporary, however, because the stars all have contracts calling for their work in the West.

One Sunday morning a whole trainload left the Santa Fe station for New York. All the screen-famous were domiciled in one car. There were Bert Lytell and his wife; Gloria Swanson's husband, Herbert K. Somborn; Clara Kimball Young; Harry Garson; Jack Dillon, the director; and June Mathis, Metro's scenarioist-in-chief. Preceding them by a week was Sessue Hayakawa, who left Los Angeles to arrange final details for his new company. But Sessue felt the need of hurrying back to attend to details relative to the building of his new $300,000 studio.

That one-time matinee idol of the films, Wilfred Lucas, and his wife Bess Meredith, left some time ago to join a company in Australia. They will be abroad a year. Which reminds me that Arthur Shirley, remembered as the hero of "The Fall of a Nation," has also gone to the antipodes to organize his own company. And William Duncan is about to hie himself and company to South America to make a serial, while Anna Q. Nilsson has been packing her trunks preparatory to sailing for her native Sweden. Tsuru Aoki is in Japan, but is expected back shortly. Rosemary Theby has been in New York now for weeks. Antonio Moreno and his company have been in the Northwest, serialing, while Hobart Bosworth and his company have been "shooting" scenes for "Bucko McAlister" in the Santa Cruz Islands and around San Francisco Bay for the past month. Mabel Normand's company was in the northern California metropolis, too, for a number of weeks, doing scenes for "Rosa Alvaro," while Will Rogers and his troupe have been in Arizona.

And Universal City has been practically depopulated, with producing companies scattered all over California "on location." Edith Roberts, doing a South Sea Island story called "Marama," was at Monterey; Harry Carey has been at Victorville, near Death Valley, for a yarn to be known as "Fighting Job"; Frank Mayo has been at Big Bear Lake; Art Acord has been in the Yosemite, while Jacques Laccard, producing a series of Northwest Mounted Police stories featuring Virginia Faire and Leonard Clapham, has been away in a far-distant canyon for weeks. And, to make things more intricate, Priscilla Dean has been finding life these days just one personal appearance after another with her film, "The Virgin of Stamboul." San Francisco saw her. So did San Diego and Santa Barbara.

With the building of his new studio, King W. Vidor has developed most staggering plans. For a month now he has been negotiating the purchase of a flock of famed stories, among them Clare Kummer's

In "The Wonder Book for Writers," which we will send to you ABSOLUTELY FREE, these famous Movie Stars point out the easiest way to turn your ideas into stories and photoplays and become a successful writer

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing lion-work. Yes you may laugh but these are The Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet it, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the imagination free rein, they might have astonished the world!

LETTERS LIKE THIS ARE POURING IN!

 "When I first saw your ad I was working in a shop for $20 a week. Always having worked with my hands, I doubted my ability to make it up with my brain. So it was with much skepticism that I sent for your Easy Method of Writing. When the System arrived, I carefully studied it evening after evening. Within a month I had completed two plays, one of which sold for $500, the other for $125. I unhesitatingly say that I owe it all to the Irving System." HELEN KINNON, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality today.

"The time will come," writes the authority quoted above, "when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of playwrights, novelists, scenario, magazine and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them!" And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—

armies of them— young and old, now doing mere clerical work, in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools, in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, new pounding typewriters, or standing behind

BUT two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open boundless Book of Humanity. Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex, the flotsam and jetsam of Life, even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays, a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write?" Who says you can't?

LISTEN! A wonderful FREE book has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about the Irving System—a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to develop your "story fancy," weave clever word pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. years old, a circlet carrying a dark topaz. This heirloom has been inherited from a great-grandmother, and each girl of the family wears it until she marries. When Beatrice Dominguez changes her surname, this ring will go to her younger sister, and then to the oldest daughter of her oldest sister.

"Yes," she smiled in answer to a query about her precious heirlooms, "my comb and mantilla," (oh, how she slurs mahntecya, with that swift upward sweep of luscious black eyes, like California cherries, and quite as if she were viewing her own headdress critically!), "are from my mother's mother. My shawls are from Spain also; one is aged one hundred and eight, the other seventy years. I like best that picture taken of me at the Universal studio, for they have such a clever photographer, so patient he is in posing one.

"The background for my favorite picture was beautiful. Everywhere flowers were painted, and deep cerise silk cushions were there to be nestled in. I wore my handsome shawl of white with red flowers and colored leaves, and the coral beads from my mother's family—and oh, yes, the gay fan from Sevilla. It was so bright, that picture, I wish it could be seen in colors."

The sparkling vitality of this girl immediately impresses one. I well remember how crowds watched her dancing at San Diego, how they pelted her with flowers and gifts, for of all the quartet she was undoubted queen. She has received so many letters since that time, for the tourists did not forget La Bella Sevilla after leaving the coast.

We spoke of her career, a quite modest one so far, Beatrice thinks. She did "The Moon Riders" and a serial with Art Acord, until that lively young man broke one leg in three places and held up production for the past three months. Mildred Moore was compelled to bleach her hair to play opposite Miss Dominguez, since a wig would have been unfeasible for serial work, where rough-riding and hard stunts are the rule.

"Do you indulge in sports, Miss Dominguez?"

"Oh, yes; I swim, ride, shoot—anything but drive a car. My mother is afraid I am too excitable and enthusiastic and that I might have an accident—so we have a chauffeur."

Now, isn't that a bit of old Spain in itself? Imagine riding a horse down all sorts of rocky canyons, over rough roads, fording stony rivers—and then balking at the modern innovation, the motor-car!

One evening, the audience at the Superba Theater, Los Angeles, was charmed to see Beatrice Dominguez dance before the film presentation. She does a great deal of charity dancing and took part in the "League of Nations" entertainment at Whittier, California.

"I wish they had cast you as Lasca," I murmured. She is the very incarnation of that wild, jealous, ardent creation of John Boyle O'Reilly.

"Almost I was cast for the part. The director wanted me, and the management agreed, but then it was found that I was a trifle too tall, so it fell thru. I was so eager for the part. I wish so much to do Carmen some day, too.

"You see, Americans try to play the part of a Spanish girl, and they slouch—is that what you call it? They drop the shoulders and sink in the chin. No Spanish girl ever does that. She is very proud, her head is held far back, her shoulders are very straight even when she dances, never does she stoop forward or bend carelessly. She has carriage—you know what I mean?"

"Coquetry isn't really intentional with Spanish people, is it? It seems spontaneous." When one has lived in a city of Spanish inhabitants for eight years, it is quite patent that the desire to please the opposite sex and pride of family, coupled with self-respect, are responsible for the arts and wiles of the attractive señoritas.

"Sometimes at the studio they say to me, 'Beatrice, again you vamp!' Bah, how I detest that—so vulgar a word. Never do I wish to hear it applied to me. I shake my head—and then they say to me, 'Well, perhaps not consciously, but you can't help vamping.' They think that if one's eyes dance and the mouth smiles, and one is happy—it must be vamping. Spanish people do not think of that.

"Why, even to her death, my mother's mother had that attractiveness. She lived to be one hundred and two years old.

"Yes, and the father of my mother lived to be almost one hundred and five years old, enjoying life with us until the last. He simply fell asleep," she concluded.

"Have you been playing chiefly Spanish parts?"

"Really, the first time I appeared before the camera was when Douglas Fairbanks came to the Exposition and filmed 'The Americano.' You remember, the Spanish dancers were featured in that? Then I had my picture taken with Mr. Fairbanks many times—he is so funny, that Mr. Fairbanks. Don't you love him? I do." Miss Dominguez is delightfully direct, and yet she is subtle, elusive, so that one finds it difficult not to stare at her changing expression.

I was spared the task of making a confession. She went on, gaily, "I wish I could do 'The Bird of Paradise'—at the studio Mr. Howard is trying to arrange for that; he wants so much to have me play Luana.

"Once I played opposite handsome Wally Reid, too, in 'Les' Than Kin,'" came the softly slurred title. "Now I have been in 'The Beach Comber,' and I love that part very much. It will be released soon. I played a good rôle with Mr. Salisbury—he is so big and kind, I enjoy so much to work with him.

SKIN BLEACH

"I am glad that I was not advertised and pushed into the front rank suddenly—like some of the young girls who have failed. It is not well to become a star that way. I should not like to play ingénues or straight leads. I think I have been most fortunate in being cast for character parts, for heavies with strong emotional parts. That is real training in acting. When my time comes as a star, I shall have had much experience, and then I shall not be afraid; I shall only know that it is a time to work harder than ever to deserve success."

Perhaps the most delightful thing about this beauty of Seville is her lack of vanity. She is very critical and, like most analysts, does not spare herself, but carefully dissects her motives, studies her appearance and strives constantly for improvement. There is not the slightest danger of self-satisfaction in this girl of twenty-one, who is accepted in the best society of Los Angeles, who is a belle in Spanish circles here, and who is unusually talented, well-educated and well-bred. Perhaps it is the convent training which has given her the remarkable poise and self-control which so oddly contrast with her exuberant spirits and emotionality.

Outside of studio life, she spends her time with mother and sister, and, like many other actresses, has early shouldered the responsibility of earning a living for her family. Spanish people are notably hospitable, and in the early days of the Pueblo poor relations from every section of the country were welcome at a rancho. The Dominguez family has inherited this love of entertaining, and their home is always open to visitors. So while La Bella Sevilla no longer dances for a living, she delights her guests with the old songs and dances, with the playing of guitar and ukulele, in a modern bungalow.

BITS OF BLUE

By LA TOUCHE HANCOCK

Down among the heather Harcobells bloom between;
Thru the cloudy weather
Azure breaks are seen.
Listen then, ye weary,
Learn life's lesson true,
Not a day so dreary
But has "bits of blue!"

For the runner failing
In the race of life,
For the soldier paling
In its weary strife,
Better are the chances,
Brighter is the view,
If some loved one's glances
Lend their "bits of blue!"

Every word of healing
Spoken to the sad,
Every kindly feeling
For the heart that's sad,
Help to others given,
Friendship ever true—
These are gleams from heaven,
Little "bits of blue!"

A woman's charm

See how white teeth enhance it

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Countless women have found a way to whiter, safer teeth. You meet them everywhere. A new method of teeth cleaning is now widely employed, and anyone who watches can see the results of it.

This is to ask that you test it. Watch the results for ten days, then judge for yourself if you need it.

The tooth wrecker

Millions find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. Tartar forms, and often pyorrhea starts.

Most of those troubles are now traced to film. To that viscous coat which you feel with your tongue. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste cannot dissolve it, so the tooth brush leaves much of it intact.

It is the film-coat that discolors—not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. All these troubles have been constantly increasing.

Now a new method

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat this film. Able authorities have amply proved its efficiency. Now leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

A new tooth paste has been perfected to meet every modern requirement. The name is Pepsodent. And this film combatant is embodied in it.

Sent to all who ask

A ten-day tube of Pepsodent is sent to all who ask. Thus millions have already proved it. If you have not, write for that tube today.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

This method long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method, so active pepsin can be every day applied.

The results are quick and apparent. They argue for themselves, and a book we send explains all reasons for them.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Judge by the clear results between the old ways and the new. Do this now, for it is most important. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

the only applause we receive, the only way we have of knowing just what people like or do not like. The best publicity a motion picture actor can have is his work, for it is the public who make stars, and you can't fool them; they know what they want and insist on having it too."

Remembering that Mr. Washburn's popularity has outlived many of his early contemporaries, it must be that his wholesome methods have pleased the public who, after all, may not be as fickle as sometimes rated, but as this star says they merely know what they want.

"How did you happen to turn to comedy?" I asked, glancing at those funny stiffs.

"It is really Mabel's fault," and Mr. Washburn smiled at his wife. "She had selected several of my best stories and when she found 'Skinner's Dress Suit,' we were both wild about it. Essanay couldn't see it. I had not specialized on comedy and they were afraid to try one. We were so sure it was the right thing however, that I finally guaranteed the cost of production. Well, we made it, and it went over."

"Oh, isn't he modest!" cried Mrs. Washburn. "Why, it went with a bang! Made him a star, too, and I was so proud."

"There is nothing like a good laugh," observed Bryant.

Glancing thru the open window, I saw Sonny and his chum, Bob White, who is George Beban's small son, playing on the lawn. "Does he enjoy your pictures?" I asked, nodding toward the child.

"Oh, yes, tho he's not always as appreciative as he might be," chuckled the father. "Last week we took him to see one of my recent films and, after watching several scenes, he remarked, in a loud, penetrating whisper, 'All right now let's have Mutt and Jeff.'"

The Washburn home is unusual, its artistic decorations and furnishings bearing the unmistakable touch of true home lovers.

"Buying furniture is Bryant's hobby," teased Mabel. "Even in the first years of our marriage every time we managed to get a few hundred dollars ahead, Bryant would see a wonderful piece of furniture or a gem of a rare book, and away would go our savings. He hasn't outgrown the habit, either, for he just found that chair," nodding toward a lovely quaint thing of the Italian Renaissance with cushions of gorgeous tapestry, "and that lamp," pointing to a stunning floor lamp of wrought-iron in exquisite design.

"Why should I?" replied the star, his eyes lingering on his treasures with the appraising joy of the true connoisseur. "Building a home is our principal delight, this is where we live, this is where I gain inspiration for my work."

kiddies, too. Little Jimmy was in 'The Strange Boarder' and 'Jes' Call Me Jim,' and he is so like his father that it is really funny."

There is no foolish temperament about Irene Rich. She is just a normal girl, giving her best to the work and hoping some day, when she is ready for it, that her big chance will come.

"I like to play good, womanly characters," she confided, "and perhaps in this way I can help the world a little; motion pictures are such a tremendous force in molding thought."

Irene was born in Buffalo, New York, and was educated at St. Margaret's Seminary. Not one of all the family connections had ever been on the stage. "I'm just an odd chip," she laughed. "My desire never became definitely formulated; it all seemed to belong to another existence, until I finally made my break. We all work better under pressure, we must have a big incentive to drive us on so that we do not count the disappointments."

"I went to a fortune-teller the other day with some friends, and she told me that I would reach the heights in my work and then—I would give it all up. Can you imagine anything so silly? Why, I'll never give it up. I hope some day to go on the stage and—oh, I have so many ambitions," and the sweet voice trailed away wistfully.

Watching the blue ocean blend into the bluer sky, Miss Rich told me about the pretty bungalow in Hollywood which she has just bought.

"Mother is with me and we're very happy. She's so wonderful, my very best pal. We have developed a marvelous teamwork with my fan mail. She addresses the envelopes and I autograph each picture. It is such fun to receive letters from all over the world and brings me so much encouragement. Sometimes it seems too funny for words to think that I, Irene Rich, am of enough importance in motion pictures to be receiving letters!" And again came the little laugh, with a whimsical note this time.

"We're very quiet, mother and I," she went on. "My greatest pleasure comes with my work and my flowers. Oh, my roses are beautiful, so sturdy and gorgeous. Most of them are red—I adore red roses. If I hadn't gone into this work I believe I would have been a landscape gardener. It would be interesting to make bare ground bloom into lovely gardens."

"That is one of the fascinations about motion pictures. Studying my rôle, which at first is just a lifeless written script, and then building it into a real woman with a heart and a soul."

"It's been a heavenly day," finally sighed Irene contentedly, as we turned for a farewell look at the ocean before starting on the return trip to the city. "Who wouldn't be happy just to be alive and working and hoping in such a wonderful old world!"

NATIONAL BISCUIT COMPANY

She detested feminine reactions to masculine advances.

Before she left, still clinging to her rôle of Miss Hobbs' maid, she had promised the "piano tuner" to "walk out" with him on the following Thursday. She did this, she convinced herself, in the interest of materia medica. She must not tell the satellites. There were some abstract interests in which even they might not share. Doubtless, the "piano tuner" would be one of them.

The "piano tuner," watching the rounded figure down the street, chuckled, drew forth his note-book, chuckled again and inscribed therein, "Bet Percy Hackett and George Jessop a dinner for three that I kiss Miss Hobbs within a month."

The day before the Thursday outing, Miss Hobbs received a rather wobbly note informing her that the piano tuner was "very low" and he had to go to the beach for the good of his fast failing health. If he might dare to hope that she . . . He spoke of the resuscitating effect her presence would have upon an otherwise doomed man, Miss Hobbs was, above all, a humanitarian. She went to the beach. She took a heart specialist with her, and Wolff Kingsearl nearly had a literal case when the eminent man entered with Miss Hobbs. It was only by dint of the most strenuous maneuvering and because the specialist happened to be, also, a sentimentalist that the day was saved and the eminent specialist departed with a fat chuckle and a fatter check from the well-lined Kingsearl pocket.

Later in the day, just when things were going most swimmingly and Miss Hobbs' humanitarianism was rising more and more rapidly to the fore of her other theories, there arrived upon the arcadian scene Wolff Kingsearl's mother and little Miss Alice Joy, the young lady selected by aforesaid mother as a satisfactory and amenable daughter-in-law.

Mrs. Kingsearl had never heard anything that she cared to hear about Miss Hobbs. She was, she had heard tell, a "stagnant-minded woman," and Mrs. Kingsearl being nothing of the sort, the idea of being brought into daily contact, not to say combat, with such an exponent of their joint sex did not appeal to her. When Wolff endeavored to make her understand the little game he was playing, and which he had induced the specialist to be party to, he found his mother adamant. She had Miss Joy with her, and she had some strength of mind. She told "Miss Hobbs' maid" that she had no idea why her son was masquerading in such an idiotic fashion. He had always been, to her way of thinking, eccentric, but a piano tuner—really . . .

Miss Hobbs thought the same. "Really . . ." Wolff Kingsearl—millionaire, sportsman, clubman and much discussed man about town! Why had he played this game? What was his idea? In the he had suspected, perhaps hoped, Miss Hobbs listened. She listened, first, because she was surprised, a weakness she would have theoretically admitted. She listened, secondly, because she loved music, good music, Chopin above all music. She listened for quite ten minutes—ten minutes in which odd little breakages occurred in her cardiac region, and then there was a sudden, discordant, terrific crash as of heavy hands falling loppily upon the keys. There was nothing else for Miss Hobbs to do. She burst in upon the renderer of Chopin to find his great length, his huge, almost shameless frame, sprawled across the keyboard.

Miss Hobbs was, she hoped, humanitarian. It was a weakness, she used to preach, to assume poses. She was definitely humanitarian even when that humanitarianism was called upon in behalf of man. She made an inadequate attempt to shake the recumbent shoulder.

"What is the matter with you?" she asked; then, quite apart from her own volition, impulsively, "detestably" she would have said, she added, "Who are you?"

There was a little silence; then the mummer over the keys replied, rather feebly, "I have heart trouble—rather badly. I—I'm a piano tuner—by profession."

Miss Hobbs looked at him with some asperity. "Isn't it curious," she enunciated clearly, "for a—piano tuner, however estimable, to play Chopin—like that."

The mummer, his hand still clutched to his heart, shook his head, wearily. "I don't know that it is," he said; "even a piano tuner may be the tomb of dead hopes. I am. Once, before my—my affliction overcame me, I had a dream. It was to be a concert pianist. Ah, I dreamed rarely—then. But my heart—my heart—" Overcome, the would-be concertist swooned again, and this time it necessitated Miss Hobbs' holding the manly frame to her breast until such time as she could ease him to the floor, get water, otherwise, and rather tenderly, revive him. She was surprised, again, at the little waves of sensation that kept recurring and receding within her. What was it? She would have to take several hours for meditation and reflection when she should have reached the sane precinct of New Thought again. It was as she had always known—man was a deterrent. She should be packing—but heart trouble—after all, man is a fellow creature, even tho' so inferior a one.

It was still more surprising to Miss Hobbs to find that, Beulah's things neatly packed, returning to New Thought did not hold out so inviting a charm as heretofore. This disturbing—Chopin, reflected Miss Hobbs, firmly donning the horned rims, had always had power to upset her. She must be more careful.

course of the day Miss Hobbs discovered a note-book in the sand, where they had been sitting, and in the note-book the inscription, "Bet Percy Black- t, etc., etc., et al. . . ."

Miss Hobbs, did, then, a most soul-destroying, theory-destroying thing. She wept. She sobbed. She literally cried, rage, bewildered baby-blue-eyed tears. It got so bad she had to retreat to the farthest corner of the suddenly un- lamored beach to have it out. There, till sobbing, bobbed hair awry, horn spectacles discarded, Wolff Kingseal found her. He took her in his arms, struggling thru her hazy brain came the asping thought that she couldn't help — she was so weak. He kissed her. "I new I couldn't unless you wanted me, darling," he told her, between many f'om; "of course I knew that. And I didn't know you, you see. I thought— h, but what does it matter what I thought—then? Before I knew you? I didn't begin to think—then. Or feel. Or live—or love." He kissed her again, and felt two arms twined about him, two lips crush back upon his own. He gave a little, hilarious laugh. "Oh, Miss Hobbs . . . Miss Hobbs," he said.

The satellites returned the next day in the bed and board of man at the heels. The director laughed at me, saying that my feet would not show, but that wasn't the point with me. Those old boots helped me build up that character. One's whole mental attitude may be influenced by one's shoes, and the way the air is arranged and the style of the rocks."

Warming to the subject upon which she admits she is a "crank," Miss Ayres continued. "When a girl goes to a city to become a stenographer after living all her life on a farm, it is certain that her idea of 'style' will be totally different from the girl who has been reared in the city, who may be working at the next desk, while both girls' ideas change as they climb the social scale. To show their advance, clothes must be reckoned with as a mighty influence in indicating their worldly growth. It is all so interesting, isn't it?" and this newly made star beamed with eager enthusiasm.

"My future? Only this, I want my success to be based upon ability. I want to establish myself as an actress, not merely a portrayer of types. This is one of the wonderful things about my new contract, for when I talked with Mr. Albert Kaufman I found his ideas were exactly like my own, and I am to have the chance to play in strong, vital stories, not those selected just because I happen to fit the part.

"Then, some day, I hope for an opportunity to go on the stage. I should like to be a second Mrs. Pi-ske— what girl wouldn't?" and Agnes Ayres laughed at her own dreams.

After all, stars are propelled by subtle forces, so perhaps it is dreams that are their guiding powers. Who knows?

the ribs—a snowball hurled with the perfect aim of a child at the silk top-hats of Uncle Sam and John Bull.
All this resulted in a new factor which presented itself in every respectable household. It began to dawn upon the public that truly it was a wise parent who knew his own child. After the weary passage of two-score years, man had accumulated a small store of knowledge at the cost of much sad experience. Along comes a child of seven or eight and calmly lays before him a more thoro knowledge of life—and its issues. We gasp for breath!

Mary Miles Minter, in a letter to her mother, written while she was looking forward to her eighth birthday, writes the following poem, presenting her viewpoint on religion:

"Went to Church last Night,
Gee! What a terrible Plight.
The minister Preached—
And with his Hands heaven Reached.
Declared all were bad—
Bless me! How Very sad!"

Volumes have been written about the stage, but to us it seems that there is absolutely nothing left to be told after reading what Miss Minter had to say about it when she was seven, in her poem, "Theatrical Life."

She seemed to come to conclusions very quickly, and having grasped the knowledge that certain factors made up the mystery called life, she calmly proceeded to take them for granted and in a matter-of-fact way included them in her daily existence. All this tended to a certain aplomb which somehow almost overcomes one. You stand awed before the iconoclastic manner in which she treats the emotions. Her poem, "Reminding, or a Chinese Puzzle," will serve to convince you that you, with your grey hair, have gotten no further with the solution of life:

REMINDING
A CHINESE PUZZLE

Life reminds me of a Chinese puzzle
And if you dont look sharp
You'll get into a muzzle,
It will grip you, and bind you
And often remind you,
That Temptations are many Good things, scarcely any,
But what right has a man,
To grab all he can,
And then not content,
But on more greed he is bent.
Till he is full to the brim
With his folly and sin.
And Thus, the Hand of Fate proclaims—
Too Late—too late.

There is no denying the fact that if motion pictures had not happened along at this time, Mary Miles Minter might have developed into one of the shining lights of literature. We feel sure of it. However, there is an old saying that—er—er—murder will out—and we have a sneaking hope that some day when the golden hair is tired of being curled and the Klieg lights have lost their purple fascination, Mary Miles Minter will again take up the pen—and perhaps another Mr. Salteena will be created.

DONTE HAIR REMOVER with the sweet fragrance

A Depilatory Sweet and Fragrant as the Daintiest Perfume

Donté solves the problem. You apply Donté to the skin with a little water, that's all. Donté not only removes superfluous and undesirable hair, but also prevents its return, as it works under as well as above the surface. Donté will not injure the most delicate skin, it leaves it smooth and in perfect condition. Donté is endorsed by leading practitioners.

Hair is beautiful on the head, but nowhere else. No matter what process you have used before, you will find Donté delightfully satisfactory. Donté has no disagreeable odor, instead, it is fragrantly perfumed. Donté eliminates cutting, shaving, or other painful methods.

Put Donté on Your Dressing Table 50c and $1.00 a jar at Drug and Department Stores. If your dealer cannot supply you, send us his name and $1.00, and we will send you in plain wrapper, a full-sized jar, postage and war tax prepaid very, very respectfully. He was blasé, up-stage, I thought, and I was even more cocky and independent than I am now. When we were introduced he asked me to come over to the studio and see him. I had heard that he wanted a leading woman, but I told him indifferently that I would when I could find the time. Of course, when I got home I told my chum all about it" (she was living with a sister of Mrs. Marshall Neilan), "and she was wildly excited. But I didn't go until three days later.

"He continued to act in a rather aloof way, as tho he felt himself superior. Towards the last of our conversation, he asked me if I would go to dinner with him the next evening. I said, 'All right,' as I had nothing else to do, but that perhaps he had better call me on the phone in the morning and make sure. He looked absolutely stunned. In other words," he remarked, "you wont go with me if you find something else to do that you like better," and I answered, "Naturally!"

But they became firm friends. He would call for her every morning and take her to her studio, the Reliance-Majestic, and take her home evenings. Each found that the other possessed a keen sense of humor and that there were a great many things at which they could laugh together. They were married at a little church in San Diego, where they had gone with a crowd of film people to see the opening of the exposition.

Chops were just being brought on when we heard a prodigious honking, followed by a joyous cowboy yell—E-e-e-e!—and Rosemary Theby burst into the room. She rushed over to her chum and hugged her. "I've got it!" she said. "The dandiest part! In 'Michael and His Lost Angels' with Conway Tearle;" she added that she was going to get a certain very tiny, very expensive wrist-watch that she had been wanting for some time. She had pulled off her hat and joined us at table, but she was too excited about her new part to think of anything else, even eating. After luncheon Mr. and Mrs. Dillon dropped in.

"By the way," said Mrs. Dillon, "is it true that Viola Dana is married to Ormer Locklear?"

"No!" the chums exclaimed together, and Teddy added, "It's only a press story."

It was at this psychological moment that many "footsteps" were heard on the front porch.

"Who is there?" called Teddy. "Mr. and Mrs. Locklear," came the answer, and the announcement was greeted with a storm of laughter.

It was not only "Mr. and Mrs. Locklear" who entered, but Anna Q. Nilsson as well. For a while the conversation turned on a little bit of everything. Miss Nilsson had to be congratulated by everybody on the exquisite work she did as Ruth in "The Luck of the Irish." Viola Dana told of how, that morning, she had called Maxwell Karger on the telephone and, when the girl in his office asked who was calling, had said "Mrs. Locklear" . . .

"They really are crazy over each other, aren't they?" some one whispered.

Still laughing, the crowd left to go to the field with Lieutenant Locklear and watch him take chances with his life that would make most people shudder to even think of. Fatalists—the right kind of fatalists—all of them, believing, with the fatalism of the young and successful, that what is to be, will be, and that it will be good.

I almost forgot to say that Teddy Sampson does not diet. On the contrary, she eats anything she likes and because she likes it, drinks milk with every meal and only weighs a hundred and nine pounds. Another thing, when two beautiful women have been chums for five years, you generally expect to find that one is a blonde and the other a brunette. In this case both are brunettes, and they get along together very nicely. Teddy Sampson is now making Supreme Comedies at the Christy studio. Some of her late pictures are "Her Novel Idea," "Room 222," "A Four-Cylinder Frame-Up," "Her Nearly Husband," "The Little Wife," "Our Honeymoon's Happy" and "Good-Night, Judge."

The Baby-Talk Lady

thinking done. That is not intended as a personal inference about any one. Of course, there are very real people in picturedom who do very real thinking—and lots of them. But it is a truth that the screen frequently creates a personality that may actually not exist. Sometimes this is accidental, sometimes deliberate.

"The other day a feminine interviewer dropped in to see me and she was genuinely surprised to find me, as she expressed it, a business-like tailor-made girl, when she had expected to discover me curled up fluffily upon a chaise longue with a box of candy. The films have created a certain sugary personality for me, giving me the mental status of Booth Tarkington's 'baby-talk lady' in his Billy Baxter stories."

We frankly admitted the injustice.

"I do not definitely know just what sort of rôles are mapped out for me," she went on, discussing her new Selznick starring contract. "I would like to do the sincere, close-to-life sort of drama, but I rather think I am to do piquant and frothy, Connie Talmadge sort of comedy. You see, it fits my cinema personality—and one must live up to one's film self."

I NEVER HAD By BETTY EARLE

I never had a friend like you
With all your loveliness,
And when you smile so trustingly
And all your face is close to me,
I hardly know what I should do—
Keep silent or confess.

Confessing love's a little queer
And sort o' strange, I guess.
One should not love a friend so dear
For all her loveliness;

But when you put your arm about
And swift my heart turns inside out—
I hardly know what I should do—
I never had a friend like you.

intention of going on the stage if the managers would let me. Then I found my supply was cut off suddenly but efficiently. Now, of course, managers may admire ambition and that sort of thing, but they are slow to discover star stuff in a wan, starving actress, so it was 'Good-by, Liberty Bonds,' or 'Good-by, Career.' The bonds were an accumulation of birthday and Christmas gifts, and I hated to part with them, but I did, one by one. I couldn't take my time about finding an engagement, either, for Liberty Bonds, even the best intentioned ones, wont hold out forever. It was a race between the bonds and me—and I won," she concluded with a smile of triumph.

Her first engagement was with "Come On, Charlie," and Charlie came on for sixteen weeks. Then some one suggested pictures and Miss Taylor started the rounds of the studios. Her debut on the screen was as a double for one of the Paramount stars. This was followed shortly by engagements with the World and Vitagraph and leads in "The Star Rover" and "The Return of Tarzan," and finally the step that was the turning point in her career, her selection to support William Farnum in "The Adventurer."

"Mr. Farnum gave me so many valuable suggestions and really brought me to Mr. Fox's notice," Miss Taylor said. "I feel that I owe this opportunity to him."

Next came the lead in "When New York Sleeps," in which she was working when I called upon her.

Of course, Washington's Birthday, Fourth of July and even Christmas come to Wilmington, Delaware, just as they do to other communities, but any one will tell you that the really big day of the year is when a Fox release brings Estelle to town. Then every seat in the theater is filled with a proud audience that boasts in no low whisper:

"I knew her when—"

MOVIE ENCYCLOPEDIA

J. H. P.—No, I am not insured. I've saved up enough to bury me, but I have no insurance. Insurance sellers, please look the other way. Insurance is an effort to discount death and destiny. Build up your own insurance surplus by right living, simple eating and plenty of sleep and exercise. You'll find, too, that your enjoyment of things is less forced with good health and spirits back of you. Yes, he is a director. Florence Reed is not married.

ROCHESTER.—You must have the eyes of Argus to see so many virtues in this department. William Farnum is playing in "The Orphan." Your three favorites among the men are Eugene O'Brien, Richard Barthelmess and Thomas Meighan, and among the girls, Norma and Constance Talmadge and Viola Dana. You choose well. Elaine Hammerstein remains with Selznick for seven more years.

IRISH.—Thank you, Irish. William Duncan played in "Smashing Barriers." Darrell Foss will play opposite May Allison in "Held in Trust," Metro. That's it. The eternal exclamation for man is, "I!" The eternal interrogatory for woman is, "He?" Write me again.

"Tonight I'm going Decolleté, thanks to Electric Massage!"

DOES your figure permit you to wear the prettiest of evening frocks? Then resolve that this embarrassing condition is going to be changed! In the privacy of your own boudoir soothing electric massage brings back the roses of youth into your cheeks, keeps your hair and scalp in fine, healthy condition and develops your figure into one of graceful lines and girlish contour.

The woman of fastidious tastes, young or old, realizes that beauty is but a natural reflection of health. Wrinkles, "crow's feet," eyes that have lost their youthful sparkle, obesity and other unwelcome facial blemishes are, to a great extent at least, brought on by what we term "the strenuous life." Muscles are sure to become weary and congested unless they get relaxation. And complexions are certain to suffer unless properly taken care of. Home electric massage is recognized as the building-up process nearest to Nature's.

The Star Vibrator should be your "beauty parlor." Used and endorsed by stage and screen celebrities for beauty helps, and fatigue, nervous headaches, insomnia. Ideal after motoring, golfing or bathing. Keeps your skin at its best! On sale and demonstrated free of charge at most drug, department and electrical stores. Or direct from us. Fitzgerald Mfg. undone things, lost opportunities, work or play foregone. I shall have a farm, I hope, the wide country about me. It will be a mild sort of fun. Why not?"

I said that I couldn't imagine it.

He said, "Why bother to? It comes. Take it easily. Bring on the next!"

I asked him, he seemed so serene, whether he was self-confident.

"Sufficiently so," he said; "too much is bad. Worse than too little."

"Isn't it indispensable," I inquired, "in your work? I always thought so."

"Too much is bad," he reiterated; "immediately we become self-confident to any set degree we cease to grow. We know it all. Our work stands still because we become rigid. We cannot be taught. We cannot absorb, and that is fatal. A great many in this profession and in others would still be lighting the skies if they had not become too much inflated in their own esteem . . . and blah! Self-confidence does not make for work. And work is the ingredient of success."

I asked him whether he liked his rôle in "The Son-Daughter."

I found that he did—for two reasons, chiefly; the wigs and Confucius. He had, it seemed, studied both. He evinced a great admiration for Confucius. If it had been a week-end instead of an hour's interview, I might have come away a Confucianist professed. Only lack of time and setting circumscribed the outpouring of the Confucian doctrine.

The wigs—the wigs he wears as the young prince in "The Son-Daughter"—were more easily explained, being visible. He handled them with reverent hands, showing how even the pseudo forehead is attached so that the blending may be super-perfect. He took a deep and loving pride in those wigs.

A day or so later I saw Mr. Lowe at a musical comedy. He was having a ripping sort of time. I thought of Confucius and the philosophy of acceptance, and smiled—corroboratively. He has, I reasoned further, the very fullest sense of the philosophy of acceptance—it embraces comedy as well as tragedy, age as well as youth, the movies as well as the stage, wigs, Confucius, good sherry and interviewers!

MEMORIALS

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

The songs men make today shall reach
Eyes which they do not dream of yet,
And with sweet, haunting music teach
Souls yet unborn life's alphabet.

The creeds may totter, grave beliefs,
Like withered blossoms, fall away;
The beauties fade to ancient griefs
And prophets change from day to day:

The wars may scourge the nation's marts
And kings and kingdoms rise and fall,
Sheltered within a myriad hearts
A lyric shall outlast them all.

"Some Boy, That Frenchman!"

Georges kept on fighting and winning until he became champion at every weight, from paper to heavy. As soon as he began to earn real money, he started to invest a large part of it in educating himself. When you talk to him you'll find out what an intelligent chap he is—Carpentier gone out for the day?—Gee, but that's luck for you! Come over to the studio tonight. They're going to stage a fight. No women allowed, but, then, you don't count."

"Thanks," I replied, as I took my departure.

If you want to get all the men together in one place, advertise a fight. Uncle Sam tried it and Robertson-Cole followed suit. When I arrived at Fort Lee that night, I found the huge Solax studio packed to the doors. Men suspended themselves from the roof, draped themselves over neighboring church steeples and supported themselves upon telegraph poles and telephone wires. Carpentier, the European champion, was to fight, and the dream fighters for miles around assembled for the event. Of course, it was only a moving picture bout in which Director Adolphi took pains to explain that the villain would be victorious for a few rounds and then Virtue, in the form of the hero, would triumph, and, whoof, we would see how champions really do it.

After a few moments' waiting, Carpentier entered the ring, and the great audience, from roof to telephone wires, stood on its feet and cheered. He was not my preconceived picture of a fighter as he stood there bowing his thanks. He was not the stage and screen idea of a Frenchman, either. Had he applied for an engagement in that rôle, many directors I know would have shaken their heads and exclaimed:

"Not the type, not the type! Nothing like it."

He is blond, decidedly so, with hair that seems to find no inducement to stray from the straight and narrow, with blue eyes, a very blue blue—so the publicity department informed me. I could not distinguish spots of color from my particular beam. When he removed his bathrobe and stood there in his fighting togs, an exclamation of envy and admiration went up from that assembly of men. Translated, it meant, "Some boy, that Frenchman!" In another instant, Director Adolphi blew the whistle and Georges started to fight. As the former had predicted, his opponent, Herbert Barratt, knocked him out in the first few rounds.

"Ah, this fight's fixed," a newcomer to my beam murmured in disgust.

Thru it all the champion was like a young race-horse straining to keep himself within bounds, longing for the signal to start in earnest. The wild feints he thrust at the air came thick and fast, and when it was Virtue's turn to triumph he made short work of the villain.

"Hang around," the publicity department advised, noting the adeptness with which I had clung to my beam. "Maybe you can catch him before he leaves."

So I hung, this time around the champion's dressing-room door. I saw stars of the ring pass over the threshold, and still I continued to hang. A few zeons later a blond boy in a grey business suit appeared. I made a wild dash in his direction.

"Come, Georgette," the blond boy called, as I clutched the air.

I turned just in time to see an answering smile in the eyes of pretty Georgette Carpentier, who had come to this country, a bride, just a few weeks before, and, lo, the Carpentier family had disappeared somewhere in Fort Lee.

"Gus Wilson, his trainer, says you may talk to him at nine o'clock tomorrow morning at the Biltmore," the publicity department whispered in my ear.

We were there on the dot, the department and I.

"Tell me about Carpentier and the war," I suggested, while we were waiting for suite 120 to answer.

"He was in it for four years," the department answered. "He was fulfilling some fight contracts in England when it broke out. He hurried back to France and entered the air service. Of course, he started doing stunts immediately. He didn't win his medals, tho, as quickly as some chaps. The commander wanted to be sure there would be no room for an accusation of partiality to the young aviator, the favorite of France. One day he, the commander, was watching a fight away up in the sky between a French plane and two German planes.

"When that fighter comes down—whoever he is," he said, indicating the distant dot, "we'll decorate him."

"When the French plane landed he found that the dot was none other than Georges Carpentier.

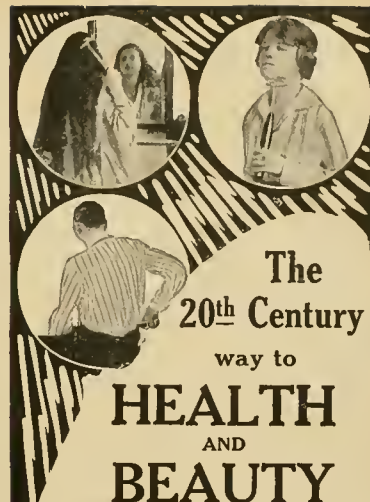

"For about a year Georges was on sick leave and acted as physical instructor to the men in back of the lines.

"Word from suite 120. Mr. Carpentier will be sleeping until ten o'clock, then he must go out immediately. Otherwise, he would gladly see you. If you will return at six this evening—"

At six I was again at the Biltmore, armed with a letter from Robertson-Cole to prove that I had no designs upon the young fighter's life or upon the Biltmore's silverware. This time I succeeded in invading suite 120. From my position in the tiny outer reception-room I heard sport topics passed back and forth by male voices in the adjoining apartment. Presently Trainer Wilson and Manager DesCamps indicated that they were at my service. In the other room I could discern, "as thru a glass, darkly," young Georges reading the fight news. I threw a question into the air. It landed somewhere in the suite. Mr. Wilson caught it and translated it to Mr. DesCamps. He listened and then smiled.

I waited. I tried again—the same result.

The season's histrionic level has been singularly high. First of all, we place Betty Compson's superb playing of the greedy and sensuous Rose of "The Miracle Man," the underworld girl whose spirit finally awakens. Here was a vibrant and human portrayal worthy of the highest praise. Mary Pickford's dear and touching Pollyanna wrung our hearts. Shall we ever forget the moment when she steps from her wheel-chair and walks?

There were other admirable performances. John Cumberland's lonely and sacrificing Jimmy Dodd in "The Gay Old Dog" was splendid in its subtlety. Charles Ray invested a half-dozen inconsequential plays with life thru his matchless sincerity. Bert Lytell was excellent as the arch-cynic, Charles Steel, in "The Right of Way." John Barrymore contributed a flashing and haunting performance in the ghoulish "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

Then, too, we might mention several of Thomas Meighan's characterizations. Striking, also, were Vera Gordon's lovable Jewish mother in "Humoresque"; poor little Clarine Seymour's piquant half-caste girl, rife with the love of life, in "The Idol Dancer"; Mae Murray's butterfly Russian in "On With the Dance"; Mae Busch's playing of the grisette in "The Devil's Passkey"; Myrtle Stedman's sincere Cherry Mellotte in "The Silver Horde"; Noah Beery's well-thought-out characterization of "The Sea Wolf"; Lon Chaney's remarkable character work in "The Miracle Man" and "Victory"; Gibson Gowland's primitive French-Canadian in "The Right of Way" and Lewis Stone's dual playing in "The River's End." Also we would add Hedda Hopper's playing in "The Man Who Lost Himself."

Probably the biggest individual advance of the year—at least in the item of popularity—was registered by Harold Lloyd, whose farces have hit a high average. Lloyd is rapidly overtaking Chaplin. Wallie Reid has been growing steadily in favor, now that he is devoting himself entirely to swift-moving comedy. Charles Ray has lifted himself to the acting leadership of the drama, this in the face of fearful vehicles. Richard Barthelmess is fast developing along the lines of romanticism—and he is now a star. Thomas Meighan made steady progress all year.

Of the feminine contingent, Clarine Seymour seemed most promising, just when death entered the field. Wanda Hawley, Gloria Swanson, Bebe Daniels and one or two other promising younger folk of the previous year already have their names in stellar electric lights. Constance Binney, to our way of thinking, bids fair to achieve limitless popularity if she guides her celluloid career carefully.

Here a few words about the cinema leaders are in order. Mary Pickford did her finest work since "Stella Maris" with "Pollyanna." Douglas Fairbanks is still young America's idol. Charles Chaplin did nothing in particular all year. Here is comic genius going to waste. Please, Mr. Chaplin, do something about Charlie! William S. Hart is still the reforming bad man. His nearest above-the-average vehicle was "Wagon Tracks," at least atmospheric of frontier days.

Norma Talmadge has had one namby-pamby character after another all year. Right now she should be at the zenith of her career. We repeat our words of last year with added emphasis. Miss Talmadge needs real dramatic material or—How long can she maintain her present popularity if she persists in milk-and-water vehicles? Nazimova has done nothing distinctive all year. Here is an instance of temperament running wild. We have well-nigh given up hope of ever seeing another "Revelation."

Now for specific comments upon the various releasing organizations:

Famous Players-Lasky still easily maintain far and away the best average in general workmanship. The once so popular Marguerite Clark seems to be voluntarily dropping from sight, having deliberately chosen retirement. Elsie Ferguson, sometimes lacking stories and other times failing to have sympathetic direction, has gone backward rather than ahead. Her best vehicle was "The Witness for the Defence," well done by George Fitzmaurice. Charlie Ray was steadily handed inane scripts, but he triumphed thru his own unique ability. Wallie Reid is at last getting the right sort of stuff. Dorothy Gish's bright and boisterous comedy methods did a lot to overcome fearful material. Dorothy Dalton continues her way thru hectic emotionalism, minus her old clinging appeal. Ethel Clayton is still the victim of the scenario department. Robert Warwick, no longer a F. P.-L. star, apparently failed to "get over." Violet Heming as yet has not established herself at all definitely. Bryant Washburn suddenly began to get good stories just before he left the fold. Another "Six Best Cellars" would have lifted him to the forefront of comedians. Mrs. Irene Castle still appears now and then.

Enid Bennett has somewhat improved, but at no time has she electrified in anything. The Maurice Tourneur productions have been interesting series of photographically beautiful tableaux—and nothing more. "Treasure Island" was his best, "Victory" his worst. The last completely missed the spirit of Conrad. Douglas MacLean got away in a flying start with "23½ Hours Leave" and hasn't equalled it since.

Metro—Every effort seems to have been made to put over Bert Lytell, who at first seemed rather light for the big material entrusted to him. But he justified their faith with "The Right of Way" and did very well with "Alias Jimmy Valentine." Metro believes it has a real find in Alice Lake. So far we pronounce her competent—and nothing more. Metro started the year by seeming on the verge of doing interesting things, but, with the entrance of new capital, the trend is now frankly towards melodrama. We certainly wish they would give better opportunities to May Allison. Viola Dana continues about the same. We have already commented anent Nazimova.

Selznick—A youthful battery of stars appearing in passable stories directed by less passable directors. Our chief interest in the forthcoming year centers in William Faversham's work under the direction of Hobart Henley and in what Louise Huff may do. The stolidly piquant Olive Thomas is apparently the most popular of the Selznick constellation, altho the powers-that-be there seem to expect big things of Elaine Hammerstein. We doubt it. Eugene O'Brien—my! my! Owen Moore—we like him better than we did last year.

First National—Of Norma we have spoken. Constance Talmadge continues along the line of thin-ice comedies, to which she lends a sparkle and verve.

Finally, I plunged desperately into the details furnished by the department. I repeated the story of the champion instructor's paying the boy's daily wages to Père Carpentier, only to learn that there was some mistake, that the latter had always cooperated in the boy's training. Another good human interest touch switched onto a busy line.

"Ask him about his bride, Madame Carpentier," I pleaded. "How, when and where did he meet her? Was it a childhood or a wartime romance? Was she—?"

But my "French in Twenty Lessons" was already repeating my question.

"He says he would rather not discuss his private life," was the answer.

"No, no, gentlemen; I appreciate the honor, but I really can't accept Mr. Carpentier's croix de guerre or his military medal. Yes, yes, I shall be delighted to drop in at the Carpentier Villa, Lens, France, for lunch some morning the Big Chief can spare me from the office."

With that I cast another lingering look at the blond back of George's blond head and exited with the other members of the chorus, smiling.

Good-looking enough to cause a flutter among the feminine contestants is George Sheldon Smith, of 5612 Fountain Avenue, Hollywood, California. George has had some stock experience and has played small bits in pictures. He has black hair, brown eyes and olive complexion.

Ella Guerite Maxwell, of 22 E. 48th Street, New York City, is a Ziegfeld Follies beauty, with black hair, blue eyes and very fair complexion.

Madeleine M. Glass, Box 532, Toronto, Canada, has had a small amount of stock and film experience. She is a very pretty blonde with dark-blue eyes.

A Swedish beauty now living at 50 Cathedral Place, New York City, is Jean Selkird. Miss Selkird has had some vaudeville experience. Her hair is a natural golden blonde, her eyes are dark blue and her complexion is fair.

THE MOVIE ENCYCLOPEDIA

ELIZABETH R., WASH.—You ask if Olga Petrova ever played on the screen with Richard Barthelmess. They both appeared in the opening scene of "A Dream of Fair Women." That's all. Madame Petrova is expected back in pictures. We hope she comes back.

CANADIAN ADMIRER.—You say you like the CLASSIC better than the MAGAZINE because we have had Blanche Sweet, Grace Cunard and Mabel Normand on the cover. You want Grace Cunard back in a serial. She is playing in a two-reel western. Remember how she could ride a horse? So you think Chaplin ought to change his make-up now. I don't know. Easter Walters was Hilda in "The Tiger's Trail."

ROSE S. BREMERTON.—You are right, my mistake. I stand corrected. Thanks for all the good things you say about me.

Bubble Grains in Milk

Don't put aside your Puffed Grains when breakfast ends in summer. Children want them all day long, and there's nothing better for them.

The supreme dish for luncheon or for supper is Puffed Wheat in milk. The airy grains—puffed to eight times normal size—taste like food confections. Yet every morsel is whole wheat with every food cell blasted.

The finest foods ever created

Puffed Wheat, Puffed Rice and Corn Puffs are the finest grain foods in existence.

Never were cereals so enticing. The grains are fairy-like in texture, the flavor is like nuts. They seem like tidbits, made only to entice.

Yet they are major foods, with every food cell steam-exploded, so digestion is easy and complete.

They will take the place of pastries, sweets, etc., if you serve them all day long. And at meal-time they will make whole-grain foods tempting.

Puffed Grains taste like airy nut-meats, and they melt into the cream. The dish is made doubly delightful.

I did not know a continuity from a fishing-pole.

"I foresee the steady lessening of the director's importance and the steady ascendancy of the author. Of course, these writers must learn the technical details of scenario building. It will not be necessary for him to work out a complete continuity, but he should be able to take the finished script and point out every weakness.

"The successful dramatist can quickly master this. What director except the two or three leaders, perhaps—knows more of audience psychology than James Forbes or Winchell Smith. The technique of laughter, for instance, is just the same on the screen, depending upon the sudden turn from grave to gay, or the finely developed situation.

"Stage farces do not adapt to the films for the reason that they are too fast. The screen demands a simple story without involved characters. On the other hand, the success of a footlight farce depends upon swift movement, the ramifications of plot and clever dialog or characterization. The most valuable stage laugh comes from a quirk of character.

"In the films there seems to be no time to develop characterization. Just as in a rapidly moving stage melodrama, there is no time for sidelights, character phrasing or tricks of manner.

"To my way of thinking, one of the two greatest weaknesses of the present-day photoplay is the lack of clearness of characterization. No one seems to have thought it necessary. Of course, the brevity of a photoplay makes this difficult. But it is becoming steadily more necessary. The plays that live on the screen are the ones possessing clear-cut characterizations.

"You know the fundamental question that the scenarist must ask himself is the same that the playwright puts to himself, 'Will they believe it?' Both of them must lay their story foundations so that the audience will travel with the characters, feeling their emotions and reactions. Then the audience will believe. The only way to achieve this is by clearly drawn characterizations, so human that folk out front will say, 'Why, I know him!'

"The other great weakness of the 1920 photoplay is the slowing up of the story thru close-ups and unnecessary shots. The close-up should be used rarely—only to accent. I know the close-up is the safeguard of the incompetent director, for the cutting man can use it to bridge over all sorts of slips and gaps. I also know that stars 'demand' close-ups. But stars are not so awfully important in the films nowadays and they are steadily growing less important. I know a lot of players will resent that statement, but I believe it."

Mr. Veiller does not think that the thought picture will ever be popular. "Where is the audience for the thought drama in our spoken theater? I honestly believe a good play has very small chance of success in America. The success this season and last of such plays as 'Abraham Lincoln,' 'John Ferguson' and 'Jane Clegg' I attribute to the American reaction against the conventional stage piece. Americans are not mentally suited for the propaganda or slow-moving psycho-analysis stage drama. It is possible abroad—in older countries—but here the theater is a thing of amusement and not of education. If our playgoers complain, they have but themselves to blame. Today there is plainly no definite place for the intellectual drama in this country. Some excellent plays have succeeded in New York. But what happens when they start out from the metropolis? 'John Ferguson' wilted away after a couple of weeks in Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago.

"No, I am sure the theater is just an amusement for Americans. I believe the same thing is absolutely true of the screen. But, of course, I am a very low-brow person. To me the ideal motion picture play—or spoken drama—is one possessing a measure of beauty and speed with a consistently told story."

Mr. Veiller discussed the widely expressed fear that the screen is gripping the stage and sapping its vitality, thru the fact that stage producers are now only presenting plays which they can sell to the screen. This, they reason, will turn the stage into a sort of foundry for melodramas adaptable to the films. Mr. Veiller disposes of this fear briefly.

"There is no question that the average stage producer can now operate without a single possibility of loss entering into his calculations," he says. "If a play fails on Broadway, he can sell it to the screen for at least the amount he lost upon it in footlight form. On the other hand, if it succeeds, he can sell it for a high price, even as much as $100,000.

"But, remember, if stage producers present only plays of a certain movie mold, they will quickly court failure on the spoken stage. No sane-minded manager is going to do that. He will produce the thing that will succeed behind the footlights, knowing that the films will take it for a high price and adapt it anyway."

play, "A Successful Calamity." In addition, he has loaned his wife, Florence Vidor, to Thomas H. Ince to play opposite Lewis Stone in "Beau Revel." And there have been persistent rumors that Vidor is to do that high-speed comedy of Winchell Smith and John Golden, "Turn to the Right." Which, considering that Vidor has pledged himself to manufacture only four film dramas a year, is bound to keep him more or less actively engaged.

Another famous stage success that has been photo-ized is "The New Henrietta," and William H. Crane was selected by Metro as the logical star. The famous actor is now wed to picture-making and has finished a second production, called "The Saphead." And, by the way, May Allison's first appearance on the screen was in the Famous Players production of "David Harum" with Mr. Crane. Now she's a first-magnitude star and Mr. Crane is working on the same lot with her. You simply ought to see them eating lunch together in the studio cafeteria!

But what has created more public interest perhaps than anything else happening lately in the film colony was the contest conducted by Thomas H. Ince in conjunction with a local newspaper. The idea, as worked out, was to secure new types for the Ince pictures—to have readers of the daily appear at the studio for screen tests. Ten persons were selected. Ince has said that he will give them the fateful opportunity before the camera. Whether or not they make stars remains to be seen, but the entire scheme occupied so much space in the newspaper that even blasé, movie-saturated Los Angeles sat up and took notice.

And speaking of Ince reminds me that the co-star team of Douglas MacLean and Doris May have split professionally. MacLean is now starring in his own right, and I haven't been able to find out what Miss May is going to do. At any rate, Mac's initial starring vehicle is a yarn to be known as "The Yancona Yollies," which has something to do with barnyards, country life and fancy chickens.

And Maurice Tourneur has a new leading lady—Barbara Bedford. Miss Bedford is a delightful, wholesome sort of girl, who looks so much like Priscilla Dean that she is continually being mistaken for "The Virgin of Stamboul" heroine. Whereby hangs a tale. For months she was an "extra" on the Universal lot. She wandered over to the Tourneur set to watch the exotic Frenchman direct. He liked her intelligent looks, made a screen test of her, signed her for three years and now the publicity man is working overtime to get her picture into the papers. Such is the leap to stardom—and such, may I add, is the good fortune of but one of about every twenty thousand screen honor aspirants.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be—gray, brown or blue—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator$.75
- M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads$.50
- M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair.....$ 1.00
- M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan.....$.75
- M. T.'s Minerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream".....$.75

The Motion Picture Magazine

Every person thruout the country, who is at all interested in the movies, will rejoice over the September issue of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

It exceeds each previous issue in a great many respects. It has a larger number of interesting stories; it carries the most beautiful photographs of the stars ever published; it furnishes a news interest about the players that will delight the reader,—in short, it will mark an epoch in its own interesting history.

You will laugh over the funny interview that Gladys Hall had with Connie Talmadge not so long ago.

You will be thrilled at the intimate biography which Ethel Roseman writes of William Farnum.

You will admire the new photographs, and become very interested in the history of Marion Davies as written by Adele Whitely Fletcher.

James Fredericks has interviewed Hobart Henley, the director who now stands in the foremost rank of directors.

The popular vampire, Louise Glaum, has been interviewed by Betsy Bruce.

The novelizations are of the best pictures of the month; the photographs are the most artistic that can be obtained.

Bill Hart's Dream Home

contentedly grazing over those pastures. "Being practical, I am making an exhaustive study of irrigation as the means to the end of realizing all this. I love Dakota, the land of my boyhood, but the long, cruel winters cause so much suffering among the cattle, I couldn't stand that, so I am turning my eyes toward the Southwest. Here the one difficulty is lack of water, but irrigation solves that."

"And it must be cattle?" I asked.

"Oh, yes, absolutely; that is part of the big 'dream.' There is just one drawback to that business, tho," and the serious eyes looked squarely into mine. "I know very well that when I have watched a herd of cattle grow until they have become splendid specimens of beef—that I will never be able to part with them—to think of having them killed," and the big-hearted man laughed a little ruefully.

"Seriously, will you ever be able to give up motion pictures?" My question was prompted by a glance around the little study, which bore silent witness to the many triumphs of this film idol who has blazed an artistic trail by establishing a true type of Western character. He has portrayed the rugged life of a dramatic period of the country's development which is now fast disappearing, and thereby causing his pictures, those splendid pictorial studies, to be viewed in the light of historical episodes.

"Absolutely," and Mr. Hart's reply was emphatic. "Not that I do not appreciate them; in fact, that is the very reason I am giving them up. When a man has put every ounce of energy, every thought center into his work for over twenty years, you must realize that he cannot keep it up forever—I'm going to quit while the quitting is good. This is not alone for my own benefit, but for the very thing I try to represent—the virile West. If I were to let up in my efforts, that which has been my life work would suffer, and I know nature too well not to know that it will demand a price.

"There will be many interests to fill my time. Probably Sister Mary and I shall both write. She is such a very wonderful woman. Her well-trained mind has the keenest sense of dramatic values. I have always considered her my best critic, confident that she really knew. We're great pals, too," and he beamed upon the portrait above his desk.

tic searchings of the Chatham, is heard to observe plaintively that she had 'phoned Mr. Withey at Mamaronock eight times that very day. She hadn't been able to reach him any one of the eight times, but then . . . Responsively, the patient interviewer with the Christian martyr air is heard to reply that she might have expected this sort of thing from a star . . . but from a director . . . She concludes, with a sigh, that she supposed he has temperament. The P. A. remarks that she never would have thought it, he has always acted so normal . . . but then . . .

At about nine-thirty, rather limp, the P. A. and the interviewer drift into the dining-room. Disconsolately, they order scallops, the while the P. A., with grim intent, supplies the interviewer with some sort of article by Director Withey on the dignity of the films. Between scallops, the interviewer perused the dignified article on the subject of dignity. And between reiterated trips to the 'phone booth the wild-eyed P. A. supplied fragmentary bits of informative knowledge anent Mr. Withey.

Chet Withey began his career as an actor, usually playing villains, then he began to write photoplays and play in them. WE hesitated for some time as to whether the following had best be narrated to a gaping and incredulous public in the form of a one-act play, a treatise, a diary, a lamentation or a psalm. In any of these directions there were possibilities apparent.

The time was eight-thirty of a mild evening in early April. The place was the lobby of the Hotel Chatham, and the characters participating, or supposed to be participating, were a wild-eyed P. A., an interviewer with a patient smile and the general attitude of I-am-used-to-this-sort-of-thing, and a young and rising director conspicuous by his absence.

The wild-eyed P. A., in between fran-

Get The Grit Out of Your Machine

YOU can't expect the wonderful human machine God gave you to run right on or last any length of time when its bearings are clogged up and its vital parts out of order and breaking down. You can't do good work while the insidious poison of constipation is soaking through your system, affecting every vital organ and befuddling your brain; you can't advance in your business or profession, if chronic headaches are unfitting you for keen, mental work; you can't make friends and forge ahead and win a success in the world, if indigestion, dyspepsia or biliousness have made you a sickly grouch.

—Get the grit out of your machine—put it up—put it in order; keep it running so that every ounce of energy you put into your work COUNTS—and there won't be any doubt of your getting ahead.

Make Yourself Fit

It's the only way to win out—it's the only way to get any real happiness out of life. What's the use of living at all, if you wake up each morning feeling rotten, with your muscles aching, your nerves in a fizzle, a weight in your chest and an ache in your head—unfit for either work or play? You can't be happy while in that condition; you can't make your wife or anyone else happy; nobody wants you around. It's the well, strong, happy, cheerful man who makes friends that help him on in the world.

Look the facts in the face—take stock of yourself—and then take steps to get rid of the Old Man of the Sea who is slowly but surely forcing you into the discard. You can do it, if you will only realize your condition AND ACT.

You can free yourself from your handicapping ailments, build yourself up, become well and strong and vigorous again, if you go about it the right way.

Let Me Help You

I know how to do it. I have spent my life studying out the surest, quickest way. I have visited and investigated the methods in the greatest gymnasium in the world. I have made a special study of wornout, broken-down men. I can and will do for YOU what I have done and am doing for thousands of other discouraged, almost hopeless men.

Let me show you how to clean up your internal machinery and put it in A1 running order. Let me teach you how to develop your figure, so it will be harmonious and symmetrical. Let me tell you the way to strengthen your heart, lungs, stomach and every other vital organ. . . steady your nerves, clear your brain—BUILD YOU UP, into a well, strong MAN, full of life, enthusiasm, pep, punch and ginger. I can do it, and I don't make a particle of difference what your present condition is or what brought you to it. I GUARANTEE to improve you 100 per cent if you will follow my directions for a few months.

Strongfortism Nature's way of Making over Men. Physicians and surgeons can't help over the great recuperative power of Nature as the biggest factor in the treatment of any case. Give Nature half a chance, and she will work a cure. Strongfortism is simply Nature's way of living life. No patent medicines about it; no drug store dope of any kind. No expensive gymnastic outfit required. No iron-bound routine of tiresome, muscle-fagging exercises. You can practice Strongfortism and get all the benefit out of it in your own home.

Send for My Free Book Learn about Strongfortism. You will find it all explained, in frank, straightforward, man-to-man language, in my book, "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy." You can't afford not to read that book. over this and over Miss Keane. He began, you know, as an actor, usually playing great villains, but once, he tells this with great pride, playing the rôle of a Father Superior of the Franciscan Order. Then he began to write photoplays and play in them. He did this for two years at the Griffith Hollywood studio, and there his loyalty and his real ability came to the fore, as such things do, and direction was the inevitable next step."

The phrase "next step" then suggested the 'phone booth again to the P. A., and when she returned it was with a beatified countenance to inform me that she had "got" him and that he would be right over. "He has an apartment in town, you see," she explained, "besides his home in Westchester. It's only around the corner. He'll be here at once."

What with the record just partially supplied me and the dignified article, et al., I expected a reverend person with many theories and much demeanor . . . Well . . . !

Before the arrival, however, (which, by the way, was not "at once"), I gleaned the further arresting knowledge that Mr. Withey co-authored with Roy Summer-ville in writing "The Devil's Needle," featuring Norma Talmadge and Tully Marshall; that he directed "The Old Folks at Home," starring Sir Herbert Beerbohm-Tree; also "On the Quiet," with John Barrymore, and "She Loves and Lies," another Norma Talmadge release. "He just keeps rising," supplied, informatively, the persistent P. A.

"Yes," assented the fortified interviewer.

It seems that he does keep rising.

He had just arisen from bed.

"I suppose I should have a story ready," observed Mr. Withey, with a touch of sardonicism, subsiding into the vacant chair and ordering beef and salad and coffee with considerable gusto; "I suppose I should be ready with the glib recital of the woes of a director, the many appointments, the endless details accounting for my delay. I know that I owe an apology. I make one. However, I am naturally veracious, and I am bound to state that I fell asleep and was getting along quite nicely when Miss Livingstone here called me up."

(Sickly smile from Miss Livingstone.)

"Or you might have put it down to temperament," I suggested; "that covers a multitude of things."

"But I have none," objected Mr. Withey, rumpling his rather belligerent-looking shock of hair; "I have none. I was just asleep." He added, "I still am."

"Promising field for an interview," I said, hopefully.

"Not at all," he remarked, agreeably. "We'll just sit tonight. Interview some other time." Hence, I, too, being veracious, feel bound to remark that this is not Mr. Chet Withey's idea of an interview.

However, being conscientious, and having come all the way from far Long Island for the express purpose of the interview, I was not to be wholly gain-said. Still, it was difficult, with a humorously ironical person, fresh from a profound slumber, eating a young and healthy meal, wholly undisturbed. I be-thought me of the dignity of the "fillum," as expounded by himself. Here, I thought, is a line.

"What," I suggested, hopefully, "would you suggest to further uplift the dignity of the screen?"

"My resignation," he said, promptly.

Later on, going to the Long Island station in Mr. Withey's car, there was a word or two exchanged.

We had been talking about the recent attack on the screen by George Jean Nathan in a current issue of Smart Set. Said Mr. Withey, with the vein of light sardonicism that flicks without cutting thruout his entire talk, "Of course, Mr. Nathan is bigger than the whole of the motion picture industry. This being the case, why not agree with him and let it go at that?"

Speaking in a graver tone, he said, "Part of the attack is quite doubtless true. There is the trite saying about the good and the bad in all things. The screen is too tremendous to escape its share of dross. However, the worst thing in the world is destructive criticism. To my mind, there is no such thing. If criticism is destructive, then it is not criticism. We cannot tear down unless we can build up a better, a different thing, in replacement."

I asked him if he felt the worth-while-ness of the thing he was doing.

He said, "Absolutely. More, it is the only thing I could do. I feel with the pictures something like what an architect, or one of a group of architects, must feel with some tremendous building. We can only do our little part, day by day, week by week, the best and the finest we know how. Then we, in our turn, must give way to another shift of workers to carry on our yet unfinished task. One man can only be a part of so gigantic an enterprise, an art, but each man, in his appointed place, can give his uttermost, as he sees it. That is what I am trying to do."

If it had not been for the sardonicism, the nicely tempered humor, the semi-mocking, semi-kindly touch of comprehension, I would have been moved to remark what a worthy young man . . . I felt that that would not quite apply . . . still, on the other hand, what would . . . so many things. I felt that to Mr. Withey no one attribute could be appended with conclusion. Like and with life he keeps growing and growing and will not stay labeled . . . obviously, this will have to be a case of a series of consecutive talks that we may keep apace.

Marooned Hearts

should believe that he deliberately shirked his duty for a moment's pleasure. Anger that they should dare to believe such a thing of him prompted his reply. "No! I have nothing to say." And then he remembered Marion, Marion's wretched selfishness—and the fact that Marion must be protected from her own act. Quixotic? Yes, but Paul Carrington was not the man to hide behind a woman's skirts. And so he sat silent until all but the old doctor who had loved him had gone.

"Paul! I can't believe it of you! You don't realize what this means!"

"I realize, all right." The young surgeon thrust his thumbs down in a significant gesture. "I'm done for—here. I shall go away, as far away as a ship will carry me"—his grey face quivered with ghastly mirth—"where society will no longer tempt me. To the Jarvis Islands, probably, where I shall go on with my experiments on gland tissues—I shall simply disappear—alone."

An orderly stood hesitant in the doorway. "Beg pardon, Dr. Carrington, but Miss Ainsworth is calling you. She says it's very important."

With a hard look in his grey eyes that gave them the gleam of one of the steel knives in the case, Paul Carrington replied, "Tell the lady that I am occupied," he spoke deliberately; "tell her that I expect to be occupied whenever she calls."

The world's memory is short—luckily, for most of us. A day's wonder, a night's gossiping, and it turns to some other, fresher happening. It wishes only the very latest thing in broken hearts. At the end of a twelvemonth only a few people so much as remembered that there had been a promising young surgeon named Carrington, whose career had been untimely ruined by an unfortunate scandal.

Dr. Matthews was one of those who remembered. Sometimes, as he bent over a particularly desperate operation, the thought would flash to his brain of the slender, steel-strong fingers that had dropped their tools so recklessly. "But there was more to it than we knew," he insisted stubbornly, when other doctors sneered at the "Society Sawbones," "and he'll redeem himself yet—if he's still alive."

If he was still alive! It was this thought that beat at Marion Ainsworth's brain like pounding fists, and made her look, as her dear friends whispered among themselves, positively haggard. "If she doesn't marry soon, she will not be able to make a decent match," they murmured, "but I think her mother will be able to land Bob Carter."

It was wholly due to the silent, incessant pressure of Mrs. Ainsworth's will, with its hurtful impact on her bruised spirit, that Marion finally consented to become engaged to young Carter, a pleasantly wealthy, averagely personable

TAKE it on your trip this summer; it is indispensable to the comfort of your scalp and the beauty of your hair.

CANTHROX SHAMPOO

Its use makes and keeps the hair attractive, develops the life, luster and natural wave and gives a clean, luxuriant appearance. Canthrox has been for years the favorite of those who want to bring out all the beauty of their hair, because it so rapidly softens and entirely removes every particle of dandruff, excess oil and dirt, at the same time giving such a massive fluffiness to the hair that it appears much heavier than it really is, while each strand has silky bright softness and the scalp is left pliant and comfortable.

For Sale at all Drug Stores

Canthrox costs about three cents a shampoo. No good hair wash costs less. A few minutes only are required for its use. You simply moisten the head with Canthrox and rinse it thoroughly, after which the hair dries quickly.

Free Trial Offer

To show the merits of Canthrox and to prove that it is in all ways a most satisfactory hair wash, we send one perfect shampoo free to any address upon receipt of two cents for postage.

She's doing nicely, thank you. Anita Stewart seems to slip more and more with each production. Micky Neilan's productions fluctuated, from the well-sustained Arctic Circle melodrama, "The River's End," to the awful farce, "Please Don't Marry." We have commented elsewhere upon other First National stars and productions.

Goldwyn—Radical changes are going on here. Of all the "eminent author" stuff emanating from these studios, we like the Rex Beach productions best. Gerry Farrar and Pauline Frederick have ceased to be Goldwyners. Tom Moore, Madge Kennedy and Mabel Normand continue uneventfully. Jack Pickford is spending money lavishly but without particular effect. Goldwyn is wasting Will Rogers in conventional melodramas. Give him a chance, as in "Jubilo," and watch him burn up the road. Going back to the trio we just mentioned, Tom Moore is slightly bettering his average of 1919. Miss Normand is retrograding. The early "Edgar" short juvenile comedies of Booth Tarkington's promise something delightful.

Vitagraph—Wont somebody do something about stories and directors there? Vitagraph apparently refuses to believe that the photoplay has advanced since 1915. Alice Joyce and Corinne Griffith continue to be wasted in features and Tony Moreno, the most picturesque of all male film stars, is buried in serials. They allowed the promising Gladys Leslie to depart after manhandling her career. Earle Williams and Harry Morey are still present. Vitagraph certainly needs a far-seeing and vigorous directorial hand to lead it out of its cobwebby retreat.

Pathé—Serials seem to be the piece de resistance here as before. We pass on hastily, for our endurance balks at serials. The best things on the Pathé program have been the Harold Lloyd farces and Mrs. Drew's comedies, vastly dissimilar, but each admirable in its individual field. We have spoken anent "The Gay Old Dog." Blanche Sweet is waning.

Fox—We hear that changes are under way here and that the trend will be away from melodrama. Pearl White's first Fox features have not yet been released. Shake-ups have been regular events until apparently only a star or two remain.

Robertson-Cole—This organization seems to be handicapped by various things, including a difficulty in getting into the leading theaters. Sessue Haya-kawa is easily its ablest star.

Cosmopolitan—All interest is centered in Marion Davies. Which makes us realize just how difficult—or shall we say impossible?—it is to manufacture a star. Alma Rubens has had little opportunity thus far.

Universal—Erich Von Stroheim's productions are the biggest factors by all odds. The one other big "U" production, "The Virgin of Stamboul," will make lots of money, but it is inconsequential from a literary or directorial standpoint. We fail to see Priscilla Dean. Of the numerous other "U" stars we cannot talk authoritatively.

United—The stellar fever seems to be breaking up the Griffith family. Lillian Gish is going a-starring. Bobbie Harron and Dick Barthelmess are becoming stars. Who will be the Griffith players of the coming year? Other United stars and productions are mentioned elsewhere.

Hodkinson—As presented in "Sex" and other vehicles, Louise Glaum is not the seductive siren of Triangle days. Doris Kenyon is pretty and pleasant to look upon. J. Warren Kerrigan is quite the same, altho practically minus popular interest.

Realart—We are betting on Constance Binney. Mary Miles Minter is doing her best, but she will never approach Mary Pickford. That's definite. Alice Brady is a plugger. Allan Dwan's productions have been workmanlike, but not meteoric anywhere.

Many screen stars seem to have been absent most of the year. Theda Bara has been devoting herself to stage work. So has Alice Brady. Dorothy Phillips has done nothing since leaving Universal. Mae Marsh is back before the Cooper-Hewitts, but her first vehicle is yet to be released. The same refers to Bessie Love.

We pause to consider film farce. We have been noting our enthusiasm regarding Harold Lloyd. "Fatty" Arbuckle has been improving. The Sennett comedies continue along their own way. Charles Murray stirs our risibilities as possibly no else does. And there's no two ways of looking at Ben Turpin's natural comedy. The Christie comedies are ambitious but purposeless. And William Fox's Sunshine comedies—ye gods! Words fail us!

The Celluloid Critic The Month's Photoplays in Review

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

"Romance," (United Artists), Chet Withey's screen adaptation of Edward Sheldon's drama, appealed to us strongly. To our way of thinking, Mr. Sheldon penned one of the most noteworthy love plays of the last two or three decades when he wrote this vibrant story of Rita Cavallini, the gay little opera diva, and Tom Armstrong, the young rector of St. Giles in New York's picturesque sixties.

We can understand where "Romance" may fail to completely capture or hold the average audience. Mr. Withey and the scenarist, Will Hastings, lacking physical action, have played too much upon the one string of passionate emotionalism. It is possible to do this behind the footlights, where dialog vivifies and personalities lend variety and color. A great film director might well be able to plumb the emotional and mental depths—but Mr. Withey is not yet a great director.

Frequently in "Romance" he slips into the obviously theatric. But let us give him credit for facing unusual difficulties in making "Romance."

To our way of thinking, the screen version of Mr. Sheldon's drama succeeds because of the basic strength of the story—the vivisection of human passion with an uncannily searching and sympathetic eye. We admit that the celluloid "Romance" stirred us and held us, despite its film limitations. Yet we did miss the superb Sheldon dialog.

As, for instance, the diva's pagan definition of love: "I tell you what love is! Love is de 'unger for anoder's flesh—a deep-down t'irst to dreenk anoder's blood—Love is a beast dat feed all t'ru de night an' when de morning come—Love dies!"

And again: "Yesterday—it is a dream ve 'ave forget. Tomorrow—jus' de 'ope of some great 'appiness—some joy dat never come! Before, behin', all clouds an' stars an' shadow—nodings, nodings is real—only de leetle meenute dat we call today!"

We tremendously admire Doris Keane's performance as Cavallini. She has been extremely well handled photographically, via soft focus, careful posing and so on. The diva—this "gleaming little humming-bird," with her bewitching mannerisms and her infinite charm—is a superb rôle, and Miss Keane makes her live on the silversheet almost as effectively as she has been doing for some years on the stage. We neither liked nor disliked Basil Sydney's playing of the impassioned Tom Armstrong, but we found Norman Trevor's portrayal of the worldly and understanding Cornelius Van Tuyl to be most praiseworthy.

How we regret that Griffith did not make "Romance"!

Erich Von Stroheim has duplicated his adroitly built story of intrigue in the Alps, "Blind Husbands," with another screen story study in intrigue, this time in picturesque Paris at lilac-time. Mr. Von Stroheim calls his newest contribution "The Devil's Passkey," (Universal).

The present tale, written by the Baroness de Meyer and the director himself, revolves around the extravagant wife of a moderately well-to-do American playwright residing in Paris. The woman falls into the meshes of a fashionable dressmaker, one Renee Malot, who lives upon the weaknesses of her sex. When the bills reach huge proportions, Mme. Malot suggests an interesting American, an army captain, as the solution of the financial difficulties. The modiste, it seems, maintains a de luxe suite of rooms where such difficulties are adjusted. However, nothing wrong ensues, altho the story gets into a Parisian scandal weekly and—here is the dramatic twist—the playwright husband hits upon it as a promising plot. His play scores, while all Paris laughs at his innocent use of scandal about his own wife. The whole thing narrowly misses tragedy

Hundreds of All Types Needed. You May Have Perfect Screen-Features

For the first time in the history of moving pictures, it is now possible for you to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

Ralph Ince, famous Sennick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his work in directing Mary Pickford, says: "I am convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." J. A. Powers of Universal, says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

This is a fascinating profession paying big salaries. Don't miss this opportunity. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrapping to get your guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-4, Wilmington, Delaware.

Unless you are sincere in your desire to get in the movies, please do not send for this printed guide.

Gossip of the Eastern Studios

"The Griffith studio family seems to be breaking up," began the Gossip, as he leaned back in his porch chair and studied the summer moon; "Lillian Gish is to be starred by the Frohman Amusement Corporation at $4,500 a week, Bobbie Harron is already at work upon his first star production, to be released thru Metro, and Dick Barthelmess becomes a star, too, as soon as he finishes work in 'Way Down East.'"

"That always comes with development and progress," sighed the Philosopher, studying the glow of his cigar.

"Of course, they will all keep on working under the Griffith eye, making their pictures at the Mamaroneck studios, but the old ensemble will be gone," went on the Gossip. "Harron is now working with Chet Withey as director. Meanwhile, Griffith seems to have a find in little Mary Hay, who succeeded to poor 'Cutie Beautiful's' rôle in 'Way Down East.' Miss Hay was in the Ziegfeld Midnight Frolic, but she has given up that work to devote her entire time to the films. They do say, you know, that Miss Hay and Barthelmess are to be married in the autumn."

The Philosopher smiled.

"Griffith is hard at work on 'Way Down East,'" rambled on the Gossip. "It is said that it will cost him around $750,000 before he finishes. Only the other day he used his biggest set since the Babylonian scenes of 'Intolerance.' It was a huge reproduction of a smart ballroom. And he has two almost complete villages built, one on Long Island and the other on the Mamaroneck property. They tell me that Creighton Hale plays a comedy character in 'Way Down East' and that he is going to make a big hit."

"Players take surprising turns under Griffith's direction," remarked the Philosopher.

"Griffith has just bought back the production originally called 'Black Beach' from First National for $400,000," the Gossip went on. "They say he is going to use it as part of his repertoire at a New York theater in the fall. It will be called 'The Gamest Girl.' They say that Carol Dempster makes a remarkable hit in it, so great that members of the First National call her the biggest find in five years."

"Speaking of family dissolutions," remarked the Philosopher, "what about the division of the De Mille organization?"

"Yes, indeed," answered the Gossip. "Bebe Daniels is now a Realart star and is being billed as 'the good little bad girl.' They're going to present her in a series of baby vampire rôles. Gloria Swanson has just signed as a Famous Players-Lasky star, and her salary has jumped from around $600 to something like $1,250. And Thomas Meighan, of course, is already a-starring."

"One thing really touched me," said the Philosopher, "and that is the way people have welcomed Doug and Mary on their honeymoon. I'm mighty glad."

"Great, wasn't it?" smiled the Gossip. "All the way across country, people in every village, town and city turned out to welcome them. Maybe their stay in New York at the Ritz wasn't one round of royal welcomes. Why, their appearances on the streets were the signals for veritable riots. Police reserves had to be called out to get them out of Wall Street one day and, when they went to the theater, the audiences stopped watching the play."

"It must have touched their hearts," said the Philosopher, softly. "Surely they deserve happiness. Think of all they have done for others on the screen!"

"I see that Theda Bara has gone to Europe for a rest," went on the Gossip. "They say she's to have a new play when she returns and New York will see her again next fall behind the footlights. This trip is her first real rest. Her sister is making the trip with her."

"Speaking of trips abroad," continued the Gossip, "reminds me that Mamma Talmadge and Natalie Talmadge are now on the other side, and they say that Norma and Constance are going over, along with Dorothy Gish. Maybe they're going to do a picture or two over there, who knows? I hear that Norma may revive 'The Garden of Allah' very soon on the screen." You remember that it was done a long time ago. Anyway, the revival is being talked about."

"I would like to see Norma Talmadge in a big drama," sighed the Philosopher. "She surely needs better material."

"It's hard to get, tho, these days," laughed the Gossip. "Look at the way they're all frantically searching. King Vidor's father and manager, Charles Vidor, was in New York for weeks recently looking for stories. They do say that King Vidor may do Winchell Smith's 'Turn to the Right.'"

The Philosopher's interest was aroused. "Vidor is the most promising director on the screen," he said. "You interest me very much, for no one could do 'Turn to the Right' better than he."

"Micky Neilan has been in New York," the Gossip ran on. "Bert Lytell is here. Going to do a stage play this fall, besides keeping up his screen work. Madge Kennedy is going to return, at least temporarily, to the footlights. You, of course, have heard that Al H. Woods, who presented Miss Bara on the stage, made an offer to Bill Hart, which was rejected. Bill is going to retire from acting, they say."

"Personally, I can't think of anything more interesting than the return to New York of S. L. Rothapfel," interrupted the Philosopher. "There is a man to whom the whole industry owes a great deal—and who isn't half appreciated by youth who had two passions in life—his yacht and Marion. And the next society heard was of a trip to Japan on the Sea Gull, with its owner, his fiancée and her mother aboard.

Meanwhile, "It's been one year exactly," wrote Paul Carrington in his diary, sitting in his palm-thatched hut and looking out over the shimmering blue fields of the Pacific, "and I have not seen a human face in all that time. My experiments are progressing so well that another three years ought to complete them, and successfully, please God. If they shall save a single human life, it will be my atonement—"

The pen fell from his fingers, he leaned forward with a roaring in his ears not of the surf. "It's—not true, of course," he whispered; "she's a thousand miles away, playing golf in imported tweeds—"

The girl in the doorway leaned heavily against the lintel. The thing she wore had been a silk crêpe evening gown once, but now hung about her in sodden wisps, leaving her arms and bosom bare. Her hair was dark with sea-water, and she was laughing softly, senselessly. "He thought—that I was more afraid—of the ocean than of—him, the sailor with the pockmarked face"—she shuddered, as at some memory, incredibly vile—"and the other boats were gone—so I was drowned . . ."

Paul Carrington caught her as she fell. "God, why did You let this woman come here?" he groaned. "Hasn't she done me harm enough already?" But, hate her as he did, he was a doctor first of all. When Marion Ainsworth opened her eyes, it was to see the face she had dreamed of so often bending above her, but she had never dreamed that his eyes could be so mercilessly cruel. She tried to rise.

"I—did not pick my route, Paul." Her lips quivered in a painful smile. "The yacht—was wrecked. One of the sailors took me in a boat. We lost the others, and"—a burning blush swept her whiteness a moment—"I had to choose between that man—and the sea, so I jumped overboard. I suppose the tide swept me ashore here, but—I'll go now—"

He laughed harshly. "Go? Where? We're marooned here together, you and I. My steam yacht broke from its moorings, six months ago, in a tropic storm. We may be picked up at any time, or we may spend our lives on this island."

They looked at one another long. Her lips quivered into speech. "You—have never forgiven me, Paul?"

"I do not forgive easily," the man answered briefly. "Make no mistake. I shall build you a hut close enough to mine for your protection, and I shall draw a line upon the ground between. That line shall separate our lives as tho it were an ocean lying between us. You have destroyed my life once. I came here to piece the broken bits together, and—you shall not destroy it again."

In the long weeks that followed she saw no sign of relenting. He built her, as he had promised, a hut, and, as he had promised, he drew a line between their worlds. On the one side he worked silently over his retorts and glass slides, apparently not seeing her, never speaking; his face a grim, grey mask hiding his thoughts from her wistful, seeking gaze. If she could have known them, they might have gone far toward easing the pain that lay always under her heart. Frivolous she had been, thoughtless and selfish, but she had loved this man, and now that she had lost him she was like one who, having lost life, still remains forlornly alive.

And he? The glass slides under his fingers were meaningless now. He still thought that he hated her and raved against her in his diary, yet her slim loveliness would not let him he. He dreamed, tossing on his restless bed, of the cool softness of her lips. He turned his eyes resolutely away from the sight of her, clad in a woven garment of reeds and drifting, light as sea-foam on the beach—and he saw her always before him.

What the end might have been there is no guessing, but the sailor with the pockmarked face played god of the machine. For days he had hidden like a wild beast in the jungle growth, watching, with hot eyes of desire, the white wonder of Marion's body dipping, morning and evening, in a sheltered pocket of the sea. Since his boat had drifted ashore and landed him marvelously near the woman he had craved, he had been waiting for his moment, and presently he thought that it had come. But he had not reckoned on Paul.

In the white glare of the tropic noon-tide the two men fought, while the woman watched breathlessly, as it was in the beginning. The sand beneath their laboring feet was trodden red when at last Carrington flung the other at full length on the beach, and stood above him, bruised, bleeding, exultant. "Get to your boat," he told the cringing creature at his feet, contemptuously, "and steer away from this island. If you try to crawl back here I'll kill you! You'll probably drown, but I warn you that's better than what I would do to you!"

The sailor did not try to rise. He squirmed away on his stomach, an abject thing of fear, like a monstrous black slug, leaving two for whom, strangely, the world was changed. The past had slipped from them like discarded garments and their naked souls stood face to face.

"How strong you are!" marveled the woman soul.

"I was fighting for you," answered the man. He held out his arms, and unquestioningly she went into them, and the world followed time into the limbo of things that were not, and there were only themselves under the sky, themselves and the murmurous mother sea.

Sixth Prize

THE new Popularity Contest, unusual and entertaining, is already the object of great interest — unfailing and rife. If you have entered it or have read the announcements which have appeared, and will appear, from time to time, containing the rules and regulations, you know it is actually a double contest—a contest in which both the public and players are equally interested.

The prizes depicted above and below were selected after much careful thought and attention and each one is destined to make some one happier, from the beautiful Crescent phonograph which suggests a twilight hour with the gems musical geni have given to the world, to the Marble nickel-plated axe which brings to mind a jolly time in some invitingly green woodland.

Perhaps you have not yet decided to enter the contest—if not do so now. Dont lose an opportunity of enjoying the unique entertainment it affords or of capturing one of the lovely and useful awards.

FIRST PRIZE

Crescent Phonograph, piano mahogany finish (value $160). Plays all makes of disc records: Victor, Columbia, Pathe, Edison, Emerson, etc., without the use of extra attachments or intricate adjustments; a simple turn of the sound-box is all that is necessary in changing from a lateral cut record to playing a hill and dale cut record.

A Crescent owner can enjoy a repertoire of the greatest opera singers, popular songs, dance music or anything that is turned out of the disc record. The tone of the Crescent is full, round, deep and mellow. It has a large compartment for records.

First

SECOND PRIZE

Movette Camera and three packages of films (value $65). Compact, light, efficient, easily operated. Think of the possibilities during your vacation trip — your canoe trip—in pictures —pictures of your family or friends—living pictures that you can project at any time in your home. A priceless record of your life.

THIRD PRIZE

Corona Typewriter with case (value $50); an all-round portable typewriter, light enough and small enough to be carried anywhere, and strong enough to stand any possible condition of travel. It is trim and symmetrical and does not give one's study the atmosphere of a business office. Fold it up and take it with you anywhere.

FOURTH PRIZE

Sheaffer "Giftie" Combination Set, consisting of a Sheaffer Fountain Pen and a Sheaffer Sharp-Point Pencil, in a handsome plush-lined box. Gold filled, warranted twenty years. Cannot blot or leak. A beautiful and perfect writing instrument.

FIFTH PRIZE

Bristol steel Casting Rod agate guide, cork grip, strong and durable. Packed in linen case. Can be easily put in traveling bag.

SIXTH PRIZE

Loughlin Safety Self-Filling Fountain Pen. No extensions to remember, no locks to forget.

SEVENTH PRIZE

Star Vibrator, handsomely finished in nickel plate with three attachments. Alternating current. Excellent for massage. Use it in your own home.

EIGHTH PRIZE

Same as Seventh Prize.

NINTH PRIZE

Marble nickel-plated pocket axe of tool steel, carefully tempered and sharpened. Indispensable in camp or woods.

Unique Competition in Which the Voters Share in the Prizes

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

SHADOWLAND, MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, and MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide awake and well informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read SHADOWLAND, the MAGAZINE and CLASSIC.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2 provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on September 30, 1920.
2. There will be ten ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
July	1920 ballot
August	1920 ballot
September	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for SHADOWLAND every month, and the same for MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and yet again the same for CLASSIC. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

National Bob

Youth and Fashion is everything—that's why I am wearing the latest National Bob. It's too lovely for words with its soft, wavy hair falling teasingly over the combs that slip so easily through my hair. Everyone thinks the Bob's my very own—it matches so perfectly and I never sacrificed a hair. I use invisible pins to attach the ends and it's on and off in a jiffy. My picture shows the Bob charm. How did I get it? I sent a strand of my hair with $10.00 and it was promptly sent—Postpaid. I'm as happy as a child with a new toy and I never looked so well. You'll like it too. by "The ANSWER MAN"

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

DAVID L.—Thanks, chappie, for the fee. Viola Dana's husband passed away recently. They both changed their name, but they are sisters. Write him at Los Angeles. Yes, life is half spent before we know what it is. It is a hard nut to crack and very few of us get out of it alive.

H. L. M.—Dont forget that theatrical life is fantastic and unreal. Elsie Ferguson is playing in "Sacred and Profane Love" at the Morosco Theater, New York City. Alice Joyce with Eastern Vitagraph, Brooklyn, and George Walsh with Fox, New York City. June Caprice is about 21; Lila Lee, 17; Lillian Gish, 24, and Dorothy Gish, 22. All old ladies, you see.

JOE B., BAY CITY.—No, m' dear, I do not do up my hair in curl papers as Lord Byron did. Look me over up above and tell me—do you see any hair? You want to see Elliott Dexter and Gloria Swanson play together. I'll try and arrange it. Yes, Priscilla Dean is married. No, no, Madlaine Traverser is not Peggy Hyland's sister. Oh, you're welcome.

A LOYAL FAN.—That's the way to be. Beware of love at first sight—always take a second look. Why, Corinne Griffith is in "The Garter Girl." Oh, for a clasp of that garter—it would look so handsome in my collection of curios. E. K. Lincoln in "The Inner Voice," American Cinema. Niles Welch is with Western Vitagraph. So you like Elliott Dexter and Norma Talmadge, and Charles Ray and Wallace Reid next. No, they take a substitute and not a real house.

HALF PAST SIXTEEN.—The DeHavens can be reached at Paramount, 481 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Surely I want you to write me again. Enjoyed your letter a lot.

BEA VO.—Yes, I was there and was glad to see the Brooklyn Dodgers win. A pitch in time saved the nine. Thanks for the verse. Does it run fluently by you? Dustin Farnum in "The Big Happiness."

URA COOTIE.—How do you make that out? Harrison Ford? I will tell you all about him some rainy afternoon. You tell me to always wear my rubbers when it rains so as not to get the flu. I need some one like you to look after me.

DUDE.—Whom the gods love—die young. I am 79, so you know what that means. There was an interview with Gloria Swanson in the February, 1919, CLASSIC. Charles Ray in "Ramsey Milholland," a Booth Tarkington story. Yes, Bill Farnum in "The Big Happiness." You say you dont believe that a crow lives 100 years. Why dont you buy one and find out?

URA PEACH.—No, night does not bring out the stars; it simply brings us out of our light-produced blindness so that we can see them. Very few of the studios allow visitors. Gladys Brockwell in "A Sister to Salome." Arline Pretty with Selznick in "The Valley of Doubt." Oh, I dont mind answering a few questions. Write me again.

JUST JUNE.—I have mailed your letter.

JEAN S.—So you have deserted Earle Williams for Eugene O'Brien. Oh, fickle jade!

'Twas ever thus. The heart of a woman is like the moon, ever changing, but there is always a man in it. You can reach Ethel Clayton at Paramount, 485 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Her last picture was "The Lady in Love." You want to see an interview with Wanda Hawley and Tom Moore.

IDEALIST.—Your clever letter received. You must write me again.

BETTY, ADELAIDE.—Well, Betty, most girls want nothing but husbands, but when they get them they want everything. Send International Coupons, valued at five cents each. See above for Elsie Ferguson. Mary Miles Minter, Los Angeles, Cal. Yes, I agree with you, but make love while the moon shines.

MARION.—Why didn't you sign your name?

GLORIOUS DIVINE TALMADGE.—You refer to "Pals First" and Rubye de Remer played with him. So you liked Monroe Salisbury in "The Eyes of the World." It's rather a tedious job, but since you ask me how to rid your pet dog of his fleas, here goes, again. Fill your bathtub with boiling water; immerse the pet dog, being careful that only the end of his tail protrudes above the water. The fleas will crawl out on his caudal appendage to keep from drowning, and you may take your time in capturing them one at a time. What will happen to the pet dog? That's his look-out. He probably will drown, but you have succeeded in relieving him of his little playmates.

EDITH C. S.—Yes, Mahlon Hamilton is at Hampton Studios, Los Angeles.

U. R. A. J.—Elsie Ferguson was born in New York in 1883. She is Mrs. Thomas B. Clarke. Hope you win your bet. No, I cannot prevent thoughts coming any more than I could keep birds from flying over my head, but I try to prevent their building nests in my beard.

ROSALIND R.—Nothing is ever so good as it seemed beforehand that it was going to be—or, anticipation is greater than realization—provided you have a good imagination. Dont you find it so? Eugene O'Brien at Selznick, 729 7th Avenue, New York. Ethel Clayton in "The City Sparrow." Do I drink? Yes, but-termilk. What else is a feller to do?

BETTY R., PITTSBURG.—So you say Nazimova is about 41 years old. You're trying to bribe me to find out whether I am a male or a female. I'm wise to you. Certainly you may come and see me in my cage. It is more blessed to call than to receive.

RED ROSE.—You here again? Now, it isn't up to me to tell you whom to vote for. The most scientific way is to put them all in a hat and pick out one. You are more apt to get answered in the CLASSIC than you are in the MAGAZINE. I know, but a very masculine woman is liable to usurp most of the masculinity of the husband and leave him effeminate. Shirley Mason is playing in "His Harvest." Yes, Cleo Ridgely has returned to the screen to play in Lew Cody's "The Mischief Man." Come again.

CUPIE.—Send a stamped, addressed envelope for a list of manufacturers, also a list of corresponding clubs.

1. Mae Murray's—er—pedal extremities in "On With the Dance."
2. Eugene O'Brien's left eyebrow in "The Perfect Lover."
3. Betty Compson's bath-tub in "The Miracle Man."
4. Bebe Daniels and her victrola in "Why Change Your Wife?"
5. Gloria Swanson's morning plunge in "Male and Female."
6. Constance Talmadge's depiction of Annette Kellermann in "Two Weeks."

"Women!" reads an advertisement anent "The Devil's Passkey." "What does Von Stroheim know about women? Too much—the women think. That's why they love him and hate him—and pack the house to the fire limits." It's sure the day of the he-vampire.

OUR POLITICAL CHOICE

We dont care particularly who gets elected this year, as long as it isn't a Democrat. But we are very particular about the next cabinet. Here's our idea:
 Secretary of State—Charlie Murray
 Secretary of the Navy—Mack Sennett
 Secretary of Agriculture—Charles Ray
 Postmaster-General—Lew Cody
 Attorney-General—Ben Turpin*
 Secretary of the Interior—Fatty Arbuckle
 Secretary of the Treasury—Mamma Pickford
 Secretary of Commerce—Lewis J. Selznick
 Secretary of Labor—Will Rogers
 Secretary of War—Bull Montana

the industry, it seems to me. Yet, when the Capitol Theater failed to get over in a big way, they have to call him back to New York to save it. And, in one night, he turned the biggest movie house in the world into a success. Interesting, isn't it?"

"You bet," responded the Gossip. "Why, Rathapfel originated the present de luxe way of showing photoplays. He's done more for the motion picture than any half-dozen producers, except Griffith."

"True," said the Philosopher. "But you know the old proverb about the lack of appreciation in one's own land!"

Only for ladies who end corns

Dainty shoes are only for those who end corns.

The way is simple, quick and easy, and is sure. Millions of people employ it.

Apply Blue-jay, the liquid or the plaster. That touch will stop the pain.

Then wait a little and the corn will loosen and come out.

Then why does anybody suffer corns?

Just because they don't know. They pare corns and keep them. Or they pad them. Or they use a treatment harsh and ineffective.

Blue-jay is scientific. This world-famed laboratory created it.

Year after year, it is keeping millions entirely free from corns.

Perhaps half the corns that start are now ended by it.

Ask your druggist for Blue-jay. Learn tonight how much it means to you.

when the dramatist learns the truth, but he comes in time to realize that he loves—and needs—his butterfly wife despite everything.

Mr. Von Stroheim presents his story with a Continental observation of men and manners, a dexterous camera sense and the same directorial skilfulness that lifted "Blind Husbands" into the unusual. As yet, Mr. Von Stroheim's characters—in the main—do not have the breath of life. Just one character of "The Devil's Passkey" really lives. It is the cocotte, Odero, realized with fine Parisian verve and piquancy by Mae Bush. Her Odero is as French as La Vie Parisienne. Sam de Grasse and Una Trevelyn are adequate as the American husband and wife, Clyde Fillmore is the army officer who wavers humanly between the good and the bad, and Maud George is Mme. Malot. The Paris atmosphere is admirably attained and maintained.

Rabelaisian in its humor is "Scratch My Back" (Goldwyn), written and adapted for the screen by Rupert Hughes. The hero is a rich young chap who always does what he wants to. Obeying that impulse, he leans over at the opera and scratches the décolleté back of a young woman who is too polite to do it herself. Forthwith his adventures begin, for the object of his unique attention not only does not resent it, but selects him to save her from the machinations of a blackmailer. Just to show his originality, Mr. Hughes has the hero enter and leave a bachelor. The story itself is not particularly humorous, but it is very shrewdly adapted to the screen and possesses delightful subtitles, captions which "kid" the action without hurting the story. The result is something new in film technique—a sort of after-dinner story told with dry celluloid humor. T. Roy Barnes, a former "nut" comedian in the varieties, stands out of "Scratch My Back" like a house afire. You'll hear more on the screen of this Barnes, or we miss our guess.

William Faversham is making his return to the screen in "The Man Who Lost Himself," (Selznick). This story of a British nobleman and a penniless American who look exactly alike, suggests "The Masquerader." The Englishman is in the grip of creditors and blackmailers, and he commits suicide secretly, leaving the American in his place. The newcomer solves all the difficulties—except the earl's wife. Love enters here and— But why tell the dénouement? "The Man Who Lost Himself" held our interest very well. Mr. Faversham does distinguished work, too distinguished, perhaps, to suggest a down-and-out American suddenly thrust into an earl's shoes. He touched the rôle here and there with a deft comic hand, which leads us to speculate upon Mr. Faversham's film possibilities in high comedy. Hedda Hopper contributes a genuinely fine performance as the wife, a well-bred, worldly and understanding woman. At last a heroine who possesses something aloft besides curls! George D. Baker's direction is very workmanlike.

"The Sea Wolf," (Paramount), as revised with Noah Beery in Hobart Bosworth's original rôle of Jack London's caveman of the North Pacific, struck us as being 'way above the average. If you are not familiar with London's virile and tragic tale of "Wolf" Larsen, seal-hunting schooner skipper, you should be. Here is an unusual novel of the primitive in man in combat with the mind.

We want to congratulate Mr. Beery upon his performance as the Sea Wolf. A mighty good bit of work it is, carefully and skilfully shaded. Mabel Julienne Scott and Tom Forman are satisfactory as the two scions of the rich stranded aboard "Wolf's" hell-ship.

Olive Thomas is more interesting in "The Flapper," (Selznick), Frances Marion's boarding-school opus, than in any vehicle we have yet observed her. Miss Marion endeavors to hit a feminine "Seventeen," satirizing girlish adolescence as Booth Tarkington did with callow boyhood. The trouble here is that the picture is entirely too long for its story and, again, that the director mistakes burlesque for satire. The tale frequently becomes preposterous. The crook element, for instance, is dragged in by the ears and does not ring true. The plot? The kid romance of two young people in adjoining boarding and military schools. Rather weak.

Will Rogers' latest, "Jes' Call Me Jim," (Goldwyn), is quite fearful. Here Rogers is made to fit a trite old melodrama, with the result that his human and humorous qualities are engulfed. Thru a conspiracy, an inventor is kept in a wretched asylum cell. How he is rescued and restored to health by Jim, (played by Rogers), forms the theme, such as it is. We like Irene Rich as the girl of the drama. The director, Clarence Badger, gives no credit for an audience's imagination. And, judging from the eternal flashbacks, he thinks they cannot remember, either.

"The Silver Horde," (Goldwyn), based upon Rex Beach's romance of the salmon industry in Alaska, sounds a healthy outdoor note. We are quite sure it will interest you. "The Silver Horde" concerns the efforts of the salmon-canning trust to get possession of a certain valuable river property at any cost. But the plotters are foiled and, when the silver salmon horde sweep up the Kalvik River, the fighters win their battle. Myrtle Stedman stands out of "The Silver Horde" thru her splendid performance as Cherry Melotte, Rex Beach's fascinating heroine of the Northland. Betty Blythe is effectively present, too. Frank Lloyd's direction is praiseworthy.

Anita Stewart did not at all interest us in "The Yellow Typhoon," (First National), based upon Harold MacGrath's romance of twin sisters, one brunette and fearfully good, the other blonde

I Teach Piano 1/4 Usual Time

I now have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. There isn't a state in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players who obtained their entire training from me by mail. Yet when I first started in 1891, I was nearly laughed out of business. Could I have overcome this prejudice and increased my students every year for a quarter century unless my method produced RESULTS? Send for free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

I use modern methods and time-saving devices which cannot be used by others because they are patented. My invention, the Colorotone, enables you to play interesting pieces in every key, within four lessons. My moving picture device, Quin-Dex, shows you every movement of my hand at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move, just as if thrown on the screen. The Colorotone and Quin-Dex save you months and years of wasted energy. They can be obtained only from me, and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them. Investigate without cost.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. Practical and easy to understand.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly as you wish in clear touch. Practise in spare time at home. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. Diploma granted. Special reduced terms this month. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

and—well—! Miss Stewart plays them both, the golden-haired adventuress, Bertha, alias "The Yellow Typhoon," and the dark-tressed Hilda, who serves Uncle Sam in the secret service. Miss Stewart cannot remotely suggest MacGrath's siren of the lonely spots. As for the story, it is the veriest piffle.

Bryant Washburn has another amusing comedy in "Mrs. Temple's Telegram," (Paramount), nowhere near as good as "The Six Best Cellars," but possessing its laughs. Adapted from the well-known stage farce, it revolves around the efforts of a young husband to explain his all-night absence from home. He has been innocently locked up on a department store roof with a feminine customer—but he doesn't dare own up to this. All sorts of complications result, of course. Wanda Hawley is an excellent foil as the wife.

Breezy and entertaining is "The Dancin' Fool," (Paramount), in which the redoubtable Wallie Reid plays a jug salesman by day and a cabaret dancer by night. No doubt you read the story in a recent issue of THE CLASSIC. Bebe Daniels lends colorful aid as Junie Budd, 'Ves' Tibble's dancing partner. Reid isn't always spontaneous in this comedy, for, in the early scenes, he is required to play a homespun lad from the hinterlands. If there is one thing Reid can't do—it's this. The hay-seed atmosphere here exists only in the "B'gosh!" subtitles.

As a screen story, Zane Grey's "Riders of the Dawn," (Hodkinson), based upon his "Desert of Wheat," is a bit out of the beaten track. It deals with the wheat farmers of the Middle West, the so-called destructive machinations of the I. W. W., (alho they are at no time called by name), and the ultimate triumph of a returned soldier-farmer over the evil element. Roy Stewart is the stalwart hero. A passable photoplay.

We looked forward with unusual interest to seeing Louise Glaum in her latest, "Sex," (Hodkinson). "As ye siren, so shall ye reap," seems to be the thesis, for the vamp, played by Miss Glaum, wins a married man away from his happy home. But, when a rich youth appears on the horizon, she tosses her married-and-about-to-be-divorced admirer aside. She herself marries and, lo and behold, another adventuress lures him off. Thus is the ex-siren paid off in her own wiles. Married life, according to "Sex" and the De Mille dramas, seems to be just one darned vampire after another. Which we rather doubt. "Sex," by the way, paints a picture of New York night life such as it is supposed to be and isn't, a maze of mad parties, with chorines dancing upon tables, youthful millionaires drinking—whisper—champagne from slippers, etc.

"Sex" may cause a gasp or two in the provinces, but it is really pretty dull screen fare.

"A Modern Salome," (Metro), with one Hope Hampton, comes pretty near meeting our idea of the worst picture of the celluloid year.

Fashion says the use of DEL-A-TONE is necessary so long as sleeveless gowns and sheer fabrics for sleeves are worn. It assists freedom of movement, unhampered grace, modest elegance and correct style. That is why "they all use Delatone"

Delatone is an old and well known scientific preparation for the quick, safe and certain removal of hairy growths, no matter how thick or stubborn. After application the skin is clear, firm and hairless, with no pain or discoloration.

Beauty specialists recommend Delatone for removal of objectionable hair from face, neck or arms.

Druggists sell Delatone; or an original 1 oz. jar will be mailed to any address on receipt of $1 by

Your first R-E-A-L cigarette pleasure will come with Camels!

YOU'LL swing into the Camel procession as easily and as delightedly as any of the thousands of smokers who have found these cigarettes an absolute revelation in quality, in refreshing flavor, in mellow mildness and in body!

Camels are unlike any cigarette you ever puffed. They are a creation—an expert blend of choice Turkish and choice Domestic tobaccos. As sure as you are a foot high you will prefer Camels blend to either kind of tobacco smoked straight! They are so delightful, so unusual in every way you consider a cigarette.

Camels fit in with your cigarette desires just one hundred per cent! The satisfaction they impart to smokers is simply joyous.

Camels will not tire your taste! Smoke them liberally—always with keen relish! And, Camels leave no unpleasant cigaretty aftertaste nor unpleasant cigaretty odor.

You'll prove out our enthusiasm when you compare Camels with any cigarette in the world at any price!

Camels are sold everywhere in scientifically sealed packages of 20 cigarettes for 20 cents; or ten packages (200 cigarettes) in a glassine-paper-covered carton. We strongly recommend this carton for the home or office supply or when you travel.

Love on the Mexican Border

Sweetly she smiled into the eyes of both, kisses she took from both—the ruddy American and the dark-skinned Mexican. And in the strong arms of the man from the North, was it any wonder that for the moment she forgot that Pedro would soon be there? Her punishment? Men of the North laugh coldly and pass on, but the Southern brother below the Rio Grande loves, as he hates, with a singleness that knows no mercy. On this erring woman, going so gayly to her fate, O. Henry could look with excuse and pity, as he did on the weaknesses of women always, everywhere, for he knew their small shoulders bear burdens that would break the backs of men.

O. HENRY

More people are reading O. Henry today than ever before. They read him because he has the flavor of life as we know it, the tang, the zest, the breathless, careless haste, the ironic, happy, tragic irresponsibilities which go to make up life as it is really lived.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a Photograph by Apeda.)

There is no gainsaying the fact that the judges certainly showed an unusual power of far-sightedness when they chose as one of the four winners of the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1919, Anita Booth. Miss Booth has proved her screen adaptability and talent by her work for the Selznick Picture Corporation lately, and the latest rumor to reach our always-attentive-where-Anita-is-concerned ears, is to the effect that she is about to sign with the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation.

THE CLASSIC will always keep an interested eye on the cinema progress of this little Southern beauty,—and without hesitation, prognosticates that Anita will go far!

AMERICAN PUB. CO., 981 Winston Building, Philadelphia

Booth.—"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early seventies. Genially delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmer and an excellent cast.

Century.—"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sextette." Here is a revival that really revives.

Century Promenade.—New York's newest dinner and midnight entertainment, "The Century Review" and "The Midnight Rounders." Colorful girl shows for the tired business man. A delightful place to eat.

Cohan's.—"The Hottentot," with Willie Collier. Typical one-man farce with the inimitable farceur, Collier, at his best. Ann Andrews lends pleasant assistance. Full of laughs.

Cohan and Harris.—"Honey Girl." Lively musical comedy built about the brisk race-track comedy, "Checkers." This has speed and humor—as well as an excellent cast.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlynn is a brilliant Lincoln.

Forty-Eighth Street.—"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire. Helen MacKellar is admirable as the piquant French-Canadian heroine.

Garrick.—"Jane Clegg." St. John Ervine's powerful drama, presented by the Theater Guild, has been running here all season. A drab but brilliant tale of middle-class English life. Superbly acted by the best ensemble in New York.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Little.—"Foot-Loose," with Emily Stevens, Norman Trevor and O. P. Heggie. Zoe Akins' well-done modernization of the old melodrama, "Forget-Me-Not." Tallulah Bankhead scores in a difficult rôle.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else. Here, too, are the most beautiful girls in all New York.

Nora Bayes Theater.—"Lassic." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent. Dorothy Dickson and Carl Hyson contribute some delightful dance interludes.

Winter Garden.—"Cinderella on Broadway." Typical summer girl entertainment designed for the tired business man. The extravaganza this year is based upon the fairy adventures of Cinderella. Plenty of girls, passable music, attractive costumes and a little humor.

sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

"The Purple Mask" with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainments of the season. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Briquet; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

"The Sign on the Door."—A very good melodrama which boasts many instances of the unexpected—and Marjorie Rameau in highly emotional scenes.

"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

"The Oujia Board."—Craue Wilbur's thriller built around spiritism. Real spooks invade a fake séance, solve a murder mystery and provide plenty of surprises. Guaranteed to keep you on edge. Excellent cast includes George Gaul, Howard Lang and Edward Ellis.

"My Golden Girl."—A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

"Shavings."—A pleasant bucolic entertainment based upon Joseph C. Lincoln's familiar Cape Cod stories. Harry Beresford is featured in a gentle, whimsical characterization.

"Mamma's Affair."—Rachel Butler's admirably written comedy—a study of that deadly human species, the hypochondriac who fancies herself suffering from all sorts of ills. Done with distinction and fine discernment. Ida St. Leon scores and important members of the cast are: Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Katherine Kaelred and George Le Guere.

"The Little Whopper."—Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

"Wedding Bells."—A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

"Aphrodite."—Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle.

"The Frivolities of 1920."—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue. Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls.

"The Royal Vagabond."—A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor.

ON TOUR THIS AND NEXT SEASON

"The Fall and Rise of Susan Lenox."—Weak adaptation of the David Graham Phillips novel. Alma Tell in the stellar rôle.

"Scandal."—Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Dick Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various

In "The Wonder Book for Writers," which we will send to you ABSOLUTELY FREE, these famous Movie Stars point out the easiest way to turn your ideas into stories and photoplays and become a successful writer.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

LETTERS LIKE THIS ARE POURING IN!

"I wouldn't take a million dollars for it."—MARY WATSON, FAIRMONT, VA. VA.
 "It is worth its weight in gold."—G. MOCKWITZ, NEW CASTLE, WASH.

"Every obstacle that menaces success can be mastered through this simple but thorough system."—M. R. S. O'LEARY, E. MICHAUX, CHARLELOT, PA.

"It contains a gold mine of valuable suggestions."—LENA BAILEY, Mt. Vernon, Ill.

"I can only say that I am amazed that it is possible to set forth the principles of short story and photoplay writing in such a clear, concise manner."—GORDON MATHEWS, MONTREAL, CAN.

"I received your Irving System some time ago. It is the most remarkable thing I have ever seen. Mr. Irving certainly has made story and play writing amazingly simple and easy."—ALFREDO HORTO, NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.

"Of all the compositions I have read on this subject, I find yours the most helpful to aspiring authors."—HAZEL SIMPSON NAYLOR, LITERARY EDITOR, MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

"With this volume before him, the veriest novice should be able to build stories or photoplays that will find a ready market. The best treatise of its kind I have encountered in 24 years of newspaper and literary work."—E. PIERCE WELLER, MANAGING EDITOR, THE BINGHAMTON PRESS.

"When I first saw your ad I was working in a shop for $30 a week. Always having worked with my hands, I doubted my ability to make money with my brain. So it was with much skepticism that I sent for your Easy Method of Writing. When the System arrived, I carefully studied it evenings after work. Within a month I had completed two plays, one of which sold for $500, the other for $450. I unhesitatingly say that I owe it all to the Irving System."—HELEN KIN-DON, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are The Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the imagination free rein, they might have astonished the world!

BUT two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the flotsam and jetsam of Life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write?" Who says you can't?

LISTEN! A wonderful FREE book has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about the Irving System—a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to develop your "story fancy," weave clever word-pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of Failure. How to WIN!

This surprising book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge. No obligation. YOUR copy is waiting for you. Write for it NOW! GET IT, IT'S YOURS. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing. The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular job. Who says you can't make "easy money" with your brain? Who says you can't turn your Thoughts into cash? Who says you can't make your dreams come true? Nobody knows—BUT THE BOOK WILL TELL YOU.

So why waste any more time wondering, dreaming, waiting? Simply fill out the coupon below—you're not BUYING anything, you're getting it ABSOLUTELY FREE. A book that may prove the Book of Your Destiny. A Magic Book through which men and women, young and old, may learn to turn their spare hours into cash!

Oh, You Skinny!

Why stay thin as a rail? You don't have to! And you don't have to go through life with a chest that the tailor gives you; with arms of childish strength; with legs you can hardly stand on. And what about that stomach that finches every time you try a square meal? Are you a pill-feeder?

Do you expect Health and Strength in tabloid form—through pills, potions and other exploited piffling? You can't do it; it can't be done.

The only way to be well is to build up your body—all of it, through nature's methods—not by pampering the stomach. It is not fate that is making you a failure; it's that poor emaciated body of yours; your half sickness shows plain in your face and the world loves healthy people. So be HEALTHY—STRONG—VITAL. That's living. Don't think too long; send three 2c stamps to cover mailing expenses of my book "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy," written by the strongest physical instructor in the world.

Simple Rules of Drawing

Easily Learned at Home

Become an Artist

If you have ever wanted to become an artist here is the opportunity that you have been waiting for! We have brought the principles of drawing right down to fundamentals. Through our wonderfully simple home study course in art hundreds of men and women have become high salaried artists. And so can you! A few hours a week of study is all that is required.

Wonderful New Method

This amazingly simple method makes it possible for anyone to learn illustrating, designing or cartooning. All superfluous technique and dry theory is omitted. You enjoy studying—it's actually fascinating! In a few weeks you should be drawing pictures that you can sell—pictures that you never before thought could come from your pencil. You will be astounded at your own rapid progress! Many of our students have gotten as high as $75 for a single drawing even before they finished the course. Get into this field of big opportunities! No profession is more fascinating or better paying.

Hundreds of Trained Artists Needed

Never before have artists been in such big demand as they are right now—today. Magazines and newspapers cannot get enough of good cartoons. Designers are at a premium. Business concerns are actually bidding against each other for the services of men and women to handle their art work. Everywhere there is a crying scarcity of trained artists. There are hundreds of vacancies in all parts of the country. Follow the footsteps of our successful graduates and students! Many of them are now making from $75 to $250 a week. You can do as well! A little study in your leisure moments each day is all that is necessary.

"How to Become an Artist"—FREE!

Write for this wonderfully interesting book at once! It explains in detail our wonderful new method of teaching, and contains many interesting stories of our students, telling of their remarkable progress. Your complexion tells a story to the world

HOW fearlessly, how confidently, the girl with a fresh, soft, lovely skin meets the eyes of the world! Nothing to conceal! For almost always a clear, radiant complexion is an indication of a buoyant, well poised nature, healthful living and fastidious habits.

Nothing so quickly creates an impression of your personality as your skin. By keeping it soft, clear, radiant—you can make it speak instantly, unmistakably of fastidious freshness and charm.

Don't let your skin tell a story of neglect or thoughtless habits. Even if through the wrong kind of treatment your complexion has lost the smoothness and freshness it should have, you can give it back the color and clearness that make other girls' complexions so attractive.

For your skin is constantly changing. Each day old skin dies and new skin takes its place. And you will find that this new skin, if given the care its particular need demands, will respond instantly and gratifyingly.

Perhaps you suffer from that embarrassing fault of so many complexions—an oily skin, and a nose that will get shiny. To correct this excessive oiliness use this special treatment:

Every night with warm water work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap in your hands. Apply it to your face and rub it into the pores thoroughly—always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with warm water, then with cold—the colder the better. If possible, rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

Use this treatment regularly every night, and see what an improvement it gradually makes in your appearance—how much firmer and drier your skin becomes under this care.

Special treatments for every type of skin

This is only one of the famous Woodbury treatments for improving the skin. Get the booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap and use the treatment for your individual type of skin.

Woodbury's Facial Soap is sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada. Get a cake today—begin your treatment tonight. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, or for general cleansing use.

"Your treatment for one week"

Send 25 cents for a dainty miniature set of Woodbury's skin preparations containing your complete Woodbury treatment for one week.

You will find, first the little booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," then a trial-size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap—enough for seven nights of any treatment; a sample tube of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream; and samples of Woodbury's Cold Cream and Facial Powder. Write today for this special new Woodbury outfit. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 909 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 909 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

DOROTHY DALTON

HARRIETT HAMMOND

Mack Sennett, the Flo Ziegfeld of the screen, has no prize beauty of whom he is more proud than the blonde Harriett Hammond. Miss Hammond is an example of such unusual pulchritude, that the chains she wears across her shoulder are entirely unnecessary for the enslavement of her beholders.

MILDRED HARRIS CHAPLIN

Mildred Harris Chaplin is fast developing into one of the few real girl stars of filmdom. She completely subjugated the Prince of Wales when he recently visited California, and is one of the most popular of the shadow-players.

DORIS MAY

A star over-night is the past history of Doris May, the better-half of the Douglas MacLean-Doris May combination, which has so successfully ridden the top waves of popularity lately. Miss May is the kind of girl who makes you think, no matter how blasé you may be, that after all this old world has some things in it which are real all the way thru.

"Bessie, Love"

chaperon and perfect propriety were lurking in the immediate background.

I found Bessie Love in her dressing-room, fastening at the neck a suit cut in a girlish fashion with a bolero jacket and a skirt sufficiently tight for her to feel that it was restraining, for later, she pulled it up over her knees, with a laughingly apologetic "You dont care?" and sat tailor-fashion on the edge of a chaise-longue in one corner of the room.

She had just finished making some tests of costume and make-up for "The Old Curiosity Shop." She came towards the door, one hand holding in place the still unfastened blouse and the other extended in the customary greeting.

I was surprised that she should be so small; smaller by far than she looks to be on the screen. Her hair is dark yellow and very fine. You would notice her broad forehead and large,

HER name is Juanita Horton, but they call her Bessie, Love, just like that, as tho it were written with a comma. Or sometimes they pronounce it Bessie Love, as tho it were all one word, with the accent on the last syllable. But, however they may say it, they say it all. No one ever thinks of abbreviating it to Bessie.

She's Bessie, Love, to her father and mother, her aunts and uncles, and even her cousins, many of whom she has never seen.

If her name is to be abbreviated, they will tell you, let it be abbreviated to Love; "Miss Love" for strangers. One fancies that the masculine stranger, at least, must have an irresistible desire to take her hand and say, "Little girl, let me protect you," this in spite of capable-looking eyes that, most unmistakably, have strength of character behind them.

Bessie Love is not weak. Tiny, she is, delicate and appealing in appearance, but not weak. She makes you think almost irresistibly of Riley's "An Old Sweetheart of Mine"; not so much of any particular verse as of the entire poem and the spirit of it.

You will remember that in the beginning he spoke of spicing the good a trifle with a little dust of harm, and then in the end there proved not to be any harm at all? Bessie Love reminds one of that.

You can imagine her as being slightly unconventional, but you would also feel quite certain that a showed the traces of a make-up hastily removed, making her look, somehow or other, like a mischievous elf from a Maxfield Parrish picture.

"I believe," she said, "in, as nearly as possible, absolute realism when it comes to getting atmosphere for a picture. When we were making 'The Sawdust Ring,' I spent three weeks with a circus. The first few days I enjoyed, but after that I grew dreadfully tired. We were always on the go, moving all the time, and it wasn't very pleasant to get up and catch trains at any old hour of the night as a regular thing.

"And it was rather funny, too. I dreaded going, because I thought, in a vague way, the same thing of circus people that some from the outside seem to think of the people of the screen. Of course, when I mentioned this to professional friends, I was laughed at. They explained that there is more devotion to the family shown among circus people than in any other class, and I found it so. I grew to love some of the 'cooch' dancers . . . they were the dearest girls . . .

Miss Love was featured as a "Griffith find"; played opposite Bill Hart in her second picture, "The Aryan"; was with Douglas Fairbanks in her next two, "The Good-Bad Man" and "Reggie Mixes In"—and in her fifth picture, "Sister of Six," she became a star "And now we are going to London on location for the exteriors of 'The Old Curiosity Shop.' We'll probably have to come back here for the interiors; I've heard that the studios in England are impossible!"

Having spent almost her entire life in Los Angeles, Bessie Love has seen comparatively little of the world outside the Western city. But, unlike most professionals, she loves to write letters, and she has carried on an extensive correspondence with numerous friends, relatives, fans and exhibitors. She did not make her first visit to New York until she was an established star.

"But I found that I had friends, not only in New York, but all along the way," she said.

"Of course, most of them knew me very much better than I knew them . . . isn't it peculiar how well you grow to know people from just seeing them on the screen?"

"In connection with that, an exhibitor, visiting here, told me rather an amusing thing. He said that he had been showing Bill Hart's pictures in his theatre for so long that Bill Hart became to him the most familiar figure in the world. And then, several days ago, he came face to face with Bill in the lobby of the Alexandria.

"Do you know, I was absolutely offended with him for a moment because he hadn't recognized me," said this exhibitor.

YOU who saw "Humoresque" know with what understanding and sympathy Frank Borzage, the director, presented the "other half" of New York's Ghetto tenements. And no doubt you wondered just where Borzage obtained his singular insight into the real selves of the city's sordid cliff-dwellers.

The answer is simple. Borzage himself came up from poverty. One of fourteen children, his father a laborer, Borzage fought his way to success against seemingly insurmountable odds. He worked as a hod-carrier, he labored in a mine, he was a member of a railway grading gang, in turn. But all the time that something—that divine fire of ambition—was burning inside.

Let us return to the beginning: Borzage's father is Italian, his mother Swiss. He was born in Salt Lake City. At twelve,

Since the beginning of all things, the most powerful cry of humanity has been "of the people and for the people." Frank Borzage believes this fact to be the greatest force in the motion picture industry—and intends to devote all his energy to genre portrayals of the movies. necessity forced him to leave school and become one of the bread-winners of the large and struggling family.

The lad's first labors centered around a building gang, for he worked with his father. Then he became a worker in the Silver King mine. All the time he had one thing in mind—he wanted to be an actor! Just where he gained this idea is one of those inexplicable twists of humanity.

The future of Frank Borzage will be a matter of distinct interest to the world of the cinema. "I intend to do stories of the people," he says. "I know the folk who go to motion pictures are interested most of all in the problems, the joys and the sorrows of their own daily life, and I hope to bring to the films a reflection of all this"

The Menace of the Movies

Is a great Wall Street colossus rearing itself in motion pictures—a colossus that will be blind to progress, initiative and all that is artistic? So believes Whitman Bennett, now an independent photoplay producer, but for years a foremost cog in that huge film machine, the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation.

Believing this, Mr. Bennett has withdrawn from the citadel and cast his fortunes with the independents. His reasons form a vastly illuminating glimpse into the modern making of the silent drama.

"The making of motion pictures is rapidly reaching the point where it will be dominated by one organization, just as the theatrical world was once held in the hands of Klaw and Erlanger, Charles Frohman and other leaders of the 'Syndicate.' As yet this film organization constitutes no out-and-out menace to photoplay progress. Remember that the old stage syndicate did not begin to obstruct dramatic progress until it absolutely controlled the country's theaters. Then its greed asserted itself.

"I believe this motion picture combine will number the Famous Players, Goldwyn and Metro forces. I do not place the blame on any of the leaders of these companies, such as Richard Rowland or Jesse Lasky, whom I highly re-

"The making of motion pictures is rapidly reaching the point where it will be dominated by one organization, just as the theatrical world was once held in the hands of Klaw and Erlanger, Charles Frohman and other leaders of the 'Syndicate,'" says Whitman Bennett who has cast his fortunes with the independent producers. spect. But Wall Street interests have been slowly seeping in and acquiring control.

"Wall Street is always a little slow. Remember that it was the film pioneers who went out and secured the money to bring pictures to their present level. They worked up the credit and hacking. Then Wall Street began to take notice, to study the business and to 'get in.' Right now I believe the opinion in the Street is that 'the motion picture business is cooked and ready to eat.'

"Wall Street capital has never been necessary. Enough money passes thru the country's box-offices to support the industry, if properly handled. Extravagance, mismanagement and business errors, coupled with over-ambition, have brought Wall Street into the field. The result is that the men who fought all these years for the best in pictures are being crowded out. Affiliations of and interests of Kuhn Loeb, the Morgans and the Duponts will control the photoplay.

"The outcome is self-evident. It is the difference between the showman and the speculator. Money interests are out to get the most out of the business with an outlay held to minimum. What does Wall Street care for art—for the progress of the photoplay?

"The screen, like the stage, is a segregated artistic business. It has never and it can never thrive commercialized. You cannot take your audience behind the scenes and let it see the wheels working and still be successful.

The Joyous Pagan

THE blonde pagan! It sounds like one of Berta Ruck's novels or a Universal picture, but in reality it's a description of Josephine Hill. For that tiny person, eighteen in years but eighty in wisdom, has evolved a philosophy and a religion all her own. It first manifested itself to me in the tip-tiltedness of Josephine's nose, which caught my attention immediately upon our meeting.

"But it was just good luck that I had that kind of a nose!" declared Josephine—and thereby hangs a tale—the tale of the aforementioned philosophy.

Upon a pedestal in a corner of the room reposed a curious carving. It was a small idol, apparently, a cross between a Billiken and a Buddha, hewn from ivory. And when my eyes were not engaged with Josephine's nose, they were hovering about that strange image. She noticed it, of course, and her mouth crinkled up into a delighted little smile.

"That," she explained, "is Korsukan, my god of luck. Every morning when I get up and every evening before I go to bed, I bow before him! Isn't that funny?" She giggled at her own caprice—and yet, was it a caprice? As I learned more of this strange god, I began to suspect that his solitary worshiper had discovered a page from the Book of Wisdom.

But I had not come to discuss newborn philosophies; rather to unearth the life story of this new light in the cinema heavens. Her marriage with Jack Perrin, the Universal star, was the talk of the day. I could scarcely believe that the tiny girl before me was a wife.

"But now, I suppose, you bow before a greater power—the god Husband?" I suggested.

"Indeed, I do not!" Her eyes widened indignantly. "We've been married only three days, and he has left me already!"

"Oh!" I began to suspect that I had said something unfortunate.

"But I can't really blame him," she continued hastily. "It's the awful company he's in!" There was a distinct break in her voice. I mentally belabored myself for having ventured into matrimonial subjects and prayed for a return to safe ground.

"They've sent him on location way off in the mountains!" she finished.

I gasped with relief and hurriedly switched the conversation back to Korsukan, the god of luck.

"Long ago, when I was a very little girl indeed," she replied in answer to my questions, "mother used to tell me that there was a little fairy named Korsukan, who would always help me out of difficulties if I would only repeat his name to myself a number of times—Kors-u-kan, Kors-u-kan—course-you-can. Do you see? And I always found that if I said Korsukan enough, I always could!"

"But the image itself?" I inquired. "Where did that come from?"

"Oh, I had that made when I found that Korsukan came thru every time. It was the decent thing to do, don't you think?" She looked at me rather anxiously.

I nodded gravely.

"And when it came time for me to make my own living, I found that my little god was quite as faithful as ever. For a long time I traveled with father and mother on the vaudeville circuits, doing baby rôles. But when I got big"—she flushed a little when she saw me glance at her feet; they barely touched the floor as she sat in the big rocking-chair—"I wanted to go by myself. Mother was a little worried by the idea. I think she was afraid I couldn't succeed. But I just said Korsukan over and over and went to see Gus Edwards. He was very nice to Josephine Hill has a remarkable philosophy all her own, in which a tiny idol, a cross between a Billiken and a Buddha, figures rather prominently. me, and when I left I had been engaged to play a part in his famous 'School-days' troupe! I played with him for many months and finally, when Lila Lee left to enter the movies, I took her part, that of 'Cuddles.' It was lots of fun." She smiled happily at the memory.

"But how did you happen to enter pictures?" I asked.

"Oh, I got to thinking about it when Lila left. And when things turned out so nicely for her I felt even more eager to try it. I felt kind of doubtful inside, but Korsukan said yes.

"The first man I went to see was Edgar Lewis. He was looking for a leading lady for 'Love and the Law.' I determined to hit high and so I walked in and asked for the part. When I saw all the other girls who were there, I felt a little weak, but that darned heathen god kept insisting. I put up a good argument and when the afternoon was over, all were eliminated but myself and one other. The only great difference between us was the fact that her nose was Grecian while mine was 'pug.' Mr. Lewis couldn't make up his mind, so he called his wife. For some reason, she came out strong for the pug. So you see, I won by a nose."

Mrs. Lewis was speedily justified in her choice. Josephine outdid herself. But she was still in the East when the picture was completed, and California, the movie center, was three thousand miles away. So she declined all offers, packed her bag, and in two weeks was searching for a home in Hollywood. She was engaged by Universal and for a time played two-reel Westerns opposite Neal Burns, and later Jack Perrin. She built up an enormous following among the cowboys and ranchers. (Continued on page

Miss Hill's recent marriage with Jack Perrin, the Universal star, was the talk of the day. It was extremely difficult for ye interviewer to believe that the tiny girl on the chair, her feet escaping the floor by a space of several inches, was a wife. Just to the left, you will not fail to notice that our heroine is a real fisherman in every sense of the word, tho we wonder what sort of fish she can hope to catch in this exact spot, unless it be a mud turtle!

represents the spirit of eternal Youth, he has taken on the way of a man.

We who recall his splendid work in "Tom Sawyer," with its roguishness and whimsical charm, fervently hope this boyish quality will ever abide with him.

"That was a great story," he remarked, when he spoke of it. "I became so attached to Tom that I was downright sorry when it was finished. I think that it will be refilmed every ten years, for it will always delight because of its youthful experiences. I only hope that the next Tom Sawyer will enjoy

WE were all there, Mary Pickford, Mrs. Pickford, Jack Pickford and myself. Now, I thought, this will be a fine time to interview Jack, for he is very diffident when it comes to talking about himself and has a clever way of side-stepping questions, but, with his mother and sister present there would be little chance for this.

Now, the most noticeable characteristic of this young actor is his contagious laugh.

Beginning deep in his throat as a chuckle, it ripplingly ascends the scale, striking each jolly tone, and I am willing to wager that no one could possibly resist its boyish merriment. His speaking voice is unusually soft, with a little drawl suggestive of the South. However, he was born far from the Mason and Dixon line, away up in Toronto, Canada.

Jack is the baby of the Pickford family, Mary being three years his senior, Lottie two. He was less than a year old when his father died, and he followed his sisters onto the stage as soon as he could walk.

Admitting that the process of growing up requires some time, there is frequently one year when the transition seems very marked and the boy suddenly becomes a man. Jack Pickford has just passed thru this kind of a year and, tho he still kid, so I threw myself into the work and had all the fun I could to make up for what I had missed."

Jack's career in motion pictures began at the age of twelve, when he trotted along with sister Mary into the old Biograph studio in New York and stood around, solemn-eyed, hoping some one would notice him. Of course, in those days there were few rôles for him, and he became general utility man of the company, playing messenger and news-boy and helping out in all the "mob" scenes. During his years before the camera he has played with most of the film luminaries. He was with Marguerite Clark in her first picture, "Wildflower," and again in "Little Sister of José."

He played with his famous sister in "Fanchon, the Cricket," and cheerfully remarked that, "Mary and I stage a real rough-and-tumble fight in that picture, and we didn't stop when the camera did, either, but went right on, rolling over and over down the hill until we landed in a nice little stream. Do you remember that, Mecca de Shush?" he asked, using his own little pet name for Mary.

"Do I?" echoed Mary, with emphasis, and sister and brother laughed gaily at the recollection.

It was in "Little Peppina," as Miss Pickford's foster-brother, and as her brother in "The Girl of Yesterday," that Jack had his first important rôles.

Then came that series of youthful romances in which he and dainty Louise Huff won all hearts as they rollicked thru film after film. Now he is no longer rated as Mary Pickford's clever brother, for he has signed with the Goldwyn Company and is being starred in the boyish sort of stories in which he excels.

"We've just finished a corking picture, 'Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come,'" Jack told us. "In the beginning I am a crude mountain boy, and you know how I always like those rôles. The story covers a period of about ten years and so furnishes a lot of variety and contrasts, and we had some mighty interesting scenes. Gee, I thought we would never finish up! You wouldn't believe so many things could happen

They mean something. They are intended to mean something. There is thought back of them; there is care put into them. They have a definite mission, a definite fulfilment to attain, and from them stabilities take shape and form, and dreams are spun . . .

Lucy Cotton, if I may employ the simile, is a conscious product. Her rise into recognition and acclaim has not been mere haphazard chance, brought about by some lucky turn of the wheel, by her pretty face, by a box of tricks. She is the conscious product not only of her own careful work and play, but also of her mother's hopes and plans and the wise execution of both of these. Lucy Cotton and her mother have been building ever since Lucy, very tiny, pirouetted before a mirror in a manner that, tho the forecast was long, suggested to her discerning mother an atmosphere of footlights and Cooper-Hewitts . . . since there were no Cooper-Hewitts, we will ascribe that to interviewer's license. To really know and appreciate Lucy Cotton and

I wish that I might, with some authoritative marshalling of facts, give the contra-distinctive values of silk as silk and cotton as cotton, the better to illustrate the great descriptive value of my title. Not, however, being scientifically informed beyond the rather general, third-grammar-grade knowledge that cotton grows in the Southland and is picturesquely picked by hand by transplanted Africans, and that silk is fearfully and wonderfully spun by delicate and specially nurtured worms, I must be content to repeat that I employ the title illustratively, I might say symbolically, because I think of silk as something lustrous and smooth, something resilient yet firm, exquisitely fine, pleasing to the eye, to the touch, to the general sensibilities, something with a super-elegance. And of cotton as the firmer texture, the durability making the delicate resilience possible, the sturdiness and substantiality without which the bloom of super-elegance is but evanescent, not really lasting nor worth the having, a more basic quality . . .

Perfectly, to my mind, does this contrasting title describe to me Lucy Cotton, within whose slender, equipoised person the contrast becomes at once a blend, subtle, yet firmly knit.

Cotton and silk are conscious products. They are the results of growth, of tending, of a planned and ordered development.

what she has done, is doing, hopes to do, you would have to know Lucy Cotton's mother. You would have to talk with her mother. If you gained nothing more—and what you didn't gain would quite certainly be your own lack—you would come away with a wider conception of the possibilities of motherhood than the one, wide enough at its least, we think of in the everyday.

"Lucy," her mother told me, over caviar sandwiches and coffee in a remote corner of the Biltmore, "is the projection of my early thoughts and desires. I have always been interested in the stage and, before I was married, had my own personal aspirations in that direction, but those were the days of implicit filial obedience and my father's mandate to the contrary was final to me. When I married, however, I determined that if ever I had a daughter who showed the slightest inclination for dramatic work, everything possible should be done to cultivate and to develop that tendency, and so when my three little girls came along and Lucy, particularly, began to give little hints in her unconscious way, I began at once a consistent preparation.

"I tried, first of all, to instil into her, into all of them, the miracle of self-development, that which comes from within. The balanced, poised, full expression of the individuality."

Lucy interpolated softly, "And there is nothing so wonderful," she said, "as to feel yourself growing, day by day, broadening, learning, fulfilling yourself. Of course, some day, I hope to marry, to have children of my own. I think every real woman does—that is a part, a great part of the development of the whole. But for the present I want just self-expression, the best that I can give. I want to perfect in so far as perfection is possible this stage of me before I pass on to the next."

Lucy's mother took up the thread, in her grey eyes a whimsical reminiscence, tender yet not devoid of humor. "I tried to bring them up in a world of poetry," she said. "I read to them a great deal—Longfellow, all of the poets, fairy-tales, myths and legends.

I tried to have them live a life of the imagination, a sort of mental fairyland, seeing the beautiful in all things, believing in the beautiful in all things. Just by way of illustration, I recall an amusing little incident that occurred when all three children had the measles. A caller came one afternoon and Lucy was left with her alone in the drawing-room while I was momentarily called away. When I returned I found the caller removing traces of recent mirth. Lucy had informed her, she told me between gasps, that the little red spots on her face and hands and other visible portions were 'red flowers growing on me.'

"We lived in Houston, Texas, you know—Lucy was born there—and, of course, she went to school, dancing school, studied music, did all the usual things a little girl does do. Later she studied for the stage under Alma McDowell, and then, when we felt that Houston had no more to offer us in the way of advantages for advancement, we gave up our home there and came to New York. Here, Lucy studied under Theodora Ursula Ervine at Carnegie Hall and then began to have her practical experience, the stage itself." 'Most everybody knows about Lucy Cotton and, logical consequence, 'most everybody knows what she has done.

"One of the things I love most to do," Lucy said to me, in her effective, delicately modulated tones, "is to give credit to everyone who has helped me on my way. I never forget any one of them or any one of the things they do for me. Everyone has

Miss Edwards, by the way, has written, among other songs, 'God Bless You, My Dear,' sung by De Luca . . . and after that it has just been a series, one thing after another, not just from my coming to New York, but from the beginning—the beginning of mother's planning and my working—and I have worked. The first night I took Ina Claire's part in 'The Quaker Girl,' for instance, so many people asked me if I suffered very much from stage-fright. I hadn't a vestige of it. I was prepared, you see. That is what training, self-development, conscious preparation does for one, for anyone. I believe it was the happiest night of my whole life. I just felt that here, at last, I was doing the thing I had been born to do, the thing I had worked and planned to do, and I was glad. One isn't frightened when one is as happy as I was then.

"And I am happy in pictures—I have been fortunate in being cast happily. I love to give the touch of poetry, half illusion and half fact. The atmosphere of great loves and

Myron Selznick Is Just Twenty-One

MYRON SELZNICK is just twenty-one. Which makes him by long odds the youngest magnate in the screen world.

While other young men of his age are freshmen and sophomores at college, with their business début some years ahead, Selznick is guiding every detail of the destinies of a big producing organization, which, incidentally, he created himself.

Because the young Mr. Selznick is a son of Lewis J. Selznick, it is commonly assumed that he is but a juvenile figurehead for his father. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Myron Selznick really directs every item of the production of Selznick Pictures. In other words, the making of Olive Thomas, Elaine Hammerstein, Louise Huff, William Faversham, Eugene O'Brien and Owen Moore productions. "And I am going to take on two or three more stars this year," he adds.

It is interesting to note the daily routine of the youthful Myron Selznick.

The World and His Wife

By FAITH SERVICE

Fictionized from the Cosmopolitan
Photoplay

THE World and his Wife must talk. There is no help for it. What is more, when they have exhausted fact, they will dip into fiction, and he who listens may profit more or less, but just so long as there is talk, just so long are there ears to receive the talk . . . and so it goes . . .

When Feodora became betrothed to Don Julian of Seville, the World told his Wife that it was a "money match." Don Julian is too old, the tongues tattled, too old for the beautiful Feodora. She should have a lover young as a sickle moon, and slender, with a guitar in his hand and songs upon his mouth. Feodora is making a mistake. She is not following the dictates of her maiden heart. No good will come of it. His Wife echoed back the World's gossip. No good will come of it, she predicted. She might have added, "So let us keep on talking, Don World, and see what may be seen."

As usual, the World and his Wife were wrong. Long, long before Don Julian told the beautiful Feodora of his love for her she had entertained a high and holy passion for him. The dreams she had dreamed . . . the prayers she had offered up . . . the beads she had told . . . watching, many times, his tall figure riding past the courtyard of her home. She had never dared to think that he would turn the eye of his fancy upon her.

It had been a rather beautiful love, tender, deep, or would have been if the World and his Wife had quieted their tongues and let the matter rest.

It began with an act of humanity on the part of Don Julian. Don Seville had been his oldest and dearest friend. When he came to die, some few months after the marriage of Julian and Feodora, he begged Don Julian to keep an eye on his only son, Ernesto. "He shall come to us," Julian promised: "you need have no fear for his future, I give you my oath."

Ernesto came to live at the Casa Granda. At first he was deep in the dregs of his sorrow for the father who had been more than father to him. In his sorrow Feodora ministered to him, for his sake, but more for Don Julian's, who implored her to give the boy her tenderness for his wound's sake. After that she continued her talks and walks with him, her rides and moonlight strolls, because he told her of a vast book world in which he had moved and had his being since first he could remember anything, and Feodora, avid, but not overly informed, drank in the strange atmospheres, the enchanted places and peoples, and seemed to expand with the far-off perfumes, the vibrations of other hearts. Don Julian, watching, was, at first, content. He loved Feodora with the love that was content to have her have the desires of her heart. He perceived that it was not Ernesto to whom she listened, but the things of which he told her.

And he knew, or thought he knew, that Feodora loved him. If, now and then, it came to him that Feodora and Ernesto were mutually young, that their blood beat dizzily in their veins, while his, Don Julian's, was slowing down, he remembered, too, the vows Feodora had made him on their wedding morn, the passion in her voice, the pulses in her lips. Such things do not lie. Facts might speak, but the instinct of a plained of headache and did not go for his usual ride. It seemed to him, then, that the tracing forefinger of Feodora lingered overlong on the difficult page, until that of Ernesto came to meet it. When, later, they strolled away together, he thought their shoulders touched and did not pull away, and it hurt him, for the first time, that they did not insist, demand that he accompany them. He seemed to himself, too, to be cumbersome and ungainly. The slim height of Ernesto gave him an unaccountable pang. He was a dotard! Listening to the paltry suspicions of his brother and his wife, who had never had, nor ever would, anything better to spread than slander. Ernesto was his father's son, the sword blade, cleanly kept, of honor. And Feodora . . . why, Feodora was . . . Don Julian leaned back and closed his eyes against the piercing sweetness of what Feodora was lover should go deeper, know more truly, sense more fully.

If the World and his Wife had maintained the dignified silence they should have maintained, the sand of Seville might not have been streaked with tragic blood and bruised hopes and sorrows. Don Julian might still be—but this is going ahead of my story.

The World did begin to talk. At first in a whisper, then, louder and louder, until the echoes came close to the little circle in which Don Julian and Feodora and Ernesto so peacefully and un harmfully moved.

The World began first in the persons of Don Severo and his wife, Mercedes, living in a distant town. They heard of Ernesto's presence in their brother's home, and they had very little else to do or to think about . . . They paid him a visit, and watched Ernesto and Feodora, deep in some legend they had come upon together, the dark heads close bent, the forefinger of the girl tracing out the magic, all but indecipherable words for the eager, dark eyes of the man.

"It is bad, Julian," Severo said, and shook his head.

"You have forgotten your youth. Don Julian," the Doña Mercedes sighed; "you are blinding your eyes and closing your ears."

Julian shook his head impatiently. "You are both absurd," he said; "they are bookworms, the pair of them. They take pleasure in talking together, in poring over books, in arguing abstract subjects I have long since forgotten. What harm in that, can you say?"

"The questions are abstract, my dear brother," Severo made reply, "but those young heads . . . those warm hands, all but touching, those soft lips lingering over enchanted syllables . . . ah, Julian, Julian, how you have lost sense of the call of the blood! You . . . sly one . . . who knew it, once, so well . . ."

That was the beginning.

The next day, while the pair were reading, Don Julian comto him, the vivid flower of his heart . . .

But after that Don Julian went no more to ride when the afternoon readings took place, and when Ernesto and Feodora rode or walked he did not wave them jovial farewell, but watched them, thru wistful, half shut eyes. They wore their mantles of innocence securely or shame would have made them see the pain his heart was nurturing.

The riper beginning came when Don Alvarez, a supposed friend of the three, remarked to Don Julian one afternoon at their club that he had seen Ernesto and Feodora riding in the morning. "These young people," he said, with a sneer, "ride solitary paths, it seems to me, and linger overlong, Don Julian, for friends on literary pilgrimages bent."

It may have been the way he felt, but on the way home it seemed to Don Julian that Ernesto was no longer his young friend, his father's son and their good comrade, but the venomous enemy that lay ready to snatch from him the flower of his heart. Youth spoke to him with its many beguiling tongues. He had been a blind fool . . . solitary paths . . . dalliance . . . what flowers had they picked, those twain, on what sequestered paths . . . who knew?

When he had reached the house his rage and fear and roused suspicion had all but consumed him. It was not tempered by sight of Ernesto playing a guitar, lazily, while Feodora lay at full length in a hammock and hummed a low, accompanying tune. They loved, he told himself, insanely; they loved, the young two of them, and he, Julian, was left outside, barred away from them, alone and cold . . . With his temples hammering and his tongue twice its habitual size, he told Ernesto that he was a wife robber, a snake in the grass, a knife in the back, a menace, a curse. "I give you my trust," he snarled, beside himself at sight of the bewildered young faces; "I give you my trust, a sacred thing between man and man, and that is not enough for you . . . you take my wife, too. Steal her—thief! Low-down, damnable thief!"

"Julian!" Feodora's voice was anguished, shocked, too, incredulous, but Julian did not, would not hear that . . .

You lie, Don Julian," Ernesto said, "and I think you know it. I think you will know it when those red mists of other tongues have passed away. You were my father's friend. You have been, until this hour, my good friend. You are an older man. The least and the most I can do for you, Don Julian, is to leave this country."

If the wagging tongue of the World had given Ernesto time to make good his departure, the ensuing events would be embryonic happenings, but one of the essentials of tongue-wagging is the amazing inopportuneness with which it operates. Ernesto was dining alone at his club. Like most keenly sensitive, imaginative persons, he was suffering, not so much at thought of separation from Feodora as at the injustice dealt him by his life-long friend. Far, so far that no malice could be imputed, beneath all other thoughts, Feodora's darkly lovely face kept recurring to him as it had never recurred to him before. A melancholy seeped thru him and his eyes burned with unshed tears. It was strange to him, the whole of it. Feodora . . . why, it was absurd. And yet, these recurrences of her image . . . the tones of her voice . . . the sudden and somehow stinging memory of her ineffably tender palm laid on his arm . . . memories . . . how infinitely are they more potent to disturb than facts! For memories are numbered not among the quick, but among the dead . . . who, being dead, still live . . .

"The melancholy lover broods alone." At first Ernesto did not hear the mocking voice nor so much as sense the fact that Don Alvarez was addressing himself to him. A little later, and with infinite implication, it was repeated. "The melancholy lover broods alone . . ."

The blood pounded in Ernesto's head. Don Julian was one matter . . . he had housed him and fed him and his suspicions were not without their basis in a possible suffering. But Don Alvarez, knowing nothing, caring less, spattering his noisome mud on the spotless robes of Feodora . . . the image of her face shone brightly before him, and he did not know what he had done when he had knocked Don Alvarez down and challenged him to a duel.

The duel would be a fatal one to Ernesto. The solitary scholar and poet had no more chance than a wisp of straw before the adroitness, the skilled professionalism of Don Alvarez. It would have been laughable had not the matters of life and death been the stakes. "It is sheer murder," said friends of Ernesto. And even the followers of Alvarez showed their teeth and shook their heads, and some made the sign of the cross. "He was full of promise," they said of Ernesto.

The red mists may have cleared away, or Julian may have realized that the impending duel meant that Ernesto was defending the honor of his home, or it may have been merely a strong man's sense of the necessity of fair play. The motives that actuate the great deeds of man and men are obscurely conceived. Julian gave no motive for deliberately insulting Don Alvarez and thus taking Ernesto's place in the duel.

To Feodora the two days seemed to be a mist, a sea of blood thru which she, unwitting cause, walked sickishly, dizzily. This duel between Don Julian and Don Alvarez could prove to watching Seville but one thing—a fundament of truth in the talk about her friendship for Ernesto.

The motives that actuate the great deeds of man and men are obscurely conceived. Julian gave no motive for deliberately insulting Don Alvarez and thus taking Ernesto's place in the duel

If he could only go, take his far trip before the duel. If, after the affair were settled, Ernesto were gone, the gape might soon be healed, things might then go on as tho this storm had never been. People would forget, with the spur to their remembering gone. Gone . . . the word hit, unawares, on her consciousness and stayed there, and chilled her . . . She shook it off. She had become used to Ernesto, to their talks and walks, to his way of doing things, to the worlds he had opened up for her mental and imaginative exploration. And still, gone . . .

If she could only see him, beg him to flee the place, leave it all as it had been . . .

There was no other motive in her seeking him out in his rooms and making her plea. "For all of us," she said. His somber eyes had somehow warned her against the more personal "for me." There were plans to make . . . and they had had, always, so much to say to one another. There had probably, they had often remarked, never been two persons with so great a mental fund, the one for the other. When they were together, time fled by them, noiselessly, unheeded. It was so on this day. They had been sitting in separate corners of the room. Ernesto was telling of what his new life would probably be in South America, the readjustments he would have to make, the way in which he would make them. He spoke of the severance of ties, the tug at the heart because of the association of places and people. There had been nothing said of the Thee and Me. Into this scene Don Julian was carried, all but mortally wounded. Don Alvarez was dead.

There was a horrible scene enacted in the dim room, the first shades of night dropping down on the colorful city without, the hush of night stealing on, the three white-faced, hurt people in the laden room.

Julian had seen with his own eyes. He needed, he said, no further proof than this. Feodora, in Ernesto's rooms. Lovers . . . while he, her husband, had been defending the honor of the twain of them with his own life. It was a grim jest, he said. It came of a man with the flush of youth gone playing the fool of love. The velvet fingers of the heart were powerful to strangulation. He had waited all this time to gather the vivid flower that was piercing him to death with hidden thorns. The bitterness of his pain and hurt poured out upon them in a venomous flood that could not be abated. Feodora knelt by him and wept over him and bathed his wounds with her tenderest ministrations. Ernesto forgot the pride of his manhood and outrage and pleaded with him. The World and his Wife had talked over-well. The seed of suspicion had grown until its fungous growth had conquered the man.

In the morning Ernesto came, for the last time, to the Casa. Don Julian was unable to see him and he asked for Feodora.

"There is only one thing for me to do, Feodora," he told her, "and that is to end the miserable life that has been the cause of the turmoil—my own."

Feodora cried out, "What good could that do? It would cause more heart-break! It would be an open admission of something so dreadful you had to die to cover it. Oh, Ernesto, I pray you, do not think of such a thing! The sunlight will come into this again, will come to us again. Julian will—"

What Julian willed was never known. There was a mad rush, as of some infuriated animal on the stairs, and Don Julian, red with his wounds and his rage, was upon them. The devastating names he called them, the anathema he hurled was but half heard. The blood he had outraged choked his throat and within an hour after the scene he was dead.

An hour later still Don Severo and the worthy Doña Mercedes had turned the offending pair out upon the streets.

"You are murderers," they denounced them, "and of what besides we will spare you the details. Let us see no more of you in my poor brother's home.

"From the beginning," they added, with a venom that increased and gained in momentum as it went along, "from the beginning of his mad, his idiotic infatuation for you, Doña Feodora, he was a lost soul, a gone man. We said among ourselves the day he married you that he was ending his life as a man. We knew that it is folly for a strong man such as he to give the greatness of himself to a girl with nothing but dreaming, the folly of dreaming in her eyes and entanglement in her hair. You were not a meet mate for such as he, who had arrived at the ripe time of life when love had ceased to be a toy and had become the sum and substance of his daily life.

"You were a cheat to him. You were a snare and a delusion. The first youth to come along with pretty words and nimble feet you fell for, as the young pale grass is mowed by the first slender sickle. We use the language your poet lover used. And from the day he came, my brother's death was set. We said it among ourselves. You used his love of you to blindfold him. You laughed into his eyes, but you sobbed against the breast of Ernesto—and sobs are more potent than laughter . . ."

"It . . . all this is not so . . ."

"Be still, popinjay! It is so. It is so much so that my brother's body lies chilling in that darkened room and outside this door is summer and sunlight—moonlight presently—and you—you and your lover are going forth to meet it. Just this much it is so, and what is more so? Tell me that. Out with you, out upon you . . . the infamous, cruel pair of you . . . and may love smite your hearts even as you have used it to smite his!"

The long hours of the night Feodora and Ernesto spent in wandering over the countryside, talking in the strained, hushed tones of the conspiracies of fate and

IT was Monday—indigo Monday. I had run out of gas on the way to the Rolin studio at Culver City, been browbeaten by a motor cop when I tried to make up for lost time and had been severely criticized by the studio watchman for parking my car in front of the gate. Therefore I wasn't in a fitting mood to interview Beatrice La Plante; I felt like asking the routine questions regarding age, disposition, favorite picture and leading man, and let it go at that, grouching my way homeward at twenty miles an hour to avoid further difficulties with the speed cop.

But, scarcely had I entered the confines of the studio when, from a long gallery above, came a throaty voice that spoke in clipped, childlike sentences, and down the staircase flashed a small figure bundled from head to foot in a crimson bathrobe. Two amazingly large brown eyes, a piquant nose and apple-red lips were framed by a fluff of bobbed hair, and before I could speak, two tiny hands had one of mine, and Beatrice was telling me, all in a breath—her English fascinatingly sprinkled with French cadences and idioms—that she was so glad I had come—would I come up to the dressing-room while she did her make-up?—Mon dieu! she was smothering in the bathrobe—had I seen her pictures with Hayakawa, and did I ever see such damhot weather?

I followed her up the stairs to her dressing-room, done in grey and blue. The indigo shade of the day had already given way to a lighter hue. I defy any-—n'est-ce pas??"

I said we would, and while I was thinking what I wanted to ask first, she forestalled me, talking with her lips, her eyebrows, her shoulders, and occasionally gesticulating with a stick of "fleshing" with which she was plastering her cheeks.

"You want to know am I French," she said positively. "Everyone ask that. But yes, I am born in Paris, in 1900, at eight o'clock in the morning—I do not remember about it, but they tell me I was there!" The audacious brown eyes dared me to dispute it.

"And in France I was not an actress. I was in school—and very strict school, too. I was not naughty Parisienne—until I came to America. People here like to think French girl as 'oo-la-la' kind—is it not?"

I admitted it mostly was, but Beatrice had plunged into her story once more, pausing now and then in the middle of a word to critically examine her make-up in the mirror, or to exchange the grease-paint stick for an eyebrow pencil.

She paused, eyebrow pencil suspended, almost ready to quote the unprintable word, then she thought better of it and began beading her eyelashes with and thought ponderously of the many mispronunciations of her inherited cognomen. Then William the Conqueror spoke boldly.

"Ann, you should have a name that people can remember and pronounce. I'm going to give you that name and"—looking about the scenery carefully for inspiration, then up at Bright Angel Trail, and the great trees silhouetted against the sapphire and amethyst veils far above them—"I herewith christen you 'Ann Forrest.'"

Eight years ago Ann was going to school in Denmark, her birthplace, and learning English and French rapidly. She speaks without accent, in deep alto tones, entrancing in quality. Visitors never can believe that the voice they hear from the distance belongs to a little girl like Ann.

When Mr. Kroman lost a fortune abroad, the family decided to emigrate as it was trying—in a country where caste rules strongly—to be half poor. The parents, with five children, came to Tacoma, Washington, and two and one half years ago, Ann began her screen career. She lost over eight months of that

By way of paradox, a wag of the studios nicknamed Ann Kroman "The Melancholy Dane," for when Ann weeps the work is so thoroly done that onlookers furtively fish for handkerchiefs.

Ann Forrest first became interested in pictures in her native city in Denmark, where old Broncho Billy pictures were shown. She would attend with her schoolmates, and often wished that she might act. Now her friends are all interested in her success

Tom Moore had a way of making Ann laugh just when she was supposed to be at her weepiest, but one day when I happened on to Stage 4 at Goldwyn, the little Danish girl had her revenge. She had withstood the engaging, genial Irish smile of Mr. Moore and, clasped in his arms, was doing her "scene" so thoroly that the sympathetic star forgot everything but Ann's seeming suffering, and the very next thing was a close-up of Tom Moore with big tears dribbling down his cheeks—a thing not written in the script at all!

Since that time, Tom Moore hasn't attempted to make Ann spoil rehearsals.

Oh, I forgot—you were wondering how Ann Kroman came to be named Ann Forrest, weren't you?

time, however, because of a wonderful visit in New York, sightseeing, studying pictures, going to theatrical performances, attending lectures and shopping until her eyes were dazzled with the splendors of Fifth Avenue.

Ann's eyes are deep baby blue—sparkling with the ice-crystals of her north country—remarkable eyes, always elusive and subtle in expression. She has a perfect snow-maiden complexion and uses no make-up off-stage and very little on. Her spun-gold hair is wavy, but she wails that it is a trifle darker since she came to sunny California, which with its alkali waters does have a tendency to change the shade. Mahlon Hamilton happened along while we chatted and said: "Ann, you're the first real blonde I have known. I never saw such baby-gold hair as yours before!"

Saucy, sparkling Ann, who speaks English so rapidly that one has difficulty in following her, laughed back with a flash of perfect teeth. "Yes—now! But I may have to come to the battle yet!" That little accent on "bottle" was about the only Scandinavian touch I had noticed.

Ann Forrest's family life is ideal. The parents are young still, having married at nineteen. Two of the boys were studying architecture when they were called to the great war, and served almost three years without injury. Now they are in the production end of the film industry, having decided that this would offer greater opportunities than the rather dull field of architecture in a country where bungalows are supreme.

One of Ann's sisters has a very lovely contralto voice, so Miss Forrest is paying for her musical education in Los Angeles. Later, Mabel will go to New York to study under the best masters. The third sister is a school-girl.

"We have the best times at home," said Miss Forrest. "At night, when we all assemble for dinner, we are a tremendously hungry family, for we are all healthy and young, including daddy and mother. We eat voraciously, almost silently for twenty minutes—for all of us have worked hard all day. Then some one begins to relate something—another follows—daddy draws us out, mother makes comments—and so

At first there seemed to be much difficulty about her getting a suitable story.

"No one wants to take too many chances on a new star," she said, "but still we felt that we had to have a good story—and good stories come high. At last, one night, when I couldn't sleep from worrying about it, a story came to me in complete continuity. Not just a scene, or a suggestion for a climax, which is the way stories have come to me before, but a perfect story; I could almost see the action, scene by scene, from beginning to end."

It was a godsend, she added, a sort of miracle. (Of course, that was inspiration.) Those who have read the story say that there are two feminine parts in it of almost equal strength and that the story is unusual as well as dramatic. (Who was it said that when an actor can write at all, he can write well?)

No, you would not call Kathleen Kirkham flighty, but you would not call her phlegmatic, either. As a matter of fact, she is a very feminine young artist, delighting in her work, but easily discouraged, for the moment, at any breath of adverse criticism, no matter from whom it comes.

Kathleen Kirkham is as clever a writer as she is an actress. She says that when she gets too old for pictures, which to her way of thinking is the age of thirty, she intends to make a profession of writing

"I think," she went on, "that I will take up writing as a profession as soon as I leave the screen." She has promised herself that she will leave the KATHLEEN KIRKHAM is securely anchored to the affairs of every-day life by a husband who is six feet two inches tall and every inch a business man.

This doesn't mean that Kathleen is overly inclined to flightiness. Far be it from me to suggest such a thing! There is about her an air of capability that you would notice the instant you met her. She is five feet eight inches tall, graceful, well-groomed. The sort of actress who would carefully plan her effects rather than leave them to the inspiration of the moment.

She thinks, and to some purpose. If all goes well she will be producing at the head of her own company before this appears in print. At this writing she is negotiating with two big distributing firms, neither of which I am at liberty to name.

screen when she is thirty years old. "But I don't know whether I could do it or not! Sometimes I think that I haven't the patience. I would rather write short stories than scenarios, and I know that I would never write a novel. It seems to me that I would have to dash off a story in a single night, not stopping until I had finished it, or I would never finish it at all. With stories running into four and five thousand words, as nearly all of them seem to, that would be difficult, to say the least!" she finished, with a laugh.

But I was telling you about her anchor.

The W. H. Woodruffs, as Kathleen Kirkham and her husband are spoken of in the society columns of the Los Angeles papers, live in a pretty, artistic eleven-room house on the outskirts of Los Angeles.

Kathleen Kirkham is very proud of her home, and well she may be. The only trouble is that they are situated directly between two aviation fields.

"I do hope,"

Kathleen has an anchor in the form of a six-foot-two husband. He is every inch a business man, and serves to keep Kathleen's fancy-loving soul on earth instead of in the dwelling-place of pink-tipped clouds to which it would otherwise fly said Kathleen Kirkham, "that some one will invent a muffler for aeroplanes soon! But that isn't the worst! You can never be sure that some reckless driver isn't going to come into your house by way of the roof."

With them are Kathleen's mother and father, the latter a successful artist and photographer, and the two children of a sister who is dead. "Herb"!

How do you say it in your language, cahnt or kant?"

It was the first thing thirteen-year-old Herbert Rawlinson asked of the first person he met when he landed in America. He learnt that it was kant and it's never been cahnt since.

His father was a Britisher. His mother very strikingly resembled the present Queen. He was born in England himself. And yet one does not come in contact with him without thinking—"A Yankee, thru and thru!" A whole-heartedness, youthful enthusiasm, sincere enthusiasm, definite enthusiasm—these mark at once his vibrant personality.

"Perhaps it's because I'm not a sentimentalist. I can't be, concerning England. It would be hypocritical. There really weren't any home ties."

And then he went on to tell me, in a straightforward manner, without superlatives or emotion influencing one way or the other, that there are two sisters whom he has never seen who are now in Australia; and a brother he can hardly recall; the governor had been a very busy real estate business man; and mother, whose head of close-cropped, mischievous ringlets had just been brought to mind, was never exceptionally robust. Of course, there was an attachment to the memory of "Clovevilly," (he began to sketch the outline on the cloth), a charming, ivy-

HER Grace the Grand Duchess Maria Louise sat at luncheon, a very small island totally surrounded by very large flunkies whose chests seemed made for the purpose of wearing gold braid. The picture of the Grand Duchess taken for Sunday supplements and souvenir post-cards showed her as a stately young person in eight yards of satin train and wearing a crown haughtily; but with the train laid away in camphor, and the crown at the imperial jeweler's for repairs, (she had flung it to the floor in a temper), the most noticeable thing about Her Grace at present was her scowl.

In one less exalted by birth, such a scowl would not have been remarkable, but Maria Louise had nothing to scowl about, as Jennings, the English governess, often pointed out in her maddeningly reasonable way. "Her Sublime Grace," Jennings would drone, "is most fortunate indeed.

Has she not lands, jewels, a summer and a winter palace and, above all—blood?" (It was positively gruesome how Jennings gloated over this item!) "And she has but to issue an order and it is fulfilled, if, of course, it is suited to Her Sublime Grace's royal position," the latter hurriedly added in view of the fact that Maria Louise's latest wish to have a hurdy-gurdy and its performer added to the court retinue, had most emphatically not been fulfilled.

To which her sublime charge had retorted most unroyally and concisely, "Piffle!" Despite all urging, she persisted in using English rather than her own tongue, because of its greater opportunity for picturesque expressions of this kind.

Now, the Grand Duchess, as we have said, sat at luncheon, and scowled over the dainty food served upon china of ethereal translucence, and drew small devils upon the priceless napery with the point of her restless fork. She looked gloomily at the wooden retainers, whose greatest pride was not to show the faintest symptom of being human; she looked about the great room, hung with tapestries, smothered in velvet and carved oak; she looked down at her plate, with the royal arms of Transmania stamped on it in gold, and—

"Oh, damn!" sighed the Duchess, drearily.

The shocked retainers pretended not to have heard this terrible lapse of royal decorum, but Jennings, at the farther end of the table, humbly below the salt, was so grieved that the tip of her bleak, spinstery nose became empurpled. "Oh, Your Grace!" she moaned. "Such an expression! In all my connections with the nobility—and they have not been few—I do

The Grand Duchess sat at luncheon and scowled. She looked gloomily at the wooden retainers, whose greatest pride was not to show the faintest symptom of being human not recall hearing such a phrase, altho His Exalted Highness, the Prince of Rutabagia, at moments of extreme irritation, used sometimes to remark, 'Tut! Tut!'

"Not strong enough," Maria Louise rebelled. "I'm not irritated, Jennings; I'm something much worse—I'm bored. Just think, out there," she flung out a reckless arm toward the window, "beyond that ten-foot wall, life is going on, and I'm not there to see it! Just because I happened to be born on the wrong side of that fence, I have to live with a lot of rusty armor and moth-eaten tapestries and never, never have any fun!"

"Fun—oh, Your Grace!" the governess spoke the plebeian word with loathing, folding her outraged lips tightly about her bluish-china teeth. "A Duchess must not desire fun; she must be above such common things; she must remember that her great-great-great-great-grandfather was a King!"

Maria Louise arose with what, in a less blue-blooded young woman, would have been called a pout, and passed out of the dining salon between rows of motionless footmen. She found a moment's amusement in wondering what would happen if she should suddenly shout "Boo!" at them; then grey lassitude de-looking indifferent, and the others were too far ahead to notice her defection. With a jerk Maria Louise swerved her disappearing mount aside into the by-path, running completely over the remonstrant shade of her great-great-great-grandfather, the King.

"Quick!" she panted, sliding to the ground and laying violent hands upon the bewildered owner of the donkey. "I want that donkey! I never rode on one before, and I'll never have a chance to again. Hold my horse, and if any one asks where I am, tell them I've run away."

Sheer amazement at her impudence led the donkey to carry the Grand Duchess some distance before he knew exactly what was going on, then he stopped. Stopped with such suddenness that the Duchess shot neatly over his head, reached wildly for his ears and missed them, and landed in a very unroyal position indeed, facing him, upon the ground. They regarded each other appraisingly. Maria Louise's chin grew grim. She arose laboriously. In the long line of her progenitors was one Knight Geoffrey of the Iron Will, who, it was legended, fought with a dragon and overcame. Knight Geoffrey looked out of her dark, defiant young eyes now, as stealthily she approached the donkey. "I'm going to ride you," she declared; "you cant do that to me again."

It was five minutes before this long-eared dragon knew that scended upon her. Listlessly she allowed her ladies-in-waiting to assist her into her riding habit, which, in spite of impeccable cut and tailoring, gave her slim little figure the appearance of a rather rowdyish boy; she allowed the First Groom of the Royal Stables to help her mount her staid horse, which was quite aware of his place as bearer of a Sublime Grace and moved with the circumspect self-consciousness of a steed on a stained glass window.

The retinue left the palace gates, turned down the Mall and entered the Royal Park. The rebellion smouldering under the black curls of the small Grand Duchess flared higher into seething flame. Always, every pleasant day since she was able to sit upon a horse, she had ridden at precisely the same hour along precisely the same dull, uninteresting avenue, to be stared at by owl-eyed tourists, clutching Baedekers and huzzaed by the populace with stereotyped cheers, like the chorus in a musical comedy. On either side small, wooded paths beckoned her imagination into the realms of romance and adventure, but, being a poor, unfortunate Grand Duchess, she must ride past them—

The thread of Maria Louise's ruminations broke off with a snap. Under the hanging branches of one of these by-paths she saw something that held her fascinated gaze—a small, knock-kneed donkey, ridden by a loutish youth whose long legs dragged upon the ground on either side. She cast a quick glance around, tugging on the reins—no, Gräfin Schmidt was engrossed in looking haughty, and Gräfin Oppe was occupied in it was overcome. In that time the Grand Duchess had assumed many odd positions, sometimes sitting facing his head, sometimes his tail, but she had hung on. Her hair was loosened from its royal braids, and hung about her crimson cheeks in little-girl tousles, her habit was torn and mud-splotted and her knees, when she descended from a thoroly licked little donkey, gave unexpectedly and wobbled her into a fallen tree-trunk, where she sat panting, laughing, gloriously alive, but she was happy.

"I wont go back—ever!" she cried, "or not for years and years, till I'm old and too tired to play. I'll——"

A howl of pain from around the bend of the path brought her back to reality; they had found her horse; they were beating the poor, clownish lout because he couldn't or wouldn't tell them where she had disappeared. Maria Louise rose, the smile slipping sidewise on lips that quivered, but she did not hesitate. "Noblesse oblige—drat noblesse!" she murmured, as she moved reluctantly back toward the old life she had escaped from for a few stolen moments. It was a muddy, bedraggled little figure who faced her retinue furiously, tossing her wild, dark hair from her flaming eyes, every one of her few inches a Grand Duchess.

"Stop! This instant, cowards! Or I'll have you flogged—flogged——"

They quailed before her red wrath, like serfs listening to their liege lord, and none of them—Maria Louise least of all—realized the absurdity of her words. Then, head held high despite the derby askew upon it, the small Duchess swung upon her horse and led her stricken retinue into the bridge path beside the Mall. Gräfin Schmidt no longer arranged her doughy features into an expression of hauteur; the Gräfin Oppe looked distinctly worried. Presently, as they passed a squad of American doughboys swinging hilariously along to the refrain. "Say, dorkies, have you seen de massa wif de mufstache on his face?" Gräfin Schmidt leaned toward her companion.

"Did you see him stare at Her Grace—the one in front?" she trembled. "Did you see him look at Her Sublime Highness precisely as tho she were a girl instead of royalty?"

"I saw," nodded Gräfin Oppe, her double chins agitated; "that is what democracy does! It destroys one's respect for one's betters!"

"See! He is saluting her! He touches his cap! He smiles—he actually smiles at Her Serenity!" The good Gräfin rocked in her saddle at the sight of such sacrilege. "And she—did you see her?"

"I saw," nodded her friend, dolorously. "The Grand Duchess is very young. He was not bad-looking, either, and he did not seem to know that the glance of a common soldier into the eyes of royalty is an insult. But what is the world coming to when such things may be?"

After the affair of the donkey, Maria Louise found herself more closely hedged in by ceremonies than before. Her Prime Minister, a stout man with a mighty mustache, at which he continually tugged, hinted that it was time to be considering the question of a husband for her, and brought her a portfolio of portraits of marriageable Dukes and Princes, varying from the stripling heir to the tiny kingdom of Monarcho, a chinless youth of seventeen with weak eyes and five wilted blond hairs upon his lip, to the thrice widowed old Duke of Prascovia, bald as a roc's egg and a great-grandfather.

"Any of these," he tugged, "would be a suitable consort for Her Gracious Grace. Her Sublimity is nearly eighteen; it is time for her to consider her—h'm—her duty to the state——"

But Maria Louise flung the portfolio furiously to the floor and stamped one small foot. "I will not grow up, do you hear," she stormed, "not until I have at least had a chance to be young! And as for a husband, when I marry"—and she colored gloriously—"it will be for love, and love only."

"Where did Her Grace get such plebeian notions?" despaired faithful Jennings. "Love! What has that to do with marriage for a Duchess? I am sure she never learned of such heresy from me!"

Sitting sullenly in her splendid chamber, the little Duchess felt as tho life were closing in on her relentlessly. Today she might defy them, tomorrow—but in the end they would have their way, for they had the past with them, and tradition, and what small white girl soul is brave enough to oppose these? Her heart beat madly; her breast rose on the swell of a cry, "I must have something to remember—afterwards,

The tale of how the Grand Duchess of Transmania, Hereditary Countess of Blatatski, had run away from her palace to play baseball with a dozen American doughboys, ran like quicksilver thru the courts of Europe and almost lifted the crowns from scandalized royal scalps. Another atrocity! Would the horrors of war never cease? What next?

makes his characters live. The old river man of Fred Turner, for instance, is a finely limned creation, so real that nowhere does it seem like acting. Florence Vidor appears but briefly, yet her moments with Mr. Turner are among the vital ones of "The Jack-Knife Man." There are photographic moments in the visualization that are veritable camera lyrics.

"Suds," (United Artists), Mary Pickford's newest screen vehicle, left us rather cold. It is a drab tragedy told largely in terms of Keystone comedy. Based upon a whimsical stage comedy, "Op o' Me Thumb," written by Frederick Fenn and Richard Bryce, it is a tragic story of a London laundry slavey—a pathetic little drudge who weaves a weird romance around a shirt left by a mysterious stranger. The tale lifts her to imaginary happiness—until the idealized stranger calls for his shirt. With her dream gone, the end of "Suds" finds the shabby little slavey sobbing out her heart on the laundry steps as the other workers hurry away upon a holiday.

This is one of two endings. The other—the happy dénouement—shows the slavey finding happiness in the love of a faithful laundry driver. We did not see this ending.

KING VIDOR has proved himself again. Mr. Vidor it was who startled the celluloid world somewhat over a year ago with his "The Turn in the Road," which, despite certain weaknesses, revealed its producer as possessing a singularly human touch. Being sure of his ability, we have waited for Mr. Vidor to do something bigger.

The bigger thing has occurred—Ellis Parker Butler's "The Jack-Knife Man," (First National). Here is a gently drawn little genre study, finely conceived and done with admirable workmanship and an excellently restrained sympathy.

Briefly, "The Jack-Knife Man" is simply the tale of two old men's love for a baby. One is a quaint old fellow living a solitary existence on an old river boat. The other is a derelict hobo. The baby is the daughter of a cast-off town girl removed by death from the sordid depths.

Oddly, there is a compelling grip to the fragile fabric of this story—to the little jealousies and hopes and dreams of the old men for the child as they drift aimlessly in their battered river-going haven. In the end, busybodies take the child away from them, but—

We will not relate the story, because we want you to see it with a fresh view-point. "The Jack-Knife Man" is worthy of your attention, for it belongs to the photoplay school of tomorrow. No pasteboard melodramatic characters, no machine-made plot development, no trite methods of screen telling are here. For Mr. Vidor—we are sure of this now—is just finding himself and before long he is going to turn out a big and human celluloid document. Indeed, "The Jack-Knife Man" in itself is a splendid thing.

Mr. Vidor touches the heart in scores of places. And he

At first glance, "Suds" might seem to be a grey and shadowy tragedy, but in reality it is told with broad slapstick humor. There is, for instance, an episode where the slavey takes an old cart-horse out of the rain up to her second-story tenement room. Aside from this, there are all sorts of comic incidents in the laundry basement.

Personally, we do not believe "Suds" will make the broad appeal of the more popular Mary Pickford vehicles. It runs too strongly in the single key of drab farce. Not that Miss Pickford does not give a very carefully drawn portrayal of the slavey. No other feminine star would hide herself beneath the fearful make-up of Amanda. And only once does she discard the dirt and grime of the laundry drudge, in the brief flashes of the slavey's imaginary romance built around the shirt. Nowhere, however, does she achieve the poignancy of her Pollyanna. We liked Harold Goodwin's playing of the slender rôle of the laundry driver.

Douglas Fairbanks topped any of his recent productions with the whirlwind, "The Mollycoddle." (United Artists). Here may be found thrills, adventure and a swiftly moving background. Richard Marshall starts off as a spineless individual—until he meets The Girl at Monte Carlo. By the time he has pursued her across the ocean as a stowaway and fought his way across the desert of the Southwest, he is as strenuous a hero as any maid could desire. The whole thing ends in a terrific fight in a Hopi cliff village. The hero leaps from a high ledge upon the villain in a tree, and the struggle continues as they drop, tier by tier, thru the adobe cliff huts until, on the crest of a landslide, they plunge into river rapids at the bottom. It is as startling a fight as you will ever see on the screen. And if there is a funnier scene than Doug's adventures in the villain's fish-house, we would like to observe it.

In a sentence, "The Mollycoddle" is a winner. Doug has turned out but two or three better comedy melodramas in his whole celluloid career.

After observing Dorothy Gish's "Remodeling Her Husband," (Paramount), we are confident that Lillian Gish could easily develop into a director of fine originality. This is the little comedy drama in which Miss Lillian directed her sister last winter.

It is the old, old opus of the bride who sets out to cure her hubby of his flirtatious tendencies. Of course, as soon as he feels that he is losing his wife, he repents—and things end in a reconciliation. There are dozens of touches in which one can recognize the delicate and gently lyric hand of Lillian Gish, such as the delicious moment where Dorothy, as the angry Jane Wakefield, hurries thru the park and demonstrates how she can attract masculine attention. Dorothy Gish lends her inimitable humor to the proceedings, but Lillian is the real star, even if she does not once appear on the silversheet.

Charles Ray gives another superbly human performance in "Homer Comes Home," (Paramount), another tale which would be conventional plus in any other hands. Once again he plays a country lad who goes to the city to

The Home Stretch!

LIKE a throng of eager spectators at the finish of a race, our readers crowd against the fence and anxiously await the outcome of the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920, which has been running in THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and SHADOWLAND for some time past. The contest closed on the first day of August, 1920, and every one interested in it—and that is saying thousands of people from coast to coast—await the decision of the judges with much anticipation.

The judges, consisting of Mary Pickford, Mme. Olga Christy, Thomas Ince, J. Stuart Blackton, Maurice Tourneur, Samuel Lumière, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, David Belasco, Blanche Bates and Eugene V. Brewster, will meet the honor roll members of the contest at the Long Island estate of Eugene V. Brewster and will watch the contestants while they are given a thoro camera test. The lucky winners will then be chosen, and, as soon after as possible, the announcement will be made in all three of our publications as to the outcome.

To the winners there will be given every opportunity to gain screen fame and fortune. They will immediately step into international fame by reason of the publicity given them in all of our publications. This will include interviews with the winners and pictures which will not only appear in our publications, but will also appear in all the leading newspapers and periodicals throughout the country. The winners will be launched on their careers under the most auspicious occasion possible.

Not only the winners of the contest, but the final honor roll members will be given an immediate opportunity to show how much screen talent they possess, for there is being produced in connection with the Fame and Fortune Contest a five-reel feature drama entitled "Love's Redemption." The story is one of the triumph of love over vice, and there seems no doubt of its being a dramatic success, for no expense is being spared in the production of this play. The cast will be one of unusual merit, including the following well-known people:

Octavia Handworth, the popular film player, who has recently been absent from the screen, has been engaged to play one of the leading rôles, and we are quite sure that her return to the silversheet will be an event of great interest to all film lovers.

This month's honor roll for THE CLASSIC is probably the most interesting one to date. As is usual in contests of this sort, the finale always brings in its wake a tremendous increase in the number of photographs sent in. It is doubly difficult to choose the right ones from so great a number, and it is only by great care and deliberate judgment that the honor roll winners are chosen. The lay-out will, we think, convince you that the judges are going to have some little difficulty in making their choice. The entries number among them some of the most beautiful girls in the whole country, and we feel assured that the final winners will interviewer would need go no further than Victor to take the measure of the man. Such being the case, let us consider the measure of Montagu Love taken and pass on to the next.

The "next" is the Bard of Avon, again (or yet) in the limelight. If his stones—I mean bones—he disturbed by such apparent flippancy, let him observe that in this day and age frail, flaunting poppies grow on sacred graves.

Mr. Love reads, breathes, inhales and exhales William Shakespeare. He is an enthusiast on him for the stage. He is also an enthusiast on him for—something new is about to burst upon you—for the screen.

He ought to know. He has studied Shakespeare as, probably, no other actor ever has or will. He has studied him in sections and in toto. And what is more, he has played him, all of him.

I asked him what made him believe that Shakespeare would "go" on the screen.

He had a diversity of reasons for his belief. Among them: "I know he would be wonderful for the screen," he said; "in the first place, he was himself, first of all, before he was anything else, an actor. He wrote plays with a capital 'P.' and his plays were pictures, surcharged with color, with rhythm, with action and emotion. These are all picture qualities. The screen requires the story first of all. It requires characterizations. It requires situations. Shakespeare knew all there is to know about all three. He knew all there is to know about the presentation of all three. Think for a moment of 'The Merchant of Venice' or 'Othello.' Every line is a word picture. Every paragraph is a situation. Every character is a character. There isn't a person in the cast who wouldn't have a definite opportunity. There is some controversy on the subject because of the fact that the Shakespearean plays are costume plays. That is, of course, footless. Consider 'The Birth of a Nation' or 'Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.' Cos-

MONTAGU LOVE is a hero to his valet. I have tried for three weeks to get away from that outstanding fact that I might, as per my mission, expatiate on his Shakespearian plans, ideas, ideals, beliefs, et al. I went there for said Shakespearian purpose. I came away with the opening paragraph (see above) howling in my cerebellum. It will not be gainsaid. Nor downed. Perchance, if I get it out of my system via the Underwood, it will let me be, and I can then get on to the Bard of Avon as expounded by Mr. Love.

I talked with Mr. Love at his apartment. In the room with us besides hooks, two photographs of small boys and a fireplace, was a dinner-table set for six, rose-shaded candelabra and all. A dinner party was impending. Hovering over Mr. Love, lighting his cigarets, supplying his sundry needs, even to occasional gaps in our conversation, was Victor. Victor is the last word of the opening paragraph. (See above.)

Some years ago, it seems, Mr. Love rescued him from a street accident and took him to his home. The accident left Victor crippled and devoted. His devotion was charming and very real. Wherever Mr. Love moved, there the eyes of Victor followed, wistful and adoring. Whenever Mr. Love said a humorous thing, a reflection of the humor touched Victor's sensitive mouth. Before Mr. Love could utter a behest, the nimble fingers and swift foresight of Victor had supplied it. There is poetry in such an adoration. There is psychology. There is so much of psychology that your personality tunes are pictures, and pictures are what we want. We must not underestimate the pictorial quality, even when it comes to the individual. After all, the appeal is, on the surface, optical.

"Shakespeare on the screen is what I want to do. Also on the stage. I have always wanted to do this. Consciously, all my other work has been in preparation for the greatest of them all. I believe, what is more, as a sop to commercialism, that Shakespeare on the screen would be successful. I am not egotistical, but I have studied my job and I've never been wrong in my judgment of a play for the screen. I'm willing to back my judgment now. Shakespeare is a pretty sound bet, you know."

I reminded Mr. Love that he had been called the Mansfield of the screen, and I asked him whether he had any objections, for the reason that Mansfield was essentially a character actor.

Said Mr. Love, "What difference does it make what one plays when one is an actor, first of all, and 'all the world's a stage'? I love every form of acting, whether it be stage, screen or pantomime. I get something, and I hope I give something to every rôle I play, juvenile or character actor. I've played Rasputin and I've played the roughneck, and the only rôle I go by is the rôle of progress, the arrival at some sort of goal. My goal has been Shakespeare. In a sort of way I may be said to have reached that goal, having played Shakespeare as I have, but I might put it in the sense that I should like to be a specialist in Shakespeare, giving him to the screen as I believe it could be, should be done."

"Assuming," I said, "that your plans go thru, what rôle will you give to the screen first?"

Mr. Love towered above me, massive.

"Titania, I think," he said, with an immense gravity. "What do you say, Victor?" he added. It is his characteristic addition to any speech.

"Yes, Mr. Love," said Victor, giving me a small, highly appreciative wink. He would, I know, have said "Yes, Mr. Love," if the amicable Love had proposed a jolly little jaunt into the nether regions, and have given that same little wink, as tho to say, "Isn't he having his little fun, God bless him!"

Montagu Love has been called the Mansfield of the screen, and has played a wide and varied rôle of characters. All the way from the rôle of Rasputin to that of a roughneck, he has never lost sight of his goal, and that is the portrayal of Shakespearean characters on the silver-sheet

The Dauntless Anita

By
LILLIAN MONTANYE

There is a tradition to the effect that Southern women are the clinging vine variety—sweet, lovable, accomplished, ornaments to the home and society, but unaggressive, not given to asserting themselves, unambitious so far as fame and glory for themselves are concerned, a bit mystified at the trend of modern women toward careers and economic independence—things that their mothers and grandmothers would have considered entirely out of the sphere of a gentlewoman. But slowly and surely Southern women are breaking the shell of tradition or environment or whatever it is. They are going in for suffrage, careers, independence. For instance, there is Anita Booth.

She was born in Virginia, on an old estate that has been in the family "always," she says. There's a big old Colonial house with wide verandas surrounded by well-kept grounds, conventional flower-beds with old-fashioned posies and tall trees with sweeping branches that hold in their massive trunks the secrets of centuries. There is a typical Dixie father. There was, until a few years ago, an idolized mother—a real Southern gentlewoman. There was a family of happy girls and boys.

Anita, the youngest of the family, was educated in Washington, D. C., at a day school that permitted her to return each night to the home she so much loved. Despite her environment—a female ancestry that has been "ladies" for generations—there was none of the clinging vine about Anita.

Nothing venture, nothing have, decided Anita one day—and as she wanted to have dramatic experience more than anything else, she set out to get it. And she did. We fearlessly predict that the combination of Southern beauty and determination will carry Anita a long way on the road of success

She must have been born with a clear perspective, because, sub-consciously, she saw things clearly, herself included, and knew what she wanted—and being the youngest of the family and of beguiling personality, she usually got it.

During her school days in Washington she attended the theater frequently, always carefully chaperoned. Critically she watched the characters live the story on the stage, in her heart feeling that she could do it quite as well, and decided that, more than anything else, she wanted to be an actress. But, she knew that she could not at once shake off the old traditions and she bided her time. Then the mother died, the family scattered here and there, as families will, the father retired from his business of coffee exporter, and, leaving the old home for a time, he and Anita made their home in Washington.

It happened that last summer, when The Fame and Fortune Contest conducted by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND was nearing its end, Anita Booth saw the announcement and "just for fun" sent in a photograph. It was most favorably received, but too late for the honor roll, even too late for publication in one of the magazines, but, with twenty-four other girls, Miss Booth received an invitation to come to New York for a test before the camera. The letter followed her to

"Has it ever occurred to you," asks a correspondent, "just how sharply differentiated are the leading directors' methods of attack?"

"Take Shakespeare's 'Romeo and Juliet,' for instance. D. W. Griffith would probably show the maid of Verona hiding in a cupboard to escape her brutal father and later on there would be a chase to prevent the lovers from taking the fatal poison. Cecil de Mille would feature a startling scene in Juliet's boudoir, and he would probably give historical flash-backs to various famous lovers of history. He'd probably call it 'Why Change Your Potion'

"George Fitzmaurice would do the whole thing with glorious light and shade photography and with Mae Murray as a new type of Verona cutie. King Vidor, on the other hand, would humanize every incident. He'd probably center upon the nurse and her love for Juliet. The Bard of Avon's passion would be transformed into spiritual uplift.

"But if Mary Pickford ever tried it, no doubt she'd do the thing as a sort of dual rôle, playing Juliet along with a slavey in the Capulet kitchen. But if Doug tried it! There would be a landslide, a flood and an earthquake to enliven the proceedings. No doubt Bull Montana would play the friar.

"Probably they'd make two endings. Of course, there would have to be happy conclusion for the exhibitors who firmly believe their audiences 'dont want no sad endings.' Probably they'd change the title, too. Can you imagine an exhibitor hooking a film with two peoples' names as a title?"

"It's a great life, if you dont weaken."

THINGS WE'RE INTERESTED IN SEEING

"Way Down East."

Charlie Ray's "45 Minutes from Broadway."

King Vidor's next.

The forthcoming Fitzmaurice-Murray production.

We note that Georges Carpentier, the French pugilist, saw his picture, "The Wonder Man," in his own Pullman, en route across country. We envy Georges. Fancy being able to sleep comfortably at a photoplay—and yet be getting somewhere.

The White House seems to suddenly have become a movie theater de luxe.

By next year we predict that both houses of Congress will have symphony orchestras and feature pictures. Imagine the trade papers. "The Senate is now playing Paramount Pictures exclusively" or "Metro production now feature House of Representatives program."

THE HIGHER ED—

The Educational Films Corporation has started releasing bathing-girl comedies.

The screen has received its ultimate uplift. The Nick Carter stories are being filmed.

À BAS LA PASSION

The state board of censors of Pennsylvania insisted upon changing the title of Louise Glaum's "Sex" to "Sex Crushed to Earth." What are they going to do with:

- "Madonnas and Men"
- "The Restless Sex"
- "The Inferior Sex"
- "Passion's Playground"
- "Sick-a-Bed"
- "The Mother of His Children"
- "The Virgin of Stamboul"
- "Body and Soul";

At last the dream of every press agent is realized. In Allan Dwan's "A Splendid Hazard," a prima donna's jewel-box is actually rifled.

A ROAD

By LE BARON COOKE

O shaded road beside the sea,
You hilly, winding ways I know;
And why you wander wild and free
So near the eddies' rise and flow,
Where white-winged crafts sail to and fro.

Your bowered vale, with joy is filled,
And undisturbed your peace is strife;
On every hand your fields are tilled
With trustful songs of simple life,
Where hearts of sacrifice are rife.

O sea-kist road, your sacred charm
Surpasses all that man portrays;
Let here no hand destroy the calm
That streams like music thru your ways,
Where dark-eyed poets chant you lays.

OLIVE CAREW

WE live in a world of strangers. So near each other that arm touches arm, yet an invisible wall separates us from those who might be our friends, our patrons—perhaps our loves. Its name is Convention. Some braver souls dare to scale this wall, but for most of us it is a barrier impassable. Eye meets eye, quickening with a message from soul to soul, but the lips are silent, and we pass—strangers.

Eve de Merincourt was thinking of a man, and it was not of the man whose engagement to her was to be announced that night. She did not know what his name was, indeed, or anything at all about him, save the important fact that he was tall and young, and that for one moment of spring-tide wonder he had gazed into her eyes thru the iron bars of the convent gate. Then Sister Marie, the pretty nun, had come quickly and hurried Eve away, but she had not scolded her, and her grey eyes, under the soft folds of her veil, had been misted with tears.

Six months ago, and she remembered him as tho she had seen him every day since, as perhaps she had. A thinnish young face, a trifle grim; thick, strongly growing hair and a way of walking like young Sir Galahad, he was the illustration of her secret girl-dreams. The fact that he had been shabbily dressed she had not noticed at all. He might be, for all she knew, a butcher boy, a poet or a tramp. What was the difference to eighteen, so long as he was tall and strong and vibrantly a man?

And now she was going to be married! She felt like one in a troubled dream when she thought of the jumbled whirl of events in the last two months, since her father had sent for her at the convent to meet the man he had chosen for her. Eve laughed aloud when she pictured Henri Caron as she had seen him that first night, fat, in spite of desperate corseting, scented, pinkly bald, with red-rimmed little eyes that had yellow whites and looked at her in a way that made her feel ashamed and strangely naked.

"He's a horrid little sausage," she had written Hilda that night. "but he's rich, and daddy says we can have everything in the world we want. So I'm engaged. He kist my hand and put a ring on it, a diamond. It's lovely, brighter than the altar, with all the candles lighted, but the kiss was horrid. I shall slap him if he ever does it again. He has a beautiful face to slap . . ."

Eve de Merincourt looked down at her diamond cloudily. It would be nice to be rich, for richness meant fur coats and pink silk underclothes and an automobile and breakfast in bed, and all the candy one

The shoulder of her dress ripped with a jagged sound and she felt avid lips on her neck and arm

Frenchman who had made millions out of the war with his aeroplane factory. She did not want to be poor. But she did not want to marry Henri Caron, either, for she suspected that marriage would give him a right to kiss her hand and would take away her right to object. She didn't know exactly what being married was, of course—they didn't speak of such things in the convent. All the same, there had been stray hints—a newspaper blown across the wall; a book of poems one of the girls had smuggled in. There was one poem Eve had read and reread, feeling the heart beneath her young bosom pounding furiously, she did not know why—

"To be a sweetness more desired than spring—

A bodily beauty more acceptable than the wild rose tree's wreath that crowns the fell—"

No. She was quite sure there was something about marriage that meant that that detestable little man with the yellow eyes could kiss her—and she simply couldn't bear that! Now, when she heard the sound of her father's steps on the threshold, she turned and flung herself upon him, trembling. "Daddy! I—I don't want to marry an old, fat, dreadful man. I would rather have a young, thin husband. Please, please find me one. There was a man like that I saw once beyond the convent gate—"

Jacques de Merincourt was horrified. The very notion that she should have looked at a man without an introduction drew down his lip-corners, brought his thin, conventional brows together. "My child!" he exclaimed gravely, "a stranger—one does not marry strangers! Henri is my friend. He has courted you properly and you have given your word. All is as it should be. Trust your father to do what is best for you." He did not finish, "and for himself"; he preferred not to admit that wanted; and being poor meant unpleasant things like scrubbing floors. Daddy had said that they would be very, very poor unless she married the little fat drawing the long velvet folds behind her that she might lean her throbbing forehead against the cool glass. And, leaning so, she looked into the face of the Stranger Man for the second time.

He was standing on the sidewalk, beneath the window, with a curious look of waiting, as though he had expected her. The dark was all around him, except for his face, lifted, faintly smiling. Her lips parted. Her father had called him a stranger. Absurd! Why, she knew him better than she did Henri, even if she had not spoken; she knew him better than—

"Ah, here you are, chérie!" her betrothed was purring in her ear; "they've gone in to supper—I've been looking for you everywhere. Naughty to run away from your Henri!"

The curtain folds fell across the black square of the window, like a relentless hand pushing her back from her glimpse of life. She felt as if she must scream, must struggle in the soft, strangling net of fate closing about her, but the futility of it all kept her silent. What, after all, could she say—that she had seen a passer-by in the street whose eyes had spoken to her eyes? That she would leave all her safe past, her conventional present, her golden future gladly to go out into the unknown dark with him? Her father was right—they were strangers. Strangers!

"Your neck was made for a man to kiss!" Caron's voice had thickened. She looked at him wonderingly, with a stirring of fright as she saw his congested face and the glitter in his tired, watery eyes. Suddenly her heart's thudding almost suffocated her. She began to creep away from him with piteous precaution, like some little hunted animal, but with a short bark of laughter he was holding her in his stubby, muscular arms. "Don't play with me, Eve! I've got a right to you. I'm tired of having only the tips of your fingers—"

The shoulder of her dress ripped with a jagged sound and she felt avid lips on her neck and arm. In the convent she had dreamed of hell, and the dream had been no more dreadful than this struggle against his animal strength and lust.

Five moments later a man, standing drearily by the water-front, staring down into its muddy lethal stream, saw a wild little figure in torn lace and crushed net flounces running along the quay. His thoughts were paralyzed, but instinct acted. She screamed insanely once, twice, when he reached her, and tried to spring, but he dragged her back. He had never felt anyone tremble as she trembled now against him, and then she lifted her white, hunted face and for the third time their eyes met.

"I—thought you were—that man!" she panted, clinging convulsively. "I didn't know—you see—what he wanted, and when—I found out, I knew I would rather die. Oh, much rather!"

He drew a slow breath. Two derelicts of life, brought together almost at the point of shipwreck by the tides, the dark, strong, silent tides of fate that move resistlessly. In the last two months these tides had tossed him hither and yon in sport, from the depths of despair and poverty, to sudden, undreamed-of riches, thence down into the depths again—of self-loathing and broken nerves and the sick desire to escape himself. There must be some meaning to it all, when the one girl he had ever really looked at had broken thru the bars of the convent and come across the months into his arms!

"Eve!" They had neither of them noticed that a limousine had drawn up behind them and two men leaped out, until the older of them laid authoritative hands on the girl, and the other, glaring, pushed her rescuer away. "All this excitement has been too much for you! Come home, my darling, and you shall rest. It's nerves, Caron—a totally inexperienced girl suddenly brought face to face with the facts of life. But she'll come around—be patient with her!"

"I shall be patience itself, mon cher Jacques!" the shorter man assured him, as they led the shuddering, speechless girl away between them, "she is worth waiting for—"

The Strange Man looked after them, seeing, instead of two gentlemen in conventional evening clothes helping a girl into a costly car, two satyrs dragging their victim in triumph between them. Then the great machine sprang forward into the night and was gone. But the Strange Man did not return to his fixed, morbid questioning of the water. He had no idea of dying now. As long as that girl was on earth, he could not leave it. Preposterous, of course! A stranger—but he knew that he had not seen the last of her; that, once again, under some sky, beside some far waters, they would stand together as now, and then—

"And then," he said aloud to the night, opening his arms violently, "then I shall be what I was when I first saw her. I shall go away, to some empty place, and win back what I have lost these last accursed weeks. When I see her again I shall be a man, and that time I shall not let her go!"

If Jacques de Merincourt had expected hysterics, stubbornness, defiance from his daughter, he was surprised by her attitude, after she had recovered from the first shock of the night's experiences. Something seemed to have gone from her

He groaned. "God!" said Richard to the sea, "how am I going to stand this seven months longer? It's asking too much of a man!"

about her waist, touching the buckle reassuringly. But she was in no hurry. Three hours more of the sunlight and the strong, fresh air in her face, and then—she would keep the tryst she had made...

Two days later a pretty young nun, face seamed with crying, fluttered like a frightened grey moth into Jacques de Merincourt's complacent puzzlingly. But her beauty was left unharmed and she was very gentle, very humble, making no plea when he urged a hastened marriage. Indeed, she seemed to desire it, for some unexplained reason of her own. There was only one wish that she expressed, and that was that immediately after the ceremony Caron would take her on a honeymoon in one of his fast-traveling passenger aeroplanes to a famous winter resort on the coast of Florida.

On the morning of her wedding day, Eve wrote a note and mailed it. Afterward she was almost gay and there was not a trace of shrinking when Henri Caron put his ring on her finger, not even when he kissed her and called her, greedily, "My wife." Jacques de Merincourt, with a fat check in his pocket and peace in his heart, watched the bridal couple ascend smoothly into the sky and presently disappear into the blue void, and felt that, all things considered, he had put in the best day's work of his life. To be sure, Eve did not seem to care for the man she had married, and, as a matter of truth, Henri Caron might be a trifle passé and emotionally frayed, but tush! No well-brought-up girl would even think of her probable predecessors in her husband's arms. After a short while, he would doubtless leave her to herself; she would have position, money—and independence. What more can a wife desire! No, no; he had done his parental best for Eve, of a certainty.

In the seat of the flying car the bride, smiling with strange fixity, looked down, looked up, looked away. She did not glance at the squat figure at her side. In the panoply of flying gear Henri Caron was even more repulsive than before. His goggles gave him the aspect of some giant beetle, his voice came to her ears, thin and squeaking, above the roar of the exhaust. "At this rate, in three hours we'll sight the coast! And then—the honeymoon begins!"

Her smile deepened. Stealthily one hand went to the belt

She lifted her face to him, rosy with the new day, and the new joy within her soul. "Perhaps you can," she whispered, "but I cant, Dickie"

Being the first of a series of literary rambles thru the Hollywood screen colony

I AM sure there are no more interesting streets in the world than Broadway, New York, Chicago's Michigan Boulevard and the Hollywood Boulevard of Los Angeles, where all the motion picture folk promenade o' nights.

It is a picturesque boulevard, this Via Cinema, as it might be called.

Here the business man from Los Angeles or the visiting millionaire from Kansas City who happens to be sojourning in Pasadena have full opportunity to see picturedom en famille, so to speak.

From the contents of the mass of "fan" correspondence which reaches me at the studio, it would seem that, had each motion picture devotee an Aladdin's lamp, he and she would wish themselves at once upon this pathway of the famous, and yet Hollywood Boulevard might be said to represent disillusionment to the layman, for along this highway one can see Charlie Ray, with the youthful Mrs. Ray in the Ray supermobile, and write the folks at home that now he knows for sure that Charlie is married, et cetera, and immediately Oshkosh or Gallup will be inundated with a saline flood from the tear-ducts of "eligible femininity."

Here, again, one will see Charlie Chaplin in his off-scene rôle, (so well known to the screen colony), of the melancholy Dane.

He will see Anita Stewart, Enid Bennett, Jack (J. Warren) Kerrigan and Wallie Reid, with Mrs. Reid and the Reid Kiddie, hobnobbing on terms of delightful intimacy.

Now, some people have told me that the public consider the moving picture star possessed of an extreme hauteur and a quite regal self-consideration. This, I assure you, dear readers, is not a fact. Maybe I am disillusioning you in telling you this. On the other hand, perhaps I am doing my profession a great service in relating to you the human qualities of the people who make up the screen colony in Los Angeles. For here in Hollywood, one discovers the Bohemianism of the West. The screen colony is not only the exclusive quartier of motion picture players—it also embraces the allied arts and professions, for screen artists are really the most gregarious animals in the world, and the most democratic at heart.

Before I wrote this article, the editor of this publication seemed to be interested in my story of the way the public's silversheet favorites live, and so in our rambles thru Hollywood, I am going to try to give you an intimate glimpse of the real.

"He is very temperamental—how we used to clash—our two strong wills!" and Una laughed in memory of frequent tilts. "However, I fully appreciate all I learnt from him," she went on, seriously, "for Von makes you work. He expects you to throw yourself into the rehearsals as completely as if the camera was going, and by the time I had gone thru the action several times I became so imbued with the spirit of the scene that I hardly realized that I was acting a part—I was actually living it.

"Following 'The Devil's Passkey,' I made a picture with Lois Weber, 'What Men Want.'

In the rôle of Renee, I played a dope fiend, a vicious sort of girl, and had some strong dramatic moments. It is always easier to do a big scene than one requiring less emotion—somehow you urge

"I'm so happy and pleased that the critics seem to like my rôle of Grace Goodwright in 'The Devil's Passkey,'" said Una Trevelyn and smiled contentedly.

"That was the second picture I ever made, the first being a small bit with Bessie Barriscale. One day I went out to the Universal studio to see the casting director, and the instant he saw me he exclaimed, 'You're just the girl.' He sent for Erich von Stroheim, and when he came in he took one long look and repeated the remark with emphasis, 'You're just the girl.' It seems they had been looking for a certain type—I was the type—so they signed me then and there to play the leading rôle in Von's second big production.

"If I climb to the heights of film fame," she continued, merrily, "it will be thru a vale of tears, for in this play I wept for fifteen solid weeks. Really, I became so depressed that I would wake up in the middle of the night, sobbing bitterly. It was a splendid part, tho, sweet and sympathetic, for, you see, the trouble was caused thru no direct fault of mine and I could easily throw myself into it.

"After all the misunderstanding and misery, there is a pretty ending—with a bright new hope—the scene being at dawn. We tried for six weeks to catch the sun at just the right place for that final scene.

"Detail is Erich von Stroheim's first, second and last name," went on Miss Trevelyn. "Why, he even took me along when he selected the furniture, colors yourself on when there is a demand for a crashing, thrilling situation."

Una Trevelyn was born of English parents, in English waters, on an English boat, and is a daughter of the United Kingdom, tho she has never set foot on English soil. Her father, being a younger son of the well-known Trevelyns, decided to answer the call of wider opportunities offered by the United States, and it was a few hours after her parents had set sail for this country that Una's arrival in this world occurred.

After remaining in New York for a short period, the family went on down to Memphis, Tennessee, where they established their home.

Una spent her school-days at the exclusive Southern college, Ward-Belmont, in Nashville, where she was graduated. All this time, deep within her heart, stirred the ambition for a stage career.

Tho reared in the strictest home atmosphere, where the theater was never mentioned, Una says that her mother has often told her that when she was a wee girlie she was always acting. Whenever she was corrected, the child would stage a big, emotional scene, the mother knowing all the time that Una herself was conscious that she was acting.

Miss Trevelyn first joined a stock company which was playing in Sioux City, and, after that, "just happened" into pictures, by reason of the fact that she was ordered West on account of her health

Several times during the summer vacations, Miss Trevelyn dabbled a little with local stock companies, but the family's opposition was so pronounced that she realized she must seek fame at a distance, so, after graduating, she ran away to New York.

"Odd thing, to look back on one's first steps," mused Una, one afternoon as she told me the story over a cup of tea in the cool tea-room at the Alexandria Hotel. "Before I had a chance to become discouraged in New York, I met a chap I had known at home, and he introduced me to a friend who was forming a stock company to take out to Sioux City. Well, I fibbed a little about my experience, and he promptly signed me.

"After I had settled down in Sioux City, thinking everything was lovely and wondering how I should break the news at home, the family found me thru detectives—you see, I was still under age. This served to make me more determined than ever, and at Detroit I eluded the detective who was taking me home and went on to New York. There I reached mother by 'phone and tried to make her see my side of the question. (Continued on page 96)

"My Irish Molly-O"

By
ELIZABETH PELTRET

HAVE you ever imagined what it would be like to meet a girl out of a popular Irish song? If you have, it was probably with an inner feeling that no such thing could ever happen, which is, of course, all wrong. For instance, take Molly Malone.

You would know that she was a girl out of a song the instant you looked at her. She is a tiny girl . . . about five feet small, you would guess . . . with fine, thick, bobbed hair, which is often in rebellious disorder, and large, expressive brown eyes. And she has all the qualities portrayed in those songs, too! Impulsive, sometimes to the point of being headstrong, and warm-hearted and sincere and plucky and lovable. She has a way of looking up at you that makes you want to grab and hug her, it is so reminiscent of a very serious six-year-old child. But to get to my story:

She had not expected to work that week but was called to the studio on the day of our appointment just too late to let me know, so I arrived to find her not at home.

"I can tell you all about her," her mother suggested, hopefully. I said that I was afraid that that wouldn't do, but we chatted for a while, anyway, before I left to go to the studio.

But luck was with me. Just as I was

Photographs by Clarence L. Bull

Molly Malone was, all press-agent stories to the contrary, not a success at first in pictures. It was only when she had failed completely and started all over again from the very bottom of the ladder, that she really began to make progress. She is now being featured in a series of Supreme Comedies, the first one being named "Molly's Millions" leaving the bungalow court, where she lives, I met Molly Malone and we turned back to the house.

"I didn't have my week's vacation after all," she said; "I've been working all morning." She was without a hat and the long mauve cape that she wore accentuated her girlishness.

I was suddenly impressed with the suitability of that bungalow court as a place for her to live. Standing at the entrance of it as we were, it looked more like a toy village than anything else.

There are seventy quaint little houses, all exactly alike, from the number of stairs leading to each front door to the width of each tiny square of lawn, all set facing a narrow court with a fountain in the center of it. Inside, these little bungalows are as cozy and pretty as you could ask for.

"Tho," said Molly Malone, "there is too much figured stuff." One of her many ambitions is to become an interior decorator. She has a great many books on the subject and she really studies them and talks about them with lively interest. For instance, she described her ideal room. It would be done in French grey with hangings of flame. Soft lights and a flame-colored sofa-cushion on a grey lounge.

"I think that makes the prettiest color combination imaginable," she said.

So, you see, her childishness is only skin deep.

How to keep your nails fashionably manicured

This season's fashions are built to display the hands

BRILLIANT fashions to permit a graceful motion of a perfect hand. Sleeveless gowns that lead the eye down the slender arm to rest on the finger tips. These and a dozen other pretty fancies this season are especially designed to display the hand.

Never before have hands been so conspicuous. Never before have women given so much thought to their care.

The chief beauty of the hands is the nails. The cuticle must be slender, even, firm. It is unpardonable this year not to have perfectly kept nails and cuticle.

Fortunately, it is no longer hard to keep the nails lovely.

An easy, quick, safe way has been discovered for manicuring your nails! A way which thousands of women are using regularly.

With fifteen or twenty minutes given regularly each week to this simple, scientific method of caring for your nails, you can keep them always exquisite.

Cutting the cuticle leaves a ragged, irregular edge. The more you cut it, the more rapidly the cuticle grows—the tougher and more uneven it becomes.

With a bit of cotton wrapped around the end of an orange stick and dipped in Cutex work gently around the base of the nail. Now wash your hands, and, as you dry them, push the cuticle back.

For snowy white nail tips, apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nails. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish. To keep the cuticle soft and pliable so that you do not need to manicure as often, apply Cutex Cold Cream at night.

Cutex is on sale at drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at all chemists' shops in England. Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Nail Polish, and Cold Cream are each 35 cents. The Cuticle Remover comes also in 65 cent bottles.

Six manicures for 20 cents

Mail the coupon below with 20 cents and we will send you the Cutex Introductory Manicure Set, containing enough of the Cutex products for six manicures. Send for it today. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th Street, New York City.

Pacific Coast Paragraphs

By HAZEL SHELLEY

David Warfield, the beloved veteran of the dramatic stage, marvels with Cecil de Mille at the wonders of an old-fashioned picture projector—the kind you used to see providing amusement to visitors in the office of the country dentist. Center, Anita Stewart has discovered a new way to alleviate the burden of Uncle Sam's postal clerks. Below, King Vidor, the promising young director, discusses the script of his latest picture, "The Jack-Knife Man," with Harry Todd and Fred Turner, who both appear in this play PACIFIC is the most proper and fitting title for anything and everything pertaining to the West Coast studios. That is, on the surface . . . Peace, the perpetual sun and a layer of dust reign supreme. Desultory stage hands whack at a solitary nail, the safety-pin of tremendous structures, as if it mattered not at all whether tomorrow came or went. In the yards hundreds and hundreds of automobiles are parked, a slight layer of yellow dust soiling even the most pretentious, as if, indeed, they had waited here long and long forgotten their claims to speed.

On the stages themselves a few actors are being measured for proper camera focus; directors stroll around; a Sabbath quiet envelops the gardens where motion pictures are grown.

A peaceful lethargy seems to enfold the studios in a benignant calm: the peace of the Pacific.

Out here I miss the hurry of New York—so far I have knocked down ten persons on the Los Angeles sidewalks in my mad endeavor to create a little speed. Here time and tide wait for every man—and tomorrow will do as well as today.

And yet under this brooding calm, great things are happening . . . enormous plans are being formulated. The King is dying, long live the King—for in these peaceful Pacific places, new stars are being born—new geniuses being given a chance.

And speaking of chances, another erstwhile comedy queen is about to come into her own under the magic De Mille management. Ora Carew is the latest pretty bathing girl to park her bathing-suit in moth-balls forever and aye—having just affixed her name to a contract by which she becomes William de Mille's leading woman. Her first picture under the direction of Mr. de Mille will be "His Friend and His Wife," adapted from Cosmo Hamilton's novel.

And while speaking of the De Milles, Cecil, that wonderful exponent of silken lure, has chosen Forrest Stanley to succeed Thomas Meighan and Elliott Dexter, as his leading man. Both of these splendid players have graduated to stardom, you know.

Yesterday, while discussing the addition of Stanley to his forces, Mr. de Mille said, "He has youth, intelligence, ability and the sort of experience which I am certain will, combine to place him speedily in the forefront of screen players."

What picture Cecil de Mille will make next is not yet ascertained. He has two stories, one by Jeanie MacPherson and the other by Hector Turnbull, both of which he will film, with the question of precedence the only one now to be determined. One is a satire and the other a spectacle—and it all depends upon Mr. de Mille's mood which he selects to make first.

The most active person out at the Metro studios these days is the doorkeeper. It matters not how often I journey to the other end of Los Angeles for the express purpose of visiting the Metro stars, each and every time he eyes me with distrust; nay, more . . . every one of his muscles quivers, as he jumps up and down madly in his wild desire to throw me out. And always just in time, the publicity department comes to my rescue and I am permitted to pass.

How to overcome the havoc wrought by sun, wind and dust

THE exposure of the skin to summer weather often inflicts deep, permanent injury on the delicate cells of the skin.

Repeated sunburn over-stimulates the oil glands and gives the skin a greater tendency to shine. Wind coarsens the texture of the complexion. Dust works deep into the pores and irritates them.

However, with a little intelligent care you can overcome these ill effects.

TO overcome the tendency to shine caused by sunburn, you must counteract the over-secretion of oil. This oil may be absorbed and discouraged by constant contact with a good face powder. But to bring results you must apply the powder in such a way that it will stay on the face.

Deep into the pores the crafty dust specks work. You need a different cream to get them out—a cream with an oil base.

If powdering is to be at all lasting, the thing to do is always to apply a powder base. For this a special cream is needed, a cream which disappears instantly and will not reappear. Pond's Vanishing Cream does just this. It is made entirely without oil. The moment you apply it, it vanishes, never to reappear. Before you powder apply just a little Pond's Vanishing Cream. It holds the powder to the face twice as long as ever before and prevents it from shining.

THE coarseness due to the wind may be gradually overcome by the use of a special greaseless cream during the day, to soften the skin and protect it from further injury.

Pond's Vanishing Cream contains an ingredient famous for years for its softening effects. Before every outing, apply a bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream. It will protect your skin and gradually make it finer in texture.

DUST is the worst enemy of your skin. It quickly works deep into the pores and darkens and irritates them. To restore clear color to the skin, you must give the pores a deep cleansing with an entirely different cream—a cream with an oil base. Pond's Cold Cream has just the amount of oil to work deep into the pores

POND'S Cold Cream & Vanishing Cream

One without any oil and one with an oil base

Do not live in terror of the powder coming off, revealing a shiny face. Hold the powder on with the right greaseless powder base.

and thoroughly cleanse them. Before you go to bed cleanse the face with Pond's Cold Cream. In a few weeks, your skin will be clearer in color, finer in texture.

Stop today at any drug or department store and get a jar or tube of these creams. Every normal skin needs both. You will be surprised to discover how quickly they will enable you to overcome the injury of sun, wind and dust.

Gossip of the Eastern Studios

Top, David Wark Griffith, snapped at his Mamaroneck studios between scenes of his production of "Way Down East." Center, Eugene O'Brien, Melznick star, out for a morning canter. Below, shooting a big scene of "Way Down East." Billy Bitzer, Mr. Griffith's chief camera-man, may be observed on the platform with Mr. Griffith

EASTERN screen interests now seem to center in David Wark Griffith's forthcoming film repertoire season at a New York playhouse to be named later. Mr. Griffith's seasons are now annual events—and things to be looked forward to. Recall that his last season at Cohan's Theater produced "Broken Blossoms."

This year Mr. Griffith will start, some time late in August probably, with "Way Down East," which he has been shooting since before last Christmas. The total footage ran to between 600,000 and 700,000 feet, and, at this writing, the cutting has brought it down to 26,000 feet, or 26 reels. As the production will, it is expected, be released in eight reels, Mr. Griffith still has quite a task ahead of him. Prominent in the cast are Lillian Gish, Dick Barthelme, Mary Hay, Creighton Hale, Burr McIntosh, Kate Bruce and others of prominence.

Another feature of Mr. Griffith's repertoire season will be "The Love Flower," originally produced as "Black Beach" and the production which the director bought back from First National to elaborate and enlarge. Carol Dempster has the leading rôle.

Bobbie Harron is doing nicely with his individual productions, made at the Griffith Mamaroneck studios and which are to be released thru Metro. The first of the star series is "Coincidence," directed by Chet Withey. June Walker, who scored last season on the stage in "My Lady Friends," with the late Clifton Crawford, is leading woman.

Film fans will be interested to know that Betty Compson's new pictures, beginning with "Prisoners of Love," will be released thru Goldwyn channels. Miss Compson is the young actress who scored so sensationally in "The Miracle Man."

Bessie Love has been visiting in New York. Ethel Clayton has been in the metropolis, too, prior to departing for Europe.

By the way, nearly every American star will be on the Continent or in the Orient before the year is over, it seems. Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks and Theda Bara are in England. The Talmadges and Dorothy Gish plan to tour Europe. Elsie Ferguson has gone to Japan.

The first seal of the new Motion Picture-Theatrical Association of the World was awarded to "Suds," Mary Pickford's latest vehicle. The presentation was made on the stage of the Strand Theater, New York, on June 27th, by Frank Bacon, secretary of the organization. As Mary was absent in London, the gift of the replica in gold of the seal was accepted on her behalf by her mother, Mrs. Charlotte Pickford.

Realart announces its newest star to be Justine Johnson, well known to the stage. Her first picture will be George Scarborough's "Moonlight and Honey-suckle."

MARINELLO
A Beauty Aid for Every Need

Marinello Toilet Preparations may be had at all Drug Stores, Department Stores and Shops.

MYSTERY GIRL.—Why, I began my career as a very little boy. "Love's Redemption" is the name of the play that we are producing. Yes, on the New Amsterdam Roof, 42nd Street, New York. Mary Pickford's "Op o' Me Thumb" has been changed to "Suds." Yes, I know that many of the women and children of Siam are clay-eaters. Me for Siam if the h. c. l. keeps up.

ADELAIDE N.—There's no fool like the old maid, they tell me. So you liked Cullen Landis in "Pinto." R. A. Walsh is directing for Mayflower. Elaine Hammerstein in "The Shadow of Rosalie Byrnes."

TENNESSEE.—You say, "Why be so hard-hearted? Why not publish a full-page picture of yourself in SHADOWLAND—if you really want to help the magazine along—so all your admirers will see just how handsome you really are?" Boy, oh boy! Do you want me to ruin the Brewster Publications? Peggy Hyland is in England now. No, she is not married. Yes, we gave a special subscription price for all three. Let me hear from you again.

W. S. E. W.—I know for a fact that what you write about Mary Pickford is not true. A lie has no legs and cannot stand long without many other lies to help it, but it can run fearfully fast and cover a lot of ground. Rudolph Cameron is Anita Stewart's husband. William Russell and Francelia Billington in "Slam Bang Jim."

GERTRUDE P.—Ruth Roland, Hollywood, Cal., will reach her.

INQUISITIVE JESS.—Had some time trying to decipher your English. You ask, "Who is the greatest motion picture player on the field?" Pretty hard. Give me another field. Dustin Farnum played in "The Squaw Man," "Cameo Kirby" and "The Littlest Rebel" on the stage.

GERTRUDE B.—My, it took me some time to wade thru pages and pages of green ink. You can write to the Blackton Productions, 25 W. 45th Street, New York City. Oh, thanks, awfully! I can return the compliment. Human beings who reside in crystallized domiciles should not project geological specimens. Get me? Send on some more green ink, Gertie B., and then exchange names with "Irish."

A SOUTHERN BRUNETTE.—Your first letter? Welcome to the sanctum. We have three dogs now, Corot, Ranger and Zorko. Shep isn't with us any more. Yes, I have framed pictures of the players on my walls. I'm a regular movie fan. Yes, I have been in love. You say it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all. Not so. It is a misfortune for a woman never to be loved, but it is a humiliating calamity to be loved no more. Ness pa!

TOTO MAC.—Thanks for yours, write me again.

ANNEXING BILL.—Sorry, but I cant give you any information about Lieut. Locklear, who played in "The Great Air Robbery." I understand he is quite smitten with Viola Dana, but there may be nothing to it. Yes, your questions are a little out of my line. I have no air-line.

LILLIAN R.—No, no, Norma Talmadge does not live at the studio on 48th Street. She has a real home of her own. I think it is true that actresses who cry easily are the best actresses. They are the most emotional. It is also true that widows who cry easily are the first to marry again. There is nothing like wet weather for transplanting. Wow! Bring on the fan! Viola Dana in "Dangerous to Men." Not to me, Viola.

FOUR BELLS.—That's what you get for staying out all night. You say that if your shoes would ever acquire the shine your nose does, you would be in 10 cents every day. Why should you not be just as proud of a shine on your nose as you are of a shine on your shoes? Samuel Lumiere and Charles Albin are our official photographers. SHADOWLAND is 35 cents.

DERE MARLE.—I am quite sure you have the wrong Marion Davies.

PHYLLIS.—Baby Marie Osborne played in "Baby's Diplomacy," "Tears and Smiles," "The Little Diplomat," "Sawdust Doll," and "The Evidence." You will see Wesley Barry playing in leads when he grows up. Surely a girl living in Canada may join the Fame and Fortune Contest. Why not?

JACK.—Yes, I like your stage name. You ought to bob your hair. I have been thinking seriously of doing it. King Baggot played opposite May Allisoo in "The Cheater."

THE QUAKERS.—The ghost walks around here every two weeks. You know why they call it that name? Because it makes our spirits rise. Yes, to your Constance Talmadge question. She has been in here lots of times—we all love her.

CLASSIC.—Milton Sills is in California now. ESTELLE.—Short and sweet is right.

SUNSHINE.—Pauline Frederick is released from her Goldwyn contract. Her last two pictures are "Roads of Destiny" and "Madam X." Anita Stewart is playing in "Harriet and the Piper." Irving Cummings and Charles Richman in the cast. Perhaps we admire a beautiful soul more than a beautiful face, but we dont run after it quite so hard.

FAIRBANKS.—Thanks for the clipping. It wasn't reviewed as severely as that in the East.

BLUE EYES.—Honestly, if Norma Talmadge corresponded with all the people who asked me that question today you would never see her on the screen, because she would have to spend all her time writing. Have a heart girls, and boys, too; you expect too much of the players.

DANA, AND THAT AMEN GUY'S WIFE.—Good luck to you, girls, and remember your oath at the altar. Obey!

LILA LEE FAN.—I am not sure whether Mary Miles Minter has a brother in Los Angeles, but I doubt it very much. Ralph Graves is not married. Yes, this seems to be a very disordered world of ours. Some are over-worked, some do not have to work, some are being worked by those who do not have to work, and some who want to work, cant find work

La Creole Liquid Shampoo

La Creole Hair Tonic

Right care means plenty of good looking hair

Men and women both should have it—but many do not

It is really surprising that men and women so commonly permit their hair to lose its good looks and actually to fall out in unsightly quantities.

Men's hair becomes disagreeably oily and stringy and gets thinner and thinner. Women suffer with falling hair and dandruff. Their hair loses its life, beauty and luxuriance.

All this can be easily prevented. Plain neglect is the cause. No more care than is given the teeth will assure abundant, vigorous, beautiful hair if the care is wisely directed.

Simple directions

Regularly, two or three times a week, apply "La Creole" Hair Tonic, using the balls of the fingers to rub it into the scalp with a rotary motion. "La Creole" tonic stimulates the scalp circulation, supplies the hair roots with the nourishment needed for a beautiful, vigorous growth of hair.

Scientific endorsement

Scientific authorities endorse "La Creole." No other hair tonic we know of possesses such distinction. No other possesses such merit.

An important ingredient is "Euresol," recognized by the Council of the American Medical Association for the treatment of dandruff and unhealthy scalp conditions. Scientific tests and actual use both prove the results "La Creole" Hair Tonic brings in the new beauty and health of your hair.

Use this superior shampoo

At last the ideal shampoo has arrived. It has been long sought. "La Creole" Liquid Shampoo is a recently achieved formula based on long experience and now added to the list of "La Creole" products. It brings a combination of stimulating and cleansing qualities never before attained in a shampoo.

Its base is a mentholized cocoanut oil—an absolutely distinctive formula never before attempted. It is standardized by our laboratory processes to assure uniform high quality because cocoanut oil varies in quality unless so treated. The unvarying superiority of "La Creole" is thus assured. Its delightful, stimulating, cleansing effects are immediately noticeable.

At regular intervals, every ten days or two weeks, the hair should be washed thoroughly with this superior shampoo.

It keeps the glands and pores of the scalp glowing with clean health and vigor to function properly.

It makes the hair soft, lustrous and fluffy. It puts hair and scalp in ideal condition. After its use added benefits follow from the unailing application of "La Creole" Hair Tonic.

For gray hair

For hair that has grown gray, gray streaked or faded "La Creole" Hair Dressing is prepared. It is a treatment for the gradual restoration of the hair's natural color—lightest brown to deepest black, whatever the natural color was—in from three to six weeks. It must not be confused with common dyes. It does not give the hair a dyed look, it cannot stain the scalp and there is nothing to wash or rub off. Refinement approves its use. Guaranteed to bring back the hair's color or money refunded.

All La Creole preparations are noted for their excellence.

presence and laid a crumpled letter in his hand. He read it and went ghastly white. "When you read this, I shall be beyond your reach and his. You have chosen a husband for me, but I have the right to choose for myself, and the only husband I shall have is Death. That is why I asked for the aeroplane. It will be very easy to loosen the buckles of the safety belt. Good-by, daddy. Forgive me, but I couldn't. He would want to kiss me, he would say he had a right—and it is far easier to die.—Eve."

Then there were telegrams, reporters, search parties, newspaper sob-stories and finally forgetfulness. Jacques had a crepe band sewed about his coat-sleeve and cashed his large check mournfully. Another candle burned on the convent altar and the world wagged on its way.

But on a small, deserted island many miles off the coast of Florida, the story that was begun with the meeting of two pairs of eyes thru the convent gate went on to another chapter, as it was meant to go on from the beginning of the world.

Richard Bedell, voluntary exile, had deliberately destroyed the boat that brought him to this wild, unvisited spot, knowing that until his year of regeneration was over and his friends had come to find him, as they had promised, he would see no other human soul. But man cannot get away from fate, tho he travel to the ends of the earth, and so, one sparkling morning, he had come out of the hut he had constructed for himself, his dog at heel, to find that he had a visitor who had fallen from the very skies.

In a crumpled heap under the tree which contained the fragments of the aeroplane, Eve lay as tho she were asleep. As he bent over her she stirred drowsily and her eyes un-closed. His heart leaped as she looked up into his face, then sank like a stone, for her gaze was shallow and empty and placidly unremembering. The shock of the fall had left her beautiful body miraculously intact, but had taken her mind away! It was a cruel jest of fate. Somewhere in the limitless void, he could imagine peals of cosmic mirth, mocking them.

Eve found herself in a puzzling world. The puzzle was not why or how she came to be there. That seemed quite natural. She accepted Richard, the hut, the island contentedly, but she could not understand why he would not let her do the things she wanted to do. There was the matter of clothes. She hated the ones that she wore, heavy, clumsy things that gave her a strange sort of fear when she looked down at them. So at night, when she was alone in the hut and Richard was sleeping in a shelter of boughs outside, she took them off and was pleased and delighted to discover charming pink, soft things underneath. But when she ran to him in the morning, clapping her hands with pleasure in herself, he behaved very strangely and even, she thought, almost unkindly.

He told her, with his back turned, to put on her clothes, and she answered, triumphantly, that she had burned them because they were nasty. Then he found a much-too-large shirt and a pair of trousers and dressed her in them, rather clumsily, because his fingers fumbled queerly over the task. She saw that he was angry and her lips quivered. "Eve didn't mean to be naughty!" she begged. "But why is it naughty to wear pretty things instead of ugly things?"

He groaned at that. "God!" said Richard to the sea, "how am I going to stand this seven months longer? It's asking too much of a man!"

She was frightened. She climbed upon the rock beside him and kist him with the open, care-less lips of a child. He looked at her with suffering eyes, bent his head and clenched his hands at his sides. When he lifted it at last there was sweat in beads on his forehead, but he was smiling patiently. "No, no, Eve!" he said, in a tired voice. "Mustn't do that, dear. That's naughty, too. Now let's go fishing! I'll let you hold the rod."

The days drifted away into eternity, the suns rose in opal and amethyst, set in crimson and purple, the moons grew red and swollen beyond the moss-bearded trees and Richard Bedell felt the old strength and pride of rewon manhood setting in a strong tide thru his veins. Three years in the Flanders trenches, two months of discouraging search for work, two more months of unbridled dissipation had added years, but fierce physical toil, hewing of trees, the matching of his body against the elements and Nature sloughed them off again.

Thru it all Eve was ever-present, running barefoot on the sands, dancing wild little dances, singing formless songs, laughing the laugh of a three-year-old child with the ripe, fervid, glowing lips of a woman. She was a bell made to give forth rich, vibrant music, but, thru an invisible flaw, forced to tinkle instead. She was made for the dear offices of love, and yet she could only be pitied and protected. It was a situation to test the mettle of a philosopher, and at twenty-eight a man does not live on the dry crusts of philosophy. But Richard starved himself and kept his guardianship untarnished by a single word or act that might reveal the pent human hungers within him.

And then, one night, six months after the one in which the splintered aeroplane had pitched out of the sky upon his island, Richard awoke, his ears ringing with the echo of a scream. He listened, groping for the loaded Colt which he kept always at his side. Thru the crevices of his shelter he saw a light in the hut beyond and struggling shadows flung thru the single window across its path.

The two men in the hut were too intent upon their business to hear the sound—

CARTOONISTS MAKE BIG MONEY

Every time Sid Smith makes a stroke of his pen, millions of people laugh and every laugh means money for the man who creates it. Andy and Min earn big money for him every day.

In this weary old world, everyone from childhood to old age wants to be made to laugh, and men who succeed at this are highly paid for it. By capitalizing their humorous ideas and drafting ability, cartoonists like Briggs, Fox, King, and Smith make $10,000 to $100,000 a year. YOU may have ideas that are equally good. Let Federal training give you the skill to put them on paper.

and ideas. "A Road to Bigger Things" tells how you can capitalize your liking for drawing through the Federal Course in Applied Cartooning. It offers you the opportunity to study cartooning under 32 of America's masters, including Clare Briggs, Sid Smith, Fontaine Fox and others. It is like learning under these big men themselves and getting the composite knowledge of their years of experience for your personal use.

What your present position may be doesn't matter; if you have this liking for drawing, Federal training will develop it and fit you for a pleasant and highly profitable profession. What Federal training has already done for thousands of others, it can do for you.

Atlantic City, where she and her father were spending a few weeks. "That I was surprised at the invitation is expressing it mildly," she said, "but I persuaded daddy to let me come to New York to see what it was all about."

She arrived late one afternoon and was conducted at once to the editorial sanctum, a pink-cheeked, starry-eyed, radiantly expectant vision. The editor was obviously interested.

"You must come out to Roslyn tomorrow with the other girls for a test," he said.

"I shall be delighted," said Anita. "But I must go back to Atlantic City tonight and explain to daddy and get some clothes. I brought nothing with me."

"But you can't possibly go to Atlantic City and get back in time. Cars for Roslyn will leave the offices promptly at nine."

"Oh, yes, I can," she said confidently. "See if I don't!"

Arriving at the offices next morning, we found girls, girls, girls. Girls blonde and dark. Girls merry and taciturn. Girls confident and apprehensive as to what the day might bring forth. And, seated quietly in one corner, but with a personality so magnetic that all eyes were attracted to her, was Anita Booth.

"How did you get here?" we wanted to know.

"I flew," she said calmly.

"You what?"

"I flew over in an aeroplane. It was the only way there was to come and get here in time—and I just had to come. So, last night when I got back to Atlantic City, I made arrangements—and I flew back this morning. It didn't take long." And that's Anita Booth—as we met her—as we have found her always—practical, self-reliant, splendid in her young and unvanquished ambitions.

At Mr. Brewster's estate at Roslyn, Long Island, that day, Anita Booth was in high favor with the contestants, the newspaper men, the celebrities gathered there for the momentous occasion. She was friendly, confident, alert, nothing escaped her. She knew nothing of the mysteries of make-up but was anxious to learn. She posed before the camera, alone and in groups of girls. She telephoned her father at Atlantic City for permission to stay over another day. She stayed. She did her individual bit and she went back to daddy.

Many weeks passed, and one day there breezed into our offices Anita Booth, chic, smiling, altogether captivating. She had come to say "How do you do and thank you." When it was officially announced to her that she had been chosen one of the winners of the contest, she cried. Not because she was one of the winners—of course not—but because she was glad and happy and, most of all, surprised.

And then the powers that be told her that in accordance with the plans and promises of the Brewster Publications a position would be secured for her. It might take some time—it probably would. But she was not to worry. A "job," and a good one, would be hers in time.

"That's perfectly wonderful of you," said Anita, "and I can't tell you how much I appreciate it—but I came back to New York two weeks after the contest closed and got myself a job. In fact, I have already finished one picture with Selznick and am soon to begin another!" And she had, and she did—and then she did two more, playing opposite Ralph Ince in "The Law Bringers" and "The Isle of Pines." She also did a picture with Elaine Hammerstein—a rather vampish part which she didn't like a bit, she says, and now we hear that she is playing a stage engagement with a stock company for "experience and discipline."

"You see," she confided to me recently, "daddy is quite willing now that I take a chance at doing what I want to do. He knows my heart is set on making a success on the stage and screen, and I think he really likes my pluck. He enjoys going about with me and will be with me a great deal. He likes New York, especially in the opera season. Opera is my favorite pastime, you know. Last winter, when I was working so hard at the studio, making those terrible trips to Fort Lee in the storm and sleet, I would hurry home and dress for the opera instead of going to bed as I should have done. But daddy says that good music is 'rest for the body and food for the soul!' and he is right. Isn't it funny how things come about? I, Anita Booth, country born and bred, here in New York and actually acting—or trying to—in pictures!"

"And do you think the Fame and Fortune Contest really started you upon your career?"

"Well, it may have hurried it up somewhat—but sooner or later I should have started," said the dauntless Anita.

the quick, decisive movements characteristic of her.

"Anyway, I picked up some little English, and thought of pictures. I had exactly one hundred dollars, and I thought until that was gone—I should have a worry—so Gloria Swanson and I took a house—it cost eighty-five dollars a month—can you imagine that?—and I got down to three dollars by the clock.

"Gloria introduced me to C. B. de Mille, but he didn't like me—couldn't see me for dust"—she emphasized with a candor typically Gallic and a slang typically American—"but I got in the Madeline Traverse picture, 'Rose of the West,' and then Bill Desmond engaged me for 'Dangerous Waters.'

"Then I had my first real chance with Sessue Hayakawa in 'The Beggar Prince,' and after that I was featured in 'The Stranger.'

"And now?" I queried, as she drew breath.

Her tip-tilted nose wrinkled slightly.

"I have a contract with Pathé for one-reel comedies," she said briefly.

"They tell me it is good experience," she added, with a resigned shrug of a slim shoulder. "And no doubt that is the truth; but I want to cry, to make the emotion—to make big name for myself—and then I am push off barns and hid under tiger-skins—can you heat it?"

I sympathized, but Beatrice's lightning-change mind was already on another subject.

"When you describe me," she said earnestly, "don't say my eyes are like deep pools of muddy water or that my lips are like Cupid's bow—just say that when God made curly hair, He left me out; I have to put it up in curling kids at night, and I feel like I sleep on marbles."

Her plaint was real enough, but there was a glint of laughter in her eyes. It is impossible for her to take anything seriously—even "sleeping on marbles."

As a matter of fact, I hadn't had time to consider whether she was beautiful or not. Her startling brown eyes, which are by turns naïve as a child's and sardonic as those of a woman of the world, her flexible eyebrows, which move with every change of expression, her lips turned up slightly at the corners as if she were forever on the verge of a laugh—perhaps at your expense—her whole vivid personality, combined with an amazing frankness and a delightful sense of humor, entirely captivate one and put the question of mere beauty into the mental background. Her English vocabulary has been acquired from a hundred sources, not all of them pedantic. She catches up every slang phrase with the avidity of a child and swears upon occasion with utmost naïveté.

"Now, I am ready for my costume," she pronounced, flashing a last critical look at herself in the mirror. "There is not much of it—I am a model in this pic-mechanical dolls worked by strings as far as he was concerned. He left the theater, hopeless but hungry. Youth may suffer, but it must be fed, and at the window of the nearest white-tiled eating place he stopped, staring with unbelieving eyes. For there, before the griddle, struggling with a spreading puddle of pancake batter, stood a small, boy-sleuder figure with masses of dark hair escaping untidily from under the cocky little cook's cap.

Richard dived thru the revolving door so tempestuously that he sent the stout, respectable citizen in the next compartment reeling in a disreputable manner along the pavement. Unheeding the efforts of a blonde beauty to lead him to a seat, he leaped the brass rail by the griddle and treated an enthralled audience of homegoing theater patrons to the interesting spectacle of a young man taking the cook in his arms while the batter blackened merrily, unturned.

After a moment, however, it did occur to Richard that there was something odd and perhaps uncalled for in his attitude and he released Maria Louise. "Why—what—who—when?" he babbled. "You—in New York—working in a hashery, Grand Duchess—"

"Not any longer, Richard!" Maria Louise smiled sadly. Then the sadness vanished. "Do you know the reason I am in New York, Richard? Because—the day so long ago you told me it was when you lived."

Another total eclipse of the cook was threatened, but an interruption in the shape of an irate manager intervened. "Wha's all this!" he began belligerently. "Comin' in here an' burnin' up my griddle. D'you want me to call a cop?"

Richard drew himself up splendidly. So far as is known, his great-great-grandfather was not a king, but a butcher in Keokuk, Iowa, but he spoke as royalty might address a member. "That will do, my good fellow! This young lady is no longer in your employ. Maria Louise, take off that apron and cap and get on your things. I am going to take you home."

And Maria Louise, enraptured at being ordered about, as all women, whether Grand Duchesses or waitresses, are enraptured when they find a man who will bully them, obeyed.

There is no doubt that the distance New York are great, and that the subway service is not all it should be, even admitting this, it does seem a trifle odd that it should have taken Richard and his little ex-Grand Duchess two hours to go from Forty-second Street to Thirty-ninth! And there, in the little sitting-room of Maria Louise's little flat, they found a stoutish gentleman, with a drooping and dispirited tache, slumbering, an alarm clock set for midnight in one hand.

"Poor Arneau will insist on coming for me every night," Maria Louise complained, as they gazed down at the

THE SECRET REVEALED

Did you ever look at a beautiful flower and try to fathom its beauty and fragrance?
Did you ever see women, returned from seashore and mountain, still retaining their wonderful flowerlike complexion, even after the tan of the hot summer suns and the rough winds and dust of Fall, and wonder what was their secret?
This beauty and fragrance of the flower is the secret of Mother Nature, but the charm of a Wonderful Velvety Skin is the secret of D & R Perfect Cold Cream.

The secret is yours for the asking. Just drop a postal to Daggett & Ramsdell, Box 1512, D & R Building, New York, and a sample of D & R Perfect Cold Cream will be mailed free, with our compliments, or your dealer will supply you D & R Perfect Cold Cream, in tubes and jars at 12c to $1.65.

Prime Minister. "I think the dear old fellow feels it very bitterly because I don't wear a crown to work. He is old, Richard, and he doesn't understand the new world. Come, let us wake him and tell him the news."

When the ex-Prime Minister saw the joy in his ex-Duchess' face, he sprang up and brought his tired old body sharply to salute. "You have had good news?" he asked breathlessly. "You are going to be Grand Duchess again?"

"I have better news than that, Papa Arneau!" Maria Louise laughed, and drew Richard close to her side. "I am going to marry Richard tomorrow as soon as the marrying-place is open, and I am the happiest girl in all the world!"

The glow of hope faded from the old man's countenance, but his eyes, upon the two radiant young faces before him, were resigned. It was unthinkable, but after all, so long as she was happy—

He bowed, magnificently, from the waist. "It shall be as Your Sublime Highness desires," sighed the ex-Prime Minister.

strong faiths and dreams . . . things such as "The Broken Melody," for instance."

I left Lucy Cotton and her mother with the happy sensation of having terra firma under my feet the while my head was encircled with the softness of dreams. I felt that she was remarkable. I felt that she had achieved. She knows herself. She has made a study of herself. She is her own critic. She has allowed no outside influence to detract her or distract her. She has marked herself a pathway and she walks upon it, pausing only when and where she wills. She is gentle and she is firm; she is tender, yet one knows that she is strong. She loves her work, loves her family, her mother first and foremost, of course, her sisters and her one little nephew, who declares that he is going to "marry you, Lucy, when I get big." His companionship," she said, in her silken-cotton way, "means more to me than I can ever say. I get, oh, so much out of it."

She gets something from everything. Lucy Cotton, something beautiful, because something in some way constructive. The garments of illusion have never dropped from her. The candid eyes from under the level brows still see in poor plain meales red flowers, growing . . .

Happy Lucy! Happy world! Amen!

THE NEW POETS

By WRIGHT FIELD

In the old days
Rose here and there a giant oak, which thrust
Its shadow all the further centuries thim;
But, save for these, the barren earth, a-dust,
Thirsted for beauty, as the centuries grew.

In these new days
The oak gives place to humbler wayside trees,
The thrill of life is felt in every clod;
Now songs, like blossoms, spring to every breeze—
At last the common people talk with God!

These are the Hours that Count-

MOST of your time is mortgaged to work, meals and sleep. But the hours after supper are yours, and your whole future depends on how you spend them. You can fritter them away on profitless pleasure, or you can make those hours bring you position, money, power, real success in life.

Thousands of splendid, good-paying positions are waiting in every field of work for men trained to fill them. There's a big job waiting for you—in your present work or any line you choose. Get ready for it! You can do it without losing a minute from work, or a wink of sleep, without hurrying a single meal, and with plenty of time left for recreation. You can do it in one hour after supper each night, right at home, through the International Correspondence Schools.

Yes, you can win success in an hour a day. Hundreds of thousands have proved it. The designer of the Packard "Twin-Six," and hundreds of other Engineers, climbed to success through I. C. S. help. The builder of the great Equitable Building and hundreds of Architects and Contractors won their way to the top through I. C. S. spare-time study. Many of this country's foremost Advertising and Sales Managers prepared for their present positions in spare hours under I. C. S. instruction.

For 29 years men in offices, stores, shops, factories, mines, railroads—in every line of technical and commercial work—have been winning promotion and increased salaries through the I. C. S. Over 110,000 men are getting ready right now in the I. C. S. way for the bigger jobs ahead.

No matter where you live, the I. C. S. will come to you. No matter what your handicaps or how small your means, we have a plan to meet your circumstances. No matter how limited your previous education, the simply written, wonderfully illustrated I. C. S. textbooks make it easy to learn. No matter what career you may choose, some one of the 280 I. C. S. Courses will surely suit your needs.

When everything has been made easy for you—when one hour a day spent with the I. C. S., in the quiet of your own home, will bring you a bigger income, more comforts, more pleasures, all that success means—can you afford to let another single priceless hour of spare time go to waste? Make your start right now! This is all we ask: Without cost, without obligating yourself in any way, put it up to us to prove how we can help you. Just mark and mail this coupon.

of becoming an actor. But the costumes he designed for "Male and Female" caused so much admiring comment that he has definitely decided to make designing his profession.

"I wanted to be a designer at one time," said Miss Kirkham, "and I think I would have made a really big success at it . . . I certainly didn't have any great gift for the stage. Marshall Steadman once told me that I would never make an actress."

She feels that all her dramatic ability has been developed by work and experience. She has appeared in over thirty moving pictures, eleven of them made last year. In many of these she played the "heavy."

"I've been married to almost every character man on the screen," she said, "and I've been the mother of many a young girl who was really older than myself, or, anyway, just one or two years younger."

"But really, I've had a very easy time—almost too easy a time." There used to be nights when I would actually pray that my parents would lose everything they had so that I would have to work for a living! That sounds terrible, I know, and yet there were times when I would refuse calls I really should have accepted. Afterwards, I would feel sorry about it and wish that I might be like some of the girls I knew, so poor that I would have to work whether I wanted to or not!

"But now I can see how my financial independence was really a protection. Unlike the girl who has to be careful of her job, I didn't have to take any insults from anybody—I could always quit. And in this, as in practically every other kind of work, it is true that nothing succeeds like success. The girl who looks as tho she doesn't need a position is generally the one who gets it."

Kathleen Kirkham was born in Menominee, Michigan, in 1893. As a little girl she was in stock for a while at Lakeside, Wisconsin. In the same company were Walter Long, now at Lasky's, and Matt Moore. She was also with Dustin Farnum in "The Squaw Man" and "The Virginian." Following a period of training in two Los Angeles dramatic schools, she started free-lancing around the studios.

"I have never played atmosphere, exactly," she said, "but I have never been under contract. I worked for quite a while at Universal and getting on very well, I thought, so I offered to sign a contract with them for as long a term as they liked at a salary of $15.00 a week and they turned me down!" This was only a little over four years ago.

"It was 'The Eyes of the World' that established me as a 'heavy,'" she went on, "and I don't regret it in the least! At that time there were only about five 'heavies' in Los Angeles and no end of work. Often I used to wish that there could be a little more competition so that life would be more exciting. And then when a new girl would come up, I'd say to myself, 'Kathie, you'll have to look out now; you'll have to work a little harder!' and I loved it!

"And then I became a star, you know," she smiled, "at Balboa."

"How much did they get you for?" I asked.

"Only two weeks! That was because I had made a rule never to wait more than a week for my salary. I've always said that if my salary wasn't ready for me on a Saturday night, I wouldn't go to work Monday morning.

"They weren't what you would call exceedingly good pictures. I remember one day I took my family to see one of them at a nickel theater on West Pico Street. There were six or seven murders in it. I played a sort of vampy character who had to faint in just about every scene.

"There she goes again!" the man in front of me would say every time I fainted. But the funniest thing was my entrance!"

It seems that some man in the audience drawled in a high voice, "Gawd, look who's here."

"After all," she remarked, thoughtfully, "I haven't gone ahead as rapidly as many of the girls I know and started with. But then, speed is only relative . . .

"That reminds me of a story my mother tells about her first automobile ride. It was in one of the first automobiles ever made and my mother was leaning back, enjoying the rapid motion and the feel of the wind in her face. Finally, overcome with curiosity, she leaned over and touched the driver.

"How fast do you think we are going?" she asked. And he answered in an awe-struck voice:

"We're going fifteen if we're going a mile!"

Some of Miss Kirkham's pictures that come most readily to mind are the three she did with Douglas Fairbanks, "He Comes Up Smiling," "A Modern Musketier" and "Arizona." Others are "For Husbands Only," "The Gay Lord Quex," "When Dawn Came" and, latest of all, Angelica in Screen Classics' "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath," the last named something new for her in that it is farce comedy.

ture, and I do a dance of seven veils—with six of them in the wash."

Sorry as I was to miss the dance of the seven-minus-six veils, I had to go back to town. But, mon dieu, what a difference! It wasn't blue Monday at all, I discovered. The gateman apologized for his remarks, the car started without a cough, and on the way back to town I saw the motor cop, who waved his hand to me. Perhaps it wasn't all Beatrice's doings, but I'm not so sure. Anyway, I recommend her as a cure for the blues—even the Monday variety.

After 10 Days

Your teeth may also glisten

All statements approved by high dental authorities

Millions of teeth now glisten as they have not done before. You see them everywhere.

A new method of teeth cleaning has, in late years, come into very wide use. Thousands of dentists are urging it. Multitudes of people have proved it and adopted it. And every person is now offered a free ten-day test.

To combat the film

The purpose is to combat the film which causes most tooth troubles. Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. In the months between your dental cleanings it may do a ceaseless damage.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Very few escape

Very few people have escaped some of these tooth troubles, despite the daily brushing. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve film, so the tooth brush has left much of it intact.

Dental research has for many years sought a way to fight this film, and the way has now been found. Many clinical tests have amply proved its efficiency. And now leading dentists everywhere are urging its adoption.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And millions of people are now enjoying its benefits.

Sent to any one who asks

The Pepsodent results are quick and apparent. Everyone who sees them will desire them. So, to spread the facts, a 10-Day Tube is sent to anyone who asks.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

A new discovery has made pepsin possible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But now a harmless activating method enables us to constantly fight the film-coat in this way.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Do this now, for few things are more important. The results may be life-long in extent. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

"Herb"!

another brother, Stanley. Stanley mingled with the English lads at the conservatoire, he with the French. Stanley was rather vague.

As a youngster, Master Rawlinson showed none of the signs of being the physical culture specimen he is now. His languid condition so worried the elders that, after completing his elementary course in French, the Isles lacking beneficial climate, a farm in Canada was designated for his future habitat. Arriving here, an adolescent, alone, without a mission other than to grow into sturdy manhood, his wonder at the vastness that was before him, his awe at the opportunities that awaited, culminated only in the greeting, "Well, here I am! Do your darndest. I'll do mine!"

That he was an actual farmer I do not conclude. All I could grasp from his unconnected, happy, rapid phrases, (Rawlinson doesn't talk in stories; he hasn't time, especially about himself), was the mention of fields and sunshine and ecstatic sensations of dogged fatigue when he came to the end of perfect days. He couldn't have been a thorough harvester, because there were plays he'd go to see and circuses in which he wallowed. In truth, one circus absorbed such vital interest that glowing, growing Herb forsook the hay for the sawdust and ran off with another chap to join the troupe.

That started it. Then came the lure of the stock companies. And one, of which he happened to be very much a part, ceased meandering for a while when it reached Los Angeles, long enough to give a moving picture director the chance to see Rawlinson and ask him if he'd ever thought of becoming cinematically entangled. Rawlinson hadn't thought, but he had a laugh. The figures financially confided by the M. P. D., that screen work would involve, choked Rawlinson's chuckle at its zenith. The comparisons of the salaries of a stock company actor and a moving picture actor weren't odious, but serious. The minstrel band next week continued its tour without its popular juvenile.

That was quite a while ago. "Florodora's" sextette can claim its originals, and also the Klieg-light industry. If ever a boast is to be made, the director who spied Rawlinson need not only label himself a pioneer, but add the laurel of having vision. It's all right to start something and better to finish. But what is more wonderful—it shows in the careers of overnight stars—is to start and not to finish. Rawlinson has come thru with this man's predictions materialized. The phenomenon is that he still is coming. And no wonder. At this season's Lambs Gambol, presented at the Metropolitan, the excitement of the evening was credited to him. Not once on the program did he appear, after a lengthy absence from the stage, but twice—in specialty numbers. It is good the first was scheduled when it was, an act, alone, with a ukulele, some songs and snappy monolog. The second, a dramalet, demanded of him to box another chap, and he once more "did his darndest," fought too joyously and vigorously for footlight illusion, and answered the clamor of his curtain-calls with a felicitous black eye.

That night set him thinking and his telephone ringing. Managers called to ask him to talk over with them a "great part in a new play." And the fellows at the club would exclaim, "Rawlie, why, to sing and dance and play the uke the way you can, you'd be crazy not to go into musical comedy."

Pals in the hotel would enthuse, "Rawlie, why, to 'emote,' and act and be able to use a voice like yours, you'd be crazy not to go back to drama."

He doesn't know what to do now. At present he's working on J. Stuart Blackton's "The Soul-Spinners," because he's well aware of the fact that hell knows no fury like desires torn, and to be energetically steeped in labor is to ease one's puzzled self. He's "sure of the movies. Even has contracts pending. There's pecuniary advantage. And he's faithful to the screen public," etc., etc. Yet the personal audience, the applause, the triumph at the Metropolitan "got him"—and who can blame him, or restrain old blood from tickling?

At any rate, not until he has an offer of the right vehicle will he be moved towards Longacre. He doesn't want to rush things or to be rushed. His conviction is that everything will come in its right time and place.

About Rawlinson there are three distinctions: a laugh, a boyishness, a radiance. Humor, to him, is as elusive as a firefly to the moon. In the same pace that pursuit is laid for the will-o'-the-wisp, he chases a joke and goes in quest of fun. The glory, then, to have captured! "Come on," he cries, "let's go!" And where does he go? Just off, into the merry roar of Rawlinson. His exuberance is intoxicating.

Boyishness, because of his spontaneity. He doesn't wait to like or dislike. And he'd much rather "like."

Radiance, if from nothing else than health, and being dazzlingly clean and trying to be happy.

There is nothing of the superfluous about him. He is sincere. One is sure of his dependability. There is nothing of the extreme, other than a completeness in balance. He is normal, a red-blood. No tantrums, no temperamentalities, no mopes, no under-the-weather and up-in-the-skies for which every one else is expected to pay. A vigorous law unto himself. A radical.

MY MEMORIES

A face in the dark that brought $200

HE never saw the girl again. One moment's glimpse was all he caught—the swift impression of a frightened-looking girl with staring eyes and a white face pressed to the rainy window pane.

The incident was nothing. But he carried home with him the memory of her face. He wondered what made her look like that, what sort of a girl she was.

Slowly an explanation took shape in his mind: details fell into place, and, one rainy night which reminded him of the other, he sat down and wrote "The Girl in the First Floor Flat."

And he sold the story for $200.

It didn't matter that the true explanation was far different; he had caught the glimpse—the hint—he needed, and his trained imagination had done the rest.

You, too, can learn to write short stories and photoplays

If you have ever wondered about the beggar to whom you gave a dime; if people's faces make you wish to know the secrets that they hide—then you have in you story-telling power. For anyone who has this spark of interest, the ability to write is a question of training—nothing more. It can be acquired just like the ability to add up a column of figures.

How to develop a story from a commonplace incident; how to select the essential points; how to plan and lay them out; how to handle dialogue; how to sell the finished story and where—step by step the Hoosier Institute takes you, by personal instruction. Well-known writers who are familiar with Hoosier Institute training are enthusiastic in their praise. The late Jack London said: "I like your simple, direct, straight-from-the-shoulder method of presenting the matter. As somewhat of a veteran in the short-story game, I feel justified in giving my judgment that your course in short-story writing is excellently comprehensive and practical."

And this training may be yours during your idle hours.

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper "Trados" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct Ill-Shaped Noses without cost if not satisfactory.

Faces Made Young

The secret of a youthful face will be sent to any woman whose appearance shows that time or illness or any other cause is stealing from her the charm of girlhood beauty. It will show how without cosmetics, creams, massage, masks, plasters, straps, vibrators, "beauty" treatments or other artificial means, she can remove the traces of age from her countenance. Every woman, young or middle aged, who has a single facial defect should know about these remarkable which remove lines and "crows feet" and wrinkles; fill up hollows; give roundness to sagging corners of the mouth and clear up muddy or sallow skins. It will show how five minutes daily with Kathryn Murray's simple facial exercises will work wonders. This information is free to all who ask for it.

each evening we spend two hours or more at the dinner-table.

Ann was named after her grandmothers, great-grandmothers and—but, they are traced back to 1630 clearly—all Anns. Further back, she comes of a Viking strain. That gives her the courage, endurance and great love of all out-of-door work. She rides, swims, golfs, "tennises" (as she calls it), skates, shoots—and just a few weeks ago brought down her limit of wild ducks at Great Bear Lake, California.

"Next December, my parents and I go to Denmark for a real old-fashioned Christmas—with plenty of skating and home-baking and spicy trees, and the game we shall shoot, for daddy is a great sportsman, too."

Ann first became interested in pictures in her native city, where old Broncho Billy pictures were shown. She would attend with her schoolmates on Wednesdays and Saturdays, when pupils have half-holidays over there. Often she wished she might act—and now her friends are all intensely interested in her success. They go to see Ann's plays, and can scarcely wait until she arrives in Denmark for the Yule festival.

"I'm afraid some young Dane will want to marry you and keep you over there now that you are famous," I ventured.

"That's what daddy is afraid of. He says they will spoil me. But I say: 'No!' I marry only an American. I love the old country, but not to live in any more—my parents feel the same about that. But I'll tell you my ambition. I want to marry in America and have lots of children. I think all those who were raised in a big family, want big families of their own, dont you?" I didn't, but that's neither here nor there and far be it from me to spoil Ann's idealism.

Miss Forrest has a prized trophy—the whip with which she was beaten in "Dangerous Days"—inscribed by every one connected with the production. Mary Roberts Rinehart cried at rehearsals—and some one thought her displeased or disappointed, but she said intensely: "Oh, no, I'm just crying over that dear child's acting. She is the very embodiment of my little heroine." Mrs. Rinehart inscribed a copy of the book to Ann and wrote on the whip: "In memory of a very great piece of acting done by Miss Forrest."

Another inscription read: "From your brutal director." The scenario writer penned the words: "We always beat the thing we love."

Miss Forrest has a unique collection of film cut from every production in which she has appeared. One of the men on the lot has assembled these as she gets them and so now they may be run anytime Ann wants to see how she's getting along. But mostly—

"Yes, mostly, I want to keep them for my grandchildren, and when I am an old lady in lavender and real lace, I want to show the little folks how their grandmother looked in her teens, when she played with handsome men—most of them long dead now!" Ann looked decidedly romantic. Perhaps she has cause to, for no longer is she to be forced to play ingénues. She has betrayed so versatile and adaptable a nature, such great histrionic development, that Ann Forrest henceforth will be cast as an emotional lead, playing characters from up-to-the-minute novels. Gouverneur Morris is to write a special story for her one of these days. He takes a keen interest in her work.

Miss Forrest cares nothing for clothes. She buys handsome frocks for her productions, but as garments, she loves them not. She is essentially feminine, frilly, but she's courageous enough to do anything that a Diana would attempt. She was one of the first women to ascend in an aeroplane, having gone up with Silas Christopherson, a compatriot of hers, in Tacoma, about seven years ago. Ann drives a Stutz and has done her 75 miles an hour without facing a judge or parting with a fine.

She has played the part of a twelve-year old child in "The Prince Chap," switched over to an abused little German girl in "Dangerous Days," played a lead in "The Rainbow Trail," with William Farnum, a thriller with Houdini, and is well on the way to celluloid heaven with its meteoric possibilities and special reservations for new stars.

Ann speaks four languages fluently, has a talent for writing and is to study voice culture as soon as time permits. She's a very melancholy Dane when really blue—but that happens so seldom that one's only impression of Miss Forrest is that of a wonderfully magnetic, charming personality set in a beautiful exterior.

It's not a bit difficult to know Ann Forrest. She is so cordial, well-read, entertaining and lovable that if a watchful wardrobe woman were not present on the upstairs tier of dressing-room row, one would surely outstay the time set by Dame Decorum.

So when the estimable matron strolled in with a huge bouquet of yellow roses, laburnums and heliotrope, saying "Miss Forrest, these just came off a set, will you take them home?" and plunged into a conversation about silver lace, beads and charmeuse, I knew it was about time for me to stalk off like Hamlet's ghost.

But the memory of a bewitching little face, with eyes like an aurora borealis and teeth like the snows of her native land, remained with me for hours afterward . . . for with sweet graciousness, Ann Forrest had pressed the flowers into my hand, saying: "You will enjoy those, I know, and I would love you to have them."

The Youngest Movie Magnate

his office in the Selznick Fort Lee studios.

Between ten and one o'clock he goes over the multitude of details of his production, scenario and business departments. He is here, there and everywhere; one moment conferring with a director on a stage, at another checking up production charts with a chief of that department.

At one o'clock he has lunch in his office. Until six o'clock he handles further details.

At six o'clock he usually motors to his New York offices to glance over any problems that may arise there.

Then he goes home, most of the time with two or three scenarios under his arm.

He admits that he is so occupied with business all week that he finds little time to devote to scenario reading. He usually goes to the Gedney Farms in Westchester County over the week-end and there reads script after script.

It is interesting to note that Myron Selznick has more producing units working under his personal direction than any other man in the whole film field. Today his activities keep four studios in and near New York busy: the Selznick, the old Biograph, the Peerless and the Solax studios. Until recently he was producing on the coast also. But he came to the conclusion that the cross-country distance prevented intelligent and adequate team work.

Myron Selznick exhibits no particular pride over his achievements. He is a son of his father, that's all. And his father is, as we have just related, Lewis J. Selznick, one of the screen world's foremost sales organizers.

"I heard photoplays talked all my life," smiles Myron Selznick. "I guess my father has marketed some five hundred pictures. What was more natural than that I should enter the game? My dad wanted me to go to college and I did—to Columbia for two months. But I couldn't contain my restlessness any longer and I told my father I wanted him to give me a chance.

"He smiled—and I guess he decided to cure me. At least he put me to work the following morning in the film-examining room at World Film. The work-day began at seven A. M. and I received five dollars a week. It was a strenuous job, for it meant carefully looking over film in a dark room, watching for flaws and defects. At the end of a week I could hardly move my fingers, they had been so cut by film.

"I stuck," laughed Myron. (Which rather sums up his character.) "Father moved me thru his purchasing and advertising departments. 'You'll learn the whole game,' he grimly told me.

"Then business changes came about and father disposed of his interests. The post of managing Norma Talmadge's studio was offered me. That instilled an idea. I wanted to carry on the name of Selznick. I resolved to produce and I signed Olive Thomas. That's all, for I have been steadily adding stars ever since.

"Please make it clear that I direct Selznick Pictures. Dad hasn't been over to our studios twice in a year. True, I frequently talk over things at night with him, as is quite natural, but I manage my own companies in every sense of the word.

"My methods?" Myron Selznick paused. "Nothing more or less than to make entertaining photoplays and to build up and maintain the best organization with that end in view."

Here we pause to note the youthful atmosphere of camaraderie about the Selznick studios. Nearly every one—from star to carpenter—is young. "I believe in youth," says Myron, whose twenty-second birthday comes next October.

"We're one big family and there is no red tape about our organization," he went on. "Anyone can get to see me at any time. That's why I have my office in my studio rather than in Times Square. We're all working together, and I'm here to be seen."

All of which is true. For instance, they have a baseball team at the studio and Myron plays short-stop upon it. There is nothing up-diamond about him, for chauffeurs and electricians who play with him talk to him forcibly and naturally about his playing without thinking of him as their employer. It's all part of the spirit of the Selznick studios.

"I've made something like fifty productions so far," Myron Selznick concluded. "I know their faults. But I'm learning and I think we are steadily working ahead. Anyway, it's great fun!"

The Joyous Pagan

But Western pictures did not appeal to her as a permanent thing. After persistent requests, she was cast to play opposite Frank Mayo in "Burnt Wings." Universal believed that they had discovered a star and offered her a five-year contract, with the assurance of an immediate twinkle. For various reasons, she refused. After that came the rôle of the innocently sinning wife in the Metro production, "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath."

"So you see," said Josephine, "I have done quite a bit, if I am only eighteen. Korsukan is a relentless slave-driver! I suppose that is very ungrateful."

Her eyes wandered about the room. "I do wish Jack would come home," she sighed.

"Did your heathen god have anything to do with bringing you Jack?" I enquired, somewhat rashly perhaps.

"Oh, indeed yes! When he first wanted to k—to hold my hand, he didn't feel sure whether he could or not, so I just said, 'Korsukan'—and he did!"

to delay us, and every day seemed a week to me, for I was afraid my trip East would be spoiled."

"How can you ever leave your aeroplane even for New York?" I asked, knowing that he spent every spare moment with his new six-thousand-dollar machine.

"Olive!" he replied, simply, but the tone spoke volumes, and I remembered that his wife, Olive Thomas, was still making her pictures in the East and he was planning a visit with her in New York.

"Jack is so reckless," sighed Mrs. Pickford, smiling fondly at the boy. "It frightens me to think of him flying. He comes over the studio and seems fairly to touch the telegraph poles."

"Nonsense, mother; I'm miles above them!" He spoke soothingly, while he winked mischievously at his sister.

"I believe I have always been battling his speed craze," went on Mrs. Pickford.

"Sure, mother, for it began a long time ago. When I first went into pictures I begged for a motor-cycle, but you told me you would never buy me one. You were so emphatic I knew you never would. I determined to earn the money and buy it myself, but, by that time, I was all over my motor-cycle notion and bought a Stutz roadster. Only had it a couple of weeks when I had a terrible accident. We spun around four times, then landed in a heap, and, tho I crawled out unhurt, the car was a total wreck."

There have been many cars since then, each of a greater speed, but he longed for even a swifter machine and was among the first of the film colony to become interested in aeroplanes, now possessing one of his very own.

"If you hadn't followed your sister into pictures, what do you suppose you would have been?" I asked, watching him smooth his hair with both hands, one of his characteristic movements.

"Dont know," he replied cheerfully; "run a street-car, I guess."

"No, you would probably have been a baseball player," chimed in Mary. "He passed thru a serious attack of baseball fever."

"Maybe," assented Jack, easily. "I think the first ambition I ever had was when we were playing with Chauncey Olcott. I wanted to be a stage carpenter. They gave me fifty cents a week for helping set the stage, and I remember the big hammer I carried around in the hip pocket of my small trousers."

The Pickford family have had many interesting experiences, and we sat there for a couple of hours, while Jack and Mary recounted their childhood pranks.

As I was leaving, Jack caught my hand, whispering, anxiously, "You wont put in all that stuff, will you?" He looked so like a little boy as he stood in the open door, and there was a hint of Mary's wistful appeal in his dark eyes, so I promised.

Wanted: Screen Faces for the Movies

Hundreds of All Types Needed. You May Have Perfect Screen-Features

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for you to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

Ralph Ince, famous Selznick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his work in directing Mary Pickford, says: "I am now convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." P. A. Powers, of Universal, says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsement of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

This is a fascinating profession paying big salaries. Don't miss this opportunity. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrap up this new guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-5, Wilmington, Delaware.

Unless you are sincere in your desire to get in the movies, please do not send for this printed guide.

Dear Marjorie:-

A chap across the street just treated me to a real thrill. No, he didn't appear on the window ledge in indelicate negligee and do setting up exercises or anything like that. He just showed me a picture.

If you can look at that picture without the same sort of thrill, then I'm sorry. I'm coming home next week! Just get a look!

Hammock; old maple tree down by grape arbor; birds and grasshoppers; bees and summer little whiffs
of breeze across the flower beds; sweet little girl; music.

Oh, Madge! Finish the picture yourself! I've just got to go and take that mandolin away from that fellow across the street; if he keeps on playing burstures I'll go dippy—

You know you ought not to read any more of Marjorie's letter—because you're almost sure what the rest of it is, and you wouldn't want everybody to read your letters, or pry into the intimate little memories and vague longings that are brought to your mind by this "picture."

Queer what music, or the mere thoughts of music, will do to a person's mind—yet not so queer after all. Music is so intimately personal, no wonder we automatically associate it with the things that are nearest and dearest.

But think of the barren places in the lives of those who do not know the joy of making music! Yet even these are just as human as we—they get the same thrill from Marjorie's letter and the picture—but it's a thrill with something missing.

Gibson Instruments

We want to tell these folks about GIBSON instruments, the most intimately personal of all musical instruments. Because they bring self-performed music within the reach of everyone,—whether the taste be for classic, popular, or the dashing "jazz" of the day,—GIBSONS are universally known as "ideal home and companion instruments." Easy to play, entirely satisfying in every respect, superb in workmanship, finish, and tone.

GIBSONS have played a part in hundreds of little romances—confidential human histories—about which we shall be glad to tell you. Also the GIBSON Book and free trial proposition sent for the asking. These will help you to become better acquainted with the GIBSON family.

"The effect of this huge growing film octopus is already evident. On every side you see the big forces—the leading directors and stars—withdrawing to 'go it alone.' Suppose that the coming combination could find it possible to substantially eliminate all outside production. How much of art would be left? Where would the photoplay be without its Griffiths, its Inces, its Neilans and its Pick-fords?"

"The result of such a colossus would be a similarity and sameness of product. That would be inevitable, since the productions would be decided upon by one body of men. Thus you would see the creation of two or three kinds of screen production and the loss of all artistic individuality.

"If such a film organization could grip the country, you would quickly see a falling off in quality. It is inevitable and human, if the theaters could be shackled and screen production dictated to audiences, that the whole thing would be brought down to the point of paying the biggest dividend. Do not forget how the theatrical syndicate gained such a grip and then demanded so high a percentage from stage producers and from theaters that artistic productions were well-nigh impossible.

"I know of what I speak. In my position with Famous Players-Lasky, I worked hand in hand for the very ideas which I am now fighting. Indeed, I created some of them. But I did not realize the menace of Wall Street.

"I was, for instance, one of those to first instill the idea of producing stage plays, thereby controlling ultimate screen rights and getting all the profits from the outset. I know the attacks this scheme has attracted. But I see no menace in it—even from my present view-point. It is charged that it will bring a lowering of the stage's artistic level and that it will mold our stage drama into melodrama, since motion picture producers will present only plays of action, these being fitted for later film purposes.

"Let me answer this specifically. I cannot see where the stage—man for man—is higher artistically than the screen. In answer to the direct charge, I say that film-footlight producers will bring a vitality to the stage by injecting action, while, at the same time, the screen will gain along the lines of the thought drama. I believe that both will be gainers.

"But to return to the menace, as I see it. The time is ripe for an independent movement and already it is appearing. The First National Exhibitors' Circuit is the one big organization as yet. This is a combination of exhibitors.

"The independent movement must come from the exhibitor. At present I find that certain far-sighted exhibitors and exhibitor organizations realize this in a measure. Unfortunately, the word independence to some people seems to mean a lack of organization. When we cast off from England, our colonies did not remain disorganized. They united for the common cause. Exhibitors must do likewise, if they wish to gain their independence—the right to have a say in those things in which they are concerned.

"I know the attacks that are made upon the exhibitor. It is customary to call him the weak link in the photoplay chain. But it isn't true in 1920. I have been studying the exhibitor at first-hand and I have observed his tremendous improvement. The old-type exhibitor is disappearing. Nowhere is this clearer than in the Middle West.

"The independent movement must come from the exhibitor. That is clear. The exhibitor must guarantee theaters to the producer, so that the producer, in turn, can be sure of a market and can guarantee artists and authors theaters in which they can secure a dignified representation. Today an independent producer could not sign a reputable star without being able to guarantee him a reputable channel of release.

"Thus the independent movement must start from the source of the photoplay. With exhibitors organized, the photoplay could in every sense of the word be independent of Wall Street. And in no other way can the photoplay advance."

SORROW-BIRD

By BETTY EARLE

Late I heard the night-wind sighing, sighing, Slipping thru the dim leaves, dripping white with dew;

Pitiful you listened; turned then, crying,
And all because a hurt bird struck its harp for you.

And all because a wild bird wanting, wanting—
Lonely for the lost mate only robins knew,
Thru the halls of anguish haunting, haunting, Opened up its sorrow-heart and sobbed for you.

Blindly then you clutched me, hoping, hoping—
Leaping into glad arms, weeping, too;
Dimly as the night-wind lips reached, groping—

Wistfully the bird went but we never knew.

IDEALS

By VARA MACBETH JONES

He untwined the star-glow strands from the fabric of a dream
Where were woven Life's ideals, as to eyes of Youth they seem,
And reweave its shimmering glory where silversheet lights gleam.

And it mirrored Hearts redeemed from the stain of worldly dross,
And the bubble myth of Gain that is blown at Honor's loss,
And Achievement's height that's reached in the shadow of a cross.

But the pen was vitriol dipped that the critic used to flay,
And the mocking crowds but came to see a visionary's play;
Yet among the throng that came to scoff three remained to pray.

For the soul of a Scarlet Woman writhed at the birth of shame,
And a Renegade of Honor felt the acid-sear
of blame;
While a Hopeless One glimpsed afar the glow of hope's bright flame.

Pathe Comedies

Harold Lloyd—From Coast to Coast the Trail of His Comedies is Swept With Gales of Laughter!

Real comedy is the hardest of all forms of motion pictures to write, enact and direct. Is it not remarkable, then, that many dramatic critics and theatre men state in positive terms that the Harold Lloyd comedies give more entertainment and are more popular with audiences than the "feature" pictures which are supposed to be the backbone of the average motion picture show?

"Lloyd is a big league comedian, his company is big league, and whoever does the directing is big league," says a magazine critic of these wonderful comedies.

"Lloyd is the chief bulwark of the Strand (New York) program this week in 'An Eastern Westerner,' a two-reel comedy," says Variety, a leading theatrical magazine. "In this laughing delight not a foot is wasted from start to finish. One laugh chases another constantly up the throat. In short this issue is a corker and should continue Mr. Lloyd on the pleasant trail of ten thousand weeks, which is understood to be his speed."

"Astonishingly fresh and diverting."—N. Y. Tribune. "Lloyd made a hit."—N. Y. Globe. "The audience roared. 'Haunted Spooks' is the funniest comedy of the season."—N. Y. Sun. "The man who discovered Harold Lloyd deserves a vote of thanks."—Minneapolis Tribune.

What so many have found to be astonishingly clever and diverting is worthy of special effort on your part to see; ask the manager of your theatre the days on which he shows a Harold Lloyd!

Pathe Comedies—Motion Pictures at their Best

HAROLD LLOYD TWO-REEL COMEDIES, masterpieces of mirth, one every month, produced by Hal Roach. MRS. SIDNEY DREW TWO-REEL COMEDIES, clever screen portrayals of the famous "After Thirty" stories by Julian Street. JOHN CUMBERLAND as "Jimmy Wickett" is scoring an even greater success on the screen than in various theatrical productions in Broadway theatres. ROLIN COMEDIES, featuring "Snub" Pollard and the funny little ducky, "Sunshine Sammy." One one-reel comedy every week, produced by Hal Roach.

"Bessie, Love"

"It was fully a minute before I realized that he had never seen me before in his life."

It will be noticed that Bessie Love talks more like a "fan" than an actress and so she impresses one. She is an actress, of course, and a very clever actress, but she is essentially a product of the screen. She has never been on the stage nor very closely connected with the stage in her life. She could, I think, be described as Griffithian, tho in her case the Griffith mannerisms are softened and changed by her own personality.

"I just wanted to go on the screen thru having seen so many moving pictures in company with my father," (a Los Angeles physician), she said. "My mother wasn't at all interested in pictures at that time; the photography was bad and the flickering figures hurt her eyes. But they interested my father as they did me, and we went often.

"I hadn't the least idea how to go about getting on the screen, and it didn't occur to me that there should be any particular difficulty. I decided to go and ask Mr. Griffith for work. It didn't occur to me that there would be anything unusual in my asking for Mr. Griffith personally. I thought that it was the thing to do.

"Mr. Woods told me a funny thing just a little while ago. He said that Mr. Griffith had started to leave the studio, but stopped when he saw me talking to the gateman. He knew by my manner that I wanted work. He gave orders that if I asked for him, I was to be admitted and then went back to his office and waited for me!"

So the little "fan" was featured in her first picture as a "Griffith find"; played opposite Bill Hart in her second picture, "The Aryan"; was with Douglas Fairbanks in her next two, "The Good-Bad Man" and "Reggie Mixes In," and in her fifth picture, "Sister of Six," became a star.

Now her own name of Juanita Horton is almost forgotten, even by those who gave it to her. If you were to meet Mrs. Horton, she would probably tell you that she is "Bessie Love's" mother. Bessie Love is as much Bessie Love at home as she is on the screen.

She has no brothers nor sisters, is not married, and lives with her father and mother in a pretty bungalow in Laurel Canyon.

Of all her achievements, I think Bessie Love is most proud of having succeeded in graduating from the Los Angeles high school last year.

"I left school when I started to work with Mr. Griffith," she said, "but I wanted to finish so dreadfully, that with all the work I had to do, I didn't neglect a study. And so, last year, I was able to show that I had completed my entire course and, after passing my examinations, graduated with the class."

And there you have Bessie Love, the girl Griffith waited for.

A thousand separate joys

Each serving dish of Puffed Grains contains a thousand separate joys.

Each grain is a bubble, thin and flimsy, puffed to eight times normal size.

A hundred million steam explosions have occurred in each, blasting every food cell.

The airy globules are crisp and toasted. They taste like nut-meats puffed. The morsels seem like fairy foods, almost too good to eat.

Yet these are the utmost in scientific foods. Two are whole grains, with every food cell fitted to digest. They are the foods that children like best, and the best foods they can get.

Serve with cream and sugar. Mix with your berries. Float in every bowl of milk. Crisp and douse with melted butter for hungry children in the afternoon.

They are nothing but grain foods. The nutty flavor comes from toasting. The flimsy texture comes from steam explosions. The delights are all due to scientific methods.

Serve morning, noon and night in summer, between meals and at bedtime. The more children eat the better. What other food compares with whole grains puffed?

The Photoplay of the Proletariat

His fellow workers laughed at his oddity and made sport of his ambitions. But Borzage was determined and he saved every cent with this end in view. An advertisement of a dramatic school in Salt Lake City lured him to its doors and, when the man who conducted it told him that he was about to take all his pupils on tour, Borzage fell into the trap with enthusiasm.

"My mother wept, as all mothers do," said Borzage, reminiscently, "and my father was quite furious—but I went. At that dad came to the train and, as I boarded it, slipped a roll of money—fifty dollars—into my hand. When you stop to consider what fifty dollars meant to him, you can realize his sacrifice for something he could not understand.

"Of course, the company went broke, altho the manager borrowed my fifty. I had just enough money to get home and, without letting my father know, I slipped into my old bed.

"Early the next morning father pounded upon my door. I pretended to be asleep, but dad rattled my bed. 'I just got home,' said I, sitting up and rubbing my eyes. 'Yeh,' growled father. 'Get up! It's seven o'clock—time to go to work!' So I went back to mixing mortar.

"How the men did kid me! No gentle kidding, either. But I saved up again and tried another company. This time we stranded in Montana. I was broke and nearly starved to death. Finally a man gave me a job on a railroad grading gang in the hills, and that put me upon my feet. I went back to the stage and worked in endless stock companies, playing character parts—all sorts of rôles, big and small. Eventually I landed in Los Angeles.

"I went to Thomas Ince—and, right here, I want to say that I owe everything to him. He looked at me and said, 'I'll put you on salary at twenty-five a week until I can find a leading man's part for you.' 'But I'm not a leading man,' I answered; 'I play character rôles.' 'All wrong,' said Ince. 'You'll be a lead from now on.' And he made good, giving me my first film rôle in 'The Wrath of the Gods' with Sessue Hayakawa and Tsuru Aoki.

"I went on and on from that point. I gained a lot of screen experience in acting. I went to directing, combining acting and directing, and went to the American studios. Then back with Ince at Triangle and next to doing specials for state righting. I tried to keep on acting and directing, but I finally realized that I couldn't do both—and do them well. So I decided that directing meant more to me. 'Humoresque' gave me my opportunity, that's all."

Some confusion exists regarding "Humoresque." The story of the New York Ghetto, as written by Edna Ferber, ended with the departure of the young musician for France. Borzage wrote the screen story as it stands, altho it originally had a different ending. The genius of the violin returned with an artificial hand in the original celluloid version and the tale worked to an unusual climax. But the celluloid powers that be changed the story to its present "happy" dénouement.

Borzage's future will be a matter of distinct interest to the world of the cinema. "I intend to do stories of the people," he says. "I know the folk who go to motion pictures are interested most of all in the problems, the joys and the sorrows of their own daily life, and I hope to bring to the films a reflection of all this.

"Of one thing I am sure—the photoplay has been too far from the realities of life. Screen people haven't breathed with life. Their film experiences have been false and artificial adventures. I want to go beneath the surface of things. I think the photoplay of tomorrow lies in that direction."

Borzage speaks with sincerity. There is nothing of the artificial about him. The rugged directness which carried him from the Utah mines to success has not been lost in transit. He knows life and, unless something unforeseen shifts him from his course, he is going to bring it to the screen.

We asked Borzage about his dad. "What does he think of it all?" we queried.

The director laughed. "I guess it puzzles him. But he is happy, for I have the whole family comfortably fixed out in California. I guess he simply sits—and wonders."

"My Irish Molly-O"

after all. A psychologist might say that in all probability the color combination of French grey and flame expresses her nature; that she would incline to extremes of seriousness and gaiety. However that may be, she has plenty of Irish pluck and Irish luck to carry her thru to the "top of the world."

Molly Malone was born in Denver, Colorado, in 1897.

"But I dont remember much about Denver," she said. The most vivid recollection of her childhood is of a visit she and her mother made to her uncle, who is chief metallurgist of the Van Ryn gold mine in South Africa. This was when she was about eleven years old. She was there for a year, and then her mother brought her to Los Angeles and she was given her first protracted taste of the discipline of school. Naturally, she didn't like it.

"I hated arithmetic and I was always wanting to do something differently from the way in which I was told to do it." So it was that as a student at Polytechnic High School she took six art periods and made up her mind to become an actress.

One day she was at the Vitagraph studio, talking with another girl who, like herself, was applying for work, when a man high in authority saw her and ordered that a test be made of her. Her loveliness photographed perfectly and she was given a leading part in a picture, with a promise of a big contract if she should make good.

"My Irish Molly-O"

(Yes, I know you have read that paragraph before. As a rule, it would go on to say that she was a success from her first moment before the camera.) But Molly Malone was not a success. On the contrary, she did what ninety-nine out of a hundred girls would do when suddenly placed in a leading part without previous training. She very humanly and naturally failed. (As a rule, the stories of girls who become famous "overnight" are only half truths. If you look into the facts deeply enough, you will generally find that months—perhaps years—of training have gone into the making of that "sudden" fame.)

"After that," said Molly Malone, "I went back to school again."

We sat on a chaise longue with our feet tucked under us and a box of sweets conveniently within reach.

"My next attempt to go on the screen," she said, taking another piece of candy, "was at the very bottom of the ladder. I went to Lasky's and just stayed around there, doing nothing in particular for eight months. I wasn't given a part there at all. Then I played leading parts at Universal City." (Among others, for George Cochrane and Harry Carey.)

"I love drama and I want to go back to it some time. But, I realize how much the comedy training means. It gives you lightness, dont you think?" She was quite serious. I, for one, expect to see her follow in the path of many another comedy favorite as, for instance, Betty Compson, Alice Lake and Gloria Swanson.

After leaving Universal, she played leading parts for the late "Smiling Billy" Parsons. Like Alice Lake, she was leading woman for Roscoe Arbuckle—"The Hayseed" and "The Garage" are two of the pictures that come most readily to mind—and she is being featured in Supreme Comedies, the first three being "Molly's Millions," "Molly's Mumps" and "Artistic Temperament." A fourth had not, at this writing, been named.

I think I should have forgotten how very little and childish she looked if it had not been for an accident which might have come out of one of her own comedies. On the day I saw her, she and her mother had just moved back to the court from Venice, where they had spent the summer. They had been unable to get the same cottage that they had last winter, and among other things wrong with the one they did get was the telephone, which was much, much too high for Molly to reach. It rang just as I was leaving, and her mother, who had answered it, called, "This is for you, Molly," and hastily pushed a little box underneath for her to stand on. But the box wasn't strong enough and Molly went thru it, skinning her nose on the edge of the 'phone as she fell.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. E. Berg Esenwein .. ally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 15 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers, sample copy 20c, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

make his fortune. Two years later finds him still the thirteenth clerk in the employ of a prosperous firm. Homer decides not to wait for future success, but to go back to Mainesville with his three hundred dollars savings for a vacation. He electrifies the old town into believing him a millionaire by indulging in all sorts of extravagances, from engaging the village taxi for two weeks to occupying the hotel's bridal suite. And, of course, he hits upon an idea which brings him to sudden success and wins the village belle away from the hotel owner's surly son.

Mr. Ray invests the rôle with a hundred and one subtle touches of humor and humanness. Between Mr. Ray and Jerome Storm's direction, "Homer Comes Home" becomes decidedly likeable.

In his visualization of C. Haddon Chambers' "Passers-By," (Pathé), J. Stuart Blackton does two things better than he has ever done before. He catches the damp greyness of the foggy London streets better than he has ever captured any photoplay atmosphere before. And his camera work is better, frequently being finely artistic. But it seems to us that he misses the heart note in this moving drama of Chambers, in which a young bachelor invites three passers-by into his rooms out of a storm—and finds one of them to be his sweetheart of years before. "Passers-By" is not especially well cast, William J. Ferguson, the sterling old character comedian, simply running away with the film as a whimsical old rogue of a valet.

Tom Moore gives a likeable celluloid performance in Ben Ames Williams' "The Great Accident," (Goldwyn). Moore plays a harum-scarum youth who is finally awakened when the great accident comes—i.e., when he is elected mayor of his town as a practical joke. The action moves thru a series of fearfully trite melodramatic incidents, but Moore maintains a certain interest. Jane Novak is an effective heroine.

"Married Life," (First National), is a five-reel Mack Sennett farce done in the broadest slapstick fashion. We admit our liking for two-reel Sennetts, but, in truth, this five-reeler bored us, although there are many ingeniously devised laughs. "Married Life" is described as a domestic satire, but in reality it merely relates the episodic adventures of "a man's man," played by the slant-eyed Ben Turpin. The thing is ridiculously amusing—at times. But two reels is enough of this sort of thing.

Douglas MacLean and Doris May have yet to duplicate their little comedy classic, "23½ Hours' Leave." Their latest, "Let's Be Fashionable," is a mild comedy revolving around the efforts of a loving young couple to ape the domestic indifference of their suburban colony, where every hubby is faithful to a wife—of someone else's. You will find "Let's Be Fashionable" fairly entertaining—and little more.

(Ninety-one)

To our way of thinking, Wanda Hawley got off to a bad stellar start with "Miss Hobbs," (Realart), remotely based upon the old Jerome K. Jerome comedy. It is the much-used idea of the fair man-hater who is eventually won over to love. Here Miss Hobbs gives herself to barefoot classic dancing in the morning dew, futuristic bungalows and mannish garb, until the piano-tuner, alias a rich youth in disguise, appears on the horizon. Then fads are forgotten. "Miss Hobbs" is piffling stuff. Moreover, it forces the gently pretty Miss Hawley into an affected, unreal and even unsympathetic rôle for her first starring production. We thought Donald Crisp's direction rather unimaginative.

Photoplasmic Peregrinations

Here is a little incident that may illumine you regarding one man who has been for many years the idol of screen fans the world over—Hobart Bosworth. You remember, of course, his immortal characterization of Jack London's "Sea Wolf"—in the original production, of course—and I am sure those of you who saw him in "Behind the Door" will never forget his vivid portrayal of Krug.

Hobart, good fellow that he is, drove over to a little restaurant in Hollywood the other day; he was in his overalls, begrimed and greasy, for he had been tinkering with his new machine. After ordering breakfast, he was addressed by the proprietor of the place, who evidently did not recognize in Bosworth the favorite of millions of moving picturegoers.

"Want to make a little extra change?" asked the restaurateur.

"What doing?" smiled Hobart.

"Well," the man explained, "I have a leaky pipe in my cellar that needs repairing. It will only take a few minutes to fix it. I'll take you down right after breakfast and show it to you."

Henry Kolker, the director, happened to be passing Hobart's table and explained to the café owner that he was talking to Hobart Bosworth, the famous actor.

"My Lord!" ejaculated the fellow. "How could I tell?" pointing to Bosworth's overalls.

"Dont you see the beautiful car out there?" said Mr. Kolker. "That belongs to—"

"Oh, well!" interrupted the abashed proprietor. "Most every plumber has a swell car these days, but, of course, if Mr. Bosworth isn't a plumber, I wont bother him any more about my pipe."

"Dont you believe it," roared Hobart, thoroely enjoying the situation. "I work just as hard in my profession as any plumber, even if I dont make so much money as some of them. Come on, now! Show me that pipe!"

And, would you believe it, here was this great actor voluntarily playing plumber, with the help of Mr. Kolker and the restaurant man! And I understand he fixed the pipe just as well as any professional could have, too!

of his coming, or even to notice when he stood, dangerous as a taut trigger, upon the threshold. One, a smallish, stoutish man with a limp, uncurled jauntiness about him, had his hands on Eve's shoulders, while he spoke down into her terror-twisted face gloatingly. "So you pretend you dont remember me, eh? Of course, a husband cant expect his wife—"

Eve screamed again. "Wife!" she cried in a suffocated tone, like one coming out of ether. "Wife! There was a man once called me that! I dont want to remember—oh, Dickie!"

She tried to break away and run to him, and, turning, they looked into the muzzle of his leveled revolver and into two eyes loaded with trouble. The man holding Eve was disconcerted, but he did not release her. "I beg your pardon," he began, elaborately sarcastic, "if I'm intruding, but you see this lady you have been entertaining happens to be my wife. I am Henri Caron, and we were married on the morning of the day my machine broke a wing-brace and threw me into the ocean. A tramp coaster picked me up. It was bound for South America, and didn't boast a wireless. There was a revolution on when we arrived, and for one reason and another, I was not able to make a search for Eve until very lately."

There was the ring of truth in his words; even Richard, hating him as he did, had to admit that. His revolver wavered, dropped to his side. He looked at Eve and she saw farewell in his gaze.

"Her father is waiting on my yacht yonder," the suave voice continued, enjoyingly. "Perhaps you will allow me to take my wife with me. We are very grateful, of course, for any services you may have rendered her, but a stranger's claims—"

"A stranger's!" Eve had torn herself free at last and stood by Richard Bedell's side, soft young bosom heaving. "Never! Something has happened—like waking out of a happy dream. I had forgotten—but now I remember everything! I remember that I wanted to die rather than be your wife! I even remember things that I dreamed these last months—and the man who did these things, kind, wonderful, tender things, is not a stranger! Oh, Dickie! Dickie! Why did I have to wake up?" She leaned to him, desolately, and very gently he patted her bowed head.

"He is right, I suppose," he said slowly; "he has the law and convention and all the smug habits of humankind on his side. I cant ask you to defy the whole world, Eve. There is nothing between us except—everything!"

They went out of the hut and to the cliff's edge, Richard walking beside the girl, who wept in long, silent shudders, but made no further plea. It was as tho the two were caught in the inexorable grip of some senseless but terribly powerful machine called civilization and felt themselves whirled into its crushing maw, helpless to save themselves. Henri Caron, watching the way her slender body leaned to the tall, straight figure at her side, thinking perhaps how she shrank from his touch, felt himself swept by the bitterest jealousy known to jealous mankind, that of the going for the coming, that of tired age for youth that can still feel and thrill, of surfeit for the old, undimmed wonder of desiring.

On the edge of the cliff, where Richard had cut a steep, ladder-like flight of steps down to the beach far below, he broke his lifelong habit and let his emotions have full control. Shaking with baffled fury at the savorlessness of his triumph, he sprang to Eve's side and brutally flung her away from the other man. "If I thought—" he panted; "she seems infernally sorry to leave—if I thought—"

"I advise you," Richard spoke levelly, "not to think. All men aren't like yourself, you know. There might even be one whose notion of love might interpose itself like a drawn sword between his baser self and the dear honor of the woman he loved."

"A likely tale!" shrieked Caron, and lunged at him, blind with hate. The earth crumbled under his heel; for a single instant he reeled against the sky, clutching frenziedly at nothing, then pitched backward and was gone. Richard motioned the other man, a common seaman, toward Eve. "Take care of her," he directed briefly, and let himself down upon the stone ladder. When, long moments later, he reappeared, he spoke quietly. "There is nothing that can be done for him. Row out to the yacht at once and bring the others. Explain how Caron met his death. Tell her father that Mrs. Caron is here, safe and well."

Side by side they waited, while the sound of oars melted into the eternal monotone of the sea, while the stars faded and the east grew pale. They did not speak. There are things that can be said better without words.

Morning grew luminous all about them; the little, eager waves had tips of flame. "Eve," the man said, at length, with a deep tremble in his voice and a deep awe, "Eve! Eve!"

"My man," she answered, and her voice was like a muted string. Below, across the morning sea a little boat raced fussily toward the shore, its motor barking like the voice of Custom baying at the Cosmos. But they did not hear or see. They rose and stood against the golden glory of the sky, alone in the universe.

"You have lost me three times, Dickie," she reminded him, tenderly chiding. "you wont let them take me away now?"

"Not even God could take you away from me now!" he cried, with the splendid insolence of young love, "not Life nor Death nor any creature." He looked down at her, the new, strong lines of patience cutting deep down about his mouth.

The Anniversary Number of Shadowland

The September issue of SHADOWLAND is the anniversary number of this magazine. It is just one year old—merely an infant in arms as yet—but showing symptoms of prodigious strength and growing ability.

To show our gratitude for the many kindnesses received at the hands of our friends and readers, we have made this anniversary number the best and most beautiful one yet issued.

We have a story on the new Russian ballet by Oliver M. Saylor who has written several well-known books on the subject.

We have a humorous satire on the movies by the popular writer, Benjamin de Casseres;

We have a prophetic forecast of the coming theater season; articles of unusual merit by Louis Raymond Reid, Frederick James Smith, Lisa Ysave Tarleau, and other well-known writers;—the pictures have never been equalled; the color-plate photographs are of such beauty that you will have them framed,—and all in all, the September number will be one that you will read—and read again.

Let Me Prove I Teach Piano In Quarter Usual Time

Write for my free booklet. Ask for the names and addresses of accomplished players of piano or organ near you who obtained their entire training from me by mail. I have students in all parts of the world and scores in every state in the Union.

Although my way of teaching piano was laughed at when I first started in 1891, yet I now have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. Could I have fought my way up against prejudice like this, year after year for over a quarter of a century, unless my method possessed REAL MERIT? Investigate, is all I ask.

I'll teach you piano in quarter the usual time and at quarter the usual cost. If you have not previously heard of my method this may seem like a pretty bold statement. But I will soon prove to you that it is not in any way exaggerated if you'll simply send me your name and address on the coupon below.

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of "finger gymnastics." When you do go to the keyboard, you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Studying this way is a pleasure. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition—usually a "night-mare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DEX. Quinn-Dex is a simple, hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—

Marcus Lucius Quinn Conservatory of Music
Studio KI, 598 Columbia Road BOSTON, 25, MASS.

Dr. QUINN AT HIS PIANO—From the famous sketch by Schneider, exhibited at the St. Louis Exposition.

you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DEX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others; and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better at any price.

You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians, who would not recommend any Course but the best. It is for beginners, or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Pacific Coast Paragraphs

The Metro studio, like an extremely hardy weed, has grown and grown. Its roots stretch over acres and acres of dissimilar architecture. The newest sprout is its section of office buildings and dressing-rooms, which boast a fresh coat of white paint.

On the stage, I followed my ears instead of my nose, and by the wail of a violin found myself in a Klieg-lighted scenic hallway, where Winifred Greenwood, wearing a lovely clinging frock of dark blue beaded georgette, was "emoting" under the tutelage of Phil Rosen for a scene in "Are All Men Alike?" May Allison's new starring picture.

Miss Allison, who is the most beloved person about the studio because of her cheerful disposition and her kindness to everyone, which extends even to the smallest extra and the studio dog, was removing her grease-paint in her ivory-and-blue dressing-room preparatory to departing to her beautiful new home in Beverly Hills.

Here I met Viola Dana for the first time—and if anyone can meet that tiny cut-up and not fall irresponsibly in love with her—well, show 'em to me.

Miss Dana is about five feet tall—in her French heels—and the most irresponsible, mischievous, pert, tomboyish ticket I have ever seen. She was wearing a heavenly evening frock of jade-green velvet combined with green-and-gold brocade. She couldn't resist spreading her trim little feet apart and dancing around to show me the pantalette effect of the skirt as she pirouetted about; her bobbed locks flying, her rounded shoulders and small feet jazzing, she reminded me of nothing in the world so much as a naughty little boy dressed up in sister's best dress.

She told me, with a wave of her delectable arm, "I've been made up like this for the last three hours—supposed to start on my new picture, 'Blackmail'—and now they send 'round word that they wont need me today, I can go home—fine stuff, I'll say!"

I called her attention to a new joke sprung recently by Roscoe Arbuckle when he was watching Lieutenant Locklear, noted airman, do his famous flying stunts above the Lasky studio.

"Wonder how he does it?" cried a lady visitor.

"Why," remarked "Fatty," "Locklear wasn't born! He was hatched!"

At my recital, Viola dramatically placed a hand over her heart.

"My word!" she said. "I get a real thrill every time I hear his name."

Miss Dana, you know, spends most of her spare time in the air with Lieutenant Locklear.

The Brunton studios are practically a gold mine these days. Because of their tremendous size and excellent facilities for making pictures, each new company that is formed trots over to Mr. Robert Brunton and rents space, offices, accoutrements in his studio to make their pictures, which is much simpler than building new studios of their own. Here Mary Pickford makes her pictures—and I walked down the street which was built for "The Hoodlum"—remember, East Side, New York? It was silent and woe-begone, dusty and deserted—it seemed sad that its usefulness was over and that the puppets who played down its alleys had long since departed.

Just around the corner from this deserted section I bumped into a street of Old Mexico—here greasy Mexicans, the real article, were playing Black Jack, or some game with cards, while they waited to be called to take part in Brunton's new serial, "Double Adventure."

A little farther on I was introduced to Josie Sedgwick. You will remember her principally for her splendid work opposite Will Rogers in "Jubilo." Miss Sedgwick is a remarkable woman. One reason is that she doesn't like to be called Josephine, her real name, but prefers the simpler one of Josie; another is that when I asked her about this new serial in which she is playing the lead, she said, "It stars Mr. Hutchinson, you know!"

Miss Sedgwick admits that she is happy—contented! She enjoys acting in serials as well as in feature pictures, because she loves her work. She played also in the Jack Dempsey serial and praised him in glowing terms.

"He is a splendid fellow—in every way," she said.

On the Brunton stage, which boasts a surface of 39,000 square feet, scenes were being shot of Roy Stewart and George Fisher for "The Devil to Pay," Brunton's initial all-star production. Contrary to my expectations, Roy Stewart appeared to belong not at all to the wild West, but rather to the effete East. I can imagine him tea-ing at the Ritz much more easily than parading the plains.

The greatest activity and expectation was being exercised over a set being prepared for Marion Davies, who is expected out here to film her next special feature, "Buried Treasure," for Cosmopolitan Productions.

Here also the famous Mayflower pictures are being filmed. It was here that the last scenes for Robert Chambers' story, "Athalie," were shot, Syd Franklyn's special production, which has Rosemary Theby and Norman Kerry in the cast.

Speaking of the handsome Norman—he recently married an extremely charming Western heiress and is busy at present honeymooning. Nobody knows when he will return to work.

Betty Compson, who scored such a tremendous hit in "The Miracle Man," has completed her first starring picture, which will be released this fall. Miss Compson plans to do six or eight pictures a year and her ambition is to have each screen play present a girl of absolutely different character.

The Motion Picture Magazine

For OCTOBER

BIGGER—BETTER—BRIGHTER—

than ever, the October issue of the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE will greet you, on the first day of September, with a grin of pride in its own merit which will just border on the smirk of complacency. You're sceptical?

Well, as a teaser to your imagination, we want to tell you of a few things which will be in this boasting number:

Judging from the number of ex-bathing beauties who have developed into stars of the celluloidian drama, it seems that salt-water comedy training, as studied under the learned tutelage of Mack Sennett, fits one perfectly for the more warmly clad rendition of drama. Like Gloria Swanson, Bebe Daniels et al., Mary Thurman has followed the instructions of Mr. Sennett—and now look at her. In the story which Hazel Simpson Naylor writes of Mary, we learn a good deal about the refining process of the beach.

The much-admired Rudyard Kipling once quoted, very sententiously, that the East was the East and the West was the West—and the two could never have anything in common. Well, just the other day Adele Whitley Fletcher decided to find out for herself how much significance lay in the Kipling remark—and returned with a story of an interview she had with Sessue Hayakawa—and all we shall say about it is that it is in the October issue of the MAGAZINE.

The popular Irene Castle talks to Gladys Hall and Gladys tells you what she had to say in a very amusingly-written interview, illustrated with some beautiful portraits of the well-known dancer.

Girls, watch out for this number! Why? Because—Maude S. Cheatham, one of our coast correspondents, has cornered the heart-thrilling Wallie Reid in his own home, and in a very much-at-home mood.

There's a fictionization of "The Molly-coddle," Douglas Fairbanks' latest picture; there's new gossip of the players, new pictures, and, in other words—the October issue of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE is a sure winner.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator	$.75
M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads	$.75
M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair	$.50
M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan	$1.00
M. T.'s Minerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream"	$.75

"Well, she just wouldn't see, insisting that I had disgraced the family and feeling that in some way she had been to blame—my father was no longer living—and she came over to New York and took me home. Then began a series of arguments, but when she did at last realize that she could never turn me from my purpose, mother proved what a game sport she was by taking me back to Sioux City herself.

"They gave me a hearty welcome and in a short time the audiences sent in petitions to have me play the lead. I was there eight months and we put on a new play each week. Work! I slaved, and how that manager coached and drilled me for hours and hours. You see, I had really had so little experience and knew absolutely nothing about dramatic technique."

Una Trevelyn is a striking-looking girl, with lovely fair skin, blonde hair and deep, expressive eyes. She is slight, almost fragile, and one wonders where she keeps her all-indomitable spirit.

"Pictures? Oh, I just happened into them," and Miss Trevelyn grew thoughtful. "I had been with A. H. Woods for two years, playing the leading rôles in 'Common Clay' and 'Cheating Cheaters' on tour, and was called to New York to be starred. When I reached there I was a wreck, weighing only ninety-six pounds. The doctors decreed that I must go West immediately. That was a year ago, and I came to Los Angeles, where I gained from the first moment. I remember that I met Mabel Normand a few weeks later, and she gasped, 'I heard you were dying! Why, you look fine!'"

The big interest in her life is her twelve-year-old nephew, Everett, whom she legally adopted four years ago when her mother, who had been the child's guardian, became seriously ill.

"When the courts gave him to me," Una spoke solemnly, "I mentally folded him in my arms and claimed him for my own—somehow I feel that my sister knows how dearly I love him. I have suffered for him, too; perhaps that is one reason I adore him so, for when he was four he was terribly burned, and I gave my own skin to be grafted on his leg, which saved it."

Everett is with her in Los Angeles and is a student at the Harvard Military School, and when her mother comes out this summer, she is planning to select a site and build a home. She wants a hillside, with winding roads, many flowers and tall trees for the mocking-birds to make their nests.

Miss Trevelyn is an expert golfer, having won the woman's Eastern championship four years ago at the Seaview Club, Atlantic City, where the Trevelyns have a summer home. Tho she seldom plays, she can still make a splendid record. She is a motor enthusiast and her greatest little recreation is buying cars; she has had half a dozen during the past year.

cause a flutter not only among the spectators of the contest, but also among the stars who have been occupying their celestial homes on the silversheet for some time past.

We begin with:

Miss Juliette Compton, of 340 West 85th Street, New York City. She is a member of the "What's In a Name?" company, Lyric Theater, and a Southerner by birth. Miss Compton is very unusual to look at. She has black hair, grey eyes and fair complexion.

A belle of Brooklyn, N. Y., is Miss Gladys Stetson, of 404 DeKalb Avenue. She is an eccentric dancer of no mean ability, having appeared with "Hitchy Koo," and is the possessor of a pair of brown eyes, a mass of brown hair and a fair complexion.

The little blonde Westerner is Miss Alene Ray, of 2248 River Avenue, San Antonio, Texas. Miss Ray has had some musical comedy experience as well as some screen experience. She has hazel eyes, golden blonde hair and fair skin.

Miss Mary Louise Lizare, of 502 W. Washington Street, Sandusky, Ohio, has never had any previous stage experience. She is a brunette with the brownest of eyes and the brownest of hair and a fair skin.

Altho we have never heard of Valiant, Oklahoma, we herewith wish to state that our ignorance is of much deeper import than we had thought, for from Valiant comes little Helen Trigg, who, while she has never had any stage or screen experience, is a contestant who causes one to sit up and take notice. Miss Trigg is a brunette with brown hair and large brown eyes that look out on a very pleased recipient, the world.

Miss Evelyn Yvonne Hughes, of 2916 Shady Avenue, McKeesport, Pa., is another honor roll member who bids fair to put up a good argument for the final honor awards. She has never been on the stage or screen, but a girl with blue-grey eyes, chestnut hair and fair complexion who wants anything—stands a good chance of getting it.

From the sunny skies of California—or, to be more explicit and less poetical, from 141 West 45th Street, Los Angeles—comes this photograph of Miss Ester Marie Ritter, who desires motion picture fame and fortune. Miss Ritter has had no former stage or screen experience and is a brunette of the "Nut-Brown Maid" type, with black hair, olive skin and dark-brown eyes.

SALVAGE

By BARBARA HOLLIS

You rescued a rose from the dust of the road
Where 'twas lying:

You eased my poor heart when the weight of its load

Was most trying.
The rose yielded perfume a moment or two—
Then died after all, as all roses must do;
But love is immortal, and ever in you
My heart shall find rest—make its final abode:
Love undying!

Florient

Flowers of the Orient

AN added charm of Florient Talc is the color of the powder. This is most unusual and distinctive—just off the white. The rare Oriental fragrance and delicate fineness of the powder itself also explain the popularity of Colgate's Florient—the new superfine Talc.

Florient, you will remember, gained first place in an International Perfume Contest. As the pure delight of its fragrance won favor—so will the grace and beauty of the new box in which Florient Talc comes to you.

An attractive miniature box of Florient Talc will be sent upon request if you mention Motion Picture Magazine.

Simple Home Treatments

Which Make Your Hair Thick and Beautiful

ARE you satisfied with the condition of your hair? Is it thick and glossy, as healthy hair should be, or is it thin, dry and brittle?

In this case begin at once the simple home treatments explained in the home treatment book we send you free. Follow them faithfully and they will soon stimulate your hair to healthy, vigorous growth.

Only 10 Minutes a Day—An Hour Every Two Weeks

These treatments require so little time no woman should neglect them. It takes only 10 minutes a day for the brushing and massage which bring healthy blood circulation to the scalp and keeps the hair soft and smooth.

These daily treatments must have the foundation of a scalp thoroughly clean to the tiniest pore. You can't allow dirt, dandruff and excess oil to clog pores and hair cells. You must learn to give yourself a scientific shampoo. Hasty, careless washing and drying is quickly followed by bad results.

Use Palmolive Shampoo
Double Sample Free

You should use Palmolive Shampoo, the scientific shampoo mixture, in which every ingredient has been selected because it is beneficial to the hair.

Palmolive is made from palm, olive and coconut oils, scientifically combined into a wonderful fluid cleanser. You massage this potent cleanser into the scalp, so that it penetrates every pore, removing every particle of dust, oil and dandruff. The booklet tells you how.

Send Today for Home Treatment Book and Free Double Sample of PALMOLIVE SHAMPOO

This book explains a simple system of home treatments which make your hair grow thick and beautiful. With it we send a double sample of Palmolive Shampoo two trial size bottles, one for each of the two washings necessary for a thorough shampoo. Book and shampoo sent free.

We invite correspondence on all questions regarding the scientific care of the hair. All answers conscientious and in confidence.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER
(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr.)

Louise Huff has long held a corner all her own in the heart of the moving picture world. She is a Southerner by birth and came North to go on the stage. After three years of dramatic work she decided to go into pictures and joined the old Lubin company, with whom she soon became leading lady. She has since been starred by several companies and was long a popular member of the Famous Players-Lasky Company forces. With her light, fluffy hair, shadowy grey eyes, and delicate oval face, this five feet of quaint charm is one of the cinema's most appealing personalities.

The Fortune Teller

"I see a man—a dark man. He is talking earnestly to a young girl. She is trying to avoid him. He seizes her by both arms. They struggle. He has his hand at her throat. She falls. He strikes her. He goes—I cannot see where he goes. It is dark—dark."

What happens then—how this medium knew—that is the perplexing mystery solved only by the marvelous genius of

CRAIG KENNEDY

The American Sherlock Holmes

ARTHUR B. REEVE

The American Conan Doyle

He is the detective genius of our age. He has taken science—science that stands for this age—and allied it to the mystery and romance of detective fiction. Even to the smallest detail, every bit of the plot is worked out scientifically. For nearly ten years, America has been watching his Craig Kennedy—marveling at the strange, new, startling things that detective hero would unfold. Such plots—such suspense—with real, vivid people moving through the maelstrom of life! Frenchmen have mastered the art of terror stories. English writers have thrilled whole nations by their artful heroes. Russian ingenuity has fashioned wild tales of mystery. But all these seem old-fashioned—out-of-date—beside the infinite variety—the weird excitement of Arthur B. Reeve's tales.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers; sample copy 20c, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

150-page illustrated catalogue free.

Bring Out the Hidden Beauty

Beneath the soiled, discolored, faded or aged complexion is one fair to look upon. Mergolized Wax gradually, gently absorbs the dermalized surface skin, revealing the young, fresh, beautiful skin underneath. Used by refined women who prefer complexions of true naturalness. Have you tried it? Mergolized Wax in one ounce package, with directions for use, sold by all druggists.

Booth.—"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early seventies. Genuinely delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmer and an excellent cast.

Bijou.—"The Charm School." An appealing light comedy with music, based upon Alice Duer Miller's story of the handsome young bachelor who inherits a young ladies' finishing school. Minnie Dupree runs away with the production as an old maid teacher while James Gleason, Sam Hardy and Marie Carroll are effective.

Broadhurst.—"Come Seven." Amusing adaptation of the Octavus Roy Cohen negro stories which have been appearing in The Saturday Evening Post. All the characters are negroes played by white players. Funny, but of little depth. Arthur Aylsworth is excellent as a shiftless dandy. Gail Kane and Earle Foxe play the colored lovers.

Century Promenade.—New York's newest dinner and midnight entertainment, "The Century Review" and "The Midnight Rounders." Colorful girl shows for the tired business man. A delightful place to eat.

Cohan and Harris.—"Honey Girl." Lively musical comedy built about the brisk race-track comedy, "Checkers." This has speed and humor—as well as an excellent cast.

Cohan's.—William Rock's "Silks and Satins." Another summer revue, but we doubt if it will even appeal to the tired business man. Ernestine Myers, the dancer, stands out.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlynn is a brilliant Lincoln.

Fulton.—"Scrambled Wives." Another typical farce built on a series of misunderstandings. A divorced couple try to hide their first wedding from their new marriage alliances. Rather bright and amusing. Roland Young is excellent.

Globe.—George White's "Scandals of 1920." Lively and well thought out summer revue with lavish and swiftly changing scenes, plus many pretty girls. Paint succeeds stockings and tights in several numbers. Ann Pennington is the shining light of this revue.

Casino.—"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay," Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent. Dorothy Dickson and Carl Hyson contribute some delightful dance interludes.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Little.—"Foot-Loose." with Emily Stevens, Norman Trevor and O. P. Heggie. Zoe Akins' well-done modernization of the old melodrama, "Forget-Me-Not." Tallulah Bankhead scores in a difficult role.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else.

Winter Garden.—"Cinderella on Broadway." Typical summer girl entertainment designed for the tired business man. The extravaganza this year is based upon the fairy adventures of Cinderella. Plenty of girls, passable music, attractive costumes and a little humor.

Superbly acted by the best ensemble in New York.

"The Hottentot," with Willie Collier. Typical one-man farce with the inimitable farceur, Collier, at his best. Full of laughs.

"Florodora."—The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sexette." Here is a revival that really revives.

"The Storm."—A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire. Helen MacKellar is admirable as the piquant French-Canadian heroine.

"The Fall and Rise of Susan Lenox."—Weak adaptation of the David Graham Phillips novel. Alma Tell in the stellar role.

"Scandal."—Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Dick Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

"The Purple Mask," with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainments of the season. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisquet; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

"The Sign on the Door."—A very good melodrama which boasts many instances of the unexpected—and Marjorie Rameau in highly emotional scenes.

"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd but effective drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

"The Ouija Board."—Crane Wilbur's thriller built around spiritism. Real spooks invade a fake séance, solve a murder mystery and provide plenty of surprises. Guaranteed to keep you on edge. Excellent cast includes George Gaul, Howard Lang and Edward Ellis.

"My Golden Girl."—A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

"Shavings."—A pleasant bucolic entertainment based upon Joseph C. Lincoln's familiar Cape Cod stories. Harry Beresford is featured in a gentle, whimsical characterization.

"The Little Whooper."—Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Brownie, who does excellent work. Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

Loew's N. Y. and Loew's American Roof.—Photoplays; first runs. Daily program.

Loew's Metropolitan, Brooklyn.—Feature photoplays and vaudeville.

Capitol.—Photoplay features plus a de luxe program. Superb theater.

Rivoli.—De luxe photoplays with full symphony orchestra. Weekly program.

Rialto.—Photoplays supreme. Program changes every week.

Strand.—Select first-run photoplays. Program changes every week.

ON TOUR

"Jane Clegg."—St. John Ervine's powerful drama, presented by the Theater Guild, has been running here all season. A drab but brilliant tale of middle-class English life.

"OH, MOTHER My story's accepted!"

'Tis the thrilling moment of her life

OUT of "the rainbow gleams of her youthful dreams" has come The Great Reward! The happy sequel to all her burning hopes—her eager aspirations! The magazine editor has accepted her story. His letter brings the happy news.

She moves as one in a daze. "Can it really be true?" she asks herself over and over. And all the while she glows with the pride of authorship, her aspiring spirit transformed in the bewilderment of this new triumph. 'Tis life's deepest moment for her.

She has crossed the Golden Rubicon! Enthralled, she stands upon the threshold of a New Life! She is at last—"AN AUTHORESS!" The story she has written, filled with fresh, bright realism, stirring incident and sparkling dialogue—written out of her very heart—painted in glowing words upon the Screen of Romance, will be read by thousands, thousands!

But yesterday, in her girlish fancy, she deeply envied those who live and move in that fascinating sphere, the Realm of Authorship. But yesterday her hopes mingled with her fears, her doubts of herself, her simple lack of faith in her ability "TO WRITE." But yesterday she deemed well-nigh impossible the triumph that has come to her to-day!

But yesterday her life was a dull, drear grind in a department store. In her little niche behind the notion counter her girl's soul was slowly shriveling. The drab, grey life was deadening every spark of hope within her. Thinking of her youth and yearnings, she would oft hopefully repeat to herself those lines from some beautiful book, "It is the Spring! It is the Spring! And Life is so FULL of Flowers! Ah, surely some of them are MINE!" But there was the monotony, the dull servitude, from 8 to 6—it never varied—it went on and on and on—a dumb fate that seemed to stare her in the face forever, just as it might be pictured in a story by O. Henry.

Not that all girls are unhappy who work in stores, but she—she dreamed of higher things. She wanted more out of life than the grey, humdrum existence. Why should Success be a thing OTHERS could attain and not she? She had two good hands and a brain—she was intelligent, observing, and though not a genius, surely, she told herself, she could learn to write stories as good as hundreds she had seen.

One day her sweet-faced mother noticed a small advertisement in a magazine. It said: "Free to writers—this wonderful book. Tells How to Write Plays and Stories." "Here, Dorothy dear," said Mrs. Dean. "Here is something about writing stories and plays. Here's a concern offering a free book on the subject. Why not get it? See what they can do for you? You never can tell—maybe you really can learn how to write the way you've dreamed so long, and just think how wonderful that would be!"

The Authors' Press has this young woman's letter on file. She wrote for our free book—and the picture above tells the happy sequel.

This is a true story, as startling as it is romantic, and here is the most startling thing of all—a remarkable discovery that will thrill ambitious men and women of all ages throughout the world! The discovery is that: MILLIONS OF PEOPLE CAN WRITE STORIES AND PHOTOPLAYS AND NOT KNOW IT!

(Seven)

For years the mistaken idea prevailed that you had to have a special knack in order to write. People said it was a gift, a talent. Some imagined you had to be an Emotional Genius with long hair and strange ways. They vowed it was no use to try unless you'd been touched by the Magic Wand of the Muse. They discouraged attempts of ambitious people to express themselves.

Yet only recently a great English literary authority declared that "nearly all the English-speaking race want to write! It's a craving for self-expression, characteristic of the present century."

So a new light has dawned! A great New Truth that will gladden the hearts of "all the English-speaking race who want to write!" Astounding new psychological experiments have revealed that "the average person" may learn to write! Yes, write stories and photoplays; thrilling, human, life-like; filled with heart-throbs, pathos, passion, pain.

You may learn it just as you may learn anything else under the sun! There are certain simple, easy principles to guide you. There are new methods that produce astonishing results for beginners. A remarkable New System, covering every phase of writing, has been perfected by a great literary bureau at Auburn, New York, now busily supplying this information broadcast. And this New Method of writing stories and photoplays is everybody's property. Not for the select few. Not for those specially gifted. Not for the rich or fortunate, but for men and women of ordinary education and no writing experience whatever—thousands who don't even dream they can write!

This institution at Auburn is the world's school for inexperienced authors—a literary institute for all humanity. And everybody is taking up the idea of writing. The fascination has swept the country by storm! People are dumbfounded at the ease with which they learn to write!

You know it was Shakespeare who said: "All the world's a stage and all the men and women merely players." Life's stage all around you is filled with people and incidents that will make stories without number. From the great Screen of Humanity and its constantly changing tide of Human Emotions—Love, Hatred, Jealousy, Happiness—you can create endless interesting plots for stories and photoplays. There is never a lack—it flows on in an Endless Stream of Circumstance—like Tennyson's brook—forever! Every person you know is a type, a character. "Every house has a story." And those who dwell within have impulses, ideas, hopes, fears, fancies that furnish material for you. The daily newspapers are filled to the brim. The Footlights of Fate reflect scenes and incidents for the Pen of Realism.

There is nothing in all this world that so dominates the heart and mind as the fascination of WRITING. It gives you a new power, a new magic, that charms all those around you. It lends a new attraction to your entire personality. Authorship carries with it new honors, admiration, respect—in addition to glorious material rewards.

THERE IS A NEW BOOK AWAITING YOU THAT AMAZES EVERY READER—and the most amazing thing of all is—IT'S FREE! This new book is pouring glad sunshine into the lives of aspiring people who want to become writers. Within its covers are surprises and revelations for doubting beginners that have caused a sensation everywhere, because it is crowded with things that gratify your expectations—good news that is dear to the heart of all those aspiring to write; illustrations that enthrall; stories of success, brilliant instances of literary fame coming unexpectedly; new hope, encouragement, helps, hints—things you've long wanted to know!

"The Wonder Book for Writers" tells how stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many suddenly realize they can write, after years of doubt and indecision. How the scenario stars began. How they quickly rose to fame and fortune. How ordinary incidents become thrilling stories and plays through these New Easy Methods that simplify everything! How one's imagination properly directed may bring glory and greatness. How to really test your natural writing ability. How stories and plays are built up step by step. How to turn Uncertainty into Success.

This book and all its secrets are YOURS! You may have a copy absolutely free. You need not send a penny. You need not feel obligated. You need not hesitate for ANY reason. The book will be mailed to you without any charge whatever.

There is no need to let your laudable ambition stand still—no need to starve the Noble Flame that burns at the Altar of your Dearest hope—no need to wait, to wish—to merely dream of being a writer. Your brilliant opportunity, your golden chance, is HERE AND NOW! Get your pencil—use the coupon below. This little act may prove the big, lucky stroke of your Destiny!

Miss Dempster has been a Griffith player for two years, but in that time she has appeared in but three productions: "The Girl Who Stayed at Home," "Scarlet Days" and the much-talked-about Griffith photoplay, "The Love Flower," not yet released. Mr. Griffith has unusual faith in Miss Dempster and

AN interview is a trying matter at best, but a chat with an actress who has just purchased an automobile is—well, difficult. That was just the problem that confronted us upon meeting Carol Dempster.

Miss Dempster has just purchased a car. And her thoughts, to mildly express it, were wrapped up, centered, absorbed and completely engulfed with the ing interesting about that period. Just the usual school girlhood.

"Then the dance idea hit me. I wanted to be an interpreter of the classic muse. Probably the athletic side of it appealed to me. You see, I'm an outdoor girl. That's why I love motoring. Now, my car—"

"Yes, go on," we reminded.

"Well, I became a pupil of Ruth St. Denis at her studio estate, Denishawn, in California," continued Miss Dempster. "I studied with Miss St. Denis for a year and a half. That was in 1916 and 1917.

"Of course, I intended to seriously follow the dance. With seven other girls, I was going on tour with Miss St. Denis and mother was going along as chaperon. Included in the eight were two now rather well-known dancers, Florence Andrews, now known as Florence O'Denishawn, and Ada Forman.

"I have often read that Mr. Griffith first saw me during the production of 'Intolerance,' when he used the St. Denis ballet he has been allowing her to develop slowly under his tutelage—to gather technique and atmosphere without forcing, as it were.

We can understand the Griffith faith in Miss Dempster after meeting her. She can think. She talks crisply and unaffectedly. Her viewpoint is fresh and girlish. She is ambitious. But, most of all, she is untouched by things theatrical—or shall we say cinematic.

Miss Dempster was born in Duluth, Minnesota. Her father was a Great Lakes captain. "From him I get my love of the water," Miss Dempster told us, as we sat on the porch of the Griffith studio at Mamaroneck, overlooking the Sound. A sloop was drifting picturesquely thru the grey haze oceanward. "I couldn't live without the restlessness and placidity of it.

"We moved to California when I was four," went on Miss Dempster. "There was nothin the Babylonian scenes. In reality I first met Mr. Griffith when he came to visit our classes and to watch us work. Miss Andrews and I did play bits in 'Intolerance'—and very inconsequential bits they were. I didn't think then that I would be a Griffith player, with a car earned upon my own salary, but——"

"You were just about to explain how Mr. Griffith discovered you," we ruthlessly interrupted.

Miss Dempster went on. "Mother's sudden illness prevented my tour with Miss St. Denis and I obtained my opportunity with Mr. Griffith. He first used me in 'The Girl Who Stayed at Home,' but I was new and crude to the screen. My make-up was not even passable. I was a bit better used to the films when I had my chance in 'Scarlet Days.' The story of 'The Love Flower' appealed to me when I heard it first, and I was delighted when Mr. Griffith gave me the opportunity to do it."

"The Love Flower" was done by Mr. Griffith at the time he made his nearly ill-fated trip to Bermuda

At the left is a glimpse of Miss Dempster on the running board of her new car. Miss Dempster started out to be a classic dancer and studied a year and a half with Ruth St. Denis at Denishawn last winter and at the same time "The Idol Dancer" was filmed. "The Love Flower" was first called "Black Beach" and was to be released by Mr. Griffith some time ago. But the story appealed to the producer and he purchased it back from the First National Exhibitors' Circuit, to which it had been turned over. Upon the conclusion of "Way Down East," Mr. Griffith set about shooting new scenes and completely rebuilding the production.

"I like 'The Love Flower,'" continued Miss Dempster, "because it gives me a human rôle. I do not want to just be an ingénue. They are very sweet and pleasant to the eye, I know, but I want to mean something more. I hope I can always do regular girls—the healthy kind. I have no lyric qualities and I would be angry if anyone said I was cute."

There are not many Carol Dempsters in the realm of the silversheet, we admit. She has, for instance, been devoting a large part of her time recently to becoming a highly proficient swimmer. That is, all the time she had not given her car.

That Youth From Second Avenue

wouldn't sound like hyperbole, which has no place in a tale concerning him, I should say excessively, and certainly, surprisingly, young. His extreme youth impressed me first of all, to the exclusion of other things. I found out, by dexterous inquiry, that his years number twenty-four.

He bears a resemblance to many of the photographs of Rupert Brooke, in a certain sensitiveness, a certain expression. There is, too, a marked likeness, especially photographically, to John Barrymore. Incidentally, Mr. Coleman has an immense admiration for Mr. Barrymore, particularly for the lack of ostentation with which he bears himself personally. "He is a very great artist," said the younger man.

I asked Mr. Coleman what he thought anent the subject of artists being born rather than made, or vice versa. He said that he thought artists were born and that then it resolved itself into a question of finding one's self. "To me," he said "that seems to be the all-important thing.

I asked him about himself in this particular. "Was there any motivating impulse theaterward?" I wanted to know.

"I had an uncle," Mr. Coleman said, telling me his name, "who was quite a famous Shake-

THERE are some few persons who make one feel that one is in the presence of artistry, in the immediate vicinity of the much exploited but seldom realized temperament.

Vincent Coleman is such a one.

Curiously enough, despite the best propaganda to the contrary, temperament is evinced rather by simplicity of speech, of manner, of thought, than by the eccentricities of any of these. The true artist does not, because he feels no need, acquire an accent, a new brace of parents, or a country. He neither renames himself nor does he remake himself. He has essentials to deal with, and the logical development thereof.

To wit:

"I was born on Second Avenue," says Vincent Coleman; "my mother taught Sunday-school around the corner from my birthplace, so it was quite a family neighborhood for us." He laughed, (we had been discussing, amusedly, temperamental acquisitions). "Someone once said to me, in speaking of the taking on of foreign accents, that all I had ever done was to drop the 'deys, dese and does.'"

Mr. Coleman is extremely young. If it

Shakespearean actor in his time, but all I can recall his telling about in my extreme youth were the hardships of stage life. Of course, he was at his prime in the days when everything was made just as hard for an actor as things could well be. He narrated dismal horrors of one-night stands, lack of funds, lack of engagements, blasted hopes and blighted ambitions, and he was rather successful than unsuccessful, at that. Somehow, I wasn't daunted; on the contrary, I believe my appetite, or my natural inclination, was augmented. Still, I hardly believe I can attribute my desire directly to my uncle, either, unless subconsciously . . . for farther back than his remembered talks, when I was the tiniest sort of a chap, not more than four or five, I used to play theater. Playing theater consisted of a wooden stage I had my father build for me and a number of wooden spoons representing the actors. These spoons I would move back and forth, speaking for each one in turn. It was an endless and a tireless pastime. Later on, reciting in front of people took the place of the stage and the wooden spoons. I think I never had the diffidence so many children have. In fact, whenever we had company, I was quite insistent upon taking the floor and delivering myself of some sort of address. My father, who was daunted by his brother's dreary tales of stage life, did all he could at this stage of the game to discourage me. He began to recognize the force and seriousness of my ever-growing passion for the theater. After I had recited something I especially liked and believed I had done especially well, he would draw me aside and say, 'That was awful, Vincent, perfectly awful. I wouldn't try it again if I were you.'

"When I was twelve I began to corral the children of the neighborhood and stage what I thought to be elaborate productions. That same year, a memorable year for me, my uncle, who saw, no doubt, being of the stage himself, that I was predestined, presented me with his trunks, three in all, of Shakespearean costumes. You can imagine the riches these were to me! I immediately induced my next-door neighbor, who was the possessor of a rather good camera, to photograph me in the different characters, and I posed all over the place. With the

How Young Is Anne?

Sarah in the acting line. A few, I will confess, have whispered that they're in the game only for the money, and they don't care a whoop for a seat in the Hall of Fame—but I've always discovered that these are the ones who pay good money to personal press agents.

The ages? Well, they differ, but I've never yet heard of a screen actress who will admit to being more than twenty-four.

And the marriage part of it! Screen stars, in the ultimate, are just as human as their unstarred brethren. They're all more or less anxious to have a home and family, altho—and I must confess again!—marriages in the cinema colony are not always guaranteed to last. But, then what of it?

All this preamble—this innocuous piffle—is merely an introduction to the very newest Universal star, a tiny little mite of a girl who's almost as much like the beloved Mae Marsh as M. M. is like herself. For Anne Cornwall, when you corner her on the "set" or sit opposite her at luncheon, just merely laughs when you pop the four introductory at her—largely, more or less, to get acquainted—and says that she is prepared to advance only such information regarding herself as all the Mary Pickfords and Charlie Rays before her have already advanced.

Just what do you like to do? What is your ambition? How old are you? And whom would you marry?

The foregoing, you will admit, are more or less direct questions. But, being an interviewer, the foregoing are the questions you always think to ask the motion picture celebs when you journey into their native haunts to put them on paper for any such publication as THE CLASSIC.

And, the funny part of it is, you nearly always get the same answer to every query from every celeb you meet. It's always the penchant of a screen star to be either literary or athletic; to be a motor enthusiast or a baseball fan; to be domestic and cook and sew, or to be an ideal hubby or wife.

Ambitions run along the same track. All the photo-famous whom I've ever met always wish to be still more famous. Within them is a burning desire to out-Bernhardt

Around the studio, the diminutive Anne is just as normal as any girl could be. Stardom hasn't affected her a bit. She stands on stage-corners talking to extras and property men, and even allows the supernumerary kiddies to sit on her lap, . . . quite unheard-of procedure from a real star

By
TRUMAN B. HANDY

Miss Cornwall is, I will admit, a trifle "different." She has an infectious smile, a spontaneous little way of saying witty things. She's not the typically ingénue type, but a girl whose very self-consciousness and record of theatrical achievements prove that this new little five-foot sparkler has, as the vulgarians say, a lot under her hat beside her ears.

Her ambition is—and always was—to make a name for herself in theatricals. In fact, about three years ago she left a very comfortable home in the East to go into the chorus ranks of the musical comedy, "Oh, Lady, Lady!" And her ambition now is to do as good work on the screen as she possibly can, to make all the money she possibly can and to be as well liked as is possible.

When I lunched with her in the stuffy little commissary across the road from the Universal studios, she wore a plain, dark-blue organdy with one of those trick rolled collars. Her hair was done up rather high on her head, to make her, said Miss Cornwall, as tall as possible. She hates being little, and when Charles Hertzman, the "U's" publicity man and, by chance, an old, old friend of the Cornwall family, kidded her about her diminutiveness, Anne pertly stuck out her tongue at him.

What impressed me most about her is her extreme similarity to Mae Marsh. She has the same sort of wistful smile, the same way of arching her eyebrows, the same sad-happy little chirp in her voice, the same somewhat nervous way of tugging at her handkerchief. She's more sprightly, however, than the famed little "screen sister," and not so pensive. She's never met Miss Marsh, but she thinks her "perfectly adorable."

And not that she'd care to imitate her, either, because Anne doesn't care to imitate anybody. Ingénues—and she admits being one—are so stereotyped, she declares. Finding something new and yet cute for an ingénue to do is like looking for violets in December. Awfully difficult! And yet, because

Anne Cornwall always had wanted to go on the stage. So one day, she got herself a job as a chorus girl and learned to dance. She danced and sang for two seasons until she went into pictures with Alice Brady. Her portrayal of the ingénue rôle in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore established her a girl's small, she hasn't any chance of being anything else than a flapper.

"When I get old," went on Anne, thoughtfully, "I hope that I'll have money—enough not to have to work. I'd hate to be a screen mother and always be reminded of the time when I was young and could do pretty nearly as I pleased, so far as health was concerned. I'd hate to look in the glass and realize that I wasn't so fresh-appearing as of yore. I think I'd cry. Then I'd spoil my make-up and get bawled out by the director. And I do so hate to be bawled out!"

No one would ever think of bawling out Miss Cornwall. Around the studio she's just as normal as any of the girls who purvey soup in the hash-house. Stardom hasn't affected her a bit. She stands on stage-corners, talking to extras and property men, and even allows the supernumerary kiddies to sit in her lap—quite unheard-of procedure from a real star.

All her life she's wanted to be an a tress. Finally the desire got so burning that she couldn't stand it any longer. She simply announced that she was going to try her luck in the chorus, got herself a job and learnt to dance. Her first season was in the New York ensemble. Next season saw her doing a small singing and dancing bit in another musical comedy, "Oh, Look!" in which the Dolly Sisters and Harry Fox were featured. And then one day she

"THIS," said Bert Lytell, over the honeydews and iced tea we had been consuming at the Claridge, "is not an interview—surely?"

"What's in a name?" I said. "I must write something."

"But what can you write?" he persisted. "We have been talking about blonde ingénues, custard pies—and me."

"I came to talk about you," I agreed affably, "and, as for the rest of it, we have been exceedingly catholic in our range of subjects. If I remember rightly, we have touched upon the aforementioned blonde ingénues, custard pies, free love, prohibition, of course, work in the scheme-of-things-entire, love in the same scheme and——"

"And have arrived—where?" he asked.

"Do you," I said, "believe that the average person does 'arrive' so very definitely anywhere? Do you, for instance, have tabulated and set ideas and philosophies on this, on that, on the other thing?"

"No, I don't," he said, candidly: "I am

All photos © Ira L. Hill

"The only worth-while persons in the world, be they men or women, are the persons who are doing things, creating things, getting somewhere, fired by an idealism," says Bert Lytell—and we quite agree with him. Mr. Lytell answers the requirements of a "worth-while" person perfectly extremely undecided about almost everything. So are most of us, admittedly or otherwise. With the many avenues there are to the many thoughts it could not thoughtfully be otherwise. I have come to one conclusion, however, one and one only—that I know absolutely nothing about anything—with one exception. I do believe that I am beginning—and only beginning—to learn something about my work. I am beginning to learn something about myself in connection with that work. I am beginning to discover what it is I want to do and how it is I want to do it. That is a very great stride."

"Tell me," I said, "more specifically, I mean."

"Well, in the first place, loving my work as I do, I believe that it is the greatest thing in life. What is man without work? I believe, for the matter of that, that work is the greatest thing in the life of all men. It is the really great thing, taken from more than the purely commercial or professional aspect. It is the great thing from a social valuation."

"Social?" Pictures of humming studios, dusty locations, strenuous continuity desks, etc., etc., presented themselves to my dreiseristically realistic mind.

"Social, certainly. You know, the only worthwhile persons in the world, be they men or women, are the persons who are doing things, creating things, getting somewhere or at least imbued with the belief that they are, fired by an idealism, how formless does not matter in the splendor of the person. The dilettante—the society 'bud'—the professional do-nothing—what are they? What can they give? The creators of something or other are the persons I want to be with, anyone wants to be with. Theirs is the magnetism, theirs the charm. This holds almost more than true of women. As a man emerges from the high-school stage, (when almost anything does, so long as the eye is somewhat beguiled), he becomes discriminating, as it were. The thing that matters, then, in a woman, is whether or no she is a good sort; whether she is, not mentally attractive, or physically attractive, but temperamentally attractive. To my mind, 'temperamentally attractive' sums up the whole. I would rather talk with one woman a year than flit from tea to tea, and ingénue to ingénue. There is no stimulus in that sort of thing for me.

"You can't be with the doers of deeds if you are not of them. In that field, the fields of activity, like attracts like more than in any other province. A drone is almost terrifically eliminated.

"That's what I mean by the social, or contact, end of it.

"And then the work itself, the solidity of it, the satisfaction, the way it will stand by you when all things have failed. It is of you, you yourself, emanates from you, is wholly your own. It's a sort of bread and staff and cannot be over-estimated."

"What specific thing do you want to do?" I asked.

"There's one specific thing I don't want to do—or be," he said, with one of his frequent lapses from gravity into ingenuous humor, (I'd call it "boyish humor," only I stand in awe of one of the custard pies he has in store for certain of my species of the blonde variety).

"And that?" I prompted.

"A matinee idol. There is almost nothing I would not rather be than that."

Altho he has quite recently come to the front, Bert Lytell finds his greatest happiness in continuous work, and no sooner does he finish one picture than he sets to work on the next. His recent work in "The Right of Way" and "Alias Jimmy Valentine" will not be forgotten soon by film lovers

He literally spat forth the words.

"I think you are infinitely more a villain," I vouchsafed, with consummate tact.

He appeared to be comforted. (Continued on page 74)

Fictionized from the D. W. Griffith Photoplay

By
GLADYS HALL

"I DON'T think I understand . . ." the girl shrank into the chair. Suddenly Sanderson's kisses had acquired a distaste for her, a shrinking of some super-sensitized fibers within her of which she had become, suddenly, aware.

The man laughed. How light his laughter was! No vibrancy, none of that timbre making laughter either sonorous or imbecile.

"What dont you understand, fledgling? You are here, with me. We are not married. The ceremony thru which your virtue dragged me was a mock ceremony, a sop to your scruples, that my hours of love might not be dimmed by reproachfulness. A reproachful woman is an abomination, probably to the Lord. Now, now I am being frank, truthful. We are not married, we never were. You are the timid country lass; I am the suave, mustachioed villain. I have roo-ned you!"

Anna put her fragile hands over her ears. Every added word was a stroke, hurting her. And when she stopped listening, memory assailed her—and that was worse. To a woman, memory is, no doubt, of all things, the most unbearable. Especially where her heart has been involved . . .

It had all been so sudden a tempest in so dreamful, so tranquil a life. She had gone, after her father's death, to her wealthy aunt's in Boston to borrow some money for a course she had planned to take. In a sense, it had not been borrowing. The dead man was solely responsible for his sister's affluence, and Anna was, by every moral right, entitled to, not bounty, but rightful heritage.

She had arrived in Boston at night, and when she arrived at her aunt's munificent residence a ball had been in progress. There had been introductions, among others, Lennox Sanderson. She had not realized how quaint a figure she had cut, or how, in the medley of perfumes and powders, boxed, hoaxed beauties, her fragile appeal had shone forth, bell-like, wistful, clear . . . Lennox Sanderson had lost his head. That he was in the habit of losing it and that it was a none too steady appendage to his six feet of svelte good looks was not conveyed to Anna's unenlightened perspective. She only knew, very simply, that he thrilled her when he bent over her and talked to her as the poets had written, the poets who had thrilled her, too, in her romantic garret, back home . . . So she had dreamed that, some day, a man would talk to her. She had dreamed, too, that he would bear the general manner of Lennox Sanderson.

When he asked her to marry him she gave him her heart, with a little, throaty "Yes."

He pleaded that his love was consuming, and that he feared obstacles, hence his whirlwind plan to carry her off, at once, and make her his own. The fact that her aunt had refused her the aid she asked; that she felt very much alone and very sad; and that Lennox Sanderson made her nerves dance like tiny wires when he came near her; these things together had urged her to go . . .

And then, after a fortnight, this . . .

"Do you understand now?" he was asking. He seemed to take, today, as keen, as thrilling a delight in probing the wound he had inflicted as he had, a short time ago, delighted in lulling her with the lights of his fervency.

"I dont see why . . ." Anna stared up at him. He had said her eyes were the blue of forget-me-nots. They were dimmed to grey today, with the tears she kept in her heart.

"My dear child, strive for some savoir-faire. Take the world as the world is. Men as men are. With so many women . . . butterflies . . . roses . . . exotics . . . surely you could not suppose a man of my type and taste would tie himself for the rest of his days to a field flower, however charming? Surely . . ."

But Anna did not hear him. She had fainted, and when she returned to consciousness, Lennox Sanderson, bag and baggage, had gone.

After her baby's birth, Anna sought the country, for work, for some sort of relief from all the dead things pressing in upon her, and about her . . .

The baby was dead . . . her faith was dead . . . her heart and all its bright romantic dreams was numbed . . . She felt, solely, a craving for the feel of cool grass, the smell of new flowers when the spring should be enough advanced, the heavy repleteness of midsummer in the country when fields and forests and gardens and homes were ripe and refulgent.

The city ground her down like a monstrous heel. Even as it had, with literalness, ground her . . .

And then there was work. She had to find work. The only thing she could do, now, was some sort of housework. She and her father had lived very simply, out of preference. They had kept no help, and she had always been able to please him. He had been fastidious, too . . . Once, she had thought she might write, write verse. That had been when all her illusions were singing, gossamer-winged, in her heart. It was quite different now. 'Lennox' Sanderson, sneering, mocking the sweetest gift she had had to give him . . . Her baby, dead . . . The dreary, endless months just passed . . . Yes, the country was best. The country—and work.

The Bartlett family were more or less known to Anna by hearsay. They had lived in a neighboring town, at one time. She had heard that they were a God-fearing, kindly sort of family, and when she applied and they agreed that she could be helpful, she felt an immense relief.

From the first she warmed to them. The Squire, with his ponderous voice, his ponderous, omnipresent Bible, his dire threats of the Law and the Prophets—and the twinkle in his eyes. Mother Bartlett, shrewd and comfortable. Kate Brewster, a cousin who lived with them, merry, robin-like, jolly, with a glow for the whole world and a solid sort of belief that the world held an answering glow for her. The "butterfly professor," who sort of gamboled about the fields with his scientific and acquisitive butterfly net and who cast, from his remote and vision-seeing eyes, sheep's glances at the buxom Kate. And David—

"I dont think I understand . . ." the girl shrank into the chair. Suddenly Sanderson's kisses had acquired a distaste for her, a shrinking of some super-sensitized fibers within her of which she had become, suddenly, aware

David was different. He was different from his family. He was different, Anna thought, in her newly grave, abstract sort of way, from the whole world as she had known it. He was practical. He was romantic. He was kindly. He was safe. There could be no harm in a life, she thought, where the men were Davids.

If her baby had lived and had grown up to be a woman, she would have liked her to have had for a friend a man like David.

When she could not sleep at night because the past pressed against her with sharp, poisoned finger-tips, Anna would think of David's face, reassuring, infinitely steady, and she would be calmed . . . and sleep . . .

She did not think of it as being love.

She did not think of it because she felt so done, so dreary, of all emotions. Love had been a blast from an evil-smelling furnace—it had seared her and then cast her forth—so much, so little for love. But David had not been seared. His had been a fine reserve and a high dreaming. Thus far in his simple, hard-working life no person had touched this reserve or pierced this isolated dreaming. It had taken Anna's delicate white face, her dream-hallowed, dream-emptied eyes, her uncertain, yet skilful white hands, her fragile body wherein, he thought, dwelt a waxen white flower in lieu of a soul . . .

The Bartlett family had taken it for granted, after the matter-of-fact manner of such people, that David would, one convenient day, wed Kate Brewster. It was so obviously and comfortably the thing to do. Kate was on the premises, in the first place. They had always been chums, in the second place. Thirdly, she would make a good, sensible wife for David, who was a bit inclined toward the whimsical, and a capable, lovely mother for his children. In the minds of the Squire and his good wife the wedding was as good as consummated.

They were little given to subtleties, the Squire and his wife, and youth was very far behind them. They did not bethink themselves that the healthy comradeship of David and Kate was the most powerful obstacle to their marriage; nor did they sense the drift of things with the "Butterfly Man," as they called the young scientist, with the eager eyes and the mellifluous voice. Kate's interest in him was, to them, inconsequential. Blushes and tremors escaped them . . . Kate was a sensible, likely girl and meant for their David. So be it.

Certain persons, it would seem, move in certain circles. However divisible their interests, their hearts, their essential lives, their paths seem to twine and intertwine with an almost deliberate insistency.

Lennox Sanderson happened to have a country place almost adjoining the Bartlett farm.

He also happened to be occupying the place, which was an infrequent occurrence. He was occupying it for a twofold reason. The first was a sort of necessity. He had been hitting rather a desperate pace, in town. He wasn't as young as he had been. His physician had advised him . . . rest . . . perfect quiet . . . the usual routine. He had rested and had been quiet, and then he had seen Kate Brewster. After the first sight, he assured himself of a second, then a third, etc. The second time he beheld her with her Butterfly Man. They had been skimming over the fields together and Sanderson had not got a look at her eyes. They had been on the Butterfly Man, so he couldn't. If he had he might—might—have had the discrimination to back out. There was love shining with a glowing frankness in the eyes Kate turned to the lovable, whimsical Butterfly Man.

And then he had seen Kate Brewster. After the first sight he assured himself of a second, then a third, etc. The second time he beheld her with her Butterfly Man

Later on, Sanderson made the acquaintance of the Bartletts. Kate was his motive. She gave him a freshened-up feeling. After the languid, orchidaceous growths he had been running about with in town—after Anna Moore, with her pallor and her forget-me-not eyes—

Like all small natures, he hated the persons he had hurt. He hated them unreasonably, and because he knew it to be unreasonable he hated them all the more. Anna he hated peculiarly. She disturbed him in the most primary ways. She came between him and his later amours. She came between him and food, between him and sleep. She was the motivating reason for his having to seek the farm. Whenever he saw a baby, he cursed.

The first day he went to the Bartlett farm he saw her. First, he could not be sure. It was as if across the bright gleam of a pearl an irreverent hand had drawn a veil. She wore black, too, and across the palpable invitation of her youth there had been an invasion . . .

The whole thing was abominable to him. He felt outraged and personally insulted. Besides, he had other fish to fry—what would the buoyant Kate Brewster think? Kate, with her untarnished vision of men and things? What would young David think, the Squire, the Butterfly Man, if this girl's sordid tale got out among them? And it would. Inevitably, it would. Women could never keep a secret. A moment of hysteria, a touch of emotionalism . . . A small town, too . . . the gossips would ferret it forth. There was the Perkins person, Martha Perkins, who lived on the dregs of the sins of others . . . Martha would have it, assuredly. Already, no doubt, the slim, black-clad figure of Anna Moore, moving about with the wistful smile, the eyes, still blue, but hurt with her broken dreaming, already Martha Perkins was fitting some sort of past to Anna Moore. Sooner or later, the past would fit Anna . . . and himself, Lennox Sanderson.

It was easy to draw Anna aside. Her first glimpse of him had hypnotized her, with the fear a bird feels of a snake. He had hurt her so that helplessness enveloped her at his presence.

"You must leave here," he told her, the rasp of his impatience roughening the silken tones of his customary voice; "you have no right, my poor girl, to foist yourself as what you are not upon these people. You must know the Squire's opinion of . . . of . . . well, of unconventionality in general. Especially with a young girl on the premises—and a young man. Where are your sensibilities, my good—er—Anna?"

Anna raised her hand. Because it quivered and she could not stop its quivering, she felt a loathing of herself. He, being he, would attribute the quivering to quite an erroneous well-spring.

"You," she managed, at length, "it is you who must go."

"I? I? But, my dear girl, how absurd! I have a home here. I—I have interests here."

"So have I. I—I have to live."

"Of course, of course. That goes without saying. But not here. Not among this sort of people. Not—surely I do not have to be franker than I am?"

"You are here—among this sort of people—"

"That is quite different. I am a man. You have not, it seems, quite 'caught on' yet. There is the question, too, of desirability."

Anna set her small chin, and into her blue, forget-me-not eyes there crept something akin to steel. David's face came before her, with its unquestioning tenderness, its calm, its ineffable assurance. "I am not going," she said, and was saved further dispute by the boisterous arrival of Kate Brewster, her Butterfly Man in tow.

Nevertheless, with the perspicacity of persons to whom mental sewerage is the everyday fare, Sanderson was right when he presupposed that Martha Perkins would "get a-hold" of Anna's past. He had never, however, been so optimistic as to suppose that she would only get a-hold of half of it—Anna's half. Such was the case.

How Martha found it out, by what channel, Sanderson did not know, nor does it matter. The outstanding fact was painfully sufficient unto itself . . .

And love is the conqueror, and there is both a quick and a dead . . . her eyelids fluttered under his breath; her hands stirred to meet his; her lips moved and uttered his name . . .

Anna had been with the Bartletts for nearly a year—it would have been a year in the spring. During that time there had grown across the rough edges of her hurt a sort of healing peace. David had placed it there. His touch had been sweet and sure. Not once had he failed. His sensibilities were delicately fine and unerringly true. The day before Martha Perkins' visit he had told Anna of his love for her. Sitting before the fire, she had dreamed the dream he sketched for her in the glowing of the coals—and had said good-by to it. David was too sweet . . . too sweet . . . Like wants like . . . She, she who thru him had learnt love, real love, to come to him dragging the tatters and remnants of her griefs as offering . . .

"I wish that I could," she told him wistfully. "Then you dont, dear?" he had asked, so softly.

He seemed, always, to know that she needed a gentle touch . . .

"Yes, I do." They dealt in simplicities. "I do . . . but that isn't the part that matters . . ."

"It is all that matters . . . Why, Anna, love . . ."

It seemed, to the stricken group at the table, almost as tho a wraith, a ghost, an unreality, were passing from them. She went so noiselessly, so unprotestingly, so vaguely and yet so definitely, that it did not seem as tho it could be she, delicate as had been, invariably, her presence among them

Mr. Tearle On Ambition

THE gentle art of interviewing holds many temptations, even for the most seasoned. One resists or succumbs according to one's individual resistive powers. I have just encountered an overwhelming temptation and, modestly enough, I may add, have resisted it.

Conway Tearle is a radical departure from the usual run of film players. He refuses to sign a long-term contract because he cannot tolerate the bondage of such a contract. He dislikes, personally, the electric-sign rating of the stars, for, as he says, "I'd never know whether I were Conway Tearle or a breakfast food"

I was tempted to call this interview "Who Took the Tea Out of Tearle?"

It is only fair to Mr. Tearle, to the gentle reader, not to mention myself, to again reiterate that I have resisted, not without, however, succumbing to the lesser evil of narrating the conquered Waterloo.

It all arose, the temptation and the victory, too, from a remark made by Mr. Tearle as we sat, and I sipped tea at Reisenweber's, where, for the past ten years, Mr. Tearle has stopped while in New York.

I had commenced my tea, having had reason to suppose, from a conflict of time, that Mr. Tearle was not going to appear. When he did, a bit out of breath, with rumpled hair and his wife reminding him that she had previously reminded him of this, I said, "Wont you join me?"

He replied that tea was one liquid he could never learn to imbihe, and this despite the fact of having been bred in England. Just shows what the individual can do with environment.

"There are three things," he said, rather in the manner of a reverie, "that I cannot understand—tea, college men and society girls."

I didn't care very much about the psychological aversion to tea, but college men . . . and society girls . . . I made inquiries.

"In England," he said, "all men are college men, so to speak. The term a college man, said, in America, with such a mark of differentiation, always amuses and rather puzzles me. It is the same with 'society girls.' What are 'society girls'? Which are they? How is one to know them? By what earmarks are they distinguishable? I fail to get the nice discrimination."

"Speaking of girls," I said, "what sort of girl do you prefer? Not to be so banal as to say blondes or brunettes; I mean the ambiguous society type, the—"

"Actresses," he cut in quickly. "I like actresses best. Just for the matter of that, as I like actors best. My wife often tells me that I should cultivate other people, people I know outside the profession. But I say, why should I bother with them? What can they do for me if they don't interest me? Actors and actresses are mine own people. I know them because I have been of them for the past twenty-two years, (a give-away on my age, but I'm wonderfully well preserved, don't you think?), and my family have been of the stage for God knows when. Knowing them. I understand them, and, understanding them, I love them. That is all. What can I get from persons who do not interest me? Mutual interest is, it seems to me, the only coin of advantage in the human relationship."

"Pictures?" I said, and paused suggestively. I surmised that the single word would open up a field of spoken thought. Mr. Tearle has a habit, a handsome habit, we admit, with obviousness, of sort of gazing into space and putting some naïve thought into words.

"At present," he said, "I'm freelancing it. Selznick wants me to sign up, but no three-year contracts for mine. I'd hate the bondage, I'm afraid. Nor electric signs, either." He added, "I'd never know whether I were Conway Tearle or a breakfast food. It would prove confusing."

"But ambitions?" I persisted.

He said, irrelevantly, "I've a country place, and I get my pleasure there. That's ambition, of a sort. Perhaps the truest. Of course, I wouldn't want to lie down and do nothing. The punch of pleasure would forthwith go at the same time. Still—ambition—I played Hamlet when I was eighteen. What ambition could I have now? I played it abominably, no doubt, but I played it, nevertheless. I had one other ambition, but it was nipped in the bud—by John Barrymore. I wanted to do Jekyll and Hyde for the screen.

Otherwise——" He waved a disclaiming hand.

"How about financial ambitions?" I urged.

"I don't know anything about them," he said. "These Aladdin Lamp salaries are all out of my line. I've worked for my living and I've never had any mint poured into my pockets for so doing. I don't know how they do it. I don't know anything about it. Some one wrote an interview with me once and called it 'Hard Luck Tearle'—and that will tell you a story in itself. It's like the Jekyll and Hyde episode—sheer hard luck plus hard work!"

There then appeared Mrs. Adele Rowland Tearle with announcement of the car and an impending date, and "Hard Luck Tearle" excused himself.

Letter of a Leading Man to His Interviewer

Leading Man, et al. . . Charles Meredith Recipient (of letter) . . . Olga Shaw

And he would say, "Well, now, I'll tell you—" And then some stentorian voice would roar, "Mr. Mer-e-dith!" And there I would be, interrogatively suspended in mid-air.

This continued for three or four hours. It had something of the effect of a mental treadmill. Also an endurance test. When that petered out, I said, desperately, "Constance is waiting for you now, Mr. Meredith . . . I'll tell you . . . suppose you write me . . . write me a letter . . . just telling me, impressionistically, some of the things we have tried to enunciate, not to say elucidate, today."

Charles Meredith studied architecture in college, and it was while applying for a job to do the scenic "investiture" of a Broadway production that he was offered a good part for the stage, which began his professional career

Mr. Meredith, looking rather worried, assented. "I'll do that," he promised; "I'm awfully sorry about today. I hope you won't think—things go this way sometimes, you know—"

I left him still wearing the worried look. He is a conscientious person, you know.

LAST week I went to the Talmadge studio to interview Charles Meredith, leading man for Constance Talmadge.

I did—so to speak.

That is . . .

Charles Meredith is a very serious young man. He is a worker, and it was quite glaringly apparent to me, despite his regrets and his infallible courtesy, that his work comes first and his publicity second. Which is, after all, being the true devotional to the G. A. P. (Great American Public)

In other words, we had a few snatched words in between scenes and close-ups and stills and various other integral parts of an actor's day in a studio. I would achieve a "Do you believe in the uplift of the—"

A few days later his letter came. It is now here, on my desk. It is written in green ink upon hotel stationery. It covers several pages and keeps all its promises. Because of these and other things, it tells something of him better than I could do. Here are a few excerpts:

First, he observes that for one of the "literati" to express themselves thru the medium of ink may be all very satisfactory and well, but . . . "As for an actor," he writes, "really interesting the public thru another medium than his chosen one—well, it is too much to expect." He adds, "As for one really saying what one thinks of any art popular in our present stage of civilization—well, it would be extremely easy to become as unpopular as Schopenhauer is with a débutante."

After a few further remarks anent the inability of himself in particular to present a picture of himself in words, (we admit the difficulty thru precedent, but not by achievement), he becomes agreeably autobiographical.

He says: "I have only done ten pictures, but have been very happy and fortunate in being with very fine and lovely people, and, of course, this made the last eleven months more than enjoyable. These so-nice people are Marguerite Clark, Marjorie Wilson, Mr. King Vidor and his charming wife, Blanche Sweet, Mary Miles Minter, Constance Talmadge and the lovely Ethel Clayton.

"I, like everyone else in the profession, perhaps, am looking forward to the time when I can be a part of an organization presenting pictures in which I might play, but in which I might also have a large part, such as selection of story, of director and organization and a sort of general interest and supervision of the entire production.

"As I spent a number of years in college, studying architecture, I feel I have a right as well as a desire to put my knowledge of this subject to some use. Also, I designed the scenic 'investiture' of a number of Broadway productions

Mr. Meredith feels that the personal elements in the life of an artist should be given to the public only thru the work that artist does of a couple of years ago. That, in fact, is how I started in the profession. I went to an office to inquire for a commission of this nature, and as I entered the 'man at the desk'

exclaimed that I was just the type he wanted and offered me a good part at a too-generous salary—and here I am! After that engagement I played in various productions on Broadway for almost two years, culminating in the leading rôle in William Faversham's production of 'Allegiance' at the Maxine Elliot Theater. I have been out of college—Carnegie Institute of Technology at Pittsburg—three years this June. There—now you have my long and 'interesting-to-no-one' career, but I have enjoyed it, and especially the fine people with whom I have associated in the profession."

Mr. Meredith goes on to say that he feels the personal elements in the life of an artist should be given to the public only thru the work that artist does. It "tells," he says. He says: "Whether an actor should 'feel' the emotions he portrays has been an open question as long as there has been a theater, but there seems to be some agreement to the fact that he must be capable, at any rate, of experiencing these emotions to a considerable degree. The crux of the matter is not the fact of it, but the capability of fact. Therefore, any innate refinement of, and sensitive reaction to, emotions in general could best be seen in an actor's work, provided his part were in any degree adequate to his skill."

There follows another plaint about the inadequacy of the written word in this specific instance, then Mr. Meredith launches bravely

A Grown-Up Ingénue

By
ELIZABETH PELTRET

So, being of a superstitious temperament, I sat quite still, near the Fifth Street entrance, and watched the crowds come and go, paying particular attention to those girls who were small and young and fluffy. This was more in the nature of a pastime than anything else, for she was to have me paged as soon as she came in.

There were a number of amusing false alarms. One I remember particularly—a girl wearing a bizarre little hat, made-up face, blouse practically sleeveless, skirt about two inches below her knees and stockings of so open-work a pattern that they looked more like a species of very wide cobweb than lace. A man sitting across from me looked at the stockings at the same time I did, our eyes met, and we both laughed. The girl went directly to a bell-boy, standing over against a post, and I waited to hear my name called. But she was looking for some one else, and I settled back in my chair again.

I was not surprised that Betty Bouton should be late. She was leaving for New York within the next two MACK SENNETT recently told Betty Bouton that there was one thing which might disqualify her from making a really great success in moving pictures.

"What is that?" she asked.

"You have too much education," he answered.

However, that, as Ruddy K. might say, is another story. This is the record of a meeting which came very near never taking place at all.

Three o'clock, three-fifteen, three-forty, three-fifty-five, the minutes passed while I sat in the lobby of the Hotel Alexandria in Los Angeles waiting for Betty Bouton and amusing myself by seeing if I could identify her on her entrance. At this time, I had never seen her either on or off the screen or stage. I had heard, of course, that she had distinguished herself, not only by her work in support of such stars as Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark, William Farnum and Douglas Fairbanks, but also by the way in which she played a leading part in the Marshall Neilan production, "Don't Ever Marry," which had not been given its Los Angeles showing.

We had agreed to meet on the balcony at "the Alex" at three o'clock, but I arrived to find the balcony closed for repairs and the lobby crowded, not only with guests and people from outside there by appointment, but with workmen in white overalls who seemed, literally, to swarm all over the place. One could not turn one's head without a scaffolding appearing in the line of vision, nor move without being in some danger of walking under a stepladder.

Betty Bouton has distinguished herself by her screen work with Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark, William Farnum and Douglas Fairbanks. She is a college girl and takes a keen interest in the woman's rights movement

SAID the M. E. to the Town Tattler, "Polly, Reggie Irving is in trouble with his wife."

Said the Town Tattler to the M. E., "Heavens, they've just went and did it. What's the racket?"

"That's just it. There isn't any racket."

"You mean . . .?"

"I mean that Angelica Irving was and is a sensation seeker. She married Reggie because, to the best of her fond belief, he was a devil. He turns out to be—a husband. Angelica is throwing fits."

The M. E. fixed her with a contemplative eye. "Cant you . . . er . . . write him up?"

he suggested. "Your colyum has given more than one man a scarlet aureole."

"But this—this must be all imagination. I demand an increase in salary. I have to manufacture the man's sins for him. Idiiotic!"

Nevertheless, Polly got busy. After a bit of work the situation took hold of her imagination, and Polly was there with the imagination—especially when it came to scandals. The idea of Angelica wedding Reggie for the thrills he could give her, only to be confronted with the daily and nightly view of carpet-slipped respectability, was enough to prod her feminine sympathies. None knew better than she what life would be like without scandals. No doubt Angelica had been dutifully brought up. Polly had been. Such being the case, scandal in one form or another was her just meed and due.

Polly took pen in hand and waxed eloquent.

Result: the colyum called "The Tattler" of The Society News fairly blazoned innuendo, some of it none too veiled, anent the doings of the "debonair dilettante, Reggie Irving."

Reggie, in his slippers, feet slightly elevated above the ground, was astounded and indignant. He waved the paper at Angelica, his voice quavered, he denounced the iniquitous press and vowed he would institute libel proceedings, his face was very red and his hands pawed the air. Angelica was secretly ecstatic. Reggie, she thought, was acting perfectly guilty. After all, she had not been duped nor de-

Reggie agreed to the party. It was to take place in the most notorious place along the coast. "No one who goes there is quite the same afterwards," said Nita, enthusiastically ceived. The man she had married was a perfectly good devil. He was fast. He was dissolute. He was a heartbreaker, a home-wrecker, an insidious Lothario. He had married her . . . well, put it down to infatuation. Her job would be to see that the future affairs did not go too far.

If all "The Tattler" said were true . . . heavens, how had he accomplished so much in the past fortnight, home as he was practically all of the time. What a consummate villain he must be! The "debonair dilettante" . . . just what she had thought him! And he was hers! She regarded him with a thrill of pride in her own prowess. Not every woman could have so neatly caught and impaled this butterfly on the wing! Everywhere, no doubt, he had trodden upon the hearts of women . . . hers he had not been able to trample under foot. What romance it was to have this love o' women for her very own, to bear his name, to introduce him to a languishing femininity as "my husband."

She thought of her own mother's domestic life. Her unimpeachable father! The endless monotony of home evenings. The dish-watery drabness of it! How had her mother endured it? Any woman could have held her father, could have caught him, in the first place. It took her, Angelica, to captivate the elusive, the captivating, the devilish Reggie. She wept aloud and decided him for his infidelities. It was her rôle. She must never let him know that, secretly, she gloated over his vices.

"But, darling," he was protesting, (still nervously, still nervously, noted Angelica, thru the corner of her eye). "you know these are infamous lies. Why, I've been with you every minute. It's that damned Hathaway girl—always stirring the mud up somewhere. I know. I'll go down to their offices tomorrow and force them to substantiate their statements. Worst of it is, there aren't any statements . . . just a lot of nasty implications a man 'd have to be a worm to wriggle out of. It's outrageous, that's what it is! It's . . ."

Angelica went to bed with the mien of a martyr and the heart of a seraph. She was happy! Reggie was a devil and he was making a devil's explanations.

Life would be just one thrill after another.

There followed perfumed notes. The perfume was what might be described as violent. It assailed the nostrils in whatever part of the house one happened to be in. Angelica took them to come from some exotic . . . a Peruvian, she thought most likely. Reggie hid them, rather obviously, Angelica thought. She almost always saw him hiding one with an air of ostentation. Probably, she comforted herself, he was more than customarily desperate over "this one" . . . hence the lack, or loss, of discretion. The matter required thought, and Angelica called in a handwriting expert. She made the most of it. It gave her a magnificent opportunity to wear willowy negligées and wallow in eau de cologne. She also acquired a plaintive voice and found that reddening her eyes, ever so slightly, was not unbecoming. Angelica had never had so good a time.

The handwriting expert ruined it. He nearly ruined her life. To go further, he all but ruined the marital life of the pair. He informed Angelica, after much research and comparative study, that Reggie himself had written the perfumed notes. He added that he had probably perfumed them himself as well. Not a houiri, he said, would anoint letters like that.

Angelica's eyes were reddened in good earnest. Now, now indeed was she deceived, misled, made ridiculous. Here, while she had been living in thrilling proximity to a devil, there had dwelt by her side a pasty angel, with not a liaison to do him credit and her proud. She could never condone him, who had never sinned. She could never be forgiving, with nothing to forgive. She could never pity her mother, whose own fatuous fate was worse. Diable! She had married a hypocrite, whose thin veneer of evil slipped from him and revealed a plaster saint.

Polly, doing her best in the colyum of "The Tattler," was unable to counteract the damage the handwriting expert had done. Angelica's faith in her spouse's evil ways was irretrievably shattered. She was again disconsolate. God knew where, now, she would seek the thrill Reggie had failed her in. Polly, admonished by the M. E., sensed the fact that it was her duty as a humanitarian and a sister in the sex to avert Angelica's probably direfully impending fate.

Polly phoned Reggie. Polly had a way with her. She confirmed Reggie's worst suspicions in no uncertain tones.

"My boy," she said, "you've got to cut up, that's all there is about it. The safest thing for you to do, since you cannot seem to achieve anything that isn't safe, is to do it with me. We—you and I—will beat it together. We'll go to a summer hotel. I know of no place better calculated to scandal and wifely suspicion. Take it from me. Also, I'll see that 'The Tattler' narrates the worst. You on?"

Reggie, rather palely, consented. He felt a certain faith in Polly Hathaway.

"We'll register as man and wife," pursued Polly, "and Friend Wife will happen in upon—the register. It ought to last her for a while. It should pass by the summer months quite pleasantly for both of you. It will take you a month to break down her injured pride. It will take her another to grant her forgiveness. It will take another for the pair of you to mush the thing over together. Still another will be consumed by a honeymoon of reconciliation. And there you are!"

"I dont understand women," moaned Reggie.

"That's obvious," agreed Polly, briskly. "I dare say, however, that you will come to some sort of an understanding after you and I are—er—discovered."

Reggie had a sort of terrified thrill when he recalled some of the things he had heard about "newspaper women"—this newspaper woman in particular.

However, he did love Angelica . . . and so . . .

And so he let himself in for more than he had bargained for—more, also, than Polly herself had bargained for. He discovered in the very beginning that there was more than one marital complication extant. He further discovered that his fame had gone before him. Literally awaiting him on the front porch of the hotel they had selected was Nita Leslie, one of the members of the set in which he had been wont to move. Nita was a clingy, effusive young person, with what might be tactfully described, had she been literary or professional, as "temperament." Being neither, what possessed Nita was not nominated in the bond—save by her husband, and then none too delicately, as Nita tearfully explained upon Reggie's astounded bosom. Polly, watching from the window of "their" suite, chuckled. Angelica, she foresaw, would get her bargain full this time.

"Fred has been a perfect devil," Nita was explaining to Reggie; "the last time it w-was a b-blonde chorus g-girl. I know it! The very worst variety' . . . and I said to mommer, and mommer said, 'Well, you would do it' . . . and then I just got desperate, and it came to me that there is only o-one person to settle one's troubles in this vale of t-tears and t-that is one's self, and then I read about you in 'The Tattler' . . . that perfectly frightful column in The Society News . . . and it all came to me . . . oh, Mister Irving!"

Reggie mopped a brow with a handkerchief. His voice had deserted him.

"W-what was it that—came to you?" he demanded.

Nita opened her eyes roundly. If, cogitated Reggie miserably, Angelica's sea-green eyes were not so persistently, so everlastingly before him, he, being a reasonable man with a pair of eyes of his own, would have conceded the really perfect baby blueness of Nita's. As it was . . . damn it all . . . why were women like Angelica thrust upon the earth to thus muddle up the cardiac regions, not to mention the cerebellum, of a man like he, Reggie?

"Why-ee," Nita was saying, "I read about your carryings on, and I heard someone say you were rather—well, indiscriminate, and I looked 'indiscriminate' up in the dictionary and found it meant that you ran around with almost anybody, and then I heard that you were coming here, and, 'The Tattler' inferred, 'not alone,' and I thought, 'No, I should say not. I'll go, too, and Reggie and I will go h—go to—you know, Mister Irving, he naughty together.'" Nita smiled sweetly and wished the hero of her deviltries would not perspire so or look so perceptibly wilted. Reggie, at present, did not answer "The Tattler's" word pictures of him at all. Still, she might have known . . . a pack of lies . . . newspapers . . .

"But, Mrs. Nita," spoke up Reggie, then, "how is all this . . . er . . . between you and me . . . to . . . to solve your husband?"

"He'll be jealous, of course," explained Nita; "he'll probably be so jealous he'll commit a murder or do some sweet, adorable thing like that, and then I'll know he really loves me. It's all quite simple."

"Yes, I see," said Reggie, putting the overworked handkerchief into play again, "yes, of course. It is. It is quite simple. Oh, very."

That evening Nita planned a party. By night Reggie had cunningly concluded that Nita was in reality the "Town Tattler," masquerading. No living woman, he averred, could be such a fool as Nita, so-called, had represented herself. He had heard, too, that the "Town Tattler" was rare at covering her tracks. She was, no doubt, covering them now.

The party was in progress in Reggie's room when Polly trailed in

Reggie found himself embracing Polly . . . when Angelica entered, accompanied by Nita's outraged and palpably murderous husband

He agreed to the party. It was to take place in the most notorious place along the coast. "No one," said Nita, enthusiastically, "no one who goes there is ever the same afterward. It's delicious."

"I dont see how she can write," growled Reggie.

The party was in progress in Reggie's room when Polly trailed in, accoutered with lingerie and other "evidence" to scatter about "their room." Reggie had been having champagne, and the haunting quality of Angelica's too-green eyes had lost some of its poignancy. Polly was deuced attractive. It penetrated the haze in which he moved that she was the "Tattler." She had been clever enough to plan all this. He recognized her, remembered her voice now. He never had been good at voices, anyway. What did it all matter? . . . jolly time . . . pre' girls . . . specially Polly . . .

He found himself embracing Polly, telling her she had wicked hair . . . wicked the trip. He would proceed to murder him on sight.

A chase ensued.

Reggie, or Reggie's champagne, or the fortuitous combination of the two, led him into the bedroom of a solitarily sleeping woman. The woman thought Reggie her husband, who had these methods of home-coming at night, and held out her arms to him. They were ample arms and afforded a shelter, a screen. Reggie took to them. Hard upon the taking, her husband burst in upon them. The din and clatter caused by Nita, Polly, (on the track of her story), and Fred was increased by the clamor set up by the irate husband, who was observing what horror he called the gods to bear witness to.

In the midst of it all, Reggie disentangled himself from the ample arms and again made good his escape, to fall into the clutches of three house detectives, who loudly proclaimed that they were bound to arrest the notorious Reggie Irving.

"Your escapades, sir," they said in unison, "are enough to give any house a black eye. You are a disgrace to this respectable hostelry, to your

And They All Wept!

By HARRISON HASKINS

THEY certainly wept! All the feminine fans east of the Pacific Coast and west of sixteen. For wasn't Richard Barthelmess—the adorable Yellow Man of "Broken Blossoms"—being married? Could anything be worse?

Of course, Dick didn't think so. For he was marrying "his ideal girl," as he termed her, otherwise (as per the wedding announcements), Mary Hay Caldwell.

The wedding took place, to be exact, on June 18th, at the Church of the Heavenly Rest in New York. And, at the exact hour, motion picture theaters in every part of the country played a wedding march. In fact, no one had ever before been so widely married.

In reality, Dick was married twice that week. The earlier wedding was—whisper—to Lillian Gish. But it was only a make-believe one for David Griffith's "Way Down East." There is a big double wedding scene in this rural play and, while Dick was being joined in cinema wedlock with Lillian, Mary Hay was marrying Creighton Hale. You see, Mary was also playing in "Way Down East." The make-believe ceremony created all sorts of merriment around the Griffith Mamaroneck studio, for the real wedding was to take place the day after.

The real one was very simple and formal.

No, Dick did not meet Mary in motion pictures. Their "meeting" was the oddest on record. For Mary met Dick in the Philippines, while Dick met Mary on the Ziegfeld roof. You see, it was this way, Dick was a shadow character in a Marguerite Clark photoplay when Mary first glimpsed him. And Dick first saw Mary on the New Amsterdam roof, where she was a member of the Ziegfeld revue.

Mrs. Barthelmess (née Hay) was only on the stage a year or two. She is a daughter of Colonel and Mrs. Frank Merrill Caldwell. (Which explains Mary's aforementioned stay in the Philippines.) She studied dancing with Ruth St. Denis at Denishawn in California and, oddly, played a small rôle in Griffith's "Hearts of the World."

The Newest Photoplays

FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

THE early summer dog days were not quite so dull as usual this year. Take Basil King's "Earthbound," (Goldwyn), for instance. This is going to cause discussion. It is going to be widely overrated. In reality, it is unusual. With the whole world delving more or less into the psychic, the motion picture has been slow to deal with it. David Griffith started in "The Great Question" and then lost courage. "Earthbound" dashes full length into the question.

Remember the story of "On With the Dance": two men and a woman, the murder, the subsequent trial and the regeneration of the woman's soul thru the way she saves the murderer by her testimony in open court. George Fitzmaurice treated the story from an emotional and wholly materialistic view-point.

Oddly, Mr. King's story has almost an identical groundwork, but the treatment is wholly from the spiritual angle. We see the spirit of the murdered man, at first defiant of God, moving thru the scenes of his earthly activities—a figure of hate. But, as he comes to realize the limitlessness of the other world, he brings about the woman's regeneration thru his unseen influence. Then, having adjusted two broken homes as best he can, he shakes off his earthbound shackles and moves on into the infinite—that is, via camera tricks, he walks over the tree-tops in the generally accepted direction of heaven.

Mr. King's story is not only a psychic one, but it preaches a certain doctrine of right living. The lives subsequently torn apart by murder are linked by a false and dangerous theory of life. "No God—no sin—no future life" has been the college creed of the two comrades, and Mr. King depicts how this destructive theory brings its inevitable disaster.

"Earthbound" was a tremendously difficult thing to visualize. We understand that T. Hays Hunter, the director, was months working it out at the Goldwyn coast studios. It was a vastly hard thing to show the spirit of the murdered man moving thru reel after reel and yet keep the right spiritual tempo. A false step anywhere would have meant a slip into the ridiculous. Sometimes Mr. Hunter lapsed into the banal and obvious, and sometimes the theatric is baldly apparent, but, on the whole, it is an elusive thing rather well done.

"Earthbound" held our interest strongly. It is a vivid clash of human passions and the spiritual. It is not our province to debate Mr. King's psychic theories here. They command thought, whether or not you dismiss them as banal. And we believe that the average person will get a message of uplift from "Earthbound."

The Convictions of Conrad

At first, Conrad Nagel's conversation was all of the house. They had rented it furnished and grown to love it so much that they bought it just as it stood. Of course, now that the house belonged to them, innumerable things were to be done. Certain uncomfortable, old-fashioned pieces of furniture that, he said, reminded him of his childhood in Keokuk, Iowa, had to make way for furniture more modern and comfortable. New draperies were to be selected and the front porch was to be arranged so that they could almost live on it and still retain some privacy. Included in their plans were a vegetable garden for the back yard and more flowers for the front. One gathered that, as much as possible, they wished to do all this themselves. They are enjoying the romance, only too often denied newlyweds in the profession, of making their own home.

There would, in all probability, be fewer divorces, both in and out of the profession, if more young married people could start this way instead of as flat dwellers, moving around from place to place, with all the sense of irresponsibility towards each other and towards the community that comes from not having a thing to call their own.

Conrad Nagel is the incarnation of Youth in real life. He is impulsive, earnest and realizes keenly his responsibilities towards the world. He has not permitted his profession to absorb him to the exclusion of other interests

CONRAD NAGEL suggested lunch at the Garden Court.

"Mrs. Nagel will be there, too," he said over the telephone.

But Mrs. Nagel couldn't come, after all.

You see, they had just bought a house. Not a blatantly new house, but a big house with a "homey" air, such as a house only gets when it has been built for quite some time.

(The rose-bushes were bearing heavily. One especially, a red climber, on the side-front porch, was a riot of full-blown blooms. And there was a white bush, too, in the center of the front lawn, so covered with flowers that you could scarcely see the bush for the roses.)

We drove around to see the house after lunch.

"I won't promise how Mrs. Nagel will look," her husband said on the way, but, from the tone of his voice, you would have felt quite certain that Mrs. Nagel could never look otherwise than perfectly adorable.

By this time, if you didn't know it before, you have probably guessed that Conrad Nagel is married. He is. More than that, he is a newlywed, and not a bit ashamed of it.

His wife is a non-professional; a sincere, generous, comradely sort of girl, not beautiful, as beauty is known in Hollywood, but rather more than that—wholesome-looking. She has an exceedingly expressive face, large, dark eyes and dark hair. Conrad, on the contrary, is a blond. His hair is taffy-colored, his eyes blue and his complexion rather pale. He is six feet tall.

But if I am to begin at the beginning, which is the logical place at which to begin, I'll have to get back to the Garden Court. We were seated at a little table near a French window overlooking the Hollywood hills. Luncheon began with a fruit cup, progressed thru lamb chops, French fried potatoes and string-beans, to strawberry parfait and coffee at the end.

ELIZABETH PELTRET

The Conrad Nagels are not going to be like many young married people, spending every penny they get as fast as they get it with nothing to show for it after it is gone. Rather, they have the property-owning fever and are putting their surplus into real estate . . . and Los Angeles real estate at that. They discovered the West, literally, in a day, and loved it on discovery.

"It is really funny," he said, "that both of us should have become converted into Californians so suddenly. I think our house must be responsible, because I hated Los Angeles at first and made up my mind that we would go back to New York as soon as I could finish with Mayflower. (He was making "Athalie.") We even secured our reservations." He drew from his pocket two tickets for New York which, he remarked, he could probably sell to some one. "Then we rented our house, the neighbors made us welcome and, before we had been there a week, the corner groceryman knew us by name. Why, if your corner groceryman called you by name in New York, you'd fall over from astonishment!

"Not only that, but we had room and freedom. You've no idea how strange it seems to look out of your window and see attractive lawns and flowers and know that friends and acquaintances are all around you, when you've been living cooped up in a New York apartment without even knowing the people next door."

Nevertheless, he had a clause inserted in the five-year contract which he recently signed with Famous Players-Lasky to the effect that he should make at least one picture a year in New York and that he may appear on the stage if he so desires.

"After all," he remarked, "one should keep in touch with the center of things."

Conrad Nagel played Youth in "Experience" for two years, and he certainly looks the incarnation of Youth in real life and acts it, too. He is impulsive, earnest and realizes keenly his responsibilities towards the world. He has not yet permitted his profession to absorb him to the exclusion of other interests. On the contrary, he talks politics enthusiastically and his religion enters into his daily life and influences all he does. He says, quite frankly, that whatever success he has gotten, or may get, will be due to his faith.

"I do not think an artist has any more right to shirk responsibility towards the community in which he lives than has a man in any other walk of life," he said, emphatically. "For instance, take the matter of voting. I think that a man who has a vote and doesn't use it is as bad as the man who has a vote and sells it."

He is also, by the way, an advocate of total prohibition.

A Pictorial Avalanche

mailed after August first, there has been no let up in the receipt of photographs from all parts of the country. It would be rather interesting to our readers, we are quite sure, if they could drop in and see the editorial offices these days, literally snowed up under an avalanche of photographs.

Inasmuch as the most difficult part of the contest is the fair and impartial judgment on these same photographs, and the final selection of the honor roll winners from them by the judges, it is needless to say that quite some time is required in this selection. Despite the fact that we have announced in all three of our magazines that the final decision of the judges would be published just as quickly as possible, this has made no difference to all those interested in the contest, for daily the editorial offices receive overpowering barrage attacks of telephone calls, telegrams, special delivery letters, etc., all containing inquiries as to the outcome and all frantically desirous of knowing whether or not the sender has been made one of the winners.

We are quite ready to concede that it is extremely difficult for those interested in the contest to overcome their desire to know what the outcome of the contest is to be, but as we have stated before, the final announcement of the winners will be made just as soon as possible. The cultivation of patience is a meritorious occupation!

Every Sunday there has been a swarm of contestants out at the Brewster estate at Roslyn, Long Island, where a thoro camera test has been given every honor roll member and all others who were notified to appear.

Just as soon as the committee finish their laborious task of separating the wheat from the chaff among

By the time this magazine goes to press the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920, which has been conducted by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, will have been finally closed so far as the receipt of photographs is concerned. Altho there has been a definite warning issued in each one of our publications to the effect that no photographs will be entered in the contest which have been the photographic mountain now looming before them, the final honor roll members will be selected, and from these final honor roll winners, and all of those who have already appeared in THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE CLASSIC or SHADOWLAND, there will be chosen those contestants who will be the fortunate winners of the contest.

The judges who will make this momentous decision are Mary Pickford, Mme. Olga Petrova, Howard Chandler Christy, Thomas Ince, J. Stuart Blackton, Maurice Tourneur, Samuel Lumière, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, David Belasco, Blanche Bates and Eugene V. Brewster.

The honor roll winners for this issue of the CLASSIC are as follows:

Dorothy Peabody, 2622 College Ave., Berkeley, Cal., who has had some amateur dramatic experience, is a brunette, with brown eyes and light-brown hair.

Marion MacDonald, 102 Shomard Street, Syracuse, N. Y., is a student of voice culture who has appeared in amateur theatricals. Miss MacDonald is the proud possessor of blue eyes and dark-brown hair, while her complexion is very fair.

Violet de Barros, 217 West 110th Street, New York City, has had some dramatic experience. She has green eyes, light-brown hair and fair complexion.

Almeda Fowler, 340 West 86th Street, New York City, has had some musical comedy experience. Miss Fowler has brown hair, hazel-colored eyes and fair complexion.

Florence Campbell, 44 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass., has never had any previous dramatic experience. Miss Campbell has brown hair and blue eyes.

Helen Richardson, P. O. Box 181, Los Angeles, Cal., has done some extra work with various film companies. Miss Richardson is a blonde with very dark-blue eyes.

New York City, is a member of the Ziegfeld "Follies." She has chestnut-brown hair and blue eyes.

We are quite sure that all of the contestants and their friends will be greatly interested to know that for some time past we have been receiving visits from the personal representatives of the very largest and most famous motion picture companies. These representatives are following the Fame and Fortune Contest with close attention, and have informed us that they are willing to take care of the future of one of the final winners.

This fact is of the utmost importance, and should add greatly to the enthusiasm among those who are taking part in the contest, for it means that the lucky winner who is chosen by these men will be immediately signed up on a contract with a substantial salary, and the future film success of the one who is selected is practically assured.

Owing to the success of last year's contest, there were four final winners chosen instead of one, as was originally planned. Up to date, we find it impossible to state just what the number of winners for the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest will be, but this announcement will be made at the earliest moment.

The filming of the five-reel feature drama, "Love's Redemption," is progressing rapidly.

The Glass of Youth

By
OLGA SHAW

Whatever it may be, it is inherent and will not be marred or decreased by the inevitableness of his success.

He is the true artist. One feels that, or senses it, rather, in his own sensitiveness, to you, to impressions, to other persons.

Having been, or being, whatever the tense, no matter, the godson of Sarah Bernhardt has been, no doubt, a molding, a finely molding factor. I asked him about her, and his face lighted up with the fervor, the keen-edged interest a responsive person just naturally portrays for all truly great things of life, of art.

"She is a tremendous person," he said, with his still unflawed accent; "a great, a very great woman as well as artist. She gave me all my training and what I am, whatever I shall be, whatever there (Continued on page 90)

Gaston Glass is the godson of Sarah Bernhardt, and it was from her that he received his dramatic training. He has only been in America a little more than a year and still possesses a charming French accent. His work in "Humoresque" has proved him to be a player of the first rank

IT was a sultry afternoon. Not that the sultriness or the time of day has much to do with it, save that the sultriness was forgotten in the quality of the ensuing talk, atmosphere in toto, etc., etc.

I went to a predirected address in one of the West 40's near th' Avenue, and rang a bell inscribed, neatly, "Barthelmess-Glass."

The former of the two names had, impulsively, a pencil mark thru it. The simple line denoted the fact that Barthelmess had flown to a new, a hymeneal nest.

I ascended some stairs and was admitted by a neat-appearing colored maid with a capable air, who directed me to an ample chair in the shaded living-room and told me that Mr. Glass would join me immediately.

In the brief interim, (he is not the sort to keep one waiting), I glanced about me. I couldn't help but suppose that this room had been the shrine of many dreams and ambitions, of many, many talks and introspections, of philosophies and intolerances and prejudices and the many-hued, many-colored faiths and un-faiths of youth. "Barthelmess-Glass" had had, no doubt, much of mutual sympathies and aims.

The room itself was comfortable and unobtrusive and in excellent taste. There was a piece or two of sculpture. There were books on low racks, one or two good prints, a huge desk, a huge couch, smoking conveniences, and thru a flutter of immaculate scrim curtains a glimpse of an equipped kitchen showing the ingredients of a domestic ménage.

Then Gaston Glass came hastily in.

I had an impression, (which remained), of sweet and enthusiastic youth. He seemed to be eager with hope, with ideals, with aspirations, with opinions. He was charmingly unassertive and delicately self-depreciatory. In his interest in himself, (and, of course, he has it, else he would not be an artist or a man), there was a delicacy of touch sans all irritation to the mere listener. It may be, I thought, the French birth and breeding of him.

Her First Interview

By MAUDE CHEATHAM

THEY were having a party.

There were music and flowers and refreshments and everything.

The everything consisted chiefly in noise, for the laughter and merriment could be heard to the far corners of the Lasky lot, while everyone who could possibly slip away from his post was crowding about the set to enjoy the fun.

"There's Viora Daniel," they told me. "That little girl in pink over in the corner with Roscoe." Eagerly I looked at the point mentioned, interested to see this new feminine lead of the rotund comedian.

Viora Daniel, by her prettiness and promise, has made fast strides in the realm of motion pictures, for after being in the Lasky Stock Company less than eight months, she was selected to play opposite Roscoe Arbuckle

I saw a slip of a girl whose vivid, sparkling face was framed in dark curls which were caught up in a huge satin bow. The frilly skirts just touched the round, bare knees, while pink socks and Mary Janes completed her "little girl" costume.

A scene from "The Life of the Party," Irvin Cobb's humorous story, was being transferred to the screen, and Roscoe was in the act of pulling Viora about the set while the orchestra jazzed a merry tune and the camera clicked.

Fatty, or Roscoe, as he is called now that he is making feature comedies instead of the old two-reelers, was a scream in blue gingham rompers, a child's round hat a-top his solemn face and "cunning" socks that failed by half a yard or so to hide his battered and bruised knees.

He must slapstick, and if not on the screen, it creeps in between acts and he tumbles about like a rubber ball. He is continually interpolating bits of hilarious comedy into his work—his strenuousness is remarkable—that keeps everyone in a roar, for there is no denying that Roscoe Arbuckle is just naturally funny at all times.

When the lunch hour was called, Viora and I started for her dressing-room. "Oh, look! There's Tommy Meighan. Isn't he adorable?" she exclaimed, grasping my hand, and we stopped to watch the handsome Thomas and Kathlyn Williams during a tender little scene in a Venetian garden.

"I've never met him," confided Viora, "but I've made up my mind that I am going to play with him some day. He is just my ideal of a hero," and she sighed romantically, even while her eyes danced.

"I remember I used to go and see Roscoe's films, and how I did enjoy them, but, of good luck, and I touch this every morning before I go to work. I was so afraid something would happen to them that I tore them apart and keep one at home, one in my bankbook and one here at the studio. That makes it pretty safe, doesn't it?" and the smooth brow wrinkled in concern as she spoke.

"Oh, I'm terribly superstitious—that's my chief characteristic," and Viora laughed at the joke. "I look in the dream-book the first thing every morning and read the signs—and I have a hundred and one things that I do before I begin a new bit of work."

Glancing about the little room, I saw three dream-books, a volume of Kipling's poems and Laurence Hope's "India's Love Lyrics."

What is she, I thought, child or woman? For looks are revealing, and this combination was decidedly unusual. Questioning her a little regarding the lyrics, which had been puzzle number one, I decided she was child—with a child's love of beauty and exquisite rhythm, with the romantic quality highly developed, which, of course, is in keeping with her emotional temperament.

Viora is a native daughter of California, having been born just eighteen years ago on a ranch near San Luis Obispo. Losing both father and mother while still a baby, she has but one relative, a brother, in the East. While attending the Coeur d'Alene College up in Idaho, she met a little girl fresh from Norway, Lorrie Larsen, who also is alone in the world, and these two have been the closest friends and chums ever since.

They have a pretty little bungalow up in Laurel Canyon, where they live all by themselves.

"The house is on the side of a hill, with a mountain stream running thru the garden. We have a balcony dining-room and, oh, it's course, I never once dreamed that I would ever be playing with him. It is all so wonderful—sometimes I wonder if I'll wake up and find it isn't true."

It is indeed wonderful, and Viora Daniel, by her prettiness and promise, has made fast strides in the realm of motion pictures, for, after being in the Lasky stock company less than eight months, she was selected to play opposite Arbuckle.

"This is my first lead and my first interview—what shall I do?" she asked, happily, as we entered her dressing-room.

It was an Oriental shrine with gorgeous Chinese hangings, Chinese prints and several good specimens of their art needlework adorning the walls, while the dressing-table was quaintly set with various treasures from the countries beyond the Pacific.

"I'm crazy about the Orient and I love every one of these things," she exclaimed, enthusiastically. "My greatest joy is to prowls about the curio shops, and I know if I ever get to Japan or China I'll become light-fingered and probably be put into jail, for I'll never be able to control myself with all those lovely things about."

"See, this is my good-luck feather," and very carefully she handed me a tiny, narrow, white feather. "It has an interesting story. The first picture I made was with Jack Gardner in 'So This Is America,' and we spent some time up in Yellowstone Park. There was a Hawaiian there who used to go about with us, and when we left he promised to send me a rare gift from the islands. Sure enough, he sent me three feathers. They are from some sacred bird that brings the owner

Told in story form from the Mayflower Photoplay

By DOROTHY DONNELL

PEOPLE in Pineport said that Athalie Greensleeve was "different"; some of them whispered that she was "queerlike in her head, seed things as warn't there to see." There were odd instances they could bring up to prove their contention, the time she sat on the tavern steps and told a posse of excited farmers that they would find the lost Higgins baby under a juniper bush on Blueberry Mountain; the time she warned old Bill Edwards not to go fishing, and he went, scoffing, and was drowned.

"The moon shone on her cradle out of a stormy sky," the old wives whispered; "her mother died the same moment she was born. She's got the look o' the other world on her!"

Certainly Athalie, at eighteen, was not like the other, plump, noisy Pineport damsels, with their red, hard cheeks and their big hands, always ready with a slap not too discouraging for the first sign of "freshness." She was rather unusually tall and slender, without being meager, and her oval face, with its amazingly large, luminous blue eyes and frame of soft brown hair, was only faintly tinted. But her white, beautifully cared-for hands could work as deftly as any hands, and her mouth, tho usually sweetly grave, could smile as it smiled now under Henry Laidlie's adoring gaze.

"Henry! You promised!" she reproached him, drawing back slightly from the great, importunate bulk of him into the syringa-scented shadow. "You know I told you two years ago that I wasn't the girl you would marry."

"You're usually right, Attie," the big fellow beside her on the porch said, grudgingly, "but I aint willin' to leave this thing up to the sperrits! It's too almighty important to me—' both of us. I want you, dear—I've wanted you for years, an' I'll be good to you, Attie; I promise you that before my Maker. Now mother's died and the tavern's got to close. You cant stay here and there's nowhere for you to go. 'Sides, why should you go to traipsing over the earth, trying to earn enough to keep soul and body together, when I've got plenty, and I need you so?"

He was wily, big, earnest Henry, in appealing to her thru his lonely need, his forlorn, uncared-for state, but still she shook her head, dimly shining in the fragrant dusk.

"No, dear. I couldn't, truly. Why, Henry, we've been brother and sister, almost ever since we were children!"

"But not since we was grown," he countered; "you're too purty, Attie, so purty it makes me feel like being in church, somehow, looking at you. You wasn't made to take care of yourself, but for a man to take care of. Attie, say you'll let me take care o' you!"

But still she smiled, and shook her head, and suddenly he cried, with the violent tongue of a long-boarded jealousy, "Who is it, then? That city feller who was so sweet on you two year ago, and skipped out without even saying good-by? Day your father died, that was—I thought then all those tears you cried on my shoulder warn't for th' old man! Are you still thinkin' of him, Attie—when he didn't give you no right to think of him?"

The chair had stopped swaying. It was quite still for the space of an entire moment on the porch, then, tiredly, "Dont, please—speak of—him——" she controlled the tremble in her voice gallantly. "It is strange, Henry, when I can see so far ahead for most people, that I cant see into my own future at all, but I think—I have a queer certainty that I shall never marry."

Henry Laidlie made an uncouth noise; a sob, strangled fiercely. She saw the big, shaggy head twist downward against the low, white moon, then lift resolutely. "All right, dear," he said, with a great breath, "whatever you say. I won't bother you again. And now, what are you going to do?"

"I'm going to New York," Athalie said slowly. The moon was full on her lifted face, and he saw that it wore the look of "differentness" he had learnt to dread and hate because it seemed to separate her so far from him. Her eyes were fixed upon something beyond reality, her lips moved stiffly as tho without her volition. "I—have work to do there. I don't know exactly what it will be, but I know that I must go."

Pineport folks shook their heads over her going. No need, they murmured, for 'Gus Greensleeve's girl to go away from home to earn her livin'. New York was no place for a female, except maybe onet or twice a year to see the Hippodrome show or do a little shopping. There'd be no good come o' it—mark their words! And after a little, for lack of news of her, their tongues ceased to wag, and Athalie was forgotten, except by one big, silent man who had an irritating way of starting up sometimes out of a reverie and looking around him as tho he had heard a call, a way that exceedingly irritated his wife—for Henry Laidlie allowed himself submissively to be married by one of the efficient, red-cheeked damsels of Pineport a year after Athalie went away.

When she took the train for the city on that afternoon in midsummer, it was as tho Athalie Greensleeve took the train out of the world, for it was another woman who got off in the Grand Central. In her four hours' journey she had gone over all possibilities and made her decision. She could not do anything which people would pay her for doing, except to "see clearly," to glimpse events as yet undreamed of. She had a childlike faith in her own powers. Not a single tainting suspicion of dishonesty troubled her—more than that, she felt something akin to the exaltation of one who is "called to preach." God had given her a strange, very precious gift, and she must use it for Him. That was all. Very simple, surely!

She spent the first disillusioning, agonizing week in seeking a room, shuddering away from some of the women who answered her bell. Once she electrified a rouged slattern by bursting into tears. "No, no! Not that room! I couldn't—after what had happened there!"

The woman turned ghastly under the purple paint. "How'd you know?" she muttered, with stiff lips. "You couldn't know!" But Athalie had gone, and the woman went in, cowering as if from the menace of black, rushing wings.

Presently she found a dark, dingy front parlor on a once pretentious street, with a faded landlady who called her "child" and offered to make her a cup of tea. The room had belonged to a fortune-teller, and was hung with the cheap and tawdry stage setting of her profession, dusty, velvet draperies, charts, and on a table stood a crystal like a drop of pure light in the dank, dreary room. "Madame La Rene had a very high-class cle-antel," the faded landlady assured her, in the whine that served for a voice, "but she drank up all she made, poor dear, and was took away to Bedloes screaming something terrible. Are you a second-sighter, my dear?"

Athalie did not quite know what she was. For three days she sat in the terrible room, among its theatrical tinsel, with folded hands, waiting to be shown what she should do. On the morning of the fourth day there was a rap on the door and an old man, immaculately dressed, stood hesitating on the threshold. He stared down at her with ludicrous amazement at seeing such youth and loveliness in a place like this.

"Madame La Rene—but, good God! It's impossible!" he burst out finally. "I came here because I am so desperate that I am willing to plunge my hands into the vileness of professional charlatanism, but I must have come to the wrong place." He was turning, but her soft voice called him back.

"You wanted to know about the children—yes!"

"You've heard?" He was actually panting with excitement. "Of course! They told me all mediums and star-gazers had a card catalog of the easy marks. Yes, I came about my grandchildren, who disappeared two years ago in this city. What can you tell me? But, of course, you can tell me nothing!"

"Only that—they are in Belgium." Athalie spoke bewild. edly, as if she repeated something whose meaning she could not guess. She moved to the table, stood staring down into the crystal. "At a convent—yes, a great stone building on a hill—near Brussels—" She sank suddenly down at the table, passed her hand across her eyes and looked up at him blan kly.

"What was I saying? I can't remember—only I seemed to see—it all—so clearly—"

Her words were the regulation cant

"She—loves you?" Athalie asked, "that woman with the red hair and the red sparks in her eyes?" "No! She never did," Clive groaned, "she wanted my name, and she will cling to it"

of the mediums, to which he had grown accustomed thru disheartening days, but her eyes were different, like the purest water in the sun. Elisha Symes had not lived for seventy years without being able to judge people. He laid his hat methodically on the table, with a hand that trembled, and sat down opposite her. "Now, suppose you tell me about yourself," he suggested, trying to speak casually. When her soft voice faltered to silence presently, he leaned toward her. "Tell me, did you ever hear of a man named Dane?"

Athalie half rose. Her delicate face was twisted as with sudden pain. "Dane—he was an explorer? Yes, I knew him. He—he came to my father's inn one summer with a friend—a friend of his, to shoot ducks. He told me he was going to Africa, and I told him"—she touched her forehead with fingertips wearily—"I told him to be careful of the injury he would receive in his arm."

"The same man!" her visitor gave the effect of shouting, altho it was his look that clamored, rather than his tone. "I had luncheon at the club with him yesterday, and he wore his right arm in a sling from the effects of a lion's claws. He told me of you—said if anyone could help me, it would be little Athalie—"

The girl was swaying, hand at her throat. "Did he speak—of anyone else? Any friend? The—man who was with him that summer at Pineport?"

But Elisha Symes, unheeding, was intent upon his own affairs. After weary months of seeking, he had found; after days of doubting he believed! He went away from the dingy front parlor, after having his generous check gently refused. But he had exacted a promise that Athalie would let him find her better quarters, worthy of her great gift.

She was settled in these, a bit awed at the quiet luxury of the apartment which old Symes had leased for her before he set sail for Belgium. "I'm going to find my darlings, I know it!" he told her, "and I shall bring them to you as soon as I come back! Meanwhile, help others as you have helped me."

The news of the beautiful girl with the strange powers spread, and the charming grey-and-mahogany drawing-room on the Drive was filled with the curious, the anxious, the despairing. Sometimes it was a stout, elaborately upholstered woman with a Pekingese and a tale of missing jewels, sometimes a white-faced girl whose lips faltered out some sordid story of wrong and misery. Athalie made no pretenses with them all. "I dont know whether I can-help you, but I will try," she told them, gently. "I cant always see ahead. Sometimes there is a veil between—"

One day, Dane, the explorer, came and bluffly renewed his acquaintanceship; his eyes, reddened by the suns and winds of strange, far places, watched her pale face with a sort of wonder. "You're looking tired," he declared, as he was going; "too much seeing! You need a vacation. I'm having a house party at my lodge in the Adirondacks this week. I'll expect you!"

"Oh, no! I—I couldn't," she began breathlessly; "I'm not—one of you. I'm only Athalie."

But he brushed her objections aside, in the ruthless way of a man who is used to denying difficulties. "Nonsense! Do you good—besides, I'm having someone you used to know—young Clive Bailey! That's settled! Good-by till Saturday, Athalie."

It was the name that brought her, the name that she had shut away in her heart for four denied years, as a woman shuts away dried roses or other remembrances. There was a new beauty about her when she stepped into the hall of Dane's great lodge and looked about the group gathered before the blazing fire. So a woman looks when she comes to meet love with outstretched hands.

Many of the visitors stared, hostilely; some whispered, for

"He's seeing that fake fortune-telling woman almost every day," she told Arnold Wayne, viciously, just after they dined together at the Ritz, "and last night, what do you think? He actually came to me and asked me to release him!"

"So small . . ." the strange tone was saying yearningly, and Athalie held out her arms as a woman to a child, "so sweet! But it needs someone to love it! Babies must be loved or they die . . ."

remembering. "You went without a word—after that kiss—I saw you in Henry Laidlie's arms. What should I think?" "He was comforting me—my father had just died and we were like brother and sister."

While Dane's guests played bridge within the great room, Athalie and Clive walked the length of the piazza many times under a cold, winter moon that was like the corpse of the palpitant moon under which they had kist four years ago. "I married Winifred because I wanted to forget that I had lost you," he told her, lips set in a white line, "and as soon as I had done it the thought of you came and lived with us. Whatever we said or did, you were there; it was as tho I had put another her reputation had preceded her, and she was already labeled a curiosity. But there was one who anticipated the host's advance of greeting. Tall, lithe, with a teasing look about him as of a faun startled at finding himself in evening clothes, Clive Bailey had leaped to her, her name blazing on his lips, "Athalie! You—after all these years!"

An instant the huddled group of mortals, holding sickly, sticky cocktail glasses in bejeweled fingers, had a blinding glimpse of what happens when the gods meet, the amazing simplicity of it, the blinding glory on their faces; then, being a woman, Athalie came back to earth first.

"Why, has it been so long as that? It's ungentlemanly of you to remind me!" she smiled falsely up into his dulling face. "Captain Dane tells me you've been too busy shooting lions to care for anything as tame as ducks!"

The group blinked, and began to chatter as tho to cover up something. A striking young woman with a dark, sullen prettiness which the arts of the masseuse and hair-dresser had coaxed into beauty, came up and took Clive proprietarily by the arm. Her chin was held just a fraction too high, her voice was a bit too sugary as she addressed him, "Clive, dear, do present me! A wife has so much in common with a man's old sweethearts—"

The surge of the sea was in Athalie's ears as she heard his voice, inflectionless, at a great distance, "Mrs. Bailey—Mrs. Laidlie—"

"They call men gallant who perish without crying out on the battlefield, but there is no medal for the woman who comes bravely thru the agony of a moment like this without wincing. Athalie laughed, quite gaily, quite naturally. "Oh, no, not Mrs. Anything," she corrected, "only Miss Greensleeve."

She caught the stricken look on Clive's face. Perhaps it gave her a strange comfort to feel her suffering was echoed in him.

It was bound to come, of course, the explanation, the futile into your rightful place. Marriage can't make it right for people to live together always, and my marriage is wrong—wicked and wrong!"

"She—loves you?" Athalie asked, "that woman with the red hair and the red sparks in her eyes?"

"No! She never did," Clive groaned; "she wanted my name, and she will cling to it. We may as well face fact. She wont let me go, Athalie, and I can't stay. What are we going to do with the mess I've made of our lives?"

He was humble, like a sorry little boy, and she did not reproach him, tho she knew that he was right. It had been his blunder, his lack of faith that had made life for him regret, and, for her, remembrance. "We are going to do nothing," she told him quietly; "there is nothing we can do. I shall go on with my work. You will make Winifred as happy as you can, and we'll leave the rest to God."

"Your work!" he fumed. "I—yes, I hate your work. It takes you away where I can't follow. I'm so earthly, Athalie—men are creatures that live pretty close to the ground, and I can't substitute dreams and ideals for things I can touch. I—I want to touch you, Athalie—"

But he held his hands rigidly at his side, and only his glance kist her lifted face. Even in the days that followed, when he came to her grey-and-mahogany drawing-room again and again, because there was no strength in him to stay away, he never so much as laid a finger upon her hair, tho she wanted to do so shook his great frame piteously. After a bit she gave up begging him to stop coming. She lived such a strange, unworldly life among her crystals and visions that it did not even occur to her people could think unkindly of his coming. But Winifred read in their friendship the evil of her own suspicions, and, being an essentially practical young woman, determined to coin the situation to her own advantage.

"He's seeing that fake fortune-telling woman almost every day!" she told Arnold Wayne viciously, just after they had dined together at the Ritz, "and last night, what do you think? He actually came to me and asked me to release him! He said we weren't making each other happy—happy! I told him I was satisfied with my end of the bargain, and was living up to it"—she cast a glance at the handsome, cynical face opposite, almost eager—"if—if you wanted it, tho, Tony."

Wayne lighted a cigaret before he answered. His eyes avoided hers. "Oh, come now, Winnie! I thought we'd argued that out long ago! Things are pretty comfortable as they are, what's the use of changing at this late day? It isn't as if—there were any reason, you know."

The light went out of the shallow eyes, like a blown candle, leaving them cold and dark and empty. "No, there's no reason—now," Winifred agree, lifelessly beginning to draw on her gloves. Her face hardened. "You men make me sick! You think you can toss a woman aside whenever you're done with her, like an old shoe. But I'm not going to be tossed! And what's more, I'm going to drive that creature out of town!"

She was a vindictive woman, and she hated Clive because she was married to him and not to another. There was no one she could hurt except Athalie, and the pent rage of disappointed love and humiliation must find an outlet. So she went deliberately about the task of hurting Athalie. The newspapers were temporarily out of a sensation, the district attorney needed political backing, and the matter was really quite simple, after all. A test of Athalie's mediumistic pow-

She faced the battery of cruel eyes with unassuming simplicity. "What do you want of me?" she asked them, tho she looked straight at Winifred's triumphant face. "How can I show you what you ask?"

"By telling us," Winifred answered vindictively, "something that has already happened, something that no one knows except the one whom it concerns. The future wont do for us. It cant be proved, and you will have to prove yourself, Madame Athalie!"

"Something—that is passed," the girl's tone was dreamy. Her gaze, still on the handsome,

The Coming Collier

By
C. BLYTHE SHERWOOD

It was my first day in Hollywood—and, incidentally, my first day of sunshine. Months of slush and storm had passed since last I'd romped, a pagan of the summertime, abandonedly in exercise and perspiration. A boy passed by in comfortably soiled flannels and a ditto sweater. He was swinging a dreadnaught driver.

"Is there a tennis court near here?" I asked.
"Indeed, in back of the hotel—nice and sunny, too. If you want to play, I'll be there with a friend of mine, and you can join us."

A mussed rush on the trunk followed, and a general scurry; and on the courts this chap offered that we double up. "Let's take the sunny side," he advised. "Sunburn will do you good."

"But your nose?" It was extravagantly peeling.
"What's a little grease-paint, more or less?" he retorted and started the volley.

A few points, a few faults, a few games, the usual deuces and the usual darns, then, "Where do you come from, partner?"

"New York."
He dropped his racket. "Great Scott! Now we can form an Eastern club." He picked up his racket. "That's my country, too!"

The young Mr. Carr opposing us, single-handed, was from Washington. For the moment, he didn't count at all.

"How's the new 'Midnight Frolic'?"

I told him and he served into the net twice.

"How's 'The Hottentot' going?" I reported. He cut a gorgeous slam.

"Gee, it's great to meet someone who can talk your own language," and he suggested that we quit playing. Under the shade of a sheltering palm he continued, "How's Ed Wynn? Who's ahead for the Equity president? Have you seen Dick Barthelmess? He's one of my best pals? How's Mary Hay? Where's . . ."

"Say, Collier, I think I better be going. So long, old man," and our Washington victor, (the score was something like 50-40), disappeared.

"Collier?" I stared at him.

"Yes."

"Buster Collier, whose pictures used to run in all the magazines sitting on his father's knee?"

"The same."

"William Collier, Jr.?"

"No other."

"Oh, Lord!" . . . (I had been playing such rotten tennis.)

By fanning his racket, he brought me to . . . He was impatient to hear more. "Tell me . . ."

A FAREWELL

By JOHN HANLON

Harlequin and Columbine,
Hand in hand with yesterday,
Vanish o'er the sunset's rim,
Dancing all the way

Once love kindled at her laugh,
Maidens' eyes were soft for him,
Hearts were young then; now, alas,
Memories grow grey and dim

Harlequin and Columbine,
Uncrowned rulers of romance,
Fade like half-forgotten dreams,
Dying in their final dance.

But the world heeds not nor cares—
Days of dreams are done for ay—
And the player folk pass on,
Hand in hand with yesterday.

THE END OF SUMMER

By THELMA STILLSON

I never knew a dance could be
So sweet a thing before—
The viol's throbbing ecstasy,
The gleaming stretch of floor,
The little breeze whose melody
Crept thru the opened door—

Outside I knew were starlit skies
And summer's scented dusk;
But, gazing up, I found your eyes,
A fragrance sweet as musk
Uphore me into Paradise.
The world was but a husk

I never knew what fragile things
Life's fairest treasures are;
How fleet the wave whose passion flings
Her beauty on the bar;
Our love, as frail as moon moth's wings,
Was dust upon a star.

That players really use the things they approve of in the magazine advertisements.

That stars never say the things credited to them in interviews.

That a star frequently changes the whole motion picture story around, if it doesn't suit her or somebody else gets a good chance.

That Griffith directs his pictures from notes written on his cuff and that he never uses a script.

Johnny Jones

By FRITZI REMONT

Photograph by Clarence S. Bell

When told to stand for a "still," he looked about eagerly for a stick to whittle into some pet toy, and whipped out a tremendous jack-knife, the sort one gets as a gift when purchasing "American Boy" clothes. Johnny would make a fine magazine advertisement for ready-to-wears. He photographs beautifully, with his bright, big grey eyes, which are as alert as those of a squirrel, and his brown hair stays in place when he slicks it down with lots of soapy water, he admits.

There's no neglect of Johnny's education, for the Los Angeles school-board has set aside a number of teachers who look after the three R's for the studio kiddies. Johnny dotes on Sallie Sykes, his schoolmarm at Goldwyn. Sounds like a

That isn't really his name, you know, but because it is easy to remember, is typically American, and pleases Booth Tarkington, who wrote "Edgar" especially to fit the Goldwyn boy-star, we shall so think of him. Besides, the powers that be wont divulge his real name, and all that one knows of Johnny Jones' previous history is that he did a bit with Mary Pickford once, and appeared in some of the Franklin kiddie pictures. Nobody knew much about Johnny, but he presented himself among about four hundred other little boys for Booth Tarkington's critical inspection.

The author had in mind a well-behaved little boy, one who would be peppy and thoroughly American, but obedient, able to act and quite original. Casting director and Mr. Tarkington sorted thru the entire aggregation and finally hit on Johnny Jones, whom they had seen in "The Walls of Jericho."

Johnny's family consists of a well-to-do business man father, a young mother and a tiny sister. He has been sensibly "raised" and still retires at eight-thirty without a murmur. His parents have taught him to be self-reliant without resorting to forward behavior, and Papa Jones is always saying:

"Now, Johnny, dont get a swelled head because you are an actor. Just remember that there are hundreds of other little boys who could do the part just as well as you, and the minute you think you are it, you are going to be fired and one of those other boys will fill your place. All you have to do is to be thankful for this opportunity and the interest Mr. Hopper takes in you."

I believe Johnny Jones would be plain and without conceit even without parental admonishments. He's just all boy.

Johnny Jones, the Goldwyn boy-star, has been selected by Booth Tarkington for his "Edgar" comedies because he, (Johnny) is one hundred per cent American boy. That is to say, he is a well-behaved, scientifically inclined youth who adores fishing, hose-battles, chasing innocently-protesting cats thru back alleys—and the lavish expenditure of all his spare change for ice-cream sodas, which his leading lady, Lucille Ricksen, accepts most graciously stage name, doesn't it? Just the same, Miss Sallie was born that way. There are not many in Johnny's regular class, but tho he's the oldest, he doesn't lord it over

Another Comedy Deserter

All photos by Evans, L. A

Miss DeVore established herself in Christie comedies and, if she scores in Mr. Ray's visualization of the George M. Cohan drama, she will very likely follow in the footsteps of Bebe Daniels, Gloria Swanson, Alice Lake, Betty Compson, Mary Thurman and many other comedy charmers now dedicated to Art, (with a capital A)

The Christie Studios follow an interesting and unusual custom in loaning their comedy players to various dramatic organizations. Following out this idea, Dorothy DeVore was recently "farmed out" to the Charlie Ray company. Now Miss DeVore is playing the leading rôle of Mary in "Forty-Five Minutes From Broadway"

STUDIOS spring up as quickly in Hollywood as do dandelions in our best kept lawns back East. Especially now that almost every star and star-director has his own studio, is one amazed at the increasing number and size of the shadow-stages.

Out on beautiful Santa Monica Boulevard is the Hollywood studio, very large and imposing and really charmingly encased in its light pink stucco exterior. Here Marshall Neilan is at work on his newest picture, and Dorothy Phillips and Allan Holubar started work on their first independent production, only to be interrupted by a severe cold which settled in Miss Phillips' throat and brought on a nasty attack of bronchitis.

Half a mile beyond is the Jesse D. Hampton studio, glistening in its white coat of stucco. Here the emotional Blanche Sweet is completing "That Girl Montana." H. B. Warner and William Desmond pictures are shot here also, but Warner was taking a fishing vacation with Mr. Hampton and William Desmond had been "loaned."

Still farther out is the new King Vidor studio, a quiet tan-and-brown structure furnished very tastefully. Mr. Vidor is anxiously awaiting just the right story before he begins another production. He has two stories on hand, but neither quite suits him. Meanwhile, Florence Vidor is emoting at the Ince studio.

Top, Bessie Barriscale's foundation of success; center, Mildred Moore, Universal leading woman, whose life is one thrill after another, stops to powder her nose before taking the next leap; below, Eileen Percy, Fox star, enhances the beauty of the California beach

Down on Sunset Boulevard is the rambling, ramshackle, green, wooden Haworth studio, which used to be the famous old Griffith studio; it is now fairly oozing Orientals of all sizes and ages who parade the streets during every momentary lull in the screen production of Otis Skinner's "Kismet," which Gasnier is producing there. And just opposite is the Charlie Ray studio.

Ray is a very serious worker, and for that reason objects to any visitors whatsoever. The other day I was made one of the fortunate exceptions, and when I slipped in on the banquet scene for "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway," I was very interested in seeing the charming Ray bent over a piano, playing the same tune sturdily over and over again, while he waited for some lights to be adjusted. It seems that he had to play the piano in the picture, so he took lessons and wasn't satisfied until he could play the exact piece correctly. Persistency is one of Ray's chief characteristics.

When the lights were repaired, he acted a scene at the table with Eugenie Besserer, that excellent actress. He has a way all his own of going over and over his comedy business until he attains the exact result he wishes.

In direct contrast to the slow, careful, painstaking manner of Ray is the quick, hearty method of Donald MacDonald, who is supporting Charles Ray in his "Forty-five Minutes from Broadway." Donald MacDonald is a native of Brooklyn; in fact, used to live opposite our very own editor, Mr. Brewster.

Why his downcast eyes spoiled her evening

Has this ever happened to you?

WHAT a good time she was having! Every minute she was growing more elated by her success. Her partner was absorbed in her conversation, charmed with her chic, enthralled by her beauty.

Little by little she grew conscious of other eyes. She glanced to the right. The man at her other side was gazing intently at her hand.

Quickly she doubled up her fingers. How long had he been staring at those nails? Had other people also noticed them?

Gone was her peace, her unconscious gaiety. Every eye seemed fastened on her rough cuticle—on that one wretched little hangnail. What a horrid evening!

You can never know when people are looking at your fingernails. Every day, often when you least suspect it, you are being judged by them. People no longer excuse ill-kept nails. They know that nowadays it is very easy to keep your nails lovely.

Thousands of busy women the country over are learning to look after their nails with the same regularity that they do their teeth and hair.

Fifteen minutes' care, once or twice a week, will keep your nails looking always well groomed.

But do not cut your cuticle. The more it is cut, the thicker and tougher it grows—the more sore and unsightly it becomes.

You can keep your cuticle smooth, firm and even if you manicure your nails the right way. Wrap a little cotton around the end of an orange-wood stick and dip it into the Cutex bottle. Then gently work the stick around the base of the nail, pushing back any dead cuticle. Wash the hands, pressing back the cuticle when drying them.

For snowy white nail tips apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nails. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish.

To keep the cuticle soft and pliable so that you do not need to manicure as often, apply Cutex Cold Cream at night

You can get Cutex at all drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at all chemists' shops in England. Cutex, the cuticle remover, comes in 35c and 65c bottles. Cutex Nail White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream are each 35c.

Where the Brook and River Meet

THE windows of Lila Lee's dressing-room at the Lasky studio in Hollywood open right into the pepper trees that line Vine Street. Here hundreds of mocking-birds build their nests while they spend their hours in joyful songs and carols.

"It is quite like 'Swiss Family Robinson,'" laughed Lila, "and we are all very chummy in our little world up among the trees. Hear those lovely notes!" and, breathlessly, we listened to the softly repeated tones with their pensive sweetness.

"No wonder they sing so beautifully," whispered Lila, "for they practice and practice—their patience seems infinite."

The dressing-room itself was a veritable garden, with its glowing pink walls and draperies, while the fragrance of roses from a huge bowl on the table furthered the illusion.

Then, there was Lila, looking like a lovely flower in a gorgeous pink negligée, its satin folds clinging to the slim, girlish form. Hattie, the efficient and popular colored hair-dresser of the studio, was diligently curling and twisting the long, dark hair into wonderful puffs and rolls, for Miss Lee explained she was scheduled to have some pictures taken and "had to be all dressed up."

"Of course, I like to dress up once in a while, but it's an awful nuisance," she cheerfully confided. "I always enjoy wearing ginghams and calicoes in my pictures, they're so comfy."

"I loved Tweeny, my rôle in 'Male and Female,' the best of anything I have done," she went on. "That is the kind of character I like to play—something serious, but still comedy—do you know what I mean? You see, all the events meant everything in the world to me, yet they were funny to anyone else. Like Mary Pick-

Three common mistakes that mar the skin

Much homeliness is caused by three common little mistakes

FIRST of all many women powder the wrong way. Then they are troubled all the time with an ugly glisten.

If powdering is to be at all lasting, the thing to do is always to apply a powder base. For this a special cream is needed, a cream which disappears instantly and will not reappear. Pond's Vanishing Cream does just this. It is made entirely without oil. It vanishes the moment you apply it, never to reappear in an unpleasant shine. Before you powder, take just a little Pond's Vanishing Cream on the tips of your fingers. Now powder, and don't think of it again. Pond's Vanishing Cream holds the powder fast to your face two or three times as long as ever before.

A SECOND mistake that many women make is failing to protect the complexion from the wind, sun and dust. Wind dries and roughens your skin; sunlight darkens and coarsens it; dust works into the pores and injures them. You can protect your skin from this injury by applying the right protective cream.

For this purpose, as for a powder base, of course you must have a cream that will disappear and not reappear. Pond's Vanishing Cream disappears instantly and will not crop out again in a hateful shine. It has a special softening ingredient which protects the skin. Before every outing lightly touch your face and hands with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It leaves your face smooth and protects it from wind and sun and dust.

BECAUSE you have learned to depend upon Pond's Vanishing Cream for a powder base and to protect the skin from the weather, do not make the mistake of forgetting the importance of cold cream. The very oil which makes cold cream impractical for use before going out is what the skin requires at other times. The pure, cream, oil base, in Pond's Cold Cream, makes it the most perfect cleanser you have ever known. Before going to bed, cleanse your face with Cold Cream. You will be horrified to see how much dirt comes out. Do this regularly and your skin will be kept clear and free from dullness.

Pond's Cold Cream has just the consistency that is perfect for working well into the skin, giving a wonderful massage.

Get a jar or tube of each of these two creams today at any drug store or department store. Every normal skin needs both.

Above, George Fitzmaurice directing Mae Murray and David Powell in a scene from "Idols of Clay," the much-expected Famous Players production. The scene is being filmed on the Florida coast. Center, Mme. Olga Petrova at her Great Neck, Long Island, home. Below, Creighton Hale as the Butterfly Professor, hiding from a prospective catch in "Way Down East"

Now that Mae Murray has finished her last George Fitzmaurice production, "Idols of Clay," and sailed for Europe, considerable interest centers in the next photoplay to be made by this master of light and shade. Its title has not yet been announced, but it is known that Dorothy Dickson, the dancer, has a leading rôle. Penrhyn Stanlaws, the artist, is again assisting Fitzmaurice on this production, which is being "shot" at the Fifty-seventh Street Famous Players studio in New York City.

Lillian Gish has started work upon her first Frohman Amusement Corporation production, and her initial screen effort away from the Griffith hand. Her first vehicle is an original story by Anthony Paul Kelly, altho, for a time, she contemplated doing a romantic costume comedy. Miss Gish is working at the Biograph Bronx studio.

Out at the Griffith Mamaroneck studio Bobbie Harron is busily at work on the Vance romance, "The Brass Bowl," with Elmer Clifton directing. This is his second Metro star production, and Gladys Hulette is returning to the screen as his leading woman. Chet Withey, who directed his first Metro vehicle, is leaving the Griffith staff. Mr. Griffith himself has been finishing "The Love Flower," with Carol Dempster and Richard Barthelmess in the leads. All interest here has centered in the Griffith repertoire season at the Forty-fourth Street Theater, where "Way Down East" had its première.

presents

"TRUMPET ISLAND"

This picture, the biggest in the history of Vitagraph, is a magnificent and thrilling story of love and adventure, fashioned into form for the screen from one of those delightful and inimitable stories of Gouverneur Morris. The picturization was made by Lillian and George Randolph Chester and the master hand of Tom Terriss directed its making on a stage that had as its boundaries the Atlantic and Pacific Coasts.

Coupled with this effort to give it the very last touch of realism is an all-star cast, months spent in the making of it and an expenditure of more than a quarter of a million dollars. It is probably richer in spectacular value than any story ever transferred to the moving film.

"Trumpet Island" tells the story of Richard Bedell, Eve le Merincourt and Valinsky, the human derelict. Bedell goes through a period of hardship and deprivation in which he can find neither work nor the hand of good fellowship. He becomes bitter and discouraged. Eve is taken from the quiet seclusion of a finishing school to wed a man she loathes. Valinsky, with a perfected invention for airplanes and starvation staring him in the face, cannot find anyone who will consider him seriously.

Thus these three travel the roads that Destiny has put them on—Bedell, the Stony Path seeking Success and Fame; Eve, the Road of Roses with its thorns and Valinsky, the Road of Mud and Muck. After many windings and twistings these three roads converge, bringing happiness and content to Eve and Bedell, while Death looms for Valinsky at the end of his journey.

Bedell's metropolitan orgies—his dissipations resulting from a too-bountiful Luck and a hopeless Love—his trip to Trumpet Island to become a man once more—Eve's fateful marriage—the airplane honeymoon—the storm—the wreck—the meeting which results in the strangest, the most alluring love story ever told—from this point on, sensational levels are touched in the unfolding of the story of Trumpet Island.

forth again, saying: "I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to state my opinion as regards photographs. In the course of one's labors, one often receives many requests from the most indulgent public for a photograph of one's self. Of course, one would like to comply with these kind requests, but what to do in my case, I don't know. I loathe photographs. I haven't had mine taken in years, except in my work. That I don't mind, for then one isn't one's self, properly speaking, but to a large extent one has assumed the personality of the rôle he happens to be playing. . . . Or photographs that have an artistic substance, irrespective of being reproductions of one's features. . . . these may be worth while, but one meets very few of them. The tragedy of the photograph is that only the features are reproduced, and the real person is entirely omitted. I have no photographs of my friends. I have better pictures of them merely by closing my eyes a moment and seeing them as I know them. If I am like my photographs, I dislike being reminded of the fact."

He concludes, (I mean almost concludes—there are two postscripts), by remarking, with rather masculine plainness, that he is sure he hasn't said anything interesting or clever, as one should in "this sort of thing," but that "perhaps it is your kind office to make living substance of even the driest old bones."

I don't know about the kind office, but then, neither do I know about the old bones. . . . Mr. Meredith is a very stalwart, very robust, rather Herculean young man, and there is nothing of the shrinking violet about him, save the essential qualification of modesty, which he does seem to possess, quite largely.

The aforementioned postscripts are as follows: "I have just received word which makes it look as tho I am going to have a sort of company of my own. It is really thrilling."

The second observes, naïvely, "I think it looks terrible to say an actor loves music and literature and is kind to his mother, etc., even tho this is probably the case. The discerning know these things without being told; the others wouldn't understand anyhow—and there you are."

A third postscript is mine own. I accept the responsibility, tho I don't know why I should. When I talked, or endeavored to, with Mr. Meredith, he was a bridegroom of, I think, five weeks' standing, and one of the nicest things about him was that he admitted it with a blush and the very proudest smile, saying, hopefully, "Don't I look it?"

EUREKA

For three days he had been poring over a big book, oblivious to the world about him. Suddenly he gave a piercing cry of triumph. The movie press agent had discovered an adjective never before used by his rivals.

How Young Is Anne?

surprised her sisters in the chorus by announcing her intention of "breaking into" pictures. She went to the World studios in the East and was cast in a very small part with Alice Brady. After that she went back to her show, danced some more, and got a call to be in another picture with Miss Brady. Almost everything Anne has ever done on the screen has been with her—until she played the ingenue rôle in "The Copperhead" with Lionel Barrymore.

That rôle, of course, established her. The Universal people saw her work and decided to "import" her to their West Coast studios. And there she was, working in one of those downtrodden-factory-girl parts in a story called "The Girl in the Rain" when I saw her.

One of her outstanding characteristics is her unpretentiousness, a somewhat unusual trait to find among the film-famous.

Her frank admission of her deficiencies is one of the most truly delightful things about her. She admitted that she bought a small car because she couldn't afford a more commodious one; that her "flat," as she styles her apartment, isn't done up in the most expensive luxury; that she hasn't a maid at the studio because she's not yet one of the screen's larger luminaries; that she's always more or less gripped with heart failure when she goes into the projection room to view the day's "rushes" or film footage. She's very much in apprehension lest she will do a "flop," as she terms a failure, and yet the one thought that buoys up her hopes, she remarks, is that she can't absolutely "flop" until her contract expires—at least, she'll draw her salary until then.

She isn't very much interested in matrimony, altho every time she gets a "fan" letter from a man it gives her a thrill. Yet, when she is around men, she says that they always treat her so like a child that it makes her furious!

It's Anne this, and Anne that; Anne, have you your rubbers, and Anne, aren't you afraid that you'll catch cold?

All of which makes her think that if you're small, you must be a baby.

And all of which prompted me to ask the question, "How old is Anne?"

That Anne refuses to divulge. Her eyes sparkle, she laughs her infectious little chortle and shakes her head.

"Old enough to know better!" she sassied back. "And old enough not to tell my age."

But at that, with her natural chirpiness, her bird-like physical qualities—and the fact that she won't eat certain things, among them rye bread, which children don't like—makes me venture a guess.

Anne is nineteen. I thought she was, but when I asked her, she shook her head and mumbled an ominous "No-o-o! Lots older." But I asked Joe Martin, the monkey, and he shook his head "yes" and grinned his broadest. And Joe Martin is the wisest bird on the Universal lot.

He can even tell you what kind of perfume Priscilla Dean uses!

"Keep Your Eye on Jim!"

"It's not alone what a man does during working hours, but outside of working hours—that determines his future. There are plenty of men who do a good job while they're at it, but who work with one eye on the clock and one ear cocked for the whistle. They long for that loaf at noon and for that evening hour in the bowling alley. They are good workers and they'll always be just that—ten years from now they are likely to be right where they are today.

"But when you see a man putting in his noon hour learning more about his work, you see a man who won't stay down. His job today is just a stepping-stone to something better. He'll never be satisfied until he hits the top. And he'll get there, because he's the kind we want in this firm's responsible positions.

"Every important man in this plant went out in the same way. Our treasurer used to be a bookkeeper. The sales manager started in a branch office up state. The factory superintendent was at a lath a few years ago. The chief designer rose from the bottom in the drafting room. The traffic manager was a clerk.

"All these men won their advancements through spare time study with the International Correspondence Schools. Today they are earning four or five times—yes, some of them ten times as much money as when they came with us.

"That's why I say that Jim there is one of our future executives. Keep your eye on him. Give him every chance—he'll make good!"

Employers everywhere are looking for men who really want to get ahead. If you want to make more money, show your employer that you're trying to be worth more money. If you want more responsibility, show him you're willing to prepare yourself for it.

For 28 years the International Correspondence Schools have been training men and women right in their own homes after supper, or whenever they had a little time to spare. More than two million have stepped up in just this way. More than 110,000 are studying now. Ten thousand are starting every month. Can you afford to let another priceless hour pass without making your start toward something better?

Here is all we ask—without obligation, mark and mail this coupon. It's a little thing that takes but a moment, but it's the most important thing you can do today. Do it now!

days, she had told me over the telephone, and there were still a number of scenes to shoot for "The Mollycoddle," which she was making with Douglas Fairbanks.

The picture had been dragging on for an unconscionably long time, until the entire company were probably sick to death of it. Doug had broken a finger and so had been unable to work for several weeks. Then had come his marriage to Mary Pickford and the Nevada suit to declare the marriage illegal by annulling her divorce from Owen Moore. The entire profession was almost as indignant over this as were the principals. Thousands of people have gone to Nevada every year for no other reason than to get divorces and nothing said. But just because they are famous, Mary Pickford and Douglas Fairbanks may not be allowed their happiness. This was the general tenor of the conversation whenever the subject was discussed, and it was being discussed everywhere. Undoubtedly, this notoriety played its part in delaying the Fairbanks production.

No, I wasn't in the least surprised that Betty Bouton should be late and I decided to wait for her as long as possible.

It was five minutes of four. For perhaps the ninth time, I glanced at the girl sitting next to me, a pretty girl with large, dark-brown eyes, set rather far apart, and chestnut-brown hair. She, too, was obviously waiting for some one who was very late. It occurred to me that a conversation with her might relieve the tedium.

"Pardon me," I said. "Are you, by any chance, Miss Bouton?" It was on the tip of my tongue to add, "I'm sorry, a chance resemblance," when she answered, "Yes, I am," and we shook hands, laughing. It seems that she had been there since ten minutes of three and had had me paged four times! Ah, well, the carpenters had been making so much noise . . .!

In the tea-room, we selected a little table against the wall, where we could talk undisturbed, and while the waiter was getting our tea and toast, "cut thin"—("That is a little trick I have learnt here," she said. "If you order it cut thin, they have to make it fresh; otherwise you are as likely as not to get toast left over from breakfast!")—I had a chance to really look at her for the first time.

She wore a dark-blue suit and her blouse was of a lighter shade of blue linen simply trimmed with pleating and rows of hemstitching. She wore a conservative little hat and veil.

The daughter of a successful inventor, Betty Bouton was born in Philadelphia and educated at the University of Pennsylvania. She and her sister both took, and, for that matter, still take, a keen and active interest in the woman's rights movement.

"I'm not much of a moving picture fan," she said, frankly, when we were discussing recent pictures.

She doesn't know how long she'll stick to the acting phase of the industry.

"I'd like to go into a scenario department and write continuity," she said, seriously.

"Because you are tired of acting?" I asked.

"Not exactly! But I've been doing it for a year and a half, and I've never stayed so long with anything else in my life.

"I was in Morosco's play-reading department for a while. I've also been a probation officer, a social investigator for a psychological clinic and a secret service agent, the latter during the war.

"My first job was as an investigator for a charity organization in Jacksonville, Florida, at a salary of sixty-five dollars a month. It was a very large salary for a woman; every one in the office told me so. There was one man especially who didn't see how I could possibly be worth so much!

"And how we had to work! We even had dictaphones installed so that we could work on Sundays. It was just case after case of illness and poverty, until I could almost have believed that there was nothing but misery in the world.

"I began my stage work by going to Sargent's dramatic school in New York, and my first part was with Nat Goodwin in 'The Merchant of Venice' as Jessica." She smiled at the recollection. "I just romped thru that part, without any knowledge of its traditions, just enjoying every moment of it! I shall probably never enjoy a part that much again."

Followed "Amarilly of Clothesline Alley" and a season of stock at the Shubert Theater in Newark, N. J. Her most recent stage appearance was with Bertha Kalich in "The Riddle—Woman."

On the screen, she appeared in "Three Men and a Girl" with Marguerite Clark; "Daddy Long Legs" and "Heart of the Hills" with Mary Pickford; "Man's Fight" and "The Man Worth While" with William Farnum; "The Final Close-Up" with Shirley Mason; "Dont Ever Marry" for Marshall Neilan and "The Mollycoddle" with Douglas Fairbanks.

It was during the making of "Dont Ever Marry" that she married Arthur Jackson, whom she met in the Alexandria tea-room thru Rose Mullaney, a Los Angeles casting director.

"I've been married for three months," she said, "and I've scarcely seen my husband for as many days! He had to go to New York to write his new show, 'Scandal,' and I had to stay here and finish my work with Mr. Fairbanks. But I'm going to join him at last. I haven't any professional plans at all—just a great many ideas about marriage that I intend to put into effect at once."

Doubtless, that was just a mood of the moment. I can hardly imagine her dropping the thread of her professional life; she appears much too ambitious for anything like that.

The Convictions of Conrad

Conrad Nagel was born in Keokuk, Iowa, in 1896. His father is a composer of note and also dean of the Highland Park College of Des Moines, from which Nagel received his bachelor's degree when he was seventeen years old. His mother, too, is a musician—a singer. Conrad Nagel drifted naturally to the stage. While in college, he was constantly producing plays and acting in them himself.

In athletics, he won several medals for sprinting. An interesting coincidence is that his first part on the professional stage was that of a sprinter. He was supposed to have fallen and had to come running on with a bad "cut" painted on his leg. Exactly the same sort of accident had happened to him in real life and the cut was painted over an actual scar. His first professional engagement was with a stock company in Des Moines, of which Fay Bainter was also a member. Followed "The Natural Law," "Experience," "The Man Who Came Back" and "Forever After." While he was appearing on the stage in New York he was also making pictures—a strenuous existence for any one who wants to try it, working all day and half the night into the bargain. Pictures he has made are "Little Women"; "The Lion and the Mouse," with Alice Joyce, "Redhead," with Alice Brady; "The Fighting Chance," a Robert W. Chambers story, for Famous Players-Lasky, and "Athalie," another Chambers story, for Mayflower.

Mrs. Nagel has made one appearance on the screen, because the director wanted just her type, but she does not expect to enter the profession.

This, That and the Other Thing

Incidentally, and this may carry more weight than even I am aware of, he admitted it.

"But the specific thing?"

"Oh—that. I'm looking for a play.

In the market for a play. A speaking play, something with a character rôle—just so long as—" He waved expressive hands, indicative of the banishment of the aforementioned idol. "A play that will amuse, first of all," he went on, seriously, "for, after all, that is what the theater is for; that is what life is for. A great play, to my mind, is a play that thrills, that makes the man or the woman watching it forget, even if for the moment, the burden that is pressing upon him or upon her—that makes that man or that woman feel a sort of flaming, sorrowful but wonderful contact and sympathy with the whole world of tears and laughter—and the great artist is the artist who makes that play alive; the purpose of it an animate, vital one. Forgetfulness with inspiration is the work the theater has to do and can do better than any other institution known to man, and to carry on that work is the gift given to every artist, to every man and woman in the drama."

Youthful Stars of America's Stage—and Their Dressing Tables

HERE'S another new star in the firmament—Miss Grace Christie, whose Silver Bubble dance is such a charming feature of the John Murray Anderson revusical comedy "What's In a Name."

We never suspected embroidery and knitting contributed anything to Miss Christie's success in her unique dance until, in a moment of confidence, she said, "My Silver Bubble, they tell me, moves with the gossamer lightness of thistle down. It never would if my hands were not velvety smooth—a condition I credit largely to Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. Curiously enough, I first used this cream to keep my hands from "catching" when doing embroidery and knitting. Oh, yes! I do a lot of both."

GUARANTEED LOVELINESS. Whenever you see a bottle of Hinds Honey and Almond Cream on a dainty dressing table, you may depend upon the owner being a woman of loveliness,—the possessor of those attributes so admired and desired by everyone,—a complexion of soft, glowing clearness, and hands slender, white and fragrant.

Delightful coolness is the first sensation when applying Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. Then follows a wonderful healing and softening process—a remarkable refining of the skin's texture and restoring of the surface to its natural clearness.

We talked of a great many other things. Marriage, for instance. Mr. Lytell believes in the infinite possibilities of marriage. He thinks the very young marriage is the serious deterrent to successful consummations. The getting-on-in-life folk not knowing their own minds, how can the hardly more than adolescent be expected to? They can't be. And there you have it; have most of the tragedy, most of the divorce, most of the unhappiness. Not marriage, but the age of marriage, is the point.

The rest of it must go under the titular heading. It leaves a great deal to the individual imagination, which is what every good writing should do, to be good, and which is what every man should do, to be interesting, and which is precisely what Mr. Lytell did, to be quite honest. And there you have it! Exert your imaginations and let them run riot! You won't go wrong and you probably won't go right, but as you won't know the difference in any case, it won't make any difference, and Mr. Lytell will still be the subject of your intensive wondering!

county, to your state, to your country and to your God, sir. We arrest you in the name of a violated law which means order. Order! Sir!"

There was a sob from the onlookers. The sob was from one lone onlooker. Said onlooker was said wife. She crept from her sheltering corner. She wound loving, even passionate arms about the disreputable Reggie. She faced, disheveled, defiant, the officers of the law, the "Town Tattler," the Freddie Leslies, one or two others.

"He may," she said, with fine dramatic intonation, "be a disgrace to his county, his state, his country and his God. He is not a disgrace to his wife. His wife who I-loves him. His little wife who for—who forgives him all. All. All!"

"Oh, d-a-r-l-i-n-g!" sobbed back Reggie and fell upon her neck.

The "Town Tattler" fell upon her trusty Waterman and wrote the witching hours away . . . and they all lived happily ever after.

B.AFFLED

By WRIGHT FIELD

I kneel here in this quiet place
And gaze upon your calm, dead face,
Not knowing if this thing be grief,
Or what I feel be vast relief,
I only know the tears I shed
Are for myself, not for the dead;
I only know, that, all my life,
Since, for some whim, you made me wife,
Your mind and heart were locked from me,
And tho I sought and sought the key,
I never found it, never knew
The secret, inner road to You!
Death levels all, they say, yet see,
Death has not brought you low for me
I dare not say of you, "My own . . ."
The same proud look is carved in stone
Upon your lips. You hold me still Aloof and waiting, at your will,
And secret still you hold from me,
Half smiling thus, inscrutably . . .
The path outside was dark and drear,
The inner road was sweet and near . . .
Yet, still denied the key by Fate,
Baffled, I kneel outside the gate!

Learn what clean teeth mean

All statements approved by high dental authorities

See the results of the new way of teeth cleaning. They are quick and decisive. You will know at once that they mean a lifetime of cleaner, safer teeth.

Millions of people employ it. And the glistening teeth seen everywhere show what it means. See what it means to you.

A film combatant

Most tooth troubles are now traced to film—to that viscous coat you feel. Film clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

The ordinary tooth paste does not end film. So the film remains—much of it—and may do a ceaseless damage. Nearly all people suffer from it, more or less.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. So, despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing.

New methods now

Dental science, after years of searching, has found new ways to fight film. All have been proved by many clinical tests. They are so efficient that leading dentists everywhere advise them.

These methods are combined now in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. It has brought a new era in teeth cleaning. This is the tooth paste we urge you to try.

Watch the new effects

The use of Pepsodent at once reveals many new effects.

One ingredient is pepsin. One multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. One multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize mouth acids.

Two factors directly attack the films. One of them keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily cling.

Pepsodent is the new-day tooth paste, complying with all modern requirements. It does what never before was done. You should learn its benefits at once.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. Watch the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Every one in your family needs Pepsodent daily and a week will prove this to you. Cut out the coupon now.

A scientific film combatant combined with two other modern requisites. Now advised by leading dentists everywhere and supplied by all druggists in large tubes.

Buddy Messenger, of "Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp," "Babes in the Wood" and "Jack and the Beanstalk" fame. You all remember little fat Buddy, and how funny he looked trying to chase villains in those entrancing fairy-tales?

The one distracting circumstance is that Lucille Ricksen, who plays leads with Johnny Jones, is the object of adoration of both Johnny and Buddy. Of course, the star has a better chance, partly because he's older, and again because his pocket-money is about double that of Buddy's—and you know the deadlier of the species, no matter how tiny, do love a spender!

Johnny has a mechanical turn of mind. Acting is just a means to an end, he thinks. He is going to be a civil engineer when he grows up—at present twelve birthday candles are all that he can "blow out"—but he spends his spare time enjoying the mechanical toys which his father gives him in great profusion. He has all sorts of building arrangements and tools and reads scientific magazines with zest.

Johnny loves to draw, and one of the funny things I viewed was a cartoon they had discovered that morning, in which Johnny, as Edgar, is portrayed as a pugilistic-looking infant with wings and a halo that resembles a centipede more than anything else, taking orders from Mr. Hopper, who is saying "Nothing like it!"—a favorite expression of the director's when the children do not get his idea at rehearsal. They all dote on their director, and no wonder, for he is play-fellow, story-teller and purveyor of sweets to them.

Johnny is temperamental, for all he's a lively lad. For instance, they had a violinist on the lot to purvey soft strains, the sort of cat-calls and woodland trills which were supposed to enthuse a new star.

Johnny Jones stood that sort of music for three days, then he said, impulsively, "Aw, say, Mr. Hopper, cant you cut that violin out? It makes me sick!"

Always obliging, the director got an accordionist, Charlie Fessia, who is brother to the famous vaudeville actor, and now Johnny enjoys doing emotional scenes and gets right into the action without difficulty.

There are some awfully cunning uniforms for Johnny Jones, one as the general, one as the President of the United States, in which garb he lays down the law to the Senate. They've built a little model of the White House just for Johnny Jones' new picture, and quite as much money and trouble have been expended on his sets as on any that Pauline Frederick might demand.

I saw them one day working on the Long Wharf at Santa Monica. The small village had turned out en masse to do honor to a great general's return with his soldiers. Johnny came marching home in his best new suit, preceded by the Santa Monica band of thirty pieces.

He wasn't keen about the gaping multitude, but he did enjoy that noisy band!

When I got a chance to talk to Johnny again, I said, "Wasn't that great? It must be lots of fun to wear a suit like that and pretend you're the biggest man in town!"

Johnny looked wistfully at Long Wharf, where boys and men stood minding fishing-poles, for halibut and dog-sharks were a-plenty that day.

"Aw, gee, I'd give anything to cut this stuff and go fishing," he returned. Later there's a scene in which Johnny and Buddy are permitted to squirt hoses on each other, and then the real joy of acting begins. No two boys ever had a grander time! In fact, director and helpers were drenched when trying to separate the aquatic combatants finally.

Buddy Messenger laughed and chortled until his fat sides shook. "Say, Skinny, didja getcher feet wet?" he shouted facetiously.

"Slim" is the joy of Johnny's existence. "Slim" is the property man, a real pal, an understanding sort of chap, about six-foot-two as to length and one foot wide. Johnny took me aside seriously and said, "Did you ever hear the story of the nigger who described a skinny man? He said, 'His head is just a knot tied in his neck to keep his spine from slipping thru his body!' I always think 'Slim' looks that way—but he's just awful nice . . . every other way . . . and he may get fat later, you know." "Slim" helps Johnny make up, walks about with powder-puff and lip-rouge, and, as Johnny says, "is just a second mamma to me—only I've got three mummies, one at home, 'Slim' here, and the one in the play."

Virginia Madison, Edgar's mother, is another who shows keen interest in the little brood. Taking it altogether, it really is a wonder that Johnny is not spoiled by petting. You just cant help loving him, he's so human and funny—and blest with lots of common sense and good deportment. It would be a strange thing indeed to walk out of a door without having Johnny Jones rush ahead to open or close it for one. He is always finding chairs for standing onlookers, and doffs his cap in the most cavalier manner, so that I'm not surprised to find Lucille showing a tiny preference for him.

Honestly, the best time Johnny ever had in pictures was when he and Buddy Messenger were allowed to chase a cat up a set alley while the camera registered. If that doesn't prove Johnny is one hundred per cent. American boy, I dont know what would.

"It was such a wild cat," said Johnny Jones, ruefully, "that instead of running straight thru the alley to the back lot, as we wanted it to, the puss just beat it right up the fence and across into the cafeteria window—gee, wasn't that tough luck? Afterwards we had to get a nice, tame tabby-cat for the retakes."

It would be a strange thing indeed to walk out of a door without having Johnny Jones rush ahead to open or close it for one. He is always finding chairs for standing onlookers, and doffs his cap in the most cavalier manner, so that I'm not surprised to find Lucille showing a tiny preference for him.

Honestly, the best time Johnny ever had in pictures was when he and Buddy Messinger were allowed to chase a cat up a set alley while the camera registered. If that doesn't prove Johnny is one hundred per cent American boy, I don't know what would.

"It was such a wild cat," said Johnny Jones, ruefully, "that instead of running straight thru the alley to the back lot, as we wanted it to, the puss just beat it right up the fence and across into the cafeteria window—gee, wasn't that tough luck? Afterwards we had to get a nice, tame tabby-cat for the retakes."

Way Down East

"Wont you please believe me, dear? Wont you . . . wont you stop?"

He had kist her hand and gone away. After a little she crept away, too. The glow of the coals had grown so dull and cold.

The next day was the day of the blizzard. About dinner-time Martha Perkins "dropped around." It was one of her many—peculiarities. Lennox Sanderson did, too.

The family entire collected about the usually genial board, yet somehow, on that night, it was not genial. There was not only a storm without . . .

The soup had just been brought in when the asperity of bearing of Miss Perkins congealed and became a definite thing. Her puckered lips, her darting glances, each one holding so many ounces of actual venom; her outraged hair, each bristle rampantly erect, all . . . At last:

"I must say, Squire Bartlett, that I, a God-fearing woman, believe in limits even to charity . . ."

There was a general stir about the table. Lennox Sanderson coughed, almost, it seemed, unnecessarily. It was obvious to even the unobservant that Anna Moore shrank against the back of her chair.

Then: "That woman, there," the pitiless Miss Perkins went on, "is—has a past. She—she had a child." Whereat Miss Perkins gargled in her throat and retired in great confusion amongst the folds of her mammoth linen handkerchief.

Squire Bartlett brought his grizzled brows together. The atmosphere seemed to hang, for a period of minutes, thick, definite, suspended, then came the righteous thunder of his voice, ordering the "unchaste woman" into the turbulent night.

It seemed, to the stricken group at the table, almost as tho a wraith, a ghost, an unreality, were passing from them. She went so noiselessly, so unprotestingly, so vaguely and yet so definitely, that it did not seem as tho it could be she, delicate as had been, invariably, her presence among them. The door closed after her and a squall of wind and snow whistled and shrieked in the room for a second after she had gone.

The silence succeeded her. Then David rose and faced his father.

"I am going after her," he said. "I've already lost a part of my self-respect in sitting thru your denunciation of the woman I so love. You—"

The anathema his father hurled at him, the imprecations, the threats of punishment in this life and hell in the life hereafter, he did not hear.

The faces of Miss Perkins, Lennox Sanderson, Kate Brewster, her Butterfly Man, he did not see . . .

He heard only that wraithlike passing, saw only that veiled white face . . .

Four hours later he came upon her at the bend in the river, where the ice had A Corn?

Why, a touch will end it!

A corn today is needless, and millions of people know it.

Years ago nearly every woman had them. Now women who know Blue-jay never suffer corns.

Ask your own friends.

Blue-jay comes in liquid form or plaster. One applies it in a jiffy—by a touch.

The pain stops. In a little time the whole corn loosens and comes out.

The proof is everywhere. Tens of millions of corns have been ended in this simple, easy way.

This is the scientific method—the modern way of dealing with a corn. It was created by this world-famed laboratory, which every physician respects.

One test will solve all your corn problems. Make it tonight. Buy Blue-jay from your druggist.

clogged too thickly to carry her farther. She had come to this as a merciful outlet to some wider, more kindly sea where there might be, at the least, oblivion.

He kist her closed eyes, her sweet mouth, her still hands. He promised her life and love if she would return from the dim recesses, the cold withdrawal . . .

And love is the conqueror, and there is both a quick and a dead . . . Her eyelids fluttered under his breath; her hands stirred to meet his; her lips moved and uttered his name . . . He took her home . . . so reverently that they had naught to say, so preciously they could but step aside, with such an air of One who, long ago, forgave where love was great, they could but give their tender benediction.

Does Johnny love to study? Sad confession, but Johnny does not. He would rather act than tackle the books—then go to college—later travel as civil engineer thru India and South America. With the joyful abandon of youth, with endless animal spirits and perfect digestive processes, he wants to let off steam and hasn't the faintest idea at present that the four hated study hours daily with Sallie Sykes are stepping-stones to a scientific career.

So the only time I saw him scowl—alho he was too obedient and polite to actually demur—was when Miss Sallie pulled the small chairs about in a circle after recess and crooked one slim finger in a beckoning welcome to her corner of the stage.

Johnny turned to me for sympathy. "Did you ever hate spelling? I do. I love geography, 'specially about the unexplored countries—the kind Teddy used to visit—and 'rithmetic, because an engineer has to learn estimating—but I cant see what difference it makes how you spell a word as long as it sounds all right, can you?" Johnny practices what he believes in and spells camera with three a's.

Then he rushed off, whistling gaily—and when I turned to see why he'd faded out so quickly, I noticed Buddy dropping into a chair beside Lucille, who was smiling her very sweetest.

LYRIC

By JOHN HANLON

The ashes of my dreams I sift
To find a memory
Uncharred by pain, without a rift,
Some treasured ecstasy;

Sometimes the fragrance of a flower,
Beyant beneath the dew;
Sometimes the rapture of an hour
With silence, love, and you;

A sparkling cobweb's elfin lace;
The echoes of a song;
An unfamiliar, smiling face
Amid a sullen throng;

But this I cherish thru the years,
Its charm can never die;
Your blue eyes clouded up with tears
That day we said good-bye.

But One Cent
Serves that dish of Quaker Oats

When you think of high food cost think also of Quaker Oats. One cent still serves a large dish of this food of foods.

Other breakfast dishes cost many times as much. Meats, eggs and fish, for the same calory value, average nearly ten times the cost.

No price can buy a better food. The oat is the greatest food that grows. It is almost the ideal food in balance and completeness. Its fame is age-old as a body-builder and a vim-food.

Quaker Oats, whatever they cost, would be the proper breakfast. It is wise for everyone to start the day on oats. But the cost is a trifle. It means not only better feeding but a vastly lower food cost.

Quaker Oats should be your basic breakfast. It was always important, but never so much as now.

Cost Per 1,000 Calories

Quaker Oats	6½c
Average Meats	45c
Average Fish	50c
Hen's Eggs	60c
Vegetables	11c to 75c

Saves 35c a meal

Note the cost per calory of some necessary foods, based on prices at this writing. The needed breakfast calories in Quaker Oats will cost the average family about 35 cents less than they cost in meat foods. The calory is the energy unit used to measur food value.

Quaker Oats

Just the Cream of the Oats

1810 Calories
Per Pound
Round Steak
Yields 890
Eggs, 635

Serve the finest oat dish you can get. It costs no extra price. Quaker Oats is flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. So this brand is famed the world over for delightful flavor.

ford's Pollyanna, in the scenes where she was scolded and had such a hard time, they were serious enough to her, but amusing to the audience.

"Some day I want to play big, emotional rôles. I should like to be a second Pauline Frederick. Wouldn't that be wonderful? I say to myself, tho, whenever I begin dreaming, that I'll do what I can do best and be satisfied in developing my own talents. So many girls ruin their future careers by insisting on playing rôles which are absolutely unsuited to them.

"See my mascot?" and Miss Lee pointed to a rusty horseshoe hanging over the door. "I found it here on the lot and I wouldn't part with it for worlds. I always say that I'm not superstitious, but I find there are three things I can't get away from: first, a good-luck horseshoe; then, I like to see the new moon over my right shoulder. Really, I have noticed that if you do this your whole month will be happier. Silly, isn't it? Then, I won't let anyone whistle in my dressing-room; that is an old stage superstition that still clings to me."

"There!" announced Hattie, pinning up the last refractory curl and stepping back to view her work. "It looks mighty nice and you are as sweet as a peach."

"You must be a favorite," I commented, watching Hattie's admiration.

"Oh, no; never believe that. There's only one favorite, and she's Gloria," (referring to the beautiful Gloria Swanson). "The rest of us merely strive for second place," merrily chided Lila.

"Oh, go 'long now; you know I like all my girls," chuckled the pleased Hattie.

As Miss Lee slipped into a wonderful frock of the new exaggerated hoop-skirt model, made of lovely shades of yellow satin and trimmed with bands of ostrich, we chatted on many subjects.

I enjoyed watching this young girl, who is fast winning a firm hold on the hearts of picture fans. There is a child-like frankness, a radiating sweet good-humor and an innocent spirit of mischievousness that are all very charming. She is passing thru the fascinating "growing-up" process, and alternating flashes of the poised woman and the ingenuous girl keep one guessing.

"So many amusing things happen while we are making pictures," Lila remarked. "I remember that I ate six big slices of bread and jam while we were trying to perfect one scene in 'Male and Female,' and I'll never be able to look at jam again.

"I have just finished making 'The Prince Chap,' William de Mille's first special production, with Tommy Meighan, and oh, I had a splendid part, and Tommy is wonderful to work with. I am now having a nice little rest—except when I have to come over to the studio and doll-up in finery to have pictures taken," and Lila twirled gaily in front of the long mirror to get a full view of her costume.

She was indeed a vision, for she is a very beautiful girl, with clear-cut, perfect features, wide dark eyes and lovely complexion, while the soft curves of cheek and throat are most alluring.

It is always interesting to learn how one starts on one's career, and Lila gave me a glimpse of hers. She was born in New York, but her mother being quiet and old-fashioned in her ideas, they were far removed from the theatrical atmosphere, and she probably would never have touched it had the family not become acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Gus Edwards. They took a fancy to the little girl and taught her songs and dances and later, under the quaint name of Cuddles Edwards, they made her a star feature of their clever vaudeville sketches. For seven years Cuddles played thruout the country on "big time," and, with her natural dramatic qualifications and magnetism, she became a great favorite.

"And your advent into pictures?" I asked.

"It was when I was in Los Angeles several years ago that I visited the various studios," Lila explained, "and, like everyone else, I became enthusiastic over motion pictures. On our return to New York, Mr. Edwards took me out to see Mr. Lasky; he had a test made and signed me with his company. It will be two years in June since I came out here, and they have been the happiest and gloomiest I have ever known. You see, I thought if my first picture was good, I would never need worry any more, that I'd be made, but I found that to succeed on the screen one must keep right on working and learning all the time. I realize that my work improves every time something happens that develops my nature, that tends to stir my own feelings. I don't believe I knew what emotions were all about when I first began."

Miss Lee lives in a pretty bungalow in Hollywood with her mother and small nephew, whom she adores. "We live much to ourselves," she told me. "I guess I became used to that while I was in vaudeville and traveling about all the time. I love to read, and my fad is embroidering lingerie pillows—I have stacks of them. Then, I am taking piano lessons and studying dancing at the Denishawn School. I love to dance best of everything!

Lila went on to tell me that her only sister, Peggy Lee, was playing in Belasco's "The Son-Daughter" in New York, and Lila hopes some day—oh, there is plenty of time, for she is still in her early teens—that she can appear on the great Broadway in a big, smashing play.

Meanwhile, this happy, high-spirited young girl is growing up into a very sensible and well-balanced woman, as well as a beautiful one, and is giving us some refreshingly wholesome screen characterizations. There is no doubt that Lila Lee possesses the qualifications for a successful actress, the best one being the willingness to work, and work hard!

New Easy Way to Become An Artist

THIS wonderful new method makes it possible for anyone to learn Illustrating, Cartooning, or Commercial Art. Hundreds of our students are now making splendid incomes. And most of them never touched a drawing pencil before they studied with us.

The simplicity of this method will astound you. You will be amazed at your own rapid progress. You learn by mail—yet you receive personal instruction from one of America's foremost Commercial Artists—Will H. Chandler. Get into this fascinating game NOW. You can easily qualify. A few minutes' study each day is all that is needed.

Crying Demand for Trained Artists

Newspapers, advertising agencies, magazines, business concerns—all are looking for men and women to handle their art work. There are hundreds of vacancies right this minute! A trained commercial artist can command almost any salary he wants. Cartoonists and designers are at a premium. Dozens of our students started work at a high salary. Many earn more than the cost of the course while they are learning! YOU—with a little spare-time study in your own home—can easily and quickly get one of these big-paying artists' jobs.

No Talent Needed

This amazing method has exploded the old idea that talent is an absolute necessity in art. Just as you have learned to write, this new method teaches you to draw. We start you with straight lines, then curves. Then you learn how to put them together. Now you begin making pictures. Shading, action, perspective, and all the rest follow in their right order, until you are making pictures that bring you from $50 to $500 or more! Many artists get as high as $1000 for a single drawing!

The Coming Collier

Famous Players-Lasky and have just finished 'Young America,' to be called 'The Boy.' My next is with Ollie Thomas in 'Nobody'—some fun! We're to be orphan, rural, dirty, disheveled kids. F. P.-L. is lending me to Selznick."

"What does your father say?"

"He's proud that I want to do something. Oh, he's a brick! He even helped me get up my contract. I must make good for him . . ."

"And mother," he added. "I'm the only one they have and the two of them bank an awful lot on me."

There is no doubt but that he feels his filial responsibility. He intends to do big things for the name of Collier, not by it. He depends upon it for stimulus instead of support.

The son believes his forte to be managing and producing rather than acting, altho he has already appeared with his dad in a number of his hits, and at the prophetic age of six displayed a streak of family humor when he made his debut in "Caught in the Rain" by hiding under an umbrella and carrying it across the stage.

"I want to be in the business end of the theater. I am practical and commercial enough for that. I want to see a show. I want to cut out what I know doesn't belong and put in what I feel is lacking. My real desire is to get together musical comedies and present them on a colossal scale—in cooperation with my father."

The comradeship between the William Colliers and their son is one of the most unusual—not only of the theater, but out of it. Buster realizes it, too, and claims his was an unusual childhood, because he was brought up in a same way. The three of them, (quoting Buster), have been "on the square"—always. They have not made unreasonable demands, or argued, or laid down doctrines, dogmas and decrees. There's been the principle to "talk things over." He was never once commanded to "do this" and "you must not do that," but "do this because . . ." His mother has never wrangled with him, or doubted or mistrusted him. From the first he's stood and talked; he's been placed on his own and relied upon to do what is best for himself and them. His name has always evoked fidelity. He cannot forget he's a Jr. and not only has something to live up to, but to carry out. For, all his eighteen years of life—

The creed imbibed in him has been thoroughness. His father has persisted that whatever he learn, he learn diligently, from the beginning and all thru. It was that way when he was taught baseball, tennis, billiards, pool, and no doubt accounts for the golf father-and-son tournament the two of them won last spring. One winter, because of ill health, he had to stay away from school, so he went down to the Long Island home and finally occupied himself with becoming

Eastern Studio Gossip

New York has had a number of visitors from the Coast recently. These included Lew Cody, the he-vamp. Maurice Tourneur was another. Mildred Harris Chaplin and Helene Chadwick are visitors.

"Babe" Ruth, the home-run king of baseball, has been signed by Kessel and Bauman to make a feature or two. The first, "Headin' Home," will be released just about world series time this fall.

Goldwyn signed a Broadway theater, the Astor, for the run of its special production, "Earthbound," which opened August 11th. And they say Allan Dwan may hire another to show his "The Scoffer."

Mme. Olga Petrova departed Europe-ward after a brief vacation at her Great Neck, Long Island, home, following an Orpheum tour. Mme. Petrova, he it noted, broke every previous vaudeville record all over the circuit. She is booked for a thirty-seven weeks' Keith tour next season. And still we hear rumors of a return to pictures.

Justine Johnstone has been busy, both in Florida and at the Famous Players Fifty-seventh Street studio in New York, on her first Realart star vehicle, "Blackbirds." Jack Dillon is directing and William Boyd is playing the lead.

Hobart Henley, the director, sailed for Europe on July 24th, taking along his bride, who was Corinne Barker, the actress.

Lowell Sherman, well known on the stage as a "heavy," has been signed by Famous Players. He is playing opposite Alice Brady. Recently he was doing "Way Down East" with D. W. Griffith, playing the villain who lures the fair heroine away from the farm.

Whitman Bennett, the independent producer, placed Kenneth Webb under a three years' contract immediately after he finished "The Master Mind," the first Bennett production in which Lionel Barrymore is starred. Webb is now directing Mr. Barrymore in "The Devil's Garden" for Mr. Bennett. First National will release these productions.

Doug Fairbanks and his bride, our own Mary, made a triumphant return from Europe and were feted and dined in New York before they departed coastward. Europe is reported to be slowly returning to normal.

Geraldine Farrar has been using the old Thanhouser (New Rochelle) studio for her Associated Exhibitors' screen work. Her first A. E. vehicle, "The Riddle: Woman," was made there by Edward Jose. Pathé will release it, together with other Farrar productions. Adele Blood and Montagu Love appear prominently in the cast. Many of the scenes were shot at Marblehead, Mass. Following its completion, Miss Farrar went to the Adirondacks with her husband, Lou Tellegen.

Speaking of the Adirondacks, Mrs. Sidney Drew is turning out a number of stories in her camp at Paul Smith's.

Carol and Her Car

"The very first day I drove it to Sing Sing. (Miss Dempster lives with her sister at Mamaroneck, her mother having died but a few months ago, thus ending a comradeship that was rare and unusual.) I know every motor-cycle policeman in Westchester. They're all awfully nice to me."

We admitted, (mentally), the discernment of motor-cycle officers.

"I am up at seven these days and out along the hill roads. I used to ride horseback a great deal in California, but, gracious, I love motoring much more. And I love Westchester and the Sound far more than California."

Whereupon Miss Dempster offered to motor us to the Mamaroneck station, after grimly remarking that she had not hit anything much—yet. We accepted. Which proves one of two things: either the charm of Miss Dempster or our fearless attention to duty. And (we hope the owner doesn't read this) attention to duty is something exceedingly elusive on the edge of Long Island Sound in the dusk of a midsummer day. Particularly when said charm is thrown into the balance.

P.S.—We hit nothing en route. That is, nothing that prevented us reaching the aforementioned station on time.

And They All Wept!

Then she came East and, in 1919, went into the Ziegfeld "Follies" and later into the Nine O'clock and Midnight Revue.

Thus the meeting of Mary and Dick came about. When Clarine Seymour died suddenly, Mr. Griffith decided to help along the romance by giving Miss Hay the rôle intended for her.

The Barthelmesses have been honeymooning in a little cottage on the Sound, close to Rye and within easy distance of the Griffith studio. (Dick's mother has a bungalow nearby.) There is just one honeymoon intruder—a pet alligator weylept "Nasturtium." And we sort of suspect "Nasty," as Dick terms him, has been neglected o' late.

"DUST OF THE DESERT"

By MARGARET CARL BREWSTER

Dust of the desert, tawny, gold,
Rhythmic with life, with joy untold
You run, you leap in the morning light;
You sleep like a nestled child all night;
And I,—a human bodied thing—
Know all your heart and the song you sing.

Dust of the desert, your lips are mute;
But the breath of your spirit is like a flute
That has thrilled from ages strange to man,
And calls thru the dusk that no thought can span.

And I—when the world shall term me dead,
Shall be one with this buoyant dust I tread.

My body shall crumble, with yours shall merge,
My soul with your passionate life shall surge,
We shall dance, brave comrades, on pulsing sod

In the open reaches touch hands with God
And all the while my body shall be Dust of the desert—exultant, free.

I'll Teach You Piano In Quarter Usual Time

To persons who have not previously heard of my method, this may seem a pretty bold statement. But I will gladly convince you of its accuracy by referring you to any number of my graduates in any part of the world.

There isn't a State in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players of the piano or organ who obtained their entire training from me by mail. I have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. Investigate by writing for my 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

DR. QUINN AT HIS PIANO
From the Famous Sketch by Schneider.
Exhibited at the St. Louis Exposition

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of "finger gymnastics." When you do go to the keyboard you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition usually a "nightmare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DEX. Quin-Dex is a simple, hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DEX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others, and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better at any price.

You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My course is endorsed by distinguished musicians, who would not recommend any course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

A TEXAS BLUE B.—Greetings. Everybody's excited about election. You point with pride to the extract from Kipling which reads, "That lying proverb which says that the pen is mightier than the sword." Perhaps, in ages to come, history will note that the pen of President Wilson did more to end the Great War than all the swords in the universe. You can write to Blanche McGarity at this address, or San Antonio, Texas.

INQUISITIVE EVE.—Je suis pret. So you want an interview with Constance Talmadge soon. Ora Carew is playing in "His Friend and His Wife." Yes, Pell Trenton is starring. You will find Helen Jerome Eddy in "The First Born" for Sessue Hayakawa.

SWEET SIXTEEN.—No, I am not angry. The thou callest me all the vile names in Webster, still thou canst not raise my ire. With all thy faults, I love thee still, and the stiller you are, the more I love you. I would advise you to write to the Griffith Studios for her photo. Thanks, but I take that airc weekly. Write me again.

ALAN M. R., BRIDGEPORT.—I have answered you.

H. M. P.—So you want more addresses of the players. Most of them change about so often that the address wouldn't be correct when it appeared in print. California and New Mexico are the only states where a marriage license is not required.

WANDA AND ANNA.—I used to drink lemonade every day that I could not get buttermilk, but now I substitute grapefruit whenever I can afford it, because a grapefruit is nothing but a lemon that has grown fat and prosperous. You want to see more of Anna Q. Nilsson and Wanda Hawley. 'Nuff said!

G. T. R. 16.—Dont trust me with your secrets. A man who can be trusted with secrets can be trusted with anything, and it is usually not safe to trust a man who is getting $9.00 per. Theodore Roberts in "The Old Homestead." Thomas Meighan in "The Frontier of the Stars." Call again.

PANKY. Thanks for the gum. I had a chew on you. No, indeed. So you live in a dull town and it is not Philadelphia. But just you dont forget that happiness is the ability to recognize it. Remember the Blue Bird!

LOVER OF WALLY REID.—Memory is what makes us young or old. Wallace Reid has one child, and "The Golden Fetter" was produced in February, 1917. Wallace Reid in "The Charm School" and Billie Burke in "The Frisky Mrs. Johnson."

Nobody HONTS.—Sort of an appropriate name! My favorite player? That's telling. Theda Bara is yours. Nell Shipman in "Back to God's Country." You seem to be able to believe anything you wish. What a lucky creature! Enid Bennett in "Her Husband's Friend."

WANDA HAWLEY FAN.—Oh, yes, I am a fine singer and have a fine range. I use it to get my breakfast on. You want Wanda Hawley on the cover. See the CLASSIC for August. Ruth Roland in "Ruth of the Rockies," Bert Lytell in "A Message from Mars."

THE GROVE.—Thanks, old chappie. Mabel Normand is not dead, Irene Castle is 27 years old, and as to her salary—nobody knows, and nobody seems to care. You say I have a wit which Touchstone would envy. Who's he? Juanita Hansen in "The Phantom Foe." Write me some more.

ESTELLA E. B.—Why, of course, that's Mary's own hair. And if 'it wasn't, what's wrong about it? Mary will continue in pictures. Some prominent English producer offered both Mary and Doug an enormous sum to play together in a picture, but they refused. Oh, yes, the great philosophers live under different conditions; Diogenes lived in a tub, Seneca in a palace, and I live in a hall room. Why, Marguerite Courtot in "Velvet Fingers" and "Pirate Gold."

MARJORY GOLDFINCH, 30 Falcon Avenue, West Adelaide, South Australia, wishes to write to some of our American girls.

ARTHUR A. I.—Well, here are just a few of the leading stage stars who have appeared in motion pictures: Sarah Bernhardt, Mrs. Leslie Carter, Lillian Russell, Lew Fields, Edwin Ahles, Tully Marshall, Robert Edeson, Elsie Janis, Cyril Scott, James K. Hackett, Betty Nansen, and Rose Coghlan. No, Lillian Walker has not been with Vitagraph for some years. No, I doubt if Caruso will appear in pictures again.

BETA.—I agree with you about those gowns. Some of the players with good figures display bad form. Ouch! Ethel Barrymore and W. B. Davidson played the leads in "The White Raven," Cleo Madison and Richard La Reno in "Black Orchids," Marguerite Clark and William Lorelli in "The Fortunes of Fifi," Viola Dana and Robert Walker in "The Mortal Sin." You're welcome.

FILLUM FAN.—I dont know, try California. So you think H. B. Warner dresses in exquisite taste. You are a clothes observer. June Caprice was on the stage last. Sorry I cant help you about the contest.

ELMHURST.—Yes, things fly in pictures. At fifteen a girl wants fame; at twenty she wants wealth; at twenty-five she wants a Rolls Royce. Natalie Talmadge is about two years younger than Constance. Constance is 5 feet 6 inches. Your list of players who are Jewish cannot be printed here. It is immaterial what one's religion is.

HELEN H.—Perhaps it was a slapstick comedy, and then anything is possible. Clara K. Young is not married now. Elsie Ferguson is, also Conway Tearle. Sure, they all like it. Never an actor born who does not appreciate applause. As Cowper says, "O popular applause! what heart of man is proof against thy sweet, seducing charms?" And since the players cannot hear you applaud they naturally like to read it.

FIGURE.—Enjoyed your first letter very much. The correct quotation is, "Tho the mills of the God grind slowly, yet they grind exceedingly small; tho with patience He stands waiting, with exactness grinds He all." Of course, I go in the ocean. Yes, there are several excursions up the Hindson.

That Youth From Second Avenue

completed pictures under my arm. I vanished one day and made a round of the motion picture studios. Shortly thereafter I landed my first job. I was on my way! Nor family nor feud could stop me then!"

"And you've never wavered in your choice?"

"Never. Never once."
 "You've been unusually successful—unusually young." I was thinking of his playing last season in "Martinique"; of his recent pictures with Constance Talmadge; of his rehearsal at the time of our talk for his new play to open the next month.

"I've had my struggle," he told me, "down to my last cent; not enough to eat; no place to lay my head. I might almost say; the gamut. And I'm glad. I don't want ever to forget that side of the ledger. I don't believe that I ever will. Just so long as we do remember it we preserve a balance; we hang on to the happier today; we appreciate the awards. It was a priceless experience."

I asked Mr. Coleman whether he intended to keep on with both stage and screen.

"I want to," he said; "I am anxious to establish myself on the stage so definitely that I may return to it at any time after a lapse."

"What type of work," I said, "in a general sense?"

"Oh," he said, "in a general sense . . . for instance, or for instances, Otis Skinner, the Barrymores, Leo Dirichstein, William Gillette . . . once you have achieved standards of that sort, nothing short of death or general disability can take them from you."

"What of the screen?" I asked.

"The screen," he said, "is for the very young; that is, importantly. After youth . . . I want to do my best work on it now, but I want, also, to have laid the cornerstone for all the years that are coming after."

One feels, strongly, a sense of potential productivity in Mr. Coleman. He is one of those from whom, reasonably, the great may come. He is possessed of youth, sensitiveness to a marked degree, a passion for his work, for life, for the things of today and tomorrow. He has foresight and common sense. He is unlimited, (illustration, to wit). He says the feminine plays a large part in his very young life. He believes in marrying in his own profession, because of the inestimable bond of better understanding. The query arises: What good fairy was absent from his cradle of Second Avenue at the surely auspicious christening?

O. J. B.; EDITH P.; A MERRY COUPLE; TOURMALINE; FLORENCE BILLINGS ADMIRER; ED M. D.; CAROLYN F.; MAE; JUNE L.; ANNETTE Y.; MULHALL FAN; ELIZABETH K.; MASTER RICHARD; JACK D.; FRANCIS M.; F. G. H.—Your questions have been answered elsewhere. Let me hear from you next month. Good night, and God bless you all.

H. C., OLEAN. Greetings! Warm enough for you? (This question is enough to make even Job mad.) You can reach Wallace Reid at the Famous Players Studio, Los Angeles, Cal. Of course, I want all of you readers to write to me. That's what I'm here for, to wait on you.

GUSSIE T.—Never heard of the player you mention. Florence Turner is playing in "Black-mail" with Viola Dana. But it is very probable that Job never had to answer questions. Why, Wallace MacDonald is playing opposite May Allison for Metro. No, he isn't married.

GODDARD W. S.—Horrors! You write that you find an inconsistency in "Male and Female,"—that when the party was rescued after being on the island long enough to grow a beard, they were all clean shaven. Nevertheless, you say you hand it to Thomas Meighan and Theodore Roberts. Thanks for the good wishes.

HATTIE H.—You say you want to keep on the right side of me. That's the idea, I'm a little hard of hearing on the left. What a question you ask me—Does Dick Barthelmess care for girls? Hattie! Don't you know that he now has a wife of his own! Charles Meredith is 23, and has brown hair.

F. R. F.—Well, I can't say nice things to each and every one of my several thousand correspondents. I haven't enough wit to go around. But be patient—all things come to the patient waiter. Yes, Cleo Madison was Judith and Rose in "The Trey of Hearts," while George Larkin was opposite her.

CHIN CHIN.—Have no fear, ye who enter here. SHADOWLAND has had a wonderful career during the first year of its existence. You want to see more interviews with Kenneth Harlan and Webster Campbell. I had a royal time reading your brilliant letter.

EDNA M.—Glad to hear that you patronize our advertisements and that you always get what you want from them—sweet are the uses of advertisements. You refer to Huntley Gordon as the doctor and Walter Neclaund as Red in "The Dark Mirror." Alex Onslow was Jerry.

MARIE, HARTLEY, IA.—I have such a large family that I cannot remember you all. Have I met you before? Sorry, but I haven't the cast for "Mothers." Allan Forrest was married, but I don't think he is at this writing. Pat O'Malley was the husband of Madge Kennedy in "The Blooming Angel." By joining the correspondence clubs. Write me. By all means do.

WANDA AND ANNA FOREVER.—Good! You greet me as Philotheus. Ah ha, fair lady, I thank you. I am not acquainted with the gentleman, but it sounds good, and I believe philo means wisdom. You say Wanda Hawley and Anna Q. Nilsson are a duet of blondes which no other person can match.

SIXTEEN.—But it happens that oil was first struck in this country at the Drake Well, Titusville, Pa., on August 28, 1859. Put not too much faith in the Answer Man. He is getting old and is not infallible. Yes, Jack Mulhall is married. I'm sorry. You refer to King Baggot. You want to know of what faith is Bebe Daniels. Oh boy! I don't keep a church record of the players. I'm a busy person.

USURP.—You betcha I have buttermilk every morning. Food for thought. Thanks for the joke. Yes, those 15-inch German guns were heard 150 miles away.

CAROLINE V.—Yes, I guess Anita Stewart did the jig-dance herself in "Old Kentucky." Mabel Normand has left Goldwyn to go on the stage. Seena Owen is going to have her own company. It's a sad month that we don't hear of somebody going out for themselves. Thomas Meighan is with Famous Players.

"Ferd, They are Playing Your Song"

Imagine the thrill these words gave Mr. Ferdinand Hohnhorst, of Covington, Ky., as he stood on a crowded street, watching the great Peace Parade, when Meyer's Military Band came swinging along playing his song, "Uncle Sam, the Peaceful Fighting Man." But let him tell his story in his own words:—

Chester Music Company
Chicago, Ill.

Covington, Ky.
1941 Augustine St.

"Gentlemen—My song entitled 'Uncle Sam, the Peaceful Fighting Man,' that your Mr. Friedman composed and arranged for me, is making a great hit. In the Peace Parade at Latonia, Ky., Meyer's Military Band played my song three times, and we have now had it arranged for orchestras and quartettes, and it is making a good impression everywhere. The Vocalstyle Music Company, Cincinnati, Ohio, a concern manufacturing music rolls for player pianos, has taken up my song, and has already sold over a thousand of these rolls in Cincinnati alone, and are placing them in their bulletin for April, which will go to all the different cities.

"My song also has made a decided hit among school children, and has been introduced into several of the Cincinnati schools. Thanking you most kindly for the services you have rendered me, I remain, Yours very truly, (Signed) Ferdinand Hohnhorst."

LEO FRIEDMAN, Our Composer

of whom Mr. Hohnhorst speaks so enthusiastically is one of America's most gifted composers and the author of many great song hits. Among his great successes are "Meet Me Tonight in Dreamland," the sales of which reached the enormous total of more than two million copies. Others that reached into the million class were "Let Me Call You Sweetheart" and "When I Dream of Old Erin." Mr. Friedman writes music to words, that cause them to fairly throb with feeling and musical charm. He has been styled "America's Favorite Composer," and properly so, for his melodies have reached the hearts of millions of the American people, and made them sing.

Leo Friedman

There is an interesting cast. Wyndham Standing is the murdered one, Mahlon Hamilton is the murderer, Flore Revalles is the impulse, Naomi Childers is the innocent wife of the murdered man and Lawson Butt is a friend who acts as protagonist of the King creed. Thru him speaks the theory. Of this cast, we hand the larger portion of our praise to Miss Childers. Never before was she so warm and moving. Only once or twice did she lapse from a fine repression.

Somehow or other, William de Mille's visualization of the Edward People drama, "The Prince Chap," gave us a large measure of entertainment. Now, "The Prince Chap" is not technically good. The lesser-known De Mille's direction is along cut-and-dried lines. The People story itself is basically as trite as from actuality as a best seller. Yet the thing stands appealing and ingratiating, even if it isn't life.

How many times have grey-haired but distinguished guardians fallen in love with their pretty wards—in fiction and the drama? Here a young artist, loving and beloved by an American girl, goes off to London to study. There chance forces him to assume charge of a little motherless girl. The child grows up and love slowly blossoms. The far-away princess, of whom the artist has many times told the child, marries another, as far-away ladies often do, but the lonely artist does not quite believe that his ward can care for him—the prince chap of her dream. But, of course, she does, and things end happily.

Out of "The Prince Chap" stands little Lila Lee. We frequently felt it our critical duty to comment rather disparagingly upon Miss Lee when she was first thrust upon the screen as a star. But Miss Lee had the courage to go back to the very bottom and start anew. She has justified herself in "The Prince Chap." Her playing of the girlish Claudia, just budding into life, is a charming and infinitely touching study of melting girl-womanhood. Anyone who can play so sympathetically is sure to go far.

We thought Thomas Meighan adequate as the artist, altho he does not suggest the prince chap of our conception. Nor is Kathlyn Williams rightly cast as the princess. But Charles Ogle does some excellent character work as an old servitor who follows the prince chap to London.

On William de Mille's direction we have commented. Once he even permits the player who depicts the studio landlady to go thru an elaborate pantomime indicating eviction when she tries to collect her bill. Subtlety is missing—and yet "The Prince Chap" stands as good entertainment.

Allan Dwan's "The Scoffer," (First National), is above the recent Dwan average. Here is a sort of combination of the spiritual uplift of "The Miracle Man" and the regeneration note of "The Right of Way." His wife having disappeared with another, and having been sent to prison unjustly convicted of an illegal operation, a young doctor, cursing God and man, goes off into the Northwestern lumber camps. He has resolved never again to aid man thru his science. How his cynicism gives way before the faith of a mountain girl and how he comes to save a little boy from death form the story. There is a picturesque scene in which misunderstanding lumbermen mob the cabin where he is performing an operation upon the boy. They destroy his lights before they understand. In desperation, the doctor calls upon God for aid, whereupon a bolt of lightning hits a hut nearby and the resultant flames provide the necessary illumination for the successful conclusion of the operation.

James Kirkwood is the cynical one who is redeemed. Somehow his cynicism seems too lightly shaded. One never quite believes him so lacking in godliness as the subtitles try to make us believe. Noah Beery really stands out as a drunken lumberjack who gets religion.

Marshall Neilan has blended Poe's "Murders of the Rue Morgue," the recent newspaper tales of transplanted monkey glands and a dash of journalistic romance, plus a serial view-point of life, in making his "Go and Get It," (First National).

Page your credulities when you go to see it. First of all, there is a wicked newspaper publisher who is trying to wreck his paper, owned by a rich young woman, so that he can buy it in with the help of the rival publisher. To do this he 'phones all his news stories to the rival and holds them out of his own paper. To the office comes a returned soldier-reporter and a young and pretty girl news-gatherer.

At this time the city is startled by a series of murders. These, it develops, were committed by a monkey to whom a surgeon has transplanted the brain of an executed murderer. This is revealed as the film unfolds, but Neilan finds it necessary to send his hero-reporter leaping from aeroplane to aeroplane and from plane to speeding train before he lets him discover the same thing. Finally the boy gets his news heat, the unscrupulous publisher is unmasked and everything ends happily, for the girl reporter whom the young chap has come to love turns out to be the newspaper owner herself.

This sounds involved. But "Go and Get It" is involved. Indeed, it is almost "Intoleranceian" in its leaping from thread to thread. We doubt its wide success. To us it seems an elaborate effort to develop a thrill melodrama, and the effort is apparent all thru. Pat O'Malley is the fearless stunt reporter and Agnes Ayres is the pretty owner, but the real honors go to the young and freckled Wesley Barry, who burns up the produc-

The Glass of Youth

shall be in me of success, of promise, I owe to her. She had a limitless patience with me, as she has with all persons and all things—saving only when she is in a temper."

"Has she a temper?"

"Oof!" He threw up his hands and told me of an incident, or more than an incident to him, when on a tour with her. I think it was in Havana.

He had been told, he said, that the tour was to end rather abruptly. Thinking the information was to be accredited, he, in turn, passed it on to someone else. Madame Bernhardt sent for him and accused him of misinformation. He appealed to her secretary for confirmation and the secretary denied the truth. The youthful Gaston told said secretary what he thought of him, and Madame lost her temper to the extent of hurling some silverware about and informing Mr. Glass that he was a fool, would never be an actor and, in brief, to be gone from her sight and her company.

Later on, she telegraphed him for his return—which he did not make.

He told me this with a certain plain-tiveness and regretfulness. A certain hesitancy and fragmentariness. He has a perspective in it, but the regret he felt at it tinges his memory still. He has, it is evident, an admiration of Bernhardt mixed with love, and a love mixed with admiration.

"She told me," he said, "that I would never be an actor. How did I dare to suppose I ever would be? And I told her, 'But, Madame, you, you yourself, are the one who told me that I should be an actor, nothing but an actor, all the time an actor'—and now I have but the one ambition—when Madame Bernhardt returns to this country, I want to be playing on Broadway. I want to make her see, I want her to know that once she was right and once she was wrong, but that it was the first time, the early years wherein she was most right."

In "Romeo and Jane," the comedy which played on Broadway for a short while and which is to return there in the fall, Mr. Glass made a notable success. The critics compared him to Lou-Tellegen to the extent of warning Mr. Tellegen to look to his laurels. Gaston Glass showed me the clipping with this criticism with some glee. "I've sent it to Tellegen," he said. "I know him, of course, and I am wondering how he will take it. Probably," he observed, naively, "he will be as mad as anything."

When Mr. Glass first came to this country a little more than a year ago, he knew not one word of English, nothing of pictures and less of the customs of the country in general. A native pliability and adaptability, the artist who knows all things, all peoples and all conditions without, paradoxically enough, actually knowing them at all, is responsible for the perfection with which he has fitted into the scheme of things, screenically, socially, professionally—every way.

Already, and notably, he has been in "Oh, You Women," with Louise Huff; "Let's Elope," with Marguerite Clark; "The Lost Battalion." "Mothers of Men," with Claire Whitney; "Humoresque" and "The World and His Wife," with Alma Rubens; and "The Branded Woman," with Norma Talmadge. He is to do other pictures with Norma.

Previous to his picture work, Gaston Glass was a pilot in the French Air Service. He first came to this country, in fact, for the French Air Service.

I asked him what he thought was the difference between the theater in this country and in his own.

He said, "It is not so much a matter of study here. It is almost wholly a matter of recreation."

I asked him what made him prefer the pursuance of his art in this country rather than in his own.

He said, "Money—why not?"

Having no adequate answer to so essentially sane a question, I gave none.

I asked him, further, what he thought of the American girls, comparatively.

He eschewed the query. "There is nothing comparative," he said, "about girls. I adore them—all." He added, plaintively, "There is just one thing about the American girls . . . they all say the same thing to me . . . and I do not know how to take it. Maybe you will tell me. They say to me, Norma Talmadge, too, 'Dont lose your accent, or you will lose your personality.' How shall I take a thing like that?"

He was quite plaintive and I had to laugh. "They all mean it in a complimentary sense," I said, with soothing reassurance, "of course . . . but . . . dont lose it!"

TENDER-HEARTED TILLIE

By WRIGHT FIELD

She never could abide the sight of sorrow,
And other people's sniffing made her wince;
She once cut off a worm's head in an apple,
And so she never peeled an apple since.
When baking day came 'round she slumped
the kitchen,

The sight of pain she always tried to shirk—
She was so very, very tender-hearted
She couldn't bear to see her mother work!

She kept her room religiously on Sunday
Until the dinner on the table lay,
It hurt her so to see her mother cooking
And serving meals upon the Sabbath day;
About the hammock on the front piazza
On Monday mornings she would always lark, While mother on the back porch did the washing—
She couldn't bear to see her mother work!

'Twas bad enough to watch her parent bending
With aching back above the steaming tub, Worse still to see her furrowed forehead swatting
When halls and floors she was compelled to scrub;
And when the day for mending and for ironing
Arrived, the sight she felt she'd have to shirk,
And so went shopping—tender-hearted Tillie
Just couldn't bear to see her mother work!

Puffed
Wheat

More Bubble Grains

Millions of dishes coming

Direct from the harvest fields we get the choicest wheat that grows. Then we seal the grains in guns, apply a fearful heat and explode them. They come out as bubble grains, flimsy and flaky—puffed to eight times normal size. Yet the grains remain shaped as they grew.

Every night of the coming year millions of children will enjoy this Puffed Wheat in their bowls of milk.

Three grains now exploded

Three grains are now puffed by Prof. Anderson's process, and each has its own delights.

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are whole grains. Corn Puffs are corn hearts puffed.

All are thin and airy—all have exquisite flavor. And every food cell is blasted for easy, complete digestion.

Serve all of them in all the ways you can, for no other form of grain food can compare with these.

long before either of them ever took any interest in pictures.

And, speaking of Ray, I met his father, who is visiting him at present, and I want to say right here and now that the elder Ray, straight, tall and handsome, would make a real rival for his son in the matinee girls' hearts did he ever wish to invade the silent drama.

One of the most interesting stories being told around Los Angeles these days is that of Tony's house. It seems that the handsome Antonio Moreno longed for a real home, a bungalow. So he went to work and bought a beautiful little place in the foothills. Then came the task of getting servants, buying fool and running the place generally. The servants imposed on Tony for special privileges and special hours, and they ate him out of house and home. Tony found that buying his own bacon wasn't so fascinating as he thought it would be, so he literally threw up his hands, sent the whole troop of parasitic servants packing, forfeited his initial payment on the house and said, "Good riddance." Now Tony is back at the Athletic Club, bag and baggage, and perfectly content to let the other fellow take the responsibility. Even the men find that house-keeping isn't what it is cracked up to be.

Actually the most thrilling event of the month in Hollywood was staged when that daredevil aviator, Lieutenant Locklear, performed for his Fox feature. I arrived on the scene just in time to have a short talk with him before he went up in his aeroplane. His flying field is a flat valley almost surrounded by purpling hills. Here a church had been built for the picture and a road wound past it. On either side of the road towers had been erected for the camera-men and directors. Locklear himself is a charming Texan, tall, boyish and sincere . . . and he actually doesn't know the meaning of physical fear. He was wearing a dinner suit for picture purposes and was as interested in whether his make-up was on straight as a child is with a new toy. Finally the signal was given that everything was ready and Lieutenant Locklear vaulted into his plane. He had his favorite pilot at the wheel, because he himself was to do the stunts. In the picture he was supposed to be pursuing a band of robbers in an automobile. Down the road past the church sped the auto, and thru the air swooped the plane, then dipped down over the auto while Locklear climbed out on the wings and, hanging just out of reach of the propeller, shot at the robbers. A shudder ran thru the vast crowd of onlookers and people held their breath until he had balanced himself along the wings and climbed back safely to his seat.

"Oh, that was nothing," he said when everybody oh'd and ah'd at him, on his landing, and he meant it.

Several times he performed the same death-defying stunt so that the camera would be sure and get it, and later he had to run the plane so that one of the wings knocked down the church steeple. None of us onlookers dared watch this exploit, so we'll have to go see the picture before we know what really happened. The next thing we knew he was back safe on the ground, a little out of breath and saying:

"Gee, this suit is a mess."

May Allison's sister, Mrs. Wright, was a delegate to the Democratic convention at San Francisco from Tennessee. At the close of the convention, almost every politician you have ever heard of begged her to get him a permit to visit the Metro studio. Poor May did her best for her sister's friends, but she says she was quite overcome, for each and every one of them wanted to know how they could get into the movies, (mainly in the business end).

Speaking of Metro, I saw Nazimova assist in directing a huge theater scene for her next picture, "Madame Peacock," the other day. Nazimova is another who allows no one on her set when she is working. Screens are placed all around it and huge placards inform one, "Madame Nazimova set. Absolutely no one allowed except those taking part." Being small, I slipped in where angels fear to tread. Over three hundred extras were playing audience in a theater scene. Madame Nazimova's newest undertaking is assisting in the direction of her own pictures.

I talked to Wallace MacDonald in a remarkable duplication of Greenwich Village's "Pirates' Den." He was playing lead for May Allison in her new picture, "Are All Men Alike?" I tried very hard to get him to admit his marriage to Doris May, which all the film colony has suspected, but he only smiled, denied it and then assured me that Miss May was quite the most wonderful girl in the world. In among the extras in the scene was Wallace's younger brother. Wallace has just brought him out here from their home in Nova Scotia, and he is getting his start and practical training in that way. He is a good-looking young chap.

Another interesting young personage in Miss Allison's "Are All Men Alike?" is Henry Miller's young son. He looked very pallid and far from strong to me, but everyone raves about his histrionic ability.

Alice Lake was busily at work on "Body and Soul." She is a rather exotic little creature and a clever actress. She was wearing a black evening frock and carrying a blue ostrich fan in the cabaret scene that was being taken when I saw her, and in between shots she could scarcely keep from shimmying, the music of the orchestra was so peppy. Stuart Holmes is the wild, wild villain in this picture, and, a queer thing, the hero hadn't even been picked out at that time. Director Charles Swickard explained to me that all the work was the villain's and is calling to people who have ideas

Motion picture producers and stars are searching the country for new workable story-ideas, for there's a famine in photoplays which has now become acute. New writers—now unknown—must be developed soon. So this is a call to you to take up a new profession and win a new success.

SOMEWHERE in America this year scores of new photoplaywrights must be developed, and your opportunity to win success is as good as anyone's.

Dorothea Mourse
Attributes her success as photoplay writer to the Palmer Plan.

For literary ability is not required—one need never have written previously for any purpose whatsoever.

Ideas about life, imagination, and a willingness to try are the sole essentials.

Who hasn't thought while viewing some picture, "I have a better idea than that"? And who hasn't had the desire to try to write that better photoplay?

The thing to do is act now—begin today—learn how to put your ideas into the proper form for presentation to producers.

The Form's The Thing

NEXT to ideas, the most important phase of this new art is the arrangement of ideas. And that is what is now being taught most successfully by correspondence through the Palmer Plan—taught to people who have never written and who never thought that they could write.

Note the pictures of men and women on this page. Learn what they have done. Only a few months ago they, too, were novices like you. Only a few months ago they, like you, became interested, and sent us the same coupon that you can send.

5000 New Photoplays Are Needed

THE dearth of photoplays plots is an actual one—5000 new ideas are needed. The great producers must have many for immediate production.

For 20,000,000 people are attending motion picture theatres daily, and they don't want the same plays twice. This, remember, is now the world's fourth largest industry, and is still its fastest growing one.

Producers are paying from $250 to $3000 for successful first attempts by unknown writers. They must hold out these inducements to get the stories, to develop new writers into photoplaywrights.

On this great wave scores will rise to new fame, and you may be one of them. Don't think you may not be—"what you think, so you are," is a truth that all should seriously ponder.

In addition to those whose pictures are shown, the following novices have lately won success under the Palmer Plan:

George Hughes, of Toronto, Canada; Martha Lord, now staff writer for Clara Kimball Young; Idyl Shepard Way of Boston, author of "Keep Him Guessing" (Selznick); Elizabeth Thacher of Montana, author of "Reforming Betty" (Ince); James Kendrick of Texas, creator of six stories since enrollment less than a year ago; and Frances W. Elijah, author of "Wagered Love," recently purchased by D. W. Griffith.

You have as good a chance as these to succeed and sell your stories.

The Palmer Plan

THE Palmer Plan of Education in Photoplay Writing teaches the technique of photoplay writing. It is indorsed by the substantial men of the profession because it represents their ideas of the proper kind of training—and the training of new writers, they plainly see, is the industry's vital need.

So on our Advisory Council are such famous producers as Cecil B. DeMille, director-general of the Famous-Players Lasky Corp., and Thos. H. Ince, head of the renowned Thos. H. Ince Studios. Also Lois Weber, noted director and producer, and Rob Wagner, who writes of the industry in the Saturday Evening Post.

Twelve other leading men and women of the profession contribute lectures to the course.

And the best known players of national reputation who constantly need new plays, unqualifiedly indorse this plan. It includes personal instruction and criticism by experts in all departments of the art.

It is of university calibre in all respects. It brings to you all the best experience of the practical men of the profession. From no other group can one learn so much of the essentials of the art.

A Feature of This Course

THE Palmer Plan also includes a vital aid to students—the Palmer Marketing Bureau, headed by Mrs. Kate Corbaley, acknowledged judge of stories and author of photoplays for William Farnum, Frank Keenan, Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew and many other stars.

This is the bureau to which producers come for photoplay-stories—the great clearing house for idea-material for the screen. Situated in Los Angeles, motion picture capital of the world, and in constant touch with the great studios, this bureau helps to sell your work.

Scenarios are submitted in person by this bureau direct to producers, stars and editors. This is an exclusive service available to all Palmer students.

malicious face of the other woman, grew fixed and far away. "There are mountains, white, with cold black shadows, and a hut among them—"

Winifred Bailey started, sat upright and cast a quick, hunted look at the man beside her, Arnold Wayne. "What is she saying?" she whispered. "How does she know?"

"So small," the strange tone was saying yearningly, and Athalie held out her arms as a woman to a child, "so sweet! But it needs some one to love it! Babies must be loved or they die—"

"Stop her! She shall not—oh, my God!"

Arnold Wayne, his own face grey, jerked at Winifred's arm. "Sit down! Are you mad! She can't prove anything. It's all guesswork, I tell you!"

But Winifred did not heed or hear. Her wide eyes were turned toward the unseeing figure before them, cradling emptiness in her arms. "See! Can't you see it! My baby! Our baby, Tony—that I left in Switzerland! The old woman said she was dead, but—I see her—plainly—" and she slid, crumpling, down upon his shoulder. With sudden tenderness the man took her in his arms, as one who holds what is his own, and faced the room manfully.

"I don't know how she guessed our secret, friends," Wayne said slowly, "but by heaven, I'm glad! Bailey, it's the truth. Winifred belongs to me, and I shall take her. You will have to give her her freedom, and I'll marry her, as I should have married her five years ago!"

Pineport lapped up the news as a cat laps up the choicest cream. Athalie Greensleeve back, eh? And that city feller Bailey hanging around, looking like he didn't see nothing else in all the world 'cept her. Well, jest as we always said, the city warn't no place for a gal—look how she's fell away! She aint long for this world, that's certain . . .

Clive Bailey was the only one who would not see that Athalie was very ill. He was full of breathless plans for the future, their future, that they would enter upon together as soon as the legal formalities of the divorce were ended. He knelt beside her chair under the budding spring orchard and talked eagerly, passionately, as tho to drive away by the very impetus of his words any fear. And Athalie listened, smiling faintly, saying little, tho her eyes, on his flushed, boyish face, were compassionate.

Then one day, he came and threw himself down on the grass by her chair and silently laid a paper on her lap. She read the first words of it, laid it aside, and their eyes met. "Tomorrow—this afternoon!" he begged her, "and then—forever afterward, oh, my dear! my dear!"

"I think—I have been waiting for this," Athalie said faintly. "I couldn't—go until you had kist me, Clive. And now you shall kiss me—good-by."

At that he gave a desolate cry, and, rising, slung back and forth under the pink boughs, defying God to take her away just when he had got her, begging

Donté solves the problem. You apply Donté to the skin with a little water, that's all. Donté not only removes superfluous and undesirable hair, but also prevents its return, as it works under as well as above the surface. Donté will not injure the most delicate skin, it leaves it smooth and in perfect condition. Donté is endorsed by leading practitioners.

Hair is beautiful on the head, but nowhere else. No matter what process you have used before, you will find Donté delightfully satisfactory. Donté has no disagreeable odor, instead, it is fragrantly perfumed. Donté eliminates cutting, shaving, or other painful methods.

God, saying wild things. Presently he was beside her again, head on her lap, crying the tearing, difficult tears of a man. She waited until he was quiet, touching the rough, dark head with pitying fingers. Then . . .

"If you love me, Clive, you cant lose me," she said; "I'll be near you all your days and nights. Because the love part of me wont die."

"But it's all of you I want, Athalie!" the earth-bound soul of him cried agonizedly. "What am I going to live on all my years? What have I got to remember?"

"This!" Athalie whispered. She drew him up to her, lifted her face to his face. For the moment she was not spirit, but all woman, warm, tremulous, passionate.

"Kiss me, Clive!"

With his lips on hers, his arms around her, she let go her frail hold on Life joyously. For her the glory of Love's promises would never be tarnished by fulfillment, for her the rose of joy would never fade and wither in her hands.

Her First Interview

heavenly! We did have a maid, but she thought it was too lonely. We never get lonely, do we, Lorrie?" and Viora squeezed her friend's hand.

"She's the settled one," she continued. "Sometimes she has to sit on me, but I always mind her, dont I?" and Viora beamed on Lorrie, while Lorrie beamed on Viora.

"What in the world would you have done if you hadn't found each other?" I asked, for they seem such kiddies to be alone.

"Oh, I dont know!" they exclaimed in unison, while Lorrie slipped from her chair into Viora's lap and they hugged each other close.

"It was Lorrie that started this picture business," began Viora. "I was away on a little visit, and when I came back I found Lorrie working as an extra here at the Lasky studio. Of course, I came right out to see about it. Louis Goodstadt, the casting director, picked me out and gave me my chance. Everyone says, 'My, how lucky you are,' and I know they are right. I have been lucky, for, you see, I just bumped into it, for, really, I was never even stage-struck."

"Viora was going to be married——" began Lorrie.

"Yes," sighed Viora, pensively, "but after I began in pictures I didn't want to give them up, so I chose a career rather than a husband. I'll only be twenty-three when my contract expires, and that will be plenty of time to marry. I want a whole family of children, too."

The first thing Viora did was a small part with Robert Warwick in "The Fourteenth Man." Then things began to happen so rapidly that she hardly had time to get her breath. She played the rôle of a widow in Bryant Washburn's "The Sins of St. Anthony" so seriously that she went from a hundred and thirty pounds down to a hundred and twenty-three.

"We hike and ride so I'll never get fat," she remarked, serenely. "I used to ride in rodeos when I was a youngster on the ranch. Lorrie and I wear boy's clothes at home. The first time I met Roscoe I had on my hiking togs, and I guess he thought I was a little boy coming to work with him," and both girls indulged in a giggle-fest.

"Roscoe is so funny, and a darling. In fact, the whole company are such fun, and they all help me in every way they can. I don't always know what to do, and Roscoe will say, 'Now, just what is it you want Miss Daniel to do in this scene?' and the director will explain it all over again.

"The greatest fun of all is receiving fan letters. I'm beginning to get them, have had twenty altogether. We get so excited when one comes. First I read it, then Lorrie reads it aloud. One came the other day from Illinois, and it spoke of me as a famous star. That tickled me. Oh, how I do prize them! Why, they are worth millions, and I know I shall never, never be bored with them."

While this embryo star loves comedy, she dreams of becoming an emotional actress. She adores Nazimova and worships Pauline Frederick, and she wants to play with Richard Barthelmess, too, some day. "He's so wonderful!" she exclaimed, which phrase means about everything to an enthusiastic, effervescent girlish point of view.

As we started back to the set, Viora grew serious. "Did I say the right things? Was that the way to be interviewed?" which shows how unspoiled she is.

With her beauty, her vivid imagination, her sweet, girlish enthusiasms and hopes, Viora Daniel promises to become a favorite twinkler.

The October Shadowland

Perhaps you feel that there is nothing left for you to discover in the way of the unusual in any of the magazines you may see on a newsstand. But you are wrong—

For after you have laughed over the drawings and comments of Wynn sent us from Paris;

After you have read the article by Oliver M. Saylor on the perfection of the cabaret in Russia;

After you have dreamed over the delicate beauty of the new poems by George O'Neil, that young prodigy of twenty-three who is hailed as the coming poet of America;

And after you have lived thru the one-act play called "Damnably Clever" by Gladys Hall and Dorothy Donnell, we feel that you will go on your way rejoicing that there is still one thing left in this humdrum state of affairs which is absolutely new; which is beautiful; which is, above all things, unusual.

Not that we mean to infer that the above is all the October SHADOWLAND offers—not at all, for there are new portraits, new articles of current interest, and new color plates of new stars and other luminaries.

FAIRY STORIES FOR FILM FANS

By FRANK H. WILLIAMS

Once upon a time there was a star who objected to having his name appear in type larger than the names of the rest of the cast.

Once upon a time a comedy was produced in which there were no bathing girls nor slapstick.

Once upon a time there was a large-sized town in which there wasn't a single girl who thought she looked like Mary Pickford.

Once upon a time the screen version of a popular novel was produced just as the novel was written.

Once upon a time a screen star lived happily with his first and only wife.

Once upon a time a motion picture cameraman actually felt that he couldn't have done any better than the director for whom he turned the crank.

Once upon a time a famous studio didn't receive a single letter from aspirants anxious to enter the movies, for an entire day.

Once upon a time in a big movie theater during an entire evening not a single person read a title out aloud.

Once upon a time a very beautiful girl who had a chance to go into the movies said she preferred to stay at home and marry the son of the corner butcher.

Once upon a time a great picture success was produced and the director, camera-man, scenarist, star, leading man, producer and everybody agreed that the entire credit for the production's success was due to the author of the story.

200 YEARS OF MUSICAL INSTRUMENT MAKING

Pacific Coast Paragraphs

the hero only came in at the last second to save the "gal."

I met Earl Rodney, that good-looking leading man in Christie comedies, in Hollywood the other day. He was all broken up over the sudden death of his mother, and I wish to express here our own sincere sympathy for him in his bereavement.

Out at Vitagraph I found that serials and comedies are the rage. The reason is that they make nearly three times as great a profit on serials as on feature productions.

Jean Paige was just completing "Hidden Dangers." As we stood beside the Vitagraph swimming pool, I almost envied her the necessity of diving in, but she assured me that the dangers encountered in serial making were really nerve-racking. They had been trying to get a picture of Joe Ryan saving her from drowning in a sewer-pipe. Up to that time all that had been accomplished was the cutting-up of Mr. Ryan's head when he dived in three feet of water to "save" her. Miss Paige was eagerly anticipating a three weeks' vacation in New York.

Our friend Antonio Moreno is also serialing, and this time he is directing himself in "The Veiled Mystery," while William Duncan and Edith Johnson have completed "The Silent Avenger" and are starting "The Wizard Spy-glass."

And, by the way, while I was in the Vitagraph office word came thru that "Lady Fingers" had been purchased for Earle Williams' next production.

Vitagraph is spending a great deal of money on Larry Semon and his comedies. He is given carte blanche for his productions and writes, acts and directs them himself. He is as funny behind the camera as in front of it.

Rumor says that Charlie Chaplin's long absences from the screen have necessitated the arrival of a new comedian to fill his shoes, and Harold Lloyd and Larry Semon are spoken of as the only possibilities. Frankly, Harold Lloyd has already nearly topped him in the heart of the public. In all the large Western cities I have found Lloyd comedies advertised as the main attraction, ahead of the feature.

Besides Ann Forrest and Forrest Stanley, other members chosen for Cecil B. de Mille's new all-star cast include Clarence Burton, Ann May, Theodore Kosloff, Kathlyn Williams, Theodore Roberts, Shannon Day and Bertram Johns. The picture is still tentatively called "The Other Wife."

Mildred Harris Chaplin is the recipient of an offer to star on the stage in New York from A. H. Woods. Whether she accepts or not, she intends to make her next First National picture in New York.

And, by the way, a bitter legal battle for the custody of Baby Marie Osborne, highest paid juvenile actress in the world, will probably mark the divorce suit and counter complaint of pretty Edyltha Osborne and Leon T. Osborne. So far, all attempts at an adjustment out of court have failed.

Carlyle Blackwell, long a star in the early days, is now a leading man for Marion Davies.

The plans for producing the picture, "Foolish Wives," at Universal City, under the direction of Erich von Stroheim, called for too much attention to detail to suit Captain George W. Hazen, secret service agent for the Treasury Department, and consequently warrants were sworn out for the arrest of von Stroheim, Clarence E. Riley of the Riley-Moore Engraving Company, Gleb de Vos, artist and designer employed in the art department of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, and three others, on charges of violating section 161 of the Federal penal code relating to counterfeiting money.

The extreme penalty for the offense charged against them is a fine of $5,000 or five years' imprisonment, or both, according to Captain Hazen.

"Moving picture producers have been flirting with the counterfeiting laws for some time," said Captain Hazen. "We have warned them repeatedly and have confiscated counterfeit money from them on several occasions. There is no such thing as 'stage money.' Money is either real or counterfeit. We are going after motion picture people the same as we would any other violators of the law."

The scene of the picture, "Foolish Wives," is laid at Monte Carlo, and the script called for great quantities of French money. This, it is charged, the producers undertook to reproduce with too great accuracy of detail.

A get-together meeting between representatives of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce and motion picture producers recently resulted in a love-feast at which all grievances dissolved into thin air and a spirit of cooperation developed. The meeting was held following complaints that those interested in motion picture work had been discriminated against by Los Angeles merchants.

Bill Hart and I had an interesting con-fab out at his studio one hot day recently. Bill's greatest concern at present is his law suit against Thomas Ince, for, as Bill puts it, "all the money he has in the world." So far, things look optimistic for Hart. Our great Westerner is really pleased with the picture he has just finished, called "The Testing Block," a story of the Sierras. Bill is writing his own stories these days. "The Cradle of Courage" being from his pen.

Clara Kimball Young is taking a two-weeks' rest before beginning work on another picture, the title of which has not yet been announced.

P.S.—We exceedingly regret to announce the receipt of a telegram notifying us of the death of Lieutenant Locklear, who was instantaneously killed while performing an extremely difficult aerial "stunt" for the camera. The interview contained in this article was the last one he gave.

NATIONAL BOB

Youth and Fashion is everything—that's why I am wearing the latest National Bob. It's too lovely for words with its soft, wavy hair falling teasingly over the combs that slip so easily through my hair. Everyone thinks the Bob's my very own—it matches so perfectly and I never sacrificed a hair. I use invisible pins to attach the ends and it's on and off in a jiffy. My picture shows the Bob charm. How did I get it? I sent a strand of my hair with $10.00 and it was promptly sent—Postpaid. I'm as happy as a child with a new toy and I never looked so well. You'll like it too. Cartoonists Make Big Money

Every time Sid Smith makes a stroke of his pen, millions of people laugh, and every laugh means money for the man who creates it. Andy and Min earn big money for him every day.

Men who can make people laugh are highly paid for doing so. By capitalizing their humorous ideas and their ability to draw, cartoonists like Fox, Briggs, King, and Smith make $10,000 to $100,000 a year. You may have ideas that are equally good. Let Federal training give you the skill to put them on paper.

Send For This Book

If you really want to learn to draw, send for "A Road To Bigger Things." It describes the Federal Master Course and shows how it will develop your originality while teaching you the technical details of cartooning. Through the Federal Course you get the composite experience of more than forty of the greatest cartoonists and artists for your personal use. Send six cents today for your copy of this book. The Celluloid Critic (Continued from page 88) tion as a bespectacled newspaper office boy. You'll like him.

Far and away the best thing of our month—in points of workmanship and humanness—is the latest Mrs. Sidney Drew comedy, "The Unconventional Maida Greenwood," of her series of Julian Street's "After Thirty" stories. This is another near-amorous adventure of the susceptible Jimsie Wickett. This time his understanding wife returns just in time to diplomatically cure Jimsy of his affaire with a Bohemian studio dweller whose soul, according to the best seer information, is just in tune with his own. The lack of dramatic overemphasis, the adroit filming of thought rather than physical action and the closeness to reality all stamp this little photoplay as a gem of its kind. Mrs. Drew is one of the two or three directors whose faces are towards the movie Mecca of tomorrow. These "After Thirty" stories, subtle and slender tho they are, are actually milestones of progress. A word about John Cumberland. No player on the screen is doing finer or more carefully conceived playing.

We found George Fitzmaurice's "The Right to Love," (Paramount), to be rife with the splendid direction and fine photography characteristic of this admirable director. But Fitzmaurice has not duplicated his "On With the Dance," because here his story is weak, trite and hectic. CLASSIC readers are familiar with it thru its appearance in these columns under its original title of "The Man Who Killed." Fitzmaurice, however, never evolved more singularly beautiful cinema moments than in this fetid Constantinople tale. Mae Murray is a colorful heroine, to say the least.

Robert Vignola's draggy screen adaptation of "The World and His Wife," (Paramount), completely disappointed us. Announcements presented this as adapted from the play by Charles Frederic Nirdlinger, in turn based upon a "poem" by Jose Echegaray. Which, of course, is a fearful injustice to a vigorous Spanish playwright. Echegaray is a leader of the younger Spanish school of the drama.

"The World and His Wife" is a study in the destructive power of gossip. Echegaray takes three people of Seville, a husband, a wife and another man, a young poet, and shows how, without a single real atom of wrong, they are wrecked upon the shoals of tittle-tattle. Echegaray told his tragic tale in terms of psychology. The theme has reached the screen in terms of obvious physical action. The whole opus becomes feverish melodrama. Vignola has failed in points of subtlety, atmosphere and shading. The striving for Spanish atmosphere is plainly labored. And there are numerous slips, such as the moment when the unmarried Theodora comes down to the gate of her house to meet her affianced husband. No well-bred Spanish girl would do this.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

- The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:
- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator
 - M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads
 - M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair
 - M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan
 - M. T.'s Mincrated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream"

M. TRILETY, Toilet Requisite, Dept. 30, Binghamton, N. Y.

No member of the cast seems wholly in his or her rôle, but Montagu Love easily contributes the most vigorous acting as the husband whose life is sacrificed to gossip. Alma Rubens is the wife and Gaston Glass the young poet.

We can't imagine why anyone filmed the old Rex Beach-Paul Armstrong farce, "Going Some," (Goldwyn), unless it is part of a systematic effort to do every play and book ever produced. Elaborate changes have been made to brace up the thesis. "Going Some" is just a skit built about a young college boy, a cheer leader, who masquerades as a crack runner in order to impress his sweetheart and who is thereupon forced to run a race as the candidate of a lot of bloodthirsty cowboys. Of course, he wins. We've forgotten how just now, but that is of no consequence. Cullen Landis is the rah-rah liar, but, to our way of thinking, Willard Lewis runs away with the film as a slangy trainer.

Bessie Barriscale's "Life's Twist," (Robertson-Cole), failed to even begin to get our interest. Miss Barriscale plays two rôles: a society girl and a factory worker who look exactly alike. When the rich girl and her husband become estranged, the double brings them together again. Turgid.

Strangely enough, "Yes or No," (First National), turned out to be Norma Talmadge's best vehicle in some time. Based upon a disastrous and crudely melodramatic Broadway stage failure by Arthur Goodrich, it transforms into an effectively theatric celluloid offering. Not life, obviously, but offering contrasting rôles. At once Miss Talmadge plays a young wife in the tenements and, plus a blonde wig, a luxury-loving matron of Central Park West. A scoundrel appears on the horizon in each instance. To their pleas, the poor wife says "No," but the other responds with "Yes." The motion picture shows how prosperity comes to the loyal lady of the negative, while suicide follows the butterfly's "Yes." Hectic stuff, but vivified by Miss Talmadge's playing and by R. William Neill's rather above-the-average direction. Neill has tried to keep away from a conventional handling of his scenes and has inserted little human touches here and there. We rather liked Rockcliffe Fellows' playing of the workingman husband.

Constance Talmadge is rather amusing in John Emerson and Anita Loos' "The Perfect Woman," (First National). Constance plays a cutie with a conquest system all her own. Her first collision with disaster comes when the young business man she fancies from afar turns her down when she applies for a job, because, by every point of his efficiency system, she falls short. So she goes home, rebuilds her face, minus powder and other aids, returns plus horn-rimmed spectacles and—wins the position. The employer is a man after Attorney-General Palmer's own heart, for he is engaged in rounding up "reds" and the lady with the system lends first aid, thereby

Dead Men Tell No Tales

Let Me Save You From Yourself

NO AMOUNT of love will ever atone for the crime you will commit, if you make some pure, trusting young girl or wife when you are UNFIT to assume the duties and responsibilities of a husband and a father. Her whole future life, her body and soul, will be in YOUR keeping; no one will be able to help her if YOU prove faithless to her trust in you. Don't put the matter aside, you can't get away from it; you can't make any girl happy, if you are weak, impotent, sickly; grouchy with dyspepsia or biliousness, poisoned by constipation, or suffering from any other debilitating ailment. Stop and think, right now, for HER sake, if not for your own. What CAN her marriage to you bring her, but lifelong regret and sorrow, if you are only an apology for a man, with your muscles flabby, your blood like water and your brain woolly as a result of your condition.

She Thinks You Are a Man

She trusts, admires and loves what she THINKS you are—a real MAN, mentally, morally and physically, whom she can respect as well as love. She believes you to be a man who can look any other man in the eye and hold your own with him; who is able to protect her under any circumstances; who can make his way in the world and give her the comforts she has a right to expect from her husband; and finally who will ultimately make her the mother of healthy, happy children, a blessing to you both. Think of the kind of children you will make her the mother of if you are one of the great UNFIT! Think of the weak, ailing, rickety, defective boys and girls such men bring into the world—pitiable little creatures, with no chance in life, living reproaches to the father who begot them. Don't close your eyes to these things. They are Facts; facts thoroughly understood by every breeder of dogs, cattle and horses; facts recognized by the legislators of several states, who would make it a LEGAL, as well as a MORAL, crime to marry when unfit.

Put Your Past Behind You

What if you have led a gay life and sowed a big crop of wild oats? Start NOW to root them out. What if you have burned the candle at both ends and feel now like a human wreck, with your strength of body and mind dissipated and your vitality ebbing away? All the more reason why you should begin now, TODAY, to stop that steady loss, build up your strength again, regain your lost vitality and make a manly, red-blooded man of yourself. It's the ONLY thing to do—the only way to have any more happiness in life—the only way to keep from slipping down into the scum heap of the hopelessly down-and-out and you can do it, if you go about it the right way.

Don't Be Discouraged

Never mind how low down you have fallen; I don't care a rap what your present condition is or what brought you to it—I know I can improve you 100 per cent in a few short months. I am doing it every day for men who had given up all hope; bringing back their health and strength; making them respected members of society again; filling them with life, and ambition, pep and ginger, and enabling them to make a success in the world. I can do for you what I have done and am doing for others, and I WILL DO IT, if you will mark NOW, on the coupon below, the trouble or troubles that are afflicting you, or the points you are most interested in, and MAIL IT TO ME TODAY.

Faces Made Young

The secret of a youthful face will be sent to any woman whose appearance shows that time or illness or any other cause is stealing from her the charm of girlhood beauty. It will show how without cosmetics, creams, massage, masks, plasters, straps, vibrators, "beauty" treatments or other artificial means, she can remove the traces of age from her countenance. Every woman, young or middle aged, who has a single facial defect should know about these remarkable

Beauty Exercises which remove lines and "crows feet" and wrinkles; fill up hollows; give roundness to scrawny necks; lift up sagging corners of the mouth and clear up muddy or sallow skins. It will show how five minutes daily with Kathryn Murray's simple facial exercises will work wonders. This information is free to all who ask for it.

K. K. K. K.—You say, "Ever since I first purchased a Classic, the very first one published, I haven't missed a number. I have decided to take the bull by the horns and sell the cow, as it were, and make myself a source of amusement to your staff." Welcome, and I am glad to know you. You can address all of those players at Los Angeles, Cal., and I am sure it will reach them. Owen Moore is in New York playing for Selznick.

JUST JEAN.—Fat men are not always funny, nor thin men solemn. No, I'm not fat, been following "Eat and Grow Thin" to retain my girlish figger. Virginia Faire is sixteen, and you can reach her at Universal Company, Universal City, Cal.

J. R. W., KOKOMO.—Yes, there is a limit to everything—even my patience. Go ahead, tho. Monroe Salisbury was born in New York. He studied art and music and in 1898 went on the stage. Played with Richard Mansfield, Mrs. Fiske, John Drew, Nancy O'Neil, and later in stock. Mahlon Hamilton is playing opposite Blanche Sweet.

RUTH A. M.—Sorry. Yes, Frank Keenan is married. The highest mountain in the world is Mount Everest, in the Himalayas, with an elevation of 29,002 feet. Just met a friend who saw the sun rise at Mount Everest. Yes, Robert Warwick in "The City of Masks."

TALMADGE FAN.—Well, it is pleasant to hear that you really appreciate me, but it is sad to think that all do not. Accent on the "zim" always. Geraldine Farrar was born in Melrose, Mass.

IRRESISTIBLE.—Dear me! I'm in the best of health, thank you. I rather like your description of love and malaria. You say love begins with a fever and ends with a chill, and malaria begins with a chill and ends with a fever. I think I get you. Referred to Darwin's.

C. M. E.—Nay, nay, I never get angry when my correspondents make fun of my bald head and long beard. I have had them too long. (But neither is too long.) Yes, I rather liked Mary Pickford in "Suds." It certainly was a touching scene when Mary saves the horse from going to glue, and when she takes him up to her boudoir.

JESSIE A.—Enjoyed your very interesting letter about Hawaii. You must write me again.

MRS. SIPPY.—Cannot tell you where Charlotte Claire Pierce can be reached.

PHANTOM, PEKING.—Guess you received my letter by now. Why, Kenneth Harlan was born in New York City in 1895. Yes, he has played with Gertrude Hoffman. Has dark complexion, dark hair and black eyes. Sessue Hayakawa is playing in "Li Ting Ling." Jack Mulhall is playing opposite Bebe Daniels.

JACK MEREDITH.—You are too temperate with your praise. Admire, but dont adore. Doris Lee in "Hay Foot, Straw Foot." Larry Semon was in to see us the other day. He is as fine and as funny as they make them. He does some mighty clever stunts in "Solid Concrete."

G. P. M.—You say you are five feet six, and want to know if Mildred Davis is taller. You're welcome, keep the change.

MISS M. T. HEAD.—Well, just because your mama has given her consent you think that nothing stands in the way of your becoming a photoplay star. There may be other obstacles, alas! Oh, pshaw! The Shah of Persia possesses an armchair made of solid gold, inlaid with precious stones. If I had it I'd melt it up and buy me a houseboat and a buttermilk cow. Drop in and see me when you come to New York. If you have an aeroplane, I might say, drop down to see me.

NENA G.—Yes, to all of your questions. Every one of them

ZARAGATIN THE BOOB.—I understand the Imperator is the first steamship to be equipped with a full-fledged bank. Phyllis Haver is about nineteen. Norina Talmadge about five feet two. Married, of course. But you cant expect me to be nice if you call me a woman.

MAX C. B.—Mary Pickford was born April 8th, 1894.

We're always on the lookout for something new. We know our readers appreciate anything that's a bit different. We have to offer in the way of novelty—a one-act play covering an interview recently had with Mary Pickford and Doug Fairbanks on their return from Europe. Adele Whitely Fletcher and Gladys Hall are the collaborators of this play.

C. Blythe Sherwood, who has gone to the coast, sends us an interesting story on Blanche Sweet.

Douglas MacLean, now a star with Thomas Ince, has been captured for a heart-to-heart talk by Hazel Simpson Naylor. There are new portraits of Douglas which will delight all of his feminine admirers.

Maude Cheatham cornered Ann Forrest and made her tell of her plans with Cecil de Mille. Ann, you will remember, has just been signed by De Mille as his new leading woman.

Betsy Bruce interviewed Bryant Washburn just before he sailed for Europe. She also contributes an interesting chat with the ever-increasing-in-popularity Constance Binney.

DeMiracle

Every Woman's Depilatory

Hair-free Underarms

WHETHER your costume be athletic togs or evening gown, the underarms should be smooth.

The only common-sense way to remove hair from face, neck, arms, underarms or limbs is to devitalize it. DeMiracle, the original sanitary liquid, alone works on this principle.

Unlike pastes and powders which must be mixed by the user, DeMiracle is just the right strength for instant use. It never deteriorates. DeMiracle is the quickest, most cleanly and easiest to apply. Simply wet the hair and it is gone.

FREE BOOK with testimonials of eminent Physicians, Surgeons, Dermatologists and Medical Journals, mailed in plain sealed envelope on request.

Try DeMiracle just once, and if you are not convinced that it is the perfect hair remover return it to us with the DeMiracle Guarantee and we will refund your money.

Three sizes: 60c, $1.00, $2.00
At all toilet counters, or direct from us, in plain wrapper, on receipt of 68c, $1.00 or $2.00, which includes wire tax.

OLGA 17.—Bless you, my child. I fear you still have a feeling for Crane, because you write me on Crane's stationery. You say you are always with me. For this we have friends! I'm with you, Olga, every time.

CUTIE.—So you don't believe I am 79, and you think I earn more than I say. No, child, I always speak truth when hard pressed. Charles Ray in "Old-Fashioned Young Man." Priscilla Dean in "Outside the Law." No, I never read the Hearst Publications. Nor the "Ladies Home Journal." I prefer "Town Topics," and the "New York Whirled." My favorite author is Mrs. Humpty Dumpty Ward.

MISS LUTZ.—Joe Emory is not married. Elsie Ferguson is to play in "Sacred and Profane Love" for the screen. Violet Heming in "The Princess of New York." We have some queens here too. Haven't the address of the Fairbanks twins.

SILVER SPURS.—You want Earle Fox to come back. If it does you any good to unburden your troubles to me, go as far as you like, and if I can say a helping word I am yours to command. Douglas MacLean in "Lucid Intervals" and "Yancona Yollies."

BAYDE.—You say you are 19 and you would love to be Tom Moore's mother. I don't get you. What do you think I am running, a bazaar—send you a bit of my beard for a souvenir? Nay, I can't spare a hair. What's in a name? Rye, N. Y.; Bourbon, Ill.; Green River, Ky.; Cluquet, Mo.; Brandy, Va.; Port, Okla.; Sherry, Wis.; Brandywine, W. Va.; Tank, Pa.; Booze, Tenn.; Drinker, Pa.; Vichy, Mo.; and Lithia, Fla.

PEANUTS.—So you want to see Maude Adams in "Peter Pan" on the screen. Yes, it would be a treat. You also say, "Is it true that Mary Pickford is going to retire? It makes me blue just to think of it. I don't care to live if I can't see sweet little Mary any more." Well, you will live a little longer, because Mary is still with us. Do write me again.

ANGELES, PHILIPPINE.—I have sent your letter to Kenneth Harlan. Ashton Dearholt in "The Girl in the Dark." Among the Hindus enormous sums are spent on cremation of the richer classes in sandalwood. Of course, I want to hear from you again.

OLYMPIAN. Yours was indeed brilliant. I am afraid you are too tender to succeed on the rough journey of life. When you have a pain you insist that the whole world know about it, whereas a window may have many panes all at once, without making any fuss about it. Be like the window. Ta, ta.

BERNICE H.—Thanks for the fee. Raymond McKee is 28 years old. Nazimova—I don't know whether she smokes or not, and Bryant Washburn is abroad. He is married and has a happy family. Yes, today would be sweet if we could kill yesterday, because happiness is but unrepented pleasure.

KITTY KAT.—You say you always read our magazines, from the girl on the cover to the Palmolive ad. Dear me, no, I cannot give you a list of the actors who are paying alimony. It would take a larger book than this. Alimony must be considered the biggest item in the high cost of living. Thomas Meighan in "His Friend and His Wife," and Sydney Chaplin is to play in "One Hundred Million." He's just playing in that, not getting it.

EDDIE.—Thomas Meighan—yes, he is married.

REBECCA.—Write to the Talmadge studio for that picture. Harrison Ford is not married. "Peter Pan," "What Every Woman Knows," and "Little Minister," are to be produced soon.

EMMA C. H.—You say all the fortune-tellers tell you, you are made to be a movie star. That's looking ahead. You can reach Virginia Faire at the Universal Studio, Hollywood, Cal. Enid Bennett in "I Wonder If" and "Incubus."

WALLACE REID FAN.—Thanks immensely. So you want more chats and stories about Wallace Reid. Cleveland is the fifth city in population of the U. S. That's going some, isn't it?

EUGENIA BIBBY.—I read with a great deal of interest your charming letter. I do hope you succeed as a story writer. Yes, women can vote for the Presidential electors and in a large number of other states. Lincoln was a Republican.

S. C. C.—And yours was a very interesting letter. John Barrymore is to play in "Amos Judd" from the novel by John Ames Mitchell. Fatty Arbuckle in "The Life of the Party," "The Traveling Salesman" and "Brewster's Millions." Nous verrons.

A. D. GISHADN.—Sorry, but I can give you no information about Clarine Seymour. The author of "Pollyanna" was Eleanor Hodgman Porter, a direct descendant of Governor William Bradford of the Mayflower. Yes, an affinity is a high-priced luxury since the cost is alimony.

F. O. B.—Charge it, please! Glad to meet you. I really don't know of any star who would carry on a correspondence with you. They are all very busy. Yes, that's true about Pearl. You should have enclosed a stamped, addressed envelope. Write me again some time.

DAVID H.; A LITTLE BLONDE; NORMA'S ADMIRER; MRS. R. F. E.; R. C.; SWEET COOKEY; RUBY; ETHEL M. F.; JUST ALNIE; FAN TAIL; CLAIRE L.; LILLIAN AHO; MARGUERITE BRUCE; GIRL NAMED MARY; FLORENCE F.; BUCK; AND CHUCHI.—Thanks for your interesting letters, but they have been answered elsewhere in this department. Better luck next time.

DADEBER'S GIRL.—Yes, I certainly missed you. So you are seeing our Great Romantic West. Write me again.

JACKIE STAR.—And your ambition is to see me face to face. No, I don't have a license to run this department. Perhaps I ought to have. Gold teeth take black on the screen. You can't tell the difference between artificial and real ones.

J. B., YARMOUTH.—Well, you call me old Sphinx. Then you say a stone face often hides a warm heart. I don't know which candidate I shall vote for, altho I am nominally a Democratic Republican.

winning his love. There are smiles in "The Perfect Woman," altho the story is pretty shallow.

This Harold Lloyd goes speeding along. His latest, "High and Dizzy," (Pathé), is made up of the oldest farce ingredients; i. e., humor based upon intoxication and sleep-walking, but Lloyd invests the whole fabric with such adroit by-play and such lively touches of fun that it is easily his best celluloid farce to date—a classic in subdued slapstick. There is some tricked sleep-walking along the high window-ledge of a hotel which will keep you gasping, no matter how much you know about camera faking.

Lumbago and pains in the back are removed quickly by the Violet Ray treatment

For building health and strength there is nothing like Vi-Rex. For chest and bronchial affections it is invaluable

The Violet Ray is especially effective for inducing a clear and healthy skin free from blemishes and sallowness

The New Magic of Violet Rays

Make It Your Beauty Specialist

YOU can now enjoy the wonderful, energizing health-giving power of Violet Rays in your own home! This famous treatment, formerly obtainable from eminent physicians and beauty specialists at high fees, is now brought to you for your personal use, and at a trifling cost. Violet Rays are so simple that a child can use them. Violet Rays rid you of headaches, catarrh, constipation, lumbago, insomnia, nervousness, neuritis. You can relieve your pain from rheumatism, neuralgia, indigestion—give yourself beauty treatments—remove eczema, pimples, blackheads, obesity. You can make your body alive with vitality, your skin smooth and fine of texture, free from blemishes and sallowness. Soothe your nerves, build up your strength.

NOT A VIBRATOR

THIS instrument is not a Vibrator. It does not contract the muscles or shock the nerves. Its magic rays pass through every cell and tissue, creating "cellular massage"—the most beneficial electrical treatment known. It leaves no soreness after use, only a delightful sensation of agreeable relief. Its great value is based on proven scientific facts now well established by experience. Violet Rays are used in nearly every modern sanitarium, hospital and health resort. Physicians, osteopaths and chiropractors everywhere use and endorse them. Like thousands of others, you will be amazed at the quick, gratifying results from Violet Ray treatments.

BEAUTY IS YOURS

Multiply your bodily health—vitalize your nerves—double or treble your energy and vitality. Sleep better, increase your strength, improve your appetite and digestion. Soothe your nerves, reduce or increase your flesh, tone and strengthen the entire system, beautify your complexion. All with the Vi-Rex.

Trixie Friganza, the famous actress, says, "Cheerfully will I add my praise for Vi-Rex. It's the best 'pain chaser' and 'soother' I've ever had the good fortune to find. It's wonderful. It cured my brother of neuritis. As for myself, I use it for facial treatments and general massage. I cannot say too much for it." Frank Borzone, of Seattle, Washington, says: "I purchased the Vi-Rex for my wife who was suffering from an acute attack of sciatica. From the very first treatment it induced peaceful rest and she is entirely well now." Scores of letters like these are received each day.

Eminent physicians from all over the country apply Violet Rays with wonderful results. Dr. Bert H. Rice, of Vinton, Iowa, says: "I have good results with the Vi-Rex. Almost instant relief in Facial Neuralgia." Dr. Daniels, Lisbon, North Dakota, says: "Have used it in such cases as Goitre, Bronchitis, Pleurisy, Neuritis, Neuralgia and Lumbago, and find it very beneficial. In fact, I would not be without it in my office." Dr. G. B. Duncan, Kewanee, Ill., says, "The Vi-Rex is the finest thing I ever used to relieve congestion in any part of the body; and to relieve pain. Treatments are so pleasant that all of my patients like it."

20 FREE TREATMENTS

You don't have to take any risk in giving Vi-Rex Violet Rays a trial. Take 20 treatments in your own home. Use this marvelous machine for ten days. If you do not find quick relief—if you do not feel better, sleep better, look better, send it back and you will not be out one penny. This special offer may be withdrawn at any time, so act quickly!

WRITE FOR BOOKLET

Write today for a very interesting little booklet explaining fully about the Vi-Rex and how you can try it for ten days before you decide. Read some of the amazing results produced in almost every disease. Read how the Vi-Rex can be attached to any electric socket and also used where there is no electric light. Read how this little instrument, shaped somewhat like a thermos bottle with a glass tube and bulb at the end, pours electric energy and vigor into every muscle, fibre, cell, and pore of your body. Read how you do not have to obligate yourself in any way until the Vi-Rex has proven its value in your particular case.

You're Popular if You Play a Mandolin or Banjo

You and I welcome the person who plays the mandolin or banjo. So will others welcome you—if you play. And besides the popularity, the assured welcome at any gathering, there is the immense satisfaction of deftly calling forth music to fit your personal moods.

Both the mandolin and banjo are very easy to play. Both have the advantage of being easily carried. They go well with other instruments.

Lyon & Healy Own Make Mandolin

The finest mandolin money can buy is the Lyon & Healy Own Make. Made with violin back. Easily packed and carried. Beautifully finished, full-toned and sturdy. Priced from $75 to $125. Mandolas, $175, Mandocellos, $200.

Lyon & Healy Professional Banjos and Mandolin Banjos

These banjos and mandolin banjos are famous the country over. They are pre-eminently the best. Their patented truss construction gives "that snappy tone." They are the choice of professionals who know orchestral requirements and should, similarly, be selected by the beginner; for the best instrument is the one to start with. Prices $45 to $125.

6-Day Free Trial—Easy Payments

Owing to the superior character of Lyon & Healy mandolins and banjos, a Six-Day Free Trial Offer is made. The purchaser's money is refunded if there is not complete satisfaction. Easy payments can be arranged, thus making it possible to buy the very best instrument without financial hardship. Write for catalogue. Mention instrument you are most interested in.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a photograph by Alfred Cheney Johnston.)

Louise Glauam stands foremost at present in the vacillating line of film lorelei. Miss Glauam made her debut on the stage as a member of a stock company in Chicago, and has been numbered among the leading women of the screen for the past four years.

When Louise is not breaking up cinema homes, and depicting the more tragic side of life on the screen, she peacefully indulges in her real passion; i. e., the raising of chickens, and her chicken farm out at the coast is one of the most widely discussed places in California.

The NOVEMBER Shadowland

LIKE the Horn of Plenty, SHADOWLAND for November offers a magazine replete with the finest in literary contributions; the most beautiful and artistic; the most interesting in the current affairs of our daily existence.

When you read the article by Walter Prichard Eaton, you will gain a new insight into the complicated character of the American playwright.

Everyone knows Heywood Brown, the sometimes sarcastic, but nearly always truthful dramatic critic of the New York Tribune. Mr. Brown, offers a thoroly enjoyable book review, which will delight our most fastidious readers.

Oliver M. Saylor is a well-known authority on the dramatic life of foreign countries. He has a story on the Japanese drama, which is one of the most absorbing articles in the magazine.

The photoplay of today and the photoplay of tomorrow are two entirely different things, says Frederick James Smith. We learn a good deal about it in an unusually interesting article.

Our own Wynn Holcomb has sent us a new lay-out of Parisian cartoons and pertinent paragraphs on things pertaining to Paris which will probably startle you.

Crystal Gazing

Amusing, interesting, entertaining. Crystal Gazing is advancing rapidly in the United States. A very interesting book which deals on the historical and physical research of Crystal Gazing and gives complete instructions in the art of Gazing and serving, is just off the press. You will want this book right away if you are interested. Special price 75c. (Don't send stamps.) We can also supply Crystals.

DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES

Bijou.—"The Charm School." An appealing light comedy with music, based upon Alice Duer Miller's story of the handsome young bachelor who inherits a young ladies' finishing school. Mimie Dupree runs away with the production as an old maid teacher, while James Gleason, Sam Hardy and Marie Carroll are effective.

Baoth.—"Happy-Go-Lucky." Ran a long time in London as "Tilly of Bloomsbury." A typical British comedy by Ian Hay. O. P. Heggie runs away with the comedy as the ballif's bibulous aid.

Broadhurst.—"Come Seven." Amusing adaptation of the Octavus Roy Cohen negro stories which have been appearing in The Saturday Evening Post. All the characters are negroes, played by white players. Funny, but of little depth. Arthur Aylsworth is excellent as a shiftless dandy. Gail Kane and Earle Foxe play the colored lovers.

Casino.—"Honeydew." Pleasant musical entertainment with charming score by Erem Zimbalist, the violinist, Mlle. Marguerite and Frank Gill score with their dancing.

Century Promenade.—New York's newest dinner and midnight entertainment, "The Century Review" and "The Midnight Rounders." Colorful girl shows for the tired business man. A delightful place to eat.

Eltinge.—"Ladies' Night." About the most daring comedy yet attempted on Broadway. This passes from the boudoir zone to the Turkish bath on ladies' night. Not only skates on thin ice, but smashes thru now and then. John Cumberland is admirable.

Empire.—"Call the Doctor." Jean Archibald's slender little comedy built around a charming feminine doctor of domestic difficulties. The production shows David Belasco's smooth stage direction and is very well cast, particularly by Janet Beecher as the physician in question.

Forty-Fourth Street.—D. W. Griffith's master-production of the rural melodrama, "Way Down East." Splendid in many ways with many moving moments and the biggest—and most thrilling—climax since the ride of the clausen in "The Birth of a Nation."

Fulton.—"Scrambled Wives." Another typical farce built on a series of misunderstandings. A divorced couple try to hide their first wedding from their new marriage alliances. Rather bright and amusing. Roland Young is excellent.

Globe.—George White's "Scandals of 1920." Lively and well-thought-out musical revue with lavish and swiftly changing scenes, plus many pretty girls. Paint succeeds stockings and tights in several numbers. Ann Pennington is the shining light of this revue.

Greenwich Village Theater.—"Greenwich Village Follies of 1920." Gorgeous and beautiful, as is typical of John Murray Anderson productions. Here is a musical entertainment with imagination and charm. James Reynolds has created some remarkable scenes and costumes and the whole ensemble is vivid and colorful.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Hudson.—"Crooked Gamblers." A lively and thrilling comedy-melo of the financial district, in which a guileless young inventor of auto tires defeats the Wolf of Wall Street. Taylor Holmes starred.

Little.—"Foot-Loose," with Emily Stevens. Zoe Akins' well-done modernization of the old melodrama, "Forget-Me-Not."

New Amsterdam Roof.—"Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else.

Plymouth.—"Little Old New York." Rida Johnson Young's delightful but fragile little romance of New York in 1810, with John Jacob Astor, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Peter Delmonico and Washington Irving among its characters. Genevieve Tobin runs away with the piece—and scores one of the biggest personal successes of many seasons. Here is a Maude Adams in the making.

Republic.—"The Lady of the Lamp." A fanciful and highly colored fantasy by Earl Carroll. Built about an opium dream which reveals a tragic romance of old China. A certain charm is here. George Gaul is admirable and Henry Herbert gives a remarkable portrayal of a sinister Manchu chieftain of centuries ago.

Selwyn.—"Tickle Me." An Arthur Hammerstein early autumn show with the amusing Frank Tinney starred. Considerable fun, some tuneful music and a very personable chorus. Likewise gorgeous costuming.

Winter Garden.—"Cinderella on Broadway." Typical summer-girl entertainment designed for the tired business man. The extravaganza this year is based upon the fairy adventures of Cinderella. Plenty of girls, passable music, attractive costumes and a little humor.

ON TOUR

"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else from the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlynn is a brilliant Lincoln.

William Rock's "Silks and Satins." Another musical revue, but we doubt if it will even appeal to the tired business man. Ernestine Myers, the dancer, stands out.

"Honey Girl." Lively musical comedy built about the brisk race-track comedy, "Checkers." This has speed and humor—as well as an excellent cast.

"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent.

"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early seventies. Genuinely delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmer and an excellent cast.

"Jane Clegg." St. John Ervine's powerful drama, presented by the Theater Guild, has been running in New York all season. A drab but brilliant tale of middle-class English life.

"The Hottentot," with Willie Collier. Typical one-man farce with the inimitable farceur, Collier, at his best. Full of laughs.

"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sextette." Here is a revival that really revives.

"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire.

"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. June Walker and Charles Cherry have the leading roles.

Loew's N. Y. and Loew's American Roof.—Photoplays; first runs. Daily program.

"OH, MOTHER My story's accepted!"

'Tis the thrilling moment of her life

OUT of "the rainbow gleams of her youthful dreams" has come The Great Reward! The happy sequel to all her burning hopes—her eager aspirations! The magazine editor has accepted her story. His letter brings the happy news.

She moves as one in a daze "Can it really be true?" she asks herself over and over. And all the while she glows with the pride of authorship, her aspiring spirit transformed in the bewilderment of this new triumph. 'Tis life's deepest moment for her.

She has crossed the Golden Rubicon! Enthralled, she stands upon the threshold of a New Life! She is at last—"AN AUTHORESS!" The story she has written, filled with fresh, bright realism, stirring incident and sparkling dialogue—written out of her very heart—painted in glowing words upon the Screen of Romance, will be read by thousands, thousands!

But yesterday, in her girlish fancy, she deeply envied those who live and move in that fascinating sphere, the Realm of Authorship. But yesterday her hopes mingled with her fears, her doubts of herself, her simple lack of faith in her ability "TO WRITE." But yesterday she deemed well-nigh impossible the triumph that has come to her today!

But yesterday her life was a dull, drear grind in a department store. In her little niche behind the notion counter her girl's soul was slowly shriveling. The drab, grey life was deadening every spark of hope within her. Thinking of her youth and yearnings, she would oft' hopefully repeat to herself those lines from some beautiful book, "It is the Spring! It is the Spring! And Life is so FULL of Flowers! Ah, surely some of them are MINE!" But there was the monotony, the dull servitude, from 8 to 6—it never varied—it went on and on and on—a dumb fate that seemed to stare her in the face forever, just as it might be pictured in a story by O. Henry.

Not that all girls are unhappy who work in stores, but she—she dreamed of higher things. She wanted more out of life than the grey, humdrum existence. Why should Success be a thing OTHERS could attain and not she? She had two good hands and a brain—she was intelligent, observing, and though not a genius, surely, she told herself, she could learn to write stories as good as hundreds she had seen.

One day her sweet-faced mother noticed a small advertisement in a magazine. It said: "Free to writers—this wonderful book. Tells How to Write Plays and Stories." "Here, Dorothy dear," said Mrs. Dean, "here is something about writing stories and plays. Here's a concern offering a free book on the subject. Why not get it? See what they can do for you? You never can tell—maybe you really can learn how to write the way you've dreamed so long, and just think how wonderful that would be!"

The Authors' Press has this young woman's letter on file. She wrote for our free book—and the picture above tells the happy sequel.

This is a true story, as startling as it is romantic, and here is the most startling thing of all—a remarkable discovery that will thrill ambitious men and women of all ages throughout the world! The discovery is that: MILLIONS OF PEOPLE CAN WRITE STORIES AND PHOTOPlays AND DON'T KNOW IT!

For years the mistaken idea prevailed that you had to have a special knack in order to write. People said it was a gift, a talent. Some imagined you had to be an Emotional Genius with long hair and strange ways. They vowed it was no use to try unless you'd been touched by the Magic Wand of the Muse. They discouraged attempts of ambitious people to express themselves.

Yet only recently a great English literary authority declared that "nearly all the English-speaking race want to write! It's a craving for self-expression, characteristic of the present century."

So a new light has dawned! A great New Truth that will gladden the hearts of "all the English-speaking race who want to write!" Astounding new psychological experiments have revealed that "the average person" may learn to write! Yes, write stories and photoplays; thrilling, human, life-like; filled with heart-throbs, pathos, passion, pain.

You may learn it just as you may learn anything else under the sun! There are certain simple, easy principles to guide you. There are new methods that produce astonishing results for beginners. A remarkable New System, covering every phase of writing, has been perfected by a great literary bureau at Auburn, New York, now busily supplying this information broadcast. And this New Method of writing stories and photoplays is everybody's property. Not for the select few. Not for those specially gifted. Not for the rich or fortunate, but for men and women of ordinary education and no writing experience whatever—thousands who don't even dream they can write!

This institution at Auburn is the world's school for inexperienced authors—a literary institute for all humanity. And everybody is taking up the idea of writing. The fascination has swept the country by storm! People are dumbfounded at the ease with which they learn to write!

You know it was Shakespeare who said: "All the world's a stage and all the men and women merely players." Life's stage all around you is filled with people and incidents that will make stories without number. From the great Screen of Humanity and its constantly changing tide of Human Emotions—Love, Hatred, Jealousy, Happiness—you can create endless interesting plots for stories and photoplays. There is never a lack—it flows on in an Endless Stream of Circumstance—like Tennyson's brook—forever! Every person you know is a type, a character. "Every house has a story." And those who dwell within have impulses, ideas, hopes, fears, fancies that furnish material for you. The daily newspapers are filled to the brim. The Footlights of Fate reflect scenes and incidents for the Pen of Realism.

There is nothing in all this world that so dominates the heart and mind as the fascination of WRITING. It gives you a new power, a new magic, that charms all those around you. It lends a new attraction to your entire personality. Authorship carries with it new honors, admiration, respect—in addition to glorious material rewards.

THERE IS A NEW BOOK AWAITING YOU THAT AMAZES EVERY READER—and the most amazing thing of all is—IT'S FREE! This new book is pouring glad sunshine into the lives of aspiring people who want to become writers. Within its covers are surprises and revelations for doubting beginners that have caused a sensation everywhere, because it is crowded with things that gratify your expectations—good news that is dear to the heart of all those aspiring to write; illustrations that enthrall; stories of success, brilliant instances of literary fame coming unexpectedly; new hope, encouragement, helps, hints—things you've long wanted to know!

"The Wonder Book for Writers" tells how stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many suddenly realize they can write, after years of doubt and indecision. How the scenario stars began. How they quickly rose to fame and fortune. How ordinary incidents become thrilling stories and plays through these New Easy Methods that simplify everything! How one's imagination properly directed may bring glory and greatness. How to really test your natural writing ability. How stories and plays are built up step by step. How to turn Uncertainty into Success.

This book and all its secrets are YOURS! You may have a copy absolutely free. You need not send a penny. You need not feel obligated. You need not hesitate for ANY reason. The book will be mailed to you without any charge whatever.

There is no need to let your laudable ambition stand still—no need to starve the Noble Flame that burns at the Altar of your Dearest hope—no need to wait, to wish—to merely dream of being a writer. Your brilliant opportunity, your golden chance, is HERE AND NOW! Get your pencil—use the coupon below. This little act may prove the big, lucky stroke of your Destiny!

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

Cultivate your mind. Develop your literary gifts. Master the art of self-expression. Make your spare time profitable. Turn your ideas into dollars.

Courses in Short-Story Writing, Verification, Journalism, Play Writing, Photoplay Writing, etc., taught personally by Dr. J. Berg Esenwein, for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literate workers, sample copy 25c, annual subscription $2.00. Readers not teaching history, or other a manuscript criticism service.

- Sluggish Skin—To rouse it
- Tender Skin—The new treatment.

To what type does your skin belong?

IS your skin dry or oily—sensitive or resistant—fine or large-pored? Study your skin and find out to just what type it belongs—then give it the care that suits its individual needs.

Remember—different types of skin need different care. If your skin is extremely sensitive—then it needs a very special form of cleansing which, instead of irritating and coarsening its delicate texture, will render it firmer and more tolerant. If it is pale and sallow—then it needs to be roused and stimulated.

For every skin condition there is a special treatment which, if followed regularly and faithfully each day, will help you to overcome the faults in your complexion and to gain the smooth, clear, flawless skin you long for.

Begin, now, to take care of your skin in the way that especially suits its particular type—see what a fresh, individual charm you can give it by this care. In the little booklet that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap, you will find careful and scientific directions on the care each type of skin needs. Study the treatment recommended for your skin and begin using it tonight. In a week or ten days you will notice a marked improvement in your complexion—the gradual perfecting of your skin by natural methods—which is the special achievement of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Woodbury's Facial Soap is sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada. Get a cake today—begin, tonight, the treatment your skin needs. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, and for general cleansing use.

"What Time Is It?" Asked Muriel

WE have accomplished interviews under all sorts of trying circumstances. We have "helped" stars pick out gowns. We have motored into Westchester with 'em. We have dined, tea-d, Ziegfeld roofed, suppered, lunched and—whisper—even breakfasted with them. Many times they have been in a hurry, but, to the best of our present disturbed recollection, nobody was ever quite in so much of a hurry as Muriel Ostriche.

The task of interviewing a cute ingénue—film ingénues are becoming more extinct every day—rather intrigued us and we were exactly on time at Miss Ostriche's uptown hotel.

Two minutes later—3:32 p.m. to be exact—Miss Ostriche appeared in the hotel reception-room. She had a tiny package in her hand.

"I'm awfully sorry," she began. "You see, I'd been planning to take a 4:10 train to the beach for the week-end and I thought our interview was to be earlier and—but I'll take a later train."

Of course, we knew that she really didn't want to take a later train. Also, we could not conscientiously upset the schedule of an ingénue.

So we asked a porter to summon a taxi.

"We'll interview you en route," we confided.

"That'll be wonderful," sighed Miss Ostriche, with something that we suspected sounded like relief. "Better start now before the taxi comes. Want a—er—pencil?"

"We never use 'em," said we, trying to maintain our editorial poise in the face of the Ostriche optics. "What about your traveling bag?"

"Dont need it," giggled Miss Ostriche. "I have everything here. (Indicating the tiny bundle.) Bet you cant guess the contents."

Our poise was slipping. Where on earth was the taxi?

"Guess," insisted Miss Ostriche.

We mopped our brow. "It's a hot day," we said, deftly changing the subject.

"A toothbrush and a nightie," continued Miss Ostriche remorselessly. "What do you think about that?"

But the taxi arrived before we were forced to commit ourselves.

(The scene changes to the interior of an open taxi.)

"Tell me the time and ask some questions!"

"3:51—and how did you get into pictures?"

"We'll make it— I'm a New York girl— Did you guess it?— Nobody ever does— Of course, I had the movie bug— Every girl has, some time or other— A boy who knew me at school, Christy Cabanne, was in pictures at the old Biograph studio and he asked me to come up for a try-out— My people objected—furiously— What time is it?"

"3:56—and go on."

"We'll make it— I didn't know a thing about pictures, naturally— They asked me to do a scene— You know, for a test try-out— I was scared something awful— Do you know what one of the camera-men said?— What time is it?"

"3:59—what did he say?"

"Some lamps!"— Funny, wasn't it— Of course, I didn't know what that sort of slang meant then—he was talking of my eyes, you know— What—"

"4:02—and we guessed it—and we dont blame him."

"We'll make it— Well, after the test Griffith came around and said, 'I dont know what we can do with her, she's too young to be made love to and too old not to. Tell her to come around tomorrow.'—But I told him I was going to school and could only work Saturdays and Sundays— I guess he was angry— Wh—"

Enter Julio!

Opportunity wont be given the chance to knock more than once on his door."

It is also legitimate when one comments: "A sportsman! He does not tear over the country, but rides his animals judiciously. Rather than return hot and disheveled, manifesting all the signs of having had a great time, he brings his horse home warm, but carefully exercised."

Rudolph Valentino is a youth from Italy who came to these shores in pursuit of scientific agriculture. Because of his unfamiliarity with the English language, he did not succeed and drifted into dancing where he attracted the attention of the leading dancers in America. His rôle as Julio in the film version of the famous Spanish novel, "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," is one which demands the work of a great artist

And for those who know him best, it is not wrong when the opinion is that "Rudie is a lonesome soul. He isn't so much melancholic as pensive. He has many friends, and very few. Books are his

"WOMAN is incomprehensible," said Signor Valentino one day. "No man can fathom her. In fact, the man who boasts 'I know woman' is either a liar or an idiot."

"What about man—is he more easily understood?"

"Yes—he is more practical, more elemental. Man has no caprice; no whim. He is whole—definite."

Being very much a part of those upon whom he had just passed judgment, Valentino placed himself under his own stamp. "Definite," he said man was. Yes—so, he himself is—in his extremes.

For just as it is simple to understand woman when one realizes she is a contradiction, and one makes allowances for her pros and cons, and one expects them—so, by the same code of perception, is the study of Rudolph Valentino less enigmatic.

Because one person could discuss Valentino and say, "What a care-free lad he is! Always joking, and romping; being serious only in his mania to dance and play. Give him a horse, a stretch of land, all day in which to tear over the countryside, and he is content."

And another person in speaking would offer: "That is what I call an ambitious young man. He is very determined to succeed, and doesn't lose a minute towards it. In his work he never slacks. He gives his best in enthusiasm and most in time.

companions, and dreams, and memories. A night at home, alone, with these, he considers far better spent than jocularly abandoning himself to Bacchus and bacchanals."

His appearance, too, is untraditional. Either, to correspond with his virile physique, he should not be so aesthetically attuned, or to accord with his vigorous spirituality he should not be so immaculately groomed. One never thinks of an artist, or an appreciator of art, as being also an appreciator of cravats and imported eau de cologne. And when one is fastidious about one's menu, it is expected one would be, to the exclusion of one's choice of opera

Yet this phenomenal youth cannot relinquish his fidelity to Arthur Symons, D'Annunzio, Dante, Wilde, Fokine and Caruso, because of his adequate amount of interest in thoroughbreds, surf-bathing, Hart Schaffner and Marx, and Dardenella. He cares for both and will have both. A good piece of watermelon is as absorbing to him as a work of Rodin's. He can go one day to Shirley Blanc's to be photographed as a rigid, immobile, determined, stern mask. And the following afternoon he can drop in to have the camera catch him as illusive, lambent, unsubstantially poetique.

Valentino with all his complexities, and because

Altho he has made extraordinary progress in pictures, having played opposite Mae Murray, Dorothy Gish and Carmel Myers, Valentino does not want to stay here forever. He longs to go to South America, China, Japan, Egypt and India and to get to know these places of them, is normal. He has the indolence of Endymion who would dream; the reverence of Dante who would worship; the vitality of Don Juan who would woo; the extravagance of Don Quixote who would exaggerate; the courage of D'Artagnan who would dare; the restraint of Sordello who would court in deed; the desire of D'Annunzio who would achieve; the strength of Vulcan who would excel; and the philosophy of Omar whose "yesterday is dead and to-morrow never comes."

He resembles both Dick Barthelmess and Rod La Rocque. His accent is a composite of Leo Ditrichstein's, José Reuben's, and Pedro de Cordoba's.

Ideas are what he would offer; and diffidence. Spontaneity; and a total lack of response. Yet, he doesn't waver. He is, as he says man is, definite—for all his moods.

One would not dare call this fiber of his temperament, for to him, the word "temperament" is greatly misused, promiscuously thrown about. The genuine artist, he believes rather leaves that term to where it has become established—in the gutter. The artist recedes into his soul, and believes. His ego is not "I am," but "I know."

"There is an artistic temperament," Valentino claims. "It is a part of another much mishandled phrase, intellectuality.

Myrtle of the Mountains

OF course, she had to get Chicago out of her system or the city would have been calling her all the time.

So she went back to the place she was born and studied for the stage, which, according to the laws of Romance, was the proper thing for a girl brought up in the mountains of Colorado to do. At any rate, Myrtle Stedman not only studied for the stage, but she went on the stage, becoming a prima donna in a very short time.

But the most impressionable period of her life had been spent in a mining camp about forty miles from Denver. There she had learnt horseback riding and, being at an altitude of 10,000 feet, she had naturally become proficient in the most difficult of mountain sports. She was a child of the snows, blonde and hardy as a Dane.

It was while she was appearing in comic opera in Chicago that she met Colonel Selig and he, needing a leading lady and hearing that she could ride horseback, immediately approached her with an offer.

"But," she protested, "I don't know anything about moving pictures."

"You can learn," he answered. "Why don't you come and visit us?"

"So," she said, in telling me about it, "I went to visit the studio. I saw the making of several scenes, but wasn't greatly tempted . . . I was afraid that I wouldn't be able to do the work. Then Colonel Selig showed me a beautiful thoroughbred horse. 'This horse' he said, 'will be yours if you join us. You can ride him all the time.'

"So it was that that decided me to leave comic opera for moving pictures."

You might call it persuaded by a horse . . .

"My first picture was called 'The Range-Riders,'" she went on, "and I was not the only member of the company making my debut. A young man who had come the same morning was as strange to the screen as myself. I was introduced to Tom Mix and after that we made a number of pictures together."

Miss Stedman started her screen career at about the same time that Mary Pickford, Blanche Sweet, Bobbie Harron, Kathlyn Williams and other famous "pioneers" started theirs.

Her work in the popular "westerns" was unrivaled.

arrived to find the doorbell in the process of being repaired, not by the to-be-expected workmen, but by two portly, well-dressed ladies, the owners of the house.

"They own several houses," Miss Stedman whispered, "and whenever anything goes wrong, they insist on making the repairs themselves."

During luncheon, we could see them thru the slightly parted portieres that divided the dining from the sitting-room. One of the ladies stood on a stepladder, placed just inside the front door, and hammered from time to time, while the other held a kit of tools handy and tried the doorbell occasionally to see if it would work. At last it rang, and after making a few little repairs in the kitchen . . . it seemed that the ice-box drain needed attention . . . they left, shown out by Lucille, Miss Stedman's irrepressibly good-natured little negro maid, who rang the bell herself for good measure and then ran thru the room giggling.

The Rise of Beatrice

and now I found her playing opposite Douglas MacLan. But I am running away with my story.

Beatrice is a southern girl. Texas is responsible for the sibilant drawl of her voice, the vibrant black of her eyes, the tiny suggestion of bravado that smolders constantly beneath her appearance of timidity.

Beatrice Burnham is either a great artist or a very little girl. That is the impression the interviewer received. She is a daughter of the South, and Texas is responsible for the sibilant drawl of her voice, the vibrant black of her eyes, the tiny suggestion of bravado that smolders constantly beneath her appearance of timidity.

A convent and a college are the two milestones that mark her pursuit of knowledge.

Beatrice is one of those girls who never tell you things. They always confide them. It is very agreeable.

"It is ten months since I had my first part—with Eddie Polo in an episode of his

Photographs by Freulich

A SOFT, cool hand in mine . . . black eyes that flashed behind a veil . . . a sigh . . . It was done so deftly!

It might have been a poem; but, alas, it was only the beginning of an interview—and in the conventional surroundings of the Ince studio.

Beatrice Burnham is either a great artist or a very little girl. It should have been easy to decide which . . . if her shyness had not been so confoundingly bewitching! I wanted to believe and yet that soft catch in her breath . . . It was done so perfectly. Almost too perfectly!

While I yet held her hand, she indicated the path that stretched away before us and disappeared into a maze of sets and stages and great swimming pools.

She barely breathed the words: "Perhaps a little walk . . . Then I shall not be so nervous."

I watched her out of the corner of my eye. In scarlet hat and coat she made a vivid figure. The only vagueness was the blue veil that covered her face, that accentuated the whiteness of her skin and the sloe-black of her eyes. And her grace was not confined to her shyness. She walked beautifully—with the balance and sway of a reed in the wind.

I thought of the ragged mountain girl in "Bullet Proof." It was hard to realize that this was she, remember talking with Harry Carey during the production and I recall his good-natured admission: "She's stealing the picture."

I had often wondered what had become of her;

By
WILLIS GOLDBECK

"Cyclone Smith" series. It all happened in the most wonderful way. I was on the Universal lot as a visitor. I had no intention then of ever attempting to get into pictures. But Jacques Jaccard saw me and dared me to take a screen test. I did, of course, and was a little bewildered by the result."

She sighed retrospectively, leaving my imagination hanging limply in the air. That is what makes me doubt . . . her trick of always choosing the correct moment—just when you are waiting breathless upon her next word—for a sigh and a pause.

A great artist . . . a little girl . . . ?

"What was the result," I demanded.

"Oh, everyone got terribly excited. You see, I had had to cry and I cried so hard that they couldn't believe it was acting. But when they saw that it was, I guess they thought they had discovered a second Bernhardt—for a moment. Eddie Polo—he seemed such a wonderfully famous man in those days!—declared that he wanted me for one of his episodes. He got me without much persuasion!"

We had talked ourselves around the circuit of the studio grounds and back to the long row of dressing-rooms. I noticed on a nearby door, in bright, fresh letters the name "Beatrice Burnham." A glimpse of the room past the half-open door made it seem cool and inviting. She murmured a suggestion that we go in.

Once in, her confidence seemed to be restored, tho she sat erectly graceful, her hands still nervous, while she told me—no, confided—the story of her brief ten months in pictures. It was that test at Universal City that she regards as the start of her career. Two years ago she did one or two "bits" for different companies, but they were merely the summer larks of a school girl.

Universal realized that they had unearthed a discovery worth while and were determined to keep it for themselves, on their own terms. But they had reckoned without that bravado smoldering beneath, that bravado which, after all, proved to be an unquenchable courage.

"They were lovely," she sighed. "They took me to dinners and sent me boxes of candy and even took me to the theater now and then. I wanted it to go on forever. I forgot all about the contract."

She ventured a naïve little smile and glance.

"But it seems that they hadn't. They were even a little exasperated when I at last said 'No' to them."

(Twenty-five)

Photograph by Freulich

There was an actual wonderment in her eyes!

It was my turn to sigh. I did.

Her career with Universal was as busy as it was brief. From the Polo pictures she went to wild animal comedies and thence to five-reel westerns. There is a hint of a playful destiny in the fact that tho she came unharmed thru the animal comedies with their inevitable lions and chimpanzees, her arm was badly lacerated by the treacherous teeth of a grouchy bruin in "Bullet Proof." She will carry the scars all her life.

In "Hitchin' Post" with Frank Mayo she did the work that brought the offer of a five-year contract from Universal, the contract which she refused—after many dinners and a theater or two.

She went to Edgar Lewis and won a good part in "Lahoma."

Miss Burnham has been on the screen for about ten months; her first part was with Eddie Polo in one of his "Cyclone Smith" series. Her career with Universal was brief. Then she called on Mr. Ince, and he immediately engaged her to play opposite Douglas MacLean

That Swede from Ystad

She Never Went Back

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

YOU can bet Ystad is mighty proud.

Isn't Anna Q. Nilsson a Ystadian—or whatever you call an inhabitant of that distant Swedish town?

Miss Nilsson really was born there. Indeed, she is a typical blonde viking. "I should have been a boy," she says. "In fact, I was raised with a regular boy's training. Dad, who was an army officer, had hoped for a boy but he did the next best thing. Six feet two, himself an all 'round athlete, he used to put me thru a daily routine of training from my earliest baby days. So I grew up to be able to perform all sorts of stunts.

"Back in those Ystad days I did not, of course, conceive of a movie career. I was to be a teacher. There was nothing much else for a girl to do in those days, save being a housewife. So I was sent to school with the idea of making myself a school ma'am.

"Teaching never did appeal to me. I must admit. I can remember how several girls came back to the town from America—wearing silks and velvets. That settled it, for I resolved to get to the fabled land of wealth in some way.

"Later, when an old friend of my father's married in New York and invited me to come over for a visit, I hastened to accept. Mentally, I told myself I was going to stay—at least until I became rich.

"So I came. I was their guest for months. Father kept asking me to return, but finally I wrote to him, 'I'm not coming back until I'm a millionaire,' and I started out to get some sort of employment.

Anna Q. Nilsson was born in Sweden. She is a typical blonde viking. "I was raised with a regular boy's training," she says, "Dad, who was an army officer, used to put me thru a daily routine of training from my earliest baby days." Here are several glimpses of Anna as an oarsman

The Charm School

Told in Story Form from the Wallace Reid—Famous Players' Photoplay

By FAITH SERVICE

AUSTIN BEVANS was a bright young man. Most persons conceded him that. He had two outstanding characteristics so marked as to all but completely overshadow any others which he may have possessed. He was an excellent salesman and an excellent lover. Par excellence, in fact. Of the first, his specialty was automobiles and for the second, at the time of which I write, Susie Rolles.

Susie had an enterprising Mamma. An automobile salesman, however snappy, did not accord with Mamma's enterprise. Susie was her one branch and best bet, and she had huddled greatly and rather expensively on Susie. The flavor of gasoline did not suit her.

She explained this to Susie at some length and to Austin with some asperity. Neither of them seemed to weigh her words very heavily. She had been all of seventeen years in instructing Susie that this world is ruled by Mammon. Susie was learning and Austin might be said to be her last line before stepping over into Mamma's Pet Beliefs.

Nevertheless, despite the fact that the course of love did not run smooth for Austin with Susie, the young man had a lot to thank the Rolles ménage for. They were, he later admitted, eye-openers, the pair of them. In the caustic course of her harangues, Mamma Rolles had informed him that she hadn't raised her daughter to be a laborer . . . she inferred that matrimony with Mr. Bevans would result in nothing else than that.

"Women, my dear, good Austin," Mamma would say, "are made to charm. To charm—that is, or should be, the alpha and omega of their pilgrimage upon this earth. Women have no business in business, either commercial or professional—their business is to be charming—to be charming—"

Evidently, Mrs. Rolles did not conceive the possibility of her Susie being able to charm as Mrs. Austin Bevans.

On one memorable occasion Susie greeted him with flushed cheeks and dilated eyes.

"You must go at once," she said, with some excitement; "I've had the dickens of a row with Mamma. I—I hate to tell you, Austin, but she is very firm in her idea. Her—her idea is that you have neither birth, breeding nor prospects and I—and I—"

Said Austin: "If you are not in sympathy with my unalterable ideas and ideals, Miss Hayes, you are at liberty to leave"

Austin laughed.

"I must have been born," he insisted, "my logical mind tells me that. Breeding has an indelicate sound to me. I refuse to discuss it. And as for prospects"—he inflated his chest: "we shall see—"

There was a melodramatic flourish of hat, and he was gone. Susie wept a few carefully becoming tears and went forth in search of other fish to fry, and Austin repaired to his office, where he was duly notified that his services would no longer be required. The implication pointed to a lady. Without an undue share of perspicacity, Austin deduced that the lady was Susie. It would be unbecoming a hero to suggest that he cursed the House of Rolles roundly and well. Rather let it be inferred that he languished and repined—

Occasionally life as an equable equation presents itself. Along with his little blue ticket Austin found an ominous looking document bearing the anathema of coming from an attorney. He opened it to be informed that his Aunt Polly Bevans had passed on to the Other Side and had left behind her on this terrestrial plane her well-known Aunt Polly Bevans' School for Young Ladies, with fifty pupils, a cottage and ten acres of well-tended ground. The meat of the matter was the fact that the whole descended to Austin.

At first he was staggered, being normal. He was a good salesman—or had been until his dismissal pricked the bright bauble of his confidence. He was a vivid lover, yet he had been ousted via the back door like any skulking Romeo. And with nothing to sell—and fifty maidens—yow! Then, like all valiant souls, he began to take stock of his experiences and determined to make them work for them. Susie was a product of a system of charm. Well—Susie would undoubtedly "get along." She would toil not, neither would she spin. She was a lily and her mission was to grow, exhaling the fragrance which was her nativity. The more perfectly she exhaled, the more perfectly would she justify her nativity— Not a bad thought— Who wanted college women, business women, professional women? Who wanted oracles, theorists, faddists, modernists? What did they profit a man? It was one thing to lose one's soul for the frou-frou of a skirt. It was another and quite unmanly to lose one's mind for the firm tread of an Amazonian intellectual. In that respect, as in most others, Mrs. Rolles had been right. Austin was beginning, in sooth, to look upon her as his benefactress. Viewed from afar, Susie had the aspect of something to be saved from. Mamma Rolles had thrown him the life line. The result of the cogitation was the determination to perpetuate at least one of Mamma Rolles' theories. He, Austin Bevans, would take Aunt Polly's legacy, fifty pupils, acreage and all. He would remove the Acting Principal, so specified in the bond as "Miss Hayes" and institute himself. He would revolutionize the school and the fifty young ladies. They should be taught one credo—to charm. It should be called The Charm School and its aim would be to turn out upon the male population Loreleis with every faculty trained to its acme of perfection.

Preparatory college courses, business trainings and the like should be tabooed, ridiculed, relegated to limbo. To charm—to charm—to charm—this and this only should be the rite and the religion. It was a great idea! The world went mad over ideas. Austin exulted.

There would have to be money. Austin thought hard and hit upon the last victim to whom he had sold a car. That said victim happened to be Homer Johns, president of the Corn Exchange Bank and an unapproachable proposition, did not deter the apostle of the new Educational Creed. He went to him at once and demanded ten thousand dollars.

While Homer Johns was spluttering and struggling back to equilibrium, Austin was launching forth upon his project.

He had a convincing vocabulary, had Austin. Also some gift of oratory, but he probably got what he had come for—more, because Homer Johns was fed up on the feminist movement than for any other reason. Wife, daughter and now granddaughter had gone the radical road in the Johns ménage and the old man yearned for the gentler days of the toil-less and spineless (not to say spine-less) woman. Here, he felt, was a young man with the right idea. A young man who might be preparing for a coming generation at least a few apostles of peace. He was for him.

"I'll go down with you," he said, "and look over the ground. It's bizarre—but it hits me right."

On the way down he disclosed the fact that he had a granddaughter at Aunt Polly Bevans' School. "She's been getting the same way as her mother and her grandmother," he complained, "and I am genuinely fond of the child. I don't forget her little ways when she was a baby—she was the most cuddle-some baby ever born, I think, and it gives me a shock to see her and to hear her now, developing radical views and opinions, talking of a college career, the economic independence of woman, the evolution of this, that and the other thing. It sounds like iron coming from lips where pearls ought to be. I'd like to check her up. It would be worth ten thousand dollars to me to do just that. If you can, young man, consider the ten thousand as gift rather than a loan or an investment."

We may anticipate, but in accomplishing this end, Austin was helped by the fact that Elise Johns fell in love with him and promptly lost all economically independent aspirations. However, that is anticipating my story—

Elise may hardly be said to be alone. When the fifty young ladies witnessed the arrival of Homer Johns and Austin Bevans they naturally, being pessimists, thought Homer Johns was the new principal. When Elise, still cuddlesome Austin thought, involuntarily, greeted the old gentleman as Granddaddy and Austin dawned upon them as their Principal, fifty hearts cracked like china and a cult was then and there established.

It was not all so soft, however. Austin found himself, in the first place, very much indeed "up against" Miss Hayes. Miss Hayes had been Acting Principal since the Will of God had removed Aunt Polly.

She believed vehemently in the Woman in Big Business, etc., etc. She maintained with a beef, iron and wine enunciation that this was the Day and Age of Specialization; that woman must meet the new demand of the new Era; that Austin was, like his sex, endeavoring to keep Woman, servile, unenlightened. She flatly denounced him as "shameless, archaic, insidious."

Said Austin: "If you are not in sympathy with my unalterable ideas and ideals, Miss Hayes, you are at liberty to leave."

The remark was, distinctly, a command.

Said Miss Hayes: "I have a three-year contract, Mr. Bevans. I am now entering upon the first of the three years. It is my pleasure as well as my duty to remain. I am a woman, Mr. Bevans."

"We are not disputing that, Miss Hayes," said Austin, and waived the question.

Let the woman rave, he thought. He would have exhaling lilies despite her. He was not without instinct and intuition. He had been there a week. A week had he been under the battery of fifty pairs of limpid, upraised eyes, blue, grey, sloe-black, leaf-brown, they met his with a sparkle, with a tremor, with a star— No, he had nothing to fear from Miss Hayes. These young, fundamentally feminine things would be lilies or hardier growths as he should will— Their will to charm was there. His but to call it forth, perfect it, enhance it, give it into their hands to use, consciously, an invaluable weapon.

He had felt it as a mission when it first came to him. He felt it more so now— now that he had seen Elise. Not that he admitted this to himself in so many words. He felt differently about Elise, older, more protective— When he noted a flower on his desk every morning, a white and scent-giving flower and traced it to Elise, he felt shamed. She was so young— she would get over it—a school girl infatuation for the Acting Principal who happened, quite accidentally and certainly unintentionally, to be young and with some slight bearing— Of course, she would get over it. Once she was thru with the Charm School, once she was launched into the brilliant prismatic circle to which she had been born, she would exhale the perfume of her charm in a rarefied circle above and beyond the Acting Principal.

At the same sacrificial moment he admitted his own love for her, and knew, too, that he had never been in love before. Love, then, was nine-tenths pain, nine-tenths self-abnegation, far more distress than joy—ebbene!

There were so many contributory elements going to make up the distress. There was Elise's roommate, for one, Sally Boyd. Not that Sally, as Sally, mattered very much either to Austin or to anybody else, but she had a brother. Brother George had been in love with Elise, it seemed, since pinafore days. When the news of the Adonis-like qualifications of the new Acting Principal reached his ears, he was consumed with jealousy. He besought his mother to remove Sally from the iniquitous surroundings and to use her influence with Homer Johns to remove his granddaughter. His stolid imagination, temporarily inflamed, conjured up vivid and vicious images— He had never been taken very seriously, however, and found some difficulty in changing the order of affairs.

With one gleam of perspicacity, nevertheless, when he heard the school lacked a secretary he got himself engaged in that capacity. On the spot, he felt, he could keep an eye on what he was convinced were nefarious proceedings—Sally, with sisterly tact, had let fall all sorts of terrifying innuendos. Elise, in the so-called commission of the school's task of writing a daily, graceful, feminine note directed all of hers toward Austin, and they were, asserted Sally, convincingly graceful, not to say feminine. Then, every day, a white gardenia found its fragrant way to the vase on the A.P.'s desk. It was unquestioned that Elise was responsible. Their eyes met and held, Sally narrated, even in class, like vises.

When the Charm School disbanded in the early summer Elise presented Austin with four letters to cover the term of the vacation. Austin dared not let the child know what these meant to him. He looked upon her as a child. He had philandered so much, He knew what philandering means—or doesn't mean. He dared not take her seriously. So many had taken him seriously who had no right to. He was sorry for all of that now. He hadn't known, then, about heartache.

The day after the disbanding of the school, Austin was alone. In the evening Homer Johns was giving his granddaughter a dinner dance to which he was going, after that he thought he would run up to the mountains for some fishing and swimming before the fall term. After that the rest of the summer didn't very much matter. He would carry his image with him and forget the rest of the world—tonight loomed large—

The morning mail brought him another notice from his lawyer. The same firm, who had announced to him the legacy of Aunt Polly Bevans' School, now announced that the real will had been found and that Aunt Polly had left her school, not to her "loving nephew," but to Miss Hayes. Austin whistled, then swore. Austin whistled, then swore, then whistled again. He paid momentary tribute to the sorority of women. Then he was conscious of a sort of ethical relief. He felt that it had all been too much—for him and for the Young Ladies. He believed that he had done some little good—but those "grace-

The Story of Flora Revalles

By ELIZABETH PELTRET

THIS is the story of a girl whose father built a railroad in Africa. Whether her inheritance from him has anything to do with the matter or not, it is hard to say, but time and space seem, somehow, to have no meaning to her.

It is a difficult thing, the moralists will tell you, to gain fame if you keep moving all the time. And yet that is exactly what Flora Revalles is doing. She has the mental restlessness . . . and the determination, too, . . . that her father must have had when he planned the 'laying-out of those tracks thru the jungles. She could never "sing for her own village" she must go out into the world . . . every corner of it . . . and sing for the world.

"I do not like long term contracts," she told me, "they keep one in the same place for so long a time. I hate to be tied down."

And this intense restlessness . . . a restlessness of the mind rather than of the body . . . is, I think, the most noticeably characteristic thing about her.

We were seated in a little alcove at the Beverly Hills hotel where she was staying during the production of the moving picture, "Earthbound" from the spiritualistic novel by Basil King, which marks her second appearance on the screen. Somewhere near, most probably in the dining-room, an orchestra played "Finiculi, Finicula."

The strains came to us softly. Portieres, looped back but lightly, hid us completely from the main lobby.

From the viewpoint of the lobby, this would doubtless have been voted a very regrettable thing, if they could have known. She looked so gorgeously vivid, did la Revalles, like sunlight on snow, you would have fancied, or if you are in the habit of associating people with jewels, like a rare emerald. And yet she wore no brilliant color, and few jewels, a long ermine scarf was thrown over her shoulders, her gown, her hat, her furs formed a color combination of black and white and silver. Only her lips were red. Her clear olive skin accentuated the darkness of her eyes and hair.

There are artists who claim to paint the souls of their subjects. She makes you feel that Leon Bakst could paint hers; vivid, gloriously colorful in contrasting shades of greens and blues and purples; a thing of beauty and restlessness and life.

"I think I must have been an animal at some time," she said, "I love them so. But not the house cats; no, I do not like cats. But I like three tigers

Tom Forman Now Gives the Order That Turns the Crank

The story of Tom Forman's development is inseparable from that of the war. When the bugle call to the great war was heard thruout the land, Tom Forman was one of the most popular of the young leading men of the silversheet. Unlike many entertainers, he waited neither for the draft nor an opportunity for facile service, but enlisted in the coast artillery two months after our entry into the great conflict.

"Cut out the war stuff," he ordered me; "every writer has sobbed over it in the magazines. I only did the best I could for the service."

But because Tom Forman's story is distinctly an after-the-war story, I must allude briefly to his service.

When he found that the coast artillery provided little opportunity for getting "over there," Tom Forman requested a transfer to the infantry. In this branch of the service he stood so high that he was one of the two in his company to be chosen to attend an officers' training camp. Here he won his commission as junior lieutenant and was put to training raw recruits. He was so anxious to get across that he worked them harder than did any of the other officers until he had the best trained men in the lot . . . and then, because he had trained them so well, they were sent abroad under the guidance of another leader and he was held over here. He had proved himself too valuable a trainer to be sent over there as cannon fodder.

Tom Forman was a junior lieutenant in the Infantry Corps during the war, and proved himself too valuable a trainer of raw recruits to be sent "over there." Before the war he had been a very popular player—but found himself almost forgotten by the fickle public on his return to the screen

A BROAD-SHOULDERED, shirt-sleeved man stood under the sweltering heat of the glass-covered studio stage at Lasky's with a girl child in his arms. The baby was quite comfortable, she liked the strong, enveloping cradle of the man's big arms and she cooed delightedly and shook her curly head and gazed everywhere except in the direction of the camera.

"Baby see pretty lady? Baby look at pretty lady. Lady will tell baby nice story if baby will look at her."

Thus the voice, low, patient, drawled its request over and over to the contrary little mass until finally the child's elusive fancy was caught and she looked in the proper direction.

"Camera!" called the same voice, now grown crisp and businesslike. The baby was transferred to the arms of Mabel Van Buren and a scene for "Rozanne Ozanne" was shot.

"Rozanne Ozanne," which stars the beautiful Ethel Clayton, is of especial interest, because it is the second picture Tom Forman has directed for Mr. Lasky under his new arrangement with that company.

When he heard he was to be held here, Tom Forman invaded the general's headquarters in high dudgeon. Twenty times he sought his commanding officer before he obtained an audience. Then he stated his grievance, he wanted to go to France.

The general looked at the dissatisfied officer. "H—, sir," he said, "I've been training men for thirty years, and they are over there and I'm here, here because this is where my country needs me . . . H—, sir, are you any better than I am? I'm not complaining, why should you? Go back and train your men."

"Yes, sir," said Forman, and he went back to his uncouth camp and weary month after weary month he turned awkward lumberjacks and backwoodsmen into snappy soldiers, and he shipped batch after batch of them over there . . . and

Mr. Lasky came along with an offer for Tom to direct—and this being the work he likes best, he is now happily building pictures that feature human types and are logical. He is bringing to the screen a certain wholesomeness and a big viewpoint. Mr. Forman's one ambition is to hunt tiger in Siberia he read about their "snuffing out" in the papers, the soldiers he had made, and still he was held here to make new man material for German cannon to slaughter.

When the armistice was signed and he found himself again in Hollywood sitting on the side-lines of a picture studio with grease-paint on his face, waiting for some silk-shirted director to give him orders, he found a slow antipathy for the whole mockery of it stealing over him.

The woods and men, camp-fires and bugle calls, service and work, and now this—grease-paint!

Before his enlistment, Tom Forman was well on the way to stardom. His mail from fans and admirers had been the heaviest in the studio; when he returned he found he was practically forgotten. And he sat on the stage, once more dolled up, forgotten by the public, waiting, waiting for the other fellow to give him orders.

Then came his great rôle as the young soldier-husband in Cecil B. de Mille's "For Better or For Worse," one of the finest bits of silverscreen ter. Some players treat their art rather as the newly rich treat their money; they must forever be making it evident. Not so the Neills.

Their art has been with them for a long time. It is part of themselves. They are not merely in the theater; they are of the theater and of all that is best in it. In their home and in their manner towards each other, you will find no suggestion of the mental turmoil that comes of making the pursuit of pleasure one's principal aim; the continual hanging on to a youth that has faded. The Neills accept their added years—(they are, I should say, somewhere in the late forties)—in cheerful peace, and for this reason, they seem astoundingly young. I can imagine them thirty or forty years from now, still surrounded, as they are today, by the youth of the profession who love their work and sincerely respect its traditions.

This is as it should be. Everything about the Neills betrays their tender regard for tradition. In their house there is not one single picture that they bought themselves. Photographs and paintings alike, all have some sentimental association. So, too, with the pieces of furniture that they use

Edythe Chapman and James Neill have been married for twenty-three years, and altho they have been almost constantly on tour, they have been separated for only ten weeks, altogether, in that time. People say that only one marriage out of twenty is a happy one—hence the title of this story

NO one could give an account of Edythe Chapman's home life without describing the home life of James Neill also.

"We've been so long together," said Miss Chapman, or rather, Mrs. Neill, "that we are almost like one person."

and value the most. One chair Edythe Chapman has on the front porch was made in 1638 and was brought to America by her ancestor, William Jones, thru whom she is directly descended from Oliver Cromwell. She is quite proud of belonging to the original "Jones" family, whose descendants may be numbered by thousands. She is a New Yorker by birth and her early traditions were all of the uncompromising mental strength and determination of the "Roundhead."

James Neill, on the contrary, is of Latin descent—Spanish and Irish. He was born in Savannah, Georgia, and while his wife's people were fighting under the Northern flag, his people fought for the Confederacy. His father and mother were enthusiastic devotees of the theater, and, far from discouraging him in his choice of a career, they were enthusiastic about it and have always been proud of him. He went to New York and began by playing small parts in road companies. His first engagement, he remembers, was in a melodrama called "Only a Farmer's Daughter." Another early engagement was with a company playing "The Hoop of Gold," a melodrama in which he played the leading part and Julius Kahn, now Congressman from California and chairman of the military committee, played the heavy. It was during the run of this play that Kahn decided to quit the stage for politics. He and Neill were rooming together.

"I don't see the use of all this," said Kahn to Neill. "I'm going to quit."

"Why, you big fat-head," said Neill, affectionately, "what do you mean?"

"Just what I said," answered Kahn; "I'm going

The River Shannon's Namesake

about "Where dear old Shannon's flowing, where the three-leaved shamrock grows"—and because of her Irish eyes and the winsome daintiness of her, they nicknamed her for the river whose praises she sang. That's how Shannon Day got her name.

"My real name is Sylvia," she confided, with a fetching frankness that is characteristic of her. "But I sang the Shannon song so often, and then artists had me pose as the river, and painted me for covers, that the girls at the Roof began calling me 'Shannon,' and pretty soon everyone was doing it—so I just adopted it for good."

I think the good old Irish river must have been highly pleased, for luck has trailed along in the wake of the little colleen who looks entirely Irish, but who is, as she admits laughingly, a strange mixture of English, Hungarian and Welsh, with a grandmother born in the County Cork to give her personality its Erin-Go-Bragh flavor.

Because of her Irish eyes and the winsome daintiness of her, they nicknamed her for the river whose praises she used to sing nightly up at the "Midnight Frolic." That's how Shannon Day got her name

With no experience or pull, Shannon managed to induce Ziegfeld to give her a trial in the "Follies." She was just fifteen

WHEN the river Shannon flowed into fame and melody, it couldn't have had any idea that very soon a wee broth of a girl was to be named for it.

If some promoter had given this river of Erin such an inkling, it might have had itself copyrighted, so that this same slip of a girl could not have stolen its name. But nothing of the sort happened; and in New York, amid the whirl of pleasure and extravagance, crowds of people thronged nightly to the "Midnight Frolic," to hear a slip of a girl sing then, and a success from the start. But one night she was singled out to do a little scene with Ned Weyburn. Ambition, with a capital "A," marked her then and there. After that nothing would do but she must have a fling at pictures.

"I was just a kid," this very apologetically, "and I figured out that if I was good enough to be singled out of thirty girls for a scene with Ned Weyburn, somebody would think I was good enough for pictures."

So out West she came and, of course, somebody saw her right away—a Ziegfeld "Follies" beauty isn't exactly inconspicuous, even in such a beauty mart as Los Angeles, and she was signed up to play leads in comedies with Fox. But homesickness and Broadway-longing finally pulled her Eastward.

"I was so silly," she admitted, her black-

"I didn't realize what an opportunity I was throwing away, so back I went to New York, and got into the 'Follies' again. I thought I'd love it, with mother in the East and everything, but the girls weren't so nice as they had been. Their attitude seemed to be, 'Well, you didn't make good, did you?' And, you know, I couldn't stand that, so I made up my mind to come out again and make good, if I died in the attempt. So here I am, and at first I had quite a hard time and lots of discouragements, because everyone offered me comedy jobs, and I was determined to succeed in drama—but I'm in to win, now; I'm years and years older than when I first came West."

"Just how old are you?" I wanted to know.

"Twenty!" was her impressive response, and I said, "Oh!" in a properly subdued tone.

After six months of "hoping and hanging around," Shannon Day got the part of the Baby Vamp with Jack Pickford in "The Man Who Had Everything." The rest was easy. Allan Holubar wanted her for "The Little Charmer" in his first feature, and now Cecil B. de Mille

Peaceful Valley

Fictionized from the Charles Ray Photoplay

By PEARL MALVERN

PEACEFUL VALLEY was an interlude. In the midst of crowded things and places it came, sweet-breathing and tranquil. It conjured relief to the mind and to the body.

It was devoid of all harassment. It caused one to turn away from the red raptures and redder roses to the hollyhocks, the zinnias, the verbenas and friendly small pansies.

Its people had taken on its aspect. They, too, were sweet-breathing and tranquil. They moved gently along the placid streams of living. There was no ostentation. There was no friction. The birds seemed to sing with a certain unruffled happiness. The brooks murmured comfortably. The skies bent low and were kind.

Especially there were the Howes. Mrs. Howe. Her son Hosea. Her daughter Martha. Especially because they were essentially of Peaceful Valley and, almost always, had been. Their father and his father before him had tilled Perpendicular Farm with varying success, according to the seasons and the rains thereof.

Mrs. Howe, too, had merely stepped from a neighboring farm to her husband's hearthstone. Joint legends came down to Hosea and Martha. They knew nothing else.

There was one excitement, aside from dressing in one's Sunday best and hearing the same minister drone forth the same sermons, typed and filed according to date and biblical significance. Seasonal sermons, as it were. By the time Hosea and Martha were ten, they could tell beforehand what the sermon was to be on, by figuring back

The people of Peaceful Valley were tranquil. They moved gently along the placid streams of living. There was no ostentation. There was no friction. But this was certainly a memorable Sunday a year, and by the time they were twelve they knew them word for word. The only fascination consisted in wondering what might happen in the event of a variation. They were devout and believed in miracles. But one never occurred.

The other excitement was the old-fashioned hotel on the other side of the Farm. It was run by Jotham, also old fashioned. Its chief charm seemed to hold forth for insomniacs. It looked deeply and chronically sleepy. One could but sleep within its sun-lazed, unstirring portals. Still, each summer there came to it from here and there strangers seeking one form or another of respite from routine.

Hosea and Martha had quite a list of fascinating recollections. Occasionally, there had been, in the Past, a boy or a girl unique and glamorous, giving Peaceful valley food for talk all thru the ensuing winter months. Winter was very rigorous in Peaceful Valley. Jotham and his hotel were something in the nature of a charity.

The summer that Martha and Hosea were seventeen and eighteen proved to be memorable. Jotham had put a new coat of paint on the Hotel, which may have accounted for the unusually festive guests. The first Sunday in June brought the first one. Hosea was preparing for Church when a man, obviously a "city" stopped and asked for some water. En route to the well he impressed Hosea with the evidently important facts that his name was Ward Andrews, he hailed from the very nucleus of the City and that he was, modestly enough, of course, but taken all in all a most important, worth-while-associating-with fellow. Hosea implicitly believed him. The flap of Ward Andrews' well-kept hand on the shoulder of his Sunday best suit made him quite tingle with a new self-esteem. He felt a kinship with the magical circle outside Peaceful Valley of which he and Martha and Mrs. Howe often spoke with reverence.

Ward Andrews made a wry face when he drank the water. "Some taste!" he observed, wiping his mouth with a very large, lavender linen handkerchief. "Some taste, I'm here to tell you!"

Hosea said he believed it was good for you, the water. His father had told his mother so when she had first come to Perpindicular, a bride, and had, herself, objected to the water.

All this gave Ward Andrews a line of thought, but he maintained silence. It was his way.

Before he left he had met Martha. "You're buried alive here," he informed her, "you ought to get out and have a chance."

Hosea colored up. "We're savin' up to send her to college," he said, with a certain red-faced pride; "she did fine in school."

"Have you ever thought of selling the farm?" Andrews put the question carelessly.

Hosea nodded. "We have," he said, "if we can get our price. We'd do most anything to give Martha her chance. She deserves it. She's the bright one of the family. And mother'd like the city. She's often felt stifled, she says. Yes sir, we'd sell."

Andrews said a word or two more, invited Martha to ride with him in his car one day soon and sauntered off with a "See you in Church."

It was all very obvious, but Peaceful Valley was very simple, and its people were the same.

In the Howe pew there were, that same Sunday, two other persons seated. A kindly appearing elderly man and a sweetly appearing young girl. Hosea stumbled over the elderly man's feet and sat, miserably, unable to keep his eyes from the delicately cut profile of the girl. His sister, Martha, had always formed for him his standard of beauty and sweetness. She still did. Yet he did not look at Martha during Church. He was able to keep his eyes away from Martha. He didn't ever wish he could touch the hem of Martha's skirt with his . . . his lips. Nor did he envision himself as Sir Walter Raleigh spreading forth his homespun suit for Martha's feet to tread upon.

The summer progressed. Hosea and Martha felt it to be a summer of which each day was scarlet-lettered

All at once the world of women opened wide to Hosea and the light that never was on land or sea caused his eyes to dance in his head and his muscles to twitch and contract.

The girl, on her part, used her own eyes. She, too, found it impossible to concentrate on the ministerial presence, self-engrossed and certainly pompous as that presence was. Hosea had a clean brown sweep of cheek and chin, and long slim lines of suggested strength. His hair grew strongly on his head and his eyes were bright and kind. And the little girl beside him, too. How clovery and sweet she seemed to be. And the patient-faced, capable-handed woman. It was all very comfortable and . . . and different.

Virginia Rand led a lonely sort of life in the city. Her father, the doctor, did the best he could for her, but the best he could was a fashionable boarding-school, and there was a strata in Virginia's nature belonging as much to the Peaceful Valleys of the world as to the smart schools, the Avenue, the hotels at tea time. She felt a kinship and, more, a yearning for what these three represented, the strong young man, the blossomy girl, the mother of these twain.

She had a sense of humor, too, and she noted Hosea's discomfiture and guessed, not without pleasure, what was the cause.

She gave a dollar to the collection, for instance, and so did he. The collector, a neighbor, stared at Hosea and wheezily inquired of him whether or no he would have any change. At Hosea's red-faced disclaimer his mother leaned over him and inquired as to his sanity and Martha's pink mouth literally fell agape.

The dog came in, too, and Hosea's embarrassment was only slightly leavened by the pleasure he felt when Virginia leaned over and made the animal secure between them. Hosea said, "thank you, miss," shyly, and from that moment the world became one woman, forever n' ever, amen.

(Forty-one)

New trails had opened in Peaceful Valley and lo, at their very feet lay the Garden of Dreaming, the World

It was, certainly, a memorable Sunday.

In the afternoon Ward Andrews returned. In the car he had with him Dr. Rand and the pretty Virginia. He said they had been talking over a project of buying the farm. He did not add what they had been talking about. The matter of the fact was that Andrew had told the doctor he believed the water on Perpindicular possessed medicinal qualities. "We could," he told the physician, "buy up the place, for little or no cost, I believe. A sanitarium on a small scale built there and properly advertised would coin money. It's an odd location. Good elevation and the hoi polloi always fall for the spring water stuff."

Dr. Rand interpolated: "I believe you said there was . . ." he said.

Andrews cut in with a sharp affirmative. "Of course," he said, "there is medicinal quality to that water. Nothing ever tasted like that unless it had some good purpose, however obscure. I tell you, it's a find."

"We'll look into it," the physician said, "as you say, this location has advantages . . . golf links . . . all that sort of thing . . . quieting for the neurasthenics . . ."

Andrews clicked his lips on a swift affirmative. The doctor did not notice the crafty gleam unpleasantly lighting the younger man's eyes. By such slight omissions are the enormities precipitated.

The summer progressed. Hosea and Martha felt it to be a summer of which each day was scarlet-lettered. The farm had never been so difficult and yet, Hosea thought, the plow ran the more smoothly because, in the evening, he could don his festive Sunday black (no longer associated merely with the seasonal sermons) and go over to Jothams, there to sit hazy and enchanted on the porch rail with Virginia, gossamer beneath the sickle moon.

He had her in his arms; had her, dripping, against his breast before the suddenly sinister water could touch her still face again

Dish washing and mending had never been so plentiful, Martha thought, and yet there was poesy to the very suds and glamor to the coarsest sheet when, at any instant, Ward Andrews' huge car might honk-honk for her outside the wicker gate.

New trails had opened in Peaceful Valley and lo, at their very feet lay the Garden of Dreaming, the World . . .

Toward the end of the summer Mrs. Howe was called away. It had long been her custom to dispense mercy and aid the family resources by ushering the small new lives of Peaceful Valley into being. Such a call came at the end of the summer.

She never had any fear of leaving Hosea and Martha. They had always been sufficient unto themselves, prudent and reliable. They were of such stuff.

Martha was a commonsensical little thing, her mother was always wont to say, and for what lack her youth might be responsible, there felt they would mutually assuage. "They're stopping at the same place," Hosea assured his sister, "it's only natural he'd spin her about a bit."

It seemed unnatural to Martha, but she didn't say so.

On one such occasion Martha and Hosea were walking to a lily pond dear to their childhood. The quiet, tree-rimmed place, odorous and rank with the lilies and the lily-pads, drew a sigh from Martha.

"When I look at this," she said, "I can understand how folks die for love. Elaine, you know, Hosey, and that lady way back in history, Lucretia, I think, who stabbed herself . . .

If I were to die of love I think I'd do it here among the lilies . . . wouldn't you?"

Hosea's sturdy normality rejected at once the morbid suggestion. Instinct told him that it was the glimpse they had had of Ward and Virginia in the motor rather than the lily pond that had given his sister her sad reverie. Somehow when he thought of Martha he lost some of his admiration for Ward Andrews. It was all planned for Luke. Things went as things were planned in Peaceful Valley.

Jothams broke up in early September. Old Jotham was

"Way Down East" and other Current Photoplays in Review

By

FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

TO us there is always a tremendous personal significance to a David Wark Griffith première. It is as if our own hopes and dreams wavered in the balance. Just as we judge his productions by a standard all their own, we find ourselves consciously or unconsciously "rooting" for this singular leader of the silent drama. We want him to outdo himself. We want him to plant the standard of the photoplay at a new point of advance. All this because we know he deserves a big reward. First, as a daring and fearless film adventurer, the one man with the courage to pioneer. Second, because we know how sincerely he loves and lives his work. And third, for the positive genius he possesses, along with the limitations every genius owns.

This personal equation may or may not cloud our impressions of his work. For instance, we would like to record his newest super-production, "Way Down East," as a cinema triumph marking a new farthest north for the photoplay. Indeed, "Way Down East" is a commercial success—and, we believe, the greatest since his epic, "The Birth of a Nation." Again, he has achieved a thrill more stirring than anything that has moved across the silversheet since that electrical ride of the Ku Klux clausmen. And, better still, he has sounded a deep and YOU'VE seen those tiny yellow butterflies that float in the summer sun and light here and there on a perfumed flower. Could you imagine one of those lovely creatures animated by the ambition of the busy bee, you would have a very good idea of what Viola Dana is like. But Miss Dana doesn't exercise her queenly prerogative and sit commandingly on her throne, she mingles democratically with her subjects and does her share of the work and a bit more.

"What is my philosophy of life?" repeated Viola Dana, tossing back her bobbed head and trying to look very serious for a moment.

"Why, just to live and to work."

And she does—live.

I know very few people who get the real zest out of life that Viola Dana does. Somehow or other, she has gained happiness in spite of trouble at an age when most girls are still seeking, still wondering what on earth they want of life.

I think that Viola Dana's secret is that she lives each day to the very fullest. She snatches every bit of joy and fun that she can out of each hour. She doesn't worry over what is past, nor does she eagerly dream of the future. She lives in the present and tomorrow can take care of itself.

Viola has always been made the baby of the family and—she admits it—the spoiled baby. If she couldn't get what she wanted one way, she would twist and turn everything about until she did find a way of getting it, and somehow or other, this is as it should be, for she is one of those people who, wanting and getting their own way, are big enough not to be hurt by being spoiled.

As a rule, she is jolly, a gay comrade, a fearless child, demanding and getting out of life—everything.

But one of the reasons that she gets everything is because she isn't afraid to give. She isn't afraid of the world, of work or of anything on land or sea or in the air.

While she is naturally a baby doll, with the lure of a vampire and the heart of a child, she hates to be perpetually dressed up—and worrying about her looks. She is not really a "prinker," for in her there is still a great deal of the primitive, a love of splashing in the ocean and running about without the shackles of hairpins and hats.

Don't mistake me, she doesn't pamper these desires; the Viola Dana that you see on the screen, beautifully costumed, pinkly manicured, perfectly groomed, dainty as a little princess, is the Viola Dana that you would see teaing at the Alexandria Hotel, dining at the Hollywood hotel where she lives, or attending the theater or swimming at Venice.

But those who know her best, know that she gets tired of always being dressed up, always on parade. The Viola Dana that I like best of Viola Dana, a young veteran in pictures, simply loves her work. Her green eyes, with their long, entangled lashes, sparkle with enthusiasm whenever she contemplates doing something new. Just at present she wants drama, and her new picture will be "The Twin Cinderella," a drama after her own heart all is the Viola who is more proud of her sun-burned shoulders and peeling nose, (from swimming at Venice), than she is of her choicest Parisian frock.

I could tell you many things about her moods; her most omnipresent one is a combination of pep and jazz and giggles. She is never bored, because she never has time to be. Often she makes good resolutions to shut herself alone in her room and read—but that is as far as it goes—she's too afraid she might miss some fun, so out she trots, gaily and blithely, to "see what's going on."

Recently her fad has been flying. Miss Dana was taught by that daredevil of the air, Lieutenant Locklear, who met a tragic death recently. She manipulates an aeroplane as "safely" as a man. At first she refused to run the 'plane, being content "just" to fly, but Locklear, determined that she should learn, signaled one day for her to take the helm. (I confess my ignorance of the specific term.) Viola—she can be stubborn—just shook her head and cuddled her small body more closely in the straps of the 'plane.

Some girls there are who can only be themselves in one phase of life—Viola Dana has a dual personality; when you see her daintily gowned, perfectly groomed, you think of her as a little princess. When you see her in her bathing suit, frolicking around in a shallow pool of water or about to leap from a high rock, (see snapshots on opposite page), you meet a tomboy of the jolliest variety

Then and there, three hundred feet in the air, Locklear let go completely of the apparatus.

"And I knew he wouldn't take hold, so it was up to me," recounts Viola.

Now she is as keen about driving an aeroplane as we ordinary mortals are about motoring.

Viola, a young veteran in pictures, simply loves her work. Her green eyes, with their long, tangled lashes, sparkle with enthusiasm whenever she contemplates doing something new. Just at present she is sick of doing comedy, (she is a fickle little lady, as variable as the winds in her likes and dislikes). She wants drama . . . her new picture will be "The Twin Cinderella," a drama.

She and her sister, Shirley Mason, are great pals; in fact, she is a great pal to anyone who is fortunate enough to have won her friendship.

She believes that marriage is a wonderful existence. She says this because her experience was so wonderful. Up until the time of his death, she and her husband worked together and played together. Theirs was a perfect companionship.

"He spoiled me as if I were a child," said Viola; "he never seemed able to realize that I had grown up."

And no wonder, for Viola, like Peter Pan, will never grow up.

The Last Act

GENTLE READER: This is the last monthly honor roll which the CLASSIC will publish for the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920. When the January issue of this magazine reaches your hands, you will gaze upon the photographs of the final winners of this contest, which has been unique in the history of motion pictures. The announcement of the winners will be accompanied by the publication of the final honor roll members; those taking part in the filming of the test scenes; photographs of the world-famous judges, and other items of universal interest to all who have been following the contest, and to the participants.

Not only were the editors of the three magazines, i.e., THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE CLASSIC, and SHADOWLAND, overwhelmingly surprised by the stir and excitement which the contest caused among the readers of these publications, but they were exceedingly gratified at the interest shown by the various well-known film companies throught the country. These companies expressed themselves as desirous of signing up some of the winners on long term contracts, and of assuring the chosen ones of future screen success and fame.

Owing to this new ingredient, and because of the fact that the contest assumed so great a significance all over the country among movie fans, and particularly among our readers, the Brewster Publications have decided to start another contest immediately, profiting by the experience of this one, which is now being completed, and striving to make the new one as nearly perfect as possible.

This is the first official announcement of the new Fame and Fortune contest which will be conducted by the three magazines representing the Brewster Publications, and any of our readers or their friends may enter the contest. Photographs may be sent in without delay, and the first honor roll of the new contest will appear in the January issues of each one of our publications.

One of the most important features in connection with the contest of the past year is the five-reel feature drama entitled "Love's Redemption," which not only includes the Fame and Fortune contest, but is also an unusually interesting film which will stand apart in its unique story, its cast of internationally famous characters, its photography and direction. As this film-feature has developed into surprising perfection, another story is now in process and just as soon as the new Fame and Fortune Contest gets well under way, the production of the new story will begin.

"Love's Redemption" carries the Fame and Fortune contest winners, the scenes in which the judges make their final choice, and also gives the chosen ones an unusual opportunity to test their screen ability. This has now been completed, and is in the process of being cut and titled, and by the time this copy of the CLASSIC reaches your hands, the five-reel feature drama will be ready for the exhibitors. If you have been at all interested in the contest in any way, you will be able to see this film at your home town theater. Tell the manager of your theater about it and he will be able to procure it for you.

The contest manager, and the editorial staff of the Brewster Publications have worked hard and late on the final outcome of the contest, but as two-thirds of the entries came pouring into the offices at the eleventh hour (despite the monthly warning to send in the photographs early) the delay in the announcement of the final winners lies in the hands of the laggards. It is a matter of physical impossibility to do three months' work in a week or so, and as the pictures began to pour in, daily increasing by thousands, just before the contest was to close, and even after the final date, the question of an immediate announcement as to the outcome became impossible. And so we ask your patience, and being human, we cannot close without saying, "We told you so."

The honor roll for this month is as follows:

Evelyn Ross, of 416 Fourth Street, Wallace, Idaho, is a young classical dancer who has done some amateur theatrical work. She has also held National and Pacific Coast swimming and diving titles, and is a blue-eyed, brown haired miss with a fair complexion.

Miss Orpha Dunn, 2132 Second Avenue, Seattle, Washington, is also a classical dancer, having studied under Ruth St. Denis and Ted Shawn. For a period of two years during the war, Miss Dunn entertained the boys at the frontlines, and also worked for charity. She is an unusual type with dark blue eyes and blonde hair, while her fair skin puts the proverbial peaches and cream combination to shame.

Miss B. Markova, 2408 Broadway, New York City, has had no professional experience. She is a brunette.

Josephine Hubatka, 312 Williamson Street, Elizabeth, N. J., informs us that while she has never had any dramatic experience, she feels convinced that anyone with grey eyes, dark brown hair and fair complexion, can make good—and looking at Josephine's photograph, we feel inclined to agree with her!

Miss Evelyn Pouch, Hotel Avery, Washington and Avery Streets, Boston, Mass., is a very youthful entry of the type that should screen well. She has dark brown eyes, while her hair is blonde.

Virginia Lee Nicholson, 2620 North Charles Street, Baltimore, Md., is a little southern beauty who has appeared in several amateur theatrical productions in Baltimore. Miss Nicholson has studied pantomime.

diamond wrist-watches show any respect for interviewers, and so we nearly fainted with surprise as we entered the doorway of the hotel, for there was Dorothy waiting—and looking as if she had been waiting some time.

We made our way to the already crowded dining-room, stopping every other step so that Dorothy might return the cordial and friendly greeting of some friend, until spurred on by visions of our desk overflowing with work, we desperately seized her arm and firmly managed to get her seated in a corner of the dining-room.

A tiny figure, the suggestion of a wood-bird in her graceful movements, and you have a somewhat inadequate portrait of Dorothy Dickson, the most recent of all stage celebrities to join the rank and file of celluloid luminaries.

Flying in the face of that Providence which is supposed to guide the time of all movie stars and other celebrities, we arrived at the quiet little hotel on the west side of 44th street a few moments ahead of time to keep our luncheon engagement with Miss Dickson. Few and very far between are the stars whose liked everyone she knew and they reciprocated. Q. E. D. Dorothy is a lovable girl of many, many friends.

Unspoiled, eager with the rush of youth, expressing her artistry thru the magic of her gay little feet; she has danced her way into the hearts of many a blasé audience. And anyone who has ever seen Dorothy dance cherishes a beautiful memory.

"Of course, I'm nervous about my engagement with Famous Players. I feel exactly as I did the night I danced for the first time professionally. Literally scared to death. But I've wanted to do pictures for a long, long time, and I have had a good many offers. Something has always interfered up to the present. As a rule I couldn't sign any motion picture contract because of other contracts that prevented," she said in answer to my question.

As you know by this time, Dorothy is playing the leading rôle in "Money Mad," the forthcoming Famous Players-Lasky feature, directed by George Fitzmaurice. Stars of the silver-sheet who have essayed the leading rôle as their first appearance on the screen are in the minority. Dorothy has never faced a motion picture camera before, save for the making of a test.

"Famous Players have had me in mind for quite some time to do a picture for them, but they have been unable to get a suitable story. This one of 'Money Mad' sounds quite exciting. Ouida Bergere wrote the scenario, and the character of the girl is one which will give me an unusual chance to show whether or not I have any acting ability.

"I have been in town shopping frantically every day for a week because I have to wear some stunning clothes in this picture," she added, "and oh, I'm quite worn out before I begin. I simply hate to shop, don't you?" she asked.

Something in the wistful little smile caused me to wonder at the undertaking of so much work by one so fragile. She had just told me that last year when she and Carl Hyson were dancing to-

THEY say that the past summer was the most sizzling this California Coast has known, but thru all the very warmest weather the studios and stars worked steadily and indefatigably. Practically every member of the coast colony, however, formed a habit of swimming, which looks as if it might continue all the year 'round. Most of the film folk prefer to take their daily dip at Crystal pier, Venice, and one sees every type of highly colored and highly priced motor-cars transporting our celluloid queens and kings to Crystal Pier when the day's work is done. Viola Dana, Shirley Mason and I la Lee are only a few who go there daily.

Mary Thurman, however, prefers Long Beach, California. I watched her taking her swim one Sunday recently. Every man on the beach was raving about her as the most beautiful woman on the shore, while all the girls envied her, her snappy bathing suit and her—er—well, you know what Mary is famous for. No—she did not wear a one-piece suit, altho they are the rule out here. James Kirkwood also swims at Long Beach.

BROADWAY was startled on September first by a tragic accident which resulted in the death of Bobbie Harron, the Griffith star. Bobbie was taking a dress suit from a trunk in his room at the Hotel Seymour, New York, when the trunk cover fell and exploded a revolver which had been in one of the pockets. The bullet lodged in Harron's left chest. Bobbie was removed to Bellevue Hospital, where he lay until September 5 in a critical condition, making a game fight for life. Loss of blood was too great, however, and death resulted.

No player in the whole motion picture world was better beloved than Bobbie. He was a modest, charming and sincere boy whose hard work was just about to lead to great things. He leaves a place which will be very hard to fill. The tragic death was a particularly hard blow to David W. Griffith, for the producer and the young star had been friends and co-workers for years and were like brothers.

The shooting, of course, was wholly accidental. Harron was taking out a dress suit in preparation for the opening of the Griffith production, "Way Down East." The trunk had not been opened since its arrival from California, which explains the loaded revolver. Bobbie had carried it during the epidemic of robberies and hold-ups in California last Winter and had slipped it into his dress suit pocket, forgetting all about it.

Harron's death is a severe blow to the Griffith organization, following close upon the sudden death of Clarine Seymour, who, like Bobbie, died upon the doorstep of stardom. Harron had just completed one production, "Coincidence," for release thru Metro and was half way thru his second, "The Brass Bowl," which was being directed by Elmer Clifton.

Speaking of the opening of "Way Down East," the production had a sensational premiere at the 44th Street Theater. The audience went wild at

By DOROTHY DONNELL

MISS MILBURN, owner, president, and social sponsor of Milburn Hall, the most select boarding-school on the Hudson, where knowledge was indeed above price, or at least above the price of most people, surveyed the gathering on the lawn with a smile that would have been complacent on less learned lips.

"Graduation Day is, with me, a solemn occasion," she intoned to the circle of relatives, trustees and other guests gathered in a group of which she was the grey satin-and-pearl clad nucleus, "when I think of the young minds and hearts going out from this cloister of learning where it has been my privilege to protect and pattern them—where they have flowered, if I may say so—"

An admiring murmur permitted her to say so. She went on in guarded and resonant phrases whose sonorous intonations rolled across the lawn and reached the punch-bowl table to the ungodly glee of several of the flowered and their friends.

"Sophie's blowing her own horn again," giggled one fluffy unregenerate, "she's a great performer at that kind of music. I wonder why someone doesn't write words to go with it!"

"Thank Heaven I've heard her say 'young ladies strive always for sweetness and light' the last time!" sighed the languid girl whose diamond ring and bold, bright eyes contradicted the protestation of simplicity of her frilled organdie. "As soon as I get to town I'm going to have a permanent wave and go to see 'Under Mary's Bed'! And I'm going to make Mother buy me a low necked gown without any back to it—"

"My Aunt is going to let me come out in the fall," confided another, swinging her expensively engraved, expensively attained diploma disrespectfully by the ribbon, "and a season at Newport—"

Ruth Sawyer turned her wide, slow gaze from one to another, then her dark eyes went irresistibly up to the handsome boy-face at her side, like purple pansy blooms lifted to the sun. She was one of the few of the girls to whom the unsophistication of white organdie and sashes seemed to belong by divine right of youth and innocence. Her dark hair waved softly back from a low white forehead with none of the theatrical effect of the others. The sunlight lay on a pale, clear cheek untroubled with rouge or powder. The rest of the girls were full of nervous movement, restless gestures, shrill words, but Ruth was strangely silent, serene among them.

The girl colored sweetly but her eyes, meeting Billy Bolton's ardent gaze, were direct and candid as a child's. Young as he was, he realized that she was still living in a story-bookland, half reality, half dreams, a Sleeping Princess whom he would awaken "Sweetheart!" whispered a voice in her ear, "let's get out of this mob. Just think we've been engaged a whole hour and you haven't given me one kiss yet!"

The girl colored sweetly but her eyes, meeting Billy Bolton's ardent ones, were direct and candid as a child's. Young as he was, he realized that she was still living in a story-book land, half reality, half dreams, a Sleeping Princess whom he could awaken.

They strolled a little apart from the chattering groups, but Ruth listened to him absently and when he drew her down beside him on a bench he saw that she was trembling. "I've been so happy here," she quivered with lips that trembled childishly, "I'm afraid, Billy—afraid! It's like stepping off something—of course I'm silly! But somehow I never saw beyond today."

"But if you love me, dearest," the boy flamed, and caught her hands awkwardly, "everything will be all right! It can't help being! As soon as we hear from your mother we'll be married. And we'll live with the Mater for a while, and I won't let any harm come to you—ever—"

They were very young, piteously young. The wise old oak who listened must have sighed gustily, thinking of the love words it had heard since its acorn days, and how they had withered and blown away like its own leaves on the winds of change. And almost before these had been uttered, the wind which had been gathering for sixteen years came upon Ruth at last and the frail white bud of her girlhood shriveled under it.

The groups on the lawn were hardly aware of the limousine when it first rolled up the curving drive, despite its lavender tinting and gold ornaments and the scrawling flaunting monogram D. B. on its doors. Milburn Hall was used to limousines, but it was distinctly not used to the kind of woman who stepped out of this one now, or the sort of man who followed her, obviously abashed, and carrying his flashy cane defiantly to cover it. The woman for her part made no pretence of disguise. She was rather terrible as she rustled up the walk with her gold-embroidered skirts swishing about her generously displayed ankles, her plumes, her jewelry; the heavy, exotic, costly scent she diffused.

Miss Milburn was, for a moment, stricken speechless. No such emergency had faced her during many staid, spotlessly respectable years of profiteering in the higher education. The woman was not even doubtful. No one could possibly have had a doubt about her. She gave herself away in every hard glance, in every stereotyped smile. Already the guests and the girls were whispering—

"Is Miss Ruth Sawyer here?" the woman asked loudly, confronting the quivering virtuous preceptress,

"I've come for her. I'm her mother."

The jangling tone was plainly audible all over the lawn. On the far bench Ruth rose to her feet uncertainly, staring with wide eyes of horror, as one who looks upon some nightmare thing. She heard Billy's gasp, saw the rigid scorn of the others—and with her dark head high, she walked across the grass to that impertinent figure and held out her hand. "Here I am—mother," she said clearly, "how—how do you do?"

The painted face opposite crinkled into baggard mirth. The woman was handsome enough in her outrageous style, but when she smiled she was almost hideous. Traitorously the expression betrayed a thousand tiny wrinkles filled with caked powder. "Ain't you queer tho!" she shrieked, "ain't seen me for thirteen years and you say how do you do! Give us a kiss, cant you!"

The girl moved like an automaton, but she kissed the scarlet lips. A burning blush drowned her pallor. She turned to Miss Milburn. "I suppose—I had better go. You have been very good to me—"

Virtue spoke in an acid voice. "I understood from Alderman Grayson that your mother was living on her estate in Nice. Perhaps you can explain?"

"Explain nothing!" the newcomer said violently. "I guess my money was as good as anybody's! It happened to suit me to have Ruth here educated swell, and I've done it, and kept my hands off the job. Now it happens to suit me to take her away with me and I'm going to do it too. I got a legal right—I can prove it!"

The group had moved away, leaving the grim Miss Milburn, the white girl and the red, vulgar woman together. The school-head drew a sharp breath. "I owe an apology to my other scholars and their friends," she said cuttingly, "but I must beg them to believe that I was wholly deceived—that this is as abhorrent a revelation to me as to them."

Abuse frothed on the other woman's tongue, but Ruth forestalled it by laying a small icy hand on her mother's jewel-laden one. "No! No—please," she implored with a sick attempt at it smile, "let's go—mother," she quivered all over at the word, "Miss Millburn will send my things on. We can talk about everything in the car."

The woman turned to her escort. "The nerve of some people!" she screamed. "Did you hear that old hold-up artist? Seems to me, "Velvet" Craft, you might show a little pep when your lady-friend is insulted—"

"Velvet" Craft! Some of the men guests—a highly respected church member, a father or two, the most pious of the trustees showed pitiful confusion, and furtively sneaked out of the circle. "Velvet" Craft, the manager of the most fashionable gambling hell in the city! Then this woman must be his partner, Dot Belmar, whose exploits were featured frequently in the police gazette, and who pursued her notorious career unmolested, due to a certain mysterious "pull" in the city administration. The white-ruffled girls watched their classmate move away beside the shameful plumes with greedy eyes that had no glint of pity in them. At the car, Ruth left the older woman to hurry up the path to the dormitory. When she came down stairs a moment later, with her hat jammed down on her lovely dark head ruthlessly without a mirror's aid, she heard her name spoken.

"Ruth!" Billy Bolton groaned. "Ruth! Tell me it isn't so. Tell me that that—that woman isn't your mother—"

The girl looked at him steadily. He saw that the child-light was gone forevermore from her dark eyes. "I suppose she is, Billy," she answered quietly. "I have not seen her since I was four. I didn't—remember— But now I know why I was afraid. So it's good good-bye, Billy." She held out her hand.

"Ruth—I did love you—" that cruel past tense! "but—I suppose I'm a cad, but I can't! My Mater—that woman—God! It's beastly!" He slithered to the bottom step, sobbing wildly, but with the wisdom of women, she saw that his tears were washing away the cause of them, and that his loss would not matter to him long. She laid her hand on the shining head, as tenderly and understandingly as a mother might pat her little sorry child.

"Good-bye, Boy Dear," she said again, and was gone. And he heard the cough of the motor on the driveway.

Ruth Sawyer thought, as she sat beside the valuable woman whom the name of mother fitted as incongruously as her dry, brittle, startlingly youthful hair, that she had plumbed the depths of humiliation and grief. Waves of Parfaite d'Amour stifled her, until she felt her thoughts whirling dizzily, with Craft's weasel face hobbing on them like a cork on waves. "There is nothing worse," she found herself saying over and over, "there couldn't be—"

Two hours later she could have laughed at her abysmal simplicity—did laugh, wildly, without reason, beating with small fists at the mirror that showed her the dreadful thing that wore her face, a shameless woman-creature with naked shoulders in a gown like sulphurous flames. The maid who had put the gown on her despite her struggles, an immense Amazon with arms like steel, brought her out of the rising tide of hysteria by pressing down on her thumb nails till the cold pain recalled her to herself.

"That's no good," the woman said levelly, "they all do it—at first. But you'll soon get used to it."

Ruth stared at her. Then she stood quiet. Strangely quiet. She did not speak at all during the moments that followed, when she went down the gilded staircase into the drawing-rooms, thru which wandered men in evening clothes and women with painted masks of faces that smiled, while their eyes, unsmiling, peered from behind their masks. Music—music that twanged on the bare nerves and set them quivering filled the rooms with barbaric sound, a woman, dressed in a single purple veil, danced—laughter, raucous, unmodulated . . . And Dot Belmar, in a shameless gown, moved among her guests, stared at her from head to foot with appraising eyes.

Then presently there was Douglas Courtenay and the new hope that stirred with the warm shine of his blue-grey eyes good many cool thousands these last fifteen years, but it was worth it. I always play safe bunches—wait till Burke Whitlock sees you!"

She turned away, uneasy under the girl's collected look. But in a moment she was back, leading a burly man who wore his evening clothes as carelessly as tho they were overalls. "Ruth ain't acquainted yet," she told him significantly, "I'm expecting you and her to be good friends, Mr. Whitlock."

Somewhat—Ruth did not quite know how it came—she was alone in a small room with this great, gross mass that peered at her under bristling yellow-white brows and breathed stertorously. "Come here!" he growled at last. People were ac-

"I had a hunch!" she said, gloatingly, "you can buy beauty over any drug store counter, but there's something you can't buy and that's the manner. And you've got it. It set me back a

Hereafter Ruth was to find out the truth of this, his boast. The weapon of his power was no knightly sword blade shielding her, but a sledge hammer which is, after all, just as efficacious. As Whitlock's ward, she had a position of secure respect, money, leisure and a chance to forget, if forgetting were possible. But the one evening in the red salons of the House of Lost Hopes had left a soul hurt that was long in healing. She felt a sensitive horror of going out into the bright sunshine that meant recognition—

At the end of the year, Boss Whitlock retired from the leadership of his party machine. How much Ruth had to do with it even he did not guess, but there was a father-look in his little, red-veined eyes as he showed her the steamship tickets he had bought for them. "We'll go over an' hobnob with the toffs!" he told her jocularly, "an' maybe we can fit you out with a title if we can find one reasonable." The tickets were dated for the next day. By such precipitate guile he got Ruth safely away without hearing of the long-deferred judgment that had customed to obey Boss Whitlock when he spoke in that tone. She came trembling, smiling a vague frightened smile—

And then she discovered that her idea of the Worst that Could Happen had been wrong. Quite absurdly wrong.

It was a small thing that saved her—the catching of her lower lip between her teeth. But Burke Whitlock's mother had had the same trick. He was sixty years old and she had been dead fifty-five of them, but he remembered. He released Ruth and stepped backward, muttering, "Why you're not the sort the Belmar woman recruits," he said presently in vast surprise, "they fight—or swear, or laugh. You're different."

Standing there in the sensuous gown, Ruth lifted her nun's face to the man whom the papers agreed in naming the most corrupt and powerful politician in the city and told him the whole story quite simply, tho once her clear voice caught on a gasp when she told of the coming of the mother she had not seen since she was a baby. "I've come—I'm here," she ended, and came to him swiftly, and touched his great hairy, glitteringly manicured paws, "but you won't let her make me stay? Oh, I'm so glad it happened to be you and not one of those others—" It was not artifice, but sheer, clear white faith in him, and his will to save her. Threats had never availed with Boss Whitlock, nor vituperation nor argument, but here, astonishingly, stood one who believed in him, trusted him for something that he did not have.

"By the Great Lord Harry!" rasped Boss Whitlock, "I'll take you away from that woman! I'll—I'll adopt you—" he stared down at her, small eyes watering with sentiment, "You're the Real Thing—edicated, rayfined an' I'm just a low-life, but there ain't any harm can touch you if Burke W's around!"

found out Dot Belmar at last and sent her from her gaming-tables and secret, perfume-stilled rooms to prison for ten years.

With the vanishing of New York's smoky sky-line it seemed to Ruth Sawyer that she had left the secret dread behind as well and were sailing out into the clear, sun-shot light of a new day. With the scenes that followed even her memory of it grew hazed and unreal. As tho she had slept feverishly one night, and dreamed—

Then, presently there was Douglas Courtenay and the new hope that stirred with the warm glance of his blue-grey eyes. Even at Miss Milburn's, she had not chatted of love as the others had, lightly, fan'liarly. She met it face to face now as the neophyte might meet the Miracle and when presently, he spoke of making her his wife, she lay thru the slow, still hours of the night that followed, trembling and awed at the beauty of life that had come to her, as perhaps on another night Mary of Bethany lay and thought of the angel's words.

Old Burke Whitlock stayed on in Paris after her marriage, tho secretly his plebeian heart yearned for Fourteenth Street, and American beef stew and the old rage of battle that stirred healthily in his veins when he read the attacks of the opposition press. But still he remained. Until Courtenay's term as attaché of the American Embassy was over, he would wander listlessly thru the marble-lined boulevards, eat of their hay-thanish cooking."

"Maybe she'll need me yet," he thought, with a flash of that prescience that had made him powerful, "I'm thinkin' that husband of hers isn't man enough to stick by if trouble sh'd come."

He watched the beloved face vigilantly but could read in it only happiness and content. When at the end of the year her baby girl was born, Whitlock owned to himself that his fears might be groundless. A cablegram from America told him of the death of Dot Belmar and the breaking-up of her business. Courtenay was a devoted husband, a rapt father. "Still I'm thinking I'll stick around a bit longer," he mused, stubbornly, shaking his grizzled head, "tho belike I'll git me passport into the next world from a frog-eating priest and be sent to the furren quarter of the Beyond!"

It was when her baby was nearly six months old that the Shadow fell across Ruth's joy. When she looked up in the Blois, startled to hear her old name in this far land and met the leering, rodent eyes of "Velvet" Craft, she felt as tho an icy hand had squeezed her heart. "What," she asked between labored breaths. "What—do you—want?" For she knew instinctively he had come to Paris solely to meet her.

"You're not very cordial to old friends," Craft answered, (Continued on page 68)

But the Fellers Call Him Bill"

By
LILLIAN MONTANYE

IN the office of one of the potentates of Famous-Players studio a tall, well-groomed, smooth-haired, smooth-shaven man arose to greet me.

"Mr. William Boyd?" I ventured.

His cool, inscrutable grey eyes looked straight into mine for a moment then melted into unquestioning friendliness.

"Yes," he said—"but—I suppose you know Eugene Field's poem—

Father calls me William, sister calls me Will—Mother calls me Willie—but the fellers call me
Bill . . .

It's that way with me. I'm 'William' on the theater programs—but to my friends I am just plain 'Bill' or 'Billie'."

There is a tremendous satisfaction always

Billie Boyd was twenty-three when he began his stage career, said beginning consisting of doing extra parts for which he received the munificent sum of one dollar. He is known as juvenile lead thruout the country. His last Broadway appearance was in "The Voice in the Dark," and he is now playing opposite Justine Johnston in her first Realart Picture, "Blackbirds" in meeting a man who admits that he loves his chosen profession so much that he would not give it up or consider doing anything else—and tho he fell down over and over again he would just get up and, with quiet persistence, start all over again. Not that he talked a great deal about success or failure—Billie Boyd isn't that kind. He wears an armor of reserve, of imperviousness—something like a small boy who is afraid he will be caught showing off—a certain reticence, a saving in the use of words as tho he were afraid he might say too much—especially as applied to himself. But—in spite of his inscrutability, his apparent modesty—one knows that he is accustomed to getting what he wants. Not in any impulsive, unpremeditated or undeserved way—he is not the sort that would trust to luck. He would make up his mind what he wanted and go after it, and his dominating personality would put it across.

For instance, there was the beginning of his stage career. He was not stage struck to the venture-all-no-matter-what-happens extent. His father was a publisher of directories—Boyd's directories being well known at one time in New York and suburban cities. When William was thru college his father wanted him to enter the publishing business, which William did with apparent feel most unconsciously big and important. You've often read the expression in the papers "epoch-making." I felt like that.

Marie's history isn't history at all. It is pure fantasy. It began sixteen years ago—she was four years old then, when she entered a convent situated in the paradoxical environment of Hollywood. For twelve years her life was colored by its dim, religious light and then she left it, but with the resolve to return within the year and become a nun!

Dame Fate is a great humorist; and poor Faith is too often her butt. She guided Marie to the office of the Rolin studio, introduced her to Hal Roach, and then, with an expectant grin, sat back to enjoy her handiwork.

Her anticipations were not in vain. Marie started as a stenographer in the studio office with no intention or desire to establish a closer connection with the screen; but the date she had set for her return to the convent found her playing the "vamp," her first rôle, in "Lonesome Luke," one of Harold Lloyd's dim beginnings!

"I didn't care for it particularly at first," she confessed. "I went right back to my shorthand and stenography and probably would have been there today but for Mr. Roach. I owe everything to him."

The father of Marie Mosquini came from Milan, and her mother from Bordeaux. Nevertheless, Marie is a typical American girl with the languor of the South in her veins

MARIE MOSQUINI was a terrible mistake. I thought, when I heard it, of jazz bands and popping corks, of Jersey lightning and New Jersey mosquitos, of snapping, black eyes and daintily embossed profanity, of hysteric hands and a gay, seductive accent—and I hastened to the interview.

Marie should have been Priscilla, and a puritan. But, alas, her mother came from Bordeaux and her father from Milan; and so you must be content with Marie, and the fact that she almost became a nun—but not quite.

Don't let me prejudice you. She is charmingly gentle, and hers is not the innocence that betokens ignorance nor the virtue that suggests smugness. Watching her on the screen, where she breaks "Snub" Pollard's heart with merciless regularity, you'd never suspect a want of sophistication.

But if only I had been a cynic!

I should have taken that name, Marie Mosquini; toyed with it—politely, of course; woven a delicate satire about it and about the fresh simplicity of the girl who bore it; dissected it, giving each detail its measure of sweetened irony; and finally I should have solemnly declared it, and the girl, quite impossible.

But—I say it with a sigh—I am not a cynic; and I sat thru an entire noon hour of a hot August day humbly grateful that it was I who was giving Marie her first interview. She didn't quite know what to do with me, nor yet just what to say. But she managed to make me

I had been absorbing the details of her dressing-room, our council chamber on the upper floor of the new Rolin studio. Two Kewpie dolls in saucy dress and a group of holy pictures, side by side . . . Robert Service and Maxfield Parrish . . . blue cretonne and a riding crop . . . a framed quotation from Omar beside a portrait of Harold Lloyd . . . Marie is amazing.

I asked that she tell me about herself—and she said she thought I was the ideal type of interviewer!

I got out my notebook and jotted that down.

And because I enjoyed her pink confusion when I asked her a point-blank question, I demanded to know her philosophy of life. I admit it was orthodox.

She looked startled for a moment and her eyes sought counsel of ceiling, walls, and floor.

"Well," she said, "I think that everything that happens is for the best—particularly Bebe Daniels who is my one and only girl friend."

She tendered me Bebe's photograph. A brief inscription testified to the new star's undying fealty.

Marie is of a composite type, with distinct suggestions of Norma Talmadge and Clarine Seymour. Her eyes are particularly interesting; large, and when they are not dreaming, brimful of mirth. But she has not the fire and verve that one might expect from such a parentage as hers. To the casual acquaintance she is an American, with the languor of the South in her veins.

Her ambitions, stirred at last by the recognition which is coming to her, are beginning to awaken. Whether her wholesomeness and sincerity can withstand the temptations of egotism and adulation remains to be seen. I for one do not doubt the outcome. She has been in the studio atmosphere long enough to separate the sheep from the goats, the sycophants from helpful friends.

"Last week I got one hundred fan letters," she said with a naïve pride. "I feel so sorry for those poor, dear people who wrote them, for my name never appears on the screen and they had to address them to the girl who plays opposite 'Snub' Pollard. But I adore them for their trouble!

"Oh dear," she sighed, "these past two days have been wonderful. Last night Harold Lloyd took me for a ride

At the age of four Marie entered a convent where she remained for twelve years, leaving with the certainty that she would return to become a nun. But she is now appearing opposite "Snub" Pollard, and out at the Rolin studios, it is said that in the near future she will enter the realms of stardom instead of dreaming within convent walls

When you cut the cuticle you leave little unprotected places all around the delicate nail root, which becomes sore, rough and ragged.

Soften and remove surplus cuticle without cutting. See what a firm smooth, even edge Cutex gives your cuticle without cutting.

The wrong and the right way to manicure

CUTTING the cuticle is ruinous. When you cut the cuticle you leave little unprotected places all around the tender nail root. These become rough, sore and ragged; they grow unevenly and cause hangnails.

You should soften and remove surplus cuticle without cutting. Just apply a bit of Cutex, the harmless cuticle remover, to the base of your nails, gently pressing back the cuticle.

The moment you use Cutex you realize how exactly it is what you have needed. It does away with all need for cutting, leaves a firm, smooth line at the base of your nails.

First file your nails. Then wrap a bit of cotton around an orange stick (both come in the Cutex package), dip it in Cutex, and work around the base of the nail, gently pushing back the cuticle. Then wash the hands, pressing back the cuticle when drying them.

For snowy white nail tips, apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nails. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish.

To keep the cuticle particularly soft and pliable so that you need not manicure as often, apply a little Cutex Cold Cream at night on retiring.

Regularly, once or twice each week, give your nails a Cutex manicure. You will never again be bothered with coarse, overgrown cuticle or hangnails.

Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream come in 35 cent sizes. The Cuticle Remover comes also in 65 cent size. At all drug and department stores in the United States and Canada and at all chemists' shops in England.

Blustery Winds and the Complexion

WHAT is more invigorating than a walk or drive on a crisp, clear day in early autumn, when sharp winds bring a ruddy color to one's face, and stimulate the joy of living.

But these same keen winds produce other effects. They roughen and chap tender skin,—they catch up little particles of dust and lodge them in the tiny pores of the face, and trouble results. The natural oil of the skin combines with the dust and the complexion becomes blotched, gray-looking, and rough.

Prevent these conditions—help to keep your skin clear healthy and soft, by cleansing it with RESINOL SOAP. Let the pure, refreshing lather sink into the pores and rid them of lurking impurities.

But Resinol Soap is not only for those annoyed by complexion defects. It has been for years a favorite among women for daily use in the toilet and bath.

*Sold by all druggists and at toilet goods counters.

Little rules that help you look your best

Occasionally you meet girls who are beautiful without effort; but most lovely people are lovely because they know the rules. Here are a few simple ones, approved by skin specialists, which every woman would do well to follow.

Never permit your face to look shiny

Powder—Yes. Just enough powder to have that soft, natural look. And when you powder, do it to last.

The only way to make powder stay on is—not to put on an excessive amount—but to begin with the right powder base.

For this you need a cream which will not reappear in an unpleasant shine. Pond's Vanishing Cream does not contain a bit of oil. It disappears at once never to reappear. Before you powder take just a little Pond's Vanishing Cream—a tiny bit—on your finger tips. Rub it lightly into your face. Notice the instant smoothness it gives your skin. Now powder as usual. See how smoothly the powder goes on—how natural it looks. You will find that it will stay on two or three times as long as ever before. You need never again fear a shiny face.

A rough skin a sign of carelessness

To get out even in the milder weather of winter without protecting your skin is simply reckless; for wind and cold whip the moisture out of your skin and cause roughness.

Skin specialists say you can protect your skin from this injury by applying, before you go out, a cream which makes up for the moisture that the wind whips out. For protection, as for a powder base, you need a cream without oil. The same pure, greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream which you use as a base for powder, contains an ingredient famous for years for its softening, protective properties. Always before going out, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream into your face and hands. In this way the delicate texture of the skin will not suffer from exposure.

The bedtime cleansing that brings a clear skin. Never retire without it

One of the chief reasons for a "muddy" look in the skin is the dust that gets lodged deep within the pores.

The only means of keeping the skin clear is to remove deep-seated dust. For this cleansing you need an entirely different cream from the one you use for a powder base, and protection. The right cream for cleansing is one prepared with an oil base. The formula for Pond's Cold Cream was especially worked out to supply just the amount of oil to give it the highest cleansing power. At night rub Pond's Cold Cream into the pores of the face, neck and hands, and wipe it off with a soft cloth. Cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream regularly and you can keep your skin clear.

Catch the little lines before they grow deep

By starting in time you can keep your face free of the wretched little lines that will keep starting. For this too you need a cream with an oil base, a cream that will work into the skin gradually. Pond's Cold Cream has just the smoothness and body required to make a perfect massage cream.

Every normal skin needs both of these two creams. Neither will foster the growth of hair. Get a jar or tube of each cream today at any drug or department store. You will realize for the first time how lovely your skin can be.

Never let your skin look tired

When you are tired, yet must look your best, you can bring your skin new freshness by applying a cream that is instantly absorbed by the weary skin. The instantly disappearing qualities of Pond's Vanishing Cream give it a remarkable effectiveness in bringing immediate freshness to your skin. Just a hit of it rubbed into the skin relieves in a moment the strained look around mouth and eyes and brings new transparency to your complexion.

The Branded Woman

calling easily into step beside her. He still was dapper, a slim furtive fellow whose yellow-stained fingers shook as they fumbled with the eternal cigaret. "But since you ask it, I want—what everybody wants—money. I'm a merchant. I've got wares to sell that I think you'll buy. How much will you give me if I dont tell your fine new husband whose daughter you are, and what sort of place Whitlock took you out of?"

The bluntness of it was like a blow. She staggered, then rallied. "You wouldn't dare!" she flashed, "Burke Whitlock would—"

"Pooh!" he flipped the ashes contemptuously from his cigaret, flipped Whitlock out of existence, "that old has-been!"

"My husband," she said proudly, "would kill you! There is nothing you can tell him unless you lie!"

"Still," Craft said smoothly, "the truth has a shady sound—eh? And I've got a flash-light of you in that dress you wore—Dot always had 'em flashed. Came in bandy sometimes. What d'you say?"

In the end, she gave in to him. She gave him money, took it to his rooms in the shabby Latin Quarter. Of course, she got nothing. More demands. Pleading, and always, at last, in terror for her happiness, yielding. When she brought him the money from the sale of her pearls—her guardian's wedding present—she told him dully that she could do no more. "This is chicken feed!" Craft sneered. His tone grew ugly. "If you cant do better maybe your husband will!"

Burke Whitlock, nodding over a two week's old New York paper, had a sudden hunch. He had had them before in his career—hadn't he guessed when the meddlesome reform gang were going to raid Joe's? And when the D.A. was going to demand something? He put on his hat and left his hotel, calling a taxi with horrible mutilation of the French language. At the corner of a boulevard some distance from Ruth's flat, the light of a street lamp fell a moment on the face of a man hurrying along the pavement. Whitlock muttered an oath. "If that wasn't 'Velvet' Craft I'm a damned mouseer!" he muttered, "looked mad too! Something's happened. Damn it, garson! Gettez vous a move on! Veete!"

He was panting from the three flights when he flung open the door of the Courtenay flat and stepped into the charming little green-and-silver drawing-room. Douglas Courtenay, standing by the mantel, head on clinched hands turned at the sound, a white, drawn young face. "Hullo!" he said flatly, "you're—you're a bit late for the show!" and he laughed unpleasantly.

"Show!" snarled Whitlock. His heavy lips drew back over his great square teeth. Once more he was the fighting animal. "What d'you mean, show? Where's Ruth? What's happened?"

"Ruth is in—her room," the younger man said with a distinct effort to speak quietly. "We have had a visitor. When he left—she said she was tired and was going to bed."

"It was Craft then!" Whitlock burst out violently. "I had a hunch! But I didn't have it in time. What did he tell you?"

"Everything," said Douglas levelly. "I imagine you know it already. Dont you? About Ruth's mother? And—where you found her?"

Old Whitlock brought his fist jarring down on a fragile French table that gave out a splintering sound. "Yes! I know that you find the whitest lilies in the dirtiest swamps!" he roared. "That's what I found—a white lily! If he said anything else he lied!"

A flash of hope lightened the heaviness of his look a moment, then died. "But she's paid him money—regularly. She admits it. And she's been to his rooms with it—"

The two men stared at one another. Whitlock took a step forward, shaking a great, freckled fist in Courtenay's face. "I knowed it! I knowed you warn't a man enough to stand up for her! You've lived with her goin' on two years and still you dont know she's the Real Thing! You believe the first blackmailing scalawag that comes along trying to dirty her name. Say! You'd ought to be beaten and I've a good mind—"

"I've been a fool!" Douglas admitted. He passed a hand over his haggard face, "but it was like a bolt out of the sky. I never dreamed—you can see it might have been a shock! And then she was so quiet about it all—if she'd only screamed, only cried, but she just stood still and looked from one to the other—"

"She's a thoro'bred!" the old man said proudly. "She wouldn't scream if you killed her. Dot Belmar's daughter? Well, the woman said she had proofs, but I'm not so sure. I've got detectives working on it now. I never knowed a ragweed to bear a rose myself."

"I've been a fool," Ruth's husband said again, gladly. He went to the door leading into the bedroom, opened it, and gave an exclamation. "Ruth! Where are you? Ruth darling!" Suddenly he sprang into the inner room. There was the sound of overturned furniture. Slowly he appeared again in the doorway. "Gone! She's left a note—says she'll never see baby or me again to—bring shame to us—"

He staggered and old Boss Whitlock caught him and held him while the awful sounds of a man's difficult sobbing filled the room.

A month later the two men, with a French nurse carrying the baby, stood on the forward deck of a steamer as it nosed its way up the familiar, crowded harbor to its Hoboken berth. The faces of both were cut with fresh lines of sleeplessness and worry, but Whitlock's tone was aggressively cheery as tho by denying fear he could avert the need for it. "We're on the same side of the water as Ruth, anyhow," he said, "on'y she got the boat ahead. There's no doubt about that, me boy! She's been here a matter o' ten days. What can happen to her in ten days?"

"What cant happen?" groaned Courtenay, leaning heavily on the rail. "A lovely thing like her—alone—frightened! God! And Craft was on the same boat—in the steerage. I dont dare to think—"

"Then quit thinking!" the old politician snapped, "we wont get anywhere by thinking. It's action we need. First off I'm going to see whether they've forgotten Boss Whitlock, and if not, we'll have the whole police force and half the town besides looking for her!"

Boss Whitlock was not forgotten. As he had boasted, the whole machinery of the city was set in motion to seek Ruth Courtenay, but for a whole month the search was unresultful. Douglas Courtenay paced his hotel room haggardly, old Whitlock beside him uttering bluff words of encouragement.

"She's not here—she's nowhere," the husband groaned. "The world's so big and she was so little. Besides—perhaps—she isn't in the world."

But Whitlock would not listen to that. "She's no quitter," he said stanchly, "we'll be finding her soon. I got a hunch."

Two days later a detective brought them word that a woman answering to the description was seen to enter a chop-sney joint on the lower East Side, but when he had followed her into the place she was nowhere to be found and the blank-eyed proprietor denied all knowledge of her. "The restaurant's a blind," the man told them yawning, "I got a tip a South American named Alvarez hangs out there and recruits girls for Brazil. Maybe we'd better raid the joint."

The few shabby patrons eating at the oilcloth-covered tables of Ah Sing's looked up apathetically as the group entered, then resumed their eating of the slimy chow main. The plain clothes men and Whitlock pushed by the chattering waiter into the murky regions of the kitchen, but Courtenay did not follow. The mirror over the fly-specked cigar case had shown him a sleek, rat-colored head that he knew. In six strides he was standing, looking down into the paling face of "Velvet" Craft.

"Where is she?" he said tensely. His hand lay on the table, quivering. There was murder in the steel-blue blaze of his eyes. "Dont deny that you know. Show me the way to get to her or I'll choke the life out of you here and now!"

The man actually squealed with terror. He scrambled out of his chair and led the way to the hall, and up the dirty stairs into a region of tangled passageways. At the end of one he stopped, crouching against the wall. "I haven't done her no

“Furious,” we interrupted. “It's 4:06. Two more blocks and you'll be at the Pennsylvania station.”

“After that I worked at Thanhouser, World Film and now I'm making a series of pictures for Arrow.—You must see them?—I'm going to California to do several— Promise you'll see them?”

“Yes,” we said rashly. “It's 4:08 and there's your station.”

(Business of exiting rapidly from taxi and settling with driver who, naturally, has no change.)

At the train gate, Miss Ostriche remarked to our gasping self. “Thanks awfully— Hope you've got enough material.”

We struggled for self-possession. “Don't lose that package, whatever you do,” we begged.

The gate closed upon our interviewee. We turned and staggered into the station drug store.

“One Bron—er—one chocolate soda,” said we hoarsely. From sheer force of habit we looked at our watch. It was 4:10. “You'll make it,” we mumbled to the co—soda clerk.

“I am,” said he, laconic-like.

That Swede from Ystad

Miss Nilsson smiled. A flashing smile it is, for she is dazzlingly blonde, something the motion picture camera does not always reveal.

Miss Nilsson has just finished William Locke's “Idols” under Raoul Walsh's direction. Before that, she was in Allan Dwan's “In the Heart of a Fool.” And “The Fighting Chance” preceded “In the Heart of a Fool.” A company all her own is in the offing. “I hope to make my own pictures, like all the rest,” she says. “But I never count on things until they happen.”

Miss Nilsson indulges in no superlatives about herself. She is not one of those players who comment loftily upon art. Indeed, we detect a sense of humor. And a regular human being-ness.

Which is something of a combination, coupled with the Nilsson blonde charm.

Ystad surely has a right to be rather proud.

and thee lions . . ." It is impossible to reproduce her accent in print. She has been speaking English for something over two years. Not a very long time, but she speaks it exceedingly well, only stressing her syllables evenly as one would in French and being noticeably careful about her diphthongs. And again she said:

"I do not like your Rocky Mountains. They are beautiful, yes; but so bleak and lonely! After you have been traveling thru them for two or three days you want to cry. But it is not so of the mountains in Switzerland. They are grand and majestic and they are not so lonely. There are villages around them and people and green things growing . . . Oh! I love Switzerland! I go there as much as possible. My mother is there, too; it is my home."

Flora Revalles was born in Switzerland of French parents. So far as she knows, no member of her family has ever been in any way connected with the stage. On the contrary, her mother was very much opposed to an artistic career for her. Her father was a well-known civil engineer. She had two brothers, the only one is living.

"I sang from the time I was a little girl," she said. "Even then, my music was my life. And I would want people to listen; that is much, thee audience! So I wanted to sing grand opera on the stage."

Remember that back of all this was the indomitable spirit of her father and her consciousness of him, laying tracks for civilization in African jungles, surrounded by an alien people, wild beasts and the ever-present danger of some strange disease. She paused for an instant, frankly waiting for me to say something.

"And then?" I prompted.

"And then," she went on, "I went to Paris. It was for my brother; to visit him, you know. I decided to enter the Conservatoire. I knew that if I could do that, my mother would not oppose me any longer. She would realize that it meant the promise of a good career. So I went to a teacher and told him to coach me for the examinations. But to enter the Paris Conservatoire is not an easy thing. There were more than a hundred of us who took the examinations and only fifteen were chosen." Because she was among the fifteen, her mother withdrew all objections to the artistic career.

"I think that, in France, one works harder preparing for the stage than in this country," she went on. And then, skipping the intervening period, "I still had one year to study when the war broke out in 1914, the Conservatoire closed, and I returned to Switzerland." For a while it seemed that all thought of a career must be laid aside until the world was at peace again, but she kept on with her singing. She could hardly have done anything else; it had become a part of her life.

"One day I was singing at a friend's house in Geneva. The manager of the

The Man Who Wouldn't Stay Down

He was putting in long hours at monotonous unskilled work. His small pay scarcely lasted from one week to the next. Pleasures were few and far between and he couldn't save a cent.

He was down—but he wouldn't stay there! He saw other men promoted, and he made up his mind that what they could do he could do. Then he found the reason they were promoted was because they had special training—an expert knowledge of some one line. So he made up his mind that he would get that kind of training.

He marked and mailed to Scranton a coupon like the one below. That was his first step upward. It brought him just the information he was looking for. He found he could get the training he needed right at home in the hours after supper. From that time on he spent part of his spare time studying.

The first reward was not long in coming—an increase in salary. Then came another. Then he was made Foreman. Now he is Superintendent with an income that means independence and all the comforts and pleasures that make life worth living.

It just shows what a man with ambition can do. And this man is only one out of hundreds of thousands who have climbed the same steps to success with the help of the International Correspondence Schools.

What about you?

Are you satisfied merely to hang on where you are or would you, too, like to have a real job and real money? It's entirely up to you. You don't have to stay down. You can climb to the position you want in the work you like best. Yes, you can! The I. C. S. is ready and anxious to come to you, wherever you are, with the very help you need.

Surely when you have an opportunity that means so much, you can't afford to let another priceless hour pass without at least finding out about it. And the way to do that is easy—without cost, without obligating yourself in any way, mark and mail this coupon.

opera was a guest there. He heard me and offered me an engagement. I told him, 'but I have no repertoire.' In Paris one learns to sing first, then one gets a repertoire. So he gave me eight days to learn the rôle of Marguerite in 'Faust.'

She had never even sung with an orchestra and they could not give her a single rehearsal. But when the opening night came she sang Marguerite, and so brilliantly that she was given a contract which she afterwards broke to join the Russian Ballet.

"Mr. Leon Bakst gave me two days to decide about joining the ballet. I accepted at once and thought a little about it afterwards. Of course, it meant a law-suit for me. I had to pay the director of the opera in Geneva some few francs, but that was all right."

She feels that the art of the ballet is the highest, most perfect art of all.

She appeared with the Russian Ballet in London and Paris and came with it to New York on a tour of this country. From the pantomime of the ballet to the making of a moving picture was but a step and a step she was certain to take. She appeared as Messaline in the Maurice Tourneur production "Woman."

"That," she remarked, laughing, "was because M. Tourneur said that he did not know any other woman wicked enough for the part; which was . . . perhaps? . . . a compliment . . ." She has a French woman's ability to say slightly startling things so that you feel they are without meaning.

"I have heard that people are often disappointed on seeing themselves for the first time on the screen. Now I . . . I was surprised that I should look so well. I did not know that I was so . . . what would you say?"

"Beautiful?"

"Yes, that is it," her voice was throaty with amusement. There is, of course, nothing of the ingénue about her.

"But then I am not petite nor blonde," she remarked, implying that she could easily play the ingénue if she thought that it would be becoming; and undoubtedly she could!

She walks with a peculiar lithe grace and her hands are beautiful and expressive beyond description. The occult has a very powerful attraction for her, but she has never had any personal experience in spiritualism.

"But I believe in the existence of the spirit after what one calls death and in the possibility of communication. It is just a conviction I have . . . something I cannot explain . . ." She is also a believer in the theory of reincarnation.

"So, it is verve interesting; this moving picture 'Earthbound,' but when it is finished, I shall not appear in another moving picture right away; I shall go. I think to London and take up my work again."

She walked with me to the door. It was a warm . . . an almost oppressively warm . . . night in late December. There are comparatively few lights around this hotel in the hills . . . Beverly Hills is acting of the year, and what was the result, so far as Forman could see? One fan who by some chance had not forgotten him, wrote, "Oh, you mustn't take parts like that, showing your face all scarred and ugly."

Later on, when he did a couple of pretty-boy parts, ("which, heaven knows, I've outgrown," says Tom), several new fans wrote him and said, "There, that's the kind of part we like to see you take."

Is it strange, then, that Forman was filled with a disgust at pictures? A disgust which was nothing more nor less than a natural revulsion after all he had gone thru; to come down to playing pastel movie men who had nothing more difficult to do than to look handsome and stride from room to room to win back his fickle following.

It seemed unendurable discouraging, but the salary was attractive and better than could be made in anything else.

And then Mr. Lasky came to the rescue with an offer for him to direct, and Tom Forman is bringing all the patience and big, wonderful manhood that came to him out there in the training camp to the building of pictures, and he is happily working in a comfortable brown sack suit, and he doesn't wear silk shirts all the time and he isn't worrying if his nice, rather wavy light hair isn't brushed sleekly from his temples, for he is again useful, again giving orders.

When you first meet Tom Forman and hear his slow drawl, you are apt to think he possesses that Texas laziness, but as you know him better you realize that this is but a facial calm, a surface lethargy.

He wants to make good pictures, pictures that are logical and feature human types; he doesn't want any sex stuff and he doesn't object to melodrama, providing it is honest melodrama. He is bringing to the screen a certain wholesomeness, a big viewpoint, an easy-going-get-there method that has something in it of nature's slow but sure method of creating, and his one great, absorbing ambition is to hunt tiger in Siberia, and, when he is old, to retire to his ranch some thirty miles from Hollywood.

He loves hunting and fishing, dogs and babies, and he says he would like nothing better than to dream away his life by a trout stream, and somehow, I can see a vision of Tom Forman, when he is old, sitting by an open fireplace in his ranch-house, with his arms full of grandbabies and his old dogs snuggling at his feet, and I can hear him drawl out the story of how he made men for the great war and there will never be a mention of "When I was a great screen actor."

For Forman is, first of all, a wholesome man who discounts momentary compliments and completely lacks a swelled head.

Above everything else, Tom Forman is a comfortable man, and we may expect real stuff to come from his direction in pictures, the same as it did in the great war.

"I dont mean intelligence," he said, "I mean human intellectuality, possessing which the artist becomes more human than the ordinary mortal; not more tempestuous (temper-estuous)."

He has been here six years, having immigrated as a scientific agriculturist, but because of his ignorance of the language, he was forced to work at what did not require a vocabulary. He was lonesome when he first came. He did not know anyone. He would go from restaurant to restaurant, finally becoming acquainted with two Austrians who spoke Italian. They met every night; and he was introduced to their fair companions; and he wished he knew how to dance. One day they went for a holiday to the Bronx Zoo. Outside the monkey house, one of the officers started to tango. Young Rudolph was fascinated, and begged to learn the steps. He was given an immediate lesson, and that evening, back in the café, on the floor Bonnie Glass (Ben Ali Haggin's wife) spied him, and wanted him for her professional dancing partner.

For two years he went hungry (it is his word) for someone with whom he could talk, until one night, while performing in Philadelphia, with Joan Sawyer, he met after the party, John Fox, Jr. They talked—until 5 A.M. Mr. Fox asked Valentino his age. When he learnt it was only twenty-two he was astounded! He sent "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come" to the boy-foreigner and autographed the preface with "If you use your head as well as your feet, you soon will not have to use your feet." And Valentino never forgot!

He must have used his feet well, for Nijinsky asked him to give him a lesson in the tango—this from the premier danseur of the Bohm-Diaghileff Russian Ballet!

You'll see him dance the tango in "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse" in which Metro production he was allotted no less a rôle than Julio.

"I did not want to be labeled a professional dancer. That is why I gave it up. I was not a dancer, anyway. Nijinsky is a dancer. In what I was doing I had nothing to express."

Altho he has made extraordinary progress, having played opposite Mae Murray, Dorothy Gish, Carmel Myers, Madame Namara and with Eugene O'Brien, he does not want to stay here forever; nor does he desire to settle back home. His longing is to go to South America, China, Japan, Egypt and India, and to get to know those places.

Those who impress him most on the screen are Barrymore, Ferguson, Talmadge, and Nazimova.

He is anxious to meet Ibañez and hear the author's opinion of his interpretation of "The Four Horsemen's" hero. "I was never so happy over any part before. I love it." Not a libertine, not a coward: just a boy with failings, hopes, humanness.

It had felt good to be all washed clean of sin and to be able to pray—but Huck couldn't tell on Old Jim no matter how sure it would make him of going to Heaven.

So he tore up the note and swore he would never reform again. He would steal Jim out of slavery, he would—and if he could think up anything worse, he'd do that too. As long as he was going to hell anyway, he might as well make it worth while.

FREE—REX BEACH

5 Volumes

Rex Beach is the most popular writer of thrilling stories living today. He is the man who knows, as no other, the outdoors that is the Klondike.

Plenty of humor—plenty of scrapping—big, raw-boned men who can whip their weight in wildcats—the woman these men fight for and die for—all these you will find in Rex Beach's vivid, human novels.

Only a Few Sets FREE

(COUPON)

Rex Beach now costs you $2 for each volume in the book store. But we have made a small special edition. As long as this small special edition lasts, you can have 5 volumes—about $10 worth of books—absolutely free.

Rex Beach has sacrificed much of his royalty so that we can do this on one edition.

If you are prompt you can get your set free. If you are too late we will return the coupon—but don't wait.

Send coupon for both sets for examination.

The Rise of Beatrice

It was her first taste of "real direction."

Her shyness stood her in good stead when she was seeking for something else. It was with more of a forlorn hope than aught else that she went to see Mr. Ince. When after a two hours' wait she finally reached the lair of the great man, she found that there were five other great men there too, all of whom began to stare at her intensely.

"It was perfectly awful," declare—er—confided Beatrice, rather breathless at the remembrance. "I just begged them not to look at me, and finally Mr. Ince made them all face the wall while he talked to me. Once Douglas MacLean, who was one of the five, turned around and hissed: 'Just the girl for me,' or something like that. I didn't hear him. They told me afterward that I was busy untagling my fingers just then.

"There are only two things I remember clearly. One is Mr. Ince's constantly repeated question, 'But why didn't you come to see me before?' It seems to me that that was all he said.

"The other is the question of Douglas MacLean. After they had all filed solemnly out to decide whether they wanted me or not and then filed back again, he came over beside me and said, 'We want you. May I look at you now?'

"I answered: 'I guess so; but look quick!'"

She sighed. "I don't guess I can tell you any more," she said softly.

I was loath to go. I hadn't decided her in my mind yet. It seemed to me that she was unique in a profession where sophistication has become a dogma. I was fascinated.

I loitered, and in loitering discovered that for seven years she had studied under Madame Rasche, ballerina of the Metropolitan Opera House . . . the secret of her undulant grace.

I had to go, but I went lingeringly. A great artist . . . a little girl . . . ? The question recurred in my mind thruout the day; and the phrase "soft eyes and a sigh."

COMPENSATION

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

When I was twenty I felt, oh, so old,
Each passing pleasure found me more blasé;

Life was as tasteless as a tale oft told,
And there was nothing new to do or say.

Now I am forty, I feel, oh, so young,
Each day I find amusing things to do,
And life seems like a fragrant garland flung
For me to savor each fresh scent and hue.

I wouldn't be as old as youth again
If time consented to turn back the years;

I want to stay as young as age, and drain
Life's utmost treasure, even unto tears!

$18²⁵ Per Year

Serves Quaker Oats each morning to a family of five Quaker Oats, the food of foods, costs one cent per large dish. The price of one chop serves 12 dishes.

Five dishes daily cost $18.25 a year, while just five eggs a day would cost you $82.

Quaker Oats supplies 1,810 calories of nutriment per pound. That's the energy measure of food value. Round steak yields less than half that.

A boy needs 2,000 calories per day. They would cost 13c in Quaker Oats, in eggs about $1.30.

These costs mean little in a day. But note what they mean on a year of breakfasts for a family of five.

Cost per year for serving five, based on this year's average prices

1 chop each, per day, $219

Average meats, $146

2 eggs each, per day, $164

Average fish, $146

$125 Saved

Quaker Oats breakfasts, compared with these other desirable breakfasts, save at least $125 per year.

The Quaker Oats forms the supreme food, almost the ideal food, the greatest food that grows.

It is rich in elements growing children need. As vim-food it has age-old fame. The best food you can serve in mornings is a dish of Quaker Oats.

Serve other foods at other meals. People need variety. But use this one-cent breakfast dish to cut the average cost.

Extra-flavory flakes

This brand is flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. The delightful flavor has won millions the world over. It is due to yourself that you get it, for it costs no extra price.

Acts in five ways

Pepsodent multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay.

Two factors directly attack the film. One of them keeps teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily adhere. Pepsin is another ingredient.

The object is to combat film daily, also its baneful effects. And to multiply the natural tooth protectors.

You'll see and feel

You'll see and feel these good effects and quickly know that Pepsodent is doing what nothing else has done.

Send the coupon for the 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears. Let the clear results show what this method means to you and yours.

Keep the Luster

on your teeth—there's now a way

All statements approved by authorities

You know how teeth shine — how clean they feel—after vigorous dental cleaning. He removes the film which makes teeth dingy.

There is now a way to every day combat that film. Millions enjoy its benefits. And a ten-day test will be sent you for the asking.

The film does this:

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The tooth brush used in old ways leaves much of it intact. And millions of teeth are wrecked by it.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Germs breed by millions in it. And they, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

You must combat it

To save teeth and to keep them white one must combat that film. Dental science has for years been seeking ways to do it.

Now efficient methods have been found. Careful tests have proved them beyond question. And leading dentists everywhere are urging their daily use.

The methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And desired results are now attained twice daily by its use.

Millions of teeth now glisten

Millions already use Pepsodent, largely by dental advice. The results are seen everywhere in cleaner, whiter teeth. See them on your own teeth and judge their good effects. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget.

The Final Touch

The River Shannon's Namesake

has signed her up for his forthcoming feature, in which she plays a married flirt.

"And when my pictures hit New York --oh, goodie!" She drew a deep, ecstatic breath. "I want the people who knew me to say, 'Well, maybe after all she will make good!' People were so skeptical!" she ended plaintively.

Sometimes, she admits, she gets horribly lonesome for the "Follies," the grease-paint, the gorgeous costumes and the chatter of the girls. Novelists, she confided, have the wrong idea of "chorus girls." They picture "stage-door Johnnies" forever hanging about, sending notes and flowers—oh, there were lots of flowers sent, she added, but no notes; that was an iron-clad rule set by Ziegfeld himself. If your admirer wanted to get into communication with you, he had to write a letter and trust it to Uncle Sam.

"Mr. Ziegfeld hates the movies because they take so many of his girls away," she went on. "Once, when I knew some picture people from California were out in front, I begged him to let me lead the feature song that evening so that they would notice me."

"Notice you and steal you for the movies, eh? he had demanded, and, refused point-blank to allow such a thing.

Shannon looks like a great many different people; certain of her pictures look more like Mabel Normand than Mabel's own photographs do; her profile is like Mae Murray's and some of her expressions remind one of Jack Pickford. This Protean resemblance is excellent for publicity purposes, but Shannon doesn't like it.

"I want to reach the point where I will look just myself, and nobody else," she declared. Anyone would be sympathetic with Shannon. There is a naïveté about her that is captivating and disarming. It may be real or it may be cultivated. Who cares?

Of course, Shannon has lots of hobbies—she rides horseback, and admits a fondness for historical romances. And as for dancing—

"I keep in practice all the time. I don't ever expect to go on the stage again, but I might need the work in pictures, and besides, it's wonderful for the physique.

"In the 'Follies' I did lots of specialty dances and, in one of them, I was tossed about the stage like a bean-bag. When I came out here, 'Fatty' Arbuckle sent for me, saying I was the kind of girl he'd like to have play opposite him in comedies, because he could do anything with me—but I wouldn't take a chance—would you?"

I assured her most emphatically that I would—not! And after carefully surveying Shannon Day's petite prettiness, I was heartily glad that the rotund Roscoe had not made a bean-bag of her. I'm afraid that the river Shannon would have lost its namesake.

to quit. I'm not an especially good actor; what's the use of my going on when it looks as tho the best I can do is forty a week? I think it would be much better for me to drop it all and go to Congress."

"Why dont you drop it all and go to the White House?" Neill asked, sarcastically. "It would be about as easy."

But his roommate was in earnest.

"No," he said, seriously, "I'm going to Congress!"

And he did! He left the company and went to San Francisco, where, with his brothers, he opened a hat store. Afterwards, he became an attorney, was sent to the legislature a few times, and then went to Congress from an Irish district because the leaders of that district had a row between themselves.

And again, Neill, on his first visit to the coast, was with the "Held by the Enemy" company which included in its cast such famous people as Henry Miller, Viola Allen, William Gillette, and then MacDowell and George Fawcett.

However, it was not until Neill had completely served his apprenticeship and was the successful manager of his own company that he met Edythe Chapman.

The Neill Company was playing St. Paul when the engagement of Henrietta Crosman, as leading lady, terminated, and it became necessary to replace her with someone else.

"I was sent to Mr. Neill by an agency," said Edythe Chapman. "This was in 1897," she went on, "and I have never had to look for an engagement since."

Unlike her husband, Edythe Chapman was given a leading part in her first engagement, and has never played anything else.

"Until," she said, "we both grew too old for leading parts. Having our own company, we were able to be always together."

Many players, now famous, were at different times members of the Neill Company. Elsie Janis spoke her first lines from their stage. Henrietta Crosman has already been mentioned as being with the company in its early days. Julia Arthur, Blanche Bates, Julia Dean, and Reginald Barker are others.

"I had very few 'early struggles,'" Edythe Chapman went on, "and those I had were all in getting started."

She attended The Lyceum School of Acting. Franklin H. Sargent was the head then, as now. Henry C. de Mille, famous playwright, and father of C. B. and William de Mille, David Belasco and Nelson Wheatcroft were members of the faculty. At that time Belasco was a teacher in the school at a very small salary.

"At the end of my first year," said Miss Chapman, "I found myself without money, and, worse, it seemed without any encouragement to continue. Franklin Sargent advised me not to go on. He said that he did not think I had talent enough to ever do anything worth while in the theater. But I was to be given some encouragement after all. David Belasco asked me if I intended coming back the following year. I said that I couldn't. My money had given out and I had no talent, anyhow.

"But you have talent," he told me. "I'm so sure of it that, if I sell the play I'm writing, I'll see you thru and you can pay me when you are a leading lady."

The play was "The Charity Ball," on which he was collaborating with Henry C. de Mille. Needless to say, he sold it, but an unexpected stroke of good fortune for "Edy," as her friends call her, made it unnecessary for her to accept his offer. A distant relative died and left her six hundred dollars. So, she went back to the school and, graduating second best in her class, played the part of Clytemnestra in Sophocles' "Electra." This was followed by her first professional engagement, which was for the leading part in "The Charity Ball."

The Neill home is a sort of Mecca for the entire profession. They live very simply in a pretty bungalow of their own in Glendale. Their lot is 100 feet wide by 175 feet deep, and on it they grow oranges, lemons, grapefruit and even dates. Like nearly every one else in Glendale, a suburb where no one is either rich or poor, they have an automobile, but they do not keep any servants, and one glance at their faces would be enough to tell you of their contentment.

It is said that only one marriage out of twenty is really happy. If this is so, then the Neills have made the twentieth marriage.

Since coming to the screen the Neills have made a number of pictures together. James Neill was with Famous Players-Lasky for five and a half years, starting with them in the second picture ever made by that company. His first picture was made for Universal, and from there he went to Kalem, where he directed Carlyle Blackwell for a while. It was some time before Edythe Chapman decided to go on the screen, and then she did not sign any contract until she and her husband both joined Goldwyn, where they are at this writing.

Dorothy Makes Her Bow

gether, they appeared in three different places in one evening, something quite unheard of on the stage. Dancing at ten o'clock in one place, at half-past ten in another production, and at midnight appearing on the Century Roof, where by the way, Florenz Ziegfield had previously managed Miss Dickson, advertising her as "the greatest dancing personality in the world."

She has only been on the stage for three years. Previous to that, she lived the usual popular debutante's life in Chicago. Her father, just before she was to have had her coming-out party, made some unfortunate investments in stocks, and Dorothy awoke one day to find that when she wanted anything, she could not have it. Nothing daunted, she determined to make her own money and this is the way she went about it. She and Carl Hyson, a boyhood friend who was in college at the time, had danced together very often at parties, and had always caused great enthusiasm and admiration because of their skill. One night they decided to take up a bet made by some friends of theirs concerning a dancing prize at Rector's. It happened that on this particular evening, they had as their competitors, Maurice and Walton, (the famous dancing pair known all over the world), and two other professional couples who had become household names in Chicago because of their dancing ability. All of Dorothy's friends were present and there was much excitement when she and Carl started to dance. They received an ovation at the conclusion which caused the manager of the place to offer them a contract; and Dorothy accepted.

It was while Dorothy and Carl were still dancing at Rector's (which they did for about six months after the above happened) that Florenz Ziegfield, the well-known connoisseur on feminine beauty happened to be in Chicago and while at Rector's one evening saw Dorothy dance. He immediately offered her a contract, and brought her to New York where he starred her in a play at the Century Theater. She made a tremendous success in New York, and from then on has appeared with increasing popularity in various Broadway successes. This season she has been featured in "Lassie," one of the most popular plays on the rialto, and has just left that company for a well-earned vacation before starting work with Famous Players.

"I know what a tremendous risk I am taking," she said, apropos of its being her first venture in pictures, "but even if I do fail, I will at least have assured myself that I took the chance. I realize what a huge task I have set myself to do; very few people know anything about me outside of the big cities, and it is the movie fan that makes the movie star, I think. But perhaps if this picture turns out to my credit, there will be a few people who will see it, and I hope to build up my

After a "Danderine" massage, your hair takes on new life, lustre and wondrous beauty, appearing twice as heavy and plentiful. Each hair seems to fluff and thicken at once.

Danderine is "Beauty-Tonic"

Don't let your hair stay colorless, plain, scraggly, neglected. You, too, want lots of long, strong hair, radiant with life, and glistening with beauty.

A 35-cent bottle of delightful "Danderine" freshens your scalp, checks dandruff and falling hair. This stimulating "beauty-tonic" gives to thin, dull, fading hair that youthful brightness and abundant thickness—All Drug Counters!

by "The ANSWER MAN"

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

THELMA F.—Greetings! How are you this nice fresh, snappy morning? Thank you. You think I am a darling, and not an old man. Wont you let me be both? Write direct to Bill Hart for his picture.

HENRY C.—The story of "The Sagebrusher" has never been fictionized in the CLASSIC.

WANDA HAWLEY ADMIRER.—Why should they be prohibited? Tsuru Aoki was born in Japan, September 9, 1892. She has been on the stage since she was eight years old. She is five foot one, weighs 120, and has black hair and eyes.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK. FAN.—Did you think I was M. S. Cheatham? Oh! You can reach Ralph Graves at Metro, 1476 Broadway, New York City. The Lee children have been playing in vaudeville all summer in and about New York City. He seems to be drifting.

ROBERT.—Good morning, Boh! Write Grace Cunard, Los Angeles, Cal. Why House Peters is playing in "The Great Redeemer" for Metro.

JUST ME.—Just you! And you want me to tell Harrison Ford that you love him so much. Will you girls never get any sense? You may admire, but not adore. Man's mind is marble, woman's mind is wax; and the one is no better than t'other. Hope you have a bon voyage.

OLIVE B.—Oh, is that so? You think it would be mighty interesting if I married Constance Talmadge. I agree with you absolutely. See if you cant fix it up for me. Dolores Cassinelli is playing in "The Hidden Light." Joe Moore and Eileen Sedgwick are playing in "Love's Battle" to be released by the Climax Film Corp.

H. E. C.—Thanks, old man. Keep the check. Write me any time you feel like it. You sure have some sense of humor.

FITZ & STARTZ.—So you dont agree with me. Isn't that strange! I expect that I am in the small minority with most of my opinions, still I am rather proud of that. The man who fears to take his stand alone, but follows where the greatest number tread should hasten to his rest beneath the stone—the great majority of men are dead. No, not me.

IRENE H.—And why are you so scared of me? I dont bite. Even tho I am caged in my hall room, with iron doors, and my big watch dog along side of me. Oh yes, I have a new dog—a Russian wolfhound, William Conklin in "The Haunted Bedroom." Jack Crosby in "A Daughter of Two Worlds." Come in again. Miss ATLANTA.—Alice Joyce Admirer, H. A. E.; Roscoe; L. Mc; Nellie S.—Your letters were most interesting, but require no separate answers.

THELMA.—Of course it is much cheaper to subscribe; why dont you?

BRODIE.—Mizpah means "The Lord watch between thee and me when we are absent one from the other." Why that was Elmo Lincoln and Enid Markey in "Tarzan of the Apes." Oh, I dont mind working this kind of weather, but when the old thermometer gets up around 98 and 100 degrees—I'm thru!

H. H. H.—Well, there ain't no use. An affinity is a high priced luxury since the cost is alimony. Frank Mayo in "Black Friday." You mean Ethel Shannon in "John Petticoats." Come on.

WANDA HAWLEY.—So you think my answers are snappy. How?

JUST ME.—You here again? And so soon. I certainly do not own an automobile. I had a Ford once, but I got tired of dodging other cars and people on the street and so I sold it. Automobiles kill more people nowadays than all the other nuisances put together. The automobile is the modern Juggernaut. Brownie Vernon in "The Coming of the Law," Harrison Ford in "The Veiled Adventure." Yes, we have the October Magazine with Constance Talmadge's picture on the cover.

SINGER B.—John Barrymore says he is going to remain in pictures. Jack Holt is playing in "The City Sparrow."

RUBY.—You are all wrong about Eugene O'Brien. He is a dandy chap, and I like him. You can reach Mahlon Hamilton at Hampton Studios, Hollywood, Cal.

KITTY.—Good for you. You can reach Violet Mersereau at the Aphorp Hotel, 94th St. & Broadway, New York City. You say you want more of Ruth Roland. So do we. She is too busy to think of us these days. You will have to write a separate letter to the MAGAZINE about those pictures. You should never write to a publisher and take up matters pertaining to several departments in the same letter.

CLEOPATRA.—It was Bernard Palissy, born in Agen, France, 1510, who was the first to rediscover the art of producing white enamel. He was the leader of ceramic art in the 16th century, and his life is characterized as "the great romance" in the history of ceramics. Your letter was indeed interesting, and I hope you write to me again.

MICKEY T.—The Dolly Sisters are still on the stage.

E. L. M.—Thanks for your verse. I wish I could print it.

LUCILLE.—Cullen Landis in "Girl from Outside."

H. G.—You're not the only one. I have sad news to relate also. On May 1st, next I must vacate my hall room which I have now occupied for nearly ten years, and seek new quarters. If the editor-in-chief decides to raise my salary before then, I shall perhaps be able to have a real square room with two windows and a closet. Wont that be grand! May 1st is generally called moving day, but next year the great moving day will be March 4th.

BUGGIE.—Why, there is no reason whatever why a Roman Catholic may not become President of the U. S., altho a Catholic was never nominated for the Presidential Office. Yes, Vivian Martin is married. She is playing in "The Song of the Soul," adapted from the William J. Locke story "An Old World Romance." The picture was edited by Robert W. Chambers. Carol Dempster in "The Love Flower," one of Griffith's poor pictures. Yes, we think Carol is a real comer. She showed a remarkable advance in "The Love Flower," fine human note in fully a half dozen places—a human note that reaches out and plays upon your heart-strings.

"Way Down East," as written by Lottie Blair Parker, was one of those perennially popular stage melodramas. This story of an innocent country girl, Anna Moore, who goes to the city, is wronged by a villainous city chap, becomes a mother after a mock marriage, seeks regeneration in work upon a farm, is exposed by gossips and turned out into a blinding New England blizzard, only to be saved by an honest young country boy who loves her despite everything, was seemingly an obvious thing of the hokum theater. Apparently, it bore no real relation to life anywhere.

We see the "Way Down East" of the stage differently. The old melodrama would not have gone on year after year had it been entirely distinct from reality. Its background of homely New England life gave it the breath of life. With all its painted scenery and torn paper snow it was redolent of the soil. But, most of all, it carried a message. It presented the struggle of woman for equality in its way as vividly, as centuries before, Euripides did in his Medea. To the simple playgoer of the nineties, Anna Moore personified womanhood in its age-old struggle for recognition—against the man-made odds of decades. Not that we consider "Way Down East" for a moment as a thing of literary or dramatic value. It was a melodrama of fearful dialog and even more fearful construction. But a compelling message and a compelling background were there.

The sawdust and the wires become flesh and blood when transferred to the screen under Griffith's hand, the canvas trees and calcium-lights transform to vast sweeps of landscape alive with summer sunshine, the torn paper to a bleak and whirling winter blizzard. "Way Down East" gains vastly upon its transfer from stage to film form, for the director endows his characters with a humanness they never possessed behind the footlights.

Griffith has taken his motion picture camera into the history of the persecuted Anna. The Parker opus started upon the arrival of the girl with her "past" at the Bartlett farm. Griffith moves back into Anna's girlhood and, step by step, shows her dazzled and destroying dip into the city and her disillusionment, along with the coming of her baby and its death. This portion of the cinema "Way Down East" to us is turgid and rather uninteresting, which seems to prove our theory that the stage "Way Down East" owes its success to its homely rural background and the vitalness of its indirect—and even claptrap—feministic single standard argument.

Once Griffith definitely reaches the countryside in this feminine "Pilgrim's Progress" his drama becomes alive with vigor. All the sweetness and fragrance

Every Woman's Depilatory

Removes Hair
Immediately—safely

BY actual test genuine DeMiracle is the safest and surest. When you use it you are not experimenting with a new and untried depilatory, because it has been in use for over 20 years, and is the only depilatory that has ever been endorsed by Physicians, Surgeons, Dermatologists, Medical Journals and Prominent Magazines.

DeMiracle is the most cleanly, because there is no mussy mixture to apply or wash off. You simply wet the hair with this nice DeMiracle sanitary liquid and it is gone. DeMiracle alone devitalizes hair, which is the only common-sense way to remove it from face, neck, arms, underarms or limbs.

ful letters," those fifty pairs of limpid, inquiring eyes, the flowers on his desk—no, he didn't do—they didn't do— It was just as well— He would tell Homer Johns about it that evening and then carry out his original plan of going away. He had resources—the pain at his heart might be a slight deterrent—but he had to figure that in—

At the dance he told Homer Johns of his aunt's true bequest. He hadn't figured wrongly. Old Johns chuckled, said he thought it just as well, altho he would have to hunt around for a school for Elise and offered Austin a $25,000 a year job, which was promptly accepted.

"Run away for a month or two, young man," the older man advised, "before you tackle the new proposition. You look a bit as if you'd been handed a blow beneath the belt."

"I have," Austin said.

It wasn't until later in the evening that Homer Johns discovered the blow beneath the belt to be Elise. Mrs. Rolles gave him, unwittingly, the information. "I hear," she said, "that young Austin Bevans is in love with one of his Charm School pupils. I am so glad. It relieves Susie of his unwelcome attentions."

Johns drew his heavy brows together and smiled. "I've just given him a heavy job," he said, "that's a comer, that young man. I should be tickled to death if his attentions were in the direction of one of my family. He's a comer and he can be trusted. Two noble traits in man."

Mrs. Rolles sought out Susie. She was quite breathless.

"Encourage young Bevans," she said, hastily, "he's a protégé of Homer Johns. That means a fortune. Give it out that you and he have long been engaged. Waste no time—most important—"

Susie gave it, with a nicely unerring instinct, to Elise.

Elise believed it. We always do believe the worst about the one we love, so far beyond our reach does the Desired One appear.

Elise decided to vanish. It was the only thing left for her to do, she decided, with the radical desperation of the very young.

The green earth should swallow her up. Oblivion was kind.

She left a note for Austin graphically describing her intent. Then, like Ibsen's Nora, she "went out into the night"—as far as Austin's car. The low-slung back tempted her. It would be so thrilling to sit there and watch proceedings. Who knows but what Austin might do something dramatic? Might even give chase. Her essential romance thrilled to the possibilities in the situation. She waited—

In ten minutes Austin appeared. Her heart pounded, the whole of the universe was the terrific onslaught of her heart—it was like the roaring of many waters—

Then he was speaking to her. "Where were you going?" he said, but with the articulation of "where" she knew that he loved her.

wont to say that he had had all the labor he could well stand by Labor Day. On the last day of this particular summer more than Jothams "broke up." Hosea had been over all forenoon, offering his dog to Virginia and helping her pack. She refused his dog, "because you love him so much, Hosea." While she was speaking, it came to her how much she loved his comfy, homcy name. "I'll be back next summer," she told him, "we'll have the same good old times . . . they have been good, Hosea, haven't they? I've come to love your mother and Martha and nice Luke and . . . and all of Peaceful Valley."

Hosea didn't speak because he couldn't find courage or conviction to say what he wanted to, and he wasn't given to light talk.

It was going to be lonesome, but he and Martha would have lots to keep their tongues going this winter. He would plan a sensational crop for Perpendicular next summer and who knows but what . . . Their mother would soon be home and maybe, after a bit, the aching which Virginia had left him, along with the sweetness, would cease. He hoped so . . .

When he got home Martha was not there. Funny. For awhile longer he hung about, dreaming . . . Deliberately, he gave himself this hour . . . himself and Virginia . . . At sundown he would hunt up Martha . . . He didn't know why the lily pond suggested itself to him on this night, save that the facts of love and death are ever intermingled . . . He walked to it, with undue haste. It was undisturbed and the lilies, overburdened with ripe sweetness, breathed forth their dolorous breaths for the exquisite delectation of his nostrils. He walked home.

At midnight of that night there was no Martha. He and Luke had scoured the countryside, given out alarms, done all their locality could do.

The next day his mother came home, and he had to tell her.

The pallor of her face was like that of death.

That night he went to the city. He went blindly and he searched blindly. He hadn't ever realized the city. Every slim girl he saw he thought he saw Martha. Every vestige of distress was her distress. After a week he returned, baffled, bewildered, distraught.

The winter settled down on Peaceful Valley. Always, before, for Hosea it had been a cheery time of white snows, flashing sleds and scarlet mittens, peaceful evenings, Christmas greens and more than the usual goodies at table.

This winter the snow was like a pall, and there were no flashing sleds nor scarlet mittens.

For all Hosea and his mother, more worn now than ever before, knew their Martha might have been under the blanketing snow. Often, they hoped she might be. It would be kinder so.

My Secret of Teaching Piano

And Why I Have More Pupils Than Were Ever Before Taught By One Man

There Must Be Some Good Reason Why My Students Become Skilled Players of the Piano or Organ in Quarter the Usual Time and at Quarter the Usual Cost—Why They Do This Not Sometimes, But Regularly, Consistently, Habitually, Year After Year

More than twenty-five years ago I originated the correspondence method in this country. And although I encountered some prejudice at first, yet every year I enlarged the scope of my work until now many hundreds of persons all over the world are studying with me. Every state in the Union, every province in Canada, contains scores of accomplished players who obtained their entire training from me—and at much less cost and effort than was usually considered necessary.

I will gladly refer you to any number of my graduates who will soon counter you of the prompt and satisfying results they obtained with me. There seems no reason why you should not benefit in the same way, and I certainly urge you to investigate without obligation by writing for my 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

Occasionally I still encounter a man or woman who is hesitant about learning by mail and feels that the methods of 50 years ago are "safer." This feeling is, perhaps, natural enough, but it is due to a misunderstanding as to what are the real problems in learning piano. you will learn much more rapidly by my scientific written method than by the old fashioned "spoken" or oral method, which cannot be made really systematic. My free booklet will fully satisfy your mind in this regard and explain exactly how and why my method produces such truly surprising results.

My Course in Piano or Organ represents the best thought of the present day and makes use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. If you wanted to study with a so-called "private teacher" by the old-fashioned oral system, and yet could afford only $1 to $5 per lesson, you could obtain only third-rate instruction. No true authority could give you his entire, exclusive attention for so small a fee. Yet, as you know, one lesson with an authority is worth a dozen other lessons. By enrolling with this Conservatory and joining my Personal Instruction Class, your lessons cost less than 43 cents each, as part of the Complete Course. Yet every step you take is under my personal supervision, and in all essential ways, I am in as close touch with you as if I were standing at your side. No matter where you live, I can teach you successfully. You study in spare time at home.

My system is entirely different from all others. In my third lesson, I teach you to play an interesting piece, not only in the original key, but also in all other keys. This is made possible by my patented invention, the Colorator, and enables you to learn at once the famous Liszt system of playing very piece in every key with exactly the same fingering—which is usually taught only after three years of study. The Colorator saves you from learning a second best method at first, and then throwing it away three years later for the correct method. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, Quinn-dec. Quinn-dec is a simple, hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to remember your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY (which cannot be always accurate) you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The Colorator and Quinn-dec save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me, and there is nothing else, anywhere, even remotely like them. Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any Course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

"Your hair is your fortune" might well be said, for it is surely one of your most noticeable features of beauty.

CANTHROX SHAMPOO

is always a source of gratification to the vast number of attractive women who have learned its virtues. The cooling, soothing influence of its fragrant, invigorating lather upon the sensitive scalp brings grateful relief to sufferers from itching and dandruff. It makes and keeps the hair attractive by developing the life, lustre and natural waviness through cleanliness. It is a favorite because it so rapidly softens and removes every particle of dirt, excess oil or dandruff, at the same time giving a fluffiness that lends the appearance of massiness to the hair.

For Sale at All Drug Stores

No Good Hair Wash Costs Less

One reason for the great popularity of Canthrox is that it requires so little trouble or time to use it. You just apply the fragrant, invigorating lather thickly, rub thoroughly into the hair and scalp, rinse out carefully with clear, warm water, after which it dries quickly and easily.

H. S. PETERSON & CO., Dept. 177, 214 West Kinzie Street, Chicago, Ill.

Spring broke reluctantly. Early summer opened Jotham's. Ward Andrews had written several times saying he was prepared to take up the option on the farm and Hosea had decided not to go in for too much in the way of crops. If the old place were sold his labor would be for naught. But he needed extra money. When old Jotham offered him a job as waiter he seized upon it.

His first evening was memorable. He came thru the door balancing his tray, more or less dexterously, and beheld Virginia. The tray met an instant collision with the floor. Over the debris Virginia laughed, and the few other guests laughed too. The red-faced boy and the merry girl were so palpably together.

After supper Hosea and Virginia sat on the porch rail together and she told him of her winter and her studies. Hosea told her of their sad winter, his mother's and his. Of Martha who had vanished from the earth.

"I'm doing this for the extra money, mostly on that account," he told her; "we've got to get trace of Martha, Mother and I. We'd not rest even in our graves if we never heard anything of her."

Virginia was tenderly compassionate. She laid her hand on his arm and stroked it a bit.

"I'm so sorry . . ." she kept murmuring; "I'm so sorry . . ." Her sympathy was very sweet.

Later in the evening Ward Andrews asked Virginia to marry him. "Your father's willing, Gimmy," he ended his plea.

"Father's not marrying you, Ward," she told him, "and, personally, I couldn't. Just couldn't. I like you . . . but it has to be so different for . . . marriage. I . . . well, there's just no use."

Ward Andrews didn't accept defeat gracefully. He didn't tell her not to worry, it would be all right with him. He scowled and gave her to understand he felt himself misused.

Hosea was learning to accept . . . Perpendicular without Martha, dreams without Virginia. This, perhaps, was life. Life as it must be lived.

Then, one day in June, the old couple, from across the road broke in on the Howes, sitting more or less wistfully in the sunlight, and told how they had seen Martily a spell up the road, straggling along and a cryin' to herself. "Actin' up as queer," the old lady vouchsafed.

Hosea wasted not a moment. His dull and weary brain made, miraculously, an instantaneous response.

The lily pond!
"If I were to die of love, I think I'd do it here among the lilies . . . here among the lilies . . ." She had said it.

She had gone down twice when Hosea caught the dank glint of her hair in the lazy ripple of the pool. The thick white of a lily baffled her curled fingertips.

He had her in his arms; had her, dripping, against his breast, before the suddenly sinister water could touch her still face again.

In the front room Ward Andrews had come with his option money. Somehow, they hadn't seemed to think he ever would. With it right there, before them, with Luke in the room with Martha, swearing he wanted her at once, no matter what had befallen her, it didn't seem necessary to part with stony old Perpendicular. It seemed hard and wholly undesirable. The past winter had taught values.

Peaceful Valley

Old Jotham saw how it was going. Saw that it didn't need to go. His hand was in his pocket when Luke opened Martha's door to come out and Martha, catching sight of Ward Andrews framed in the front door, emitted a piercing, unmistakable shriek of terror, of appalled recognition, of appeal . . .

Somehow it struck them all, simultaneously. Ward Andrews . . . the option . . . Martha and her disappearance . . . Hosea was upon him before Luke could get there and finally out of the chaos some sort of order was evolved.

Luke went back to Martha to still the incoherence of her reiterated "I got away from him . . . I got away from him . . . he never so much . . . I did . . . I did . . ."

Dr. Rand had Hosea by the hand. "I have been investigating this young man on the quiet for some time," he said, indicating what was left of Ward Andrews, "and he hasn't borne the investigation. I have also been investigating your farm, Mrs. Howe. You and your son are to be congratulated as potential millionaires. The place is invaluable in mineral springs."

Outside the door Virginia had maneuvered Hosea. Her eyes were upon him, beseeching.

"Once you said," he imparted, "that you loved mother . . . and Martha . . . and Peaceful Valley . . . but you didn't mention . . ."

"You?" prompted Virginia, touching him, "you? Oh, darling, that was only because I was a 'fraid cat . . . I didn't dare . . . And I wasn't sure about you. But I am now. I see it in your eyes . . . I do . . . I do . . ."

Hosea took her in his arms and kissed her. All at once it was the natural, the only thing to do. All at once, too, Peaceful Valley was filled with an unearthly light as of a great glory and there was the sound of singing, heavenly sweet, and the summer burgeoned and filled the twilight with a million, million roses . . . and thru it all filtered Martha's thin little happy laugh. Dr. Rand's deep pleasant voice, their mother's tremulous, eager answers . . . the singing of their pulses . . . his and hers . . .

THE IMPERISHABLE

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Death may take to him the painter,
But his works to us belong;
He may steal from us the singer,
But he cannot seize the song.

Hold our sum of joy, yet he
Cannot rob us of the largess
Of a single memory.

The Wonders of a Puffed Grain

Each Puffed Wheat bubble is a whole grain puffed to eight times normal size. A hundred million steam explosions have occurred within it.

Every food cell is exploded, so you see an airy, toasted morsel as flimsy as a snowflake.

Puffed rice is whole rice puffed in like way. Puffed Corn is broken corn puffed to raindrop size.

The texture is enticing, the flavor is like nuts. The airy granules seem to melt away.

But think what they are

But these delightful bits are grain foods, fitted for digestion as grains never were before. Float the Puffed Wheat grains in milk and you have the greatest food in existence.

Serve with cream and sugar, mix with fruit. Douse with melted butter for hungry-hour delights. Use like nut-meats on ice cream.

In all ways these Puffed Grains are like flavory confections, yet they are supreme foods. Millions now enjoy them. Serve all three in all the ways you can. No other grain food can compare with them.

Myrtle of the Mountains

"Funny little thing!" said Miss Stedman, laughing in sympathy.

And then, just as we left the table and started for the living-room, the doorbell began to ring.

"What on earth!" she exclaimed . . . there was no one in sight. Still the bell rang, loudly, continuously, as tho making up for lost time. After a protracted search it was discovered that the amateur electricians had in some way connected the thing with a clothes closet door. When the door was left open the bell wouldn't ring at all, but with the door closed it rang all the time. The door was propped open, to keep out the noise, and we returned to the living-room and seated ourselves comfortably on a big davenport.

We had been laughing so heartily that, for a minute, conversation was impossible. "Let's see; where were we?" said Miss Stedman, and then answering herself, "Oh, yes; at the Westerns. Of course, we worked under difficulties that producers don't have now. There was, for instance, the matter of the trademark. It was, you remember, a big diamond 'S' and it had to appear in every scene. Sometimes we would get miles out on location and find that it had been forgotten. When this happened, production was held up until the property man could get it from the studio; we never dared make anything without it."

There was, of course, the ever present possibility that someone would try and steal some of their stuff. It was about five years ago that Myrtle Stedman left Chicago and Westerns for drama and California. She appeared as Saxton in Jack London's "Valley of the Moon," and was also in the first production of "Burning Daylight." It will be remembered that she was at Lasky's for a time playing with Hayakawa, Wallie Reid and many others.

"I suppose you've had a trying week," I remarked, referring to some re-takes for "Sowing the Wind," in which she had been working at the Mayer studio.

"Yes, I've been weeping steadily all the way thru this picture. It's an old 'Romance' play, you know—of course, they've brought it up-to-date.

"I did hope that I was going to do a Western next, but it seems that the picture won't be a Western after all. It's a mill story. However, it will be with Bill Hart and I'm delighted about that anyway!"

Myrtle Stedman has a frank, straightforward way of looking at you from clear blue eyes, a frank straight-forward handshake.

She has never lost her capacity for enthusiasms. She loves the theater and she can still watch a play or a picture uncritically, laughing at the right moments and crying at the right moments, too. With all this, her work shows her to be a remarkably finished artist.

It is not to be wondered at, that Rex Beach, seeing her in New York, engaged her for the part of Cherry Melotte in "The Silver Horde." She was an ideal choice for the part.

How Every Woman Can Have A Winning Personality

Let Me Introduce Myself
DEAR READER: I wish to tell you how to have a charming, winning personality because all my life I have seen that without it any woman labors under great handicaps. Without personality, it is almost impossible to make desirable friends, or get on in business; and yes, often must a woman give up the man on whom her heart is set because she has not the power to attract or to hold him.

During my career here and abroad, I have met a great many people whom I have been able to study under circumstances which have brought out their weak or strong points, like a tiny spot on the lens of a moving picture machine will magnify into a very large blot on the screen. And I have seen so many people, lacking in personality, try to make a success of their plans and fail completely, in a way that has been quite pathetic. I am sure that you also are familiar with one or more such cases.

Success of a Winsome Manner

I saw numerous failures that were so distressing that my thoughts could not help dwelling upon those shattered and vain conditions. I have seen women of education, and culture and natural beauty actually fail where other women minus such advantages, but possessing certain secrets of loveliness, a certain winsomeness, a certain knack of looking right and saying the right word would get ahead delightfully. Nor were they naturally forward women. Nor were they the kind that men call clever. Some of them, if you studied their features closely, were decidedly not handsome; yet they seemed so. They didn't do this by covering their faces with cosmetics; they knew the true means. And often the winning women were in the thirties, forties, or even fifties. Yet they "appealed."

You know what I mean. They drew others to them by a subtle power which seemed to emanate from them. Others liked to talk to them and to do things for them. In their presence you felt perfectly at ease—as though you had been good, good friends for very long.

French Feminine Charms

The French women among my friends seemed to me more generally endowed with this ability to fascinate, than did my friends among other nationalities. In the years that I lived in Paris, I was amazed to find that most of the women I met were enchanting.

"Is it a part of the French character?" I asked my friends.
 "Were you born that way?" I would often ask some charming woman.

And they smilingly told me that "personality" as we know it here in America, is an art, that is studied and acquired by French women just as they would learn to cook, or to sing, or to play the voice. Every girl and woman possesses latent personality. This includes you, dear reader. There are numerous real secrets for developing your personality. In France, where the women have always outnumbered the men, and where opportunity for our sex is restricted, those who wish to win husbands or shine in society, or succeed in their careers, have no choice but to develop their charms in competition with others.

How Men's Affections Are Held

Lately the newspapers have been telling us that thousands and thousands of our fine young army men have taken French wives. It was no surprise to me, for I know how alluring are the French girls. Nor could I help conceding the truth in the assertion of a competent Franco-American journalist that "American girls are too provincial, formal, cold and unresponsive while the French girls radiate warmth of sympathy, devotion and all those exquisite elements of the heart that men adore in women."

You may have all those attractive qualities that men adore in women

And I who am successful and probably known to by reputation through my activities on the Faubourg St. Honoré can tell you in all candor, as one woman confiding in another, that these French secrets of personality have been a very important factor in the successes of mine. But it is not my tendency to boast of myself, the Juliette Fara whom I want you to feel that you already know as your sincere friend, but I speak of YOU and for YOU.

French Secrets of Fascination

My continued residence in France enabled me to observe the ways and methods of the women closely. I studied and analyzed the secrets of their fascinating powers.

When I returned to the dear old U. S. A., I set myself at work putting together the facts, methods, secrets and formulae that I had learned while in France.

Of one thing I am absolutely convinced—every woman who wishes it may have a winning personality.

Overcoming Deterrent Timidity

I know I can take any girl of a timid or over-modest disposition, one who lacks self-confidence, or is too self-conscious for her own good, and show her how to become discreetly and charmingly daring, perfectly natural and comfortable in the presence of others. I can show you how to bring out charms which you do not even dream you possess.

Uncouth Boldness—or Tactful Audacity

If you are an assertive woman, the kind that suffers from too great forwardness, I can show you in a way that you will find delightful, how to be gentle and unassuming, to tear away the false fabric of your repelling and ungracious personality and replace it with another that wins and attracts. By this method, you will succeed, oh so well, while by uncouthness or misapplied audacity you meet with setbacks.

I can take the frail girl or woman, the listless one who usually feels that the good things in life are not for her and show her how to become vigorous and strong, tingling with enthusiasm and good cheer and how to see the whole wide world full of splendid things just for her.

Become An Attractive Woman

I can take the girl or woman who is ignorant or careless of her appearance, or the girl who dresses unbecomingly and instill in her a sense of true importance of appearance in personality; I can enlighten her in the ways of women of the world, in making the most of their apparel. All this without any extravagance; and I can show her how to acquire it with originality and taste. You realize, of course, that dressing to show yourself to advantage, is a real art and without that knowledge you will always be under a disadvantage.

For Married Women

There are some very important secrets which married French women know that enables them to hold the love, admiration and fidelity of their men. How the selfish spirit in a man is to be overcome so ingeniously that he does not know what you are accomplishing until some day he awakens to the fact that his character and his manner have undergone a delightful change—that he is not only making you happy, but he is finding far greater pleasure in life than when he was inconsiderate. There are secrets in my compilation that are likely to change a turbulent course of married life for one that is entrancingly ideal. And this power lies within you, my dear Madam.

Acquire Your Life's Victory Now

What we call personality is made up of a number of little things. It is not something vague and indefinable. Personality, charm, good looks, winsomeness and success can be cultivated. If you know the secrets, if you learn the rules and put them into practice, you can be charming, you can have an appealing personality. Don't think it impossible. Don't think you must be born that way. Don't even think it ought to be hard to acquire it; because the secrets of charm that I have collated and transcribed for you are more interesting than the most fascinating hook you have ever read.

Once you have learned my lessons, they become a kind of second nature to you. When you notice the improvement in your appearance, how you get on easier with people, how your home problems seem to solve themselves, how in numberless little ways (and big ones, too) life gets to hold so many more prizes for you, you will decide to put more and more of the methods in practice in order to obtain still more of life's rewards.

No Fad—the Success of Ages

I am well enough known by the public not to be taken as advancing some new-fangled Fad. All my life I have understood the value of plain common sense and practical methods. And what I have put into my course (in the cultivation of personality is just as practical as anything can be.

I could go on to tell you more and more about this truly remarkable course, but the space here does not permit. However, I have put some important secrets for you into an inspiring little book called "How" that I want you to read. The Gentlewoman Institute will send it to you entirely free, postpaid, in a plain wrapper, just for the asking.

My advice to you is to send for the free hook "HOW" if you want to gain the finest of friends and to possess happiness with contentment that will come to you as the result of a lovely and winning personality.

willingness. He thought he wanted to go on the stage—but he was not sure, because he had not yet tried it—or anything else.

So he tried directories. But figures and detail work bored him. He was not interested in directories altho he honestly tried to be. His father was disappointed—his mother, well known to the profession in this and other countries, did not want him to go on the stage.

Billie Boyd was twenty-three when he began his stage career—but he began by doing extra parts, receiving, sometimes, the munificent sum of one dollar—fifty cents of which he handed over as a commission. But he had decided and there was no turning back. From these small beginnings he has advanced rapidly. Not only in all the principal cities of America, but in all the provinces he is known as juvenile lead hero of drama or light comedy, in character parts. His last Broadway appearance was in "The Voice in the Dark" and he had just finished a long engagement in Chicago with "Poker Ranch," reaching New York just in time to begin work in the filming of "Blackbirds" in which he is appearing with Justine Johnson in her first Realart picture.

"And have you deserted the stage entirely?" I asked—knowing well what his answer would be, but wishing to get him to talk about himself.

"No indeed!" he said emphatically. "I was glad of the chance to do this picture because I have finished my stage engagement in Chicago and A. H. Woods who has practically signed me for the coming season was not quite decided about the play I was to appear in. So I had time to do this and am enjoying it wonderfully. Funny business—" he commented. "Went to Florida week or so ago to take some scenes. And now, we are doing some scenes that come away ahead of those we took in Florida.

"I'm not used to that—and even tho I know the story, it's a bit confusing. You see I have done only one picture before this—"Virtuous Wives" with Anita Stewart. But I hope it will develop that I can do more. I really like the work very much. Ten years ago," he said, reminiscently, "George Fitzmaurice tried to persuade me to go with him as a director. I could not see pictures at all at that time—and turned down his proposition."

"You might have made a big success as a director—as Mr. Fitzmaurice has done."

"No," he said decidedly. "I am an actor—and while some actors are good business men—I am not. And I believe a director of motion pictures should be both. As I see it, it's up to the director to make the picture both an artistic and business success. I might take care of the artistic end—but the financial end would be a big gamble. And I couldn't give up the stage. It's my job—it's all I know. So I'll keep the faith—so to speak—and try to justify my choice of a profession. And Billie Boyd would.

My Hair Was Quite Gray

"It was falling out, getting brittle and stringy. My scalp was filled with dandruff and itched almost constantly. A few applications of Kolor-Bak produced a wonderful improvement. The itching stopped instantly. There was no more dandruff. And—marvel of marvels—it is now restored to its original color—not a gray hair shows anywhere!"

Kolor-Bak is not a dye or stain. It is colorless, stainless, harmless and restores original color to gray hair simply by putting hair and scalp in a healthy condition.

more a series of estates than a town . . . and the hotel is surrounded by wide grounds. There seemed to be twice as many stars in the sky as is usual and a little new moon looked very brilliant and very near. One felt as tho in the midst of a stage setting, rather than a scene of reality. There, she told me of a thrilling experience which she had while in the South of Russia. The anecdote deserves a place here because it illustrates so well the daring of her nature.

"I had been in Russia many times," she said, "but never far from civilization. On this occasion just a little stream separated us from a Tartar village where the people were wild and verree cruel. We had been warned, our party, but still I wanted to cross that stream. It was so narrow one could step across it quite easily.

"One day, I was out walking with a friend and we decided to go just a little way. We had hardly crossed the stream when we were surrounded and made prisoners. I was never so afraid in all my life. I was certain that they were going to kill us. They made us prisoners for some time, then they let us go. They said that if ever we came back they would certainly kill us!"

But she had had her own way about crossing the stream; she is that type of woman.

popularity with each succeeding picture, that is if I make good. I am not going into this venture with any false illusions, you may be certain. I sometimes think that I should have worked in small parts, gotten some experience before venturing into being featured in pictures, but circumstances have forced me to act otherwise, and I can only work and wait."

Miss Dickson is one of the most photographed girls in the country. Not an issue of any of the popular magazines seems complete without a photograph of her. The dainty charm of her wistful beauty lends itself with extreme aptitude to the camera, and this is perhaps what the powers that be over at the Famous Players studio realized when they signed Dorothy up with an interesting contract.

We lifted our glass of iced coffee slowly, our thoughts busy with the many gifts which the fairy godmothers had showered upon this one girl-woman. Our eyes chanced to fall on the diamond wrist watch she wore. Choking and sputtering, we came back to earth and gurgled that we had to dash—"no idea it was so late—Heavens! Much work to do."

"Can I drop you anywhere, I'm on my way to finish my shopping," said Dorothy.

"No, thank you. Have to go by subway. Many thanks just the same. Thanks awfully. Good-bye! Good-luck!"

"Good-bye. See you soon, I hope," said Dorothy—and she will!

(Ninety-seven)

You have always wished for it—this fascinating ability to draw. And now it's yours! This power to grasp a pencil and picturize your ideas, to "speak" more than a few pen-strokes than your lips could tell in half hour, to spread your message farther and stronger than any voice can reach—this wonderful ability filled with pleasure and profit is now yours! Forget that you may have no "talent"—forget that you may not be "gifted"—but REMEMBER that, regardless of these things, the fascinating ability to draw can now be yours!

New Easy Way To Learn Drawing

How you can earn big money in Commercial Art, Illustrating, Designing, or Cartooning, without being a "genius" and without being "gifted" or "talented."

Never was there such a need for artists as today! Business, revitalized, needs thousands. Illustrated catalogs, advertisements, posters, circulars, trademark designs—countless pieces of art work are needed by the busy business world. More than 48,868 periodicals are published in America—think of the enormous amount of art work they require—think of the thousands of artists needed to satisfy this never-ending demand. Magazines, newspapers, advertising agencies, business concerns, department stores—all have realized the commercial value of pictures and are calling for artists to draw them. Big money is gladly paid—and big money is waiting for anyone with foresight enough to prepare for this pleasant profession. Thru our new, easy method of teaching, YOU can easily earn big money as an artist.

Learn in Spare Time at Home

This new method is like a fascinating game. No matter how little you may know about drawing, no matter whether people tell you, "you have no talent," no matter what your present ability may be—if you can write we can teach you to draw.

Have you ever noticed a child trying to draw? Every child does it. They also try to read and write. The faculty of reading and writing is developed in them as they grow older. The faculty of drawing is not. That is the only difference. Everyone has within him the power to picturize his ideas. The right method of training is the only thing needed to bring out this ability.

New Method Simplifies Everything

Our new method simplifies everything. All the red-tape, "art for art's sake" teaching, and superfluous theory is taken out and in its place is put definite, practical instruction so that you will make money in the art game. This new system of teaching has exploded the theory that "talent" was necessary for success in art. Just as you have been taught to read and write, you can be taught to draw. We start you with straight lines—then curves—then you learn to put them together. Now you begin making pictures. Shading, action, perspective and all the rest follow in their right order, until you are making every week pictures that sell for as much money as you now earn in a month.

Every drawing you make while taking the course receives the personal criticism of our director, Will H. Chandlee. Mr. Chandlee has had over 35 years' experience in commercial art, and is considered one of the country's foremost authorities. He knows the game inside and out. He teaches you to make the kind of pictures that sell. Many of our students are now commanding big fees—some of them have received as high as $100 for their first drawing!

of the country sweeps out from the silver-sheet. There is the Bartlett kitchen, the forum of the New England family, there is the Bartlett farmhouse porch, whereon mother does her churning and father reads his paper in the twilight of the departing day, there are vast stretches of hay and daisy fields by summer and frozen roads and snow-swept countryside by winter. Mr. Griffith has caught it all, from the gentle lure of the New England June to the tingling sleigh ride and barn dance days of December.

We do not mean that Griffith has been entirely successful. He has permitted a horrible overdrawing of rural comedy characters, following in the footsteps of the original stage version. How easy it would have been to have limned these folk simply and honestly, to have presented them with homely sincerity. But Griffith, we suspect, felt this necessary to meet popular favor. In our critical—and perhaps impractical—way, we doubt it. But, of course, we have no millions at stake, waiting upon the film's success or failure.

We have noted the big thrill of the Griffith "Way Down East." In the stage version, the unhappy Anna merely disappeared out the door of the Bartlett maison into a flurry of fluttering paper. Upon the Griffith screen she struggles thru a real blizzard until she falls unconscious in the midst of an ice jam. Thereupon the ice breaks and Anna is carried upon a careening and steadily dwindling ice cake towards the river falls. The country lover dashes blindly to her rescue and—leaping from one ice block to another—reaches Anna's side as she is about to be swept over the falls. Seizing her, he jumps from ice floe to ice floe until he reaches safety. This sounds tame in the narration. In reality, he seems two or three times to leap from an ice cake just as it plunges over the roaring cataract. We do not know how Griffith accomplished it, but, as we have said, this is unquestionably the biggest thrill since that classic climax of "The Birth of a Nation." At the New York première the audience actually leaped to its feet and shouted as Anna, alias Lillian Gish, was carried to safety, by David, otherwise Dick Barthelmess.

Here let us give Miss Gish her just due. Her Anna Moore, a ghostly colorless being on the stage, is one of the biggest things the cinema has ever revealed—if it isn't the biggest. Right now we are rather of the opinion that it tops every histrionic performance of the past. It has slashing moments, as in the hysteria of the baby's death and again when the distraught girl bursts into a denunciation of those who persecute her, but, best of all it is a big, consistent and developing performance. Anna literally grows from wide-eyed girlhood to womanhood before your eyes. Congratulations, Miss Gish!

Mr. Barthelmess is excellent as the country lover. Fine, too, is Burr McIntosh's virile and unbending old Puritan,

BROWNATONE
Tints Faded, Streaked
GRAY HAIR to any shade

WHAT woman of forty, or fifty, does not prefer to receive the deference everywhere paid to feminine beauty rather than the reverence the world accords to old age?

How many women entering at forty upon the golden period of woman's life with all their other attributes of beauty and loveliness preserved, have seen their brightest dreams shattered by the premature graying of their hair?

Fortunate those thousands who have learned how BROWNATONE eliminates mouse-gray streaks and restores to leaden dingy hair the colorful beauty and life that makes even the plainest young girl attractive.

BROWNATONE

Many a woman has found the whole course of her life changed by this truly wonderful preparation that brings back to gray, laded and streaked hair the raven black, light golden tint or exact shade of brown it had in girlhood. Absolutely harmless, it is easily applied, instant in results, does not rub off and cannot be detected.

Squire Bartlett, incarnate representative of the New England conscience. He is the atmosphere of "Way Down East." Lowell Sherman is a vivid villain, Kate Bruce is sweet and moving as Mother Bartlett, Mary Hay has cute moments as a city educated farm maiden and Creighton Hale plays a butterfly-hunting scientist with line—and even subtle—touches of humor. But the rural comedy characters—horrors!

Mr. Griffith has achieved some unusual things here and there, both technically and dramatically. In the last named category comes the scene where he has dared to show the agonies of childbirth. Griffith has utilized the Brewster method of natural color photography for at least a half dozen scenes. Alongside the superb color of Bitzer's matchless photography it seems doubly crude. There are many notable moments photographically. One, which occurs in David's chase of the lost Anna, will cling in our memory. This is a fleeting glimpse of the boy caught in the whirling blizzard, framed by swaying fir trees against a haze of swirling snow.

A minor complaint can be made against the seeming confusion of time in the city and country scenes. Lucile and 1920 reign in the wicked metropolis, while the country is still in the nineties sartorially.

Griffith came near greatness in "Way Down East." He fell short in two things, slowness in reaching the real theme of his story and, in a greater measure, in constantly tearing away the homely and tenderly developed atmosphere with such palpably overdrawn horse-play characters as Hi Holler, Seth Holcomb and Reuben Whipple. But "Way Down East" is so worth while that we predict an endless sort of popularity for it.

And, let us add, you will not forget Miss Gish's performance. It is splendid in every sense of the word.

Lack of space necessitates brief reviews of the various current photoplays: "The Love Flower."—D. W. Griffith's story of a man-hunt in the South Pacific. Griffith lost his theme in prettying a romance between the pursued man's daughter and a young adventurer. Does not seem real anywhere but it establishes Carol Dempster as a cinema personality. Here is a young girl with charm, distinction and vividness. Dick Barthelmess is not at his best.

"The White Circle."—Maurice Tourneur's visualization of Robert Louis Stevenson's "The Pavilion on the Links," another man-hunt with entirely different treatment. Griffith deals in personalities, Tourneur in backgrounds. There are some superb scenes on the lonely moors by night. Spottiswoode Aiken plays an old man frought with fear about his pursuers.

"Lady Rose's Daughter."—Hugh Ford's visualization of the Mrs. Humphrey Ward novel. A study in inherited weakness. Bad continuity and inferior direction handling. Elsie Ferguson was never more unconvincing.

Wanted: Screen Faces for the Movies

Hundreds of All Types Needed. You May Have Perfect Screen-Features

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for you to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

Ralph Ince, famous Selznick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his work in directing Mary Pickford, says: "I am convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." B. A. Powers, of Universal, says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

This is a fascinating profession paying big salaries. Don't miss this opportunity. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrapping this new guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-7, Wilmington, Delaware.

Unless you are sincere in your desire to get in the movies, please do not send for this printed guide.

harm," he whined. "Before God I haven't! All I did was to send a fake message to the day-nursery, where she was workin' for Alvarez. He was on the boat and hired me to find her. If anything's happened—"

He fumbled for a key, fitted it into the lock of a door, and pushed it open. At the moment of his entering a shot sounded. Douglas Courtenay stepped over Craft's jerking body and caught the little figure, holding the smoking revolver, in his arms. "Ruth!" he cried, "Oh my darling—"

She did not look at him. "I thought it was the Spaniard," he felt her shudder. "This afternoon when he brought me here I stole this from his pocket—to use when he came back—" she sighed, shuddering, and her weight grew heavy. Douglas Courtenay gathered her in his arms and strode down the stairs, stopping only for a word with those who were hurrying up in answer to the shot.

"Accidental death—I'll see to that!" the old boss said with a kind of pride in his power, "after the formalities are over I'll come to your hotel. Be gentle, boy, and don't say too much! Sure it's words that do more harm than bullets in the world!"

But when Ruth opened reluctant eyes, moments or hours later, to find herself held in her husband's arms, there were no words needed between them. For the deep lines of suffering in his face begged her "Forgive!" and the look in his eyes said "Love." With a little sigh of content she nestled closer and answered both by lifting her lips to his kiss.

The Celluloid Critic

Charlie Ray mis-cast as the slangy prize fighter hero of George M. Cohan's famous opus. Has the little human Ray touches but lacks Jerome Storm's directing hand. Remember how Storm could work you up to a pitch of fine enthusiasm over the sale of a mere bond? This is utterly flat. Probably you will like Dorothy Devore as the heroine.

"Civilian Clothes."—The likable Thomas Meighan in Thompson Buchanan's drama built about the handsome soldier who isn't so handsome when he dons his "civies." Cut and dried direction by Hugh Ford results in a colorless picture. Martha Mansfield is pretty but fearfully inadequate dramatically.

"Something to Think About."—This—the latest—Cecil de Mille offering will interest you. De Mille has deserted sex for the spiritual uplift, and he shows what the power of right thinking will do. We wish we had more space to devote to this, for it deserves extended comment. De Mille hits several very effective theatrical moments. Gloria Swanson is more varied than ever before. Elliott Dexter plays sympathetically, and Theodore Roberts is a strong and winning figure.

Gray Hair Disappears In from 4 to 8 Days

A Scientific Discovery

Science has discovered a way to restore gray hair to its original natural color.

Not by old-time crude dyes so distasteful to dainty women. But by a scientific hair color restorer.

Women have long been waiting for this discovery. All women want to end gray hair. Yet few have wanted to use greasy dyes.

Now women no longer hesitate. Thousands have already used this scientific hair color restorer. And many more thousands are learning of its wonderful results.

A Convincing Test

Mary T. Goldman's Scientific Hair Color Restorer is a clear, pure, colorless liquid. You apply it yourself.

All that is necessary is to comb it through the hair. In from 4 to 8 days your hair will have been restored to its natural color. It leaves the hair soft and fluffy. It will not fade or wash off.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be—gray, brown or blue—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator..... $.75
- M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads..... $.75

Dead Men Tell No Tales

The Amazing Interview

in his brand-new limousine and now you have come to interview me!" And she sighed again.

If only I had been a cynic! Marie does not always plan to remain in comedy. Mr. Roach has been developing plans for the production of serious drama and has urged that she stay with him a little longer—until he can put his plans into effect. It is very probable that she will. At least, if she maintains her present record, she will never be very far away, for she has never in all her life been out of the city of Los Angeles!

"But that's not half so silly as the fact that I've never ridden on a railroad train!"

She is delightfully aware of her own uniqueness; a uniqueness, by the way, in which a professional generosity is no small factor. It seemed to me that in her I had discovered the epitome of the spirit of the Rolin studio—surely the most cheery in Los Angeles.

She told me of a brief talk with Harold Lloyd just before my arrival.

"He knew the moment he came in the room that I was terribly upset about something and, of course, when I wouldn't tell him what it was he only grew more curious. In the end I gave in—somehow one always does give in to Harold—and confessed that I was about to be interviewed, and that I was dying of fear that you'd forgotten me, and that it wasn't really for the CLASSIC after all. . . . But Harold laughed at me and promised not to tell anyone. You see, I don't want anyone to know until it actually comes out in print. Then I shall take it to Mr. Roach and say, 'There! Now see what you've done to me!'"

In her home, a bungalow in Hollywood where she lives with her mother, Marie is much the same as at the studio; a little less restrained perhaps, with the actress side of her for the moment obliterated, the chum of a splendid collie dog, whom she has brought up since his third day on this earthly globe. That he is burdened with the conventional name of "Shep" makes him none the less beloved.

In common with so many, many other young actresses Marie is a worshipper of the elder Talmadge. To be somewhat like her, to accomplish something of her success, to achieve a title of her perfection . . . that would be enough. She asks no more. But like all others who will ever rise to any greatness Marie is so essentially herself that she could never be a second anybody. She must be an "only" or nothing at all.

I was still persistent. I wanted a glimpse of her inner self. There had seemed to be a reserve, and so I said again: "But tell me something of yourself, something that is not of your work, nor of your dog, but just of you."

"I?" She looked rather frightened, but took heart at my smile. When the words came they came suddenly, as if they had at last broken out of a secret chamber of her heart. . . . "Oh, I just want to be good, good now and always!"

If only I had been a cynic!

for DECEMBER

VACATION time is over — and once again the world turns its thoughts to the problem of providing entertainment for the long winter evenings.

Whether it be the velvety warmth of a marble mansion or the gas-stove warmth of a hall bed room, provides the necessary companionship.

The MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE

"Breathes there a man with soul so dead" that he would fail to thrill to the glory of Clara Kimball Young? Adele Whitely Fletcher says "no," in her story about the dark-eyed Clara.

And who can resist the blue-eyed appeal of Hope Hampton, the Girl on the Cover? Gladys Hall has interviewed Hope for this number.

The Blonde Blanche Sweet has been cornered by C. Blythe Sherwood and tells us things about herself which we knew not of.

The Rainbow Chasers is an unusually interesting story on extracts from letters to the scenario editor.

Hazel Naylor chats with Forrest Stanley, that handsome new leading man of Cecile de Mille's! George Walsh, Niles Welch, Jack Pickford, Clyde Fillmore and Enid Bennett are a few of the others whose stories appear in this coming issue. The gallery is an unusually attractive one.

Cartoonists Make Big Money

Every time Sid Smith makes a stroke of his pen, millions of people laugh, and every laugh means money for the man who creates it. Andy and Min earn big money for him every day.

Men who can make people laugh are highly paid for doing so. By capitalizing their humorous ideas and their ability to draw, cartoonists like Fox, Briggs, King, and Smith make $10,000 to $100,000 a year. You may have ideas that are equally good. Let Federal training give you the skill to put them on paper.

Send For This Book

If you really want to learn to draw, send for "A Road To Bigger Things." Are You Physically Fit?

DO you look forward serenely, confidently, towards the day when you will wed the girl you cherish? Do you see in your day dreams a loving, admiring wife and sturdy children of your own flesh and blood and a dear little, happy home? This is the picture every man ought to be able some day to realize. But you may be one of the thousands, who, for one reason or another—known only to yourself perhaps—have stumbled into youthful errors which have discouraged and weakened you and made you almost hopeless of ever being happily married. You fear the consequences of deception. You hesitate to make love, lest you make a miserable mess of some sweet girl's life. Life looks mighty gloomy to you. But don't be disheartened. There is hope for even the frailest of humanity, for both sexes of whatever age.

My Hand is Held Out To You In Friendship— I Want To Help You

Strongfortism has lifted thousands of weak, ailing, impotent, discouraged men out of the bog of hopelessness and despair and placed them on the broad, straight road to health, happiness and prosperity. Strongfortism has restored the manhood they had destroyed and thought they had lost forever and given the renewed vitality, ambition and the power to DO THINGS in the world. Strongfortism has enabled them to beget children who will make citizens of whom both they and their country will be proud. And you do want children, don't you? Of course you do—and you shall be a proud father, with healthy kiddies at your feet, if you listen to my advice and take my hand and let me help you to be a real man.

STRONGFORTISM Is A Science In Itself

Strongfortism is a long stride ahead of any so-called physical culture course or system that you know of. It embraces all the essentials of such systems, but is not limited to them—it goes far beyond, reaching out to a variety of Nature's aids, employing them to an advantage that brings surprising results to every Strongfort follower. I banish all drugs and medicines and clumsy devices intended to relieve disease. I get results that are most astounding because my plan is so simple—my instructions so easily followed.

LIONEL STRONGFORT
Dr. Sargent, of Harvard, declared that "Strongfort is unquestionably the finest specimen of physical development ever seen."

My FREE Book Tells All About It

Send today for your copy of "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy." It's free, but the information which it contains will be of inestimable value to you. It will tell you how you can, without medicines or drugs, and without the use of expensive apparatus, build yourself up to perfect health—how you may become a strong, healthy man. Fill out coupon at the right and mail it with three 2c stamps to cover packing and postage and you will receive your copy by return mail. Take the first step by mailing that coupon now.

the big climax, standing and cheering. Lillian Gish, Dick Barthelmess and Lowell Sherman were present and the audience insisted upon a speech from Miss Gish. Mr. Griffith was also called upon. Mary Hay (Mrs. Barthelmess) was unable to be present, being on a visit to relatives in Oshkosh, Wis.

News has reached New York of the death of Susanne Grandais, "the Mary Pickford of France," in Paris. Some of her films reached this country from the French Gaumont studios.

The usual autumn business changes have been under way. Samuel Goldwyn has resigned as president and F. J. Godsol as vice-president of Goldwyn Pictures. Messmore Kendall was made managing-director, pending the election of a president.

Vitagraph announces that Antonio Moreno is at last to be shifted from serials to features. Good news this!

The exodus of stars to the other side has continued all summer. Among those who crossed were Norma and Constance Talmadge, Dorothy Gish and Mrs. Gish; Mae Murray and her husband, Bob Leonard, and Mme. Olga Petrova. Theda Bara returned and went on tour in her stage play, "The Blue Flame." She is booked for a tour of twenty weeks.

Tragedy ended the Paris visit of Olive Thomas and her husband, Jack Pickford. Miss Thomas died of mercurial poisoning on September 11.

Alice Joyce called Mrs. Sydney Drew from her camp in the Adirondacks to direct her in a Vitagraph production, "Cousin Kate." Mrs. Drew may do another story to follow "Cousin Kate."

Jerome Storm was secured to direct Lillian Gish in her first star production under the Sherrill banner. Miss Gish has experienced considerable delay in getting started, owing to story changes, etc. Mr. Storm will start work on Jerome Storm Productions shortly, a million dollar organization having been completed.

Much interest has been aroused in the East over the reports that King Vidor is to direct Ralph Connor's "The Sky-Pilot." This will be the next Vidor production to follow "The Jack Knife Man," which scored so heavily in the East. Joseph Plunkett, manager of the New York Strand Theater, called it the best film he had offered this year.

mitted to watch scenes being taken. Of the actresses present, Marjorie Daw was by far their favorite and, no wonder, for in her simple but smart little brown taffeta frock she looked very, very pretty. Then, too, one couldn't help admiring her charming manner, neither affected nor spoiled. She was wholly natural and a little bit shy over the fuss the three hundred middies made over her.

History Repeats Itself!

The Fame and Fortune Contest of 1921

THE phenomenal success of the Fame and Fortune Contest which has been conducted for the past year by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND have firmly decided the heads of the Brewster Publications that another contest, even more far-reaching in its power, should be started immediately for the year 1921.

The Golden Key of Opportunity is in Your Hands—Turn the Key in the Doorway of Success and thru the portal of the Fame and Fortune Contest you may enter the kingdom of the screen.

Photographs May be Entered at Once and the first honor roll winners will appear in the January issues of each of our publications.

Send In Your Photograph Early

We know that you get tired of reading this notice, but if you could have seen the avalanche of pictures which flooded the offices at the last moment, and could realize that there must ensue tremendous confusion, unnecessary work, and inevitable delay in the announcement of the final winners, you would appreciate the value of this Warning. Those who have failed in previous contests are eligible to enter the next contest.

NOTE: In the gardens of the Chateau de Lude in France. It was such scenes that the French chevaliers, the forefathers of the modern Creoles, left behind them to establish the colony of Nouvelle Orleans (New Orleans). The Creoles are of pure French and Spanish blood, and their wonderful hair is a mark of their descent as well as of the care given it. They have always retained the "secrets de toilette" as well as the charm bequeathed them by their aristocratic ancestors.

For Beautiful Hair

Take the advice of highest medical authorities

EVERYONE (men, women and children) should have healthy hair. Nature provided it in the beginning. Proper treatment will preserve it through life.

The most eminent authorities have prescribed the way to prevent the loss of the hair's life and luxuriance.

Simple directions

Two or three times a week apply "La Creole" Hair Tonic to the scalp. Moisten the hair and scalp thoroughly. Massage with a rotary motion of the finger tips. Scalp circulation is then stimulated, the hair roots supplied with needed nourishment and dandruff quickly eliminated. You will notice an immediate improvement in the loveliness of your hair.

Proper shampooing

Absolute cleanliness is essential for beautiful, healthy hair. The scalp is constantly throwing off old skin and extraneous substances. If the pores and hair tubes are clogged with dirt and perspiration, a healthy condition is impossible. Regularly every ten days or two weeks shampoo the hair thoroughly with "La Creole" Liquid Shampoo.

"La Creole" Liquid Shampoo is made from an exclusive Menthol formula of purest coconut and cochin oils. You will instantly notice the delightful, cooling effect from its use. The hair becomes soft and lustrous—dries quickly—and the scalp and pores glow with clean health and vigor. Always apply "La Creole" Hair Tonic after shampooing. When purchasing "La Creole" Liquid Shampoo be sure to get "La Creole" Hair Tonic also, because the formula of each is designed to aid the other.

Highest authorities

The Council of the American Medical Association (the highest authority known) has recognized Resorcinol Monoacetate for the treatment of dandruff (seborrheal eczema) and baldness (alopecia-areata)—the common foes of beautiful hair. Resorcinol Monoacetate is the principal ingredient of "La Creole" Hair Tonic. Thus science approves this wonderful preparation. Abundant vigorous hair is now easily attained.

The Oliver Typewriter—Was $100—Now $64

The Guarantee of a $2,000,000 Company that it Is the Identical Model

Be your own salesman and earn $36 You get the identical typewriter formerly priced $100—not a cent's alteration in value. The finest, the most expensive, the latest Oliver Model. Old methods were wasteful. Our new plan is way in advance. It is in keeping with new economic tendencies. It does away with waste. Inflated prices are doomed forever.

During the war we learned that it was unnecessary to have great numbers of traveling salesmen and numerous, expensive branch houses throughout the country. We were also able to discontinue many other superfluous, costly sales methods. You benefit by these savings.

Brand New—Latest Model

Do not confuse this with offers of earlier models, rebuilt or second-hand. Note the signature of this advertisement. This is a $2,000,000 concern.

We offer new Olivers at half price because we have put typewriter selling on an efficient, scientific basis.

You can now deal direct—sell to yourself, with no one to influence you. This puts the Oliver on a merit test.

You Save $36 Now

This is the first time in history that a new standard $100 typewriter has been offered for $64. Remember, we do not offer a substitute model, cheaper nor different. But the same splendid Oliver used by the big concerns. Over 800,000 Olivers have been sold.

We ship direct from the factory to you. No money down—no red-tape. Try the Oliver Nine at our expense. If you decide to keep it, send us $4 per month. If you return it, we even refund the out-going transportation charges. You are not placed under the slightest obligation. That's our whole plan.

We rely on your judgment. We know you don't want to pay double. And who wants a lesser typewriter? You may have an Oliver for free trial by checking the coupon below. Or you may ask for further information.

An Amazing Book

All the secrets of the typewriter world are revealed in our startling book entitled "The High Cost of Typewriters—The Reason and the Remedy"—sent free if you mail the coupon now. Also our catalog. Order your free-trial Oliver—or ask for further information at once. Canadian Price, $82

IMPORTANT NOTICE

Due to unforeseen conditions, it has been impossible to announce the final results of the Greatest of All Popularity Contests in this issue. The final votes have been tabulated, however, and a complete announcement, with the interesting last-minute developments, will be printed next month, and also in the January number of the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

Stage Plays of Interest

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Belasco.—"One," with Frances Starr. Edward Knoblock's opus of twin sisters with but half a soul apiece. Neither sister can get along without the other, hence the drama. Miss Starr plays the twins. Mr. Belasco's handling of this play saves it from slipping over the line from serious drama.

Bijou.—"The Charm School." An appealing light comedy with music, based upon Alice Duer Miller's story of the handsome young bachelor who inherits a young ladies' finishing school. Minnie Dupree, James Gleason, Sam Hardy and Marie Carroll are effective.

Booth.—"Happy-Go-Lucky." Ran a long time in London as "Tilly of Bloomsbury." A typical British comedy by Ian Hay. O. P. Heggie runs away with the comedy as the bailiff's bibulous aid.

Broadhurst.—"The Guest of Honor," with William Hodge. A typical sugar-coated Hodge vehicle, in which virtue is shriekingly triumphant. Nowhere near life, but pleasantly bunkum.

Casino.—"Honeydew." Pleasant musical entertainment with charming score by Efreim Zimbalist, the violinist. Mlle. Marguerite and Frank Gill score with their dancing.

Central.—"The Poor Little Ritz Girl." A musical play enjoying a long run. Andrew Tombs heads the cast.

Century.—"Mecca." A gorgeous and elaborately colorful "mosaic in music and mime" of ancient Egypt along the lines of "Chu Chin Chow." "Mecca" achieves several rarely beautiful moments in the ballet interludes created by Michel Fokine. A huge cast and fourteen scenes.

Century Promenade.—New York's newest dinner and midnight entertainment, "The Century Review" and "The Midnight Rounders." Colorful girl shows for the tired business man. A delightful place to eat.

Cohan and Harris.—"Welcome Stranger." Aaron Hoffman's story of a Shylock in a New England town. Presents the battle of Jew and gentile in a way that the Hebrew gets much the best of it, teaching a whole town kindness and religious toleration. George Sidney is excellent as the twentieth century Shylock.

Eltinge.—"Ladies' Night." About the most daring comedy yet attempted on Broadway. This passes from the boudoir zone to the Turkish bath on ladies' night. Not only skates on thin ice, but smashes thru now and then. John Cumberland is admirable.

Empire.—"Call the Doctor." Jean Archibald's slender little comedy built around a charming feminine doctor of domestic difficulties. The production shows David Belasco's smooth stage direction and is very well acted, particularly by Janet Beecher as the physician in question.

Forty-fourth Street.—D. W. Griffith's master-production of the rural melodrama, "Way Down East." Splendid in many ways with many moving moments and the biggest—and most thrilling—climax since the ride of the clausen in "The Birth of a Nation."

Fulton.—"Enter, Madame." The best thing—dramatically speaking—in New York at the present moment. A vivid study in artistic temperament: the story of a butterfly opera singer, Gilda Varesi strikes fire in this rôle and gives a superb performance. Norman Trevor plays her husband admirably.

Henry Miller's Theater.—"The Famous Mrs. Fair." Able drama dealing with the feminine problem of a career or a home. Skillfully written by James Forbes, with unusual playing by Blanche Bates, Henry Miller and Margalo Gilmore.

Hippodrome.—"Good Times." Another big and picturesque Hippodrome spectacle. Nothing like it anywhere else on earth. Plenty of entertainment.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else.

Palace.—Keith vaudeville. The home of America's best variety bills and the foremost music hall in the world. Always an attractive vaudeville bill.

Plymouth.—"Little Old New York." Rida Johnson Young's delightful but fragile little romance of New York in 1810, with John Jacob Astor, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Peter Delmonico and Washington Irving among its characters. Genevieve Tobin runs away with the piece—and scores one of the biggest personal successes of many seasons. Here is a Maude Adams in the making.

Republic.—"The Lady of the Lamp." A fanciful and highly colored fantasy by Earl Carroll. Built about an opium dream which reveals a tragic romance of old China. A certain charm is here. George Gaul is admirable and Henry Herbert gives a remarkable portrayal of a sinister Manchu chieftain of centuries ago.

Selwyn.—"Tickle Me." An Arthur Hammerstein early autumn show with the amusing Frank Tinney starred. Considerable fun, some tuneful music and a very personable chorus. Likewise gorgeous costuming.

Shubert.—"Greenwich Village Follies of 1920." Gorgeous and beautiful, as is typical of John Murray Anderson productions. Here is a musical entertainment with imagination and charm. James Reynolds has created some remarkable scenes and costumes and the whole ensemble is vivid and colorful.

Times Square Theater.—"The Mirage," with Florence Reed. The first offering in Broadway's newest theater. Edgar Selwyn's drama of New York's easiest way: the tale of a country girl who comes to the white lights and forgets her ideals. Miss Reed plays the girl and prominent in the cast are Alan Dinehart, Malcolm Williams and Florence Nash.

Winter Garden.—"Broadway Beauties." Another typical Winter Garden revue, sans satire but plus girls. Bert Williams furnishes most of the real fun, altho Eddie Cantor and George LeMaire are also present.

ON TOUR

"Crooked Gamblers." A lively and thrilling comedy-melo of the financial district, in which a guileless young inventor of auto tires defeats the Wolf of Wall Street. Taylor Holmes starred.

"Foot-Loose," with Emily Stevens. Zoe Akins' well-done modernization of the old melodrama, "Forget-Me-Not."

"Cinderella on Broadway," Typical girl entertainment designed for the tired business man. The extravaganza is based upon the fairy adventures of Cinderella. Plenty of girls, passable music, attractive costumes and a little humor.

"Scrambled Wives." Another typical farce built on a series of misunderstandings. A divorced couple try to hide their first wedding from their new marriage alliances. Rather bright and amusing. Roland Young is excellent.

George White's Scandals of 1920. Lively and well-thought-out musical revue with lavish and swiftly changing scenes, plus many pretty girls. Paint succeeds stockings and tights in

Screen Stories in Demand

Before sending your photoplays and stories out on the market, be careful to have them first put in proper form and language. The "Detailed Synopsis" is preferred by the studios, as almost every producing company now has its own scenario form, and it would be an utter impossibility for outside writers to learn them all. But, a "Detailed Synopsis" can be used by any company, and, if accepted, will be "picturized" by their own writers to suit their own requirements.

We CRITICISE, REVISE, and TYPE photoplays and stories at reasonable rates, which will be furnished on application. After REVISION, we return the same Carbon Copy and Original, to the writer, along with a complete list of PRODUCING COMPANIES, to whom scripts may be sent directly. This is the method now universally adopted by both studios and writers, and it has been found to work admirably, as it is a distinct advantage to the writers, who thus come into personal touch with the Studio Editors and Directors.

Mr. T. Herbert Chesnut ("Allan Douglas Brodie"), short story writer, photoplaywright and screen actor, who has made many friends among writers thruout the English-speaking world during the past five years, is now Editor of our SCENARIO DEPARTMENT, and will be happy to extend every courtesy to our patrons.

We assure the readers of MOTION PICTURE, CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND that we shall be glad to give them every assistance in our power. Send stamp for further information.

Stage Plays of Interest

several numbers. Ann Pennington is the shining light of the revue.

"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else from the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlynn is a brilliant Lincoln.

"William Cook's 'Silks and Satins." Another musical revue, but we doubt if it will even appeal to the tired business man. Ernestine Myers, the dancer, stands out.

"Honey Girl." Lively musical comedy built about the brisk race-track comedy, "Checkers." This has speed and humor—as well as an excellent cast.

"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneful little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent.

"Not So Long Ago." A fragile and charming little comedy by a newcomer, Arthur Richman, telling a story of picturesque New York in the early seventies. Genuinely delightful. Finely played by Eva Le Gallienne, Sidney Blackmar and an excellent cast.

"Jane Clegg." St. John Ervine's powerful drama, presented by the Theater Guild, has been running in New York all season. A drab but brilliant tale of middle-class English life.

"The Hottentot," with Willie Collier. Typical one-man farce with the inimitable farceur, Collier, at his best. Full of laughs.

"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "sexette." Here is a revival that revives.

"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire.

"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. June Walker and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles.

"The Girl in the Limousine." A decidedly daring boudoir farce by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white bed is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening.

"Nightie Night." Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger and some daring.

"The Magic Melody." A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting.

LOVE IS DEAF

By JOHN HANLON

Once I heard a symphony,

Sublime chord on chord,

As music won Eurydice

For her lonely lord;—

Tho 'twas tonal ecstasy

I was bored.

Once I heard a woman play

Tunes she scarcely knew

In a fumbling, halting way,

Discords not a few;—

I could listen all the day;

It was you!

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—plan work, he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution of agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for story writers, weekly copy 25c, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching services, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES

Dead Men Tell No Tales

DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES

DEAD MEN TELL NO TALES

"OH, MOTHER My story's accepted!"

'Tis the thrilling moment of her life

OUT of "the rainbow gleams of her youthful dreams" has come The Great Reward! The happy sequel to all her burning hopes—her eager aspirations! The magazine editor has accepted her story. His letter brings the happy news.

She moves as one in a daze. "Can it really be true?" she asks herself over and over. And all the while she glows with the pride of authorship, her aspiring spirit transformed in the bewilderment of this new triumph. 'Tis life's deepest moment for her.

She has crossed the Golden Rubicon! Enthralled, she stands upon the threshold of a New Life! She is at last—"AN AUTHORRESS!" The story she has written, filled with fresh, bright realism, stirring incident and sparkling dialogue—written out of her very heart—painted in glowing words upon the Screen of Romance, will be read by thousands, thousands!

But yesterday, in her girlish fancy, she deeply envied those who live and move in that fascinating sphere, the Realm of Authorship. But yesterday her hopes mingled with her fears, her doubts of herself, her simple lack of faith in her ability "TO WRITE." But yesterday she deemed well-nigh impossible the triumph that has come to her today!

But yesterday her life was a dull, drear grind in a department store. In her little niche behind the notion counter her girl's soul was slowly shriveling. The drab, grey life was deadening every spark of hope within her. Thinking of her youth and yearnings, she would oft' hopefully repeat to herself those lines from some beautiful book, "It is the Spring! It is the Spring! And Life is so FULL of Flowers! Ah, surely some of them are MINE!" But there was the monotony, the dull servitude, from 8 to 6—it never varied—it went on and on and on—a dumb fate that seemed to stare her in the face forever, just as it might be pictured in a story by O. Henry.

Not that all girls are unhappy who work in stores, but she—she dreamed of higher things. She wanted more out of life than the grey, humdrum existence. Why should Success be a thing OTHERS could attain and not she? She had two good hands and a brain—she was intelligent, observing, and though not a genius, surely, she told herself, she could learn to write stories as good as hundreds she had seen.

One day her sweet-faced mother noticed a small advertisement in a magazine. It said: "Free to writers—this wonderful book. Tells How to Write Plays and Stories." "Here, Dorothy dear," said Mrs. Dean, "here is something about writing stories and plays. Here's a concern offering a free book on the subject. Why not get it? See what they can do for you? You never can tell—maybe you really can learn how to write the way you've dreamed so long, and just think how wonderful that would be!"

The Authors' Press has this young woman's letter on file. She wrote for our free book—and the picture above tells the happy sequel.

This is a true story, as startling as it is romantic, and here is the most startling thing of all—a remarkable discovery that will thrill ambitious men and women of all ages throughout the world! The discovery is that: MILLIONS OF PEOPLE CAN WRITE STORIES AND PHOTOPLAYS AND DON'T KNOW IT!

(Nine)

For years the mistaken idea prevailed that you had to have a special knack in order to write. People said it was a gift, a talent. Some imagined you had to be an Emotional Genius with long hair and strange ways. They vowed it was no use to try unless you'd been touched by the Magic Wand of the Muse. They discouraged attempts of ambitious people to express themselves.

Yet only recently a great English literary authority declared that "nearly all the English-speaking race want to write! It's a craving for self-expression, characteristic of the present century."

So a new light has dawned! A great New Truth that will gladden the hearts of "all the English-speaking race who want to write!" Astonishing new psychological experiments have revealed that "the average person" may learn to write! Yes, write stories and photoplays; thrilling, human, life-like; filled with heart-throbs, pathos, passion, pain.

You may learn it just as you may learn anything else under the sun! There are certain simple, easy principles to guide you. There are new methods that produce astonishing results for beginners. A remarkable New System, covering every phase of writing, has been perfected by a great literary bureau at Auburn, New York, now busily supplying this information broadcast. And this New Method of writing; stories and photoplays is everybody's property. Not for the select few. Not for those specially gifted. Not for the rich or fortunate, but for men and women of ordinary education and no writing experience whatever—thousands who don't even dream they can write!

This institution at Auburn is the world's school for inexperienced authors—a literary institute for all humanity. And everybody is taking up the idea of writing. The fascination has swept the country by storm! People are dumbfounded at the ease with which they learn to write!

You know it was Shakespeare who said: "All the world's a stage and all the men and women merely players." Life's stage all around you is filled with people and incidents that will make stories without number. From the great Screen of Humanity and its constantly changing tide of Human Emotions—Love, Hatred, Jealousy, Happiness—you can create endless interesting plots for stories and photoplays. There is never a lack—it flows on in an Endless Stream of Circumstance—like Tennyson's brook—forever! Every person you know is a type, a character. "Every house has a story." And those who dwell within have impulses, ideas, hopes, fears, fancies that furnish material for you. The daily newspapers are filled to the brim. The Footlights of Fate reflect scenes and incidents for the Pen of Realism.

There is nothing in all this world that so dominates the heart and mind as the fascination of WRITING. It gives you a new power, a new magic, that charms all those around you. It lends a new attraction to your entire personality. Authorship carries with it new honors, admiration, respect—in addition to glorious material rewards.

THERE IS A NEW BOOK AWAITING YOU THAT AMAZES EVERY READER—and the most amazing thing of all is—IT'S FREE! This new book is pouring glad sunshine into the lives of aspiring people who want to become writers. Within its covers are surprises and revelations for doubting beginners that have caused a sensation everywhere, because it is crowded with things that gratify your expectations—good news that is dear to the heart of all those aspiring to write; illustrations that enthrall; stories of success, brilliant instances of literary fame coming unexpectedly; new hope, encouragement, helps, hints—things you've long wanted to know!

"The Wonder Book for Writers" tells how stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many suddenly realize they can write, after years of doubt and indecision. How the scenario stars began. How they quickly rose to fame and fortune. How ordinary incidents become thrilling stories and plays through these New Easy Methods that simplify everything! How one's imagination properly directed may bring glory and greatness. How to really test your natural writing ability. How stories and plays are built up step by step. How to turn uncertainty into Success.

This book and all its secrets are YOURS! You may have a copy absolutely free. You need not send a penny. You need not feel obligated. You need not hesitate for ANY reason. The book will be mailed to you without any charge whatever.

There is no need to let your laudable ambition stand still—no need to starve the Noble Flame that burns at the Altar of your Dearest Hope, no need to wait, to wish—to merely dream of being a writer. Your brilliant opportunity, your golden chance, is HERE AND NOW! Get your pencil—use the coupon below. This little act may prove the big, lucky stroke of your Destiny!

"The clear, smooth, flawless complexion you long for—does it seem to you a special gift of nature that only a fortunate few can hope to possess?"

Facts about her skin that every girl should know

IS your skin a constant source of worry to you? Do you find its care continually perplexing? The clear, smooth, flawless complexion you long for—does it seem to you a special gift of nature that only a fortunate few can hope to possess?

You are wrong if you think that a beautiful skin comes merely as the result of good fortune. Any girl, by giving the skin the special care its special needs demand, can win the charm of a smooth, clear, soft complexion.

How to keep your skin fine in texture

Perhaps the pores of your skin are becoming enlarged. If so, your skin is not functioning properly—the pores are not contracting and expanding as they should. To restore your skin to healthy, normal activity and give it back the fine, smooth delicacy it should have, begin tonight to give it this special treatment:

Just before you go to bed, dip your washcloth in very warm water and hold it to your face. Now take a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap, dip it in water, and rub the cake itself over your skin. Leave the slight coating of soap on a few minutes until your face feels drawn and dry. Then dampen the skin and rub the soap in gently with an upward and outward motion. Rinse your face thoroughly, first in tepid water, then in cold. Whenever possible, finish by rubbing your face with a piece of ice.

Use this treatment persistently, and it will bring about a marked improvement in your skin's texture.

Special treatments for each different skin condition are given in the famous booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Get a cake today and begin using your treatment tonight. A 25-cent cake lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment, or for general cleansing use. Sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada.

"Your treatment for one week"

Send 25 cents for a beautiful little set of Woodbury's skin preparations containing your complete Woodbury treatment for one week

You will find, first, the booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," telling you the special treatment your skin needs; then a trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap—enough for seven nights of any treatment; samples of the new Woodbury's Facial Cream, Woodbury's Cold Cream and Woodbury's Facial Powder. Write today for this special new Woodbury outfit. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 912 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 912 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario.

Shadowing Kismet

all the haunting old love songs. The mechanics of the movies, that pitiless hamme. ng of stage carpenters and electricians, was strangely absent. The illusion was as perfect as if we had been in front of the footlights. Even the rustle of the queen of the harem's beads sounded a note of something imminent, something great impending.

"When you finish 'Kismet' will you do another picture?" I inquired.

"It all depends how this picture turns out," he replied; "if I am rotten in this, never again! If it is a success, I shall undoubtedly do others."

And right there one touches the chord of Otis Skinner's being. He has no desire to be attached, be it ever so ephemerally, to—a failure. What he does must be of the very best caliber. He loves most that which attracts the greatest success. He has passed beyond the persistent stage of youth which stubbornly stamps its foot and hews and whacks its way out of the barriers that hinder it. Otis Skinner has reached the age where a rough road in life means a detour. His is the philosophy of the person who has arrived.

He has long since passed the stage of growing pains. He sees life as it is. Is the gossamer veil of romance rent into shreds, you ask? No, indeed—for his is the power to recreate romance. Sitting in the green glare of the Klieg-lights, he recounted for me the story of 'Kismet,' and by the tones of his voice alone transported

"HOW did you happen to fall for the hated movies?" thus I greeted Otis Skinner, very nearly the only great actor on our stage today, who has up to this time zealously repudiated any art in pictures and steadfastly refused munificent offers to see himself as others see him.

The entrance of Otis Skinner into the celluloid world marked the inevitable surrender of all the great stage celebrities to the lure of the screen. Mr. Skinner will be seen shortly in a film version of his former stage success, "Kismet"

"Why pick on me," he retorted, "I know dozens of actors right here in Hollywood who hate pictures . . . but—the money . . ."

I pricked up my ears, this promised to be an extraordinary interview.

"Seriously," he added, "'Kismet' is going to be a very beautiful picture."

He motioned to the scene on the border line of which we were sitting. It was the harem scene from "Kismet" which Mr. Skinner played so long and so successfully on the stage. At our feet lapped the cool, green water of the sunken swimming pool, beyond rose the purple and gold walls of the palace. Enormous silken cushions, as wide and broad and deep as I am tall, were huddled invitingly against papier-maché marble pillars. In the background an accordion player wailed fragments of me into a story-book world—but the false sentimentality of youth is gone. It is not likely that he would mope over the past, or long for a departed favorite. He is interested solely in the play of today. The play that attracts the widest popular applause is the one he loves the best.

He says that stage people are not completely understood. He quoted Henry Arthur Jones as saying, "all actors are rotters" and then added "that erudite gentleman tried to write plays for the 'rotters.' Of course, he failed.

"Many actors make the mistake of thinking the applause, the notes, the flowers are tributes to them personally and become big-headed or pig-headed as the case may be. That is why you see the strutters, the poseurs. The audience is perpetually mistaking the part the player is playing with the man himself. They ascribe to him all the virtues of the stage character he is portraying, while in real life he may go home and beat his wife."

"What do you think of matinee girls?" I asked.

"Matinee girls?"

God bless them! Where would we be without them? We have to have someone to buy the tickets, you know."

Otis Skinner is a jovial gentleman with a vast fund of humor. He possesses all the witticism of the accomplished raconteur. This is as it should be, for all that is best in the traditions of the stage are a part of him. All that is best in literature and art, he is familiar with.

In spite of his erstwhile persistent hatred of the silent drama, he has not entered it with ignorance. He now goes to see movies indefatigably. He knew what others had done and were doing in the shadows before he stepped into the camera's glare.

What he hates most about pictures is their trite melodrama, their persistent namby-pambyness; what he likes about them is their ability to present the beautiful.

He said, "People told me I should find a vast difference in the mechanics of the movies and the stage. I see very little difference in the required methods. A little slowing down of action to give the camera time to register—that's all."

Mr. Skinner is tremendously interested in all that pertains to his picture, "Kismet." He wants the scenes to be the most beautiful that have ever been erected. He is enthusiastic over the costumes and he marvels at the way a whole city street by the villain, and return somewhere off-stage to get renovated. Not that you ever expect 'props' to get off all the grime. That's out of

When James Kirkwood made his screen debut, the majority of the now-known "pioneers" were "extras" at the studio, making five dollars a day. He became a director after playing every kind of part in one- and two-reelers, and finally joined the Famous Players, where he directed Jack Barrymore, Hazel Dawn and Florence Reed. Now he has again taken up the grease-paint, and, judging from his popularity as a player he won't have much opportunity to discard it the question. 'Props' is 'props,' and he'll un-spot you enough so that the dear fans won't think you are sporting sartorial novelties.

"This leading-man life has the directorial existence skinned a mile?" I again ventured.

THERES an intangible something to James Kirkwood which you simply have to describe as "personality." Not that it is expressed either in a loud voice or a jazz shirt, after the fashion of some of our other screen leading men, but, nevertheless, it's all there.

Kirkwood has come back to the screen after quite a lengthy directorial absence. The traditional grease-paint and handsome-hero stuff is a relief, he says, after the strenuous duties of a megaphone manipulator, and hereafter he's quite satisfied to leave the direction end of the movie game to whatever gentlemen may be disposed to shoulder its burdens.

The solid comfort enjoyed only by that variety of the human species known as motion picture stars—the solid comfort relative to having even the minutest speck of dust brushed from the coat-tail of one's suit by a fourth-assistant property boy, was being enjoyed by Kirkwood when I cornered him in a brilliantly lighted cubby-hole of a stage at Ince's, where he is working in a Glauum picture.

Kirkwood enjoyed himself ostensibly. Oh, so ostensibly! In fact, as ostensibly as only one who is accustomed to the joys of an actorial existence can possibly enjoy himself. Languidly he held up one arm while "props" with a whiskbroom hacked away at a dust smear. A broad smile o'erspread the Kirkwood countenance.

"Oh," he almost yawned, "I'm so lazy. So darned lazy! Too lazy, even, to doll myself up. And very happy! This is the penalty one pays for being a cinema hero. You mess up and get messed do unto you. You, whether you be mother, son or daughter, can understand how a mother's heart must be wrung and torn upon reading the various articles purporting to tell the truth but, in reality, the lowest order of cowardly attack by men and women who enter your home under the guise of

At the age of three, surprising as it may seem, Theda was a blonde of the fairest type. Then, every night her prayer was something like this: "Please, dear God, make me a tall lady wif black hair and wif black eyes and have a 'nana (banana) under my pillow in the morning." Above, Theda Bara, at the ages of three and four, and below with her sister, Loro, and her mother

WOULD you like to know the real Theda Bara? Perhaps you wonder if there is a real Theda Bara and not just a reel one, after the many contradictory things you have read about her in magazines, newspapers, etc. Victor Hugo, I believe, said, "Art is a corner of life seen thru a personality," and if I may be permitted to paraphrase, "A personality is a corner of life seen thru a press-agent or an interviewer. It is a difficult task, indeed, for any one to tell the exact truth about any person, and more especially if that person is an artist who is a strange mixture of moods, paradoxes and complexities—but this is the task that I, her mother, have set for myself.

In the four-and-a-half years that Theda Bara has served you—her fans and friends—much that was malicious, cruel and untrue has been written about her and I feel that the time has come when one who knows her in the most intimate sense possible should at least attempt something that represents a true presentation—or close-up of herself, if you prefer.

To those of you who have grown to love her—and there are many, God bless you—my task is an easy one. To those of you who hold otherwise, you at least, in your hearts, have the desire to see fair-play—to render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and so I ask you to read this article with an open-mindedness that simply follows the good old rule of doing unto others as you would have them friendliness and who go away and outrage every law of hospitality, good-breeding and honor by printing that which is far more contemptible than lies—half truths. If you, in your life's experience, have ever made a statement and afterwards heard it falsified and garbled beyond recognition by malicious people so that you burnt with the outrage and insult, you can, perhaps, in a measure, realize the heavy, heavy heartaches that have been the portion of a girl named Theda Bara.

Perhaps you think a mother is so blinded by her love and maternal pride that she is unable to present an impersonal picture. Read and judge then, for I shall tell you of her faults as well as her virtues.

Perhaps I had better begin back a good many years ago, with myself—I, like most French children, was christened with a long string of names. Pauline Louise Françoise (etc., etc., etc., etc.) de Coppet. My mother and father died when I was a small child and I, with my dear sister, was left in charge of a guardian, mutually appointed by my dear parents before their death. MADGE KENNEDY was practically en route the other day, when she, none the less, very graciously served me tea and chicken sandwiches at the Ritz Carleton. She was about to take a plunge into atavism (to which I shall devote a paragraph anon) and had, prior to the plunge, to buy a hat, gifts for the staff at the studio, a book for her husband to peruse on the trip, et cetera ad infinitum.

With the liberality of time, characteristic of the person with many things to do, Miss Kennedy was enthusiastic and eager to talk about her new stage play and was reading, incidentally, The Life of Leonardo Da Vinci—not that that has anything to do with the play.

The plunge into atavism heretofore mentioned is better described by a trip Miss Kennedy and her husband were about to embark upon the morning after our talk.

They were traveling, Miss Kennedy explained, in rather caravan fashion, caravan à la mode it might be said. First Mr. Bolster and herself in the Mercer, followed by the chauffeur, the maid and the impedimenta of camping in the Ford.

They were heading first of all for Quebec, pitching their tents in the resinous woods by night, wearing riding habits and khaki in general, and stopping every second or third day at some hotel to taste, momentarily, of civilization ere retiring again to the forests primeval.

"Such preparation as we have been undergoing at home!" Miss Kennedy laughed; "First of all a room was set apart to collect things in. The 'things' began with a folding cot and a luncheon basket. Since then they have swelled to amazing proportions. There is a most motley collection inclusive of famous old middys of mine, riding skirts, one's favorite books, fishing tackle and huge boots. It will be refreshing, tho, much more so than a conventional vacation at a conventional hotel. It will give us time to breathe and time to think and time to recreate ourselves. In the pictures life has been, for me, just one gown after another—clothes, clothes, clothes . . . Oh, how good the old middy and the riding skirt will seem!"

Lofty green branches and running pebbly brooks and lilt of birds, and all free, unfettered woodland things seemed mirrored at that moment in her face . . .

I asked her about her play; how she felt about returning to the speaking stage after her three-year absence therefrom; what were her sentiments upon leaving the studio life, etc., etc.

"As for the screen," she said, "I feel that I have been very unfortunate in my stories, my material. I feel disappointed in the work I have done; the work I have not done. Still, it was not standing still, because it is a part of my philosophy that no experience is without growth, without an accruing benefit. All told, I simply feel as tho I were laying down one vehicle and taking up another.

"I am unspeakably enthusiastic over my play, 'Cornered.' It is a melodrama, which is a new field for me, but it provides me with plenty of delicious comedy, and it runs a gamut of emotions, never for an instant losing track of the human touch. Which is, of course, the essential element. My part in 'Cornered,' and I dare go on record as saying this, is the best woman's part in—well, in my time. It is so varied, so complete.

"I have read plays, plays, plays for the past three years and this is the first one that has so much as intrigued my interest. I had determined never to return to the stage until I had found the, to my mind, the play . . ."

(Twenty-one)

"You believe, then," I interpolated, plagiaristically, "that 'The play's the thing?'"

Miss Kennedy was emphatic.

"The only thing," she said; "absolutely the whole thing. In 'Cornered,' for instance, any girl with an air of breeding could play my part; the play is all . . ."

"That savors of self-depreciation," I said.

"I hope not," said Miss Kennedy, thoughtfully; "really, I

"I always feel that a person bearing within him an art should consider that art as a flame to be tended, to be kept clean and bright," said Miss Kennedy, "I believe that one should conserve one's self for this flame; guard one's self; watch over it. It is a lamp to be tended and trimmed"

The New Zealand Bushranger

WHAT is a New Zealand bushranger?

That is precisely the first question I asked Mr. Patrick, whose Christian name is Jerome.

"An outlaw," he told me.

"And yet Mr. Belasco always called you the New Zealand bushranger?"

He nodded assent.

I stared more closely—mayhap more rudely (but interviewers are privileged creatures) at the powerful male person seeking with me that oasis in the Lasky studio, a cool spot. He was wearing white jeans and a grey coat. His method of wearing them bespoke the man who seeks tailors who build clothes to fit him, not mold him in stock clothes. His physique is muscular, he gives the impression of dapper solidity, of a healthy sophistication, of a man whose traits are all masculine and who is nevertheless an artist. And withal he is redolent of Broadway and all the best things for which Broadway, New York, stands.

"An outlaw," and the more I gazed at him the less I saw anything which would render that term applicable.

But David Belasco always calls Jerome Patrick, "that New Zealand bushranger,"

Mr. Jerome Patrick is primarily of the stage. He was born in New Zealand and his parents destined him first for the priesthood, and then a doctor's career. For a while he tried the latter and practised at medicine and dentistry, but his leaning toward the stage only increased until he finally decided to leave home. He appeared with Lenore Ulric in "The Heart of Wetona," and his first screen appearance was in "Officer 666" and who am I to argue with Belasco? To speak of Belasco is only natural when one is with Mr. Patrick, for to that virile young man, Belasco is the god of all things as they should be and the father of his career.

For Jerome Patrick is primarily of the stage. He loves it, it is his mate.

"If I thought I would never tread the boards again, I would want to pass out," he said, and he meant it. The stage means more to him than life itself.

Jerome Patrick was born in New Zealand, of very religious and perhaps slightly narrow-minded parents. They destined him—when they found he wouldn't be a priest—to be a doctor. For a while he tried to fit his square personality into a round hole and practised at medicine and also at dentistry, but his leaning towards the stage only became greater as the days passed.

The inevitable climax

HUNT up your memorandum book right now and in it write two words: Jerome Storm. For you are going to hear more of this individual with the cognomen of troubled atmosphere. Before long, too, for Storm is now directing Lillian Gish upon her first appearance as a star.

If you are a real movie fan, you already know Storm as Charlie Ray's director. Which, of course, stamps him as unusual and necessarily possessing a human and sympathetic hand. But the Ray-Storm partnership was broken to permit the formation of Jerome Storm Productions, for the director has gone the way of all directors who do anything above the average. Storm is temporarily directing Miss Gish, pending the launching of his own organization.

We are willing to stake our judgment back of the statement that Storm will go a considerable distance. Because—but let us go back to the beginning.

Storm came thru the usual film mill. His career moved past the regular milestones: theatrical barn-storming, California studios in the pioneer days, and so on.

Born in Colorado, he went on the stage at Elitch's Gardens, where regularly a stellar stock company played each summer. After that came seasons behind the footlights. Finally came California and the movies.

Storm became an actor at Inceville, that pioneer training school of stars, actors and directors. Chet Withey, the present director and recent maker of "Romance," was playing "heavies" there in those days. Frank Borzage, still another recent directorial discovery and the maker of "Humoresque," was acting there. Mildred Harris was playing child parts. Sessue Hayakawa and Tsuru Aoki were featured players. But, more important to this tale, Charlie Ray was a player at the Ince studio. Indeed, the first words Storm heard around the Ince "lot," were spoken in an argument between two actors as to which was the better "heavy," Withey or Ray. In those days, Charlie was doing deep-dyed villains and doing them vividly.

At Inceville started the early friendship of Ray and Storm. "Oddly, my strongest early impression of Ray came about thru the fact that I was cast for an Irish rôle which had been intended for him," says Storm. "Everyone shook his head and said I would have to go some to fill the part.

"Of course, everyone knows how Ray stepped gradually from heavies and character rôles to his present style of part—and to success. While success was coming to him I was being graduated from acting to directing. My first production was Elnid Bennett's 'Keys of the Righteous.'

"When the opportunity came to direct Ray I was delighted. I started with 'The Girl Dodger' and directed him in all his productions up to the time we severed connections, making this step for our mutual benefit. 'Peaceful Valley' was my last Ray production. You know how easy it is to slip into a rut. We thought the best thing all round was to try new fields, as it were.

"Let me express my great admiration for Ray as an artist. I honestly think he stands alone. Impressed with his humanness, film fans underestimate his histrionic ability. He is past master of every technical trick. Every effort is carefully conceived and worked out. It has always seemed uncanny how this boy, who, in reality, knows but little of the varying phases of life, can understand and reflect them upon the screen. Working with him as long as I did, I know him to be a great artist in his particular line of playing, altho he is a big boy at heart."

Which is praise, indeed. Storm, too, gives Ray every credit for the success of his vehicles. There is nothing of the typical self-assertive screen director about him. Storm, in reality, is wholly unassuming and likable. The generous and sane way he praises others and the way he subordinates himself, point to a well poised and clear thinking mind.

He has very sharply defined ideas about the photoplay. He is going to center his interest as a producer upon small town stories, because he believes they best reflect the healthy average of American life. The Case of Norma Talmadge

By
FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

THE possibility of writing a verbatim chat with Norma Talmadge is quite beyond our ken. Miss Talmadge cannot be interviewed in that fashion. She does not pose placidly before an interviewer and recite her likes and dislikes, her ideas of art and the movies, her opinions upon the way things should be. Emphatically, she does not.

Norma Talmadge is not that sort of star.

She strikes us as an every-day sort of American young woman elevated to high estate by the cinema. Also it seems to us that she is quite willing to be considered in this fashion. Any attempt to gild a personality, we suspect, would stir her sense of humor.

Said sense of humor impressed us most of all. This—and her very easy going outlook upon life.

We know that the League of Nations, the Bolshevik bugaboo and the problem of capitol and labor concern Miss Talmadge not a whit. The average girl is interested in other things—and so is Miss Talmadge. Again, the average star would try to impress you as vitally alive on every topic, but Miss Talmadge is not the average star.

We like her sincerity and her lack of pose.

Because she does not unfold a colorful—and doubtlessly carefully created—personality for one's inspection, it must not lead you to think she looks down upon the photoplay.

We can well believe that stardom is a mixture of work and good fun for her. She isn't the sort of person to slight things.

When we interviewed Miss Talmadge, she curled up comfortably in a huge arm chair and ran her hands rather hopelessly thru her hair. We represented her third interview of the day.

Then she summoned a maid with tea and cinnamon toast, (at least, teat and toast were among the things brought), and settled back into her chair.

It developed that:

Miss Talmadge admires Nazimova immensely.

That she dislikes most of her recent pictures and is terribly disappointed in them.

That she is a sort of older sister-mother for the family, which, incidentally, means that she keeps a careful eye upon the harum-scarum Constance. "Someone has to get Connie to the studio," she sighed.

That she is so tired at night that she either rests completely or goes to the theater for recreation. Sometimes she reads a magazine story or two.

That she likes to play every-day sort of people.

Photograph by Royal Atalier, N. Y.

That temperament amuses her a whole lot. That—

Is our pen portrait still vague? Perhaps, we should go back to our first meeting with Miss Talmadge. It was—well—some years ago. The scene was the old Vitagraph yard. We were talking with Edith Storey when a slender girl in short skirts happened to pass. Miss Storey introduced us to "the Talmadge kid." This was, of course, before the silversheet arrival of Constance, who, at that time, must have been even slenderer and in even shorter skirts.

Norma secured her early training in those palmy Vitagraph days. She played everything from children to grey-haired mothers and, incidentally, found time to grow up. From Vitagraph she went to Triangle. After this came her marriage to Joseph Schenck, the vaudeville and motion picture manager.

"My Lady Claire"

By
WILLIS GOLDBECK

AN interviewer is like a bold knight of ye olden days.

He rides forth to rescue ladies faire from their castles of obscurity, to assail with his lance-like pen the powers of darkness which strive constantly to cut them off from the world, and to crown them finally with a wreath of golden praise, printed where all may read. Usually there is a fierce dragon, called strangely "dear monna," who guards the castle's portal. And the fiercer the dragon the fairer the princess languishing within . . . That is the rule.

I was considerably encouraged, therefore, when I knocked upon the door of Claire Adams' bungalow in Hollywood. A pretty melody which was being played on a piano within halted suddenly, in the midst of its most lilting strain. At the same time the door swung open and the dragon stood revealed. As dragons go, she was quite homelike, clothed in a voluminous apron, grey hair and "spees," but she was undeniably a dragon. Her gaze pierced me like a rapier and I thought I detected the odor of sulphur. Perhaps it was only the coffee boiling over in the kitchenette.

And the princess? She was standing in the center of the room, clasping a black poodle in her arms in a manner that seemed to say, "You shall not have my child!" When she beheld me, a hint of disappointment crept into her eyes, she dropped the child, which fled yelping to the kitchenette in the dragon's wake, and exclaimed: "But you're not at all formidable!"

Behind that sentence I divined worried hours of preparation, epigrams neatly polished and ready for the psychological moment, a studiously careless knowledge of all the vital questions of the day. I felt sorry for Claire. I should have warned her of my youth!

It is significant that even as I use her first name, Claire, I have a sneaking feeling that I shouldn't. She is like that; instinctively, Britishly reserved, a person whom one cannot hope to know in a day, or a month. We talked of every thing from socialism to real estate but never once did she open the gate to her inner self. With her, spontaneous intimacy is impossible.

Her career is just at the hudding period, perhaps a little beyond, so that one catches a glimpse of dazzling possibilities yet to be unfolded. It is the result of ambition's triumph over parental prejudice. In Canada, where she was born, she gained a few weeks'

Madame Peacock

By FAITH SERVICE

MADAME PEACOCK slipped from her head the magnificent head-dress composed of the feathers of the most magnificent birds of the species. She slipped the silken, embroidered sheath she wore from her body, suddenly weary, suddenly divested of glamour, suddenly and unmiraculously itself.

For the first time in, oh, well, in many, many years she felt that she was herself, essentially herself. Not very wonderfully herself save as reality, however unlovely, is always wonderful.

It hurt to be herself. To be herself, Jane Goring, again. It hurt because she had, first, to be so divested of the glittering garments she wore. The garments of Sham.

What, again, had Cleeburg, the manager of the theater, said of her, that afternoon, as she was leaving.

"Sham's her middle name, my boy," he had said, to the author of the new play, "she can't help it—she was born that way. A sham!"

"A sham!"

Well. . . well. . . ?

Her nervous fingers unbound her hair. There were one or two grey hairs. Angèle had been careless, of late, then. . . Of late, everyone had been more or less careless. Ever so slightly there were appearing rents and tears in the adulation she had been for so long accustomed to, so long fed upon. And how greedily she had eaten! How she had taken the public laurels and burned them at her own insatiable altar, inhaling the smoke as rare incense, into her nostrils, into her very being. Ah, it had been a breath of life to her, pervasive, consuming. . . .

To stimulate it further she had done all manner of eccentricities. She had culled the rarest silks and jewels, the most extravagant fads and foibles, the bizarre of all countries and fashions. London had called her, had acclaimed her as "Madame Peacock." She, together with London, had almost forgotten that she had once been Goring, Jane Goring, simply horn and bred. That there had ever been McNaughton, or the baby. . . . that ever. . . .

As in a mirror, life-sized, faithful in its reproduction, fearful in its verity, Madame Peacock beheld her years come creeping back. Some grey with tears, some red with hope, some chameleon in their many colors, some strident, some subdued. She looked because she wanted to, but more because she couldn't help it. Her sham had dropt from her with her head-dress and her silken robe. Her years were demanding toll of her. . . . She had preached the philosophy, many times, to many an admiring satellite, of the inevitable paying of a price. . . . Knowing, full well, as she had preached that she, Madame Peacock, would never pay, would evade payment, being sham. What she had not foreshadowed was the possibility of sham deserting, of the years coming back to one, rather than one going back to the years. . . .

First, then, came McNaughton. The man, no, the boy she had married. He it was who had first given her to herself as something rare and wonderful and set apart. Prior to his coming, his love of her, she had had no very great self-esteem. She had hoped she might act one day, might be on the stage, more because the stage seemed so glamorous a mystery than for any self-assurance. Then McNaughton had come and had told her she possessed qualities akin to the great ones of the drama.

He had taught her the value of her great green eyes, her supple body, her red rage of a mouth. He had taught her by his humble, postulant love of her. His adoration had been the first food her slumbering vanity had had to feed upon.

And how she had fed upon it! Hungrily, gratefully at first. Then with rapacity, with disregard. Little by little the world she had known had faded from her enraptured vision and she, she herself, had stepped onto the stage of her imagining, supreme.

The baby had come. But she had come too late. She did not give Jane time enough, time enough to preen, to muse, to capture the full glory of the career she was sure, now, she was to have.

Then, the first engagement.

In McNaughton's tender arms she had sobbed out her first reaction to the Big Chance, terror, joy, self-confidence, timidity.

That night the baby had been ill, and she had not cared. She had told McNaughton he must care for it; she was to rehearse in the morning, she must have her rest.

McNaughton had known his first pangs that night. Had felt his first fear that he was doing Jane harm rather than good. Had woven, for her, the first threads of the mantle of sham she was so superbly to wear.

It had been spectacular and swift. The first engagement had been brilliant and successful. She had been "a find." London raved over her green eyes, her accent (pure Dorsetshire polished and contorted, had they known). There had been vague comparisons to Bernhardt, to Duse, to all the great and gifted of the Drama.

Jane Goring had drunk it in.

With the beginning of her engagements and the sure argosies of success coming in, daily, freshly laden, she had acquired more and more temperament, more and more disdain of the humble McNaughton, the unfortunate baby, the demands of every-day living.

There came the day when she told him that if he really cared to help her, as he had so often and so extravagantly said, she could tell him how he could do so.

"How?" he had asked, with the pathos of eagerness characteristic of him where she was concerned; "you know you have only to tell me, Jane."

"Forget me," she had said to him, and, reminiscently, how metallic, how terrible her voice came back; "forget me. I am going away."

In the mirror of her years she shut her eyes against the remembrance of his face, white and unforgettable, even now . . .

The opulent years had followed. The years of Madame Peacock. Glittering, golden, fiery years. Triumphal years, with, in this hour the ring of brass.

The gowns she wore, the gestures of her famous hands, the sweep of her eyebrows, the shoes she wore on her arched, imperious feet, the reed-like unexpectedness of her laugh, all these things had been copied, emulated, parodied, made world wide. Ah, she had known Fame . . . why were the dregs so bitter?

Her car driving thru the London streets had been the signal for a mob to follow. In the theater she had been a despot, an empress, unquestioned, untouched, supreme. All the sediment of tyranny in her nature had been stirred up, made active. . . . How she had ruled! What an imperial dream had hers been! Why was the purple faded and the gold lace tarnished—tonight?

The lovers who had pursued her—a wistful troupe viewed in retrospect—a youth with gold hair dulled—the strident young leading man she had repulsed, who had called her milk and manna—Nirvana—fulfilment—whither were they gone?

Then, five years ago, after one of her most successful performances, she had gone home and found McNaughton awaiting her. She had scarcely recognized him. The years had depleted him, had hurt him, marred him.

He had told her, timorously, that he had induced her press agent to let him come in his place. He had to see her, he had said.

She had questioned him, more with her slender brows, her manner than the solicitude of words.

The opulent years had followed. The years of Madame Peacock. Glittering, golden, fiery years. Triumphal years with, in this hour the ring of brass

He had told her he was ill, forced to go to Colorado; their early days had seemed to return to him, miraculously recharged with their old significance . . . the child . . . he thought perhaps she had found the glitter more superficial than the gold, that she might wish to accompany him . . .

Into his white, somehow bewildered face her own laugh rang back to her, thin and cruel. No, she had told him, and so deep-dyed was her chosen art that she had been, temporarily, the victim of her own delusion. No, she no longer belonged to herself, certainly not to him, but to the Public, the Public who had given her idolatry and fame.

He had brought to bear upon her a few more reminiscences, memories. He had again referred to their child, emphasized the mutuality. She had ignored it.

Angered at her indifference not so much to himself as to the child, McNaughton had bidden her farewell. He had told her that she was giving up love and friendship and the inimitable gift of her baby for—sham. He, too, "sham." . . . How fitly she must have worn it that, here and there down the primrose path, to the tune of lutes and the delectation of honeycomb, that word had appeared to her . . . Sham!

Well? . . .

On her head she seemed to feel, for the first time, the weight of the peacock feathers. On her body the embrace, the soft sweet strangulation of satins and silk. On her hands and arms the hard, unlovable kiss of jewels. She had no tears. . . . And there was no place for laughter . . .

The mirror brought back five more years. Still triumphant years; still replete with adulation; dizzying successes; popularity approaching genius; genius rather great than good. Yet they wore, these later years, a different aspect. After McNaughton's sudden, unexpected visit, after his sudden complete departure they seemed to be, the years, tinged with the pallor of his face. Now and then a shrill voice echoed thru them, reed-like as her own strange laughter, and yet dissimilar. Her mother's face, too, appeared infrequently, her mother who lived with her rather in the capacity of maid and general factotum than mother. Yes, they had changed, the later years . . . the flowers were more hothouse than natural; the footlights seemed garish rather than like stars fallen to her feet for her further glorification, even the notices in the papers seemed to hide, thinly, sardonic censure under their hyperbole . . .

What had she done, then, Madame Peacock? . . .

There seemed to be, she felt, a reluctance on the part of life to let fall further largess. After all, what had she given to life? Never before had this question touched her. She, Madame Peacock, favored of life and the lovers of life. But what, what really, had she given?

The mirror she faced demanded a reply. It would have none of silence and the evasion of silence.

She answered: "Nothing."

That, persisted the mirror, was not enough, was not draining the mouth of verity.

She answered then, "WORSE than nothing!"

The mirror was content. It was true . . . all these years . . . worse than nothing. . . . Sensationalism . . . envy . . . rancor . . . jealousy . . . occasional wonderment, mostly unwholesome, a great deal of fear . . . excitation abnormally obtained . . . inflation of values where values were nil. . . . These things she had given . . . these worse-than-nothing things.

In exchange for what?

In exchange for young McNaughton, for young-old McNaughton now, no

The lovers who had pursued her—a wistful troupe viewed in retrospect—a youth with gold hair dulled—the strident young leading man she had repulsed who had called her milk and manna — Nirvana — fulfilment—whither were they gone?

Later in the week she had remarked on the ugliness of the girl and Cleeburg had said, without enthusiasm, that she was like enough to play own sister to Madame Peacock heady draught, her future, its first tinge of individualism, of apartness from herself, small duties and small cares.

And her baby . . .
In that moment she had her baby for the first time. . . . A girl-baby. . . . Madame Peacock. . . . She wanted to laugh, then, but the mirror forbade laughter . . .

This brought her back to the Present, to Today.
A week ago a new girl had entered the cast of the new play. She had shown, during the initial performance, a strange facility, a really remarkable comprehension of the lines . . . Cleeburg, the manager, James, the young author, had been enthusiastic.

Madame Peacock had inquired her origin. She had been "discovered," it seemed, in some Western town in the States; Madame Peacock had shrugged and laughed. Her own laurels she knew to be invincible. They had taken root and grown to her, to herself, to Madame Peacock. . . . Cleeburg had seemed, for the first time indifferent. . . . Had almost ignored her as she sat in the wings smoking, nostrils disdainful, had not opened the doors for her and stood before on her way from the dressing-room to her waiting car. Little omissions, per-doubt. McNaughton with his belief of adoration, his self-effacement, his tenderness that knew no limit, his pride that had been spared no barb. McNaughton who from the depths of his love had given her the first food to feed upon, her egotism its first black rage and her brain, wearied, over-exerted, had reeled, had become abandoned and unsteady . . . venom had come from her heart to her lips—she had felt, first, an impulse to cry out, to destroy . . . she had told Cleeburg that, unless the girl were dismissed instantly, she, Madame Peacock, would, herself, sever their connections. The ice of the manager's face who had been, so short a while ago, servile, obsequious . . . His answer had seared her, leaving her, she felt, exposed, withered, undesirable . . .

"I have signed the young lady up with a life contract," he had said, then he had shrugged . . .

He had needed to do nothing further . . . that shrug! . . .
Madame Peacock, with her long cape drawn about her, suddenly old and inexpressibly weary, had crept from her dressing-room to the outer door. On the way the smell of the grease paint, the old dust of old sets, the dimness . . . all that had been champagne to her seemed stale and odoriferous. She had no spirit to do more than incline her weighted head to the door keeper who raised his hat to her as she passed. Just as in her most dizzy triumphs, he had raised it in recognition of a great artist. This alone was left her; the salute of the keeper of the door, thru which, for the last time, she was passing. It was said of him that he, too, had been great for a time. And had been cast forth. Well . . .

In her apartment alone Madame Peacock shuddered and drew in her breath with a little shivering cry.
A great need of a human touch overcame her. Also the knowledge that she had been without a human touch for Bebe's road to stardom was a trail of luxurious cinema boudoirs. Heretofore, she has been one of the screen's most attractive boudoir sirens — especially in the silken dramas of De Mille. And now under her new contract— who can tell?

MONROE SALISBURY was standing in front of a moving picture theater on Broadway, Los Angeles, waiting for his car. He had just returned from a trip to northern California where he had been shooting scenes for "The Barbarian," his first picture made with his own company.

"Another important thing," said Monroe Salisbury, "is that our pictures will be cut to natural length and cut by the man who is directing them." Above, a character portrait and right, an informal picture "And maybe you think we didn't have a wonderful camping outfit!" he said. "It was such an outfit as I don't believe anyone ever had before. Of course, the scenario called for a society camp and we had to have one, and, equally, of course, it proved useful and luxurious for the company. We traveled in style. Mr. and Mrs. Jack Cudahy were members of the party, as were also their two children, Michael and Ann, who played parts in the picture. We left town in the Cudahy's machines and carried with us a number of their servants, including their chef.

"I've never seen a long period of location work go by so smoothly. There was really no friction at all. We made our headquarters at Sisson, but branched out from it for many miles. I think that the most beautiful part of the trip was that spent on the John Wrinkle estate, near San Francisco. There we shot scenes of deer in the wild; some of the exteriors were unimaginably beautiful.

"Did you hear that I had a road built for me? A nine-mile stretch, between Sisson and Castle Lake. It was formally christened Salisbury Pike just before I left. And now, I come home to find a new and unusually rigorous bunch of traffic laws!"

"Arrested?" I asked.

"Yes, before I had been in town for an hour. Something in the nature of a welcome home, I suppose."

I notice that there was about him an air of happiness that no annoyance over the much-cussed traffic laws could effect, even temporarily. After a period in which he had been, as an acquaintance of his phrased it to me, "In prison" . . . making pictures of an arbitrary length under certain set rules, with the question of expense something to be considered at every turn, he is, at last free and has unlimited backing . . . (Jack Cudaly is among those heavily interested) . . . to make pictures according to his own ideas of how pictures should be made.

These ideas are not basically new. The screen has had enough of newness. What it needs now is a little wholesome tradition. And this is what Monroe Salisbury plans to give it.

During his career on the stage, he was associated with such people as Charles Frohman, Richard Mansfield, Mrs. Fiske, John Drew, Kathryn Kidder and Nance O'Neil. Undoubtedly, he absorbed all of the finest traditions of the stage and made them his own.

His company—The Monroe Salisbury Players—has been formed on the same principle which has gone to make famous stock companies ever since the beginning of theatrical history; that is, the principle of uniform excellence which dictates that every member of the company must be an artist in his own line, and must remain with the company for as long a time as possible. To this latter end, it is necessary that they should never be dissatisfied. Said Salisbury:

"The whole thing must be looked at from the viewpoint of the actor. Donald Crisp, who is directing, is himself an actor and a good one. His Battling Burrows in 'Broken Blossoms' is a bit of artistic work that will never be forgotten. He is, then, capable of directing actors and understanding their peculiar needs. The same with the management. The idea is that we are featuring our company. We could not do this if the company were not a good one. Consequently, an artist who joins us is doing us a favor and will be treated accordingly!"

During our conversation, we had walked slowly up Broadway to a confectionery store, where we had enjoyed something cold to drink. We had then walked back to the original place, in front of the theater, arriving there at the same moment that his car drew up.

Milton Markwell joined us. He is a young man with fair hair and blue eyes. Given the rôle of a surveyor in "The Barbarian," he has something very much more important in "Ethan of the Mountain" which will be the second picture made by the Monroe Salisbury Players. He recently appeared in stock in Seattle.

"Shall we drive around for a while?" Salisbury suggested. "Suppose we take you home?" We soon found ourselves on Santa Monica Boulevard where the heat of the day was relieved by a light breeze blowing in from the sea.

"Another important thing," he went on, "is that our pictures will be cut to natural length, and cut by the man who

SOME 'teen years ago she was born Ann Inez Williams, in a small town in Texas, U. S. A. Today she is Dorothy Devore, star in Christie Comedies and leading lady for Charles Ray in "Forty-five Minutes From Broadway."

It all happened very much in approved story-book fashion. When Ann Inez Williams was eleven years old, her mother, seeking renewed health, brought her to California.

Ann Inez at that time had four brothers and an elder sister. They were all married; had families of their own, and so mother Williams felt free to devote her time wholly to Ann Inez and her health. She brought all the family furniture, took a comfortable house in Los Angeles and sent Ann Inez to private school. All seemed going smoothly—that is, on the surface.

But Ann Inez wasn't the placid little soul her mother thought (I could have told her that, the moment I saw those big brown eyes with mischief hidden deep, deep within them.) Ann, who was called Dot at school because she was so very tiny, was possessed of a tremendous voice, and it used to amuse all her friends to hear that huge voice issuing from the slender throat of the very littlest one of them. And so Ann, who was very ambitious, caught the career fever and sang in the church choir where her voice, she says, "Just boomed out."

This led to an offer for her to sing in private hon'rs of society people for the entertainment of blasé guests. Ann Inez knew that her mother would never consent to this, so she used to run away from school every afternoon when her services name of Dorothy Devore. She says the Dorothy was easily accounted for, but she must have chosen the Devore from a Snappy Stories magazine.

Dorothy's mother didn't hear about her professional success until it led to a splendid cabaret offer. Then, of course, as mothers of spoiled daughters have a habit of doing, she, at first, absolutely refused to let Dorothy keep up her work and at last gave in gracefully.

So it was that Dorothy Devore, without training of any kind, found herself heading a troupe of professional chorus girls in the vaudeville act at Levy's, a very popular Los Angeles café. Dorothy not only was the headliner but taught her chorus new dance steps and songs and managed them—and she was, I might add, in her very early 'teens. But when one is in their very early 'teens and ambitious, nothing seems impossible—perhaps that is why Dorothy was so successful.

In a very short while an offer came to book her over the Orpheum vaudeville circuit, and it seemed that Dorothy's greatest dreams had come true. Everything was planned. She was to be billed as "The Miniature Pocket-Edition Sophie Tucker," the real Sophie Tucker gave her permission to use her name in return for the exclusive rights to some songs that Dorothy had composed.

And then one day, she received a telephone call from Eddie Lyons, of Universal's Lyons and Moran comedies.

"Would she consider coming out to Universal City to do a picture with them?"

She had had no desire to enter pictures, but she had a little spare time, and so she went out to Universal City, fully prepared to be assigned nothing but an atmosphere part. But without even taking a test picture they assigned her the lead. And that rather settled Dorothy's career, for she was seen by Christie's casting director and captured with the lure of a high salary.

That was two years ago, and Dorothy has now become Dorothy Devore spelt with a small v. She played opposite Bobby Vernon for some time and was then made a star herself for Christie. She has the greatest fondness for that company, and altho she is being sought on all sides by directors who wish to put her into drama, she only dips into drama at present when her services can be dispensed with briefly at Christie's.

Because she is so very young she is still in love with her first love, farce-comedy; for she believes that that which we learn first we learn best.

And so it happened that her vaudeville tour was postponed indefinitely—but Dorothy Devore admits that it is her real ambition, and some day she hopes to travel. She can imagine nothing more wonderful than a tour in vaudeville. But at present she is very happy in pictures, because her mother is happy to have her in them.

As for Dorothy Devore herself, this little happening illustrated what she is like better than anything else.

The other day she was introduced to a dear old lady of seventy or thereabouts.

"And what do you do, little girl?" she was asked.

"I act in pictures," responded Dorothy.

"What—you are one of those motion picture actresses? Land sakes, I'd never have believed it, why, little girl, you belong in a sweet little home, married to a good man, with a couple of kiddies."

Dorothy says she considers this the greatest compliment she has ever received. Incidentally, one of Dorothy's schoolgirl formally, a friend, (or interviewer), in pajamas is quite all right. (We'll say it is, and so would anyone who had beheld Ann May.)

"I know you wont mind," she began. "You see, I'm so frightfully busy, as I'm leaving tomorrow for the coast, with only three days' notice. Now what do you think of that? I came East after finishing 'Paris Green' with Mr. Ray, expecting to stay all spring and summer at least. But here I am," indicating the adjoining room, where one glimpsed a bewildering array of dainty feminine apparel, "madly packing.

"Not that I'm not glad to go back to the coast," she said, becoming more shining each moment. "I adore it there and I dont like New York, not at all. The atmosphere is so unreal and every one hurries so and there are no neighbors or nice, cozy, homey

IF I had to choose one word with which to describe Ann May, I would choose shining, she is so unqualifiedly that. Shining brown hair, worn in a mass of curls, eyes like twin stars, a face as bright and a smile as sunshiny and alluring as a June morning. She has an air, too, this shining Ann, of delicate, high-strung intensity, as tho poised, birdlike, to see what wonderful thing is happening next, just around the corner. Even her voice, heard before I saw her, was "shining," and then she came blithely in, clad unembarrassedly in black pajamas bizarrely embroidered in green, red and gold.

Time was, of course, when pajamas were merely sleeping apparel and were never, not ever, worn outside one's bedroom. But times have changed and, with them, the ways of pajamas—and to receive, in-just keep fussing at something, do you?" she ended breathlessly. "I must run fresh ribbons in these things—my maid is rushed to death with last-minute shopping."

She is a daughter of Ohio, Ann May. Toledo, to be exact, and a graduate of a dramatic school of that city. Not that she was expected to take advantage of this training in any way. Certainly not! But a girl should receive some specialized training, and, if she can afford it, why not along some line that she likes? reasoned an indulgent father. If she cared to do so, she could become a teacher of elocution some day. And so, because from a child little Ann could "speak pieces" in a most entertaining way and because her father was proud of her talent and because Ann wanted it very much, she entered the dramatic school, where she continued five years.

"Father never seemed to have an idea," she said, "that I might want to go on the stage. Of course, it was part of the training that the pupils of the school take part in theatricals. Well, when dad found out how 'popular' I was, it was both funny and pathetic. He was proud of me, as he was of the little girl who spoke pieces to amuse his friends—but he didn't like my popularity, for he was afraid it would 'put notions in my head,' and he ordered me to stop taking part in the entertainments. But I could not do that and continue at the school. I finished the course, but have never been on the stage—yet."

"And do you consider that your dramatic training has helped you at all in screen work?"

"Not a bit!" she smiled, relaxing into a corner of the divan with a cup of tea and bit of pastry.

"Of course, any line of study helps one to concentrate and is good mental discipline. Aside from that, my training taught me poise, a certain amount, at least, and it did wonders for my voice. It was worth while just for that—if I ever get a chance to use my voice. But as to technique—the technique of motion picture acting is not to be learnt at a dramatic school. Of course, I had no thought of pictures then."

"And when did you think of them?"

"Well, it sounds funny, but a picture of mine was used on the cover of a book. A man saw it and said it was a good screen face and should be in pictures. I was offered a part in a picture with Catherine Calvert and just for fun I took it and was crazy about it. Father," she said slowly, a shadow flitting across her bright face, "had died, and mother, knowing that I scorned a social hutterly existence, consented to let me try pictures. She thought it would be a more normal life than the stage. So we went to the coast, where I did a part in 'Lombardi, Ltd.' with Bert Lytell.

"And then I was asked to play opposite Charlie Ray in 'Paris Green.' I cant tell you how thrilled I was. It seemed that the door of opportunity had opened—and it had because I am called back to play opposite him again in his first First National. Isn't that wonderful? He is the cleverest and the kindest man in the world. Every one who works with Charlie Ray simply adores him. He is a real inspiration, too. He told me how hard he worked, and how discouraged he became, thinking he never would 'arrive.' It made me more than ever determined to succeed.

"And so I'm anxious to be back and at work. I have had a good time in New York—just as a spectator. I could never

KENNETH HARLAN is one of the workers. I didn't see him working, but then, one seldom does on a studio interview. I suppose if I were of the school of Maeterlinck, I could consume a whole paragraph on a scientific simile anent the drones and their antithesis. Being handicapped, I shall have to say that:

He has invaded vaudeville, stage and screen, stock, et al., and I leave it to public opinion whether or not a mere drone would, or could, be so versatile. . . . Changes of any sort require initiative and initiative requires work.

Of all of them the vaudeville life appealed to him the most from the human, personal viewpoint.

The first picture he ever did was with Constance Talmadge. And he was doing one with her the day I talked with him at the studio. In the distance, also temporarily off the set, Constance like her leading man was pinned on the inquisitorial prongs.

I asked him whether he liked doing comedy, and he said he preferred other things. "I am not the comedy type. I think," he said.

He added that he believed in changing from one sphere to another, but not from one type to another. (Cont'd on page 70)

DEEP WATERS

By DOROTHY DONNELL

"IT'S a sightly mornin'," said Caleb West contentedly, "the ocean's as bright and blue as the picter on an insurance calendar." He hitched his chair a little back from the table and fumbled in the pocket of his faded blue shirt for his pipe. Behind the tin coffee-pot his wife, Betty, leaned her soft chin on her clasped hand, looking dreamily away thru the window at the ocean, sparkling in the early sun.

"I like it better when it's kind o' misty and mysterious," she confessed shyly, "and you can imagine the fishing boats are—are gondolas and the summer cottages on the cliff are palaces an' towers—"

"Romancing again!" But Caleb's tone was indulgent. "Wonder why 'tis that you young folks is always wanting something different, wishin' today was tomorrer, and here was somers else. Reckon it's because they're young—a kind o' a disease like measles or chicken-pox. Time'll cure it, Betty, like it has me." His slightly faded, humorous blue eyes were a trifle wistful as he looked across at the fresh, girl-face opposite.

She shook her head. "I dont want to be cured! What would be the use o' living if you couldn't look ahead, and expect something beautiful? I want to go everywhere, and see everything and feel all the different feelings in the world!" There was a kind of fierce hunger in the way she threw out her arms. He watched her somberly.

"Reckon I'm too old for such junketing, Betty," he said quietly, "you'll have to go to those furrin places alone."

She started slightly, as one coming reluctantly out of a glorious dream. Her eyes widened as they turned on his rugged, weatherbeaten face with the greying hair and the fine, humorous lines about the eyes. "Oh, Caleb, I was just a-foolin'!" she laughed, and ran around the table to perch on his chair arm, "you cant get rid of me easy as that! Besides how'd I enjoy traveling thru the Alps and ruins and pyramids and thinking of you having to eat your own cooking?" There was only mischief in her vivid face now, tho his eyes were watchful. And with a sigh Caleb West got to his feet. "Building lighthouses may be isn't so romantic," he said, "but folks couldn't travel without 'em. And you couldn't build lighthouses without laying foundations for 'em first. I'm needed, Betty, and it's good to feel needed."

She went to the door with him and lifted her face to his good-by kiss. "Be careful, Caleb," she whispered with a shudder, "I know you're a master-diver, but sometimes when I get to thinkin' of you down under tons an' tons of green water seems as if I'd sh'd scream. I need you too, Caleb—"

The trouble went out of his eyes then, and he caught her to him with a kind of clumsy fervor which the slim, handsome youngster, coming up the path noted with a scowl. That old buzzard an' a pretty girl like her! Why he might be her father—all of fifty he must be, and she hardly turned twenty yet.

"Dont think, Blossom," Caleb admonished, "there's a heap of suffering comes from thinking about troubles that ne'er happen.—Why, hello, Bill. Comin' along of me, eh?"

Bill Lacey shook his dark head. "Maw's got another of her headaches. I haven't had a bite of breakfast—if Mrs. West could give me a cup o' coffee—"

He sat before his filled plate, later, making small pretense of eating, while his eyes, full of little smoldering sparks, followed

"I'd like to see things," she confided, "but I guess I never shall." She sighed, "Caleb likes to stay put" the girl's slender figure from the table to sink and cupboard sullenly. Suddenly the dishes clanged with the jarring blow of his fist on the table. "Damn it!" he burst out, "I seen him at the door—kissing you—he don't know how to kiss. Betty; You ain't ever been kissed!"

She stood quite still, staring, while the quick color flooded to the bright line of her hair. "Bill Lacey, are you stark crazy?" she gasped, "the idea of talking like that! It's— it's wicked—"

"It's true!" he came to her and gripped her wrists, "I'm crazy all right! Crazy about you—an' I have been ever since you come here seven months ago. What did you marry him for? He's almost an old man, he dont know how to make you happy but I do, I—you—"

She wrenched herself free of him. "I am happy! You shan't stand there and say things about Caleb! He's the best man in the world—he married me when Paw was drowned and he's been kind and—and wonderful to me. I—I guess you'd better go now. I guess you'd better not come back either."

The color did not leave her cheeks after Lacey, mumbling apologies, strode away, tall and straight in the sharp, uncompromising light of the new day. She went about her household tasks with tightened lips and hands that shook and blundered over their work. Once she stopped to look out of the window, wonderingly, as tho at an unfamiliar world. The line of rocks jutting against the sky, the platform with its diving apparatus and pigmy figures, the hotels and boats, and white road winding by were the same—yet subtly different. Something seemed to have thrown her safe, serene world out of focus.

A red racing car panted by with the gleam of a yellow sweater and the glimpse of a white flannel suit. "Mr. Sanford's taking Mrs. Leroy out to the Point again," she said vaguely aloud, and suddenly the words seemed to take on sinister meaning in her own ears. "I wish he hadn't come, meddling," she thought and, determinedly resolved to think no more. She worked all the morning on stiff blue denim, making a shirt for Caleb, disciplining her fingers. By afternoon Lacey's wild speech and the hurtful, strangely thrilling grip of his fingers on her wrist seemed like a feverish dream. She was singing as she began her preparations for an extra good supper, but the song broke off short with the sound of heavy boots on the pathway.

She turned a small face, bleached with fear to the door. Caleb—O God! Dont let it be Caleb!"

Her husband's ruddy face answered her prayer. He looked concerned. "Betty, young Lacey's had an accident, rock fell on his leg. I guess it's broke." He looked at her guiltily. "I—I'm having him brought here, Betty. I know it'll make you a heap of extra trouble, but you know his maw's only a step one, and besides she's kind o' an invalid. Do you—mind?"

She was clinging to him, sobbing. "I dont mind anything so long's you're not hurt!" she choked. "Oh, Caleb, but you gave me such a turn!"

Young Lacey proved a meek and docile patient. Pain at first, prudence later kept him from touching on the subject they had last quarreled over. He slept a great deal, or she thought that he slept, not guessing how often the heavy black lashes hid a gaze that followed her every movement. His grit in bearing the ordeal of moving, and his helplessness touched her pity dangerously, and the admiration that he let her see now and then in his handsome dark eyes was not unpleasing—so long as he did not put it into words.

When he judged that her defences were down he began to talk, matter-of-factly, about every-day things. There was a young eagerness in his attitude toward life that found its complement in her own vague, restless yearnings. Besides he had traveled somewhat, a fishing voyage around the Cape, a trip to New York, and he spoke confidently of going some day to the West Indies. She listened, her fingers forgetting to hold the needle, her eyes wide with gazing at the far places of her fancy.

"I'd like to see things," she confided, "but I guess I never shall." She sighed, "Caleb likes to stay put."

"He would," Lacey agreed, kindly tolerant, "folks lose that when they get his age—wanting to go places, I mean,—and discover life." Silence lay over the room. Into it came, presently, the sputtering cough of a recklessly driven motor. "Sanford's going to hit a snag some day," the boy said, choosing his words, and watching her averted face under lowered lashes, "anybody with him this time?"

She looked, answered almost unwillingly. "Mrs. Leroy."

"I thought so," said Lacey, "she usually is. Well, you can't blame a pretty woman like her for wanting something more than that husband of hers can give her. He's slow—Leroy is, doesn't talk much—always reading a paper. I guess he's older than she is, too."

That was all then. He managed it cunningly and with infinite patience. When Caleb was present he always seemed to defer to him, but managed to make him seem older, greyer and more unromantic than ever in contrast to his dark youth and eagerness. He saw her sometimes glance from one of them to the other, and then run to Caleb's chair and perch on it and lay her bright head on his dusty one almost defiantly. Lacey could have leapt from his bed and snatched her away in the consuming jealousy that swept him at the sight, but he only smiled. He loved Betty West, selfishly, perhaps, but as much as it was in him to love—and he waited his time to possess what he wanted.

It came presently. He was not quite certain of her, but he dared not wait. There was no longer any excuse for his staying. He could limp about the house, could have walked without limping, indeed. "tomorrow," he said, as he sat on the seaward-looking porch, while she shelled peas, "tomorrow I'll be gone—"

A pod slipped in her fingers, scattering its green globes over the grass. She bent over the pan. "Tomorrow? Yes, —I suppose—you'll have to go back to work."

He spoke in a low tone. "Are you sorry, Betty? Are you going to miss me?"

She tried to smile. "Of course! There won't be anybody to praise my puddings! Caleb never notices what he's eating—"

She paused, beginning to tremble as she found her hands prisoned and his eyes with the disturbing flame in them close to hers. "Betty! Betty! Don't you see I can't go—and leave you here? We belong together, dear! We're both young, we both want life and everything it can give us. It isn't wicked to want them, it's the way the world's made! West isn't really your husband—he never was your lover. Betty—you're going to come away with me—on the Boston boat—tonight—"

"Oh, I couldn't!" she quivered, but she felt as tho strong tides were beating her, carrying her out with them from her safe harbor, "Caleb—what would he do? I've got to get his supper. You mustn't—it isn't—right—"

When Caleb was present he always seemed to defer to him, but managed to make him seem older, greyer and more unromantic than ever in contrast to his dark youth and eagerness

He saw that he had won, and laughed low with triumph. "Then life is wrong, Girl!" he exclaimed, "you've never lived—but you're going to. It's your

"He's like the ocean—when there's a fog," he found himself repeating mechanically. "he says that there is life behind the fog—and I want to see. You'll never forgive me, Caleb, or believe that I do love you. Your new shirt is in the top drawer—the camphor is on the kitchen shelf in case you catch cold. O Caleb—"

He held the pitiful, foolish note to the flame of the lamp, watching it consume. Captain Bell, standing unnoticed in the doorway, regarded him in amazement. "I swan!" he ejaculated, "the hull blame world's gone plumb crazy to-night. Caleb West. What in tarnation you doin'?"

The other man gripped his arm, turning a stark face toward the window. Over the water came the birthday. Betty, yours and mine." But he was wise enough not to kiss her, even then.

Caleb West came home late, noting with a curious sense of uneasiness that there was no smoke curling up from his chimney. He pushed open the door and found darkness and the sharp sudden scent of the sea. "Betty," he called, "Betty-Girl, where are you?"

A match sputtered and flared out under his impatient fingers. He lighted another. Then he saw the note on the mantel shelf, blotched with tears. After he had read it he sat a long time, hours—staring down at his twisted, gnarled old hands lying on the red-checked table cloth. It was a fresh cloth he noted stupidly. She must have put it on just before she went—he groaned as if in pain.

sharp yelp of a steambot whistle. "She's gone," he said heavily, and his lips came together like the jaws of a trap, "she's gone with Bill Lacey to find life—" he laughed silently, unpleasantly.

Captain Bell probed the white face in the lamplight with

Semon the Jester

By HARRISON HASKINS

WHEN we were invited to luncheon with Larry Semon at the Hotel Astor, we made one condition—that no custard pies or spaghetti would be served.

One cannot be too careful with movie comedians.

But—seriously—Semon is no mere clown. No screen player we know has a more alert business brain or does clearer thinking. His long newspaper career, which preceded his film debut, gave him an unusual viewpoint.

Only a few years ago he was feature sporting cartoonist on The New York Evening Sun. Before that he was on the art staff of The New York Telegram, The Morning Telegraph and The New York Herald. But the real incentive which led him to film comedy dates back still further.

Semon comes of a picturesque family of theatrical adventurers. His youth was not the youth of the average boy. Instead of baseball, marbles and the back lots, it was spent in backwoods town halls, remote railway stations and dingy trains.

To go back to the beginning:

Semon's grandfather was connected with the tours of the magician, Herman the Great. The comedian's father naturally became interested in magic and took up the work. The elder Semon became Zera the Great, and toured the country as a magician, hypnotist and ventriloquist, accompanied by his wife and the boy, Larry. He carried a vaudeville company with him and comedy, tumbling and other miscellaneous acts were interspersed with the mysterious illusions of the Great Zera.

For a long time Larry Semon was a newspaper cartoonist. Then he turned to motion pictures—with remarkable success. "I do all my work myself," says Semon. "I do not use doubles. Naturally we take lots of chances and, let me add, there is less faking in my comedies than in most farce productions"

Larry, of course, was called upon to assist in various ways and, in time, he became a proficient and versatile performer. One night would find him an acrobat, another a hypnotic subject, again he would be a comedian, just as the needs of the little barn-storming company developed.

Larry himself wanted to be a singer but fate—and his father—interposed. He lost his voice. And his father, tired of the struggle of pioneer stage work, wanted his son to do something different. Both the elder Semon and his son had a certain knack of caricaturing. Result—the boy was sent to art school.

Finishing his course, Semon secured his first employment on The New York Herald. He advanced until he occupied the first comic post with The Evening Sun.

How "Earthbound" Was Made

By JAMESON SEWELL

PROBABLY no motion picture story yet filmed presented the difficulties offered by Basil King's psychic novel, "Earthbound." Hence the story of the director, T. Hayes Hunter, is of unique interest.

First, "Earthbound" required seven months for its development from the printed page to the photoplay screen. Four months were actually occupied in filming the story at the Goldwyn coast studios. Mr. Hunter actually shot 190,000 feet of film, which were cut down to 7,600 feet, the final length of the completed screen production.

To those who have not yet seen "Earthbound," something of an explanation is in order. The Basil King novel traces a domestic tragedy which culminates in the murder of the other man by the husband and then goes on to show the regeneration of the dead man after death—how his spirit readjusts two shattered households to the best of his (or shall we say it) ability. Through a great deal of the story the chief protagonist moves in shadowy spirit form. This necessitated double exposures and the most adroit camera trickery. To be exact, there were 166 double exposure scenes in "Earthbound." Successful double exposure work can only be obtained by the most careful and painstaking camera work.

But let Mr. Hunter himself explain

"Let us assume I intended to photograph a scene in which the spirit talked to his living friend. I first rehearsed the two actors together in the scene as it would be screen visualized. Then I timed the action, using a ticking metronome to standardize our count. For instance, at the count of 63 we would find that the ghost started speaking, that at 79 he stopped, that at 85 the material figure felt his presence and turned around, that at 96 the spirit materialized to be visible to the living man, that at 115 the spirit walked over and put his arm on the other's shoulder, that at 169 the living man showed visible emotion as a result of the other's words, that at 175 the ghost started to dissolve out, taking eight counts to become nothing.

"You can realize that, if we depended upon a human count, an inaccuracy would be bound to occur. The metronome kept this in perfect measure, even the cameraman grinding to its beat.

"Let us assume that we have carefully rehearsed and timed every

The Month's Photoplays in Review

By Frederick James Smith

AN odd and homely little tale, shining out of an exceedingly dull photoplay month is "Honest Hutch," an unpretentious Will Rogers effort which, to our way of thinking, is the best thing ever done by Goldwyn. Interesting it is to see this simple story of a village loafer easily displace all the expenditure and elaborateness of a long line of Goldwyn productions.

"Honest Hutch" is just another proof that real film drama is the drama of every-day life, minus claptrap and melodrama—that the really big play may revolve around the simplest daily events.

"Honest Hutch," which by the way, is built from a short story by Garrett Smith, has a delightfully droll thesis. The shiftless, happy-go-lucky Hutch, with his embittered drudge of a wife and his brood of ragged children, lives a life of utter laziness—until he finds a box containing fifty thousand dollars in $10,000 bills. Hutch suddenly realizes that the money is useless to him, since no one will believe him the possessor of an honestly acquired $10,000 bill. It is a case of going to work, thus acquiring a reputation equal to his money, or throwing the fifty thousand away. Hutch, reluctantly, goes to work, altho he has a sneaking doubt that the money isn't worth the labor. How, in the end, he finds real joy in work—and in bringing happiness to his family—is brought out with homely humor.

Rogers is Hutch to the life. It is an honest, close to the soil performance, and his best celluloid rôle thus far. We congratulate him. Our hat is off, too, to Clarence Badger for his directorial handling of "Honest Hutch."

In interesting contrast to "Honest Hutch" is "Madame X." Goldwyn's visualization of Alexandre Bisson's super-heated Parisian melodrama. With all its expensive outlay, "Madame X" does not come within a hundred miles of "Honest Hutch's" closeness to life.

Bisson is a master of adroit stage technique. He knows how to build with fine theatric effectiveness. His characters may be puppets neatly maneuvered to get the greatest dramatic effect, but he, at least, achieves the result he seeks. "Madame X" has a scene of big emotional appeal.

"Madame X" tells the story of a young French wife who leaves her husband and baby-boy for love of another. Later, when her husband refuses to forgive her, she drifts to the moral depths, a drug wreck. Finally, she commits murder and is brought to trial. Without realizing her identity, her husband, now a man of affairs, is a visitor in the court-room while their son is appointed to defend her. She is steadfast in her refusal to say a word, but the boy by a brilliant and impassioned speech, wrings a verdict of "not guilty" from the jury. Then her wrecked constitution gives way, but not until there is a reconciliation.

This court-room scene was an electric thing behind the footlights, but it is lost in the screen adaptation. This is due to several reasons. Director Frank Lloyd launches his story in too high an emotional key. Consequently, he steadily loses effectiveness. Again, Pauline Frederick did not touch us anywhere as the wretched Jacqueline. Her performance, in a measure due to the director, of course, lacks all gradation. From start to finish it is a drab uncolored thing on the verge of hysteria, without the building up necessary for sympathetic appeal. Again, Casson Ferguson is an unfortunate choice as the son. Here is a big rôle in every sense of the word. What Richard Barthelmess could have done with it! Indeed, the whole cast of "Madame X" disappointed us.

"Nomads of the North," (First National), a James Oliver Curwood story, had enough theatric ingredients, including a forest fire, to have been an effective picture. It fell down largely thru inferior direction.

With the Canadian-Northwest as his background, Curwood has unfolded a story of a cruel factor, his scoundrelly son, an innocent cutie of the wood-

The Winners Are Announced

THE 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest closed on August 1, and on September 23 the judges met and, after due deliberation, rendered their verdict. In announcing their decision, which was not without dissenting votes, it seems desirable to make some explanations. Quite early in the contest several unusually promising contestants appeared, and for months they continued to head the list. Repeated motion picture tests were made of them under various conditions and the most promising of these young ladies were sent to Albin, Lumiere and other photographers for studies. They were photographed from every possible angle and under different lights and conditions to make sure that they were endowed with all of the many essentials that go to make up a one-hundred-per-cent. screen star. Among these were Lucille Langhanke, formerly of the West, but now of 419 West 115th Street, N. Y. City; Helen DeWitt of Queens, N. Y.; Beth Logan of 22 Maple Street, Bronxville, N. Y.; and Erminie Gagnon, formerly of Canada, but now of 244 West 109th Street, N. Y. City. For beauty, charm, grace and personality, they are awarded first honors, and in commemoration of the event, they will be presented with gold medals. Each of these young ladies will hereafter be known as a Gold-Medalist of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest.

Lucille Langhanke is an amazingly well equipped girl, with sunset eyes and hair, and her friends will not be surprised to read here that for grace, charm, beauty and photographic picturesqueness the contest has produced no superiors. In fact, we have already placed her with the Famous Players-Lasky Company on a five-year contract, and you will soon hear much of this unusual girl.

Helen DeWitt is none other than the violinist who for years toured the world with Madame Gadski and Sousa's Band as soloist. She is a little blonde of classic beauty, with golden hair and big blue eyes, and is about twenty years of age. The Metro Company has already engaged her to play in Bert Lytel productions, and the concert platform's loss is the screen's gain.

Beth Logan is a distinct type and a real discovery. She is about five feet five in height, slight of figure, with large, dark, sparkling eyes, and is full of vivacity and "pep." She is barely fifteen years of age and we have no doubt that the screen will soon find a place for her.

Erminie Gagnon is just sixteen and we have made over ten tests of her before the motion picture camera. In real life years I was a member of the cast, I passed from rôle to rôle until I had actually played every part from a loaf of bread up. I felt like a full-fledged actress and after playing with Elsie Janis and Gaby Deslys I went with Ziegfeld, spending two years in 'The Follies' and 'Midnight Roof.'

"Mother never quite approved of the stage," she went on, thoughtfully, "and was anxious for me to get into pictures—we used to talk about it so often. After her death I wanted more than ever to do what she wished, so one day I told Mr. Ziegfeld that I intended to leave the show and go back to posing.

"A night or two after this, Douglas Fairbanks saw me in the 'Midnight Roof' and, with his characteristic impulsiveness, he immediately engaged me to play leads, so within two weeks after Mother left me I was on my way West to act in motion pictures! Almost uncanny, wasn't it? Somehow, I felt she knew, and I was happy that I could so soon fulfil her dearest wish."

It requires but a moment's chat to discover that the guiding influence in Eileen Percy's life is her mother's memory and her sincere desire to live up to what this mother would wish. Ideals of the highest order, early instilled by the absent one, form the girl's standard.

Born to the wailing of Irish winds and the wash of waters on the wild shores, there is just naturally an aura of romance around this pretty girl all the time and you have only to look at the lurking smile at the corners of the eyes and the provocative curve of the lips to realize how well the quaint endearments of old Ireland fit her. "Macushla, mavourneen,

FROM the Emerald Isle to the silver-sheet is a long trail but it was trodden by a little maid of Belfast between the ages of infancy and sweet sixteen. Recalling the roguish twinkle in her eyes, no one will be surprised to learn that Eileen Percy is a daughter of Ireland, Belfast being her birthplace.

However, she was still a wee baby when the family came over to this country, so the first part of her journey to the silver-sheet was made in her mother's arms, but the latter part was made alone on the trim and independent feet of the "colleen" herself.

The Percys, arriving in this country, settled in New York City, where the five children, three brothers, a little sister, Thelma, and Eileen, herself, grew up.

Eileen attended school in New York and Brooklyn, then was sent to a Sisters' Convent.

She wasn't very big when she began posing for the noted artists of the day, among them Harrison Fisher and Howard Chandler Christy. It is easy to imagine their delight in drawing the girl's piquant little face, with the wide eyes that are set far apart, continually changing color, ranging from the deepest blues thru various greys to a lovely green.

It frequently happens that it is but a step from posing to the stage, so, when "The Blue Bird" was produced at the New Theater, Eileen was among the group of "unborn children" in that fanciful scene which the poet, Maeterlinck, wove into his great dream drama.

"I grew up in that play," remarked Miss Percy, "and during the three ahagar" she was to that mother whose memory she adores and is to the people from her island who seek her pictures in American theaters.

I saw it all as we were sitting in her bungalow dressing-room, where her perfectly molded features, masses of glossy hair and fair complexion were enhanced by the artistic decorations in soft shades of orchid. These bungalows are all the fashion at the Hollywood studios, for the idea, started several years ago by Mary Pickford's cunning bird-cage in the corner of the Lasky lot, has met with favor. At the Fox studio, each star has a pretty grey bungalow set in a lovely garden, and Eileen, now a Fox star, has in hers an effective setting for her daintiness, which does not destroy the glamour of romance.

Her humor is of the quiet kind, and tho she looks the part of the peaches and cream girl, she has a remarkably sane balance, governed by a happy viewpoint of life, with a safe margin of spirit—when the occasion demands.

"Being with Mr. Fairbanks was a very wonderful experience," Miss Percy was telling me, "and I shall never be grateful enough for all I learned with him, but I found it a pretty big jump from The Follies, to playing lead with one of the foremost film-stars. I became discouraged after completing five pictures and decided to give them up. I was only sixteen and had not yet found my bearing since losing Mother and tho I had my sister, Thel-

"Oh, of course, I came to my senses," she went on, "and I suddenly realized that to succeed I must get right down to hard work and seriously study this work. The screen is illuminating, for it reaches the thought behind the action and this is, after all, the very point on which the finely balanced ball of success is poised. If the foundation is not true and sincere, the whole thing crumbles—, this is so with everything, motion pictures and life itself.

"As soon as I looked it squarely in the face everything seemed to come to me in the most satisfactory way and now I am fired with a big ambition to make a worthy name for myself. I seem destined for comedy—farce comedy, so I presume that will be my forte."

After playing in several pictures with Sessue Hayakawa, where her dainty fairness made an excellent foil for the Japanese artist, Eileen was

HOW TO BE A MOVIE REVIEWER

(In One Lesson)

NOTE—You know the kind of motion picture criticisms you read in the daily newspapers and in the trade papers. But have a ever thought of trying it yourself? Here's how to do it).
If the director wrecks an automobile:
Truly no expense has been spared.
If it is a wildly improbable melodrama:
Crammed full of real thrills and possessing a wealth of action.
If the principal cutie is in peril anywhere:

Replete with heart interest and having an absorbing love story.

If the star is downright bad:

The drama carries itself, altho the popular star was never better.

If the star and the story are both bad:

Agreeably entertaining and marked by superb photography.

If a mystery tale:

Perplexing story in which the interest of the absorbed spectator will be held to the end.

If the cutie wears several gowns:

Star runs the whole gamut of emotions.

If the cutie reveals a glycerin tear in the close-up:

Here is, indeed, a triumph of emotional acting.

If the plot is almost invisible:

A sweet and simple photoplay of rare wholesomeness.

For any photoplay including a mob scene:

Greater punch than "The Birth of a Nation."

For any photoplay with a spiritual reformation:

More uplifting than "The Miracle Man."

For any photoplay attempting hazy "art" photography:

Nothing like it since "Broken Blossoms."

For any star wearing curls:

... gives a sweetly unsophisticated performance which plays upon the heart strings.

For any male star:

That he succeeds in this difficult rôle attests to the ability of the sterling actor that he is.

Dinty

By

PEARL MAIVERNE

"A CHAP doesn't take pay fer doin' right."

Dinty stood his ground squarely, legs planted sturdily apart, blue eyes level. He repeated his assertion. It was said without bravado, simple as part of the boy's creed.

The third District Attorney eyed the small and evidently Irish face.

"You're from the anld counthree" he said, with a smile and a brogue.

Dinty's blue eyes glinted.

"Yessir," he said. "we've a story, we have. A rare one."

"Tell it me."

The third District Attorney seldom squandered his valuable time so freely. More or less of a humanitarian, he had learned to reject much of the flotsam drifting in to him in these quarters. Especially, the ones with "stories." Generally, the fiction was connivance in one form or another, more or less ingeniously masked. Dinty seemed different. There was a light in his blue eyes, wide eyes suggestive of strain and sleeplessness, there were faint hollows in his too-young cheeks and an irresistible and unquenchable humor in his smile, a ready smile.

"My mother was Doreen Adair," the lad said, as tho he loved the dark romance of his telling; "she was in love, very greatly in love she was, with Danny O'Sullivan. He had eyes like me, that Danny. There are many times when my mother, not so well as at other times, sir, kisses my two eyes and says 'fer you, Danny-arragh'. She forgets-like. They married secretly, the pair of 'em. Doreen Adair had a landed father and oh, such a lady-mother; English, she was. I've heard of her often. Laces, she wore, and little tip-tilty caps and a haughty air. Danny O'Sullivan wasn't good enough for the likes of an Adair. And so they got married, and then Danny got wind of a job in America and he told Doreen how that he'd go over where gold was growing like sumac at home and then he'd send for her, and after a hit they'd go home again. Croesus-like and rich and the proud mother of Doreen would bow her haughty head." Dinty vouchsafed a smile. "It didn't happen like that," he said, "'cause I came first, and then, when Doreen got here, Danny had been kilt only three days before." A little tenderness actual in its significance touched the lad's sensitive mouth, "it was a battle the little woman had to fight then," he said, "with me a babe as helpless as helpless and nary a cent, nor kin, nor friends. But it takes the Irish! Her proud mother and her stormy father and me, soft and dependent, but most of all, most of all, her love for Danny O'Sullivan pulled her thru. She worked by day and she worked by night and her body got thin and stooped and her pretty hair thinned and there's siller in it, and her feet lost their shapes, she said, and her hands got twisted and poor-like and after a while a doctor told her . . . her lungs had to be 'humored,' but, at first, she couldn't humor them, owing to the work and the hard times and all. But now . . . now . . ." the embryo man puffed his own exceeding small chest, "I'm the man of the family, now," he said, "I work by day and by night I take care of Doreen. I feed her and make her all comfy, same as she did for me, and I think she's mostly happy. Now and then she takes me for Danny O'Sullivan, and not just Dinty, and then she smiles and looks like the little picture of her taken on her father's estate, all curls and frills and laughing. So it's mostly all right."

"But some of it isn't? Some of it is fight, eh?" The young third District Attorney felt a suspicious stinging of his eyeballs. Nor was he, in any sense, a sentimentalist.

"Well, it's like this. I'm selling papers. Me and Water-millions, he's black outward and white inward, and Chinkie, he's yellor, but the same applies to the inner. We're up against a gang, Levinsky's the head of it. Levinsky's a bird. He makes life hard for me and for Watermillions and Chinkie. He has all the best corners, you see, for his gang. Whenever one of us gets going good and gets a trade, he takes our corners

Another Chinaman had accompanied them and they had taken the white woman into a banquet hall, all red and black lacquer, couches and weird contrivances for pleasure and for torture away from us, and makes us move on. We cant get a foothold, not that way, and we dont get on very firm or very fast. I 'spose gangs must be gangs."

The third District Attorney fingered his lost wallet, containing its thick wad of bills and other, valuables, that hour returned untouched, by Dinty.

There were not, in his section, many Dintys. Painful experience, the painful experiences of others, had taught him that. Dinty had refused reward in the shape of a tenner, despite the sick, beloved Doreen and the gang and the preempted corners.

John North rose and clapped the small man on one lean but unflinching shoulder.

"Keep a stout heart, my friend," he said, "and we'll see what can be done."

A week later Dinty received a communication from the third District Attorney. It requested the honor of an interview.

The sum and substance of the interview was that Dinty accepted a loan, on a strict business basis, wherewith he collected a selling force of his own, inclusive, of course, of Chinkie and Watermillions, bought up some corners, and became the leader of a gang of little fellers to oppose Levinsky's big fellers. North also insured the little fellers police protection.

Dinty was exuberant. His mother's teaching was right as right. The white light of it burned on the zealous altar of his soul.

van had loved the young Doreen, all his Irish was up.

He ached to conspire. He dreamed fitfully of the flash of knives and the snarl of teeth in pallid yellow faces. His vivid imagination showed him secret panels and underground dungeons and holes beneath the earth, foully conspiring to blood-curdling conspiracies.

He told North all he knew and all that he had heard of the desperadoes of Chinatown.

"It's one of the Malays," he said, "I can bet. It's one of them half-breed Malays. They cling together like glue. There's Dorkh, for instance. He's got some white in him. That makes him all the worse. It makes him cunning. Chinkie's scared to fits of Dorkh and his sister is Dorkh's Chinese wife. She's scared to fits of him too. She's only a kid, fifteen. Thin and lemon colored with terrified eyes. I useter look like that in the dark, once. I'll bet it's Dorkh."

That night Dinty's suspicion was confirmed by Judge Whitley.

North called on him and told him of his talk with Dinty. "I try to draw him out," he said, "very often those kids are scavengers of information, and Dinty's would be straight."

Whitley groaned.

"It is Dorkh," he said, "I've been keeping it to myself for a twofold reason; first, because I feared further enmity if publicity got out and, secondly, I had no confirmatory word. Tonight I got a message direct. A month ago I sentenced his son to San Quentin for killing a Chinaman in a gambling row. Dorkh came to me and tried to bribe me. He was ferocious in his svelte way. Naturally, I refused the bribe. He left me, apparently reasonable. Then . . . this . . . Ruth. God, God, to

Bringing the Congo to Broadway

By B. F. WILSON

AN unusual phase of the motion picture industry recently came to light with the return of Dr. Leonard John Vandenberg from an eleven months' trip thru Central Africa.

On the twenty-fourth of September, 1919, Dr. Vandenberg together with a camera-man, an assistant, and Dr. George B. Shattuck, embarked from New York to Naples. From there, the party journeyed to Mombasa, on the east coast of Africa, continuing on to Albert Nyanza, Lake Kioga, and following the Nile to Alexandria. This small body of men brought back sufficient data to confirm unquestionably the report of the existence of a race of pygmies, known as the Mambuti.

"We encountered many difficulties in locating this tribe," said Dr. Vandenberg, "for they are a most timid people. None of them exceed four feet in height, and their customs and mode of living are perhaps the most unusual I have ever encountered in my nine years of missionary work in the wilds of Africa."

We were seated in the offices of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. At first impression, Dr. Vandenberg resembles a banker, or doctor, yet the deep-set eyes and the bronzed skin bearing witness of long months of exposure to burning rays of tropic suns,

Two strange tribes of Africa are the Mambuti, a race of pygmies, and the Masai people, who are giants in stature. Dr. Vandenberg confirms the report of their existence in his recent trip to Africa. Top, a White Father with two of the pygmies; center, Dr. Vandenberg; bottom, two Congo belles in gala attire places him as one who has seen wide spaces, and lived in strange countries.

"You see, I had originally planned this trip solely for the purpose of gathering material for a coast to coast lecture-tour in connection with my missionary work.

I have for nine years lived with these people, who are so pathetically untouched by the hand of civilization. I wished to arouse the interest of America, and to get her help for these ignorant children. Mr. Jesse Lasky heard of my projected trip and most generously offered to finance it if I would take a camera-man along and procure some motion pictures. Also my missionary work is to receive a certain percentage of the returns from the pictures when they are released as a special feature.

"It was thru the friendship with some of the White Fathers, who live so simply and work so earnestly on their apparently thankless tasks, that I managed to finally locate the Mambuti. As I have said before, they are a very timorous little people and, upon the first inkling of our approach, they fled, leaving the villages quite empty. However, they were coaxed back thru intermediaries, and finally became quite friendly, posing for pictures and dancing for us. I lived in one of their villages for some weeks, making a thoro investigation of their habits, their daily life, their customs. I found that they existed on rodents, caterpillars, and other similar food, and that their chief sport was in and advised me to keep it. 'You'll need it,' she told me, 'in my apartment.' I find that I do. It sort of fits in."

Miss Hansen was hospitable plus over a charming dinner-table containing not merely charm but food, substantially speaking as well . . . delectable and exceedingly gooey chocolate cake inclusive.

Juanita occupied a tall and carven chair of somber hue and looked startling . . . like a glad sort of picture, framed.

She has a sort of hovering solicitude which one might not expect, perhaps, of her somewhat sensational appearance. One knows, however, that the sensational appearance, the super-ability to wear clothes startlingly, does not mitigate the kind heart beneath the Luciles, if they be Luciles.

There is an air about her at once of ministration and childlike pleasure.

She had never been in New York before, which I did not know. It is, I suppose, always something of a shock to a born and bred New Yorker to encounter a person who has never before so much as seen the famous

Photographs by Edward Thayer Monroe

Of course, I knew that Juanita Hansen had had an apartment or a bungalow or something or other in California with Mary Thurman; that she had been one of the famous Mack Sennett bathing girls and that she had rather recently changed her line, as it were. I knew that she was but newly arrived in New York; that she was effectively blonde and that she was occupying Texas Guinan's apartment in the precincts of the village known as Greenwich. This last I knew with a beautiful definiteness, because she had cozily invited me to dinner, and I always ascertain dinner addresses . . . I am an interviewer.

These facts, above related, were the only facts in my possession. I had heard, tho, come to think of it, that some glib soul had observed that Texas Guinan's apartment resembled the large set in "Intolerance," and, having seen Miss Hansen photographically, I anticipated an—well, graphic evening. I got it.

I was greeted by a vision, nothing else, nothing less, with hair blonde and bobbed, in Turkish costume of an extreme effectiveness, even to the hound ankles.

"I always," said Miss Hansen, "wear this thing around the house. It is a habit with me. Just before I left California, tho, I was throwing away a lot of things and was about to include this in the lot, when Texas Guinan came sky-line. "I nearly," she told me, "went crazy the first night I arrived. Some friends met me and took me some place to dine . . . I don't know where . . . I was so excited and seeing so many things all at once, so it seemed to me. I just kept bobbing from one side of the taxi to the other, asking questions galore and always coming back to 'Where is the Statue of Liberty?' I thought I couldn't be happy until I had seen that."

After dinner we inspected some creative fabrics known, commonly, as gowns; likewise hats and vamp negligees and such-like triumphs. I discovered in the delicate process the innate good nature of Juanita, a sort of ready and open obligingness pleasing to find. Tired from a long day at the studio, strenuously serialing, anticipating a repetition of the same early the following morning, she still tried on the various hats and gowns for us, (her secretary, her P. A. and me), with unvarying éclat and with varied and always bewildering achievement.

Then we went into the dimly lit, mirror-hung, exotic living-room and toasted our feet against a coal grate . . . and talked . . . I asked her what had induced her to leave the Sennett line of work, et al.

"I suddenly found myself," she said; "I had always been very self-depreciatory and without any self-confidence at all. I thought every one I saw was so supremely much better than anything I was or was doing that I would come away completely crushed and discouraged. I'd see Lillian Gish, or Norma Talmadge, or Blanche Sweet, and I would go home and think, 'Oh, they are wonderful! I can never be like that,' and I would be so blue I would be actually in despair. Then, one day, it came to me like a flash that each one of us has his or her own particular place in the scheme of things which no other person can possibly fill or even touch. No matter how small the place, it is our own place, uniquely, to do with what we will. It came to me as sort of revelation. No one can take anything from us or give anything to us in so far as our niche in life goes. We are all personalities. No two of us are similar, really. I sort of felt that I had met myself and for the first time. I took a look at myself in the glass. I was still young. I made up my mind that I would cut out parties and fooling

Nancy Manages

By LILLIAN MAY

The little family, however, remained in Australia for some time and it was there at the age of ten that Nancy made her stage debut in a Christmas pantomime. She made such a success of it, too, that she begged to continue her work as a child actress, which she did intermittently, thru several years of traveling about with her parents.

"Ever since I can remember, I have loved to act and dance," she said. "Daddy didn't want me to do it, but mother didn't mind, and I reasoned with Daddy, telling him that as long as he and mother were always traveling that I might as well put it to some good advantage for myself.

I DON'T know what it was about her. She is very small and childishly formed. Her brown hair waves naturally over her ears and is drawn low at the back of her head. Her dark blue eyes look out from long, curled lashes that were not darkened. Her mouth, a real Cupid's bow that an artist might have formed, was not too red. Her clear skin with a suspicion of small brown freckles was guiltless of powder. She was quietly dressed and yet, as we walked a few blocks up Broadway, thru the lobby of the Claridge and into the dining-room to a cozy corner, it was as tho every one were saying, "Here comes Nancy Deaver!"

How so much personality could be encountered in one small girl I have wondered ever since. And it was not long until I discovered, that not only is Nancy Deaver a person of exceeding charm and personality, but she is also very business-like.

In the first place, there was the business of being horn. Daddy Deaver is a civil engineer with business all over the world. Mother Deaver accompanies him on all his trips. Did Nancy, merely to be born, separate the family or postpone an important business trip to Australia? Certainly not. The trip was made as scheduled and en route, efficiently and promptly. Nancy was born. Never for a moment would she interfere with the business of civil engineering or anything else!

"That's why I am sometimes called an Australian," she said, "but I'm not. I was horn on the way to wherever we happened to be going, which happened to be Australia. But father is English and mother is Scotch, therefore I am English and Scotch and proud of it."

Photographs by Apeda

A continual source of surprise is that so much personality can be encompassed in the diminutive Nancy Deaver. And not only is she a person of exceeding charm and the above personality, but she could also come off with flying colors in the latest and most difficult of efficiency tests!

Of course, he said that I ought to be put in school in England and left there. But all the same he was glad that mother refused to have me left behind at a stupid school. You see my father is not a typical Englishman—the kind who rules his family. No indeed, Mother and I rule him. And some-

Gossip of the Eastern Studios

THE new Long Island studios of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation are now running in full force. It's a big, model plant, and an ideal creative home for the photoplay.

Motion picture stars are still coming and going abroad. Dorothy Gish has returned with her mother. She is going to rest a while, making a trip to California before she resumes production. Blanche Sweet recently sailed for Paris. Herbert Brenon, fresh from interesting activities along the Mediterranean and in Italy, has been visiting in New York. Very possibly he may go back to make a few more pictures. As THE CLASSIC goes to press, this is still pending.

Some interesting news comes from Realart way. They say that Constance and Faire Binney are to appear together, playing the sisters in the new novel, "Christopher and Columbus." By the way; Constance is going to play behind the footlights again, alternating with her screen work. It will be in a Rachel Crothers drama, "Nice People."

Theda Bara returned from an interesting trip abroad and is again on tour in her stage play, "The Blue Flame." Rumors are current regarding a return to the screen next summer. Be that as it may, it is an interesting possibility.

Madame Olga Petrova made a flying trip to England on business and returned to open a twenty-week vaudeville tour of the Keith Theaters. This will take her to the middle west.

The remarkable — and even sensational — success of David Wark Griffith's super-picture, "Way Down East," is the talk of the motion picture world. "Way Down East" is doing an absolute sell-out business at the Forty-fourth Street Theater in New York, and is playing to S. R. O., (Standing Room Only), in Boston and Philadelphia. A Chicago presentation is about to be made.

There is much talk about David Wark Griffith's future plans. The tragic death of Bobbie Harron, of course, upset things a great deal and activities at the Mamaroneck plant ceased for many weeks. Griffith always personally supervises the presentation of his productions in the various cities. Following the launching of the Chicago run, it is likely that he will again turn to production immediately. He has another super-production in mind, one in which Dick Barthelmess will be featured. After this, Dick is to be starred.

Charlie Chaplin has been seeing New York very much incog. He dodges interviewers, but can be occasionally seen at the theater and at evening roof entertainments.

George Fitzmaurice who once was an art student in Paris, looks over a studio "prop" in the upper picture. In the center, Constance Binney pauses for a cup of tea between scenes of her latest Realart production. Below, Thomas Meighan confers with his father, John A. Meighan

Pacific Coast Paragraphs

TEA time at the Alexandria! The statuesque blonde wearing the beautiful tailored suit and the trim sailor hat is Kathlyn Williams—with her husband. The demure, slender little girl in the dark blue serge and close fitting hat is Colleen Moore who has just signed a fine new contract with Marshall Neilan. The good looking boy with her is her brother, Cleeve. King Baggott is the business-like man on your right and so it goes—unless you look closely you miss the celebrities, for they are just people.

One of the beautiful brunettes in Los Angeles is Florence Vidor. I met her out at the Ince studio the other day where she was completing her final scenes in "The Magic Life." House Peters was playing opposite her. The quality of Florence Vidor's beauty is the sort you read about and dream about. There is a perfection of feature, poise and carriage which leaves one fairly breathless. She was wearing an evening gown of yellow and lavender draped chiffon. Her luxuriant chestnut hair was bound closely to her shapely head. Her complexion is so finely luminous that it is scarcely necessary for her to use any make-up. About her there is a spiritual aura, a peace, a completeness. She is a wonderful woman, wife, mother, and artiste.

William deMille has begun work on Barrie's play "What Every Woman Knows." Lois Wilson has been given Maude Adams' original rôle and Conrad Nagel plays opposite. The Conrad Nagels are a model, happy, young married couple, who are now making their home in Hollywood.

Another admirably mated pair are Mr. and Mrs. John Bowers, who recently spent a wonderful five weeks' vacation on their yacht, the Uncas.

Metro has signed up a stock company of unusual strength this season. Included are Wyndham Standing, whose performance in "Eyes of the Soul" was a screen epic, Edward Connelly, Edward Jobson, Florence Turner, Cleo Madison, Edward Cecil and Lawrence Grant. Having these players always available, means that Metro stars will be supported by practically all-star casts.

We were all just thrilled over the addition of Gareth Hughes to our film colony, when along came Fame and handed him the leading rôle in J. M. Barrie's "Sentimental Tommy," and he departed for New York. However, he was only loaned to Famous Players by Metro for this one picture, so we may expect him back again soon.

And speaking of "loaning," Marshall Neilan has loaned Colleen Moore to King Vidor for one picture, "The Sky Pilot."

Jack Mulhall, another happy beneficiary, is to have the leading rôle opposite Viola Dana in her new picture, "The Off-Shore Pirate."

By the way, I stumbled on an interesting rumor the other day. It is said that Thomas H. Ince, who produced the wonderful old Indian pictures in the good old Fine Arts days, will produce another Indian drama in the near future.

I watched Myrtle Stedman being directed in "The Concert," by Victor Shertzinger a while ago. Miss Stedman has remarkably expressive blue eyes and fair hair and is, complete mistress of screenic moods. She can turn from a study of "Vogue" on the side lines to a most pathetic

In addition you get a double-cut steel file, emery boards, orange stick, absorbent cotton and an invaluable little booklet on the care of the nails, all combined in a stunning set.

In one stunning set— everything to keep your nails beautifully manicured

IN ten minutes, with these Cutex manicure preparations, you can transform nails you are ashamed of.

Start today to have the shapely, well-kept nails that make any hand beautiful. No matter how rough and ragged the skin around your nails is, no matter how ugly cutting the cuticle has made them, you can almost instantly change them into nails that are noticeably lovely.

Without trimming or cutting of any kind, Cutex keeps the skin at the base of the nail smooth, firm and unbroken. Just file your nails to the proper length and shape. In the Cutex package you will find orange stick and absorbent cotton. With a little cotton wrapped around the end of the stick and dipped in Cutex, work around the nail base, gently pushing back the cuticle.

Almost at once you will find you can wipe off the dead surplus skin. Wash the hands, pressing back the cuticle as you dry them.

For fascinatingly snowy nail tips, apply just a bit of Cutex Nail White under the nails. You will delight in the fashionable finish that the Cutex Polish gives. Your first manicure will show you how lovely nails can look.

For Christmas and birthday presents

Last year over three hundred thousand women bought Cutex sets during the holiday season. Before you plan a single Christmas gift, look at these Cutex sets. The Fair Four Pathé has a new idea! A company of six girls has been organized—the half dozen to take turns playing leading rôles in Rolin comedies. They are to be known as the "Vanity Fair Girls"

How to banish the needless flaws that ruin your appearance

It is so easy to let your skin acquire bad traits

WIND and cold, you know, are ruinous to the texture of your skin. They whip the moisture out of it—leave it dry and tense. Then follow roughening and chapping.

Skin specialists say that one can protect the skin by applying a softening and soothing cream always before venturing out. Never omit this. One little slip, and your skin has had its first dangerous lesson on how to grow rough!

Of course you need for this protection a cream which will not make your face go out and your skin will not chap all winter long. Regardless of the weather it will become more and more exquisite in texture.

Does the powder keep coming off your face, leaving you all shiny and embarrassed?

Perhaps you are expecting too much of it. Really, it is entirely your own fault if you put the powder directly on the skin and expect it to stay on of its own accord. The finest of powders needs a base to hold it, and to keep it smooth.

For this use, as for protection from the weather, you need a cream without oil. Before you powder, take a bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream and rub it lightly into the skin. At once it disappears, leaving your skin softened. Now powder as usual and don't think of it again. The powder will stay on two or three times as long as ever before.

When your face is tense from a long, hard day, yet you want to "look beautiful," remember that the cool, fragrant touch of Pond's Vanishing Cream smoothed over the face and neck will instantly bring it new freshness. Do this before you go to a dance. All the tell-tale weariness around eyes and mouth will vanish. Your skin will gain a new transparency. You need never let it get into the way of staying tired.

Whenever you want to look especially lovely, even though you are tired, you can give your complexion new freshness at a moment's notice. Pond's Vanishing Cream is famous for the eleventh hour freshening it brings your skin.

Beware of allowing your skin to cloud up and lose its clearness. When this happens, it is because minute particles of dust have worked their way too deep into the pores to be removed by ordinary bathing. Really, it means that you have been allowing your skin to go only half cleansed! To remove this deeply lodged dust you need an entirely different cream, a cream with an oil base. Pond's Cold Cream has just the amount of oil to work deep into the pores and cleanse them.

Before you go to bed and whenever you have been especially exposed to dust, rub Pond's Cold Cream into the pores of the skin. Then wipe it off with a soft cloth. You will say, "How could so much dust have gotten into my pores!" Do this regularly and you will be rewarded by a clear, fresh skin.

Every normal skin needs both these creams. Neither will foster the growth of hair.

Get a jar or tube of each today at any drug or department store. You will realize for the first time how lovely your skin can be.

To make the powder stay on all evening apply a powder base of Pond's Vanishing Cream.

look oily before going out. Pond's Vanishing Cream is made without any oil precisely for this daytime and evening use. It cannot reappear in a shine. Lightly touch your face with Pond's Vanishing Cream. This leaves your face smooth and protects it from the weather. Do this every time you

The little bedtime duty you must not forget if you care about your complexion is the cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream.

shrewd eyes. "Mm!" he said at last dryly, "she must ha' found it quick, because she's down at my house this minute, crying as tho her heart 'ud break. I couldn't make out what was wrong, so I come over to find out. Went away, oh? With Bill Lacey? Well, I guess she changed her mind."

Caleb West caught the table edge. "She—didn't go?"

"Didn't 'pear to," the Captain said, dryly, then his tone changed, grew pleading, "Caleb, she's young. We older folks forget what the world looks like to twenty. We'd ought to make 'lowances. Shall I go back and send Betty home?"

The master-diver stood immovable. His face was like granite. "It's too late, Bell," he said slowly, "It 'ud happen again. I couldn't stand it, watching' her, wonderin'. I'll give her half I make but—she cant come back."

Argument, pleading availed no more than a wave washing against a rock. "There ain't nothing," mused the good Captain as he plodded heavily homeward, "there ain't nothing unforgettinger than a good man, nor stupider either. Caleb West is all right when it comes to laying the foundation for a lighthouse but he cant keep his own home from drifting to shipwreck."

White-faced but singularly calm, the girl received Caleb's edict. "He's right!" she flashed when the Captain showed indignation. "I haven't got the right to go back." She faced the old man bravely, "you know what folks'll say. But it wont be true. Bill Lacey never so much as kissed me. Soon as I got on that boat I knew I couldn't go. But I was wicked all the same. I listened to him and I—wanted what he said—Life! and things happening—and things to see! And I deserve to be punished."

The tiny fishing village rocked seascickly with the news. Housewives left their dishes unwashed to discuss it over their fences, the men on the fishing boats rolled it like a flavorsome morsel on their tongues. But there was a singular scarcity of details. None of the three involved would speak of what had happened. Bill Lacey, sullen-eyed, with bitten red lips left the lighthouse gang and went to work as a fireman on a freighter, plying between the island and the mainland. Betty West got a place as a waitress in the hotel, and Caleb strode to and from the ledge where the lighthouse was rising, with a heavy look that forbade questioning.

But the gossips eked out their fare with another spicy morsel. For a long time the admiration of Henry Sanford, the contractor who was building the light, for pretty Kate Leroy, the wife of the hotel owner, had been unmistakable—to the whole village, except apparently, to slow, silent, plodding Morgan Leroy. The handsome shoulders and dapper mustache of the city man were almost never seen without an orange sweater, a floating chiffon veil close by, and while Sanford paid assiduous court and Kate Leroy's gay, pleased laughter shrilled her flattered delight to all the world, Morgan Leroy, in shapeless old trousers and wrinkled necktie sat hunched over his paper in the hotel office.

In her leisure hours Betty slipped away to the cliff, and sat, a small, huddled figure hidden among the bushes, looking out over the restless harbor to where the far figures of the divers moved on their platform. The ocean no longer called to her imagination. Its eternal plaint moaned in the homesick ears of her soul, and slow, silent tears gathered in her eyes and dripped off the point of her chin.

To Bill Lacey, when he tried to reason with her, to plead angrily, passionately she answered only "No. That's all over with—please."

"But you cant live here all your life like this," the boy stormed, haggard eyes on her colorless little face, "people whisperin', working like a horse! Ask Caleb for a divorce and marry me. We'll go away—to Europe, we'll see the world—"

She smiled sadly, as tho she were infinitely older and wiser than he. "I couldn't be any farther away in Europe than I am here," she said, and fell to brooding, not noticing when he stumbled blindly away.

People said afterward that the explosion aboard the Bessie Marie, freighter, was a judgment, rolling the good old Methodist word solemnly on their tongues. They proved at the inquiry that it was a leaky valve. Whichever you prefer, it was at least a turning point in six people's lives. Almost before the vibration of the explosion had died away a crowd had collected on the shore and the tug with the divers, still in their suits had started for the wreck. Captain Bell was casting off his dory when he felt his arm seized, and looked down into the face of Betty West. "I've got to go!" she told him wildly, "I've got to go!"

And so Caleb West and his wife came face to face at last on the tilting deck of the tug beside the mass of wreckage which alone showed where the Bessie Marie had gone down. Her hands went to her breast, but she did not speak, only looked up into his face, set into hard and alien lines. "All o' the crews safe—but one man," he said harshly, "he's in the air lock. If I dont get him in ten minutes, handsome Bill Lacey'll never break up another man's home."

There was such terrible bitterness and exultation in his tone, and his kindly eyes held such an unholy light of triumph that she cried out then and clutched at his arm. "Caleb! You're going? You must! Oh—you must!" She was thinking only of him, and of the Cain-reproach he would carry always thereafter if he did not go, but he read in her agony another meaning. Without a word he turned on his heel and set the helmet over his head.

It seemed to Betty West that all her lifetime up to that moment was not so long as the ten minutes that followed, when she stood by the bow, staring down into the green deeps as tho by the force of her will she could draw him up to her. When the ugly, squat figure appeared, silently carrying something limp in its arms and clambered clumsily aboard, she heard the sound of hysterical weeping somewhere at a great distance but did not know that it came from her own lips.

They laid Bill Lacey on the deck, a long young sprawl, terribly still. And while she watched them work over him, Caleb West clambered out of his diving suit, staggering with weariness. It had been a gruelling fight under the crushing green waters, a fight more than physical. But he came out of it a conqueror. He went to his wife now, and the hardness was gone from him. "I saved him partly because 'twas my duty, Betty, but mostly because you wanted him." He smiled crookedly, "I been wrong. I was too old for you—I didn't have the right to your youngness, Blossom," (the old pet name slipped out unawares), "but I'll give you back what I took, best I can. I'll set you free—"

The nearness of her—ah God! the dearness! He shut his eyes lest he forget his promise and take her straightway, because he could do no other, into his weary arms. Because they were shut he could not see the quivering shame and tenderness in her upturned face, but suddenly—thru the darkness, spiritual and bodily that engulfed him, he heard a whisper:—

"Caleb, please—dont—set me free. I want—I want to stay—"

And, as in the beginning, the voice cried to the swirling chaos, "Let there be Light," and there was light. Now Caleb West opened his eyes on a glory of sunset crimson and a face in it, lifted to his. It was not the placid kiss of middle-age but the kiss of a young, ardent lover that he gave his wife then—

And the same night that robbed the village of one scandal took away the other also, on the train that carried Henry Sanford to the city—alone. Captain Bell, who rowed two passengers from the Point to catch the train, might have been able to explain why he brought one back with him, weeping with a melancholy satisfaction over her shattered romance and tremulously grateful for its shattering.

Rowing homeward, after he had left Kate Leroy, whimpering her gratitude at the hotel, Captain Bell regarded the lights twinkling friendliwise along the shore contentedly, his face gently humorous.

"Ain't it nice to think all o' them lights mean a home," he ruminated aloud, resting a moment on his oars, "That's the way the Lord meant it to be, I reckon, men and women set in homes. An old bachelor like me has missed his job at home-making. Still," and he chuckled softly, "I do' know but what the Lord needs a few lighthouses, too!"

she is very pretty to look upon, with an unusual complexion.

Among the early contestants were two children of unusual beauty and screen personality.—Little Ruth Higgins of 20 Liberty Street, Morristown, N. J., and Dorothy Taylor of 1322 Findley Avenue, N. Y. City. Both of them play important parts in "Love's Redemption," and we know of no other children on the stage or screen who could have played and looked better. They are each awarded silver medals and will be known hereafter as Silver-Medalists of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest.

And while we are speaking of "Love's Redemption," be it remembered that every member of that cast was carefully selected from among thousands of applicants and, therefore, each one is hereby given the award of Honorable Mention, and a place on our final Honor Roll. They are Dorian Romero, Lynne M. Berry, Katherine Bassett, William R. Talmadge, Arthur Tutbill, Cecile Edwards, William Castro, Ellsworth Jones, Seymoure Panish, Jos. Murtaugh, Effie Palmer, Bunty Manly, Alfred L. Rigali, Edward Chalmers, Charles Hammer, William White, Norbert Hammer, Carl Chalmers, Doris Doree, Mrs. F. Mayer, O. L. Langhanke and Jose Santo DeSigue. Some of these are "types" and are not honored for beauty. Mr. Romero deserves special mention for his work in this play.

During the warm months hundreds of girls appeared before the judges, and some were so beautiful that it seemed they would outshine those previously mentioned in this article. Among these was Betty Pomroy Hanson of Rugby, North Dakota, who seemed to be the exact "double" of Lucille Langhanke. Several tests were made of her and it was found she screened remarkably well and had all of the elements that a screen star should have. In the same group appear Mary Jane Sanderson of Johnstown, Pa., and so promising was her first test that we at once telegraphed her to return for another. She is not quite fifteen.

There were two more in this group, deserving of special mention, for they screen exceptionally well. They are Yvonne Bailey of 15 McDonald Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., and Bertha Keating of Springfield, Mass. They are each about thirteen years of age and a trifle too young to win first honors in this contest, but look out for them in the next!

Early in September there came two girls of remarkable beauty and presence, each measuring about five feet seven in height. They are Elma McKinney of 114 West 58th Street, N. Y. City, and Eileen Elliott of 707 Ritner Street, Philadelphia, Pa. They both screen very well, indeed, and while their spheres will be limited on account of their unusual size and height, the cinema will find a place for them.

About this time came two charming little brunettes, who were long considered for first honors. They are Katherine Leonard of 160 West 84th Street, N. Y. City and Bye Madden of 1667 Grove Street, N. Y. City.

Those who saw "A Dream of Fair Women" will remember the cute little miss who played the part of the "tough girl." She was then only fourteen years old. She came down to Roslyn one day in July for a new test, and everybody was amazed at her appearance. She screened beautifully and we did our best to get her back again for additional tests, but she was away on the road playing in vaudeville. She is Evelyn Pouch, but we are unable to give her address.

Late in August several of the judges met and again went thru huge piles of photographs in search of some "rose born to blush unseen and waste its fragrance on the desert air," fearing that somebody of unusual promise had been overlooked. Several thousand photographs were thus selected and sent to the studio of the editor-in-chief. Many hours every day were spent in going over these photographs in the hope of revealing a rose or a bud that had been previously overlooked. About a hundred were selected and the wires were burned up in sending hurry messages for these girls to appear at once before the judges. Telegrams, form letters and phone messages were sent out in great haste, and soon they began to bear fruit. Among these photographs was a small, poorly made, and in-artistic one sent in by a friend of a young lady in Canada, unknown to her. The young miss was surprised to receive our summons, but, when she learned what had happened, on she came from Canada, and now she finds herself on the final Honor Roll, well up among the winners. She is Jean McIntyre of Meaford, Canada.

Another similar case, and even more astonishing, is that of Corliss Palmer of Macon, Georgia, who will now be amazed to find herself a winner. Her simple photograph had been passed over and she came within an ace of being lost in the shuffle.

Another similar case is that of Allene Ray, a charming little blonde from San Antonio, Texas, who came, saw and conquered at the last minute. Both of these young ladies are dazzling beauties of rare charm and photographic possibilities, and, as Emerson said to Walt Whitman on receipt of a copy of "Leaves of Grass,"—"We welcome you on the threshold of a great career." Many screen tests have been made of them and the judges are convinced that, everything considered, the contest has produced nobody quite so faultless as these two Southern beauties.

Space forbids our making further mention of the many glorious girls who appeared in this contest. There is a limit to all things, even to the final Honor Roll. It is quite possible that we have overlooked some who have screen possibilities. We now wish that we had secured half a dozen cameras and camera-men instead of two and given every girl additional tests under different conditions. Therefore, we say to all those whose names do not appear here that they should not be discouraged, and not give up hope for the future. May they have better luck in our next contest.

All of those mentioned above are declared by the judges to be the real discoveries of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest. However, we have agreed to make stars of the winners, to give them two years' publicity in all four of our publications, and to secure for them contracts with reliable companies. We have already secured two contracts, as above mentioned, and we shall do what we can to secure others as fast as opportunity comes. We surely cannot be expected to declare as winners all of the foregoing, for various reasons. Some of these girls are not yet ready to start on a screen career and some are mere children; and as for publicity, there would not be room for much else in our magazines were we to grant two years' publicity to all.

As for Lucille Langhanke, she is already a star, and is entitled to all that a winner is entitled to. The same is true of Helen DeWitt.

But since the judges are to select one or more who are to be declared winners, and who are entitled to the full quota of our promises, it is found necessary to reduce the number of declared winners to two. Should more than two winners be announced, we could not fulfil our promises. In one sense of the word, all those above mentioned are winners, because they have all won honors. Lucille Langhanke, who will hereafter be known as Mary Astor, has already been made a star, or will be made one by the Famous Players-Lasky Company, regardless of what we do for her. They have already started their campaign of publicity. However, we insist upon selecting and making at least two more stars and, therefore, we take pleasure in announcing the final decision of the judges as follows:

The winners of the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest are hereby declared to be:

CORLISS PALMER, 614 MOUNT PELIER AVENUE, MACON, GEORGIA; AND ALLENE RAY, 2248 RIVER AVENUE, SAN ANTONIO, TEXAS.

To these two young ladies we extend our hearty congratulations for having won the greatest contest that has ever been staged. We are confident that the future will prove the wisdom of this choice. In the years to come, these two young ladies and five million readers will look back upon this announcement as an epoch-making one, and the editors of the Brewster Publications, as well as the judges of this contest, will always feel gratified and elated over the wisdom of their choice.

Whiter Teeth

In 10 days, if you'll ask us for this tube

This simple test has shown to millions the way to whiter, safer teeth. It is a free test—you should make it. It may bring life-long effects.

No other method known can do what Pepsodent does for teeth.

To end the film

The object is to fight the film, which dims the teeth and causes most tooth troubles. Dental science has worked years to do that.

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays. The ordinary tooth paste does little to combat it, so the tooth brush leaves much of it intact.

It is the film-coat that discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus all these troubles, despite the tooth brush, have been constantly increasing.

Now we combat it

Dental science, after years of research, has found ways to combat film. High authorities have proved their efficiency by clinical and laboratory tests.

The best dental opinion approves these methods. Leading dentists everywhere are urging their adoption. Now millions daily use them, largely by dental advice.

The methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is being sent, so all who will may quickly know how much it means to them.

The new effects

One ingredient of Pepsodent is pepsin. Another multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva to digest starch deposits which cling and form acid.

It also multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to neutralize the acids which cause tooth decay. Two factors directly attack the film. One of them keeps the teeth so highly polished that film cannot easily adhere.

Pepsodent combines the best that modern science has discovered to combat the tooth destroyers. And to millions it is bringing a new era in teeth cleaning.

Watch it act

This is to offer a ten-day tube. Send the coupon for it. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

The new tooth luster will show you its effects. The book we send will tell you what they mean. Then you can judge for yourself.

Men who smoke

Smokers' teeth often show film-stains most. Children's teeth are most affected by the film. Young teeth are most subject to attacks. With older people the chief danger lies in pyorrhea.

So to all this test is most important. For your own sake don't forget it. Cut out the coupon now.

He prefers the heavier, more dramatic rôles. Better fitted to them, more in his element. He does not, he informed me, go upon the general theory of the good in versatility. To be able . . . all right . . . but in practice . . . no. We have, he adduced, a limited time to progress in. It is too much to expect that we can progress along all lines and reach any number of definite and worth-while goals. There is such a thing as overstepping one's mark and one's capabilities. Strained efforts are palpably so. A wise man knows and remains within, his own limits.

"Still," I said, "you are going to appear in a stage play as well as in pictures this winter, isn't that so?"

He admitted it . . . no, them.

"I hope to," he said, "for a year or so anyway. It will give me a better working value, to myself and to those employing me.

"It is also a matter of money. Working at both increases my market value. I think we are all interested in the money end of it. I am. I admit that, too."

"Do you think," I pressed, "that the money end is of more import to the majority than the so-called Art end?"

Mr. Harlan considered, blowing, the while, perfectly remarkable fantasies of smoke against the ceiling.

"I think," he said, "that to the wise and practicable individual the money end is the means to the Art end and, therefore, greatly and certainly primarily to be considered.

"Money is the great liberator. We can do so much more with it than we can without it, which would be trite if I did not mean in anything but a material sense. We can be artists so much more youngly and easily because we have the where-withal to lessen the brunt of other drains and pressures."

"What," I said, "is the most worthwhile thing to you?"

"Ambition," he said, sans hesitation. "Ambition and California. Sunshine and the will-to-get-on. Without ambition we are dull, flat and quite stale. An interesting person is almost sure to be an ambitious person, in one sense or another. You can be sure that it is the missing ingredient in a savorless person."

"And work?"

"Work is the walls of the house, of which ambition is the foundation," Mr. Harlan said, adding, rather vaguely, "but I am getting in beyond my depth. Anyway, I mean that ambition is, of all characteristics, the fundamental prompter."

Afar off someone hailed him. Constance, duly inquired of, no doubt, had gone back to the set. Mr. Harlan arose with some alacrity, not to say relief.

"Speaking of work," he said, "this is the first stroke I have done today. Perhaps that is why I am so glib . . . talking about it . . . It often goes that way . . ."

The camera clicked and I departed.

don't believe in self-depreciation. It is an inverted form of egotism, and quite as harmful as its antithesis. We cannot help what we are. We really have no reason to laud or to cavil at what we are. We are, and it is outside our volition.

"It is what we do with what we are that matters; that can give us the right to pride or shame. If we are born with a gift of writing, of acting, of painting or playing, it is so. What matters is the way in which we treat the gift, once it is ours. Whether we maltreat or exalt it, humble it or glorify it.

"I always feel that a person bearing within him an art should consider that art as a flame to be tended; to be kept clean—and bright.

"I believe that one should conserve one's self for this flame; guard one's self; watch over it. Sometimes the simile of a lamp comes to me, a lamp to be tended and trimmed, dimmed, perhaps, or raised.

"One should be able to consider it, this art, subjectively, abstractly, a thing not entirely one's own, to be rendered an accounting for to the public . . ."

Miss Kennedy gave her whimsical deprecatory smile; patted her husband's hand, near her own, said, "I hope you do not think I am trying to be theoretical, unduly," and was gone from me in quest of the Hollander hat.

"Come and see me in my play," she called back to me, and I said:

"I will—good luck!"

ambitions was to be a millionaire and have five babies by the time she was twenty-five.

And there is still time for even this dream to come true.

Dorothy Devore is as unlike an actress as anyone I have ever met. She is a tiny little girl, another member of the five-foot-small brigade. She has enormous large brown eyes with an innocent stare. Her hair is naturally a reddish-brown, and off the screen she doesn't curl it, neither does she use make-up, and she is one of the few girls I know who has no interest in a lipstick. She wears—in real life, you understand—simple little frocks of gingham or of organdie as the occasion may warrant. She is all in all the typical American ingénue. Her very manner, hearing and clothes, bespeak the clean-minded, very young, well-brought-up daughter of an American mother.

A cabaret dancer, a vaudeville artiste, and a motion picture actress!

I give you my word, as well as the old lady's—

You'd never know it from meeting her.

"Another $50 Raise!"

"WHY, that's my third increase in a year! It just shows what special training will do for a man. When I left school to go to work I couldn't do anything in particular. All I could hope for was just a job—and that's what I got, at $60 a month for routine, unskilled work. I stayed at it for three years, with one small increase each year.

"Then one day I woke up. I found I wasn't getting ahead simply because I couldn't do any one thing well. I decided right then to put in an hour after supper each night preparing myself for more important work. So I wrote to Scranton and arranged for a course that would give me special training for our business.

"Why, in a few months I had a whole new vision of my work and its possibilities. You see, I was just beginning to really understand it. I made some suggestions to the manager and he was immensely pleased. Said he had noticed how much better I was doing lately and wished he had more like me.

"Just after that an opening came and he gave me my chance—at an increase of $25 a month. Then I really began to grow. Six months later I was put in charge of my department and my salary went up again. Since then I've had two increases of $50 a month and now I've got another $50 raise!"

be a part of it. I love the theater and have revelled in the opportunity to see the work of some of the great artists. And there are many wonderful things to see and learn. But do you know that it is the 'outsider' who really knows and appreciates the best things in New York? What does the average New Yorker care about the art galleries or walking across Brooklyn Bridge at twilight or the view from the top of the Woolworth Building or plays like 'The Jest'?

"I have been living here with friends who seem to live in a mad whirl of dinners, teas, dances, shopping—going round and round in a circle and getting nowhere. They have tried to carry me along—because they think it's the only life for a young girl. But I had decided that it would never do for me and, as I expected to be here several months, engaged a room down-town in the dormitory of a girls' club—all of them girls who work and live for something besides a good time.

"My philosophy of life may be a very queer one," she said, "but it seems to me that youth is not the time for frivolity. Not if one is to get anything out of life worth having. It's the time to discover many wonderful things—to study, to observe, to travel—to cultivate worth-while people—to build. And then, when one is older and has learnt to discriminate and knows what one really wants most in life and has earned the right—why, then, let them 'as wants' go ahead and frivol," she laughed; "it's up to them!

"No, I'm too young in the business to have any theories about pictures. I'm just learning and glad of the opportunity to watch and learn. In the meantime, I'm glad I'm going back to God's beautiful country, where one can really live. But some day, when I have acquired much experience and a great deal of nerve, I'm coming back to New York and haunt the offices of the Broadway managers until they offer to try me out in a stage engagement. Of course, I realize I will have a great many things to contend with, but the game would not be worth playing without them," quoth the shining Ann.

was brought to a head when his father, a stern man, utterly forbade him to appear in an amateur performance for which he had been rehearsing for weeks.

It was the last straw. Jerome Patrick left home and answered the call of that will-o-the-wisp fame.

But he was willing to work hard, no false pride kept him from attaining his ambition. He was willing to do anything that was honest, providing it kept him in the theater. Thus he was a chorus man, a leader in stock, a player in the provinces, but all the time he had just one object

The Land of Romance

Few people realize that they may enter into this charmed land, and contribute to it. Novices?—the greatest artists were once of that class. Chances?—just as many as in any other walk of life. You simply haven't tried.

New Opportunities In Photoplay Writing

Open to All Who Have Ideas

WHO will say that he or she has not average ideas and imagination about life? And who has not thought, in the theatre, that they have as good or better ideas for photoplays than some they have seen on the screen?

And did you know that literary ability has nothing to do with this new art?

One doesn't need "style" or vocabulary, but simply good ideas and the ability to express them clearly.

For photoplays are not written as stories are, or as plays for the stage. They are built of ideas, which are put into pictures, arranged in a certain way.

Those who would write photoplays are most concerned with that particular arrangement. And now there's a way in which you can learn how to arrange your ideas.

When you have learned that, you have learned to write photoplays in the form acceptable to producers.

And producers will rejoice as much as you in your new success.

The PALMER PLAN is complete, efficient and vitally interesting—it entralls those who take it up. There is no tedium; in fact one finds in it one of the best of all diversions from other lines of work. Don't say you can't follow it. Don't think you can't win because you have never tried to write. This is a new and different opportunity. Who knows who doesn't try?

For There's a Famine in Photoplays

THERE'S a need for 5000 new stories and producers must have scores of them to produce at once, for the demand is far exceeding the supply that present writers can prepare. Twenty million people are attending motion picture theatres daily and they are calling for new plays. Their interest must be maintained if the art is to survive. The opportunity to aid is yours. Who will rise to a new and perhaps "unexpected" success on this modern wave? Who is there who hasn't said to himself, "I am capable of doing something that I have not yet found, far better than anything I have ever done"?

The Palmer Plan

THE PALMER PLAN of Photoplay Writing teaches you mainly how to prepare your ideas for acceptance. Then as you progress it develops you in all the fine points of the art. It is both a primary and finishing school, and it has brought out many star writers—Mrs. Caroline Sayre of Missouri, author of "Live Sparks" for J. Warren Kerrigan; Dorothea Nourse; Paul Schofield, Ince writer; G. Leroi Clarke, who sold his first story for $3,000; and others who have won success. "His Majesty the American," played by Douglas Fairbanks, is a Palmer student's story. James Kendrick, another student, sold six stories less than a year after he enrolled.

We maintain a Marketing Bureau in Los Angeles, through which students can offer their stories to the big producers if they so desire.

Our Advisory Council which directs our educational policy is composed of Cecil B. DeMille, Thos. H. Ince, Rob Wagner and Lois Weber. All are famous in the industry and would lend their aid to nothing that they would not use themselves.

Twelve leading figures in the profession have included special printed lectures for the course. These lectures cover every essential phase of photoplay plot construction.

in view: to be under Belasco's management.

It is a singular fact that when one has a straight goal in mind one generally reaches it. Patrick reached his.

It was while he was playing "A Thousand Years Ago" that Belasco sent for him. And he has been associated with that wizard of the stage ever since.

"Why, I can remember" when I was playing in 'The Little Lady in Blue,' I had to write a letter and Belasco had me supplied with paper stamped with the monogram of the character I was playing. In that play, too, I had to ask the butler each night for a glass of claret. At the dress rehearsal three different bottles of claret were brought me (no ice tea in this production) and Belasco asked me to sample them and order the one I liked best. I singled out the one I preferred. Mr. Belasco said, 'Oh my word, the most expensive of the lot, that man will bankrupt me.' Nevertheless, he ordered it, and at every performance I was served real claret."

Mr. Patrick played with Lenore Ulric in "The Heart of Wetona" and more lately in "By Pigeon Post." At present he has come West to play in pictures.

His very first glimpse of the Klieg lights came in "Officer 666," his second in the all-star production, "The Furnace," directed by William D. Taylor for Paramount.

He praises Mr. Taylor's work very highly.

"Mr. Taylor is a gentleman in every sense of the word," said Patrick, "and he is keen enough to know that a picture must be produced with a splendid cast thruout. The star system, turning every ray on the star, is all wrong. I myself have found pictures like starting all over again, and I am so interested that I shall keep it up and see what I can do."

And I hope that Mr. Patrick will keep it up, because he has that which the screen needs—something new. He possesses all the culture and background which a first-class stage training gives one; he is young, different from other movie heroes and decidedly easy to look at.

His hair is red—absolutely—altho women who fall in love with him will call it russet, Titian or some other poetic name—it is the kind of hair that waves naturally, tightly, the kind that a woman would love to run her hand thru and feel the short tendrils cling to her fingers. His eyes are blue-green, fascinating because they bespeak superiority yet humanness, sophistication yet clean-mindedness. He does not wear a mustache in real life, consequently he seems more boyish and younger than he appears on the stage or screen.

He has the exterior of a hero, the heart of a gentleman, the mind of a scholar and the soul of an artist.

Here's hoping the Klieg lights reveal Jerome Patrick's personality honestly.

You Can Keep Your Hair Beautiful

THIS device makes shampooing at home, easy, thorough and convenient. Attaches to any type of combination hot and cold water faucet. Temperature of water regulated to suit, the medicated soap tablets contained in the nickel plated receptacle combine with water in just the right proportion. Can be used as frequently as desired without causing the hair to become streaky as is often the result when soap is applied directly in the old fashioned way. Soap container quickly removed for clear rinse.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 25c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator $.75
M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads $.75
M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair, $.50
M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan, $1.00
M. T.'s Minerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream" $.75

Smiling Stars

Who are they?

YOU will notice that all three of these Smiling Stars have good teeth. A motion picture star must have good teeth to be successful. Think how disappointed you would be if a close-up of your favorite motion picture actor or actress showed a set of bad teeth. Your admiration would vanish at once.

Write on the coupon below, your guess as to the names of these three popular motion picture stars, and mail it to us. If you guess even one of them right we will send you a generous trial tube of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

Because Colgate's is safe; because it is free from harmful acids and dangerous grit, and because it cleans teeth thoroughly, Colgate's is recommended by more dentists than any other dentifrice. The flavor is delicious.

experience as a child actress before her parents refused to let her continue. Even in the face of their strong disapproval she never gave up her dream of the stage.

At the beginning of the war, she became a nurse. She collapsed finally under the strain of her work and retired to private life again. A trip to New York found her surreptitiously making the rounds of the movie studios. When she actually landed a small bit her father gave in and her career was started.

"I shall never forget," she laughed, "the reply that granny wired from England when father wrote her what I had done! She demanded, 'Are you out of your head to let the child become an actress?' She will be ruined!" But success justifies almost anything.

"When she saw my first big picture, 'The Spirit of the Red Cross,' she sent a wonderful letter of approval!"

She is patricially beautiful, Claire Adams, in a dark, intense way, patently a woman of the world, and possessed of all the easy charm that worldliness implies. Her voice, influenced by her life in Canada and London, is modulated and quiet. In the West, where voices incline to stridency, it is like the touch of velvet after gunny-sacking.

And this English deliberation has crept into her being, until it is an integral part of her life. I asked her if she did not mourn New York, where she had got her start with Vitagraph. She shook her head slowly.

"No," she said. "I do not like New York. Its money-madness makes more than a few weeks of it unbearable. It seemed to me that while I was there I was under a terrible, relentless pressure. I was caught up in the mad race and had to keep up with the racers or be trampled under foot. The average dweller there, if he is working, may see nothing of grass or trees for months on end, and only an occasional dash of smoky sky. I have been brought up chiefly in western Canada, and the outdoors has become an essential part of me. Here in California it is crowded enough, but at least one may live comfortably, and have a lawn, and a car and keep a dog without fear of protest from the landlord."

Later, on the track of her ambitions, I spoke tentatively of stardom. Her reply was as convincing as it was surprising.

"No, I do not want stardom. I think I could be content if it never came. After all, there is an infinite satisfaction in being surrounded by a cast of capable actors and, in the end, being a part of a picture that is thoroely satisfactory and as perfect as good acting can make it. The star is too often surrounded by an ineffectual support that ruins the picture as a whole. Think of the countless personal triumphs of which you read and of the countless failures which accompany them. I believe that the day of the star is dying. It is inevitable that a chosen few will survive. Mary Pickford, for example, could never be set aside. But why should I even talk of stardom? It is not so long ago that I was taking lessons in the art of walking from Kosloff, and so far 'The Riders of the Dawn' is the only picture that has been released under my new contract for five years with B. J. Hampton. I have completed others, of course—Churchill's 'The Dwelling Place of Light,' Harry Leon Wilson's 'The Spenders,' and Upton Sinclair's 'The Money Changers.' But I still attend each day's 'rushes' on the alert for every little exaggeration, every fault of expression that I have made. And in the increasing confidence that is resulting, in the surety that I have done this or that bit as near perfection as possible, there is a thrill that the possibility of stardom has never given me."

In defiance of her earnestness, I started out to write about Claire in an airy vein, to try to weave fantasies into the serious web of her ambitions. I find that I have failed miserably. The heavier vein persists.

But I would not give a wrong impression of her. Her work is not the be-all and do-all of her existence. She had just returned from a five days' trip to Mt. Baldy, an interlude of rest between productions, where she had fished the entire five days, had caught one fish, and had come home contented. It was a magnificent achievement in optimism.

And she has created a charming home for herself out of a miniature bungalow, a taste for delft blue, and the aforementioned poodle. The dragon, who after all was not her mother, she speaks of in warm tones as "a perfect dear." She is an elderly companion whose forbidding aspect, it would seem, hides a multitude of kindnesses. I conferred my blessing upon her as soon as I knew that she was not a "movie momma."

I didn't want to leave. But I could hear the dragon thumping tinnily in the kitchenette, her energy increasing with each thump. It may have only been a good dinner in preparation, but it sounded like a hint. When the poodle stuck his head out of the door and sniffed straight at me, I knew it was. I withdrew my blessing and departed.

DARK AND DEW

By TED OLSON

In the dark, in the dew,
When the laggard day is thru,
And one star burns, whitey chill,
Just above the highest hill,
When the lilac's odorous pain
Swims across the dusk again,
Comes a dream, dear heart, of you—
In the dark, in the dew.

Hark! the silence stirs alone
To the frogs' metallic drone,
Or the wavering, unseen flight
Of a bird across the night:
But the room is all a-blur
With the shades of things that were,
With a joy reborn anew—
In the dark, in the dew.

In the dark, in the dew,
How my heart leaps back to you!
To your slim young wildwood grace,
To the glory of your face;
Till the fragrant twilight seems
Warm and redolent with dreams,
With one dream I never knew—
In the dark, in the dew.

Kirkwood Compresses! (Continued from page 18)

"You said it! No more directing for me!"

Kirkwood, a few years back, was one of the coterie of popular matinee favorites—when he played opposite Mary Pickford in "Behind the Scenes." Just at the zenith of his popularity he gave his admirers a heartache by leaving them flat to direct. For a long time we heard nothing of him, further than that he would produce this picture or that, until Allan Dwan lured him back to the grease-paint in "The Luck of the Irish."

In the picture he played a whole-hearted, manly young Irishman. Kirkwood, being both manly and whole-hearted, made the characterization a page from the book of Life. He had a fight or two every twenty-five feet, and by the time that the picture was half over, you commenced to wonder whether God and human vitality would pull him thru.

Fighting is one of his pastimes de luxe. Back in the old Biograph days he used to astonish them all by his ability in a screen free-for-all, and now that he's staged a regular film "come-back," they still continue to cast him as the chief purveyor of this black-and-blue drama.

"I've had something like four hundred brawls before the camera," he remarked, "and I've never put anybody permanently out of commission. Screen fighting's a fine art. You have to hit your opponent so you won't crack either his make-up or his jaw."

Kirkwood, both in his make-up and off-stage, is not the type of the matinee man. His hair is naturally curly—not marcelled. His teeth are all his own, and he has enough muscle to beat up a cop should he want to. Furthermore, when you're talking to him, he seems to forget that James Kirkwood is alive. He never mentions himself, and it is only with the utmost difficulty that he is made to say anything at all about his work.

And, girls, he's just a wee bit bashful! In fact, he blushed—visibly, even under his make-up—when someone asked him if he'd ever been proposed to. Of course, he has; what good-looking screen actor hasn't?

But it's nothing to brag about, he adds. Rather, it's an honor to be proud of, and he wishes it made known that he would like to oblige each of the fairest fair ones, only—

That "only" is a definite reason, which it is not my province to disclose. Suffice it to say that James, being a dutiful son, supports his mother.

Kirkwood insists that he likes to do either dramatic or comedy parts.

To his great credit his versatility enables him to do one as well as the other.

"What are you best in?" I asked. "Why ask me?" he rejoins. "Why ask any actor? How does he know what he's best suited for?"

Once, when he was very young, a stage manager had him don crepe whiskers and play old men in their seventies. Later, he did foreign character parts. It used

WINDS

By WRIGHT FIELD

The south wind, sweeping inward from the shore,
Lifts your damp, golden locks in such a way:
But so it lifted hers another day—
For every wind that blows has blown before!

The north wind that careens the meadows o'er Puts a round, red spot on your velvet cheek;
Hers, I remember, bore a scarlet streak—
For every wind that blows has blown before!

The east wind, whining, scattering the store
Of summer's largesse, makes your red lips pout;
It whipped her grey eyes till the tears came out—
For every wind that blows has blown before!

The west wind, pulsing, fragrant, I adore!
It wakes the latent passion in my breast;
I hunger for you and forget the rest—
But every wind that blows has blown before!

I WONDER!

By J. LILIAN VANDEVERE

A very dignified old gentleman
Comes often to the motion picture house,
And tho we sometimes have adjacent seats,
He never speaks. I watch him, and I catch Unnumbered little hints that make me smile
And wish I knew him. When the travelog
Transports us to some Old World river town,
I've heard him sigh, and when the boat swept round
The river's curve and landed, he said "Yes!"
Beneath his breath, then coughed, and stirred a bit.
He always comes to see the heroine
Whom some think childish. Once the lights went on Quite suddenly, and I surprised a tear
Caught on his wrinkled cheek; but then, I've seen
The picture in his watch—a gentle face—
That looks quite like our heroine herself.
The homely man who does the Western stuff
He never misses. There's a little scar
On my old hero's forehead, near his hair—
I wonder if he's known the West himself?
He never even smiles at me; in fact,
The program done, he starts away alone,
Aloof and dignified, and looks about,
As if he said, "What common folk are these!
How can they sit thru such a tawdry bore?"
But when I go again, to right or left,
A bit in front, I see his silver head
As usual!

Miss Evan-Burrows Fontaine

Hinds
Honey and Almond
Cream

NEVER fairy tale with aspiring Knight, proposed a more difficult feat than Miss Evan-Burrows Fontaine, brightest of stars in tepsichorean constellations, devised for Hinds Honey and Almond Cream.

"My impulse to dance has always been irresistible" writes this famous interpretive dancer. "Yet I once had a terrible objection to it. I always worried terrifically over the thought of my feet becoming hard and calloused as those of all other barefoot dancers become. Then I decided to put Hinds Honey and Almond Cream—which I have used ever since I can remember—to the severest test I could imagine. I am enthusiastic, but I do not exaggerate when I tell you the wonderful skin-softening action of this cream has kept my feet so soft that I am surprised, even myself."

Attributes most admired and desired by every one, a complexion of soft glowing clearness, and hands slender, white and fragrant.—these are most safely possessed by the woman on whose dressing table you find Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. Delightful coolness is the first sensation when applying Hinds Honey and Almond Cream. Then follows a wonderful healing and softening process—a remarkable refining of the skin's texture and restoring of the surface to its natural clearness.

FOR TRIAL: Hinds Honey and Almond Cream 5c. Either Cold or Disappearing Cream 5c. Talcum 2c. Face Powder, sample 2c; Trial size 15c. Trial Cake Soap 8c. Be sure to enclose amount required, but do not send foreign stamps or foreign money.

That's True

in a million homes

Suppose you read that breakfasts had dropped 85 per cent. Think what good news that would be in these high-cost times.

In countless homes breakfasts have come down. In late years millions of new users have adopted Quaker Oats. Those homes do save 85 per cent. as compared with meat, eggs, fish, etc.

To save $125 a year

Quaker Oats costs one cent per large dish. It costs 6½¢ per 1,000 calories, the energy measurement of nutriment.

It costs 12 times as much to serve one chop—9 times as much to serve two eggs. A bite of meat costs as much as a dish of oats.

In a family of five Quaker Oats breakfasts served in place of meat breakfasts saves some $125 per year.

The oat is the food of foods. It supplies 16 elements needed for energy, repair and growth. For young folks it is almost the ideal food. As vim-food it has age-old fame. Each pound yields 1,810 calories of nutriment.

It is wise to start the day on oats, regardless of the cost. Yet it costs a trifle as compared with meat.

These figures are based on prices at this writing. Note them carefully.

They do not mean that one should live on Quaker Oats alone. But this premier food should be your basic breakfast. Serve the costlier foods at dinner.

Kirkwood Confesses!

to be his ambition to be a heavy. There's something about the expression of his eyes that made me think that, perhaps, he might be a good he-vamp. Whereupon I broach the subject and—am at once squelched.

"He-vamp?" he snorted. "Nothing doing!"

Some day, when he has amassed a neat little bank account from the silent drama, Kirkwood is going to "settle down" on a comfortable farm. Now, he says, he gets tired of the sophistication of the stage, exactly as a banker wearies of the humdrum existence of the clearing house. It's reversing the English on your own life, as it were; everybody gets bored doing his own particular line of work—or, rather, tires of his world.

Kirkwood literally got dragged onto the screen. Griffith, working at the Biograph in New York, saw him one day when he visited some friends at the studio and prevailed upon him to accept a part. Previously he had been with Blanche Bates on the stage under Belasco's management in "The Girl of the Golden West," with Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin in "The Great Divide" and with other stars of the legitimate, and was playing the male lead in the stage version of "Behind the Scenes" when he strolled into the studio.

When he made his screen debut, the majority of the now-known "pioneers" were "extras" at the studio, making five dollars a day. He started in a picture with Marion Leonard and Mary Pickford—went on before the camera for the first time in a "retake." After playing every variety of part in one- and two-reelers, he was at length given Marion Leonard to direct, and subsequently, after careers with Reliance, Mutual, Universal, Fox and American, he affiliated with Famous Players, first as a leading man, later as a director, where he swayed the destinies of such stars as Jack Barrymore in "The Lost Bridegroom"; Hazel Dawn in a number of plays, and Florence Reed in a series, among which was "The Struggle Everlasting."

Shortly afterward, when Jack Pickford began to make pictures for First National, Kirkwood became his director. He wrote "In Wrong" for Mary's little brother and directed him in it. Later, he held the megaphone for "Bill Apperson's Boy."

It was then Allen Dwan came along, and Jim joined him, later going to play opposite Louise Glaum in "The Girl Who Dared"; and now Kirkwood will permanently remain in his make-up, because, in the final analysis, he likes to think that there is a bigger field in acting.

"But," I concluded, "I thought I heard you say you're lazy."

"Oh, yes," he responded. "I guess I am. But I couldn't go without working—not if somebody offered me a cool million to take life easy—exactly as I like to take it."

FOR DECEMBER

THE luxurious personality of Catherine Calvert pervades the atmosphere of "Satin and Pearls" as her gowns and jewels did the Japanese Garden at the Ritz, where she was interviewed by Adele Whitely Fletcher. Read about the capture of this star by Vitagraph and her return to the screen.

The story of Bobby Haron in the December issue of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE holds much interest, as it is the last interview granted by him before his death.

C. Blythe Sherwood presents new views and sidelights on Blanche Sweet.

The personality of Forrest Stanley is portrayed by Hazel Simpson Naylor.

Hope Hampton, in her palatial apartment in New York, grants an interview to Gladys Hall. Result—a vivid word picture which brings before the reader this luminary, her charming negligees and exotic perfumes.

Excerpts from letters written to scenario editors appear under the title of "Rainbow Chasers," by Elizabeth Pelret.

Departments of valuable information conducted regularly by THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE are: The Answer Man and Greenroom Jottings. Valuations of the pictures to be shown are to be found in the Screen Time-Table.

Three powerful new photoplays not yet released will appear in fiction form. Read them and be prepared for a fuller enjoyment of the plays.

Semon the Jester

All this time, however, he had his eye upon motion pictures. This, too, may be traced to the adventurous elder Semon, who had once manufactured "flapper-books," little photo-packets which gave the effect of motion pictures when the thumb was run over the edges. Later, too, he had been interested in the making of slot machine movies, the earliest form of the photoplay.

But let Semon tell the rest of the tale himself:

"Thru J. Stuart Blackton I secured the opportunity I desired at the Vitagraph studio. I started learning direction as his assistant and then became a director myself. I did all this during the last year of my caricaturing contract with The Sun. Then I decided to cut adrift from comic drawing and stick to pictures exclusively. Chance threw me into comedies, for the simple reason that, at the moment, they had dozens of dramatic companies at work and needed farce directors.

"I did not play at first, but, as I worked with one comedian after another, I found that they did not quite carry out my ideas in one thing or another. Why not try myself?

"I did—and I'm still at it. Of course, my early barn-storming training was a vital aid. And my newspaper work gave me a clear—and broad—viewpoint. That's about all."

Now let Semon offer an explanation or two aent his comedies.

"I do all my work myself. I do not use 'doubles.' Naturally we take lots of chances. On high buildings, for instance, and, let me add, there is less faking in my comedies than in most farce productions. The members of my company are mostly all acrobats.

"I have been asked why I do not try five-reel farces. I believe them too long. Audiences do not want so much slapstick at one time. I do not think they fit into the average theater program. On the other hand, I want to go on making fast two reelers.

"This coming year I hope to elaborate upon my work of the past. That is, I am going to 'shoot' my two-reel comedies in as big and elaborate sets as serve for five-reel dramas."

Semon has had a mass of amusing adventures before and behind the camera. Only recently he was using a colored man in a comedy scene and the company had been enjoying themselves in "kidding" the darky regarding an imaginary scene in which they told him he was to appear with several savage lions.

Finally, Semon thought he would add the final touch to the colored man's worries.

"Rastus," he said, impressively, "we'll shoot your lion scene tomorrow—ever work with animals?"

Rastus breathed hard. "Yas, suh, ah's worked with animals—pigeons, goldfish, canaries, but ah draws the line right there!"

FADED HAIR Now easily Renewed

BREMATURE gray hair that falsely proclaims the passing of youth is not more unpopular today than it was two thousand years ago.

All through the ages, in every land, women have sought and chemists have tried to perfect a satisfactory preparation for coloring and renewing gray, faded and streaked hair.

In the short time that "Brownatone" has been on the market its sales have increased so rapidly and to such a tremendous total as to prove that it is giving perfect satisfaction to more women than anything previously discovered for this purpose.

BROWNATONE

If you have not tried "Brownatone" and compared its simple, clean, easy method of application, its instant results, and its truly remarkable reproduction of your gray hair's original color, there is a delightful surprise waiting for you.

Any good druggist can supply "Brownatone"—50c and $1.50. Two colors: "Light to Medium Brown" and "Dark Brown to Black." Guaranteed absolutely harmless.

Shadowing Kismet

was built for his picture. He can call everyone, even the minor players, the stage carpenter, the stage artist, by his first name. Now that he is in pictures he has not spared time, effort or talent to make his picture the very best that has been done.

Mr. Skinner's family is a very happy one. He is tremendously proud of his only daughter, Cornelia Skinner. It seemed to me that he is even more interested in her career than in his own. She is a tall, regally attractive brunette and has just completed two years at Bryn Mawr College. She is playing a small part in "Kismet" this summer, and in the fall goes to Paris to study pantomime, drama, and elocution preparatory to her debut on the stage.

"I was hoping," Mr. Skinner told me, "that her talent might run in another direction—literature, for instance, but so long as she has made up her mind to go on the stage, I am going to see that she gets the very best groundwork possible."

So you see even those with a heritage of genius must study.

Know Thyself

around. I made up my mind that I would leave the sort of work I was doing. I made up my mind that I would make good. More importantly, I made up my mind that I could make good. I felt, for the first time, that I could do just what I wanted to do if I wanted to work hard enough. And I did want to.

I have always thought we could do anything if we wanted to badly enough. Now I was ready to prove it.

"I walked across the street and told Mr. Sennett I was leaving—just like that. 'What are you going to do, Juanita?' he asked. 'I don't know,' I said, 'but I am going to do something.'

"That very day, walking around town, I ran into Crane Wilbur. 'What you doing, Juanita?' he asked me. 'Nothing,' I said. 'Do a picture with me,' he suggested. I did, and I've been doing ever since.

"I have set myself a mark. Chalked myself up, as it were, financially and otherwise, and I am going to attain it. I have reached one mark now, and that first mark is the hardest of all. It's the devil and all to get your first thousand a week, for instance, but once you do . . . It's all a question of knowing yourself, setting right what's wrong, eliminating wastes, building up the weak spots. It can be done. That's my slogan. Some people call it getting a line on yourself, still others getting wise to yourself. It all amounts to the same thing—self-knowledge."

is directing them. Donald is cutting 'The Barbarian' now.

"It stands to reason that you can't shoot a large number of scenes and then leave it to someone who hasn't the remotest idea of what you are trying to do, to put them together. If a story can be best told in four-and-a-half reels—or in six-and-a-quarter reels—why, that is the length to which it should be cut. No one can do consistently artistic work if he is forced to make all of his pictures the same length, any more than a writer could do artistic work if he was forced to make each one of his books contain exactly the same number of words.

"We want to keep, as nearly as possible, the same people with us all the time. We may not be able to do this at first, as I may go on tour with 'The Barbarian' and I couldn't carry so large a salary list over an indefinite period of time."

(The cast includes Jane Novak, Alan Hale, Barney Sherry, Lillian Leighton, Eleanor Hancock, Milton Markwell, Guy Milham, Larry Steers, Sydney Dean, Harrison Post, Tip O'Neil, Marcel Daly, and Michael and Ann Cudahy.)

Salisbury was faultlessly dressed. Never conspicuous, you would not, for instance, notice his clothes before you noticed him, he is punctilious in these matters. He wore the conventional dark coat and light trousers with a dark hair-line stripe, white hat and white nubuck Oxfords.

His eyes were shaded by large, smoked glasses, which, while making him look older than he does on the screen, added to his natural distinguished air.

He is tall and holds himself erectly.

As he talks, especially about something which particularly interests him, his lips have a way of quivering into a sort of nervous smile.

His fingers are long and expressive. His favorite gesture is a short, side-ways movement made with stiffened fingers and the palm turned inward. He has a keen sense of the dramatic. This it is that makes him so fond of Latin and Indian characters and gives him the insight to portray them so exquisitely.

He humors his aesthetic and artistic taste by making a hobby of collecting odd and interesting articles, some of which are real works of art, others mere curios.

In his apartments you may see many curios from the South Sea Islands, the Philippines, or made here in the States by his Indian friends.

His favorite paintings are of Indian scenes and Indian characters, and of the pictures he has made, he enjoyed the part of the Indian Alessandro in "Ramona" best of all.

He is unmarried and is living at the Mountain View Inn with his mother.

"We are thinking very seriously of moving," he said. "We've lived there for a long time."

Which goes to show that this is a period of change for Monroe Salisbury.

Madame Peacock

... oh, for a very great while ... She ran into her room where, as she knew, her mother sat, solitary, sewing ... Details wrought themselves upon her ... The pity of her mother's hands ... the joylessness of her life. ... She buried her head in the patient lap ... she sobbed ... "I am afraid—I am afraid—"

Her mother patted the humiliated head. She said no word, being wise. The touch was what the woman wanted—

The bell rang and the head burrowed deeper. "I can see no one—" Jane Goring said, "no one—today ... dont let them find me, mother—dont—dont—"

Her mother left the room and when she returned, Madame Peacock could hear, from her pillow, that there were others with her. Why did they seek her out? Why did her mother go against her in this way? Didn't they know she was done with the Public even as the Public was done with her—?

She raised her eyes, and it was McNaughton, McNaughton holding the arm of the girl from the theater. Her mother, too, her mother had her arm about the girl—

Jane stared. Then unbidden tears clouded her vision. Things kept thronging back—her desire to touch this girl's hair—her vision of the girl carrying on, perfecting, the weapon she, Madame Peacock, was now to lay down ... the travail she had undergone at this intrusion of the younger generation—ah, now she knew—her subordinate leaving of the theater—her hunger for the human touch—

She rose and, very slowly, crossed the room to where the girl was standing. She put forth her forefinger and, very delicately, traced the features, her own, yet, mysteriously, not her own ... sharper, keener, sweeter. ... She looked at McNaughton and she never knew how sweetly, how plaintively, she smiled ... she didn't have time to, because her head was on her daughter's breast and her arms were clinging about the young slender body, of her own fashioning, her own neglect, and when she raised her head again there was a rainbow across her eyes—directorial ideals are substantially those of King Vidor and Mrs. Sidney Drew. Here let us add his belief in Henry King as a coming directorial force. It is not commonly known that King made the comedy success of last season, "23½ Hours Leave." King is now with Bessie Barriscale.

Storm suggested that we jot down the name of Henry King in our memory book. We offer the suggestion for what it is worth. But—emphatically we ask you to be sure to have Storm in your memorandum book.

times," she added decisively, "I rule them both!

"So, I had my way, and stage-managed myself around the world, going to school wherever we traveled at hours that suited my work. It was not a 'regular' education, of course. But don't you think that a girl who has traveled in Australia, Great Britain, France, Spain, Germany, and Cuba, learning nearly all these languages and business-managing herself into jobs wherever her father's business took him, has learned some thing?

"And the trouble I had with the Gerry societies and children's societies and the like. I never could see what the fuss was about, I was just being myself. Even after I was old enough, I was always having to explain myself because I was so small they wouldn't believe me when I did tell the truth. But I always managed!"

Nancy Deaver's first stage appearance in America was about four years ago with Fred Walton, the English pantomimist, as the War Doll. Needless to say, her success was assured. And then, being, as she says, grown up and able to manage a "regular" career, she has worked steadily in musical comedies and vaudeville, always in dancing parts.

Until last winter, Nancy had never appeared in a picture. She always intended to, she says, but was cannily biding her time and watching her chance. One day she met Charles Miller, the director, whom she knew very well. "Nancy," he said, "I'm thinking of producing 'East Is West' and I want you as the Chinese girl."

"Me? I should say not! I'm not the type and I don't want to be a Chinese girl."

"Never mind what you want," he said, "come and let me make you up."

"Anyhow," I thought, "here's a chance to learn something about screen make-up. And when he had put a black wig on me and fixed my eyes so they slanted, I didn't know myself. But it happened that instead of producing 'East Is West,' he produced 'The Law of the Yukon,' and I was given a leading rôle. I played the part of a young girl whose father kept a dance hall. I was very carefully looked after by my father in the picture, but I had a chance to dance in the picture, so I liked the rôle very much.

"Well, I have traveled nearly all over the United States and thought I knew something about cold and snow, but Fort Henry, up near the Canadian border, where the picture was made, was the coldest place in the world. We were up there fourteen weeks. Lots of times it was too cold even to work, but it was perfectly glorious and was surely just the right temperature for that picture. The queer characters Mr. Miller unearthed as extras, and what he got out of them, was uncanny.

"This is ancient history, but we were up there at Christmas time, a bit lonely and homesick, some of us, so we decided to see what we could do for the natives. We had a community Christmas tree in the town square and every poor child, (600 of them), had a toy, some sweets, and a useful gift. We nearly froze before it was over, but it paid. Mr. Miller was so lovely to work with, and we were just one big family. The people of the community treated us like royalty. We were entertained by the nicest people. If making pictures were always like that, I would want to make them the rest of my life.

"It was good to get back, tho. You know I just love to cook, and, next to dancing, it's my favorite sport. Up north, the food was good but monotonous. So when I got home I started in to cook and I had a wonderful time, only it seems to me prices are more appalling than ever. I'm ashamed to think how much I have squandered on chops.

"So, since I've been back I've cooked and I've danced. No, I have not danced for managers or at rehearsals or even in restaurants. But, I knew there must be a lot of new dance music since I left, so the day after I returned I bought fifty new dance records and every morning when I wake up I jump out of bed, put on a record and have a party all my own.

"Yes, I shall do more pictures. In fact," she said, "I have had several offers and just now I am holding out on a certain person because I happen to know I'm the type he wants and I know that he knows that the type is very scarce. So, I'm waiting to get what I want. Do you see?"

I did. And have every reason to believe that Nancy will get it.

The Case of Norma Talmadge

who has produced her pictures ever since.

It is rather difficult to summarize her screen work. We doubt if she has ever once given a characterization in the full sense of the word. She is always Norma Talmadge. That she has succeeded lies in the fact that Norma Talmadge represents average American girlhood. Consequently she has made the young women of her vehicles flesh and blood folk to those in front of the screen. Hers has been a healthy, natural girlishness. There was no forced cuteness, no "clever" touches, no be-curved super-innocence. She was a regular girl, with the feelings, the flapper viewpoint and the high spirit of a regular girl.

Miss Talmadge has retained her hold because she has remained unspoiled; because, in the main, she has retained these things. Thus it is that a little Brooklyn school girl shot to cinema popularity and success minus all technical equipment, without the breadth of vision that comes of tasting and observing life, lacking all seeming histrionic essentials. Indeed, she has succeeded and retained success, because of these things—and because she is Norma Talmadge.

"—Not One Gray Hair, Now"

"And my hair was quite gray a short time ago!
"It was falling out, getting brittle and stringy. My scalp was filled with dandruff and itched almost constantly.
"A few applications of Kolor-Bak produced a wonderful improvement. The itching stopped instantly. There was no more dandruff. And—marvel of marvels—it is now restored to its original color—not a gray hair shows anywhere!
"Kolor-Bak is not a dye or stain. It is colorless, stainless, harmless and restores original color to gray hair simply by putting hair and scalp in a healthy condition.
Send for our special trial offer; also Free Book on Hair which explains how Kolor-Bak restores gray hair to its original color.

At the present speed of release, Chaplin's "The Kid" will have white whiskers before he sees a screen.

Yes, Rollo, we know people keep comparing the screen to the stage, to the damage of the former. The answer is simple. Rollo, very simple. In 1915, Frances X. Bushman was on the screen. In 1920, Francis X. Bushman is on the stage.

Anyone else in the audience having questions will please hand them to the ushers on the way out.

No, no, Rollo! "Black Beauty" is not to be confused with "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse."

Dinty

had caused them to be strapped to this table. Over the table swung a massive knife, clutched in a dragon's teeth.

In this room, the Chinese wife told the father and lover, Dorkh had imprisoned the white woman before he made good his departure.

Even as they talked, then, Ruth was on the hideous table, her wide eyes watching, sanely or insanely, the descent of the murderous knife. She had held out, they knew then, against the Eurasian, and this, this vile death, was his revenge.

The father lost control and hurled himself against the door.

North tried his turn. "It is absolutely useless," he said. The Chinese wife nodded a dumb assent.

In the background, Dinty, Chinkie and Watermillions stood, rooted, their individual heads bristling, their mouths loose and agape. Within that door the heart of their hearts was being tortured. In this twentieth century, that gently bred girl, tortured! Ruth . . . their Ruth . . . left by a Malay half-breed to so lurid a death!

All at once Dinty and Chinkie bent their heads together.

The older men were crying out to her now, to the victim within. They were trying to make sound carry some comfort, some sustenance to her. "They loved her too much to be efficient. Dinty sensed that. He knew . . . Once Doreen had had hemorrhage . . . He hadn't been much good.

Watermillions and Chinkie were agreeing with him. It was tremendous! An inspired plan!

I'll Teach You Piano In Quarter Usual Time

To persons who have not previously heard of my method, this may seem a pretty bold statement. But I will gladly convince you of its accuracy by referring you to any number of my graduates in any part of the world.

There isn't a State in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players of the piano or organ who obtained their entire training from me by mail. I have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. Investigate by writing for my 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of "finger gymnastics." When you do go to the keyboard, you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition—usually a "nightmare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DIX. Quinn-Dix is a simple, hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DIX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me, and there is nothing else, anywhere, even remotely like them.

DR. QUINN AT HIS PIANO

From the Famous Sketch by Schneider, Exhibited at the St. Louis Exposition.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 42 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others; and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better at any price. You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians, who would not recommend any course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

VIRGINIA K.—How do you do! Glad to see you this evening. Is Rex Beach married. Very much so. Walter McGrail is not married. Wallace McCutcheon is a player, also the husband of Pearl White. I'll say so.

BABY BLUE EYES.—Oh, I began my career as a very little boy. Rod LaRoque plays the part of Life in "Money Mad." Bert Lytell and Lucy Cotton in "Misleading Lady." Well, your trouble seems to be that you think you are thrifty—whereas you are spendthriftly.

DOROTHY F.—Yes, he is married. I am afraid you idle too much, Dorothy. Everything comes to him who works. Dont be a Micawber, always waiting for something to turn up. The crowd always makes way for the man who pushes boldly forward. Yes, Will Rogers has been appearing in vaudeville. Making some money too. He played in "The Guile of Women."

CARL E. S.—Too late for that issue. That is a very profound question you ask, "Is life worth living?" Once more this oft repeated irksome task must be accomplished—it all depends upon the liver. You want to know if Corbet played in the Eighteenth Amendment. I dont think it was his turn at bat.

TOTO MAC.—Well, his experience should teach us to beware of love at first sight—always have a second look. Sorry, but I have no cast for "The Love Flower." I dont happen to know the middle names of the ten players you inquire about. That was some verse of yours.

PAUL Y.—You want to know what queen was crowned, with all due ceremony, after her death. You refer to Inez de Castro, queen of Pedro I, of Portugal, 1350. It has not been done in photoplay, I believe. Sorry I cannot help you.

BETTY B.—Oh, hello! I understand that Marguerite Clark spends quite a bit of her time in New Orleans with her husband and his parents. Dorothy Davenport is the only wife, I know of, that belongs to Wallace Reid. Run in again, Betty.

RED ROSE.—Dont know where I will spend Thanksgiving, but I hope somebody will take pity on me, for I do love turkey and cranberry sauce. No, I cannot tell you what the actresses do to keep themselves beautiful, but I know that there is no torture that they would not suffer to enhance their beauty. Just send me a stamped, addressed envelope and I will send you a list of the correspondence clubs.

HERMAN B.—You want a picture of William Farnum in the gravure section. Certainly, come and see me in my cage. It is more blessed to call than to receive. Well, Mary Miles Minter played in the picture play "The Littlest Rebel" and on the stage.

WEE WEE.—Oui la, la. God bless the publicity man! Without him many a player would be born to blow up unheard and to go to seed unseen. But wasn't it Benjamin Harrison, in his contest for the presidency in 1888 who originated the so-called "front porch" campaign? Or was it McKinley—I forget.

CARMEN SILVA-HLVANA.—Dont know where you can purchase all the photos of the players? You want to see Forrest Stanley and George Walsh in the gallery soon. I'll do what I can. Yes, the pen is mightier than the sword, but I have found out that the scissors are often mightier than the pen.

HELEN LOUISE.—You want to know all about George Walsh. I'll try to find out—wait a minute. Viola Dana is playing in "The Off-shore Pirate," Jack Mulhull opposite her. Oh, thank you, it isn't so cold up here. I expect to get a new feather bed and a fur coat. I'll send you the rest by wireless telepathy.

AMADO B. MAGTOTO.—Stiletto! No, I am not married. Your first question to me. You think Marie Provost partly resembles Mary Pickford and partly Mae Murray. Maeterlink is finishing his first original motion picture scenario for Goldwyn. It is called "The Power of God."

BLUE-EYED DOLL.—It is bad cynical philosophy that says, "It is rare that, after having given the key of her heart, a woman does not change the lock the day after." I cant believe that most women are as fickle as that. I understand Nazimova is doing "Aphrodite." You know Madame Petrova was asked to play the part for the stage play of the same title, but refused.

KAMLOOPS KID.—Thanks for the nice things you say about me. So you have been watching Larry Steers and think he has an awfully kind looking face—so whimsically Irish. Montague Love opposite Geraldine Farrar in "The Riddle, Woman." You must write to me again.

MONSIEURS.—Yes, "Limehouse Nights." Buy the book. They say that there are no pleasures where women are not; and that, with the French, champagne itself has no flavor unless served by the hand of beauty. I hold woman in high esteem, but not so high as that. I have got along for 79 years without one, and my champagne always tasted pretty good.

ALLEN.—Oh, yes, I always use a typewriter. Every make of typewriter produces its own peculiar noise by the clatter of the keys. An expert recently recognized and named correctly 20 different machines simply by the sound of their operation. I know the sound of some automobiles, particularly the Ford.

STACY B.—I didn't see "The Adorable Savage." You say there were seals basking in the tropical sunlight on the Fiji Islands. Now wasn't that clever of the director? Such a novelty!

A DOG LOVER.—You should see our two dogs we have here in the office. A Russian wolf-hound and a collie. Write to Mack Sennett. You will soon see Hope Hampton again, and in a more attractive role. You know she is a new star, and I am betting on her.

JOHN M.—I haven't the heights just now, and cant get them right away. How would I look walking around among the players with a tape measure?

BUCK PRIVATE.—Welcome! Vivian Martin can be reached at the Capitol Theatre Bldg., N. Y. City. I guess they only appear to be friends. Friendship between two leading ladies in the same company is only a suspension of hostilities.

How "Earthbound" Was Made

bit of action of our scene. I first 'shot' the material portion. That is, after the actor playing the living man had rehearsed his part alone, I took his scene with him in it alone. Here I would carefully prompt, something like this: 'Get ready to feel his presence—you sense his presence—you see him'—and so on.

"Having taken the material side, we would next film the spirit action. The player doing the ghost would rehearse and, when he was perfect, we would cover the entire setting, even the carpet and floors, with black velvet. Then we would grind the film carefully back in the camera to the start of the scene.

"I should, perhaps, explain the velvet. Since we were re-exposing the film, the velvet prevented any fuzzy doubling of background. Only the ghost's figure would be photographed, the velvet preventing any reflection of light or photography of background.

"Then we put a gauze of crepe de chine before the lens. This gave the resultant vague and hazy spirit effect. After which we 'shot' the scene, which dovetailed in exact numbering with the material portion.

"You can guess how easily these scenes slipped up. The slightest error threw everything out. To guard against this, we 'shot' every scene many times and finally used the best 'take.' Right here I want to express my appreciation of the way the players co-operated with me. Frequently we worked from 8:30 in the morning to midnight or longer. This was necessary because the camera could not be moved between exposures; that is, between the filming of the spirit and material 'shots.' It would never be possible to re-set up the camera exactly the same. A divergence of one-eighth or one-quarter of an inch would wreck everything.

"There were many apparently insurmountable difficulties. For instance, in a scene of speedy action, such as the one where the widow falls thru the spirit arms of her husband to the floor. It is practically impossible to time a fall with accuracy. This simply meant doing the scene over and over until we caught the right thing.

"Again, I believe the scene where the dog sees the spirit is the most unusual example of double exposure ever made. You cannot rehearse a dog or tell him what to do. So we did the next best thing.

"On the top of a platform, out of range of the camera, we placed a goat. Now a dog hates a goat, perhaps, more than any other animal. In front of the goat we placed a draw curtain.

"At the moment when the dog sees the spirit, we drew aside the curtain and revealed the goat. Of course, the dog started, bristled and jumped to his feet, revealing all the necessary emotions.

Never Forget

How folks love Bubble Grains

The finest breakfast you can serve lacks its greatest charm without them. There are three of them—Puffed Wheat, Puffed Rice and Puffed Corn—and each has its own delights. You can serve them in a dozen ways. So they bring to breakfasts endless fascinations.

What other cereal is half so enticing as these flimsy, flavory grains?

At other hours

Remember what Puffed Grains are. Two are whole grains steam-exploded, one is corn hearts puffed. Every food cell is blasted for easy, complete digestion. The grains are puffed to bubbles, eight times normal size.

They are flavory, flaky tid-bits, yet they are ideal scientific foods.

Use in home candy making or as garnish on ice cream, or as wafers in your soups. Mix in every dish of fruit. Salt or butter, as with peanuts, for hungry children after school.

The night dish

At supper or bedtime float Puffed Wheat in milk. Then you have the supreme food made delightful and easy to digest.

Think of whole wheat with every food cell blasted—made into food confections. Do your folks get these ideal foods as often as they should?

Puffed Rice

Puffed
Corn

Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour

The finest pancakes ever tasted

Now we mix ground Puffed Rice in an ideal pancake flour. Your grocer has it—Puffed Rice Pancake Flour. It is self-raising—batter is made in a moment. The Puffed Rice flour makes the pancakes fluffy and gives a nut-like flavor. You have never served a pancake so delicious. Try it now.

How "Earthbound" Was Made

You will recall that the dog suddenly turned and looked about as the spirit faded out. Here we closed the curtain and started an unusual series of noises under the set stairway. Naturally the dog wheeled about to see the new surprise and looked puzzled at not being able to tell what it was.

"The scene where the murdered man finally disappears for the last time required the most expense. The material exterior was 'shot' in Santa Barbara but the psychic part was done on the Goldwyn lot at night. An inclined platform two-hundred-and-fifty feet long was built and covered with velvet. A motor driven car was arranged to run up this platform, carrying powerful lights. Thus, when the spirit apparently walked away over the tree tops, he in reality walked up this velvet covered runway, while the electric light car traveled alongside."

Pacific Coast Paragraphs

and emotional episode with a facility which is little less than amazing. Others in the cast of "The Concert," are Mabel Juliene Scott who has left the Lasky lot for the Goldwyn studio, Lewis Stone and Frances Hall, a new screen recruit from musical comedy.

Maurice Maeterlinck left behind him several original stories for the screen when he departed from this coast. The first of these, "The Power of Good," will be produced as a Goldwyn special. The continuity is being written by Elmer Rice, author of that famous stage success "On Trial." Mr. Rice is so youthful that it is hard to believe he has already attained the success for which other men work years.

Mary Pickford has almost completed "A Flame in the Dark." This is the story of Italian atmosphere written and directed for her by Frances Marion. In it our Mary grows up, puts her hair on top of her head and becomes a regular emotional actress. Tho taking the part of an Italian, Miss Pickford is not wearing a dark wig, for she says she came across so many blond Italians in the village she visited to get the atmosphere for her story that she decided against the black tresses. Before this picture is released, however, you will see our Mary in another of the kid comedies in which she is so well loved. This, too, was written by Frances Marion who will direct it and who has titled it "Rag-Tag and Bob-Tail."

Thru some error a report was circulated that Elliott Dexter was still handicapped by his recent illness. This is untrue. Mr. Dexter has returned to the screen with a greater power for portrayal than ever. I greatly enjoyed watching him during the filming of "The Witching Hour," his most recent picture.

The Holiday Number of Shadowland

LIKE the pack on the back of St. Nick, December SHADOWLAND comes laden with gifts. The pictured faces of screen favorites, bright stories of unique personalities, and lovely color plates are some of the pleasant surprises.

Novelizations of new photoplays soon to be released, a quick-moving one-act play, "Ask Ouija," and the smiles and satire of the critic are other presents enclosed within this holiday number of SHADOWLAND.

W. L. George, the man who wrote "Caliban," making it one of the six best sellers, naturally holds strong and interesting views on timely subjects. Read about him as Frederick James Smith delineates him in "Women and the World War."

Mordkin, the inimitable Russian dancer, and Mordkin, the man, are the subject of another story by Oliver M. Saylor.

Thru his successful achievements with the "Greenwich Village Follies," James Reynolds, tho but 23, is recognized as a leader in stagecraft. His story will appear in SHADOWLAND for December.

The ramblings of The Rambler result in a page of attractive suggestions for Christmas gifts.

A magazine that aims always at the artistic and the beautiful, it will be especially alluring for December. Bring joy and inspiration into your home with the holiday number of these days of mad scurrying to get any place at all to live. Go out and eat? Of course not. Earl, (already present, coat off, hard at work), could go out and get the makings of a meal. He could also cook it. It wouldn't be the first time.

The Fighting Earl

By LILLIAN MAY

Earl went. He came back laden with bundles. We removed the baby's doll, a bundle of clothing and the piano stool from the dining table and, presently, we ate. We had chops, creamed peas, French fried potatoes, alligator pear salad, fifty-seven varieties of French pastry and coffee fit for the gods. Earl was some cook.

When we had finished, Earl washed the dishes and arranged the cupboards. He decided where the piano should stand and moved it in place. He hung pictures and became deeply involved in restoring efficiency to a disabled group of light fixtures. He talked very little.

"Wont you please talk?" I said. "What kind of interview is this?"

"What does talking amount to in times like these?" came back

Earl Metcalfe was born in England and went back to his birthplace as a commissioned officer of the Fighting Sixty-ninth in the recent world war. He served with the American Army for a year and was then honorably discharged. He has just begun work on a seven-reel feature which the Fox Film Co. are producing

Of all the interviewers ever staged, this one with Earl Metcalfe was most unusual. Hearing of the impending interview, a mutual friend invited me to meet Mr. Metcalfe at dinner at her home. It would be jolly and different, wouldn't it? she said. It would, and, eventually, it was.

Anticipatorily, I fared forth on the appointed evening. At the home of our mutual friend, I found that she had moved that day to the floor below. She had always wanted that particular apartment and that morning found she could have it. She had salvaged the elevator boy, the doorman and, presto, change!

Dinner? Of course. But that was a mere detail. The point was, she had moved. It is an accomplishment in dian, who had betrayed his trust thru rash speculations and investments, committed suicide, so that my sister and I were left entirely in the charge of my uncle, a very brilliant surgeon and a most erratic man. Our education was an unusual one according to his peculiar ideas and my early recollections are kaleidoscopic, here, there, everywhere—a series of strange places, faces, schools and governments—and America. So much for myself and the pure French strain in Theda Bara which has been so often disputed.

My Theda Bara

Theda Bara's name is not Death and Arab, spelled backwards, as someone has ingeniously concocted nor was she christened by the Fox Film organization. She was named originally Theodosia Burr after Aaron Burr's lovely daughter, the one really fine and splendid influence in a brilliant but dissolute career. My husband and myself were greatly impressed by Theodosia Burr's beautiful but tragic life and so we called one of our daughters after her, with the hope that she might emulate the character of this very fine woman who met such an undeserved and terrible fate. Theodosia is a long, long name and she had many pet names as a child, amongst others Theda which you can see for yourself, is a diminutive of The(o)d(osi)a. The Bara is an old family name and now you have the real explanation of this so-called mystery.

In most people there is a dual personality and I think always of an old nursery jingle that you all are familiar with when I think of my daughter Theda—I believe it was especially written for her, both as a child and a grown woman.

"There was a little girl and she had a little curl right in the middle of her forehead, and when she was good she was very, very good and, when she was bad, she was horrid."

At the age of three, surprising as it may seem, Theda was a blonde of the fairest type, with blonde ringlets covering a very small head and two large violet eyes. Every night her prayer was something like this, "Please, dear God, make me a tall lady wif black hair and wif black eyes and have a 'nana (banana) under my pillow in the morning." Naturally, I was able to fulfil the latter half of this prayer and the first part of it seems also to have reached its destination.

At this time we had a home in a suburb called Walnut Hills—the house was of brick with a very large veranda and stood rather high upon a hill.

One day I placed her upon the veranda in a very big chair with a pretty pair of new booties on—pink in color. Her little feet stuck straight out in front of her and I left her, the dog on guard beside her, gazing with enraptured concentration and vanity at her new acquisitions, in order that I might finish dressing her brother and then take both of them for a little ride. I was gone for possibly fif-

Gibson Instruments

Really, a GIBSON is more than a mere instrument. It is a pal; an understanding friend; comforting; cheering; always ready to sing our heart thoughts; exquisite in design, finish and tone—truly a GIBSON is a "joy forever."

We want to tell you about GIBSON instruments, the most intimately personal of all musical instruments. Because they bring self-performed music within the reach of everyone, whether the taste be for classic, popular or the dashing "jazz" of the day—GIBSONS are universally known as "ideal home and companion instruments." Easy to play, entirely satisfying in every respect, superb in workmanship, finish and tone.

GIBSONS have played a part in hundreds of little romances—confidential human histories—about which we shall be glad to tell you. Also the GIBSON Book and free trial proposition sent for the asking. These will help you to become better acquainted with the GIBSON family.

teen minutes and when I returned I found her sitting bare-footed. Vanished were the new shoes and stockings—her little pink toes almost pinker than the shoes had been. "Baby, baby—where are you shoesies and 'tockies?" I demanded. She waved a small fist toward indefinite space and said sorrowfully—"A poor little boy in no shoes and no stockies came along the street so I called him and gave him mine 'cause I've got so many o'vers." I ran madly down the steps to the street just to see a big lad of nine or ten rounding the corner with the tiny shoes and stockings in his hand—I gave chase but, alas, he could run faster than I could! I felt it unfair to scold her, for after all it was the prompting of a little heart at the sight of what she reasoned to be dire need.

As a little thing she was a great run-away and she showed positive genius in ways and means of escaping our vigilance. We had the locks in the entrance doors placed high above her tiny reach and yet she disappeared as if by magic; search as we would we could not find the means of her escape. One day she was gone—I rushed out of the house and down the street. Ahead of me, I saw what appeared to be a tiny dwarf with an enormous hat around her neck, the head being completely submerged under it like a wash-basket and dragging behind yards and yards of train, my very best frock. That was my daughter's first public appearance in costume. We afterwards discovered she had hammered a small hole in the screen door, just large enough to crawl thru. Finally, we were obliged to fence in a corner of the garden to prevent further escapades. I shall never forget the intense interest with which she watched the construction of that fence and the screams and kicks when she discovered she was trapped; and that was my daughter's first temperamental fit.

About this time we moved to another suburb, called Avondale, and here came our first tragedy—Sport, the faithful, little guardian of our runaway, went to sleep quietly and forever under my girl-baby's chair. At breakfast she tried to waken him but she discovered only the cold inanimate shell of her pet and this was her first great grief. To you who are sophisticated this event will seem trivial indeed but to you others who have loved devotedly a little, dumb animal, to you whose lives are made up of the many small intimate pleasures derived from the affection of pets, flowers and trees, far removed from the busy mart, with its hectic excitements and desires, this intense grief of a little child will be quite understandable. Theda has never outgrown her love of animals, especially dogs and horses. You all know the story of her two white Russian wolfhounds; the first one died on her birthday. She sat up the night thru, giving him his medicine at fifteen minute intervals, vainly trying to save his life, but he passed out at the dawn and again she repeated the sorrow of parting from a beloved companion as she had in her babyhood.

(The second and final instalment of this story will appear next month.)

The Fighting Earl

Earl. "It's doing that counts. Hand me that screw-driver."

Perhaps it was true that Earl Metcalfe detested interviews. Was he keeping busy to avoid talking about himself? Or had his training in Uncle Sam's army given him this zeal for service? He was a lieutenant, I remembered, a commissioned officer from the first Plattsburg Training Camp and assigned to the famous One-hundred-and-sixty-fifth Infantry, popularly known as "The Fighting Sixty-ninth" of New York City. He went across with his regiment in '17 and, after a year, returned upon a special mission to the Adjutant-General of the Army in Washington. With the signing of the armistice, the mission became automatically finished and he was honorably discharged. He must know many things worth talking about. At any rate, he must talk about something.

"Sit down by the lady, Earl," commanded our hostess, "and tell her where you were born, what you like for dinner and what you are going to do next."

"Next? I'm going to lengthen this picture wire," said Earl, imperturbably. This feat accomplished, he reluctantly descended from a stepladder and sat down upon the lower rung. "What shall I talk about?"

"I know you were born in England," I said, "and I know what you like for dinner—you showed us—but wont you talk of your year overseas?"

"No," he said quietly. "I spent a year over there, a good part of it in the trenches. I saw war in all its phases. But I can't talk about it. The public doesn't want to hear about it, either. It's over. Let's forget it."

"And be thankful that there wont be another war," I added.

"Wont there?" and Earl jumped to his feet and began pacing up and down between the piles of furniture. "Do you ever listen to the 'soap-box harangues' that take place on the street corners? I never did until I came back from the other side. Over there I learnt the condition of the people—their position economically and socially. Some of them come over here and have advantages they didn't know existed before they came. Then about one out of every hundred discovers that there is a class of people who have much that he hasn't and decides that this land of the free isn't a land of the free at all, so he proceeds to put ideas into the heads of all who are unfortunate enough to get in his way.

"Does socialism and anarchism and bolshevism with incitement to strikes and riots start with good American citizens? No. Would a good American citizen stand upon a soap-box and incite his fellowmen to lawlessness, and could he get away with it? No. He would be judged insane or a criminal. And when I hear these exhorters and know that they are actually influencing some of their hearers, I get so angry I stop and argue, and then I get so much angrier that I know if I don't keep quiet I'll get in trouble. There will be war right in our midst if things don't change. And I'm here to tell you that if there is, I'll be in it." And Earl of the "Fighting Sixty-ninth" stopped for breath and sat down.

"Since I've been back?" establishing himself more firmly on the stepladder. "Well, I've just been getting my bearings. Captain Charles Maigne gave me a chance to break into harness by giving me a part in support of Alice Brady, whom he was directing. Then I directed the James Montgomery Flagg satirical comedies. I like directing and did considerable of it in the old Lubin days.

"Then World Films asked me to finish 'The Battler,' a picture Monty Love was starring in when he was taken seriously ill. Of course, all the scenes had to be retaken. Ultimately, I want to go back to the speaking stage. I played a thousand dramatic rôles before I went to Lubin and feel that the experience helped me in many ways.

"War certainly broke into things," he said, "careers, finances, everything, but I'm doing the things which lie nearest, and just at present that happens to be a part as leading man for Corinne Griffith. Later, I hope to do some big character work, and would like to direct pictures, too, if I could get a chance to do it in a large way.

"That's plenty of time spent talking about myself," throwing open the piano to strike a few chords. "Out of tune. Too bad I don't number piano-tuning among my accomplishments. This certainly has been an evening after my own heart. I haven't had such a good time in years," he said, attacking a pile of books stacked in one corner.

THE FEMININE FACTOTUM

By LA TOUCHE HANCOCK

With a hairpin woman can do
Most things on earth! Here are a few—

Pick a lock, and pull a cork!
Cut a pie, and make a fork!
Put up curtains, rake a fire!
Tinker with an auto tire!
Scour the kitchen pots and pans!
Take up carpets, open cans!
Clean the chimney of a lamp!
Saw a cake, and jab a tramp!
Peel an apple, rake a grate!
Hang up pictures, or a plate!
Spread the butter, varnish floors!
Fix the hinges on the doors!
Do up a baby, heat an egg!
Use it as she would a peg!
Button gloves, sew, darn, and knit!
Make the children's trousers fit!
Yawning chasms reconcile!
Keep receipted bills on file!
Tighten windows, clean a clock!
Sharpen pencils, mend a sock!
Stop a leak, untie a knot!
Varnish floors, erase a spot!

With this in hand she's quite content—
She needs no other instrument!

Playing Cards for Your Winter's Fun

There are yet a great many of the old-fashioned sort of people who enjoy tranquil, quiet evenings and a game of cards that is interesting without being unduly exciting. Not everyone has time to master the intricacies of bridge-whist, the more modern games. Not everyone enjoys them.

Here is a game that is restful yet jolly, easy yet piquant, entertaining—even educational—because it acquaints one with the names and faces of the best artists of stage and screen. Why not lay aside your old games and try our STAGE PLAYING CARDS? There are 52 cards and joker, daintily painted in pastel shades of pink, cream, green and gold, gold-edged and highly flexible—each card bearing the photograph of some popular player on its back.

These cards need not be hidden when not in use; they are an ornament to any living-room table and in offering them to you at 65c we are giving you an unusual opportunity to add to your store of winter's fun.

Be An Artist

Release the Talent in Your Pencil

Everybody has the ability to draw. True, some have more ability than others—but that is because it has been developed. Just as you have been taught to read and write, you can be taught to draw. It's simply a question of the proper training. Why snick at a routine job, wasting your life away, when there is a crying demand for trained illustrators—cartoonists—and designers? Our wonderful NEW METHOD of teaching art by mail has qualified hundreds of our students for high-salaried positions. Under our instruction, your undeveloped ability will flow forth in streams of saleable pictures, and you will have

A Career—Not a Job

A career is open to you as commercial artist that has definite possibilities. There is no future for you in a "job." There are thousands of big paying Artist's positions open right now. And these positions are actually going begging because of the scarcity of trained artists. Magazines, newspapers, advertising agencies, business concerns—all are looking for men and women who can handle their illustrating. With the tremendous boom in both foreign and domestic business, commercial art is more in demand than ever—and that demand is growing every day! Get in this fascinating game NOW!

$100 for One Drawing

That is what many of our students are now getting for one drawing! Many, after completing this wonderful first course, have been started in at $10 a week! Often, even before the student has finished his course, he has made more than enough through the sale of his drawings to pay for his tuition. Why? Because he learned to draw under the personal instruction of one of the country's foremost commercial artists—Will H. Chandlee. The Chandlee system does away with all antiquated technique and entangling humbrances of the ordinary art school. It brings the principles of successful drawing right down to fundamentals in a course of instruction that can't be beat. You can get all the benefits of studio instruction right in your own home—and for just a few cents a day! Your spare time is all that is required. Our valuable book "How to Become an Artist" tells all about it. Send for it today! It's FREE!

An Irish Twinkler

featured with Warner Oland in the Pathé serial, "The Third Eye," which she says she thoroly enjoyed, as she had always wanted to make a picture with a lot of stunts, being something of a tom-boy. Then, came her flight among the Fox luminaries.

"Being a star brings a stimulating responsibility, for you are so determined to make each picture the real prize winner that it becomes an exciting game," and the Percy eyes sparkled.

The day of our interview proved to be an eventful date on her calendar, for the first shots on her new picture, "Beware the Bride," were to be made and the bungalow dressing-room was in a state of confusion while the star flitted about.

"Look!" she cried, tragically pointing to a set of armor in the corner of the room. "Please remember that it is mid-summer and that is what I must wear in half my scenes,—it is the same that Geraldine Farrar wore in 'Joan the Woman.' Lift it!" and standing back, she laughed at my attempts to lift the five hundred pound armor.

"That is just four times my weight and I expect to be reduced to a mere speck after carrying it about. My costumes touch the extremes, for in several scenes I wear gay little negligees, again I prance about only in frilly lingerie, then sometimes I appear in lovely old-fashioned things like that," pointing to the fluffy frocks with rows and rows of lacy ruffles.

"Allen Forrest is my leading man in 'Beware the Bride,' and it is one of those laughable affairs where every imaginable complication comes up to separate the lovers. My rôle is interesting. I've never vamped, I am always the excuse for the picture ending happily. Still, in my last, I was a husband hunter,—so perhaps I have broken my record after all."

As the little star, finally arrayed as a girl of yesterday, waited for the call from the stage, we talked about her fads.

Somehow, you would know Eileen had a kitten. It is a beautiful orange Persian, named Foxey, and it manages to live in peace and harmony with the shiny black Pekingese that looks like a drop of ink, and Princess Pat, the pedigreed Boston Bull, which nestles closest to the heart of the little mistress.

Eileen has revived roller skating and is finding it great sport. She spends some of her leisure hours, usually in the evening, flying about the boulevards near her home in Hollywood.

The Percy sisters have a pretty bungalow ruled over by a Chinese cook and a Japanese maid, while Eileen confesses that she dearly loves to cook so it is no hardship for her when she has to prepare a meal. She is so essentially feminine, from the tip of her little toes to the top-most yellow curl, that this announcement brings no surprise.

She drives her own car, is a long distance swimmer and adores dancing.

years with "The Follies."

Then, there's fishing!

Her idea of a really good time is to slip quietly over to Catalina Islands, the vacation Mecca, with rod and reel. Last year she won a button for bringing in a forty-nine pound white sea bass, unaided.

On a recent visit, that expert fisherman, William Farnum, was in a boat alongside of hers in the Bay of Avalon and suddenly they both began to reel in like mad, hauling up a good size fish.—"But," wailed Eileen, "my line broke and Mr. Farnum landed the prize, I call that tragedy."

At the studio they will tell you that Eileen Percy is a general favorite, with her happy, bubbling spirits and unselfish consideration of everyone. She never indulges in temperamentals and—she is always on time! This is the highest praise one can bestow around a studio.

"Oh, that's simple," laughed Miss Percy. "I honestly try to do to others as I wish them to do to me—and I hate to wait!"

lands and a simple French-Canadian who loves her. The hero kills a man in self defense, and he is about to be executed for the crime when he escapes with his bride. The two seek happiness in the wilderness. They are tracked down by a Canadian mounted police officer who, after a forest fire in which they all fight for their very existence, rides away, giving them their freedom.

We should have liked to see what suspense David Griffith would have extracted from the forest fire. Director David Hartford was unable to get it across, altho huge stretches of woodland seem to have been burned. He simply was unable to transfer it to the silversheet. Betty Blythe is effective enough as the heroine, Nanette, and Lewis Stone plays another "River's End" rôle as the pursuing arm of the law. But Lon Chaney is miscast as the hero. In his hands, Raoul becomes a mixture of George Beban and Bull Montana. Mr. Hartford's direction is of the most obvious sort.

Every time we see Constance Binney, our faith in this young actress grows apace. "39 East," (Realart), is a celluloid presentation of the Rachel Crothers play, in which she appeared on the speaking stage. It is the usual sugar-coated opus of the innocent girl who comes to a New York boarding-house in quest of theatrical success, her struggles with sordid foot-light life and her ultimate winning of a rich youth who, for some reason or other, is also a boarding-house dweller.

"39 East" ambles pleasantly along without approaching the surface of life anywhere. It is just caramel entertainment, but Miss Binney is so fresh, unspoiled and pretty as the girl heroine that you elephant hunting. Very often the chase would last for months and months, and they would move their villages in pursuit. When the elephant had been finally brought low, more because of loss of blood, the innumerable spear wounds, and exhaustion, than anything else and after they were certain of his death, they would swarm all over the huge carcass, and resembled nothing more than an enormous ant hill alive with insects. Altho they are timid because of their size, these people are fearless hunters and, when attacked, very brave fighters.”

Here Dr. Vandenberg showed me some pictures of himself with four or five of the pygmies lined up under his arm, showing their size, and also their friendliness with the white stranger.

“One of the most thrilling results of the trip in the way of novelty is the motion pictures we made of a real lion hunt, the lion being killed some thirty feet from the camera,” he said. This feat was accomplished by members of the Masai tribe; a people who are unusual in every way. They are gigantic in size, absolutely fearless and very intelligent. They have decreased in numbers from 250,000 of some twenty-five years ago to about 20,000 at present. This is due largely to their impossible living conditions and their enormous death rate. One of their customs, up until very recently, (and still existing in some places), was the method of handling their sick. When one of them became ill, he was taken out into the forest, where a crude hut was erected around his body, and where he was left. Of course the body was invariably devoured by wild animals, and no sympathy or attention was permitted. The possible chance of recovery was never contemplated. When the British authorities discovered this practice, an end was put to it, but it has not even now become entirely obliterated.

“They were a very agreeable and friendly race, posing willingly for pictures, performing the most difficult athletic feats, and dancing for us. For two and one-half hours, some three thousand of them danced steadily, the wildest, strangest sort of dance, known as the Kavaronda.

“We stumbled upon another phase of the strange workings of the African mind in our trip up the Nile. Among certain tribes they still continue the custom of offering young girls to supplicate the god of the river during a drought. This is done by tying the virgin's body in a sort of sack, and at a certain hour of the day, amid much ceremony and religious rites, she is thrown into the river.

“I can only say in conclusion,” he remarked, “that it was a most interesting trip for me, and that I have not only accomplished something for my missionary work, but that when the Famous Players people release the film it will be really worth seeing.”

Dinty

Outside in the street a wagon had been laying cables. The three boys rushed for these cables. Their hearts pounded in their narrow chests like bullets flying to and from. Inside, that knife . . .

Dinty and Chinkie fastened one end of the cable to the steel door. North knew that only a miracle could help.

Outside Watermillions and Sketches fastened the other end of the cable to a cable car whizzing up the San Francisco hills. They timed the feat. The car started and the rope strained gently, at first; taut, then, with a mighty wrench, a groan, the giant door burst open, the chamber of horrors stood revealed.

A hollow of gloom, in the center a white object, luminous, Ruth . . . Over her, hideous and distorted, the gleaming knife was swooping. Two minutes more and it would have scraped at her garments, at the rise of her breast, another minute, and . . . North sprang to the table. He called, “Dinty!” Between them, they untied the ingenious knots.

“Oh, Ruth! Oh, Ruth!” they said, the two men that loved her. In the soft, terrorizing gloom North held the girl to him. He dared not let her go.

Outside, Dinty was sobbing against Judge Whitley's shirt-front. His small, steel nerves had sprung.

The four of them put their heads together. There was no word.

“And then, Doreen,” Dinty said, late that night, having finished his graphic tale, “then the Judge took Miss Ruth and Mr. North home and told me to come for supper at six, me an' Chinkie an' Watermillions an' Taki-San, Dorki's wife; an' we went. The Judge took me in his own room and told me I was either too old-young or too young-old, to know just what I had done. But that he had to tell me I had done the most precious thing in all the world for him, and that I must not exhibit—exhibit is the word he used—a smallness after so fine an exhibition, an' I must go to school, he said; an' you must have a cottage, bungalow he called it, an' a nurse, so that I would be free to come into my great career. He said, I think you ought to know, Doreen, darlin', because it's yourself that gave them to me. He said I had integrity (I memorized 'em 'special and particular to tell you, ochone) an' steel nerves, an' resource, an' sterling worth, an' he could use these qualities, he said, an' it would be very poor business, he said, for him to lose track of this, or for me to, either. An' so, bein' a business man an' a family man, first, last an' all the time, I consented, Doreen. Yes, sir, darlin' mine, I gave my consent.”

The wasted woman on the bed sighed. It was a sigh of happiness. Her gentle mind, vague now and then, wandered into the realm wherein it found most peace. She kist the lad's blue eyes. “Danny's eyes,” she murmured, “Danny's eyes . . .”

Dinty, holding her hand late into the night, did not misdeceive her.

TEDDY.—Great guns! Has it come to this? You want to know how I wash my face. I'll tell you a secret, if you wont tell. I never wash it. I let my beard grow on it, and that hides everything. There is no way of telling; you must be tried out before the camera.

McNULTY.—All right.

LUZIE D.—That was a sad case. Nothing makes ladies who have been "attractive" more ridiculous than to forget that they are no longer so. They are coquettes by profession. If they only knew that they are just as attractive in their forties and fifties without trying to appear youthful!

TRIXIE.—Stuart Holmes has been playing in "But Yet a Woman" with Doraldina in the lead, taken from Carey Wilson's story "The Passion Fruit."

C. E. F.—I advise you not to buy any of that motion picture stock. One touch of avarice makes the whole world skin. Good motion picture stock is seldom hawked about. Niles Welch is about 25 years old. Shoo fly. Did you know that a large nest of wasps will account for at least 24,000 flies a day? Come on in and see me some time. There's no flies on me (this time of the year).

MILDRED & CLELIA.—Olive Thomas's last picture was "Everybody's Sweetheart." She plays the part of an inmate in the poorhouse. Viola Dana in "Rings and Things."

NATALIE.—Lou Tellegen is in New York City now. No indeed. Eugene O'Brien likes the ladies. "Suds" ended with Mary Pickford sitting on the laundry steps. Very well, thanks.

BOBBIE.—Your letter was very interesting, but you will find your answers elsewhere.

MRS. K. H. M. FARGO.—I will have to open a Woman's Department. I cannot tell you why it is that a woman likes to be called a duck or a ducky, but not a goose. And a chick or chickie, but not a hen. A bird vision, but not a ghost; a lamb, but not a sheep. Funny creatures—yes. Eileen Percy in "Beware of the Bride."

IRISH STEW; MELIKEM; FRANCES.—Your letters were very interesting. Do write to me again.

BLANCHE R.—I wish I could tell you the life history of Gloria Swanson and Thomas Meighan, but why clutter up this department with biographies? Yes, "Drink To Me Only With Thine Eyes" should become very popular now.

MADGE KENNEDY ADMIRER.—Blue Eyes.

W. S.—Write me again, please, and try to draw me out. Sometimes I'm very timid and retiring—particularly late at night.

GREASY JIM.—No, I didn't see that pugilist when he was here. May Allison—I dont know her age. She's not telling. Ferdinand Earle is filming "The Rubaiyat" of Omar Khayyam in Los Angeles. It is being produced in colors.

TOTO MAE.—Dont be a fool! Fashion is a fickle and misleading jade. She is the will-o'-the-wisp that leads us, step by step, to the quicksands of financial ruin. It is nice to be well dressed, but folly to be overdressed. Why dont you learn to save. Charles Meredith is in New York City. Sorry I cant help you. So you didn't care for Carol Dempster in "Scarlet Days," Why?

MARIE H.—No, I didn't scratch the hair off of my head by answering questions. Money may be the root of all evil, but I have always said, give us plenty of the root.

E. CORINTH MISS.—Why, Edward MacDowell at one time held the chair of music at Columbia University. So you are a wonderful pie baker. You can send me a pumpkin pie any day, and I'll let you know how good you are.

CHARITY.—So you dont believe in handshaking, but it brings two people closer together. Kissing is shaking hands with the lips, and brings people still closer together. Well, Emerson says nothing is old but the mind, and believe me, mine entertains some pretty young ideas.

DOT-DASH.—Very glad to hear from you. RUBY T.—Thanks for the fee. Henry G. Sell was Tom in "The Lightning Raider." If you see Hope Hampton in her new picture you will change your mind. They tell me she "has everything."

MAJOR R.—Yes, Ward Crane is the same young man who was Secretary to Gov. Sulzer of New York State.

DORA T.—Your's was a peacherino. Warner Richman was the gypsy in "Sporting Life." Be sure to send on that fudge. You know I am fond of good things to eat. Olive Tell in "Wings of Pride."

LENORE.—Thanks. Write me again.

GLADYS T.—Never heard of her. That's it, write me often. I count not among my friends those who come only when they want a favor. Nigel Barrie is playing opposite Pauline Frederick in "Iris."

BABE.—Ship ahoy! So you think Thomas Meighan is a humdinger. Yes, they are both married, but not to each other. Polygamy is the right to have more than one wife. Monogamy, one wife. Where there is only one wife, it is called monotomy. That is the reason why there is so much bigamy in the world.

G. G. N.—Get your pictures direct from the players, but be sure you pay for them.

N. W.—Will Rogers latest is "Honest Hutch," adapted from the story "Ol Hutch lives up to it." Glad you are to be married. What is home without another. Shirley Mason is with Fox, Los Angeles, Cal. Pauline Frederick with Robertson-Cole, 1600 Broadway, N. Y. C., and Mae Murray and her husband Robert Leonard are in Europe.

THEBA BARA ADMIRER.—Get out the geography. The chief colonial possessions of Holland are in the East Indies comprising the islands of Java, Sumatra and Celebes. The Ganges is the sacred river of India. Valeska Suratt in the October and November, 1919, "Shadowland." Get a copy, it's a handsome book. Mary McAlister was on the cover of the February, 1918, issue.

DOLLY.—Ars longa, vita brevis—means Art is long, life is short. H. B. Warner is playing in "Felix O'Day" at Pathe. Goldwyn is producing "It's a Great Life," Mary Roberts Rinehart's famous story. She's a great favorite of mine. Natalie Talmadge is 19. James Regan is Mr. Alice Joyce. Thanks.

JOYCE.—Maybe you refer to "Lives of ploughmen all remind us we can make our furrow straight; and, departing, carry with us passports thru the golden gate." Cleo Madison is playing in California. She is the mother of twins, Fannie Ward is in France. But every candidate seems to believe in high wages for the working man and low prices for the consumer, but nobody seems to know how it is to be done.

ARTHUR S.; JEAN D; GUSSIE; CATHERINE E. M.; JOE S.; WM. H.; BENJAMIN R.; ALICE; L. E.; TIP; ETHEL; E. M.; FANCHON; L. W. S.; AND ELIZABETH. Your letters were very interesting, and I'm sorry to not be able to answer you individually.

TIS.—Indeed, there are several players with college educations.

VAMP.—Sorry I am not able to print your kind words about Mary. And you like Bebe Daniels. See the interview with her in SHADOWLAND, Louise Glaum in "The Leopard Woman."

VERA D.—Well, I have often marveled to see what pains women take to catch men and how very little they take to hold on to them. Perhaps it is because our ladies devote more attention to external decorations than to internal improvements. Nothing personal, Vera. Edward Earle is playing with Doraldina in "The Passion Fruit."

LILLIAN NERVE TRUMAN.—Yes, it will soon be time for turkey and cranberry sauce, hooray! And then we can see some of the good old foot-ball games. Frederic Burton was Horatio in "The Fortune Teller."

MAY PAINE.—Election doesn't bother me much. Your suggestion that the authorities print the pictures of the different candidates on the ballots is very unwise. What chance

The Slave

With all her strength she fought to get away from it all—the vulgar cabaret—the mysterious beauty parlor—the underground drinking hell. Fiercely she had refused every bribe—resisted every temptation. And yet, when there came the chance to escape, she turned her back to it and stayed.

It is a plot so exciting—so marvelously planned—so brilliantly solved—that it could have been written only by the master detective.

CRAIG KENNEDY
The American Sherlock Holmes
ARTHUR B. REEVE
The American Conan Doyle

He is the detective genius of our age. He has taken science—science that stands for this age—and allied it to the mystery and romance of detective fiction. Even to the smallest detail, every bit of the plot is worked out scientifically. For nearly ten years America has been watching this Craig Kennedy—marvelling at the strange new startling things that detective-hero would unfold.

Such plots—such suspense—with real, vivid people moving through the maelstrom of life!

rather forget the hollowness of it all. We think you will like it.

Charlie Ray's final Paramount vehicle, "The Village Sleuth," will not add to his laurels. This, an original story by Agnes C. Johnston, is a trick melodrama. Ray plays a would-be detective who, while employed at a sanitarium, attempts to solve what appears to be a murder. Just as he seems to unravel the mystery, the "murdered" one returns. "The Village Sleuth" is an involved thing, told rapidly but loosely. It does not hold our interest in the least, despite Ray's usual byplay as the yokel sleuth. The director, Jerome Storm, too, does not seem to get a definite hold on the story, ridiculous tho it is.

It is our painful duty to record "Little Miss Rebellion," (Paramount), as another failure, despite the spontaneous Dorothy Gish. Harry Carr's original story, the pleasant hocus of a royal princess who falls in love with an American dough-boy, is lost in the direction. George Fawcett, the director, seems to have told the story in chunks—and then had considerable difficulty getting the chunks to fit. Result, a comedy which became a melodrama—and an exceedingly lame one at that. Even Miss Gish is lost.

We hand another medal to Harold Lloyd for his "Get Out and Get Under," (Pathé). We thought the humorous possibilities of the Ford car had been exhausted, but now we know better. Lloyd has not equaled his classic "High and Dizzy," (which was the funniest thing since Chaplin's "Shoulder Arms"), but he has succeeded in building a consistently funny farce.

The Talmadges had better look to their scenario departments. For instance, Constance Talmadge has just been miscast in "Good References," (First National), an original story by E. J. Rath, in which she plays a young secretary who gets a position in a wealthy home on fake credentials. Of course, she falls in love with the young man of the household and has to face the terrific emotional problem of confessing the fib.

Here Miss Talmadge is lifted away from her forte, light comedy, and dropped into a far-fetched semi-melodrama. R. William Neill, the director, probably did all he could with the story. He gives Miss Talmadge a new leading man, the boyish Vincent Coleman. Young Coleman seems rather artificial as yet and wears a fearfully theatric looking make-up.

THE IMPERISHABLE

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Death may take to him the painter,
But his works to us belong;
He may steal from us the singer,
But he cannot seize the song.

And, tho he may take the lives that Hold our sum of joy, yet he Cannot rob us of the largess
Of a single memory.

Every household should have a jar of Resinol to heal skin troubles

Minor skin troubles—itching patches, bits of rash or redness—so easily develop into serious, stubborn affections, that every home-maker should have Resinol Ointment on hand to check them before they get the upper hand. We recommend Resinol for this with the utmost confidence because of its harmless ingredients and its success in healing eczema and similar serious skin diseases.

Resinol Ointment is an excellent healing dressing, too, for chafings, burns and stubborn little sores. Doctors prescribe it. Sold by all druggists.

would the homely candidate have, now that the women are doing so much voting? I'm glad you think Nell Shipman is 100%.

ALICE M. S.—Write direct to the players.

W. W. G. W.—No I never had corns. I always got the right size shoes. Freezone—you ask is it good—do we advertise it? See for yourself, anything we advertise is O. K. You're right, but when a man is compelled to eat his words, his appetite is quickly satisfied. I didn't call Owen Moore a poor simp—I said he played in "The Poor Simp."

JOYCE.—Jack Keane was Edward in "Black and White."

AL G. B.—There are different kinds of selfishness. In the intercourse of every-day life the friction produced by mere thoughtlessness is far greater than that caused by deliberate selfishness. Sarah Bernhardt was born in Paris in 1845. George Larkin played in "The Trey of Hearts" series. He is in Los Angeles now.

VIRGIL T.—Glad you like them, and hope you always will. You refer to Pope Adrian IV, who was by birth an Englishman, and the only one of that nation who has ever occupied the papal chair. Our editor's new son is named Virgil, and he's a wonder.

SANTA CLAUS.—But dont bristle up so. The country is not run on your opinion; other people have ideas too. When I die who is going to take my place? I dont know—that will be easy to fill. Send the old maid on—I'll get her a job in New York.

INQUISITIVE ED.—But remember, in love, as in everything else, experience is a physician who never comes until after the disorder is cured. Bert Lytell is on the coast, and married.

BO LA B.—Yes. Bill Rogers was on the stage. He was interviewed in Nov., 1918, issue of the CLASSIC.

ROMONA.—Dont believe all the scandal you hear. Those who live good lives are not afraid of the black band of scandal. Scandal is the sport of its authors, the dread of fools, and the contempt of the wise. Ann Pennington is a brunette. She was born in Wilmington, Del., 1895, and educated there. She is on the stage dancing now.

MYRTA.—You want me to tell you more about myself. I cant tell you any more than that I am 79 years old, long white beard—after I use ivory soap—drink buttermilk, live in a hall room, and well, that's all there is, there is no more. Beatrice Dominguez is with Universal.

I. KNOWITALL.—You're probably the only one who thinks so. Some day run in, and we will go over that ancient history you speak about. I've got letters piled sky high here in front of me to answer.

KATHERINE S.—No, I dont file my letters when I finish with them. You bet, I read every letter I receive. You're very nice to say all those things about me.

ME, MYSELF & I.—You bet 2 cents I am not 79?—make it a nickel; you lose. No, there is no limit to the number of questions you may ask, but be reasonable—that's all I ask. Arline Pretty is live foot five and a half. Yes, William Russell is married to Helen Ferguson. You say if you ever get into pictures, you will take the name of Violet Ray. Here's hoping for Violet Ray.

JESSE FAULKNER.—So you are a lawyer. God bless you, but please keep away from here. I look upon the law as sort of mousetrap—easy to enter but hard to get out of. You say you look a lot like Wallace Reid. Why dont you get into pictures?

J. B.—Cecil de Mille is French.

JANE EYRE.—Richard Barthelmess is 25. Write him.

G. M. B.—Now, that the sweet season of the Sweet Buy and Buy is over, I hope that people will settle down to their normal way of living. Robert Warwick in "Secret Service." Write to the National Motion Picture Institute, 173 Duffield St., Brooklyn.

Portraits of Your Favorites

TWENTY-FOUR LEADING PLAYERS

What is a home without pictures, especially of those one likes or admires? How they brighten up bare walls and lend a touch of human sympathy, alike to the homes of the rich and poor!

And what could better serve the purpose of decoration for the homes of motion picture enthusiasts than portraits of the great film stars, who have become world-wide famous?

The publishers of the three leading motion picture monthlies, the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, have accordingly prepared at great expense, especially for their subscribers, an unusually fine set of portraits of twenty-four of the leading players.

These portraits are 5½"x8" in size, just right for framing, printed in rich brown tones by rotogravure, a process especially adapted to portrait reproductions, and are artistic, accurate and high-grade in every way.

You will like these portraits, you will enjoy picking out your favorites. You will delight in framing them to be hung where you and your friends may see them often.

Officer Jones.....	Seymour Panish	Police Captain.....	O. L. Langhanke
The President.....	James J. McCabe	Pawnbroker.....	Jose Santo DeSegui
	The Poet's Little Friend.....		Ruth Higgins

Edwin Markham, the greatest of living poets and author of the immortal “The Man With the Hoe,” makes his first appearance in this photodrama, and so do Hudson Maxim, the great inventor, and Hon. Lawrence C. Fish, Judge of the Municipal Traffic Court. The leading part is beautifully played by Blanche McGarity, winner of last year’s contest, who takes the part of a fifteen-year-old poor girl. Octavia Handworth, who was for years Crane Wilbur’s leading lady, plays an important part, as also does Anetha Getwell, another of last year’s contest.
