A Startling Memory Feat That You Can Do

How I learned the secret in one evening. It has helped me every day

WHEN my old friend Faulkner invited me to a dinner party at his house, I little thought it would be the direct means of getting me a one-hundred-and-fifty per cent. increase in salary. Yet it was, and here is the way it all came about.

Toward the close of the evening things began to drag a bit, as they often do at parties. Finally some one suggested the old idea of having everyone do a "stunt." Some sang, others forced weird sounds out of the piano, recited, told stories, and so on.

Then it came to Macdonald's turn. He was a quiet sort of chap, with an air about him that reminded one of the old saying that "still waters run deep." He said he had a simple "stunt" which he hoped we would like. He selected me to assist him. First he asked to be blindfolded securely to prove there was no trickery in it. Those present were to call out twenty-five numbers of three figures each, such as 161, 249, and so on. He asked me to write down the numbers as they were called.

This was done. Macdonald then astounded everyone by repeating the entire list of twenty-five numbers backwards and forwards. Then he asked people to request numbers by positions, such as the eighth number called, the fourth number, and so on. Instantly he repeated back the exact number in the position called. He did this with the entire list—over and over again, without making a single mistake.

Then Macdonald asked that a deck of cards be shuffled and called out to him in their order. This was done. Still blindfolded, he instantly named the cards in their order backwards and forwards. And then to further amaze us, he gave us the number of any card counting from the top, or the card for any number.

You may well imagine our amazement at Macdonald's remarkable feat. You naturally expect to see a thing of this sort on the stage, and even then you look upon it as a trick. But to see it done by an everyday business man, in plain view of everyone, blindfolded and under conditions which make trickery impossible, is astonishing, to say the least.

ON the way home that night I asked Macdonald how it was done. He said there was really nothing to it—simply a memory feat, the key to which anyone could easily learn in one evening. Then he told me that the reason most people have bad memories is because they leave memory development to chance. Anyone could do what he had done, and develop a good memory, he said, by following a few simple rules. And then he told me exactly how to do it. At the time I little thought that evening would prove to be one of the most eventful in my life, but such it proved to be.

What Macdonald told me I took to heart. In one evening I made remarkable strides toward improving my memory and it was but a question of days before I learned to do exactly what he had done. At first I amused myself with my new-found ability by amazing people at parties. My "memory feat," as my friends called it, surely made a hit. Every one was talking about it, and I was showered with invitations for all sorts of affairs. If anyone were to ask me how quickly to develop social popularity, I would tell him to learn my memory "feat"—but that is apart from what I want to tell you.

The most gratifying thing about the improvement of my memory was the remarkable way it helped me in business. Much to my surprise I discovered that my memory training had literally put a razor edge on my brain. My brain had become clearer, quicker, keener. I felt that I was fast acquiring that mental grasp and alertness I had so often admired in men who were spoken of as "wonders" and "geniuses." The next thing I noticed was a marked improvement in my conversational powers. Formerly my talk was halting and disconnected. I never could think of things to say until the conversation was over. And then, when it was too late, I would always think of them, when it was too late. I would always think of apt and striking things I "might have said." But now I can think like a flash. When I am talking I never have to hesitate for the right word, the right expression or the right thing to say. It seems that all I have to do is to start to talk and instantly I find myself saying the very thing I want to say to make the greatest impression on people.

It wasn't long before my new-found ability to remember things and to say the right thing at the right time attracted the attention of our president. He got in the habit of calling me in whenever he wanted facts about the business. As he expressed himself to me, "You can always tell me instantly what I want to know, while the other fellows annoy me by dodging out of the office and saying 'I'll look it up.'"

I FOUND that my ability to remember helped me wonderfully in dealing with other people, particularly in committee meetings. When a discussion opens up the man who can back up his statements quickly with a string of definite facts and figures usually dominates the others. Time and time again I have won people to my way of thinking simply because I could instantly recall facts and figures. While I'm proud of my triumphs in this respect, I often feel sorry for the ill-at-ease look of the other men who cannot hold up their end in the argument because they cannot recall facts instantly. It seems as though I never forget anything. Every fact I now put in my mind is as clear and as easy to recall instantly as though it were written before me in plain black and white.

We all hear a lot about the importance of sound judgment. People who ought to know say that a man cannot begin to exercise sound judgment until he is forty to fifty years of age. But I have disproved all that. I have found that sound judgment is in nothing more than the ability to weigh and judge facts in their relation to each other. Memory is the basis of sound judgment. I am only thirty-two, but many times I have been complimented on having the judgment of a man of forty-five. I take no personal credit for this—it is all due to the way I trained my memory.

THESE are only a few of the hundreds of ways I have profited by my trained memory. No longer do I suffer the humiliation of meeting men I know and not being able to recall their names. The moment I see a man his name flashes to my mind, together with a string of facts about him. I always liked to read but usually forget most of it. Now I find it easy to recall what I have read. Another surprising thing is that I can now master a subject in considerably less time than before. Price lists, market quotations, data of all kinds, I can recall in detail almost at will. I rarely make a mistake.

My vocabulary, too, has increased wonderfully. Whenever I see a striking word or expression, I memorize it and use it in my dictation or conversation. This has put a remarkable sparkle and pulling power into my conversation and business letters. And the remarkable part of it all is that I can now do my day's work quicker and with much less effort, simply because my mind works like a flash and I do not have to keep stopping to look things up.

All this is extremely satisfying to me, of course. But the best part of it all is that since my memory power first attracted the attention of our president, my salary has steadily been increased. Today it is many times greater than it was the day Macdonald got me interested in improving my memory.

WHAT Macdonald told me that evening was this: "Get the Roth Memory Course." I did. That is how I learned to do all the remarkable things I have told you about. The publishers of the Roth Memory Course—the Independent Corporation—are so confident that it will also show you how to develop a remarkable memory that they will gladly send the Course to you on approval.

You need not pay a single penny until you have examined the Course and found that it fully lives up to all the claims made for it. Send no money. Merely mail the coupon or write a letter, and the complete Course will be sent to you instantly, all charges prepaid. If after examination you decide that you do not want to keep the Course, then return it and you will owe nothing. On the other hand, if you find, as thousands of others have found, that the Roth Memory Course will do wonders for you, then merely send five dollars in full payment.

You have always wanted a good memory. Now you can have it. Remember, you pay no money until you have proved that the Course will benefit you. You have everything to gain and nothing to lose by taking immediate action. So mail the coupon NOW before this liberal offer is withdrawn.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a photograph by Campbell Studios.)

Probably no player who has yet graced the silversheet has ever received the vast publicity campaign accorded Marion Davies, the star of International pictures.

Miss Davies, it will be recalled, was very well known on the musical comedy stage before she invaded the celluloid world with "Runaway Romany." Widely known as a footlight beauty, Miss Davies proved to be a remarkable camera beauty, as well. She has been steadily developing in the films.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

For many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—'spare work,' he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution of agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 12 volumes; descriptive booklets free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary writers, single copy 25c, annual subscription $1.00. Besides our teaching courses, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

PAINTING AND SKETCHING

THE Long Island School of Art offers excellent training to amateurs and art students. Our system of individual instruction eliminates the time-worn academic training so unnecessary in landscape painting. Pupils are instructed in a technique most suited to their temperament and ability, a system which will ensure success, an all year season allows the students to begin their course at any time. Our city studios are always open to our pupils for criticism, and students wishing to stay at our L. I. studios for the summer, will find excellent boarding near-by. Frequent social affairs will bring them in personal contact with many of our most famous artists. Address

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama. Miss Bainter is picturesquely pleasing.

Century.—"Aphrodite." Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle. The ballet, directed by Michel Fokine, is spirited and colorful.

Cohan and Horris.—"The Royal Vagabond." A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor. Also tinkling music. And a corking cast, with Grace Fisher, Tessa Kosta, John Goldsworthy and Frederick Santley.

Casino.—"The Little Whopper." Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson, and W. J. Ferguson.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment adopted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of a guileless young manufacturer of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Eltige.—"The Girl in the Limousine." A daring, boudoir farce, by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopkins, centering about a bed, which is invaded by every member of the cast during the evening. John Cumberland is very amusing, and pretty Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, lends every aid.

George M. Cohan's.—Elsie Janis and her gang. Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

Globe.—"Apple Blossoms." The ambitious and much heralded operetta of Fritz Kreisler and Victor Jacobi, plus colorful Joseph Urban settings. An offering far above the musical average. John Charles Thomas sings admirably. Wilda Bennett is an attractive heroine and Florence Shirley lends a piquant personality to the proceedings.

Hippodrome.—"Happy Days." Big and spectacular production typical of the Hippodrome. The diving girls are again a feature, disporting in the huge "Hip" tank.

Hudson.—"Clarence." Booth Tarkington's delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier reunited a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Harris.—"Wedding Bells." A light and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

Henry Miller's.—"Moonlight and Honey-suckle." Ruth Chatterton in a charming comedy that might have been a big hit had the playwright taken full advantage of some splendid situations in the last act. As it is, it starts like a hare and ends like a tortoise.

Maxine Elliott's.—"The Unknown Woman." A very emotional melodrama with Marjorie Rambeau in Bendel gowns and tears. Jean Robertson contributes a vivid bit as a "dope."

Morisco.—"Civilian Clothes." A delightful comedy to please everybody. Brand new idea and cleverly worked out. Thurston Hall in the title rôle shares the honors with beautiful Olive Tell. Support excellent.

Playhouse.—"Palmy Days." A picturesque drama by Augustus Thomas, in which Milton Lackaye does the finest work of his career since "Jim the Penman."

Plymouth.—"The Jest." Arthur Hopkins production of Sem Benelli's colorful and gripping Florentine drama. John and Lionel Barrymore are again seen in their original rôles. An admirable cast and Robert Edmund Jones' settings lend splendid aid.

Princess.—"Nightie Night." Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger, and some daring. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

Shubert.—"The Magic Melody." A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Fay Marbe, Julia Dean, Earl Benham and Carmel Meyers, the last two well known to the screen, head the cast.

Thirty-ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

ON TOUR

"An Exchange of Wives." Another Cosmo Hamilton comedy which, however, never attains the spontaneity or piquancy of "Scandal." The chief blush-inducer is a scene on a sleeping porch.

"See-Saw." A pleasant musical entertainment. The delightful Elizabeth Hines stands out and Dorothy Mackaye is pleasantly cast.

"She Would and She Did." Grace George in a light (very light) comedy founded on a little hole in the golf links which Grace angrily made, resulting in her suspension from the club for two months. Society and golf folks will probably find this an entertaining little play.

E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire. These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," and "The Taming of the Shrew," are distinguished in every sense of the word.

"The Better 'Ole." The Coburn production of the musical comedy based upon Bruce Bairnsfather's new immortal cartoon creation, Old Bill. Mr. Coburn's characterization of Bill is still as remarkable as ever.

"A Lonely Romeo," with Lew Fields. A light show running in the usual groove. Frances Cameron, who is developing remarkably, is the bright figure of "A Lonely Romeo," while Mr. Fields is his humorous self. There's a decidedly funny scene in a men's hat shop.

"Chu Chin Chow." An opulent and beautiful musical extravaganza based upon the Arabian Nights tale of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. Dazzling series of sensuous stage pictures. "Chu Chin Chow" is presented this year with an entirely new edition and new costumes. Marjorie Wood makes a colorful desert woman, Lionel Braham is very effective as the robbing sheik and Eugene Cowles makes the rôle of steward stand out. George Rosely plays the young lover admirably.

"La La Lucille." Musical comedy built around the efforts of a loving couple to arrange a divorce in order to live up to the terms of a millionaire aunt's will. A correspondent is engaged and troubles begin. John E. Hazzard and Janet Velie play the would-be divorcees, while Marjorie Bentley and Helen Clark give able assistance. Light summer entertainment.

The Shubert Gaeties of 1919. A lively revue with scores of statuesque girls and stunning frocks. A decidedly attractive entertainment.

"John Ferguson." A straight drama that compares favorably with anything of the kind that New York has seen for years. Beautifully staged and acted. Masterpieces of this kind should be liberally patronized to encourage others.

George White's "Scandals of 1919." All sorts and variations of dancing make up for a lack of story or humor. The real star is piquant little Ann Pennington—as seductive a little jizzer as ever shimmied on Broadway. Then there's the lively dancing of Mr. White himself.

"Friendly Enemies." This is the record-breaking comedy drama of last season, with Louis Mann in his original rôle.

"At 9:45." An absorbing melodrama by Owen Davis. One of those thrillers in which every one in the cast is suspected of murder until the final curtain. Marie Goff proves to be a genuine discovery as the heroine, and an excellent emotional performance is given by Edith Shayne.

"Three Wise Fools." Austin Strong's human little drama of three crusty old bachelors who are bequeathed a young woman and who are subsequently rejuvenated. Melodrama with a heart throb. Helen Menken gives a striking performance of the nerve-racked heroine, while Claude Gillingwater is a delightfully testy old Teddy Findley.

"She's a Good Fellow." A light but pleasant musical comedy built about the efforts of old folks to break up a marriage between a loving young couple. Joseph Santley is a likeable lover-husband, masquerading in skirts for a whole act. Ivy Sawyer, the very pleasing Ann Orr and Scott Welsh lend delightful assistance.

"Listen, Lester." Lively, dancy show with considerable humor. Cast includes Gertrude Vanderbilt, Clifton Webb, Ada Lewis, Ada Mae Weeks and Eddie Garvie.

"39 East." A charming comedy founded on a boarding school romance in which many interesting characters make love-making difficult for a pair of young lovers.

"Up in Mabel's Room." Piquant, daring but decidedly amusing farce built about the pursuit of a dainty pink undergarment which bears the same name as a recent jazz dance. Admirable cast, including the radiant Hazel Dawn. "Up in Mabel's Room" is an admirable example of well-knit farce.

"The Unknown Purple." Interesting and well sustained thriller. The story of a convict who discovers a way to make himself invisible, transforming into a purple ray, and who starts out to get revenge. The invisible man steals necklaces, opens safes and passes thru doors. Richard Bennett gives a vigorous performance of the human ray.

"Take It From Me." A comedy with music, in which a sporty young man falls heir to a department store and runs it according to the latest musical comedy methods.

"Three Faces East." Another Secret Service-German spy drama, this one by Anthony Paul Kelly, one of our most successful playwrights. The principal charm of this play is in trying to guess who are the German spies and who are the Allies, just as we were puzzled in "Cheating Cheaters" to know who were burglars and who were not.

AN APOLOGY AND AN EXPLANATION

On October 1st, 1919, practically all of the printers and typesetters in and around New York went out on strike, including those who print this magazine. Without going into the merits of the controversy between the employers and the employees, we will simply say that we had no voice in the matter one way or the other. Several labor unions had differences among themselves, and these differences caused the Publishers' Association to refuse to comply with the demands of certain labor unions. We do not belong to the Publishers' Association. That body conducted all the negotiations. When the printers and compositors walked out, it was not in our power to make them walk back, even if we had been willing to give them everything they asked. Had we terms with one union, another union would have refused to handle our paper, and another union would have refused to make the plates which are necessary for us to have. In other words, our hands were tied. We were helpless. Some publications were fortunate enough to have some of their printing done for them in distant cities, some had it done by some other process (such as typewriting photographed) and some could not have their work done at all. The strike did not end until the latter part of November, having lasted nearly two months.

During this time we did everything possible to supply our readers with this, their favorite magazine, on time and in good condition, but such was not possible. We left no stone unturned and were willing to go to any expense, but in spite of every effort, we were unable to meet the schedule, hence we were late. Furthermore, the magazine that you received was not the one we intended to give you. When the strike came on, this magazine was partly made up and partly printed, but we were unable to move either the type or the parts that had been printed. We managed to get out a MAGAZINE, but it was not the kind of magazine we wanted, it was the best we could. We could not even print an explanation and an apology, hence this one. We hoped, and still believe, that all of our esteemed readers, even those in distant parts, had heard of the great tie-up strike and that they would patiently wait. Some of our contemporaries took advantage of our extremities by issuing extra large editions on an advanced date, hoping thereby to secure some of our readers, instead of extending us the brotherly hand and saying, "Is there anything we can do for you in your distress?" We hope that they have largely profited by their business sagacity, but we believe that we have not lost a single reader. Once a reader always a reader.

We are now fully recovered from the disaster and from now on our readers may expect the finest magazine possible. We have done this for ten years and we can do it now. WATCH US.

Why Do People Like William S. Hart and Dorothy Dalton

What Dr. Blackford Says

Miss Dalton has a particularly fine physical organization. She belongs to the vital-motive type. Note the roundness of her features and the fullness of her figure. The motive qualities show in the squareness of her face in full front view, and in the graceful poses and movements of her body. She has splendid recuperative power. This gives vivacity, responsive energies, warmth and enthusiasm of nature.

Miss Dalton is distinctly feminine in type. Note the slightly concave nose, tilted up at the end, the soft curves of her face and body, and the cupid-bow lips. Feminine characteristics are further shown in her large, soulful eyes, her long, curling lashes, and the subtle humor and coquetry in her facial expression.

Miss Dalton belongs to the convex type, with the exception of the nose, which is plane tending to concave. Convexity of features indicates keenness, quick responses, quickness in action and directness in speech. These qualities Miss Dalton manifests in her quick responsiveness to conditions of environment, in her quick comprehension of artistic values and her readiness to make the most of a dramatic situation.

She is very emotional and strongly sentimental, and appeals to these qualities in her audience. One loves Dorothy Dalton because she has the art of winning your affection through her heart appeal.

Paul Graham was a blond, and not until he had learned that there was all the difference in the world between the characteristics of a blond and those of a brunet did he discover the secret of making people like him.

Paul had been keeping books for years for a large corporation which had branches all over the country. It was generally thought by his associates that he would never rise above that job. He had a tremendous ability with figures—could wind them around his little finger—but he did not have the ability to mix with big men; did not know how to make people like him.

Then one day the impossible happened. Paul Graham became popular. Business men of importance who had formerly given him only a passing nod of acquaintance suddenly showed a desire for his friendship. People—even strangers—actually went out of their way to do things for him. Even he was astounded at his new power over men and women. Not only could he get them to do what he wanted them to do, but they actually anticipated his wishes and seemed eager to please him.

From the day the change took place, he began to go up in business. Now he is the Head Auditor for his corporation at an immense increase in salary. And all this came to him simply because he learned the secret of making people like him.

WHY is Dorothy Dalton so well loved by her followers? Why does William S. Hart attract and hold the admiration of almost every one? They both know the secret of making people like them.

If Dorothy Dalton and William S. Hart can do the thing that makes themselves liked by the most cosmopolitan audience in the world—people they never see—think how much easier it will be for you to master this ability—win the confidence and liking of the people with whom you come in contact.

You too can have the power of making people like you. For by the same method used by Dr. Blackford in analyzing Miss Dalton and Mr. Hart, you can, at a glance, tell the characteristics of any man, woman or child—tell instantly their likes and dislikes, and YOU CAN MAKE PEOPLE LIKE YOU. Here is how it is done.

Everyone you know can be placed in one of two general types—blond or brunet. There is as big a difference between the characteristics of a blond and those of a brunet as there is between night and day. You persuade a blond in one way—a brunet in another. Blondes enjoy one phase of life—brunets another. Blends make good in one kind of job—brunets in one entirely different.

To know these differences scientifically is the first step in judging men and women; in getting on with them; mastering their minds; in making them like you; in winning their respect, admiration, love and friendship.

And when you have learned these differences—when you can tell at a glance just what to do and say to make any man or woman like you, your success in life is assured.

Dear Sirs:

It was with great interest that I read Dr. Blackford's character analysis of Miss Dorothy Dalton. From a long acquaintance with Miss Dalton it gives me pleasure to say that Dr. Blackford has unerringly depicted Miss Dalton's characteristics.

Everyone knows of Miss Dalton's outstanding histrionic ability and personal charm, but this is the first time to my knowledge that anyone has stated the basis from which these personal qualities spring. I feel sure that Dr. Blackford's analysis will not only be interesting to everyone but informative as well.

Cordially yours,
(Signed) B. E. SIEBEL
Manager to Miss Dalton.

Another example—the case of a large manufacturing concern. Trouble sprang up at one of the factories. The men talked strike. Things looked ugly. Harry Winslow was sent to straighten it out. On the eve of a general walkout, he pacified the men and headed off the strike. And not only this, but ever since then, that factory has led all the others for production. He was able to do this, because he knew how to make these men like him and to do what he wanted them to do.

Another case, entirely different, is that of Henry Peters. Because of his ability to make people like him—his faculty for "getting under the skin" and making people think his way, he was given the position of Assistant to the President of a large firm. Two other men, both well liked by their fellow employees, had each expected to get the job. So when the outside man, Peters, came in, he was looked upon by everyone as an interloper and was openly disliked by every person in the office.

Peters was handicapped in every way. But in spite of that in three weeks he had made fast friends of everyone in the house and had even won over the two men who had been most bitter against him. The whole secret is that he could tell in an instant how to appeal to any man and make himself well liked.

What Miss Dalton's Manager Says:

A certain woman who had this ability moved with her family to another town. As is often the case, it was a very difficult thing for any woman to break into the chill circle of society in this town if she was not known. But her ability to make people like her soon won for her the close friendship of many of the "best families" in the town. Some people wonder how she did it. It was simply the secret of work—the secret of judging people's characters and making them like you.

You realize of course that just knowing the difference between a blond and a brunet could not accomplish all these wonderful things. There are other things to be taken into account. But here is the whole secret.

You know everyone does not think alike. What one likes another dislikes. And what offends one pleases another. Well, there is your cue. You can make an instant "hit" with anyone if you say the things they want you to say and act the way they want you to act. Do this and they will surely like you and believe in you and go miles out of their way to PLEASE YOU.

You can do this easily by knowing certain simple signs. In addition to the difference in complexion every man, woman and child has written on them signs as distinct as though they were in letters a foot high, which show you from one quick glance exactly what to say and to do to please them—to get them to believe—to think as you think—to do exactly what you want them to do.

As unerringly as Dr. Blackford has told the characteristics of Miss Dalton and Mr. Hart you can tell the weak and strong points of character in everyone you meet.

In knowing these simple signs is the whole secret of getting what you want out of life—making friends of business and social advantage. Every great leader uses this method. That is why he IS a leader. Use it yourself and you will quickly become a leader—nothing can stop you.

You have heard before of Dr. Blackford the Character Analyst. Dr. Blackford's development and application of the science of Character Analysis has been built on a solid foundation of direct professional study of all kinds of men and women. After years of extensive consulting work among business concerns, merchants, manufacturers, Chambers of Commerce, and trade associations, Dr. Blackford made a trip around the world, observing widely different races, comparing notes with leading specialists of forty nations, comparing theories with such famous authorities as Alfred Haddon, Metchnikoff and Giuseppe Sergi, and studying the exhaustive records of Bertillon. So Dr. Blackford's store of ideas in the realm of human relations has become probably the most carefully arranged exhibit of facts on character study in the United States.

It is not surprising, therefore, that many concerns will not employ a man without first getting Dr. Blackford to pass on him. Concerns such as Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, Baker-Vawter Company, the Laurentide Company, Ltd., and many others pay Dr. Blackford large annual fees for advice on dealing with human nature.

So great was the demand for these services, that Dr. Blackford could not even begin to fill all the engagements. So Dr. Blackford has explained the method in a simple seven-lesson course, entitled, "Reading Character at Sight." Even a half hour's reading of this wonderful course will give you an insight into human nature, and a power over people which will surprise you.

Such confidence have the publishers in Dr. Blackford's Course, "Reading Character at Sight," that they will gladly send it to you on approval, all charges prepaid. Look it over thoroughly. See if it lives up to all the claims made for it. If you do not want to keep it, then return it and the transaction is closed. And if you decide to keep it—as you surely

Mr. William S. Hart is a fine example of a keen intellect, dominating and directing both the activities of his muscles and the play of his emotions. This characteristic enables its possessor consciously and unerringly to express in the finest shadings of posture, gesture, walk, and features, just the meaning he wishes to convey.

This is shown, first, by the height, breadth and depth of his forehead and the keenness of his eye, indicating intellectual power of penetration; second by the length and firmness of his upper lip—indicating control of emotion—and the length and firmness of his chin, indicating control of physical activities.

It follows from this that he is keen, shrewd judge of human nature. He uses this knowledge of people not only to portray their joys, their sorrows, their passions, and their sympathies, but also as a basis for judgment as to what will please them in the pictures.

One of the most marked traits about Mr. Hart is his determination which is shown in the long, firm upper lip, the square, deep jaw, the straight, dogged cut of the lips across the face, and the high head.

His determination is backed by courage. Courage is shown in the long, large but well-balanced nose; the straight, level gaze; and the prominence of the lower end of the chin.

So we have in him a man who by keen observation and smoothly working intellect, fixes upon his purposes, who knows how to influence, persuade and direct people to play their parts in his plans, who has the courage to attempt big things and the determination to accomplish them to spite of difficulties and obstacles.

These are qualities which largely explain Mr. Hart's success in motion pictures, but he adds to them an unusual capacity for concentration. He not only starts, but no matter how disagreeable and difficult the job, he sticks and he finishes.

Gentlemen:
I have carefully read Dr. Blackford's analysis of Mr. William S. Hart, and in the light of years' close personal acquaintance with him must say that I am amazed at the close accuracy with which Dr. Blackford depicts Mr. Hart's personal characteristics.

This analysis is all the more remarkable when it is realized that Dr. Blackford has never met Mr. Hart and that this character reading was made wholly from a photograph.

Yours truly,

Manager.

What Mr. Hart's Manager Says:

If you long for more color

Use this famous treatment for rousing sluggish skin

Just before retiring, wash your face and neck with plenty of Woodbury's Facial Soap and warm water. If your skin has been badly neglected, rub a generous lather thoroughly into the pores, using an upward and outward motion. Do this until the skin feels somewhat sensitive. Rinse well in warm water, then in cold. Whenever possible, rub your skin for five minutes with a piece of ice and dry carefully.

For pale, sallow skins requiring greater stimulation, use the new steam treatment. You will find it in the booklet wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

To make your skin noticeably lovely - Give it the regular care it had when you were a baby

When you were a baby, your skin was exquisitely soft—clear, delicate—daintily rose-pink and white.

People loved to touch your rose-petal cheeks, your soft smooth little hands.

Do you ever stop to think what kept your skin so fine and soft? What is keeping it now from being as fine and soft as it can be?

No matter how you have neglected your skin, you can make it exquisite in texture. You can have the glorious color of youth. You must begin at once to give your skin the tender, regular care it received when you were a baby.

Every night before retiring, cleanse it thoroughly—just as thoroughly as a baby's skin is cleansed every night. If your skin has lost its delicacy and clearness, use the particular Woodbury treatment indicated for its needs.

Do you want more color? Are your pores enlarged? Have you disfiguring blemishes or black-heads? These conditions are the result of neglect and the constant exposure to which your skin is subjected. The right Woodbury treatment, used nightly, will correct them.

Get a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap and have your first treatment tonight. The feeling the first two or three treatments leave on your skin will tell you how much good its regular use is going to do you. In a week or ten days you will begin to notice a decided improvement—the greater clearness, smoothness, fineness and color you long for. Woodbury's is for sale at drug stores and toilet goods counters throughout the United States and Canada. A 25 cent cake will last a month or six weeks.

Sample cake of soap, booklet of famous treatments, samples of Woodbury's Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream, sent to you for 15 cents.

For 6 cents we will send you a trial size cake (enough for a week or ten days of any Woodbury facial treatment) together with the booklet of treatments, "A Skin You Love To Touch". Or for 15 cents we will send you the treatment booklet and samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream. Address the Andrew Jergens Co., 901 Spring Grove Avenue, Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada, address the Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 301 Sherbrooke Street, Perth, Ontario.

Wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is the booklet, "A Skin You Love To Touch." It contains scientific advice on the skin and scalp, and full directions for all the famous Woodbury treatments.

met. Because he isn't the least like a player. None of the things we call temperament are there, just a down-right, regular, breath-taking boyishness. Not a slam-bang, certain-of-himself boyishness either, but a quiet, introspective sort.

Just before this "interview" was written we went to a musical comedy together. Barthelmess didn't laugh at the cheap humor of it. Neither did he assume a high-brow air in commenting upon its banality. But he was frankly—and boyishly—interested in the girls.

Some one interviewed Barthelmess on the coast and pronounced him a shrinking lad who loved books. They didn't see him as I saw him.

Yet Barthelmess does love good books. He reads a great deal. One night he dropped a volume of Blasco Ibanez to have dinner with me.

But Barthelmess is many sided.

He loves the feminine note in life.

His ideal type of girl? "Rather tall and slender," he said, (and I know he will shudder to read this), "she needn't necessarily be either blonde or brunette, but she must be attractive."

"What about brains?" we parried.

Barthelmess paused. "I was thinking of an ideal dancing partner. Of course, I hope some day to meet a combination of beauty and brains. Possibly I have met them but they have not been able to see me for dirt." No conceit there.

Yes, Barthelmess loves to dance. Cabarets appeal to him. But he confessed: "After two or three weeks of New York night life—with theaters and midnight dancing—I feel as if I were wasting myself. Sort of as tho I needed a mental bath."

Then—odd as you may think—Barthelmess goes away into the country, near his home in Connecticut.

"I have a quaint old room in a quaint old farmhouse," he relates, "I sleep in a four-poster and I sleep. I read a lot and I dream. Somehow, I guess I like that best of all." Did I say Barthelmess is many sided?

No, Barthelmess is not "temperamental" as the word is used in screen circles. Not that he lacks ambition. He has fought every inch of his way.

His mother an actress, Barthelmess came from college to try his luck on the screen. The rôle of the younger brother in Herbert Brenon's "War Brides" with Alla Nazimova, gave him his start. But it by no means made him. He drifted, not quite able to do anything big anywhere.

"I almost starved before my opportunity with Griffith came," he told me laconically, "really almost starved."

Naturally Barthelmess looks

THIS is no conventional chat-for-an-hour interview — this composite view of Dick Barthelmess. For it is the product of many hours together; in the country, in the city, under varying conditions.

I would shudder to write my impressions of Barthelmess after seeing him once. He is too elusive, too much within himself. He sits half broodingly, saying very little, laughing now and then with typical boyish high spirits, tempered by an odd semi-worldliness. But to paint a word picture of him after one meeting would be impossible.

I know that now I have not wholly found the real Barthelmess. But here and there in our conversation flashes have revealed something of this boy who became famous over night for his Yellow Man in "Broken Blossoms."

We first met after the première of the Griffith production. He had every reason to have lost his head in the avalanche of praise. But he hadn't. A singular mental balance is his.

Indeed, he is the most unusual young actor I ever upon Griffith with eyes of genuine worship. "He is more like a father than an employer or the master the world sees," the young actor says. "Gee, I'll be glad when he comes east. I always feel that I can tell him all my troubles and always be told just how to solve things?"

A Composite Study

That was before Griffith brought his studio staff east and began producing in Westchester. (Right here let me add that the producer remarks anent Barthelmess and Bobbie Harron: "No cleaner minded boys ever lived.")

Of course, Barthelmess just a bit envies the young stars of the celluloid drama who have every means, particularly financial, to advance themselves. "I wish I had money to buy plays and books now and lay them aside for a future day, when I shall have learned enough and made enough friends everywhere to be a star—that is, if that day comes."

His favorite role? Not the Yellow Man but the lover with Marguerite Clarke in "Three Men and a Girl." He likes that sort of light romantic character best. Probably, "I'll Get Him Yet" is his next choice.

The Mexican vagabond hero of "Scarlet Days" interested Barthelmess a great deal. "It was different, at least, to ride a mustang and wear a mustache," he laughs. Critics have said that it was a boyish Walthall come to the screen, this sensitive, glamorous, dashing desperado with the haunting vein of humor and sadness.

Barthelmess has been playing a beachcomber in Barthelmess loves most of all to stay at his old home in Connecticut. "I have a quaint old room in a quaint old farmhouse," he says, "I sleep in a four-poster and I sleep. I read a lot and I dream." Two views of Barthelmess in "Scarlet Days" are shown on these pages a forthcoming Griffith story of the South Seas. This will be his latest contribution to the screen—and a fascinating one it should be, with Barthelmess playing opposite Clarine Seymour, the famous "cutie beautiful." Miss Seymour portrays a hula hula maid—and does it vividly, judging from our studio glimpses.

But to return to Barthelmess.

There is no question but that Dick holds a place all his own on the screen. Comparisons have been made with Charles Ray, but the two young men are poles apart. Youth alone makes them comparable. Ray is the film's foremost exponent of the genre school—Barthelmess of the humanely romantic school.

The silversheet has needed just this touch. It has been missing since Walthall contributed his "little Colonel" to "The Birth of a Nation." The Yellow Man was the first idealistic touch of poetry since that lovable character.

There is one vivid thing in Barthelmess' character that I haven't touched upon.

I was glad it was near the window, because every now and then, as she turned, the light reflected the moist greyness of her eyes, and from the twinkle they flung out I knew I liked her right away—that she was the sort everybody liked—enormously—right away. She was so vibrant, so full of fun.

It was the first taste of November. Rain shot thru the air and there was sufficient chill to warrant furs and a wrap. Brrr!

The soap-scented elevator lifted me to immeasurable heights, where I got out amongst the clouds at the —th floor, and sailed in upon a soft atmosphere of blueness that was —heavenly. A maid told me to wait. (There are maids in these places.) And from my glory of azure velvet, underneath a lamp of golden tints, I looked out on the drizzle—doubting its reality.

Elaine came into the room, and I saw the purple of her kimona, the grey of her eyes, and the tiniest auburn veil that glimpses thru her hair—and I knew movies were never like this!

"Good morning," said Miss Hammerstein. My maledictions on November changed instantly to enthusiasm for the season. "Good morning. It's funny how I can say 'Good morning,' isn't it, when I thought a few hours ago that everything in the universe was changed. You see, all day yesterday I was working on 'The Country Cousin' at Glen Cove. Along towards the end of a glorious August came a note from her father which read, "Come home. I have had a part written for you in 'High Jinks.'" Elaine's father is Arthur, and Arthur's father was Oscar—the late Oscar Hammerstein. The one.

Elaine went. She rehearsed. And had a violent time with the make-up. For "The Armitage" even powder had been forbidden. And the day after the première at the Casino Theater in New York, Elaine—by the critics and by the public—was acclaimed a hit! Everyone went wild over the freshness and piquancy of Mr. Hammerstein's young, beautiful daughter. They thought she had the most delightful, natural way. But no one, except Elaine and her mother and Miss Hammerstein laughed so deliciously as she confided all this to me now, but a moment later she sobered, when she recalled the nights that followed nights with her pictures in the papers—and how it hurt her—along with the way the people of the company felt towards her because of that publicity.

"I didn't care a bit for the old clippings, and worse than that, I couldn't stand the footlights, and the necessity of having to work on Wednesdays and Saturdays—when the sun was out—and on evenings when there was another play I wanted to see, or a party of my friends who were going off to dance or skate. It was a miserable time for me. The only nights that were happy ones were when the boys and girls from school would come and sit in a box, and wave to me. And I'd return the salutations and forget the play—and father would send

It is this yacht that John Bowers thinks of as home.

This doesn't mean that he has no love for the little white bungalow just two blocks from the Goldwyn studio, where he and Mrs. Bowers play at keeping house. He couldn't help being fond of it, the place is so pretty. And, too, "We have lived so long in hotels and apartments," he said, "that life in a real house seems like a game." But "a man's home is where his heart is," and on the day I saw John Bowers his heart was away off with the Uncas on the Hudson River. He was, I think, the most homesick young man in the world. It was a warm day in early August and a light breeze blew in from the Pacific, reminding one that Venice (and solid comfort in a bathing suit) was only about twenty minutes away. He was playing the part of a photographer. He stood on a London roof at the Goldwyn studio; a nice, solid, realistic roof about twenty feet from the ground with no house underneath, and under Frank Lloyd's direction, photographed the funniest family group I have ever seen. JOHAN BOWERS, leading man of many pictures, has just signed a contract for another year of work with Goldwyn; a year which—who knows?—may end with his becoming a star.

He is very handsome, is John Bowers—but this could hardly be called news—at least six feet in height and athletic looking with dark eyes and chestnut brown curly hair.

He tells a pathetic story about those curls which is worth repeating here in order to have it over with. It seems that recently, when he went to see one of his own pictures run off at a local theater, he heard a violent argument between two women about his hair. One insisted that "no hair could curl naturally like that" and offered to bet the other "every cent she had in the world" that it was marcelled. Let me say right here that he was more indignant than amused; he has done everything possible to keep it plastered down ever since.

But to get to my interview:

The fact that he is a good actor and handsome are not his only claims to distinction. Along the water front many people entirely unfamiliar with the famous ones of the stage and screen cameraman were precariously perched on a movable platform opposite, which rocked lightly at their least energetic movement while an orchestra, there for "atmospheric" purposes, played teasingly a few bars from "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep."

"The Uncas is really coming," John Bowers said, joining me when the scene was over. "I've made definite arrangements at last. Hal and Doc Wilson (shipbuilders of Balboa, a sea-side resort near Los Angeles, and his inseparable companions on many a cruise) are going to make up a party of seven or eight people and bring her around thru the canal. I almost think I'd like to sleep until she gets here, the waiting will be so long! Talk about your passionate love scenes—I'm going to stage one when that boat arrives." He was speaking lightly and whimsically but with an undertone of seriousness. "I'm going to wade out into the Pacific to meet her and kiss her right on the bow-sprit!"

He laughed at the idea but he was more than half in earnest. Anyone who has ever owned any sort of a boat knows that it may seem as vivid and living a thing as one's dearest friend and as full of unaccountable moods and actions. And when, in addition to this, she is a beautiful boat and famous—well, one could not ask for more. And the Uncas is both beautiful and famous; she has a racing record known among yachtsmen everywhere.

She is a $25,000 schooner yacht—a seventy-footer—built on long graceful lines, painted white and with fittings of mahogany. Her staterooms are large and comfortably furnished. He could take nine guests for a thirty-one day cruise without their missing any necessities or luxuries. One does not wonder that her young owner speaks of her with all the warm enthusiasm of a young man describing his sweetheart as "the only girl." John Bowers has been interested in boats ever since he can remember, he told me. The first one he owned was a twenty-one footer and he built her himself when he was still in his 'teens. He used to sail her around Lake Wawasee,

Indiana, and he grew so expert in handling her that the only way he could get any excitement was by purposely "turning turtle" when he knew his parents were watching him, frightening them almost to death and getting a lot of fun out of the many attempts to rescue him. He is, by the way, one of a

THIS is an amazing interview because, (this will require elucidation), it is not amazing at all; that is, save as an interview. It is with Norma Talmadge, and the day I sallied forth to "get" her, I sallied prepared to be amazed. "Of course," I thought, subwaying jerkily along, "of course . . . young, very young, really . . . the extraordinary and undeniable touch of a real genius . . . widely acclaimed . . . at the top of the ladder, so to speak . . . things are bound to have happened in her . . . yeasted in her, as it were . . . sybaritic, perhaps . . . some distinguishing eccentricity . . . couldn't be helped . . . I don't know just what . . . but something . . ."

Nothing at all. The girl who, admittedly, stared, some years ago, at the screen and murmured to her mother, in the surrounding darkness, "That's what I want to do . . . be a movie actress," who, afterward, wandered solitarily about the Vitagraph studio until she was given a chance—that self same girl talked with me in her own studio, the Norma Talmadge Film Corporation, the other day. Talked with me, not to me. I say that advisedly.

In one preconceived particular I was right. She is young. Marvellously young. More as to viewpoint and general mannerism, or rather, total lack of conscious mannerism, than either line or tint. She is possessed of that sophistication which appears to be unconscious of itself. She has ideals and does not attempt to conceal them. There is no thinly applied veneer of cynicism, nor, on the other hand, is there the sugar-coated baby-staring of the curly ingénue. She is just a girl with a spice of the devil in her and a belief in things . . . probably Santa Claus and fairies. She appears to be quite unconcerned about herself, the eminence she has achieved, the altitude from which she could look down upon the lesser lights.

interesting to know that she really and absorbedly loves it; not the results, only, generally she feels a dissatisfaction with them, but with the work itself, the details of it, the everyday, all-night details. "I took a three months' vacation this summer," she said, "or tried to and after about one month I nearly went mad. 'Phoned the studio every day and finally cut it a month short and got back into harness. I could never stand the gentle art of doing nothing. That would be too strenuous for me!"

We had a plain chummy sort of an afternoon, Beulah Livingstone, who does all of Norma's publicity and also that of her sister, Constance. Norma and I. There was only one tentatively uneasy person present. That person was Beulah Livingstone. She had "arranged" the interview and she was immensely anxious that the interviewee and likewise the interviewer should, as it were, come up to scratch. Such did not seem to her to be the case. What possible press-value could result from two giggling people who seemed to be saying nothing more pertinent than admissions of fondness for the same brand of cigaret, for "hen parties" and for certain unimportant persons having nothing to do with the intensive field of interviewing? What indeed, thought Miss Livingstone, prodding first Norma and then myself, furtively and occasionally, in the vain hope of turning the talk into publishable channels. Eventually, be it said, she, too, succumbed and we smoked and gossiped and laughed a perfectly good interview away. Also, this is probably more important to me than to anybody else, we spent, Norma and I, several more of the precious interrogative moments in comparing palms, both hers and mine being equally wrinkled, lined and then crosslined. "My child," said Norma, with sagacity, "you're going to have a fearful life, all sorts of weird and interesting things. That is what everybody tells me."

We were holding this frivolous session, be it said, in Norma's (I am a realist, so it has to be Norma . . . that is, she is going to censor this interview, so it may NOT be Norma, in which event you will know that she has blue-pencilled it, which I lay an

I believe it is the only thing of its kind in studioivity. I may be mistaken, in which event there will be more blue-pencilling done. This relieves me of all strain. The apartment is delicious, compact and complete, aside from being an innovation. You step from the hammering and shifting and shouting and general activity of the studio into quite another world, quiet, tasteful, apart. There is a tiny entrance hall. There is a large sort of a main room, part living room, part dressing room, which is, of course, its chief use. The walls are a soft cream effect and the high windows are hung in some sort of effective cretonne. There is a mammoth black wicker dressing table topped by an oval mirror framed in black wicker. There is a comfy black wicker chaise-longue, occupied that afternoon by a diminutive and much-beloved "Pom." There are one or two made-to-be-sat-in black wicker chairs. A broad window-seat, upholstered, runs beneath the cretonned windows. There are two capacious clothes closets containing sundry costumes. Aside from all this, there is a complete little of twenty-five dollars a month derived from some property of her own. The brave young mother did the thing she knew best how to do. She raised blooded stock and pedigreed hunting dogs. Her parents came to live with her and a new life began.

Mary MacIvor was a delicate child. She was unable to attend school regularly and was taught by her mother at home. Her maternal grandparents were scholarly people, and Mary's first recollections are of the poems her grandfather used to recite. His collection of books was her playground. She began to read very early and whiled away the hours curled up in an armchair, either reading to herself or listening to her grandfather. Mary's first

THAT was one of little Mary MacIvor's favorite nursery rhymes. Her ancestors on both sides of the family were Scotch, and tradition has it that the women of her clan are small, the men tall and handsome—true defenders of their kith and kin. Mary never saw her father, but she loves to hear how splendid and how good he was and to look at his pictures. When her brother had passed his ninth birthday, the young father died of double pneumonia, and the shock of his death caused the premature birth of the child. After his death there were money worries, and when all the debts had been paid, the great farm sold and the little family forced to leave the beautiful old house for a smaller place in the mountains of Virginia, Mary's mother had nothing to start on but an income great grief came with the death of the only real "daddy" she had ever known.

As she grew up and became stronger, Mary was taught to ride the fine horses her mother bred. She was afraid to take the high jump, but she would nerve herself for it whispering her mother's instructions, "Give him his head when he goes down, pull him up as he lands."

Mary MacIvor is an old-fashioned girl, rich in the traditions of the South. She knows how to do fine hand-sewing and can darn a hole in such a way that it improves a frock. On certain days of the week, her mother used to have Mary prepare the luncheon and taught her how it should be served. At such times Mary put on a tiny cap and apron and waited on the table with great formality. It was a game, but it prepared the girl for the home she manages so gracefully now.

"We had the prettiest wedding! An old friend of ours, in Pasadena, has a rare collection of Chinese works of art. She insisted that we should be married at her home, and we were.

We were married in a Chinese room, with a low seat, covered with handsomely embroidered draperies serving as a prayer-bench with canopies overhead of the same rich materials. At our engagement dinner, given by Mr. Desmond, every one had place cards of Kewpies save Little Mary. Mr. Desmond turned to the guests and announced the fact that 'Mary gets an Irishman!'" She opened a Chinese box and took out a funny little image of an Irishman.

That Chinese box is a veritable treasure house. It contains miniature Buddhas, temples, sombreros, furniture, dishes, holy-water fonts, dice that are almost too small to be seen with the naked eye and hand-carved ivories. Nothing is more than an inch long and most of the treasures are a good deal smaller. They have been sent to Mary from her admirers all over the world who know her fad.

Mary's biggest hobby is—bottles! When she told me about that, I said, "Beer bottles?" Laughingly she answered, "They're almost rare enough now to be saved as souvenirs of the twentieth century, aren't they? But no, my bottles are of all sizes, shapes and nationalities."

She owns a whiskey flask used by high-bred women of the Civil War period, camouflaged in a peculiar manner. It's of china, colored and built like a small prayer book, with a hole at the top for a tiny cork. A "lady" of that period could carry this spiritual volume in her muff without exciting suspicion. It was the fashion to faint in 1865 and old Bourbon was much in demand.

Miss MacIvor is related to the Buchanans and many other famous Southern families.

If I Were King

AND you should have the sun and moon to wear—
if I were king—”

The pen was rusty, the ink vile, the man who bent over the rude deal table a scarecrow figure in a velvet doublet so bepatched it was hard to say what its original color had been. His hair, dark, long and unkempt, fell about unshaven cheeks on which a week's beard blurred the lines of expression, a battered cap, adorned with a dragged cock's feather lay on the bench beside.

“If I were king—ah, love, if I were king—” he read aloud and his voice shook oddly in the reading, and the wild, bright eyes, deep-sunken and surrounded with the fine lines that told a sorry tale in Life's handwriting were actually filmed with strange drops. For the nonce, Master Francois Villon, of unsavory name, pick-pocket, rhymster, marauder, sometime jail-bird, empty of stomach, emptier of purse, was transported to that seventh Heaven of the poet—Inspiration.

The Fircone Tavern on the afternoon of a warm June day in the middle Fourteen Hundreds was hardly such a place as would beget thoughts of love and royalty. Rather would one expect its smoke-stained walls, its atmosphere of stale wine and mouldy cheese and unwashed humanity to spawn a litter of evil deeds, of foul oaths and deformed fancies, but the crew gathered before the wide hearth, tatterdemalions, rogues, girls of the oldest profession in the world, merry vagabonds, all seemed happy and at home as they clattered mugs and cans of ale to the accompaniment of brisk tongue wagging.

corner, “canst moisten your gullet with ink, lad? Be not so chary of your sweet company!”

“Leave him be,” said one of the girls, a slip of a lass in boy's habit, who looked despite it no more a boy than stout Colin Cayeux, sprawling on the floor at her feet looked a woman; “he wants none of our company, being in love with his own. Look!” she wagged a derisive hand. “Canst not see he has a goodly crowd about him? There is Sir Villon, poet of Paris, and one Francois, gentleman adventurer come upon evil days; then there is Francois Villon, King of the Cockle-shells and Rogue Villon, known indifferent well to the keepers of His Majesty's gaol, and there is Villon the sot, Villon the huckster of rhymes, Villon who has betimes an itch of the dagger and Villon—”

"The lover!" tittered a full-bosomed wench who seemed bursting with ripeness thru the straining sheath of her bodice; "forget not his best rôle, Abbess! Is no other i' all of France can match him at sweethearting!"

Tigerishly the girl sitting on the table's edge, swinging one shapely green clad leg, twisted her lithe body upon the speaker. "Have you been making eyes at my man, minx? I'll teach you to meddle—"

"Come, come," interposed the swinish landlord, thrusting his fat body between, "no hair-pulling! Settle your differences outside, and," significantly looking about the circle of emptied mugs, "settle your scores here! No excuses, mind, in the stead of coins or you'll find a leak i' the bottom of your glasses hereafter!"

The crew of ragamuffins looked askance at one another, and Jehan, the Wolf, slapped a lean pocket forlornly. "Have none of you the wherewithal to appease this grasping ale-draper?" he whined; "if we would keep up the dear habit of eating and the dearer habit of drinking we must find some good burgher whose purse suffers from a plethora and needs bleeding."

ward. "Know you any of you, Thibault D'Aussigny, the Grand Constable?" he hissed. "Ods blood, if 'tis not he who has just entered—the fellow in the black cloak yonder in the corner, I'll dine on my doublet! There's no hiding that beak—but what can the Constable of France be looking for in the Fircone Tavern?"

"Shall we stick him?" queried an ill-favored Cockleshell, jerking a dirty thumb, "my dagger has no objections to spilling blue blood as well as red."

"Let's ask Francois," Rene suggested, and approached the figure sprawled over his writing, shaking him boisterously. "Come! Enough of rhyming—can you fill your belly with rhymes? We are hungry, and an ill world demands vile silver in return for food. Poems are good but fat capon, cheese, meat pies, pink ham and brown ale are better!" and the rogue's eyes glistened and he licked his lips.

The figure at the table unhooked itself and rose with a gesture of brushing away cobwebs. Francois Villon looked dazedly about him, at the sanded floor, the guttering candles and the motley assemblage turned toward him, looking in the flaring and uneasy light like so many hobgoblins, and the light went out of his face as tho extinguished by a cold gust of memory. Then, drawing back his lips, he began to laugh with no mirth in the sound.

"Welladay, lads and lassies, so ye are hungry!" He struck a fantastic pose, tattered cloak flung back, palms on hips showing the dagger and the vellum book that kept strange company in his leather belt, "that is a fashion all Paris will soon follow unless our straw King finds himself the guts of a man ere long!"

He would have thrust the paper he held into his doublet but the Abbess, leaping forward like a tigress, snatched it away. "Let's see to what mistress he writes now!" she snarled, "of love that ever finds your face more fair"—bah! should I be jealous of a paper wooing—I know better ways of love than that—eh Francois? Eh, my little monkey?"

Francois Villon unwound the arms she flung about his neck and put her aside gently, with a curious look of pity. "If I cannot fill your stomachs I can fill your ears with a well-seasoned tale," he promised, as he took his place, back to the fire, the leaping flames making him a still wilder and more grotesque figure, a knight of the gutter, a gallant of the gibbet. "Hark then to the story of how one Master Villon met with the One Woman in the World."

The Abbess gave a sound of rage, but Villon shook his head. "'Tis the tale of the moth that scorched his wings at a star, Hugette!" he comforted her. "'Tis not love as you understand it but rather something else that only the good God understands, the mystery of the ages, the riddle of the Sphinx. Know, then, that on Wednesday last as I was strolling—for my health alone!—near the Church of Notre Dame, watching the good folk enter, suddenly, I felt myself caught up to Heaven, and I saw—the loveliest she alive beneath the sun. She saw me no more than the pave aneath her little foot, but I saw her, and I see her now, and I shall see her in all the dreams I dream till it comes my time to die! It was not that her hair was so much brighter than the sun, or that her eyes were bluer than the blue overhead, or that her little mouth was redder than the roses in the King's garden; it was something else — a soul that peeped from her eyes, a God-knows-what that made her the queen among women. The sight of her beauty hurt my eyes, the taste of her beauty burnt my lips, and the ache of her beauty troubled my heart, and she passed me by, unseeing and entered the church, and I stumbled away drunk with a headier wine than you have in your rotting bins, Master Robin. And," he groaned, and mocked the groan with a jangle of laughter, "I think I shall be drunken with her all my days."

"I was standing near the church of Notre Dame when suddenly I felt myself caught up to heaven and I saw—the loveliest she alive beneath the sun."

"Why didn't you follow her into church and get near her in the crowd and pinch her?" queried Colin, sleepily; "I like not your tale, Francois. It has an ill sound in ears that ring with hunger. Love! Balderdash! Oh, for a roll of sausage—" and he looked greedily toward the cloaked figure drinking a sedate noggin in the corner.

At that moment, as tho summoned, the figure rose and moved toward them. "Is there among you a braggadocio ruffian, a loose-tongued fellow known as Francois Villon?" asked a voice from under the concealing hat brim, "if so I have a word for him."

"At your service, good Cuffin!" bowed Villon, airily. "Your description fits me an ill cloak, and I like not the cut of it, but never mind. Has your word the ring of metal?"

The stranger glanced about the circle of wolfish faces, and apparently decided they were birds of a feather. "It has," he answered surlily, "the sound of a thousand francs to one who can do a simple errand."

"For a thousand francs," smirked Villon, "I would carry a message to the devil himself. Out with it, friend! What's to do?"

"Only this," said the newcomer, lowering his voice, "as you know, the Duke of Burgundy besieges Paris and King Louis Do-Nothing sits idly by, willing his people should starve. But some there are of us this likes not, and we want a trusty messenger to carry word," he regarded Villon watchfully, "to Burgundy that the defence of the city is a pitiful myth, that there is no wall but may be carried, that the army dices, and the Court dances and there is nothing in the way of his entering whenever he wills!"

"Ouch!" Villon gave a sudden cry as if of pain and clapped his hand to his side; "I have a cramp—in my sword! It needs exercise!" He drew it, and flourished it fantastically above his ragged head. "It is a French blade, fellow, and thirsty to drink the blood of a traitor!"

Like a frightened hen, the man in the cloak scuttled across the room, and the door-erased him. A murmur of discontent rose among the fellows of the Cockleshell. "You fling away a thousand francs glibly, Francois," grumbled Rene, "who'd have suspected you of such a tender conscience? And what difference does it make to you who sits on the throne of France?"

Villon sheathed his sword. "'Tis a whim of mine," he confessed, half ashamedly, "to be loyal. There's no accounting for whims, but I'll not let mine rob you of your supper. Come! The good moon has drawn a curtain across her window like a tidy housewife and the world's adark. I know a church chest waits us, bursting with spoils pilfered from the pockets of the poor. Let's be gone, what say you, Hearts of Gold?"

It was a windy night, the gusts rushing down the little crooked lanes, setting the shop signs creaking, and the lanterns

(Thirty-one)

"Hist!" waved Villon, "one comes!"

flaring overhead. The Fellows of the Cockleshells slunk along the streets like shadows cast by the moon, and without accident eluding the watch, arrived at length at the church. "Ods blood!" then swore Rene de Montigny, softly; "but the fellow's brought us to the chapel of His Majesty!"

"Who better?" whispered Villon, gaily; "one goes for riches where riches are. Does one seek poultry in a draper's? To work!"

A hasp on a window at the side was loose and Colin, who despite his flabbiness, could twist a bar of iron as it had been cheese, snapped it in two. Pell-mell into the dark interior hurtled the pilferers with as much éclat as tho thievery were not a hanging matter, and Villon followed them. The chest was soon located, its contents distributed among the several jerkins which closed over the yellow metal cosily. Then, as they were about to leave, Villon held up a warning hand. "Hist!" he muttered, "one comes!"

A gleam of a torch pricked the darkness of the chancel. The intruders shrank into the shadows as a woman's figure rayed about with a nimbus of light paused at the altar and motioned the attendant with the torch away. "Wait me outside," said a voice, like the deep tones of a bell, and hearing it, Villon gave a great start, and forgetful of caution leaned to look down at her. "God in Heaven!" he muttered, "'tis she!"

There in the darkness the five rogues listened to a woman's prayer, a prayer for the safety of France which was dearer to her than her heart's blood, a prayer that a weak King might be given strength—or "that a man should come to court" and rouse the painted puppets to be men. Only one of the eavesdroppers gave the words much heed, chafing to be gone and taste the sweet fruits of their thievery. When at last the white figure had trailed down the aisle, Rene de Montigny prodded Villon's side.

"Come, let's be off!" he muttered, "before another wench comes a-praying!"

A ray of the moon, prying thru a shutter, fell across Villon's face, showing it aflame! His fellows stared curiously, as tho they hardly knew him, but Villon gave them no heed. "A man would come to court!" echoed Villon, with a great longing shaking his voice into rags and tatters of sound. "Now if there be a God, how He must be laughing! A nincompoop upon the throne, and a gutter rat with the spirit of a king! If I were the king of France—" His head rocked back on his shoulders, he spoke as one inspired in his beloved rhyme—

"We want a chief to bear the brand—
 And bid the damned Burgundians dance—
 God! Where the oriflamme should stand
 If Villon were the King of France—"

In flaming measures he poured his heart into the words, the wild, untamed, heart of Villon the rascal, beating beneath the rags of shame and terrified by the sound of approaching feet his friends fled from him, diving from the windows with their spoils, bent on saving their skin whole. In the vestibule, a small crooked figure in a velvet doublet, with silken hose sheathing his lean shanks listened, and smiled with wry, thin lips. "A braggart, mouthing easy nothings!" Louis of France murmured to his entourage, "still—the fellow has fire in him. Get him, and bring him to me!"

Dazed, Villon saw himself suddenly surrounded with pikes and the flash of steel, he whipped out his poor blade but too late.

Louis looked down at the wretched huddle of limbs they brought him, and laughed softly. "An ill-looking bird, but he croaks like an eagle. Thibault has gone over to Burgundy and the post of the Grand Constable is empty—take him in, wash and dress him in fine linen and lay him on Thibault's bed. When he comes to himself address him as Grand Constable! We shall see whether he has aught can match his bravery of tongue!"

And so it happened that on the morrow, Francois Villon opened his eyes upon purple draperies and tapestried walls, upon servile faces bowing about his bed, upon gold lace and velvet and plumed hat laid by ready for his donning. "'Tis a monstrous fine dream, at any rate," he murmured, as he was helped to dress, "if I might dream a few gold pieces in my pocket now—"

He thrust his fingers into the wallet at his belt and drew them out full of coins. He raised his eyes and beheld in the mirror before him not the scarecrow figure of yesterday, but a gallant gentleman, barbered, freshly shaven, carrying his fine plumage easily and well.

"His Gracious Majesty the King to speak with the Grand Constable on affairs of state," intoned a voice at the door. The small, crooked figure in black velvet waved his attendants away. He regarded the transformed thief, and sniggered. "Welladay, my good Constable!" shrilled Louis, "I trust you have found all to your taste? We are but humble folk at Vaucelles; you must overlook our failings."

Villon fell upon shaking knees and touched his lips to the hem of the black robe. "Sire!" he choked, "Sire, I know not what to say!"

"Yet last night you were at no loss," chirped the king; "you had a mouthful of fine words and boasts as to what you would do if you were France's king!" His tone grew sharp, his smile more malign; "I have decided to give you an opportunity to make good your words—if you can. For one week you shall be the Grand Constable of France in very sooth. You shall do as you will and drive Burgundy from our gates if you can. Afterwards," the thin lips sneered, the small cold eyes twinkled up at him, "afterwards your final act as Grand Constable will be to pronounce sentence of death upon one Master Francois Villon, scapegrace and ne'er-do-well, provided that in that week you have not made good your words and won the heart of the Lady Katherine of Vaucelles, proudest lady of the court, and hardest to win!" The wry smile became a cackling laugh. "Egad, it would serve Katherine well to have flouted me and to pin her faith to this thing of rags and tatters!" chuckled Louis.

Villon was very white, but his eyes glowed. "Is that the only choice, Sire?"

"Louis made a contemptuous gesture. "Oh, no, you may don your vile rags and go back to your gutter this moment if you choose a longer lifetime of lying in the mud rather than a week of sitting among the stars."

Villon bent his head. The sunshine was pure gold across the floor at his feet, the air was soft with roses. Life was very sweet even to a poor rogue of a rhymster—yet, to play a man's part for a week—to be near his Lady, to speak with her as an equal, to woo her perhaps—

He bowed low. "I have chosen the week, Sire," he said quietly, "if I cannot make good use of it I would rather die than live longer to hate myself."

Of the strange, wondrous days that followed, there is no space to tell. Francois Villon, Francois Villon caught the slim white hands with a great cry. "You would do that for me?" he asked

'gutter-born, found himself at no loss among the great lords and ladies of the court. Even when Katherine of Vaucelles bent her shining head to him and spoke in the tone she used toward the king himself, his lips fell into the courtly phrases of compliment and badinage, tho his heart beat to suffocation with great joy and great pain. And the hours sped across the sundial in the castle garden, and still Burgundy crouched without the gates.

Then came a herald, bearing insolent words. "Surrender Paris or taste of our guns!" Louis the King listened, small, weazened face inscrutable, while the court chafed under the insult of the message and the messenger's bearing. "My Grand Constable will give you our answer," said the King, calmly. "He knows our heart, and our will."

Francois Villon rose to his feet, in his soul a great humbleness, in his eyes a flame. He had dreamed always of great deeds that he would do, and now great deeds were possible to him. He spoke with his lips to the herald, with his heart to Katherine. "Go back to your master!"

he bade the messenger, "and take him this word from the lips of France Herself. Defiance for defiance, menace for menace, blow for blow! This is our answer"—and he drew his sword and flashed it aloft. "God and Saint Denis for the King of France!"

Up sprang the perfumed courtiers, dragging their sleeping blades from silken sheaths, the air was full of their flashing and the sound of cheers. His words had burned away the painted threads of lassitude that had enmeshed their man-

Erich Von Stroheim and the Miracle

"Perhaps it was your splendid acting in the rôle of the hated German officer in various pictures that helped prejudice the public," I remarked. "I confess that your subtleties made me long to see your punishment several times."

"What could I do?" he replied. "The moment a director saw me I was immediately cast in that rôle. I played it in 'The Unbeliever,' 'For France,' 'Hearts of the World,' 'The Hun Within,' and in 'The Heart of Humanity.' Probably I could never have given such a villainous characterization in the latter picture had I not been conscious of the hatred which every member of the cast felt for me. I sensed their antipathy so distinctly that it was reflected in my acting and I put into the rôle just what they were thinking of me.

Erich Von Stroheim went thru painful privation when he first came to America from Austria. In those days of frayed collars and run-down heels he engaged in every possible occupation, except bartender and waiter

"It was after a disagreeable affair that my father thought the American climate would be good for me and he sent me over for five years, I doubt if I shall ever go back.

"During the years of

"It is like a miracle! I can hardly yet believe it. After so many struggles with heavy odds against me, to have at last become a director—well, as I say, it is like a miracle!" And while Erich von Stroheim smiled, the eyes remained serious. The memory of those struggles is not readily effaced.

There is a saying about the motion picture studios that in every life there is at least one good scenario. If this be true, Mr. von Stroheim has a dozen stowed away behind those serious eyes, for during his 32 years he has touched the dramatic contrasts of life that develops the emotional powers and he has—lived!

Before meeting him I had been told that he was by birth Count von Stroheim, of the Austrian nobility, his father having been a colonel in the Austrian army, and he himself a graduate from the War College of that country in 1905.

When I asked Mr. von Stroheim about these early years he shook his head, saying, "Titles mean nothing." I gave up mine for I am an American citizen.

"This American citizen had a hard time during the war, however," he continued, as we lingered over our sandwiches in the little café at the Universal City studios. It was long past the usual lunch hour and the room was deserted.

"My name, my face, in fact, my whole Austrian make up was against me. I was shunned and disliked. At one time I was even under observation, but about six weeks before the armistice was signed I was offered a commission in the Intelligence Department of the United States Government. I had served four years in the U. S. Army when I first came over ten years ago."

run-down heels and frayed collar bands I engaged in every possible occupation, except bartender and waiter, to keep from starving. Oh, yes, I was often hungry. I recall that once in New York I didn't have one cent and was miles from my lodging in Brooklyn. I stood by a subway entrance determined to ask someone for a nickel; I had frequently helped others, but I didn't have the nerve and walked home after all.

"Struggles are all right to look back upon, but so far I derive little pleasure in contemplating mine, they are still too recent to have gained any glamour. I came from a fighting family, however, and I fought my way thru every inch."

Whatever the battles, Mr. von Stroheim has finally emerged not only as an actor of subtle force, displaying the rare ability to sink one's personality into the rôle he is playing, but he has achieved a signal success as a director, for his first picture, "Blind Husbands," places this young man among the foremost directors of the day. This may well be termed a personal triumph for not only did he direct the production but he wrote the story, under title of "The Pinnacle," and acted one of the prominent rôles.

"It was Mr. Laemmle who gave me my chance," Mr. von Stroheim replied, when I congratulated him. "He came west just as we were finishing 'The Heart of Humanity.' Meeting him, I told him what I wanted to do and he said to go ahead. I still feel it is a miracle, four months ago I little dreamed my chance was so near."

It was after a series of hardships during which he had tried everything, from writing a vaudeville sketch and playing it on the Orpheum Circuit, to being Life Saver at Lake Tahoe (with the unlucky number of 313) that he broke into pictures.

Being down and out but still determined, he walked over to the Griffith studio in Hollywood every day for two months and waited around the outside, hoping to attract someone's attention.

One day John Emerson, who was playing a rôle in Ibsen's "Ghosts," stepped out of the studio in his evening clothes with a ribbon across his breast. "For the first time in my life I was nervy," observed Mr. von Stroheim. "I stepped up, told him my name and asked if he was playing comedy or drama. When he said drama, and that the ribbon was a badge or decoration of a Chamberlain, I told him it was not correct. 'What do you know about it?' he asked. I replied that it was too long a story to tell

The Director-Diplomatic

By MARY KEENE

YOU are accustomed to see, or at least to think, of a director in more or less stereotyped attitudes and atmospheres; poring distractedly over scripts; scrambling about on location; searching for said location; overlooking sets; all the usual rest of it.

I saw Edward José differently.

Had I not known the nature of my mission, had I been ushered, wholly unprepared, into the spacious tranquil room overlooking the Hudson and cast mine eyes, all unprepared, upon the stalwart, picturesque gentleman with the intent eyes and the courtly, other-world bearing, clad in a Burgundy silk lounging attire and writing at a huge carved mahogany desk I might have made several guesses as to his pursuit in life, and several would have been wrong. Asked what he did in the world's work—and that he did something would be quite obvious—I think I should have hazarded: "Why, he's a foreign diplomat. Or an emissary from some court." I might have ventured, "He's an actor—of the stamp of Sothorn and Mansfield." I don't think I should have called him a director. I can hardly say why.

I found him as diplomatic as his appearance conjectured. Quite charmingly so. He has a fine discrimination in giving his point of view and in keeping it. He is a man pre-eminently fitted to direct because there is always a deep reserve fund within himself of power, of thought, of feeling.

He is wholly void of personal egotism. So much so that I found it very hard to keep him to the topic of the hour—himself. He talked readily and egrossingly on many things—on the absurdity, for instance, of the individual pitting himself or herself against tradition; against world-old laws and orders. "It is inevitable destruction," he said. "Take marriage, for example. The scenario I am doing now deals with the revolt of a woman against the sacrament of marriage. She loses thruout—of course. What does one case of unhappiness, or two or three, or as many dozen, prove? What have you and I to do with what has been ordained from the beginning?"

I had come, however, to hear him talk about himself, and if it had not been for the gentle interpolations of Mrs. José who sat sewing in the adjoining room, I should certainly have gone away with the charm of his indubitable personality about me, but wholly, too, without Joséan information.

Just as a beginner I asked him what he considered the requisite of a truly great director. It is the prize question.

He shrugged his shoulders, elevated his brows, threw up his hand and took a few steps about the room in what I discovered to be a characteristic way.

"If I say," he said finally, "people will think I speak of, or from, or about myself. It will sound too . . . well, too egotistic. It is better that I do not say at all."

The Cinema Comes to Carleton

By HARRIETTE UNDERHILL

WILLIAM CARLETON, JR., laid the corn muffin which he was buttering down on his plate, looked at us seriously and said, "You are right—there is!"

Now William, Jr., is a mild-mannered man and he is particularly fond of corn muffins, so we knew something untoward was egging him on to this display of fierceness and this renunciation of his beloved viands.

"You are right, there is a fly in the ointment. I dont like cinema field days—community acting, if you know what I mean."

"But we dont know," we murmured, outwardly timid, but secretly exultant, because we sensed a story. "What is community acting? Something to inspire good fellowship, like community singing?"

"Yes," answered Mr. Carleton, still gloomily regarding his neglected muffin; "something like community singing, only not so sweet and I cant say that it is particularly conducive to good fellowship—in me, at any rate."

"And what are cinema field days?"

"The same, only more protracted."

And all this because we had inadvertently asked Mr. Carleton if there was not a single fly in his syrup of contentment.

"Never mind," we soothed, "you needn't tell us what community acting is and we can live if we dont know what cinema field days are. Dont excite yourself and we'll talk about birds and flowers."

"No we wont; we'll talk about cinema field days," for William Carleton, Jr., can be a "majerful" man when he wishes. "If it wasn't for them, life in front of the camera would be one sweet song. But people never can be induced to believe that we make motion pictures because it is our profession. They firmly believe that we do it for their delectation. Have you ever made exteriors in a popular summer resort? No, of course you haven't—I forgot."

"Well, you needn't be so superior," we replied. "We have had three offers, but we dont like to work so hard."

"Well, community acting is when the whole community decides to take part in the picture. Cinema field days are those awful days when mothers gather on the site which has been selected for the exteriors for your new picture, bringing with them numerous little Cutberts and Cedrics who, they fondly hope, will be the picture heroes of the next generation.

"You select a nice secluded spot back of a stone wall for your dressing room. You find a hollow tree evidently placed there by providence to be your make-up table. You work for an hour in the sun. Then the director will say, 'All ready for this scene! Carleton, your nose is shiny. Better touch up your make-up!' and you rush away to your nice secluded dressing room to find an angel-faced, flaxen-haired child digging in your box of powder with a stick. His face is daubed with your grease paint. Mamma sits nearby reading. You take your cherished possessions away from him, get out your mirror preparatory to holding it up to nature and proceed to touch up your make-up. Cutbert stands wild-eyed. 'Mamma,' he shouts, 'come and see the man putting powder on his nose just like you do!' or, if you carry your make-up with you and hide it under a stone, when you return you'll surely find some coy belle of '84 in a picture hat using your powder puff and mirror. It never fails."

"Poor dear," we murmured, "the subject is evidently a painful one. Tell us some more."

"Well, there isn't going to be any community acting in 'The Copperhead.' That is the picture I am working in now with Lionel Barrymore. Charlie Maigne has made me a deputy sheriff and I am going to wear a 'tin star' and everything just like a regular one. So when the people gather on the field for the ceremonies, as they surely will—10,000 strong, I suppose, to see a real Barrymore, I can order them back and flash my badge and be real impressive."

"Did Mr. Maigne select you as a minion of the law because you are six feet two?" we asked. "And important-looking."

By FAITH SERVICE

Just now, rankling virulently, was the girl in the Zangicamo orchestra, lately arrived from Eastern ports and stopping a few weeks at the hotel en route for California

In his very early days Baron Heyst had been badly battered and mauled by life . . . there had been a great many things . . . it had not seemed able to let him be. With the passing of his youth passed, too, his faith. He drew, as it were, an enveloping cape about him and stood aloof, mocking thru badly twisted lips.

"The thing to do," he told his son, shortly before he came to die, "is to do nothing. Only by establishing an absolute negation of attitude are you safe. Do not attempt, either, to be anything. Be in the world, because to remove yourself from it involves an infringement of negation, of all infringements the greatest . . . but be not of it. Stand apart. Live apart. Say little and condemn, inevitably, all that you hear said. If you evolve philosophies, the rabble, swine all of them, will still go nosing for truffles. If you ponder the philosophies of others you will become evolved. Establish an absolute negation."

To establish a negation was not peculiarly hard for Axel Heyst. Curiously, he had never believed very vitally in his own identity, in his own essential existence. He had been, to himself, a shade 'walking among shades . . . he had established no contacts . . . there had been vague persons . . . even his father with his detached bitterness, so detached, indeed, as not to be bitterness at all, but only a wraith of other days, still shrouded. There had been vague events . . . and many books . . . and travels . . . seen, as it were, thru a haze, darkly . . . nothing had been real, ever. Nothing had given any stabbing joy. Nothing had given any driven pain. There had been no palpable sense of discomfort, nor yet the glow of any substantial comfort.

After his father's death, Axel Heyst left London. He had read of the South Seas and they called to him. There, he thought, on those deep lulling waters, among those drugging scents and thick strong sounds, one might, like mammoth lazy birds, wheel away one's time, suspended between, literally and figuratively, earth and heaven.

One could readily establish negation with the natives. There could be no possible other stand. There would be no intrusions. Things would not happen. There would be no women. Not that Axel thought of women in the way of intruders. Actually, he did not think of them at all. He knew that part of his father's philosophy had had to do with woman's component part in the some sort of a chapter had been shut down, a seal affixed. Axel Heyst roamed five years among the islands of the South Seas, drugging himself with a sweet narcotism, not so much waking as sleeping. There had been no intrusions . . .

There had been passing dusky faces . . . barbaric sounds and smells . . . lagoons like fluid souls . . . endless blue waters . . . endless gold shores . . . endless sailings . . . coming and goings . . . nowhere . . . to no purpose . . . the world did not knock at his door . . . He might have been his father, entombed, for all life had of him, or he of life . . .

Then, as abruptly as poetry might turn to prose and almost as shockingly, he fell in with Morrison. Morrison was mere man. He didn't know anything about negations. You couldn't have established the abstract fact of negation in his head by any sort of means. He was utterly the positivist. He had a passion, too. A ruling one. An overruling one. It was for his trading brig, the "Capricorn." Morrison had been born on the Capricorn. He had grown up on her, with her, body and soul. He had got his life and his livelihood from her. She was living tissue to him. He had a tremendous sentiment for her, a feeling composed of tissue and blood. He had sailed the Java sea on her and now, it seemed, in the port of Timor, because he had no cash, some irregular had been found in his papers and the Portuguese officials were going to impose a fine he couldn't pay on him, arrest his brig and, at the expiration of the week, knowing the fine was beyond him, sell her at auction. Sell the Capricorn . . . It was like the sacrilegious sale, the sacrilegious public sale of some beloved woman . . .

Morrison was in the throes when he ran into Heyst. He was too terribly in the throes to take notice of anything different cosmos. And then, with the beginning of the bitterness, woman's part had been ruled out of the philosophy and Baron Heyst had expatriated himself from his native Sweden and about Heyst. He was just someone to pour out his heart to . . . his big heart, which was breaking.

It was a sort of a vandalism, after a fashion. Morrison was a sort of a, no, distinctly, a vandal of dreams. He thrust his heavy, hob-nailed boot into the delicate aloofness of Heyst's absolute negation. He showed him a bare heart, a rugged piece of suffering, easily averted.

Heyst was shocked. Of course, he felt at once, the Capricorn could not be sold at auction. He sensed the tragedy there, immediately. Sensed, too, somehow, remotely, the clamor of resistance Morrison was making.

Consummately and very delicately, he made it possible for Morrison to pay his fine and assure the safety of the Capricorn. He turned away before the sight of the big man's heaving joy. It was somehow cataclysmic. The primitive forces in the man slept, or dozed, so close to the surface that one felt the sense of an upheaval of nature in his emotions, forces . . .

"I'll tell you what," said Morrison, after he had released Heyst's sensitive fingers from his blunted ones; "I cant do enough for you. I cant, for a fact. I . . . but what I can do . . . I'll let you in . . . there's coal on the island of Samburan. I happen to know . . . come closer . . . hearkye . . . that's how I know. I've been waiting . . . for the right man. You're him, Mr. Heyst. You're him. You are, for a fact. There's a fortune. A fortune. There is, for a fact. Here's the details. . . ."

Three hours later, Heyst said all right. He didn't know why he had said all right; why he had agreed. It wasn't in accordance—it wasn't in accordance at all with the utter detachment preached him by his father. He couldn't see why this huge crude man should break thru the delicate, impalpable, yet very potent doorway between himself and the rest of the world. His had been a huge fist knocking . . . knocking smashing sorts of blows . . . he had, it seemed, battened things down. Heyst was conscious of a tingling in his veins. After all, perhaps, outside the thick blue haze shot thru with dreamy gold in which he had lived and had his separate being, after all, there were men who wept immense tears over the threatened loss of a grubby trading schooner; to whom these staple things of life meant breathing and being. Odd sort of a surmise, but probably true after a limited fashion . . .

And then, it had occurred, even to Heyst, that to dream one must have money. Dreams, even, are quite costly. One must pay, it seemed, to float about on the South Seas watching the curious native life thru half-closed eyes. This coal mine of Morrison's . . . it could be got thru with and then he. Heyst, amply supplied for endless dreaming, could go back . . .

But one doesn't go back, it seems . . .

Morrison went to London to float the company and in London he died. There was too much fog there, perhaps—the details were never made very explicit. But he died. And when Heyst heard of the big man's death he felt precisely as tho someone had given him a crude rent with a knife. A most unthinkable thing.

Before he died, however, it seemed that Morrison had been successful in forming the company. Heyst found himself nominated manager and with the mushroom growth of such enterprises coolies were imported, engineers arrived from London, bungalows sprang up, a gallery was driven into the productive hillside and coal in vast quantities was taken out. Heyst had felt quite excited up to the actual time of the mining. There was something, he thought, in the nature of a gigantic dream about it all. He felt detached from it, interested, immensely interested, but as a spectator. He missed Morrison. Morrison had a fresh salt tang. There had been an invigoration to Morrison powerful enough to pierce the veil of Heyst's dreaming. Now Morrison was gone and the old lethargy was creeping about him again. His father had been right . . . detachedness . . . all this . . . what did it amount to?

Shortly thereafter the company went into liquidation and Heyst was left alone on Samburan with his chinaman, Wang. He was content to stay. He had his pipe and the bungalow had been fixed to suit him. He rather thought he would stay on . . . indefinitely . . . he was at peace. On the other islands, when he had gone to and from while the mining was on active process, there had been nasty talk back and forth. Schomberg, the big German who kept the hotel on Sourabaya, seemed absolutely to hate him. This seemed absurd to Heyst, who had never hated as he had never loved, a living soul. Schomberg, it seemed, accused him, with equal absurdity of an absurd thing. He had used Morrison, Schomberg alleged, had even been responsible in some occult way for Morrison's death. There had been mysterious dealings . . . hidden wealth . . . Heyst laughed at it, silently, after his fashion, yet it was, he thought, as tho something gaseous, noxious alloyed, unpleasantly, a trade wind from the south, spiced and aromatic . . . It was certainly negative on Samburan. He was forgotten by the world. In his turn, he too, forgot .

When, finally, there came an occasion for him to go to Sourabaya on some sort of a final transaction for the liquidated company he had forgotten along with other things, the dead Morrison and his own brief days of activity, the hatred of Schomberg.

He remembered it when the bearded German glared at him and spat a reluctant consent to his registration at Schomberg's Hotel. The Englishman with the woman's eyes didn't know of Schomberg's hatred . . . Schomberg himself was rather indefinite as to the original source . . . he only knew that he had a deep antipathy for Heyst . . . that his fingers twitched for him and his mouth watered in contemplation of cruelties he might inflict .

Heyst's odd presence inflamed the hatred. Schomberg wanted to talk about it, wanted to plot and plan about it, wanted to allay it. He had wandered on this desert of his detestation long enough. He was parched.

He couldn't talk to Mrs. Schomberg. The woman had sympathies, despicable trait. Her sympathies, tho, were never for him, for Schomberg. For him she entertained some sort of a primitive passion which did nothing save preclude him from such other, infrequent and diverse pleasures as might chance his way. An occasional native, now . . . Mrs. Schomberg had no sympathies for him . . .

Just now, rankling virulently, was the girl in the Zangiciamo Orchestra, lately arrived from Eastern ports and stopping a few weeks at the hotel en route for California.

The girl was different from most people, from almost all the women who came to Sourabaya. She was white, that was one thing, dead white. She was whiter than the whitest flower ever stained with native blood. And her hair was like gold, like the sun that pours like heavy brass, all liquid, over Sourabaya. Her eyes, now, they were blue, sea-blue and sky-blue. She wore a blue uniform, too. Schomberg had a passion, probably Prussian, for uniforms. This one was a particularly taking blue uniform and it matched her eyes. It was adorned with copious brass buttons and considerable gold braid. It fitted her trimly and gave evidence, delicately, of soft, very young lines. She moved gently, too, and rarely spoke.

It was horrible to have the automatic, seldom sympathetic Mrs. Schomberg perpetually between them. It was maddening, like a red banner waved eternally before an inflamed bull. There were so many ways of disposing of automatons on Sourabaya . . .

When Heyst came he listened, the first night, to the Zangiciamo Orchestra. He didn't know why he went in, and once in, he knew still less why he stayed in. The discord, of course, was quite obvious, and outside the sea was murmuring, almost restfully . . . and there was a low sky, all weighted down with depending stars . . . there was a trade wind . . . thickly spiced . . . Heyst had felt a little dizzy . . .

After the Zangiciamo Orchestra had done he knew why he stayed. He stayed because the very white girl in the impossible uniform stayed, solitarily, on the platform, immediately abandoned by the other members of the Lady Orchestra and by Zangiciamo himself. She seemed to Heyst to be shrinking, up there on the platform. She wasn't looking at him, either. On the contrary she seemed to be trying very hard not to look at anybody at all, as tho she were fearful to.

Of course, following the absolute negation, Heyst knew that he should go out at once, lose himself in the night, let it consume him. But he had noticed her as the Lady Orchestra played, vaguely, but still . . . she had had a luminous quality . . . she had seemed to shine softly, faintly, like some fragment of a fallen, drifted moon . . . It occurred to Heyst that she was the loneliest thing he had ever seen. He had always, heretofore, thought that of himself, thought that indigenous to himself. It was a new thought, wholly new. Just as Morrison had been a new thought, Morrison who could weep and wring tremendous hands over the loss of a sailing brig, run with rats and smelling of rope and tar.

Heyst approached the girl and from behind the bar Schomberg glared and chewed his beard, his mustache, his chin itself.

Schomberg had had three new guests the day before and until this instant he had felt some sort of a clammy fear of them. One gets fears of that nature on the South Sea Islands. One of the guests had registered himself as Mr. Jones. That was simple and unfeared enough, certainly, but Mr. Jones belied his name. He had a horrible air of a recent gravel. Schomberg swore to his wife, pinching her the while he mouthed his fears, that there was the smell of grave-mould on this Jones. Ghouls had disinterred him, avowed Schomberg in part, and he had drifted here. The ghouls, he thought, were his two companions, Ricardo, an ex-seaman with a smell of fresh blood about him, and Pedro, their Venezuelan servant with fifty devils in his eyes and a smile cruel enough to congeal the blood Ricardo might well be expected to spill.

Tonight, tho, Schomberg saw the three horrors he was housing in a different light. That they were bent on human death he was convinced. Plain Mr. Jones had been unearthed from some unholy grave and now he, in his turn, was about to destroy and to raise up. Suppose that Schomberg told them about Heyst, over on Samburan, and about the death of Morrison and the hidden treasure. Suppose they left his hotel, these somehow terrible three, and went to seek out Heyst . . . Schomberg crept up to the corridor where the three occupied three lordly rooms. He whispered to them thru the evil hours until the dawn, sickly, turned to bannered splendor. Now and again he rubbed his hands violently together and mopped his brow. The pale proximity of the plain Mr. Jones beaded him with agues of cold sweat.

The second night, too, Heyst waited for the white girl, who waited, too. On the second night she talked to him. Oddly, he had the dawning feeling that a human being was talking to another human being. Always, before this, he had thought a human being was talking to a shade, soon would sense this to be so, soon would chill and draw away.

Tonight, with this girl, it was different; how he could not say, did not want to say. She did not draw away, either. They walked on the curving half moon of the white beach along the edge of a lagoon within whose calm transparent breast a single star shivered, yet remained . . .

She told him about herself. Her mother, who wore a great deal of jewelry and then was kind, or who wore none and was rather terribly cruel, who spent a great deal of time out, grew very tired of walking . . . pavements being hard . . . Of her father whose name her mother was vague on and so, in consequence, was she. He had been a gentleman she said, her mother had told her she was certain of that, as certain as certain . . . a gentleman, she could bank on that . . . that nebulous fact, it seemed, was alone substantial in an insubstantial world thru which this child had drifted, white like a fragment of a moon . . . Her mother had died, after coughing a great deal . . . somehow she had got this job with Zangiciamo . . . and she was here and she was very much afraid . . . Zangiciamo and Schomberg were like two maddened dogs, it seemed; she the pitiful bleached small bone between the pair of them . . . She didn't know . . .

On the third night he waited on the curve of the beach for her. When she came, she came flying. "Oh, take me away with you!" she begged, her breast torn like the wings of a bird, "take me away. Take me away! I'll work for you. I'll live for you and die for you. I wont ever bother you, any. I wont . . . I wont . . ."

It was like, even tho unlike, Morrison again . . . something battering . . . this time something soft . . . it occurred to Heyst freshly that he was a man . . . that the world about him was made up of two component parts . . . man and woman . . . fundamentally, inescapably . . . and that he was, he, Axel Heyst, was the man and this white girl clinging to him, was the woman . . .

He took her with him to Samburan, escaping that night, with the help of Mrs. Schomberg, only too glad to be rid of her, and Davidson who passed to and fro on his schooner and had done sundry small services for Heyst in the past.

She made a difference in the bungalow on the island. Heyst admitted that almost at once. It seemed to him, unobtrusively, as tho the house were flower-filled, even while he knew that it was not. Everything seemed softer and, at the same time, sharper. He, himself, seemed to be somehow quickened. Things were more acute, possessed more significance; daily things such as the eating of meals, the drinking of tea before dusk, dinner by candle light. Heretofore they had been things to be got thru with, generally with a newspaper propped before his plate. Now . . . now he liked to linger over each detail of each one of them . . . there were her hands to watch, daily miracles, her eyes catching, holding, giving forth to him, again and again, new and amazing lights. Her talk . . . all to him. Suppose she should ever talk in the same way to any other person, to any other man. He knew, with his newly awakening self, that he wouldn't like that. And then, clothes, and, if he happens to be in "the speakies," it even influences his diction. If the truth were recognized, it would be seen that mentally, at least, he frequently goes on playing it forever.)

-Think over all the players, both of the stage and screen, whose work you have followed and see if you can pick out the character or scene that they love the best. Frequently, you will find it very easy. You must use your detective powers, however. No true artist ever repeats a favorite scene or a favorite character in all of its details. But it will creep out; as is the case with all true love, they cannot help but show it. Even the very versatile Edith Storey has a love of this kind hidden behind her many distinct and perfect characterizations. If you watch her closely, you may see it there; a persistent suggestion of the Egyptian, in her clothes, her dry quiet humor, her enigmatic smile. Her favorite part was in "Dust of Egypt," a comedy made by the Vitagraph Company about four years ago.

"It was so entirely different from anything I have ever done that every moment of it was a pleasure," she said (she had on a dress of lavender striped organdie at the time. Later when the photographer saw her, she had on a different dress but it was striped, just the same).

The most noticeable thing about Edith Storey is her sincerity. She has the most exquisite sense of humor and her viewpoint on life is a very lovely one, indeed. "I am a regular tomboy," she explains. "My brother and I are the best pals in the world"

"In the beginning of the picture, I was an Egyptian princess. Nothing could stand in the way of my getting anything I wanted. I could take it or have it brought to me. My will was law absolute. And then this Princess died and her mummy came to life in the present century. (In the end it turns out that she was the creature of a dream).

HAVE you ever stopped to think how many different kinds of love affairs there are? But of course you have; everyone does at some time or other! There is, for instance, puppy love that doesn't last, and Indian summer love, that doesn't last either. There is the love of the leading man for the leading woman (on the screen)—and the love of the leading woman for the leading man (who is usually a member of some other company) off of it and this lasts—sometimes. But there is one love that lasts thru life and beyond, and that is the love of a player for his, or her, favorite part.

"Her surroundings were no longer regal, but the princess had not changed in the least. She wants to use a certain table as a couch. It is loaded with beautiful things, but she just brushes them off—(Miss Storey illustrated with a non-chalant gesture)—and orders a bear rug that she fancies brought to her.

"The sub-titles were so good, too.

"Without being in the least conscious that she is saying anything unusual, the Princess remarks to her host, speaking of his wife, 'The Woman is old and ugly; why dont you send her away and get a younger one?' A man interferes with some little thing her Highness wants done and she deliberately attempts to stab him But always she is possessed of a deep inward sense of her dignity as a princess

Perhaps the most noticeable thing about Edith Storey is her sincerity. She has a dry, quiet way of talking, her voice is low, rather "husky" perhaps, and even in tone, but never monotonous. She has brown hair, with the prettiest possible little wave in it, and large oval-shaped brown eyes.

The first thing you notice about Edith Storey is her deep humanity. She has a gift of fitting in any scene or becoming one of any group of people in any walk of life. The scenes on these two pages show Miss Storey at her California home

"I'm not looking very far ahead, towards any wide or distant horizon," she said; "I like to do the thing that is with me now, in the best possible manner. I like to keep husy. I dont even like to sit still and read unless I am doing it for some definite purpose. I would much rather be outdoors. I love mechanics; I can do almost anything about an automobile down to taking it apart and putting it together again. I am a regular tomboy; my brother and I are the best pals in the world."

Marie: The Mystic

By FRITZI REMONT

Three glimpses of Marie Walcamp at home and motoring. Miss Walcamp, before she gained her success on the screen as a daring cinema serial belle, was a show girl in musical comedy

MARIE WALCAMP will do any sort of stunt so long as she has faith in her director.

And let me whisper: Marie is so sensitive to thought transference that nobody working near her dares think anything that Marie isn't supposed to know.

Now isn't that sensitiveness queer in a girl who is a death-defying, gymnastic wonder?

Miss Walcamp's eyes, change color while you talk to her—from grey to hazel, from hazel to grey. Everything about Marie suggests mysticism. Her smile is inscrutable. No two people know her in the same way. Inwardly, she is perfectly sincere, but outwardly she is as changeable as a chameleon.

She may be happy one moment and somberly reflective the next. She isn't just exactly beautiful, but her great individuality marks her as one having a beautiful soul. She is reserved and likes to spend odd moments in reading and study. At night she usually reads herself into a sleepy mood, then tucks the book away under her pillow so that it can easily be drawn forth the first thing in the morning.

Miss Walcamp has a great deal of humor. You need watch her smile but a moment to be convinced of that. She has a large mouth, with perfect white teeth, slightly overlapping on the upper row, and that is why Marie wont smile often before the camera. Meeting her occasionally, one would not even notice the slight irregularity unless Miss Walcamp mentioned it, for her teeth give one only the impression of wonderful strength, resistance and perfect health. However, serial pictures never require smiles, so perhaps that's why the girl changed from comedy to stunts.

"Did you ever attend a séance?" I asked. I hadn't known about the Anna Eva Fay business up to that time, but Marie's mystic eyes—eyes which make one think of looking thru seven veils and trying to pierce an inner shrine—had given me courage to accuse her of being a psychic.

"Yes, just once. It was in a town far away from here when I was about twelve years old. Mother heard of a spiritualists' meeting and decided that it would be interesting for us to go and get a 'message,' if possible. I had always astonished her by my sudden hunches, and she was more or less interested in psychic phenomena anyway, so she mustered up courage enough to take me. It was her first experience also.

"We sat in a darkened room. I felt delicious thrills of expectancy and just a little shiver of fear. After a silence, the medium said—and oh, oh, he was so funny, with an impediment in his speech—well, he said, 'Thumbuddy kicked my calythes awful hard just then. Does anybody here weckonize that sphthirit?'"

"I forgot all about thrills, fear, spirits and good behavior, because the idea of being kicked on the shins was so irresistibly funny. I laughed and laughed until I almost rolled off my chair, and then it struck mother, too, and she began to suppress giggles, and a man asked us to leave—and we did! So my first and last séance was a real failure and I never tried it again.

I told mother I was sorry we hadn't behaved well, for I did want to see a spirit that had gumption enough to announce its presence in such a forcible way. I always did admire people who had the courage of their convictions, no matter what form they took."

"Do you have hunches about getting hurt when you do stunts?"

"Oh, often. Last week, when Mr. MacGowan was going to throw that block of wood at me, of course, aiming to avoid actually hitting me, I said, 'You are going to hit my head with it.' He said he would aim low and never get near my head. A few minutes later I was almost knocked out by the block! I guess that ought to be the other way around, tho." Again the alluring smile brightened Marie Walcamp's hazel-grey eyes.

"Did you ever play anything along occult lines?"

"Well, you know my coming into the picture; was rather strange. I'll tell you just how I happened to be cast for Bob Leonard's 'The Evil Power,' which was a hypnotic play with a very powerful part in it for me. I certainly loved doing it.

"I was a showgirl with Kolh and Dill and had a great admiration for Laura Oakley, who was their leading woman. Every night I'd go to her dressing-room and watch her make up, glad to get any advice from her as to acting and the show business, or ready to sit quietly by and study her if she rehearsed anything. At that time she was working in pictures as well as with the comedians on the stage.

"One night she suddenly turned to me and said, 'Marie, why dont you try for the pictures? I think you'd make good. You have excellent features for the business.' I said, 'Oh, I dont know; I hardly think I'd have a chance, do you?' She replied, 'Well, nothing like trying. Come out to Universal with me tomorrow and I'll introduce you.'

"Next day I accompanied her early in the morning and was put right into a comedy with Lee and Moran; then I had a chance to work for Mr. Leonard in the occult play; then two pictures with Daddy Turner and 'The Village Blacksmith' with Harry Pollard. I did a great many dramatic leads after that with Otis Turner and Mr. Pollard.

"The first two weeks I worked I earned ninety dollars a week. I simply couldn't believe it. You know what the life of a showgirl means hardly a cent left for necessaries, so much goes for board

The Girl from Out Yonder

Fictionized from the Selznick-Olive Thomas Photoplay

By Dorothy Donnell

"You lost some of your hair, and all of your complexion and one sandal," itemized Flotsam, dispassionately. "I guess that's all. Luckily I happened to be out with the lobster pots." She lifted one foot and scratched the ankle of the other with a bare pink toe in a carefree manner. Like that king of France who replied to a courtier venturing to criticize one of his acts, "I am the State!" Flotsam might have said "Convention? I am Convention!"

Mrs. Reggie Elmer, who had spent a very bad five minutes clinging to an unstable lobster pot and wishing fervently that she had been a better woman, giggled hysterically and made a futile attempt to wring a considerable portion of the Atlantic Ocean out of her salmon colored hair. "If you hadn't come along when you did—" she chattered, "my friends would have been saying, 'how natural she looks' in a day or so! I suppose I am a perfect sight—you haven't a powder puff about you, have you?"

The young person in the baggy corduroy breeches shook her curly brown head. "Nope. I wanted to send for one out of a Sears Roebuck catalog but Fardie wouldn't let me. If you come up to the house you can have some flour, tho. Are you a week-ender or a permanent?"

Mrs. Elmer seemed to be staring thru a lorgnette. It's all very well to have your life saved, and all that but it does put one under obligation to such odd people! "I beg your pardon?" she queried, frostily, "if you mean, am I summer boarder at the Point, no. That is my yacht off the Reef."

Flotsam was serenely unconscious of being snubbed. "I thought I hadn't seen you at the Light," she rejoined, pulling the great oars thru the water with magnificent sweeps of her strong young arms, "we're one of the sights, you know. All the summer folks come out to the Reef in Abe Barrow's motor boat and squeal when they climb up the stairs, and say 'how pictures-que' and 'I suppose its frightfully lonesome winters,' and buy souvenir postcards."

On the rocky ledge they were approaching two figures stood looking out into the dazzle of blue and gold. The one, sinewy, slightly stooping, with grizzled grey showing beneath the oil-skin hat, waved his hand as the dory swept about the ledge. "Thar they be!" he beamed. "I told ye my gal 'ud find her. She's the greatest hand to be pickin' up queer things out of the water, once 'twas a turtle, and once a devil fish and now your Ma!"

"Aunt," corrected his companion with a slight cough. He was a handsome, well-tailored young fellow whom Captain Joe Barton had classified already as "a city toff." Just now his expression was oddly compounded of anxiety, amusement and boredom. Edward Elmer was usually bored. He found the flavor of Life insipid to his tongue, as is usually the plight of those who have never wanted anything they could not have.

"Oh, Eddie!" chattered his aunt, hysterically as she tottered over the side of the boat. "Oh, Eddie, it's a miracle I'm not lying at the bottom of the Atlantic! And after all those expensive swimming lessons I took too! But this water was wetter, or at least it seemed so—it behaved so oddly—and I got a puncture in one of my water wings—oh, Eddie, I have a feeling that when I get around to it I'm going to have hysterics—"

"There, there, Tootles!" her nephew soothed her perfunctorily, patting her upon the back—the infallible masculine remedy for all feminine ills whether of body or soul. But his eyes strayed undutifully from the sodden salmon tinted head upon his shoulder to the quaint little figure dragging the dory up beyond the water line.

Flotsam was small, but her sturdy boy's attire gave her a look anything but frail. She had crisp bronze hair, an audacious tip-tilted nose, a mouth, just a shade too large for classic perfection, not a whit too large for charm, and eyes that, from long gazing had caught the color of the sea, blue and gold, darkening into slate grey when there was a storm brewing. She gazed directly and honestly at Edward Elmer without a trace of the sex-consciousness which a pretty girl usually shows when meeting a good-looking man.

Gasping and giggling, Mrs. Elmer chattered out an introduction and fled up the rocks to the shelter of the light-house for her bathing suit was of the kind that is intended for beach bathing, and likely to dissolve embarrassingly when in contact with water. Captain Barton followed, leaving the two young people alone. Flotsam stood poised on a peak of granite, humming a little song, apparently quite unaware that Convention expected her to make conversation when she had nothing to say. There was nothing uneasy about her silence; it was that of the sea itself, brooding without revealing its soul.

Edward, who was used to girls that chattered, girls that tittered, girls that flirted, girls that gossiped, but not to girls who said nothing at all, found himself suddenly desirous of hearing her speak.

"It was certainly deuced lucky you were out this morning," he began, with a smile intended to put her quite at her ease, a smile that seemed to say, "Dont be abashed by my grandeur, little girl. I'm awfully democratic and all that!"

"Wasn't it?" rejoined Flotsam, continuing to gaze out to sea with unflattering interest in the fleet of fishing boats just jutting out from harbor. Devil take it, but she was really extraordinarily pretty—rigged out in one of Clarice's gowns she'd be a winner. His tone lost a trifle of its patronage and acquired deference.

"Tootles ought not to go swimming in anything deeper than a bathtub," he confided, "she loses her head too easily! So you live out here on the Reef, do you? I suppose you must—"

"No," replied Flotsam, coolly, "I dont get lonesome winters at all. Yes, indeed, I love the ocean. No, I've never been to New York. Yes, I'd like to. I'm not your baby doll, thank you, and I dont care to row over to the mainland some day and take a little ride in your car."

Edward Elmer stared at the mutinous little face blankly a moment then burst into a roar of laughter. "So that's what they say to you, is it? Then I wont say it. We'll talk about anything you choose, only do let me stay and talk. I'd like to awfully well, honestly!"

Unexpectedly the stormy face opposite broke into dimples. Flotsam sat down on the rocks beside him with as much grace, in spite of her salt-stained corduroys and clumsy shoes, as tho she wore organdie and patent leather pumps. "Then tell me," she begged him, hungrily, "every single thing you know about clothes." Her tone quickened, her eyes held a light almost holy. "Are they still wearing narrow skirts?" breathed Flotsam, "and tight sleeves, and are the hats turned up or down?"

And so began, on the rocks beside the morning sea, the story that was to lead to other, stranger chapters, as the sea has other, somberer phases. It was the first of many talks they had, Edward doing most of the talking, while Flotsam sat enthralled, listening to the tale of a world as remote from her ken as Fairyland.

"Why you allow it!" marvelled Clarice Stapleton, with the edge of spite in her voice, "that common little thing knows well enough who he is and how much money he has! Of course, I dont mean to imply that Eddie could be so ridiculous as to think of marrying her, but that sort is dangerous. Marriage isn't the only way to get hold of a rich man's money—"

Mrs. Elmer looked shrewdly at the speaker. Morning was always unbecoming to Clarice, tho she was still able to shine under electricity. In the full, hard light her face showed every one of the thirty-two years—she only confessed to twenty-eight—of struggle and disappointment. Clarice had tried desperately to marry almost every eligible young man she had met since her déhüt, and the campaigns had left their traces in fine lines about her rather pale eyes, in a certain acidity of viewpoint, and drawn expression about lips that art rendered a vivid vermilion.

"She's young and pretty, you must remember," she remarked sweetly, and apparently without guile, "even in those outrageous togs she wears she manages to look like a little soubrette in a musical comedy, and withal she's as utterly natural and unaffected as a wild rose." It was not that Mrs. Elmer really approved of Flotsam as a prospective niece-in-law, but—as any feminine reader will understand—she took distinct pleasure in making Clarice writhe.

There were others than those on the yacht who regarded with alarm the friendship of Edward Elmer, clubman, millionaire, first-nighter of all musical shows and Flotsam—the Girl Out Yonder, the village called her. Of these, one, Joey Clarke, heavy of hand and feature, with hair burned a strange, tawny red by long days of fishing under the blazing sun, was the bitterest. Twenty-nine was Joey, a hard man, his fellows called him—a dangerous man. He could drink any other fisherman on the coast under the table without anything to show for it outwardly save a tendency to smile and talk more than when he was sober. He could strike with his tarry fist a blow like that of a sledge hammer. He could hate faithfully—could love bitterly. And he loved Flotsam Barton. There was a burning in his eyes when he looked at her, a thickness on his tongue when he spoke to her.

"Going to let the city dude cut you out, Joey?" his fellow fishermen jibed as the dory with Elmer and Flotsam put out from the Reef. "I hear they're as good as promised a'ready. What gal who c'n have silk gownds and a fine house in the city is going to choose a fisherman's shack?"

To none of their jeers did Joe Clarke reply but his jaw had an ugly set, and his eyes, under scowling brows smouldered. Alone in his three-roomed shanty he considered possibilities. She had liked him well enough before that damned dude with his silk socks and silkier words had come. She would like him—well enough, if he should go. And he should go.

"I could kill him," Joey muttered, and played with the thought for a moment, but in the end relinquished it. "But I'm not going to. I'm not hankering to spend the rest of my years in jail—or mebbe get kicked out of life with a dose of tectricity. But if he stays much longer it'll be too late—he's not to go, but how—" the dishes chattering with nervousness. His lips drew back. "Why didn't I think of that afore?" he blazed, "if that dont send him kiting nothing will!"

Edward Elmer was surprised the next morning, to see the shaggy head and lowering face of the most unprepossessing fisherman on the Cape rise over the edge of the yacht to be followed by six foot two of oilskins smelling vilely of fish long defunct. "I beg your pardon, Mister," Joey Clarke said surlily, "but might it be as how I could speak with ye, a moment?"

But when the desired permission was given he seemed at a loss how to begin. His great hands, shaggy with black hair twisted his greasy cap, his eyes were fixed upon the far-away ledge of the Great Reef Light. When he did speak the words seemed somehow wrung out of himself. "It's about Flotsam Barton. I've heard you're sweet on her—is that so?"

Elmer's eyes flashed dangerously, but his tone was level! "I dont recognize your right to ask such a question. However, if it is the least interest to you I am quite willing to tell you that I intend to marry Flotsam. And now—if that was quite all—" he gestured suggestively toward the gangway, "it would be a pity to lose a morning's fishing—"

Joey Clarke's great hands worked silently with the hat, a slow, dreadful twisting movement as tho he were strangling something. "You cant marry her," he said, "you cant marry her. It isn't safe—she comes from a bad stock—"

Edward Elmer laughed scornfully, then, little by little the laugh became mechanical and forced as his eyes studied the other's face. "Just what"—he wet his lips—"just what do you mean?"

"I mean," Joey Clarke said heavily, with monotonous inflection, "that she's the daughter of a murderer! And what's more Barton killed his own father. That's why he's tending the loneliest light on the coast—to keep out of the way o' the Law!"

"You're crazy," stammered Elmer, ashy of face, "stark crazy!"

"You dont believe it?" Joey pointed toward the Reef, white in the sunlight. "Ask him then! He knows I know it—'twas me as found the old man with his head beat in and him lying in a drunk alongside with his hands—red—"

Captain Barton touched the great brass reflector with his chamois as a mother touches the cheek of a new-born child. Next to Flotsam, singing below over her housework he adored his Light. It was somehow a symbol to him, those clear white rays brush-ing the darkness triumphantly away—

"Captain Barton!" He turned, startled, then extended a hearty hand.

"Mister Elmer! I didn't hear ye, ain't you a mite early this mornin'? Flotsam's down stairs—"

"I didn't come to see Flotsam," the boy said tragically. The agony in the young eyes searching the tanned weatherbeaten face before him drove the smile from the lighthouse keeper's lips. "I came to see you. To ask you—this man Clarke here says that you—Oh, I cant say it! He must be lying—he is lying, isn't he, Captain?"

The strength seemed to go from the gaunt figure before them. All at once he was an old broken man, an old frightened man with quivering lips that worked loosely and cheeks that twitched. His eyes roved dully from Elmer's tense face to Joey Clarke's implacable one. "So he's told ye?" he wheezed, "I've been payin' him for fifteen year to keep shet o' it. But—it's true—leastwise I s'pose it's true—"

"You suppose it's true?" the boy snapped furiously, "dont you know?"

"I was drunk," Captain Barton said, heavily, "I used to go on spreeds—those days. And I come out o'one of them with Joey here, shaking me, and hollerin'—and there was Pap—and my clo'es all over blood—"

"God!" said Elmer, and shrank away shuddering. Below stairs came the sound of a brisk broom and the lilt of a clear soprano. "I have heard the mavis singing, her love song to the morn—"

"She dont know," the father cried, as tho in answer to some unspoken argument. "What makes you look so queer like? It ain't her fault! She ain't done nothin'," he plucked feverishly at the boy's sleeve, "what you turmin' away like that for? You aint—going—to leave her 'count—of me—"

"I've got to!" In the face of Life's realities all the affectations and artificialities dropped away from Edward Elmer, and he spoke with his soul to the ears of the other's soul. "I love Flotsam—but I'd be afraid, afraid hideously, of the taint in her, afraid of what—my son would be and do—"

"She's good!" babbled the old man. "I wont never see her again—if you'll take her away—I'll promise you you wont never hear of me! I'll give myself up, and tell 'em Pap didn't fall onto the cellar floor like they thought. I'll—I'll do anythin' you say, on'y dont break my baby's heart, dont—"

"I'm breaking my heart, too." But he was turning away, young shoulders sagging, young lips stubborn. "Tell her good-bye for me. I—couldn't bear—I'll have Auntie leave before another morning—oh, Flotsam—"

Moments, hours passed, and the old man in the Light tower stood motionless, then he lifted his face to the great blind blue that showed thru the glass dome overhead. "Help me t' lie, God!" Captain Barton prayed, "help me t' have my little gal."

Flotsam gave a cry at the sight of the face he turned toward her, but he stilled her terrified questioning with a gesture. "I got to tell you something that breaks my heart, baby," he said, thru stiff lips that smiled dreadfully, "but it's the on'y way. I'm not—not yore pappy, not by blood—"

Hours later, Captain Barton climbed the stairs that led to (Fifty-three)

And he loved Flotsam Barton. There was a burning in his eyes when he looked at her, a thickness on his tongue when he spoke to her the Light, holding desperately to the iron rail. His knees shook beneath him, his head felt oddly dizzy and confused, incapable of thinking of anything but his duty—the Light that he must send out into the swift autumn darkness, the Light that must not fail whether hearts broke or no.

"First o' all that," mumbled he, as he dragged himself up stair by stair, "and after—I'll think o' Flotsam—an' the rest—"

Out somewhere in the dusk he had left her, Elmer's arm about her, with her face, half frightened, half sorry, yet somehow wholly glad, turned to him as he waved her good-bye and dropped over the rail. The ethics of what he had done did not occur to him. He had denied his fatherhood to save her happiness, that was all of it, no more, no less. He had told his lie so well that it had passed as truth, and he thanked God. Somewhere out there—he looked down upon the dark heaving waters—the yacht was lifting anchor to take his little girl away from him, out into the world where even his thoughts would get lost in trying to follow—

"Th' Light—it's pitchy dark a'ready." He was working feverishly now. "Supposin' it shouldn't be lighted and the boat should go on the rocks! Where'd I leave them matches—God!"

For his hand, groping in the thick darkness had touched another hand. Joey Clarke's voice leaped upon his ears like some savage animal. "No you dont! The Light aint going to be lighted to-night. Get me? It ain't going to be lighted!"

For a moment Barton did not understand. He even tried to laugh in a forlorn, helpless way. "What do you mean, Joey? You're jokin'! I got to hurry because the yacht is leavin'—and it's dark—"

"It's not leavin'!" Dreadful mirth shook the great body beside him, "at least—not far. Send Flotsam away, would you? She was mine, I tell you—mine! And she aint goin' to be anybody else's!"

There was madness in the wild words, in the gleam of the eyeballs in the darkness, madness in the clutch of the great, hairy hands. "Git out o' here, Barton! I'll tend the Light to-night! Git out o' here afore I serve you as I served your Pappy fifteen year ago—"

It was not until the door crashed behind him that Captain Barton realized the meaning of the last words. He beat the panels with impotent hands, but the stout ash mocked his efforts. He shouted, begged, prayed, and listened to the walls toss his own cries back upon him. From within the Light tower was awful silence. He slid to his knees and peered thru the keyhole—darkness, utter, merciless, and—out there, helpless in the night, the vaecht driving on the rocks—Flotsam—

Somehow he had staggered down the stairs and into the kitchen, found matches, a can of oil. "Just a minute, dearie, Fardie's comin'!" the old man groaned. He lifted a wooden chair, brought it down upon the stove with terrific force that nearly tore his arms from their sockets. Feverishly he poured oil on the splinters. Another chair—another—clapping the bundle of faggots in his arm, he staggered out into the windy dark, and felt his way down the rocks. Even by daylight it was a hard path to negotiate, steep, with unexpected pit-falls and fissures, but he panted on, falling, crawling on his hands and knees. Below him, and strangely near, sounded the hiss of the water on the pointed rocks. He strained his eyes and thought he saw lights moving thru the darkness—

"Just a minute, dearie," moaned Flotsam's father, and touched a match to the oil-soaked wood. The flames streamed on the wind like wild locks of a Valkyrie's hair. Above him from the darkened tower came a shout of fury, then, sickeningly the sound of a body hurled from a great height upon the rocks—afterward silence.

The torch flared higher, casting wild shadows. In the red light of it the old man's face was hallowed with prayer. "Keep her safe—please God! My baby—keep her safe, please God!"

"Fardie!" Light footsteps ran across the rocks, and Flotsam was beside him, straining him to her with strong young arms. "Fardie! What are you doing? Dont look so, Fardie; it's me, Flotsam! I've come back, and I'm never going to leave you again!"

He continued to wave the torch, staring down at her stupidly. "But—you cant! You're going to be a lady—" His knees weakened. She pushed him gently down and took the torch from him, holding it steadily.

"I'd rather be just Flotsam. To-night—when I saw them dancing—the fine ladies, in their fine dresses—I knew that you'd lied, and that I was truly your girl, and didn't want to be anything else—" her voice broke, denying her brave words, but she went on. "He told me, Edward—everything. And so I came back to tell you it didn't make any difference and I loved you. I rowed away while they were dancing. They'll never miss me, Fardie—I didn't belong there; I belonged here on the Great Reef—Out Yonder; I belong to the Light, Fardie, and to you!"

"And to me, Flotsam!" said a new voice in from the shadow. Tall and handsome in his evening clothes, Edward Elmer stepped into the golden ring of light, hands outtheld. "You didn't suppose you could run away from me, did you, dear?"

They had both forgotten the silent figure of the old man, crouched among his rocks, and, looking from young face to young face shining with a light that was not from the dying torch, Captain Barton rose softly and stole away. Later there would be things to be told, later he might free his name from the taint that Joey Clarke, lying somewhere starkly on the rocks had fastened upon it fifteen years ago. Later he might reclaim the fathership he had denied. He sprang up the steep ledge, into the tower and up the stairs to where the door swung open at the top. A scratch of the match, a flicker of a wick—and the Light shone out, splendid, serene, over the dark fields of the sea.

Out somewhere in the dusk he had left her, Elmer's arms about her, with her face half frightened, half sorry, yet somehow wholly glad, turned to him as he waved her good-bye and dropped over the rail

He held out his hands to the rays of it, ecstatic. "The Light—is stronger than the darkness—" cried Captain Barton, triumphantly. "what's there for us to be afraid of, God?"

THE EXCEPTION

By Walter Pulitzer

There's change in everything, alas! except a fellow's pocket! This world is full of changes; there's nothing here abiding; All things are evanescent, fleeting, transitory, gliding, The earth, the sea, the sky, the stars—where'er the fancy ranges, The tooth of Time forever mars—all life is full of changes, Like sands upon the ocean's shore that are forever drifting, So all the fading scenes of earth incessantly are shifting, Change rules the mighty universe—there is no power to block it.

Double Exposures

THE waif and her pitiful little pet geranium are always with us. Witness the opening scenes of De Mille's "Male and Female" and of Tourneur's "The Life Line."

A company has been formed out in Los Angeles to film the Bible in 204 reels. Some directors we know can hardly get an ordinary story into that length.

Recently we presented our composite feminine star of the films. This month we offer our ideal screen male star with:

- Lloyd Hamilton's hair.
- Ben Turpin's eyes.
- Bull Montana's ears.
- Chester Conklin's mouth.
- Ford Sterling's chin.
- "Fatty" Arbuckle's torso.
- Charlie Chaplin's legs.

One of the New York newspapers has been listing the most popular lines of the spoken drama. We submit the following three subtitles to represent the photodrama:

- "A lily growing in the mire."
- "Poor but honest."
- "The dawn of a new day."

BIG SCREEN MOMENT OF THE MONTH
Bebe Daniels in the allegory of "Male and Female."

The British are protesting about American bathing girl comedies. Why? The bathing girl is the screen prototype of the stage chorus girl. There is no other way to logically introduce the flapper except as an aquatic charmer, hence the bathing girl farce. Why permit the real thing behind the footlights and protest at an animated photograph of it?

Erich Stroheim has been purchasing pages in the trade papers to complain about the way Universal shifted the title of "The Pinnacle," which he wrote and directed, to "Blind Husbands." It's about time some one took a determined stand upon the cold-blooded and brainless way producers twist titles about. Incidentally, Mr. Stroheim notes that Carl Laemmle, president of U., decides his change by saying that "there are more blind husbands in the world than pinnacles" and that, therefore, more people would go to see the re-titled picture. Which, we submit, is considerable reasoning!

Our all feminine football team for the season of 1919-1920:

Dorothy Gish.....	Left Tackle
Wanda Hawley.....	Left Guard
Louise Fazenda.....	Center
Corinne Griffith.....	Right Guard
Bebe Daniels.....	Right Tackle
May Allison.....	Right End
Theda Bara.....	Quarterback
Katherine MacDonald..	Right Halfback
Elsie Ferguson.....	Fullback

"Syd Chaplin Finds Europe Is Unsettled" is the heading of The Motion Picture News story of the comedian's attempt to produce on the other side. Something of a discovery, we'll say.

"Aye, there's the rub," comments some one on noting that Chris Ruh has been signed as comedian by Universal.

How impressive are statistics! Mary Pickford's tabulator states that Little Mary will make 15 miles of drama in 1920 and that 100,000,000 people will crowd theaters in every land to see her. The subtitles of her plays will be translated into seven languages, including Chinese and Japanese. We'd like to see "Pollyanna" in Swedish.

"American films are stimulating a desire among Brazilians to learn the English language," says The London Kinematograph. "Perhaps the pres- (Continued on page 83)

A fairy's gifts were on her cradle shed—
This Pierrette of the screen, whose happy wit
And dainty store of fancy exquisite,
Seems fragrant of old gardens, quaintly spread
With tangled blooms of roses, white and red;
As with swift gleams of joy or sadness lit
Her winsome, little, wistful gestures flit
Thru pictures by her grace dream-garlanded

Sparkling with youth, her charm, shy, whimsical,

Enchanted-wise sets memory astir
Unto the tune of some forgotten dance,
And leads, altho the leaves of autumn fall,
Thru paths of rosemary and lavender,
Back to that far-off country of romance.

The Celluloid Critic

The Month's Photoplays in Review

Above, Sylvia Breamer, in "Dawn"; right, Geraldine Farrar and Lou-Tellegen in "Flame of the Desert"; below, Douglas MacLean and Doris May in "23½ Hours Leave"

Two absolutely unheralded photoplays stand out of our month in the screen theater. One takes its place as a veritable celluloid cameo—and easily one of the best pictures of the year.

This silverscreen gem is "The Gay Old Dog," (Pathé), based upon an Edna Ferber story. It was adapted—and admirably adapted—to the films by Mrs. Sidney Drew and produced by Hobart Henley. Since we have long recognized Mrs. Drew's ability to sound the human note and Mr. Henley has heretofore been a director of no particular distinction, we give the major share of the credit to the former. Possibly we are wrong. Anyway, there is honor enough for both.

Now "The Gay Old Dog," isn't dramatic, hasn't the so-called "punch"; indeed, it violates most all of what producers have deemed to be photoplay essentials. It is just a slice of life. It moves leisurely, without forcing, to its logical conclusion. Its story? The bitter fate of one Jimmy Dodd, who, weighted down by his dying mother's request that he "look out" for his three sisters, sacrifices his own love and hopes for his family. Then, as the years pass, he finds himself alone and loveless and he tries to be a "gay old dog." But he just can't—and so the picture ends with the "gay old dog" just a "tired, lonely old man in a ridiculous rose-room gone suddenly drab."

This brief summary does not begin to reveal the direct humanness with which Mr. Henley and Mrs. Drew have unfolded Miss Ferber's tale. If "The Gay Old Dog" doesn't reach your heart—well, something is the matter with your heart. The tear is there, the tear of a vital heart-throb. We beg of you to see it, if only to observe the way thought can be put across on the screen.

John Cumberland, "the gay old dog," has been playing so long before the footlights in risqué boudoir farces that we had come to think him just an average comedian. But his playing in "The Gay Old Dog" is superb in its subtlety. The remainder of the cast is well chosen. Indeed, "The Gay Old Dog" is well nigh faultless. The subtitles, for instance, are gems of fine screen expression, so rare these days.

The other pleasant surprise of the month was "23½ Hours Leave," (Paramount), an adapted Mary Roberts Rinehart story, which introduces a new juvenile team, Douglas MacLean and Doris May, to the films. This is a delightful comedy revolving around a nervy young rookie's love for the daughter of the commanding officer of his training camp. There is a delightful freshness to the handling and scores of unforced laughs.

Young MacLean proves to be a very pleasant young comedian of whom we expect a great deal. And let us not forget the director in giving credit where credit is due.

Since David Griffith gave us his epic, "Broken Blossoms," we again look forward to new productions emanating from his studios with something of the expectation we once awaited his old-time Biographs. Mr. Griffith's latest, "Scarlet Days," (Paramount), is a tale of the mining camps of '49, built around a young outlaw, Alvarez, said to have been a real character of California history. There is nothing particular about Mr. Griffith's melodramatic opus, altho Mr. Griffith, by a multitude of tiny touches, gets a little closer to what the real pioneers and dance-hall favorites must have been. But "Scarlet Days" is distinctive in at least one item: Richard Barthelmess' portrayal of Alvarez, a sensitive, finely attuned romantic performance. Little Clarine Seymour makes a Mexican spitfire stand out and Eugenie Besserer gives a very commendable presentation of a grey-haired mining camp belle.

That high-spirited little comédienne, Dorothy Gish, is not happy in "Turning the Tables," (Paramount), a farce constructed about the effort of an unscrupulous aunt to put a young woman in a sanitarium in order to get control of her money. Miss Gish has her moments, but the comedy itself is lame stuff. So is the direction.

More of Norma Talmadge is revealed in "The Isle of Conquest," (Select), than in any vehicle we have yet glimpsed. For in it Miss Talmadge plays an unhappily married young wife cast ashore in abbreviated masquerade costume upon a desert island with a dashing stevedore. Of course, she comes to love him, believing hubby dead, and they are about to perform a marriage ceremony of their own, that they may become man and wife, when a steamer appears on the horizon. Friend husband is on board, but he promptly dies of heart trouble and things end happily for the sailor and the widow. Miss Talmadge is adequate enough, aside from being optically interesting, but "The Isle of Conquest" is just conventional screen drama.

"His Majesty, the American," (United Artists), is another routine Douglas Fairbanks celluline cyclone. Doug gymnastics as a young New Yorker who gets involved in a middle Europe revolution and turns out to be the heir apparent to the throne.

The star dashes from mantel to balcony and from housetop to window-ledge with his customary dramatic power. In other words, "His Majesty, the American" is just another Fairbanks comedy of the usual sort.

Geraldine Farrar's newest, "Flame of the Desert," (Goldwyn), does not impress us. Miss Farrar has the rôle of a British girl in Cairo during a threatened revolution of natives. She loses her heart to an Arab leader who turns out to be a British officer on secret service. Lou-Tellegen is the Arab-Englishman. "Flame of the Desert" is a machine-made vehicle and nothing more. It has all the careful photography and direction of Goldwyn productions—and all their lack of heart and imagination.

Dolores Cassinelli's "The Right to Lie," (Pathé), is hectic, unreal stuff. Miss Cassinelli is seen as the daughter of an American who has innocently been guilty of bigamy. He cannot reveal his first marriage, but does his best to right matters, making the child his ward. Every one suspects a sordid relationship and there are reels of tears and emotionalism.

Constance Talmadge's "A Virtuous Vamp," (First National), is, despite the cheapness of its title, a bit more amusing than Miss Talmadge's recent vehicles. An artless young British society belle, under an assumed name, invades the American business world and just can't help vamping every man in sight, thereby upsetting business organization with every flash of her smiling eyes. It is adapted from Clyde Fitch's "The Bachelor," the whole comedy being ruthlessly shifted from masculine to feminine

The Riddle Man

By PEARL MALVERN

WHEN I went to "get" William Russell I went to the Victor Studios somewhere on 11th Avenue and I French-heeled shakily over cobblestones and slunk into weird arched doorways and around somehow sinister corners. There was the rankly humid smell of docks and of salt water against the docks, and I felt that I might be in "Limehouse" rather than on an interview. There was something distinctly "different" about it all.

However, I thought, when I get into the star's dressing-room I shall be in atmosphere again. He will run true to form, some form or other. Perhaps he will be tailored, and correct and, to the eyes, an "objet d'art," and we will discuss his fans and his hobbies and I will know that I am on an interview.

Which only goes to prove one dare not think in tracks on any man.

I found Bill Russell to be quite in atmosphere. Oh, quite—in Limehouse and the cobblestones. He was nothing if not in atmosphere. Besides being Gargantuan in build, which is not his fault but quite to his attraction-credit, he was attired in a flannel shirt open at the throat, nondescript and very utilitarian. There was a tie bound round about his brow and he talked with great difficulty, having to hold in two recently displaced teeth besides the little matter of enunciating.

The two teeth, one of which fell out upon the floor with quite a thud during the course of the subsequent conversation—I tell you this to kill suspense—I wish mine might have been as briefly killed—the two teeth, I say, had been removed from their moorings during a "scene" taken some fifteen minutes or more, or less, before my toothsome arrival. Which is a rather conclusive proof that when Bill Russell is before the camera he is not merely posturing. He fights his fights as literally as he would fight them were he in the Klondike or the Northwest, or Limehouse or any section where gentlemen with giant builds make pleasant havocs of their fellowmen.

There is none of the obvious about Bill Russell. He gets you guessing. You dont know whether you're going to like him, or whether you're not. You dont know whether he's going to let you like him. He doesn't gush. He doesn't pose. He doesn't attitudinize. There is none of the mummer. He has the air of reflecting quite outside of your being there at all. He talks quietly and it takes him some time to warm up to his subject. He weighs things. He does not speak lightly or glibly. Just in the beginning you begin to despair of him as "copy." You dont quite know what to make of it, of him. You fidget and begin to believe that you had better go. Then you find that he is saying things here and there that are immensely worth while. He is saying them in a manner of speaking as tho he were alone and musing aloud. You realize with something of a shock that he had no formula ready to spring on you. He is just talking—is just himself. He may and may not have said these same things before. If he has, he doesn't know it. It is the thing he is thinking of at the moment. You have the impression of something deep and primitive, of some mighty force leashed up, of something barely stark and elemental. It comes to you that the confines of the dressing-room are far too small. There is a need of space and then more space.

He talks with a few wide gestures, with every so often a piercing look from his eyes which are deep-set and grey. He talks sparsely, but one gets big canvases of thought . . . impressions . . .

He is tired of stage life, he says. He wants to travel the great world over. Roam the seas and blaze strange trails and climb peaks that ravage the skies. He wants a good comrade by his side—a woman. "That would be more than half the joy of it," he said.

"Men want good women," says William Russell, in discussing marriage, "wholesome women — strong, sanely balanced women. Women who are, primarily, good comrades"

THE RIGHT WAY TO KEEP YOUR NAILS ALWAYS PERFECTLY MANICURED

Just a little regular care makes your hands beautiful

NAILS like rosy pearl inlaid in a delicate setting—a setting of smooth unbroken cuticle, a perfect curve which repeats the curve of the nail tips.

It is easy for anyone nowadays to have this alluring grace of perfect nails and cuticle—so easy that people no longer excuse the lack of it.

The sensitive nail root is only one-twelfth inch below the cuticle. When you look through a magnifying glass you see the unpleasant results of cuticle cutting.

Today ill kept nails are as unpardonable as ill kept teeth. For it takes but a few minutes of regular care each week to keep your finger nails always perfect, your cuticle smooth, thin, unbroken.

Make some day of the week your regular day for manicuring. Then regularly on this day give your nails the care they need.

Do not forget that the most important item in the appearance of one's nails is the care of the cuticle. Broken cuticle is like a broken setting to a jewel. Coarse overgrown cuticle is equally unsuitable.

Yet many people ruin the cuticle through ignorance of the proper method of caring for it. Never cut it. This is ruinous. The nail root is only $\frac{1}{12}$ of an inch below the cuticle. When the cuticle is cut, it is next to impossible to avoid exposing the nail root at the corners or in some other little place. The root of the nail is so sensitive that Nature will not permit it to remain uncovered. The moment a tiny bit is exposed, new skin grows very quickly in that place to cover it. It grows much more rapidly than the rest of the cuticle. This spoils the symmetry of the curve at the base of the nails. It causes uneven cuticle and hang-nails. It gives a coarse ragged appearance to the border of your nails.

Realizing this, an expert set himself to the task of discovering a safe, effective way to remove overgrown cuticle. After years of study he worked out the formula of a liquid, which gently, harmlessly softens and removes the surplus cuticle. This he called Cutex.

Wrap a little cotton around the end of an orange stick (both come in the Cutex package), dip it into the bottle of Cutex and work it around the base of the nails, gently pushing back the cuticle. Instantly the dry cuticle is softened. Wash the hands, pushing back the cuticle with a towel. The surplus cuticle will disappear, leaving a firm, even, slender nail base.

If you like snowy white nail tips apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nails directly from its convenient tube. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish. For an especially brilliant lasting polish, use Cutex Paste Polish first, then the Cutex Cake or Powder Polish.

If your cuticle has a tendency to dry and grow coarse, apply a bit of Cutex Cold Cream each night. This cream was especially prepared to keep the hands and cuticle soft and fine.

It takes only about fifteen minutes a week to give your nails this complete manicure. Do this regularly and your hands will always have that peculiar attractiveness which adds a subtle appeal to one's whole appearance.

To keep your cuticle a perfect frame for your nails, you must use the right softening method.

Herewith the Al Christie comedy girls—unfortunately nameless—demonstrate the relative value of a fishing pole and that first aid to femininity, the lip stick. Personally, we pin our faith to the last named article

“We sat before the fire place, Mary and I, with Betty perched on the arm of the big chair. It was our first evening in our own home! There were two glistening tears in Mary’s eyes, yet a smile was on her lips. I knew what she was thinking.

“Five years before we had started bravely out together! The first month had taught us the old, old lesson that two cannot live as cheaply as one. I had left school in the grades to go to work and my all too thin pay envelope was a weekly reminder of my lack of training. In a year Betty came—three mouths to feed now. Meanwhile living costs were soaring. Only my salary and I were standing still.

“Then one night Mary came to me. ‘Jim’, she said, ‘why don’t you go to school again—right here at home? You can put in an hour or two after supper each night while I sew. Learn to do some one thing. You’ll make good—I know you will.’

“Well, we talked it over and that very night I wrote to Scranton. A few days later I had taken up a course in the work I was in. It was surprising how rapidly the mysteries of our business became clear to me—took on a new fascination. In a little while an opening came. I was ready for it and was promoted—with an increase. Then I was advanced again. There was money enough to even lay a little aside. So it went.

“And now the fondest dream of all has come true. We have a real home of our own with the little comforts and luxuries Mary had always longed for, a little place, as she says, that ‘Betty can be proud to grow up in.’

“I look back now in pity at those first blind stumbling years. Each evening after supper the doors of opportunity had swung wide and I had passed them by. How grateful I am that Mary helped me to see that night the golden hours that lay within.”

In city, town and country all over America there are men with happy families and prosperous homes because they let the International Correspondence Schools come to them in the hours after supper and prepare them for bigger work at better pay. More than two million men and women in the last 28 years have advanced themselves through spare time study with the I. C. S. Over one hundred thousand right now are turning their evenings to profit. Hundreds are starting every day.

You, too, can have the position you want in the work you like best. You can have a salary that will give your family the kind of a home, the comforts, the little luxuries that you would like them to have. Yes, you can! No matter what your age, your occupation, or your means—you can do it!

All we ask is the chance to prove it. That’s fair, isn’t it? Then mark and mail this coupon. There’s no obligation and not a penny of cost. But it may be the most important step you ever took in your life. Cut out and mail the coupon now.

hood, and where there had been a hundred coxcombs, stood now a hundred soldiers eager to fight for honor and country and king. Katherine Vaucelles came swiftly up the steps of the dais and flung herself on her knees before Villon, taking a ribbon from her hair, still warm.

"You will wear my colors, my lord Constable?" she asked with a wonderful blush, "and until you come back I shall pray for you!"

Louis looked down at her, smiling evilly, then turned to Villon. "After such a conquest methinks Burgundy should be easy for you, my lord Constable!" he sneered. "It is easier to win a woman under a borrowed name than wearing one's own! I wonder how the lady would answer the love-making of one Master Francois Villon?"

The Grand Constable stood motionless, staring blankly down at the mocking smile of the King, then suddenly he groaned as tho the words had been daggers piercing his heart. "I have been living in a fool's paradise!" quoth Francois Villon, "but I'll not die with a lie on my lips. Katherine!" he turned to the girl, standing wonderingly at his side; "Kate! Listen to me, and loathe me! You have known me one week as the Grand Constable of France, a very gallant nobleman, who loves you—better than aught else under the sky." His voice shook, but he forced it on. "Yet the name is not mine, this fine suit—borrowed, my position here at court a whim of the King. Only my love is no sham, but purest gold, Lady—Lady! Aside from that—" he drew his great figure proudly up, facing the court, "I am a pitiful impostor, a pasteboard nobleman, known better as one Francois Villon, wine-bibber, wastrel—and worse a sottish fellow unworthy of any woman's love, least of all of yours, Sweetest of Women!"

Katherine Vaucelles did not cry out, nor shrink away. But in her eyes he read the horror of him, and turned away, trying to smile. "At least I shall hope to crown a shameful life with a good death, Sire," Villon said quietly, "if Heaven is kind I shall never see tomorrow's sun!"

In the great court of the palace on the morrow workmen were raising a stark structure, a tree of evil fruit, the gibbet that loomed, a thing of dread in the sweet yellow morning air. From the terrace the King looked down at it smiling ironically at his secret thoughts. Presently he turned to Katherine Vaucelles, who with the other women of the court stood beside him, and his tone mocked her white silence.

"It is a pity—is it not, Kate, that our patchwork Constable did not get his wish for an honorable death? But no doubt you will be glad to see him dangling from yonder gibbet who dared make a mock of winning a great lady's love!"

The girl did not answer. She stood motionless as the court gradually filled with a rabble, eager to welcome the liberators of Paris back again. Even when the fanfare of trumpets heralded the victorious troops and with Villon riding at their head as they entered the square, she did not lift the heavy lashes that hid her eyes. Very tall, very straight, Francois Villon mounted the steps of the terrace and knelt to lay the torn battle flags of Burgundy at the feet of the King; then rising he lifted his hand for silence.

"And now the Grand Constable of France has one more duty to perform," said Francois, in a ringing voice, "and that is to decree that Master Villon shall be hanged from yonder gallows until he is dead, for the many sins that he has sinned."

A great cry rose from the crowd, which surged forward threateningly, but Louis, the King merely smiled his twisted smile. "Which of you will die in Master Villon's stead?" he asked them, "and thus save the life you seem to prize?"

The murmur died. Men shrank back, looking whitely into one another's faces. Then, clear and high came a woman's voice across the sullen silence, and Katherine Vaucelles moved down the steps until she stood at Francois Villon's side. "I will die for him, Sire," she said gladly, "for that I could not live without him—"

Francois Villon caught the slim white hands with a great cry. "And is that so, ob my dear Love?" he asked her, "you would do that for me?" He lifted his face to the sky. "Now I thank thee, God in Heaven, that this thing has come to me!" He touched his lips to the slender fingers reverently. "And now, Brave Heart," he told her, "leave me, for a little while, I think that we shall meet again, Kate—beyond the stars."

"If you go, I go also," said Katherine, lifting the crimson flower of her lips to his, "but first, give me my betrothal kiss, Francois—"

Again the multitude moved forward, again the voice of Louis, nasal, faintly amused halted them.

"I have made a great discovery, friends—I have found one man whose heart is pure gold, one woman whose soul is all angel. I give the man his life, the woman her lover. True man and true woman—to each other's arms!"

And who would venture to disobey a king?

PEARL WHITE FAN.—Study hard. You'll get there some day. Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers. Fay Tincher is with World. Marion Davies is with Elect. What do you mean when you say that that player is "tough"?

ORIENTAL THEFADA.—Why not? Poetic talent is given as well to the peasant as to the knight. Florence Turner isn't located permanently. All in care of Fox.

BOBBY LINKS.—I'm pretty sure it was James Bryce who said "America should be particularly thankful for its remoteness from European quarrels and menaces," but that was several years ago and he could not say that now. Very few players have time to write personal letters.

him there, but that I did know, for I had worn such a ribbon myself. 'All right,' he said, 'go ahead and get me the real thing.'

"Borrowing three dollars from my landlady, Lord knows how much I already owed her, I bought the ribbon and tho in the meantime Mr. Emerson had given up the part, Henry Walthall wore it. Later, Mr. Emerson asked me if I had ever read 'Old Heidelberg.' I told him I had seen its first performance in Vienna and knew much of it by heart. I nearly fell over when he told me he was going to film it and that I was to be his assistant director as he wished the details to be correct. I had been starving and the $18 per week seemed a fortune.

"Then, one day he asked me how long it would take for me to get ready to go to New York with him. Thinking of my limited wardrobe of a couple pair extra hose, a shirt or two and a few stray collars, I replied that about seven minutes would do. Then, like a flash I remembered the many debts I owed—who would pay them? I told Mr. Emerson about them and jumping into a car he drove around with me and paid them all. Great, wasn't it?

"Now, someone had borrowed my only satchel, so wrapping my few clothes in a newspaper I started for New York! I stayed three years, returning for 'Hearts of the World.'

"My opportunity really came because of my understanding of detail—and I am a crank about this. Detail is the unmistakable atmosphere that places the story and there are always many spectators who know what is correct, we must not forget this."

Returning to the big stage where Mr. von Stroheim is directing another picture, we forget all about the Past and spent several hours in a very vital Present.

After calling the company together and discussing a few points, the work began. "His Great Success" is a big story containing an after-the-war problem and laid in Paris at the present time. With the orchestra playing the dreamy "Je T'Aime Waltz," over and over, while an intense scene between Clyde Fillmore and Una Trevelyn was being directed, I grew deeply interested in watching Mr. Von, (as he is affectionately addressed by his company), for he acted out the entire scene in detail for each one, rehearsing several times until it was satisfactory. He knew exactly what he wanted portrayed—subtle touches, mere suggestions—which carry such weight in the psychology of a picture.

"Here is a play," said Mr. Von Stroheim, when the scene was over, "with all the allure, the vivacity and the lightness of Parisian life, with a tragedy, and it must be handled very carefully to express the meaning desired. I try to have the scenes taken consecutively, whenever pos-

Safer Teeth—Without a Film

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

It Is Film That Mars and Ruins

It is known today that the cause of most tooth troubles is a slimy film. You can feel it with your tongue.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

The film is clinging. It enters crevices and stays. The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. So millions find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay.

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a film combatant. Its efficiency has been amply proved by clinical and laboratory tests. Able authorities approve it and leading dentists all over America are now urging its adoption.

A Free Test to Every Home

This new method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is sent to everyone who wishes to prove its efficiency.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

But pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So pepsin long seemed impossible. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And millions of teeth are now being daily brushed with this active pepsin.

We urge you to see the results. They are quick and apparent. A ten-day test will be a revelation. Send the coupon for the test tube. Compare the results with old methods and you will soon know what is best. Cut out the coupon so you won't forget, for this is important to you.

"No. He selected me because I feel so strongly on the subject."

Here Ruby de Remer stopped at the table and we presented Mr. Carleton. "Meet Miss de Remer," we murmured, just like a movie title. One of our friends said that nobody ever introduced anyone that way in real life and we are going to prove to him that he is wrong. We do. That's how devoted we are to the cause. If the movies do not talk like real people, let real people talk like the movies. The effect will be the same.

Miss de Remer joined a party at another table and the waiter brought some hot corn muffins but it seemed as though everyone we knew was at the Knickerbocker that day. As they say in the movies "came Robert Warwick" and "came Edward Earle" and "came Percy Marmont" and to each we said boldly, "Meet Mr. Carleton."

"You know them all, dont you," he said, when we had returned to our muffins.

"Oh, yes!" we assured, "and it is fascinating to go around with them and have people stare at you. One day when we stopped to talk to Alice Joyce in front of Claridge's the crowd got so thick we had to call a traffic policeman to get us thru."

"You don't see any such demonstration over me, do you? I haven't made enough pictures yet to become internationally famous."

"Dont worry; anyone who saw you in 'The Society Exile' with Elsie Ferguson, isn't likely to forget you. But the trouble with you is no one would recognize you. We were all prepared for a dark man with a moustache, wearing a uniform, and here you are—"

"Dressed in tweeds with a smooth face and also red-headed. But, you know, red hair takes black on the screen."

"You, and Petrova," we said musingly. "But you do look, oh, so different in real life."

"So it seems. I went over to the studio on Fifty-sixth Street the other day and the boy at the door held me up. 'What do you want?' he said. 'I want to go to work,' I answered. 'We ain't doing any casting today. Come in Monday.' But wait until you see me in 'The Copperhead!' I have to portray a boy of twenty and an old man of seventy-one. When they were casting the play they told me of their quandary and asked me to look around for a good actor who could look twenty and make up to look seventy-one."

"A good actor?" we said.

"Yes," answered William, Jr., "and, of course, that let me out. But I scoured the country and couldn't find anyone who wished to undertake the job. When I reported this to Charlie Maigne, he placed both hands on my shoulders, looked me straight in the eye and said, 'William, you and I have been friends for a good many years; you must play it!' 'I can look seventy-one all right, but how about the twenty,' I answered.

"You know the advertisement, 'Is she twenty or eighty?' Why didn't you consult them?" we asked.

"Dont be flippant. It is a serious subject. A man who was the original 'Shade of the Sheltering Palm' man in 'Floradora' doesn't look twenty. You know that. But I got busy and worked with spirit gum and juvenile powder until I had done my darndest and when I went down they all agreed that angels could do no more. So I went back and tried the old man and for my pattern I used a picture of my revered grandfather. He was a kindly soul and his make-up was not difficult to copy. I found it far easier than the other. My efforts met with equal success, too, and Mr. Maigne said 'The part is yours,' just as tho I had been begging for it."

"An incident that occurred in the studio made me think that perhaps I possessed latent powers of make-up which I never suspected. On my way to the dressing room I asked one of the men in the studio if Mr. Barrymore had come in yet. He hadn't so I went upstairs to experiment with my juvenile make-up. When I came down I asked again and he said 'No, he isn't in. Your father was looking for him awhile ago.' Later, after I had put on the old man's make-up, I stood talking to Lionel Barrymore and the man saw me and said, 'They have got the whole family in this picture, haven't they?'"

"How many pictures have you made?" we asked.

"Only a half dozen—no, not that, only five."

"How does it happen that you have waited so long to get into pictures? You have been such a success and it might have happened long ago."

"I wasn't ready," answered Mr. Carleton. "I wanted to sing."

"But, look at Caruso and Mary Garden and—and Geraldine Farrar!" we added, hastily, as being, perhaps, a happier illustration.

"Yes, I know, but I had inherited the Carleton voice, they said, and I was sort of expected to sing. Had been doing it ever since I was a choir boy at the age of ten. And then, you know, I was in Boston most of the time and in Europe part of the time and to tell the truth I never had any particularly brilliant offer made me."

"But you certainly are a good actor on the screen and you have that peculiar something which has nothing to do with beauty and which is, to us, at least, far more essential. Miss Ferguson has it, too. That is why you are so delightful opposite her. That 'peculiar something' is what some people call 'class,' which would be a very good word if it were not such an overworked one."

"Thank you for them kind words. Particularly for 'class.' The word does not offend my aesthetic soul in the least, and if one must earn his living (and one must) there is no more congenial way of doing it than by working in front of the camera. I love the work."

"If it weren't for the cinema field days," said we, "and the community acting," said he.

THE SCREEN MONTH IN REVIEW

Juanita Hansen is being starred in the Pathé serial, "The Red Snows." Kathleen Clifford is playing opposite Douglas Fairbanks in his latest picture.

Macklyn Arbuckle has returned to the screen, with the San Antonio Picture Corporation. Alan Forrest, long Mary Miles Minter's lead, is playing opposite May Allison in "The Walk Offs."

Lieut. Frank C. Badgley has brought suit for divorce, in the New York Supreme Court, against June Elvidge.

Bessie Love's Vitagraph contract has expired.

Lew Cody is now making his own pictures at the Astra studios in Glendale, Cal. Noah Beery and Mabel Julienne Scott have the leads in the forthcoming Paramount revival of "The Sea Wolf," being directed by George Melford.

King Vidor has severed his connection with Brentwood and will produce for himself, featuring his wife, Florence Vidor. The Vidors were recent visitors in New York.

Bernard Durning, in private life Mr. Shirley Mason, made his screen debut in "When Bearcat Went Dry." Now he's under a long term contract with the C. R. Macauley Photoplays, Inc. Miss Mason is the featured player in Maurice Tourneur's forthcoming visualization of "Treasure Island."

Edgar Lewis productions are to be released thru Pathé. The first will be Andrew Soutar's "Other Men's Shoes."

Pauline Frederick has been visiting in New York. Also another Goldwynner, Tom Moore.

Earle Williams is producing for Vitagraph in the East. He will make "The Fortune Hunter" and two others at the Flatbush studios.

Harold Lloyd is rapidly recovering from injuries sustained, on Aug. 24, in an accidental bomb explosion. Jay Dwiggins, long a Famous Players-Lasky character actor, died on Sept. 8 in Hollywood.

Kay Laurel heads her own film company, with J. M. Shear as executive head of the organization. Jack O'Brien will direct.

Syd Chaplin has returned from Europe. Marshall Nielan has purchased Booth Tarkington's Penrod stories and will present Wesley Barry as the boy hero of the tales.

David Griffith is now producing in the East. He arrived with his staff early in October and has recently been in Florida.

Eugene O'Brien has recovered from a severe illness and is busily engaged on "The Broken Melody." The Carter de Havens have been signed by the Famous Players-Lasky, going over to that organization in November.

DEATH OF BILLY PARSONS.

"Smiling Billy" Parsons died at his home, in Los Angeles, on September 28. Mr. Parsons was founder and president of the National Film Corporation, the maker and star of his own comedies and long an active figure in the film world.

Before invading the screen, Mr. Parsons was highly successful in the life insurance business. It was after fourteen years of success in that field that Mr. Parsons turned to pictures. His first picture, "Tarzan of the Apes," was a big money maker, definitely deciding him to take up the screen in earnest.

Mr. Parsons was 41 years old. He was recently married to Billie Rhodes.

Be a high salaried business woman. Learn Costume and Millinery Designing. See your creations on the stage—in the films—and on Fifth Avenue.

You Can Learn By Mail or at Our Studios

Learn costume designing. It is based on two of the very fundamentals of living—the necessity for clothes and the feminine instinct for lovely, graceful, alluring attire. Never before has there been such a demand for designers.

You want pleasant work—Then learn costume designing. Once you have learned it, you can make it a splendid profession and give your whole time to it, or you can work at it in spare moments in your own home. Clothes are lovely in line, exquisite in color and costly in fabric. When you create them, you work only with beautiful things and you contribute to one of the recognized arts today.

You Want to Improve Your Appearance—

You want to be the best-dressed woman in your set—to be an authority on the art of dress. You want clothes that express your temperament—that suit your personality. You know what you want, but often you can't make your dressmaker, your milliner, or your tailor understand. Then learn the technique of costume designing, and you can make a sketch that will show them exactly what you have in mind. Your clothes need never be a mistake—you can always have what you want.

You Want a Satisfactory Income—

Then costume designing will give it to you. There really is no other profession in which, given only a fair amount of talent, you can arrive at the top in so short a time. One graduate of the Brown Studios is receiving over $10,000 a year as a designer in a Fifth Avenue establishment. Another is designing for the pageants and balls of a prominent New York hotel. Another creates for big moving-picture productions. Still another designs costumes for vaudeville acts and another for moving-picture actresses, and all are receiving salaries far in excess of anything that they could achieve in so short a time in any other field.

The Brown Course consists of lessons which may be taken under the personal directions of Mr. Brown in his Fifth Avenue or San Francisco Studios. For those who are unable to attend either studio there is a complete course that may be taken by mail which is usually completed in three or four months, depending, of course, upon the ability of the student.

P. Clement Brown

Costume and Millinery Design de Luxe

The course in costume designing covers every field of dress:—sketching costumes; creating distinctive suits and wraps, daytime frocks and evening gowns; the making of patterns; modeling and draping materials; dress-making; and the originating and making of smart millinery.

The increasing demand for designers from the Brown Studios has made it necessary for Mr. Brown to move into a new and enlarged establishment in New York. He has been so fortunate as to secure an entire floor at 620 Fifth Avenue, where he has opened the most unique and complete studio in this country for the teaching of costume and millinery design. and ordinary expenses and the salaries are so small. I had hardly known when I went into pictures that there was so much salary in the whole world. It made me dizzy and I hoped and prayed it would continue. They signed me up when the two weeks were over and I gladly turned my back on musical comedy, one-night stands and general discomforts.

"I finished the last five episodes of 'Patria' with Irene Castle. I wasn't in any of the swimming or diving pictures. That was out of the question then, because I hadn't learned to swim. My real advertising came with Mrs. Castle because the film was so much discussed before it was suppressed. I consider that my real chance. I did 'Liberty' also."

"When did you take up swimming?"

"We went to Hawaii to shoot some scenes and there I met the Duke Kahanamoku—the famous swimmer of Honolulu, who personally instructed me. When I left, he gave me a beautiful ukulele which he had made himself—one of my treasured mementoes of a happy holiday."

"Miss Walcamp, did you ever call the Duke by his WHOLE name?" I had been watching her spell it to me—spellbound, as it were.

"Why, of course I did. Just like this " What I heard sounded like a muffled alarm clock trying to tell the hour. Marie has a deep contralto voice, gained by much shouting over the hills of the U's big "Back Ranch." She had a shrill soprano at one time, but while the contralto sometimes breaks "on her," Marie considers that it is generally reliable for classification in the "female baritone" class. She seldom sings now—the serious business of acting has taken up all her powers of concentration.

"Isn't it queer how many players are doing serials just now and making good?" said Miss Walcamp, suddenly taking charge of the interview. "I believe the serial is the savior of the motion picture business. An exhibitor as well as the producer has something to fall back on—it's a sure bet. The serials are making money everywhere. Anne Luther and Herb Rawlinson are doing splendid stories and there are many others who are beginning to see the advantage of holding public attention. Of course, it's always the same old thing, I get chased, abused, nearly killed, rescued in the nick of time, loved, hated—and finally there's a happy forever after! The stories are much alike in that respect, but the pleasure to the actress is in the many new locations—just think, next I'm going to Japan to work on a serial—the ingenious devices used and the unexpected situations which are quite as entertaining to her as to any audience. I can hardly imagine myself out of in the service of her country, too. She drove an ambulance in New York, meeting the ships as they came in and carrying wounded to various debarkation hospitals. And, she will tell you, there was nothing in the least depressing about it. The most tragic things somehow became beautiful.

"That was when we were all excited, of course. When there was no call for the ambulance, I used to go to the hospitals and talk with the boys there. I don't think that they realized what it would mean to be crippled for life. There was one little Irishman, for instance, who had lost both his legs. He never grumbled about that, but he used to make a fuss about the most ridiculously little things—things you would wonder he would even think of in the face of his big tragedy. Yes, he was a giant in big things, this Irishman, but he was a baby in small ones. He used to hate the boy in the cot next to him. This boy had twenty-seven wounds all from shrapnel and had won the Croix de Guerre and he always insisted on having his coat hanging on the back of a chair near his bed so that everyone could see the Croix. He was kiddish, too, this boy and I suppose that that is what got on the nerves of the Irishman—" she smiled reminiscently, a smile that grew into a laugh and then she explained. It seemed that the Irishman had a habit of talking about battles he had never been in at all, tho he never said a word about the one in which he had lost his legs.

"And now it is all over and we must all begin living in prose again. I hope I get some really big and cheerful stories. You don't know how difficult it is! Nearly every scenario we get has the same old 'wronged woman' in it somewhere."

The first thing you notice about Edith Storey is her deep humanity. She has a gift for fitting into any scene, or becoming one of any group of people in any walk of life, that is far beyond ordinary adaptability. It is as tho she had, herself, belonged to every nationality and lived thru every possible experience in the world.

Edith Storey, a New Yorker by birth, went on the stage when she was eight years old. She appeared in "Audrey" with Eleanor Robson, in "The Little Princess" and in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." She joined the Vitagraph Film Company when she was about thirteen.

"That was at the time when J. Stuart Blackton used to direct and Albert Smith, the present head of the company, cranked the camera. When the men finished acting they used to don overalls and build the set they were to work in next day. I remember that Maurice Costello was the first actor we had who refused to wield a hammer. He insisted that he was an actor, not a carpenter, and soon the others followed suit and the profession gained new dignity."

In addition to doing child rôles and "pages" she was the official "stunt" actress. She could swim, ride, fall or climb to any director's satisfaction and so she was frequently called on to do all of them—"Once, when I was about fourteen years old," she said, "they needed an old lady to fall off a bridge. With the aid of a grey wig, I was the old lady!"

She is quite as athletic now as she was when a little girl and, incidentally, she hates to cook, can't cook, and won't cook.

She likes to live rather on the edge of things. Her Long Island home is some miles from anywhere, and when I saw her recently in Los Angeles she had just rented a bungalow within a block or two of the city limits—some miles from anywhere, too. It is a pretty place, however, with big high ceilinged rooms, plenty of windows and a low, broad cement porch. I found her cutting dead leaves from a fern.

Sooner, her favorite dog, was there too; a cuddly white ball curled up on the porch sound asleep. Sooner had just given her quite a fright, she told me. It seems that she had left the hotel and rented a house especially for Sooner and then, on the first day they moved in—(her mother and brother are both with her now)—Sooner disappeared.

"I was afraid he had gotten lost and would never find his way back," she said. "I went all over the neighborhood calling him." Instead of a whistle, her call for Sooner is a short, shrill rolling note blown thru her puffed lips—"Bl-bl-bl Bl-bl-bl!"—

"I walked blocks bl-bl-bl-ing at every step, but still, no Sooner. I suppose the neighbors think that I'm crazy—"

He showed up all right but not until evening and he had another dog with him. It seems that the first thing Sooner does in a new neighborhood is to make friends.

You see, then, that Edith Storey's home atmosphere is simple and wholesome; no "dust of Egypt" about it anywhere but just a little touch of the exotic in her own personality to lend additional charm and mystery.

We talked about women—or he did. We also talked about marriage. He said he believed in, longed for it. He thinks there is one love, one love only and many counterfeits. He thinks we believe in the counterfeits because we so greatly want to, need to. He talked with something of a sympathetic sadness of a certain type of girl of today—girls who degrade their youth by painting their faces and smoking cigarets and sitting in the vitiated air of cabarets. It is a mistake, he says, to believe that men, worth-while men, want that.

"You women want good men, dont you?" he asked; "good men? Well, we men want good women. Wholesome women. Strong, sanely balanced women. Women who are, primarily, good comrades."

He told me of his home in California and the sweep of land and sea and sky it had and the free, out-of-door life he led there. He told me, too, in relevance to our talk of women and men, that no woman was permitted to smoke in his home nor to touch wine. "They may do it where they will," he said, "I dont doubt but what some of them did, but I dont want to have to see it, and I have a right to preserve my ideals in my own home, haven't I?"

I asked him if he thought many people had ideals, consciously. He said he thought they did. He has never, he says, lost his simple first faith in human nature. Never swerved in his empedestal-ling of women. Never relinquished the belief that the great and good life, the secret of lasting happiness, the alchemy of deep content is the simple life, the quiet life in the country with little of the fever of ambition, with books and a few friends and the woman one loves. "Love is the greatest thing in life, of course," he said.

"I couldn't stand New York," he went on—"the elevated over my head; the subways underneath me; the look on the faces of most of the people I see; the strain and push and sweat and grind. I'm going back to California where, if anywhere, people really live

"I was born and brought up in New York City, but that doesn't make me love it. I was born and brought up in a theatrical family. That doesn't make me love the theatrical, either.

"I have come thru to a lot of beliefs I didn't have, of course, say ten years ago. I have not always had this philosophy or this way of looking at things. I'm a Christian Scientist and that has solved a lot for me, given me light. And then, too, I have gone down and lived in the very depth of things, not because I was ever so unfortunate as to have to, but because I wanted to, for the experience. I wanted to test out the theory that environment will make or break a man. It will not. It is the man every time. A man can keep intact his immortal soul as well in a dive as in a mansion. No person or no place or no circumstance has power over him. His is the power. His alone. Man cannot blame his state on circumstance, since he moulds circumstance—or could."

We talked a while of books. Bill Russell likes to read biographies and autobiographies—because they're real

We talked of hobbies and the pursuit of pleasure—and he has his pipe—not cigarets; and he likes to take his car and ride about the Westchester hills—when he is in the East—and feel the freedom of the winds he loves sweep past him as he goes.

He likes to dream as men dreamed long ago when the world was new—and he has built about him a shield of idealism that these dreams be not destroyed.

A Man-Person. A flash-back to Adam, the first man, when he walked in the cool of the first morning.

Barthelmess: The Boy

It is his mother love. Now mother love, I am afraid, is a thing that may become destructive, foolish, a figurative ball-and-chain. Not with Barthelmess and his mother. Between them there is companionship, pal-dom, love.

Before our interview his mother had been ill, confined in a Long Island sanitarium for weeks. Barthelmess spent every week-end with her.

"Mother does not want it," he told me when I heard him turn down an invitation to a house party, "but I know her heart—and I am not going to disappoint her."

Her recovery was slow but finally she has been able to join her son in New York. Once again Barthelmess has the companionship he longs for, and when time permits—(the Griffith players frequently work far into the night)—he does the theaters with his mother.

"The two pals," they call them. And well they may.

On Vamps and Ingenues

"What men are worth vamping?" she asked, with the seriousness one should give to such a weighty question. "The men whose brains have raised them above the mass of their fellows. Now when the generally accepted type of vamp knocks at the door of these same brains, the man is put on his guard at once. He looks at the curve of the lips, the slant of the eyes, the cut of the black gown and knows that the lady has but one purpose in view, to vamp him. If he is wise—or even if he but thinks he is wise—he turns from her at once. Then comes the sweet, child-like, wonder-eyed girl, the girl who looks as if she were born to pick daisies, to chase butterflies, to coo sweet lullabies at twilight, and, lo, you find him hanging a diamond—or a limousine—on each curly eyelash. That vamp is the real actress. Behind the baby stare may be a mind plotting to overthrow a throne; the girlish giggle may be more deadly than a siren's song, but the man never guesses it and therein lies the great secret of success.

"And the screen vamp has set the example for the vamp in real life. Have you ever noticed young girls who are blessed—or is it cursed?—with the innate desire to lure fashioning their dress, their actions on the model of some famous screen vamp? The latter's method of luring must be the correct one or why has it succeeded with so many men thru so many reels of so many features?" They don't seem to realize that vamping talents come from within, that a girl can't don the generally accepted gown and accessories of a vamp and be miraculously endowed with the capacity to vamp. She must first have the feeling—and, I may add, the brains—for it, and then the proper setting will come as a matter of course.

"And the ingénue! As soon as one star, by her personality, won the heart of the screen public, her type became the accepted one for the ingénue. If a girl in any way resembling her crossed the path of a picture director she was at once hailed as a "find," while hundreds of others just as truly typical of the young American girl knocked vainly at the screen door. I like ingénues. I enjoy playing them much more than I do vamps, but the one that appeals to me is the girl who requires characterization, not the one who is simply "sweet," and is content to let it go at that."

Dorothy Green is sure that to be perfectly normal one must be a "nut" on some subject and she is a nut on sanitation. She took me thru her doll-house apartment, just a stone's throw from the theatrical district, but far enough away to forget if need be the noise, the bustle, the White Lights, and exhibited its spotlessness; that, too, upon the eve of forsaking it for a new home further uptown.

Most of the star's friends are girls in other professions.

"I am just as interested in their lines of work as they are in mine," she said. "It keeps me from becoming narrow, from viewing life from the sole point of view of a moving picture actress."

At that very instant the 'phone rang. It was one of Dorothy's business chums with her own particular problem to solve, and Dorothy gave her advice just as wisely as if she had been sitting behind an office desk for years.

"Don't ever bob your hair," she warned me as she stopped for a moment with the comb suspended above the fluffy mass. "If you have two inches, nurse them carefully and pray fervently that at each harvest time, another quarter of an inch will be added."

"How did you ever have the courage to do it?" I inquired, recalling the heavy dark braids coiled at each side of the head that were part of the Dorothy Green I had known.

"Why, it's just like falling in love," she answered thoughtfully. "One doesn't need courage; just an idle moment. One does it and then spends hours wondering why."

"And regretting?"

"Sometimes."

Dorothy admits two hobbies beside sanitation: jazz music and sheer hosiery. To her mind the success of the Pied Piper is easily explained. He was a jazz artist and she is sure that, had the Garden of Eden been hung with sheer hosiery instead of prosaic apples, Eve, not Adam, would have had the tag line of the play.

Of course, the moon for which the baby Dorothy cried was a stage career. Her childish dreams were woven about great actresses whose glories would some day descend upon her young shoulders. Then came that operation on her throat that marked on the stage door, "No Admittance." But fortunately for Dorothy and the public, pictures were beginning to come into their own.

It was in Mr. Lasky's "The Country Boy"—playing the chorus girl—that she laid the foundation of her career as a vamp. She continued to "vamp" for William Fox, the World Film, and then she decided to turn over a new leaf and be an ingénue, not any kind of ingénue, but one permitting characterization.

And what if there had been no silent drama? Then Dorothy would have invented some method of giving expression to her dramatic talent. For she has originality—the originality that laughingly disards the ladder with the broken rungs and makes for itself a new one.

Improve your complexion. Have your own beauty parlor.

For headache, nervousness, fatigue, insomnia, indigestion.

YOU will find the Star Electric Massage Vibrator on sale in most drug, department and electrical-goods stores. In case you are unable to get the "Star" in your city, send Five Dollars, your local dealer's name and address to us and we will send one complete outfit direct to you, postpaid. Fitzgerald Mfg. Co., Dept. 216, Torrington, Conn.

The woman of fastidious tastes, young or old, realizes that beauty is but a natural reflection of health. Wrinkles, "crow's feet," eyes that have lost their youthful sparkle, obesity and other unwelcome facial blemishes are, to a great extent at least, brought on by what we term "the strenuous life." Muscles are sure to become weary and congested unless they get relaxation. And complexions are certain to suffer unless properly taken care of. Home electric massage is recognized as the building-up process nearest to Nature's.

Electric massage is the active man's best friend. It takes the kinks out of sore muscles, stiff joints, sprains; it relieves headache, nervousness, fatigue; it is ideal for after-shaving facial massage and a boon to men whose hair is falling out. So the "Star" really is the ideal $5.00 Christmas gift. Especially so when you stop to realize that other vibrators cost from eighteen dollars up to fifty.

Get a "Star." Put it first on your shopping list for Christmas purchases. Complete outfit only $5.00. Includes three applicators, six feet of cord and illustrated booklet explaining all uses. The Star "Universal," a more powerful vibrator, costs $6.00. Fits any electric light socket. Preferred by many. Make your choice to-day. Fitzgerald Mfg. Co., Dept. 216, Torrington, Conn.

Men! Try this: After you've finished shaving, take a little cold cream, rub it over your face—then massage yourself with the "Star" for two or three minutes. It's great!

Treat your hair and scalp at home. Save that beauty parlor money. A "Star" costs only $5.00, but lasts for years. Get one to-day and let your husband use it.

That was all musical comedy had of Miss Hammerstein. In the few years that have followed, the cinema has fared far luckier. And yet, managers are still clamoring for her in their stellar rôles. That is why she calls the Selznicks the best friends she has in the world. "Myron is my boss, you know, and he refuses to let me play any theatrical engagements while he's starring me on the screen." She laughs over the titles of her productions. "The Argyle Case," "The Madcap Lover," "An Accidental Honeymoon." A few months ago she was billed all over the country as "Elaine Hammerstein—'Wanted for Murder,'" and this, her first Selznick picture—"Elaine Hammerstein in 'The Country Cousin.'" Her second stellar piece is called "Love," and her mother, who had just entered the room, said she hoped it wouldn't be advertised as "Elaine Hammerstein in Love."

Portraits of Your Favorites

TWENTY-FOUR LEADING PLAYERS

What is a home without pictures, especially of those one likes or admires? How they brighten up bare walls and lend a touch of human sympathy, alike to the homes of the rich and poor!

And what could better serve the purpose of decoration for the homes of motion picture enthusiasts than portraits of the great film stars, who have become world-wide famous?

These portraits are 5½" x 8" in size, just right for framing, printed in rich brown tones by rotogravure, a process especially adapted to portrait reproductions, and are artistic, accurate and high-grade in every way.

You will like these portraits, you will enjoy picking out your favorites. You will delight in framing them to be hung where you and your friends may see them often.

A Fillum Fatality

By WALTER E. MAIR

"O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

Sub-titled the star as he mourned neath a willow.

But straightway on payday he bought him a loud

And luxurious necktie as large as a pillow.

He bought him five shirts of the costliest weave,

He bought a blue diamond to add to his splendor,

Then, nicely, precisely, from out of his sleeve

He drew forth a roll for ye touring-car vendor.

He bought him a phoney Los Angeles farm,

And stocked it with high-balls and white leghorn chickens;

The latter, I flatter him, did him no harm,

Being not of the species that raiseth the dickens.

He bought and he bought, did this film Galahad sad,

Who so nobly declaimed, with such soulfulness utter,

Till play-day, not pay-day, was all that he had;

His credit—his job—took a spin to the gutter.

"O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?"

He has married an extra-girl—Garlic-tooth Rhoda.

"Tho he walks and he talks with his head in a cloud,

He is back at his old twenty-per, jerking soda.

The Owner of the "Uncas" family of three and his brother and sister—non-professional, both of them—have never taken the slightest interest in the sport that interests him so greatly. He has a broad and characteristic philosophy; a belief that everything moves in cycles and that individuals, like events, return again and again, each time on a higher plane, until they reach perfection.

He does not like detail. Perhaps the most noticeable characteristic thing about him is his love of dashing thru things; his impatience of any restraint. He looks to be about twenty-seven years old.

His stage and screen career is so young and so much has been said about it recently, that it does not need recounting here; enough that it, too, has moved quickly. He began in amateur theatricals in Indiana. From that to professional work was just a step, and two years after he went on the stage he landed on Broadway, New York. He has been on the screen for two years, his first moving picture work being with World.

Five o'clock came—"at last!" He drove me back to Los Angeles. His motor car is painted green. On the way, we talked of the Uncas, moving pictures, real estate, money and the Uncas again.

"I wish I could be with the Wilson boys when they make that trip," he said. "Doc Wilson told me that they'll be sixty days on the way, stopping, of course, at all the interesting ports." He cut a corner sharply. "Do you know," he went on, "I'd like to have money enough to be absolutely free. Not rich, you understand, there is no freedom in that—but, say, an independent income of a hundred dollars a day. If I had such an income, I don't believe I'd work any more"—remember this was said at the close of a busy August day—"or, if I did work, I'd like to do something else. I think I'd like to be a recognized writer. Those chaps can go anywhere, any time they want to. I knew one, a writer of advertisements, who had his yacht next to mine in the Hudson. He was always going off somewhere because that was his whim and there was nothing to stop him."

By which you may see that the owner of the Uncas was homesick for a long cruise and, anyhow, it is characteristic of August that no matter where one is he sits down and wishes himself elsewhere.

THE SILENT DRAMA

By CLARENCE E. FLYNN

Out of the silence often comes
A voice that breaks the stillness deep,
And with an eloquence unheard

Calls hidden memories from their sleep.
It carries power unknown to speech;

It speaks directly to the heart,
Grown thoughtful in the silences.
Such is the screen's appealing art.

It calls the strong to lost resolve,
It thrills the weak to better things,
It touches sleeping hopes to life
And in the songless heart it sings.

It opens scenes of loveliness
For eyes long used to barren spot,
This sacred silence that is heard
Where thought is all and voice is not.

ONE MILLION DOLLARS A YEAR

ONE HUNDRED DOLLARS A WEEK

is being made by thousands of persons in the Motion Picture Industry.

Hundreds of Thousands of People are asking every day such questions as these:

- How can I get into the Motion Picture business?
- Can I become a photoplayer?
- Have I sufficient talent?
- Have I the necessary personality?
- How can I become a Motion Picture Director?
- Can I become financially interested in Motion Pictures?
- Can I write for Motion Pictures?
- Have I a "Motion Picture face"?
- Can I train myself for any branch of the business?
- If I have the talent and ability to become a picture star, how can I get a start?

These are questions that have long remained unanswered. But they can be answered. There have been schools that pretend to teach Motion Picture acting, but they are generally frowned upon by the profession. Personality, charm, winsomeness and beauty are God-given gifts. They can be cultivated and improved, but not created. Acting is a natural talent. Some have it, others acquire it, but most people who haven't it never will learn it. Grace is natural to some, but most people can acquire it. There is no rule about beauty, grace, charm, etc., and some may win without any one of the supposedly necessary requirements.

If you want to try to win a place in the great Motion Picture Industry, send five cents in stamps for this booklet.

Here are a few very successful stars:

Chaplin	Pickford	Fairbanks
Hart	Nazimova	Drew
Arbuckle	Keenan

How different they are! Not one of them is noted for grace or form, and hardly one for beauty, and dozens of others might be added to this list.

And in the various other branches of the Motion Picture business startling deductions can be made. The Motion Picture Institute was organized to analyze the conditions of the Motion Picture Industry, to inform the public of these conditions, and to show how and why some people can get in and why others cannot.

A competent and experienced staff of experts have been secured to carry on this much needed work.

Later, I returned to the attack. His very reluctance was my goad. His reticence hid revelation.

"Well," he said, cleverly, with a twinkle in his eye: "well—let us have patience, then. That is, surely, the indispensable requisite."

And he was not to be tempted farther. When it came to his early days he was more fluent, tho, always, the "I" was toned down, passed over, dismissed. He was born in Belgium, but is "American now," he says, and he has the lingering of his native land in his speech. He was to be a musician, his father being one before him and when, later, he gave up music for the stage, José père almost disowned him, considering the step, no doubt, a distinct drop in caste.

He told, too, with reminiscent amusement tinged with the young tragedy it must have been to him, of playing with Sarah Bernhardt on an opening night in Paris—or, more accurately, in Sarah Bernhardt's company. He had a small part, he said, only six or eight lines, but the character, that of a young king, is very much discussed by the other players before his entrance. His arrival is heralded with pomp and fanfare. "I stepped upon the stage," he narrated, "in full panoply of sword and satin, tripped upon the sword and measured my length upon the floor of the stage. A moment and the house burst into ruinous gales of laughter. The opening was a farce. It was horrible at the time. You can imagine the distraught state of my mind as I went to Bernhardt's dressing-room and tendered my most abject apologies, promising to act better the next time. 'Act!' said Bernhardt, justly enraged, 'young man, you will never act!' It was terrible—terrible"—sighed José, shuddering again over the span of years.

He toured the provinces, then, he said, for some years, with his wife, playing in Africa, the Far East, etc., and finally, believing that there was little chance of big money for the general actor, went into the managerial end of it. He came to America for six weeks' stay, I think he said, and things went so successfully that—why, that he is still here and has been for more years than the number of weeks he planned.

He fought his way upward, starting with vaudeville. Always he clung to his artistic ideals—thru thick and thin.

Pictures, he said, always appealed to him. Chiefly from the directing end. At first, however, he played in pictures for Pathé, also with Theda Bara in her first picture, "A Fool There Was," and he, incidentally, introduced her to the screen, engaging her for the part from the rank and file of many applicants. He said, with another canny wink in my direction, that it was a very good thing for a director to have been an actor first—thru the mill, in other words—tho not necessarily essential, he added.

It came out bit by bit, waived by him at my slightest appreciative sign, but emphasized by his wife, that he not only reads every book that comes out, writes his own scripts, casts them, directs them but follows the raw stock of the film straight thru to completion. "I wish you would emphasize that," said Mrs. José, who is ideally the comrade-wife; "I believe that it is quite exceptional."

We touched upon the controversial question of the Screen as Art or Commercialism.

Mr. José seemed to be momentarily amazed that there could be any controversy on the subject.

"An Art, absolutely," he said; "those people who take the other side of the question do not take into consideration the tremendous work, the detail, the time and the often colossal expenditure in even the least picture. Only Art achieves such results, however short that Art may fall of its ultimate possibilities. All Art has some room for progression, for further perfecting. High spots are not the everyday run. 'The Miracle Man'—and 'Broken Blossoms'—pinnacles!"

Back of Director José (this is s. p.—Strictly Personal) there is another director. The director behind the director! A feminine person, aged three and answering to the name of Helene José. His little girl. "She is the one soft spot with Ted," said Mrs. José, smiling at him over the tea-cups—the director had left his desk and was drinking his four o'clock tea and having his four o'clock cigaret, a ceremony he never omits, even at the studio, where Mrs. José is with him and serves it for him, as at home.

"Well, but how can I help it?" asked the wee Helene's Assistant Director, with a smile; "her little talk—and all, it is so wonderful—" He got out of his big chair and took a large photograph from the book shelves to show to me. "I saw her as I came in," I said; "she is adorable." Mr. José nodded. "Yes, now, isn't she?" he asked, "can you blame me? And do you know, she has no respect for her father at all. She calls me 'Ted' and when I try, at times, to be very stern and very paternal, she laughs at me. She takes me for a humorist. Maybe I am—with her."

Mr. José is not, strictly, a humorist, unless in a very super-sense of the word. He is the rare being who can make an adaptation of life; who can live it and at the same time, play it. He can direct because he is, himself, by himself, directed. He accepts traditions and does not bruise the vigor of his years battling, inadequately, against them. He comes from the Old World and he brings some of the old world's riper philosophy with him. He can run a gamut, which is good. He can be the great director (he would modestly eschew this) and he can be the playmate a tiny child calls "Ted."

too, he told her what to read, directed her reading, discussed the books with her afterward. At once, the characters sprang to life, lived, breathed, had vital sorts of beings. Everything was animate. Her viewpoint, too, it was deliciously strong and tender . . . he had thought himself so wise, who was not wise at all—at best, he was wise enough to learn . . .

Several weeks of this slipped by and then, with the same unexpectedness Schomberg had felt, the plain Mr. Jones arrived on Samburan. He had with him Ricardo and Pedro.

Heyst made them comfortable in one of the abandoned bungalows. He had no reason not to. Their discomfort at his hospitality fired the abstract alarm the plain Mr. Jones gave him. There was something quite horrible about Mr. Jones; he was so unnecessarily pallid. Even the spice of the trade winds gave him, Heyst noticed, only the unpleasant greenness of decay. Heyst felt him to be very unhealthy. Of course, appearances . . .

He was afraid for Alma, too, as he had come to call the white girl. These men . . . their attitudes . . . a woman alone, as Alma was . . . Suddenly Heyst felt himself to be very much a man and Alma very potently a woman, needing his protection, needing him . . . The blood so long quiescent in his veins awoke and pounded. How wrong his father had been! What a false premise his negation had been! Or else, how long and how bitterly he must have starved and thirsted! That was it, perhaps, someone had long denied him and decried him; someone very dear to him, as Alma might be dear . . . Heyst felt, suddenly, none of his former pride in his father, cold tribute, but burningly sorry for him, bitterly compassionate, yearning . . .

It became apparent almost at once, certainly to Alma, that these men were here for a purpose. Ricardo, she soon learned, included her in his purpose. She had one desperate encounter with him and sent him spinning across the room, after which his attitude was more, rather than less devotional. Still later, he became consuming. He would be dangerous, Alma knew, dangerous to Heyst. With the cunning of a woman who loves Alma knew that the safe way for Heyst was for her to dally with Ricardo, to worm their motives from him, to lead him on. For herself . . . she was accidental, anyhow, a fragment conjured out of some detached nothingness; it had been easy to come; so would it be easy to go back. But Heyst . . . Heyst was different. Heyst must go on living, a god, apart. "The love that loves for love" came to the girl's mind . . . without thought of any other thing than that love's sake . . . and it came to her, too, that it might not be unpleasant to sleep on this fruitful island lulled by the sea . . . dust, some day, beneath his pass-

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by E. B. Davison of New York, one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, 'most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

"The time will come," writes the same authority, "when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of playwrights, novelists, scenario, magazine and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them!" And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—armies of them— young and old, now doing mere clerical work, in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, now pounding typewriters, or standing behind counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are the Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as he did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the Imagination free rein they might have astonished the world!

But two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Toasted Bubble Grains

Here are whole grains—Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. Corn Puffs are corn hearts puffed.

Puffed Wheat in milk forms practically a complete food. All the needed elements, including minerals and vitamins, are there.

All are steam exploded—puffed to 8 times normal size. In fact, a hundred million steam explosions occur in every kernel. Every atom is fitted to digest.

There are scores of ways to serve them. One is to crisp and butter for children to eat dry. Use like nut meats in home candy making—scatter in your soups.

As breakfast dainties they hold premier place. And nothing makes the milk dish so attractive.

Don't make them occasional foods. The three kinds offer variety.

The more children eat the better. The less they eat the more they want of something not so good.

ing feet . . . beneath his scattered flowers . . . of course he would not forget her, would not be oblivious of her . . . he was not so made.

The climax came before a clearing of the situation presented itself. It was all very strange. Of an evening Mr. Jones and Heyst would sit together and play backgammon, each watching the other with a cold intensity. Heyst felt, always, that some presence from a long-filled grave had come to dally with him for some weirdly pleasant hour. Mr. Jones did not betray what he felt, unless it was the faintness of a disbelief, an unwilling sort of a liking, chilling in the extreme.

And always Ricardo followed Alma, begging her favors, making love to her, threatening her, lavishing extravagances of praise upon her, hinting that their presence on Samburan had to do with treasures Heyst had stolen from dead men and buried there, on the wane of the moon.

On one of these nights, as Ricardo was making his most violent assertions Alma looked up to see Heyst and Mr. Jones standing in the doorway. Mr. Jones convulsed her with sick shudders. He looked as a corpse might look who has been rudely disturbed from his slumbers.

"What did I tell you about women?" he muttered, levelling his pistol, suddenly drawn, at Ricardo, all his dispelled animosity suddenly concentrated toward the Venezuelan; "what did I tell you about women . . . about women . . . what, answer, rat, what?"

Alma made the next, sudden move—a knife flashed thru the air—Ricardo toppled over at a thrust of her strong arm—Mr. Jones fired and when the din and the powder cleared away Heyst had Alma in his arms, over both of them her blood flowing, bright red and somehow victorious.

"I did this to save you," she whispered to him, holding her throat in which the pulse leapt, frighteningly; "I did this to save you . . . I led him on . . . I let him think . . . They would have killed us . . . for gold . . . they think we have gold . . . but now he is gone and you . . . oh, you are . . . safe . . ."

The pulse in Alma's throat seemed to Heyst to be his own heart pumping her blood away . . . Negation . . . how thin . . . how thin! Himself, a shade among shades . . .

Outside the surf was pounding and tomorrow the hot sun would draw all the strong scents of the earth into its passionate heart and there would be a shimmer of hot gold over all the land, squandered flowers . . . natives dancing . . . this white woman . . . where? Where would she be? . . . In his arms . . . close to his heart . . . because he knew . . . he knew . . . the riddle of heaven and earth . . . the sea . . . the sky . . . all living things and all things dead . . . He loved her . . .

And pressing his mouth on hers . . . he told her so . . .

ence of British made films in the States will arouse the same feelings of pardonable curiosity among the Americans."

Speaking of subtitles, why doesn't some company sign Daisy Ashford to write captions?

Anne Luther wore 103 gowns during six days of the making of the serial, "The Lurking Peril," and wrecked them all doing stunts. After seeing a serial, we know just how a gown feels after participating in one.

The British may poke fun at our screen methods, but their sense of humor stops short of reading their own film press material. We had to send to the nearest drug store for a restorative after our office-boy had glanced over a batch of recent screen press stories. Note these choice bits, bearing the plea "for the favor of insertion":

"Whilst riding on the Downs for a scene in her new production, 'The Gentleman Rider,' Miss Violet Hopson was thrown from her horse, and altho not seriously hurt, this popular star sustained a severe shaking. It will be remembered that whilst acting in the Broadwest film, 'A Fortune at Stake,' last year, Miss Hopson had a bad accident in Rotten Row and was for some time unable to work owing to a severely sprained ankle."

And this:

"If you had been privileged to look in at the Broadwest studio one day last week you would have found a very merry party at dinner. Somewhere behind the scenes, rag-time tunes were being played to 'get the atmosphere,' altho no piano appeared in this particular scene. It was effective, however, for when a call of 'speed up that rag' spurred the musician on to syncopate the already raggy tune, the artistes 'got going' and the scene proved a huge success."

German kinemas, according to film men just returned from Berlin, are against providing remarkable musical programs. The popular film demand is for detective and society dramas. The reported wave of immorality in the German kinemas seems to be without foundation. The moral level of films there is pronounced excellent.

The manufacturing of German lenses and projectors is being taken up rapidly. This will shortly have an effect on the American market.

At present American activities on the other side are interesting to note. The Italian Kinema Union, the biggest film organization in Italy, has signed Herbert Brenon to produce a series of pictures starring Marie Doro. The first will be "The Mysterious Princess."

Reel Realities

Photoplay fashions change, indeed! Consider the screen idol of some two years ago, the vampire, the be-curved ingénue.

All of them are in the discard, altho the curly-headed flapper has fought hard for screen life.

It is distinctly a man's year in the films. Producers declare that the world war has centered interest in masculinity. Anyway, nearly all the new stars on the horizon are men—Eugene O'Brien, Owen Moore, Lew Cody, David Powell and others.

But the days of the Bushmans, the Williamsses and the other typical film idols have waned.

Note what Crane Wilbur says on another page of this CLASSIC.

Photoplay followers have sickened of the clothing store manikin who personified every virtue. It's thumbs down for the film idol wearing an arrow collar and a halo.

Today the popular man on the screen must be different—and human. The debut of Douglas Fairbanks marked the dawn of this era. He did something besides pose.

Observe how players like Wallie Reid are turning to comedy, how Bert Lytell has switched to character studies in "Lombardi, Ltd."

Recently we had 'Gene O'Brien, in "The Perfect Lover," as a painter who decides to put his affairs of the heart behind him and settle down to domesticity.

And now we have Lew Cody bringing another male character to the screen—the typical boulevardier, the man about town who, according to Mr. Cody's own announcement, is "always charming in manner, with a distingué air and a way with women—in brief, a man of personality who is not disliked by men, tho they envy him his savoir faire and his knowledge of the secret of living."

Thus the screen male who is a mingling of good and bad. Some miles from the virtuous but unsoiled blacksmith of the pioneer film days!

For women the steps must necessarily come slower. Yet the lady of dead black morals—the vamp—has passed.

The guileless ingénue—of dead white morals—is also in oblivion.

This year we have had our not entirely spotless but more or less humanly good women of "The Woman Thou Gavest Me," "Katherine Bush," and other popular photodramas.

Not to mention the sophisticated ladies of the De Mille dramas who can look a divorce in the face without quivering a single beaded eyelash.

The whole style in women folk has changed. We have our Nazimovas, our stately Katherine MacDonalds, our lureful Gloria Swansons and our beautiful Corinne Griffiths where once gambled the be-curved ingénue of other days. We consider the very human frailties of our film heroines as calmly as once the flapper star watched her pet canary.

The photoplay can be safely said to be advancing when it no longer demands that its characters be good or bad as in the old-fashioned melodramas—white or black of heart in the most obvious style.

We have discovered that there is something of good and something of bad in everyone! Which means that our stories are passing the kindergarten stage. Does not Maughan say, in his "The Moon and Sixpence," "I did not realize how motley are the qualities that go to make up a human being? Now I am well aware that pettiness and grandeur, malice and charity, hatred and love, can find place side by side in the same human heart."

The coming few months will see a definite stand taken against the cutting of feature plays to fit de luxe theater programs.

Recall what David Griffith said recently in THE CLASSIC?

Mary Pickford has just announced that she will not permit her future productions to be cut in any way by exhibitors, either to shorten their programs or because they do not like certain scenes.

This winter is going to see an interesting experiment. While American companies are talking of invading England and the Continent to produce pictures, a British film company is coming, bag and baggage, to produce in California.

The organization, G. B. Samuelson's all-British Company, will probably produce at Universal City. Mr. Samuelson is bringing his entire company, including Madge Titheradge, the well-known stage star, and his whole technical staff, from directors to cameramen. The company arrives via Montreal, heading direct for the coast.

Mr. Samuelson is planning to make at least two productions: Gertrude Page's "Love in the Wilderness" and Ridgewell Elkin's "Night Riders."

Reports from Germany indicate that the late "central power" is returning with vigor to the making of motion pictures. An official embargo exists on all foreign films, but, it is said, American and French films are being smuggled into the country in large quantities and are being openly exhibited. The officials in fact are winking at the embargo.

Marie: The Mystic

serials; especially now that Mr. Jaccard has returned from France to direct me."

"Yes, you and he have worked together so long, it must be regular team-pulling now, isn't it?"

"I've loved and respected all my directors—few girls have had so many charming experiences as I have had under Mr. Turner, Mr. Pollard, Bob Leonard and Tom MacGowan. But I feel that the greatest laurels belong to Jacques Jaccard. We thoroly understand each other. You might call me temperamental—I dont call it that. But there are times when I feel cross or blue; at other times, I feel exuberantly happy. He knows how to handle me, tho no word is spoken. I get his moods in the same way. I have absolute confidence in him, so that when he says a certain dangerous trick must be done in this or that way, I never hesitate to do it. I know he understands me and understands the situation perfectly and I always feel sure that I'll come thru all right.

"Every night we write together. Mr. Jaccard has only used three stories in five years that were written by outsiders. He devises plots and thrills and we go over them carefully. That's why I dont have time for pleasure. I have only been to the movies twice in the last four months!

"It is usually very late when I get home from the studio. We use all the daylight possible and then comes the long drive back, dinner, and after that we're ready for the serious business of concocting a story that may run thru fifteen to seventeen weeks. Sometimes I jump up for a few moments and play the piano to relieve the tension of an entire day spent in work and then we get a fresh start, but I retire about ten because you see I have to be up very early in the morning in order to get made up at Universal City in time."

"But what do you really do for amusement—when you do work in a little spare time?"

Miss Walcamp hesitated, began, hesitated again and said slowly, "I hate to tell you—it will seem silly to an outsider, I'm afraid. But if I ever have a few days off between pictures, I take everything out of my bureau, chiffonier and closet and put the whole place in apple-pie order. The fact is, that it just rests me and is a regular treat to be able to clear up boxes, drawers and closets. Honestly, I cant think of anything I'd rather do than that, save acting. Of course, when it is all finished, I take account of stock, make a memorandum of what I need and go down town in my Stutz and shop. I'm like the rest of the girls—I do love clothes."

I should say Marie does love clothes. Hanging in the dressing-room closet was a eautiful black evening gown, made of real Irish lace brought to her

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper "Trados" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct Ill-Shaped Noses without cost if not satisfactory.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be—gray, brown or blue—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated. Nowadays, so one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cat represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator$.75
- M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads$.75
- M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair.....$.50
- M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan.....$1.00
- M. T.'s Mineralized Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream".....$.75

by—well, I promised not to tell who brought it, so mum's the word. It will be worn in "The Red Glove" which is being adapted from "The Fifth Ace" by Douglas Grant. Hope Loring is churning out episodes in continuity as fast as her nimble fingers can dash over the typewriter and the two girls hobnob in odd moments on the lot, discussing innovations.

During the shooting of "The Red Ace" Marie Walcamp proved herself an uncomplaining martyr, for a sudden fall broke her wrist. Having learnt many different ways of swimming from the Hawaiian teacher, Miss Walcamp decided not to postpone work on this serial; had her arm put in splints and, on the fourth day after the accident, was doing high dives and endurance swims in Great Bear Lake, a cold natural tank up in the mountains.

"Oh, I didn't mind the break, but I was worried for a few hours lest it would interfere with finishing the episode. However, I really think that cold water did me a lot of good. You see the boards kept me from knocking my arm against anything. It was not really dangerous. After a few days, I felt no inconvenience whatever," said the intrepid lassie.

Marie Walcamp's attitude toward animals is interesting. She has such perfect self-control that the dumb brutes seem to sense it. She is always the judge of any horses brought in for her to ride; sizes up their points; tries them out and teaches them tricks.

"Baby lions are so interesting! Have you ever seen a lioness put her little ones to bed?"

Having lived a safe and sane apartment house existence, I hastily disclaimed such knowledge.

"Well," continued Mystic Marie, "the mother gathers up one cub and walks up and down the cage swinging it by the neck the way a cat carries a kitten. Then when it seems ready to doze off she puts it down, sets her foot on it-and, if it doesn't move, gets up and takes the next one and swings that to sleep."

But just then props arrived with a boiled egg and a bit of bread, hustled across the fields in a U-bus, so our chat was interrupted for a very tiny luncheon on Marie's part, so tiny in fact that I ejaculated, "You're far more spiritual than material. I believe you live in the mental realm."

"A-b-s-o-l-u-t-e-l-y," answered Marie the Mystic slowly. "I dont care anything about material things. I like to spend my time thinking, trying to fathom things. You cant do that if you are wondering whether it will be steak and onions for dinner or sausage and waffles for breakfast. I want to spend my time on the worth-while things and they're absolutely mental, aren't they?"

So I'm wondering if Marie is not protected by "presence of mind"—a quality she exercises constantly.

bath with a marble shower and a most complete little kitchen equipped, electrically, with every device known to culinary use.

"I prepare my stewed fruit in there," said Norma, huddled at the time in one of the wicker chairs, hair slicked nonchalantly back, wearing the serge bloomers, middy and socks in which I had come upon her taking a scene. She told me, too, of the time Madame Petrova had come there to interview her and they had prepared tea and sent out for cakes and all sorts of things. Constance, she said, had loudly observed that there was "real food!"

The Talmadges are distinctly a family group. A strong camaraderie and interest exists between the sisters, which is unusual and rather sweet. Norma and Constance see each other's pictures run, are critical or enthusiastic as they honestly believe the occasion demands, but always constructive, and pleased at each other's triumphs and successes. Natalie, the third sister, was, at the time "up with the cows trying to get fat," as explained by Norma.

Later on in the afternoon we paid a visit to Constance who occupies a large dressing room and studio on the floor above. We found her with golden baby hair and a blue dressing-gown bemoaning and bewailing over her new picture with Conway Tearle she had seen run that morning. She appealed tragically to Norma. "It is something awful," she declared, "aw-ful!"

"What's wrong?" asked Norma, with sympathy and a wink. "Everything . . . story . . . lighting . . . me . . . most of all, ME! Conway saw it and he agrees with me. Simply AWFUL!"

Norma informed me on the way back to the cretonned sanctum that it is not half so bad as Constance would have it. I was thinking on other matters, having been of the opinion that it probably was not anywhere nearly so bad. "What," I demanded, "is the reason for the several dozen kewpie dolls I observed in Constance's room?"

Norma laughed. "Everyone gives Constance a doll," she said; "they probably think she's a nut, or simple minded, or something." The laugh, you know, was an affectionate one and the explanation lovingly without malice

"And the parrot?" I prompted; "I saw (and heard) a huge parrot in there."

"Dick Barthelness gave her that, out in California. She named it Richard Barthelness Talmadge and travelled cross continent with it, taking endless pains. Lillian Gish has one, too. They brought them together and arrived in New York looking, according to themselves, like immigrants."

We found Mother Talmadge awaiting us below and making a great fuss over a forementioned Pom. "What have you done to your hair, Norma?" she greeted her illustrious daughter; "looks different." "Combed it, probably," responded Norma, genially.

There is a nice air of being "regular people" about Norma which augurs, above all else, a sane perspective, a nicely balanced sense of things, equipoise. There is none of the irrational about her, no bizarre evidences of temperament. If you didn't know her for a star . . . well, you wouldn't know her for one, if you get my meaning. She is with you and me and all the rest of us. No doubt but what she gets a real enjoyment out of what she has done and is doing and the way in which it has all been received. She is essentially and quite evidently human enough for that. She is nothing of the snob, nothing of the highbrow. She detests the easily and prudishly shocked. She is free and easy and talk to-able and at-able.

"I've always had ideals," she told Miss Livingstone and myself, who had doubtless just denied the same; "and I still have 'em . . . more than ever . . . I've never seen any reason not to!"

Those of us who have ideals give them . . . beautifully when we can and always and necessarily helpfully and inspirationally to the great many, many "others."

Thus Norma Talmadge and the Art which is herself.

TO A VAMPIRE

I want to be your victim, rare, robbed wrecker of the screen.
I want to cringe and crawl and do 'most anything that's mean.
I want a mustache, steely grey, a wife and children, too,
That you may see and sneer and snarl and curse them, thru and thru!

I want to break a bank and kill the man who gave me fame;
I want my folks to die because I've spoiled the family name;
I'd slink up to your slimy side and kneel to kiss your shoe,
If I could be the victim of a vampire such as you!

I want to kiss your false, famed face; I want to curse and cry,
To beat, bruise, batter, then beseech of God to let me die;
To tear your snakelike arms away and dash, with hated breath,
Down to the old canal and die a most befitting death!

I want you, pampered, poison pet! Believe me when I say
I'd dare death-dealing deviltry, beneath your vicious sway!
Seek what you will! Hound me with hate!
There's not a hair-breath scene
That I wont do to humor you—but only on the screen!

FAN FANCIES

Close-ups lend enchantment.
No thin vampire no sin has.
Go West, young fan, go West—they're all in 'Frisco!
Hero—Never too great to send—you his autograph.
Heroine—A glint in the eyes is sufficient.
Comic—A squint in the eyes is sufficient.
No fan but would be the hero's valet.
It's the wronged dame that gives kids learning!

Hallam Cooley's Trail

man could enlist and, in these circumstances, Fortune spread her golden net before him.

He found the Calexico army. It consisted chiefly of two hundred and fifty loboes from the American side and a large number of Mexicans and Yaquis. There were only thirty-two guns for the crowd and, naturally, Cooley didn't get one. Instead, the generalissimo handed him a bucket and told him to carry water. He cooked his own tortillas, dished up frijoles and performed various other culinary rites, but he never saw the promised five dollars a day. He saw plenty of fighting, however, chiefly among the tatterdemalions themselves. They had an abundant supply of whisky and tobacco, and whenever an altercation took place,

Hal Cooley's picturesque trail leads across nearly the whole expanse of America. Not so long ago Hal was a waiter in a restaurant in Yuma, down in the sun-baked Southwest. Tired of that, he crawled upon the top of a Pullman and— But read his story

Photographs by Evaos, L. A.

HALLAM COOLEY's trail begins at Minneapolis and zigzags down thru the Wisconsin woods to Highland Park, Illinois, where he put in laborious days at the Northwestern Military Academy. From Highland Park the trail runs towards the wild and woolly Southwest, the home of the sagebrush and cacti.

Following this trail about nine years ago, Hal struck a town called Yuma—not a bad town in itself, but one which did not yearn to take him to its heart. He balanced trays in one of its hot and murky restaurants, and the incongruity of the task must have impressed any transcontinental traveler who happened to see him there. In those days, however, Cooley followed his star regardless of consequences. He was out for experience!

When he grew weary of Yuma, he went down to the station and hopped aboard the Sunset Limited. Under cover of the darkness, he crawled on top of a Pullman and journeyed into Calexico. He had heard that the gentlemen adventurers of Madero's forces were receiving five dollars a day, that Calexico was the place where a interest. Director David Kirkland has overemphasized his points thruout, yet "The Virtuons Vamp" will entertain you, for Miss Talmadge's singular comedy sense gets much play in it. Conway Tearle is a good foil and Gilda Grey, the famous "shimmie" artist of the New York white light district, makes a trembling screen debut.

Wilfred North has hit upon a singularly timely theme in his "The Undercurrent," in which the pugnacious Guy Empey enters civil life—on the screen. Empey depicts a returned soldier who, upon discarding his uniform, gets involved with the Bolsheviki, but recovers himself in time to prevent rioters from burning the local steel mills. Working under handicaps, Mr. North deserves a large share of praise.

J. Stuart Blackton's newest production, "Dawn," (Pathé), is a visualization of Eleanor Porter's story of a young man who goes blind and his subsequent regeneration into a man of vigor, despite his handicap. We fear Mr. Blackton has selected too depressing a theme for wide popularity. Again, we believe Robert Gordon miscast in leading rôles. This, of course, is our personal belief, but we think Mr. Gordon is a character player and that he is lost in his present type of work.

A Request

By WALTER E. MAIR

If there are visions in the solemn night
That wait for me with eager, trembling hands,
Plucking my sleeve, and bidding me to write,
Ere drift away the swiftly-spilling sands:

If there are unborn truths beyond the veil
That yearn to find their being in my pen,
If I may voice oppression-stifled wail,
And champion the cause of shackled men:

Say not of me "He is a fool to cast "Away the glut and glitter of his Art!"
Breathe only that I held unto the last Love's single jewel of wonder to my heart.

Tell them when I have finished, "Ay, he wrote
"Because, he' loved, nor found the world too kind,
"Except that this one splendor showed no note
"Of tarnish, ere the Angel struck him blind."

Say this, and all your little world of tears
May roll its course, while I go on anew, Clasping my single jewel thruout the years,
Yet knowing I have given it to you!

An Old-Fashioned Girl

She has a bottle of Hungarian glass, red and white, with one small wine-glass to match, which was used by President Buchanan in his own home. There are scent bottles, tall cut-glass bottles for the dresser, Chinese lacquer bottles, old majolica bottles—in fact, the array of liquid-holders is simply astounding. Mary is a connoisseur who delights the owners of old curiosity shops.

Mary MacIvor is just past eighteen and looks not a day over fourteen. One can't believe it possible that she presides over the lovely home at 2018 Cahuenga Avenue, a terraced, flowered bungalow in Hollywood. She wears simple frocks, little one-piece dresses like those of a small girl, and her sunshiny hair, which waves and curls quite naturally, is held back at the nape of the neck by an amber pin. A huge, floppy straw hat with a ribbon twisted around the crown and pulled thru the brim at the back is as unadorned and plain as if Mary MacIvor were a schoolgirl instead of a leading lady and the wife of a star.

Mr. Desmond, who had been entertaining a business caller on the veranda, blocked the door and shook his finger threateningly. "Don't make this too confidential, Baby. Remember, every word you utter will go down in black and white."

"I suppose Mr. Desmond will play leads with you?" we said.

"Yes, when she gets a little older; she can't make up to look old enough just now," he answered.

"How did you come to pictures, and why?"

"Necessity! Need of money. There was no romance connected with my first appearance at all. I was at a fancy dress ball in Culver City, had been taken there by friends, and Thomas Ince saw me. He offered me a job with fifteen dollars a week wages—"

"Engagement, Sweetie, and one gets a salary in the movies, not wages!" groaned the Irishman from Dublin.

"Some day Beedee, (as she calls her big husband), and I are going to build a fine house, aren't we, Beedee? A house with a six-foot fireplace and logs that burn three days, enormous chairs everywhere, a landscape window ten feet wide, a private den for Beedee and a little room where I can write whenever I feel like it. Yes, I write short stories and poems, but I hate scenarios or continuity or anything with numbers in it.

"I love the Bible because it contains all I want—poetry, history, love stories and battles, but I never really enjoyed it until I was given one without numbered verses, written just like a novel. It used to distract me to read about Ruth and Naomi with those old figures straggling down the page—reminded me of a movie script: Scene I. Ruth says 'Entreat me not to leave you.'"

"Have you experienced anything unpleasant in pictures?"

"Yes, once. A director swore at me. Men may swear before me, but not at me. A girl's defensive armor is her self-respect and I shall always maintain mine. Never did I work under that man again, altho he made the apology I demanded." The pride of Scotch ancestry and Southern environment sparkled in Mary's wistful grey eyes.

SHORT CUTS TO FILM DOM

Things are not what they screen. It's a wise author that knows his own script. Kome can be built in a day—leave it to props!

Don't hitch your wagon to a star—be one! Marry in haste, divorce at leisure. Don't look before you leap—it's only a papier-mâché cliff!

Nine tailors may make a man, but one good modiste can make a star.

Self-possession is nine-tenths of the lore. Fortune favors film stars.

The pay's the thing!

A fan's a fan for a' that!

Custard-pie covers a multitude of things. A press agent at hand is worth reams of gush.

A reel of Chaplin makes us all akin. Plots—All that aren't swiped are old.

Still drama brings sleep. Too many crooks foil the fan.

A sweet ingénue is half the plot. The vamp is the mother of dissension.

Cast curls for all lines. Fan-cied is as fancy does.

THE SOUL OF THE SCREEN

By FREDERIC T. CARDOZE

I am the voiceless soul of many a scene, My realm the boundless regions of the screen; A million million vassals I command With but an idle gesture of the hand. I am the whole wide earth, I am the sea, I wing the universe on pinions free; I am the hill of smiles, the vale of tears, I am a day, I am a thousand years, I am the jade Decèit, I am the truth, I am maturity and I am golden youth, And I am folly, frivolous and vain, Yet I am wisdom, when I will, again. To me there is no hidden road or path, I hold the keys to gladness and to wrath; I am the silent guide to every glade Where glows the sun or falls the somber shade.

Today I steal a garment from the light, Tomorrow, from the wardrobe of the night; I am a ragged beggar, bowed and grey, Yet I am Cæsus, flinging gold away; I am the cold and flaunting Mistress Pride, And I am Modesty with Diffidence allied. The deeds of ages, dead and quick, I trace; I barter not with time nor yet with space. Tho from my tightened lips there falls no word, The messages I bear are clearly heard; The fair and foul things of life I glean— I am the soul and spirit of the screen!

THE OUTCOME

By CLARENCE E. FLYNN

Life's always at its best upon the screen. It is not perfect. Life is never so. There runs a struggle thru each shifting scene, And shadows often come, their pall to throw Across the landscape. Things go wrong a while.

But always comes at last the shine's glow, And gloom is followed by the song and smile.

In every drama wrong must have its reign, In every tale the villain has his day; Gladness we see, contrasting it with pain, And truth is valued but by error's sway. The right and wrong are alternate in power, The scene is now in sun, now shadow cast, But tho the wrong may triumph for an hour, The right is seated on the throne at last.

Feature Photoplays

reveal the Progress in Motion Picture Art, an Art which had its Origin with Pathé.

THE first motion picture feature, a scant two hundred feet in length, but truly picturizing a written story and enacted by experienced actors, was made by Charles Pathé over twenty years ago. Never before had a story been put into a motion picture!

The first comedy, the first drama and the first of the longer pictures were all made by Pathé.

More than fifteen years ago Pathé was reproducing in picture form the works of famous novelists and playwrights, the very first company to see the necessity for giving to the public for its entertainment the best work of the best minds.

Thus each step in the evolution of the well written, well directed and well acted feature of today was first taken by this great pioneer. And today, as yesterday, Pathé Photoplays present the best in authorship, direction, acting and production.

Among the producers are Frank Keenan, Hobart Henley, Edgar Lewis, J. Stuart Blackton, Albert Capellani, Leonce Perret, Edwin Carewe and Jesse D. Hampton. Man for man, measured by achievement, these producers have no superiors in the business.

Ask the manager of your favorite theatre when he will show Hobart Henley's "The Gay Old Dog", adapted from Edna Ferber's story; Blanche Sweet in "A Woman of Pleasure", produced by Jesse D. Hampton and adapted from James Willard's famous play; Albert Capellani's "The Right to Lie", with Dolores Cassinelli; and J. Stuart Blackton's "Dawn". They are first presented this month.

Comic Conkling

By MARY McAUBREY

pute our rancher, so let's go," bantered one. "Get him to tell you about his flock of bees he's fattening up for Christmas," called another, as the group vanished into the dressing-rooms.

"Are you a rancher as well as a comedian?" I asked.

"Sure," laughed Mr. Conklin. "I work at comedy and play at ranching. That is a fine balance, for you cant work at comedy all the time—it wears you out, and ranching is the greatest play there is."

Sitting on the steps of the big yellow street car, marked "The Wait In Vain Transit Co.," which figured in the new picture, the little comedian whose antics have occasioned thousands of laughs during his years on the screen told me all about his ranch, a hundred miles north of the city.

There are 320 acres, with 65 in citrus fruit; there is a wonderful view across the desert, with its fascinating lights and shadows, that lures one into its very heart. You cant get away once you succumb to its spell! There are several thousand turkeys, and then there are the bees!

THE forest fires raging in the mountains back of Pasadena flung a curtain of smoke over the valley, making exterior camera work a difficult matter in the many studios in Hollywood and Los Angeles.

Out on the Fox studio lot a group of players were waiting for the haze to lift long enough to finish their scene.

"I should say that motion pictures make the greatest little patience exerciser in the world," remarked Chester Conklin. "You must learn not to worry over delays in this business or you would go crazy. There's no hope, boys," he continued, with his mild blue eyes fastened on the grayish sky, "there'll be no more sunshine today."

"No one will dis

We forgot all about pictures and interviews and forest fires and overcast skies, while he told me many interesting things regarding the habits of the little creatures. He finds them an absorbing subject and is collecting a library on bee culture. Recently he had to move his bee stands nearer to the honey flow—meaning the orchards, for in season these tireless workers labor so hard that they wear themselves out; in fact, they frequently die of exhaustion.

Suddenly, while talking, Mr. Conklin took off the paint-brush mustache which has formed a veritable trademark for this comedian, and he was so completely changed that I should never have recognized him.

"Why," I gasped, "you look years younger!"

Chester Conklin works at comedy and plays at ranching. He owns 320 acres and devotes the space to citrus fruit, turkeys and—bees. Honestly!

Don't Belong to the Great Unfit

You see them on every side—men who don't count—men who are losing every chance of happiness and success in life, some because chronic ailments are sapping away their energy; others through loss of their vitality through early excesses and dissipation.

they smashed one another over the heads with boxes of twenty-five cent cigars. Cigaret tobacco was so plentiful in camp that a whole sackful was rolled up in each cigarette. Nine quart bottles of Canadian Club whisky were often traded for a needle and thread.

This life, however, finally palled on the young adventurer. So he decided to "hit the trail" again, and this time he made for the C. M. Ranch, where Uncle Sam gave him a job hauling supplies for the U. S. Reclamation Service. He had to rise at three o'clock in the morning, light the fire, hitch up a team of mules, load a wagon and set out before day-break to visit camps on the farther side of the Colorado River. His favorite plan was to drive to the banks of the stream, disrobe and wade across with the mules. Thousands of buzzards waiting him upon these excursions, waiting to breakfast on the scraps that might fall from his wagon-load.

When he had exhausted the thrills and adventures of this way of living, Cooley worked his way westward towards the Pacific Ocean and finally landed in Los Angeles. He did not make his advent in hero style. He came into the City of Angels on foot and the Salvation Army befriended him.

By hook or crook he drifted into pictures. It wasn't long before his natural talent for acting asserted itself. His good looks, his spontaneity and dash won him good parts and he cashed in without delay on the knowledge of life he had gained "roughing it" on the trail. He worked for Selig, Universal, American and finally for Ince. He appeared in the Al Woods picture "The Guilty Man," as the heavy with Charles Ray in "The Girl Dodger" and with Enid Bennett in "Happy Tho Married." Later he had a season with another concern, playing important rôles, and he is now with Famous Players-Lasky.

"I was born in Brooklyn," he went on, "but I think I prefer the West to the East, particularly since I have found happiness here. You know I was married last Christmas to Miss Elizabeth Bates, of Columbus, Georgia. We are building a house on Lanewood Avenue, Hollywood—just the sort of place I've always dreamed of—a home of the Pueblo sort, with a big patio and wide verandas. Also, I'm going to have cacti growing in the front yard—lots of it—for, despite my wild experiences in the desert country, I learnt to love sand and sagebrush and cacti. There is mystery and an enchantment about the desert that only those who have lived in it can know. It speaks with a voice that is heard by the heart—its very silence is full of music!"

"Yes, I am happy! I have found myself! I have found peace and joy in my work, and I have discovered that home is where the heart is. If heaven is a state of mind, I am living there now!"

Comic Conklin

Grinning at my surprise, he replied, "Guess this mustache keeps me from getting mash notes. I receive lots of letters from all over the country telling me they like this or that in my pictures and even asking for my photographs, but never a love note.

"When I was a youngster back in Osaloosa, Iowa, I knew a man with just such a mustache. It always amused me and I used to hang around his shop waiting for him to talk so I could watch it move up and down. When I came to motion pictures and was trying to think up a funny character to create for my comedies I naturally remembered that mustache."

Armed with this make-up and adding those ridiculously loose and baggy clothes and enormous shoes (which he obtains from the largest policeman on the Los Angeles beat), Chester Conklin has succeeded in establishing an amusing screen comedy character that has endeared him to a host of fun-lovers.

Now, Chester's father was a contractor and builder and he hoped the son would follow in his steps, but after speaking a few pieces at church festivals and winning an elocution prize at the age of 12, Chester upset these plans by announcing that he intended to be an actor.

The comedian's eyes twinkled as he recalled these early experiences. "Father urged me to stay at home and let him make a man of me," he began, cheerfully, "and he kept saying that he had never seen an actor who was worth a hill of beans. I guess he didn't change his mind about this for several years after I started out, for I called on him repeatedly for money. Now? Oh, now, he thinks I'm great!

"I finally ran away from home and got a job at the Grand Theater in Des Moines and I was the happiest kid in the state. Sometimes I carried a sword, sometimes a spear, and sometimes I was lucky enough to have a real bit. Then followed a little of everything, stock and road shows, several vaudeville acts, and I also took a turn at being a circus clown.

"When you love your work you dont care how hard it is. Unhappiness comes when people struggle along some uncongential rut to make a living while longing for something different all the time.

"Now, I'm sure I am in the greatest business there is and I'll be satisfied if I succeed in making people laugh. There are enough sorrows and tears in the world without making pictures about them. I never did hanker after your heavy stuff!"

After watching a very red sun drop thru a haze of smoke in the western sky, Mr. Conklin went on. "To me the greatest fascination of motion pictures is the thought that these films we are making will reach the people in all countries. No matter who or where they are, they all understand the same fun and a laugh is the universal language. Often, when I am doing some nonsense before the camera I think of this and I'm glad, clear thru, that I can help jolly the old world along."

It was Charlie Ray who started Chester Conklin on his screen career. They had played together in a vaudeville act up and down the coast, and at the end of their tour Mr. Ray had ventured into pictures under the Thomas Ince banner, while Chester went back on the road with a circus. Drifting into Los Angeles again a little later, he decided to follow Charlie's suggestion that he, too, try pictures, and so for six years Chester Conklin has been one of the Sennett prize comedians. A few months ago he brought his mustache, along with his merriment, over to the Fox lot to become a star of the Sunshine Comedies.

"Where do we get the ideas for our pictures?" He repeated my question. "Well, I should say from everywhere. Just pluck them out of the air sometimes. For instance, the comedy we are now making was suggested by the recent street-car strike. We are picking up some ludicrous situations and making a good two-reeler out of it. There are funny sides to every question, if we'll only see them.

"To play before the camera one must keep, themselves in good physical and mental trim; you cant afford to go stale. Your mind has to be open to all the light touches, real comedy can never be forced."

Chester Conklin is a quiet, diffident little fellow, reluctant to talk about himself. He has a sane, wholesome outlook on life and declares that living in the atmosphere of comedy clears away the clouds and depressions.

"Comedy," he remarked, as we walked toward the gate thru the deserted stages, "is nothing more than what should be happening all the time if we would only forget to worry."

This cheerful attitude permeates his work on the screen and he has succeeded in bringing to his pictures a refreshing spontaneity, for many of his best efforts at fun-making are achieved on the spur of the minute, many laugh-provokers being the result of a sudden whim.

So, Chester Conklin may well be satisfied—for he is indeed "making people laugh!"

sible and the big, crashing final scene will be made last of all, for by that time the actors will fully grasp the undercurrent and depths of the preceding situations. Taken now, they would not feel the true values.

"Yesterday, we had some highly emotional scenes and—"

"You should have seen him," interrupted Una Trevelyn. "While he was making me cry as if my heart would break, I looked up and he was crying, too—he feels everything he is directing. He knows all about period furniture and decorations, and all the great paintings," went on Una, as we watched him arrange the yellow satin drape on the table in the foreground of the set.

"And music," said Sam de Grasse; "he has a thoro acquaintance with the musical classics and knows what should be played during each scene to bring out the best efforts. He plays the violin himself."

"He knows all literature, too," chimed in Clyde Fillmore. "I can't see how he has managed to learn so much in his few years, it must be the result of his continental education."

As I left the studio and stepped out into the late afternoon sunshine, with the haunting melody of the "Je T'Aime Waltz" ringing in my ears, I was still thinking of Erich von Stroheim's last words and the smile, which included the eyes this time, accompanying them.

"My ambition," he said, "is to write and direct. To go on—on, worthy of what my friends believe I can do—making bigger and better pictures."

Costs 15 Cents

As Much as 15 Dishes of Delicious Quaker Oats

A serving of bacon and eggs, at this writing, costs the housewife about 15 cents.

It supplies about 250 calories—the energy measure of food value.

That 15c would buy about 15 dishes of Quaker Oats. And they would supply 2,500 calories of food.

Compare Food Values

Quaker Oats yields 1810 calories per pound. Round steak yields 890. So oats are twice as nutritious as beef, measured on the calory basis.

The cost of some necessary foods at this writing will average about as follows:

Cost Per 1000 Calories
Quaker Oats . . .	5½c
Average Meats . . .	45c
Fish about	50c
Eggs	60c
Vegetables	11c to 75c

Quaker Oats

This doesn't mean to eat oats alone. One needs variety.

But Quaker Oats is the supreme basic breakfast. It costs one-ninth what meat and eggs cost for the same calory value. And the oat is the greatest food that grows.

All Punny Grains Discarded

Quaker Oats is flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oajs. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. By discarding all the small grains we get a delightful flavor.

WIND-IN-THE-WILLOWS

By LYDIA M. D. O'NEIL

Wind-in-the-Willows, you stand so tall—
Slender and straight as a sapling pine;
Youth's in your footstep, youth's in the call

Of your lifted eyes when they meet with mine.

Wind-in-the-Willows, the day is glad—
Sunny the mesa and gold the sky;
What is it fretting me, Indian lad?
Search you the heart of me, tell me why!

Gold is the sky, but the gold will fade,
And youth will pass like the fading light,
Fretting in vain at the fates that made
Your skin so tawny and mine so white.

I am one of the dominant race;
I am bound by the dominant law;
But Wind-in-the-Willows, youth's in your face,
And I wonder, I wonder—who'll be your squaw?

INQUISITIVE ANN.—Good grief, Frank Mayo and Edna Mayo are no relation. Neither is Woodrow Wilson and Marjorie Wilson, nor the Answer Man and Louis Mann. Naomi Childers is going to play opposite Bert Lytell in "The Blind Man's Eyes."

MARJON F.—Never been there, but it has been estimated that the Roman Coliseum could accommodate about 87,000 spectators. But dont shout at me. I cant stand it. Pleasant and kind words, if they be sensible and well meant, are cords that all men may be led by. Women, take the cue. No, Frederick Smith is not past 50—he is about 29, and—period.

WEST VIRGINIA FARNUM FAN.—My dear, give the woman credit—they'll always take it. Mrs. William Farnum is non-professional. Earle Williams is with the Western Vitagraph.

DIXIE DEE.—You can reach Marguerite Clark, Paramount Company, 485 Fifth Avenue, New York City. You say you like "Silver Spurs." So do I. Good for you; stick to it. Of course I'm happy, because I'm busy.

COLLY.—Your letter was a corker. Have passed your idea along. Yes, it is true that my hours of strenuous work are very long, but I find time for play, to loosen the mental tension and so obtain perfect harmony and recreate power. More power to you also.

INQUISITIVE HARRY.—Why, Wally Van will direct the comedies for the Rothapel films. The Bankhead girl is Goldwyn. You might write to Enid Bennett. Taylor Holmes, he's 5 feet 8½ inches high. You didn't care for "Virtuous Wives" and you thought Anita over-acted and appeared very amateurish in the scene where she bids farewell to her husband as he departs. Witness refuses to answer on the ground that it might tend to incriminate him.

QUESTION MARK.—No, Theda Bara is not married. Yes, I am glad spring is here. You bet I have a new spring suit. Yep, a blue one, and I look like a bluebird in it. The spring brings a change of air in the studios, with changes in the casts. Change of diet is excellent, but change of companionship and a new heart interest are sometimes more rejuvenating than a tonic.

EDDIE.—Madge Evans is about ten years old. Yes, Sylvia Breamer has beautiful eyes. I always try to rebuke with soft words and hard arguments, and if this does not take. I try a club.

LEONARD W.—Send a stamped, addressed envelope for a list of the film manufacturers and then address the player in care of the company.

SOPHIE E.—Thanks for the thrift stamp. Yes, I understand. Why, the oldest lunatic on record is Time—out of mind. Indeed, I am a musician. I dont like to speak about my talents, but there are those who say that I play the pianola and jew's-harp without creating any hard feelings.

LAUREN G.—Glad you subscribed. Hope you'll always be a subscriber. Mary Pickford's salary? She's part owner in a company now, and therefore draws dividends. No, just separated.

VERNON J.—Never heard of Eva Campbell. Your plan sounds logical, but instead of reviving the old plan of limiting the wealth of the rich, why not pass a law limiting the poverty of the poor? Doris Kenyon in "Twilight."

JEAN F.—Address Theda Bara care of Fox and Carlyle Blackwell care of World, both in New York City. You ask why does a loaded car run more easily than an empty one? Because it's the load that makes the car go. Wonderful!

B. V. D.—It's not what you wear so much, for fine feathers are frequently found on coarse birds. Mme. Petrova has gray-green eyes and a wonderful figure. Yes, Carol Dempster. Handed your letter to the interviewer.

MANILA GIRL.—No, Wellington Cross is in vaudeville. Goldwyn released Rex Beach's "The Brand." Viola Dana in "Satan Junior," Metro.

The old canoe; a redolent, moon-flecked evening; and Us Two!

The swish of limpid waters; subdued voices; the sweet intimacy of a moonlit, music-caressed solitude and the seductive harmony of stringed instruments—lilting notes, crashing chords and syncopations.

But listen! It isn't the canoe—nor the moon—nor the water—that thrills your heart. It is the Music—those lingering melodies of happy hours.

'Tis the same in any setting! Summer's shady nooks; snugly evenings of early Fall; Winter's cheery firesides,—always and everywhere good old GIBSONS furnish that indefinable "something" which eliminates formality, makes hearts lighter, eyes brighter, friendships dearer and love sweeter.

Yes,—anyone can play a Gibson—"easy to play, easy to play for"—the ideal instrument for home and companions. It weaves itself into your life and brings pleasures and privileges obtainable through no other medium.

Gibsons have played a part in hundreds of little romances—confidential human histories—about which we shall be glad to tell you. Also the Gibson book and free trial proposition sent for the asking. These will help you to become better acquainted with the Gibson family.

Teacher Salesmen wanted. Exceptional opportunities. Write for details.

SONG WRITERS

WRITE A SONG—Love, mother, home, childhood, patriotic or any subject. I compose music and guarantee publication. Send words to-day. Thomas Merlin, 359 Reaper Block, Chicago.

CRYSTAL COURT.—Sidney Drew and his wife are in "Once a Mason," released thru Paramount. Zasu Pitts was not in the cast. Jack Mulhall was born in New York. No, I think once a star long absents herself or himself from the screen, they are soon forgotten. Yes, I have read those letters.

WILD KITTY.—Sure thing, you're welcome, Doubt whether that player can "come back." However, yeast, the compressed, will rise again. Better not ask me how to become a movie star. Your letter was some wild, Kitty, and it sure was rip-roaring comedy.

JOSEPHINE S.—Too bad! Misfortunes never come singly; they are always married. I never sit up late and I advise you to quit it. Late suppers and late hours make men unhealthy, unwealthy, unwise and otherwise.

FAECKLES.—Nothing doing! You must sign your full name or I don't play. See?

QUESTIONARE 14.—Yours was quite a chatty little letter. Dont be haughty. Haughtiness lives under the same roof with solitude. Dont pay to be uppish. Yes, I saw that headline, "Charles Bryant returns to support Mme. Nazimova." We hope he has been supporting her these last years. He's her hubby, you know.

MATILDA M.—Last I heard of Pearl White she was on her way to France. Crane Wilbur has gone on the stage opposite Marjorie Rameau in "Eyes of Youth." Pessimists are moral squinters, who, being incapable of a straightforward view, imagine that penetration is evinced by universal mistrust. Get me?

M. V. Z.—Madge Kennedy in "Leave It to Susan." Bessie Love with Western Vitagraph. Irving Cummings playing with Ethel Clayton in "Men, Women and Money." Evelyn Nesbitt in "My Little Sister" for Fox. Sure thing; drop in to see me again.

NORMA, BUTTE.—Beaut, or from Butte? Ann Little played opposite Bill Hart in "Square-Deal Sanderson." Enoch Herbert Crowder, the "Father of the Draft," was born in Missouri, graduated from West Point, served in the Philippines and with the Japanese army, was Secretary of State in Cuba, appointed Judge Advocate General, directed an enrollment of 24,000,000 men between the ages of 18 and 45 years for military service, and directed the registration of 14,000,000 men under an amendment to the selective service law. Some pedigree, eh, what? Yours was pretty long, but I'll excuse you this time.

DREAMER.—Which studio is the most beautiful? Haven't been in all of them, so would not venture an opinion. Sorry I cant help you. Yes, Woods, Shuberts and Selwyn are affiliated with Goldwyn. Wheeler Oakman will play in "The Third Eye" for Pathé. She is West.

JUDIE.—You will find "I can tell where my own shoe pinches me, and you must not think to catch old birds with chaff," in Don Quixote. Your letter wasn't as sweet as it might be. You cant catch an old bird with chaff, either, you know. Make the best of everything, think the best of everything, and hope the best for yourself. Harry Morey was Christopher, Maurice Costello was Henry, Betty Blythe was Barbara and Robert Gaillard was Dempsey in "The Man Who Won," released in July. Story was by Cyrus Townsend Brady.

DREAM GRL.—Yes, Alice Brady is back in pictures. She is married. Dont complain. We did not make the world, but we may mend it, and must live in it. We shall find that it abounds with fools who are too dull to be employed and knaves who are too sharp to have to work.

ROBIN.—You think I am about the size of William Hart, with Douglas Fairbanks' smile and hair like William Farnum! Oh, I'm better looking than that. You just ought to get your peepers on me once and see how beautiful I am. Madge Evans in "Home Wanted," produced by Tefft Johnston.

BEEF.—Wallie Van is in Los Angeles now. Richard Barthelmess played with Nazimova, Florence Reed and Madge Kennedy before going with Griffith. Lillian Walker is coming to New York to play in a serial. Beware of the little green snake—it may be just as dangerous as a ripe one.

"Motion Picture Writing Simplified"

By F. McGrew Willis

BANDANNA.—Thanks for the thrift stamp. No, I am neither. Of course I dance. Norma Talmadge is 22; Dorothy Phillips, 27; Agnes Ayres, 22, and Beverly Bayne, 24. Fatty Arbuckle remains with Paramount for three more years.

THOMAS R.—First you knew how Charles Chaplin looks human without his make-up on? Yes, indeed, he's quite human. No, I don't keep the addresses of my readers. Sorry, Donald Hall is playing in "The Carter Case," released by Oliver Corp.

SNOOKUMS.—Enjoyed reading your opinion. Aunt Eliza's opinion of some men is quite cruel. She says, "Men, fate and the pawn-brokers are very much alike. They find out the very least which you will accept, and then offer you just a little less." Girls, to be happy, put a high valuation on yourselves. Mary Miles Minter and Alan Forrest in "Social Briers."

NUTTY.—So you were crowded out of the Magazine. Yes, I know my space has been cut down a lot, hence so has yours. Why, J. W. Johnston was Horace in "On the Quiet." Frances Burnham in "On the Jump." Suff-ren slippers, but you won't obey me!

ESTHER K.—You want an interview with little Mary Jane Irving. Perhaps later.

MISS VIVAUDOU.—Yes, it is a very amusing world if you do not refuse to be amused. Montagu Love is playing on Broadway in "The Net."

FRANK E. H.—Eternal vigilance is the price of keeping track of the players. Will have to call them shooting stars—they shoot from one place to another so much. I was all wrong about Doris Kenyon last month. She is with the Dietrich-Beck combination—I had another Doris in mind. Sessue Hayakawa in "The Man Beneath." Neva Gerber and Ben Wilson are married, but not to each other.

EAGLE ROCK.—I'll have you understand I am not an old man—only seventy-nine. Always respect old age—except when you get stuck on a pair of old spring chickens. Pauline Frederick in "The Peace of Roaring River." Tom Moore in "Lord and Lady Algy."

TROY O.—Yes, Jim Corbett played in that Universal. Corinne Griffith was born in Texas. Yes, Douglas Fairbanks is building a home in Los Angeles, near the Beverly Hills Hotel, costing about $175,000, with bowling alley, private projection room, swimming pool, etc., etc., but I wouldn't trade all that for my hall-room.

STELLA.—Welcome! Friends are divided into two great classes—those you need and those who need you. You want a picture of Constance Talmadge on the cover of the MAGAZINE, and a picture of Wallace Reid on the cover of the CLASSIC. Editor, please note: You've got the right idea.

FRANCIS III.—Home, James; home, James! You want me to answer your questions in the Boston Post. Now, if you will arrange with that paper to help me add to my income tax. I'll seriously entertain your proposition. You're wrong, all wrong. No, Billie West isn't playing now. If you don't see your answers, Francis, let me know.

EMMA MAY D.—The only way you can see the picture is to have your theater manager try to run it. Norma Talmadge's next is a Russian story. And then you will see Marc MacDermott, Marguerite Clayton, Marguerite Courtot and Betty Hutchinson.

BOB WHITE.—Yes, but the men should work and think and the women love. Monroe Salisbury is with Universal. Marshall Farnum is not a brother to the other Farnums.

CURIOSITY.—Can't tell the name of the second oldest brother in "The Heart of Humanity." Elliott Dexter is the husband of Marie Doro. Billy Elmer was the burglar in "The Dub." Light. Theda Bara's next is "When Men Desire."

EDAYN M. J.—Carlyle says, "There are remedies for everything but death," so get busy and recover. If I were to give you the cast for the three plays you mention, you would take all the space allotted to me. Send a stamped, addressed envelope.

GREEN-EYED FLOSSIE.—Cast your optics on the paragraph at the beginning of this department.

This amazing book on motion picture writing can now be secured separate from the course in photoplay instruction offered by The F. McGrew Willis Institute. The insistent demand from newsdealers, bookstores and writers generally has grown so great that a limited edition of the book has been set aside solely for this purpose. The book, acknowledged to be the best work on motion picture writing yet published, and the only one in the scenario departments of the studios, has become known among members of the Institute as the "magic book." It is the only one ever written by any author who has himself had years of experience in the various studios writing feature stories for more than a score of the big stars. It contains everything that can be learned about the art of motion picture writing. Haste is imperative if you desire to secure your copy of this work. THE PRICE IS THREE DOLLARS, postage prepaid anywhere in the world. Orders will be filled only in the order of their receipt.

PHOTOPLAY WRITING CORRECTLY TAUGHT

F. McGrew Willis is the only recognized writer of feature photoplays in America heading a concern teaching motion picture writing. He is the only writer who has ever received endorsements written in their own handwriting by the leading directors of filmdom. He is maintaining the only FREE SALES BUREAU for photoplays in existence where the writer is given every cent realized on the sale of his story. No commission or fee has ever been or ever will be accepted by him on any sale whatever. If you expect to make good at motion picture writing you must write your stories as the directors want them. THE DIRECT, DETAILED WAY OF

WRITING—THE WILLIS WAY—IS THE ONLY WAY THESE MEN WANT STORIES WRITTEN. There is a golden opportunity offered people who can furnish real photoplay plots. If you are in earnest about writing send for the FREE BOOK, "The Inside Story of Motion Picture Writing." It tells about the Institute and the course it offers. The book is absolutely free and places you under no obligation whatever. Address will contain the words and music of A CHARMING WALTZ called "IN SHADOWLAND"

This waltz was dedicated to SHADOWLAND by the composer STANLEY BROTHERS, Jr.

It is just the RIGHT WALTZ for the new season.

Dance and be merry— You're only young once!

PEGGY, 20.—No, the two literary editors are not related, except that one is a smith and the other a nailer. Sounds like a blacksmith or carpenter shop, doesn't it? So you thought the two little stars on the covers stood for men in service. That's a good joke on you. No, Peggy, they are private news company marks. Ormi Hawley was there, all right. You know she has gotten much thinner. Ormi has a pretty face, but she was on the road to obesity for a while.

ADDIE T.—So you have been doing your bit. Good! Yes, indeed, young ladies should be employed in the post-office, because then they can manage the males. Boy, water please. (Turn on the hose!)

HENRY E., BERLIN, N. H.—Henry, and you living in Berlin? You should change the name to Lerbin. Write Norma Talmadge at Talmadge Studios, 312 E. 48th St. Try Moving Picture World.

LOCKWOOD FANNETTE.—Some day you may be discovered. A motion picture director is not like an astronomer—unless it is when he discovers a new star.

A WOMAN.—But where is the rest of you—address, name, etc.?

IONA FORD.—Have you got it yet? Well, it's a rattling good car. Oh, I get $10 a week now, and I will be owning a Ford one of these days. Got a raise on the first. Yep! Now I can buy war saving stamps, and buttermilk, and chocolates, and chewing-gum, and live comfortably. It is difficult for a woman to keep a secret, but I know more than one man who is a woman in that respect.

MOUNTAIN LASSIE.—Whoop-la, and a couple of tuts! And a hull lot of gnashing of teeth! Here's a reader who dont think I get all the letters that are answered. Zounds and gad-zooks! Ask the housekeeper who empties my basket. And such questions you ask! "Do Alice Brady and Pearl White smoke cigarets?" Norma Nichols was Chiquita in "The Ne'er-Do-Well," by Selig.

RUEAIE B.—You have a great opinion of me. Harry Morey in "Hoarded Assets." Both Sessie Hayakawa and his wife, Tsuru Aoki, had the flu.

ELLA M. S.—You say, in putting a tax on rouge, Uncle Sam makes it a war-paint. To arms! Ella, your letter reminds that the mind of the idler never knows what it wishes for. Pat O'Malley and Marie Walcamp are playing in "The Fifth Ace," directed by J. P. MacGowan. Zoe Ray with Universal on the coast.

LUELLA B.—You want too much information. See you later.

LOVIE.—A serviette means a napkin in French. But it's not death, it is dying, that alarms most of us. Mary Boland in "The Prodigal Wife." Harry Hilliard and Edith Roberts in "Set Free."

M. P.—You want a picture of Eugene O'Brien on the cover. All right, we'll think it over. And you want Richard Tucker in the gallery. All right, we'll think that over, too. And you want a biography of the Answer Man in THE CLASSIC. Not at all, and we wont think that over. Nothing doing! Pat O'Malley played Tom in "She Hired a Husband."

MAYME A.—Most of your questions have been answered above. God bless 'em, we couldn't get along without the fools. If they could look wise and say nothing and not write letters, nobody would ever take them for fools, and they might even be mistaken for philosophers.

SEMPER FIDELIS.—Roy Stewart was with Triangle. Dick Barthelmess is about 5 feet 7 inches tall. Thanks for your hopes. You are studying to be a sculptor. Your letter is interesting. Phidias was a celebrated sculptor of Athens, whom Pericles appointed superintendent of all the public works, both of architecture and statuary, and I suggest that you read his biography.

ROSALIND F.—Mary Pickford is about 5 feet tall, or rather, short. Shirley Mason 5 feet and Viola Dana 4 feet 11 inches. Bert Lytell and Mary Anderson in "The Spender."

MA CHERIE.—You bet I'm a jolly old cuss. Usually he who talks much accomplishes little, and that's why I am sometimes taken for a clam. That was Emmy Wehlen in "Sylvia on a Spruce."

When do you discard the Joker?

FOOLISH question? Not at all. There is a time in "500" when the best card in the deck is the least desirable. The new edition of the "Official Rules of Card Games" tells you when to discard the Joker, and gives you the latest rules and expert suggestions for playing any one of the world's 300 games you like best. We will send you this 250 page book, just off the press, for only 20 cents. Send for it today—NOW. Use the coupon below, if you wish.

BICYCLE PLAYING CARDS

Next to knowing how to play, there is nothing which adds or detracts so much from the pleasure of playing as the cards you use. Bicycle Playing Cards are the standard everywhere. Their air cushion finish prevents sticking, making shuffling easy and dealing accurate. Their large, clear indexes are easy to read. The quality material used in their manufacture makes them durable and long-lasting, even though subjected to hard usage. Get a pack today from your dealer so you will have them next time you play.

Congress Playing Cards are playing cards de luxe. Full color art backs. Gold edges. Ideal for prizes, gifts and social play.

REVELATION—The Latest Thing in Fortune Telling Cards

There are many evenings of entertainment and good fun packed into every deck of Revelation Fortune Telling Cards. Designed by a man noted for his uncanny performances in card conjuring, these cards produce results as mystifying as they are fascinating. They answer any question on any subject—love, business, health, wealth—the past, present or future—and always in a weirdly accurate fashion. One color back in tuck case, 50 cents per deck; colored back design, gold edges, in telescope case, 70 cents. From your dealer or postpaid.

Don't forget to send for the "Official Rules of Card Games" today. And when writing, why not order a deck of REVELATION Fortune Telling Cards? You will be more than pleased with them!

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

Shadowland, Motion Picture Magazine, and Motion Picture Classic—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide-awake and well-informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read Shadowland, the Magazine and Classic.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2 provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on June 30, 1920.
2. There will be seven ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for Shadowland every month, and the same for Motion Picture Magazine and yet again the same for Classic. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

Elliott Dexter Has Come Back

By MAUDE YORKE

IT was a red letter day at the Lasky studio in Hollywood—Elliott Dexter had come back!

For six months he had been ill, at times perilously near the border-line, and great was the rejoicing among friends and associates to have him among them once more, well and strong.

After the camera man had celebrated the event by taking several pictures of him with Cecil De Mille and Tommy Meighan, we found a quiet little nook to talk it all over.

Mr. Dexter is thinner, both in face and body, but this merely adds a new distinction to his good looks and he is handsomer than ever, while the quiet dignity, ever one of his chief charms, is perhaps, intensified. His dark eyes are clear, his cheeks bronzed, for he has spent many of the recuperating days at the beach, and he declares that he possesses more vigor and strength than ever before.

"Queer thing," he remarked, reflectively, after asking permission to light his pipe. "But it seems as if we must all have a good, hard bump of some kind to wake us up. This is the first illness I have ever had and I assure you I went thru every possible mental state during those long months.

"There was a time, at the very first, when I didn't care if I recovered, and all my old interests seemed to drift away. I didn't want to think of pictures or my career, in fact, nothing seemed worth while, but now," and he squared his broad shoulders and laughed, "I can hardly wait to begin my new picture.

"Everything interests me, I feel thoroughly fit, and I want to plunge in and make up for all this lost time. I guess a little introspection and retrospection does one good. My whole viewpoint seems changed, I have learnt much during the months while I have been absent from the world and I am sure I shall do better work than ever before."

"As a star, too!" I exclaimed.

"Yes," he laughed, boyishly, "as a star! My illness came just as I had reached the goal for which I had been working during these three and a half years in motion pictures. I was to have played in Cecil De Mille's 'Male and Female,' then he starred, but—I took to my bed instead. Seems years since I had to give up.

"I am quite mad about my first picture which is to be 'The Prince Chap.'

"Any part that is consistent and human, I enjoy playing," replied Mr. Dexter to my question as to his favorite rôle. "I found much satisfaction in the SLIM H.—Yes, I have noticed the tight skirts. How could I help it? They are decreed to prevent the girls from running after our returned soldiers. Skirts that they cant run in, shoes that they cant walk in, corsets they cant breathe in—such is woman! Alice Brady and Conrad Nagel will be seen in "Redhead" (Select.)

GEORGE N. C.—Couldn't comply with your request, son. Join one of the clubs.

M. A.—Donald Hall with Goldwyn last.

WALLACE REID FAN.—They all do it sooner or later—Katherine Lee, age nine, and Jane, age six, have started their own company. Nothing like getting a little leeway in pictures. Some one told you Pearl White had no ears—cant you see for yourself? 'Deed she has ears, and they are like pearls.

Two Bugs.—What kind of bugs? Dont you think that men in general are but children of a larger growth? So you thought Eugene O'Brien and Norma Talmadge were ideal, and that when it came to kissing they were bears. You say, "You are old enough to know better than to tease your readers that way." Why, do you know a better way?

FRENCH.—Dick Barthelmess is not married.

PRINCE DANTAN.—Sure I would be content with little if nobody had any more. Thanks for the picture. You're not a bad-looking chap after all. Fairbanks twins are on the stage in New York. We have no photographs of Florence LaBadie for sale. Run in again.

NORMA TALMADGE ADMIRER.—So this is your first to me. You say you had an appointment at the Commodore Hotel to meet Lillian Gish, and you got "cold feet" and were afraid to meet her. Try woolen socks.

MAAC MACDERMOTT FOREVER.—Last I heard of him he was free-lancing. Jennie Lee, of the old Biograph pictures, is playing in "Jim of the Rangers."

PINKY ROSE.—You want me to tell you how Gladden James ever got into pictures. Is this an inquiry or a stiletto thrust?

DORIS N.—Robert Louis Stevenson was the author of "To be honest, to be kind, to earn a little and spend a little less, to make the world a little happier by our presence—here is a worthy task." We had an interview with Elsie Ferguson in June CLASSIC.

JO JOKEV.—Why, the word Czar comes from Caesar and became adopted thru Simeon, Grand Khar of Constantinople, A. D. 900. Caesar has become, in German, Kaiser, and that individual has become obsolete. "Shadows of the Past" is Anita Stewart's next picture.

A. V. R.—Yes, I believe in prayer, but the best way to get a prayer answered is to pray hard, then get out and hustle. That's what I do. Sorry I haven't his name.

HOUSE PETERS FAN.—Yes, everybody ought to read "Don Quixote." Cervantes laid many of the scenes in La Mancha, an old province of Spain, in the southern part of New Castile. Gail Kane is on the stage. Sure I can keep a secret. Age is the only secret a woman can keep.

BILL FARNUM LOVER.—Yes, and the old fellows who used to whittle the chairs from under them now go to a movie show. William Farnum has been playing for about five years. You're excited.

CONSTANCE M.—You say all you have to have to get in the movies is luck. Then all players must be lucky, which is not so. No, no, little one, you're all wrong. Yes, Charles Clay is married.

RED HEAD.—You have been reading Darwin. I'll wager. Our ancestors, even tho they were monkeys, weren't so ignorant as some folks fancy—they were generally educated in the higher branches. Pardonnez moi. You ask what was my ambition when I was small—if it will give you any pleasure, to be a policeman. To be continued.

ANNA L. F., MEMPHIS.—Send a stamped, addressed envelope for a list of film manufacturers. The stage has had all the characteristics. In Greece, it was a form of religion. The Greek theater had all the beauties. The world progressed, and light always came from the stage.

SHADOWLAND

A MAGAZINE OF BEAUTY

... "The best in this kind are but Shadows and the worst no worse, if imagination but emend them."

SHAKESPEARE.

Among the hundreds of letters and telegrams addressed to us by friends of SHADOWLAND there were many felicitous phrases. One of these lingers in the mind like a strain of music. "SHADOWLAND!" said a poet, "is the BROKEN BLOSSOMS of the magazine world!" This, in our opinion, is about the highest praise a magazine can win.

We dreamed of creating a magazine that would be useful, inspiring, uplifting and appreciative of all the arts. Beyond all this, we dreamed of creating a magazine that would be prized for sheer beauty alone—a magazine that would give one a thrill comparable to that which one receives from a bouquet of wild roses on a cottage window sill.

If we have come so near to our ideal that SHADOWLAND suggests the Griffith masterpiece; if it is the BROKEN BLOSSOMS of the magazine world, or nearly, it has not been done in vain. Beauty, like a fairy godmother, will watch over it as it grows up and beauty-lovers everywhere will take it to their hearts.

'Squawman,' for he was a great character and held my interest from first to last. So was my rôle in Mary Pickford's 'Romance of the Redwoods.' The man was redeemed thru a woman's love and this situation is always a vital one.

"I believe I took a keener pleasure in making 'Dont Change Your Husband,' than I have in any picture. There was comedy and emotional acting, with a splendid opportunity for good character work which I always gladly welcome. It is an inspiration to be under De Mille's direction. He works much as they do on the stage, making the scenes as they come in the story, whenever possible. This keeps us in the spirit of the action, and when, at last, we gather up all the currents of the plot in the final scenes, we can give a more convincing climax.

"Making motion pictures reminds me of a dress rehearsal on the stage. Everything is perfect, yet there is no responsive audience to applaud or criticize, and we all miss it. This is partly met thru the fan letters, and I assure you I read every one that comes to me, appreciating the words of encouragement and deriving some of the same thrills that applause would bring."

Elliott Dexter's voice is full and deep and he speaks slowly, betraying his Southern origin, for he was born in Galveston, Texas. From his earliest childhood he dreamed of a stage career and at the first opportunity he went to New York, planning to enter a dramatic school, but instead joined a stock company.

"My first appearance was in 'The Great Diamond Robbery,' and, tho I was merely 'suping,' I was the happiest boy in the world," said Mr. Dexter. "I remember that on that very night, standing in the wings, I solemnly determined to work on until I became a star.

"This was the beginning; there were much hard work and many disappointments before me, but it is wonderful what a tremendous force ambition is in our lives—the moment we attain even a little success, we no longer count our struggles."

Mr. Dexter's stage experience included playing in "The Tyranny of Tears," with John Drew; "The Heir of the Hurrah," with Guy Bates Post; "Diplomacy," and with "The Lily."

After reaching stardom on the stage he was willing to experiment in pictures and played with Marguerite Clark in "Helene of the North." Tho enjoying the work and seeing the possibilities he was not quite ready to forsake the spoken drama and went back for a season before making another picture. This time it was with Hazel Dawn in "The Masquerader." When this was completed he had fully succumbed to the lure of motion pictures, and casting his lot with them he has steadily ad-

"Ferd, They are Playing Your Song!"

Imagine the thrill these words gave Mr. Ferdinand Hohenhorst, of Covington, Ky., as he stood on a crowded street, watching the great Peace Parade, when Meyer's Military Band came swinging along playing his song, "Uncle Sam, the Peaceful Fighting Man." But let him tell his story in his own words:

Covington, Ky., 1941 Augustine St.

CHESTER MUSIC COMPANY, Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—My song entitled "Uncle Sam, the Peaceful Fighting Man," that your Mr. Friedman composed and arranged for me, is making a great hit. In the Peace Parade at Latonia, Ky., Meyer's Military Band played my song three times. We now have had it arranged for orchestras and quartettes, and it is making a good impression everywhere. The Vocalstyle Music Company, Cincinnati, O., a concern which manufactures music rolls for player pianos, has taken up my song, and already has sold over a thousand of these rolls in Cincinnati alone, and are placing them in their bulletin for April, which will go to all the different cities. Thanking you kindly for the services you have rendered me, I remain,

Yours very truly,

(Signed) FERDINAND HOHENHORST.

Leo Friedman, Our Composer

Mr. Leo Friedman

about whom Mr. Hohenhorst speaks so enthusiastically, is one of America's most gifted composers and the author of many great song hits. Among his great successes are "Meet Me To-night in Dreamland," the sales of which reached the enormous total of more than a million copies. Others that reached into the million class were "Let Me Call You Sweetheart," and "When I Dream of Old Erin." Mr. Friedman writes music to words that causes them to fairly throb with feeling and musical charm. He has been styled "America's Favorite Composer," and properly so, for his melodies have reached the hearts of millions of the American people, and made them sing.

SHADOWLAND

A Magazine for Dreamers

*"Many a man has a secret dream
Of where his heart would be;
Mine is a low verandahed hut
In a tope beside the sea."*

So sang Laurence Hope and few people knew more about dreams and shadows than she did. Dreams were all about her—the pink flowering almonds of Kandahar—the hiding places of the blue poppy—the purple fields of peaks that stretch from Northern India to the snows of Thibet—the shadow of clouds upon fields of iris—the shadows of moonlight falling on mosque and tower and minaret. To read her is to see the Char Minar again, to feel once more the scent of the yellow jessamine and the champac.

Every dreamer knows that the shadow is sometimes more than the substance—it was Emerson himself who said that the faintest reverie is divine.

Shadowland will call your dreams to mind. Something of all men's dreams will come into it—the dream home and the dream child; dream pictures; dream plays and the players that haunt our dreams; poetry and those age-long dreams of the human race—health and happiness.

If Laurence Hope could come back to the world she loved, we venture to say that she would like "Shadowland."

She would say that it fits into a world where dreams are king—where men first dream of what they wish to do and then find means to make their dreams come true.

If you are a dreamer, you belong to us.

Elliott Dexter Has Come Back

vanced until now he takes his place in the ranks of the foremost favorites.

Elliott Dexter has not depended on his charming personality and his good looks for popularity, but he has given us splendid acting that makes his finely drawn characters stand out as real human beings. His work is always the essence of good taste and perfection of detail, and no less an authority than Cecil De Mille declares that his technique is the most finished of any actor on the screen today.

"Do you study the script and thus form the idea of your rôle?" I questioned, curious as to his mode of procedure.

Relighting his pipe, Mr. Dexter replied, "Usually De Mille tells us the story, painting it so vividly that I see my character, clear and distinct, as if it were photographed before me. I have always been able to do this, for even on the stage I visualized my rôle with the entire action, as soon as I read the play."

"What a gift for directing!" I exclaimed. "Will you direct—some day?"

"I hope so," he smilingly confessed. "I can think of no greater satisfaction than to have directed a successful picture, and seeing it on the screen know it will be shown all over the world, swaying thousands with its message."

"It must give you a little thrill to know so many friends and admirers are welcoming you back to health and the screen with sincere affection," I remarked, after Gloria Swanson, William De Mille, Wanda Hawley, Wallace Reid, Major Robert Warwick, Raymond Hatton, Alvin Wyckoff, and Director Wood had filed by joyfully extending their hearty greeting.

Mr. Dexter's voice was a bit husky as he replied, "I can never express all that it means to me. Oh, I am so happy to be back!" And stretching out his arms, he took in the whole world.

Elliott Dexter possesses a simplicity and a genuine modesty that are of a very fine quality. He has sounded a new depth, he has caught a new insight into emotional intensities, which promises an added strength and warmth in the upbuilding of his future work in motion pictures.

THE WRITING FAMILY

By LA TOUCHE HANCOCK

We are a writing family,
 We are! We are! We are!
 My mother, brother, sister,
 Myself, and even pa!
 Mother writes short stories,
 Which nobody will read;
 Sister's writing play on play,
 Which never will succeed!
 I write so-called poetry,
 Which nobody will print;
 Despite rejection notices
 I never take the hint!
 Brother writes facetious screeds,
 Which are the greatest trash,
 While pa writes checks upon his bank,
 Which nobody will cash!

Fame and Fortune Contest for 1920

THE first Fame and Fortune Contest having come to a happy and successful end, and several prospective stars of the first magnitude having been selected and started on their careers, it is with pleasure that we announce a similar contest for the year 1920, beginning with the January number of

Motion Picture Magazine, Classic and Shadowland

Once more we shall go thru America with a fine-tooth comb, as it were, in search for budding beauties with Motion Picture ambitions. No longer can any young lady or girl say that she has not had a chance. We shall give them all a chance—that is, every one that appears to have sufficient personality, charm, beauty and winsomeness. The first test is the photograph. If that gives promise, we publish it and ask for more. If the others are equally promising, we secure a personal interview, and finally we make a "test" Moving Picture and send it broadcast thru the theaters. Many of the girls whose pictures appeared in the Honor Rolls of our magazines, received many flattering offers from producing companies, and this proves that we are doing a good thing for ambitious American beauties, even tho we might err in our final judgment in selecting the winners. The Honor Rolls will continue each month in all of our publications, thus giving something like two hundred girls honorable mention, including a published photo. One or more of these we promise will be made

Stars of International Fame

Just think of what a prize this is! The contest just closed attracted nation-wide attention. The newspapers everywhere published illustrated accounts of our final test, and several of the News Weeklies of Current Events showed scenes of the happy party at Roslyn, which were flashed on nearly every screen thruout the United States.

What an opportunity! If it does not interest you, tell your neighbor about it or your distant friend—they may have a daughter just looking for a chance of this kind.

One thing we want to impress upon all aspirants—be careful in the choice of the photograph you submit. Postcard photos will not do. Poorly printed photos, and small ones, cannot be considered. We feel that many beautiful girls lost out in the last contest just because they did not go to the trouble of consulting a good photographer. Furthermore, dont submit photos that lie! They may get you on the Honor Roll, but they will never see you thru. We recall in the last contest several young ladies who submitted wonderful pictures, and succeeded in getting on the Honor Roll, but when they appeared on the scene, alas, we found that the camera had lied. We want pictures that do you full justice, even flattering ones, but not dishonest ones. If you are a giant or a midget, if you have an impossible profile, or an ugly nose, or some other defect, dont let the photographer conceal these things—it will be to your loss and disadvantage in the end. Your features may not be perfect, but you may win in spite of that—only, we want to know all. Hence, please do not try to deceive us. Make yourself appear to the best advantage, but do not overdo it.

Rules and date of Contest opening to be announced in next issue.

WHO should walk into the room but Howard Lindsay! Of all men perhaps he was the last I had expected to find as the president of this great new company. They had told me that Mr. Lindsay, of the Consolidated, was looking for a fine country home and was interested in buying the Dollard Place in Englewood; so as executor of the Dollard estate I had come to discuss the terms with him.

But Lindsay! Surely some miracle had happened. For it was the very man who had come to me "dead broke" about four years back and had asked me to help him get a new job.

"You are surprised, Mr. Otis, I can see that without your telling me. Let that real estate matter rest for a moment while I tell you how the change happened. It won't take five minutes. It all seems simple as A B C as I look back on it now.

How It All Began

"Our new life began when we discovered how to save money. That happened soon after I started in the new job you helped me secure. And it all came about right in my own home. Our sole source of supply was my salary of $3,000. That first year we didn't save a cent. Besides that, we woke up on New Year's day to find a big bunch of unpaid bills to be taken care of somehow or other out of future salary checks.

"When I asked myself the reason for all this I found that I did not know the reason, and no more did my wife, because we hadn't the faintest idea what our money had been spent for.

"Then we looked around among our friends and learned a great lesson.

"The Weeds, I knew, were getting more than $5,000 a year. They lived in a modest apartment, did not wear fine clothes, seldom went to the theatre, did little entertaining, yet we knew they barely had enough money to pay current bills.

"In the case of the Wells, I found a very different story and one that set me thinking hard. Their income was $2,000 a year, yet, to my amazement, they confided to us that they had saved $600 a year ever since they were married. They didn't have any grand opera in their program—except on their little Victrola—but they did go to the theatre regularly, they wore good clothes, entertained their friends at their home and were about the happiest and most contented couple of all our married friends.

"The difference between these two families was that in one case the expenditures were made without any plan—while in the other the income was regulated on a weekly budget system.

"We sat down that evening and made up a budget for all our expenses for the next fifty-two weeks. We discovered leaks galore. We found a hundred ways where little amounts could be saved.

"In one short month we had a 'strangle hold' on our expenses and knew just where we were going. In one year my wife proudly produced a bank book showing a tidy savings account of $800.

My New Grip on Business

"In the meantime an extraordinary change had come over me in business.

"I didn't fully realize this until the president called me in one day and said, 'Lindsay, you have been doing exceptionally well. I have been studying your work for the last year and you have saved the company a lot of money. We have decided to give you an interest in the business.'

"So there you are. It is wonderful, isn't it? I often wish I might tell my story to the thousands of young married couples who are having the hardest time of their lives just when they ought to be having the best time."

So now I have the opportunity and you are lucky, if only you will act on the wonderful message this story contains.

HARRISON OTIS.

The Magic Budget Plan

The Ferrin Money Making Account System is built on the experience of Howard Lindsay. This system, which is simplicity itself, comprises:

The Ferrin Money Making Account Book.
The Ferrin Kitchen Calendar (for the household).

The Ferrin Pocket Account Book.
The Ferrin Investment and Insurance Register.

The Ferrin Household Inventory and Fire Insurance Record.

Compact information is given on Making a Budget, Keeping Expense Accounts, Making Safe Investments, Making an Inventory of Household Goods.

There is no red tape or complicated book-keeping in this system—it is so simple that any one can keep it—so convenient that you will not notice the few moments of your time required to make entries. The Pocket Account Book (price when sold separately 50 cents) contains printed slips so that you have only to jot down the amounts of your daily expenditures. The Kitchen Calendar (price 50 cents) keeps track of household expenses.

At the end of each week or month these amounts are transferred to the Money Making Account Book, which contains 112 pages, size 8½x10¾ inches, and is bound in half blue Silk Cloth Back—Cadet Blue Cover, Paper Sides—Turned Edges, semi-flexible, stamped in gold on Front Cover. This book has been prepared by an expert to fit any salary from the smallest to the largest. Incorporated in it is a recapitulation for every month of the year, which shows at a glance the Budget and the amounts paid out during the month for the various classified items of expense. It is the only book to our knowledge which has a Budget column for every month. Special columns are provided for items on which an income tax does not have to be paid, so that these amounts may be deducted at the end of the year.

One Money Saving Feature

A war tax is now levied on almost every kind of article you buy. Few people know that the amounts so paid on daily purchases may properly be deducted from their income tax report. By keeping track of these war taxes on the pages for daily expenditures, and transferring the weekly or monthly totals to the Money Making Account Book, you will effect a saving on your income tax that will surprise you and that will pay the small price of the System many times over.

The Ferrin Investment Insurance Register is designed to keep an accurate record of your investments, insurance policies, etc. Contains 32 pages, size 5x8 inches, price separately, 50c. The Ferrin Inventory and Fire Insurance Record will enable you to make and keep a complete inventory of every room in the house; also provides for record of your fire insurance policy. It is an absolute necessity in case of a fire. It may save you many thousand times the cost, which is 50c when sold separately.

Two Minutes a Day

The Ferrin Money Making Account System takes only two minutes a day. Any bright grammar school boy or girl can keep the accounts. This method is not a hard task.

Now you need not worry about the money you spend for clothes, food, rent or the theatre. You will spend it freely because you will know how much you can afford to spend.

The Ferrin Money Making System is a most practical gift to any newly married couple. Many people use them for Christmas gifts.

Send No Money

See how magically the Ferrin Money Making Account System works, no matter how much or how little your income. We know what you will think of it when you see it. So we are willing to send you the complete system without your sending us any money in advance. Just mail the coupon, and back will come the system by return mail. If you feel that you can afford not to have it, simply send it back and you will owe nothing.

But when you have seen what big returns the Ferrin System will pay you, you will surely want to keep this wonderful aid to money-making, especially as we are now making a special, short-time offer of only $3 for the complete system.

You will appreciate what a remarkable offer this is when you consider that other expense account books are sold for $3 and cover a period of only two years.

The Ferrin Money Making Account Book covers four years, and therefore has twice the value, $6. And in addition you get the Ferrin Kitchen Calendar, the Ferrin Pocket Account Book, the Ferrin Investment and Insurance Register, the Ferrin Household Inventory and Fire Insurance Record, each worth 50c, or $2.00. You have the opportunity, therefore, of securing $8 value for only $3.

But we can make this special combination offer only for a limited time. We expect to place this system in one hundred thousand homes this year. We want your home to be one of them. You are therefore urged to mail the coupon now—to do so costs nothing and does not obligate you in any way, and it may be a revelation to you of how much more you can get out of your income.

Letter from Head of Financial Department of largest corporation of its kind in the United States Independent Corporation.

Gentlemen:—I consider your account book a remarkable contribution to the people of this country at this time.

In our company we have 5,000 employees and it was a revelation to me in giving them advice in regard to the making out of their income tax returns to find how few had any intelligent idea of their income and their living expenses.

The simplicity of your plan, which by comparison with previous methods of account keeping would seem to be a well nigh automatic, appeals to me strongly.

They say you can't teach an old dog new tricks, but I will say to you that I am going to use the Ferrin Book for my own family expenses, and consider it will make money for me right from the start.

8,320 Burlingtons in the U. S. Navy—

8,320 Burlingtons have been sold to the men aboard the U. S. battleships. Practically every vessel in the U. S. Navy has many Burlington watches aboard. Some have over 100 Burlingtons. The victory of the Burlington among the men in the U. S. Navy is testimony to Burlington superiority. A watch has to be made of sturdy stuff in order to "make good" on a man-of-war. The constant vibration, the extreme heat in the boiler rooms, the cold salt air and the change of climate from the Arctic to the Tropics are the most severe tests on a watch. If a watch will stand up and give active service aboard a man-of-war, it will stand up anywhere.

21-Jewel Burlington $3⁵⁰
A Month

And yet you may get a 21-jewel Burlington for only $3.50 a month. Truly it is the master watch. 21 ruby and sapphire jewels, adjusted to the second, temperature, isochronism and positions. Fitted at the factory in a gold strata case, warranted for 25 years. All the newest cases are yours to choose from. You pay only the rock-bottom-direct-price—positively the exact price that the wholesale dealer would have to pay.

See It First! You don't pay a cent to anybody until you see the watch. We ship the watch to you on approval. You are the sole judge. No obligation to buy merely because you get the watch on approval.

Write for Booklet!

Put your name and address in the coupon or on a letter or post card now and get your Burlington Watch book free and prepaid. You will know a lot more about watch buying when you read it. Too, you will see handsome illustrations in full color of all the newest cases from which you have to choose. The booklet is free. Merely send your name and address on the coupon.

Use this Oliver for five days as if it were your own. Type all your letters or any other work with it. Put it to every conceivable test. Compare it with any $100 typewriter on the market. Compare it for simplicity of construction. For beauty of finish. For ease of operation. For speed. For neatness of work. Then if, after 5 days free trial, you do not wish to keep the typewriter for any reason whatsoever, simply send it back to us and you won't be out one cent for the free trial. If, on the other hand, you decide that it is the finest typewriter, and you wish to keep it, then pay us at the easy rate of only $3 a month. This is the open, free trial offer we make to you on the Oliver to let you see for yourself that if any typewriter is worth $100 it is this splendid, speedy Oliver No. 9, our latest model and the finest we ever built. Who could make such an offer of free trial and ship without money unless they had absolute confidence in the quality of their product proved by years of experience?

For $57 you can now obtain the identical Oliver Typewriter formerly priced at $100. We are able to save you nearly half because of our radically new and economical method of distribution. During the war we learned many lessons. We found that it was unnecessary to have such a vast number of traveling salesmen and so many expensive branch houses throughout the country. We were able to discontinue many other superfluous sales methods. The result is that we can afford to sell at $57 the very same Oliver formerly priced at $100.

In line for something good

THE big thing that Paramount Pictures have done for you is to take the gamble out of choosing motion picture entertainment.

Time was when you took a chance every time you paid your money—every fan remembers it. And even now it isn't everybody who knows how to avoid taking chances.

Pleasure-time is not so plentiful that it can be wasted anyhow.

But note this: Wherever you see the name Paramount you can bank on a good show.

It is not a question of taking anybody's word, it's simply a question of reading the announcements of the better theatres everywhere, checking up the brand names of the pictures, and choosing the Paramount Artcraft features, Paramount Comedies and Paramount short subjects.

Go by the name and you're in line for something good.

Just now Doris Kenyon is dividing her time between the footlights and the film studios. She is playing on Broadway in the highly successful farce, "The Girl in the Limousine." A native of Bridgeport, Conn., Miss Kenyon has lived in Brooklyn and Syracuse. She is a graduate of Packer Institute, Brooklyn, and of Columbia University.

Miss Kenyon went on the stage in "Princess Pat" and was quickly discovered by the cinema, doing her first important rôle with Alice Brady in World's "The Rack." She has forged rapidly to the front and is now one of screenland's favorites.

A Wife Too Many

Into the hotel lobby walked a beautiful woman and a distinguished man. Little indeed did the gay and gallant crowd know that around these heads there flew stories of terror—of murder—and treason—that on their entrance half a dozen detectives sprang up from different parts of the place.

Because of them the lights of the War Department in Washington blazed far into the night. About their fate was wound the tragedy of a broken marriage, of a fortune lost, of a nation betrayed.

It is a wonderful story with the kind of mystery that you will sit up nights trying to fathom. It is just one of the stories fashioned by that master of mystery

CRAIG KENNEDY
The American Sherlock Holmes
ARTHUR B. REEVE
The American Conan Doyle

He is the detective genius of our age. He has taken science—science that stands for this age—and allied it to the mystery and romance of detective fiction. Even to the smallest detail, every bit of the plot is worked out scientifically.

Such plots—such suspense—with real, vivid people moving through the maelstrom of life! Frenchmen have mastered the art of terror stories. English writers have thrilled whole nations by their artful heroes. But—all these seem old-fashioned—out of date—beside the infinite variety—the weird excitement of Arthur B. Reeve's tales.

FREE POE 10 Volumes

To those who send the coupon promptly, we will give FREE a set of Edgar Allan Poe's masterpieces in 10 volumes. When the police of New York failed to solve one of the most fearful murder mysteries of the time, Edgar Allan Poe—far off there in Paris—found the solution. The story is in these volumes.

This is a wonderful combination. Here are two of the greatest writers of mystery and scientific detective stories. You can get the Reeve at a remarkably low price and the Poe FREE.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"stag work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is overearning over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 12 volumes; descriptive booklets free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers, 50 cents copy 10c, annual subscription $2.00. Monthly not teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama. Miss Bainter is picturesquely pleasing.

Casino.—"The Little Whopper." Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn, a discovery, is a brilliant Lincoln.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment, adapted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of a guileless young publisher of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Century.—"Aphrodite." Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle. The ballet, directed by Michel Fokine, is spirited and colorful.

Cohan and Harris.—"The Royal Vagabond." A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor. Also tinkling music. And a corking cast, with Grace Fisher, Tessa Kosta, John Goldsworthy and Frederick Santley.

Central.—"The Little Blue Devil." A musical entertainment built about the late Clyde Fitch's "The Blue Mouse." Tuneful music by Harold Ateridge and Harry Carroll. Lillian Lorraine is the "blue devil" and Bernard Granville is co-featured.

Eltinge.—"The Girl in the Limousine." A decidedly daring bouboir farce, by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white bed is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening. John Cumberland is very funny and Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, is both pretty and pleasing as the heroine.

Forty-fourth Street Theater.—"Carnival." A British-made romantic drama of Venice at carnival time marking the first appearance of the English favorite, Godfrey Tearle. Mr. Tearle seems an actor of unusual attainments, but the drama is dreary, out-of-date stuff.

George M. Cohan's.—Elsie Janis and "her gang." Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

Globe.—"Apple Blossoms." The ambitious and much heralded operetta of Fritz Kreisler and Victor Jacobi plus colorful Joseph Urban settings. An offering far above the musical average. John Charles Thomas sings admirably, Wilda Bennett is an attractive heroine and Florence Shirley lends a piquant personality to the proceedings.

Harris.—"Wedding Bells." A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

Hippodrome.—"Happy Days." Big and spectacular production typical of the Hippodrome. The diving girls are again a feature, disporting in the huge "Hip" tank.

Hudson.—"Clarence," Booth Tarkington's

delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier re-united a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Lyric.—"The Rose of China." A pleasant musical comedy, in a way a sort of Chinese "Madam Butterfly." Clever lyrics, striking Urban settings and a fairly adequate cast. Rather tuneful.

Maxine Elliott's.—"The Unknown Woman." A very emotional melodrama with Marjorie Rambeau in Bendel gowns and tears. Jean Robertson contributes a vivid bit as a "dope."

Morasco.—"Civilian Clothes." A delightful comedy to please everybody. Brand new idea and cleverly worked out. Thurston Hall in the title rôle shares the honors with beautiful Olive Tell. Support excellent.

Plymouth.—"The Jest." Arthur Hopkins' production of Sem Benelli's colorful and gripping Florentine drama. John Barrymore is again seen in his original rôle. An admirable cast and Robert Edmund Jones' settings lend splendid aid.

Princess.—"Nightie Night." Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger and some dancing. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

Shubert.—"The Magic Melody." A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Fay Marbe, Julia Deane, Earl Benham and Carmel Myers, the last two well known to the screen, head the cast.

Thirty-ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal," Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

Winter Garden.—"The Passing Show of 1919." A typical girly garden show in which the famous runway gets plenty of use. The revue presents a number of travesties upon current attractions, particularly colorful being that of "The Jest," with George Winninger doing a clever burlesque of Lionel Barrymore.

ON TOUR

Shubert. E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire. These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," and "The Taming of the Shrew" are distinguished in every sense of the word.

"Palmy Days." A picturesque drama by Augustus Thomas in which Wilton Lackaye does the finest work of his career since "Jim the Penman."

"See-Saw." A pleasant musical entertainment. The delightful Elizabeth Hines stands out and Dorothy Mackaye is pleasantly cast.

"Moonlight and Honeyuckle." Ruth Chatterton in a charming comedy that might have been a big hit had the playwright taken full advantage of some splendid situations in the last act. As it is it starts like a hare and ends like a tortoise.

"An Exchange of Wives." Another Cosmo Hamilton comedy which, however, never attains the spontaneity or piquancy of "Scandal." The chief blush producer is a scene on a sleeping porch.

"She Would and She Did." Grace George in a light (very light) comedy founded on a little hole in the golf links which Grace angrily made, resulting in her suspension from the club for two months. Society and golf folk will probably find this an entertaining little play.

"The Better 'Ole." The Coburn production of the musical comedy based upon Bruce Bairnsfather's new immortal cartoon creation, Old Bill. Mr. Coburn's characterization of Bill is still as remarkable as ever.

"A Lonely Romeo," with Lew Fields. A Judge!

When you sent me up for four years, you called me a rattlesnake. Maybe I am one—anyhow you hear me rattling now. One year after I got to the pen, my daughter died of—well, they said it was poverty and the disgrace together. You've got a daughter, Judge, and I am going to make you know how it feels to lose one. I'm free now, and I guess I've turned to rattlesnake all right. Look out when I strike. Yours respectfully, Rattlesnake.
This is the beginning of one of the stories by O. HENRY.

THE sets of Jack London which have been given FREE with O. Henry are handsome sets of books and we cannot afford to continue to give such books away.

We have the choice of discontinuing the offer or giving you flimsier books. We prefer to stop the offer.

Before doing so we wish to make this one announcement. As long as the present edition lasts you can get the O. Henry at its regular price and the Jack London FREE. This, however, is your last chance. Send the coupon without money at once and get your O. Henry for examination and Jack London FREE.

O. Henry

O. Henry has made another record. More volumes of his works have been sold than any other short stories in the history of the world. Up to the day this page goes to press 3,784,000 volumes have been sold—in England and Australia, France and Germany—throughout the world—over two million in the United States alone. So many editions have been printed that the old plates were entirely worn out and we had to make brand new plates for this edition. So you will get the very best impression from these new plates—the clearest, cleanest print you have ever seen.

Your Last Chance

This is the last edition of Jack London's works we can get at the special price which permits of our giving them free with O. Henry. When this one edition is gone (and there are only a few hundred sets now left) you will be able to get Jack London's wonderful stories only at their regular price of $1.00 or more a volume.

Now, while you can, get the O. Henry at the low price with the Jack London free. Dont be left out of a thing as tremendous as this. Dont let this chance go and later pay a big price.

Send the Coupon Now

—get Jack London free—and join the millions who have wept and laughed and felt better for the reading of O. Henry's warm, kindly, joyous, tragic bits of life.

Remember that the end of the sale is at hand. A day lost will cost you money.

"A Thief—She?"

AND YET—with a silver ebe told him all the sordid story! The stage life—the nights of drunkenness—the days of remorse for her sin—all was poured out in the desperate tale. But he loved her in spite of it all, and—then came the astounding truth—the unexpected twist—that makes O. Henry the most eagerly read of American story-tellers.

He Dared More Than
All His Heroes

Two hundred miles out on the Pacific with a boat leaking at every seam, with every member aboard seasick from the endless tossing—with hands blistered from the ropes—there and then, Jack London learned navigation. He built himself a cockleshell, and in it, with his wife, sailed nearly around the world. Go with him to the freezing North. Follow him to the South Seas. Fight your way with him around the Horn. He was more real, more primitive, than any of his heroes. Along the lea-bound Yukon he had trokked with dogs and sleighs and hunger—oo the coral South Sea Islands he had battled with typhoons and man-eating cannibals.

light show running in the usual groove. Frances Cameron, who is developing remarkably, is the bright figure of "A Lonely Romeo," while Mr. Fields is his humorous self. There's a decidedly funny scene in a men's hat shop.

"Chi Chin Chow." An opulent and beautiful musical extravaganza based upon the Arabian Nights tale of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. Dazzling series of sensuous stage pictures. "Chu Chu Chow" is presented this year with an entirely new edition and new costumes. Marjorie Wood makes a colorful desert woman, Lionel Braham is very effective as the robber sheik and Eugene Cowles makes the rôle of steward stand out. George Rosely plays the young lover admirably.

"La La Lucille." Musical comedy built around the efforts of a loving couple to arrange a divorce in order to live up to the terms of a millionaire aunt's will. A co-respondent is engaged and troubles begin. John E. Hazzard and Janet Velie play the would-be divorcées, while Marjorie Bentley and Helen Clark give able assistance. Light summer entertainment. The Shubert Gaeties of 1919. A lively revue with scores of statuesque girls and stunning frocks. A decidedly attractive entertainment.

"John Ferguson." A straight drama that compares favorably with anything of the kind that New York has seen for years. Beautifully staged and acted. Masterpieces of this kind should be liberally patronized to encourage others.

George White's "Scandals of 1919." All sorts and variations of dancing make up for a lack of story or humor. The real star is piquant little Ann Pennington—as seductive a little jizzer as ever shimmied on Broadway. Then there's the lively dancing of Mr. White himself.

"Friendly Enemies." This is the record-breaking comedy drama of last season, with Louis Mann in his original rôle.

"Three Wise Fools." Austin Strong's human little drama of three crusty old bachelors who are bequeathed a young woman and who are subsequently rejuvenated. Melodrama with a heart throb. Helen Menken gives a striking performance of the nerve-racked heroine, while Claude Gillingwater is a delightfully testy old Teddy Fwindy.

"She's a Good Fellow." A light but pleasant musical comedy built about the efforts of old folks to break up a marriage between a loving young couple. Joseph Santley is a likeable lover-husband, masquerading in skirts for a whole act. Ivy Sawyer, the very pleasing Ann Orr and Scott Welsh lend delightful assistance.

"39 East." A charming comedy founded on a boarding school romance in which many interesting characters make love-making difficult for a pair of young lovers.

"Up in Mabel's Room." Piquant, daring but decidedly amusing farce built about the pursuit of a dainty pink undergarment which bears the same name as a recent jazz dance. Admirable cast, including the radiant Hazel Dawn.

"Three Faces East." Another Secret Service-German spy drama, this one by Anthony Paul Kelly, one of our most successful playwrights. The principal charm of this play is in trying to guess who are the German spies and who are the Allies, just as we were puzzled in "Cheating Cheaters" to know who were burglars and who were not.

AT NIGHT— a thorough bath for your Face—

If you want a skin that is clear, brilliant with color—let it breathe at night

TINY invisible dust particles—always, always falling on your unprotected face!

In crowds—in shops—in theatres—all day long, while you are going unconsciously about your occupations—the delicate skin of your face is exposed to millions of unseen enemies.

That is why a thorough bath for your skin at night is so important.

During your eight hours of sleep the skin of your face should be allowed to rest—to breathe. The delicate pores should be freed from the dust and dirt that have accumulated during the day.

For remember—authorities on the skin now agree that most of the commoner skin troubles come, not from the blood—but from bacteria and parasites that are carried into the pores from outside, through dust and small particles in the air.

If, from neglect or the wrong method of cleansing, your skin has lost the flawless clearness it should have—if it is marred by blackheads—by disfiguring little blemishes—begin tonight to change this condition. You can make your skin just what it should be. For every day it is changing—old skin dies and new skin takes its place. By giving the new skin, as it forms, the special treatment its need demand, you can make it as soft, as clear and smooth as you would like to have it.

The famous treatment for blackheads

Perhaps, in your case, failure to use the right method of cleansing for your type of skin has resulted in disfiguring little blackheads. This condition can be overcome—and your skin can be smooth and clear in future.

To keep your skin free from this trouble, try using every night this famous treatment:

Apply hot cloths to the face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough washcloth, work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly, always with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear, hot water, then with cold—the colder the better. If possible, rub your face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice. Dry carefully. To remove the blackheads already formed, substitute a flesh brush for the washcloth in the treatment above. Then protect the fingers with a handkerchief and press out the blackheads.

Use this treatment regularly, and you will begin in a few days to notice the greater clearness and attractiveness it gives to your skin.

The famous Woodbury treatments for each different skin need—for an oily skin, for blemishes, for conspicuous nose pores, etc.—are contained in the little booklet that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap.

Find the treatment that your particular type of skin demands—then use it regularly each night before retiring. You will be surprised to see how quickly your skin will gain in attractiveness—how smooth, clear and colorful you can keep it by this care.

Woodbury's Facial Soap is on sale at any drug store or toilet goods counter in the United States or Canada. Get a cake today—begin using it tonight. A 25 cent cake lasts a month or six weeks.

We shall be glad to send you a trial size cake

For 6 cents we will send you a trial size cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap (enough for a week or ten days of any Woodbury facial treatment), together with the booklet of treatments, "A Skin You Love To Touch." Or for 15 cents we will send you the treatment booklet and samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream. Address The Andrew Jergens Co., 902 Spring Grove Ave., Cincinnati, Ohio.

If you live in Canada, address The Andrew Jergens Co., Limited, 902 Sherbrooke St., Perth, Ontario.

WANDA HAWLEY

Wanda was looked upon as one of the screen "finds" of last year. Miss Hawley keeps steadily advancing since her first hit in "Old Wives for New." She is now at the very forefront of our younger actresses.

Photograph by LEON T. A.

HELENE CHADWICK

Helene hails from a town bearing her own cognomen. Chadwick, N. Y., being the youngest of a famous family. She first achieved success in Pathé serial productionns and is now with Goldwyn

GLADYS GEORGE

Miss George is one of the most popular players with the Universal forces and she has been doing some unusual work in several recent productions.

HELEN BRONEAU

Miss Broneau is a Universal discovery. She seems to be coming to the front rapidly and the "U" powers-that-be expect great things of her.

The Silken Gloria

we went for a walk. At 1:30 we returned.

The hotel clerk was quite sure Miss Swanson hadn't come down yet. So we waited, whiling away the time with observing the clerk's technique in handling the tribulations of the hotel guests.

At 2 o'clock we knew the clerk's first name was Al and why he never went to the Methodist church.

At 2:15 o'clock we heard, for the nineteenth time, that there wasn't a room to be had in the hotel at any price. In fact, the waiting list . . .

And then Miss Swanson appeared.

Except for her silken sleekness, we would hardly have recognized her. The real Gloria Swanson looks like the younger sister of the celluloid Gloria.

"So sorry," smiled Miss Swanson, "so-o-o sorry." Not, of course, meaning a word of it.

"We're used to waiting for beautiful stars," we reparteed. "The more beautiful they are, the longer they make us wait. Just one player ever kept us waiting longer than this."

"I won't have that," said Miss Swanson. "Try to interview me again tomorrow, and I'll break that record."

Then we took a taxi to the Hotel Astor for lunch, Miss Swanson, like all femininity just emerging from slumber, being "famished."

On the way downtown we learnt these startling facts: That Miss Swanson works every second of her time in California and really doesn't luxuriate at all.

That she doesn't want to keep on doing the semi-vampire stuff of her past few pictures, but hopes to do character stuff such as her "Why Change Your Wife?" She will even don prim clothes and spectacles for art.

That she worships Cecil De Mille.

That she loves diamond and platinum bracelets. She wears three on her left wrist alone.

That she never can button her gloves. (We know, because we did our best to assist her en route via taxi.)

That she loves New York because of its theaters and gor-

Gloria Swanson is twenty-one and, off the screen, looks like a younger sister of her celluloid self. The daughter of an army officer, Miss Swanson received her education everywhere—from Chicago to Porto Rico

WE reached Gloria Swanson's hotel exactly on time for our interview—12 o'clock noon.

"Gracious," sighed a languid voice over the house 'phone, "I'm just getting up—and I'm still half asleep. Please come back at one."

So we adjourned to the hotel lobby for rest—and meditation. We had expected Miss Swanson to be a luxurious young lady, but . . .

At one we called her on the 'phone again. "My, my!" sighed Miss Swanson, "I'll be right down—in ten minutes."

But her voice sounded just as sleepy as an hour before. Knowing something of the feminine conception of ten minutes, geous places to dance. That California becomes dreadfully tiresome.

That tears came to her eyes—real tears—when she talked of Elliott Dexter and the way his sudden illness had held back his stellar career in the films.

But to interrupt our findings to turn to weightier things:

"Tell me I look younger off the screen," commanded Gloria.

We saw our duty and did it. "Exactly how old am I?" she insisted.

We parried, realizing we were on exceedingly dangerous ground. Finally, pushed to the wall, we hazarded, "Twenty-two."

"Twenty-one," said Miss Swanson, in triumph. "You just protested when I said I didn't want to go on vamping or semi-vamping on the screen. Why?"

"Because," said we, trying to take our editorial mind from Miss Swanson's eyes, "you're so uncannily seductive. Most vampires leave us cold, but . . ."

"Yes," aided Miss Swanson.

"You are exceedingly—er—effective."

At that psychological moment we arrived in front of the Astor.

We sighed with relief

Once inside, Miss Swanson attacked a healthy-sized luncheon with fervor. A waiter attempted to remove the actress' orange-juice before she had finished—and she well nigh withered him. Right then and there we decided that Miss Swanson might easily speak out her mind. In fact, she did.

Between orange-juice and soup and chops, Miss Swanson told us more of herself. The daughter of an army officer, she received her education everywhere. "It was a terrible handicap," she said, "my education stretching from Chicago to Porto Rico.

"I first tried pictures with Essanay in Chicago and then I went to the coast. There I was with Triangle and later joined Mack Sennett's comedies. But I wasn't a bathing girl. I never—never—was. Please get that into your interview, wont you?"

We promised.

"We did a series of juvenile comedies in which I had a leading rôle. Then Mr. De Mille gave me my chance in drama. That's all. As I never cared for comedy and my whole heart is in dramatic work, you can guess how hard I worked to make good with Mr. De Mille."

We asked Miss Swanson to tell us her philosophy of things in general.

"I live for today," she said, "and I try to get every bit out of it. I don't believe in waiting for tomorrow. Life is too short for that."

Then our interview drifted until, like all interviews, it came

"I live for today," says Gloria Swanson, "and I try to get every bit out of it. I don't believe in waiting for tomorrow. Life is too short for that." That sums up her philosophy of life in general

Imagine the "male vampire" of the screen being a New Englander! Altho of French descent, (his real name is Coté), Cody's home town is Waterville, Me., a few miles from the home of Dustin and William Farnum. He soon forsook Maine for the stage luncheon at the Alexandria and some moving picture notable could be seen at almost every table).

You may, perhaps, think it strange that the original "He Vamp" star of the screen should have come from New England. And then, again, you may not. It all depends on whether you have come from there yourself, or on whether you still live there, or on whether you have never been there at all. Undoubtedly, there are people who are "un-profoundly" affected by their environments; for instance, Lew Cody.

"Dustin Farnum used to live within a few miles of Waterville, Me., which is my home," he remarked. (We were, by the way, at luncheon at the Alexandria and some moving picture notable could be seen at almost every table). "We often get together," he went on, "and talk over the scenes and people we used to know. Of course, we didn't live there at the same time and we didn't really know the same people, but that is a mere detail. In that neighborhood, the scenes and the people seem, somehow, always the same; the same yesterday, today and forever!"

There, then, you have the material for a tragedy by Ibsen. Think of it! Lew Cody, whose real name is Cote, a boy of French descent, living in a place where, if one can believe some of our best fiction, people take their sins and their virtues very seriously and where marriages are made in Heaven for life and for population!

He could read French, too; gracefully written tales of graceful love affairs, sincere while they lasted, lightly undertaken and gracefully dropped. Why, he might have committed suicide—or matrimony—before he was eighteen, with vine leaves in his hair and all that sort of thing. But instead of that, he did something that could never have occurred to a character of Ibsen; lightly and without any particular brain storm, he decided to go away.

"One afternoon, after a whole day spent reciting poetry at myself, I went to my father and told him that I was going to go on the stage. 'All right!' my father said. 'When are you going?' Of course, that was all wrong. He should have objected violently. But he must have had too keen a sense of drama, himself, to do such a commonplace thing. Instead, he staked me to a wardrobe and I went to New York and got my start almost at once."

This was with Mary Mannering in "The Stubbornness of Geraldine." Then came melodrama with A. H. Woods; such plays as "Fast Life in New York" and "The Power of Money," an experience which, he says, he would not take anything for. And then, with all of his energy, he plunged into stock, becoming actor-manager of his own company, the Cody Players, just out of New York. He had four companies before that began to tire him and then he left them to shift for themselves while he came to the Pacific coast with the Winter Garden production.

"I've been everything in the profession except a clown in a circus," and but for its being such a serious job, he might have been that too.

He fell instantly and intensely in love with Los Angeles and decided to return sometime and remain indefinitely. It was at this psychological moment that Thomas Ince sent an emissary with the offer of a screen contract.

Undoubtedly, Lew Cody's best work was done, not under contract, but as a free lance, in such pictures as the Lois Weber productions "For Husbands Only," and "Borrowed Clothes" with Mrs. Chaplin, Cecil B. de Mille's "Don't Change Your Husband" and "The Life Line," and "The Broken Butterfly" with Maurice Tournier.

When I saw him at the Alexandria, he had just finished his first picture made with his own company and he had collaborated with his director, L. Gasnier, in the writing of the story. His second picture, he said, is to be "The Butterfly Man" from the book by George Barr McCutcheon.

Lew Cody is, himself, very much of a "butterfly man." That is, he has the quick, volatile temperament of the artistic Frenchman who is also a natural dilettante.

"Until a year ago," he said, "I never had any particular ambition. I was conscientious enough in my work and all that, but—" He made a gesture with the hand that held his cigaret. Very quietly, in fact without attracting his attention in the least, it left its holder and deposited itself on the tablecloth where it went on burning merrily. "Oh, look!" I exclaimed, pointing rudely. For a moment he was decidedly puzzled; "How did that get there?" and then, with a glance at the exquisite but empty holder,

"Do I believe in marriage?" says Lew Cody. "Yes, indeed—for other people. I think it is a beautiful institution. But the human butterfly type—male or female—should be free. They can't rub up against the little troubles of everyday life and keep the gloss on their wings"

Betty Blythe: The Peacock Princess

Photograph by Alfred Cheney Johnston

"I WAS born in Los Angeles," began Betty Blythe, as she whisked a heap of pink chiffons from one chair and a pile of letters from another, drawing them nearer the window where we could watch the glorious view of the mountains which so entrances her.

"After being away for nearly four years, it is such fun to be back. Here in Hollywood there are no elevated trains, no subways, no crashing traffic, just peace and quiet, why, it's heavenly. I was so thrilled the first night after my arrival to hear a cat fight on the back fence, it sounded so rural.

"These silver nights are wonderful, too," she continued. "I wander all over the hills. I walked thru the big gates into the lovely grounds of the Japanese place on that hill last night and suddenly, while enjoying the wonder of the scene, I heard the strangest noises. I stopped to listen and the next minute I saw there were monkeys swinging from tree to tree in the moonlight. I didn't run home, I flew!"

Betty Blythe is another of the bright lights that the Goldwyn studios have added to their splendid stock company. She has just completed "The Silver Horde," a Rex Beach story, and will next appear in a Brentwood production under the direction of Henry Kolker.

"I have played so many vamps," said Betty, "that I am glad of the opportunity to play this rôle of a splendid woman who finds her happiness in the development of her own soul, not in wealth or power. And clothes! Oh, I am to wear some gorgeous things."

Going to her closet, Miss Blythe brought out an array of ravishing costumes and spreading them on the bed we indulged in a feminine orgie of tulle, chiffons, lustrous satins and rich furs.

"Of course, like most women," said Betty, "I have always longed for beautiful clothes and now that I can have them I love the planning and designing. I sometimes wonder if my old vision of realizing the poetic sense of literary effort is merging into a passion for clothes. However, in motion pictures they play such an important part that I feel justified."

"How did you discover your own particular style?" I asked, remembering the distinctive manner in which this stunning girl is always gowned.

"My dear," she replied solemnly, "it took three years and an awful waste of money to teach me that I must civilize my weird ideas—I do so love queerish styles—if they are becoming.

"I adore brilliant colors, they brighten one's mood, while laces seem alive. Look at this shimmering symphony which also persists in shimmying," laughed Betty, holding up a fascinating frock of cloth of gold with its bands of heavy silk fringe forming the "shimmying" skirt.

Winding herself into a luscious Moorish yellow crepe negligee and sweeping across the room, she remarked, "I glory in trains and tassels, too. The last time I wore this I killed a man—it photographed beautifully! I'm going to have it made over. I'm always saving things. If I should die suddenly I would miss a lot of fun for I have such stacks of lovely materials waiting to be made over."

Then, sitting on the edge of the bed surrounded by these luxurious clothes, she told me some of her early experiences.

Betty Blythe made her first appearance on the stage billed as "The Peacock Princess." In a sumptuous gown, made entirely of peacock feathers, she put on her own little musical act at Pantages Theater, in Los Angeles and scored a success.

"It was a beautiful gown," said Betty, "and I felt so grand and struttv and excited with all those brilliant colors flashing about me. Everything was going beautifully and I had dreams of being a real prima donna; you know, I spent two years in Paris and London studying voice culture. Then suddenly, my mother and a sister passed away and I was gripped by the old Chinese superstition of peacock feathers, and I wouldn't go on with the act."

After a season with Oliver Morosco's "So Long Letty," in Chicago, and a summer in stock in Albany Miss Blythe had a chance to play on Broadway with William Elliott in "Experience."

"With the closing of this engagement," she went on, "I had a taste of the fighting struggle which girls usually have when they buck up against New York. Out of a job, the city frightened me. I believe the fear of going broke frightened me most.

"Every day for months I made the rounds of the theatrical agencies. It was heart-breaking. Only once did a ray of light penetrate. A Shakespearian actor took an interest in me and promised I should play Ophelia in his company. Now, all my life I had wanted to play Shakespeare. When I was only 12 my sister started me reading his works in the original and by the time I was 16 I had read everything he had written and had made up my mind to be a tragedy queen, a second Marlowe, so this seemed the coming true of my early dreams.

"After spending weeks rehearsing Ophelia, and building my hopes to the very sky, the venture fell thru, and I went, left with debts and all my illusions shattered. Really, I contemplated suicide, but after all, youth and its reviving confidence urged me on to win in spite of obstacles.

"One day a girl, whom I knew very slightly, asked me to go to the Vitagraph studio with her. I believe God sent her, and I went, really because she was friendly and I so needed

Moore o' County Meade

To this branch of the family we are quite sure Tom belonged. If you ever do see him and have any idea that you ever will wish to interview him, "do it now," for you never will see him any more.

Both Tom and Owen are coy and elusive as the first snowdrop, and all the time we do not blame them in the least for not wanting to be interviewed. We are quite sure that we should never want to be interviewed by us.

About a year ago we were asked to interview Owen Moore. He consented, but he still owes it to us. And then our editor gave us a standing order to interview Tom Moore. So long as he was safe and sound out on the Pacific Coast in the Goldwyn studio, we did not worry. We decided that we could not be expected to go as far as that, but then one day we heard that he was here in the East "on a vacation."

The words had a portentous sound. It seemed such a perfectly legitimate excuse for not being interviewed. However, we tried out our luck by calling up the Goldwyn office and asking for Tom Moore's address. "He just went out of the office on his way to the Lambs", but we are not allowed to give any one his address. He is on a vacation."

So we called up the

When the Moore family decided to migrate from its tiny farm in the County Meade, Ireland, the problem of destination arose. So they drew lots. Little Tom put in his hand and drew out a bit of paper marked "America"

A SCRAP of paper it was which decided the destiny of Tom Moore, son of Sarah and Joseph and, incidentally, brother of Owen and Matt. It happened like this. Tom was born in Ireland on a farm in County Meade. Artistic vagueness rather than bold accuracy places the date of the event as the late '80's. Now, in those days a small Irish farmer had about as much chance to make money as a conductor on a pay-as-you-enter car, so the senior Moore and his better half decided to seek the city and open a shop of some sort. So they sold all the things on the farm, collected the family and put them in a jaunting car, and then Mrs. Moore turned to Mr. Moore and said, "Whither thou goest, I will go, and where thou lodgest I will lodge, but whither do we go and where do we lodge?"

"I never thought of that," said Moore the elder. "Now what do you say?"

"Dublin," said Mrs. Moore.

"America!" cried little Tom.

"We'll draw lots for it," said Moore, the elder. So pieces of paper, marked "Dublin" and "America" were put into a hat. Little Tom put in his hand and drew out "America," and America it was.

Now, we set down these facts triumphantly, and so would you if you had worked as hard to unearth them as we did.

Once upon a time there was celebrated in song a girl named Annie Moore. History says little about her, save that she was sweet and that we'll never see her any more.

Lambs, and they said, "He has gone over to the studio." There didn't seem to be any way to get him excepting to call Central and ask for Fifth Avenue between the Lambs and the Goldwyn office, and this wasn't feasible owing to the present strained relation between the "hello" girls and the innocent bystander, so we decided to let nature take its course.

The best way to do this is to walk up Fifth Avenue from Forty-second Street and wish. We hadn't been doing this more than two blocks when we met Tom Moore face to face. Now, altho we are a firm believer in this concentration thing, when we met our victim we were so surprised that we said, right out loud, "Aint nature wonderful!"

"She is," agreed Tom Moore, "but why?"

Of course, we didn't dare tell him, because he would look upon us with cold disfavor and say, "I'm on my vacation." So instead we said, "Why, meeting you and everything like this. And do you remember the time we interviewed you, over in Fort Lee, when you first became a Goldwyn star, and the funny little place where we had luncheon and the woman who put the records on the graphophone, records that were round, tube-like things, and the phonograph had a horn?"

"Yes, a horn like a director uses," and Tom laughed just the way he does on the screen. He always laughs that way. It is one of his charms. You see him laughing, but you dont hear him.

Now, all this was according to Freud, or somebody who has theories. We had reminded Tom Moore of the fact that he had once been interviewed and had recalled to his mind at the same time all of the pleasant features of the encounter, so we struck while the iron was hot.

"Have you got a half-hour to spare?" we said, timidly, meaning to finish up with "Mayn't we walk over to the office with you and interview you en route?"

"Indeed, I have," he answered, cheerfully. "Let's go in here and have a cup of tea."

And as we were on the corner of Forty-fourth Street, and Sherry's is no more, we knew that "here" meant Delmonico's. How thankful we were that we had on our imported hat with the red polka dots on it, tho maybe if we hadn't we shouldn't have received the invitation.

"See, no belts!" said Tom, with his silent laugh, as he took off his overcoat. "Do you remember how you got after us for wearing belted coats and said that Charlie Ray was the only man who could wear one with impunity? I remember, altho I felt hurt, how I trembled when I realized that I was wearing a belt on my coat that day you came over to Fort Lee to see me."

"Aren't you glad you're on your vacation?" we asked, a little less cautious now that the orange pekoe was between us and our victim and there was no chance for him to escape.

"Yes. I suppose I needed a rest, only New York is such a funny place to rest in. You dont do it."

"Have you been working hard?" we asked, trying to put a lot of sympathy in our voice, so as not to make it sound like a leading question."

"Working hard? Rather! I've made nine pictures this year with Harry Beaumont. In a couple of weeks, when I go back, I am going to have a new director, Tom Mills. Know him?"

We shook our head, and there the conversation switched to California—California climate, California roads, California hospitality. Why, one would think Tom Moore was a native. They always talk like that.

"Were you born in California?" which was an innocent

Photograph by Mishkin

After the Moores came to America, little Tom ran away to New York and lived there a whole year. Then he went home—and to school. His stage "debut" was in the mob scene of "Parsifal" enough question that any one might have asked. It had marvelous results, too, far beyond our fondest hopes, for Tom Moore told us all about being born in Ireland and just how he drew the scrap of paper out of the hat and came to America. But when Tom got as far as New York he stopped, at least he stopped in his narrative, but as a matter of fact, he went on to Toledo, because he had some cousins living there.

"Had you thought of going on the stage at that time?" we asked, trying to give the question the proper amount of insouciance as coming from a layman and not from an interviewer.

"No, indeed," he answered, laughing. "You should have seen me then. I was such a funny-looking little shaver. They sent me to school, but the wanderlust was in my veins, and I ran away with just enough money to get me to Jersey City. I didn't have a nickel to get over to Manhattan, but—well, I eventually got there. My lack of money worried me not in the least, and I hung around and enjoyed myself between the Battery and Fourteenth Street for nearly a year. Then I had some promptings from my conscience and I returned home. They sent me back to school, but I ran away again—"

"And went to dramatic school," we interrupted. Tom Moore gave us a scornful glance and, if he had been that sort of person, he would probably have said, "How do you get that way?"

The Boy Who

By MARY S.

"Why, they're real!" I exclaimed.

"The freckles? Sure, they're real," and Wesley Barry rubbed his brown hands vigorously across his cheeks to convince me the speckles would not come off.

"Lots of people seem to think they are part of my make-up for the pictures," he went on. "If they could see my red hair they would know the freckles belonged to me. I used to hate them, but they've brought me a lot of luck and I don't know what would happen if they went away now." And the funny little smile that has endeared this twelve-year-old lad to film fans throught the country spread over his small face.

"Then, you'll never be tempted by the promises of freckle cream?" I asked.

"I should say not," came the emphatic reply in true masculine scorn for such methods. "Anyway," he added, "it would take bushels and bushels to take them off. But—looky—my warts are going away," and he held out his hands for my inspection.

"A lady in Boston read that I had warts and she sent me a pin, telling me to bury it in the garden and the warts would disappear. And, sure 'nuff, they're all gone except this teeny one and it's going." And again the "Wes" Barry smile lighted up the sensitive face.

Tho Marshall Neilan discovered this lad several years ago and has given him bits in a number of pictures, it was not until "The Unpardonable Sin" flashed on the screen that his unusual qualities were fully recognized.

This was shortly followed by his splendid work with Mary Pickford in "Daddy Long Legs," and his clever, acting throught the orphanage scenes—especially in imbibing the hard cider—will not soon be forgotten.

Now, fame and stardom have captured this little freckle-faced boy, for he has recently been signed up by Marshall Neilan to create the screen rôle of "Penrod," in a series of pictures depicting this adorable character in his boyhood adventures.

Wesley is refreshingly natural and absolutely unspoiled and he is taking his good fortune very modestly. The best description one can give is that he is every minute—just real boy!

Since he is under contract and working steadily he has a private teacher, studying between scenes at the studio, instead of attending school. He is in the 8th grade and will be ready for high school next year.

He told me all about his studies as we sat in an old swing in the Neilan studio garden in Hollywood. "I like arithmetic and geography, but English is so hard it makes me mad. I like mechanical drawing, too, but I am not good at free hand. I've always wanted to be an electrical engineer, but, since I'm doing so well in pictures, guess I'll stick to them.

"We had the best fun making 'Daddy Long Legs,'" went on Wesley. "It was mostly on location and was just like a picnic, for we went out in trucks and had our lunch out of doors. Those were real chicken sandwiches we ate in that orphanage scene. They were a part of Miss Pickford's own lunch and she said, 'Children, I never can eat all these sandwiches, so we'll use them in this scene.' Gee, they were good. She used to give me some of her hot chocolate every afternoon, too, for we would get so hungry!

"Do you remember the circus in 'Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm'?" I was the ring master. I'll never forget, there was one kid who was so scared when he had to slide down the chute that we laughed at him. The most fun was at the barn dance, for there was real ice cream and cake and we boys would slip around to that corner every chance. Good? Well, rather! I can't say as much for the lemonade, it was positively on the bunk, one trip was enough for that.

"I was the only funny one in 'The Unpardonable Sin' and whenever it got too serious I would come in with some foolishness and jolly everyone up. I did have a big crying scene, tho," he recalled.

"Was it hard to cry?" I asked.

"Oh, no. Mr. Neilan told me all about it and it was so sad that I couldn't help crying, that's all."

And just that easily did this little actor dispose of one of the most affecting moments in that tragic picture.

"I like to go and see comedies—I laugh and laugh," and Wesley snickered in true boy fashion. "but I don't like to play in them, for it is all running and rough stuff. Mr. Neilan jokes with me while we are working and makes me laugh all the time. Do you know," and the small figure sat up straight, "I can tell just exactly how he is feeling by his whistle. He whistles such jolly tunes when he's happy, but when he is thinking out some scene he whistles—oh, you know, that way up, heavy music. You ought to hear him play the piano, he can make me cry when he plays those sad pieces. He can play any thing!" It is quite certain that here is a director who is the idol of his own star.

"Which baseball team do you want to win the pennant?" Wesley asked, suddenly, after talking of many things.

"Vernon," I replied promptly.

"Good, shake!" and he grabbed my hand in his firm hold, and we fell into a discussion of the relative strength of the Los Angeles and Vernon teams which are battling for the Coast League pennant.

"You see," said this little enthusiast, "this is the first season that Fatty Arbuckle has owned the Vernon team and I am afraid he might be discouraged if he lost the pennant when he is so near it, that's why I want it to win. Oh, it's just gotta to win," he added, loyally.

"We're getting ready for a big western picture," said Wesley, "and every morning I go out to the Lasky ranch and practice rough riding stunts on a big black horse. At first he was awfully frisky and tried to buck me off, but I hung on. I have the swellest cowboy suit. It cost $200! Want me to put it on so you can see it?"

So, hand in hand, we raced over to his dressing room where we solved the problem of straps and buckles as he arrayed himself in a regular "Bill" Hart western costume. "Look at this belt, isn't it a peach?" he cried, holding up a broad leather belt. "It is to wear when bucking to keep from getting all jarred up."

"Let's have your picture taken in all this finery," I suggested, as he turned about for my approval.

"Oh, I can't," he wailed, "my sombrero isn't here. It is a beauty, big—you know—and makes me look fierce." Then noting my disappointment, he added, "If you think nobody will notice that I haven't it on, we'll take it."

"Cowboys don't usually live among palms," commented the cameraman, a few moments later, as Wesley took his place before a huge palm.

"Oh, well," replied the boy, easily, "this isn't the real thing anyway, for I haven't my sombrero."

Wesley's mother told me that he was a very welcome baby and was

On these two pages are glimpses of Wesley Barry in his "swell" cowboy suit, which cost exactly $200. Which, after all, isn't expensive for a high-priced star—if he is only twelve years old born with a smile on his face and has always been happy and contented. Two older brothers, aged eighteen and fourteen, were given the privilege of selecting his name and they spent several weeks searching for a suitable one, finally christening the baby, Wesley.

Already this name is becoming widely known as Wesley Barry, aged twelve, takes his place among the stars of film-land.

"So stands the statue that enchants the world,
So bending, veils the mingled beauties of exulting Greece."

PERHAPS the poet would have written his verse to Naomi Childers were he here to have viewed her. Perhaps he would have put into couplets her moon-like radiance that is shed thruout Culver City, California; her élan, which is that of a New York débutante, and her thoughts, which are those of the futurists in art.

Which latter sentiment she brought to light by insisting upon having art for luncheon, in the form of a lavender room with light-grey furniture and Erté drawings in frames upon the walls, and vivid cretonne at the windows. It's so much nicer, she remarked, to dine in a place where you needn't swat the proverbial fly and partake of nourishment from inch-thick near-china.

Art, it has been said, is an auxiliary to happiness. Art, Miss Childers, avowed, is a necessity and, when you glimpse her in the flesh, you're certain to agree with her. But, in the flesh she is exactly the same as she is on the screen, a Broadway Lady Algy, with her soft, semi-Southern drawl, her gracile bearing, her tapered fingers and her cameo-like Grecian nose.

It just happened that, as the statue said, Allah provided this interview. Allah always provides: he has come to Miss Childers' aid at various moments when the clouds have been tinged with grey. He put her onto the stage, and she will emphatically tell you that he will some day put her back there. She was about to say more about her Allah, but the waiter appeared. Tea and cakes, two lumps in the tea and a dash of lemon.

In anticipation of the gastronomic revel, Miss Childers glanced about her. The little Bakst lunchroom seemed the rendezvous of numerous photofamous. John Bowers, after bowing himself in, sat in a corner and commenced to sing something about Kentucky and the angels to his own mandolin accompaniment. Madge Kennedy read a letter. Enid Bennett and her husband, Fred Niblo, chatted volubly with Geraldine Farrar, whose French maid, nearby, was watching her with hawk-like intensity. Tom Moore palavered with Charles Ray and his wife, and Mabel Normand was going into ecstasies over a new consignment of photographs received by Pauline Frederick. Miss Childers put her chin in her hands and looked wistfully thru a pair of violet-grey eyes.

Any stranger who'd ever seen her in the Goldwyns or the old-time Vitagraphs, would have recognized her, altho her manner, semi-cold, semi-disinterested, would not have spurred him on to approaching her without due formality.

Pictures, the willowy Naomi will tell you, have not changed greatly—at least from the actor's standpoint—in the interval of the present and when she played with Vitagraph, perhaps some two or three years.

"Oh, we have hot and cold running water in our dressing rooms now, and perhaps a bit of cretonne and a picture or two," she drawled. "Otherwise, it's the same. But the directors dont seem to swear so much, and the continuity we work from is more complete."

I asked her how she felt the first time she stepped before a camera. Was she frightened; did she faint?

"No," she purred, "I wasn't frightened, and I was too inexperienced to know how to faint gracefully. We all felt rather funny, tho—Edith Storey and Rose Tapley and Harry Morey and the rest of us at Vitagraph. They tell me they all experienced the same sensation that I felt, a sort of daze like when you're awakened in the morning by the ringing of a bell and you dont know whether it's the telephone or the alarm clock."

The Childers reminiscences, with their colorful narrative, delivered with a smile and with the eyes half closed—provoke the risibilities of even Tom Moore, who has heard them told before by others. And the orchid-girl speaks feelingly of Edith Storey, who she says is "the cleverest woman on the screen," in addition to being one of the most heroic women of the country.

"She could always do everything none of the rest of us could do," she said. "She could ride and swim and look beautiful when she was dead tired. And act! There was no chance for anyone else when she was on the lot."

And changing the topic to contemporary pictures, my subject impresses one with having given considerable thought to the art. She asked me if I'd ever read Vachel Lindsey. I had? Then, perhaps, I might in a measure understand what she thinks—mainly, that being a star isn't the greatest thing in the life of a cinemese.

Nor will pictures ever progress until one Mr. Griffith gets a new idea and infuses it into the shadow-play.

"Why?" she asked and explained. "Because he seems to be the only man whom people have consistently followed and to whom people look for something hitherto undone to be done. And one of the main reasons for his success hinges upon the

MARIE CALLENDER was waking up luxuriously. The process was a very becoming one, involving many dainty yawns, much stretching of round, dimpled arms and rubbing of velvety brown eyes. For two weeks she had enjoyed this portion of the day with a passionate delight such as can only be experienced by those who have been accustomed to being awakened by the raucous voice of a tin alarm clock to the smell of frying boarding-house onions and a battle of wits for the possession of the bathroom.

It was a wonderful sensation to be able to turn over on one's pillows in defiance of the sunlight pointing an accusing finger thru the drawn dimity curtains, to sleep and wake again, and half sleep and drowse, and at last to sit up among one's tossed linen and silk covers—so, and reach out a pink finger-tip—so, to the bell that will summon deferential maid and a silver and fragrant breakfast tray. Marie's finger fell abruptly. She shook the last traces of sleep from her with a single jerk of her dark curls, drew her knees up to her chest and encircled them with her arms.

"Oh, darn!" she sighed. "What a silly world this is anyhow!"

Surely an ungrateful remark from one who in the last fortnight had taken the step from poverty to riches with a single bound, but there was the crumpled newspaper on the floor, where the eyes of her extremely active imagination could read the words that provoked the remark. "Young Ship-Builder Threatened with Bankruptcy. Ernest Lismore Said to Be in Need of Large Sums to Defeat the Conspiracy of the Stockholders—"

"I wonder," mused Marie, "what 'large sums' means? I've seen the time when a five-dollar bill looked like all the money in the world. And he has such ducky eyes, and such a perfectly sweet chin! It's simply wicked that he should have to fail when I've got a million or two that he could have just as well as not, and all because of the perfectly stupid things people would say!"

With Marie thought and action were practically synonymous. She reached for the telephone, disguised as a Dresden shepherdess, on the stand by the bedside and called a number. After a season of energetic waiting—Marie was always energetic—a protesting voice answered, evidently around a cigaret. "If it's the landlord, all I've got to say is that you'll have to wait—and serve you right, too! The roof leaked last night and turned a perfectly good clay model of 'The Naked Truth' into mud—positively mud! It's the worst attic in the Village, and, believe me, if you think—"

"Polly!"—Marie shook the telephone irritably—"for heaven's sake quit it! I'm in terrible trouble, and you've got to help me!

Trouble? You! What trouble can a girl with a million dollars have?" Polly's amazement evidently displaced the cigaret.

"Lord, child, you dont know what the word means—look it up in the dictionary."

"It isn't money," Marie wailed, "but—well, the fact is—I'm in love! What's that? So long as I'm not married, that's not a trouble? But you dont understand. I dont even know him, and now on account of this darned money, I never shall! You see, he lived next door to Mr. Goldsmith when auntie and I were there last June, and when the fire happened, he rescued me, and so—well, of course, I fell in love with him, but poor William was so jealous he wouldn't introduce me, and now he's going to fail in business and I cant do anything! How can I go to him and say "Take my money! I've fallen in love with your eyes!" Oh, he'd despise me; he'd think I was bold and brazen and unfeminine—what's that?"

For a long time the other end of the wire hummed, and Marie's expressions ran the gamut of emotions from doubt, disapproval, to final enthusiasm. "Polly, you bobbed-haired Solomon! You Socrates in smocks! I believe to my soul you've hit it! A girl that can out-Eddie Foy ought to be able to—I knew there was some reason why I kept my make-up box and props! Oh, boy! Wait till you see!" and she kist the telephone ardently. "Good-by, darling! You certainly have got brains, even if you do live in Greenwich Village!"

Ernest Lismore was a man without discernment, which is really tautological. No man is discerning, but he had even less than the others of the bifurcated sex. Still, let us give him his due. Marie Callender had not been Marie Max of the two-a-day for ten years without result, and, moreover, the piece of work she did now was the best she had ever accomplished. There was in the dainty, dignified little old lady of sixty-odd who sat serenely pouring tea with little, delicately withered hands, not the faintest trace of the lovely little plotter of the morning. From iron-grey, high-piled hair to the tips of her cloth-gaitered boots, she was perfect, and her voice carried out the illusion with its tiny suggestion of a quaver, its precise enunciation.

"My dear boy, there is nothing in the least odd in what I'm suggesting," she assured the perturbed and visibly embarrassed young man before her; "it's simply that I'm interested in you, as a grandmother lady is privileged to be interested in one who might have been"—she sighed artistically—"should have been her own kith and kin if there had not been a miserable boy-and-girl misunderstanding half a century ago!"

Ernest made a ghastly pretense of laughing lightly. To find a might-have-been grandmother, and to have her propose to one all in the course of fifteen minutes, is upsetting, and several nights of insomniac worry had already weakened his constitution. "It's awfully kind of you—awfully good and all that," he choked, "but really, I dont see—"

"You dont have to see," this amazing old lady smiled, and he noticed, with a sinking of the heart, that despite the network of fine lines in her cheeks, her chin was really terrifyingly determined. "Of course, marriage with me would be a mere matter of form in order to enable me to get possession of my money. I have already explained the terms of the will—the principal comes into my possession only when I marry 'from choice.' You take the money, save your business, and return it, and whenever you wish I will free you. Perfectly simple, perfectly—by a mere business proposition."

Ernest tried to drink his frosted tea-cake and to crumble his cup. His handsome young face was dully crimson, his young hands shook, his young voice also. "I—of course, it's impossible to take advantage of your kindness, but I'm no end grateful! I'll make out to weather this storm somehow, and if I don't—well"—he stretched out his big, lean hands—"I've got these left."

"Nonsense!" said the little old lady, vigorously. When she was aroused, her voice seemed to lose its quaver of age. "Be a sensible boy, I'd adopt you if I could get around that idiotic will, but as I can't, I'm going to marry you. That's settled. And now have another cup of tea and let's talk about politics or something!"

It was her matter-of-factness that won out in the end. She actually made the incredible thing sound plausible, even sensible. He went away from the grey-shadowed room, with its subdued lights and cosy tea-table, with the feeling of a sore-hearted youngster who has been comforted. It seemed as if a load had been taken bodily off his shoulders, and so he called himself "cad" and "contemptible cur" and other hard names, he found himself actually whistling as he strode up the avenue. The shipyards would be saved, then, and he would have a wife—a dear little, grey little grandmother-wife who would pet him and bully him and pour out tea from a squatty silver pot.

"Of course," Ernest Lismore assured himself, "it isn't true—any of it! And she least of all! Yet I couldn't have dreamed her possibly. And of course, I'm not going to do it."

But he knew quite well that he was going to do it. And he did. He was very silent on the ride back from the church, where the ceremony had been privately performed, so silent that the small grey person beside him was secretly rather dismayed. But once in her sitting-room, he spoke with stern lips. "I am ashamed of myself for saving my business in this way. I didn't realize what I was doing until the minister said those words. My God! Why, I ought to be horsewhipped for letting your divine kindness of heart make me fall so low! But I'll try to make the best amends I can, and that means, first of all, I'll save my shipyards and pay you back, and after that—"

He did not finish, but alone in her own room later, Marie finished for him. "Afterwards, my dear," she said to the little grey person in the glass before her, "afterwards he is going to throw us over. Oh, very nicely, and very gracefully, and all that, but that's what he means." Her lips took on naughty and most ungrandmotherly curves. "He's certain to fall in love," she mused, "and I wonder—I wonder who's going to be the girl? As his wife I surely have the right of picking out my successor, at least. Yes! I think Polly can be useful again!"

For some weeks the marital life of Ernest Lismore ran smoothly, being confined chiefly to breakfasting across the table from a dainty little lavender figure, all ruffles and ribbons and old-fashioned gilt-gold brooches, who saw to it that his toast was soft and his egg hard and his coffee exactly the right shade. Behind the disfiguring spectacles his wife's surprisingly young eyes rested on the handsome head behind the morning newspaper with anything but a maternal expression, had he either seen it or been able to interpret it, but his attitude toward her was one of distant respect. He was sometimes garrulous, sometimes pettish, sometimes sulky, sometimes gay, but he was never affectionate.

"It's high time," decided Marie's alert brain, under the grey-waved wig, "that he had a love affair."

The next morning she looked across the table casually. "Oh, Ernie-Boy," she said, briskly, "I see in the paper that there is to be an exhibition of modernist paintings in the Dawn galleries this afternoon. Now, heaven knows where that is, but you could find out, couldn't you, and go down and glance over the pictures for me? I'm looking for a wedding-present for a young couple I know."

The Dawn galleries appeared to be two rooms, so dark that they had to be lighted by gas-jets and painted a startling shade of orange-yellow. Paper lanterns added a festive touch, and wooden kitchen chairs of purple, picked out with pink cabbage-roses, lined the walls. Several people with prominent souls and receding chins were moving about the rooms, saying vague, wise things about the exhibit. Ernest, after a single hasty glance about the walls, began to sneak toward the doors. He did not care for the exploded-egg school of painting; he was not attracted to young women who wore their hair short and their finger-nails long. But before he could escape, a hand fell upon his arm, pinioning him.

"Oh, Mis-ter Lismore!" gurgled a feminine voice. "Whoever would think we should have the pleasure of seeing you down here! Dont tell me you have gone in for art? Is it interior decorating? Or the one-act play? And do let me introduce you to Miss Daye—June dear, this is Mis-ter Lismore!"

A glance at the speaker, who had fan teeth, wore a dirty smock of a sickly green and carried a cigaret, opened Ernest's lips for a denial of acquaintanceship. Wherever she had picked up his name he had never, to his knowledge, met this creature before. But with the words upon his lips, he paused. Beside the weird lady of the pale green draperies stood another, as different as the dawn is different from gas-light, as the art of Pericles differs from the art of Greenwich Village.

June Daye was slim and small; she was dark, with golden gleams about her; she was lovely. This much he saw with the first glance, and seeing, Wisdom nudged him with horny forefinger, prompting him to flee, while Desire whispered seductively to him to stay. He stayed.

Before Wisdom was finally able to drag him away, he had spent four hours in the dim, æsthetic light of the Dawn galleries, discussing modernist art with the passionate zeal of a devotee, admiring the picture of the nude negress seated upon the top of a cone-shaped mountain, clutching a basket of carrots and pineapples and signifying the whichness of the whither, or some such thing, as Polly suggested. He was reeling with drunken sunsets, shrapnel moonrises and geometrical pictures that resembled the view thru a kaleidoscope when he finally turned his steps homeward, but it was not of the pictures he was thinking, but rather of a vivid little face, glowing under great masses of warm, dark, fragrant hair. Not until his feet halted on the very threshold of his home did remembrance flood icily over him—his wife! He was married! He, a married man, had actually promised to return to the Village the following afternoon to drink tea—dare-devil function!—in Polly's studio, where the charming June also dwelt!

When, over the coffee the next morning, Marie spoke of the exhibit, he replied morosely that it had been "tommyrot" and he had stayed only a moment. "However," he added, with an effort at nonchalance, "I heard of an artist who does good work, and I'm going to—hm—run up to her—to his studio this afternoon, if I get time."

He had the grace to blush outrageously at this, and departed hastily, leaving the little lavender lady smiling demurely to herself over nothing at all. "I shall soon have cause for jealousy, I fear," she murmured, "now I know how poor, dear old William felt!"

Thus disrespectfully did she speak of her elderly fiancé, William Goldsmith, whose opportune death on the very outskirts of matrimony had left her the enviable perquisite of getting up at whatever shameless hour she chose.

Polly's studio proved even more impossible than Ernest had feared. It was very dirty, very, very embarrassingly feminine, with its intimate garments hanging from the corners of the furniture, and hairpins, cigaret ashes and powder scattered over everything. It contained broken chairs, tables with unwashed dishes, a model throne, several sticky clay statues—and June, June, looking more adorable than ever in a loose smock of a flaring pink that lighted twin flames in her soft cheeks as she smiled shyly up into his eyes.

Of the ensuing hours he had only a vague recollection afterward. He knew hazily that there had been other people, awful people who tittered shrilly, and smoked like furnaces and struck posterish attitudes. He knew that there had been one lady arrayed airily in a sheet, and bare as to feet, who did a dance which she entitled "Psyche, the Soul," with much elbow motion, and who finally insisted, to his horror, in sitting upon his knee and doing things to his hair while he writhed in agony.

He knew that there was a blessed interval when he was alone with June. Afterwards, in the middle of the night, he awoke in a cold sweat trying to determine what he had said to her, and only after great mental strain being able to assure himself that he had spoken merely of Art with a capital "A." "I wont go back to that damned place!" he cried out loud, blushing chastely in the darkness at the memory of the barefoot lady. "Hang it all, I'm a married man——"

But—"Married your grandmother!" jeered his baser self, startlingly apt. "Think of that girl, man; think of her hair, think of her eyes, and the way her face crinkles up when she smiles."

For several days Ernest managed to withstand temptation, much to the unwifely chagrin of Marie Max, née

Callender and, more lately, Lismore, who also went by the cognomen of June Daye. "He doesn't love me, after all, Polly!" she moped, poking disconsolately about the studio. "I dont know the first thing about vamping, evidently."

"He's afraid," the canny Polly opined. "Scared to death: I've noticed it myself. Men always run away from me for fear they'll fall in love with me."

But if Ernest did not come, Bob Brummel, an old flame of the period of the two-a-day, did. A slapstick comedian, Bob, who had originated an act called "A Half-Hour with an Umbrella," which, according to his tale, had brought 'em down from good ol' Peru, Maine, to the well-known Los Angeles. It was good to hear the almost forgotten patter of the stage, and Marie forgot, for the time being, her marital, and love tangle. But Bob soon brought it to the fore by attempting a kiss.

"You mustn't!" Marie cried, in a panic of propriety. "I'm—I'm married now!" in the noisy thoroughfare, in the shabby cottage, in the village street—it awaits not for the proper 'set.'

 "We must learn to find romance and beauty in everyday life, among everyday people. This is the appeal of O. Henry, he found love, adventure, romance, in every moment of life.

"Oh, for a new director, a young revolutionist! One who will come into the field and, flinging open the windows and doors, sweep aside the old conventional methods. It is the obvious that holds us manacled to the old systems.

"Think of the relief it would be to show the bad man of the play doing a good turn for once; to allow the hero to slip occasionally; to permit the vampire to forget her eternal cigaret and give alms to a poor beggar!

"Think of the sensation it would cause if that young director of the future—the one who is going to make every one of us gasp—will not take his scenes in the best of conditions, with a perfect backlighting beautifully reflected by silver screens, but instead, take them as they really are, in the morning with long shadows, in the sadness of dull, grey weather, perhaps even in the rain. With these snatches of life, seen thru an artist's eyes, he will have a magic garment which will prove astonishingly beautiful and delightfully realistic—life itself!"

"And 'Treasure Island,' why did you select it for a picture?" I questioned, breaking upon his reverie.

"Chiefly because everyone loves the story," came Mr. Tourneur's prompt reply. "There was one thing, however, that worried me—the lack of romance, I mean, the lack of sex appeal romance.

I had the choice of changing it into a conventional love story, and I would rather have died than do such a thing, or of putting a girl into the cast in the rôle of Jim Hawkins. I put the girl in. Shirley Mason plays this rôle.

"Oh, for a new director, a young Revolutionist!" says Maurice Tourneur. "One who will come into the field and, flinging open the windows and doors, sweep aside the old conventional methods. It is the obvious that holds us manacled to the old systems"

BEFORE me sat the Idealist of the screen, Maurice Tourneur!

Leaning back in my chair I studied the man who has made fairy-tales, visions, and poems live and breathe before the camera.

Mr. Tourneur is somewhat larger than the average Frenchman, and indeed, looks more like a husky athlete than an artist and poet, yet the moment he spoke I felt as if I were in the audience chamber of an Oracle, for every word he utters is heavy with meaning and significant of deep thought.

"Life is so beautiful we should not wish to change it, yet that is what we endeavor to accomplish in motion pictures," began Mr. Tourneur, gazing thoughtfully thru the open windows of his study at the Goldwyn studio in Culver City, where he is making his pictures.

"On the screen the lovers always plight their troth in moonlit gardens where birds are singing and roses blooming, while in reality, love comes quietly, mysteriously, anywhere, everywhere—

By MAUDE S. CHEATHAM

She is the size of an eighteen-year-old lad and is an excellent actress. Oh, I have already been criticised for doing this but it seemed the better plan to me.

"There is plenty of romance of the sea in 'Treasure Island.' You remember the pirates? I made them prominent, and what a time I had with those pirates. At first they acted like a Sunday school class at a picnic or a lot of masqueraders strutting around the plaza on a holiday parade. Toward the end, however, they became very clever. My God, how they learnt to swear! I blushed while I took the scenes. They were dirty, too, and enjoyed it after true pirate fashion.

"We hear much about the American audience not caring for fairy-tales, that they are too practical to find enjoyment in such wild, imaginary stories, and when presented as fairy-tales this is only too true, but in the present-day motion pictures we must admit that the characters are just the same as in the fairy-tales.

"To be sure the handsome hero wears a frock coat or sport flannels rather than the feathered cap and velvet mantle of the days of yore; the lovely princess is attired in modish frocks rather than in the cloth of gold woven by the Queen of the Fairies.

"The story is the same, for the good fairies are always more powerful than the wicked, the monstrous dragon, or villain, is always vanquished, virtue triumphs over evil, the lovers marry and live happily ever after.

"Motion Pictures must move onward to the place where life seen thru an artist's mind will find expression on the screen," says Mr. Tourneur. "Suggestion must take the place of exact delineation, impressionism in place of the literal transcription, alike in motive and execution"

"This only shows that audiences do not always know what they want. The artist, the musician, do not ask their patrons what they want, they give them what they themselves wish to give them. The modistes do not ask their customers what the styles shall be. Oh, no, they get together and decide that next year the women shall dress to look like mushrooms, and behold, next year they all look like mushrooms, and they like it!"

Maurice Tourneur's life has been most eventful and colorful. He was born in France in 1878, graduating from Lycee Condorcet at the age of eighteen. His first step in the artistic world was as a designer and interior decorator. He illustrated everything, designed fabrics, lace curtains and stage settings. He became associated with Rodin, and later assisted the great artist, Puvis de Chavannes, in designing the decoration for the Boston Public Library. Then came three years in the French Army as an officer of artillery.

When his period of military service expired he turned to the stage and his rise in this profession was rapid.

His first engagement was with a road show giving four one-act plays on one-night stands, and Mr. Tourneur laughingly recalled in those four plays he acted nine parts.

This was followed by a world tour with Mme. Rejane, which included England, Portugal, Italy, Spain, Africa, and South America.

It was about this time that motion pictures began to take their place in the amusement world and he became associated with Emile Chautard, director general of the Compagnie Eclair, the leading film company of Paris! After a short experience in acting and directing, he was sent to Africa to produce war pictures and with the entire French Army at his command, he made a number of notable productions.

The Kodak Girl

THE distinction of being one of the most-photographed and advertised girls in the world belongs to Edith Johnson. Not that she achieved this result thru her short career in motion pictures. It was because the Eastman Kodak Company selected her from a number of aspirants to pose for their advertisements.

You have seen Edith Johnson in every sort of kodak pose from the time she was fourteen years old, even tho she "made up" to add a few years. She was born in Rochester—perhaps that is why the Eastman people thought home talent should have first chance. Thru her earnings, Miss Johnson was able to take a college course, and because of her much-photographed beauty, a small part was offered her with the Lubin Company, in Philadelphia.

However, William Duncan's leading lady states emphatically that her reell life only began when she entered his company to do serials. While she had studied make-up and action with other companies, her opportunities were decidedly limited. Yet it was because Mr. Duncan chanced to enter a theater where the feature showed Edith Johnson playing leads, that she received a telephone invitation to come to the Vitagraph lot and talk over "a little business proposition." The first day's talk covered Edith's screen experience and sounded her on the question of playing serials. No mention of salary had been made by Mr. Duncan, and contracts were not even referred to. The star and the girl who had played opposite Tyrone Power in several productions parted pleasantly, but without even a "see you again soon" expression.

Within the second setting of the sun, the telephone summoned Miss Johnson again to the Vitagraph, and this time she was offered a salary much in advance of her previous earnings and asked to do one picture. She's doing the third serial with the Scotch star now, the first having been "The Fight for Millions." This was succeeded by "The Man of Might" and now "Smashing Barriers" is nearing completion.

Edith Johnson has been described as a blonde. That's because she wears a golden wig defying detection. In repose, she is almost a twin to Beverly Bayne—and the girls were born in the same year, 1895. Miss Johnson is two inches taller than Mrs. Bushman, but of the same delicately rounded build. She has tenderly feminine brown eyes—eyes not to be associated with death-defying stunts.

Miss Johnson is blest with strong individuality, makes intimacies slowly and yet is charmingly entertaining on first acquaintance. She dresses far more like an Easterner than a California girl, always choosing grey, white or black frocks. We of the West, so accustomed to ruby lips and tinted cheeks on the streets, with frocks outbidding the flowers in brilliancy, find the quiet costuming and creamy pallor of Edith Johnson a distinct oddity. But if her furbelows are modest and almost colorless, the jewels of Edith Johnson reveal regal splendor. They are many and priceless.

"Did you ride before you went into pictures?" I asked, as we sat in her second-floor dressing-room. The little chamber assigned to Miss Johnson is made habitable by wall drapes of blue and white silkoline, the dressing-table and boxes being covered with the same material. At Vitagraph, the dressing-rooms were hurriedly put up, sans plaster and presenting a very uninviting appearance, so Edith got busy with tacks and hammer and has a sky-blue cage with three windows and to which very few are admitted; in fact—

"You see, I chose this end room because I can hear any one come up the stairs and walk along the dressing-room row—and they're not admitted if I hear them coming first!" Miss Johnson laughed merrily. "One has so little time, and it is very disturbing to entertain visitors. The colored maid asked me today why I hills and sunsets possible to these end windows.

"Oh, yes, you were asking about my riding? I never had been on a horse before I went into serials. The first day I rode I was not even given a chance to practice, but just sent off on what seemed a fiery steed to me. We rushed down a hillside until I hadn't a hairpin left, but I clung on and made it safely. When I was to alight my knees shook so and I was so frightened they had to lift me off. But now! You should see me. I'm not afraid to take anything—broad jumps, streams, chasms or anything the picture requires.

"There is only one stunt in which I use a double—the swimming scene. I have a terrible fear of the water. Yes, I can swim, but the moment I find myself in water above the chest I almost lose consciousness with fear, so I know it would not be safe for me to attempt water stunts."

"Did you ever have a real scare—something that would put crimps into your hair for a week?"

Understudying Mary

OVER all the surface of the world—wherever motion pictures are shown—and that means everywhere except on the deserts, in the mountain fastnesses, the forests and the jungle—little girls and big girls too, with curly blonde hair and girls with hair that is neither blonde nor curly—have stood long and often before their mirrors and have tried to find in the reflection something that resembled the great Mary Pickford.

a fleeting expression that is peculiar to the big star, the joy of the poser has known no bounds.

And with what a dizzying thrill of pleasure, has the small girl with the blonde curls heard someone say: "She looks just like Mary Pickford." For days thereafter, the little girl thus complimented has lived in a sort of fairyland and dreamed dreams that someday—perhaps—?

Dreams do come true—sometimes—and the little girls with the curly blonde hair and the other girls with neither the blonde hair nor the curls, are now to learn that the joyous dream of looking, and actually acting, "just like Mary Pickford," has come true for one little lady, whose name is Louise Du Pre.

Louise Du Pre is "just like Mary Pickford," or as nearly so as nature ever cast two human beings. Miss Pickford, herself, discovered this fact and when she started the production of "Pollyanna" she engaged Miss Du Pre as her understudy. The first understudy to a screen star in the history of motion pictures.

All of the big stars on the speaking stage have understudies, but Louise Du Pre is the first legitimate understudy to a screen star. How many other motion picture stars will follow Miss Pickford's lead will depend upon the difficult task of finding talent, plus perfect resemblance; because the stage star needs only dramatic ability in her understudy while the screen star must find one that duplicates her in appearance.

"When Miss Pickford sent for me and offered me the position as her understudy," says Miss Du Pre, "I realized that the honor was one that millions of

The Broken Melody

Fictionized from the Eugene O'Brien-Selznick Photoplay

By OLIVE CAREW

STUART GRANT lived in a studio in Bohemia. Now Bohemia has been said by some sage souls to be merely a state of mind, and by other scoffers, who get their notions of the world out of their morning's newspaper, to be absolutely non-existent. It has even been unkindly called a pose.

But we know better, we who have lived in Bohemia, have eaten in its tiny, smoky cellars—or not at all, have wrangled deliciously long hours with congenial spirits over a straw-covered bottle of Joe's acid red claret, have hoped, and hungered, played and toiled with youth that makes all hardships jokes, with joy that dresses poverty in the motley of light-heartedness. And, by the bye, it is as well to say here that our Bohemia is not related to that commercial, self-conscious, imitation thing of gift shops and smocks, Mad Hatter tea rooms, artists' balls, freak hair-dressing and sight-seers, which is sometimes called by that name.

We who love Bohemia jealously guard its exact geographical location. Definiteness would let the world into our secret. "Take the Fifth Avenue bus, then turn West from the Square—" that is enough for Philistines to know. They would call our old tottering brick houses "picturesque," and—privately—"tenementy," they would rave over our work (and we know how bad it is, how far short it falls of the Glory), they would mess thru our brave, Mother Hubbard cupboards, they would trail in gaping groups up and down our stairs, in and out of our courtyards, into our attics, trample over our hopes, and our beliefs and our youngnesses.

So we will say simply that Stuart Grant lived in Bohemia. (Find the place if you can!) More definitely he lived

THE BROKEN MELODY

Told in story form from Ouida Bergere's story produced by Selznick Pictures. Starring Eugene O'Brien. Directed by William P. S. Earle. The cast:

- Stuart Grant..... Eugene O'Brien
- Hedda Dana..... Lucy Cotton
- Mrs. Drexel Trask..... Corinne Barker
- Howard Thornby..... Donald Hall
- Le Roy Clemons..... Ivan Dawson
- Musician..... Gus Weinberg

At the third sitting she told Stuart he was a great artist and wasting his time in prosaic and stolid America the most modern, to speak euphuistically, and in winter there was no getting away from the fact that the attic let in as much cold as in summer it let in the sun. But Stuart took these things for granted. He took it for granted that he should often not have enough in his pocket to satisfy his healthy young appetite, and that at times he should feast under the exceeding sloping roof of a brick dwelling that was old when Washington stood on the steps of the City Hall, two miles away, and took command of his army. The plumbing was not of magnificently with the proceeds of a painting—his own or one of his friends'. He took it for granted that he should fall in love frequently with some beautiful lady—perhaps in a passing limousine, or it may be the little black-eyed waitress at Joe's, and should be loved in return, and should fall out of love as harmlessly and gaily. He took it also for granted that he should rap on the door across the hall every morning at nine, and be told to enter upon a gay little attic corner, all bright with yellow tarlton and paint and fragrant with the smell of frying sausages, with Hedda—

We will come to Hedda presently.

The power to take all these things for granted is only possessed by philosophers, and young and artistic people under thirty. So you know now something of Stuart's age. But you do not know that he had an exceeding wholesome, clean young body, curly black hair, too long—not because he wanted to look artistic but because it was less expensive so, and gay, clear blue eyes that met the world trustfully, and branded him at once as a son of that merry, simple, firey race who still believe in fairies.

It was Hedda who had nick-named him "Paddie," for this same strain in him, and as Paddie the whole Quarter knew him, and loved him for his sins and his virtues and the light that came into his Irish eyes when the moon lay over the Arch, or the sun was like copper upon the old Italian beggar woman's shawl.

Hedda was the other occupant of the attic floor. She was very small and incredibly slender and flower-dainty, and she was going to be a great singer by and by. She was going to wear Marguerite's grey robe, and sit spinning in a painted orchard at the Metropolitan and the whole world was to be at her small feet, which—to tell the truth—were very shabbily shod at present, with a great patch over one slim instep, but that is a mere detail.

She was singing the rôle now, perched on the rickety old bureau in Stuart's studio, while old Ivan, the cello player drew the chords of the Jewel Song from his bow, and Stuart's brush fairly danced over his canvas to the gush of silvery song. When the last of them winged into silence he flung down his brush, laughing.

"You sing that, Hedda," he taxed her, "absolutely shamelessly! You sing it greedily—as if you really did long for diamonds and rubies and pearls!"

She flushed, laughed lazily, not quite meeting his eyes. "Moi, je suis artiste, Monsieur!" she defended herself, "an artist must be able to pretend all the feelings in the world!"

"No. You are wrong," Ivan said suddenly from his corner, speaking crossly as he always did. "An artist must have felt all the feelings in the world."

"Would you have Hedda turn murderer, then, or go mad in order to sing Lucia?" asked Stuart, indignantly. "Must the poor girl break her heart for love, be rent with the pangs of jealousy, tattered with revenge, poisoned with hate? Nonsense, Ivan—look at the way Hedda just sung 'ni belle, ni demoiselle'—she couldn't have put more heart-break into it if she'd been head-over-heels in love!"

The old cello player looked deliberately at the girl, perched on the bureau. Stuart's broad, unconscious back was toward them and he did not see the confessing crimson sweep the delicate hollows of her beauty under the hard, searching old eyes that seemed to say to her, "You do know? You could not sing that way if you did not know love."

There was a piteous entreaty in the look she cast at him, and he only said, dryly, "Humph!" and fell to scraping at his instrument. An old man, Ivan, with the juices of life dried out of him till he seemed to rustle like a dried mullein stalk when he moved. He lived in a tiny room below the attic floor, played in an orchestra of a motion picture house, and what he thought, no one had ever been able to discover, but he watched over the two young people on the top floor zealously, and they accepted him as one of the natural facts of the world without question.

Hedda sprang down from her bureau and sauntered over to the easel, and then she gave a little cry. "Oh, Paddie!" she gasped, "Oh, Paddie, it's beautiful! I'm afraid you're going to get There first."

There was, of course, Success. But Stuart, lifting the canvas from the easel to the light, tried to look doubtful and critical, instead of proud. It was a very crude little sketch—a corner of an old Dutch garden with splashy hollyhocks and larkspur, and a girl rocking a wooden cradle, the sun across her quaint white head-gear and her musing face, but it was done ideally, with a brush dipped into dreams. "Pretty poor stuff," he grudging it, shaking his head. "The face isn't bad, tho'. I ought to chuck trying to paint real pictures and go in for portraits—pretty ladies with diamond tiaras on, or magazine covers—"

"The very idea!" cried Hedda, shocked by such profanity. "You wait, you just wait! Some day somebody will discover you, Paddie, and they'll hang you in the Metropolitan and they'll write books about you, and I shall be so proud to remember that I used to know you—"

"Used to?" Stuart inquired. "What's the big idea? Are you going to cut my acquaintance as soon as I get successful? Because if that's the way you feel about it, I'm just not going to be at home when Fame comes knocking!"

And at that moment Fame came knocking. The man who stood on the threshold was very much out of place there. He was all shiny broadcloth, and patent leather shoes, and silk hat, what of him was not pink flesh and pomaded black hair and smallish, knowing eyes. He had the effect of making the whole attic look rather wretched and shabby, instead of romantic. Stuart Grant did not like the way he glanced from him to Hedda either. It made him feel better all over, he did not know just why.

"Miss Dana?" the man asked—Stuart felt an impulse knock him over for the way he said Hedda's name. "Hm! I'm Leroy Clemons. Maybe you've heard of me, eh? Manager of the Frivols! Somebody tipped me off you could sing, eh?"

At the fourth sitting she suggested, quite casually, that he should go to Paris

Stuart gripped his brush fiercely and painted with set jaw for many moments, quite ruining the canvas, and trying not to listen to Hedda's silver voice parading itself in the little room across the hall for Leroy Clemons. For he too had heard of Clemons, knew that he was a Power in the musical world, albeit it was in light shows in which a slim ankle was as necessary a qualification as a voice, knew that if he decided to take up Hedda and exploit her she would not have to live in garrets any longer—

"Damn! Oh damn!" he burst out suddenly, and flung his brush in a splash of ochre upon the floor. "I thought—I wanted—"

Old Ivan, forgotten till now, crept out of his corner, thrusting his dry old face close. "You thought you were in love with her?" he asked. "You wanted to marry her perhaps?"

Stuart Grant stared at him wonderingly. "Why," he stammered, "I—believe—I believe to my soul that's exactly what I did want, tho I never realized it!"

Lose Hedda? Not hear her voice (that was like a flute in the sunshine) calling at his door, not have a little yellow-shabby room with sausages sizzling to turn to in the mornings—Preposterous. Why she was a part of Life—she was a part of him.

But old Ivan was persistent. "You haven't told her?" there was anxiety in his parchment face. Actually, thought Stuart resentfully, he was afraid he would marry Hedda! It couldn't be jealousy—what could it be? He was soon to learn. For in the uninflectional voice of sixty old Ivan proceeded to tell him what marriage would mean to Hedda—for "I'm not denying," said he, "that she'd marry you. Women are all fools!"—he painted the future before her, the wonderful opportunities, the success waiting for her. He made Stuart see her applauded, beautiful surrounded with the luxury that was her due, a great singer with the world for her audience—Italy, Paris, England—and as against that brilliant picture he made him see the reverse side of the canvas, the dinginess of life as the wife of a struggling painter, living always among the poor, tawdry makeshifts that would not seem funny or romantic as they grew older.

"Do you dare to tie a woman like that to your poverty—to wash your chipped crockery for you and cook your squalid meals? What chance would Love have to live in such an atmosphere? You would see her look growing hard, and turning to indifference and then scorn, and then—hate! I know. Oh, yes," and he laughed cacklingly, "I know!"

Stuart Grant was stricken dumb. It was as tho he saw himself and his garret and the Future in new guise. His eyes were dark with the bitterness of looking on their stark nakedness. He spoke slowly, because he did not want to cry. "I—see. I'm a failure, and failures mustn't marry. It's perfectly simple. Oh, quite."

Old Ivan was pitiless; he finally extracted a promise from Stuart that he would not tell Hedda that he loved her—"if he could help it." When she came in, tremulous with the great news that Leroy Clemons had actually offered her a part in his new musical show, she was puzzled and a trifle hurt at Stuart's silence. "Of course," she said apologetically. "I know it isn't much, but it's a beginning, Paddie! And everyone has to begin."

"It is I, Hedda," Stuart whispered

"You'll be getting your diamonds and rubies and pearls after all," he laughed, but the sound hurt her edgily; "well, this requires celebration! How about a party at Joe's tonight, with the gang all there? And perhaps we can persuade Joe to forget about prohibition for once, beef-steak, too!" He was reckless, tho she guessed that his watch would be missing the next day. His gaiety rang hollow like a drum, but she was a good sport, was Hedda. She fastened a smile before her hurt, donned the Pierrette guise of mockery and went to his party, star-eyed.

It was a very gay party indeed. Perhaps the contents of the tea cups that Joe kept filled was partly responsible. All of the guests were young, and shabby. Some of them laughed because they were happy, some of them because they were sad. The whitewash of the dingy rooms flared with fantastic shadows, toasting a shadow lady who sat upon a dais at the head of the long bare tables. Stuart, seeing them, was seized with an idea. He leaped from his seat to the fireplace and found a char of wood. With this he began to sketch roughly upon the wall where Hedda's pure profile was cut in shadow like a cameo.

He was so engrossed that he didn't notice that their seclusion had been invaded by a squad of "trippers" doing the Village, uptown women with crisp, carefully dressed hair and fragile draperies, who stared at the feasters, and whispered together and laughed stridently. From the table on the balcony where they sat one of these women could look down upon Stuart, at his fantastic work. Gracia Trask was one of those women in the twilight zone of society. She had been a trifle too much married for entire—well, respectability, and yet she had enough money, almost, to cover all her sins, and she was undeniably lovely in a finished and calculated fashion. The men of society liked Mrs. Trask, the women sniffed at her, avoided her—and invited her to their big affairs.

She had been good for a long time, nearly eleven months to be exact, and she was horribly hored. Women of her type cannot live without the appertif of love-making. She saw Stuart Grant as soon as she entered the room, and under her shaven brows her eyes watched him with a glint in them as a tiger watches his victim before he springs.

"Hedda, you shall have your jewels after all!"

Joe touched the artist on the shoulder, apologetically. "Ze lady would spik to Monsieur—ze one with ze so-red hair—"

Gracia Trask smiled charmingly up into Stuart's politely questioning face. "I suppose you think I am mad!" she said, "but I am so much interested with the picture you have just made! It is really wonderful—I wonder—" she leaned forward, holding his eyes with hers, which were green and gold, like topaz—"I wonder whether you wouldn't paint my portrait. I'm frightfully vain, you know—and I want an artist who can make me perfectly beautiful!"

Stuart opened his lips to refuse, as his Artist Soul bade him, then hesitated. He thought of Hedda. He thought of Ivan, and he laughed out, harshly. What did it matter what he painted—who was there to care? "I shall be glad to paint you, Madame," he bowed.

And so Hedda sang her rôle, and Stuart, in the pale putty-and-grey apartment, smothered with patchouli, sickly with mauve draperies, painted Gracia Trask's beautiful bare bosom, and insinuating smile, and old Ivan scraped at his cello in the motion picture house. And the world wagged unfeelingly on.

At the first sitting Mrs. Trask was disarmingly girlish and confiding. At the second she discovered, without a word from Stuart, all about Hedda and was more alluring and charming than was quite fair. At the third sitting she told Stuart that he was a great artist, and wasting his time in prosaic and stolid America. "You should be in belle Paris; ah, that is

Theodore Roberts

By EMMA LINDSAY-SQUIER

I mentally tore up the outline and went out with him into the back yard. How can one talk art to a man who won't wear a collar and who looks like a sea-captain on shore leave?

"I'm just getting the yard fixed up," he told me, pointing out the Japanese sunken garden, with trick bridges and weeping willows and things. "I'm going to have some kennels for my Airedales—I raise them, you know, as a hobby—and over here will be an aviary for my prize pigeons and tame seagulls—birds are a hobby with me, too—and over there will be a concrete swimming pool where Mrs. Roberts and I can take a daily plunge."

"Is that a hobby, too?" I broke in, facetiously, but he answered, in all seriousness, "Indeed, it is. I need rigorous exercise to keep me in trim for my work at the studio."

Since he had mentioned studio, I felt that it wouldn't be inappropos to say something about pictures, so I told him that he was reported to hold the championship in the movie world for versatility and for having more rôles to his credit than any other actor on the screen. He nodded, rather absent-mindedly, keeping an eye on the man who was hauling dirt from the swimming pool excavation.

"Yes, I've played a great many rôles, both in the legitimate and the movies," he acknowledged. "My stage career commenced in 1880, and I played everything from Shylock to Simon Legree, and ran the gamut of dramatic characterizations from Sven

I HAD intended to talk to Theodore Roberts about pictures exclusively.

They told me at the Lasky studio that he had more rôles to his credit than any other actor on the screen, besides a multitude of Thesplan interpretations given in his forty years on the legitimate and vaudeville stages. So, as I walked up the hill that leads to his Hollywood castle, I planned a perfectly splendid conversational outline, commencing with how did he like motion pictures and ending with what did he think of the future of the cinema.

But—you know about the best laid plans of mice and interviewers. As I waited in the cool dimness of a Jacobean period library, I heard his wife calling to him in the back yard. Then I heard her say something about putting on a collar, and there was a murmur of conversation I couldn't catch. And when he came in to greet me, he didn't have a collar on, and I could have hugged him. He didn't even apologize for it, just said that he was busy working in the yard, and wouldn't I like to come out and see his animals and his trees.

Theodore Roberts began his stage career in 1880 and he played everything from Shylock to Simon Legree, from Svengali to King Lear. Five years ago he went into pictures gall and King Lear to lighter rôles such as the County Chairman in the play of that name and Falstaff in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Then I toured the country in my own vaudeville sketch and, five years ago, went into pictures. Since then I've averaged one rôle a month, sometimes more, so you can figure out how many parts that is—and that will be enough shop talk, wont it?" He broke off abruptly, turning his keen, humorous grey eyes on me.

I said it would, because I did want to see his Airedale dogs, which were woofing at the top of their lungs to attract his attention, and his tame sea-gulls, which were with the pigeons in the flying pen, screaming to the high heavens that they wanted food immediately if not sooner. So we inspected the kennels, and I was sniffed at by "Boy Scout" and "Friar Tuck," and had my face licked affectionately by "Lady." Then we went over to the flying pens, where his prize pigeons, enormous Runts, were strutting and cooing, and the tame sea-gulls, "Pete" and "Repeat," flew on his shoulders and hands.

"I'm particularly fond of sea-gulls," Mr. Roberts told me, as "Pete" snapped at his meerschaum cigar-holder. "You know, it is practically impossible to tame them, but I got these fellows when they were just fledglings

It was on the Santa Cruz Islands, where the Cecil De Mille company was making the shipwreck scenes for 'Male and Female.' I took the part of Lord Loam, and one of the carpenters brought me these birds, just hatched.

We all took a hand at raising them, and when we left the islands, I brought them back with me. When the aviary is finished they'll have a miniature lake to swim around in—it's a hobby of mine to provide natural surroundings as nearly as possible for all my pets."

"How did you enjoy the strenuous scenes in 'Male and Female'?" I asked, when we sat down—on a sawhorse—to watch the pigeons.

"They were—well, interesting," affirmed the veteran character actor. "The days on the island were strenuous ones. I was dressed in pajamas and it never occurred to me that I would suffer from sunburn, but my ankles were exposed, and they were fairly baked in two days. I had to hobble around on improvised crutches except when I was working in the picture.

"The rôle I like best?" he echoed, in response to my question. "Oh, that's hard to say. I rather enjoyed Wealth in 'Everywoman,' but for real artistic value, I liked the part of the old rounder in 'Old Wives for New'—you remember, the old fellow who is shot by

The Newest Photoplays in Review

By all odds the most significant photoplay of our screen month was David Wark Griffith's "The Great Question," (First National). Not because it is a good screen drama. It isn't. But it has tremendous idea buried beneath its melodrama.

A wave of interest in spiritualism has been sweeping the world since the days of the great war. Does after life exist? Can dear ones across the Great Beyond exert an influence over earthly destinies? What is the answer to the eternal problem of death? Griffith had these questions in mind when he started to screen "The Great Question."

Then something happened. The exhibitor—that monster reared by producers themselves—stood menacingly upon the horizon. Would the exhibitor accept a stern and grim drama dealing with death and the spirit world? We can imagine Griffith meditating—and then giving way to the exhibitor and his beloved melodrama.

So the vital theme of "The Great Question" was carefully buried beneath "action" and "punch." It became the story of a little war in the hands of a murderously brutal farmer couple, her love for a neighboring boy and the subsequent finding of oil—with its attendant avalanche of wealth. The whole is gilded with the philosophy that a simple faith meets and overcomes all obstacles.

Griffith came nearer giving the world another "Broken Blossoms" in "The Great Question" than in anything he has done since the epic of Limehouse. "The Great Question" might easily have been a notable contribution to screen thought. There is one big scene where the spirit of a young sailor, lost from submarine, comes home to his aged parents.

Lillian Gish and Bobbie Harron are the bucolic lovers, but the best work is done by Eugenie Besserer as the bereaved mother and Tom Wilson as a lazy negro servitor.

Technically, Erich Von Stroheim's photoplay, "Blind Husbands," (Universal), is a flashing thing—but it lacks soul and spirit.

Von Stroheim will be remembered as the Hun villain of a number of wartime films. "Blind Husbands," his own story produced by himself, relates the triangle of three people in the snow-capped Alps; a self-absorbed American doctor, his heart-lonely young wife and a young Austrian officer on sick leave. The dashing Austrian tries all his Continental wiles upon the American girl, but he finally meets retribution in a fall down the snowy precipice of the Alps. Von Stroheim has told his story with remarkable directorial dexterity—but, in the end, it is just an adroitly presented silver-screen melodrama. Von heim's characters fall short of the breath of realism, despite the remarkable superficial excellence of his direction. He has, for instance, attained his Alpine effects in striking fashion.

"Everywoman," (Paramount-craft), turned out to be ten reels of papier-mâché attitudes. Built upon Walter Powne's ingenious and ingenious morality drama depicting the adventures of Everywoman in her search for Love, accompanied by Youth, Beauty and Wealth. "Everywoman" was a study to appeal to the guileless. However, it possessed a certain helpful turn of simple philo-sophic dialog. These merits are largely lost on the screen and "Everywoman" becomes obvious as a conventional story differing only in that the characters bear such names as Vice, Wealth, Passion, and so on. We do not look upon George Mel-lie's direction as particularly inspired anywhere. Nor do we rate the acting as anything but mediocre. "Everywoman" drags fearfully.

"Toby's Bow," (Goldwyn), has a certain pleasant warmth to it, altho it is conventional plus as to story. John Taintor's successful novelist hero, Tom Blake, goes incognito as a boarder to a poor but proud Southern family, helps the pretty daughter write a popular novel and—presto!—love and happiness come upon them. Toby is the old negro servant whose family bow is finally won by young Blake. We like Tom Moore better in "Toby's Bow" than in any vehicle he has had, despite the trite direction. It is an ingratiating bit of work.

That rare character comedian, Will Rogers, is advancing with tremendous strides. Rogers is going to be one of the great favorites of the screen, or we miss our guess. In "Jubilo," (Goldwyn), Rogers is a lazy, roving hobo who counters a rancher's pretty daughter and reforms, slowly, gently, but completely. Rogers is Jubilo for the life, no mere screen idol masquerading in torn breeches, but a wanderer of homely humanness. Moreover, the performance is rife with a splendid sincerity. Josie Sedgwick lends the right note to the girl.

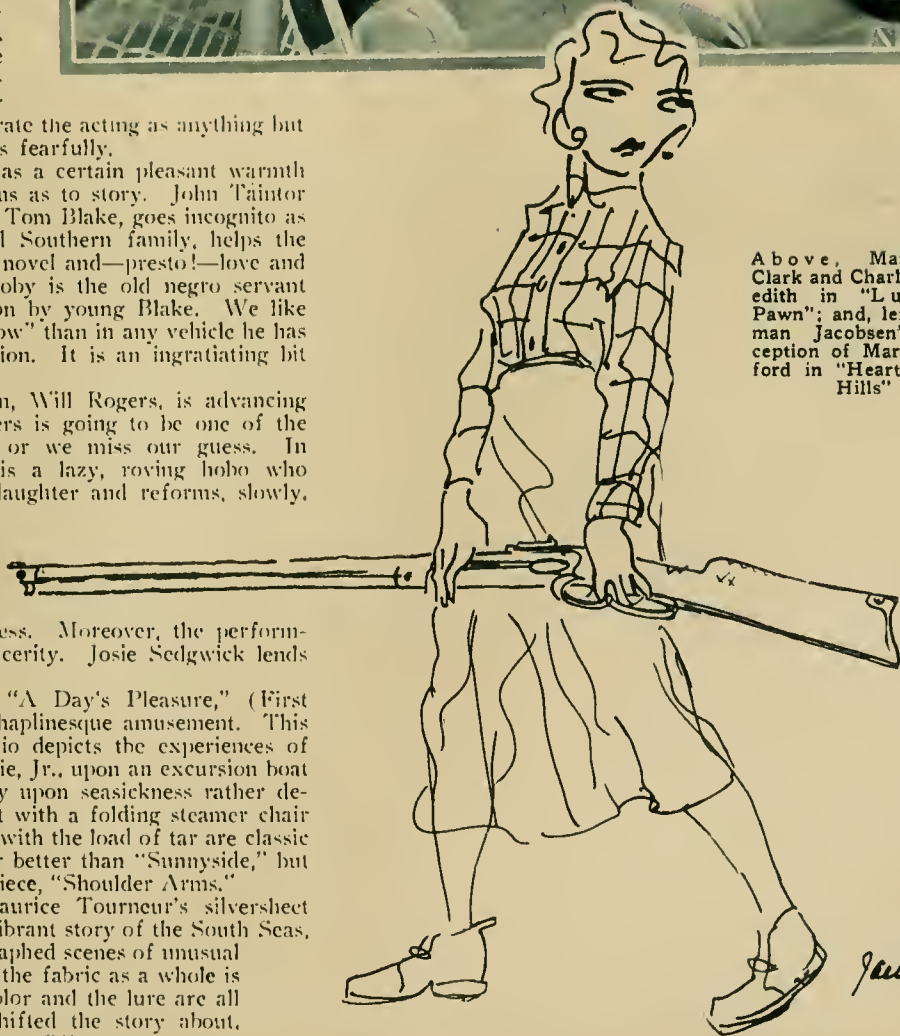

Despite its episodic nature, "A Day's Pleasure," (First National), gave us plenty of Chaplinesque amusement. This bus from the comedian's studio depicts the experiences of Mr. and Mrs. Charlie and Charlie, Jr., upon an excursion boat ride in a Ford. The buffoonery upon seasickness rather depressed us, but Charlie's combat with a folding steamer chair and the encounter of the flivver with the load of tar are classic bits. "A Day's Pleasure" is far better than "Sunnyside," but files behind that comic masterpiece, "Shoulder Arms."

"Victory," (Paramount), Maurice Tourneur's silversheet adaptation of Joseph Conrad's vibrant story of the South Seas, is a series of beautifully photographed scenes of unusual atmosphere in themselves. But the fabric as a whole is not Conrad. The power, the color and the lure are all missing. Mr. Tourneur has studied the story about.

is a tale of passions and despairs, of hates and loves, of tranquillities and distortions, of men . . . and women . . . and life . . . and death . . .

It might not have happened, that is, just as it did, if Dimitri Varinoff had not had rebellious blood in his veins, adventures in his bones and love and knowledge of books in his mind, so that, after his wife died and his life in the small Russian village dwindled to scant proportions of interest, he departed for America to seek work among the books he loved. He left behind him his ill daughter, Maria, very small for her time, with large eyes, uncombed hair and the stuff of her mother's blood and she transmitted her own. The love of books she was not to have. On the village streets her small feet twinkled to more rapid melodies. There were strains of music in her head, wanton and wild and rather marvelous.

Her father's going meant nothing to her at the time of his departure. At the time, the village and its adulation were sufficient. Later she reached out for wider horizons and she followed her father to America.

Schuyler Van Vechtman, to whose extensive and exquisite library Dimitri Varinoff was reverential, was one of the last of an old order. He had traditions in his soul. He had beliefs, lurkingly, but very convincingly, he had ideals. An ideal. That he had gone for forty years with lost dreams seeking harbors and eager ideals laid away in reminiscent lavender did not, somehow, rust away the belief still straight and shining somewhere in the ungrown-up depths of him. His aristocracy was in his long, sensitized hands, too, and in his voice with certain modulations, time-mellowed.

The day Sonia Varinoff came into his study, tucked oddly away on the tiptop of one of the many skyscrapers his business ingenuity had placed in his possession, something happened to him.

It was just at twilight. Dmitri was copying something or other under one of the tall windows, hung in sullen red. Schuyler was meditating as to where he should dine, and with whom. It occurred to him that he was lonely. Often he had thought so before, but this evening, in this particular twilight, tinted mauve, it came to him with something of sick oppression. It seemed curious to him that at this time Sonia should make her vivid entrance into his study at the top of the world, into his life . . .

Of course, he saw at once, while she stood talking to her father, with many gestures and much play of very potent hands, that she was not in keeping with the old Van Vechtan order of things, but he knew that old orders have nothing to do with a man when a woman comes into the twilight of his life, lighting it . . .

Here was a personality. He knew that. It mustn't get mixed up with the flotsam and jetsam. Get confused, the brilliant edges rubbed away with contacts, unnecessary contacts.

He had a long talk with Dmitri after she had gone into a small guest chamber he kept reserved for the very occasional and very favored passer-by, and told the old man to keep her there, to encourage her to study her music, to give her opportunities, at his expense.

Dmitri Varinoff was a canny old man; books had made him so. He had polished his wits to a powdery fineness by much bibliophiling. He knew that the satyr was non-existent in Schuyler Van Vechtan. He was a seeker of fine things, of rare things; he was an epicure of personalities. It was clear that he had seen something profitable in his little girl. And old Dmitri felt very glad.

There was one disturbed person when the new arrangement was made clear. That person was Peter Derwynt, secretary to Van Vechtan and chief high adviser in all business transactions and the like of that. He was largely disturbed because Van Vechtan informed him that he was to be Sonia's practical guardian and general adviser and conductor.

"You know, Peter," Van Vechtan explained, late in the following night, "the girl has some sort of a tremendous gift. Of that I am quite certain. She has the touch seldom felt. I want her to see the life of New York, the artistic life, the night life. I want her to see it safely and sanely. I have the time. You have, or you can make it. Logically, you are Sonia's guardian."

Peter remained unenthusiastic. What Van Vechtan suggested had a habit of being done, and he supposed the personal surveillance of this Russian person would be done, too, but he was utterly cool to it all. He thought perhaps he had better tell Van Vechtan a few things. He didn't want the good old chap to think him a clam, but continued escorting of a young Russian person, not to say personality, doubtless entailed some outlay of something or other not precisely compatible with love, deep and rather difficult, for another person.

"I think you ought to know," he found himself saying, with the smoke of their two cigars made grey fantasies around them and somber red hangings, "I'm in love, you know; have been for a great while, with Lady Joan Tremelyn. We met in London two years ago. It's been going on ever since. It—it will continue to go on. It's—it's like that with both of us. I have a mother, of course—her mother has plans. You know the kind. There must be money. They have the title—it needs some backing. They've just come over, she and her mother, and the Countess is angling for Jimmie Sutherland. You know Sutherland, You don't know Lady Joan. If

He got Sonia a music master and, every twilight, with her father, listened to her play, was critical, helpful, advisory, as he felt and thought

Van Vechtan"—the young man's voice rough—
 "if you did," he said, "you'd see—the hell it is."
 Van Vechtan saw the dream of it and the truth of the dream. He liked to help that sort of thing go. There had been love in young Derwynt's eyes and a pain his own heart made quick answer to. He had known heartbreak like that once, many years ago. It made him sensitive for Peter.
 "Help me with Sonia, like a good fellow," he answered, "and I'll fix it up so that you draw up plans for the new terminal. If you do and I go thru, you ought to be able to run a pretty fair competition even with the lobster-James Sutherland."

Peter was quite human and very much amused and hurt over his enforced aloofness toward Joan, whom he loved, where she springs, deepest, sweetest. He was human enough to be rather angry when, introduced to Sonia the next day, she grasped his hands in two very warm and pal-ating palms and cried out
 "Oh-h-h, what a very pretty girl!"

It was a fool remark, of course. Peter blushed un-comfortably and thought that it was like a foreigner, a Russian. . . . Joan would abhor anything like that. . . . still
 . . . the warm pressure of those eager palms and the rich, warm note in that young voice . . .
 . . . was awfully lonely . . .
 . . . so far remote . . . and it was owing to Van Vechtan a favor. Peter could have gone to almost any lengths for Van Vechtan. He felt, toward him, an almost desperate al-lance. There was something in Van Vechtan one could fasten onto, a firm hold of, know.

He got Sonia a music master and, early twilight, with her father, listened to her play, was critical, helpful, advisory, as he felt and thought.
 Gradually, he grew to know, was still considerably the child who, in bright lights and outlandish hair, had strayed on the streets of her native city. There were in her the mixed ingredients of the gamin and the g dienne, the sated woman and the grasping child.

He didn't love Sonia. All the love that it was possible for him to know had gone, irrevocably, to Joan, but she was a vivid interest. She aroused him and quickened him, and, later on, she loved him.

Van Vechtan told him this. "You know, I suppose," he said, one twilight—Van Vechtan always chose to speak of intimate things in the twilight—"you know, I suppose, Peter, that Sonia has come to love you."

Peter was essentially straightforward and simple. "I was never afraid so," he said. He added, "Of course, as you know, there's nobody but Joan."
 "I'm sorry for Sonia," was all that Van Vechtan said. Peter understood that, in the twilight, in this particular twilight, Van Vechtan looked weary and drawn. Behind the careful screening of his asceticism stared for an instant, odd, desperate, baffled sort of dreams . . .

 Quite soon after all this old

Peter created a scene, justifiably enough, and only Sonia's really desperate pleading saved the studio from being the scene of God knows what a horror

The maid helped him and he made her comfortable. He eased her tired body and her tired soul and quelled the sorry fluttering of her heart stiffened arm. It was, Van Vechtan told the sobbing, distraught Sonia, a wonderful moment for him to meet his death, exultant as he must have been, momentarily fulfilled. "All his blood," said Van Vechtan, with a wonderful tenderness in his manner, "had gone into his care and seeking of books. He is quite happy and at rest, I know. Don't be sorry, my child."

Joan was sorry, too. Prior to Dmitri's death Sonia had been something of a thorn in her flesh, on the infrequent occasions of her having tea in the tower with the little group. It had seemed to her almost like waving a red flag—this Sonia so near to Peter. Sonia's love of him, too, quite naturally tormented her. It was frank and unconcealed, and it was violently appealing. Joan knew that Peter loved her. She knew, too, however, that he was wearing himself out with wanting her, with waiting, and there are so many infusions in the blood, so many complexities, so many shiftings . . . she had been afraid . . .

After Dmitri's death her fear changed to a warmer feeling, sympathy. She couldn't feel otherwise. Sonia was a des-

Dmitri was killed crossing a street before the traffic was halted. He had come unexpectedly across a rare edition and, in his eagerness to bear it back to the tower rooms, met his death. He looked quite peaceful when they brought him in, the rare edition still fast in his perate little figure, seductive even in her darkened draperies, with the shadows under her wonderful eyes and the disarray of her entangling hair.

It wasn't very long after Dmitri's death that—well, it was this way. Joan came to the tower quite unexpectedly one late afternoon. Somehow she had managed, at a last moment, to escape the machinations of her maternal parent and the inconsistencies of the pork-packing Jimmie Sutherland. She had wanted, especially, to see Peter. It wasn't, she well knew, quite the thing. Still, what did "the thing" matter when an urge, beyond good and evil, got a grip?

She went, almost blindly, to the tower rooms.

It was immediately after Sonia's practice hour. She had been playing very wonderfully and getting up, in between bits, to execute or to better interpret with snatches of erotic dancing. She had felt very much in love with Peter. She felt, too, rather badly treated. She couldn't quite see Peter's point of view, or rather, lack of it. Of course, Joan was dear, lovely and goddess-like, but Peter—Peter and she were vital and living and near to each other. Sonia believed in proximity and the thoro reasonableness of the immediate hour.

When Joan came in, quietly, to charmingly surprise a lonely Peter, she saw Sonia on the arm of his chair, her bare arm about his non-resistant shoulders, her thick, arresting voice saying, "Don't you love me, Peter . . . just a little . . . just a little . . ."

Joan waited, a shade, in the dim shadows.

Peter said, "Yes, but——" and Joan did not see that Sonia saw her there and swiftly stifled Peter's "but" with her hand. She saw, only, Sonia bend to him, touch his mouth with hers, lightly, then more closely, and seeing nothing more, blanched, like a sorry ghost who has walked, forgotten, among the loved living, crept away.

It was a long while after the Lady Joan's brilliant, immediate marriage to James Sutherland before Peter Derwynt saw her, and still longer before he in any sense understood the hurt she had, with seeming groundlessness, dealt him.

In that interim, bereft and with the feeling of one left naked, exposed to biting winds, he turned to Sonia, tried to lose himself in her warm witcheries, married her.

It was like, he often thought, having been acolyte to some passionless lily, having worshiped the lily, having spilled the last chalice of his soul into the chaste cup and then, at length, turned utterly away, to seek and find—he admitted the finding—a riotous fragrance of consolation in some scarlet, delirious rose.

Sonia was like that to him . . . scarlet and delirious . . . but never, never in their most ultimate moments, was she Joan . . . He knew that, and she knew it, too.

Her knowing, her knowledge of it, had something to do with her mounting zest for dancing, for gowns and jewels and furs, the bedeckings of the town.

Peter was unable to do these things for her. Schuyler Van Vechtan was, she thought, uninterested aside from the income he gave her, methodically and silent, from month to month. He seemed to her, more than ever of late, just a part of the twilight detached, quietly observant.

Still, it was to Van Vechtan she owed her meeting with Jimmie Sutherland.

Van Vechtan had dined one evening with the Sutherlands. He had been touched by the stilled suffering on Joan's face. All at once the error of the whole thing assailed him. Peter, tormented, even tho deliriously, by Sonia, not understanding her, not able to get the thread of her being, the thread of gold Van Vechtan knew to be there, ready for unraveling . . . and Joan, writhing under Sutherland's well-meant tenderesses . . . bondages, Van Vechtan thought . . . only contacts, deliberate contacts could effect liberations. Van Vechtan believed in liberations.

He gave a dinner party and bade the Sutherlands and the Derwynts to attend. There would be makings or breakings. Van Vechtan believed either one or the other to be preferable to this galling, this fettering, this outraging of sensibilities.

Jimmie liked Sonia. He understood the part of her that was still the dancing village child, the part of her that wanted, now, the trappings of the city where the lights shone, gold and rose. Sonia liked Jimmie, too. He was another child to take hands with her and play . . .

They took to meeting and dancing a great deal together. Sonia became confidential. She admitted to Jimmie that she and Peter had words over bills. She wished, she said, she could obviate all that. She ought to be able to. Something in her, she felt, was going to waste . . .

Jimmie suggested a plan, a humdinger, as he termed it. Sonia should dance. He could get her "in." She should appear en masque, create a mystery, as 'twere. Broadway, he said, ate mysteries alive and then hollered for more. Sonia, with her strange grace, her abandon, her paradoxical reserve, her mystic feet, could be a super-mystery.

The suggestion suited Sonia. And Jimmie, time heavy on his hands, his wife cold to him, his lady love, Fay Desmond, (Continued on page 90)

The appeal of beauty

WHAT person lives who is not attracted by beauty—beauty of face, beauty of voice, beauty of complexion?

Not all can have beautiful features, nor can all have beautiful voices, but a beautiful complexion depends largely upon the care that is given to it.

Don't neglect those ugly little blemishes, that excessive oiliness, those enlarged pores. Resinol Soap contains just the necessary requisites to aid in overcoming these defects. It is pure, mild and cleansing.

Compounded with the greatest care, it cannot harm the most delicate skin, yet it usually gets right at the root of the complexion trouble, and aids in obtaining the desired beauty of skin.

RESINOL SOAP FOR THE HAIR HELPS TO GIVE IT LUSTER, AND TO PROMOTE THE HEALTH OF THE SCALP.

A few simple rules that bring Loveliness

Occasionally you meet girls who are beautiful without effort; but most lovely people are lovely because they know the rules. Here are a few simple ones, approved by skin specialists, which every woman would do well to follow.

WHEN you powder, do it to last. Powdering in public is an admission that you are uneasy about your appearance.

The only way to make powder stay on is—not to put on an excessive amount—but to begin with the right powder base.

Never use a cold cream for a powder base. It is too oily. The right powder base is a greaseless, disappearing cream. Take just a little Pond's Vanishing Cream on your finger tips. Rub it lightly into your face. Instantly it disappears, leaving your skin smoother. Now powder as usual. Notice how smoothly the powder goes on—how natural it looks. You will find that it will stay on two or three times as long as ever before. You need never again fear a shiny face.

CHAPPING is a sign of carelessness. So is roughness. You can keep your skin as smooth as rose leaves all winter long. Always, before going out, smooth a little Pond's Vanishing Cream into your face and hands. It softens the skin instantly, so that the cold cannot do it the least harm. It is a good idea to carry a tube of it right in your hand bag so that immediately before and after skating or motoring you can soften your hands and face with it. In this way the delicate texture of the finest skin will never suffer from exposure.

DO you want to know why your skin is not always clear? Look at the cloth after cleansing your face with a cream prepared especially for cleansing. The dust will make you realize that a dull looking skin is often nothing more or less than a skin not thoroughly cleansed.

The only means of keeping the skin clear of the dust that gets lodged deep within its pores is the cold cream bath. For this, Vanishing Cream will not do, for Vanishing Cream has no oil. At night cleanse the skin with Pond's Cold Cream. The formula for this cream was especially worked out to supply just the amount of oil to give it the highest cleansing power.

Catch the little lines before they grow big

YOU can keep your face free of the wretched little lines that will keep starting. Once a week iron out these lines. Massage from the center of the face outwards and upwards with Pond's Cold Cream. If your skin has a tendency to be rough and dry, leave a little of the cream on your face over night. Pond's Cold Cream has just the smoothness and body required for a perfect massage cream.

Why your skin needs two creams

ONE without any oil, for daytime and evening needs—Pond's Vanishing Cream. It will not reappear in a shine.

One with an oil base, for cleansing and massage—Pond's Cold Cream. It has just the amount of oil that the skin needs.

Neither of these creams will encourage the growth of hair on the face.

Get a jar or tube of each cream today at any drug or department store. You will realize for the first time how lovely your skin can be.

Sousa's Band and Conn Instruments

What Sousa Says

JOHN PHILIP SOUSA

I take this occasion to tell you of the genuine pleasure and perfect satisfaction your New Wander Model Instruments, used by the members of my Band, have given me.

In our extended engagement at the New York Hippodrome your instruments have had a splendid opportunity to display their merits. They have fully demonstrated their worthiness of the Grand Prize and Gold Medal of Honor given them by the Jury of Awards at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. During our pleasant engagements at the Exposition I had occasion to note the various bands and orchestras there engaged and the Conn Instruments seemed to be in evidence everywhere. Particularly was this the case where High Grade Musicians were engaged.

I still maintain that the new model Conn Instruments enhances the musical value of any organization to a marked degree and the members of my organization fully accord with me.

The Conn, Ltd., has created a high standard of excellence for Band Instruments, a standard worthy of emulation, if possible, by other makers.

Very sincerely,

JOHN PHILIP SOUSA

The Famous Jackie Band, U. S. Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, Ill.
Lt. John Philip Sousa, Conductor

The organization and successful training of the "Jackie Band" is one of the most remarkable of Lieut. Sousa's achievements. Its members were recruited from all walks of life—many of them wholly unfamiliar with music and musical instruments—and yet in a few short months, Lieut. Sousa was able to develop them into a world-renowned organization. The Jackie Band of over 1200 members was equipped throughout with Conn Instruments—a most significant fact when one remembers the success achieved. And yet, good music is no mystery. It is the expression of skill in both the artist and the maker of the instrument.

MUSIC IN OTHER ORGANIZATIONS

The power of music to inspire and bind together was well illustrated in the Jackie Band. Hundreds of organizations and institutions are recognizing the same fact and are using it to the mutual advantage and the profit of their members.

Large manufacturing industries, Fire and Police Departments, Boy Scout Organizations, Schools, Colleges, Lodges, Churches, etc., are all beneficiaries of the bond of music. Many remarkable Bands and Orchestras have been developed among the members of such organizations with the aid of Conn Instruments.

Unusual benefits of no small proportions await other similar organizations who are interested in the creation and development of a spirit of harmony in thought and action within their organization.

Ralph Dunbar's White Hussars have become so enthusiastic over their Conn Instruments that they both play and sing their praise. Those who have heard the White Hussars in Lyceum, Chautauqua and Vaudeville work know the quality of their work and also appreciate the significance of their enthusiasm for Conn Instruments.

ESSENTIAL TONAL QUALITIES

A Characteristic of CONN Instruments

The test of an instrument is its tonal qualities—its perfect intonation—its symmetry of proportion—its proper balance—its embodiment of Art and Science as expressed in appearance and performance.

Conn Instruments are the product of a patented method impossible of attainment elsewhere. An intimate, scientific knowledge of requirements, plus a mechanical skill in production that approaches the Artistic and Ideal, gives a guarantee of quality and uniformity in tonal elements that is unsurpassed. The universal recognition of this superiority of Conn Instruments by all great Band Leaders of International Fame is the best possible guide and assurance for the beginner or the veteran purchaser of band instruments.

Let us send information about forming a band in your organization. If you are a player or beginner, ask for information concerning the instrument in which you are interested.

YOUR BEST GUARANTEE of a good Band or Orchestra Instrument is to see that it bears this mark—

THE SCHUSTER FAMILY

Many brothers and sisters might well emulate the musical activities of the Schuster Family Saxophone Quintette which has earned an enviable reputation as entertainers. The degree of harmony expressed by this little family is truly wonderful,—but then, they use Conn Instruments, of course.

THE DARLING SAXOPHONE FOUR

is all that the name implies. Four charming and capable young ladies who are meeting unusual success as musical entertainers in high class vaudeville. They, too, place their dependence in Conn Instruments. The result? Exactly what you would expect,—the best ever.

where they would appreciate you!" she told him. "It is wicked for you to hide your genius in a wretched garret in the slums among all sorts of common, coarse creatures who dont understand—"

She used that word a great deal, and the inference was that out of everyone he knew, Gracia Trask alone really understood him. Stuart began to feel abused, and to look about his studio with dissatisfied eyes that saw for the first time the bare boards, the poor pinched, bravery of furnishing.

At the fourth sitting she suggested, quite casually, that he should go to Paris. She watered the seed thus planted at the fifth sitting by telling him that she would take him with her as her secretary, courier—or "what he pleased." But it was not until the seventh and last sitting that he consented to go. He told Ivan that evening, and was rewarded by the pale flicker of relief in the watery old eyes. It was the cello player who took Hedda the news.

"It is well," Ivan said, not appearing to notice the quiver of the red lips, the agony of the hurt brown eyes before him; "he is a great artist, and like all true artists he needs the right environment. Here—" his gesture took in the gay tarlton curtains, the painted pine furniture and made them ridiculous. "here he would stifle! His Art would either die or become prostitute to convenience. It is very well that he goes, and all his friends should rejoice that this chance has come, eh, Hedda?"

The girl sat quite still for a long moment. When she spoke her voice was composed. "You have known—I think almost before I knew, how I felt toward Stuart," she said quietly; "rather than stand in the way of his good I would go away myself and never see him again. That is what will happen now. He will go, and I shall never see him again." The pure girlish face quivered whitely into a selfless smile. "Do not be afraid, my kind friend, that I shall try to keep him—or that I would let him stay even if he wished."

They were very gay at the parting. Stuart, with his shabby portmanteau and his painting outfit, came to her door to say good-bye, and they both made prodigious efforts to pass the dangerous moment over lightly. They joked lamely about the Fame that was soon to come to each of them, they spoke casually of mutual friends of Joe's, they talked desperately of the voyage, and his chances of escaping seasickness. Then came a panicky moment when they could neither of them think of anything safe to say, because of the multitude of unsafe things that struggled to be out.

"Oh, Hedda!" Stuart said suddenly, with a great, thick sob, "Hedda—dear—tell me to stay! I cant go—and leave you—I cant—"

Then Hedda told her glorious lie, and her Guardian Angel hesitated over His ledger, not knowing which page to place it on. "I cant tell you to stay, Stuart," she smiled—"because I dont expect to be here long myself. Clemons tells me that if I make good he will give me a hundred a week, at first, then much more. And I've got to succeed, Stuart! I want success so—more than—than anything in the world. I want money, and beautiful clothes and praise—" She forced herself to go on, tho the words choked her. "Do you remember the time you reproached me with wanting Marguerite's jewels? Well, you were right, Stuart—I do want them, and I'm going to have them!"

"Then that is how I shall remember you," he said, smiling with stiff lips, "covered with jewels—"

"He despises me," she whispered, when long after he had gone, striding erectly away down the crooked stairs, she lifted her swollen face from the sodden pillows of her couch bed. "I've cut the last strand that might hold him back—oh, God, take care of him!"

Gracia Trask was grievously disappointed with her new toy. It is difficult to feed neurotic fancy upon either gratitude or remote respect, which were the only two emotions Stuart Grant displayed to her. He was very silent on the trip over, tho he attended faithfully to her Pekingese, her rugs, her books and cushions, her steamer chair and wraps. Once in Paris he stubbornly refused to allow her to establish him in an expensive and charmingly decorated studio as she had fondly planned. Moreover, he would not dress in velveteen jackets and slouch hats, he would not drink absinthe, he would not—he simply would not make love to her.

How he managed to live she could not discover, for he was decidedly uncommunicative about his doings when he was away from her. Three nights a week he presented himself at the door of her pink-silk upholstered apartment on the Blois, impeccably shaven, amazingly clean and very much a man in spite of his out-of-date and shabby old evening suit. They would go out and dine, then perhaps to the theater or opera, or now and again to a reception, for the fair Gracia was almost as well known in Paris as in her native New York; afterward a grave good-night at the foolish ivory door with its bird-of-paradise knocker. No wonder the clever and accomplished Mrs. Trask was baffled.

She tried strategy. In some way she managed to learn the address of his rooms and appeared there late one afternoon, unannounced, having put the protesting concierge in his place. She found Stuart at his easel, so absorbed that even when she stood beside him, looking over his shoulder, he was unaware of her. She saw the canvas. She recognized the face. It was that which he had been limning months ago on the whitewashed wall of the restaurant in Bohemia—Hedda's face, painted as only Love can paint.

But she tried again. She was not one to give up anything she had set her heart upon lightly. And she was not choice of her methods. She took Stuart Grant to a reception at the house of a friend of hers and arranged that in his hearing her name should be slightly mentioned with hers. She was waiting in an anteroom when he came, very pale, with thunderous brows, to find her.

"You must let me take you home," he told her briefly, "there has been—unpleasantness. I was obliged to knock a man down."

And he told her what he had overheard. She looked at him softly, even tenderly, for he was a man born to be loved of women, and, as much as she was capable, she loved him. "Well?" she asked. "Well? And what shall we do?"

If she had expected that he would perforce ask her then and there to marry him she was mistaken. He stared straight before him somberly. "I have been a cad," he said, loathing himself; "I have accepted your favors, and I have placed you in a position where people dare say wretched things, and worst of all I have profaned myself. I would be still more of a cad if I did not ask you to marry me, but before I do so I must tell you that there is a girl, back there in New York whom I love as a man loves only one woman in his life. I have tried to do without her, but it is like doing without part of myself. I cannot paint, I cannot even want to paint without her—"

Gracia Trask put out her hand and took his. In that moment she stepped out of herself. "Then go back to her," she said wearily, "if you feel that way—go back to her, and tell her to try to forgive me for taking you away . . ."

It was a fortnight later that Stuart Grant pushed open the door of his attic in Bohemia with a warm rush of happiness in his heart, as he looked about at the blessed familiar shabbiness that spelled home. Then he saw that it was freshly swept and dusted, that his easel stood ready, with a canvas on it—that there were even asters in that old blue jug on the dresser—

Footsteps on the stairs brought him about with a cry, but it was only Ivan who stood before him, gaping, rustling with every movement, as he reached out and touched his sleeve with bony fingers. Then—"Thank the good God!" Ivan said hoarsely, "you've come back in time to save her from breaking her heart."

"Her!" Stuart cried, not daring to believe, "not—Hedda?"

"Hedda." Ivan nodded, and groaned very bitterly. "I was wrong. I tried to separate you, thinking Art was enough, but it is not so. She stopped

Shadowland for February

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY! As three words, more or less unarresting, this announcement might not seem to mean so very much, but it is, as a matter of fact, an illustration par excellence of the exceeding potency of mere words, the underlying current of all words, the shades of meaning behind the obvious meaning.

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY means that your intelligence is going to receive direct appeals. You are going to think, which is, to state it mildly, never undesirable.

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY means that your imagination is going to be touched, possibly fired, by delicately beautiful pictures, by colors, by words with rhythm, by the departments—each one bearing a message. You are going to be impelled to dreaming . . .

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY means that your news sense is going to be amplified. The plays and the players you are curious about, interested in, fond of, desirous of knowing better—you are going to know better, by the power of brush and by the power of the pen.

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY means that your sense of beauty is going to be—well, at least, we think, stimulated.

SHADOWLAND for FEBRUARY is going to spell laughter . . . and dreams . . . reasoning and thought . . . profundity and witticism . . . color and gravity. It is going to try to be a message vari-hued and vari-toned. It is going to try to be still more . . . a promise . . . an omen.

The Man Who Wouldn't Stay Down

He was putting in long hours at monotonous unskilled work. His small pay scarcely lasted from one week to the next. Pleasures were few and far between and he couldn't save a cent.

He was down—but he wouldn't stay there! He saw other men promoted, and he made up his mind that what they could do he could do. Then he found the reason they were promoted was because they had special training—an expert knowledge of some one line. So he made up his mind that he would get that kind of training.

He marked and mailed to Scranton a coupon like the one below. That was his first step upward. It brought him just the information he was looking for. He found he could get the training he needed right at home in the hours after supper. From that time on he spent part of his spare time studying.

The first reward was not long in coming—an increase in salary. Then came another. Then he was made Foreman. Now he is Superintendent with an income that means independence and all the comforts and pleasures that make life worth living.

It just shows what a man with ambition can do. And this man is only one out of hundreds of thousands who have climbed the same steps to success with the help of the International Correspondence Schools.

What about you?

Are you satisfied merely to hang on where you are or would you, too, like to have a real job and real money? It's entirely up to you. You don't have to stay down. You can climb to the position you want in the work you like best. Yes, you can! The I. C. S. is ready and anxious to come to you, wherever you are, with the very help you need.

Surely when you have an opportunity that means so much, you can't afford to let another priceless hour pass without at least finding out about it. And the way to do that is easy—without cost, without obligating yourself in any way, mark and mail this coupon.

INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS BOX 6770, SCRANTON, PA.

Explain, without obligating me, how I can qualify for the position, or in the subject, before which I mark X.

The Movie Kiss

By TOM MASSON

As far as we can judge by history, the kiss has been practiced in all ages. It varies in its speed and horse-power, according to age, race and previous condition of domestic servitude. While it is a purely local affair, it has a considerable range of activity. As a rule, it is exclusively confined to two, but it is occasionally conveyed by hand from one person to a group of others. A kiss thus blown may reach several parties for whom it is not intended. While apparently general in its nature, it may be intended for only one.

There are several kinds of kisses. There is the common or domesticated matrimonial kiss, that works automatically and frequently becomes rusty and stalls upon critical occasions. There is the short-lived, or honeymoon kiss, whose age varies from six months to two years, according to climate and financial condition. There is the lover's kiss, that frequently attains a cloud height of 22,000 feet and is accompanied by explosions. And there is the kiss of seasoned ladies, with an aurora borealis exterior, which often drops internally to 100 below zero. Kissing is also practiced by Frenchmen when conferring decorations upon one another or upon the sufferers belonging to other nations.

But the movie or screen kiss is comparatively new to the world. It is usually somewhat dilatory in its habits, and takes place "the night after" or "the next morning." It may, however, occur anywhere along the line of march—between recently wedded husbands and wives, parting lovers, or when bending over cribs, hospital beds or sofas. Thomas Edison did not invent it, but he is more or less responsible for it.

There is one peculiarity about the screen kiss that makes it not only different from any other, but which shows that the kiss in general is a thing in itself and not dependent upon time or materials. For when we see it on the screen, altho we know that it has actually taken place in the past and is now well over with, we think of it only as a present affair. We actually delude ourselves into thinking it is now going on. We roll up our sleeves, smack our lips and take part in it ourselves when, as a matter of fact, it was probably created some months before in Los Angeles or Jersey City. Thus a kiss which in its execution takes only a fraction of a minute, becomes a permanent affair. It travels all over the world. The movie, therefore, offers domestic possibilities of great interest. A newly married man may kiss his bride in the most complete and satisfactory manner. Having arrived at the highest point of skill and workmanship, he can have a film taken, which his wife can thereafter turn on for her own benefit every morning and evening, while the husband, relieved of this manual labor, can devote himself more completely to the business of keeping together his body and what soul he may have left over.

But this is not all, for the screen kiss contains a value still more interesting and important. Heretofore, people have had to get along and learn how to kiss by themselves, without any accredited model. They have had, so to speak, to grope in the dark, and assisted only by each other, have learned by severe practice. The only object lessons they have had have been furnished by amateurs like themselves, or by more or less offensive relatives at railroad stations. Now, however, they can sit out almost any night and see skilled workmen and women do it as it ought to be done, with a minimum loss of energy. Thus the art of osculation is getting on its feet and becoming standardized. If any young woman views her lover with suspicion because there is no motion in the way he grabs her and presses his lips to hers, and if she declares that she must have learned it somewhere else, she can simply refer her to the osculatory educational film that has been running in the local picture palace for the past three nights, as convincing evidence of his personal innocence.

the girl he snubbed. And on the legitimate stage," he went on, reminiscently, "I enjoyed doing Shylock better than any other character. You see so few convincing portrayals of that character. He is depicted mostly as a scurrilous Jew with an enormous lust for gold and a vicious spirit that is satisfied only with blood, while as a matter of fact, Shakespeare has given him no speeches that are not full of dignity and forcefulness, while his whole personality is that of a leader, not a mongrel money-lending foreigner. I tried to make him the representative of a race—and a human being."

I found myself thinking that it was possible to talk art without a collar, but Mr. Roberts was thru for the time being.

"Come see my trees," he invited. "Trees are a hobby of mine and I have a few rare ones in the yard."

The one he pointed out looked like a live oak, but it was a cork tree, he told me. My idea of corks has always been vague; I rather thought they grew in bottles, but it seems not. Mr. Roberts cut a slice of the bark for me, and it was cork, just the same as you'd see in a bottle of—er—catsup, and he told me that he could have made a fortune off his tree in pre-prohibition days, but that he had bought it too late. Then there was a "butterfly" tree, with flowers of flaming orange and leaves that looked like butterfly wings and that fold together at night. They, too, are very rare, and will not grow where there is frost; and, Mr. Roberts told me, impressively, his house was just two blocks beyond the frost belt in Hollywood—otherwise he couldn't have a butterfly-tree.

When he had shown me his shrubbery, I asked point-blank how many other hobbies he had, and he laughed, showing white teeth and crinkly wrinkles around his eyes.

"Quite a few," he confessed. "In the first place, there's art—you see, I come from a family of artists. My father painted very well indeed, and so does my sister. I was told, when young, by a famous artist that I ought to follow that career, but I inclined towards the stage. However, I paint, draw and 'sculpt,' collect paintings and furniture and—oh, yes," he interrupted himself again in his abrupt fashion, "I mustn't forget my hobby of correct make-up—that is a very important one." He led the way to the Japanese gardens and we sat beside the tiny lily pond while he talked about this most "important" hobby of his.

"I have always given the most careful study to making up for a character," he said. "You might say that I stop at nothing to get the result I want. I'm wearing a mustache just now, but I will shave it off for my next character bit with Mary Miles Minter in 'Judy of Rogue's Harbor.' I've let my hair get long and unkempt, I've allowed my beard to grow—I even shaved my eyebrows

My Hair Was Quite Gray

"It was falling out, getting brittle and stringy. My scalp was filled with dandruff and itched almost constantly. A few applications of Kolor-Bak produced a wonderful improvement. The itching stopped instantly. There was no more dandruff. And—marvel of marvels—it is now restored to its original color—not a gray hair shows anywhere!"

Kolor-Bak is not a dye or stain. It is colorless, stainless, harmless and restores original color to gray hair simply by putting hair and scalp in a healthy condition.

Rushing to the defense of some of my friends in the industry, I demanded to know just why Miss Childers is "down on" the star system. And thus did she elucidate.

"Why not feature the story? There is no story, except, perhaps, that of Adam, that was ever written for one individual. A lot of people like Norma Talmadge or Elsie Ferguson or Clara Kimball Young, but they can see that very personality in a play where the story's the thing—where they won't have to sit thru some untold million close-ups of Miss A's gowns or Mr. B's waxed mustache."

Tho' thruout the luncheon Miss Childers was garbed as a Russian princess and wore a black-net evening gown, I had seen her before at the studio in the rags of a screen charwoman—her features distorted with make-up.

"Just so long as the clothes aren't dirty, it's all right," she explained.

Once, Miss Childers avers, she had hopes of being a fortune-teller or a clairvoyant, but, having a penchant for the luxuries of this transitory life she elected the stage as a profession.

And again, she would have been a student in an art school had not Fate put in an oar. As it is, her Hollywood apartment is replete with sketches and pastels bearing her signature in the lower right-hand corner, and the orchidaceous lady will confess to designing all of her own—and sometimes, other people's—gowns.

It was just before she was to register at a certain academy of fine arts in St. Louis that a stage manager, who met Miss Childers socially, offered to cast her as Beauty in "Everywoman." She didn't take the part, however, because she was afraid of its bigness, but rather, became a French maid in another production, and retired serenely into the background.

One day (and this is the manner in which she reminisces)—she found herself becoming ambitious, and burning with the fever of supposed genius, she approached Henry Kolker, whose French maid she was in "The Great Name," and asked him to allow her to make a spectacular entrance.

At the suggestion of such an entrance Mr. Kolker was observed to succumb to gales of laughter, and finally to bid the sixteen-year-old Naomi to remain content with her the-carriage-waits-without speech.

During the last week of "The Great Name's" run, however, the actorine who played the fat German cook of the production, disappeared, and the heroine of "The Spirit in the Clay" and "Lord and Lady Algy," hurriedly became a corpulent frau from Hamburg. She with her imperturbable calm and her tapering fingers!

And, even tho' I knew that the price of print paper is ever soaring higher, I feel called upon to enumerate the remainder of the Childers' career. Thusly. In productions of Henry W. Savage and H. H. Frazee, followed by terms with Vitagraph in "The Writing on the Wall," "The Turn of the Road," "The Spirit in the Clay," "The Devil's Prize," et al.; Metro in "The Yellow Dove" and "The Blindness of Love," in which she was playing with Harold Lockwood when he was stricken with the influenza which caused his death; and at Goldwyn, where she created on the screen the famous Lady Algy opposite Tom Moore, and appeared as a lady passionately loved by Lou-Tellegen in "The World and Its Woman."

"And after all this," I ventured, "what do you crave?"

"Oh, three pictures a year," she answered, nonchalantly, "a house at Newport with a neat collection of genuine paintings, some good-looking gowns, and large quantities of French novels."

Exactly what I thought. Lots of magnificence. Orchids—Riverside Drive on Sunday afternoon—the front box at the Metropolitan—Tiffany's window in collision with the Empire State Express.

once. Not only that, but I give close attention to grease-paint and putty. I have some materials on my dressing-table at the studio that you will not find elsewhere, because I have them made up especially for me. When I am assigned a part, I immediately begin to study it. What would this man look like? Is he a grouch? Very well, then, hard lines about the mouth and nostrils. Is he a miser? Close, furtive eyes, then, and thin lips; an open-hearted, careless old fellow, he must have ruddy cheeks and well-groomed features.

"The other day I was made up as an old miner, with long white beard and weather-beaten countenance. I was coming back from lunch and saw a group of my friends outside the studio. I hailed them, not thinking of my make-up, and they stared at me blankly for an instant. Then they burst into laughter as they told me how one of them had just remarked, as I approached, 'Look at that old fellow—he's a wonderful type—he ought to register for a job!'"

All of which is interesting comment upon the vividness of Roberts' make-up.

A voice from the house told "Theodore" that lunch was ready, and I rose to go, tho' hospitably urged to remain. But I was obdurate.

"Your hobbies are wonderful!" I told him, as he accompanied me to the steps.

"Yes, I collect almost everything," he laughed.

"Except collars," I reminded him, wickedly.

"Yes, except collars!" he admitted, without a trace of shame.

A Perfect Voice Is Priceless!

Yours can be made perfect

—The Feuchtinger Method of Voice Culture will do it

THINK what your voice means to you—what a priceless possession is a PERFECT voice!

For singing, public speaking, for conversation—the trained, fully cultivated voice gives any man or woman an immense advantage over those who neglect to improve Nature's best gift.

Any Voice Can Be Developed

The Feuchtinger Method of Voice Culture will develop the most ordinary voice into a thing of beauty—a power to arouse admiration and compel success.

This method is an absolute science of voice culture. It develops Nature's own sound organ by proved principles. It is the science of tone-production, tone-strength, clearness and harmony. Your voice can be trained by it to great power and beauty.

Immediate Results

The FEUCHTINGER METHOD is a PROVED SUCCESS—it has demonstrated unflinching results in countless cases. Your voice will receive almost immediate benefits, and your progress to perfection should be swift and sure.

Mr. Feuchtinger has received letters from men and women in all walks of life, telling what the Power of the Voice has been to them after studying this unfailing method. Those friendless before taking this course now find themselves popular wherever they go. Our students testify that a fine singing and speaking voice is responsible for unexpected social and business opportunities.

No Stuttering—No Stammering No Lipping

The Feuchtinger Method banishes ALL impediments of speech—gives perfect command of muscles and vocal cords. Harshness, hoarseness, huskiness will quickly disappear.

No more stuttering, stammering or lipping! All these business and social handicaps are quickly and permanently removed by the Feuchtinger Method of Voice Culture.

A Few Minutes Silent Daily Practice in Your Own Home

Amazing results will be achieved by a few minutes' daily study of the Feuchtinger Method in the privacy of your own home. You need not know music—the practice is silent—nobody will even know you are studying this method.

As you progress in this intensely interesting method, you experience the joy of increasing power that springs from self-confidence and the conscious development of vital personality.

the second serial. I was supposed to be in a cave with this beast and, while there were two trainers, and outside some men with iron bars, and lights were placed in front of the camera to confuse the animal, an unexpected danger arose. I was waiting for them to get it all ready for action—was sitting with a bit of embroidery in the back of the cave. They had wire fencing between the cameramen and the lion, and the trainer was endeavoring to make him go thru certain tricks, for this was not one of the old Selig lions usually hired by producing companies, but a wild one which proved to be very stubborn and excited to boot.

"Suddenly there was a roar—and I just looked up in time to see the lion leaping. Whatever made me act so quickly, I could not tell you, but I ducked and put my head between my knees, and as the lion took the entire cave-length in one leap, I narrowly escaped having my head or shoulders badly clawed. Everybody was so frightened. The wire supports were torn down. Mr. Duncan had a piece of crooked pipe which he was trying to manipulate to keep the lion back, and finally the forest king made one big jump over a high obstruction and got out, followed by the trainers, who finally subdued him.

"But that was only the beginning of a bad day. I was supposed to face a snake as soon as I got to another end of the cave. For some reason, as I was led to turn around, and while the men were busy, I saw this snake right in front of me. He had his fangs, for the man who owned him said he was the only one of his snakes who could feed himself and he refused to take out the poison sacs.

"I hardly know what did happen, but Mr. Duncan was shouting orders to me, and I simply obeyed what he told me to do—and somehow he managed to grasp that hissing serpent by the neck, as he had been told to do by its owner, and I escaped snake-bite from a mad rattler. I can't see anything pleasant in acting with animals, but I don't mind being suspended over cliffs or rescued from almost impossible positions; in fact, I think serials are lots of fun," finished Miss Johnson, very vivaciously.

Miss Johnson's mother and her brother, Donald, aged seventeen, live with her in California. She is determined to put Donald thru college and is giving him every educational advantage even now. At present the little family is merely "existing" in an apartment, while house-hunting goes on merrily. There is a shortage in dwellings here, and Edith Johnson thinks she will be forced to buy, as "For Rent" signs are scarcer than oranges in the Arctic zone.

But meantime, she just "loves" house-work, and when the housekeeper goes out, Edith swirls a broom happily and says it the best sort of exercise. Her greatest sorrow is that being a motion picture actress prevents her from cooking and cleaning. She loves to do the things many other women despise, thinks dishwashing is a rare treat after cavorting about on a horse all day and just wishes she could be a housewife.

But before such dreams come true, if ever they do, Edith Johnson is to do some straight dramas with William Duncan, for the Vitagraph Company has promised to give the star and his lovely lady an opportunity to show their talents in an entirely different line of work when they are thru "Smashing Barriers," in stories probably written by James Oliver Curwood.

As it was, he said, "No, I went in a mob scene in 'Parsifal.' However, my life-long (not so long) ambition was realized—I was on the stage. Owen was with me this time. Yes, he ran away, too, the same time that I did. We earned $5 a week. But even this enormous sum failed to appease my ambition and I got a chance to play the lead with a number five road company of 'Lena Rivers,' I think it was. The people wouldn't come to see us. They had more sense than I had. But anyway, I was stranded in a small Canadian town. Were you ever stranded in a small Canadian town?"

"No, but we have been stranded in Troy, with a number five company of 'Bluebird.' It isn't any fun, is it?"

"Say, do you know, I stranded so many companies that season, that they wouldn't take me in any more, so I joined a stock company, and one day a man from the Kalem Company offered me a job to work in moving pictures. I scorned it—all 'legitimate' actors did then; but the magnificent salary of $40.50 finally tempted me and I fell. I was only earning $25 in stock. I never did know what the 50 cents was for."

"It's like our own salary," we answered. "For five years there has been a 3 tacked on the end of it and every time we get a ten-dollar raise the $3 remains just the same. The next time we shall beg for a $7 raise to make it come out even."

"Well, my first raise was $9.50. At last, my ambition was realized. I was making $50 a week."

"And did you stay in pictures then?" we asked, reckless, now that we had our story.

"Did any actor from the stage ever go in pictures and stay in them at first? No, I made frequent trips into stock, but every time I went back to the stage my salary was cut and every time I returned to the screen it was boosted, so finally I stayed."

"And now you're a star!"

"Yes, and that is the only thing about the whole affair that surprises me up to date. How did I get to be a star?" And paraphrasing, we answered, "The fault, dear Brutus, is in ourselves if we are not stars. You earned it, that's how. Or if you don't understand it, ask Sam Goldwyn. He knows!"

FIGHT FILM

To Save Your Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

It is Film that Ruins Them

This is why brushed teeth discolor and decay. And why old methods of cleaning have proved so inadequate.

Your teeth are covered with a slimy film. It clings to them, enters crevices and stays. That film is the cause of most tooth troubles.

The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary dentifrice does not dissolve it. So, month after month, that film remains and may do a ceaseless damage.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Also of many other troubles.

Dental science, after years of searching, has found a way to combat that film. Able authorities have proved the method by many careful tests. And now, after years of proving, leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use.

Now Sent for Home Tests

For home use this method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And a 10-Day Tube is sent without charge to anyone who asks.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

The way seems simple, but for long pepsin seemed impossible. It must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And millions of teeth are now cleaned daily in this efficient way.

Let a ten-day test show what this new way means. The results are important, both to you and yours. Compare them with results of old-time methods and you will then know what is best.

Cut out the coupon now so you won't forget.

Lewis Cody, H. V.

"Oh, yes," he said, and laughing put the cigaret in its place again.

"I'm a great believer in leaving things to chance; that is, little things," he remarked. "I never have a good time when I plan on it very far ahead. I've generally found that the best way for me to enjoy myself is to start out alone feeling grumpy and dull. Pretty soon I am likely to meet some friend who feels very much the same way. 'Where are you going?' he asks 'Nowhere,' I answer. 'Suppose we go together?' he suggests, and the result is one glad time!"

"And the big things in life?"

"Oh, chance usually takes care of them, anyhow. How many people in this room knew where they were going when they started out, do you think? Look at all the biggest names on the screen; did Chaplin think that he would be great for his comedy when all of his plans were serious ones? And Doug Fairbanks, too; wasn't it chance that showed him the thing he could do best? I believe it always happens like that: You start out to do one thing and end up by doing something entirely different."

Lew Cody, by the way, had to be argued into playing just about every good part he ever had. He did not want to get a reputation as a "heavy," which goes to show how very much there is in a name; a "heavy" could hardly hope to be a star, while a "he vamp" is a different proposition. He got the "he vamp" reputation because of his part in "For Husbands Only."

"Do I believe in marriage?" he repeated my question. "Yes, indeed I do—for other people. I think that it is a beautiful institution. But the vamp, the human butterfly type, either in man or woman, should be free, as free as possible. They simply cant rub up against the little troubles of everyday life and keep the gloss on their wings. They make perfect lovers, but impossible husbands and wives.

"For instance," he went on, "take the character I played in 'Dont Change Your Husband.' He wasn't insincere. On the contrary, he was really in love and he didn't make love to the woman in her husband's house, either. In fact, there was nothing really bad about him. He was just weak and couldn't stand up against everyday things. The very sense of irresponsibility that made him fall in love made him fall out of love again. And if, by some miracle, it were possible to make such a person sober and practical, he would probably lose all of his charm for the world."

"You think that people admire a little wickedness in their heroes?"

"I do, indeed! And in their heroines, too, so long as it isn't ugly. You know the admonition of a French mother to her child is never 'Be good,' but always 'Be pretty.' Wickedness, in the strict meaning of the word, is never pretty, so perhaps it would be more correct to say that what people want is humanity with a little dash of fun, so that they can laugh at their own faults and at the faults of others.

"That is what I hope to do with my 'vamp' stuff; I never want to lose the light, graceful tone. And that is not easy."

"Then you are working harder than you ever did?"

"N-n-o. All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy; I hate dull people and I'd hate to hate myself. Anyhow—(he was more than half in earnest)—I think that a player should to some extent, at least, live the character he is playing, in order to keep in the spirit of it. So I never want to become too serious."

singing, as tho the spring of melody within her were broken—" he pointed at the door across the hall, "yonder she grieves, lad. Go to her—"

And Stuart waited no longer, but obeyed. As he stood upon her threshold the girl outflung on the couch sat up, stared, and her hands crept to her low girl breast. "It isn't you, of course," she said in a small, shaken voice. "It couldn't be you. You are in Paris, you know."

"It is I, Hedda," Stuart whispered, for he had come close to her now, and his arms were around her hungrily. "I cant paint pictures without you—I cant even live without you. There's just one thing that matters in the whole world, and that is—will you let me stay, sweetheart?"

"But your work—" she was still afraid to believe in her joy.

"We will work together, Hedda," Stuart told her, "you are my work—you complete me. And perhaps—some day—if I work well enough, Hedda, you shall have your jewels after all!"

Her face was lighted with a solemn light. She seemed to be looking ahead, far ahead of them—"Yes, Paddie," Hedda nodded quietly, "I think—I shall—have my jewels—"

Idealist and Artist

In 1914, Mr. Tourneur was sent to this country as a producer for the American branch of the Eclair Company.

"Will you ever make another 'Blue Bird' or 'Prunella'? I asked, recalling those exquisite fabrics of dreams.

"I hope so—some day—I hope so! You know, don't you, that they were not what we call successful? Oh, I would be willing to suffer poor financial returns if such beautiful pictures would only reach the people, but they don't, for they think they do not like them.

"I left painting because it gave me more pain than enjoyment. So much beauty was lost between the brain, which conceived the idea of the picture, and the fingers which portrayed it. Just so in motion pictures, some day I will leave them because they, too, are painful. So much is lost in every picture. I find a story, I am enthusiastic. Then, there is a little lost in making the script, a little more in acting, a little in the photography, a little in my directing, and when it is all completed it is not the beautiful thing I had conceived. Human workmen can never come up to the mental pictorial perfection."

Presently he continued, "Motion pictures must move onward to the place where life seen thru an artist's mind will find expression on the screen. Suggestion must take the place of exact delineation, impressionism in place of the literal transcription, alike in motive and execution. An artist looking at a landscape does not give us an exact reproduction on his canvas, for instance, such as photography affords, but he represents it as he felt and saw it."

Suddenly wheeling around in his chair, Mr. Tourneur pointed to a picture above his desk, "This Whistler canvas does not look like nature nor is it the real thing, but it gives the impression of low tide, twilight depths, shadows cast by the old bridge across the Thames. It is as it looked to Whistler. The reality passed thru the artist's mind and he gives us the picture as it impressed him"

Earnestly, he continued, "One might look at this chair in many ways. Were I weary it would suggest a haven of rest, but were I searching for art, it would be an object of contempt. So all of life and its action can be looked at from various angles, and the picture director must be an idealist and an artist."

"The function of the film today?" I prompted, speaking softly, for the late afternoon stillness had crept into the room while we talked.

"Motion pictures must always have a theme that will make the audience laugh or cry; it may be comedy or drama, but it must never bore!"

Like all great idealists, Maurice Tourneur feels the magic waves of discontent that spurs the artist on to greater tasks. Following his own visions, he longs to share them with the whole world—if it will but see!

Food Up 85%

So statistics show at this writing, compared with pre-war cost. That's the average on common foods.

On this account, about 9 in 10 are underfed. So states a Chicago Board of Health authority.

That is, most men don't get what men must have — 3,000 calories of nutriment per day. So the facts here stated are of paramount importance.

One Cent Per Dish

Buys the Supreme Food—Quaker Oats

Quaker Oats is prepared from the greatest food that grows.

It is almost a complete food—nearly the ideal food. In energy units it yields 1810 calories per pound, while round steak yields 890.

Yet Quaker Oats costs one cent per big dish. A whole dish costs you no more than a bite of meat.

Saves You 88%

Foods are compared by calories, the energy measure of food value. A man must have at least 3,000 calories per day, a boy at least 2,000.

At this writing, some necessary foods cost as follows on this basis:

Cost Per 1000 Calories
Quaker Oats	5½c
Average Meats	45c
Eggs about	70c
Average Fish	50c
Vegetables	11c to 75c

So Quaker Oats, per 1,000 calories, costs you 88 per cent less than meats, eggs and fish on the average.

Let Quaker Oats cut down your breakfast cost. Serve the costlier foods at dinner.

Quaker Oats

With That Matchless Flavor

When you buy oats get Quaker Oats for their exquisite flavor. They are flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats. We get but ten pounds from a bushel. Don't miss this extra flavor when it costs no extra price.

friends. Well, the minute the director saw me, he asked what I could do. Knowing that my very meals depended on my answer, I replied, airily, 'Oh, anything!' just as if I knew all about acting before the camera, and because he needed my type he put me to work right away with Harry Morey in 'His Own People.' Isn't it funny how things work out? Here I had lived in Los Angeles, the very heart of motion pictures, but had scorned them as a career."

After playing with Harry Morey in a number of pictures, and also with Earle Williams, she did a couple of O. Henry stories, then went with Guy Empey where as Madame Arnot, in "Over the Top," she did such excellent work that she attracted the attention of all lovers of the screen.

"It was a great rôle," Miss Blythe declared, enthusiastically, "I felt I had created something really worth while. To me, Madame Arnot was symbolical of the women of France during the war, of their nobility in suffering and sacrificing everything for their beloved cause. I also made 'The Undercurrent,' with Mr. Empey.

"The greatest thrill of my life came one morning when the New York Telegraph had a full page picture of me. There it was staring up from every newsstand and street corner. Can you imagine what that meant to me after all my disappointments?

"Now that they are over, I'm glad to have had them. We gain very little except thru struggle. All history teaches that every step of advancement is the result of turmoil. I often wonder what upheaval accounted for Schubert's glorious melodies."

Betty Blythe had some serious ambitions for her future on the screen. Possessing a striking beauty and being able to wear her clothes to splendid advantage has caused her to be cast in many society rôles. Not caring for this type in real life she finds it hard to visualize her on the screen and hopes to have the opportunity of portraying the real woman, the one who stands for the best in all womanly qualities.

"Careers are all very well," I remarked, glancing at the various masculine photographs adorning Betty's boudoir, "but suppose love should come."

"I want it to come!" came the quick response. "I've reached the point where I long for a home and a more unselfish life," and a new warmth crept into the large, dark eyes as they lingered on one picture.

Betty laughed. "Let's go and have an ice cream soda!" she said.

THORNLESS ROSE.—What did you do with the thorns? Thanks for your good advice about not marrying so the girl will get my money. I'll take good care of that. You're right about Pearl White. If we can't make money honestly, let's make it as honestly as we can.

Every Woman has it in Her Power to be Beautiful

True, lasting beauty is not dependent upon cosmetics. It comes from the INSIDE—from the blood itself. You cannot draw it out of bottles, or jars, or boxes. A clear delicately tinted skin is the result of clean, freely circulating blood. It is within the power of every woman to possess a beautiful skin—pink, fresh, healthy and glowing with youthful vitality. THAT is the foundation of true beauty.

up against the subject of marriage and divorce, those Gold Dust twins of discussion.

Miss Swanson believes thoroly in marriage. Indeed, we strongly suspect she is about to try the problem personally.

"One of the biggest fallacies of marriage," philosophized Miss Swanson, "is the idea that a couple should be of opposite temperaments. In reality, they must have similar interests, desires and hopes.

"Each must give and take.

"There must be a basis of companionship when the glamor begins to wear thin.

"Each must allow the other plenty of leeway.

"Those are my ideas today. Of course, I revise my ideas daily. Indeed, I might have entirely different ones if you interviewed me tomorrow. You never can tell about me," admitted Miss Swanson.

All of which goes to prove that she is typically feminine above all else—feminine from the tips of her dainty slippers to the glistening hat setting at just the proper angle of effectiveness. Woman is woman—and Gloria is Gloria.

MINSTREL'S LAY
By WALTER E. MAIR

Sing me a song of the high road,
And the best road to go,
From the town with its empty laughter
To the land that I used to know;
To the land full of sun, where the meadow-lark's call
Like to silver-sweet rain on my heart used to fall.

Sing me a song of the far road,
And the road fair to see,
From the place of unending striving
To the haunts of the droning bee;
To the vale where the autumn gold gleams in the sun,
And the twilight brings peace when the day's work is done.

Sing me a song of the old road,
And the one road I know,
Where every traveler's a comrade,
And the goal of his path is the glow
Of home-keeping hearts that are waiting to give Their love to his longing, to help him to live!

Aye, sing me a song of the high road,
And the best road to go.

HIS HERO
By MINNA IRVING

Our Buddy-boy is ten years old,
His hero used to be
A private with a big black flag
Who sailed the stormy sea,
And made his captives walk the plank,
And scuttled ships, I trow,
But Buddy's changed ideals—it
Is Charlie Chaplin now.

He thought a bold bad bandit's life
Was something very fine;
I took him to a movie show—
This little chap of mine,
With smudges on his tiny lip,
A derby o'er his brow,
He imitates his hero—it
Is Charlie Chaplin now.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by E. B. Davison of New York, one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, 'most anybody can tell a story. Why can't 'most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

"The time will come," writes the same authority, "when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of playwrights, novelists, scenario, magazine and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them!" And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—armies of them—young and old, now doing mere clerical work, in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, now pounding type-writers, or standing behind counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are the Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as he did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the Imagination free rein they might have astonished the world!

But two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little concentration and the thing that looks hard turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. The greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seeing all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the fitful and jet-sam of Life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening.

Even one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would do a story at all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you'd be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write? Who says you can't?"

Listen! A wonderful free book has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold-mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you are a writer. How to develop your "story fancy," weave clever word-pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of Failure. How to win!

This surprising book is absolutely free. No charge. No obligation. Your copy is waiting for you. Write for it now. Get it. It's yours. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing. The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular job. Who says you can't make "easy money" with your brain! Who says you can't turn your Thoughts into cash! Who says you can't make your dreams come true! Nobody knows—but the book will tell you.

So why waste any more time wondering, dreaming, waiting? Simply fill out the coupon below—you're not buying anything, you're getting it absolutely free. girls would 'go mad' over. I also recognized the great opportunity it offered to further my knowledge of the dramatic art and it was with the happiest little thrill, that I signed my name to the contract.

"That little thrill of happiness," states Miss Du Pre, "has constantly grown in intensity because the work with Miss Pickford has been glorious. I have learnt more about the ways of children from Miss Pickford, in watching her portray them and in emulating her portrayals, than I ever could have learnt in a lifetime from watching real children in real life."

Speaking of her remarkable similarity to Miss Pickford, Miss Du Pre said: "Our resemblance is almost uncanny. Not only in general outward appearance but in most every detail of form and figure. One day Miss Pickford and I stood before a mirror and made minute comparisons. We compared our height, the length and shape of our arms, legs and feet, and all of our measurements are identical. There is a difference in certain small lines and in certain lights, but they are of little moment and I guess that I am, as I have been so often told, Miss Pickford's 'double' in real life as well as professionally."

Even without make-up and the characteristic curls, Miss Du Pre's resemblance is remarkable and when made up and dressed as Miss Pickford, the illusion is astounding. So much so, in fact, that on the first day that the cast was called for a dress rehearsal of "Pollyanna" and before Miss Du Pre had been officially introduced to all of Miss Pickford's company, a lady appeared on the "set" and placing her arms about Miss Du Pre's shoulders, started to discuss a private Pickford matter. When Miss Du Pre halted the speaker and referred her to the real Miss Pickford, the lady stepped back confused and wild-eyed, and then stammered in her amazement. "Why!" she gasped, "Mary and I are cousins, I have lived with her constantly for the past ten years—and I thought you were she." Then the speaker, Miss Benson, rubbed her eyes and just stared—first at Miss Du Pre and then at Miss Pickford, who sat a few feet away laughing at her cousin's confusion.

With "two" Mary Pickfords at the studio, things began to happen even before the production of "Pollyanna" was actually started. The first incident occurred on the very first day of her engagement and it reminded Miss Du Pre of the story of "The Prince and the Pauper."

She had been called to the pretty little bungalow, that Miss Pickford uses as a dressing-room, for the purpose of trying on Miss Pickford's clothes and there with the shades drawn, she arrayed herself in the wardrobe of the star, as Miss Pickford, disrobing in the bathroom, handed each garment thru the partly opened door.

How to give a Dry
Rough Skin a Smooth
Satinny Texture...

Use Tissue Cream—
"One of the Seven"

The normal skin is fresh in coloring—fine in texture—soft, pliable and provided with enough natural oil to keep the surface moist and free from any tendency to wrinkle. If your skin is dry and rough, it is lacking in natural oil.

Stop use of soap and water on the face and instead use Tissue Cream for the purpose of cleaning. This cream removes the dirt and grime imbedded in the pores and leaves the dry skin refreshed and ready for an application of nourishing Tissue Cream.

A Dry Skin Is a Hungry Skin

—it craves a liberal supply of an oily preparation. Tissue Cream has been compounded for this particular purpose and may be used not only at night for massage, but at any time during the day that the skin feels dry and drawn.

New Method Makes Music
Amazingly Easy to Learn

Learn to Play or Sing—Every Step Made Simple as A B C

TRY IT ON APPROVAL

Entire Cost Only a Few Cents a Lesson—and Nothing Unless Satisfied

How often have you wished that you knew how to play the violin or piano—or whatever your favorite instrument may be—or that you could take part in singing?

How many an evening's pleasure has been utterly spoiled and ruined by the admission "I can't sing," or "No, I am sorry, but I can't play."

And now—at last—this pleasure and satisfaction that you have so often wished for can easily be added to your daily life.

No need to join a class. No need to pay a dollar or more per lesson to a private teacher. Neither the question of time nor expense is any longer a bar—every one of the obstacles that have been confining your enjoyment to mere listening have now been removed.

My method of teaching music by mail—in your spare time at home, with no strangers around to embarrass you—makes it amazingly easy to learn to sing by note or to play any instrument.

You don't need to know the first thing about music to begin—don't need to know one note from another. My method takes out all the hard part—overcomes all the difficulties—makes your progress easy, rapid and sure.

Whether for an advanced pupil or a beginner, my method is a revolutionary improvement over the old methods used by private teachers. The lessons I send you explain every point and show every step in simple Print-and-Picture form that you can't go wrong on—every step is made as clear as A B C.

My method is as thorough as it is easy. I teach you the only right way—teach you to play or sing by note. No "trick" music, no "numbers," no makeshifts of any kind.

I call my method "new"—simply because it is so radically different from the old and hard-to-understand ways of teaching music. But my method is thoroughly time tried and proven. Over 225,000 successful pupils—from boys and girls of 7 to 8 to men and women of 70—are the proof. Largely through the recommendations of satisfied pupils, I have built up the largest school of music in the world.

To prove what I say, you can take any course on trial—singing or any instrument you prefer—and judge entirely by your own progress. If for any reason you are not satisfied with the course or with what you learn from it, then it won't cost you a single penny. I guarantee satisfaction. On the other hand, if you are pleased with the course, the total cost amounts to only a few cents a lesson, with your music and everything also included. When learning to play or sing is so easy, why continue to confine your enjoyment of music to mere listening? Why not at least let me send you my free book that tells you all about my methods? I know you will find this book absorbingly interesting, simply because it shows you how easy it is to turn your wish to play or sing into an actual fact. Just now I am making a special short-time offer that cuts the cost per lesson in two—send your name now, before this special offer is withdrawn. No obligation—simply use the coupon or send your name and address in a letter or on a post-card. Instruments supplied when needed, cash or credit.

At that moment, Paul Powell, Miss Pickford's director, passed by the bungalow and seeing thru the open window what he supposed to be the person of his star, he stopped and called in—"Good morning, Miss Pickford"—The startled look of amazement that spread over the director's face, as his greeting was answered—from the depths of the bathroom—and not from the person before him, was a comical but eloquent compliment to Miss Pickford's selection of an understudy.

Then the thought came to Miss Du Pre, that here in real life was the theme of "The Prince and the Pauper," staged in a bungalow instead of a palace, but just as alluring in its fanciful possibilities. Dressed in these "magic" clothes and standing in the lucky shoes of the great star, she seemed enchanted and in imagination she conjured the adventure that would befall them, if she retained the wardrobe and assumed the identity of the famous star, and Miss Pickford went off into the world carrying the raiment and the name of her newly acquired understudy.

After this incidents of mistaken identity followed thick and fast. Each day had its complement of humorous situations. Visitors to the studio approached Miss Du Pre with expressions of pleasure at the supposed honor of meeting "the star"—and on "locations" in and about Los Angeles, where the exterior scenes were made, spectators bowed and spoke to her, fully confident that they were addressing Miss Pickford.

Out in the little town of Norwalk, California, where several scenes were made. Miss Du Pre arrived in her car considerably ahead of Miss Pickford—and as she waited, a crowd of several hundred children gathered and stood wide-eyed—as they nudged each other and whispered—"That's Mary Pickford." Then several of them got together, held a whispered conference and scampered off. Soon they returned carrying an old and badly soiled candy box containing some candy, purchased by their contribution of several cents, and this they presented to Miss Du Pre with the statement: "Please take this, Miss Pickford, because we like you."

The incident was "so cute" and "so pathetically sincere," said Miss Du Pre, that she refrained from disillusioning the children and was greatly relieved when they went off to school before the arrival of Miss Pickford.

Even the old station master at the Santa Fé Depot at South Pasadena came in for his share of wonderment. This venerable railroader, who has studied the faces of hosts of travelers, was nonplussed. A scene was made on the station platform and while waiting for things to be made ready, Miss Pickford and her understudy perched themselves on a big shipping case and sat there in animated conversation.

You Can't Teach Piano by Correspondence, Dr. Quinn

Many people told me this, when I first started OVER TWENTY-FIVE YEARS AGO.

But now, after more than a quarter century of steady growth, and with my successful graduates scattered all over the world, this "old-fogy" prejudice against learning by mail has nearly vanished.

I now have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. There isn't a State in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players of piano or organ who obtained their entire training from me. They learned in quarter the usual time and at quarter the usual cost. I will gladly refer you to any number who will soon convince you of the excellent results they gained from my instruction. My free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ," will interest and inform you. But don't send for it if you're afraid of being convinced.

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of finger gymnastics. When you do go to the keyboard, you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition—usually a "night-mare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DEX. Quinn-Dex is a simple hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DEX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others, and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better: at any price. You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any Course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

"Married!" Bob was plainly hurt. "My Gawd, Marie, how'd it happen? You know I always sort of meant to marry you myself. Who's the lucky stiff that came under the wire ahead? Is it Ted O'Keefe, that used to do the song-and-dance with you, or Rufus?"

Marie saw that she had said considerably more than enough. She changed the subject to vaudeville again, and Bob, knowing that matrimony is a dangerous and sore subject with most of its victims, considerably did not follow it up. But he did not forget. And when, the very next afternoon, he pushed open the door of Polly's studio and therein beheld Marie and a handsome young fellow in close juxtaposition before an easel upon which stood a painting which in nowise seemed to justify their interest, and when, moreover, he saw Marie lean forward and just brush the hair of the handsome young fellow with a kiss, and when, lastly and likewise, he had seen the young fellow turn ardently and seize her hand and draw her down to him, he leaped to a naïve conclusion.

"Give us a knockdown to your hubby, Marie!" he demanded, jovially, and then, to the purpling Ernest, "I'd ought to be sore at you, Bo, but take it from me, you've picked a peach! When Marie told me yesterday that she was married, believe me, it give lil' ol' John W. Me a jolt right where he lived, but I——"

Then he paused, for the first time realizing the chill and rarefied atmosphere of silence that surrounded him. Marie's face was scarlet, Ernest's very white. Bob was not subtle, but something seemed to whisper to him that he had blundered.

He took his exit as gracefully as possible, leaving two who regarded one another coldly. "And so," said Ernest, rather tremendously, "and so you, a married woman, have allowed another man to make love to you!"

Marie blazed forth at this. "And you," she asked, "had you the right to make love to me? Why, for all that I know, you may be married, too!"

He wilted like a punctured balloon, all his rage oozing from him. He stammered piteously, but she was merciless. Writhing, he confessed. "I've been a brute—a cad! Why did I ever come to this accursed part of town, where people wear loose clothes and loose morals? And she's so sweet—so good——"

Marie thrust her vivid young face close, daring him. The fragrance of her was warm in his nostrils, the golden gleams dazzled his eyes. "Tell me," she whispered, "is she young—and pretty? Look at me, Ernest—and tell me."

He wrenched his gaze from her effortfully. "She is good—and I—I love her!" he said doggedly, and got to his feet, defying her, tho unconsciously his arms went out hungrily to the youth of her, the splendid, quick young loveliness. "I'm going back to my wife—I shall never see you again! Good-by!"

But still she had no mercy. "Tell me—before you go," she dared him, "tell me that you never want to see me again."

He tried to say the words, but his dry lips refused to shape them. In his gaze was confession, but he was still man enough to go, and the door closed behind the tragic young figure. Marie laughed shakily. The sound stumbled over a sob. "He's splendid and I'm a wicked woman." She sprang across to Polly's clothes-press, disguised meagerly with cubist cretonne, and rummaged. Among the bedraggled smocks, the smeary batik, the wool-embroidered, the stenciled, she found one comparatively new white one, dragged it down and began to tear at the fastenings of her own.

"I've got to look pretty—enough to make him forgive me," she sobbed, as she worked. "Oh, I'm afraid—afraid!"

To Ernest Lismore, sitting dully in his study, staring at broken pictures in the mocking flames, came the sound of little, light feet that he had learnt to know. He looked up guiltily as his old little wife came into the room and stood by his chair, patting his rough, dark head gently. "Boy," she said, "boy, I've been thinking, wondering. Perhaps it's time for me to free you, Ernie. I've thought that you looked troubled lately. Tell me, boy, are you in love? Remember I'm your grandmother and tell me all about her."

"Oh, you're wonderful!" choked Ernest, and caught at the kind little hand. "You know everything! I didn't mean to, honest! It just happened—she's little, like you, and she has hair like a dark spring night trimmed with stars!"

And he went on in breathless, stumbling words, in flaming young phrases, foolish young similes, to tell of his love for the paint-smeared little artist he had met in the Dawn galleries. When, a long time after he had begun speaking, he stopped abruptly, there was a space of silence. "I—suppose you can never—forgive me," Ernest faltered.

"Forgive you!" a voice echoed in his ear, throbbing, beating like a heart.

Amazed, he looked down at the little white-clad figure that had slipped to the floor at his feet, and suddenly he cried out, unbelievably, "You! Not—you? Was it—you, all the time?" for she had lifted the piled grey hair with a revealing gesture and flung it from her own.

"It was I—all the time," Marie answered, and suddenly her look quickened to that of some prophetess. "Ernest, it wasn't all acting. When a woman loves a man, she loves him because he's her hero, and because he's her protector, and because he's her lover—and, most of all, because he's really her little boy, Ernie. Still—her lips grew mischievous—"still, sir, if you're dissatisfied with your wife, of course I'll stick to my agreement——"

"My wife!" said Ernest Lismore, and he said it like a prayer. "My wife," and this time it was like a poem. "My wife!" and he stooped to sweep her up in his strong, hungry arms.

LEARN DRAFTING

at home in spare time as you would in actual practice. Men and women in great demand for permanent positions as mechanical draftsmen. Crooked Spines Made Straight

Thousands of Remarkable Cases

An old lady, 72 years of age, who suffered for many years, and was absolutely helpless, found relief. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding his wheel and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing at the house, for wearing Philo Burt's Auslander in—how different from the old-fashioned plaster, leather or steel jackets.

30 Days' Trial

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, comfortable and really adjusted the Philo Burt Auslander is—how different from the old-fashioned plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate this remedy. Price within reach of all.

AN APOLOGY AND AN EXPLANATION

On October 1st, 1919, practically all of the printers and typesetters in and around New York went out on strike, including those who print this magazine. Without going into the merits of the controversy between the employers and the employees, we will simply say that we had no voice in the matter one way or the other. Several labor unions had differences among themselves, and these differences caused the Publishers' Association to refuse to comply with the demands of certain labor unions. We do not belong to the Publishers' Association. That body conducted all the negotiations. When the printers and compositors walked out, it was not in our power to make them walk back, even if we had been willing to give them everything they asked. Had we terms with one union, another union would have refused to handle our paper, and another union would have refused to make the plates which are necessary for us to have. In other words, our hands were tied. We were helpless. Some publications were fortunate enough to have some of their printing done for them in distant cities, some had it done by some other process (such as typewriting photographed) and some could not have their work done at all. The strike did not end until the latter part of November, having lasted nearly two months.

During this time we did everything possible to supply our readers with this, their favorite magazine, on time and in good condition, but such was not possible. We left no stone unturned and were willing to go to any expense, but in spite of every effort, we were unable to meet the schedule, hence we were late. Furthermore, the magazine that you received was not the one we intended to give you. When the strike came on, this magazine was partly made up and partly printed, but we were unable to move either the type or the parts that had been printed. We managed to get out a MAGAZINE, but it was not the kind of magazine we wanted, it was the best we could. We could not even print an explanation and an apology, hence this one. We hoped, and still believe, that all of our esteemed readers, even those in distant parts, had heard of the great tie-up strike and that they would patiently wait. Some of our contemporaries took advantage of our extremities by issuing extra large editions on an advanced date, hoping thereby to secure some of our readers, instead of extending us the brotherly hand and saying, "Is there anything we can do for you in your distress?" We hope that they have largely profited by their business sagacity, but we believe that we have not lost a single reader. Once a reader always a reader.

We are now fully recovered from the disaster and from now on our readers may expect the finest magazine possible. We have done this for ten years and we can do it now. WATCH US.

Get The JOY Out OF LIFE

STRONGFORT
The Perfect Man

What's the good of living at all, if Life is just one miserable day after another, full of discomfort and failure, often of actual suffering? You can't enjoy life, or make a success of anything, while you are undeveloped, weak, ailing; a sickly growth whom nobody wants to help along or even have around. When you wake up in the morning with a rotten taste in your mouth and a weight in your chest; with your brain woozy and your nerves all on edge, tired out before you even begin the day, YOU ARE IN A BAD WAY.

Forty per cent of Americans, it is estimated, die before their time, of PREVENTABLE diseases. Nobody knows how many men and women break down in early and middle life and live out years of miserable uselessness in the scrap-heaps of wornout humanity.

Put Your Human Machine in Order

Dyspepsia, indigestion, biliousness, constipation, nervousness, and a host of other ailments are simply signs that your internal machinery is not running right—that REPAIRS ARE NEEDED—fresh blood, new and vigorous body and brain tissues. It isn't the discomforts you suffer from such chronic ailments that is important: it's the serious internal condition that they indicate. Heed those warnings of Nature. Make the needed repairs before it is too late. You never will be well and strong and capable until you do. You will get worse—each day—until the final collapse or breakdown comes. That is the Law of Nature. There's no dodging or getting away from the penalty she exacts when her warnings are not considered.

Make Yourself Fit

You can do it, if you will only make up your mind to get out of the way of putting the matter off "until tomorrow" and begin at once to Build Up yourself. Nature has implanted in every human organism a wonderful revivifying, revitalizing force, which she will exert to the utmost when you learn her methods and observe her laws. Patent medicines won't put you right. Druggist's dope won't do you any good. Pills and powders may give you a little temporary relief and stimulation, but they won't eradicate the CAUSE of your troubles, and when the inevitable reaction comes you will be even worse off than before.

Let Me Show You Nature's Way

I have spent my life studying Nature's methods of building up and revitalizing wornout, broken-down humanity. Her laws are fixed, immutable, absolute, operating on every individual alike. I KNOW what they can and will do for YOU, through my own experience and that of thousands of my pupils, who came to me weak, ailing, discouraged, and are now strong, well, able, ambitious men and women. It makes no difference what your present condition is: it makes no difference whether or not it was caused by your own early indiscretions or excesses. Let me show you the straight, sure path back to health and strength and happiness. It's Nature's way, and there's no more doubt about the operations of Nature in the human frame than there is of the daily rising and setting of the sun. I GUARANTEE to improve your condition 100 per cent, if you will only WILL to build yourself up and follow my methods for a few months.

It will tell you all about Strongfortism, the Science of gaining and maintaining vitality and vigor in Nature's way—NOT through any iron-clad courses of muscle-tiring exercises, starvation diets or any other fanciful fads—but by Living Life as Nature meant it to be lived, and thereby getting the greatest enjoyment out of it. Write now for a copy of "Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy." It will tell you what Strongfortism will do for YOU, if you will devote fifteen or twenty minutes a day to it, in the privacy of your own chamber, if you like. Don't put off sending for it. IT'S FREE. I'll send you the book, sure path to you, as you will see when you have read it. De Miracle
Every Woman's Depilatory

Remove Hair
the Common-sense Way

IF merely removing hair from the surface of the skin were all that were required of a depilatory, a razor would solve the superfluous hair problem. De Miracle, the original sanitary liquid, does more than remove surface hair. It de-vitalizes it, which is the only common-sense way to remove hair from face, neck, arms, under-arms or limbs. De Miracle requires no mixing. It is ready for instant use. Simply wet the hair and it is gone. Only genuine De Miracle has a money back guarantee in each package. FREE BOOK with testimonials of eminent physicians, surgeons, dermatologists and medical journals, explains how De Miracle de-vitalizes hair, mailed in plain sealed envelope on request.

"The ANSWER MAN"

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

OPAL B.—A little late, but better late than never. Those striking printers certainly did play havoc with our schedule. Never mind, we expect to be out on time with the next issue. Be patient. I haven't the boy's name in "The Delicious Little Devil."

TALMADGE FAN.—My thanks, you flatter me. My wit might be more appealing but that Shakespeare, Butler and Bacon have rendered it extremely difficult for all who come after them to be sublime, witty or profound. However, I'll do my best. Write to our Sales Department, and not to me, please, about all matters concerning back copies, subscriptions, etc.

FROM MR. PLEASANT.—Oh, how do you do! Yes, I have just had a birthday, but I hope to advise you during 1920—never too old to be an Answer Man. I rarely look back, but always keep looking ahead. Some people spend their lives in reasoning on the past, in complaining of the present, and in trembling for the future. Ruth Roland in "Hands Up," and Jean Sothorn in "The Mysteries of Mira."

C. RAY.—Fiat lux means "Let there be light." Mae Murray is playing in "The A B C of Love," released thru Pathé. Corinne Griffith is playing in "The Tower of Jewels." Why, I very seldom get down to Vitagraph. Ah ha, so you like little Marguerite de la Motte, and think she is a "pippin." I think so too, but I confess I don't know what a pippin is. So you like the MAGAZINE better than the CLASSIC.

DIXIE DEE.—Sure I have whiskers like a Turkish pasha, but I never wear a muffler in the winter time, nor do I carry a muff, nor do I ice-skate to and from the office. Dorothy Gish in "Betty of Greystone" opposite Owen Moore. You say you know something about the markets and the way of the dollar, but all I know about women is that they are good to have. And you come along and say that Wallace Reid is the handsomest man in the world. Have you seen them all? Come in again and see me.

COMING AUTHOR.—Well now, come right along. There's room for one more. You say you have written a scenario and ask how much it is worth. That's not the question. It is, How much will it bring? Take what you can get and be thankful. Write for a list of the manufacturers.

MIAMI B.—Well, there is one thing that people bring to the table, and cut, but do not eat, and which should never be brought to the table at all—a pack of cards. Card-playing is a terrible waste of time and brings no benefits. Marjorie Wilson played in "Mountain Dew" and William Elliott in "When We Were Twenty-one." And now Lillian Walker will play in "$1,000,000 Reward," a serial, produced by Grossman Pictures, Inc., Ithaca.

MINNIE F. L. AUBURN.—Oh, you have Auburn hair? I am always glad to hear from architects. I am one myself. I am the architect of my own fortune, but I confess that I have made a bad job of it so far. But what can one do on nine dollars a week? I went into this business nine years ago without a cent in my pocket and I've got it yet. Oh, how could I forget you, Minnie!

G. E. W.—Why, turning a woman's head is as easy as missing a train if you know how. Is Conway Tearle married? Witness prefers not to answer on the ground that he is not sure about it this minute. Mississippi was the first, Virginia second, Kentucky third, South Carolina fourth to ratify the amendment for prohibition. Even Kentucky!

PEGGY ADAIR.—I thank you, fair lady, for the cigars, but with all due respect and gratitude, I must inform you that I knew they were purchased by a woman. You say they had Connecticut wrappers? I believe you; they tasted like some kind of rags. An artist tells me that old wrappers make excellent rags. No, Mrs. Adolph Zukor is not a player. She's a producer's wife. Write to me again.

M. T.—Of course I eat fish. If I have plenty of mackerel for breakfast, I can usually make the other two meals out of cold water. Virginia Brown, one of the winners in the Fame and Fortune Contest, has changed her name to Virginia Faire, and has signed a five years' contract with Universal, involving some $85,000. Pretty good start, eh? Antonio Moreno in his new serial, "Smashing Barriers."

LILY B.—My dear, no human creature gives his admiration for nothing; either the eye must be charmed, or the understanding gratified. And that is the way of the world. Yes, Elmo Lincoln in "Tarzan." Why, haven't you heard of a varnish tree? There is the black varnish tree and the Japan varnish tree.

MISS MANDA.—You question my statement that I am a self-made man, because if I had made myself I would have put more hair on my head. Well, I put it on my chin instead. Be off with you. Alice Brady's latest picture is "The Fear Market," which was produced a couple of years ago on Broadway.

HELEN.—Yes, Alice Joyce was in New Orleans taking "The Sporting Duchess." Ben Wilson and Neva Gerber are producing a second serial, "The Screaming Shadow." Somebody must like these serials. Of course I lie down to sleep, do you think I am a horse? Speaking of horses, they show their anger by retracting their ears. Did you notice mine retract?

GEORGE L.—If you want your letters answered in the CLASSIC, please be sure to put "CLASSIC" at the top of your letter. Dolores Cassinelli is playing in "The Web of Deceit." Herbert Rawlinson is starring in 8 two-reel detective features. J. Warren Kerrigan in "The Lord Loves the Irish," and I guess He does, or He wouldn't have made so many of them. So you want to see Anna Little on the cover and an interview with Clara Williams.

MARJORIE M.—Chickens, no, no, the incubator was known to China and Egypt first—in the very early period. The smallest British possession is Gibraltar, and the largest is Canada. You know there must be a beginning. Don't know why you are afraid to write to me. I won't hurt you. The more the merrier. Yes, Frankie Lee is a bright child. Billie Burke did not play in her stage play on Christmas Day. She spent the day with Patricia.

but it is the Doorway to Success in Photoplay Writing

If you have normal intelligence and the energy to open the door

If you have story ideas and want money, the richest market in the world today is the photoplay market.

You could sell a thousand good photoplays this minute at from $200 to $2,000—if you could get them read.

There is a special language in which photoplays are written. It is called a "technique." Manuscripts which do not follow the rules of this technique might just as well be written in Chinese.

The men and women who are making money by photoplay writing today are not geniuses. They have learned the language of the studios—some of them through the Palmer Plan, some of them in the much tougher school of experience.

The Palmer Plan teaches the technique of photoplay writing. You can study the Palmer Plan in your spare time at home.

If you want endorsements of the Palmer Plan, we can show you enough letters from successful Palmer students to amaze you.

But that is not the point. The point is that when you have finished with the Palmer Plan, you will be equipped to sell photoplays. You will have learned to write the language of the screen as well as any living person.

In brief, the Palmer Plan does three things: It gives you a complete, workmanlike picture and explanation of studio methods. It gives you professional criticism—painstaking, honest, accurate. And if your photoplay is good, it will sell it for you.

The coupon at the top of this page is not an Aladdin's lamp. It will not accomplish miracles. It will not hand you thousand-dollar checks on a platter. But it will reveal to you the simple formula which has enabled others to make their energies worth much more than they dreamed of. This isn't reckless advertising talk; it is a considered statement.

Send coupon to us. It will bring you a book—"The Secret of Successful Photoplay Writing"—which will tell you much more than we have room for here. The book is free.

Wanted SCREEN FACES FOR THE MOVIES

Your photograph will be placed on exhibition where the casting directors can see it. You may have the screen features for which they are seeking.

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for screen aspirants everywhere to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live or whether you are considered good looking, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen faces."

We register your name with our theatrical agency, controlled exclusively by us, and place your photograph in our files, where the casting director can see it.

We do not teach "movie" acting. Roy Sheldon, famous director, says: "I would rather employ those without experience, and I consider now the opportune time for those who want to get in." P. A. Powers of Universal says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, just off the press, which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, history and portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

On With the Dance

staling on him, opened a dancing palace and sent the masked dancer off to a sensational success.

Sonia loved it, especially at first. She feasted upon the adulation, personal, press and otherwise. She rioted in furs and jewels and the things she had hungered for since she had danced, half-naked, on her native steppes. It was all rich food to a part of her long lean with deprivation.

Other things, of course, were more involved. Van Vechtan, incidentally, acquired two deep lines on his brow where lines had not been before. Peter grew more silent and more morose, retired more than ever to himself. He was out a great deal of the time with Joan, doing settlement work and reading things Sonia did not nor would not understand. When he was at home he was utterly abstracted, felt utterly stifled. Joan was the air he needed to breathe in order to live. Sonia and her heavy atmospheres stifled him. He grew to know how bitterly a man sins against himself when he does not play true with himself, with the greatest urge within him.

Under a surface all roses and smiles and discreetness and silences and abstractions, something ugly and sinister rankled and grew apace. Peter became insistent as to the source of Sonia's plutocratic apparel. He knew it did not come from him, even tho his income from the terminal plans had become a solid one. He knew that Van Vechtan was simply making her the simple allowance he had given her when she first came to her father and to him, adequate only for her studies and simple attire. Because he honestly did not very much care in any essential sense he did not press the matter for a while. Van Vechtan did, and Sonia, curled up on a couch, told him all about it. "It's gorgeous fun," she said, in conclusion.

Van Vechtan sighed. The sigh came from his traditions and his dreams, never quite the same, always a bit disturbed since this girl had come over the waters, bringing with her new flavors, a hint of new desires.

"You are a mystery as you are, Sonia," he told her. "Why try to exploit it all—for the mob? Reserve is the last of the arts, and the finest. Why not live more for Peter, more for the things you can take with you into the softer years? The adulation of the mob—they are a wolf-pack, snarling for fresh meat. They will reject you and cast you out. They will forget you."

"I will reject them and cast them out, too," Sonia said; "they are a toy to me, also. I will forget them. Anyway, what does tomorrow matter? Or yesterday? It is the present that matters. It is today. Death and forgetfulness make mockeries of past and future."

"You are imbibing," sighed Van Vechtan, "the tin-pan philosophy of Jimmie utherland. I suppose you've got to earn. What a weary cycle it all is!"

Of course, sensationalism stepped in and smashed the whole rotting structure to the mud, from which, only with great pain and labor, anything whole and adequate was made again.

Peter came home one night, straight from Joan, to find Sonia dancing an abandoned sort of a thing for Jimmie Sutherland. All the satyr in Sutherland was on the surface. It was repellent. Peter created a scene, justifiably enough, and only Sonia's really desperate pleading saved the studio from being the scene of God knows what horror.

After it was over, Sonia packed her bags and departed. "I dont know what it's all about," she said, "but I know that I cant stand it, any of it. You've never loved me, Peter. I think some of the cause is in that."

A week later Peter followed her to the dancing palace, and so did Jimmie Sutherland's discarded Fay Desmond. The papers had the whole thing in detail the next morning. Fay Desmond tore the mask from the masked dancer, denouncing her, Sutherland leaped to the rescue and then, clean as a lance, past the lot of them, a slender man, white and murderous, cleaved thru the crowd—and Jimmie Sutherland lay under a smoking gun held by Peter Derwynt.

It was an equally sensational trial. The component parts were splendid as copy—the famous masked dancer; Schuyler Van Vechtan, unapproachable in the assault of all approaches; Peter, an odd murderer in his remote and white asceticism; the desperate-looking Fay Desmond, with the odd air about her of petrified vitality, almost as tho frozen; the name of the wealthy Jimmie Sutherland, whom wealth had turned, it seemed, from a ruddy, honest pork-packer into a satyr, horridly stalking.

The trial reached its climax when Sonia, slender and vastly different, all in black and utterly composed, took the stand. She told the jury, very simply, without any sort of affectation or apology or ostentation, that she had been Jimmie Sutherland's mistress because she craved the luxuries of life and her husband could not give them to her. "He found it out," she said, in conclusion, "so he killed him."

Peter was acquitted. He had done, of course, the justifiable thing. He had merely killed the thing rotting the decent foundation of his home. One could do no more, it seemed; no less.

He went to Sonia and thanked her—for telling the truth.

"Naturally," Sonia said to him, her small hand, a frozen thing, stiff in his formal touch, "naturally, Peter, I would—tell the truth. I've always done that—at least."

"It was a hard truth to tell," Peter said, "but it was big, Sonia. You might have done much less."

Surprises

You Can Serve With Bubble Grains

Some morning serve Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs in this way:

After crisping, douse with melted butter. Then add your cream and sugar.

It will taste like a dish of confections. And men enjoy it just as much as children.

Add Puffed Rice to your fruit dish—any fruit. Fruit tastes best with some flimsy crust. That's why we have pies, tarts and short-cakes.

These fragile, nut-like bubbles add that crust. After a test you will never omit them.

For supper, float rafted Wheat in milk. These are whole-wheat bubbles toasted. They are four times as porous as bread.

Children need whole wheat. They need the minerals in the outer coats. Served in this way they will revel in it.

After school surprise the children with these tidbits:

Douse Corn Puffs or Puffed Rice with melted butter. Let them eat like popcorn. Children can eat these grain dainties to their hearts' content—they so easily digest.

Scatter Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs like nut-meats on ice cream. A famous restaurant in Chicago first suggested this.

Puffed Rice is also used like nut-meats in home candy making—to make the candy porous, light and nutty.

Puffed Wheat	Puffed Rice	Corn Puffs
Also Puffed Rice Pancake Flour

All steam exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. Every food cell blasted by Professor Anderson's process, so digestion is easy and complete.

These are the greatest grain foods in existence and you should know them all.

Like Pancakes Made With Nuts

Now we make a pancake flour containing ground Puffed Rice. It makes the pancakes fluffy and gives a nut-like flavor. The flour is self-raising, so you simply add milk or water. You never tasted pancakes such as folks make with Puffed Rice Pancake Flour.

"I agree with you there," she said. Peter felt, curiously, that she was flame grown ice. It was somehow tragic. It made of Sonia something he had not suspected. Vaguely he felt uncomfortable. He knew that he was in the face of unshrouded pain.

Later he went away with Joan to await the time when the peace they had all but lost could come to them, too wise now to let it evade them, however and whatever the price they might have to give.

Sonia left the courtroom alone. She walked. She walked a long way, toward the river. She remembered hearing that a lot of "crazy foreigners" went that way when the things of life became too much for them. She laughed aloud, but not bitterly. She was too tired for bitterness, too tired for anything save relief that she was alone and that there remained so simple a solution as slipping her dreary body into enveloping waters, lapping ever so gently against the green docks. Of course, it was very cold, she supposed, and very dirty. But then so was she cold, terribly cold and dirty, too, she thought, all stained and scarred . . .

She had only wanted to live, too. There had been no evil intent in her heart, not any more than there had been when she had wanted, so vividly, to dance, back in her native village. And she had danced. She had danced here, too. She had danced her soul into flames and her body into the river. It was all very odd. Very inexplicable. Things one could not understand invariably hurt one. It was a blunting, blowing sense. One groped, sly, too, who had so greatly loved the dear ozone, the winged ether, the altitudes where one could see far horizons with an untrammelled vision.

All at once something took hold of her. Something warm. A human hand. She had never expected to feel warm again. Some one drew her very close and, as if knowing her to be cold despite her own furs, enveloped her in a great coat he was wearing himself. It was Van Vechtan.

"My child," he was murmuring, ever so tenderly, "my child . . . my child . . ." Sonia found herself crying against him, against the beating of his heart, his true heart. He had, it seemed to her, walked suddenly from out of the twilight and was standing, fully, in the sun.

"Come home, my love," he said. The maid helped him and he made her comfortable. He eased her tired body and her tired soul and quelled the sorry fluttering of her heart. He bade her know that love might be a torch held high against the heavens, unquenchable, eternal. He took her in his arms and rocked her to and fro. He taught her a new lesson, a new faith. Once, half wakeful, she whispered to him, "Of course, I lied . . . to Peter . . . about Jimmie . . ."

"Of course," he whispered back. Still later she crept closer to him. Her lips, white petals now, moved, tonelessly. He bent closer to catch what she said. "I have come home, my love," was what he heard.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator $.75
- M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads $.75
- M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair $.50
- M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan $1.00
- M. T.'s Minerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream" $.75

The old station master knew that Miss Pickford and her company were coming there that morning and he was all expectation. His expectations were more than realized when he came out of his little office and beheld "two" Mary Pickfords instead of one.

He circled about the pair and surveyed them in every detail—from curl-bedecked heads to identical "Pollyanna" homespun short frock, plain cotton stockings and tiny well-worn shoes. He took distance views from the front, rear and sides. Then he tightened the circle and looked his fill at close range and punctuated his glances from each angle, with a perplexed scratch of his head.

Then he waited his opportunity and when the "two" Pickfords separated for a moment, he hurried over to Miss Du Pre and plied her with a "million" questions. He asked where she had been born and where Miss Pickford hailed from, and if there existed any relationship between them. But the answers only perplexed him the more and learning that Miss Du Pre came from Atlanta, Georgia, while Miss Pickford came from Toronto, Canada, he gave up the effort to solve the "mystery" and resumed his work with the remark—typical of a railroad man—"cant understand how two people can come from such widely separated points and look alike."

Then to the studio came such celebrities as Mrs. McAdoo and Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, where they met Miss Du Pre and were amazed at the duplication of the little "Queens of the Screen." And the furore she created in the studio extended even to the wise ones of the profession, to those men and women long associated with the business of making motion pictures and used to the surprises of the motion picture stage.

There was Tom Gerrity, the scenario writer and veteran motion picture man, when he beheld star and understudy together, for the first time, he looked, rubbed his eyes, and looked again and then pleaded: "Tell me quick—which is which—or send for a doctor."

And all thru the excitement, Miss Du Pre has retained her usual poise, with not the slightest sign of being spoiled by the flattery and the official appointment of being "just like Mary." "Of course, it is very wonderful to be associated with Miss Pickford," she said, "but I detest imitators and I have no desire to imitate Miss Pickford in any way, other than as her understudy. Miss Pickford is a master of the art of silent expression and in my present position I feel like a student taking a post-graduate course."

Louise Du Pre has played on the stage for several years, but has always played dramatic-ingénue rôles—parts far removed from the "child" characters essayed by Miss Pickford. She is a Southern girl with a convent education, and altho only five feet in height, she likes to dress her hair back and appear "grown up."

incidentally giving it a happy ending. Conrad's tale of the exile, Axel Heyst, and the girl from a wandering tropical orchestra upon the lonely Pacific isle is touched here and there by Mr. Tourneur's camera, but not by the scenario. "Victory" singularly disappointed us, for we suggested the tragic tale to Mr. Tourneur some two years ago, and we looked forward to its screening with genuine interest. The dapper Jack Holt is not the Axel of Conrad and Sena Owen is too much the ingénue to ever be the picturesque Alma. The only approach to Conrad is Lon Cheney, who was the Frog of "The Miracle Man," as that merciless vulture of the South Seas, Riccardo.

"Soldiers of Fortune," (Realart), Allan Dwan's celluloiding of the late Richard Harding Davis' pleasant romance of South American revolutions in the merry days before the poison gas and modern mechanism took the gayety out of warfare, is done in a big way, but it never once makes a direct personal appeal. Dwan is more fitted for series of the inner soul than these pageants of supers. Here his cast does not in any way distinguish itself. There is one remarkable long shot, a vista of the animated royal parade ground, which will not soon be forgotten by fans who see "Soldiers of Fortune."

Mary Pickford contributes a mellow and more legitimate characterization in "Heart of the Hills," (First National), adapted from a tale of the moonshine mountain folk by the late John Fox, Jr., than in any of her vehicles for some months. Here she has a rôle slightly more mature than has been her wont recently, the character of a fiery, untamed girl of the Kentucky hills. And Miss Pickford plays it with an infinite variety of shadings and nuances, despite the triteness of the romance. Harold Goodwin does the mountain boy lover admirably.

"For Old Kentucky," (First National), is still another story of the moonshiners, Kentucky colonels, and so on. For years a barnstorming stage melodrama, it has been adapted to Anita Stewart's film needs. It is the most obvious sort of cheap melodrama. Marshall Neilan has done all in his power to camouflage the story, but the screen is mercilessly revealing, we fear. Miss Stewart shows no advance in this picture, we regret to report.

Mary Miles Minter's "Anne of Green Gables," (Realart), belongs to the sugar-coated Pollyanna school of realistic literature. Miss Minter portrays a young orphan who, adopted by an aged couple, softens their hearts and eventually wins her own happiness. Miss Minter is a pleasant little person, but of limited technical equipment. Hence "Anne of Green Gables," centered wholly upon her, moves along a monotonous level of conventionality.

Only a season or so ago Mrs. Fiske played a stage version of Helen R. Martin's stories of the Dutch folk of Pennsylvania called "Erstwhile Susan," building the play about the eccentric teacher of elocution who weds into a stolid farmer family. In adapting "Erstwhile Susan" to the films for Constance Binney's use, Realart has shifted the interest from the wife to the brow-beaten youngest daughter of the Dreary domicile. "Erstwhile Susan" is loose and slow-moving of continuity and direction. John S. Robertson's direction is but fair, but Miss Binney reveals certain distinct possibilities as the drudge, Barnabetta. She makes a genuine effort at characterization. The photoplay has been cut to accent Barnabetta, with the result that the odd character of the step-mother, altho well played by Mary Alden, will be puzzling to the average celluloid audience.

Billie Burke's piquancy is very much soft-pedaled in "Wanted—A Husband," (Paramount). Herein she plays a dowdy young girl who, stung by the comments of her friends, announces a hastily selected photograph as that of her lover. She puts herself thru a training with modistes and hairdressers just as the imaginary lover turns out to be the real thing. There are all sorts of complications, of course. "Wanted—A Husband" is very slow-moving. We do not care personally particularly for James L. Crane as the lover who comes true.

Very frothy is "Luck in Pawn," (Paramount), a Marvin Taylor story in which Marguerite Clark lends her petite charms. Miss Clark plays a little country girl who tries to be a painter, meets a bored young millionaire and, after arousing him, finds ultimate happiness. Walter Edwards has fearfully over-drawn many of his incidents. No such society folk ever existed on land or sea. Miss Clark is pleasant, but the comedy itself is pretty fragile stuff.

The Movie Encyclopædia

UTAH'S DAUGHTER.—Why, Juanita Hansen isn't missing. She was playing in "The Lost City," presenting Selig's Wild Animals. Lois Weber in "Forced to Wed." Think of such a thing! I am told that brown eyes usually photograph better than blue ones. Yes, Marguerite Clark is married. Dont believe all you hear, and only half of what you see.

P. C. M., MANILA.—Last I heard of her she was on her way to France. Can you think of a more gruesome title than "The Cinema Murder" with Marion Davies in the lead! Think of it, written by Frances Marion, and directed by George D. Baker, two of the best in the business, with a title like that. I wonder who murdered the cinema. Let me hear from you again.

J. F. M.—Well, I cant tell you offhand how many distributing associations there are in the U. S., but there are at least 10 organized exchanges with branches thruout the country, altho there are only about five important film exchange systems.

R. E. N.—Yes, I know they follow our style, but you know that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. Why, the Pacific Ocean is the deepest of the oceans of the world. Its greatest known depth is 21,500 fathoms. I understand they are going to have bars in the ocean now. Yes, Dorothy Green is playing—she just finished "The Wild Fawn."

Popularity Contest Awards

Sixth Prize

THE new Popularity Contest, unusual and entertaining, is already the object of great interest — unflinching and rife. If you have entered it or have read the announcements which have appeared, and will appear, from time to time, containing the rules and regulations, you know it is actually a double contest—a contest in which both the public and players are equally interested.

The prizes depicted above and below were selected after much careful thought and attention and each one is destined to make some one happier, from the beautiful Crescent phonograph which suggests a twilight hour with the gems musical genii have given to the world, to the Marble nickel-plated axe which brings to mind a jolly time in some invitingly green woodland.

Perhaps you have not yet decided to enter the contest—if not do so now. Don't lose an opportunity of enjoying the unique entertainment it affords or of capturing one of the lovely and useful awards.

FIRST PRIZE

Crescent Phonograph, piano mahogany finish (value $160). Plays all makes of disc records: Victor, Columbia, Pathe, Edison, Emerson, etc., without the use of extra attachments or intricate adjustments; a simple turn of the sound-box is all that is necessary in changing from a lateral cut record to playing a hill and dale cut record.

A Crescent owner can enjoy a repertoire of the greatest opera singers, popular songs, dance music or anything that is turned out of the disc record. The tone of the Crescent is full, round, deep and mellow. It has a large compartment for records.

SECOND PRIZE

Movette Camera and three packages of films (value $65). Compact, light, efficient, easily operated. Think of the possibilities during your vacation trip — your canoe trip — in pictures — pictures of your family or friends — living pictures that you can project at any time in your home. A priceless record of your life.

THIRD PRIZE

Corona Typewriter with case (value $50); an all-round portable typewriter, light enough and small enough to be carried anywhere, and strong enough to stand any possible condition of travel. It is trim and symmetrical and does not give one's study the atmosphere of a business office. Fold it up and take it with you anywhere.

FOURTH PRIZE

Sheaffer "Giftie" Combination Set, consisting of a Sheaffer Fountain Pen and a Sheaffer Sharp-Point Pencil, in a handsome plush-lined box. Gold filled, warranted twenty years. Cannot blot or leak. A beautiful and perfect writing instrument.

FIFTH PRIZE

Bristol steel Casting Rod agate guide, cork grip, strong and durable. Packed in linen case. Can be easily put in traveling bag.

SIXTH PRIZE

Loughlin Safety Self-Filling Fountain Pen. No extensions to remember, no locks to forget.

SEVENTH PRIZE

Star Vibrator, handsomely finished in nickel plate with three attachments. Alternating current. Excellent for massage. Use it in your own home.

EIGHTH PRIZE

Same as Seventh Prize.

NINTH PRIZE

Marble nickel-plated pocket axe of tool steel, carefully tempered and sharpened. Indispensable in camp or woods.

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper, "Trador" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct ill-shaped noses without cost if not satisfactory.

Fame and Fortune Contest for 1920

THE first Fame and Fortune Contest having come to a happy and successful end, and several prospective stars of the first magnitude having been selected and started on their careers, it is with pleasure that we announce a similar contest for the year 1920, beginning with the January number of

Motion Picture Magazine, Classic and Shadowland

Once more we shall go thru America with a fine-tooth comb, as it were, in search for budding beauties with Motion Picture ambitions. No longer can any young lady or girl say that she has not had a chance. We shall give them all a chance—that is, every one that appears to have sufficient personality, charm, beauty and winsomeness. The first test is the photograph. If that gives promise, we publish it and ask for more. If the others are equally promising, we secure a personal interview, and finally we make a “test” Moving Picture and send it broadcast thru the theaters. Many of the girls whose pictures appeared in the Honor Rolls of our magazines, received many flattering offers from producing companies, and this proves that we are doing a good thing for ambitious American beauties, even tho we might err in our final judgment in selecting the winners. The Honor Rolls will continue each month in all of our publications, thus giving something like two hundred girls honorable mention, including a published photo. One or more of these we promise will be made

Stars of International Fame

Just think of what a prize this is! The contest just closed attracted nation-wide attention. The newspapers everywhere published illustrated accounts of our final test, and several of the News Weeklies of Current Events showed scenes of the happy party at Roslyn, which were flashed on nearly every screen thruout the United States.

What an opportunity! If it does not interest you, tell your neighbor about it or your distant friend—they may have a daughter just looking for a chance of this kind.

One thing we want to impress upon all aspirants—be careful in the choice of the photograph you submit. Postcard photos will not do. Poorly printed photos, and small ones, cannot be considered. We feel that many beautiful girls lost out in the last contest just because they did not go to the trouble of consulting a good photographer. Furthermore, dont submit photos that lie! They may get you on the Honor Roll, but they will never see you thru. We recall in the last contest several young ladies who submitted wonderful pictures, and succeeded in getting on the Honor Roll, but when they appeared on the scene, alas, we found that the camera had lied. We want pictures that do you full justice, even flattering ones, but not dishonest ones. If you are a giant or a midget, if you have an impossible profile, or an ugly nose, or some other defect, dont let the photographer conceal these things—it will be to your loss and disadvantage in the end. Your features may not be perfect, but you may win in spite of that—only, we want to know all. Hence, please do not try to deceive us. Make yourself appear to the best advantage, but do not overdo it.

Rules and date of Contest opening to be announced in next issue.

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

A small bottle of Freezone costs but a few cents at drug stores anywhere.

*If it's Goldwyn
It's a Winner!*

Goldwyn is not an institution resting on the laurels of one or two great successes. Its aim and middle name is consistency! For Goldwyn does not make the mistake of trying to sell the public a single motion picture, but bends all its energies and its talents to the end that every Goldwyn production shall be a winner.

You can see a motion picture any old time!

Goldwyn is worth seeing all the time!

"I'd like to see it right over again"

TO MAKE you say that it's got to be a pretty good picture. But these pictures are not so rare as they used to be. You've noticed that.

More and more often you run across them. Genuine portrayals of human virtues and ventures and follies and perils that are all the more fascinating and thrilling because so clipped-from-life as it were.

The kind of motion picture that carries you off like an aeroplane—and you've no desire to get back to earth till the journey's end.

The kind—as you've probably noticed also—that bears the brand name Paramount.

In every Paramount Artcraft Feature, Famous Players-Lasky Corporation recognizes no limits on the scenes but the earth. No limits on the machinery but machinery. No limits on the cost but money. No limits on the cast but artists. No limits on the plot but clean, new and thrilling.

And that's what brings the encores from you!

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr. Based upon a photograph by the Hoover Art Company.)

Since vivacious little Clarine Seymour stepped into prominence in David Griffith's "The Girl Who Stayed at Home," playing the cabaret girl, she has been strongly in cinema interest. Little Miss Seymour has previously had considerable experience in film farce.

Since her first hit, Miss Seymour has again scored in Mr. Griffith's "Scarlet Days" and her forthcoming silversheet appearances are being awaited with interest. It is clear that the screen has no prettier or more piquant comédienne than little Miss Seymour.

New Easy Way To Learn Drawing

How you can earn big money in Commercial Art, Illustrating, Designing, or Cartooning, without being a "genius," and regardless of your present ability.

Never was there such a need for artists as today! Business, revitalized, needs thousands. Illustrated catalogs, advertisements, posters, circulars, trade-marks designs—countless pieces of art work are needed by the busy business world. 48,868 periodicals are published in America—every one of them needs the services of at least two artists for each issue. You can't begin to realize the gigantic amount of art work that must be done—and the demand is increasing daily. Big money is gladly paid—and big money is waiting for anyone with foresight enough to prepare for this pleasant profession. Thru our new easy method of teaching, YOU can earn $40 to $100 a week as an artist, regardless of your present ability.

Learn in Spare Time

This new method is like a fascinating game. No matter how little you may know about drawing, no matter whether people tell you, "You have no talent," no matter what your present ability may be—if you can write we can teach you to draw. The new method simplifies everything—all the red-tape, "art for art's sake" teaching, and superfluous theory is taken out and in its place is put definite, practical instruction so that you will make money in the art game. The course is the work of an expert—W. H. Chandler, an artist of over 35 years' practical experience. And all your instruction is under the personal supervision of Mr. Chandler.

Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. Esenwein

For many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a bawp wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes; descriptive booklets free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers, sample copy 20c, annual subscription $2.00. Double our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

CHESTER MUSIC CO., 5 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill. Dept. 330

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama. Miss Bainter is picturesquely pleasing.

Booth.—"The Purple Mask," with Leo Ditrchstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainment in New York. Mr. Ditrchstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisset; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

Broadhurst.—"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective, drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

Casino.—"The Little Whopper." Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn, a discovery, is a brilliant Lincoln.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment, adapted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of a guileless young publisher of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Century.—"Aphrodite." Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle. The ballet, directed by Michel Fokine, is spirited and colorful.

Forty-fourth Street Theater.—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue, "The Frivolities of 1920." Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls. The cast includes the Kouns Sisters, Doralina, Henry Lewis and the beautiful Doris Lloyd.

Eltige.—"The Girl in the Limousine." A decidedly daring boudoir farce, by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white bed is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening. John Cumberland is very funny and Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, is both pretty and pleasing as the heroine.

Globe.—"Apple Blossoms." The ambitious and much heralded operetta of Fritz Kreisler and Victor Jacobi plus colorful Joseph Urban settings. An offering above the musical average. John Charles Thomas sings admirably, Wilda Bennett is an attractive heroine and Florence Shirley lends a piquant personality to the proceedings.

Harris.—"Wedding Bells." A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

Hippodrome.—"Happy Days." Big and spectacular production typical of the Hippodrome. The diving girls are again a feature, disporting in the huge "Hip" tank.

Hudson.—"Clarence," Booth Tarkington's

delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier re-united a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Lyric.—"The Light of the World." A picturesque story of the passion players, showing the effect of a modern Christ upon life in 1920. Pedro de Cordoba is excellent as the wood-carver who plays Christ in the passion play, Clara Joel is effective as a village girl, and the remainder of the cast is adequate. "The Light of the World" is impressive.

Plymouth.—"The Jest." Arthur Hopkins' production of Sem Benelli's colorful and gripping Florentine drama. John Barrymore is seen in his original rôle. An admirable cast and Robert Edmund Jones' settings lend splendid aid.

Princess.—"Nightie Night." Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve and ginger. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

Selwyn.—"Buddies." Amusing comedy-drama with music of the after-armistice days of our boys in France. Roland Young, Peggy Wood and Donald Brian head the cast.

Shubert.—"The Magic Melody." A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Julia Deane, Earl Benham and Carmel Myers, the last two well known on the screen, head the cast.

Thirty-ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal," Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

Winter Garden.—"The Passing Show of 1919." A typical girly garden show in which the famous runway gets plenty of use. The revue presents a number of travesties upon current attractions, particularly colorful being that of "The Jest," with Charles Winninger doing a clever burlesque on Lionel Barrymore.

ON TOUR

"The Royal Vagabond." A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor. Also tinkling music. And a corking cast, with Grace Fisher, Tessa Kosta, John Goldsworthy and Frederick Santley.

"The Little Blue Devil." A musical entertainment built about the late Clyde Fitch's "The Blue Mouse." Tuneful music by Harold Atteridge and Harry Carroll. Lillian Lorraine is the "blue devil" and Bernard Granville is co-featured.

"Civilian Clothes." A delightful comedy to please everybody. Brand new idea and cleverly worked out. Thurston Hall in the title rôle shares the honors with beautiful Olive Tell. Support excellent.

Elsie Janis and "her gang." Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

Shubert. E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire. These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," and "The Taming of the Shrew" are distinguished in every sense of the word.

"See-Saw" A pleasant musical entertainment. The delightful Elizabeth Hines stands out and Dorothy Mackaye is pleasantly cast.

"Moonlight and Honey-suckle." Ruth Chatterton in a charming comedy that might have been a big hit had the playwright taken full advantage of some splendid situations in the last act. As it is it starts like a hare and ends like a tortoise.

"An Exchange of Wives." Another Cosmo Hamilton comedy which, however, never attains the spontaneity or piquancy of "Scandal."

The chief blush producer is a scene on a sleeping porch.

"The Better 'Ole." The Coburn production of the musical comedy based upon Bruce Bairnsfather's now immortal cartoon creation, Old Bill. Mr. Coburn's characterization of Bill is still as remarkable as ever.

"A Lonely Romeo," with Lew Fields. A light show running in the usual groove. Frances Cameron, who is developing remarkably, is the bright figure of "A Lonely Romeo," while Mr. Fields is his humorous self. There's a decidedly funny scene in a men's hat shop.

"Chu Chin Chow." An opulent and beautiful musical extravaganza based upon the Arabian Nights tale of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. Dazzling series of sensuous stage pictures. "Chu Chin Chow" is presented this year with an entirely new edition and new costumes. Marjorie Wood makes a colorful desert woman, Lionel Braham is very effective as the robber sheik and Eugene Cowles makes the rôle of steward stand out. George Rosely plays the young lover admirably.

"La La Lucille." Musical comedy built around the efforts of a loving couple to arrange a divorce in order to live up to the terms of a millionaire aunt's will. A co-respondent is engaged and troubles begin.

"The Shubert Gaeties" of 1910. A lively revue with scores of statuesque girls and stunning frocks. A decidedly attractive entertainment.

"John Ferguson." A vigorous drama that compares favorably with anything of the kind that New York has seen for years. Beautifully staged and acted. Masterpieces of this kind should be liberally patronized to encourage others.

"George White's 'Scandals of 1910.'" All sorts and variations of dancing make up for a lack of story or humor. The real star is piquant little Ann Pennington—as seductive a little jizzer as ever shimmied on Broadway. Then there's the lively dancing of Mr. White himself.

"Friendly Enemies." This is the record-breaking comedy drama of last season, with Louis Mann in his original rôle.

"Three Wise Fools." Austin Strong's human little drama of three crusty old bachelors who are bequeathed a young woman and who are subsequently rejuvenated. Melodrama with a heart throb. Helen Menken gives a striking performance of the nerve-racked heroine, while Claude Gillingwater is a delightfully testy old Teddy Findley.

"She's a Good Fellow." A light but pleasant musical comedy built about the efforts of old folks to break up a marriage between a loving young couple. Joseph Santley is a likeable lover-husband, masquerading in skirts for a whole act. Ivy Sawyer, the very pleasing Ann Orr and Scott Welsh lend delightful assistance.

"39 East." A charming comedy founded on a boarding school romance in which many interesting characters make love-making difficult for a pair of young lovers.

"Up in Mabel's Room." Piquant, daring but decidedly amusing farce built about the pursuit of a dainty pink undergarment which bears the same name as a recent jazz dance. Admirable cast, including the radiant Hazel Dawn.

"Three Faces East." Another Secret Service-German spy drama, this one by Anthony Paul Kelly, one of our most successful photoplaywrights. The principal charm of this play is in trying to guess who are the German spies and who are the Allies, just as we were puzzled in "Cheating Cheaters" to know who were burglars and who were not.

Hear, Hear!

The world is so full of a number of things, but—nothing more important to the readers of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE than the following announcement—delivered in our best oratorical manner, and with gestures:

Ladies and Gentlemen:

Owing to the congested condition at the printers'—occasioned by their recent strike—and in an endeavor to catch up with our customary schedule, we regret to announce that there will be no April issue of that most welcome of visitors, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

But—

We also wish to announce that we will issue on the First Day of April, 1920 (mark the date with red ink on your calendar), a unique feature in the magazine world—to be known as The April-May Issue of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE!

This will be a two-in-one magazine, and the subscribers of THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE will have no reason to regret the missing one, when this one will be released.

HELENE CHADWICK - CLARA WILLIAMS - LOUISE FAZENDA - RUTH ROLAND - RUTH STONEHOUSE - MAY ALLISON

In "The Wonder Book for Writers," which we will send to you ABSOLUTELY FREE, these famous Movie Stars point out the easiest way to turn your ideas into stories and photoplays and become a successful writer.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by E. B. Davison of New York, one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are The Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the imagination free rein, they might have astonished the world!

LISTEN! A wonderful FREE hook has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about the Irving System—a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to develop your "story fancy," weave clever word-pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of Failure. How to WIN!

This surprising book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge. No obligation. YOUR copy is waiting for you. Write for it NOW. GET IT. IT'S YOURS. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing. The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular job. Who says you can't make "easy money" with your brain? Who says you can't turn your Thoughts into cash! Who says you can't make your dreams come true! Nobody knows—BUT THE BOOK WILL TELL YOU.

So why waste any more time wondering, dreaming, waiting? Simply fill out the coupon below—you're not BUYING anything, you're getting it ABSOLUTELY FREE. A book that may prove the Book of Your Destiny. A Magic Book through which men and women, young and old, may learn to turn their spare hours into cash! Get your letter in the mail before you sleep to-night. Who knows—it may mean for you the Dawn of a New To-morrow! Just address The Authors' Press, Dept. 3, Auburn, New York.

 "When I first saw your ad I was working in a shop for $30 a week. Always having worked with my hands, I doubted my ability to make money with my brain. So it was with much skepticism that I sent for your Easy Method of Writing. When the System arrived, I carefully studied it evening after work. Within a month I had completed two plays, one of which sold for $500, the other for $350. I unhesitatingly say that I owe it all to the Irving System."—HELENE KINDON, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

BUT two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the flotsam and jetsam of Life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write?" Who says you can't?

Mae, Mary and Matrimony

MARY had just been put to bed. We sat at the dining-room table—Mae Marsh Arms, her husband, little Mary's nurse and I. Quaint candles illuminated the room with flickering, home-like gleams.

Across the table we caught the glow in Mrs. Marsh Arms' eyes. We had interviewed the Mae Marsh of picturedom at least several times before, but this was a new Mae Marsh.

Where once flashed a rollicking glow of mischief now burned a new and steady light. And we listened:

"Mary is wonderful!" exclaimed Mamma Marsh.

"Yes, indeed," echoed Papa Marsh.

"Did nurse tell you how splendid she was today?" said mamma, turning to papa.

Papa shook his head enthusiastically. "You bet!"

"She just loves strangers——" began mamma.

"Not a bit like most whiney kids," interrupted papa.

"Every one says she's awfully different," smiled mamma, proudly.

"Yes, indeed," echoed papa.

We caught our breath. A year or so had certainly transformed the hoydenish Mae. Plumper, more rounded, there was a new dignity here. And that wonderful light in her eyes!

We asked the once-so-wistful star of the screen how she liked married life.

"Great!" she exclaimed. "I simply cant understand why every one isn't married. I love it—and Mary—more than all the world put together."

"And you wouldn't change—"

"Not for millions," she answered, fairly aghast. "Of course, I am returning to the screen, but I am taking Mary along with me. All the photo-plays in the world couldn't separate us.

"I believe all this happiness—and Mary—have made me a better actress. They couldn't fail to do that. Why, I didn't begin to know the depths and the heights of life before Mary came. Now it is as if a curtain had been drawn aside and all life's possibilities lay before me.

"I may never again be successful on the screen from the standpoints of appeal and personality, but I cannot fail to be just a bit better actress. For I understand a little of life now."

"Ethel Barrymore once said something like that," we reminded.

"And it is true. Life was a thing of pleasures and whims—to be tasted as pleasant or unpleasant, and passed on. But—think of it—Mary is upstairs asleep—my own little Mary—my husband is here and I am infinitely happy.

"I am going to do my best to be successful in the films upon my return. I know I shall, if I can only make a fraction of my happiness shine out of my work."

Little Mary is just six months old. We asked her mother if she wanted Mary to be an actress. Papa Arms, who is a newspaper man, smiled.

"If she wants to be an actress, of course, I shall help her," mamma answered.

"I think she is going to be a writer," said papa, proudly. "When I sit down at night with her in my arms and open a newspaper, Mary's joy is complete. She chuckles with glee, I can tell you."

The Marsh-Arms have been spending the past summer at Forest Hills. There Mae Marsh has been resting. No pictures did she see all thru the year, of course. "I'm having a perfect orgy of picture-going now, and I'm hunting everywhere to see 'Broken Blossoms,' 'The Miracle Man' and all the other big things I have missed. I simply must see them all."

At this writing Mamma Marsh, plus papa and Mary, are about to start for the coast, where Mae will again return to the Cooper-Hewitts.

"We haven't found exactly the right story yet," said papa. Just then a sound came from the upper regions of the Arms' mansion. Mamma and nurse dashed Mary-ward.

"She's laughing in her sleep." ex-

INTRODUCING THE REAL TOMMIE:

Thomas Meighan is going to star shortly, the Tommie you have come to love in "The Miracle Man," "Male and Female" and other photodramas. That alone isn't particularly startling. But the fact that Tommie has reached stardom—and retained his human viewpoint—is. Thus it is that we take unusual pleasure in saying:

"Mr., Mrs., and Miss Classic Reader, meet Mr. Tommie Meighan."

THE quote marks are discreetly placed to the fore and aft of the title lest the stigma of an undue familiarity be ascribed to the wholly humble and well-meaning scrivener thereof. At any rate and all rates, the quotes belong, because . . .

I took tea with Thomas Meighan at the Claridge, late one afternoon, lately. During the course of the chicken sandwiches and the conversation we touched upon the oft-discussed fact that simplicity is the outward and visible sign of all true greatness. Thomas had with him a letter from a very well-known editor of this city. It began "Dear Tommie," and I thought, "How fitting." It contained, too, a pithy paragraph anent our subject of greatness; i.e., simplicity, and it went on to say that in some few years "Dear Tommie" hadn't changed a jot. It said it much more cleverly than that, you understand. It was more to the point and it didn't use the word "jot," but the gist of it was the abiding simplicity of Tommie with the necessarily accompanying innuendo. It occurred to me, still further, that, ten years or more from now, there will perhaps be another letter, other letters, and that they will say "Dear Tommie, you haven't changed a bit."

The boy, Tommie, is very illy concealed by the man, Thomas.

And, still more pertinent, Tommie has an abounding sense of humor. It is a powerful lens, a sense of humor, and it does not permit the greatest of us to be set very high in our own esteem.

Tommie has been married, he told me, for ten did not ask me to censor the statement in my written word, either. The ten years, happy years, I take it, from the twinkle in his eye, have been dedicated to Frances Ring. "She's got something up here," he told me, touching his forehead. I asked him, awed by the ten years, what he thought the secret of marital success really was—or is. I felt that the decade entitled him to some ripe philosophizing. He answered me, "A sense of humor." He went on to say that he considered it the really vital thing. He said that it must exist if the matrimonial ship is to escape the reefs and shoals. One doesn't fight, he said, when one can laugh. It makes for true camaraderie. It removes all stings. It is the real solvent.

"Dear Tommie"

I asked him what he thought his own success was due to, what intrinsic thing within himself.

He waved a protesting hand when I articulated the word success, but I was well fortified with chicken sandwiches and considerable orange pekoe, and I persisted. I was there to push my questions, and I believe I can say, modestly, that I pushed. I had to, with "Dear Tommie." He has a habit of running off the track

Tommie Meighan has been married ten years; Frances Ring being Mrs. Meighan. Regarding the secret of marital success, Tommie answers: "A sense of humor." Moreover, he calls it the one vital thing to marriage. It makes for true camaraderie. It removes all stings. It is the real solvent. Adjoining are glimpses of Mr. Meighan in recent De Mille productions and discoursing upon somebody else, volubly and with interest. As monologist on himself he is a good Miracle Man. However, as I say,

I did persist . . .

After a tentative waiving of the word success, he said, "Such as it is—to my mother and father."

I asked him why. What particular thing or things they had done for him. "Just because they were what they were," he answered, "right-thinking, clean-living, regular people. Being with them was enough."

We paid the small tribute of a momentary silence to the memory of his mother, who had died six weeks before.

I wanted to know whether

By FAITH SERVICE

he really loved the work he was doing, and what he hopes to do in the future, along what line or lines and, particularly, whether he has any aspirations along the directorial line.

He is, you know, a very pleasant sort of person, with a light-some smile and an easy manner, or he might have gently evicted me from the further consumption of food and time as a human interrogation and therefore not accountable. Instead of which he was smilingly informative.

He hadn't cared much about his work, he admitted frankly, until quite recently. Hadn't, at all events, taken the same deep interest in it he takes now, felt the same Meighan says he owes all his success to his mother and father. "Just because they were what they were," he says, "right-thinking, clean-living, regular people. Being with them was enough." As regards success, Meighan remarks: "A well-known person can never go out and have a thoroly good time, when and where and with whom he pleases" impelling charm. Then, too, so many and such limitless possibilities have opened up to him recently. "The Miracle Man," he said, is the type of work he wants to do, his line . . . He has no desire to go back to the stage, very much contrariwise. He'd have stage-fright, he declared. Facing an audience—whew! After working in the rather clubby fashion of the studios. As for being a director . . .

"To my mind," he said, "there are three absolutely essential factors in the make-up of a really great director. The first is imagination. The second is concentration. The third is application. I haven't any one of the three. I guess that lets me out."

"I don't believe you haven't any one of them," I said; "the first, now . . ."

"Oh, well," he said, with a smile, "I'm Irish . . ."

The Little People have flocked for too many idyllic centuries over Ireland . . . too many banshees have wailed on too many moon-white nights . . . legends with thrills and throbs of a wild beauty have been too rife for one of Ireland's sons to disclaim imagination now.

"Well, then," I prompted.

"Well, the other two—the majority, you know—application and concentration, I haven't a vestige of either one of them. Besides, I haven't, honestly, the desire. I'm content to leave the directing to others—Griffith and De Mille and George Loane Tucker, and men like them."

I asked him, while we were sky-rocketing with the subject of success, whether he thought a high price of some sort or other was necessarily attached thereto.

"I do," he said; "for one thing, the loss of personal liberty. Imagine, for instance, coming here for tea with Charlie Chaplin. You'd be mobbed in a great many places; in almost all places you'd be so whispered about and nudged about and openly and overtly stared at that you'd have acute indigestion before you got hold of the tea-card. A person with all that success can never go out and have a thoroly good time, when and where and with whom he pleases. There's a sort of barrier built and there's no getting past it. It's distinctly a limited sphere while seeming to be without limit."

Then, too, a certain loss, I think, of perspective.

Rose-colored glasses, in a sense, even tho we may be wholly unaware that we are wearing them, or that they have been placed upon the bridge of our, so to speak, nose.

We gaze, at times, from a figurative Woolworth and the good substantial horses and drays and other matter-of-factnesses seem lost in a sort of blur.

Tommie has not lost his. There is no blur, of rose or otherwise, upon his figurative glasses.

"Dear Tommie" is going to star this coming year. He believes, he says, that starrng will show a considerable change in his work. "A great many of the best bits of the cast are often and necessarily cut out for the fuller benefit of the star," he explained, "and, quite often, work I have done has seemed stolid for that very reason. When I am doing my own starrng such will not be the case, so I'm hoping."

Tommie will be interesting to watch, but what is more and better, I believe, with the well-known editor, that he will always be just about the same to know . . . essentially, come what may come, "Dear Tommie—You haven't changed a bit!"

contract in which she is to appear in this young producer's pictures.

"It is so cheerful," she continued, as her eyes swept the large, sunny room, with its wicker furniture and gay cretonnes, while thru the open windows could be seen rows of flaming dahlias and lovely lawns. "I adore colors. They spur me on, and these ducky yellow lights are warm and cozy. Oh, but just look here; this is the very best of all," and, dashing to a door, she led me into the most perfectly equipped little kitchen imaginable. "I've never had time to learn to cook, but now I am so enthused that I want to learn everything all at once so I can invite my friends in to a studio luncheon. Micky thinks this is a huge joke, but I'll show him.

"Always," Marjorie went on, seriously, after we had returned to the dressing-room, "I have wanted to be in Micky Neilan's company. I remember, when I was just a little girl at the Lasky studio, how I would slip around and watch him directing Mary Pickford, just hoping and hoping that some day I, too, could be under his direction. I nearly died of joy when it all really happened.

MARJORIE DAW isn't her real name at all! Cecil De Mille gave it to her several years ago when she first came to the Lasky studio. With his prophetic eye, he probably saw that it would look better in electric lights when she grew up and became a star, than her own, which is much longer. Anyway, this sweet little name just suits her, and tho it has not yet flashed in electrics, it has appeared in very black type on many programs, for her career has progressed by leaps and bounds and she has played with many of the best known film stars of the day.

Great things are predicted for this young girl, whose spontaneity makes her characters live and breathe upon the screen, bringing youthful romance vividly before our eyes.

"Isn't it wonderful?" questioned Marjorie, dancing about in girlish enthusiasm.

I agreed with fervor, even while I secretly wondered if she referred to the very smart frock she was wearing, an adorable navy tricotine, which was one of her purchases during a recent trip to New York, or the artistic dressing-room, newly decorated especially for her at Marshall Neilan's quaint little studio in Hollywood, or, indeed, her splendid

"We're making a great picture now, 'The River's End,'" she rattled on, with her contagious enthusiasm, "and my rôle is light comedy. I'm an English girl, and everybody loves me down to the Chinese cook. I wear pretty clothes and have a beautiful time. Why, I even ride horseback—in a still!" and she laughed gaily.

"Our whole company is wonderful, all working together like one big family, and even the camera-man, who is a dear, tells me when to put more soul into my eyes.

"Micky is so boyish, with a regular Peter Pan sense of youth, and he is always joking and 'kidding.' He sees life at its best, and one of his rules is never to lose his temper while working, and he lives up to this faithfully."

"The trip to New York—was it all you had anticipated?" I asked.

"Was it?" jumping to her feet to give added emphasis. "It was wonderful! I went and went, and saw and saw, and everything was so exciting," and Marjorie dropped back into her chair, subsiding for a moment after this ecstatic explosion.

Then followed an animated account of the shops and the styles, the new plays and the interesting people she had met, all from a girlish viewpoint so refreshing that it seemed to sweep everything old and sordid from the map.

She confessed that she found herself judging those splendid Gotham hotels and cafés by the quality of their ice-cream, this being her fad of the moment.

"Down in Greenwich Village," she told me, eagerly, "I found a new kind, queerish and delicious, made by a secret process or something, and I couldn't describe it in a hundred years, so it is just a memory to dream about," and again came the gay laugh.

"My first and only character rôle was Emmy Jane Perkins in 'Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm,'" said Marjorie, settling down to the demands for an interview. "I was embarrassed to death with

Norman Kerry says he is more or less afraid of women — except his mother, who is seen in the circle picture. Also that he loves his liberty. Dan Cupid is duly warned

TEN o'clock in the morning, and the maid said he hadn't as yet wakened. A half-hour's wait, and at length a sleepy-eyed young gentleman clad for tennis, and bemoaning the fact that three old-fashioned, very rare, hand-blown glass bottles, sent him by express from the East, were broken in transit.

"I'm all disheartened," quoth the insouciant Mr. Kerry. "I can't replace 'em."

"Oh, yes, you can," I replied. "The Olde Curiosity Shoppe on Sixth Street has a couple just like them. Four dollars apiece, but I imagine you can 'Jew 'em down.'"

"Righto!"

And the insouciantly broken-hearted Mr. Kerry became happy again. You see, I didn't have to go thru the formality of an introduction. Norman and I have been friends for some time. In fact, I quite well remember the time that he sang a sobby song to me at my table in a Los Angeles café. That's how I met him. He thought I was some one else, and when I told him I wasn't, he said he didn't give a whoop; we were friends anyhow.

Being of the sex that wears sox and a mustache, I was at once enjoined to languish in his chambre à coucher, where he keeps his art treasures and which looks like a cross between the peacock-room of the late Empress of China and the studio of a Bolshevik artist. Purple and grey hangings on the four windows, funny little doo-clabs, that Norm told me are very valuable, on the tabouret which stands at the head of his bed. I thought that probably they'd contain incense, or something like that, but I found they held cigarets. And—keep this quiet, mates—there's a table which looks like an escritoire standing along one of the walls which caches what, in these Saharaesque days, is mintily—a cut-glass carafe filled with spirituous liquor.

"Have a drink?" His forethought was really remarkable. Personally, I am never known to refuse. Neither is Norman. We both of us are Scotch, and Scotch always finds itself in seltzer.

"And now, what do you know about women?"

I knew it would get him started. He has every feminine heart in Hollywood fluttering when he makes his appearance at the hotel dances or dines publicly.

And the high school sub-débs blush and cast their eyes to the ground with what authors are prone to call maidenly ingenuousness when he passes them on the street, and I've heard 'em sigh over him. Gosh, girls, it's awful!

"The dear things!"

"Well, what about 'em?" quoth I, interviewally.

"I love them all. Except the vampires; they're too obvious. The girl to vamp me is the baby blonde. Then I know I'm getting vamped, and I enjoy it."

What is a vamp? Kipling calls her the rag-bone-hank. Gautier refers to her as a disappointed mistress. Kerry to the fore, thusly:

Vampire—Thisbe minus the hole in the wall; Melisande without her Pelleas. In other words, an unnecessary female, who makes life more unpleasant for herself than for those whom she'd like to "wreck."

And with this

By TRUMAN B. HANDY

high-minded ideal, perhaps you may draw the conclusion that Mr. Kerry is in the matrimonial market, or that his "Wanted—A wife" ad appears in the daily papers. Huh-uh!

Kerry is more or less afraid of women. He says so himself; also, that he likes his liberty.

"For that simple reason I've never been married. I may, and I may not be, but if I were, I'd bow to my superior.

"I hate that word 'superior,' and personally, I fail to recognize any of this so-called 'superiority' in the opposite sex. In California, where women vote, they're quite an equal, but superior—huh!"

"But are they superior?" I back-fired.

"Certainly—if you love them. I mean, a man's wife is always his superior, for the reason that he wouldn't have married her if he didn't recognize in her qualities which he fails to possess and wishes to acquire. And then, too, grandes passions are as rare as masterpieces, and very few men are geniuses."

"And what about the cave-man? Like to be one?"

"Hot doggie! If I were married, there would be only one pair of trousers in the house, and I'd be in 'em. A man is born to be a soldier, as he is to be the head of his house. If he gives up his life for his country, he's bound to do so for his marriage, and, according to Emerson, everything has its compensation—even, in this case, if it's only paying the checks. And that's why I'm single. I've never wanted to spoil a woman's illusions."

As Kerry and I discussed pro and con the woman question, Norm skimmed thru a few dozen fan letters. At one of them he laughed. Handing it to me, I read that a shop girl in St. Louis would like to marry him. In fact, she openly stated that she idolizes him. Another heartache!

"Doesn't it give you a thrill to be idolized?"

"Huh-uh. Lions are good for only one season. As soon as their manes are cut they are the dullest creatures extant."

"But why keep the fair sex in suspense?"

"That's just why I'm telling you all this. I'm not. No man wants to make a woman impatient. Women consider themselves a flower to be plucked before the boll gets into the bud. But the proper basis for marriage is a mutual understanding. Kind of hard to get nowadays, isn't it, when in so many cases they've made a deletion in the marriage ceremony?"

Kerry is a strong romanticist, as Oscar Wilde says, "very punctual and with a passion for collecting curiosities. Great aversion to cats and bores."

His art collection ranges from an age-old

Then, there is the matter of her looks . . . tawny-colored hair massed on her head, bright eyes, fresh coloring, a springy sort of a walk and rounded lines. No, there is no suggestion in Olive Thomas of "going out into the night" to find herself. She appears to be quite completely found, between the pictures and her new and fascinating occupation of decorating and buying for her new apartment and being Mrs. Jack Pickford, at which estate she is quite evidently pleased, save for the long distance and the long times that elapse

THERE is to be nothing Ibsen-esque about this interview saving the rather obvious play on a famous Ibsen title—not that the scrivener thereof wouldn't like to attempt an emulation, but that there is nothing of the morbid Scandinavian and his equally morbid and highly introspective heroines to be deduced from the Maytimish Olive Thomas.

Olive could never have posed for Ibsen. She is quite youthfully and healthfully an antithesis. Too essentially a product of—well, Pittsburgh in the matter of nativity and New York and California in the

She knows what she wants and how she wants it, and also how to go about acquiring what she wants. There is a certain directness about her despite her most palpable youth, which gives the impression of a small child in a mammoth toy shop, given, suddenly, carte blanche.

Her long, spacious living-room, with windows across the entire front of it, overlooks the park. It is carpeted in a soft French gray and Olive told me, with asperity, that she was at the studio when the carpet was laid and the men had neglected to lay filling underneath it. "If," said the small matron, "I am to pay for good stuff, I expect to get it, and good workmanship into the bargain. I am going to have them take the whole thing up again and lay it properly. I believe in value received." Which shows, in a very young person with a not inconsiderable salary, a certain sense of economics.

Richard Barthelmess had gone on to the Bahamas ahead of the Griffith party. When news reached him that the Griffith steamer was missing he chartered the "Berry Islands" and started out in search. Here are views of Barthelmess and his mother on the searching trip. Below is a recent study of Griffith

THE world of motion pictures drew a startled breath and paused to think one recent December morning when the newspapers of the land carried the story that David Wark Griffith and his party had been "lost at sea" off the Bahama Islands. It is human to take a person or thing for granted—to accept unthinkingly. So Griffith, standing at the very forefront of the photoplay's march, had been accepted. But the news that Griffith might be adrift in the lonely Spanish Main—dead or dying—startled the film world and set it thinking.

Quickly it took stock of just what it owed this genius of the silent drama—for Griffith, with all his faults, is the one genius of the photoplay. From the flickering first days he has proudly held the standard upright. From the moment when he stepped from crude one-reel melodrama to such brief celluloid bits of brilliancy as "The Blot in the 'Scutcheon,'" "Enoch Arden," and scores of others, down thru the avenue of progress marked by the fade-out, the close-up, the dissolve, and a multitude of now accepted technical devices, to the present of that lyric tragedy, "Broken Blossoms," Griffith had led the way—and led in every sense of the word.

Other excellent and in many ways brilliant division commanders have appeared—De Mille, Ince, Tourneur, Tucker and Dwan among these potential leaders—but Griffith is still essentially the field-marshal of the film. So the world of the cinema realized in a flash that December morning. But, after drifting for four days, the Griffith party made port. The photoplay-sphere settled back—but we trust not to forgetfulness. It is natural for those close to greatness not to observe the light, but the honor that alone is Griffith's must be accorded. No other one man has done a fraction of service to the silent play performed by Griffith.

May he long retain the leadership! May he go on experimenting and trying, for few others have his courage and resourcefulness! To be sure there are many promising figures upon the horizon—none more notably so, for instance, than the youthful King Vidor or Mrs. Sidney Drew—but there is but one Griffith.

Let us recognize this Moses of the motion play, this Columbus of the cinema! Let us remember that grim December morning—and give all honor where honor is due—now.

some constructive nature. Every individual craves self-expression in one form or another. It is as essential as any other one thing, and more. But it should be work that can be done when the spirit of it moves the activities. An artist, and fundamentally, a director should be an artist—an artist cannot work by clock, on schedule, according to rote. Theoretically, it would be very fine if it were possible and best. But it is not possible. The creative impulse is bound to be more or less sporadic. Some training can, of course, be brought to bear, but efficiency—horrible word!—will grind out inspiration if one is not careful. And it is in inspiration that the great things of living, in so far as the arts are concerned, are achieved."

Speaking of art, I unearthed the hoary question of whether he thought the film business an art, etc., etc.—you know.

He said he thought the art of the screen certainly was an art. The business end of it—no.

Three glimpses of Hobart Henley adorn this page. In the center he appears with John Cumberland and, below, with members of his company

"H—H—H" sounds like the Crown Prince, but it is not, however topical at the date of writing. It is about Hobart Henley, who has the humanizing touch. He has it in his pictures, "The Gay Old Dog" to wit, and he has it in his personality, which is even more, because, sooner or later, the personality of the man is bound to seep into the personality of his pictures, his work whatever form it may take. A man cannot give greater than he is.

I don't believe that Mr. Henley is conscious of the human touch he has in any deliberate sort of way. He is so very much and so very naturally a homey sort of person, with a rich sort of speaking voice, Kentuckian and rather slow, and a smile that gives you a comfortable glow in the cardiac regions and—he would blue-pencil this, I know, if I gave him half a chance, which I shant—romantic eyes and hair and general aspect.

He adores his mother, which means more than the face value of the assertion. The adoration is mutual. Originally a Kentuckian, as I said, he brought his mother here to make a home for him and in that home he abides. He is a believer in the home. He gave me a sketchy idea of his idea of happiness, and it was to get up in the morning on your own place in the country, the country of course, he said, and jump on your horse and take a good gallop before breakfast, then back to steaming coffee and eggs and things, à la anglaise, as it were, then dalliance in the sunshine, browsing among your books, thinking, planning, dreaming . . .

"Of course," said Mr. Henley, "to be happy and normal there must be work, interest of "AIR they places bigger'n the Junction—bigger'n Lexington?" Melissa's eyes were round with awe. "Hit dont seem likely, Chad! 'Pears like they couldn't be."

The boy laughed with masculine superiority, flinging his fine head back in a gesture characteristic of him. "Pooh! M'liss, they're grander than anything we ever saw! They've got shining streets and white castles that reach up and up, and towers where you can see the whole world from. They've got many mansions, M'liss—grand mansions—"

Caleb Hess, schoolmaster, smiled a very little at the boyish rhapsody, with its odd mingling of the Arabian Nights and the New Testament, but it was an infinitely tender smile. Twelve patient years in the Cumberlands, dealing with soggy minds, dulled with generations of pork and pone eating, with the sullen, the dull, the vicious, had not quite extinguished the flame that had burned, altar-like, in his soul when he came up into the mountains to teach the mountain young of the beauty and the wonder that is in the world.

"Ah, but you must build your castles, Chad boy," he said gently; "you must work for your towers, earn your mansions. There is no virtue in easy things. It is you and you alone who make your life what it will be."

Trite words, old, frayed truths, but to the boy the sayings of an oracle. His dark eyes, under the ragged fringe of uncut hair, glowed like smouldering coals in a fanning wind. "I can do anything—I want to," cried Chad Buford. The last name was problematical, a thing of tradition, for the boy was a waif of the wilds, without parents or kin, or even graves that held his own.

"I can do anything I choose to do—anything! I can get learning, I can be a gent! man!"

The didactic voice of the schoolmaster sounded soothingly. "A gentleman isn't the best thing to be, Chad boy. If you're honest and brave and kind you'll be a man, and that's better. A king who controls a million men is no greater than a man who controls himself."

"Chad could be a king," Melissa cried, jealously, with a look that yearned toward the long, lank boy-figure huddled before the fire; "Chad could be a king easy. He aint like the res' of us, somehow, 'pears like. He's like somebody—somebody in that book you-all read t'other day at school, 'bout tournyments and round-tables."

If Chad had lifted his eyes to the girl's face as she turned it toward him with the age-old mothering in it, he would have known what few people guessed—that Melissa Turner, daughter of his employer, was beautiful. But Chad's gaze was in the dancing flames, where his fancy pictured the strange, fluid, changing shapes of the future, and his thoughts were leagues away from the dingy, log-cabin room. Caleb saw, however, and winced. It was a pity that there could be no beauty, no grace in the world without bringing suffering with it, as the sunshine brings shadows.

"But the boy must not be fettered. He must be free, and he will go far," he thought. "Melissa is right. He is not like these dull-souled mountain folk. There is blood in him somewhere, race. Look at the height of that forehead, the shape of that chin! But he must go away quickly before harm can come. He is young, and youth's wants are dangerous."

Aloud he spoke in his accustomed drawl. "How would you like to go to Lexington, Chad? Or, better still, how would you like to go up North to school?"

"Oh, sir!" Chad gasped, and could say no more. His sensitive lips were quivering, his long, lean hands, which all the rough work of shepherding could not make like the thick-set paws of the mountain boys, clenched together on his knee with a grip that turned the fingers white. Neither he nor Caleb, absorbed in the plans of the moment, heard the strange little cry the girl gave from her shadows, a hurt cry, like a little wild animal wounded, nor saw the whitening of the long, pointed face between the fans of wild tangled brown.

They were still talking eagerly, making plans for the journey that was to set Chad's impatient feet on the pathway to the world, when she slipped out into the cool Cumberland night, lucent with the cold clearness of the stars. She lifted her face toward them, marked with strange woman lines of pain in its girlishness. Melissa was fifteen, but she was very old tonight, old as the travail of her soul, old as the brave, sweet heart of her that now rose above its pain to pray for him.

"I've lost him, but hit's best. On'y, God, take keer o' him. If they's any hurtin' to be done, hurt me instead," Melissa begged. "That's what womenfolks was made for, I reckon, to git hurt 'stead of they men."

The next week Chad Buford, with all his worldly possessions, a poor calico shirt, two pairs of white socks and a thumbed, dog-eared copy of "The Knights of the Table Round" rolled into a bundle under his arm, started out afoot down the mountains, with Caleb Hess beside him, and only the half-jeering commentaries of the loafers outside the tiny general store as farewell.

"Spect you'll be 'lected President one o' these days, Chad!"

"Dont l'arn too much—'tain't healthy, I reckon. Knowed a man onct went thru the 'rithmetic and took with a fever 'n' died."

To each other, after the two figures had disappeared down

"How would you like to go to Lexington, Chad? or, better still, how would you like to go up North to school?"

the trail, they spoke with coarse freedom of the boy's dubious parentage. "A bound boy, with no pappy and no mom as anybody knows on," they sneered, "settin' hisself up to be somebody—it's 'nough to make a hawg laff. He'd 'a' done better to have stayed and minded Jeff Turner's sheep, and kept his belly full."

Only one person watched Chad set out, and sent a gentle thought with him, a prayer that he might find what he went to seek for—happiness and success. Melissa, hidden behind the great tree at the bend of the trail, heard their voices coming closer, passing, then dared to look out from her leafy covert for one last glimpse of the dark head, held so high in its rough fur cap, the straight shoulders in their sheepskin covering, the very way he walked—as if, she thought, he already had his white castles, his towers. She closed the memory of this last glimpse of him away in her heart sacredly, to be taken out when she was alone sometimes, looked at, dreamed over. "I'll never see him again," said Melissa, but she did not know.

A week later Caleb Hess returned. It got about, after a while, thru assiduous questioning, that he had not taken Chad up North after all, but left him in Lexington with a Major Rufus Buford, who had taken a fancy to the boy and promised to care for him and give him an education. The name re-awakened old rumors. What if Chad should have a right to the half-jesting patronymic he had always borne? What if this major should be kin of his?

"Always said the boy had something to him," the mountaineers told each other. "Reckon he'll be mighty proud, now he's got fine friends, an' fergit all we've done fer him!"

Life went on, thru the cold winter days, the sheep, huddled in their folds, bleating plaintively. The women shuffled about the dark cabins from greasy skillet to the cradles of their ailing babes. Caleb, in the frigid log schoolhouse, labored patiently, but without inspiration, to plant a small seed of beauty in the unfertile minds before him, and M'liss dreamed in the red dusks of a tall, erect figure, panoplied like a knight, striding down the shining street of a great city.

And then one night, as the Turners sat about their eternal sow-belly and beans, and the cabin swam in the sooty, greasy light of oil lamps, the door opened and Chad stood on the threshold, looking at them with a set, white face and eyes cold and empty, like dead brands when the flame is gone.

The elder Turner brought his knife handle down on the table with a hoarse cackle of delight. "Haw, haw! Come back, eh? Fine friends turn you out and you come crawlin' back to fill your crop."

(Thirty-one)

Dan and Jake, the boys, echoed their father's hateful hilarity, Mrs. Turner gave a spiritless glance at the silent figure, then shuffled to the stove to pile another plate with food, but Melissa sprang to her feet and ran to Chad, clutching his hands in her hard, calloused ones.

"Chad boy! Oh, mebbe it's wicked to be glad, but I am—I am!" Melissa sobbed. Then, vaguely terrified by the stillness of him, she stood on tiptoe, thrusting her face close to his. And the set despair she read there brought a cry to her lips. "Chad! What's happened? Tell me. Oh, Chad, the fire—the fire in your eyes is out! What have they city folk done t' you?"

But the boy merely shook her off, not unkindly, and went to the table. "I've come back—if you'll keep me," he said, with set lips. "I kin take care of the sheep for my keep. I found"—he drew a deep breath, and his face went white—"I found I belonged up here—"

And that was all he would say, tho he pushed the plate of repulsive food away and sat silent, staring down at his lax hands till all but Melissa had yawned themselves away to bed. Like a little, grey shadow, Melissa slipped closer, laid her hand tremblingly on his knee. "Now, Chad, tell me," she whispered. "I reckon 'tisn't anything that cant be mended. What did they-all do to you—down thar?"

Chad drew a sharp breath, laughed terribly. He was very tragic, as is youth's way, for his pride had been hurt almost to death and his heart was sick. "Kin you mend bad stock? Kin you find me a mammy and a pappy—kin you give me the right to be borned at all?" Unconsciously, his tongue fell into

"You've been mighty good to me, M'liss; I reckon I wont forget it, ever," he said

Melissa had drawn away from him. She did not want him to feel the shaking of her meager body. Her voice was dry and expressionless. "So your major friend sent you away?"

"What does it say in the Scriptures," Margaret murmured, "what does it say about loving—your enemies?"

mountain rudenesses, which told her more plainly than anything else of his utter recklessness. "No, M'liss! I was wrong—I kaint ever—be—a—gentleman——"

Then, in a tumbled flood of words, it was all out. The major had been kind, wonderful kind. He had treated him like kinfolk and told him he should have his chance for all the book learning he wanted. He had seemed to—like him, somehow. Oh, and it was a grand place where he lived—fifteen rooms, each one bigger than the cabin, and black servants, and horses—they were mighty nice, the horses. Then there had been the folks next door—Dean, their name was, a terrible fancy man and woman, and two boys his age, and—and——

Chad's face grew scarlet in the firelight, and she saw that his hands were trembling.

"They was a girl, too—her name was Margaret," he stumpled. "She had awful pretty hair, light and sort of soft and the color of sunshiné at high noon—a real lady she was, but she—she was powerful pleasant to me, and made me forget I wasn't anything but a mountain critter. We—went riding in the park—once or twice. Then they found out"—his voice brooded—"about me being a nobody, having no pappy that I knowed on. They'd thought I was some blood kin of the major—an' when they found I wasn't, they told me"—he choked, fought wrathfully with unmanly tears—"they done told me not to come to they house no more—not to speak to—to Margaret——"

"No!" Chad said, violently. "No! He didn't know I was coming, but I couldn't stay an' be a burden—be looked down on. It hurt me—in here!" He struck his chest cruelly, violently, like a bitter man; then, like a disappointed boy, he began to sob, his forehead resting on Melissa's shoulder for comforting. "Oh, M'liss! I'll never find the white towers—and the many mansions. I wish I was dead! I wish I'd never been born!"

Melissa patted the rough head pitifully. "Dont fret, boy," she whispered; "dont fret." But her brain was already busy

The Farce University

By HARRISON HASKINS

THE celluloid farce comedy seems to be the training school of the film star. "The farce university," they call it in picturedom.

Consider Gloria Swanson, Clarine Seymour, Betty Compson, Alice Lake, Bebe Daniels and Mary Thurman. All graduated with honors from fast and furious farces.

We asked one of the biggest directors in the country to account for this seeming phenomena.

"Phenomena—nothing!" he exclaimed. "In farce comedy you are taught to put over your points with a bang—to accentuate with speed—to retain your poise while tons of water sweep by and a brick house tumbles about you. In a sentence, to have poise with pies."

Which, if we may further pun, seems to hit it.

We put the same question to Gloria Swanson herself. She said almost the same thing.

"Acting in farce teaches you to slightly over-exaggerate to drive home things with a smash," remarked Miss Swanson. "When the dramatic director gets you, he merely has to tone you down. And it is much easier to tone down than to tone up some one who doesn't know how to make his or her points. That is why you can more or less successfully step from film farce to film drama."

Which explains why Miss Swanson only a short time ago was a player in Mack Sennett farces.

Pell of Pell Manor

THE first thing I asked Pell Trenton was the whyfore of his first name. By rights, I should have quizzed him concerning his stage and screen career, but when a man has a name that sounds as if it might be an abbreviation for "Pellingham" or "Pellerford," or something equally romantic, to say nothing of its being a great deal like "pal" and a bit like "pill," he may expect to be asked for an explanation, even tho names are strictly personal affairs and as such are supposed to be exempt from cross-examination. And he wasn't the least bit offended. Indeed, he seemed pleased to talk about it.

"I've wondered why no interviewer ever asked me that," he beamed upon me. "Every one else does as soon as the law allows. I'm proud of it for various reasons, and it is my 'monicker' and not a stage name, as every one seems to think.

"I am a descendant of the first Lord Pell, who came over from England in 1600 and was given a grant of land in New York in what is now Westchester County. The eldest son has borne the name all down along the line—hence the cognomen for me."

They had told me at the Metro that I would find Mr. Trenton somewhere on the lot, wearing a kimono and a classic hair-cut, which was their more or less subtle way of telling me that he was playing in "The Willow Tree," an adaptation of an old Japanese legend, and that he made a romantic-looking hero.

When I first glimpsed him, he was wearing a gorgeous black kimono with gold dots, and he was standing near a half-moon bridge in a perfect Japanese garden—made for the occasion out of the prosaic Metro lot. While waiting for the camera-men to adjust reflecting screens and mirrors, he was engaged in the somewhat startling occupation of powdering his nose in public, while Viola Dana, metamorphosed into a dainty Nipponese maid with tinselled black wig and butterfly kimono, was doing likewise. They seemed quite oblivious of each other's proximity until Director Otto shouted, "Action!" when they hastily put away their make-up boxes and stood very close to each other in the time-honored position for those in love.

"Camera!" called the director. "Run across the bridge, Vi—right after her, Pell—call to her, 'I'll catch you!' Run off after her—cut!"

Little Miss Dana hurried away to change her costume, and it was a rather weary but intensely romantic-looking Pell who led me over to the steps of the tea-house set for a chat between scenes.

"I didn't know whether I was going to get a minute off or not," he said, dabbing his face carefully with a handkerchief. "I am playing opposite Miss Dana in this picture, and many of the scenes are taken in this garden. There are only a few hours a day when the sun is right for shooting, so we have to take advantage of every minute when the light is good."

He has a deep, rich voice—baritone, I suppose you would call it, with that inflection which betokens at once a New Yorker and an actor. He has grey eyes that regard you alternately with twinkling humor and flattering sincerity, and his forehead is of that classic variety that in a mid-Victorian novel would be termed "brow," possibly with the adjective of "lofty" or "noble" before it. His hair is brown and has a slight wave that becomes a positive crinkle over the ears, and tho I'm sure he wont own up to this, the fact remains that he has a romantic face. You could visualize him as Launcelot or Francois Villon, or as the first Lord Pell of Pell Manor, in powdered wig and satin waistcoat.

"I enjoy working in 'The Willow Tree' immensely," he told me, when we got around to talking pictures instead of Pells. "It is an adaptation of the play that made such a success in New York, and I take the part of the English sculptor who falls in love with the little Japanese girl who pretends that she is the willow-tree image come to life.

"Let me show you thru the garden," he invited. "It is a real achievement—perfect in every detail."

He helped me across a narrow little bridge that spanned an artificial canal, and we stopped a moment to watch the white ducks sunning themselves on the banks.

"At first the stream was full of gold-fish," he said, "but ducks are no respecters of movie props, and they ate them all the first day."

The garden was indeed a miracle of realism, carpeted with soft green grass, filled with transplanted willow trees, cherry trees in full artificial

Meet "The Frog"

By MAUDE S. CHEATHAM

THOSE who saw Lon Chaney's remarkable character study of The Frog in George Loane Tucker's great play, "The Miracle Man," will not soon forget it.

All thru the horror of the early scenes, where as an underworld derelict preying upon the sympathies of the slum sight-seekers with his faked paralysis, to his inspiring regeneration, not one false note was struck, and it remains as a unique study in sharp contrasts.

I was quite convinced that he must be a contortionist, and this was the first question that I asked him.

"I should say not," laughed Mr. Chaney, amused at the thought. "I am not even double-jointed. I figured it out that to throw the body back into position after twisting it as a paralytic, the first movements would be slow—and painful—with a quick jerk at the last, and with practice I mastered the trick.

"I'll confess that, with all my knowledge of make-up—and I have been character actor both in musical comedy and on the screen during my entire professional career—I had some difficulty in deciding just what to use for The Frog. In the first place, I planned to be a cripple, have a withered hand and a hump on my back, but when I discovered that I had to unfold twice before the camera, these three infirmities were, of course, impossible.

"Finally, after several sleepless nights and a number of experiments, I decided on—paralysis! I let my beard grow, and altogether I worked out a convincing make-up, horrible as it was.

"We spent twelve weeks making 'The Miracle Man,' and it was a wonderful experience, for Mr. Tucker was certainly inspired, and he inspired us until we were all living our parts every minute of the time. He works very quietly, directing every scene himself, and he went thru those underworld scenes relentlessly, with set jaw and cold eyes, while in the emotional moments he cried as hard as the rest of us.

"Character work is always interesting," continued Mr. Chaney. "In my last picture, 'Victory,' under Maurice Tourneur's direction, my rôle called for pockmarks, and I followed a Mexican, who was badly marked, all about the Plaza in Old Town for hours one hot afternoon. I wanted to see how they appeared on his face. Then I hunted up another Mexican to study the cut of his mustache.

"Recently, I played two totally different rôles in Tourneur's production of 'Treasure Island.' One was a bloodthirsty pirate, the other Pew, the blind man. In every picture I learn a little more about human nature, for preparing a character rôle means studying people. I am ever on the watch for characteristics and peculiarities that I can use in my work."

Lon Chaney was born in Colorado Springs, Colorado. Both his parents are deaf and dumb, his mother from birth, his father since he was three. This is without doubt the secret of his remarkably expressive face, which mirrors every fleeting thought, for, of necessity, he early mastered the art of pantomime.

His maternal grandmother's four children being mutes, she founded watching him lie back and relax. For the rest, of course, it was a good deal to hear Mrs. Jennings change the tone of her complaints, but the complaints remained, only that they took, now, the form of aspirations

IMMEDIATELY upon their arrival in California the Jennings became the Parker-Jennings. This was but the beginning, but a very real beginning, of a series of satisfactions to Mrs. Jennings—er—Parker-Jennings. It was the only sort of satisfaction she had ever craved. The lack, heretofore, of these satisfactions had put the fretted lines about her mouth and the petulance in her eyes, which might, devoid of it, have been pretty. Once, they had been.

Money and the lack of money had been the scales on which Mrs. Jennings had weighed her happiness and her unhappiness, and, since up to the time of the oil findings, there had been rather a bad lack of it, the scales had weighed decidedly for unhappiness. She hadn't been able to find it in any other way. Her husband didn't give it to her. She felt that he had failed her. It was the only sort of failing she would have considered as such. His petty clerkship, his petty salary, the inevitable scrimping and scraping and piecing and patching, all had been irritants for which she had no counter and no inner resources to tap for her consoling.

Nor had her daughter been of much avail to her. Ethel was too different to be in any sense availing. She was too happy in the small things. She had too deep and serene a spirit of content. She loved too greatly and was too well satisfied with the petty clerkship and the correspondingly petty salary of her father. When things pinched too hard, as they did during her junior year at college, she left college and all the hopes it held forth to her and the friends she had made and the atmosphere she had worn with a high pride as a sort of garment and stayed at home and went to work in the town bank. More, she avowed her happiness in so doing. She was quite beyond her querulous mother and not at all comforting in her aloofness, or what her mother felt her aloofness. There was no kinship of spirit between the two.

When the miracle happened, when the California oil wells in which Mr. Jennings had once, long ago, foolishly, so they told him, invested, and which had, ever since, lain foolishly fallow, when they, all at once, gushed rivers of oil and, simultaneously, rivers of dollars into the stunned coffers of the impecunious Jenningses, the reactions were dissimilar and not without farce value. Not, either, without an element of pathos.

Mr. Jennings, worn by his petty clerkship, by the fretting of his petty salary, by the small recriminations and piled-up barbs and stings of the piled-up years, simply relapsed and asked to rest. What initiative he may once have possessed, which had been adequate, at least to the retaining of the clerkship, dropped from him. A chair in the sun, skimming the morning papers, an occasional light novel of the summer reading variety, the society and tender attentions of his daughter, who bolstered him up by frequent references to his foresight in the purchase of the oil wells, these were the things his millions brought to him.

To Ethel it meant simply a sort of surcease for her father. She took a deep and gratifying pleasure in probably impossible of achievement. She wanted, virulently, to break into society. For herself, Ethel had taken a sort of enjoyment in the struggle. She liked construction and she felt, when she left college and went to work, that she had done, in the way of character building, a constructive thing. Then, the way she had been managing things, the small income and all. It had been a game, played with realities, by an earnest gamester. It had had its value and also its fascination. The frills of life meant nothing to Ethel.

To Mrs. Jennings, as has been said, it meant being Mrs. Parker-Jennings.

It meant that as an outer symbol to cover multifarious other details, such as the buying, for instance, of exorbitant diamonds, unsuitable gowns and furs. It meant the trip de luxe to California, where the family had, perforce, to live in close proximity to the gushing oil wells and the operating company. It meant the leasing and furnishing and exceeding interior decorating of the most ornate mansion to be had. It meant, too, the opportunity to be a snob, altho, of course, Mrs. Parker-Jennings would not so have termed it.

She was one, however. Successfully, to her mind; disastrously in the eventuality, as such codes of conduct generally are. Mrs. Parker-Jennings had, herself, been snubbed. The biting memories of the snubs had remained. Remained, too, the reluctant admiration for the persons so fortunately placed as to be able to indulge in snubbery. One of her first ambitions was to do to some other what had been done unto her. The victim was more or less non-important.

The victim happened, however, to be important to other minds if not to that of Mrs. Parker-Jennings. She was a young widow, Mrs. Wanley by name, with an adopted daughter and enough attractiveness to warrant her male support from some quarter or other. Probably rather arduous support. It came, in this instance, from one Ambrose Holland, who had one ambition in life, and that was to be the successor to the late lamented Wanley. What was resentful to Mrs.

JACK STRAW.

Fictionized from the scenario of Olga Printzlau and Elmer Harris based upon the stage comedy of W. S. Maugham. Produced by Paramount-Artcraft, starring Robert Warwick. Directed by William C. DeMille. The cast:

Parker Jennings.....	Charles Ogle
Mrs. Jennings.....	Sylvia Ashton
Jack Straw.....	Robert Warwick
Ethel Jennings.....	Carroll McComas
Serlo.....	Lucian Littlefield
Ambrose Holland.....	J. M. Dumont
Mrs. Wanley.....	Helene Sullivan

Wanley was resentful, in triplicate essence, to Holland, and he had the means and the power of retaliation. When Mrs. Parker-Jennings gave it forth that her daughter, Ethel, was not to associate with such penniless nobodies as the Wanleys, Holland swore revenge. That Ethel herself moaned over this crudity in secret was not known to Mrs. Wanley. Which brings us to Jack Straw. Also, back to New York, briefly.

Jack Straw was an iceman, and this is a romance, despite the seeming disparity. He was an iceman, that is, at the time he first saw Ethel Jennings singing while she kneaded dough. There was no ostensible reason why Jack Straw, who had roved the world in one capacity or another and had been and done many things, should fall, for the first time, in love with a young girl kneading dough and singing a popular song. Yet such is love. He did fall in love with her. Rather badly, even painfully. And he remained in love. If the oil wells had not gushed at an unpropitious moment, he would have revealed his identity and his amour at one and the same time, but to the heiress of the Parker-Jenningses such an avowal would have seemed rather preposterous. Jack Straw knew that the millions would make no fundamental difference in Ethel. She was too firmly grounded and too finely poised. But he loved her, and he wanted her to have her chance. She hadn't really seen the world, save from her college dormitory and her kitchen window, and such views were, of necessity, limited. If she should see the world thru a mist of gold and still, some day, be able to turn to Jack Straw, such a gifting would be for time immeasurable.

So Jack Straw, with an aching heart, watched the Parker-Jenningses depart, and, a month later, covered the same ground himself. Before Ethel's departure, however, he permitted himself the daring to leave a note on the kitchen table asking her not to fall in love with any one in California until he could meet her there. He signed it Jack Straw. He counted on the essential romance singing in her heart. All nice girls had romance in their hearts. They wouldn't be nice if they didn't have. It was part of a nice girl's birthright, and dreams, too . . .

Of course, Ethel did dream. She dreamed a great deal. She liked the name, Jack Straw, and the handwriting and the spirit he gave to it all. She decided that it would not be very hard to wait. Dull hours were lightened by the funny little, appealing little thought of Jack Straw. How would he come to her? In what array? In shining panoply, or tattered rags? And would he bring love with him? And who was he, after all?

After all, and just at the time of Ethel's wondering, Jack Straw had become a waiter in a hotel nearby the Parker-Jennings' mansion. The Parker-Jenningses dined there quite frequently, being usually, owing to Mrs. Parker-Jennings, without a cook. No doubt Jack Straw had had wind of this before he accepted and capably conducted his profession as waiter. It was something to be able to gaze upon Ethel, dining. To be able, now and again, ecstatically to serve her. It gave them, even tho she was serenely unaware, a bond. It gave him, too, the thrilling assurance that his note had struck a response. Ethel was waiting and watching for Jack Straw. But the time, Jack Straw believed, had not yet come. In the meantime, the greatest part of love is service . . .

Things conspire. Mrs. Parker-Jennings' snobbery, Ambrose Holland's love of Mrs. Wanley, the clean-cut good looks of Jack Straw—all these things conspired together with the result that Ambrose Holland approached Jack Straw with a proposition. It was to impersonate some titled person and allow himself to be introduced into the Parker-Jennings family. "The old bird," informed Holland, "will fall for it like a duck.

She will literally hurl herself upon you. You can fall for the daughter . . . you see?"

"I see," said Jack Straw, and was speculative. He added, "It's not a question of money, with me, of course."

"Of course not," said Holland, hastily, recognizing a sensibility and, evidently, the spirit of the adventurer for adventure's sake, since he could not know of Jack Straw's love for Ethel, nor yet that Jack Straw had seen, too frequently, Serlo, the free versifier, at the Parker-Jennings' table, reading his fre-verse to Ethel and expounding, no doubt with dire intent, his theories of free love. It was to circumvent Serlo that caused Jack Straw to adopt the pretentious title of the Archduke Sebastian and be thus presented to the Parker-Jenningses, to the enraptured Parker-Jenningses as represented by Mrs. P.-J. and.

After that, for minutes without end, the world swirled by in flower scents and moon radiance and the star-strewn sky and kisses and low words. Love a little later, by Ethel.

The papers carried gallant tales of him—the way he had hurled the poet, Serlo, into the lake . . .

The causes of emotion were, as usual with this mother and daughter, largely variant.

To Mrs. Parker-Jennings the Archduke was the thing. To Ethel Jennings the man was the thing. Out of a world of men he came, quite suddenly, and there was no other man save him. Singularly uninvolved where her emotions were concerned, Ethel knew, without compromise, that she loved him.

Sensing, with the same delicate perceptiveness, his response, she knew that he loved her. This, then, was the reason of her being. It became, with the advent of this love, a paradise of a world to live in, riotous, yet serene, with flowers and the sound of music, with color and rhythm and unimagined dreamings . . . a wonder-place!

One little rift in the clear lute of all this happiness was the recurrence of the note she had had before she left New York, signed, even as that first one, Jack Straw. She did not want to make this unknown person unhappy. Out of her own largesse she wanted to give, even as she was receiving.

On the night of the large reception Mrs. Parker-Jennings gave the Archduke Sebastian, Ethel met the guest of honor in the conservatory. He gave her, with his whimsical smile, a little note, a replica of the other three. Ethel read it, only half comprehending. Then she sought the eyes, the suddenly-grown-tender eyes of the Archduke Sebastian. She was silent. No word had as yet been spoken. She was delicate of the first one. Then came his voice, unlike, yet deeply like. "Have you waited?" he asked.

Ethel felt the need of a great simplicity. "You know I have," she said.

After that, for minutes without end, the world swirled by in flower scents and moon radiance and the star-strewn sky and kisses and low words. Love.

Ethel's joy shone about her, a halo, when she returned to her mother and the reception committee. She couldn't keep her joy confined. Her tolerance embraced even her mother, who would see, as cause for joy, only the fact of the Archdukery. Nevertheless, she told her, and, breathless with this latest stroke of a kindly fate, Mrs. Parker-J. planned to announce the tremendous news. This, she said, was pre-eminently the time. It was striking while the iron was, so to speak, hot. Ethel, heedless of the world knowing or not knowing, gave her half-dazed assent. Nothing of all this made very much difference. She had come, with reverence and joy, into the High Courts of Love. She was remote.

Mrs. Wanley and Ambrose Holland, arriving on the outer edge and hearing of the proposed announcement, saw the thing as a practical joke gone decidedly wrong. This, they felt, would involve too much for the joyous fillip of humiliating the impossible Mrs. P.-J. This would involve too much responsibility for the gratification of an, after all, unimportant vengeance. They decided to appeal to the pseudo Archduke, and, appealing, found him adamant.

"The thing is precipitated now," he said; "the kindest thing to do is to let this affair go off, just for tonight. Afterward, let her down. She will be able to bear it better after her triumphal hour. Anyway, you are responsible for the hoax, neither the Jenningses nor I. They will, therefore, be absolved and you yourselves will harbor what blame there will be. I think you will both deserve it for not recognizing in Mrs. Parker-Jennings a spoiled and fretted woman taking out her, after all, childish, silly spites. I think it is all up to you, both of you."

Panicky, Ambrose Holland confessed to the Parker-Jenningses. Confessed the hoax which had made of the waiter, Jack Straw, the Archduke, Sebastian. It was a confession with horrible results. Mrs. Parker-Jennings dropped from her, as one drops a flimsy cape, the aristocracy of her millions. She ranted and raged and all but gnashed her teeth. She had been on the very threshold of a supreme achievement, and lo! it was snatched from her and she was given a cup of the bitterest gall. Society, all but her own, was once again unattainable. She wept until her lashed eyes were red-rimmed, even as they had been in the days when she bent over her kitchen range to test her homely breads and pies.

It was, after all, Jack Straw who saved her immediate skin. He persisted in his original idea of going thru with the reception and announcement as had been planned. The glory of it all, he maintained, would remain firmly in the thoughts of assembled society. The divulging of the hoax would come more easily afterward. In the meantime, something would have been established. There would be a comprehensive pity for Mrs. Parker-Jennings, not unmixed with awe at her splendid hostess-ship. Society was accustomed to being hoaxed. She would not be, because of this, beyond the pale. Mrs. Parker-Jennings, all but lost in her own esteem, seized, none the less, at this granted reprieve.

The evening and Jack Straw were successful. Society seemed captivated, by the entertainment, by the Archduke and also by his prospective bride. They went away imbued with the charm, wit and gallantry of the man. The papers carried gallant tales of him: how he had written anonymously to Ethel Jennings for some months; the way he had hurled the poet, Serlo, into the lake because he had expressed sentiments to Ethel which the Archduke considered inexpressible; the home he was going to give her; the almost-royalty of it all; the way the Archduke had disappeared some time ago from his kingdom and had thus and in this place revealed himself. It was a charming romance.

Ethel Jennings read it and was able to smile over it. Was even glad that she had been, as she was, tested. She loved him. She knew that now. That he was "just Jack Straw" made, miraculously even to her, no kind of conceivable difference. He was the man for whom she had been waiting, the man who had kist her into an acceptance of life and living, there in the conservatory, the radiant being who had led her into the High Court of Love. The mere matter of who he was was no matter at all.

The matter of who he was seemed, however, to admit of various doubts and complications. One of the features of the reception, indeed, had been the arrival of the Ambassador of Pokerania, native kingdom of the supposed Archduke.

Those in the secret supposed that it was the short-sightedness of the Ambassador which caused him to, apparently, acknowledge the Archduke Sebastian.

When, on the following morning, he called upon the Archduke at the Jennings home, he found the luggage of that young man being hurled upon the front lawns, to the complete demolition of the flower-beds, and the young man himself in the extreme eventuality of following said luggage. He was informed by an irate Mrs. P.-J. that this was no Archduke, but a waiter in the hotel nearby, an impostor and the cause of her immediate downfall, just when victory had been so near.

The Ambassador amazed them all. He pooh-poohed her statement with some show of outraged dignity himself. The young man, he claimed, was indeed the missing Archduke who, some years before, had been very ill and had evidently wandered away while suffering from some sort of amnesia. The Ambassador had proofs of identification, many photographs and other things, the surveying of which brought back to Jack Straw that man he had been when, fifteen years before, he had set surreptitiously forth upon his wanderings.

Mrs. Parker-Jennings knew, in that moment, what it was to faint from joy. She took pleasure in the faint.

Ethel knew, still again, what it means to love. The outer manifestations of the state in life of Jack Straw passed over her, wholly non-essential. She told him that she had quite lost track of which of the two he might be, Jack Straw or the Archduke Sebastian. He said, loving her, that it didn't matter. And she agreed with him.

"There's only one identity worth while for me," he told her, and she, within his arms, whispered, "And what is that?"

"The man you love," he said, "the man . . . you . . . love."

"There's only one identity worth while for me," he told her, "the man you love"

Zena's Zenith

"SAY! How do ye get that way?"

It was an officer who growled the anthem. As Anthony Paul Kelly was so fond of describing his nautical rank and appearance last year—a C-O-P, who thuswise addressed Zena and me.

"Why, Mr. Policeman," pouted Zena, débütanting, "what do you mean?"

"What do I mean?" He dramatically swept his club along the landscape of New Jersey. "There! What do you mean?"

Zena and I peered thru the glass of the coupé. A line of thirty or forty machines purred impatiently and were honk-konking their temperament. Thirty or forty machines—and Zena, who had arrived in the little brand new Hudson but a moment before, headed the pageant!

"Oh, Mr. Policeman," continued Zena the débütante, "I'm so tired. I've been working at the studio all day. And I do want to get home." Tears glistened. Ingenue disconsolance prevailed.

Zena threw her in first. She crushed the claxon and laughed into the thirty or forty claxons shrieking behind, and prepared to lead the file aboard. "Dear Mr. Policeman, thank you so much!" she bade him an revoir.

"There aint much nourishment in that," he groaned, but Zena and I had already settled in front of the Fort Lee.

"I absolutely could not have waited until all those other cars got aboard," Zena sighed. Relief and wafted suspense illuminated her eyes. "I'm going to the theater tonight and I'll die if I miss that show."

"Which show?"

"I dont know exactly which, but I told mother to get tickets for 'The Crimson Alibi,' 'At 9:45,' 'A Voice in the Dark' or 'Those Who Walk in Darkness.' I'll enjoy any of them, so it doesn't make much difference. I'm crazy about mystery plays."

"You dont get much time for the theater, tho, do you?"

"I should say I dont. We've had to work late so often on 'Piccadilly Jim' that by the time I did get home I was afraid to take a tubbing for fear I'd fall asleep therein. But one thing nice about being with the people of 'Piccadilly' is that we are all as young and as strong for holidays as for work! Owen Moore made it a rule that we would never have to keep shop on Saturday night, and Wesley Ruggles, a peach, tho a director, was only happy, too, to pass."

Pen Impressions by NORMAN JACOBSEN

OUT of a dull month in the cinema stands Irvin Willat's visualization of the Gouverneur Morris story, "Behind the Door." We say this not from approval of the thesis of Mr. Morris' tale, but from appreciation of a well-knit scenario, skillfully directed and played with a fine vigor.

"Behind the Door," (Paramount), is an opus in brutality—an intermezzo in gory revenge. Mr. Morris asks: What would you do if you saw your wife taken prisoner by a bestial captain of a German submarine who left you adrift in the open sea? Mr. Morris' hero, being a taxidermist, pleasantly decides to skin the Hun officer alive and, when chance later throws the U-boat in the path of his scout ship, he carries out his revenge, at least in part. But not quite, for the ex-taxidermist sighs, "I swore I would skin him alive, but he died on me—damn him!"

It isn't an appealing tale, this filming of brutal vengeance. There is too much of the material side of life in every photoplay, too little of the sweet-nesses, the sacrifices, the really heroic things of the every day. "Behind the Door" is a ghastly epic in war hysteria, but it is admirably done.

Mr. Willat has superbly handled a number of difficult moments, notably the shelling and sinking of the submarine. He has evolved another remarkably powerful scene, wherein the American wrings the sordid story from the German officer. Hohart Bosworth is decidedly strong in this rôle, over-playing but occasionally a rôle that would be maudlin in most any other hands. Jane Novak is excellent as the wife sacrificed to war. Let us pause to note the uniformly human playing of Miss Novak in all her rôles, but particularly in this. Wallace Beery, too, is striking as the U-boat commander.

Again is Alla Nazimova's vivid art submerged in "Stronger Than Death," (Metro), an adaptation of I. A. R. Wylie's novel of India, "The Hermit Doctor of Gaya." We do not know the merit of the original, but "Stronger Than Death" is draggy, labored and conventional. Nazimova plays an English dancer in the East, a young woman told by her physicians that another dance will mean death. But she meets the hermit doctor, who, single-handed, is fighting cholera, and, imbued with his sacrifice and in order to gain time that a native uprising may be forestalled, poses as a reincarnated vestal—and dances. The doctors are wrong, of course, for the dancer lives to gain happiness with her lover.

We do not know just who is to blame, but both the continuity and the direction shift the interest from Nazimova to Charles Bryant, who plays the self-sacrificing hermit physician. "Stronger Than Death" is but fair in the matter of Herbert Blache's direction and is too long and wandering in its telling. Mme. Nazimova's opportunities are slight.

Norma Talmadge appeared in

two contrasting photoplays: one a delightful but slight comedy, the other a vague and badly built melodrama.

"She Loves and Lies," (Select), is a light little tale—of a vivacious girl who poses as an elderly woman of wealth in order that she may marry the man of her choice. Then, as her real self, she actually wins his heart. When divorce seems to face the worried husband, she throws disguises aside—and he finds that he has fallen in love with his wife. The comedy is done with nice spontaneity by Director Chet Withey. Miss Talmadge is charming as the much-disguised heroine and Conway Tearle is a delightful foil.

On the other hand, Miss Talmadge's "A Daughter of Two Worlds," (First National), is far-fetched and impossible stuff, badly told in continuity and direction and but indifferently acted. This deals with the efforts of a girl of the underworld to find happiness in a higher strata of society. James Young, the director, has failed to clearly place his characters, has been inexpert in many of his scenes and, on the whole, has turned out an inferior and slow-moving melodrama. True, we doubt if any director could have done much with it.

Doug Fairbanks' latest, "When the Clouds Roll By," (United Artists), is at least a little different.

Doug plays a superstitious chap who falls under the persuasions of a mysterious stranger—a man who turns out to be an escaped lunatic. Doug overcomes all obstacles, including a real flood. The climax finds Doug in a tree in the midst of the inundation. A house, with the heroine clinging to the roof, floats by. Splash!—and Doug is beside her. Then a church, with a parson astride the steeple, comes drifting by. The young couple succeed in maneuvering their house alongside the church—and the

The Fortune Hunter

Told in Story Form from the Vitagraph-Earle Williams Photoplay

By ALEXANDER LOWELL

HENRY KELLOGG was flushed by the wine of the grape and the headier wine of success. He could afford to be expansive, and he was. He eyed his friend and the sharer of his Park Avenue bed and board with a speculative as well as a kindly eye. Finally he said, "Dont be despondent, old man. You've always been successful in one line, at least."

Nathaniel Duncan didn't raise his head nor cease his nervous fiddling with a macerated cigaret. But he said, colorlessly, "What line?"

"Women," said Kellogg and shot him a glance.

"Oh, that . . ."

"It could be remunerative, y'know. I've a plan."

"Shoot."

"Dont be so lifeless. One thing you've got to have is pep . . . your old-time pep. It's your asset. Your stock in trade. All you've got to do is be yourself."

"I cant cash in on that. You know that."

"No, I dont. The point is, that you have never been yourself. You've tried to be everybody but yourself, every kind of type. That's why you haven't succeeded. You need the chance of self-development. You can get that by . . ."

"By . . .?"

"By marriage."

"I'm damned if I do! I cant support myself. What th' hell d'you mean coming in here with a line of jibber like this? Cant you see I'm on my uppers for fair? Down and out? I'm in no mood for your bibulous mirth. You've had a big success. I can see that. I can even be glad. But dont stand on the pinnacle of it and throw your fool cabbage-roses down at me. They . . . tonight they hurt."

Henry Kellogg shook his head. "You've got me as wrong as I've got you right, old man," he said; "actually, I'm in earnest. Here you are, college-bred, the son of a millionaire who, kindly enough, he thought, robbed you of incentive and consequently of initiative. Result, failure and discouragement. What he didn't rob you of, however, is your appearance, your charm for women—oh, a decent enough charm, I know that; in short, your personality. My plan is for you to go to some small town a safe distance from any city. The sort of town where a man like you would be Prince Charming come to flesh and blood, set all the hearts a-flutter, a thing of fairyland, you know . . . all that . . . I'll stake you to all expenses and a wardrobe fit to knock the eyes out of fifty local belles, and all you have to do is . . . to marry the town heiress. There's always a town heiress. All you need to do, say, is . . . to be your father's son."

Nathaniel Duncan had one faculty. He realized a limit when a limit had been reached. Today he knew that he had reached one. He had had dreams, perhaps oddly. He had had ideals. He had even mused on love and the part it would play in his life; on marriage and the building up of a home. Of course, it would take love to do that. The plan Kellogg suggested placed the limit on that. He could marry the town heiress and he could bid farewell to his dreams of couleur de rose.

Well . . .

Beggars and choosers . . . he knew that old adage. And he knew that he was beggared. In all things save acquiescence which took, tonight, the form of obedience to the man in evening clothes, redolent of the success stocks and bonds and certified checks can bring. He gave Kellogg his word, which, at least, he had maintained and made good, and they shook on it.

It was an unforgettable supper. Bread and cheese, and the thought at least of kisses, old Sam Graham talking inventive possibilities and speaking with gentle whimsy of the drug-shop

Two weeks later beheld him alighting at the rather impoverished appearing station of Radville, O.

Radville, O., station or otherwise, seldom if ever had seen anything resembling Nathaniel Duncan alight. He was, so to speak, an innovation. A breath-taking one. To a man, it sat up and took notice.

Nathaniel had a charming way. He had the priceless knack of making friends. He could talk. He went to Radville determined to like Radville, and equally determined to make Radville like him. He began with Hetty Carpenter, the village gossip, to whose domicile he was directed for bed and board. Rather different, he reflected, ruefully, as its spare clapboards, thinly painted, dawned upon him, from Park Avenue and the opulent Kellogg. Still . . .

He unpacked his "props" quite ostentatiously before the trained eyes of Hetty Carpenter. Hetty had little enough on which to feed her one acute sense, the gossip sense, in Radville, and she made the most of her lean opportunities. This one, she felt, however, to be other than lean. The young man, besides a magazine cover appearance, had the gossip material of a Bible, apparently fervently thumbed, dog-eared student books and a goodly roll of the green bills of the realm. Here, indeed, was material and to spare. By nightfall every person in Radville knew of the arrival of the miraculous young man and each minutest particular thereof. Also, by the same token, Nathaniel knew each minutest particular of each inhabitant of Radville. He knew, pertinently, that Josie Lockwood was the town heiress, considerably an heiress, what was more, and that her father was an old skinflint and that he owned the bank wherein worked one Roland Barnett, who had long had the same Josie as the object of his clerkship.

He knew, too, that the town paupers were Sam Graham and his daughter, Betty. That Sam was a pauper because his pockets had always leaked and his heart had overgrown, and that Betty was the cuddliest lamb this side of the paved streets and loved nearly to the death in spite of her poverty by Radville. Contrariwise, Nathaniel felt a glow when he heard of the impecunious Betty and her dad, and a cold, frigid little feeling when he heard the description of the gilded Josie. But that, he thought, was just him, his mulish nature.

He thought rather differently, tho, after he had met the heiress and likewise the grey-eyed, starry-faced pauper. He felt that his instincts had been right. He met them both in church, whence he was conducted, as a matter of course, by Hetty Carpenter, not without, on her part, an air of triumph. Kellogg had warned him that church would be part of the game in a small town, and he had rehearsed sanctimonious expressions which, he felt, he successfully executed. After all, there was a sort of glow to it. These simple folk, each one a part and parcel of the other's life, participant in their births, participant, too, in their deaths, offering their simple joint worship to an indisputable God. Things felt clearer, somehow.

After worship Hetty Carpenter, with the air of a convoy, presented him to Josie Lockwood. His heart sank, even while he knew it had no obvious reason for so doing. Josie was tall and slenderly made and golden-haired and with a certain sort of manner. She quite evidently knew her position and prestige in Radville, and just as evidently was deliberately not making use of it. There was a beyond-Radville cleverness to Josie. And yet . . . and yet . . . the chill, the frigidity, grew . . . Nathaniel could not seem to picture the stately Josie rearing up the edifices of his trampled little dreams . . .

Betty Graham, the town pauper, had a difference. He didn't know what it was, but he knew that it was. She wasn't so much of a "looker"; she didn't have airs and graces, her hair was blowing about under her wide straw hat, an old hat, but her mouth was frank, like a child's, and her eyes were frank, too, like early dew, and eager and expectant, and her little hand was warm and even eager. She invited Nathaniel home for supper, adding that there wouldn't be "much," and so did Josie Lockwood, adding no such thing, and Nathaniel went home with Betty Graham. Inwardly he groaned while something in his cardiac region sang, and was vindicated. It was, he knew, his lack of business acumen again attacking and conquering him.

It was an unforgettable supper. Bread and cheese, and the thought, at least, of kisses. Old Sam Graham talking inventive possibilities and speaking with gentle whimsy of the drug-shop. Betty hovering over them both, making the insufficient food manna to one of them at least.

"Rot!" said Nathaniel to himself, and gave himself a shake, but something within him denied the allegation and persisted in singing fantastic little tunes, all glad, all free, all promise-full.

Lots of things came from that first little supper. Nathaniel took a fancy, not only to Betty, but to Sam as well, with his dreaming impracticability, the broken hopes he had strewn all along his way, the thing he might have been and the thing he was. There was a bond.

Also, the drug-store promised things. Nathaniel felt that with these gentle, impoverished visionaries and his five hundred dollars something could be made of the store. Then, too, girls patronize soda fountains, particularly and especially when a tall young man with a pleasing personality dispenses the frappés, the vanilla and the nut sundaes. The drug-store might be made to pay in more ways than one.

It did. Nathaniel bought syrups, bought fixtures, paid off old credits and stood, himself, behind the polished and newly ornamented fountain.

In the evenings, he and Sam worked over Sam's automatic soda fountain. He found a great deal that was good in it; found, as was the case with most of Sam's dreams and plans, that it had not been marketed properly and at once had found obscurity. He wrote to Kellogg about it, who was ever on the lookout for the new and the possible. He wrote, too, that he had an interest in the invention, that he believed in it and that he wished that Kellogg would "let him off." He insinuated that he didn't care an awful lot for the town heiress, who was "a good sort, but—"

Kellogg wired back, "Nothing doing."

That same night Nathaniel escorted Josie home from the prayer meeting he made a habit of attending. On Josie's other side walked the all but displaced Roland, who had, before the advent of Nathaniel, been considered, and considered himself, the flashiest boy in town. To Roland, who really nurtured a passion for the stately Josie aside entirely from his mutilated pride, the presence of Nathaniel was insupportable. Before they reached the Lockwood mansion the thin skin of Roland Barnett was insufficient protection for the primitive passions always so near to the surface. He fell upon the surprised Nathaniel and they "had" it. Nathaniel conquered. He never knew why, unless it was because he had had such bully training at college and was, at the assault, red mad. Anyway, Josie screamed and the sheriff intervened, and when it was all over the conquering hero escorted Josie home and something—it may have been his turbulent blood, of which she had been the really unwitting cause, or it may have been hunger for some soft touch, or the moon, or sheer madness—anyway, he kist her at her gateway, and put the fatal query and was affirmatively answered, and it wasn't until he reached home—home being, by this time, the Grahams'—that he knew that he loved Betty.

He knew when she met him at the gate, with her face coming out of the dusk like a little, bruised white flower, and her starry eyes all dimmed and her clear voice all trembly because she'd heard he "had got hurt." He knew poignantly, sharply, painfully, sweetly, unforgettably and for all time. And because it was so true and so strong and came upon him with such breath-taking sweetness and force he didn't have time to collect all the emotions that rushed in upon him, and he had her against his heart and was kissing her. And then it occurred to him that he had just kist Josie Lockwood, and was pledged to her, and he dropped down on his knees with a groan and kist, not once, but many times, the frayed hem of her little cotton gown. He said that he was not worthy of her and many things along the same line, but love had made wise the heart of little Betty Graham, and she knew that men say such things in such an hour, and she smiled while the tears of her love glistened on his hair and caught the vagrant star gleams and held them . . .

It was very sweet . . .

The next day Nathaniel told Betty of his enforced engagement to Josie. He told her all about Kellogg, and how he, Nathaniel, had tried to beg off, and how Kellogg had refused him his plea and so he had had to go thru with it. Betty said her heart was broken and her tears came again, from the broken depths of her tenderness, and Nathaniel said his was, too, and they stared with the uncompromising eyes of youth into what they deemed to be uncompromising tragedy.

Dispensing sodas, sundaes and other frivolities that afternoon, Nathaniel felt as tho he must be giving wormwood and gall in the glass receptacles. His soda fountain popularity cost him dearly that day. His smiles, he felt, were so many self-victories achieved from the very spirit of bitterness.

The following day dropped the Damoclean sword, so to speak. Henry Kellogg arrived in town, having received from Nathaniel a sketch of Sam Graham's invention. He was, he said, interested. Nathaniel presented Betty. After a bit, when they were alone, Kellogg gave Nathaniel a quick look. "Betty is the reason, yes?" he asked.

"Reason for what?" asked Nathaniel, dourly.

"For you—let us call it begging off."

"Yes. Yes, you may as well know it, I love her."

"Really?"

"Really and truly."

"What makes you so certain?"

"You are certain when love comes."

You just know. I can't explain."

"You dont need to, Nat. I do release you. I think I understand."

"You . . .?"

real. I can imagine. She would break your heart. Also, she'll make you, more, even, than the heiress. And you do love her. Betty is real. Go to it."

Occasionally the law intervenes in a sense of liberation. It did, as it happened, for Nathaniel Duncan. He had been wandering about Radville, the day after his talk with Kellogg, too dispirited to go to the store, too dispirited to seek out Josie and put it up to her, not daring to face the soft, the terrible temptation of Betty. Some one, he feared, was going to get hurt in this mix-up, and he didn't want anyone to. Not Josie, who was, after all, a good enough sort according to her lights, and not, oh, not Betty . . .

In stepped the law.

Back, it seemed, in the place in New York last graced by Nathaniel's presence in the capacity of a clerk, money had been missing.

Dispensing sodas, sundae and other frivolities that afternoon Nathaniel felt as tho he must be giving wormwood and gall in the glass receptacles

The thief had escaped, not without, however, being seen and a description given. The man described had boarded a train going in the direction of Radville. The police had picked up the clues and the thievery was traced to the amazed Nathaniel.

An hour or two or three before he was aware of the fact, all of Radville knew that Nathaniel Duncan was a plain, ordinary thief, who had stolen from his employer and had fled to hide his crime and himself in poor, innocent Radville.

Nathaniel himself, however, confronted suddenly, by Josie Lockwood, her father, the winking sheriff, who, loathing the bonds of matrimony, thought this an opportunity to release Nathaniel, did not deny the allegation. He admitted, quite solemnly, to being a thief. He didn't say of what. He expressed no surprise. He had understood the sheriff. Formally, then and there, Josie released him, or rather, dismissed him with hauteur and scorn. She was last seen by Nathaniel sobbing away her outrage in the consolatory arms of Roland.

In the Grahams' back yard that night, or that twilight, Nathaniel sought out Betty and told her the whole truth. "It was a ruse, dear heart," he said, "and of course, Josie will know that it was when she learns that the real thief has been caught; but it did give her a chance to prove whether or no her heart was involved, and you see it wasn't. If it had been . . . well, she would have stuck anyway, wouldn't she, Betty?"

"Yes," said Betty.

"Love is like that, isn't it?" went on Nathaniel. "Real love, you know; it persists, anyway, all the time, doesn't it?"

"Oh, yes," whispered Betty.

"Then everything's all right," said Nathaniel, coming closer; "the invention is going to go . . . Kellogg, God love him, will make it, and there will be money and the store will thrive and you and I . . . and I and you . . . I love to say it, darling, you and I . . ."

But Betty was in his arms and he could not speak for the kisses on his mouth.

The Ambitious Miss Eddy

By ELIZABETH PELTRET

"I've played dozens of love scenes," said Helen Eddy, whose work with George Behan, with Sessue Hayakawa and more recently in the King Vidor production, "The Turn of the Road," has given her a place in screen circles peculiarly her own, "but," she went on, "I've never had a real love affair in my life." Probably it is this that makes Helen Eddy so different from other young girls of her age.

The game of hearts that interests them more than anything else has no interest for her at all. She doesn't talk about it with the keen relish most girls do. She regards love as an important ingredient in the making of a play, she said. We had been discussing the necessity, or lack of necessity, of an actress having some basis of actual experience as a foundation for her characterizations. "But I don't think it is at all important for any player to experience any emotion of a part in reality. Of course, you have to realize these emotions in your imagination, and that would argue some basis of experience—at some time."

"Then you believe in reincarnation?"

"Yes; it seems to me the best explanation of Shortly after Helen Jerome Eddy left a dramatic school in Los Angeles she met a Lubin director. At that time, she wanted to be a scenario writer. The director didn't buy her script—but he did engage her as an actress everything. After all, isn't it not only possible but probable that I have taken up the broken thread of an interrupted work, that I have had much of the experience necessary for this work and that it alone will be sufficient for me now?"

We were sitting in the front room of her home on Van Ness Avenue in Hollywood, where she lives with her father and mother. (Other members of the family are three very lively and very affectionate puppies.)

One's first impression of Helen Eddy is of surprise—that she should be so much taller than she appears on the screen. Her brown eyes are rather round in shape and have in them something of the fatalism of the Oriental. She is an indefatigable worker. When she is not at the studio she is usually studying or rehearsing a part in some production of the Hollywood Community Players. Her voice is deep, well cultivated and of splendid scope and power. Her hair is a glossy black. She was, you will remember, a remarkable Italian in her work with George Behan. It is interesting to note that in a recent picture with Sessue Hayakawa she appears just as characteristically Chinese.

Helen Eddy is a fatalist. She feels that in training herself to become an actress she is

The Fame and Fortune Contest for 1920

WE were, to say the least, delighted with the results of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest. Thereby we verified our theory that the world in general, and America in particular, are still well supplied with cinema possibilities, both optically and dramatically. Our two-reel feature, "A Dream of Fair Women," which is now being shown thruout the country, presenting the winners and honor roll beauties, is proof of our success. The flattering offers received by winners and honor roll girls alike show how highly producers regard the opinion of our judges. Hence we take great pleasure in presenting our bigger and better Fame and Fortune Contest for 1920.

In connection with the contest now in progress we shall produce a Five-Reel Feature drama for the honor roll beauties, work upon which is already under way. The story has been selected, and it is strong, picturesque, unique and original, presenting unusual opportunities for many players of various types. To the members of its cast who measure up to possibilities, this production will give unusual publicity and prominence, since the drama, aside from being a product of the greatest campaign of its kind, would stand well-nigh alone upon its own histrionic merits.

Those contestants whose pictures appear promising will be communicated with at once, and they may—depending upon ability—be offered a part in this five-part play immediately. While we are now starting production, the play will not be completed till the late fall, since as a special feature it is to contain the test scenes taken of the honor roll girls at Roslyn, N. Y.

This opportunity is not limited to youth and beauty alone, for there are several character types needed, both male and female, some of whom are to play big parts. We suggest that any contestant wishing to apply for one of these parts so state on the entrance coupon, as well as by letter accompanying photos.

There are several points to be considered in the choice of photographs. First, do not submit photos that lie. Choose an artistic portrait that shows you up to the best advantage, but never one that conceals really visible defects. A false photo may win a place on the honor roll, but a feat so accomplished will only make keener your disappointment at rejection when you in person appear before the judges. So be perfectly honest with your picture; it will pay in the long run. Furthermore, we must have at least one straight photograph. There is no objection to an extra tinted photo, but our main concern is how you will show up on the screen, whose sole colors are black and white. Then, too, if you should win a place on the honor roll a tinted picture could not be reproduced. There is no limit to the number of pictures that may be sent in; in fact, if you fail to succeed at the first attempt, it might be well to recall that anything worth while is worth repeated efforts.

It will be well to here review the salient features of the rules and regulations governing the contest. In the first place, we must have regular photographs, not snapshots or post-cards; and be certain that the necessary entrance coupon is pasted upon the back of each picture. Bear in mind when entering the contest that under no conditions will any photo be returned. Another important point, while a little previous stage or screen experience is allowable, no one may enter who has already played prominent parts; this contest is for amateurs only. Both sexes and all nationalities are eligible and there is no age limit; in short, any one other than well-known actors and actresses may compete.

All four winners in the 1919 contest were girls, simply because the latent Romeos of the screen were so utterly indifferent. There is just as great demand in pictures for men as there is for women, and this demand ranges from the "handsome and dashing" juvenile to the character parts. So, men of America, rouse yourselves, and show to the "females of the species" that you are as deadly as she when it comes to silver-sheet possibilities.

And, finally, we cannot answer any letters in regard to this contest. Obviously, it would be utterly impossible to answer all of the hundreds that pour in daily; hence we will answer none. The announcements in the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND will cover every phase of the rules and regulations governing the contest. We shall also publish special articles on the subject from time to time.

Remember, this is the opportunity of a lifetime; for to the winner or winners, as the case may be, we give invaluable aid in winning a place among the bright lights of the shadow stage. We guarantee an engagement and will give to each of the winners two years' publicity. This will consist of cover portraits, pictures in the gallery, special articles and interviews by prominent writers—publicity that cannot be bought at any price! Hence we can promise that at the end of two years the winners will—to a degree depending upon the artistry of their work—be known thruout the civilized world. In other words, we can, thru the power of publicity, place an amateur possessing unusual screen possibilities in a position of prominence such as could not be attained thru single-handed efforts except after a long and arduous struggle. This we guarantee.

This feature of the contest is invaluable to the winners. True, we have artists of the screen who began at the bottom and worked up step by step—and we admire them all the more for it—but it took years of struggling against fearful odds. On the other hand, think of what we are offering you. Thru our three magazines we bridge this great gap of obscurity and insignificance and immediately place you in the position which your abilities demand. Why linger at the foot of the ladder indefinitely if you have within your power the means of covering many unessential rungs at a single bound?

So here's to Fame and Fortune! We shall put over the contest and its resulting feature production with characteristic energy and enthusiasm. Your success is now up to you. Meet us half-way in the beginning, and if you possess sufficient screen possibilities we can give you the opportunity to make a place among the great artists of the silversheet.

In connection with the showing of "A Dream of Fair Women," local theaters will conduct contests under the patronage of our magazines, the winners in which will be placed on our honor roll. If your manager has not heard about this, tell him to write to Murray W. Garsson, Foundation Film Corporation, 1600 Broadway, New York City, for details and literature. Announcements also in current issues of our publications.

FIVE-REEL FEATURE

Having successfully produced the two-reel feature, "A Dream of Fair Women," which is now being shown thruout the country, presenting the honor roll beauties and winners of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest, we now take pleasure in announcing our plans for the 1920 contest. We shall produce a FIVE-REEL FEATURE drama for the honor roll contestants, and we shall start on this immediately. The story has already been selected, and it is a strong, unique, original and picturesque one, affording fine opportunities for many players of different types.

Those contestants whose pictures appear to us to be very promising will be communicated with at once, and they may be offered parts in this unusual play immediately. While we are now starting production, the play will not be completed until late in the fall, and it will include the test scenes of the honor roll beauties which will be taken at Roslyn. In this picture we can use a few persons other than young and pretty girls, for we shall need several character types both male and female. All contestants who wish to apply for one of these parts will kindly so state on their entrance coupon, or in a letter accompanying photo.

Every Day People Judge You by Your Nails

Have they the beauty they so easily can gain?

HOW beautifully turned out, how correct," you thought—until you caught a glimpse of her nails.

Then, "Shocking!" you said to yourself.

And that one glimpse of her carelessly groomed hands left an impression that you never forgot.

This method is the secret of the perfect, even cuticle of many fashionable women.

Cutex is a harmless cuticle remover. Applied to the cuticle, it keeps the base of the nail smooth, firm, crescent-like.

Wrap a little cotton around the end of an orange stick (both come in the Cutex package), dip it into the bottle of Cutex and work it around the base of the nails, gently pushing back the cuticle. Instantly the dry cuticle is softened. Wash the hands, pushing back the cuticle with a towel. The surplus cuticle will disappear, leaving a firm, even, slender nail base.

If you like snowy white nail tips apply a little Cutex Nail White underneath the nails directly from the tube. Finish your manicure with Cutex Nail Polish. For an especially brilliant, lasting polish, use Cutex Paste Polish first, then the Cutex Cake or Powder polish.

If your cuticle has a tendency to dry and grow coarse, apply a bit of Cutex Cold Cream each night. This cream was especially prepared to keep the hands and cuticle soft and fine.

Give yourself this manicure regularly. Make it as much of a habit as keeping your shoes shined. It is true that one Cutex manicure makes your nails look lovely; but you cannot keep them well groomed by irregular care. Give your nails a Cutex manicure regularly.

Cutex Cuticle Remover, Nail White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream are 35 cents. The Cuticle Remover comes also in 65 cent bottles. You can get Cutex in any drug or department store in the United States, Canada and in any chemist shop in England.

A manicure set for 20 cents

For twenty cents we will send you the Midget Manicure Set containing enough of the Cutex preparations for at least six manicures. Use the coupon below. Address Northam Warren, 114 West 17th St., New York City.

If you live in Canada, address Northam Warren, Dept. 903, 200 Mountain Street, Montreal, Canada.

The secret of beautiful nails lies in the care of the cuticle. This is the most important part of a manicure. The more you cut the cuticle the faster it grows. It becomes tough, thick, and hangnails appear.

You can keep your nails lovely without injuring the cuticle.

Zena's Zenith

iridescence of sunset. The west was aglow, and the windows we approached gleamed like orange lanterns behind a veil of rose chiffon. I looked at Miss Keefe, in her black velvet toque, and her squirrel-trimmed suit. Orchids lent an extra tint to the picture that I sensed she so completely harmonized.

Manhattan spells expectation. And Manhattan at twilight spells fulfillment. Zena Keefe, sitting beside me, vibrant, alive to influence, keen to interest, spelled expectation . . . and fulfillment . . . and expectation all over again.

Zena comes from San Francisco, where at an early age she became a vaudeville artist. Mrs. Keefe recognized that the only way to gain development is to go after it. So Mother Keefe and Baby Keefe rolled up their tent-flaps and went on circuit tour.

Zena laughs now. "At every different town we visited, I was enrolled in a new school. I'm not the least bit sorry that I didn't get the academic training in one particular school, because, now that I look back"—which isn't so awfully, awfully far—"I think the course laid out for me did much more good. The rules were few. Tersely, I believe I was drilled to work and play, as much at one as at the other and—enjoy both."

The primer of "Never to Be Bored" is as innate in Zena Keefe as A-B-C. She claims that working as she did when a child has not taken away her youth but, if anything, has shot it out ahead, preceding her. All the work that she did then has been balanced by all the play she can afford today. She says this, but Zena makes me feel sure that when she slept, even, she giggled, and when she wept, if ever—she is not the weeping-willow sort—she'd jazz her sobs into oblivion. Zena may some day catch up to her childhood, but she will never entirely grasp it so that it can absorb.

Zena may be of the footlights, but, like all compensations that run true to Emerson, Zena is essentially an outdoor girl. When she told me that skiing and riding and skating were her middle names, and I found it a happy surprise, Zena smiled, "Yes, indeedly! I may look fragile, but if I bend over I won't break my back." The one expectation of her heart not yet fulfilled is to—fly!

Zena let 'er out again, and this time whizzed past the freshmen. "I wish some kind fan would give me an aeroplane for Christmas," she whispered to the wind.

Mae, Mary and Matrimony

EMPTINESS

By BARBARA HOLLIS

My soul went out to the soul of the moon,
As she rode thru her studded sky;
There was no one else in the earth or air—
There were only the moon and I.

I traveled far in that mystic land,
Out over the Bridge of Years,
That crosses the River of Time and Space
With its ripples of smiles and tears.

I passed the Gateway of Hopes Long Dead,
With the Arch that is built out of Dreams;
And walked thru the Valley of Things undone
By the mortals who basked in her beams.

I, too, felt the spell of her magic rays,
But the joy from my heart had fled;
And I turned away with a bitter sigh—
For the soul of the moon was dead.

MR. BROWN QUALIFIES

By WALTER E. MAIR

James De Lancéy Sterling Brown
(Classic mug hut hopeless bean!)
Dreamed that Fate had writ him down
For a future on the screen.

So he journeyed to the Coast,
(Rather logical at that!)
But he dwindled to a ghost,
Looking 'round for "something fat."

Desperate at length he grew—
(Ah, Los Angeles was cruel!)
For our J. D. L. S. knew
Fate was smiling as the mule

Smiles upon its incuhus:
(Pause we now to tear a tear!)
Plunged he 'neath a jitney-bus,
Broke a nose, tore off an ear.

Later on, that visage rare
(Ah, the murderous extra-line!)
He displayed; someone yelled "There "Is the type we're after: fine!"

Steady work from that day on!
(Viva, J. D. L. S. Brown!)
Crooked-nosed, with beauty gone,
As a bum he scooped the town.

GRAY HAIR YOURSELF
AT HOME

AT forty or fifty a woman may still not feel more than twenty-five years old. But no matter how well preserved her skin may be, how clear the sparkle of her eyes or how painstaking she may be in other details of her toilette—in the end she will be judged by the appearance of her hair.

For there is no longer any excuse for permitting the hair to remain gray, faded and streaked. In one's own home, with no other help than a bottle of BROWNATONE, all its original color and beauty can be instantly restored—any shade from light to medium brown, dark brown or black—making it even more glorious and attractive than it was in youth.

Hundreds of thousands of women use and all leading druggists recommend this safe and harmless hair tinting preparation.

NORMA TALMADGE
"You may use my testimonial to the value of WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO."

ALICE BRADY
"I consider WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO an ideal shampoo. It can be used with such little effort and keeps my hair in wonderful condition."

MABEL NORMAND
"I never knew that a shampoo could be so delightful until I used WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO."

PAULINE FREDERICK
"Not only is the use of WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO beneficial to one's scalp and hair but the refreshing and stimulating after effects are delightful and indescribable."

MAY ALLISON
"Of all shampoos I have ever used WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO is by far the superior."

PROPER Shampooing is what makes beautiful hair. It brings out all the real life, lustre, natural wave and color, and makes it soft, fresh and luxuriant.

Your hair simply needs frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, but it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soap. The free alkali, in ordinary soaps, soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it. This is why leading motion picture stars, theatrical people and discriminating women use

WATKINS MULSIFIED REG. U.S. PAT. OFF. COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

This clear, pure, and entirely greaseless product, cannot possibly injure, and does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and has the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is. It leaves the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to do up.

You can get WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO at any drug store. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Keeps Skin Smooth, Firm, Fresh — Youthful Looking

To dispel the tell-tale lines of age, illness or worry—to overcome flabbiness and improve facial contour—there is nothing quite so good as plain

Powdered SAXOLITE

Effective for wrinkles, crowfeet, enlarged pores, etc., because it "tightens" and tones the skin and underlying tissue. No harm to tenderest skin. Get an ounce package, follow the simple directions—see what just one application will do. Sold at all drug stores.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator $.75
- M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads $.75
- M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair $.50
- M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan $1.00
- M. T.'s Minnerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream" $.75

must do a great deal of atoning. Also, they have a kiddie with them. Six years old. Of the masculine gender.

I inquired.

The kiddie is Olive's brother's boy. Last summer the mother died and Olive adopted the small nephew. Just at present he is going to school in Tarrytown. At the date of my talk with Olive she was expecting him the following day to come to New York, while she bought for him a velvet suit and a fur overcoat.

"He wants an aeroplane for Christmas," she informed me, with seriousness at the behest; "the only thing that bothers him is how it is going to manage to get thru these windows. I explained to him that Santa will manage it somehow, that he is quite marvelous as a manager. I don't know just what I can get by way of an aeroplane, but of course I shall get some sort of a thing that flies."

All told, the young Jack Pickfords were going to make a high and festive occasion of Yuletide. That very morning Olive had been buying Jack's gift, consisting of a set of black pearls for evening wear, at Tiffany's, and there was also a resplendent lounging robe of sumptuous silk, and then it was only the first part of December. I should think the aeroplane not the only unlikely thing to wedge into one apartment. Olive laughingly remarked that her mother says she and Jack spend all their salaries giving one another presents.

"He's always sending me something and then I send him something back," Olive said. "You see, we have to bridge the distance in some way. At first I just couldn't get used to the idea of living this way, but I suppose one gets used to anything, given time. When we were together we used to use up the time fighting over things. I'd say, 'You were out with this person or that person,' and he'd come back at me in the same way, and we'd have a lively time of it, but we're over that now. We know that we can't sit home by the fireside all the time just because we cannot be together."

She went on to observe that there was not, in screen work, however, much of any time to sit by the fireside or elsewhere. She worked, she said, with a pretty little air of distraction, night and day, and when she was supposed to have a week off to attend to such necessities as shopping for household and for Christmas, there were all sorts of retakes and other summoning things.

She would love, she said, to go on the stage, but for the next two years or more she will do as she is doing now . . . for the present . . . Thus is it gorgeous to be gorgeously young and be able thus to dicker the passing of the young years . . .

As I was leaving she showed me thru the whole of the apartment and told me, with the pretty pride of possession, of what she was doing, intended to do, with every nook and corner. One feature of

The Newest Fifth Avenue Styles!

These are not the usual "mail-order styles." They are the very same garments we are showing in our five-story Fifth Avenue building—the same frocks the best-dressed women in New York are buying by hundreds. Every one is new, smart, and distinctive—just the sort of garment you've longed for.

Actual Photographs From Life!

And every coat, every dress, every blouse is shown as it actually looks when worn—not as an artist hopes it will look. It is photographed from a living model, and the camera never lies! Over 300 of these photographs are reproduced by Rotogravure in the Spring catalog. Be sure to see them!

Little More Than Wholesale Prices!

With prices still going up, a saving of $5 to $10 on every garment is certainly worth while. By buying from us—the manufacturers—you save the middleman's profit. 200,000 pleased customers are now making this great saving. Couldn't you use the extra money too?

Our More Than Liberal Guarantee!

You cannot lose by buying from us. If a garment is unsatisfactory in any way, return it at our expense. We guarantee everything—even the fit. You can exchange it for another garment or have your money refunded without question. A trial costs nothing—Postage is prepaid!

After the Dance

THE woman who dances, or who engages in any form of exercise, knows the value of having a complexion which retains its delicate loveliness throughout the glow of her exertion.

Nature intended that your skin should remain smooth and fresh despite the free flowing of the blood that comes from exhilaration, and Resinol Soap is nature's agent for preserving the soft natural bloom of your skin.

Resinol Soap is an unusually pure and cleansing toilet soap with qualities that soothe and heal irritations of the skin's texture. It is the soap for you if you are resolved not to permit skin imperfections to interfere with your social and business success.

All druggists and toilet goods dealers sell Resinol products.

“$1,000 Saved!”

“Last night I came home with great news! Our savings had passed the $1,000 mark!

“I remember reading one time that your first thousand saved is the most important money you will ever have, for in saying it you have laid a true foundation for success in life. And I remember how remote and impossible it seemed then to have such a sum of money.

“I was making $15 a week and every penny of it was needed just to keep us going. It went on that way for several years. Then one day I woke up! I found I was not getting ahead simply because I had never learned to do anything in particular. As a result whenever an important promotion was to be made, I was passed by. I made up my mind right then to invest an hour after supper each night in my own future. So I wrote to Scranton and arranged for a course that would give me special training for our business.

“I can't understand why I had never realized before that this was the thing to do. Why, in a few months I had a whole new vision of my work! The general manager was about the first to note the change. An opening came and he gave me my first real chance—with an increase. A little later another promotion came with enough money to save $25 a month. Then another increase—I could put aside $50 each pay day. So it went.

“Today I am manager of my department—with two increases this year. We have a thousand dollars saved! And this is only the beginning. We are planning now for a home of our own. There will be new comforts for those little enjoyments we have had to deny ourselves up to now. And there is a real future ahead with more money than I used to dare to dream that I could make. What wonderful hours they are these hours after supper!”

For 28 years the International Correspondence Schools have been helping men and women everywhere to win promotion, to earn more money, to have happy, prosperous homes, to know the joy of getting ahead.

More than two million have taken the up road with I. C. S. help. Over 100,000 are now turning their spare time to profit. Hundreds are starting every day. Isn't it about time for you to find out what the I. C. S. can do for you?

You, too, can have the position you want in the work of your choice, you can have the kind of a salary that will make possible money in the bank, a home of your own, the comforts and luxuries you would like your family to have. No matter what your age, your occupation or your means—you can do it!

All we ask is a chance to prove it—without obligation on your part or a penny of cost. That's fair, isn't it? Then mark and mail this coupon.

For Boys and Girls Also

Marjorie's reminiscences are necessarily rather limited, for it was only eighteen years ago that she was born in Colorado Springs, Colorado.

When she was eight she came to California with her mother and brother, Chandler, who is three years her junior.

Marjorie and Chandler are all alone in the world now, for the little mother passed away two years ago, and the absolute devotion and remarkable “chumminess” existing between brother and sister is a favorite topic among their friends. With an older girl friend they play at housekeeping in a pretty little bungalow in Hollywood.

The Chandler had gained some prominence in the picture world, they have

THE NEAR-PICKFORD

By WALTER E. MAIR

When a studio was built next door to Blomstein's,
And Reba was born soon after,
With hair that curled so naturally,
And soulful eyes that rolled,
And everything. . . .
They said Art had been, so-to-speak,
The predominating, prenatal Predestining influence. . . .

Reba grew up.
So did the hair that curled so naturally,
And the soulful eyes, which waxed more lustrous
She became more screencish every day
And everything

But somehow, alackaday,
Reba is only a cold-cream demonstrator.
And the Blomsteins do not live luxuriously
In a million-plunk bungalow-dream
Down among the sheltering palms.

So we think that the good Lord must have put Almost all the elements into little Reba
Of a wondrous second Mary Pickford, Excepting only—the necessary soul o' the ould sod.
Which, of course, is Heaven's fault
Not Reba's.

SCREEN MAGIC

By ETHEL HOPE

Out from the cold and the whirling snow,
He came at close of day;
Lured by the warmth and the ruddy glow,
Lured by the tones of the music low,
Where picturedom held sway.

Fair were the scenes that before him went;
He watched as one entranced;
Feeling his heart growing more content,
Feeling himself far less worn and spent,
And his heart's joy enhanced.

Into the cold and the whirling snow
He trailed the crowds at last;
Deep in his soul was the summer's glow,
Deep in his eyes a glad light shone low.
As on his way he passed.

IMPRISONED

By BETTY EARLE

Like a leaf I would turn and turn in the sunlight,
Enlarging my shadow in my own way,
Baring the haunting green of my soul to all who would understand;
And to all who would understand, baring the wan underneath of my soul.

But they have bound me tight, tight:
All the tendrils, the minions, the moods.
They have pressed me between white walls that breathe no escape.
And when the stars lean over the night, I cannot answer;
And when the wind pulses low, I cannot respond.

THE TRAGEDY OF HUMOR

By LA TOUCHE HANCOCK

Everybody's still,
Everybody's solemn,
Papa's got to fill
The daily comic column!
Mother doesn't dare
To ask him for money;
Silence everywhere,
Papa's being funny!
Sister cannot sing
To amuse the folks;
Peace o'er everything,
Papa's making jokes!
Anxious, quiet, sad,
All around we sit;
Isn't it too bad
Papa is a wit?

Scotch and Seltzer

hand-carved rum-chest given him by his uncle, an old Nantucket whaler, to a set of ebony opium pipes regaled him by a Chinese smuggler. He has every variety of vase, pitcher, bottle, platter; a dozen different varieties of period furniture from Jacobin to Stickleby; several original canvases—one of Rembrandt's.

And then, he has a sister, who is his secretary, and a charming mother, who speaks with a semi-Southern accent and whom Norm worships.

And he, who is the typical sophisticated man of today, the romancer who is a romancer without being a vampire, is, about his sister, unquestionably the most solicitous being I've ever seen.

Miss Kerry is eighteen and beautiful, tho one of those rare flowers whose petals have as yet to be singed by the bright lights. Norm says that he's glad she's not what is generally known as "sophisticated."

"I'm afraid it's a very great drawback these days," he remarked, "altho I wouldn't have sis any other way for worlds. A fellow, when he only has one little sister, places his every hope in her. He wants her to be like his mother. What he himself does, affects him alone; it must never reflect upon others."

In 1910 Kerry had an appointment to Annapolis. Somehow or other, he changed his mind about being a naval officer and enrolled in St. John's College, the arts and science branch of the University of Maryland, to learn about the world.

But college got on his nerves. He, like many other young progressives have found, discovered that one today lives in a commercial era that has swept away the dust of ancient Rome and Greece; that has put the practical note into affairs of education. In fact, Kerry says that to him a worldly education was worth twice that gleaned from fifty-seven varieties of 'ologies and 'onomies.

He became associated with his father in the cattle business and journeyed to Latin America to purchase hides and beef. Later he returned to this country and rode the range in the West. It was there that he met Art Acord, with whom he eventually journeyed to Los Angeles, where he became a salesman of anything from real estate to cuff-links.

One day, two years ago, he journeyed to the Brunton studio to sell Paul Engstrom, one of the proprietors, some paint. As he walked across the lot he was accosted by a casting director, Bessie Barriscale's leading man, it seemed, had suddenly become temperamental and "walked off the set" while the company was "shooting" a nearby park. Blonde Bessie, stranded, had sent in an S. O. S. for a leading man. The casting director liked Norm's looks, dragged him into the office, and fifteen minutes later Kerry was in a company car, speeding to Griffith Park and wondering what all that writing in a contract meant.

ROMANCE

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

"'Twas once upon a time" and "Far away"—
 What charm the worn, familiar phrases hold
 Of mystery and magic, and of old,
 Enchanting places; courtiers brave and gay,
 And lovely ladies, sweet as budded May,
 Whose beauty and quaint graces manifold
 May lift us one brief moment from the gold
 And clamor of the world's drab workaday.

Again we tread romance's fair domains,
 Thru pathways sweet with rose and lavender,
 Led by the fragrance faded memories stir,
 Swack to the glamour of the leafy lanes
 And gardens hedged with patterned box and time
 Of "Far away," and "Once upon a time."

 Sweet voices ring across the snow,
 Or seas sob in their ebb and flow—
 Whene'er you sing!

Blue mountains rear their crests on high,
 Kings sit alone 'midst revelry,
 Palms pierce the forest to the sky,
 Processions, torch-lit, pass me by—
 Whene'er you sing!

Life's sordid cares of ev'ry day
 Are overpowered and shut away.
 All unrestrained the fancies play
 From glad to sad, from sad to gay—
 Whene'er you sing!

But I must add, O maiden, fair!—
 My views your father does not share.
 The room he'll leave, the door he'll slam
 And right out loud he'll swear, "Oh, d—n," Whene'er you sing!

DIRGE

By FAITH SERVICE

Out of my broken heart I'll make a song, Aureate with palmistry—blood-stained with wrong—
 Binding love's shattered limbs—cradling love's head—
 Closing love's muted mouth, stricken and red.

There where a sickly moon rides o'er her dead,
 There must I lay it low—love's crimsoned
 head—
 But on the Silversheet, memoried and dear—
 Rises love flowering, homing, and near . . .

A REEL ROMANCE

By MINNA IRVING

I cannot sit at eventide
 Beside the girl I love,
 Or spoon with her while softly shines
 The silver moon above.
 I cannot take her for a spin,
 Altho I own a car,
 Or out to supper, or to hear
 The latest opera star.

I see her almost every night,
 Yet cannot press her lips,
 Or tell her that her sparkling eyes
 The brightest arcs eclipse.
 I cannot ask her to be mine,
 For lo! the little queen
 Is a celebrated heroine
 Upon the movie screen.

But I'm in luck and would not change
 My sweetheart of romance
 For all the girls that ever led
 A hapless chap a dance.
 She's never not at home to me,
 Tho every night I go,
 And all I have to spend on her
 Is a ticket to the show.

Scotch and Seltzer

Shortly afterward he joined the British forces, but was rejected because of an injury received in training. Returning to this country, he recuperated and, incidentally, made a few more pictures. He then signed up for service with Uncle Sam, and was on his way to Buffalo, N. Y., to report, when he met Constance Talmadge on the train. The tank corps, however, was more important than the camera. He proceeded to his training camp and later was commissioned. And then the war finished itself!

But, nevertheless, he was destined to play opposite Connie Talmadge and, when his contract expired, to be signed by Alan Dwan as the star of Mayflower Corporation to play the handsome, manly young engineer-hero of Richard Harding Davis' "Soldiers of Fortune."

And, as an actor, Kerry is sadly lacking in one attribute—conceit. Everybody calls him Norm, and he refuses to take himself seriously. For if you do, he says, everybody else will take you seriously; if you dont, your mistakes are going to be overlooked and you're going to get by. All of which makes the movies for him more a pleasure than a business.

"And you're quite sure that you wont get married as soon as I get out of the house?" I queried, in parting, for I know so many married actors and I've personally viewed three contracts signed by the weaker half of the family.

"Nope," he echoed. "Have another drink? Good Scotch, this, eh?"

Absolutely! And, as I have said before, the better the Scotch, the more apt it is to find itself in seltzer.

BLEEDING HEARTS

By FAITH SERVICE

He sent no gift of roses . . . lover's greetings,
 No lacy-patterned, verse-circled token;
 Just this . . . a tiny sheaf o' bleeding hearts
 Because our hearts were broken.

He sent no flowering thing, nor joyous song,
 He swore not that his love was true and blue;
 Just bleeding hearts because his heart had bled,
 Ah me, mine bleeds anew!

He sent no sweet confections, gaily ribboned,
 No tender missive, things all lovers say;
 But this . . . a faded sheaf o' bleeding hearts
 On All-Hearts Day.

THE MOVIE VILLAIN

By TED OLSON

Not of the chap with the rakish air
 And the manner coaxing and debonair;
 Nor yet of the ruffian of darkest dye,
 With the unshaved jaw and the lowering eye;
 Nor still of him whose receding chin
 Bears subtle witness to secret sin;
 Tho each is steeped to his eyes in crime,
 For none of them do I weave this rime.

The villain of whom I tell is seen
 Not in the light of the silver screen;
 He's the one who stumbles in front of you,
 Stamps on your feet and ruins your view,
 Pours himself in the nearest chair,
 Poisons with garlic the suffering air,
 And favors you and the rest of the crowd
 By reading the titles half aloud.

The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come

with wild schemes. If it meant the overturning of the world, the reaching up to pluck stars down from the sky, she would gladly do her best for the sake of bringing the light back to his eyes.

Of course, Major Buford discovered the runaway after a search, tho the seeking took several weeks, and, of course, he insisted that he should come back to Lexington with him. "Hold up your head, my boy! Show 'em you dont care a damn what anybody thinks!" he roared. "By gad, I thought you had more spirit!" But secretly he rejoiced in his proud old heart at the boy's stubborn pride.

It took argument to overcome it. It took Caleb's reinforcements, Melissa's pleading. But perhaps more potent than any of these things was the unseen urging of a sunny-haired vision in a black velvet riding-habit, who seemed to whisper earnestly, "Chad, come back! We'll go riding again together. Wait and see!"

So Chad once again turned his face from the mountains to the Valley of Disillusion, but before he went he kist Melissa good-by—kist her as he might have kist his mother, with frank, boyish lips, careless and passionless. "You've been moughty good to me, M'liss. I reckon I wont forget it, ever," he said. She held his head a moment between her small, hard hands and looked in his eyes. Hope had rekindled the fires of his youth, and they flared high and splendid—torches of a conqueror.

"Good-by, Chad," said Melissa, and smiled so that he would not know her agony. "Good-by, boy."

Again she thought, watching him go into the morning distance, "I shall never see him again."

Yet you were wrong, M'liss—once more—once more—

In the valley time passed on winged feet, the time it takes to make a boy into a man, to make a gold-haired girl into a woman. The major adopted Chad legally. He was as proud of him as he was of his own name, and that is saying much. For, to the major, birth was the only necessary virtue, not to be a gentleman the only unforgivable sin. Sometimes he would stand long beside Chad's bed and look down into the lean, cleanly cut face, with its hollowed temples and proud lips, with faded, questing old eyes.

"The Buford chin," he would mutter irritably, "and the Davidson nose. There's blood in you, boy—blood, and I'm damned if I dont believe it's Buford blood, too! Chadwick Buford was a rover and a waster, but he was a gentleman, and you're a gentleman's son."

But he never spoke of this to Chad. Indeed, he did everything possible to make the boy proud of his ancestorless state. "Every line has a beginning," he told him, tartly. "You shall found a line, my boy—a line of Bufords and gentlemen."

The kindly forgetfulness of time had dimmed Chad's offense of birth in the

That Would Buy 100 Dishes Of Supreme Food—Quaker Oats

Consider that—the steak for an average family meal would serve 100 dishes of the food of foods.

Quaker Oats costs one cent per large dish. One egg would buy five dishes. One chop would buy twelve dishes, based on prices at this writing.

You can serve ten breakfasts of Quaker Oats for about the cost of serving one with meat or eggs or fish.

Saves 90% on Your Breakfast

But the true way to measure foods is by nutrition. The calory—the energy unit—is used for this comparison.

Quaker Oats yield 1810 calories per pound, while round steak yields 890 and eggs 635.

This is the cost per 1000 calories in some necessary foods at this writing:

Cost Per 1000 Calories
Quaker Oats	5½c
Average Meats	45c
Average Fish	50c
Hen's Eggs	70c
Vegetables	11c to 75c

So Quaker Oats, compared with average meat foods, saves some 90 per cent on a breakfast.

And the oat is the supreme food. It is almost the ideal food in balance and completeness.

It is rich in elements which growing children need. As a vim-food it has age-old fame.

Make Quaker Oats your basic breakfast. Start the day well-fed. Use this saving to bring your average food cost down.

eyes of the Deans. When he returned home from college, tall, slimly built and handsome in a dark, grave, eager fashion, Mr. Dean himself unbent far enough to call upon him and publicly invite him to his home. The Dean boys, noisy young blades of his years, greeted him with the careless democracy of youth, and Margaret, grown straight and slim as a candle with a flame of gold above her vivid, flashing face, danced and rode with him as she danced and rode with the young Olivers and Carters and Blackburns, and the dandified youths from Richmond who came to visit at her father's house.

"She's good to me because she just cant help being good to everybody," Chad said, quietly, to the major. "I hope I'm not quite such a cad as to take any hopes from that, sir."

"Pooh!" snorted the major, grandly, bristling, as he always did, like an old turkey cock when anything concerning Chad's desirability came in question. "Pooh! Dont be so damn humble! I hate humble men. Believe in yourself! If you do that you're fit to marry a princess of the blood! Pooh! The girl's no fool! Dont treat her like one."

But Chad shook his dark head gravely and turned the subject. He was put to it these days to keep Margaret Dean's dazzling face, the light, crisp rustle of her garments, the scent of her, diffused by every movement, the need of her out of his thoughts, as a man of honor should, who had nothing to offer her but a borrowed name. Youth was hot in him, aching, tormenting, giving him no peace. He grew a bit thin, more than a bit white and worn with the struggle those days, and the old major was anxious.

"By gad! There's spirit for you! Eating his damfool heart out for that girl and she'd fall into his arms if he asked her! But he wont ask, confound his devilish pride—he'll die before he asks her! Still something must be done—cant have the boy wasting to a shadder before my face and eyes."

So the major, muttering, puffing with the pride that was in him. What it was that must be done he did not say, and, in fact, could not guess. Certainly nothing was further from his thoughts than what did happen. One day in early autumn, Chad Buford strode into the house, with thunderous face, and flung his riding-crop upon the table. His voice when he spoke to his guardian was high and shaking like that of a man at the breaking point of nerves.

"I'm going away, sir—to China—Egypt—Bombay—anywhere so long as it's far enough!" he cried, and rested his forehead on his arms, folded upon the mantel. "I've got to go—if it isn't already too late—"

"And by that, Chad?" asked the major, very softly. "By that you mean—"

"I mean," said Chad, in a stifled voice, "if I haven't already made her love me—me—a beggar from Nowhere! But it all happened so quickly." He groaned and shook from head to foot. "Her horse

A Woman's Smile Should Reveal Glossy Teeth

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

It is Film That Clouds Them

That slimy film which you feel on your teeth is the cause of most tooth troubles.

It clings to the teeth, enters crevices and stays. The tooth brush does not end it. The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve it. So it continues to mar the beauty and to wreck the teeth.

That film is what discolors—not the teeth. It is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

That film is the teeth's great enemy. So dental science has for years sought a way to end it. Now an efficient film combatant has been found. It has been proved by careful tests. And now leading dentists all over America are urging its daily use.

Supplied to All Who Ask

For home use this method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And to show its effects a 10-Day Tube is sent to anyone who asks. This is to urge that you get it.

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

This method long seemed impossible. Pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. But science has discovered a harmless activating method. And now active pepsin can be daily used to combat this viscous film.

Able authorities have made convincing clinical and laboratory tests. Now everyone is asked to make a home test and see what Pepsodent does.

Compare the results with the methods you are using. See the change in ten days. Then decide for yourself if this new method is best for you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

shied and bolted. I followed and stopped him. It had been a close shave, and I suppose I was a bit off my head—before I knew what was happening I—I had her in my arms, sir! Oh, cad—cad—"

"And then," said the major, with deep satisfaction, "I hope you asked her to marry you."

Chad laughed uglyly. "I? Ask that paragon among women to marry me? A shepherd of the hills born under the bar sinister? No, sir, I begged her pardon on my knees. I told her that I loved her, but could not ask her to marry me and throw her life away—I told her—a good many things—"

Silence while the fire snapped rosily. Then spoke the major, dully, "So you'd go away and leave the old man alone? Chad boy, there's a better way. Wait a bit—the papers are uneasy. There may be a war, and then the South will need you. Wait, Chad. Things have a way of working out. Give them a chance."

"It would take more than a chance to work my life out as I would have it," said the lover, wearily; "it would take a miracle. But—I will wait a little."

It was the miracle that happened. As they spoke the bell rang, and presently the negro butler ushered in a vision, all blue velvet hood and swansdown cloak and golden, fluttering curls, a vision that stood trembling and blushing on the threshold, looking from one amazed man to the other, a vision that presently rustled forward and into a seat by the fire, which immediately became a throne.

"You are not—very cordial to visitors!" murmured the newcomer, plaintively, with an upward glance that made Chad clutch at the mantel. "But perhaps when you hear what I have to say you will ask me to take off my things and pour the tea. Chad, a very strange thing has happened, so strange that it seems almost a dream. Today, just after I got home, a girl—or perhaps she was a woman, at least she was dreadfully thin and sick-looking, and so strangely dressed—came to the house and asked for me. 'Air you-all Margaret?' she asked me, looking at me with such big, mournful eyes, 'Chad Buford's Margaret?' And then she began to laugh and cry at the same time, and all the time looking at me with those great eyes. 'Yes, I'd know you anywhar,' she said, 'even if I hadn't seen you riding with him.' And then she told me why she had come, Chad—it was to bring me these."

The boy, for he was hardly more, took the worn, soiled papers she handed him, dazedly, held them to the firelight, and the room rang to his cry. "A marriage certificate—my mother's and my father's!" He seemed to grow taller there before them all. "Mary Miles and Chadwick Buford, Gentleman! That is my name, then—I have a right to that name!"

The vision pouted, sighed. "And what about me?" it asked, in a small, meek tone. "Haven't I got a right to it, too, Chad? Oh, before I'd be so stingy with my old name!"

BEWARE OF THE LITTLE FLAWS THAT MAKE ONE HOMELY

It is so easy to let your skin acquire bad traits

A LITTLE roughness, a little shine, a little cloudiness of skin, and one's looks are gone! It is so easy, too, to let your skin acquire these bad little traits unless you know just how to avoid them.

Wind and cold whip the moisture out of your skin—leave it dry and tense. Then follow roughening and chapping. Skin specialists say that one can protect

Before you powder, take a bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream and rub it lightly into the skin. At once it disappears, leaving your skin softened. Now powder as usual and don't think of it again. The powder will stay on two or three times as long as ever before. There is not a bit of oil in Pond's Vanishing Cream, so it cannot reappear in a miserable glisten.

WHEN your face is tense from a long, hard day, yet you want to "look beautiful," remember that the cool, fragrant touch of Pond's Vanishing Cream smoothed over the face and neck, will instantly bring it new freshness. Do this before you go to a dance.

BEWARE of allowing your skin to cloud up and lose its clearness. When this happens, it is because minute particles of dust have worked their way too deep into the pores to be removed by ordinary bathing. It takes a cold cream with a good oil base to remove this deeply lodged dust.

Before you go to bed and whenever you have been especially exposed to dust, rub Pond's Cold Cream into the pores of the skin. Then wipe it off with a soft cloth. You will say: "How could so much dust have gotten into my pores!" Do this regularly and you will be rewarded by a clear, fresh skin.

Even though you are tired, you can make your complexion especially lovely at a moment's notice

A touch of Pond's Vanishing Cream before going to a dance gives your skin new transparency the skin by applying a softening and soothing cream always before venturing out. Never omit this.

Of course, you can't apply a cold cream before going out. It makes your face too oily. Lightly touch your face and hands with Pond's Vanishing Cream, which is made precisely for this daytime and evening use. This leaves your face smooth and protects it from the weather. Do this every time you go out.

DOES the powder keep coming off your face, leaving you all shiny and embarrassed?

One little bedtime duty that no wise woman forgets is the cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream

Why your skin needs two kinds of cream

Every skin needs two creams. Do not forget that the cream which you use for daytime and evening is especially made without oil so that it cannot reappear in a shine. This is Pond's Vanishing Cream. It cannot make your face shiny even for a moment. It is based on an ingredient prescribed by physicians for its softening effect. Use it for protection from cold, for a powder foundation, for freshening the skin at a moment's notice.

But for cleansing the skin and for massage it is the cream with an oil base which you need—Pond's Cold Cream. Use it nightly before retiring, and whenever you have been exposed to dust and dirt.

Neither cream will encourage the growth of hair on the face.

Stop at the drug store or at any department store and buy a jar or a tube of each cream. See how much it improves your skin.

LOVE AND LUCRE
By LA TOUCHE HANCOCK

(An advertisement has appeared in a daily paper, in which a poet says he will write love verses for One Dollar.)

The maiden gazed with pensive eyes
To where the stars were blinking;
She did not notice that the moon
Was positively winking!
For she was lost in Lethes' stream—
In plain prose, she was thinking
Of all th' intoxicating draughts
Of love her soul was drinking!
The paper clasped within her hand
Had verses written on it,
Full of her raptured lover's vows,
And, as the moonbeams shone, it Seemed just as if the rays were sent
To let the maiden con it;
And so again, and yet again
She read his precious sonnet!
"Ah! how my sweetheart's passion burns!"
She cried. "Yes, now I know it,
Here every sentence speaks his love,
Just as his actions show it!"
But Venus sighed, and Cupid grinned,
And Eros cried, "Oh, blow it!
'Twas written for a dollar by
That advertising poet."

BALLADE OF PROFITEERS
By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Mike gets two dollars every hour
For helping with the cows and hay;
And, grinning as worn housewives cover,
Amanda's asking five a day.
Pat's coining untold wealth, they say,
At jobbing with a wrench and screw;
The garbage men for taxis pay—
But what is left for me and you?

The peas and beans and eggs and flour
Whose prices cause our souls dismay,
Bestow upon the grocer dower
For limousines and gems' array.
And, if objections we betray
Anent the butcher's bill for stew,
Then his "Not givin' it away"—
But what is left for me and you?

Warm frocks of wool or velvet tower
Above our possible survey,
And furs! 'Twould make old Croesus sour
Had he such mandates to obey.
Bricklayers' wives may still be gay
And in their garb of latest hue
Adorn the restaurant or play—
But what is left for me and you?

To drive a moving-van or dray,
And earn a goodly revenue
So we our daily needs allay—
Is all that's left for me and you!

HUMORS OF AMERICAN TRAVEL
By WALTER PULITZER

The agent of a well-known insurance company in New York was on his way to Chicago, and the train stopping at one of the wayside stations, he got out for refreshments. Walking up to a porter he asked:
"Will my bag be safe here?"
"Sure, if you'll put a card on it," replied the darkey.

The traveller hunted thru his pockets for a card with his name on it, but without success. But he found an old pack of playing cards, and scribbling his name across one of them, he laid it on the bag. . . . Coming back from the refreshment room he found his bag missing.
"Porter, some one has taken my bag!" he cried.

The porter chuckled. "Say, mister, that was cert'nly a foolish thing you did."
"Why, what did I do?"
"You laid a King of Hearts on that bag and a chap just come up here and put an ace on it and took it away!"
MORAL: Always carry a card-case with you.

DeMiracle

Every Woman's Depilatory

Removes Hair
Immediately—safely

ONLY a chemist should mix a depilatory, then it is sure to be safe. Unlike pastes and powders which must be mixed by the user, DeMiracle is a liquid just the right strength for instant use. It never deteriorates. DeMiracle is more economical because there is no waste. It is the quickest, most cleanly and simple to apply.

To devitalize hair you must use DeMiracle. Being a liquid it permits absorption. Therefore it is totally different. It attacks hair under the skin as well as on the skin which is the only common-sense way to remove it from face, neck, arms, underarms or limbs.

Only the original sanitary liquid DeMiracle has a money-back guarantee in each package.

Three sizes: 60c, $1.00, $2.00
At all toilet counters, or direct from us in plain wrapper, on receipt of 65c, $1.05 or $2.05, which includes war tax.

for you—a Voice that Wins Admiration and Success—Easily Obtained

Every voice CAN be beautiful—every voice WILL be beautiful if properly developed and trained. The Feuchtinger Method means perfect voice for ALL

THIS method is an absolute science of voice culture. It develops Nature's own sound organ by proved principles. It is the science of tone-production, tone strength, clearness and harmony. ALL voices can be trained by it to great power and beauty.

Improves Your Voice Almost At Once

This method will improve YOUR voice as it has for countless students all over the world. Mr. Feuchtinger has received letters from men and women in all walks of life, telling what the Power of the Voice has been to them after studying this unfailing method. Those friendless before taking this course now find themselves popular wherever they go. All our students testify that a fine singing and speaking voice is responsible for unexpected social and business opportunities.

Just Few Minutes Daily

Simple—silent exercises—just a few minutes every day—and you will be amazed at the immediate improvement in your voice. You study this method in your own home. A knowledge of music is not required. You practice silently. No one need be aware of what you are doing. New and beautiful tones will develop, with perfect muscular control. You will gain that self-confidence necessary to develop a strong personality.

Correct Breathing Means Health—Beauty

This course teaches the exact scientific manner which alone can explain and direct the correct way of inhaling and exhaling breath. Correct breathing is the root of health and perfect physical development.

Don't Stutter— Don't Stammer

There is no greater handicap in business or society than stammering or stuttering. The Feuchtinger Method does away with speech impediment. It gives command of muscles and cords which produce vocal sounds. Harshness, hoarseness, huskiness will be banished.

Easy Payments— Phenomenal Results

WRITE! Send the coupon and get our NEW FREE BOOK ON VOICE (Illustrated). It tells just what this wonderful method is, how it is used—what it will do. No obligation. Just mail coupon. Scientific vocal training that in the past cost hundreds—often thousands of dollars—is yours for small investment—easy payments. Phenomenal results—no matter what your voice. All-Wool Sweater Slip-On Ripple Style

There never was a more charming garment for women, young and old. This wonderfully fashionable ripple style sweater has taken women everywhere by storm. From no other garment can a woman get such worlds of wear, such complete satisfaction and such freedom and comfort combined with stylish smart appearance. These sweaters will be the craze of the new season.

Genuine All-Wool

Only long fibre specially selected yarns are used. Knitted in a close even plain stitch above the waistline and a fancy rack stitch below—just like grandmother would do it. The weight is exactly right for all the year round wear. Slip-on over the head.

New Ripple Style

The fitted waistline is offset with a contrasting color, run through with a knitted cord ending in pretty tassels. Strikingly handsome flare to skirt and youthful blousy waist. Below the waist it drapes in soft folds all around. Being knitted form fitting, the shoulders and sleeves set snug and smart, not bulky. The stunning bell shaped cuffs are perfectly delightful and are caught at wrists with a tighter knitted contrasting band, run through with knitted tasseled cords. The lovely rounded neck is also set off with a contrasting color shell edge and knitted cord and tassels in front.

The Book of A Thousand Styles

1001 Other Styles Prices Like Memories in My Newest Free Book

This sweater is just a sample of my other values in coats, dresses, waists, shoes, suits, millinery, etc. Don't worry and fret about high prices and overlook the chance I bring to you without promise or obligation on your part. Look around to your heart's content and see what others offer.

All I ask is not to forget my new book. It shows all the most beautiful and practical styles at sensible prices. My own designs are recognized as the most copied of all fashions shown anywhere.

Everything a Woman Wears Sent Prepaid On Approval

My new book will tell you in advance of the season what styles will be most popular. It will help you compare values. Even if you intend to buy elsewhere I want you to have it anyway. It costs you nothing.

Style—Price and Credit—Take Many Months to Pay

I allow you to pay just about as you please. You don't even need to ask for credit. I take care of all that in advance. You can have the loveliest things without waiting, look your prettiest at all times and take months to pay.

But my Credit Plan alone would not make many women want to have my Style Book. Style, quality and value must come first. The credit can be considered simply as something extra. Write for my Style Book because of its beautiful fashions. Get it because of its splendid bargains. Expect prices that will seem like memories. Your copy is waiting your request.

Be Posted on the New Styles

My new Style Book will tell the new width and length of skirts; the right height and design of shoes; the newest clothes; the latest waives; the smartest trimmings.

You will learn from it the most popular modes in dresses; the fashionable colors; the correct ideas in millinery, lingerie or children's wear. Having it in your home is like chumming with a famous style authority. Why not write for it today?

MARTHA LANE ADAMS, 3845 Mosprat Street, CHICAGO

The Secret of My Bargains

I do away with all extravagances. I never have left-over stocks or excessive sales. I have no high-priced salespeople. I deal direct with mills and makers. So I cut out all the profits of the retailer, the wholesaler and the jobber. I never charge anything extra because a style turns out unusually popular.

Ask for It Early—A Penny Postcard Will Do

My new book will bring you many moments of real pleasure. You will love to run through its merry styles. Many things are shown in actual colors. Nothing has been overlooked. I will send any selection prepaid on approval. If you return it, I pay the cost back to me and immediately refund your payment.

bloom, Oriental pergolas, quaint pagoda-shaped bird-houses, stone storks and fantastically cut shrubbery. At one end of the garden a hill rose steeply, and this, Mr. Trenton pointed out, was built by the studio carpenters, in tiers like the seats of a circus, and covered with green shavings to simulate grass. To the camera's eye the illusion was perfect. There was not an inch of the magic garden that did not look as if it had been born and educated in Japan.

We sat down in the bamboo pergola, and Mr. Trenton talked about his work on stage and screen.

"I really started in to be a lawyer," he said, "but just as I was ready to take my examinations I took a notion that I would rather be an actor. Perhaps if I had had a great deal of trouble getting started my ardor would have been dampened, but as it was, I got a bit with Julia Marlowe the first thing in 'The Goddess of Reason.' I stayed with her company until she married Mr. Sothern, and after that—well, I've had a checkered career. I've played everything from the stern father who shoves his erring daughter out into the paper snowstorm to the jealous husband in 'Parlor, Bedroom and Bath,' which was, by the way, my last stage appearance in New York. From 1910 to 1918 I played one hundred and fifty leads in stock companies in Salt Lake City, Bridgeport, New Haven and New York, and I was a juvenile in Herbert Blache's company—he is with Metro now, you know, and directed 'The Uplifters,' in which I played opposite Miss Allison."

Somewhat we got around to talking about the war.

"Oh, yes, I enlisted," he said, "but I didn't get across—worse luck! I was in the officers' training camp at Palo Alto when the war flivvered. I think I would have made a good soldier, too," he continued, a trifle wistfully. "It's in the blood. All the Pell and Trentons have been military men, and I am what mother calls a 'double son' of the Revolution, because two of my ancestors fought in that war, one as a Tory and one as a Colonial."

After being mustered out, Mr. Trenton took up picture work once more, having before his enlistment played with Mrs. Vernon Castle in "Stranded in Arcady" and with Clara Kimball Young in "The House of Glass." Since the war he has been with Metro, and has played opposite May Allison in "The Uplifters," "Fair and Warmer" and is now Viola Dana's leading man for "The Willow Tree."

Somewhere from the interior set an authoritative voice was calling for "Pell," and Pell responded in a tone that was a little regretful—at least I imagined that it was, and I hope I was right.

"I won't detain you a minute longer," I said, as we walked down the gravel path

A Buescher True-Tone Saxophone opens the way for you to double your income, double your opportunities and double your popularity and pleasure. It is easy for the beginner—you can learn to play the scale in one hour's practice and take your place in the band within 90 days. Practice is a pleasure rather than an effort. A clarinet player can make the change almost at once.

Buescher is the oldest maker of Saxophones and makes more of these instruments than the combined products of all the other manufacturers.

Get This Free Saxophone Book

It tells you what each Saxophone is best adapted for, when to use singly, in quartettes, sextettes, octettes, or in regular band or full Saxophone Band. Tells how to transpose for cello parts in orchestra, and familiarizes you with many facts you would like to know, whether you are a beginner, amateur or professional. It illustrates and describes the virtues of each model of the Saxophone Family from Bb and Eb Soprano Saxophones to Contra Bass. Ask for your copy.

Buescher-Grand Cornets and Trombones

With all its wonderful volume, the Buescher-Grand Cornet is exceptionally easy to blow, requiring so little exertion to start the tones, or to keep them sounding, that jumps of thirds, fifths or octaves can be taken without the slightest stopping or breaking or spacing between the tones. Its "Split-Note" Bell is an exclusive and patented feature.

The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come

It was long after when they remembered Melissa. "She hunted for those papers—all this time," Chad said, wonderingly. "Poor M'iss! Dear M'iss! Oh, we must find her."

But when they did find Melissa she needed no thanks of theirs. Very still and white and peaceful she lay on the narrow bed in the hospital where she had gone from Margaret's door, and once again with the little shadowy, mysterious smile on the lips, no longer hungry, Melissa was beautiful. They gave her a simple burial in the valley, for somehow Margaret knew, being a woman, that Melissa would have liked to be near Chad.

It would have been followed by a wedding, but on the very eve the smouldering fires of the quarrel between North and South burst out in all their devastating brightness, and Chadwick Buford told his sweetheart, with white lips, that he could not fight for the South and keep his honor clean. "And now," he said, wistfully, when she was done with futile weeping and pleading, "now I suppose you hate me, Margaret, and never wish to see me again?"

"Never!" she flamed, small foot set violently down; "never!" And then, as, bowing, he turned to go, she whispered, in a small voice, after him, "Oh, Chad! Be careful—don't let them shoot you!"

The major took the news as a man takes a sentence of death. He seemed to shrivel up before the young eyes that pitied and yearned over him, to grow, of a sudden, very old and frail and tired. "Go, then," the major said, in a panting whisper. "Go, damn you! I've raised a traitor to my country! I hope I never may see your face again."

He never did see it again. The war was hardly a year old when the major died. Just before, he sent for Margaret. "Don't be—too hard on the lad," he whispered, difficultly. "Always—did what he thought right—damn fool, of course"—his voice grew weaker—"but—I'd never have forgiven him—if he hadn't fought as he thought. A thorough—by gad, my dear—a gentleman—"

And so when at last the great wound had begun to heal and men were brothers again instead of enemies, Chadwick Buford came home to the great empty house which the major had willed to him, in stiff, unforgiving phrases, and after a week of self-flagellation he crossed the yard, with its roses and laurel, and set the brass knocker on the Deans' door thundering.

In the drawing-room, a trifle shabby now, as all the South was and would be hereafter, he faced Margaret Dean, her brightness hardly a little touched by the four years of pain, tho her dress was of an older style and mended cleverly.

"I have come back, Margaret," he said slowly, searching the face that baffled him, "I have come back. Can you for-the State Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, in Colorado Springs. His mother had always been interested in dramatics, and even after her marriage she continued to direct and be stage manager of all the entertainments given at the institution, and Lon was barely three when he began appearing in charades and pantomime sketches.

At the age of twelve, he was property boy at a local theater for twenty-five cents a night. At eighteen he started into the theatrical business in earnest and with his brother, who was twenty-three, he opened a stock musical comedy company, producing all the Gilbert and Sullivan operas. Lon played the comedy rôles and arranged the dancing acts, for he had become a skillful dancer, tho never having had a lesson.

They played the entire season at the Grand Opera House, then toured the State, after which they sold the company to the leading tenor, and Mr. Chaney continued with them as master of transportation, wardrobe mistress and comedian, all for the enormous sum of twelve dollars per week.

"Lots of high-sounding titles, but little money," he laughed. "But will you believe me when I tell you that I saved four dollars every week?"

"Tho I played in musical comedy for years, I knew nothing of music and couldn't sing a note, but a comedian has much liberty in this line and can always get by with reciting his songs and adding a little dancing to the number. The only dramatic rôle I ever played was Gaspard in 'Chimes of Normandy.'"

About 1909, Mr. Chaney came to Los Angeles and appeared in tabloid musical comedy, later joining Ferris Hartman's stock company, playing in a number of such operas as "A Knight for a Day" and "The Time, the Place and the Girl" at the Lyceum Theater in Los Angeles.

Lon Chaney's next step was to become the producer of Kolb and Dill, those popular funmakers of the stage. He also acted and danced in the plays. It was while on tour that he met Lee Moran, who, having identified himself with the motion pictures a year or so before, was enthusiastic over their possibilities, and on his return to Los Angeles he called on Mr. Moran at the studio.

"You can guess the remainder of the story," Mr. Chaney went on. "I soon succumbed, and my first work was with Allen Curtis, at Universal, in a regular slapstick comedy. Then I played a strong character rôle, a hunchback fisherman, one of those rough exteriors but with a heart of gold, in a story written by Jeanie MacPherson. Tho only a two-reeler, it went big, while I made the discovery that the screen was more interesting than the stage. I wouldn't go back for worlds. This work affords a broader scope, a chance for splendid character acting, and I like the idea of a different rôle with every picture.

SONG OF THE TOILER

By ETHEL HOPE

Day after day I sit up in my dreary tenement,
And hour by hour my nimble needle ply,
To earn the money only that it may again be spent—
There's rent to pay and food and clothes to buy.

'Tis oft that I grow weary of the dingy streets and walls
And long for wind-swept fields and skies of blue;
While all my starved and yearning soul for joy and beauty calls—
For once far fairer scenes than this I knew.

But yester-night I chanced to go to watch the pictures play
In fleeting, fairy fashion on the screen.
I saw—I scarce believe it yet—the ocean foam and spray
And stately ships that plowed their way between.

I saw old-fashioned gardens quaint, where lilies tall and fair,
And gorgeous poppies nodded in the sun;
I saw the guelder-roses bending in the summer air
Which blew away their petals, one by one.

* * * * *

The huge machines whirl noisily; the room is filled with din;
Without, there is the ceaseless noise and strife;
But thru my happy memory a host of pictures spin,
Where sea and ships and summer-time are rife.

STAGE EFFECTS

By WALTER E. MAIR

The little things that Mary says to me,
When we are sitting looking at the screen,
Somehow just make me wish that I might be
In charge of all the lights—and the machine.

I'd flash "Good Night," and let the fans depart,
And then a single lamp of rosy glow
I'd burn before a close-up of my heart
To show her, so she couldn't fail to know,

How, as the shadow-people went their way,
One vision only lingered to the end,
All bound 'round with my thoughts from day to day,
A vision much too dear to just pretend!

And then I'd put—ah, yes, a question-mark
In softest tints I'd screen, while, tenderly,
As lights died down till all was still and dark,
I'd have the organ breathe "Oh, Promise Me!"

ANTICIPATION

By BARBARA HOLLIS

In life's wide fields and wooded hills,
In deep ravine or plain,
They who have passed each other once
May some time meet again.

Thru life's long paths of mystery,
Of happiness and pain,
This is my prayer: Our lips have met—
God grant they meet again!

JOURNEY'S END

By MORRIE RYSKIND

"Love," said I, "I'm thru with you forever:
You have mocked me with your promises long enough!
I have followed strange roads when you commanded,
Strange roads . . .
Roads that beckoned, ever beckoned . . .
And at the trail's end, there rose the Mirage of Happiness—
But it was only a mirage,
For the trail led to Nowhere."

And Love spake:
"It is true you have not found what you sought,
But was the seeking the less joyous therefore?
Ah! the clean, sweet dreams
That I alone can give . . .
Only dreams, it is true, but has Life
Anything better to offer?"

But I steeled my heart to his pleading,
And I said:
"Love is only a dream, and I would awaken to Life!" . . .
And so I started on the Great Adventure,
Alone,
And Life was worth the finding:
And I slew many dragons on the way,
And fought my battles with a stalwart heart . . .
Sometimes I missed the phantasies of Love,
But mainly I was thrilled with the realities of Life . . .
Often the Road I had chosen
Appeared to lose itself in many windings,
But ever it unwound itself,
Leading to Somewhere . . .
And I laughed, and was merry,
For the other roads
Had led to Nowhere . . .

So came I to the Ending of the Road,
And there—behold!—
Far more alluring than before
Was Love!

"So this," I laughed, "is the end of all!"
But Love smiled whimsically . . .
And so I knew
That it was only the beginning.

Train for a High-Salaried HOTEL POSITION in Spare Time!

By our interesting and wonderfully complete home-study Course in hotel work, you can easily and quickly qualify for a high-salaried hotel position. This fascinating business has expanded to America's FOURTH largest industry. There is a great scarcity of trained hotel executives today! Hundreds of big-paying positions are standing open right this minute! Get into this delightful business and earn from $50 to $125 a week—board and room included! Scores of our students are making EVEN MORE. Personal instructions given you by CLIFFORD LEWIS, one of America's foremost hotel experts.

Work is Fascinatingly Interesting

No work is more generally enjoyable than hotel work. Just think of the pleasures that you can enjoy as a mountain or sea-side resort employee—bathing, fishing, long walks in the healthful mountain or sea air—in fact you can take advantage of all the pleasures that hotel patrons pay big money for. You not only spend a delightful vacation—but you are well paid for it! And think of the splendid environment that the fashionable city hotel offers you. You are in constant contact with people of wealth, prominence and influence. Never was the demand for trained hotel executives greater than it is right now—today! Get into this business now. In a few short months you will have a better position than you ever dreamed of!

No Previous Experience Necessary

So thorough—so practical—so clearly explained is this remarkable course that many of our students have been able to fill hotel jobs paying them $2200 a year and over even before they finished the Course! Our graduates are given preference by such great hotels as the Biltmore, Commodore, Waldorf-Astoria, Copley-Plaza, Washington and other leaders. This course is endorsed by the biggest hotel men in America who eagerly seek our graduates. Our Employment Bureau is flooded with calls for graduates and students of this school. Get in line NOW for one of these big-salaried jobs! A little spare time study in your own home is all that is required.

16 Years' Progress in 6 Months

"I really believe I have made sixteen years' progress in six months. The splendid position which I am now filling would not be mine, had I not prepared for it through your Course of Training. I heartily recommend it to other aspiring men and women."

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "nose," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper "Trados" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct ill-shaped noses without cost if not satisfactory.

"The ANSWER MAN"

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

ETHEL CLAYTON FOREVER.—Greetings, friends, and I hope we can get back on schedule time from now on. I hope you will be patient with me, and I'll do my best to make up for lost time. There is no Triangle Film Co.—at least they are not producing. Mildred Harris Chaplin can be reached at Los Angeles, Cal. No.

ETHEL M. P.—Your first letter, is it? Well, come often. Ralph Graves married? Nay, nay! Yes, Dorothy Dalton is playing at the Century Theater, New York City. Of course Emily Stevens is still in the ring—she is playing in "The Sacred Flame." Somehow or other that girl likes fire.

LITTLE MISS ZEALANDIA.—Yes, and some of the American people waste their lives as tho they were going to have plenty of others to utilize. Why, Tom Forman has signed a contract with Lasky for four years. He's doing some directing, too. No, child, I don't conceal my age because I might receive mash notes from admirers. I'm honest to goodness 79. Do write me again, enjoyed yours immensely.

WARWICK ADMIRER.—Right you are, Alice Joyce is playing in "Slaves of Pride." Jack Dempsey, the pugilist, is playing in the Pathé serial, "Dead or Alive," produced in Los Angeles. Of course, I live alone. You think I ought to have a butler? They're not being made any more. Butlers are like poets, they have to be born that way, but when a child is born nowadays, he is expected to become president—never a butler.

ALMA MATA.—I'll do anything to help you. Why don't you send a stamped addressed envelope for a list of the correspondence clubs? Yes, Roscoe Arbuckle is with Lasky playing in "The Round-Up." Edward Earle will play leading part in "The Law of the Yukon," released thru Mayflower. Oh, I don't mind when they complain. More people make complaints than ever make a living. Sure, run in again.

JENNIE.—You ask me why I raised a beard. Well, it was this way, Jennie. The women insisted upon sending me so many ties, in self-defense I raised a beard. Now you have my secret. No, you need cry no more, Eugene O'Brien is not married, Dorothy Davenport, Mrs. Wallace Reid, is playing in "The Fighting Chance" with Conrad Nagel and Anna Nilsson. Los Angeles, of course.

ALMA S.—So you have a new ermine scarf. Fit for the queen, I'll say. Did you know that ermine was nothing but the winter skin of the common stoat. The animal turns white in snow time, all but the very tip of its tail, which remains black. Mabel Julienne Scott, Tom Forman, Irving Cummings and Roscoe Arbuckle all playing in "The Round-Up," directed by George Melford. I should say that was some round-up—all-star cast, too. So long, Alma.

DOMACO.—No, I never get angry. When I feel it coming on, I count ten. That's a wonderful joke of yours—you say a blotter is not the real thing, it's just a take off. True, a blotter does not blot—simply absorbs the superfluous ink. Why, Jack Dempsey is living in Fannie Ward's former home in Los Angeles. Jack Sherrill will return to the stage soon.

L. G.—Well, Mary Pickford is 26, and Elsie Ferguson—well, she sang in the chorus of "Belle of New York" twenty years back, so which is older? Yes, Lionel Barrymore is playing in "The Copperhead," a famous stage play, for Paramount. Blanche Sweet in Bret Harte's "Fighting Cressy."

KEWPIE D.—You bet I like kewpies. I like the "splash me kewpies." Sorry I haven't her name. You probably read it in one of the newspapers, there's only about 60,000 newspapers in the world. Dolores Cassinelli is playing in "The Web of Deceit." Leah Baird in "The Capitol."

FREDERICK W. K.—You win, you win, my error. You say I was all wrong when I said "Neither Constance Talmadge nor Harrison Ford are married." The verb should be singular. Thanks for the correction.

ETITANCE.—If you refer to the King and Queen, they have returned to Belgium.

NORMA TALMADGE LOVER.—Thank you for your invitation to spend my vacation with you at Sparta, but since it is on the Erie R. R. I cannot accept. The last time I rode on that road I asked the man back of me a question. He could not answer, but he said he had been riding on that road all his life. I then suggested he must have got on just before I did. I don't see why they put cow-catchers on the Erie engines. They ought to put them on the rear car. There is not the slightest danger of an Erie train ever overtaking a cow, but what is to prevent a cow from walking in the rear car and chewing somebody up? No, thanks, anywhere but on the Erie for mine. You want more about Norma Talmadge in our magazines.

POLLYANNA.—The explanation of the phrase "mother tongue" is that, at home, father has nothing to say. 318 W. 48th St. is Norma Talmadge's address. No, I have no jokes about the telephone service. It's no joke, believe me. Telephone service was furnished to residences in the fall of 1879 and during that year there were sixteen telephones in New York City residences and five in Brooklyn residences. No, I didn't live in Brooklyn then, I lived in hopes, and I had plenty of neighbors.

HARRY A. J.—No, Kathlyn Williams is playing just the same. Bebe Daniels is in Los Angeles, Cal.

WALLACE L.—It isn't the way you look at other girls that spoils you with your sweetheart, but the way they don't look at her. Elsie Ferguson born in New York, 1883. So you have been floating around the Fort Lee studios for eighteen months and cant get in.

HENRY H. D.—It's on now. No, Gen. Leonard Wood did not get across, but his friends are now trying to put him over.

HELEN P. G.—You refer to "The Canterbury Tales," written by the first great English poet, Geoffrey Chaucer. You say the Stadium High School is in Tacoma and not in Seattle, and that Mildred Davis is from Tacoma. Nous verrons.

Shadows Cast Before

Some seer with a far vision has said that coming events cast their shadows before. A Modern, especially an editorial Modern, might well say that such is the case with coming Magazines—they cast their shadows before. SHADOWLAND is just this—a COMING Magazine. SHADOWLAND does just this. It lives in the Today and it promises richly, artistically, colorfully, literarily for Tomorrow. This is the Age of Progress and SHADOWLAND is the many-toned note striking, striving to strike, the harmony of the Age, the ultra-perfect Chord.

SHADOWLAND wishes to be in many lives just that—a perfect chord. A perfect chord means a perfect blending of many things and that, again, is what SHADOWLAND aspires to. To something, may we say, just a little bit finer, a little bit higher, a little bit more fraught with dreams and dreaming than we, the great Most of Us, get in our Little Everyday. Like a Shadow it wills to move in the trend of our daily lives yet leaving a Substance behind.

There is no one of us who, consciously, subconsciously or unconsciously, does not love and reach out for the color of things, the pulse of things, the rhythm of things. There is no one of us who would not, if we could, 'broider the drab cloth of the mundane with a shimmering Thread of Gold. Perhaps, being blest, with more than one shimmering thread. SHADOWLAND would like to be at least one of those shimmering threads.

It would like to be a simile to the rainbow seen at the end of a grey day.

It would like to be as a song heard faintly, clearly, by a weary heart.

It would like to induce a smile where a tear had been before.

It would like to give an hour of forgetfulness with the turning of its pages where such forgetfulness might be grateful balm.

It would like to be a friend, felt as a friendly hand.

It would like to be a light, a guide, under no obscuring bushel of adversity.

It would like to be and it aims to be a bit of real beauty, intrinsic, like a small glimpse of depthless blue seen thru rifted clouds.

To this end it has striven and still more mightily will strive.

It will strive for Color and for Counsel.

It will strive for Wisdom and for Wit.

And it has been writ in many a book of the Ancients that to those among us who mightily strive will be awarded the green sprays of the young Laurel.

We of SHADOWLAND ask for the laurels of many friendships and the beliefs thereof!

Portraits of Your Favorites

TWENTY-FOUR LEADING PLAYERS

What is home without pictures, especially of those one likes or admires? How they brighten up bare walls and lend a touch of human sympathy, alike to the homes of the rich and poor!

And what could better serve the purpose of decoration for the homes of motion picture enthusiasts than portraits of the great film stars, who have become world-wide famous?

The publishers of the two leading motion picture monthlies, the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC, have accordingly prepared at great expense, especially for their subscribers, an unusually fine set of portraits of twenty-four of the leading players.

These portraits are 5½" x 8" in size, just right for framing, printed in rich brown tones by rotogravure, a process especially adapted to portrait reproduction, and are artistic, attractive and high-grade in every way.

You will like these portraits, and you will enjoy picking out your favorites. You will delight in framing them to be hung where you and your friends may see them often.

These portraits are not for sale. They can be secured only by subscribing to the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE or MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC for one year, and then they will be sent free.

The Ambitious Miss Eddy

fulfilling her destiny, and not her destiny alone, but the destiny of another Helen Eddy, whose career in this incarnation ended when hers began.

This Helen Eddy, at one time a famous teacher of elocution, was her grandmother and constant companion during the impressionable years of her childhood. Helen's mother, (every one calls Miss Eddy Helen), was very ill, when the grandmother took the little girl and brought her to California, so her grandmother's influence was the first and the strongest Helen ever knew. It is with her today to an even greater extent than when her grandmother lived.

So, while it impressed me as being unusual, it was quite natural that she should have asked me to write this story about her grandmother.

The grandmother's favorite color was lavender, and the color alone is enough to bring back to Helen Eddy vivid memories of days spent at Mission Inn, at Riverside, California, when she was a little girl. "This was," she said, "before they raised the rent there." Of course, it was a fashionable place, but not the palatial resort that it is today. The first reprimand she ever got was from her grandmother, for whistling in the dining-room of the Mission Inn.

"She was so very beautiful," said Helen Eddy. "Her hair was white, soft and wavy, and her face was very sweet and gentle. She had lost her voice. I never knew her when she could talk above a whisper, but that whisper was beautiful in tone. She read and recited to me constantly. I knew 'The Rhyme of the Ancient Mariner' before I was seven years old. Among her pupils was Margaret Illington—and Margaret Illington was the first actress that I ever met in person."

This was not until some years after her grandmother died. Helen Eddy had been going to a dramatic school in Los Angeles for some years and appearing in Los Angeles theaters occasionally, when such appearances did not interfere with her grammar school work. The first of these appearances was at the Burbank when she was about fourteen and was in support of Margaret Illington.

"Grandmother knew Clara Morris very well, and she used to give me readings showing Miss Morris' conception of many a famous rôle. She used to talk to me of the history of the stage, too, long before I was old enough to understand."

So you see all of Helen Eddy's training was for the speaking stage and, tho her work for the screen is always sincere and conscientious, she is still looking forward to the career originally planned. She went on the screen by accident, anyhow, or at least it seemed that way. It all happened when she was a high school student at Manual Arts, a school that saw the early training of many another moving picture player.

High school days gave Helen the de-

For headache, nervousness, fatigue, insomnia, indigestion.

The woman of fastidious tastes, young or old, realizes that beauty is but a natural reflection of health. Wrinkles, "crow's feet," eyes that have lost their youthful sparkle, obesity and other unwelcome facial blemishes are, to a great extent at least, brought on by what we term "the strenuous life." Muscles are sure to become weary and congested unless they get relaxation. And complexions are certain to suffer unless properly taken care of. Home electric massage is recognized as the building-up process nearest to Nature's.

Electric massage is the active man's best friend. It takes the kinks out of sore muscles, stiff joints, sprains; it relieves headache, nervousness, fatigue; it is ideal for after-shaving facial massage and a boon to men whose hair is falling out. So the "Star" really is the ideal $5.00 Christmas gift. Especially so when you stop to realize that other vibrators cost from eighteen dollars up to fifty.

Get a "Star." Put it first on your shopping list for Christmas purchases. Complete outfit only $5.00. Includes three applicators, six feet of cord and illustrated booklet explaining all uses. The Star "Universal," a more powerful vibrator, costs $6.00. Fits any electric light socket. Preferred by many. Make your choice to-day. Fitzgerald Mfg. Co., Dept. 216, Torrington, Conn.

Men! Try this: After you've finished shaving, take a little cold cream, rub it over your face—then massage yourself with the "Star" for two or three minutes. It's great!

Treat your hair and scalp at home. Save that beauty-parlor money. A "Star" costs only $5.00, but lasts for years. Get one to-day and let your husband use it.

sire to write plays as well as act in them. She became the official stage director of many a production. From writing plays she began writing scenarios and from writing scenarios she began trying to sell them. It was in this way she met Captain Melville, head of the Lubin studios. Captain Melville did not buy a scenario, but her long training, first under her grandmother and then at a dramatic school, had given her a bearing that he recognized. She was a remarkable type, he saw, a type that would either be a great success or a flat failure. He offered her a place with his company, not as a scenario writer, but as an actress, and she accepted. Her first picture was "As the Twig Is Bent." This was in San Diego. She remained there for six months, playing a little bit of everything. In Los Angeles again, she applied for work with the Morosco Company. She became George Beban's leading woman, and in order to look more thoroly the Italian, she bobbed her hair, to the very great distress of her family. Her first Beban picture was "Pasquale," followed by "His Sweetheart," "The Marcellini Millions," "The Cook of Canyon Camp" and "One More American." Now she is a free-lance, and so great is the call for her services that she is frequently compelled to make two pictures at once, as when she did a heavy, tragic rôle with Hayakawa mornings and broad farce with Bryant Washburn afternoons. She appeared in "The Man Beneath" and "The Illustrious Prince" with Hayakawa. Her latest rôle is with Mary Pickford in "Pollyanna."

Also why Miss Lake was only recently playing opposite the rotund "Fatty" Arbuckle.

Why Betty Compton was also aiding the avoirdupois Arbuckle a few short months ago.

Why Bebe Daniels stepped from Harold Lloyd to Cecil De Mille's studio.

And why Mary Thurman deserted the Sennett bathing squad for Art.

The Metro powers-that-be consider Miss Lake the discovery of the screen season. But before Miss Lake became a foil for the heavy Mr. Arbuckle, she had serious screen leanings. A Brooklyn girl, she started at old Vitagraph. After that she was at Universal. Then came her excursion into farce with Sennett, Christie and Arbuckle, all of which apparently brought her ability to a head.

Mary Thurman was just an unknown bathing beauty on the Sennett beach when a shrewd press agent "discovered" that she was an all-round athlete. Then Mary leaped into fame overnight. All the time, however, she was obtaining valuable training. Like every other member of the Sennett seagoing squad, she had dramatic leanings, and her farce experience seems to have started her well on the road to success.

Bubble Grains At Bedtime

Foods Easy to Digest

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are not for breakfasts only. Serve them for luncheons and suppers. Float in every bowl of milk.

These are bubble grains, airy, crisp and toasted, puffed to eight times normal size. No other dainty in existence makes the milk dish so enticing.

Every Food Cell Blasted

Consider Puffed Wheat. Here is whole wheat made delightful, both in texture and in taste.

Under Prof. Anderson's process, every food cell is exploded. Digestion is made easy and complete.

It supplies whole-wheat nutrition. It does not tax the stomach. It makes milk inviting, and every child should drink a pint a day.

Serve as a breakfast dainty. Mix with your fruits. But don't forget that Puffed Grains also form the ideal bedtime dish.

Puffed Grains are the greatest of grain foods and the most enticing. Serve all three kinds. Let children revel in them.

Reel Realities

What is being done towards preserving the motion picture records of our country's participation in the great war?

These priceless films should be placed in some kind of national film repository, probably in the Smithsonian Institute in Washington, and measures made for the preservation and renewal of these films as long as may be possible. Steps have already been taken along this line in France and the idea has been taken up in England. Indeed, the movement has been given wide comment thruout British film circles.

Preserving War Films

In each allied country much money has been spent on commissioning painters to record now historical battle scenes, but little real effort seems to have been made towards preserving the actual film records of these events. Says the London Kinematograph on the subject:

"Surely we do not want the American film version of what occurred to be the only record for posterity to see! Even if it were necessary to take fresh copies of the films every few years, the expense would be quite justified and more than compensated by the money-earning value of the films. There are many other films which might be added to the National Repository, notably the films of famous people, living or dead, and the big historical subjects, but for the moment we are confining this inquiry to official war films, the preservation of which it is necessary to take prompt steps to insure. On the general question, our view is that the directors of the National Repository would invite all producing companies to present copies of worthy subjects for preservation, and we are certain that all producers would regard such an invitation in the light of an honor. How much time must elapse before we see the National Film Repository founded?"

Public Questions on the Screen

Until the government recently asked the film world to cooperate during the war and again only recently in combating Bolshevik influences, the idea seemed pretty thoroly rooted that the film should not enter the field of public discussion. The motion picture was an entertainment, it was reasoned, and not a means of public debate. Why?

As well rate the newspaper and magazine as light reading and cast aside their vast power to present and discuss current questions.

The possibilities of the silversheet are beyond our present horizon. But surely the canvas will embrace things of vital import to us today. The motion picture can do more to explain, teach and develop humanity than any other agent. Consequently we disagree with the famous T. P. O'Connor when he says, at a meeting of the British Kinema Commission of Inquiry:

"We would not allow films showing a dispute between capital and labor or serious things like that. You see, a department like ours, if we took these things on, would have a very large and a very delicate issue to decide, and we are not anxious to add to our responsibilities. We exist mainly, almost exclusively, for the kinema theater alone, for the amusement of the public, and for the profit of the proprietor or the owner of the film." In other words, the kinema is a business, not a debating circle.

Kinema Theaters in China

Albert Nachbaur states in the Chinese-French Journal de Peking that there are only fifty-seven kinemas for the four hundred million inhabitants of China. And, he adds, it is not the patrons who are lacking.

"The Chinaman, curious, artistic, and a loiterer, adores the kinema; but in order to make it popular there must be touring undertakings, a special wagon on each of the principal railways." Weekly shows could be held in the theaters and halls. With regard to films, at present, he states, Pathé and Gaumont are represented in China. "All the rest are American."

Consider the vast possibilities in China for Louis Selznick and his electric signs.

Foreign Film Activities

Pavlova is now doing a film play in Rome with Rimich, the Italian king of the screen. Her entire ballet appears with her. Reports from Spain, by the way, indicate that Italian productions are returning to favor there, supplanting American photoplays. This is largely because the Italian pictures are much cheaper than our own.

Paris is about to see Griffith's "Broken Blossoms" under the title of "Les Lys Brisés."

Restricting British Theater Building

The building of theaters in England is about to be seriously restricted, at least. The British Ministry of Health will soon take steps to impose drastic restrictions upon the building of kinema theaters until the government housing scheme has yielded more tangible results, it is said. At the moment the cabinet is considering whether it would not be advisable to prohibit the erection of kinema buildings altogether, for a definite period, but the present indications are that the less drastic course of imposing restrictions may be decided upon. It is impossible to say more at the moment beyond the fact that, if restrictions are decided upon, these would operate under a system of licenses. Such licenses would be granted only in such districts where no housing schemes are in progress.

ONE PAIR PUTTEES, PREPAID

"What prize will you give to the first director who omits a bathroom scene?" asks a CLASSIC reader.

While we are on the subject of popular trends in the celluloid plays, what about the present striving for boudoir daring after the fashion of the footlight dramas? Listen to this announcement of a Connie Talmadge production: "Just naughty enough to be nice." In it Connie wears, so the press agent declares, a "filmy costume made of moonbeams and midnight witcheries."

Just now the celluloid drama is undergoing an epidemic of desert island plays. Note the recent Norma Talmadge effort, "Victory," "Male and Female," et al. And the great Griffith is coming along with another. Which raises the question, who would you rather be desert-islanded with? And Griffith seems to have satisfactorily answered the question in his production with Cutie Beautiful.

And while we're on the subject of Griffith, the publicity prize of 1919 goes to the director's recent "lost at sea" episode. We understand that one California director is so peeved at Griffith "making" the front pages with a dinky little trading steamer that he contemplates wrecking an ocean liner.

The critic who remarked that Dorothy Dalton is a revelation in "Aphrodite," said something.

I Teach Piano A Funny Way

So people said when I first started in 1891. But now, after over twenty-five years of steady growth, I have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. I make them skilled players of the piano or organ in quarter the usual time at quarter the usual cost.

To persons who have not previously heard of my method, this may seem a pretty bold statement. But I will gladly convince you of its accuracy by referring you to any number of my graduates in any part of the world. There isn't a state in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players of the piano or organ who obtained their entire training from me by mail.

Investigate by writing for my 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of finger gymnastics. When you do go to the keyboard, you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition—usually a "night-mare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DEX, Quinn-Dex is a simple hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DEX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others, and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better at any price. You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any Course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

Fame and Fortune Contest

Having successfully produced the two-reel feature, "A Dream of Fair Women," which is now being shown thruout the country, presenting the honor roll beauties and winners of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest, we now take pleasure in announcing our plans for the 1920 contest. We shall produce a Five-Reel feature drama for the honor roll contestants, and we shall start on this immediately. The story has already been selected, and it is a strong, unique, original and picturesque one, affording fine opportunities for many players of different types.

Those contestants whose pictures appear to us to be very promising will be communicated with at once, and they may be offered parts in this great play immediately. While we are now starting production, the play will not be completed until late in the fall, and it will include the test scenes of the honor roll beauties, which will be taken at Roslyn. In this picture we can use a few persons other than young and pretty girls, for we shall need several character types, both male and female. All contestants who wish to apply for one of these parts will kindly so state on their entrance coupon, or in a letter accompanying photo.

H—H—H1
Human Hobart Henley

"The business end of it is the trouble," he said, "the retarding factor. Not mentioning any names, I know, from personal experience, that a director may be working on a picture and conditions on a certain day may not be entirely desirable. There may be friction, which is unavoidable occasionally. As a consequence, very few scenes will be shot. Perhaps, late in the day, the power-that-be will come in and inquire how many scenes have been taken. You tell him and he is aghast. He tells you, in no very measured terms, how much he knows should be produced per diem, per hour. Just as the taking films were so much grinding out of sausage meat, so many pounds to the hour, on an efficiency schedule. This has been the condition a great many of us have been up against. It has been a money-making proposition and art has had to stand by. These things considered, and their quite probable elimination also considered, I should say that the screen is a great art. It has every possible reason to be."

I mentioned, with an ear to argument, the loss of the speaking voice, so rich an asset on the stage.

Mr. Henley waived it as of no import, even to be considered as an advantage. He suggested that I, or anybody, sit thru, in one evening, two or three stage plays. Contrariwise, he suggested sitting thru two, three, even four photoplays. The former would be, he said, exhausting, even abnormal. The latter would be quite in order, is even done, and without any vast amount of fatigue. One sense in pictures, the aural sense, is completely at rest. Witnessing a stage play all the senses are called into play.

I asked him whether he had any particular mission in directing pictures, any specific message he wished to give. He disclaimed this with a smile and a shrug. Just something human, he said, something that people, all the people everywhere might see and go away, feeling kindlier, feeling happier and more tolerant, the one of the other, than they had felt before. To present life, not as we would like to have it, but as it is. Illusions are all right as a pique now and again, but dangerous as steady diet.

One of his ideas, which seems to me interesting, is his selection of themes. He takes only what appeals to him as human, whether it rises or falls to the general rule of a screen play. He takes only what appeals to him as that fine thing akin to tears and likewise akin to laughter, which makes the whole world kin. He believes, with Kipling, that Julia O'Grady and the Colonel's lady are sisters under the skin and that, fundamentally, the deepest source of tears and the most hidden founts of laughter are one and the same.

Another idea is that of using, in his pictures, non-professionals almost entirely. If he believes that a person fits the part, he engages him to play the

Writers Are Needed Jack London Said:

There are 24,868 publications, the majority of which buy short stories and feature articles. The demand for short stories and photoplays is tremendous. Over $10,000,000 will be paid for short stories and photoplays this year. Competition is keen, assuring the highest prices for good stories. And the Hoosier Institute paves the way for you to earn this money and make a name for yourself.

"I like your simple, direct, straight-from-the-shoulder method of presenting the matter. As somewhat of a veteran in the short story game, I feel justified in giving my judgment that your course in short story writing is excellently comprehensive and practical." part. It makes no difference whether he has or has not ever played before. It makes no difference where he comes from nor what he does. He might see a man walking along the street and think to himself, "That is my John Smith." He would approach that man and put it up to him. Almost always, he says, they are splendid. Of course, he uses discrimination. If a person looks so utterly the type as the persons Mr. Henley selects look, they are certain to have at least some inside qualities to tally with their outer seeming. Upon that he relies and, almost always, rightly.

When I talked with him he was near to the end of directing "Skin Deep," the main if not the only characters being two old maids, sisters, to whom, after lean years and many dreams foregone, a legacy is left . . . their reactions . . . And to watch him handle the two characters was a joy and a bit of artistry . . . Just as tender . . . just as beguiling . . . just as coaxy-and-come-ony-now as tho he were, in reality, inducing emotions in two old, quaint ladies dear to his heart. He has that manner, anyway.

He loves the work he is doing because, he says, he is at last expressing himself. He is doing, is going to do, the sort of thing he has always wanted to do. And he believes that the highest form of reward possible for any work is the satisfaction of your own creative instinct, the knowledge of your own fulfillment. He has his finger on the human pulse and counts the beat.

LOCHINVAR UP-TO-DATE

By SOPHIE E. REDFORD

Young Lochy, ballooning, came out of the fog in his Q-23—he was flying incog; He had smiled all the way thru a forty-mile gale, As he thought out his plan and hereby hangs the tale.

For a chap with a little 8-cylinder car Was to wed the fair Helen of Young Lochinvar!

His blimp was maneuvering 90 an hour, For his gondolas carried 800 horse-power, But he slacked his propellers when coming in view

Of the home of fair Helen on Fifth Avenue. He circled the heavens above her and poof! Landed softly on top of her old daddy's roof. He slipped down the fire escape, not to alarm The guests at the wedding—he meant them no harm—

But had he been found there without an excuse They might have mistaken the Ace for the deuce!

He looked at the crowd as he sat on his perch, And just as they started to go to the church. He jumped thru the window and picked up the bride

And carried her out with a strong manly stride. The bridegroom right after him hollering "Stop!"

As onward they scrambled till over the top, When Lochinvar handed the bridegroom, alas! A few cubic inches of hydrogen gas! Then bucking a belt on his lady's slim waist, He gave her a coat and some goggles in haste, For her relatives hitherto standing aloof Were now on their way en famille to the roof And the language was not a polite parlez vous That was heard at that moment on Fifth Avenue.

April-May Magazine

THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE has always stood for all that is best upon the Silver screen.

It is interested in new things, new people, new plays, new ideas.

Better than ever, brighter, gayer, more intimate is the April-May number. The very prettiest, the very smartest girls are there. The handsomest of men grace its pages.

If you would have an intelligent knowledge of what is what and who is who in the world of the movies, read the April-May MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.

Among other things it will contain:

A bright, intimate story of Ethel Clayton, illustrated with beautiful home pictures.

Faith Service visited the new Griffith studios recently and saw Lillian Gish directing her sister Dorothy—and in a vivid word-picture tells you all about it.

There will be fictionized stories of the best photoplays featuring Viola Dana, Norma Talmadge and Wallace Reid.

ADMIRER.—Bon jour. Why dont you go up to Fort Lee, N. J., to get the pictures? That's just a myth. Progress consists in discarding one's delusions, just as a bird molts its worn-out feathers to make room for fresh ones. Betty Blythe and Mahlon Hamilton are in "The Third Generation."

M. R. P. D.—All of the people you mention will be interviewed sooner or later. Be patient.

HELEN A. C.—You failed to send the where-withal. And, oh, boy, that's necessary.

JOSEPH W.—No, I didn't mind the cold weather this winter. Had all my furs out, and I was comfortable in my hall room. Surely I drink buttermilk. Vola Vale is with Metro in Bert Lytell's company. Good company, too. I haven't the name of "The Kid" in "The Girl from Outside."

LUCIEN F.—Well, if a man continually makes a fool of himself it does not follow that every clown is a self-made man. Yes, Babe Ruth's pictures are being shown. Yes, about Pauline Frederick. First two on the coast, the others in New York. Run in again, Lucien.

RICHARD BARTHELMESS ADMIRER.—Thanks, the manner of the giving makes the real value of the gift. Well, you dont want much of any. You know Socrates said "He who has the fewest wants is nearest to the gods." Bryant Washburn is playing in "Too Much Johnson." Warren Kerrigan in "Live Sparks."

MARGUERITE MCG.—Alice Brady is playing in "Forever After" and also on the screen.

DORIS W.—Sessue Hayakawa is about 31 years old. Douglas Fairbanks has been in pictures for about five years. Your critic reminds me of the eagle who "has a contempt for all other birds." The owl, however, is more contemptuous still, for he hoots at everything. Bessie Barriscale is playing in "Beckoning Roads."

DOROTHY M., BROOKLYN.—No, we never published "The Spite Bride."

VIRGINIA C.—You want interviews with the players and their wives. I'm afraid a good many of them would prefer not to have their wives present. Your illustration reminds me of Lord Bacon, who, when he went driving in the rain, would remove his hat to let the shower come upon his head, and say that he seemed to feel the spirit of the universe upon him. Dorothy Gish and Owen Moore in "Betty of Greystone."

EDITH H.—Have no list of addresses of players.

DORIS K.—Why didn't you sign your name and address?

HENRY H. D.—No, I dont know whether Gloria Swanson can speak Polish. I have never spoken to her in that language. Olive Tell is with Jans Pictures, Inc., 729 7th Ave., N. Y. C.

JUNE C.—Yes, Viola Dana has bobbed hair. Yes, we have to have them. Fools and obstinate people make lawyers rich. And knowledge directs practice, yet practice increases knowledge, so there you are. Run in and we will debate it some day.

LEONA T.—My, all in one breath. You want Nazimova on the cover, more about Zazu Pitts, and an interview with Lila Lee. You think Dorothy Gish is great in comedy, and Marie Provost very cute. And you dont like Betty Blythe. You say I remind you of a mirror, because I reflect. Most gracious lady, I thank you.

TEXAS BLUE B.—Well, I'll try to be kind to you. Jack Pickford is playing with Goldwyn. He might send you his picture if you write him. Yes, I thank you for the fee.

W. J. WRIGHT.—Yes, Louise Lovely is still playing opposite William Farnum, Fox Company, Los Angeles, Cal. I didn't care for "Wings of the Morning." Cant say that I liked her in it.

LOIS C.—Do you really mean that? No, I have never tried a fireless cooker, but I have had lots of experience with a cookless fire. I prepare a good many of my meals. You want to see Grace Cunard back again. Grace, the silversheet is paging you.

ALADDIN Homes

SAVE $300 to $1000

Lumber shortages—a virtual famine of lumber—exists in many parts of the country. Reports indicate it is impossible even now to get material for certain needs. Stocks were never as low as they are now. The demand was never as great as it is now. THIS MEANS STILL HIGHER LUMBER PRICES. It means that prices will go upward rapidly—that it will possibly take $150 in six months or a year to buy $100 worth of lumber. Will you be forced to pay these prices? Will your need for a home in six months cost you a 50% or a 100% penalty?

Four Greatest Forests—Aladdin Lumber Yards

The Aladdin lumber yards are the four greatest forests of the United States. Each one has sufficient standing timber to take care of the needs of the country for many years. The possible lumber famine predicted in all parts of the country will not affect the Aladdin Co. Every Aladdin Home manufactured in 1920 will be shipped quickly and completely. No shortage of a few grades of material from the Aladdin house order. No hold-up on the job on account of lack of material.

BUILD NOW—DON'T DELAY

Early buyers of Aladdin Homes are assured delivery. Aladdin buyers are also assured a big saving—from $300 to $1,000. BUT quick action is necessary. The enormous demand for homes will soon fill the Aladdin Mills to capacity. Your order will possibly be too late. An important message to every builder is contained in the Aladdio catalog. It is the message to you from the world's greatest homebuilding organization. Send to-day for this 100-Page Book No. 1661.

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

A small bottle of Freezone costs but a few cents at drug stores anywhere.

DORIS B.—Surely I like to know what you think of these magazines. We'll do all we can to give you what you want. Yes, it would be a much different world if we were as discouraged with ourselves as we are with other people. Oh, of course, Harry T. Morey is with Vitagraph. Very much so. His next picture is "The Darkest Hour," but most of Harry's hours are bright. You know he's a star.

WALLACE REID FAN.—You say in part, "If you are really 79 years old, be quick about answering." Yes, child, it's vice versa now, the old must dance to the tune of the young. Henry Walthall played in "Confession," Louise Glaum played in "The Lone Wolf's Daughter."

EMIL G.—You want information about Ellen Cassidy. Well, she's Irish, and she has a Catholic name, and she probably likes the color of green—particularly on payday.

Oo LA LA.—Vee, wee. Why, Famous Players have bought "Aphrodite," now playing in New York, and in which Dorothy Dalton is making a hit. It will be produced in pictures soon. Louise Lovely is with Fox. No, I don't use a cane—only the infirm and aged do that, not to mention duds.

MINNEHAHA.—Why, John Burroughs says that animals experience grief over the loss of their young, but not over the death of a member of their flock or tribe. Death itself seems to have no meaning to them. Francis Bushman and Beverly Bayne played in "The Master Thief" in Los Angeles. They do say that Washington seldom smiled, but the same cannot be said of Laugh-eyette.

MILLICENT.—Hobart Bosworth is the star in "Behind the Door," directed by Thomas Ince. Louise Glaum fell and sprained her ankle when making the final scene of "Sex."

APHRODITE.—Of course I compose on the typewriter and, like Kipling, use an Underwood. My greatest pleasure in life is to rise early and oil it. I can do better on this machine without the trouble of thought. I just start something at the first line, pull open the throttle valve and go for a walk around the park. When I come back I find an answer of any desired length completed and the machine flushed and happy waiting modestly for my applause. Believe that, and I'll tell you another. Douglas Fairbanks in "When the Clouds Roll By." Elaine Hammerstein in "Greater Than Fame."

Mrs. JAMES DE B.—Glad to hear from the mothers as well as the children. Shirley Mason was born in Brooklyn, 1901, but she has lived it down. She has brown hair, grey eyes, and plays the piano beautifully. No, I never hoast of my ancestors. I have a tree around here some place. But it's a rather sad fact that the ancestors of a great many men who boast of their coats-of-arms, had no coats to either their arms or their backs. You mean Mitchell Lewis in "The First of His People." Come in some time, and I will be glad to chat with you.

THURSA.—Dont cry, little girl, dont cry. Washing your eyes with tears may be discomfoting for the moment, but it clears the vision afterwards. Delaware, Alaska, Nevada and Wyoming have the least picture theaters of all States in the U. S. A.

C. K. Y. FAN.—Yours was more of a letter to the editor, but I like to hear what you have to say about the magazines. Yes, I have heard that armistice, like divorce, is the little period à la mode, between two marriages. Get thee behind me, Satan.

MIRIAM H.—Your wish will be satisfied soon. Richard Barthelmess has been interviewed. McAlpin is Scotch. But if you dont change your opinions you never will enlarge your knowledge.

JACKIE.—Betty Blythe was born in Los Angeles, 1893. She has dark hair and complexion, weighs 145, 5 ft. 8½ ins. No, I have never met her. Glad to hear from you; write some more.

TWO, TO, TOO ENTHUSIASTIC.—Address Elsie Ferguson, in care of Paramount, New York City. "Unpardonable Sin" has been released for some time now. The maiden name of Mrs. George Washington was Martha Dandridge.

CHESTER MUSIC CO., 920 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Ill.

WILLIAM DUNCAN ADMIRER.—Write the players you mention in care of their company, Los Angeles, Cal. Yes, there must be something fascinating in the scheme of getting others to do our intellectual labor for us, to attempt to fill up our minds as if they were jars. Wouldn't that jar you? Clara Young in "The Forbidden Woman."

MONTIE BLUE writes that on account of change of address he wants his friends to know that several hundred requests for photos were neglected. Address him Lasky Studio, Hollywood, Cal. Let's hear from you again, Monte.

DIZZIE DOT.—Yes, and a drop of ink will make millicus think, if wisely directed. Dorothy Dalton and William Desmond in "A Gamble in Souls." Speaking of suffrage, did you know that more than 14,000,000 women in suffrage states will be privileged to vote for President next year, even if the Federal suffrage amendment is not carried? I'm out of politics. No, I don't think I will accept the nomination for President. But, of course, if they can't find anybody else, and the nomination were forced upon me, I might ask the editor to give me a four years' vacation and try it.

C. E. C.—May MacAvoy in "The Woman Under Oath." You write a clever letter. As somebody has said, some men are always making spiteful remarks about any man who succeeds. They seem to think the door of success will open to them if they do enough knocking. Madame Petrova is not playing in pictures, but she is the most popular vaudeville artist in the world.

ROBIN G.—Yes, Richard Barthelmess, Griffith Studios, Mamaroneck, N. Y. You say he was good in "Broken Blossoms," but whoever saw a Chinaman with a dimple in his chin? Shucks! A Chinaman with a dimple is a better Chinaman.

JERE G.—Florence Turner has been making comedies at Universal and Maurice Costello makes occasional appearances at Vitagraph.

HENRY K. S.—I doubt whether the actresses you mention will carry on a correspondence with you. You know they work all day the same as the rest of us.

CANADA.—There is nothing being said about Mary Pickford retiring from the screen. Come, you must not think that of Eugene O'Brien.

MITZI V.—That's one thing, don't believe in rumors. Theda Bara is very much alive. So you noticed a careless mistake in "Her Kingdom of Dreams." You say the envelope when handed to Miss Warren had no stamp on it, and when she opened it, it was all stamped, addressed and everything. And you wish Nazimova would give up smoking. When she sees this and learns your desires she will no doubt promptly desist.

POPPY.—No, Dorothy Gish does not wear a wig when not playing. What do you think I am, a human geography? Texas was much larger before it was annexed to the U. S. in 1845. Please look up your own geography. You advise me not to throw my old gaiters in the back alley because then they would become alligators. I deny the allegation and defy the alligator.

INQUISITIVE.—Norma Talmadge was born in 1897 at Niagara Falls. She has brown eyes, is 5 feet 2, and weighs 110. Mrs. Charlie Chaplin in "The Inferior Sex." Ben Wilson, and Neva Gerber was the girl in "Mystery Ship." Why, I should say the reason for the lack of development in the Alaskan forests is because of the dampness. Sit down and write me again, Inquis, and I'll do my best.

A. B. C.—Touching on a subject of which I know little, but the name "whiskey" was probably derived from the Celtic "uisgebeatha" (water of life), which was contracted to "usquebaugh" and still later to whiskey. It's selling for $8.00 a fifth, and try and get it, even for that! Zena Keefe in "The Woman God Sent," a Selznick.

TOMMY, ST. PAUL.—You say some of the players have shaky reputations. Who said so? In order to preserve an unspotted reputation, you have got to look out that nobody spots you. Everybody is free to give his opinion except lawyers—they sell theirs.

The girl got $6 a week, and was lonely.

"Piggy" you can imagine his kind,—was waiting down stairs. He knew where champagne and music could be had. But that night she didn't go. That was Lord Kitchener's doing. But another night—

When the Gorilla Sang!

Fluttering—poised an instant—then back and forth with light and easy steps she sprang, while he leaped out at her side mimicking the uncouth, hideous bounds of a gorilla—she in her woodland nymph dress of leaves and be in the clothes of Broadway.

There in that dingy night court—in the pale flare of the gas lens—they did a dance which held the destiny of two lives—and yet, so strange it was that only one of all who saw it dared guess—

Two Against Two Hundred

They were waiting for him to collapse, before they killed him. He was alone with two hundred man-eating blacks. He had tended them in their misery—but they had no gratitude.

And then she—this girl—had appeared, out of nowhere—like some mysterious goddess out of the Pacific. And alone, they two fought off the two hundred.

That is the beginning of the story—and in it is all the heat—the weird terror—the dreadful mystery of the South Sea Islands. To you they have been but a few dots on the map.

JACK LONDON made them blaze into terrific reality.

Are YOU Headed For The Scrap Heap

STRONGFORT
The Perfect Man

Thousands of men are suddenly dumped into the scrapheap of worn-out humanity who hadn't the slightest idea, a week or two before they got their walking papers, that they were slated to be fired.

A weak, sickly, constipated, bilious, grouchy man never appreciates that his usefulness is nearly at an end, until the day comes when he's out of a job for good. WAKE UP, IF YOU ARE ENGAGING YOURSELF THROUGH YOUR DAILY WORK, HANDED AND HAMPERED AT EVERY POINT BY CHRONIC ILLNESSES THAT ARE DRAGGING YOU DOWN INTO THE GREAT PIT OF THE SNIFFIT. Your collapse will come some day with a bang—probably when you least expect it. Look the facts in the face—take stock of yourself—ACT, before it is too late, and

You can do it, without any question, when you once appreciate the dangerous toboggan you are on and make up your mind to get off it for good and all. You can get rid of the constipation that is soaking your system with virulent poisons; you can free yourself from the digestive disorders that are making you feel like a human wreck; you can turn your watery blood into the rich, life-giving fluid that will build up your body and your brain, strengthen all your vital organs and make a virile MAN of you again—you can do it, if you WILL to do it, and go about it in Nature's way.

Don't take the wrong turning and waste your time and money in quick "remedies" and patent medicine dope. Nature never prepared a prescription or put up a patented powder. Your violation, perhaps unconsciously, of Nature's Law, as laid right in your presence, condition, and she alone, through her marvelous recuperative force, can restore the manhood you have lost.

Let Me Show You Nature's Way

I don't deal in drugs and dope. My life has been spent in studying out and experimenting with the forces that Nature has implanted in every human organism for the eternal betterment of the human race. No more wonderful power exists in all the world. Every physician and surgeon depends upon it; without the aid of Nature, no treatment, no operation, could possibly succeed.

I built myself up into the strongest man in the world through Strongfortism—Nature's method of Remaking Men. Thousands of strong, able, successful men, former pupils of mine, owe their present abounding vitality and the success it brought them, to that same method. Pupils of mine right now, in every part of the globe, are regaining each day the vigor and vitality they thought was lost forever.

Strongfortism

Strongfortism is simply a system of Living Life as Nature meant it to be lived; of taking advantage to the utmost of the wonderful forces she constantly exerts toward the rebuilding of wasted brain and body tissues and the restoration of lost vitality. Your present unfortunate condition may have been caused by early indiscretions or excesses of your own, it makes no difference; no matter how much of your energy has ebbed away. Strongfortism will help you, as it has helped other men, and set you on the right road toward renewed health and manly vigor. I have never known it to fail. I GUARANTEE to improve your condition 100 per cent, if you will follow my directions for a few months.

Send for My Free Book

"Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy" will give you all the facts about Strongfortism, and prove to you indisputably that Strongfortism will do for you what it already has done for thousands of other sickly, miserable men. You'll find it interesting from first to last, because it treats of the most important thing in the world TO YOU. Send for it NOW. Don't delay—every day, every hour counts. Remember, THE BOOK IS FREE. Fill out the coupon and mail to me with three 2-cent stamps to cover packing and postage and I will send with the book a special letter on the subject in which you are most interested.

Gossip of the Pacific Coast

By FRITZI REMONT

LOS ANGELES, (Special).—It's a well-established fact that when any one wants to raise funds for charitable purposes, the motion picture field is combed for cuties first of all. At Clune's Auditorium, just before the holidays, the Los Angeles Examiner arranged a monster benefit, at which nearly everybody tried to insert a bit, with the effect of keeping us out of bed until 2 A. M. one Sunday morning.

Ben Alexander aroused a lot of amusement by playing director behind a big camera, with Charlie Murray as chief actor. His instructions, coupled with much delightful semaphoring and facial maneuvering, made one of the hits of the evening. The genial Mr. Murray had been billed to tell funny stories, but introduced himself by saying that he knew more "stag" stories than any other sort and that, if the ladies would retire from the audience, he would be pleased to entertain the men folk.

One of Cecil De Mille's playlets was produced with telling effect, Bebe Daniels sang lovely ballads, Mary Miles Minter told anecdotes and—oh, well, what's the use? Everybody was there and saw and conquered.

Gloria Swanson, the adored of many swains, has gone and done it. She is off on her honeymoon with Herbert K. Sornborn, who is with Equity Films Corporation. This is Miss Swanson's second venture, altho she is only starting to tick off her twenties. She will continue her screen career, having several years' contract with Famous Players-Lasky Company to fulfil.

Conrad Nagel is starting as a star on the same lot, doing "The Fighting Chance," Robert W. Chambers' exciting novel, under Charles Maigne, who has but lately arrived also.

The lot at Vine and Selma streets, Hollywood, looks rather lively, with eleven companies working hard. Uncle George Melford is now a feature director, and several new directors have been added to the list, among those being Thomas Heffron, who is megaphoning Major Warwick and Lois Wilson, who is making her first appearance opposite the soldier-star. Miss Wilson looks about sixteen now; she keeps getting younger and prettier and is one of the best-loved girls at the studio. It was just about two days before Christmas, a frightfully warm spell that we had, and Lois was sauntering about, package-laden, awfully excited over the exchange of gifts. She wore a sheer little frock of some lace-trimmed buff material, and was made up for the afternoon scenes with the Major.

I saw Wanda Hawley in a blue suit and ditto turban, looking exactly like one of those blonde "Baby Vamps" the stores are selling nowadays. She is playing opposite Bryant Washburn this time, in "Mrs. Temple's Telegram," which James Cruze is directing.

Stop!

We cant. We haven't a minute to spare. We are trying to catch up. We have to make up for that time we lost in taking off that tire, punctured by the printers' strike. The race is a hot one—it looks as tho we might be beaten, but—

Look!

We are not the only ones upset by punctures, and blow-outs, and strikes, and things—and the race is even again—and Listen!

We have an idea! We are going to win yet. We will leave the punctured April issue of THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC by the roadside, and will catch up by putting out an April-May issue!

BIGGER — BRIGHTER
—BETTER than ever.

Remember the date. April 15, 1920! Wait for this new novelty number which will fully compensate you in every way for the unavoidable delay!

Ethel Clayton was buying Oregon holly wreaths, having carefully sorted thru a lot of spruce and pine circlets, which did not appeal to her fastidious taste. She's done "Young Mrs. Winthrop," under Walter Edmunds, formerly with Connie Talmadge, and will start on "A Lady in Love"—and Ethel is—but only with her work.

Mary Anderson planned to remember everybody at the Selig studio with gifts—at least those who work with her—and looked engulfed behind piles of small boxes and strands of ribbons looped for safe-keeping about her neck. Mary said that she wished we had a theater like the one Seattle boasts, which has a second-floor ballroom where one may dance to rest one's self while waiting for seats in the motion picture auditorium. She hates to stand in line, and with Los Angeles crowded to the bursting point with tourists, one cannot get a seat anywhere without holding down a bit of paving on Broadway for an hour or so first.

Mitchell Leison, the wonderful designer for the Famous Players-Lasky studio, whose entrancing gowns for Gloria Swanson have been shown on living models at our local theaters many times, is back from New York, where he had carte blanche for the buying of rare laces and materials. Howard Higgin, who designs the luxurious sets used by the De Milles, has also returned recently. He's an architect as well as connoisseur of furniture and draperies, china and bric-à-brac, so it's no wonder his sets are "chemically pure" in every respect.

I met Irving Cummings sauntering up Vine Street with Junior, who is surely the image of his Par—with the same big brown eyes and "sortacurly lox," only Junior is hatless and his fond parent wears a giant Stetson. They do say that Mrs. Cummings is the most delightful woman! That this is one of the truly happy marriages in Filmland. It's no wonder Mr. Cummings had the top button of his sports shirt thrown wide to the December zephyrs, for any man should be cheery over a handsome infant like Junior.

Over on Wilshire Boulevard, I bumped into "Mother" Sylvia Ashton, who was dropping in on the Donald MacDonalds for afternoon tea. The latter have just bought the lot next to their handsome home, and Mrs. MacDonald, artist that she is, has designed marvelous improvements, for the garden will now be double size, and one part will be devoted to a sunken garden, adjoining the cute Japanese tea-garden, where so many lovely hours have been spent in entertaining friends with the only amber beverage now available in Hollywood.

William Stowell, whose tragic death cast a lot of gloom over the photoplayers, left seventeen thousand dollars, his only surviving relative being an elderly aunt. Lillian Leighton, who is always mothering some one on the screen, is still taking care of Mr. Stowell's birds, books and other pets, not to mention the treasures he collected in the last few years. She had received so many interesting letters from Mr. Stowell, who was a "great big kid," they all tell me, very good-hearted, frank and unspoiled—and it's been almost impossible for Miss Leighton to believe that he really wont return to claim his trinkets and pets.

Colleen Moore has been suddenly elevated to special honors, and is doing an eight-reel feature, the biggest thing ever handed out to that bright little gossoon. I met her shopping for a chic wardrobe, and judging by the wrinkle on her pretty face, she's very much puzzled about her "trousseau."

Miss Moore was out on location at the celebrated San Juan Capistrano Mission, half-way between Los Angeles and San Diego, and sent lots of snapshots to her studio friends from that interesting resort. San Juan was pretty well destroyed by an earthquake in 1812, and only part of the mission has been restored, altho the beautiful and quaint old cloister garden still offers splendid "shots" for the camera.

At San Francisco, I saw a preview of the first Australian film offered in our markets, and many were the Los Angeles brokers and producers who had run up to see it.

The story is a dialect poem by C. J. Dennis, considered the greatest writer of dialect poems in any language today. The theme of "The Sentimental Bloke" is simple, but it is sympathetic, allows of much legitimate comedy and gives charming glimpses of Australian scenery. A flash-back of scenes from "Romeo and Juliet," with subtitles in verse supposedly recited by "The Bloke," is one of the funniest things in this comedy.

I overheard a conversation between two men later. The one with a wealthy voice and a rotund personality was saying, "I am afraid of it; we're not strong for dialect stuff in the U. S. A., because we're not apt to understand it."

The other replied, "I dont see that at all, for in each case the action follows the subtitle in dialect so closely that a man must be an ignoramus not to catch the drift of the verse."

The first answered, "You're talking from the standpoint of critic and newspaper man—I'm talking for Lizzie and Sallie, et al., who cant even read ordinary English."

Then both laughed as the newspaper man recited dramatically, "'Ow I ongkored for 'at coot, 'at barny goat named Romeo!'"

Wilfred Lucas directed the photoplay, so it's with a good deal of interest that we viewed it, at all events.

A party of Indian princesses and princes visited the Lasky studio, and while it's not unusual to have foreign visitors, these excited attention because the ladies were of such high caste that they were distinguished by having diamonds inset in their noses, one on either side. Evidently they dont have gumshoe men in India to disturb the peace of mind of the young ladies.

A queer sight presents itself at Sixth and Hill streets, former home of the First Methodist Church, and a good

Shadowland

"The Magazine of Magazines"

You have just come in from your day's work. You are mentally exhausted. Life is dead in its monotony, and you flop down in a chair and gaze stupidly at the blank wall of your existence before you.

Your hand gropes idly for the cigarets or pipe (or knitting). It touches a magazine. Half-despairingly, you pick it up with the faint hope that your mind will be distracted for a moment. In the arch of light coming from your reading lamp, you stare at the name—SHADOWLAND. You repeat it slowly, again and again, in a sort of half-whisper. Slowly vague thoughts begin to form in your mind. Half-developed visions, pictures from the inside world of the mind's eye, creep into your memory. You set sail for the Land of Romance, that misty Land of Long Ago.

SHADOWLAND—Again you say it and shadow pictures appear before you. You remember the long evenings before the fire-light when you were a child. You sat on grandfather's knee and gazed fearfully over his shoulder to where the long, grotesque shadows towered from floor to ceiling.

You remember when a boy, coming home late at night from some fellow-playmate's house, across the empty lots which looked so threatening and full of mysterious shadows. How frightened you were, your only companion being your shadow running alongside of you and causing strange thoughts and terror to trouble your mind.

You remember the great discovery that two shadows could be one. That moonlight night when, holding her in your arms, you saw the single shadow on the grass. You sigh with regret—for Shadowland is Memory.

* * *

You turn the pages of the magazine and, like the immortal Alice, you begin at the beginning, go on to the end, and then stop. Regret leaves you. Your mind becomes stimulated, for Romance is with you still, but in another form. Your pulse quickens at the sight of so much Beauty—your sense of humor is touched by the wit of the writers, and your mind appreciates the cleverness of the articles. You become more and more absorbed. Fatigue vanishes; the world and its troubles are again worth while, and you are content—for Shadowland is Life!

February SHADOWLAND will be a magazine de luxe. It will treat vividly of the best in art, the stage, screen, music, literature and kindred arts. It will have the best stories, articles and interviews that can be obtained. Its beauty and its charm will gladden the heart of every member of the family.

many of the former church members are expressing shocked surprise.

The building was bought by Syd Graumann for a new theater, and the enterprising advertiser has boarded up the stained glass windows partially, ditto the big carved portals, and placed his advertising sign across the edifice announcing the forthcoming production of motion pictures de luxe on the sacred site. But that's not the worst of it, for fruit vendors have leased the "concession" from Graumann, enabling them to display fruits and vegetables on the steps formerly trod by pious visitors, and so for the first time we're seeing a twentieth century version of "My house shall be called a House of Prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves and money-changers." Yet it's quite in line with P. T. Barnum's advice, isn't it?

her boudoir is to be an antique desk, lined—she is having it relined—with purple leather, and before which she will sit to write, Turk-wise, upon a mammoth cushion.

All about there were pictures, framed in heavy silver, which "Jack gave me," of Jack himself, of Olive and of the kiddie, besides various other screen luminaries.

decided that he shall finish high school and go thru college before choosing a career.

"We think of a new one every few days, so there is no telling what he will really be when the time comes. My brother is everything to me," and Marjorie waxed eloquent in his praise. "His fatherly advice guides every move I make, for we talk over all my personal and business affairs, and his judgment is wise and dependable. He is growing an inch a week and is getting so dignified. He is struggling to learn to dance now, and we have the greatest fun every night, dancing all over the bungalow."

FASCINATING PHYLLIS

By BARBARA HOLLIS

Phyllis is false—she is fickle and frivolous; Phyllis is flighty—flirtatious, forsooth; Phyllis is frank—ah, yes, frightfully, fearlessly;

Fair yet so faulty—I'm speaking the truth.

Phyllis is fathomless—fetchingly fathomless; Phyllis is flippant and faithless I know; Phyllis is foolishly fond of philandering; Isn't it funny I love Phyllis so!

She Played to Lose!

This woman—so soft—so lovely—so exquisite in every detail—so out of place in that wild gambling hell—this woman played to lose. Across the gleaming tables her long white hands pushed the crackling bills. One after another the yellow backed hundred dollar bills passed from her golden bag to the dealer. And yet she smiled serene.

How she got there—why she was there—how she got away—it all makes a thrilling story—a tale with not one mystery, but three—and it has been told by to-day's master of detective mystery—

CRAIG KENNEDY The American Sherlock Holmes ARTHUR B. REEVE The American Conan Doyle

He is the detective genius of our age. He has taken science—science that stands for this age—and allied it to the mystery and romance of detective fiction. Even to the smallest detail, every bit of the plot is worked out scientifically. For nearly ten years, America has been watching his Craig Kennedy—marveling at the strange, new, startling things that detective hero would unfold. Such plots—such suspense—with real vivid people moving through the maelstrom of life! Frenchmen have mastered the art of terror stories. English writers have thrilled whole nations by their artful heroes. Russian ingenuity has fashioned wild tales of mystery. But all these seem old-fashioned—out of date beside the infinite variety—the weird excitement of Arthur B. Reeve's tales.

For some reason he seemed much embarrassed.

"I—er—oh, I ride horseback, and—do you really want to know?"

Of course, I did. He was so mysterious about it I thought it must be dueling or moonshining.

"I play poker!" he confided, in a stage whisper.

"So do I!" I responded, in the same tone, and we shook on it.

"I've always thought," he added, in hurried confidence, "that my fondness for that indoor sport was responsible for my part as the Mystic Shrine husband in 'Fair and Warmer.' You remember, he was a poker devotee."

However, Know All Men by These Presents: That on or about the twenty-third day of March, in the year nineteen hundred and twenty, there will be placed for sale at all customary places, a March-April issue of SHADOWLAND MAGAZINE—more beautiful, more artistic, more interesting than any previous number, by which sale we expect to repay the readers of this magazine for the annoyance caused by the necessary omission of the March issue.

The Celluloid Critic

knot is tied. The way a healthy young chap falls beneath the spell of the madman forms an unpleasant vein running thru an otherwise high-spirited comic romance. You will at least sense this vaguely when you see the comedy.

"Should a Woman Tell?" (Metro), is claptrap melodrama of the most obvious sort, dealing with one of those super-innocent cuties who is wronged by a rich

TO MARY PICKFORD:

It would not be quite fair to write a cold, calm criticism of "Pollyanna." Because it would not tell half that is in our heart.

'Way back in the minds of all of us are dreams—the dreams we started with, the dreams that came to grief when we encountered life as it is. You have the ability—indeed, we should say genius—to stir those latent memories, to sweep back the years, to give us faith again.

How well you have succeeded in "Pollyanna"! The calm, critical side of our brain tells us that it is a sugar-coated view of life as it isn't and never was, but the dream side of us stirs—and awakens. What, then, of criticism? You have given us a golden flash into something intangible, never to be attained perhaps, but sacred, far inside our hearts. You have made us forget the realities of today.

If we ever reach the point where you fail to touch us, Mary Pickford, we will know that our ideals have gone, that our heart is empty, that ashes have taken the place of our memories. May that never be!

We know—our critical self keeps repeating it—that you never did a finer, better sustained or an infinitely more subtle bit of playing of childhood than your Pollyanna. That the tear was never so close to the smile. But it is the soul beneath this histrionic dexterity that we feel. You are eternal youth, with its dream cities of high hopes.

We need you, Mary Pickford—and more "Pollyannas."

THE CELLULOID CRITIC.

and unscrupulous youth and who goes thru reels and reels of hectic emotions. "Should a woman tell?" is supposed to be the problem facing the cutie when she weds a very upright young chap. "Should a Woman Tell?" is exceedingly mediocre. The direction is uninspired, save for a rather well done shipwreck. The one redeeming feature is the rather promising work of the new Metro star, Alice Lake, who seems a sort of mingling of Alice Brady, Norma Talmadge and half a dozen other celluloid luminaries.

Miss Wise Woman says MAGDA CREAM used first makes powder cling much better. When motor-ing it protects the skin. After a day's shopping or dusty ride it is nicer than soap for cleansing the skin. A MAGDA massage before retiring keeps the skin youthful looking, rests and refreshes tired nerves.

WORTH A MILLION DOLLARS

But It Doesn't Cost a Cent to enter

1920 Fame and Fortune Contest

Just as easy as sitting on the magic carpet and wishing yourself a place on the screen. This is open to everybody—ladies and gentlemen. It doesn't matter who you are, what your nationality is, how old or how young you are, married or single, fat or thin, or where you live. All you must possess is charm of manner, grace of movement or some personal charm or beauty.

MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND

will give two years' publicity to the winner. This means your portrait in colors on our magazine covers that claim a circulation of nearly a million copies monthly; interviews, special articles, pictures,—in other words, publicity that cannot be bought at any price. The magazine claims that in two years the winner will be standing on the ladder of success in the motion picture world. Can you afford to pass this up?

RULES FOR THE CONTESTANTS

Contestants shall submit one or more portraits. On the back of each photo an entrance coupon must be pasted. The coupon must be from either THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, CLASSIC or SHADOWLAND, or a similar coupon of your own making.

Postal-card pictures and snap-shots not accepted. Tinted photos cannot be reproduced in magazine.

Photos will not be returned to the owner.

Contestants should not write a letter accompanying photo requiring a reply. Thousands of photos will be received and it will be impossible to answer each one. All rules will be printed in all three magazines.

Photos should be mailed to CONTEST MANAGER, 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. Send as many as you like.

The contest is open to everybody, no age limit, except those who have already played prominent screen or stage rôles.

Contest closes Aug. 1, 1920.

"Red Hot Dollars," (Paramount), isn't much as a story, but it is vivified and humanized by Charlie Ray, as a young machinist who saves the life of his employer and is rewarded by being adopted into the family. Then, of course, he settles a feud between his foster father and the grandfather of his sweetheart. Charles Mailes makes this dour old Scotchman stand out and Gladys George is effective as his daughter. Ray was never better than in "Red Hot Dollars." What a vitally real person he is!

"The Beauty Market," starring the breathlessly beautiful Katherine MacDonald, is another story wherein the society girl of fine sensibilities is just about to sell herself in matrimony when the rugged chap happens along and teaches her that the real thing is "to cook and scrub and love." Every time this kind of story ends we experience a period of worry for the hero, knowing that the fair butterfly heroine is going to become an awful flivver as a cook. But one should really look no further than the final fade-out. Miss MacDonald is the heroine, Roy Stewart is the strenuous hero, (and we liked and disliked him in alternating moments), while Kathleen Kirkham gives an able—and finely subtle—performance of a weak society hanger-on.

An unpleasant tinge overhangs "The Woman in the Suitcase," (Paramount), Enid Bennett's latest vehicle. This is due to the story itself, revolving around the efforts of a girl of refined home life who tries to overcome her father's secret weakness for a very blonde young woman by meeting the v. b. y. w. in her own sordid world. At the same time, the story holds the interest.

Albert Ray and Elinor Fair have certain possibilities, but they are not strongly manifest in "Tin Pan Alley," (Fox). Briefly, it is a story of a young chap who writes a song hit and then loses his head. The photoplay has the usual Fox subtitles; i.e., labored attempts at humor. Still worse is Peggy Hyland's "The Web of Chance," (Fox). This even has the unforgivable fault of bad photography.

"Haunting Shadows," (Robertson-Cole), is a passable visualization of Meredith Nicholson's novel, "The House of a Thousand Candles," of a lonely, deserted house, hidden treasure, ghosts and kindred ingredients of callow romance.

Let us turn for the moment to comedies. Fatty Arbuckle, (Paramount), shows a decided improvement. His "The Garage" is the funniest farce of the month. Not a little of this merit is due to "Buster" Keaton.

Harold Lloyd has been slumping a bit. His "From Hand to Mouth" and "Captain Kidd's Kids" were rather weak. The former has Bebe Daniels' successor, Mildred Davis, who appears pleasantly youthful and promising. Mack Sennett has not turned out a brilliant burlesque in quite some time. The Sunshine and Universal comedies continue as fearful as of yore.

Pathé Comedies

They Teach the Hard-to-Make-Laugh—How to Laugh

HUMOR is raised to the nth degree in Pathé Comedies. Joyous, care-free laughter bubbles out of audiences at the mere thought of Pathé Comedy stars. No propaganda, no social problem, but just clean fun and the high spirits of youth!

HAROLD LLOYD, who for four years has been teaching the hard-to-make-laugh how to laugh, is presented in a hilarious two reel comedy every month, produced by that master hand, Hal Roach.

MRS. SIDNEY DREW, who is known wherever live people who have not forgotten to smile, is presenting John Cumberland, famous star of the stage, in two reel comedies, one each month.

"BRINGING UP FATHER," the famous George McManus creation, has now been brought to the screen in two reel comedies, one every month, produced by the Christie Film Company.

"ROLIN COMEDIES," each of one reel length, for four years favorites with the public, featuring "Snub" Pollard and "Sunshine Sammy," the cunning little darkey, are shown weekly by a theatre in your vicinity.

Ask your favorite theatre when!

Greatest of All Popularity Contests

Unique Competition in Which the Voters Share in the Prizes

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

Shadowland, Motion Picture Magazine, and Motion Picture Classic—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide-awake and well-informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read Shadowland, the Magazine and Classic.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2 provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on June 30, 1920.
2. There will be seven ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for Shadowland every month, and the same for Motion Picture Magazine and yet again the same for Classic. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

PALMOLIVE

Re-Incarnation of Beauty

JUST as the Egyptian Princess of 3,000 years ago bequeathed a heritage of beauty to the modern girl, so did she also hand down knowledge of the surest way to keep it.

She knew that Palm and Olive Oils were mild, beneficial, natural cleansers, as soothing in their action as a lotion. A crude combination was all she could command — today she would use Palmolive.

For the mild, soothing, profuse lather of Palmolive soap, so smooth and creamy, embodies this oldest beauty secret.

Palmolive beautifies while it cleanses because it contains the same rare oils used as both cleanser and lotion in ancient Egypt.

Palmolive may be had wherever soap is sold and supplied by popular hotels in guestroom size.

A Stenographer's Advice On Typewriter Buying How to Save $43

THE young lady who suggested this advertisement convinced the writer that too few people realize that the Oliver Typewriter has the usual keyboard. A definite propaganda, she insisted, had been spread to lead people to believe that the arrangement of letters on the Oliver keyboard was different, and therefore difficult.

This advertisement is to set people aright. It should be understood once and for all that the Oliver has the same universal arrangement of letters as on all standard typewriters. And it has improvements and simplifications not found elsewhere. Several hundred thousand stenographers use the Oliver daily.

The young lady brought up another point. She said many people might think that the new $57 Oliver is a second-hand or rebuilt machine of an earlier model.

But note that this advertisement is signed by The Oliver Typewriter Company itself. This is a guarantee that the $57 Oliver is the exact model formerly priced at $100. Not a change has been made. It is a new machine. The latest product of our factory.

How We Both Save

The entire saving of $43 comes from our new sales methods.

During the war we learned that it was unnecessary to have great numbers of traveling salesmen and numerous, expensive branch houses throughout the country. We were also able to discontinue many other superfluous, costly sales methods. You benefit by these savings.

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a copyright photograph by Lumière.)

An appropriate Easter cover girl is Dolores Cassinelli, who comes from Italy, the land of sunshine and flowers. Altho she was born in Italy, Miss Cassinelli was brought to this country at an early age and she is really a typical American girl.

A singer of no mean ability and an accomplished musician, Miss Cassinelli is a screen star of unusual attainments. She has been popular in the films since the days of Essanay.

Faces Made Young

The secret of a youthful face will be sent to any woman whose appearance shows that time or illness or any other cause is stealing from her the charm of girlhood beauty. It will show how without cosmetics, creams, massage, masks, plasters, straps, vibrators, "beauty" treatments or other artificial means, she can remove the traces of age from her countenance. Every woman, young or middle aged, who has single facial defect should know about these remarkable Beauty Exercises which remove lines and "crows feet" and wrinkles; fill up hollows; give roundness to scrawny necks; lift up sagging corners of the mouth and clear up muddy or sallow skins. It will show how five minutes daily with Kathryn Murray's simple facial exercises will work wonders. This information is free to all who ask for it.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Aster.—Ray Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama.

Booth.—"The Purple Mask," with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainments in New York. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisset; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

Broadhurst.—"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective, drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

Casino.—"The Little Whopper." Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

Central.—"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Sam Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn, a discovery, is a brilliant Lincoln.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment adapted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of the guileless young publisher of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Century.—"Aphrodite." Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle.

Eltinge.—"Breakfast in Bed," with Florence Moore. A rather amusing farce satirizing the movies with vaudeville's lady clown, Miss Moore, working very hard to put it over.

Empire.—"Déclassée," with Ethel Barrymore. One of the big things of the dramatic season is this clever play by Zoe Akins. Whether or not it has the basis of truth, it is brilliantly written and is well played by Miss Barrymore.

Forty-fourth Street.—"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

Globe.—"Apple Blossoms." The ambitious and much heralded operetta of Fritz Kreisler and Victor Jacobi plus colorful Joseph Urban settings. An offering far above the musical average. John Charles Thomas sings admirably, Wilda Bennett is an attractive heroine and Florence Shirley lends a piquant personality to the proceedings.

Harris.—"Wedding Bells." A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

Hippodrome.—"Happy Days." Big and spectacular production typical of the Hippodrome. The diving girls are again a feature, disporting in the huge "Hip" tank.

Hudson.—"Clarence," Booth Tarkington's delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier reunited a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Knickerbocker.—"Shavings." A pleasant bucolic entertainment based upon Joseph C. Lincoln's familiar Cape Cod stories. Harry Betesford is featured in a gentle, whimsical characterization.

Maxine Elliott's.—"The Cat Bird," with John Drew. A leisurely little play by Rupert Hughes, dealing with an elderly ecologist who straightens out the romances of several people according to the principles derived from his studies among the flowers and insects. Mr. Drew returns to the New York stage after an absence of two years as the ecologist. A suave evening's amusement.

Morocco.—"Sacred and Profane Love," with Elsie Ferguson. An absorbing—if loosely conceived—drama by Arnold Bennett which marks the return of Miss Ferguson to the speaking stage. It is the story of the remarkable love of a keenly mental authoress for a musical genius who slips into the slough of drugs. Miss Ferguson has many admirable moments and Jose Ruben contributes some brilliant playing as the drug wreck.

Nora Bayes.—"My Golden Girl." A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

Thirty-ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal," Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

Winter Garden.—"The Passing Show of 1919." A typical girly garden show in which the famous runway gets plenty of use. The revue presents a number of travesties upon current attractions, particularly colorful being that of "The Jest," with Charles Winninger doing a clever burlesque of Lionel Barrymore.

ON TOUR

"The Frolivities of 1920."—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue. Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls. The cast includes the Kouns Sisters, Henry Lewis and the beautiful Doris Lloyd.

"Always You."—A typical Hammerstein musical show with Irene Franklin, the brilliant mistress of the character song, and Ralph Herz featured.

"One Night in Rome."—With Laurette Taylor. J. Hartley Manners has furnished his wife with a colorful and picturesque character of a de luxe fortune teller in "One Night in Rome." The play itself is but a pallid melodramatic background for the big rôle. This, however, is so vividly written and so vividly played that it lifts "One Night in Rome" into the ultra-interesting class.

"The Royal Vagabond."—A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor. Also tinkling music.

"The Girl in the Limousine."—A decidedly daring boudoir farce by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white head is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening. John Cumberland is very funny and Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, is both pretty and pleasant as the heroine.

"Civilian Clothes."—A delightful comedy to please everybody. Brand new idea and cleverly worked out. Thurston Hall in the title rôle shares the honors with beautiful Olive Tell. Support excellent.

Learn To Talk Convincingly

—and the World is at Your Feet

WHY can one man sell where another fails? Why can one man literally carry an audience off its feet, while another, speaking on the same subject, makes little or no impression? Why can one man get the sought-after job when another better qualified is turned down? Why does everyone "believe in"

An interesting and convincing talker is popular—the center of attraction at all social affairs.

one man and have no confidence in another who really has just as much ability? The thing that counts is

Not Only WHAT You Say But HOW You Say It

The world is full of splendid merchandise that doesn't move—"order takers" who should be salesmen—political ideas that meet continual defeat—good men earning less, much less, than they're worth; all because so few know how to use that God-given faculty of speech which is one of man's greatest weapons.

Let Me Teach You

I can teach you how to carry conviction—how to make what you say have

If your words carry conviction you can influence a crowd to think as you do.

the effect you want it to, whether you talk to sell, to convince or to entertain. I can enable you to overcome timidity—give you confidence in yourself, develop your personality, improve your memory.

I can show you the art of brevity, the value of silence. Instead of being funny at the wrong time, I can suggest when and how to use humor with telling effect. Do you know the knack of making oral reports to superiors? Do you know the right and wrong way of presenting complaints, estimates, and to issue orders?

CAN YOU DO THIS?

Can you talk as well in public as at home? Can you get financial backing when you want it? Can you win confidence, friendship, love through your speech? Can you make people listen when you talk?	Can you hold your hearers spell-bound? Can you give humorous, extemporaneous talks? Can you address any size audience from one to thousands? Can you get up and talk, any time, any place, without nervousness?
--	---

I can show you how to answer complaints, how to ask the bank for a loan, how to ask for an extension on your note. Another valuable lesson I teach is how—instead of antagonizing people when they disagree with you, you may swing them around to your way of thinking in a pleasant sort of way. You will learn the best way to get things done—the secrets of diplomacy.

Results in One Evening

Now one of the remarkable things about my method is that it requires little study and time.

Among strangers or at home people listen eagerly.

Nearly anyone can grasp the principles in an evening. Hundreds of letters pour in every day proving that my method brings almost immediate results.

Thousands Have Benefitted

Among the enthusiastic students of my Course are thousands of prominent men in all walks of life—they include business men, preachers, lawyers, teachers, physicians, bankers, etc., etc.

Frederick Houk Law

At a committee or board of directors' meeting you will be able to hold attention when you talk.

The Independent Corporation, publishers of "Mastery of Speech," Dr. Law's Course in Business Talking and Public Speaking, are offering you an opportunity to learn in your own home how to improve your ability to Talk Convincingly. They are so confident that you will see its possibilities that they are willing to send it to you for free examination.

The ability to talk convincingly will win over prominent men. It is one of the secrets of closing big deals.

Send No Money

You send no money. Just mail the coupon and, all charges prepaid, you will receive the Course—you are under no obligation whatever—and if you are not entirely satisfied send it back any time within five days after you get it—you will owe nothing.

But if you are pleased, as thousands of others have been who have used the Course, it will cost you only $5 in full payment. You have everything to gain and nothing to lose. Act immediately before this unusual offer is withdrawn.

Personal Experiences:

"... The very day after examining 'Mastery of Speech,' I had the confidence to go up and ask my superintendent for a transfer on the planers. . . . And, to my surprise, he gave it to me. I had for months been wanting this change, but didn't have the confidence until your Course pointed out the easy way to talk to your 'Superior.' That is only one incident where your Course was of value."

LEONARD,
RALPH L.
40 Bridge St., Beverly, Mass.

"After a careful perusal of the Course, I am convinced that correct speech is the largest contribution to a man's success, and that honest application to the study of this Course will produce the desired perfection in speech."

H. W. GROSS,
1802 W. Mansur St.,
Guthrie, Okla.

"I have had the Course only a few days, but have already noted considerable improvement in speech and in ability to please and entertain persons I'm associated with. I am much pleased with it."

A Wife Too Many

Into the hotel lobby walked a beautiful woman and a distinguished man. Little indeed did the gay and gallant crowd know that around these heads there flew stories of terror—of murder—and treason—that on their entrance half a dozen detectives sprang up from different parts of the place.

Because of them the lights of the War Department in Washington blazed far into the night. With their fate was wound the tragedy of a broken marriage, of a fortune lost, of a nation betrayed.

It is a wonderful story with the kind of mystery that you will sit up nights trying to fathom. It is just one of the stories fashioned by that master of mystery

CRAIG KENNEDY
The American Sherlock Holmes
ARTHUR B. REEVE
The American Conan Doyle

He is the detective genius of our age. He has taken science—science that stands for this age—and allied it to the mystery and romance of detective fiction. Even to the smallest detail, every bit of the plot is worked out scientifically. For nearly ten years, America has been watching his Craig Kennedy—marveling at the strange, new, startling things that detective hero would unfold.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

"Nightie Night."—Described by the program as a "wide awake farce," "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger and some daring. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

"The Magic Melody."—"romantic music" play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Julia Dean, Earl Benham and Carmel Myers, the last two well known to the screen, head the cast.

"Elsie Janis and 'her gang.'"—Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

E. H. Sothorn and Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire.—These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," and "The Taming of the Shrew" are distinguished in every sense of the word.

"See-Saw."—A pleasant musical entertainment. Dorothy Mackaye is pleasantly cast.

"The Better 'Ole."—The Coburn production of the musical comedy based upon Bruce Bairnsfather's now immortal cartoon creation, Old Bill. Mr. Coburn's characterization of Bill is still as remarkable as ever.

"A Lonely Romeo."—With Lew Fields. A light show running in the usual groove. Frances Cameron, who is developing remarkably, is the bright figure of "A Lonely Romeo," while Mr. Fields is his humorous self. There's a decidedly funny scene in a men's hat shop.

"Chu Chin Chow."—An opulent and beautiful musical extravaganza based upon the Arabian Nights tale of Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. Dazzling series of sensuous stage pictures. "Chu Chin Chow" is presented this year with an entirely new edition and new costumes. Marjorie Wood makes a colorful desert woman, Lionel Braham is very effective as the robber sheik and Eugene Cowles makes the rôle of steward stand out. George Rosely plays the young lover admirably.

"La La Lucille."—Musical comedy built around the efforts of a loving couple to arrange a divorce in order to live up to the terms of a millionaire aunt's will. A co-respondent is engaged and troubles begin.

"The Shubert Gaeties of 1919."—A lively revue with scores of statuesque girls and stunning frocks. A decidedly attractive entertainment.

"John Ferguson."—A vigorous drama that compares favorably with anything of the kind that New York has seen for years. Beautifully staged and acted. Masterpieces of this kind should be liberally patronized to encourage others.

George White's "Scandals of 1919."—All sorts and variations of dancing make up for a lack of story or humor. The real star is piquant little Ann Pennington—as a seductive little jazzier as ever shimmied on Broadway. Then there's the lively dancing of Mr. White himself.

"Friendly Enemies."—This is the record-breaking comedy drama of last season, with Louis Mann in his original rôle.

"Three Wise Fools."—Austin Strong's human little drama of three crusty old bachelors who are bequeathed a young woman and who are subsequently rejuvenated. Melodrama with a heart throb. Helen Menken gives a striking performance of the nerve-racked heroine, while Claude Gillingwater is a delightfully testy old Teddy Findley.

The Pulse of the Photoplay Public

No one should know the pulse of the motion picture public better than Jesse Lasky, first vice-president of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, and unquestionably one of the cinema's biggest powers.

The photoplay, as developed by the Lasky organization, may well be described as art harnessed to business. The screen drama is very nearly produced according to a mathematical formula. To make picture plays in this fashion one must know the public taste—and know it accurately.

The Famous Players-Lasky Corporation believes it has solved this. It secures regular reports from every exhibitor it supplies with picture plays, and these reports are supposed to embody the opinions of the audience, as well as the box-office result.

"The real—the vital—development of the photoplay," says Mr. Lasky, "is the steadily increasing success of the film drama which, minus a star,

In the center is a snapshot of Mr. Lasky in conference with Cecil de Mille and, below, he is talking things over with Thomas Ince and Mr. de Mille. Across the page is a glimpse of Mr. Lasky in his New York office and, in the lower corner, discussing "The Round-Up" with Roscoe Arbuckle scores on its own merit. The public is showing a confidence in the producer or director unheard of two years ago. For instance, consider the present drawing power of Cecil de Mille.

"There are several distinct trends to the photoplay of 1920. One is towards comedy. But, to be successful, the comedy, however light, must have a theme—an idea. This may be almost anything—the high cost of living, the extravagance of modern woman, the relation of husband and wife—but the idea must be beneath the laugh. 'Twenty-three and a Half Hours' Leave' was an interesting example. Again, the fast-developing popularity of Wallace Reid in comedies of this type. Reid was always more or less a favorite, but since he has turned to comedy, he has developed by leaps and bounds.

"Again, the public of 1920 will now accept the drama with a moral, provided it is entertaining. 'Everywoman' was a preachment, but it was pleasant, and it has been well received across country.

An Interview With Jesse L. Lasky

By FREDERICK JAMES SMITH

"Another trend is the extraordinary success of a film play like 'Huckleberry Finn. The public wants direct, human, close-to-the-soil stuff. There is no question of that. We are so certain that we have delegated William de Mille to center upon this style of production."

Mr. Lasky turned to answer the telephone. In a two-minute conversation he practically engaged a new star. Then he returned to our interview.

"The costume play of other days is still out of vogue and will not be popular for the next few years, if, indeed, it ever attains popularity. This can be easily explained psychologically. When we view a silent play we unconsciously cast ourselves in the rôle of the hero or the heroine. We live in a vital age—an age of the aeroplane, the automobile, the telegraph, the wireless, a period of tremendous business battles. When we see modern plays of our own time we throw ourselves into the drama and draw inspiration from it. This is unconscious, of course, but this exhilaration, this inspiration, is naturally lacking in stories of dead and passed times."

Mr. Lasky paused. And, catching our breath, we turned the subject towards the actor.

"The trend there," he answered, "is clearly towards the dramatic man or woman and away from the becurled ingénue. The old-fashioned ingénue has passed. No one can ever make another Mary Pickford. Miss Pickford was the exception. She has an ability amounting to genius, along with tremendous technical resources. She is, in fact, an emotional actress with the exterior of an ingénue. There will never be another Mary Pickford, and any one who attempts to produce another is doomed to failure."

The conversation switched back to the photoplay story. "The sex theme," went on Mr. Lasky, "is steadily receiving

Mr. Lasky discusses the popularity of the close-to-the-earth play, the comedy and the starless production, besides the happy ending and other things—as reflected by the theater box-office

A Joyful Miss Joy

"Mother had selected the name Beatrice for me; it means—Blessing, you know, but it seems there were many Beatrices, so taking the alphabet she went down the lines seeking another first letter. Coming to L, which stands for Love, she decided that was the one, so I became Leatrice, to her, a combination of Blessing and Love."

"And with Joy added, what a wonderfully happy name you have," I said, watching her lovely, sensitive face with its delicate shadings of thought.

"Oh, isn't it? I love it and find it a constant inspiration," she responded, joyfully. "Anyway, I'm so happy, and here I am playing the rôle of an unhappy wife in this new film, 'Just a Wife.' Imagine being unhappy in all these lovely clothes, to say nothing of the family heirlooms in jewels!"

She was indeed an alluring picture in her dinner gown of lovely shades of apricot, the brocaded velvet and tissue clinging to the straight, girlish form. There is a poetic charm, an elusive delicacy, about this young beauty which seems to enfold her in a glamor of romance. Her hair is dark, as are her eyes, which are far apart and very wide open, and altogether, she combines the brilliant qualities of which stars are made.

"This stately business, trains, and grown-up

LEATRICE JOY was born in New Orleans, and is the ideal type of that most fascinating bit of femininity, a daughter of the Old South.

All thru the family, on both sides, flows the French blood of old Bordeaux, which was transplanted into this country three generations ago and its warmth and glow has been tenderly fostered under the Louisiana blue skies.

Her voice is soft and very melodious and she speaks slowly, lingering over her words, and when she says "deah," there is a caress in each slurred letter, while her "Yes, sah" is deference itself.

"Dont lose it," I exclaimed, speaking aloud my thought.

"Lose what?" and the wide eyes looked interested.

"That accent!" I replied.

"Oh, deah, I cant, I have tried, for everyone laughs at me, but my tongue gets all tangled up when I try to talk like you Northerners," and her happy, girlish laugh caused everyone on the set to turn toward our corner with a smile.

"Yes, there is a real reason why it is Leatrice instead of Beatrice," replied Miss Joy, when I remarked on her unusual name.

Leatrice Joy is a Dixie girl and a daughter of picturesque New Orleans. The French blood of old Bordeaux flows in her veins. Her name, Leatrice, translated into matter-of-fact English, means Blessing and Love :

By MAUDE S. CHEATHAM

action is a little new," she confided, "and I have a wild desire to sit on my foot or slide across the floor. It is a great part, tho, and Roy Stewart is a wonderful husband," she added mischievously, as Mr. Stewart sauntered across the set looking very impressive in his correct evening clothes.

"I am a Southern girl in this picture," Leatrice went on, gaily, "and the other day when I was married I wore mother's real lace wedding veil and felt so proud and romantic."

"And some day, I suppose, you'll be wearing this veil at your own wedding," I said.

"I hope so, but it must be a far away day, for I am too much interested in my work to let anything interfere. I had a hard, stiff climb and would never be willing to give up until I reach the heights. Somehow, I do not believe that careers and love go hand in hand, both are too absorbing, so I say, please let love stay away from me for a while!

"Anyway, I am not thinking about such things. Mother spoils me and it would be very hard for me to find a man who would be as devoted. We are very happy together in our little bungalow in Hollywood and are great stay-at-homes.

"I have just been selected to play the lead

Leatrice Joy plays her first real dramatic rôle in George Loane Tucker's "Ladies Must Live," and she has been selected to play the lead in the Selznick production, "Blind Youth" in the next Selznick picture, 'Blind Youth'; isn't that wonderful?" and Leatrice sighed, rapturously. "So many beautiful things are happening and every one is so lovely to me. I believe the secret of it all is that happiness depends on our own thoughts. The first thing I say to myself every morning is that the day is beautiful and everything and everybody in it, and that I reflect only happiness and joy and contentment! We all have our own perfect place and nothing can take it from us. Why, the orange blossom doesn't fret and worry, fearing that the—the—the watermelon will usurp its place!" And we both laughed at the simile, even while grasping the tremendous import of her sweet thought.

When Leatrice was a little girl down in the big house in New Orleans, she used to array herself in her mother's hats and pretty dresses and play "lady," before the mirror in the reception hall, and so the first desire for dramatic work began to unfold.

One morning in 1916 she read in the paper that the Nola Film Company had been organized in New Orleans and they wished to secure a native daughter for their leading rôles. Leatrice decided to answer the advertisement. The test was a little scene in which she was to weep. That very morning she had received a letter from her father, who was in El Paso for his health, and with this in her mind, the tears came readily enough and she put a touch of appealing pathos into her acting that so impressed the manager that she was instantly engaged.

When "Micky" Walked

Of course, any one who knows Marshall Neilan will tell you that he can find something amusing about almost anything that has happened, is happening or that he can imagine as happening in the future!

He "kids" all the time, at the studio and away from it, and his people "kid" back at him and call him "Micky" and apparently all but worship him.

Think over a few of the pictures you have seen that were made under his direction. There were "Amarilly Photograph by Evans, L. A.

THERE was a time when Marshall Neilan belonged to a sort of club which was called by the others working in a certain machine shop in Buffalo, N. Y., "the beer squad."

"We," he said, referring to "the beer squad," "used to, work eleven hours a day, or rather a night, for we began at eight in the evening and worked until seven the next morning. You can imagine us as we looked, tired and grimy; in a word, all in. But just as sure as we quit work, we used to walk to our rooms, fully two miles away. And why do you think we did it? To buy beer with the nickel! I used to write a little note for myself—he was only fifteen years old at the time—"Please give this boy five cents worth of beer," and sign it 'Mrs. _____.'" He looked thoroly amused at the recollection.

And now "Micky" is one of the most famous directors of moving pictures in the world. Cause and effect? Perhaps. In order to be really great one must be really human.

If a man has never known "ups and downs"; if he has kept, as we used to say in English class in school, the even tenor of his way, then his work must necessarily prove as calm and comparatively uninteresting as his life.

But frequently there is too much said about the early struggles of the successful. One is likely to forget that as soon as they are over with, these struggles are, as a rule, a source of unlimited material and endless amusement.

Marshall Neilan worked his way up from the bottom. At fifteen he worked on a night shift in a Buffalo machine shop. At twenty he was in a Los Angeles stock company. A little later he was leading director? They were, and there you have "Micky."

No wonder that he doesn't have to walk any more! Naturally, he has a handsome car and, if he wants anything to drink, like tea or orange-juice, (you see, the times have changed), he can drive to the "Ship" at Venice and have it more expensively than any inexperienced person would think possible.

I saw him in his office at the temporary studio of the Marshall Neilan Productions, on the day after his return to Los Angeles from Portland, Oregon, where he had gone with the purpose of shooting scenes for "The River's End."

As a director, "Micky" Neilan has tried his hand at everything from "Ham and Bud" comedies up. He has a remarkable sense of humor and "kids" all the time. The studio folk "kid" back—and every one worships "Micky"

He had taken his company up there with the intention of staying five weeks, but had returned almost at once, without shooting a single scene.

"What was the trouble," I asked, "the weather?"

"Yes; it started to rain the day we got there. I knew from previous experience that it would probably continue indefinitely, so I decided it would be best for us to come back. The joke was on me. We received a report that the weather had cleared the day after we left!"

Luck like that would have given some producers an awful grouch. Neilan laughed and lit a cigaret.

wistfully, "when you haven't your own home. I feel so unsettled here in California, where mother and sister and I are living in furnished apartments. Nothing our own, no associations. Nothing you'll regret leaving behind you when you move. And we move so often!"

Which is the style in Hollywood. Everybody is continually moving into everybody else's house. The picture colonists, not being interested in moss, are more or less rolling stones. But Miss Mason, when you speak of such things to her, shakes her head after the manner of a fascinating sub-dé, and sighs.

"I do so love a home. One's husband, you know, must be considered, and mine is a believer in solid comfort. Berney is such a good husband. I never want another."

The horoscoper some time ago told Shirley that she is

"Oh, little sister mine, let me look into your eyes and read an inspiration there; let me hold your white hand and know the strength of a philosophy more beautiful than human knowledge teaches. Let me fold you in my arms and have you ever with me, that in the glory of your faith and love I may walk the paths of wisdom and peace." —Eugene Field.

She's a petite creature, hair bobbed à la Irene Castle. Nineteen, a star, and the wife of a great, big, black-haired boy whom she adores and to whom she not infrequently talks baby talk, and whose judgment in all matters is quite final—as far as she is concerned.

There's everything about her that makes one think Shirley Mason is a child—a child of the Eugene Field type, whose philosophy, happiness, is, as Field has said, more beautiful than human knowledge teaches. Her clear, grey-blue eyes search you wonderingly when she is perplexed, and when she smiles her lips part like two petals of a rosebud opening in the sunlight.

It happened that when I saw her at her home in a fashionable Hollywood hostelry, into which she and her family were just moving, Shirley was heartbroken because she, perforce, had to take her dog and cat to the hospital to board. The hostelry is typically Hollywood; it allows no cats nor dogs, altho the bars have been let down and movie actors are permitted residence.

"That's just it," she said, going to live to be eighty-two years old. Horrors! What's she going to do with herself after she's seventy-five?

Merely look after Berney, and anticipate the eighty-second summer. She remarks, naïvely, that she won't be useful any more, and, therefore—

"And just what would you do if a vamp walked in and tried to steal Berney?" I queried.

"Scratch her eyes out!" vociferously.

And then, perhaps, I suggested, she is wont to "vamp" him herself at times, to kind of exercise a variety of exorcism—just merely to pique his interest.

"Certainly," she remarked, nonchalantly, smiling, blushing a little—(we interviewers do get vulgarly personal at times, dont we?)—"everybody does. Every woman has some time or other wanted to do a little vamping. I vamp Berney by trying to look my prettiest, to wear the things he'll like to see, to do the things he'll enjoy, and to think the things that he thinks."

And she's quite certain that if Lew Cody came around he would find her unresponsive to his chicken-hawkerie, for, she swears, she wouldn't know how to act under such circumstances and she'd be so fussed that she'd say exactly the thing that would spoil the aforesaid Mr. Cody's train of thought.

"And," she interposed as a sort of postlude, "I'm terribly interested in Berney, and one man is quite enough."

She's what the horoscoper has termed a "twain"—a dual soul—one interested in affairs of home, the other engrossed in an avocation. Only in Shirley's case the avocation has proved to be a vocation. And the horoscope has proclaimed her lucky days the third, fifth, sixth and eighth of each month, with Wednesday each week predominating. Her best letters are B, C, H and D, and as she held the chart in front of me, telling me its innumerable indescribable signs, of half of which she herself doesn't know the meaning, she clapped her hands as a sudden thought struck her.

"Lucky letters, B and D. Why, those are Berney's initials: Berney Durning! I never thought of that before. Isn't a horoscope wonderful?"

"Perhaps his middle initial is C or H?" ventured yours truly.

"Oh, no," she sighed; "it's J. Joseph,

THEY told me out at Universal studio to interview Francelia Billington about her Japanese fans, so I did; that is, I asked her to let me see her collection. Instead of complying with my request, she burst out laughing.

"That's a studio joke," she apologized, sobering.

"Then you haven't any collection?" I asked, a trifle tartly, mentally hoping that a certain publicity man would choke on his demi-tasse.

"Oh, yes—yes, indeed," she hastily assured me, "but they're all in Japan—they aren't that kind of fans, you see," she hurried on, disregarding grammatical niceties. "They're people . . . you know, picture fans."

I forgave the Universal P. M., and we sat down to chat. Miss Billington has a home in Glendale, near Los Angeles, with a mother who looks young enough to be her sister, a sister, Wanda, who is a trifle older than she, and a white Spitz dog which answers to the name of "Mutts" and which is very much a part of the family. She was wearing a creation—it really was that—of grey ured chiffon, with loose, fluttery sleeves and a deep collar of cream l. Her hair is lighter than you would expect from her pictures, and her e are either grey or hazel—it's hard to tell which—and she smiles with unexpected quirk, showing lovely white teeth and wholesome little lau ter lines at the corners of her mouth.

I suppose you know without my telling you that she was Eric Von St heim's leading woman in his much talked about feature, "Blind Husband and has been made since that time, a Universal star heading her own conpany. But to return to the fans—Japanese variety!

"It's a funny thing," said Francelia, settling herself into the corner of a couch piled high with comfortable pillows, "but it seems that in Japan I am very popular. I'm sure I don't know why," she added, frankly. "I'm not a raving beauty . . . I think they must be partial to blondes, not having any of them in that country. But the fact remains that two-thirds of my mail comes from Japan, with the most extravagant praise for my work and flowery compliments for my 'heaven-flower beauty,' as they call it. Recently I won the popularity contest over there, and since then the whole studio force has joked me about my collection of Japanese 'fans.'"

At my request, Francelia's mother went upstairs to look for some of the letters and gifts which her talented daughter receives from the Flowery Kingdom. And, while waiting, we talked shop—pictures, directors, titles and ambitions.

"I suppose you commenced as an extra girl?" I asked, confidently, but the fair Francelia shook her head and almost blushed.

"No, I didn't," she confessed, apologetically. "I'd like to say I had, but the truth is that I began my career in pictures as a leading woman.

I was fairly pushed into the movies. If I had had to stand around in the hot sun for just one day, waiting for a casting director to 'cast' his eye on me, I'd probably be selling ribbons or teaching school, but believe me, I would not be in pictures!"

By EMMA-LINDSAY SQUIER

Did you ever hear a movie star talk like that? I never did. They always tell, and truthfully, too, I suppose, of their heart-breaking struggles for "bits" in pictures and for recognition of their talents. Naturally, I asked for further details—any one would.

"It happened when I was seventeen years old—that was five years ago," she said, by which you will notice she is one of screen's beauties who can afford to tell her real age.

"George Melford, who was then a director at the Kalem Company, in Glendale, and Mrs. Melford lived near us. Mrs. Melford was always trying to get me to go over to the studio for a test. But I considered being in movies a sort of disgrace and wouldn't go. And then one day, when I was up at her house, Mr. Melford came in with the announcement that Alice Joyce was leaving Kalem. He said to me, 'I've got to have a leading woman, Francelia, and you look a bit like Alice Joyce; come over to the studio tomorrow for a test.' Well, you might imagine that I would have been delighted, but I wasn't. I went over because mother made me go, and when they offered me thirty-five dollars a week to play leads opposite Carlyle Blackwell, I simply couldn't resist. Wasn't I a mercenary little wretch? Not one thought of art, mind you—just money! But those first weeks that I worked were very unpleasant ones for me. I hoped that my school friends wouldn't find out that I was a 'movie actress,' and I fairly sneaked to the studio for fear some one I knew would recognize me. Naturally, I got over that and began to like the work for its own sake.

"I did leads for Universal two years ago, then was with American for a year, playing opposite William Russell, and now I'm back at Universal, being featured. My latest picture is called 'The Day She Paid'—doesn't that sound lurid?" She continued, "It's a picturization of Fanny Hurst's story, 'Oats for the Woman.'

"I think it's a shame to spoil a logical situation by an artificial finale that takes the punch out of the picture. I know the exhibitors say that the public demands them—but do they? Look at 'Broken Blossoms'—could anything have been more tragic than that ending? And now that Griffith has made the plunge, I suppose we'll have a regular orgy of sob fade-outs."

And then Mother Billington returned with a big box full of letters, pieces of silk, hand-painted

Gentle Jane

By MAUDE S. CHEATHAM

WATCHING pretty Jane Novak in her appealing rôles as heroine in the romantic pictures of William Hart, Hobart Bosworth, Lewis Stone, Sessue Hayakawa, Tom Mix, and a score or more of our leading film stars, she appears to be a mere slip of a girl with no more vitally serious thought in her little head than the adventures depicted on the screen.

This is one Jane Novak!

The other one is a happy, contented housewife, fluttering about her lovely home in Hollywood, for in real life she is Mrs. Frank Newburg, and there is an adorable two-year-old daughter, Virginia.

Domesticity and careers present no unusual combination in these days of woman's freedom, yet, somehow, I had never thought of Jane as sewing, cooking, or caring for a baby!

"How do you do it?" I asked, as she rescued Ginny from a tumble on her head.

Jane laughed. "The responsibility came so gradually that I learnt as I went along. It all works out beautifully except when I have to be away from home on location. I have been out of the city five of the past six months. A terrible thing happened when I came home the other day after spending seven weeks in Portland. Ginny didn't know me and it broke my heart!" and Jane's soft voice ended in a wail as she hugged the baby close in her arms.

"I spoil her when I am home and the nurse is so distressed because I do not insist on the regular hours she has been following. Oh, dear, I know I ought, but it is such fun to let her do as she pleases," and while the lenient blue eyes beamed upon the two-year-old, I quite understood how impossible it would be for the gentle Jane to become a disciplinarian.

Gentle!

This is indeed the one word which describes Jane Novak!

Tho she is very sweet, refreshingly genuine, absolutely unspoiled, alluringly feminine, with a serenity that remains ever unruffled, yet it is this gentleness that stands out above every other quality when one thinks of her.

Jane was born in St. Louis, her father being a newspaper man in that city. She early made her appearance in a stock company, which was something of a family affair, being composed of two uncles, two aunts, and a half a dozen cousins. This was followed by a short experience in vaudeville and musical comedy, always in St. Louis, however, for her mother would never permit her to leave the home

It was when she was seventeen that she made her first train trip, all alone, crossing the country to Los Angeles to join her aunt, Ann Schaefer, who had been playing with the Vitagraph Company for several years.

On the very morning of her arrival, Jane was introduced to Mr. Newburg, and, after a romantic courtship extending over two years, they were married in a little vine-covered church in Santa Monica, on May 25, 1915, the bride being just nineteen.

Mr. Newburg has given up his screen work and is secretary and treasurer of the Actors' Association, as well as his wife's business manager, for Jane confesses that she knows nothing of business, letting "Hubby" attend to all these worries.

"My first picture was a little comedy with Ruth Roland," said Jane, "and from the first I loved the work. I believe there is a little angel following me around for so many nice things are always happening. Of course, I hope to be a star some day, that is what I am working for, but I have been so fortunate in playing leading rôles with many splendid actors who are fine men as well. This is an education and an invaluable training.

"I have been with William Hart in a number of his pictures and he is such a true artist himself that you can not help gaining much. Oh, he is a dreadful tease and I have an exciting time when I am working with him.

"Coming down from Sacramento the other day our company was in the diner and they were all teasing me. Finally, I took a rose I had been wearing and threw it at Mr. Hart. It landed on his plate and he declared I had started a rough house, so, to get even, he poured a whole glass of ice-water down my back," and Jane shivered as she laughed.

"Several years ago I made four pictures with Hobart Bosworth and I was very glad to be with

The Sporting Duchess

Fictionized from the Alice Joyce-Vitagraph Photoplay

By FAITH SERVICE

MURIEL, Duchess of Desborough, was sporting in more ways than one. She was sporting in her instincts as well as her tastes. She loved her husband, her son, horses and fair play. Chiefly, fair play. Her blood ran thru her veins according to the best form, and bluey. She maintained traditions. She expected the same of others. She expected happiness, too. She was one of the serene souls who, giving serenity to the world, expect serenity to be given back again. Her years were tranquil, well ordered, charming . . . that is, until the Duke of Desborough "ran across" some old friends in London and planned to have them for a week-end at Desborough.

"I knew them in India," he explained to his Duchess; "Mostyn and Mrs. Delmaine and most of the others. I know them—rather well. One does, y'know, in India." He added, with what Muriel reconsidered apparent irrelevance later on, "the rainy season, dont you know?"

From the beginning she did not like Mostyn. He was dissipated, and he had unpleasant eyes. They shifted like oily waters. She not only did not like him, but felt a fear of him, which annoyed her. Groundless fears were hysteria, and the Duchess had a fine contempt for hysteria.

She did not like Mrs. Delmaine, either, but she felt, as one woman to another, a kind of pity for her. There were ghosts in her eyes—sad ghosts—and restless. Dead things stirred and would not let her be. It was evident that Mrs. Delmaine had been exceedingly unhappy.

The fact that her husband had known her in India meant very little to Muriel. No doubt the Duke had known a great many women in India and elsewhere. Muriel was not the type to question pasts, which certainly belonged to their owners. The present, so that it had dignity and security, was all she asked.

It was the present that Mostyn and Mrs. Delmaine, who, in the Indian days, had been more than friends to the Duke of Desborough, wished to ferment. They had love name. Desborough, caught unaware, held her to him, whether necessarily or unnecessarily he himself would probably have found it hard to say. He found, when, unexpectedly, he met Muriel's eyes, that he could say nothing at all. Mrs. Delmaine did not give him any help. Muriel did.

"I am sorry you are ill," she said, with a gracious ease. "Shall I send for your maid? You must wish to rest?"

If Desborough had loved Muriel before, he loved her even more after the tensivity of that little scene had been relaxed by her deft touch. More than all else, anyway, he had always loved the sporting blood in her. It had had the power a finely strung whip has on a blooded steed—the effect of making him rear up, hold his head high, step reasons . . . Mostyn had got, at cards, on the race-track and one way or another, Desborough into debt. Badly into debt. The one way out for Desborough was his horse, "Clipstone," winning the Derby. If Mostyn should foreclose before the Derby, there would be few vestiges of dignity possible, then, for the Duke and Duchess. Mostyn had another reason. He was the sort of a man who always would have another reason, and the other reason, in some form or other, would be a woman. He had looked upon Muriel, and from the introduction he had conceived for her an obsession. That she was cold, aloof, unattainable were but so many goads. Neither did it make, to him, very much difference how he attained his desire. His desire, in itself, was all that mattered.

Mrs. Delmaine was a willing conspirator. She had taken her discard hard, when it came to the matter of Desborough. It had been unforgettable, for some strange reason she had never been able to fathom. Perhaps—her mouth quirked bitterly at this thought—perhaps she had loved him. Who could tell? Love, or a lesser thing, it had hurt her past forgiveness. It had bred, first an intolerable pain, then bitterness, arid and consuming, then the desire for a personal vengeance which might measure back to him some meed of the pain she had known. Mostyn seemed a sort of answer to a great many blasphemous prayers.

Mrs. Delmaine was not as subtle as she might have been. She had got, it seemed, beyond that stage. Pain is a bad thing for shades and nuances, especially when a woman has turned the shady thirties and has known emotional thumb-screws. She was not, at any event, subtle enough for the Duchess, who was very subtle indeed and far cleverer than she might have been credited with being by a casual observer.

She fainted in Desborough's arms, just in time for Muriel to see him bending over her. She maintained the faint, coming out of it badly and murmuring something anent times like these in Indian days . . . she added a little, intimate Indian proudly. He felt, in that hour, that he wanted, more than anything else, to hold his head high, to step proudly. He told her so. There was a silence between them, and he knew that she could not ask him any question, but that her heart was wondering. He felt that the part of pride called for words.

"A long while ago," he said, taking her hand, which met his touch firmly, "a long time ago—in India—Mrs. Delmaine meant—meant something to me, Muriel, in the way a woman does mean something to a man—at times. It passed away, with me. Completely. It was a closed incident. It was final. It has been, until her appearance here, absent from my most subconscious thought. Of course, her coming was a breach . . . horrible . . . Mostyn did not tell me, when I met them all in town, that he was bringing her here to stay . . . just for tea . . . I am no end sorry, Muriel. I wouldn't tarnish a single hair of your head . . . or the boy's. You know that. You do, dont you, my dear?"

"Yes," said Muriel; "yes . . . of course. You know, it is instinct or tradition, or just the sense of possession, which is rather a grilling thing . . . but—well, there's a certain pain to a—a thing like this, of course. Not that I dont understand. Not that . . . I . . . I believe I do."

"I dont want you to," whispered the Duke, holding her very close; "I dont want you to, sweetheart, and yet I . . . oh, I adore you because you do."

It was upon this scene that Mostyn entered, unobtrusively, and noted that the original plan had failed. The Duchess was being sporting.

The only thing to do was to change the target of attack. Since Muriel was so awfully sporting, the logical quarry was Desborough himself. Men and the jealousy of men were more easily inflamed. Mrs. Delmaine said that she thought she could pierce the armored pride. Leave it to her, she told Mostyn.

It was an easy rôle for Mrs. Delmaine, that of sympathy blended, subtly, with admiration. It was throbbingly easy for her to sit by Desborough and talk with him of things near to him. It brought back, hotly, the old days in India, when he had ridden by her rickshaw—and they had talked—

"The Duchess is superb," she had said to him, "but she is a woman, my dear, almost intensely feminine, dont you think? Of course, forgiving you for . . . for me was almost un- earthly, but . . . I dislike this, Tony, but dont you think there was something . . . a little something underlying?"

Desborough shifted uneasily. He was conscious that he was not being sporting—sporting as Muriel was—in so much as shifting from what should have been his utter refusal or disturbance. And yet . . . little, slithering thoughts kept creeping into the recesses of his mind . . . the utter desirability of Muriel, for one . . . the indubitable if unpleasant attraction of Mostyn . . . glances he had seen . . . Muriel's voiced dislike of the man . . . something akin to his own feeling for Mrs. Delmaine . . . dregs of dead hours . . . dregs . . . he knew the symptoms . . . he knew the way they manifested themselves . . . He grew cold, there in the sunlight, while the woman's insidious propaganda did its work . . . Muriel . . . and Mostyn . . . and the stirred ashes of hours out away . . . He felt sickened.

If the events of other lives and circumstances, and, who knows, the fates had not, apparently, all conspired together just at this time, Desborough might have recovered from the distress Mrs. Delmaine had given him. He might, might very well, have grown ashamed of himself and open-eyed to the whole tawdry situation; might, even, have violated English hospitality and asked the two to leave Desborough. But lives, circumstances and the Fates did conspire, and before the Duke could get a sane perspective on the matter he was hurled into a veritable maelstrom of questionings and shame.

Probably Muriel's very sporting reticence, which occasionally manifested itself in an extreme reticence, had a great deal to do with it. She had not, for instance, thought it incumbent upon her to inform the Duke that Mary Aylmer, their small son's governess, had been go- into serious trouble. This was not, accord- ing to the view- point of the Duchess, the sort of thing to tell a man, even one's husband. So that, on the night of the big country ball, when the Duch- ess found that Mary Aylmer had fled London- ward, penniless and obviously desperate, Des- borough had no clue as to Mu- riel's apparently inexplicable conduct. Mostyn had remained behind, awaiting the Duchess, he had said. When the Duchess appeared she was attired, not for the ball, but for a hurried trip to London in search of Mary. She had a horrible presentiment of the river case . . . and Mary had made the baby years of her small son safe and happy ones.

Mostyn insisted upon accompanying her. He was amazed at any disclaimer. Did, he wondered, the Duchess quite know what she was doing that she should contemplate a night trip to London alone? It was unthinkable, and she was apparently distraught.

In the press of this new situation Muriel lost sight of Mostyn as an individual at all. She supposed a trip alone was rather a bizarre thing to do. There could be no harm, there could be nothing at all, one way or the other, in Mostyn escorting her up on the train. No doubt it would be eminently more proper. She gave an abstracted consent.

There seemed, to Desborough, when he returned home to find Mostyn and the Duchess both missing, nothing abstracted about it. It had, to him, a deadly intent and meaning. Mrs. Delmaine's soft hand and beguiling voice were decidedly not oil upon his troubled waters. He felt, in that sudden engulfing presentiment, that the world was all wrong and that women made it so. He had enough, he thought, pressing down upon him, and Muriel knew it. Yet, in this dark hour, when all his hopes and energies should have been concentrated upon the forthcoming Derby and the rehabilitation of his fortune, she left him, left him, disgraced and alone, with a bounder like Mostyn, who . . . Good God! He shuddered when he thought of the coiled and slimy trail Mostyn had covered.

Still, there were appearances . . . He would, of course, give chase to Muriel and, having found her, would then let her go, make her go. He would take her son from her, her home, her name. He would expose her to the slings and barbs of the poisoned gossips, and, if she had one, her own conscience. He would let her see what Mostyn could do for her. Women—bah! There was Mrs. Delmaine . . . and there was Muriel. Opposite poles, he would have said, and yet here they were, meeting on common ground. Would, one day, the same sad, restless ghosts haunt Muriel's dark eyes because of things still poignant, still unforgettable?

Desborough never believed, tho, as he and Leigh, Mostyn's friend, traveled up to town that he was going to discover anything more than a well-covered trip for the purpose, perhaps, of talking and planning. He was essentially shocked and horrified when, breaking into Muriel's room at her hotel, he discovered her, white and dishevelled, with Mostyn, scarlet and, so it seemed to the blurred vision of Desborough, satirically triumphant. Muriel's cry of "Tony . . . you've come in time!" reached him as thru the roaring of many turbulent and outraged waters. He felt that Muriel was using theatrics . . . and on him. She should have known better. Here, now, for the first time in her life, she was being crude, was being cheap. The sporting blood he had been so proud of, and so sure of, had run out of her veins. She had suffered profanation. She could never be the same. Desborough needed a pedestal for the woman to whom he gave his adoration. It was the toppled pedestal that had sent Mrs. Delmaine crashing to the earth.

The house party at Desborough broke up that night. Mrs. Delmaine returned to London and the rather vague obscurity in which she kept herself enshrouded. Mostyn, dropping all pretense of friendship for Desborough, foreclosed on Desborough's stables, thus losing "Clipstone" and his attendant hope for the Duke. Harold, their little son, ill over the loss of his mother, whom he had worshiped, was removed to a sanitarium in London and the merry wags who call themselves the Fates had full tilt and sway.

Muriel, of them all, outraged and misjudged as she had been, maintained a certain balance. In the death of her hurt, in the very heart of her pain, she felt a sympathy for the Duke, for what he must in every way be suffering. She even felt a sense of pity for Mostyn, poor man, harried by the beasts within him. She felt, for herself, that things must come straight again. She believed, still, that the world paid back in like coin. She felt that, entrenched, she could wait.

She could, but the Duke's fortunes could not. With the loss of "Clipstone," he had lost his chance of rehabilitation. With his pride torn from him as well as his wife, Muriel trembled for him. He had not much of the constructive quality, the lovable Desborough. He needed fortification of one sort or another. Muriel grew desperate. At the same time she learnt, or the suspicion was given her, that the Duke was directly responsible for the flight of Mary Aylmer. Also, that he was seeing and seeking consolation in Mrs. Delmaine. There grew in Muriel the belief that, if she could save him financially, he might still make of his life something of the thing he wanted. She loved him enough to love herself a great deal less. It was this hope that led her to consent to an engagement with Lord Streatfield upon the day her divorce decree was granted. Streatfield was a nice boy. He was clean and he had adored her. She would be giving him happiness, and he—well, he would give her his consolatory presence and he would buy "Clipstone" for her, so that she might return him to the Desborough stables and win the Derby race for the Desborough glory. Streatfield, for a young man, and one very much in love, had few illusions.

Young Leigh was with Desborough and back of them was Streatfield, who had come for her

He had learnt that the greatest illusion of all comes when you think, once and for all, that you have done with illusions. The only illusion to cling to is the rather facing one of reality. He had come up against that one, for the first time in his life, when he knew that he loved Muriel. He had come up against it rather hard. But he did love her. In the light of his love for her he knew that he'd only wanted other women, for himself, never for them. He learnt that love is sacrifice and service, there being no limits to either one of these.

If he could give to her, even in so small a measure as to give her comfort after all the discomfort she had known, he knew that he would achieve what must be for him his pinnacle of happiness. If he could take the droop from her slender shoulders, the shadows from her dark, dear eyes, the dejection from her wistful mouth . . . just to lift these ghosts from her . . . would be enough . . . this, learnt Streatfield, was love . . . The first step was to buy "Clipstone" and allow her to feel that thru the horse and a won race the fortune so dear, so inevitably dear, to her heart, was restored . . .

"Clipstone" did win the Derby race. He won it in spite of foul play on the part of the opposing jockey. He won it because the judges played exceedingly fair and reversed the numbers, having disqualified the opposing "King of Trumps" for the foul. The Desborough debt was cleared.

After the race Muriel went to her little son at the sanitarium, where, once a week, she was permitted to see him.

After the race several other persons went there, too. They all seemed to be impelled.

First it was Desborough. Muriel's heart contracted at the sight of his tensed face, tensed and drawn in spite of the victory. It contracted with a pain, a pain for him, when he ordered her from their son's room. She knew because she was what she was that his suffering, reacting on her, was torturing him even more terribly. She had learnt a great many things since Mostyn and Mrs. Delmaine had been their week-end guests . . . a great many things about men and women, and passion and despair. And also, about love.

She had learnt how to temper justice with mercy and how to leaven despair with the divine ingredient of hope. She had come to believe that, of all vital things, the most vital of these is love, and that it will, because it must, win thru. Other things make no difference, springing, as they do, more or less extraneously, from the fundamental fact.

It had been so with her. She loved the Duke, not because she didn't know him; not because she harbored an illusion which the house party and the incidents thereto had torn from her, but because she did know him, and knowing all was forgiving all. She loved him as she loved their son, who, being wise, might, too, at times be foolish, yet in both guises be the same essential being. It was this love that had directed her every move, that had enabled her to stay away from him, to retreat when he seemed to wish it, knowing that if his love for her were of the same inherent quality as hers for him he must inevitably come back to her, and that if it were not, she could not do with a lesser thing.

Young Leigh was with Desborough and back of them was Streatfield, who had come for her. In the midst of Desborough's denunciation, Leigh was speaking. He was admitting that he had given false testimony at the trial of Muriel and Desborough for divorce. He had been "bought" by Mostyn and Mrs. Delmaine. He admitted, too, that he had helped Mostyn foster Desborough's suspicions and, further, that it was he who had suggested to Muriel that Desborough was responsible for Mary Aylmer. The responsibility of that, he added, belonged to Mostyn. He concluded, miserably, that it was "pretty slimy."

Desborough, more gravely than was his wont, acknowledged that it was.

"You know what the need of money is," muttered Leigh. "It is a regular grindstone on your very soul. I had one once, and then . . ." He looked over to where Muriel, very white and straight, was standing by her son, her patient hands touching his hair, her eyes compassionate and Madonna-like. "I couldn't go on," he said, indicating Muriel, "with her . . . as she . . . is . . ."

There was a silence in which, between all of them, assent breathed and a tacit acknowledgment of the sporting duchess. Then the boy went on, as tho some coiling thing was untwisting itself from his inner consciousness. "It's the other sort of person," he intoned, rather nasally, "the Mostyns and the Delmaines, little, mean sort of people, violating, pandering sort of people. Petty jealousies, old grudges, and all that. Mostyn . . . Mostyn was mucking about in the mud, reaching for a star to drag down into it, and Mrs. Delmaine—well, we know her type. They seem to keep recurring . . . anyway, they kept at me, the two of them kept and kept at me, suggesting, offering, bribing, threatening . . . they knew a chap's weak points, those two, and they attacked 'em . . . they made me do it . . . I can swear to that . . . it was weak in me, but they played on that weakness . . . oh, they played right enough . . ."

The Duchess intervened, kindly. She said it was quite all right. She said that so courageous an acknowledgment was a thoro vindication. She said that they all forgave him, and more, understood. It was, she added, quite all right, and turned her head that she might not see the tears standing forth in the lad's eyes . . .

It was Streatfield who saved the day. He went over to Muriel, white in the gathering gloaming, and took her soft hand in his. "Steer straight, Muriel," he said, tenderly, "and dont think of me. You love Desborough and I know now that you belong to him. He knows it, too. Be happy. Please be happy. You've made me so . . . and that will hold. Good-by."

A month later Muriel was again at Desborough. Tony sitting very close to her; their small son, roses beginning to show in his cheeks again, safe in his nursery with Mary, also safe.

"Do you remember," Desborough was saying, "that Streatfield said that you belonged to me? Do you?"

"Yes, dear."
 "Do you know—it's so? You do. Deeper than all outer things, a truth like that exists. We belong, you and I. We have, we can have, no separate entities."

Muriel took his head between her hands and held it close.

Pretty Polly

I thought her all too serious, too weighted with responsibilities, and was glad to hear that she had found an opening at the old Triangle, in Culver City, when the famous Griffith plant closed down.

The two years that followed saw Pauline Starke a featured player with her name in electric lights. One began to

I saw her first three years ago, a sad little wisp of a thing, with a pigtail, down-drooping lip-corners and a shabby frock, with shoes too large for the tiny Cinderella feet. At the time, Pauline Starke was doing school in company with Mildred Harris Chaplin, Georgie Stone, Violet Radcliffe and other very small fry.

Polly Starke and Mildred Harris were the oldest scholars, and both were in the gauche, schoolgirl age when attending the Majestic-Reliance school, where one teacher disseminated knowledge to all grades.

It was necessity that drove Pauline to the movies, for at the time her mother was wardrobe mistress at the Reliance studio and Pauline's future looked none too bright.

A few days later, in a physician's office, I met mother and daughter, and pretty Polly looked positively older than she does now. You see, at that time she had to put on age in order to hold the opportunity to make good on the screen. With her hair dressed high and a ridiculously long skirt, the little girl sat on a stiff-backed settee and talked very seriously to me while her mother had a treatment.

taking the public's attention away from horror and death by substituting comedy-drama for tearful photoplays, put Polly on her mettle. It was in "Until They Get Me" that Pauline did a daring jump, a "Fairbanks' drop" into space, landing on a horse's back and galloping away in great style.

So it was with a good deal of curiosity that I rang the upstairs bell of a two-family flat house, conscious that a pretty swallow the fact that Polly's mother is her senior by nineteen years. And Polly herself! Bless me, the child is younger now than when she sat on the school-bench. Her hair is modishly arranged, parted on one side, with ear-warmers which are mighty becoming and make one think her hair is bobbed.

Pauline Starke doesn't photograph "true," either in private sittings or on the screen. She's not the sad-faced wight one expects to find. She's blest with the sweetest little face, a bit whimsical, droll, wistful—but optimistic, full of the enjoyment of a healthy, young life. Her nineteenth birthday was celebrated in January, 1920. She's a slim girl, and her feet haven't grown any bigger in the three years aforesaid, even tho' clothed in comfortable cosy-toes, put on because she'd worked so hard all day in tight pumps that the exquisite luxury of a pink satin boudoir slipper appealed strongly.

Now that she doesn't have to look old, Polly is looking childishly young. Her mother looks about six years older than she; both have the fine, fair skin, soft, dark hair worn off the face, and thoughtful eyes. Mrs. Starke is keeping every

Mary MacLaren was stage-struck, like many girls. At fifteen she went into the Winter Garden chorus. Then she came to California with a letter of introduction to Lois Weber. That started her celluloid career yellow-haired, blue-eyed girl, who sat waiting for me to "start something," was one of wholesomeness. I could see no trace of paint or powder on her clear, fresh skin, and when she talked her clear and pleasant voice seemed to match the rest of her. She had no affectations, no striving for effect. It seemed impossible to realize that this young girl became a screen star in her early teens, was then the center of a bitter legal fight over her services. She is so unspoiled, so utterly unlike what I expected to find her.

It was evident that she had had difficulty in interviews.

I ARRIVED at Mary MacLaren's home a few minutes ahead of the time stated for the appointment, only to be told by the maid that Miss MacLaren had gone out, left no word for me, and did not say when she would return. While I was waiting to speak with her mother, she came driving up.

My first impression of this pretty, an inch and a half wide. How did you come to make such a mistake?"

"You know, mamma, I haven't been feeling very well lately," was her excuse.

"I can't possibly use this. You will have to go back and get me another piece."

Which goes to show that, altho a star, Mary is still rebuked by her mother, as any other girl of nineteen years.

Mary MacLaren paid a warm tribute to Lois Weber's great directorial ability. She explained that she had signed a new contract with Universal after the courts nullified the first one, in order to retain the right to continue the use of her screen name.

The living-room of her pretty and typical California bungalow on Manhattan Place, convenient to Hollywood, is furnished simply but in good taste. It extends the entire width of the bungalow, but is not so large that it could not be heated by a little fire in the grate on the coolest California morning. I sat on the lounge, and opposite me, on the wall, was a Maxfield Parrish print. As I entered my eyes were filled with the beauty

"I suppose you come to an interview with something like the self-consciousness with which most of us sit to a photographer?" I said.

"I never know what to say," was her simple confession.

And so we proceeded, not to have an interview, but just an intimate chat about work and life and books and other things, during which I mentioned, casually, "You are Kathleen MacDonald's sister."

"Yes," she replied, "I am the youngest of three of us, but I was the first on the screen." This with just a touch of pride.

"Did you try hard for it?"

"No," she answered, "I deserve no credit. I was given a letter of introduction to Lois Weber and she put me to work immediately."

We were interrupted by her mother. "Excuse me," she said, and then, "Mary, did you bring the piece of lace insertion that I asked you to get?"

"Yes, mamma," was the reply; "I'll bring it to you." And she did so. She had reseated herself when her mother exclaimed, "Why this is only half an inch wide! Didn't you look at the note? I wrote upon it of several bunches of beautiful red roses.

The whirr of an aeroplane was heard overhead, and it brought out the fact that Mary's sister, Miriam, was to be married in a few days to H. Clyde Balsey, who was a member of the famous Lafayette Escadrille, and a description of battle in the clouds of Raoul Lufberry, the famous ace.

"I have no yearning for aviation; I prefer stick to terra firma," said Mary, "altho I do know it isn't any safer. I have had three cars smashed up for me in as many years." (One of these accidents brought her to the border-line of life. She was unconscious for sixteen hours and in bed several weeks.) "One peculiar result of this accident," she said, "is that since my recovery I have abandoned, altogether, horseback riding and surf bathing, two of my favorite recreations, while it has not had the least effect on my automobiling, and I think it must also be responsible for my disinclination for air riding."

"What was there in your life before your screen experience?" I asked.

"Nothing extraordinary," she replied. "Like most girls in their early teens, I was stage-struck, and a glimpse behind the scenes of a New York theater made my home town seem stuffy and intolerable.

I told my mother I was determined to go on the stage. I applied for an engagement, and was taken on with the chorus of the Winter Garden. I was not then fifteen years old. It was not long before I decided not to go on with it, but I cannot say that the life lost all of its glamor for me."

"Do you hope to renew your stage experience?"

"Yes, I am studying for it."

"Serious drama, of course."

"Of course, serious drama." She smiled as she repeated the words. "Mother says it is my near-morbid tastes in drama and books and is but a passing phase of the late teens and early twenties. Edgar Allan Poe is my favorite author. His grim stories fascinate me, and it interested me tremendously when I learnt that we have the same birthday, January 19th. I think, tho," she continued, "that the book that made the most impression on me was 'The Mysterious Stranger,' by Mark Twain. It fascinated me with its terrible pessimism."

She also spoke of the pessimism of Oscar Wilde and the gloom of Balzac. Her interest in these dark pictures of life is the inquisitive

"WHEN one has lost all that counts and is still young, and must live on, there is only one thing to do—make the best of what is left. That I am trying to do."

It was eleven o'clock on a Sunday morning. A big house just off New York's famous avenue—a big room, dull green and tan, hangings of old rose—Madame Halina Bruzovna in a richly upholstered chair, her feet resting upon a Bokhara prayer rug that sank heavily into grey pile.

Would it were possible to tell her tragic story as she told it to me, slowly, hesitantly, carefully, in pretty, broken English, and to picture her mobile, sensitive face, the appeal of her dark eyes, the indescribable grace of gesture of her beautiful hands as she turned to her watchful secretary when the right word would not quite come.

Madame Bruzovna began her stage career more than eight years ago. Her repertoire consists of comedies and dramas of Russian, French, English and Polish authors, Kinternacker, Wilde, Bernstein, Gorky, Tolstoi, etc. She is known not only in Poland, her native country, but all over Europe, in Australia, even Africa, as the stage and movie queen of Poland.

"The Dancer," a popular Broadway production a year or two ago, is one of the plays in which Madame Bruzovna scored a wonderful success. It ran six months at the State Theater in Warsaw, following which Madame formed a company of fifteen people and went on tour.

When war broke out in Europe, she happened to be in Berlin and, before she could get out of the country, was taken prisoner. Finally, thru the intervention of friends, she was allowed to go to Switzerland, leaving her trunks, her jewels in Berlin. During her sojourn in Switzerland she could not buy even a change of linen, as there was not enough clothing for the old and the children.

Anxious to reach her native town, Warsaw, she was compelled to journey all over Europe, thru France, England, Norway and Russia, before she reached Poland, where, until war closed the theaters, she continued her stage career.

In California there had lived for twelve years young Ostoya, Polish by birth, American by environment, but loving Poland with the intense love that all Polanders have for their native land. When Europe was plunged into war, he, with many other loyal countrymen, hastened to his country's need.

In Warsaw, young Ostoya met his talented young countrywoman, Madame Bruzovna, and greatly admired her. The admiration and esteem were mutual, and soon they were married. When Major Ostoya, later one of the most famous of Polish commanders, was called to the battlefield, madame donned a soldier's uniform, shouldered a gun and went with him as a soldier in the Polish army. Twice she fought in the front-line trenches. With her husband she was stationed in Warsaw during the crisis of the Polish struggle. After she left the army she became a Red Cross nurse, serving for eight months directly behind the firing-line. One of her choicest possessions is a medal given her by the late Czar of Russia when he was at Warsaw and was shown about Red Cross headquarters by Madame Bruzovna, who speaks Russian fluently. The medal is an old one, struck by the first Romanoff Czar centuries ago. When Nicholas presented the medal to Madame he said: "This medal, cast by the first Romanoff, is presented to you for your distinguished service by the last Romanoff." These prophetic words were uttered just a month before he lost his throne.

In connection with her stage work in Warsaw, the young Polish artiste had played many leads for the Sphinx-Warsaw Film Company, so, besides active service as soldier and nurse, madame was called upon many times to play leading rôles in films that were shown all over Europe during the war, many of them being taken at the front.

And then, the war over, Major Ostoya was killed at Danzig by the Bolsheviki.

"It was so very hard," said Madame Bruzovna. "We had gone thru the war together—never very far apart—and so happy—even tho we were facing—yes, living, strange things, terrible things, outrageous things. Always, when we had time, we planned our future—after the war. My husband wanted to bring me to America and put me on the stage. He tried to teach me English, but always I liked best to talk to him in Polish.

"And now he is gone. I have the cap he wore when last I saw him alive—his pictures, a few snapshots of both of us taken on the very few days we spent 'honeymooning' in Poland. That is all, and I am here—because he wanted me to come.

"I have been here four months. I am trying hard to learn to speak English perfectly, because Mr. Shubert, Mr. Belasco, say they will put me on the stage when I have English right. Americans—have been very kind. They told me about pictures and, because I cannot bear to be idle and because it takes much money to live in America, and many 'marks' I brought from Poland to make one American dollar—I work in pictures.

"At Selznick studio we made 'The Faded Butterfly.' It is very interesting and very different from making films in Europe. Over there we made all pictures out of doors. Here, we make them in a studio with big lights.

"I like the country—the people—the work I do. Sometimes it seems like a dream—my life. Sometimes, when I think—it seems I must be sixty—so much I have lived. But—when one has lost all that counts and is still young and must live on—there is only one thing to do—make the best of what is left. That I am trying to do."

"Do I look so much like a vamp—a home-wrecker?" queried Helen Gammeltoft, Scandinavian film star and songstress, gazing earnestly up at us. "Please tell me."

She did not, we decided, and said so emphatically. She is strikingly beautiful, with a sensitive face, masses of hair that shone like burnished copper against the old-blue of the chair in which she was seated, and an appealing personality that is bound to set the male heart beating faster—but "vampish"—no, we wouldn't say that.

Miss Gammeltoft was born in Copenhagen. She had an inherited passion for music, a consuming zeal for the study of it. As she grew older music was always to her the voice that she best loved and understood.

To sing in opera was her ambition, but the impatient urge of youth and a tempting offer decided her to accept a shorter cut to a career, and at the age of seventeen she made her stage début in musical comedy at the Gaiety Theater in London.

It was during her popularity as a music-hall favorite that her

By OLGA SHAW

A SHORT time ago it came to my ears that a great many people, tourists and such like, had written, and even sold, stories about Judy of Rogue's Harbor. It made me rather indignant and accomplished the even greater feat of making me think . . . for I felt, justifiably, that not one person among them knew as much of Judy as I did, being there, as I was, during the summer when the drama of her young years came to its predestined climax. Not any one of them knew Teddy, or the Governor, or poor, tragic Ollie, or the Lady of the Roses, with her white hair and her unforgetful eyes. It made, all of it, a deep impression upon me at the time, unfolding before me, as it did, and then I went away and there came obliterating years, and not until I read a recently published story obviously with Judy as a theme did memories come back to me . . . fragmentary . . . here and there . . . vivid here and there . . . sweet and sad . . .

The first glimpse I had of Judy, for instance, was with Denny. Just at that time it would have been impossible to see her without Denny. The two were continually together . . . and it gave me a sort of pleasurable pain, compounded of estheticism and sheer love of form and beauty, to see the lovely girl, approaching womanhood on sure, steady feet, guided, as it were, by the fragile little boy whose protectress and confidante she was.

There was probably nothing particularly arresting about Judy to the casual observer, save for the flowerlike beauty and tinting of gold and sea-shell pink and forget-me-not blue, which were her eyes. She was not brilliant. She was even quaintly illiterate most of the time. But she had, if I may so express it, the all-pervasive quality of love, and it seemed to beam from her tender eyes, shine from her white brow, touch her lips with just the difference that made her unforgettable. At least, she has been unforgettable to me . . .

I have always been touched, in one sensibility or another, by contrasts, and the contrast of Judy to her surroundings, to the people about her, was what first diverted my attention from—well, myself at the time—to her. The cottage, with its unkempt exterior, its rather obvious little "fixings" done, all too plainly, by a woman's hands; the old man with the sullen eyes and the perpetual pipe, at the window; the tragic-looking girl about Judy's own age, but as different as two creatures of the same sex and the same general lineaments could well be; the cowering child, Denny, and the coarse farmer, Jim, who was, it seemed to me, hovering, and always ominously, in the immediate background.

There were, I thought, strange elements mixing and contending there. There was storm brewing . . . and of all things, I did not want to see the little girl with the love potentiality in her face in any sense victimized.

I grew to know the Lady of the Roses. I think I came to want to know her at first because of Judy. After a while I wanted to keep on knowing her because of herself. She had an exquisite gentleness that, just at first, I had mistaken for a silkiness I am not

Jim, it seemed, was hovering, always ominously, in the background . . . and, Judy shuddered to us, wanted to "get married with me" partial to. But after a short time I came to know that the gentleness was a philosophy acquired piece by piece and bit by bit, often with fingers that bled, and, always, with a heart that ached. It was the martyred way in which she had draped the shrine of faded dreams and locked away desires.

She told me that Judy was unalloyed youth and love. "The loveliest thing," she added, "that ever God thought of, after roses. Once upon a time . . ."

I had to prompt her, but she shook her head and made a little gesture with her hands as tho she were closing the door on a room she had vowed to leave unprofaned.

"We make a great mistake," she told me, "in talking of old hurts. We think for easement, but we get revivification. I never speak of dead things . . . not hopes . . . nor hurts . . ."

And so, of course, I did not touch upon the theme again, but, often, seeing her with Judy, I pictured her as a woman who had loved very greatly and whose dearest hope had been to cradle a child in her arms, the child of the man she had so loved. I came to think of her like that, wearing the immortelles of a great renunciation.

I didn't know, until Judy brought Denny to the Lady of the Roses to keep, just how matters stood at the little, but in Rogue's Harbor. Judy was shocked, that night, out of her usual timidity, never without its accompaniment of a fastidious dignity.

Grandpap, it evolved from Judy's tremulous lips and fingers, was lovely as you can think when he was sleeping. Then, it seemed, he had dreams, gentle-appearing dreams, and his half-opened eyes were kind, his mouth lost its ugly twist and became tolerant and all his ferocity fell from him even as an ill-fitting cloak might fall. He seemed, Judy thought, to be his real self. It was characteristic of Judy that she would believe more really in the gentle self of dreams than the coarse one of awakening. Judy was like that.

"He has been getting," Judy told us, "worse and worse of late" . . . when he was awake. He had threatened her and he had actually hit Ollie. Also, he had sided with Jim Shuckles, who, Judy shuddered to us, wanted to "get married with me." As a climax, he had about done for Denny, on whom, most frequently and most disastrously, he vented his unbridled brute rages. This night had been the end. Denny, Judy had thought, was done for. He could stay no longer in Rogue's Harbor if he were to stay on earth at all.

"I thought," she ended, with her wide eyes on the calm eyes of the Lady of the Roses, "that he could kinder stay with you a bit till I . . . till I c'n make plans. I'm going to do something for Denny. He aint going back to grandpap, not ever. If you cant . . ." She ended on rather a wistful note and waited.

The Lady of the Roses had taken Denny's bruised little body into her arms and was soothing him with whispers and with touch. The calm of her eyes was momentarily troubled. Her lips moved and I heard her say, "Not like . . . and yet . . ." Then she smiled up at Judy. "Of course I shall keep him," she said; "it will be charming for me. He shall have lots of bread and milk and sunshine and roses and love, and these are the things, and all the things, a child requires. I shall give them . . . oh, gladly! And he shall watch me sew, by lamp-light, and when you come, Judy, to try on the frock I am making you we will have Denny as audience and critic-in-general."

It seems to me now, on looking back, that two or three uneventful weeks went by, with the exceptions of the daily brawls at the hut in Rogue's Harbor. They, I knew, were daily. They were as much a part of the atmosphere as the smell of the salt, mud and sand, the clam-shells drying in the sun, the salt winds breathing over the marshes, the smell of the ships and the feel of the shifting fogs. It all, somehow, blended into the place, and only Judy stood forth, penetrating the miasmas like a pale shaft of purest gold . . .

It came to me then that Governor Kingsland, then Governor of the State, was spending his summer in the next town, as was his wont, and that he came quite frequently to Rogue's Harbor and quite frequently talked with Judy. At the time I did not connect the Governor and his visits with anything in any sense out of the usual. He was a busy old man, I thought, if I thought at all, with fancies, with dreams . . . to which, no doubt, the child with her sunny hair and her sunny eyes and her naïveté, made whimsical, made tenderish appeal.

Still later it came to me, in divers ways, and finally thru the Lady of the Roses, that the Governor's grandson, Teddy, had met Judy and that he seemed to share the family leaning.

I came into closer touch with the whole when Teddy began to meet Judy at the cottage of the Lady of the Roses.

"They've been meeting in the woods," she told me, "and by the lakeside, and when and where they could. I think it better if they come here. They must be alone, of course; that is their right. But there are alonenesses and alonenesses. I think it is better if I am here, an abiding presence."

I thought of what a mother she might have made if life had not been denying, watching her, as I did, mothering Denny and standing apart from Judy, infinitely wise.

It was more an idyll than a love, all along. Judy, with her child's face and child's loyalties and woman instincts; Teddy, with his chivalry and his fresh-from-the-wariness and his growing, deepening, first unconscious and then very frankly conscious love . . .

It was an idyll against which the brutalities of Jim and poor Ollie seemed bestially insulting.

It was, perhaps, merely again, the matter of contrast. Judy was an idolon, a thing of dreams and dream-desires, and Teddy loved her, responded to her, in just that way.

Ollie, poor creature, was just an exponent, and a very untutored, very uncontrolled, very crass one, of sex, of her sex. There was a man, and there was a woman, and there was a child; there was a marriage, or there was not a marriage, according to Ollie, and there were no shades, no complexities pro or con. There ran thru her, partly because of her sex, no doubt, a certain dull and even dread persistency called loyalty, and an equally dull bewilderment and helplessness when she discovered no such trait in the man from whom she had dully, too, expected it—Jim. It was not Jim Shuckles, so much, who looked after Ollie now, with that light in his eyes; it was the father of Jim Shuckles' impending child . . . and Ollie's world was awry, with no possibility within her horizon of adjustment.

It has come to me frequently since, and specifically in connection with Judy, that love, the essence of love, must be a constructive element. Judy was a builder. Her whole impulse was one to rear things, and, always, toward the clouds . . . She had the quality of patience, too.

She must have had, because, as it evolved afterward, after the day of the Governor's narrowly averted death, and her own heroism, heroically displayed, she had been fighting all sorts of almost insuperable elements, having to bring to bear upon them the wisdom of a woman and the wit of an adventuress.

It is an ill wind, so saith an ancient proverb, and the day of the assault on the Governor's life and Judy's saving of the same had the effect of the heavy mists of Rogue's Harbor lifting and revealing the hulls and the masts of the many ships, secret and otherwise, at rest in that same harbor, veritably Rogue's Harbor.

It revealed, primarily, the fact that there was, without a doubt, some sort of secret organization in the town operating anarchistically. It must have come to Judy on that occasion that Jim Shuckles was a part of it. The ideas connected by some sort of natural inference, called, easily, instinct. Jim just was that sort of person. And, by natural inference, too, it must have come to Judy that this very connection was to be some sort of a means of saving Ollie, whose poor tragedy was growing daily in the lives of all of them. Judy had that instinct, exclusively a woman's.

It made Teddy know how much he loved her, too. When he saw her swinging at the head of the maddened horses to stop them on their mad career, he knew that life and death were duelling and that the life at stake was the breath of his own. It didn't make any difference who she was, or what her relationship to the queer people at the hut at Rogue's Harbor was. She was Judy. He was Teddy.

"They've been meeting in the woods," she told me, "and by the lakeside, and when and where they could. They must always be alone . . ."

Teddy and Judy walked in the garden of roses just as they came to their most perfect bloom, and whispered, one to the other, the old-as-the-world vows

And the answer was two-in-one.

It made the Governor reveal things hidden too long. It gave back . . . but this is how it happened . . .

Two nights after the attack on the Governor's life another attack was planned by Jim Shuckles and his fellows. The Governor, already incapacitated, was to be spirited away. The whole party was to be disrupted. Power, in short, was to be shifted. The plans took place in the barn at Rogue's Harbor, and poor Ollie, ever, these days, on the lone trail of Jim, overheard them. She told them all to Judy, because, primarily, she told everything to Judy. Judy made her plans, and, herself maneuvered the Governor from his house, to a boat, and thence to the cottage of the Lady of the Roses, to whom, somehow or other, Judy felt all who were weary, or sick, in danger or in doubt, should essentially go.

When the Governor recovered from his stupor and beheld deliberate. It sounds—monstrous. I know. There is no alleviating circumstance. There is no possible condoning. I was young. Shallow. I did not know what we pay for joy and what we mean by pain. I had not known grief nor death, nor love, nor any of these things. The years bring these. It took a great many to bring them to me. I told you that the money was gone and the child was dead. I made it seem real beyond all shadow of a doubt. You went away at once. Later, when penitence came to me, I could not find you. You seemed to have vanished from the general surface of the earth . . .

"I had," murmured the Lady of the Roses, and all the battle with pain made intolerable her face, so that the Governor turned from it with a groan.

"There is no expiation," he said; "I know that. I cannot, no matter how bitter my sorrow, give you back your lost years. I cannot give you back your baby. I can give you back your little girl. She is here. Judy. I gave her to her grandfather the Lady of the Roses, he gave a sort of cry, a terrible sort of cry that yet held a strange, paradoxical relief. It was as though a soul long tormented was facing an ultimate, most exquisite torment before some sort of a Nirvana.

"I've felt that this would come to me for a long while," he said. "I told my son only yesterday that I could not give him more money for his senatorial campaign because the money—is not mine to give. Has never been mine to give. It . . ." He looked up into the serene face of the Lady of the Roses and the slow tears gathered in his eyes. "I hate to take from you once more," he said, brokenly, "the serenity you must have gained at such a cost. But I am taking it this time, I know, only to give it, in some measure, back to you again. My dear, when your husband went away so many years ago and did not return—when you returned alone and I had to account to you for the moneys that had been entrusted to me and the child left in my house—I lied."

The Lady of the Roses started violently. Her lips formed the word "child." Involuntarily, Judy moved closer to her. Teddy, in the background, was watching his grandfather with an absorption, half fascinated, half terrorized.

"I lied," the Governor was saying, thru taut lips; "the temptation overcame me, and I fell. It sounds

That Irishman From Paris

By FREDERICK

JAMES SMITH

AN Irishman from Paris—and with a French accent! Which seems to describe George Fitzmaurice, the director.

For Fitzmaurice was born in the Parisian capital of true Irish folk from the south of the little green isle. Wanderers, they had made their home in Paris. It was early decided to train young Fitzmaurice for the diplomatic service—that goal of the Continental youth—but the future director decided differently.

Art beckoned and Fitzmaurice decided to be a painter. He studied and was graduated from the famous Julien School in Paris. Oddly, two years after Fitzmaurice left, Lionel Barrymore came to the same place to study art.

Fitzmaurice found it impossible to pin himself down to pigments and brushes, and the next year found him in the Far East. "It was far from an artistic career that I fell into," laughs Fitzmaurice in telling it. "I became a salesman for cotton, jute, hemp and other Eastern products, and for nine years I lived in India, with visits to China, Japan and Egypt to break the monotony.

"Then I wandered back to Occidental civilization and the movies. Six years ago I invaded pictures with Pathé, and I have been directing ever since. That's the whole story."

Fitzmaurice doesn't tell his own tale very well. Beneath the bare outline are, we suspect, scores of colorful adventures—but Fitzmaurice simply will not talk of himself.

Oddly, this variegated career seems to have been an admirable preparation for the screen. For Fitzmaurice owes his remarkable ability to attain beautiful pictures—admirable in light, shade and grouping—to his early training as a painter, just as Maurice Tourneur owes his skill in the same field to the same source. Fitzmaurice's ability to create atmosphere—as in Elsie Ferguson's "Witness for the Defense"—may well be traced to his wanderings thru Eastern lands. To this add the director's natural Irish imagination trained in French channels.

Fitzmaurice himself believes that diplomacy is one of the chief requirements of a director, for, as he says, "stars and players require delicate handling." We ask if there is a better diplomatic combination than Irish and French?

Fitzmaurice is an interesting observer of the screen. He talked vividly of David Griffith, particularly of the beauty of scene attained in "Broken Blossoms"; of Maurice Tourneur and his rare skill as a painter of the cinema; of thing in favor of the story; of Cecil de Mille and his theatrical viewpoint; and of King Vidor, that new figure on the photoplay horizon. Of them all, Fitzmaurice talked frankly and with singular discernment.

"We have been making fine strides in artistic photography," he remarked. "Today bad camera work is unforgivable. The next step is the story."

The director believes that a star is something of an essential to a big drama. "A star—and, by a star, I mean a player made competent by long training—is of infinite value as an organ to interpret. The star is an instrument upon which the intelligent director plays. As a director attains prominence it becomes necessary to subordinate the star, with the result that the featured director must use new and unstarred—indeed, frequently untried—material. Naturally, this presents added difficulties. If a player does particularly well, he or she immediately slips away to stardom. This happened recently, for instance, with Constance Binney and Violet Heming. The road of the featured director is not easy, despite the apparent ease of some directors, as Griffith and Tucker, to project their ideas into young players."

En passant, it is interesting to note the camaraderie of Fitzmaurice and his wife, known to the scenario world as Ouida Bergere. "We work together on every production," explains the director. "I owe a lot to our team work."

These two settings were built in Famous Players-Lasky studios, "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" in the East, and "The Round-Up" in the West

SOPHISTICATED and searching is the photoplay of 1920. Franker and franker does it become each month in dealing with that eternal theme—sex. The picture puritan may lift his trembling hands in horror, but we see the photoplay as in its adolescent period. The screen drama has been growing and, with a mighty hurrah, it has just discovered sex.

What a shock Cecil de Mille's latest silken orchidrama, "Why Change Your Wife?," (Paramount), would have caused but two short years ago. Not that this latest ruthless cinema invasion of the sacred domain of they-lived-happily-ever-after will not provoke comment. It will—decidedly. For De Mille starts intimately in a bath, with hubby safety-razoring and wifey trying to button her dress unaided, and zips briskly thru matrimonial boredom, divorce, marriage to a pretty gown model, another case of domestic ennui, a second divorce and remarriage to wife No. 1. Remember De Mille's "Why Change Your Husband?," in which he pointed the moral that divorce is rather a waste of time, since all men eat onions, forget to shave and doze off to sleep directly after dinner? Here he reverses the sex of his moral and shows that all wives— But we pause. Mr. de Mille makes his point with more adroit grace. He says, in brief, wives should learn when to be wives and when to be sweethearts.

We verily believe "Why Change Your Wife?" to be Mr. de Mille's best film contribution. It is done with all the director's luxuriousness of method. It has been very smoothly constructed by William de Mille and gilded with subtitles of excellent expression. Moreover, it is admirably played. Thomas Meighan is mere man to the life as the husband of humanly shifting affections, while Gloria Swanson sounds a deeper note than heretofore as the first wife. Bebe Daniels reveals a subtlety new to her screen playing as the mannequin who dazzles the bored spouse.

Turn from the De Mille opus in divorce and marriage to George Fitzmaurice's production of "On With the Dance," (Paramount), a de luxe excursion into the gilded sordidness of Manhattan. This presents a new Mae Murray.

Miss Murray has long been a film luminary of decided piquancy, but her dramatic ability has hardly extended above the knees. Here she is both piquant and dramatic, thanks to Mr. Fitzmaurice.

"On With the Dance" dashes thru mismatched marriages, a murder, an international trial and divorce. Miss Murray has the rôle of a bizarre little Russian; a pagan who lives for the moment, a butterfly of shallow emo-

MY DEAR MR. SMITH:

When I read your wonderful letter to me in reference to "Pollyanna," I was so deeply moved that the tears came to my eyes. It is the sweetest tribute that has ever been paid to me, and one which I sincerely appreciate. I am going to keep it always in my treasure box.

I had almost decided not to impersonate any more children on the screen hut, since your letter, I have reconsidered my decision.

Cordially yours,

tions, yet understandable, even lovable, in her frailties. Unthinkingly she brings down the crime upon her head. Then it is that the girl, Sonia, rises for a second to greatness of soul, when she goes upon the witness stand and, to save the husband who no longer cares, deliberately lies away her name and every dream.

Quida Bergere has transformed Michael Morton's stage play into a most effective film drama. Mr. Fitzmaurice has given it a superb screening. Aside from the dramatic effectiveness, he achieved a remarkable series of screen pictures. Here is the best silverscreen light, shade and balance since "Broken Blossoms." The cabaret scenes, with Miss Murray as the chief charmer, are finely done.

Besides developing a most remarkable dramatic note in Miss Murray, Mr. Fitzmaurice selected a capital cast, with Alma Tell shining as a human, well-bred girl of society and David Powell furnishing excellent playing as the distraught and unhappy husband of the shallow Sonia. This photoplay—sweeping from the midnight cabarets, where bored, jaded New York amuses itself, to its ultimate finale outside the Criminal Courts Building, crowded with photographers of the yellow journals—stamps Mr. Fitzmaurice as a director of the very first rank.

Marshall Neilan's first independent production, James Oliver Curwood's story of the Canadian mounted police, "The River's End," is likely to be very popular, because it is an effectively built melodrama. Basically, it plays havoc with the probabilities and falls down in an even casual examination. Death overtakes a police officer after he has persuaded and captured his man in the Arctic Circle. The captive, who by one of those remarkable coincidences, looks exactly like his captor, assumes the uniform and personality of the dead man and returns to civilization. There he meets his "sister" and falls in love with her. A very happy conclusion is ultimately reached, of course. What? The hero wasn't really guilty of the crime? Of course not. A death-bed confession of the real murderer solves everything.

Lewis Stone does the two rôles—of captor and captive—with fine virility. A corking performance it is. Marjorie Daw is cute—a typical screen heroine. Mr. Neilan had a well-knit continuity to work with, but he deserves credit in keeping a high note of suspense and mystery thruout. "The River's End," with all its weaknesses, holds you. The early Arctic Circle scenes do not impress us, but Mr. Neilan has done some brilliant double-exposure work—the best we can recall—in his scenes with Mr. Stone.

Little Shirley Mason came into prominence in two productions: Maurice Tourneur's visualization of Stevenson's immortal tale of adven-

This new Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920 has started off with a bang.

Already an avalanche of photographs of beautiful women and handsome-men are swamping the office and a special staff is kept busy every day checking them up.

They come from all parts of the world—from Australia, New Zealand and other far distant lands. The interest aroused by the success of the last contest has brought gratifying results.

It should be remembered that the winners of this contest get the same guarantee that was promised the winners of the last

The Dancin' Fool

By ESTHER STEEL

SYLVESTER TIBBLE had the spirit of the commercial reformer. How he came by it neither God nor he could tell. And where it came from did not seriously annoy him. The source of things was of little moment to Sylvester Tibble. There were so many manifest things to be immediately attended to. Actions and reactions, complexes and analyses, as such, were wholly unknown to the energetic Tibble.

He had been energetic at the time of his birth; he continued to be energetic thruout the precarious span of his boyhood and he would continue energetic until the day of his doubtless protesting death.

He was perpetually bursting out of things, in one fashion or another. When he was very small indeed he burst forth from his clothes because of surplus fat and surplus energy. When he was twenty-one he burst from the precincts of the home farm and the home town because his ideas were surplus and, e'en as his infantile fat, energetic. Also, analogous to the fat again, his ideas were concrete. They centered upon making money and they super-centered upon Uncle Enoch Jones, who operated, rather successfully than otherwise, a jug factory in the gold-paved city of New York. The mere fact that Uncle Enoch had had the commercial wizardry to go to New York in the first place commended him to 'Ves, who was surrounded, otherwise, by farm-abiding relatives, rather horribly content.

It should be Uncle Enoch, a fortune and jugs!

There was little or no posity to Sylvester Tibble. Uncle Enoch did not appear to him in any light other than the maker of a salable and highly utilitarian article, upon which could be hooked and fastened the brimming zeals, the enthusiastic ideas of a hitherto unappreciated Tibble. That is, he had no posity when he left the dear old farm . . . later . . . but that is later . . .

Uncle Enoch, approached by the all but unknown nephew, ruddy, exuberant, immensely cordial, did not, at first blush, nor second, either, share the cordiality. He was making jugs in his own way, selling them in his own way, saving his income in his own way. That it was an antiquated way bothered him not at all. It was his way, and he was of the vast majority to whom that is wholly and pleasingly sufficient.

To begin with, he did not believe in sweeping out an office in which one only worked. Sanitation in a factory where jugs were turned forth was "new-fangled." There seemed, however, on the first day of young Tibble's arrival, to be no help for the sweeping, at least. Uncle Enoch, obscured by the clouds of the dust of considerable antiquity, stood by and watched, making grim and, as he feared within him, futile resolutions to make quick work of this young upstart who had had the ill grace to be his sister's child and then foist the undesirable relationship upon an old man. This, then, was what the cartoons meant by pokes at one's relatives . . . Enoch understood . . .

After the sweeping, Sylvester straddled a desk, neatly dusted and oiled by the hand recently self-released from the plough-share, and faced Enoch, still inhaling heavily of dust. Sylvester began to talk.

"This is only the beginning," he said, and got the old gentleman a chair in time to prevent the floor from receiving his complete collapse. Sylvester persisted. "This isn't all, just the beginning," he repeated. "You see, Uncle Enoch, I've ideas. You've jugs and a force to turn 'em out. I've ideas, and the ideas have to do with selling the jugs. You're not selling 'em. I know that. Comparative statistics prove that. How can you? You're not up to date. You're letting every other competitor you've got, and you've got 'em by the fourscore, put things over on you. You're the gimp horse in the race. You're dead from the eyes up. You've got a crêpe on your efficiency. You're stale. You haven't even got a telephone—I've ordered one installed. You haven't even got typewriters. I've rectified that—ordered half a dozen. You haven't got adding machines, nor stenographers, nor dictaphones, nor the proper operating staff. I've taken care of that, too. When these details are installed I'll go out on the road for you and see what's wrong with the out-of-town trade. Something is—that's flat. You're not getting the orders the Mills Jug Company is getting. You're not getting half the orders the New Time Jug people are taking in, nor making one quarter of the profits out of what you do sell. You're on a freight and you're being done in the bargain. You leave it all to little 'Ves."

Young Tibble smiled, by way of encouragement.

Uncle Enoch was beyond the smile and quite beyond encouragement. He didn't know his Ibsen or he might have bewailed, very lustily, the fact of the "younger generation knocking at my door." He did assimilate the heresies of telephones, dictaphones, stenographers and such like twentieth century contraptions. All the troubles known to men came from just these ambiguous and wholly distrustful sources. His father had not done business in such a fashion up in Jaytown, Pa. Did this young radical suppose that just because Enoch Jones had come to the city of New York he had forsworn the ways of his forefathers, the honest, God-fearing ways? Did he? Because, if he did, he would learn . . . he would . . .

In a voice that quavered, Uncle Enoch bade the undesirable relative to be gone, to be completely and, for Uncle Enoch, profanely gone. In a word, he consigned Sylvester Tibble to a most thoro annihilation.

Sylvester Tibble had not swept for nothing. He had not come to New York for nothing. He had not picked upon Uncle Enoch Jones for nothing. He had come to stay.

He told Uncle Enoch so, without ire and even with a certain patience. He bore with him; that was manifest. He had come that morning, unheralded and certainly unasked, and Uncle Enoch had been there, among the dust and jugs, for nigh onto half a century, but that was an inconsiderable part of the whole, which was the renovation of the Jones Jug Factory and the innovation of the fortunes of Sylvester Tibble.

Promising, with unnecessary kindness and forethought, to report promptly for work in the morning and observing that he would now go forth to seek a night's lodging, the son of the sister of Enoch Jones fared forth.

Not at once, however, to seek a night's lodging. Reading efficiency manuals and economics and the Laws and By-Laws of

The people who lounged about McGammon's that night looked on at the dawning of first love, of young love, of love when love is new Commercialism was not all the reading young Tibble had done in his clean-swept room at the home farm. He had read, too, of the cabarets of New York, the dancing girls, the wine and laughter and lure. He had read, approvingly. One of the things he had come to New York for was to dance and to laugh and to live. He had mapped it all out. He would seek love as he would seek his fortune, applying principles of efficiency and system.

Of course, it did not happen to him as he had planned it—love. Almost always this is so, of others than Sylvester Tibble. It happened to him suddenly, with an almost violent abruptness. It happened to him deliciously and accidentally, and like this:

The first cabaret he saw he went into, and the first cabaret happened to be rather a rough sort of place known familiarly as McGammon's. The attraction at McGammon's happened, that season and that fateful night, to be Junie Budd, a very young thing with limbs like a flying dryad's and a face like the name she bore. She was very young and very sweet and very untouched, and the gods had surely kist her pink, arched feet and put that abandon of grace into the curves of her body. Sylvester, not being poetical until still later, did not note these details as details. He did note, however, that the music—or was it something more?—quicken the pulse of his heart almost unbearably, that he felt oddly short of breath and that there was a dizziness in his head and a coldness in his hands heretofore unknown to him. He tried his efficiency formulas and they fell flat. He tried to think of Uncle Enoch and the jug outfit and tomorrow's regimen and found that all he could see was a pair of limbs, flying and fleet and sweet; all he could hear was the hula-hula of the music. It was uncommonly queer.

Then the thing itself happened. Junie Budd stopped dancing. There was a commotion above which her voice rose, clear as a bell, resentful, full of tears. Sylvester knew what one did then. His head cleared and he made the platform upon which they danced with a bound. Junie's partner, it seemed, had kist her, full upon the mouth, and this was in no sense a part of the program. Junie was "pertikeler," and "What would Ma Budd say?" was the hue and cry. To emphasize her point she was rubbing savagely at the pink, assaulted mouth, and Sylvester found himself considering, with the queer new undercurrent of thinking he had developed in the past fifteen minutes, that that pink, hurt mouth was the loveliest thing he had ever seen; lovelier, even than the pink anemones in the woods at home with the first of the spring.

The thing to be done was to dispose with two fists of the unspeakable villain who had done the more than unspeakable wrong and, this done, with dispatch, and being nothing very new to McGammon's, the music was resumed. Junie signified 'Ves didn't quite know how, that she wouldn't at all mind dancing with him. 'Ves had never done much dancing before, but all that mattered to him was the face of Junie Budd, and he fell in love with her then and there, and the people who lounged about McGammon's that night looked on at the dawning of first love, of young love, of love when love is new, and knew that their hearts beat in their breasts with a different rhythm; knew that their eyes filled with unconscious and uncalled-for tears, knew that they wanted to see this over and over, again and again, so that they might walk forth into the greyness of the unlovely street and never see the greyness nor mind the unloveliness; but they did not know why. They did tell McGammon what they wanted, tho, in various ways and with various reasons, and they told it so variously and so emphatically that McGammon made Junie and 'Ves a joint proposition to take immediate effect and Junie and 'Ves accepted.

They did not quite know, themselves, what had happened to them that night. It had come so strangely, so unexpectedly, so keenly and sweetly. They knew that they wanted to be together; that they could not bear to part. They knew that they were happy when they were dancing together and inexplicably sad when their arms fell asunder and the music ebbed low. They knew that they did not see just as they had seen before; that there was a different meaning than there had been the day before. They did not know quite yet that it was love.

Whatever the reason Junie Budd and 'Ves danced their way to fame

He called Enoch Jones a few hard but understandable names and produced from every pocket his wearing apparel boasted contracts secured by him on his trip

That night Junie took 'Ves home with her and introduced him, palpitantly, to Ma Budd. Ma took roomers and was willing, having a vacancy, to include Sylvester Tibble, "with references." Sylvester was efficient enough to have equipped himself with these. He had foreseen almost all contingencies save the entirely marvelous one of falling in love—and, of all marvelous persons, with Junie Budd. To think that he should have picked out Junie Budd! It was, he knew, with a reverent and deep conviction, nothing less than a dispensation from heaven.

Late that night poesy entered the soul of Sylvester Tibble and he inscribed his first perfervid sonnet to "Beautiful Junie Budd."

In the morning he knew that he was in love.

So did she.

Before they danced, that same evening, at McGammon's he told her of his love, and she admitted hers, and the mutual confession ended in the first kiss and the promise of the finest engagement ring in the town.

On the way home from McGammon's 'Ves told Junie all about Uncle Enoch and the jug factory and the reforms he was instituting and was going to institute in order, altruistically enough, to make Uncle Enoch and the jugs efficient and, quite incidentally, to make the gold and glittering fortune of one Sylvester Tibble. Junie Budd listened and believed. The jugs and the efficiency principles were all rather vague, but, outstanding and startling, was the great fact of the greatness of Sylvester Tibble. It was, to her, a manifest fact, and she told him so. Further proof of his greatness consisted in the fact that he put the idea of greatness modestly from him—it was nothing much, he guessed, to come fresh from a farm and place factories and factory owners and labor situations and out-of-town trades upon a speedy efficiency basis

. . . nothing much as he could see—it was just him, that was all . . . just Sylvester Tibble. He happened, wonderfully or otherwise, to be made like that.

Perhaps the world was hungry, after the war, for the lighter flowers of lighter things. Perhaps it was just the inborn desire everywhere to see young love and young life winged on dancing feet. Whatever the reason, Junie Budd and 'Ves danced their way to fame. Once again 'Ves burst bonds. McGammon's could not hold them once the tales of their light-some steps became noised abroad. Offers came in and they danced, finally and triumphantly, in the Garden of Roses, the most famous and the most exclusive of the popular cabarets.

Junie would have been content just to dance and love, but there was a real sense of commercialism in Sylvester. "They want us because we're so darned young," he told Junie, "and so much in love. Both these things show, honey-girl. That's what the people are coming to see. That's what they want, even tho they haven't the sense to name it. That wont last—the youth part of it—and they wont want to see the love part when the youth part isn't there. Then . . . where will we be? We wont save money at this rate. People living this sort of life just dont, just cant. And, anyway . . . I dont want to have you keep on dancing for other folks to see . . . I want you to dance over green lawns and wild flowers . . . in the morning . . . in the moonlight . . . for me . . . alone . . . honey . . ."

"Why . . . why, 'Ves," whispered Junie Budd, resting her young, pink face against his sleeve, "I . . . I didn't know you were a poet . . . too . . ."

"I'm not," said 'Ves.

"But . . . just now . . ."

"I'm a lover . . . that's why . . ."

'Ves danced at night and by day he persisted in his thankless job of modernizing the down-sliding Jones Jug Factory. He fired the star salesman when he found that he had been looting the firm via his much-inflated expense account, and he managed, with much effort and a great deal of abuse, to smuggle in the typewriters and the telephones. The stenographers were still in abeyance, owing to a slight consideration for the apocryphal tendencies of Uncle Enoch.

Then, one night, after dancing at the Garden of Roses, he met James Harkins, a jug manufacturer, and his extremely up-to-date and talkative sister, Dorothy. Harkins was willing to talk, and from the talk of both of them 'Ves gleaned his great idea for merchandizing the Jones Jug. It meant a trip on the road and, before the trip, it meant a great many talks with the Harkinses, both brother and sister, to accumulate data and gain information. It meant, analogously, seeing considerably less of Junie Budd, who simply could not talk jugs nor get the ins and outs of efficiency. Seeing less of Junie Budd meant an aching loneliness to 'Ves, but it meant to Junie, Dorothy Harkins. She had always suspected that 'Ves was far too wonderful a person to have loved her, and now this commanding young woman, with the statistics of jugs at her very fingertips, was going to prove the horrid fact to 'Ves himself. Junie skidded completely away on the idea. She told 'Ves she was certain of it. She told him not to mind her; her heart could break, but her feet should go on dancing . . . and dancing . . . and dancing . . . forever and ever and . . . at which juncture her poignant grief conquered her and she wept out her heartbreak and gave him back his ring and sent him forth on his trip, puzzled, distraught, more, however, than feverishly anxious to make good that he might dazzle Junie's baby blue eyes with a more than magnificent diamond. She was a child, God bless her, a baby, and as a child and a baby bright things should be dangled before her to bring her back to his heart . . . in the meantime . . . there were the jugs . . .

It took 'Ves two months to do what he wanted to do, and when he returned to New York it was spring again and it was night-time . . . such a time and such a night as the first one upon which he had met Junie Budd and danced with . . . and loved her . . . and made a host of people to dream while their lips grew wistful and their eyes grew dim with tears . . .

He had not heard from Junie since the night she had sobbed out her farewell to him, but she had said, then, that she would keep on dancing and dancing . . . forever and ever . . . and so he sought her in the Garden of Roses.

She was dancing there, but, he saw at once, not as she had danced before . . . with him. There was life in her young grace, but the love had gone from the life and the pulse from the flesh. And the people, too, they were sipping their wine . . . smoking . . . only casually . . . only occasionally did their eyes rest on the girl and man dancing on the stage . . . 'Ves heard one man say, "Curious . . . she used to get you like a heartache that you wanted to keep on feeling . . . Not now . . . deader than a door-nail. Management's to can them, I hear."

This was too

"Will you marry a dancin' fool, Junie?" the young lover asked, "and . . . the present partner and future outright owner of the Jones Jugs, Incorporated . . . will you?"

(Fifty-seven)

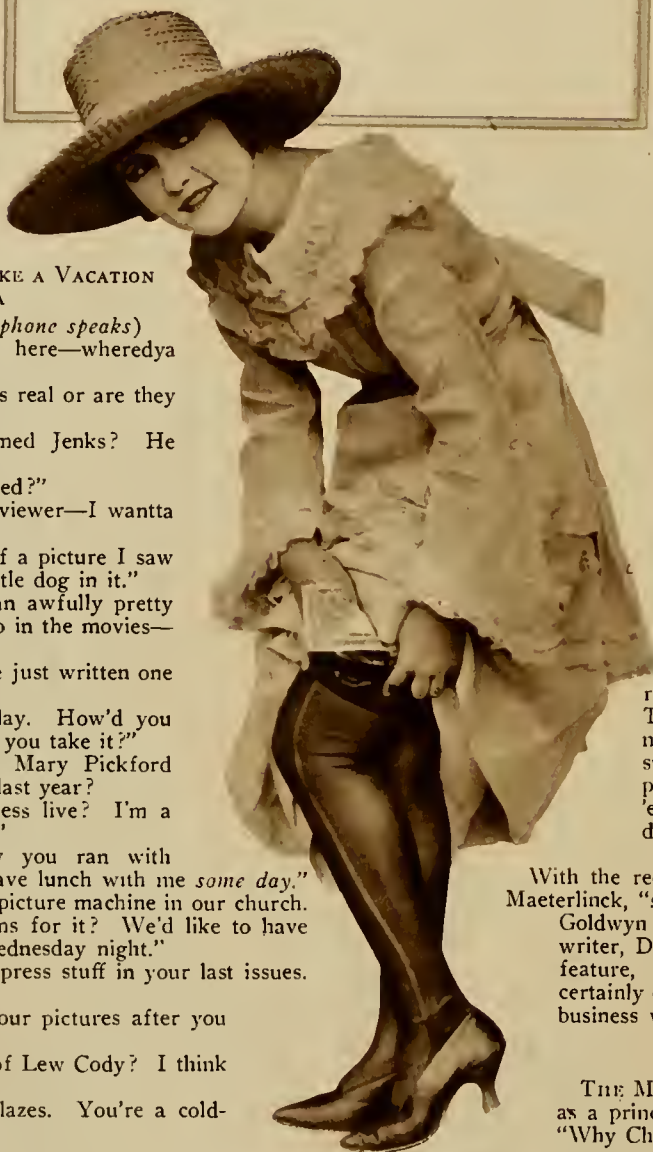

much for 'Ves. It was too much for him to look on at his dancing dryad with all the fervors gone from her pretty limbs. He made the stage as he had made it once before, months ago, seized her in his arms and gave the assembled crowd the lure and lilt they had missed, not knowing why . . . And they hadn't forgotten him. They hadn't forgotten her. They hadn't forgotten the pair of them together. They didn't know that the quick gasp of her breath, the exultant leap of her young body, the ecstatic sway and song of them was because she hadn't known . . . because her heart had been breaking . . . because young love had come to her again . . . made the world a dream new . . . they knew they were getting what they wanted, and they told the young couple so with cheers and cries and welcomes and bravos . . .

There was one table on the floor silent in the midst of the general hubbub. Grouped about that table were the Harkinses, brother

BIG MOMENTS OF THE MONTH

When Bebe Daniels adjusts the sofa victrola in "Why Change Your Wife?"

The moonlight swim of Connie Talmadge in "Two Weeks."

Mae Murray's cabaret moments in "On With the Dance."

Our idea of far-fetched comparisons occurs in a recent Lewis J. Selznick advertisement, which compares the quality of Selznick productions to the quality which "impresses you on every hand in the stately mansion of George Washington at Mount Vernon." Pretty soon some ambitious press agent is going to compare somebody else's pictures to Grant's Tomb.

The "piquant photoplay" is still striving for piquancy. A recent Constance Talmadge comedy carries this advertising line: "A tale of wild men and wild women in a wild city." A picture of an elderly gentleman examining a cutie's right shoulder-blade carries this message: "Ye gods! The old fossil thinks he's a sinner!" And the advertising man sums it all up in this choice phrase: "What if it does make 'em blush—your theater is dark!"

With the recluse "Blue Bird" philosopher, Maeterlinck, "supervising productions" at the Goldwyn coast studios; the "Pollyanna" writer, Doc Crane, dashing off a super-feature, Art (capital A, please), has certainly entered the scenario end of the business with a vengeance.

GROWTH

By BARBARA HOLLIS

I've grown away from you I know,
I tried to take you too;
But you cried out, "Come back to me!"
And that I cannot do.

I hoped it might not matter, dear,
Till in your grieving eyes
I saw that you were lost to me—
Could it be otherwise?

Life holds its compensations—true—
A crown for every cross;
Yet can the sad-sweet joy of growth
Make up for bitter loss?

LOST KISSES

By ELEANOR HAMMOND

You kist me, and the sea wind blew away
The kiss and lost it in the whirling spray.
A nautilus came drifting in from sea—
It was your kiss blown back to me.

You kist me where the summer breezes pass;
We lost the kiss among the wind-blown grass,
And as we laughed, we saw it flutter by—
A little yellow lutterfly.

And once beneath a sky of amethyst
Almost your lips touched mine, almost we kist.
The night wind stole the kiss and tossed it far—
It blossomed as a little star.

At Every Move of Your Hand— Your Nails are Conspicuous

YOU jot down a memorandum—instantly eyes are attracted to your hands. Instantly a judgment of you is formed, based upon the appearance of your nails.

Eyes follow a moving object automatically; follow it as inevitably as they blink when something suddenly flies towards them. This is why they are so often fastened on your finger tips.

Notice today and count the number of times someone glances at your nails.

People no longer excuse unsightly hands. For it is generally known that nowadays well-kept nails are simply a matter of a little care.

However busy you might be, however hard you might use your hands, you need never be ashamed of your finger nails. It requires only a few minutes of the right kind of care once or twice a week to keep them in perfect condition. But be sure it is the right kind of care.

The safe and satisfactory method of caring for the cuticle is softening and wiping away. This is easily done by the use of Cutex, the pure liquid cuticle remover.

The simple Cutex method of manicuring takes less time than the old painful cutting of the cuticle, and it is absolutely harmless. Cutex Nail White and Nail Polish complete a perfect manicure.

You will be astonished at the wonderful results from one Cutex manicure. Repeated once or twice a week, it will keep your nails in perfect condition.

Cutex can be obtained at every drug store or department store in 35c and 65c bottles. Cutex Nail
White, Nail Polish and Cold Cream are each 35c.

Pretty Polly

photograph ever taken of her daughter, because she wants them all to gaze upon and dream and croon over when Pauline leaves for a home of her own.

That did look as if Polly had expectations matrimonial. I asked her about it first thing.

The girl laughed merrily. "I dont want to marry until I am twenty-five, it's such fun to live and work and travel about. But a fortune-teller told me I would marry next year—and I'm awfully excited about that."

A cynical visitor happened to be there and withered Polly's orange-blossom hopes with the cold wind of mistrust and disappointment.

"I hope you fare better than I do!" quoth the mere male. "Two fortune-tellers told me I would marry very young, and at the end of twenty years I'm still doing monologs!"

"She might not have understood her business," answered pretty Polly, peppfully.

"There isn't anything I love quite so much to do as to dance," went on Pauline. "But I ruined my lovely new ball-gown—just think, my very first ball-gown—"

"Pauline, I cant think how you managed to do it," interrupted her mother. Then, explanatorily, "Pauline went to her first big ball this month—the directors' ball. She wore a débutante frock, American Beauty velvet, very simply made—not one of those matronly looking décolletés, but—"

"Why, mother, you know it hasn't a thing but shoulder-straps. You're beginning to describe it as if it had a high neck," chimed in Polly.

"I dont know how it is that young girls now think of nothing but clothes—I get so sick of hearing clothes, clothes, at the studio, and Pauline's vagaries nearly drive her tailor crazy. He always says, 'Pauline, you know what you want, but you never know how hard it is to make it your way—you drive me insane!'" Mrs. Starke sighed in a motherly sort of fashion.

"You should see my trick frock—for the street!" Pauline didn't wait for a second invitation when I begged her to show it off.

Miss Starke is very original. She designs everything she wears. Moreover, she wont study fashion books, even when the tailor flourishes them hopefully under her straight little nose.

"I think Pauline may be quite a designer after a while," continued Mrs. Starke, while Polly dove headfirst into her clothes closets. "Just now everything she does seems freakish to me. I dont see any particular reason for turning the world topsy-turvy the way she does, there are so many pretty fashions in the windows and books."

"Here is my trick skirt—see, I wrap myself into it this way." I dont wonder the tailor gets excited. The skirt begins as a semi-circle, slopes off into a long point, and wraps twice around the slim hips to form a double overskirt, with drop underneath, and just one little tape holds the lower part together with a snap fastener. Skirt edges and coat are finished with binding of black leather. A bright little vest, fastening in the back, adds color to the blue suit.

"You didn't finish telling me about the ruined ball dress," I reminded.

"Oh, to be sure. Jack Pickford and I were doing all sorts of exhibition dancing, and I think the knees of his black trousers must have interfered with my velvet skirt, for it shows long black streaks, like dye.

"I had a perfectly thrilling experience today. Jack had his new aeroplane on the lot and, when I said some day I wanted to go up in it, he proposed my going right off with his pilot. I couldn't do stunts, because they wont let you do that unless the owner goes along."

Pauline drives her mother out to Culver City daily in her Buick coupé. She's doing Melissa in "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come"—not much of a part, but a fill-in until her own feature is produced at the Goldwyn plant.

Before that, she played the younger sister in "Eyes of Youth," but much of the rôle was cut out owing to the enormous amount of film consumed. In "Soldiers of Fortune," under Alan Dwan, Polly fared well. Then she is showing in "Broken Butterfly," with Maurice Tourneur's direction, and "The Life Line," which forces her to be mother to a four-year-old daughter, a part opposite to the screen Lothario, Lew Cody. Pauline has had to weep thru so many of these abandoned girl stories—always she is the Injured Innocent.

"Will you keep on with that sort of stuff?"

"I like best to play the part of the very poor little girl who works hard, or meets somebody, and who gets very wealthy and is happy forever after," said Pauline Starke, enthusiastically. That's natural, of course, for Pauline's own life has been a development of the chrysalis into a beautiful butterfly—a shedding of limitations and achievement of home, fortune and many friends.

Her home is really beautiful. There are soft chairs, much mulberry-colored velvet, lots of cushions, all showing up well against the grey rug. Mahogany catches high-lights from the various gas-heating devices, one being an open grate with gas-logs. There are very odd lamps with subdued shades, not a glaring light anywhere, and the canary cage has a ruffled arrangement of dark green silk like the window drapes. The canary is Polly's only pet, and he fights her viciously, to her immense gratification and mirthfulness. However, he does sing night and day, which is all a canary is supposed to do.

Pauline herself is never quiet. She

HOW TO FIGHT THE LITTLE FOES WHICH WORK TO MAR YOUR SKIN

YOUR complexion is surrounded by enemies—There is that inward enemy that shines the face. There is the tricky breeze that dries and dulls the unprotected skin. There is dust that clogs the pores.

Be always on your guard against their wiles.

EXPOSURE to wind, sunlight and dust coarsens your skin. Skin specialists say that you can protect your complexion from this injury by applying a protective cream before every outing.

Of course you cannot apply a cold cream before going out—cold cream leaves your face too oily.

Lightly touch your face and hands with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It is made precisely for daytime and evening use. It has not a bit of oil in it, so it cannot make your face shine.

In this way you can keep your face appealingly soft and smooth no matter how much time you spend out of doors.

YOU never can tell when that treacherous enemy, an ugly glisten, will creep upon you unawares and make you look your worst.

This cannot happen if you powder in such a way that it will last.

To foil wind, sun and dust, use a bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream before motoring or other out-of-door sports

The same greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream makes the powder stay on

You cannot expect too much of powder. The right powder foundation is essential if you are to stay powdered. For this you cannot use a cold cream. The oil in it soon comes out in a worse glisten than ever.

Before powdering rub a tiny bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream on your face. Then notice how smoothly the powder goes on, how natural it looks. It will stay on indefinitely. Until you wash your face it cannot shine again.

DUST is a subtle enemy. When your skin grows dull, loses its clearness, it is simply an announcement that the pores have become clogged deep down with tiny particles of dust.

To remove these, vanishing cream is not enough! Only a cream with a good oil base will suffice.

Before you go to bed and after a train or motor trip, rub Pond's Cold Cream into the pores and wipe it off. It contains just enough oil to work deep into the pores and thoroughly cleanse them. You will be shocked at yourself when you see how much dirt you were harboring.

When you go downtown, stop at the drug store or any department store and buy a jar or a tube of each cream. You need never again fear the little flaws that ruin one's appearance.

Before retiring remove the dust that is lodged deep in the pores with a cream with an oil base—Pond's Cold Cream

YOUR SKIN NEEDS TWO CREAMS

Every skin needs two creams. For daytime and evening a cream specially made without oil, so that it cannot reappear in a shine. This is Pond's Vanishing Cream. It has no oil and cannot make your face shiny even for a moment. It is based on an ingredient which is prescribed by world famous physicians for its softening effect. Use it for protection from the weather, for a powder foundation and for freshening the skin at a moment's notice.

On the other hand, for cleansing, for supplying a lack of oil, and for massage, Pond's Cold Cream should be used. Its formula was worked out to supply just the amount of oil required to give it the fullest cleansing power, and just the smoothness to work well into the skin.

Neither of these creams will foster the growth of hair on the face.

Tiny deepening lines can be kept at bay with a Pond's Cold Cream massage has a way of standing, stork-like, on one foot, or swaying on both feet—crossed! Again, she'll rock in a perfectly straight chair—and always it is the essence of graceful movement.

"Dont tell anybody I swim—for I dont!" she burst in, suddenly. "They are always talking about how the girls swim, and I dont want anybody to think I'm trying to put something over, for I cant swim a single stroke and I dont want to!"

I crossed my heart—let these words bear witness to the truth.

"What sort of man do you want to marry?" Pauline's ideas are so original one wants to draw her out further.

"I want—" Polly reached over for the figs stuffed with walnuts before she felt fortified to answer the momentous question. "I want a man with personality now—strong personality. I used to dream of a handsome man, but I've seen too many good-looking men, and played with too many, to care about their faces any more. I'm after intelligence and character—that's the only thing that lasts."

"That looks as if you were turning from leading men to directors," shot in the cynical visitor again.

"Perhaps," closed pretty Polly, laconically.

Bonnie Mary

interest that makes almost all of us eager to peep into a chamber of horrors.

"One of the great events of my life," she remarked, "was when I made a long visit to an aunt, who lived in her old Colonial home in a wild portion of West Virginia, on the trail which the pioneers traveled on their way westward to colonize Kentucky, Indiana and Illinois. I was very fond of our history, especially of the struggles with the Indians. My aunt did not allow me to associate with the neighbors, who were mountaineers of the feudist type, so I used to wander around, fancying myself in the scenes of these combats between the whites and the redmen. She had a large library, and I would cuddle up in it when I was tired of tramping and explore the bookshelves. It was there that I made the acquaintance of Becky Sharp and the people of Dickens. The latter attracted me the most. I was especially fond of 'The Tale of Two Cities' and 'Bleak House.' Next February, when my contract with Universal is at an end, I intend to visit Europe and see all the Dickens landmarks and explore the abiding places of my Scotch ancestors. I feel that the rest will do me a lot of good, and when I return I will be able to go back to my screen work with new zest."

Her most famous picture was "Shoes," made under the direction of Lois Weber. Some of her more recent pictures are "Rouge and Riches," "Bonnie, Bonnie Lassie" and "Petrol on the Current." The last, (her favorite), from a story by Edna Ferber.

"You may see my testimonial to the value of WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO."

ALICE BRADY
"I consider WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO an ideal shampoo. It can be used with such little effort and keeps my hair in wonderful condition."

MARCEL NORMAND
"I never knew that a shampoo could be so delightful until I used WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO."

PROPER Shampooing is what makes beautiful hair. It brings out all the real life, lustre, natural wave and color, and makes it soft, fresh and luxuriant.

Your hair simply needs frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, but it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soap. The free alkali, in ordinary soaps, soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it. This is why leading motion picture stars, theatrical people and discriminating women use

WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle no matter how often you use it.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will cleanse the hair and scalp thoroughly. Simply moisten the hair with water and rub it in. It makes an abundance of rich, creamy lather, which rinses out easily, removing every particle of dust, dirt, dandruff and excess oil. The hair dries quickly and evenly, and has the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it is. It leaves the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage. You can get WATKINS MULSIFIED COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO at any drug store. A four ounce bottle should last for months.

The Pulse of the Photoplay Public

more attention as audiences develop. That is natural, for sex, playing a big part in real life, must necessarily play a big part in our drama. Thus sex has stood out in our biggest recent successes, 'The Miracle Man,' 'Male and Female,' 'Everywoman,' and our new film production, 'On With the Dance.'

"Our public does not want a morbid story. Every film play tending towards the over-dramatic, the brutal or the depressing shows poor box-office returns."

We questioned Mr. Lasky upon the happy ending. "It is necessary," he answered. "The audience out in front of the screen centers its interest in the hero or heroine and unconsciously roots all evening for its favorite. If the story comes to an unsatisfactory ending, the audience feels an intense personal injury. No, the happy ending is a requisite. The charge is made that the spoken drama is truer to life in this respect, but if you go carefully over the footlight successes, you will find them capped with happy endings, with but few exceptions.

"One thing I want to make clear: I do not, by any manner of means, believe that the death-knell of the star has been rung. But we can now have good pictures without a star, for our audiences have developed. Today the screen and stage stand upon an equal footing in this matter of the star."

Mr. Lasky briefly disposed of the so-called menace of the foreign photoplay.

"The foreign-made drama can never cope with our own photoplays, because its makers have not the pulse of our public. Their work is temperamentally and even racially unsuited to us.

"We have been studying England carefully. Indeed, our plans to produce in Britain were intended entirely to bring us closer to the English public, for we could find far better places to make pictures. On the whole, we have learnt that British and American tastes are very much alike. The English audience likes society plays very much. On the other hand, its taste in comedy runs to the slapstick, while over here we have been steadily tending towards a higher type of comedy."

Again Mr. Lasky paused. "I want to add one thing," he went on. "We hear a great deal of change and unrest among the personnel of picturedom. Stars and directors are ever shifting and ever starting their own companies. I have watched them and they all come face to face with one great fact—that there is an element in photoplay-making not often considered. That is the studio organization behind the picture—the art director, the scenario editor, the research department, the casting director, and all the rest. Back of every good picture must be a fine organization. That is why stars slump in popularity and directors fall off in workmanship when they try to go it alone. And they continue to fall down until they build up an adequate staff."

Gentle Jane

him again last summer when he came back to pictures. We made some thrilling submarine scenes in a rough sea where I had to jump from a rowboat on to the submarine, and be submerged six times. One day Mr. Bosworth was reassuring me and said, 'Jane, dont you ever be afraid. Remember I have two big hands ready to battle for you at any time or any place.'

"Sessue Hayawaka is wonderful to work with, too. He is very intense and feels his emotional scenes so keenly that he carries me along with him. He is another merry tease and delights in telling long stories in Japanese and making funny sketches of me while we are resting between scenes.

"I have been doing a new picture, 'The River's End,' with Marshall Neilan. He is a genius at directing, always so encouraging, keeping every one keyed up to the spirit of the action. This is the best rôle I have ever had and a decided change, for I am the daughter of a judge who has loads of money, so I wear lovely clothes. You remember that I usually wear the worst old, horrid ones!"

This home-loving Jane enjoys cooking and in the midst of her busy life last summer she filled a closet with jellies, jams and wonderful looking preserves. She likes to sew, and Virginia's tiny garments are hand-made with dainty touches of embroidery done during the long waits between scenes at the studio.

While we were chatting Virginia had succeeded in upsetting a basket of pictures, and selecting a still, brought it to me, announcing, "Dis is Jane, dis is Bee Hart," and planting a moist kiss on each pictured face she darted away before her mother could catch her.

"She always calls me Jane; every one does, you know. When we take her to see my pictures, she recognizes me the moment I come on the screen and she calls out, 'Dere's Jane, dere's Jane,'" and the fond mother smiled, indulgently.

So you see, there are, indeed, two Jane Novaks. One, who with her charm and beauty, as well as her thoro knowledge of the dramatic technique and unusual ability as an actress, makes one of the loveliest heroines before the camera. The other one, with her sweetness and gentleness, makes a real home for her loved ones, and fortunately for us, she manages the dual rôles most successfully.

THIEVES

By BARBARA HOLLIS

I am in sympathy with thieves,
Condemn them less and less.
I can forgive them anything—
Their weakness I can guess.

For in my life the stolen things
Seem far the sweetest yet;
As I look back upon the days
I never shall forget.

A stolen hour—a stolen word:
A stolen kiss from you:
I am in sympathy with thieves—
Whatever they may do.

Imagine the Thrill of Seeing YOUR Song on Sale!

"It was the proudest moment of my life, when I saw my song on sale at the local music stores," said one of our writers.

Why Don't YOU Write the Words for a Song?

Our composer, Edouard Hesselberg, will write the music, and we will have the complete song printed according to our SPECIAL PLAN.

Edouard Hesselberg, Our Composer received his musical education at the Moscow Royal Conservatory of Music, Moscow, Russia. After perfecting himself under Rubinstein, he began a brilliant concert career, appearing with such world famous artists as Sembrich, Nordica and de Reszke. He has played before and received valuable decorations from the former Czar of Russia, the present King of Italy, and other Royal families. He is an interpretative artist of rare and distinguished ability as pianist and composer. Among his greatest song successes are "If I Were a Rose," of which over a million copies have been sold. His latest song, "America, My Country," the new national hymn, is now in its fourth edition. Our writers are indeed fortunate in securing the services of this great musician.

EDOUARD HESSELBERG

You Can Succeed by Metropolitan Studios Plan

and make no mistake about it. There is a golden opportunity offered people who can furnish real "words for a song." Popularity follows a successful song writer. If you are in earnest, read over a few of the popular songs—study the words and the way they are written.

Every magazine and every newspaper is filled with ideas for a song. Just use your imagination. Select any subject—love—patriotism—home—mother—sweetheart. Tell the story in simple language in two verses and chorus, and then send it to us. We will examine it without charge. If our Lyric Editor finds your words contain an idea for a song, we will offer you the benefit of our service. REMEMBER, YOU INCUR NO OBLIGATION IN SENDING US A POEM FOR INSPECTION. GET YOUR LETTER INTO THE MAIL BEFORE ANOTHER DAY PASSES. WHO KNOWS—YOU MAY BE THE "SONG WRITER OF TOMORROW."

Gossip of the Pacific Coast

By FRITZI REMONT

LOS ANGELES, (Special)—Springtime and sunshine, pretty girls and new clothes, and Kathleen Kirkham in just the right mood for a luncheon to celebrate the coming of new things and the feminine reminiscing over the old.

At her home on Delaware Avenue, Miss Kirkham entertained us beautifully, the special honoree being her married sister from the Middle West. The mahogany table was bare, save for Cluny lace doilies and a delightfully springy centerpiece. A tiny pond holding some Japanese toys, a real one-inch goldfish, an infinitesimal turtle that never should have left home and mother, and spanned by a tiny bridge, proved highly attractive.

The place cards were hand-painted Japanese figures, mounted on tiny boxes holding salted nuts, and each guest received a favor of a tea-cannister of dark wood, hand-painted, ribbon-tied, holding orange pekoe tea. Two Japanese figures stood near the pond, swinging lanterns filled with incense. The rooms were decorated with peach and plum-blossoms, and flowery vines and roses "budded in" at the windows, as Kathleen put it.

I was delighted to meet an old-time friend in Nell Craig, who has signed up the best contract she ever had. She's been reducing, so that her svelte and graceful figure was simply lost in the wonderful moleskin coat which she had donned for driving.

Coleen Moore had heged a few hours off from the Haworth studio; having worked all day and night before the luncheon she was able to get only a few hours' sleep before the luncheon. She is the cutest kiddie, drives a Hudson roadster, but is planning to buy a larger car for her "family," since her mother and brother of school age have come to stay. The Moores have been occupying an apartment, but Coleen says she simply must get a big house now. Her hat was a very flower-basket of wild blossoms, and her new taffeta frock, with its bouffant hips, one of the prettiest creations this spring.

And, by the way, you never tasted such luscious light biscuits as those Kathleen serves. She calls them "Mrs. Washington biscuit," and I am sorry that lack of space forbids my giving you the recipe—but you might ask her for it when bidding for a photograph.

She was looking charming in one of those square-cut necks which are so becoming to Kathleen. The frock was black taffeta, with fine lace about the square and elbow-sleeves touched off by little net undersleeves about four inches wide. Miss Kirkham's sister is almost like enough to be a twin, and their mother, as usual, did the honors, for she keeps house for busy Kathleen. A couple of capable colored girls made perfect table service possible.

Emma-Lindsay Squier, whose stories we all enjoy so much, wore a cute blue taffeta, very ruffly, offset by dainty neck and cuff adornments. Margaret Ettinger

THE DENOUEMENT

By FRA GUIDO

When the noonday of our life, dear, finds fulfillment in our toil,
And the evening sun is setting in the west,
When our path starts winding downward, thru the autumn drowsy woods,
To the Valley where abides the Final Rest,
Then we'll stop in at the playhouse where they weave young lovers' tales—
Sure there'll be some little housing for an old-time guest—
And we'll see the old story that was ours in youthful glory,
The eternal, sweet old story of love's everlasting quest.

There we'll sit in our old places, missing many friends, departed,
Watch the lovers, voicing fervent vow,
We'll re-live our sacred moments, when in June-warm scented by-ways,
There was something, in my ear, you whispered low;
They will play a new love story, but they'll mirror our own glory,
When you kist me, strolling where the willows blow,
We'll re-live our own life-story, mellowed now by age's glory,
Our sweet story, ever cherished, since the tender, long ago.

Greatest of Popularity Contests

The new popularity contest of SHAD-OWLAND, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC is going merrily on. Hundreds of votes are arriving daily. They come from the East and West, from New Zealand, Australia, from almost every country in the world. Many letters accompany the votes and all concede this contest to be the best, the most impartial, the most rousing contest that has ever been conducted in the interest of the players.

The contest is a joy to all participants because, not only are they boosting their favorites and adding to the popularity of the players, but they also have a chance to win one of the splendid prizes depicted on another page of this issue.

The contest is running another six weeks, or until June 1st. You still have a chance of casting three votes in each class for your choice of the most popular player. We know that our readers are intelligent and discerning critics and that their opinion as to the player who combines the greatest number of characteristics that go to make popularity is of supreme importance in the field of motion pictures. Therefore we are counting on you. A special staff of workers are kept busy counting and sorting the classes of votes that are coming in by thousands. Here are the results to the time of going to press:

Among the women stars, Mary Pickford leads with 9,487 votes, Norma Talmadge with 6,434 and Pearl White with 1,243.

Among the male stars, Richard Barthelmess is first with 2,210 votes, Wallace Reid with 2,892 and William S. Hart with 1,453.

Two Cinema Players from Foreign Shores, striking beauty attracted the attention of a well-known artist. She consented to pose for him and later this poster, "Beauty and the Beast," won an international prize.

It was in London, also, that the Danish beauty made her film debut, appearing in "The Seventh Commandment" with Gladys Cooper and the late James Welsh. She had many flattering film offers, but by this time she had become so homesick that she returned to her home in Copenhagen.

From the music-halls to Ibsen plays seems like an impossible accomplishment, but that's exactly what this versatile young artist did, proving, also, that sometimes a prophet (or artist) has honor in his own country, for in her native city she scored a big success in these famous plays. Following this, she further demonstrated her versatility by achieving a brilliant record as a vaudeville artist, especially in Stockholm and Gottenborg.

Back in Copenhagen again, she was offered splendid opportunities with the Nordisk Film Company. She played ingénue rôles, then boy impersonations, which she liked very much. Then, the managers decided that she was to continue her career as a screen vampire and outlined a particularly sensational program for her.

"I simply couldn't do it," she said; "I decided to come to America, where they have plenty of vampires and are not looking for more. I don't want to be a woman with a past, a raging, hissing, impossible vampire creature condemned to eternal sinning. I want to play straight, dramatic parts—something requiring brains, intelligence, a chance to grow—rôles that will make people love, not hate, me—so I packed my grip—and here I am.

"And—if I can't get what I want, I'll go back to Copenhagen—to the stage—but not to vamping!"

SONG AFTER GRIEF

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Give me the summer days again,
When hope was warm and love was true,
When little griefs were all we knew
And sorrow sang no long refrain.

Give me the summer dreams again,
When all the lands spread broad and fair
With promises of joys to share,
And hawthorn bloomed in every lane.

Give me the summer songs again,
Their words of dewy-hearted flowers,
Their music of light-falling showers,
And low winds rustling thru the grain.

Give me the summer joys again,
Ah, Life, just once, and let me go
The old way that I used to know
And lost—so dense the mist of pain.

I saw those summer days again!
I knew your lips, denied so long,
I knew the dreams, the joy, the song;
Saw Time with his own hours enchain
Upon the screen, those days again!

“The Proudest Moment of Our Lives Had Come!”

“We sat before the fire place, Mary and I, with Betty perched on the arm of the big chair. It was our first evening in our own home! There were two glistening tears in Mary’s eyes, yet a smile was on her lips. I knew what she was thinking.

“Five years before we had started bravely out together! The first month had taught us the old, old lesson that two cannot live as cheaply as one. I had left school in the grades to go to work and my all too thin pay envelope was a weekly reminder of my lack of training. In a year Betty came—three mouths to feed now. Meanwhile living costs were soaring. Only my salary and I were standing still.

“Then one night Mary came to me. ‘Jim’, she said, ‘why don’t you go to school again—right here at home? You can put in an hour or two after supper each night while I sew. Learn to do some one thing. You’ll make good—I know you will.’

“Well, we talked it over and that very night I wrote to Scranton. A few days later I had taken up a course in the work I was in. It was surprising how rapidly the mysteries of our business became clear to me—took on a new fascination. In a little while an opening came. I was ready for it and was promoted—with an increase. Then I was advanced again. There was money enough to even lay a little aside. So it went.

“And now the fondest dream of all has come true. We have a real home of our own with the little comforts and luxuries Mary had always longed for, a little place, as she says, that ‘Betty can be proud to grow up in.’

“I look back now in pity at those first blind stumbling years. Each evening after supper the doors of opportunity had swung wide and I had passed them by. How grateful I am that Mary helped me to see that night the golden hours that lay within.”

In city, town and country all over America there are men with happy families and prosperous homes because they let the International Correspondence Schools come to them in the hours after supper and prepare them for bigger work at better pay. More than two million men and women in the last 28 years have advanced themselves through spare time study with the I. C. S. Over one hundred thousand right now are turning their evenings to profit. Hundreds are starting every day.

You, too, can have the position you want in the work you like best. You can have a salary that will give your family the kind of a home, the comforts, the little luxuries that you would like them to have. Yes, you can! No matter what your age, your occupation, or your means—you can do it!

All we ask is the chance to prove it. That’s fair, isn’t it? Then mark and mail this coupon. There’s no obligation and not a penny of cost. But it may be the most important step you ever took in your life. Cut out and mail the coupon now.

When "Micky" Walked

"I always said," he remarked, "that one reason I wanted my own company was so that I could hire an efficiency man and then can him. Now I think that I'll hire one and let him stick around for a while. It would keep me amused."

"A sort of court jester?"

"Yes."

"We had some fun on that trip, tho," he went on, characteristically.

It seems that when the company reached Oakland he found that his grip had been left in San Francisco and sent his secretary back for it. By the time the secretary discovered the grip, the company had left Oakland. He took the next train. They would have connected all right except that Neilan decided to stop at a little way-station for Thanksgiving dinner. Then instead of remaining in Portland, the company came back immediately, with the result that, tho "Micky" took both his secretary and his grip along, he didn't see either of them until he got back home again.

This wasn't all. A friend of Neilan's who had gone along just for fun, came down with a bad cold. This gave "Micky" an idea for livening up a dull moment of the trip. He decided to invent an epidemic of the "flu." He made a number of "flu" masks and ordered every one to wear them, but there were (intentionally) not enough to go around. Those who didn't get masks were thoro'ly scared, while the others, onto the joke, had a good laugh.

"Gracious!" you exclaim, "doesn't he ever take anything seriously?"

Of course, no one ever asked him this question, but if they did, his answer would probably be, "Yes, I'm always very serious when I am directing ants or goldfish."

Why should he be serious? Successful, twenty-eight years old and handsome—what more could any one want?

Marshall Neilan was born in Los Angeles, California, in 1891. He was about twenty years old when he joined a stock company in San Francisco, helping to form the mob in mob scenes. Within a few months, however, he was made the juvenile lead.

"All of that has been said so often," he remarked, plaintively.

Yes, he was with Griffith; a leading man with the "old" Biograph. He was also with Kalem, Universal, Selig, American and Famous Players. He has been leading man for Mary Pickford, Marguerite Clark and Blanche Sweet.

As a director, he has tried his hand at everything from the W. K. Ham and Bud comedies to the somber feature, "The Unpardonable Sin."

And now, as producer and director at the head of his own company, he is one of the "Big Six" association of directors just formed, which includes, besides Marshall Neilan, George Loane Tucker, producer of "The Miracle Man," Maurice Tourneur, Mack Sennett, Thomas H. Ince and Alan Dwan, a formidable combination which, it is rumored, will later become affiliated with the "Big Four," Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, Charles Chaplin and D. W. Griffith, tho in regard to this Marshall Neilan would say nothing.

All during our conversation there were innumerable things to be done . . . he was casting for his next picture . . . this association was just being formed . . . he had about fifty appointments . . . With all of his "kidding" and his innate love of fun, you would never forget that he is doing big things and has heavy responsibilities. He isn't always laughing. Sometimes he looks quite serious. His brown eyes are large and his long, thick lashes, that turn up just a little at the ends, would be the envy of almost any young girl in the world. So, too, his thick, wavy brown hair.

I mentioned the "dog stuff" in "Stella Maris." If you saw the picture, you cannot fail to remember how, after the big dog had driven the little dog away, he was shown haunted by his conscience, having a little vision of his own.

"I've always liked to believe that animals, and especially dogs, think, and that one might be troubled by his conscience in quite the same way as a human being," said Neilan. "You know the expression of the cat that has eaten the canary, and examples of the thoughtfulness of horses are unending. I hold that that stuff was quite possible. Why, even goldfish . . ."

This brought to mind a story about him which has been going the rounds in Hollywood for some time. It seems that there was a big goldfish in a bowl at Lasky's that would "go crazy" every time he heard "Micky's" voice. Whether this was caused by fondness for "Micky" or sensitiveness to sound vibration, no one seems to know. But anyhow, the fact remains, and it has caused him to be very generally referred to as the greatest director of fish in the world.

Seriously, his fondness for animals, like his fondness for children, is one of his outstanding characteristics.

"I've thought," he said, in conclusion, "of a good stunt for Wes' next picture." He was referring to little Wesley Barry, the twelve-year-old boy who is his protégé and who "Micky" thinks has unbounded promise. "Wes' father sends him to 'rush the growler' with a pitcher, and every time he goes, Wes breaks the pitcher. Finally the old man, who isn't particularly squeamish, tells him that from then on he can get the beer in a hot-water bag."

So you see Marshall Neilan has what the novelists call a "usable past."

Ten years without a corn

Countless people boast that record now. Years ago they started using Blue-jay. Never since has a corn pained twice. And never has a corn stayed a week.

You can quickly prove that corns are needless. Millions have already done it. Think what it means.

No more paring, no more pain, no more unsightly pads. Dainty shoes without unhappy hours.

Apply a touch of liquid Blue-jay or a Blue-jay plaster. The corn pain will end. And soon the whole corn will loosen and come out.

The action is gentle but sure. Blue-jay is the scientific method, created by this world-famed laboratory. It is not like the methods which are harsh and crude. Try Blue-jay on one corn. Buy it tonight from your druggist. Live the rest of your life without corns.

Several pictures were made under this banner and then Miss Joy journeyed up to New York where she made one picture under Maurice Tourneur, later going to Jacksonville to appear in the Paramount one-reel comedies.

Comedies were all right for a time, but she longed for dramatic work, so persuading her mother to accompany her, she came to Los Angeles where there were more opportunities.

"Oh, I was lucky," declared Leatrice, with her joyful enthusiasm, "for at once I was given the part of Toby, the Southern girl in 'The Dollar Bid,' with Jack Kerrigan; then I played the ingénue in William Farnum's 'The Man Hunter.'"

"I guess each experience mellows and prepares us for the next. My father passed away while I was making 'The Right of Way,' and it was terribly hard to go thru those death scenes."

Since coming to pictures, Leatrice has been cast in a series of Southern girl rôles in which she could portray her own sweet, girlish self, and it was not until she played the lead in George Loane Tucker's new picture, 'Ladies Must Live,' that she had the chance to play a truly dramatic rôle. Mr. Tucker predicts that this young girl will win her laurels as a dramatic actress and suggested that she change her name, declaring that Joy was not suitable for a future Fanny Davenport. After much consideration, Leatrice decided she couldn't sacrifice Joy, even for art, and will take the name with her even to the very heights of a dramatic and emotional success.

In her dressing-room there is a much-used copy of Emerson's essays which this little Southern girl reads daily, gaining help from its high philosophy. Turning the leaves of this book I found a little poem dedicated to her mother and then I discovered that it was as a poetess that she first dreamed of finding her place in the artist world.

Thru the sweet thought expressed in rhyme, I glimpsed a depth, tenderness and power, which promises great moments in Leatrice Joy's screen portrayals.

HEREAFTER By BARBARA HOLLIS

When finally I in death shall lie,
My hope will be to dream of thee—
To find in deep untroubled sleep
Fond memories awaiting me.

For naught I crave beyond the grave—
Nor greater bliss in Heaven than this:
To dream of thee—thy smile to see—
To keep the memory of thy kiss.

SCREEN RIMES By VARA MACBETH JONES

There was a little girl,
And she had a little curl
Right in the middle of her forehead;
And it must have been the curl
That helped to star the girl—
For really her acting was horrid!

There was a movie star
Who lived in a shoe;
Her press agent told me—
So it must be true.

Miss Mason Manages

it stands for. I always forget that, because I don't like the name Joseph, do you?"

And when I mentioned the fact to her, Shirley remarked that she had completely forgotten that Joseph is a perfectly revered saint, whom all adorers must respect. The name has a sort of history, don't you know.

"Yes, and so has Luke," she countered. "That's no sign that we must retain a name we don't like, is it?"

And speaking of names reminds me. Shirley's real name is Leonie Flugrath, and, altho she'd like very much to have, kept the Leonie, she frankly says that the letters comprising Flugrath would never look well in electrics!

She's one of three sisters, one of whom is Viola Dana, the Metro star, and the other, Edna, at present a quite popular English comedienne in London. Everybody in Hollywood fully believes that Viola sets the style for sister Shirley. She does, in some respects, because, as Miss Mason remarks, "she knows so much more about things than I do."

But there's a particular advantage about being young. One can sit on the lawn and play with one's cat or one's dog without setting the town tongues to wagging. And one can dress in pinafores and Peter Pans without creating the impression that she's a female nut. And one can sing if she wants to sing. In fact, one doesn't have to be taken seriously at all times.

"When I was young," Shirley goes on to say, "I used to buy the oldest-looking hats and gowns, and wear all of Viola's clothes, because I wanted to look more grown up. Now I'm all over that. Every girl passes thru that stage when she wants to look more sophisticated than her mother."

She and Viola look so much alike that it's difficult to tell them apart. The fatal beauty was nearly disastrous two years ago, when she was married to Berney, because, at the crucial moment, the minister nearly wed Viola to Shirley's husband-to-be.

"And when I first came to Hollywood, it was just after Viola's husband, John Collins, had died of influenza. Viola wasn't seen in public much, and when I ventured out I got all the sympathy, because people mistook me for my sister.

"But I've always been a tomboy, while Viola hasn't. When I was young I always played with the boys. Girls were so catty. And I had an idea that I must always wear kid gloves, altho it didn't matter whether or not they had fingers, just so they were gloves. Oh, when I was young, we had the best time! Steal strawberries! Once I nearly got arrested."

This when-I-was-young talk amused me greatly. Shirley, sitting opposite me in her little black velvet dress, with lace collar and elbow-length sleeves, portrayed the quintessence of youth. Impunitously I inquired her age. Nineteen.

Not old enough to vote! She doesn't care particularly, because, she says, when she is twenty-one and over it'll be just her luck to be very busy at the studio when election time comes around.

"Can't I let Berney mark my ballot for me?" she asked.

I informed her it isn't being done.

"Well, then, I suppose I must find some way to do it myself. I shall be very happy when I'm twenty-one. Then I shall be considered discreet. One nowadays can't be considered discreet until one has reached one's majority, as they say politically, can one?"

In the year 1900, among other important events, occurred the birth of the youngest Flugrath, now Mrs. Berney Durning. Brooklyn, N. Y., is the lucky city, and today Shirley Mason and Gladys Brockwell are about the only Californians I've met who condescend to "put in a good word" for the settlement across the river from Manhattan.

Little Leonie made her debut on the stage when she was two and a half in a play with Peter B. Daley, in which she rushed onto the boards, crying dramatically, "Daddy!" A few months later she created the part of Little Hal in William Faversham's production of "The Squaw Man." Other child parts, her specialties, were Meenie in "Rip Van Winkle" and Jan in "The Piper."

She was never bothered much by the "gerrymen," as the members of the theatrical profession term those gentlemen whose duty it is to make a mental inspection of stage children under sixteen in order to note that their education has not been neglected, because both she and Viola got their schooling in the summer when the company was vacationing.

Once, when she was eleven, a "gerryman" called her into the office of the manager and asked her such foolish questions as "What letter comes after W?" and, at length, what procedure she would pursue were she to lay a carpet in the room.

"I was up a stump," she confided to me, "but I thought that I'd better say something. At length I got very haughty and looked at the 'gerryman' with my best 'heavy' stare.

"Sir," I said, "I don't think that I shall ever be required to lay a carpet. Therefore I have never given the matter consideration." The 'gerryman' was very obliging and did not further trouble me."

Shirley's start in pictures was a case of hard work and long waiting until she should get a "call" from the Edison studio, which was near the Flugrath home in the Bronx, New York. She was understudying sister Viola in "The Poor Little Rich Girl" and had a great deal of time to herself. Her mother thought of the flickers and registered her at the studio, where Harry Beaumont and Mary Fuller and Marc MacDermott were starring. Finally, both she and Viola were given "kid" parts, meanwhile continuing their legitimate work, when Shir-

Judy of Rogue's Harbor

after you had gone. It is all true." There was a pause during which the silence throbbed among them like a quivering heart. The Governor fainted and no one knew the difference. The thing that mattered was between Judy and the Lady of the Roses. The lovely bond that had been between them was being explained to them. An awareness that had existed, almost miraculously, from the first, came to fruition between them. The Lady of the Roses had Judy against her heart. The tears distilled thru empty hours, how empty her lips would never formulate, threaded Judy's hair like priceless pearls. "I know now," the woman murmured, with an immeasurable tenderness, "why I sewed the little frocks for you, why I wanted to curl your hair, my darling, why I wanted to make you cookies and other goodies. It was all the little loving demands of the separated years, crying out to me . . . oh, baby . . . oh, baby . . ."

Of course, I didn't hear it all in detail. There are some things one does not feel one wants to hear about. Sacred things. Bared hearts. An hour like that after years of barren hours. There are no words for them.

I do know, tho, because Judy told me so, that the Lady of the Roses forgave Governor Kingsland for the terrible wrong he had done her. The philosophy of years had taught her, too, the mellowing of that philosophy which knows all, and knowing, forgives . . .

I know that she went to Rogue's Harbor and identified the old man there as her father, brought back to him, permanently, the evanescent kindness he had had, of late, only in dreams.

I know that Jim Shuckles and his gang were apprehended, and that Teddy and Judy gave him an alternative—Ollie or jail—and that, completely terrorized for the first time in his cowardly life, he married Ollie and was even, it turned out, moderately human toward her.

And I know that Teddy and Judy walked in the garden of roses just as they came to their most perfect bloom, and whispered, one to the other, the old-as-the-world vows, and billed and cooed, and made promises more fragrant than the drifting petals, more mysterious than the salt breaths of the sea; more set and eternal, more unalterable, than the stars, in their fixed, immemorial courses.

And, because no one ever quite "lives happily ever after," as the beloved lore of the fairies would have us believe, I will not say that they did, but they have lived as happily as ever two young things could, together, and, because they are so young and have so much love between them, both for their neighbors and themselves, the unhappiness that comes to them is taken, heads high, transmuted into philosophy, and so given back again. And over it all, with shining needle poised and serene eyes smiling, presides the Lady of the Roses waiting for the baby she knows will come to her now.

Writers Are Needed Jack London Said:

There are 24,868 publications, the majority of which buy short stories and feature articles. The demand for short stories and photoplays is tremendous. Over $10,000,000 will be paid for short stories and photoplays this year. Competition is keen, assuring the highest prices for good stories. And the Hoosier Institute paves the way for you to earn this money and make a name for yourself.

"I like your simple, direct, straight-from-the-shoulder method of presenting the matter. As somewhat of a veteran in the short story game, I feel justified in giving my judgment that your course in short story writing is excellently comprehensive and practical." ley played Peter in the Frohman production of "Passersby."

At length she went with the Kleine-Selig-Edison-Essanay combination as a star in "The Telltale Step," "Lady of the Photograph," "The Apple-tree Girl," etc., and finally with McClure's serial, "The Seven Deadly Sins," where she starred in the "Passion" episode. She was next won to the Famous Players fold, as their youngest ingénue. Under that contract she made perhaps six plays, among them "The Winning Girl" and "The Final Close-up." On the expiration of the contract, Miss Mason rested in Hollywood for several months and at length signed with Maurice Tournour for the ingénue part in "Treasure Island."

Now, however, she has the distinction of being William Fox's newest star, who is to gleam in a series of stories that deal with the innermost life, thoughts and actions of a sub-débutante.

"What is your philosophy?" I asked, concluding.

"Simply to be happy," she rejoined. "Be happy, make everybody else happy and stay young. One is dead an awfully long time, isn't he, and I believe in getting the fullest enjoyment out of life, which, for me, is bounded on the north by mother, on the south by Viola, on the east by Berney and on the west by my cat and dog. And since both of the latter are languishing in boarding-school, it looks as if I'm minus a place for the setting sun of my hopes, which I'm cut out to entertain till I'm 82 years old and 'cant eat nothin' but bananas!"

And Shirley, who isn't old enough to vote, mimicked an old lady of the toothless stage and told me she wasn't going to live long—only eighty-two!

SHE WASN'T FRIVOLOUS

"What did she do then? Go to work?"
"Yes, she went to work and dismissed him."

HER EASTER SIN

By WALTER PULITZER

The wife before her husband stood,

As if for his inspection,

All newly gowned, and on her head

An Easterish confection.

She cried, "'Twas such a bargain, dear—

The price you'd never guess;

It cost but eighty dollars, and

It cant be bought for less."

"What, eighty for that thing," he cried,

And simply boiled within;

"Extravagance like that is—well—

It's shameful—it's a sin!"

The lady, ready with retort

And nothing daunted, said,

"Oh, well, at least the sin will be Upon my own fair head!"

A new era in teeth protection

These new discoveries mark a new era in teeth cleaning. Tooth beauty comes through removing the cloudy film coat. But that also means vastly more. It means safer, cleaner teeth. And it doubtless will mean, in the years to come, a vast reduction in tooth troubles.

Dentists everywhere are urging people to adopt this new protection.

Why Teeth Glisten

Millions of Them Now

All Statements Approved by High Dental Authorities

You see glistening teeth in every circle now. For millions of teeth are being cleaned in a new way. They are not only whiter, but cleaner and safer. And leading dentists everywhere are urging this method's adoption.

A ten-day test, which costs you nothing, will show what it means to you.

To end the film

The purpose is to end the film—the cause of most tooth troubles.

Film is that viscous coat which you feel with your tongue. It is ever-present, ever-forming. It clings to teeth, enters crevices and stays.

It is that film-coat which discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

The ordinary tooth paste does not dissolve film. So brushing has left much of it intact. Millions of well-brushed teeth, on this account, discolor and decay. Few people escape tooth troubles, and it is largely because of that film.

Now a combatant

Dental science, knowing these facts, has long sought a film combatant. It has now been found. Convincing clinical and laboratory tests have proved it beyond question.

The method is embodied in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And this tooth paste in all ways meets modern requirements. Millions of people have already tried it, and the results you see on every hand show what it means to teeth.

The vital facts

Pepsodent is based on pepsin, the digestant of albumin. The film is albuminous matter. The object of Pepsodent is to dissolve it, then to day by day combat it.

But pepsin must be activated, and the usual agent is an acid harmful to the teeth. So this method long seemed barred. Now science has found a harmless activating method, so active pepsin can be every day applied.

Pepsodent accomplishes two other great results. But its all-important quality is this action on the film.

Mark the results in ten days

One cannot question the Pepsodent effects. They are too conspicuous.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how the teeth whiten as the film-coat disappears.

Compare the results with results you get now. Then read the reasons for them. After such a test, neither you nor yours will be content with old methods of teeth cleaning. Cut out the coupon now.

posters and cleverly carved toys—all from far-off Japan.

"Isn't it sweet of them to like me so well?" Francelia said, gratefully. "But the way they express their admiration—you must read some of their letters!"

One Oriental epistle was on a long strip of thin rice paper, in verse form, and with delicately painted flowers outlining the edge. Another was inscribed on silk, and commenced, "Miss Billington, dear sir—" Japanese fans, it seems, do not believe in expressing their admiration merely in words. Almost all of them sent material tokens of their esteem, ranging from expensive kimonos to postal coupons which could be exchanged for stamps. Many of them sent their pictures, and two girl admirers of flapper age sent photographs in their "swimming suits," tho how they would be able to navigate in the water was a problem which Francelia and I gave up. We recommend it to the attention of the Sennett bathing beauties.

It must not be supposed that Miss Billington's popularity is limited to Japan. Her work with Kalem, American and Universal is widely and favorably known, and her emotional rôle in "Blind Husbands" gave her even greater opportunities to display her talents. This rôle, indeed, again brought her strongly into the screen limelight and attracted unusual interest.

"Oh, just one more letter before you go!" Francelia urged, with the unexpected little quirk of the mouth that comes when she smiles. "It's the prize of my 'fan' collection, and if you can tell me what it's about, I'll give you one of these posters."

I got the poster, but I didn't win it. Francelia was generous enough to let me have it anyway. Do you think you could have won it? This is what the letter said:

"Dear, F. Billington—I double to say that I cant well versed in composing an English. But these sort letter is taken your interesting, I think so. I am writing for you that I am very glad. Then I have taken your beautiful photograph by your kindness. I am very found the autograph of the famous actress. But, generally person are giving me by print. You are very kindness man.

"I am thankful your truth heart; and I am longing to preserves your envelope with the photo.

"Now Miss. Much to my regret then your photo was not so clear. I am very regret what a beautiful itself.

"If you have a good kind. Please heard me to my request and send me another delightful one. I think you shall be to send it for me. Excuse me Miss. I am so unreasonable to propose. But I am fond your truth. Then I have to make application to you.

"Now I am out for you some of the nishikje (picture print). These picture is famous in our country. And my writing picture with it.

"And some of the bamboo's pen for you. And a little lovely doll with it. Use to play.

"Dont wait to write me of your health and present condition. Good grant that every succeeding year may bring you continued prosperity."

"Believe me,
"HIROSHI SHIOGAWA."

Like Nut Bubbles

Yet It's Whole Wheat Puffed

There lies the fascination of Puffed Wheat.

The grains are light and airy—puffed to eight times normal size. They almost melt away.

An hour of fearful heat has given them a taste like toasted nuts.

Yet they are whole wheat. Every food cell is exploded so digestion is easy and complete.

They supply whole-wheat nutrition as no other food can do. In lesser ways of cooking, the outer wheat coats pass largely undigested.

Dozens of Delights

The three Puffed Grains with their different flavors offer dozens of delights.

They are not for breakfast only. Every home finds countless uses for these nut-like, flimsy grains.

Remember These Three

Puffed Wheat in milk is the utmost in a food. With every food cell broken it is easy to digest.

For luncheons, suppers and at bedtime there is nothing to compare with this dish.

Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs mixed with fruit adds a delicious blend. It adds what a light and dainty crust adds to shortcake or to pie.

Puffed Rice or Corn Puffs, crisped and lightly buttered, become a food confection.

Have a dish ready when the children come from school. They will eat them like peanuts or popcorn. And they take the place of foods less healthful, less easy to digest.

Millions of children are now enjoying Puffed Grains, but not half of them get enough.

Every home should keep all three Puffed Grains on hand.

and sister, and Uncle Enoch Jones, contemptuous of what had gone before, vociferously disgusted at that "dancin' fool," as he anathematized his nephew.

Harkins did not gainsay the anathema. He had been trying, while 'Ves was on the road, to beguile Enoch Jones into selling the business. Enoch had not been wholly unwilling. He had felt, since the innovation of his nephew and his methods, like an atom taken in hand by a cyclone, and he wasn't at all certain as to where he might be cyclonically deposited. The thing was going down-hill, he had to admit that, and Sylvester, blame him! was running up expenses something fearful, and, so far, he hadn't seen any of the efficient results so glibly predicted. All he had seen were a lot of new-fangled contraptions and their bills to do work heretofore done by honest and understanding hands, and a "dancin' fool" smirkin' and grinnin' down at a bunch of fool people with some slip of a thing hangin' to his arm . . . efficiency . . . bah! . . . He didn't very much care for the talkative Harkinses, but they offered him a fair price for the business he had built up, painfully, by hand, only to have it ridiculed, bandied about, jostled and torn asunder by the "dancin' fool" his sister (Elmira had always been a fool herself) had given birth to . . . and he was tired . . . his head hummed with the worry and the change . . . he was old and these other people . . . other methods were new . . . cruelly new . . . Better to take the price they were kind enough to give him and go back to where this young upstart had but recently come from. Then, drat him, if he wanted to make jugs, let him make them . . . for the enterprising Harkins.

He was thinking these things when 'Ves came up to him, grinning, and begged him to go back to the office; he wanted to have a talk with him. He told him to take the Harkinses along, too, if he cared to. He would get Junie and follow up. Uncle Enoch said, with intent, that he did care to take the Harkinses along, and, when 'Ves arrived, half an hour after the others, he found Uncle Enoch almost in the act of transferring the Jones Jug Factory to the Harkins interests.

He called Uncle Enoch Jones a few hard but understandable names and produced from every pocket his wearing apparel boasted contracts secured by him on his trip big enough and solid enough and soaring enough to make the Jones Jugs famous. The dust of antiquity was not too thick in the eyes of Enoch Jones to miss figures. He considered them, while back of the enigmatic specs a glint and a glimmer began to grow. Finally, "Facts," he said, "is facts, and figgers is figgers." Mr. Harkins, I have reconsidered."

After the all but unmarked retreat of the Harkinses and the reluctantly, the

The Best Thing in Life

By ELIZABETH PELTRET

IT was just before luncheon, when we were sitting in the garden, that Kipling's "Jungle Book" got mixed up with Jack Gilbert's first interview.

This was strange, because we hadn't been talking about books at all.

On the contrary, we had been talking about moving pictures and Maurice Tourneur and ham sandwiches and milk and Maurice Tourneur. With Jack Gilbert, just at present, all conversational roads lead to Maurice Tourneur. He may begin by mentioning his own efforts towards putting on flesh, but he will invariably end by telling you that Maurice Tourneur is a god.

We tried to get into the studio cafeteria, but it was crowded to the doors.

"Let's walk around for a while," suggested Gilbert.

The sun had broken thru the fog only about an hour before and the Goldwyn studio garden was at its best. Shrubs and ferns and, further away, eucalyptus trees, made spots of comparative darkness to relieve the glare on the white buildings and the glass-encased stages.

"Pretty," remarked my companion, appreciatively. We seated ourselves where the sun was warmest.

"You write stories, dont you?" I asked.

"Yes; I was in the scenario department of the Gibraltar Company, but it blew up just about the time I got well started. Then I made a resolution to write a story a day for the purpose of improving my mind. After about five days, I decided to quit that and take up foreign languages."

"What foreign languages did you learn?"

He laughed and traced a circle in the garden path with his cane.

"Actors," he said, "are like monkeys. Did you ever read Kipling's 'Jungle Book'? Yes? Then you know how monkeys are. They play with one thing for a while until they get tired of it, then they let it go and jump to something else. And imitative; the only way an actor can improve his work is by watching some other actor. When a John Barrymore picture comes to town, I go to see it five or six times. But just as a monkey, no matter what he may pick up and drop, sticks to his trees, so an actor sticks to his work. He cant help it; it's second Pallor places almost any woman at a disadvantage. To appear at her very best, she needs a finishing touch of color; a soft, natural, girlish tint, such as Ingram's Rouge imparts.

Ingram's Rouge is excellent in every way, and unusual in some ways. It will not run; it will not streak; it is not affected by perspiration; nor will it harm the skin, for its color is not absorbed. Prepared in daintily scented cakes, which are less wasteful than loose powder, it is sold in three perfect shades, Light, Medium and Dark. Price 50 cents.

Gossip of the Pacific Coast represented the Studio Girls' Club and drove over in her little brown Scripps-Booth.

They are keeping Helen Eddy, of the Club, very busy at the Hollywood Community Theater, besides her work with Mr. Beban. Helen is so versatile and has such a fine voice that delivery of her lines is always listened to with great pleasure.

The Southern Pacific station was crowded one afternoon as I dropped in to bid farewell to a friend departing on the Owl. The Christy company producing "Bringing Up Father" was occupying a hollow square at two of the exit gates and an audience five deep stood about the outer edges of the square. Funny Johnny Ray was togged out in a top-hat garnished with a bright-blue ribbon and three ditto buttons, and as the echoes are very noticeable at the terminal station, everything he said was carried for hundreds of feet. A train dispatcher had nothing on Mr. Ray! The tourists are entranced whenever they happen to witness a free show like this. It's funny to hear their comments.

Donald Crisp is directing "Held by the Enemy," and there are more people in Northern and Southern uniforms and crêpe hair mustaches ambling up and down Vine Street at luncheon time than you could imagine. It reminds me of that old panorama of Gettysburg. It is droll to see the "dead" men arise when the noon whistle blows. They've an attendant out there who smears thick mud over the countenances, hands and clothing of the hundreds of extras employed at five dollars per diem. 'Tis very realistic. The women in hoop-skirts have a difficult time getting luncheon at the small nearby café, but the leading players manage to stuff themselves into cars and drive over to the Boulevard, where there are some good light lunch places and French cafés.

Gloria Swanson always drives over, because she's particularly fond of toasted bread with chicken en mayonnaise as a filling, and the waiter knows to the fraction of an inch how she likes the bread cut. Ethel Clayton has a lot of extras, too, and the Lasky lot is a busy place this spring, every company working overtime.

I noticed Wally Reid in a gorgeous blue silk lounging robe sunning himself at noon in front of the enclosed stage and enjoying the society of fat Walter Hiers, who is called "The Soft-Drink Kid." Mr. Hiers is always telling jokes, singing, or otherwise amusing not only stars but extras. He was wearing gaiters with inset rubber, and is playing in "Held by the Enemy." He's under a five-year Lasky contract now, and looks as if he were quite lot-broken and at home on Vine Street. There's one thing about genial Walter, he is big enough to be found easily, and his merry chirps give away his whereabouts, anyway.

Monte Blue is wearing tortoise-shell goggles offstage. That pair of spectacles gives Monte a sort of sentimental, poetic air. One expects to hear him burst forth into limericks—he's quite a hand at jingles, be it known. Raymond Hatton, beloved on the Lasky lot, has become a Goldwyn feature player. Nobody begrudges Ray his good fortune, for he's worked steadily for advancement, even playing untitled parts in some of the larger productions for Mr. de Mille, just to give proper characterization to what would have been a minor part in less capable hands.

Herbert Heyes has taken this town by storm in "Civilian Clothes," which has run steadily for nine months at the Morosco Theater, Los Angeles. Not long ago, Clyde Fillmore told me, when stepping out of the aforesaid clothes into a Lasky contract, that he thought Heyes would be the best Sam McGinnis of them all. The local papers are raving over Mr. Heyes' conception of the part, altho they fairly admit that both Thurston Hall and Clyde Fillmore seemed incapable of improvement, so well did they play their parts.

Priscilla Dean has really wed Wheeler Oakman, a former stock company man here. They were married in February, at a "wedding within a wedding" on the Universal lot. She's as saucy a bride as you'd wish to see—always up to pranks.

Lincoln's Birthday was famous for the Wally Reid ball at the Hotel Alexandria, heralded in advance by sky-bombs dropped by Lieut. Shirley J. Short. Viola Dana was patroness, escorted by Lieut. Locklear, whose plane was donated for the cloud-massaging acts. I asked Vi if she were engaged to the lieutenant, and she answered, most emphatically, "If you value your life, repeat not that question!" They do say on the lot that Viola sees red when quizzed on that subject.

Wherever one goes, Edith Roberts is talked about. The movie colony predicts wonderful things for Miss Roberts. They say she's as clever as she is beautiful. She has had a fine cast for "The Daring Duchess," including Henry Woodward, Leota Lorraine, Stanhope Wheatcroft, formerly of the Morosco Theater, Harold Miller, Kathleen Kirkham and Ogden Crane. The next picture for Miss Roberts will be a revival of Clara Louise Burnham's famous novel, "Jewel," for nowadays stories dealing with metaphysical healing are very good money-makers. Tommy Meighan told me that you cant buy a ouija board in New York on short notice, that the wave of psychic phenomena has struck not only that skeptical money-making burg, but every little hamlet thruout the country. Nearly everybody at the studios is interested in mediums, and lots of the girls have crystals, ideographs, Jula boards—or something like that.

"SHOOT TODAY!"

By WALTER E. MAIR

Peep o' day in January;
Winds that were so long contrary
Drift to sleep, and all their fretting
Hardly seems worth while forgetting.
(Some one breathes into my ear
That a picture-day is here.)

Drowsy dawn in January,
And the tender stars unwary
Taunt their rising lord and master,
While he threatens their disaster.
(Ah, what is it seems so good?
Nature's in a melting mood!)

Wondrous morn in January!
'Twas but yesterday that Mary
Wept of mother, courts and lawing;
But . . . today, the ice is thawing.
(Is it Mary turns to say, "Shooting-light is great today?")
Happy morn in January!

NOT A GENUINE HERO

She saw him coming; the welcoming light in her eyes and the tender smile on her lips made her more beautiful than the roses, pansies and morning-glories that grew all around her. He saw her watching for him, and waved as he hastened thru the pasture.

Then—then it happened. The bright glow died out of her azure orbs; she gave a quick little gasp and keeled over into a convenient bed of skunk cabbages.

Instead of lightly vaulting over the fence, he had opened the gate and walked in, just as you or I would do.

nature to him or he wouldn't be an actor."

All of this was said lightly, and then he added, with boyish seriousness, that his work is his life; that he'd rather die than do anything else; that he would a thousand times rather die than not succeed in it!

He is very serious, is Jack Gilbert, and very young, in some ways younger even than his twenty-three years. He played you will remember, the part of a fourteen-year-old boy in Mary Pickford's "Heart of the Hills." But since then he has added five pounds of breadth to his five eleven of height, with the promise of more from the physical instructor of the Los Angeles Athletic Club, where he lives. Also, he played a "heavy," (his first rôle of that sort), in "Should a Woman Tell?" with Alice Lake, and the strongly sympathetic part of the puritanical garden boy in the George Loane Tucker picture, "Ladies Must Live."

On the day I saw him—he had just signed a two-year contract with Tourneur and he was, he said, in the seventh heaven, happier than he had ever been in his life before. A director can make or break his people . . . it meant everything, he said, absolutely everything, to be with the right one, and Tourneur could bring out the best there was in you! He would praise you to the sky when you did anything well and perhaps break a chair over your head when you did anything badly . . . Gilbert laughed.

"He won't let his people overact, tho," he went on, "and he doesn't kill your enthusiasm. He makes you want to do your best every minute, because you know that the work you are doing with him will live, that it means something. Did you see 'Victory'? Didn't he just take you to the South Sea Islands?"

Gilbert's eyes are dark-brown and have in them much of the romantic mysticism of the Celt. His feeling of hero-worship for Maurice Tourneur is real, quite the realest thing imaginable, and one knows that Mr. Tourneur must be conscious of it and proud of it, too.

We left the garden and went to the cafeteria, where, neither of us being particularly hungry, Jack Gilbert had a piece of apple pie and I had a ham sandwich, and we both drank milk for the sake of the extra pounds it might add. "You must drink it very slowly," he advised.

He was born in Ogden, Utah. "Almost a Mormon," he remarked. His mother, Ida Adair, was a well-known stock actress. His father, Walter Gilbert, also an actor, is at present stage director of the Baker stock company at Portland, Oregon.

Jack, or, to give him his full name, John C. Gilbert, made his first professional appearance at the ripe old age of six months, when, in company with Eddie Foy's oldest son, he crawled on the stage at the end of an act. It was at about this time that he began to dread the loneliness of Thanksgiving and Christmas. This is a feeling that belongs to all actors, an unfailing mark of the professional who is usually away from home, if he has one, and who has to give an extra performance into the bargain. However, the most vivid recollection of his childhood is of an incident that happened when he was about eight years old.

He and his father were "barnstorming" with a company playing some wild and woolly melodrama the name of which he has, of course, forgotten. In a little town in Arkansas they cleared a little something from the receipts and the manager, seeing his chance, left the company very suddenly, taking with him the little something. To make a bad matter worse, a cyclone came along in the middle of the night and blew away most of the town . . .

"We were stranded. My father and I had to go work washing dishes in a little railroad lunch-room to get money enough to get out!"

Those were early . . . very early . . . struggles. His screen career began with Triangle-Ince. "Golden Rule Kate" and "The Mother Instinct."

He made "More Trouble" for Vitagraph, (no pun intended), and "Wedlock" for Palta. His first picture for Maurice Tourneur was "The White Heather." When I saw him, they were just "shooting" "The Glory of Love." I almost forgot to say that a number of the scenarios he wrote were produced, one of them by Henry B. Walthall.

After lunch, we walked over to the stage and sat on the edge of the set, showing a wax-works exhibition in Paris, waiting for Jack Gilbert to be called.

"It is not a good thing," Gilbert remarked, "for an actor to marry outside the profession."

"Is it a good thing," I asked, "for an actor to marry at all?"

"Oh, yes! No man ever won great success unless he had a woman to help him. That is true not only of actors, but of all the big people of history!"

So, you see that Jack Gilbert is still looking forward to the best thing in life, a romance that will do its share towards making him famous.

OPPORTUNITY

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

Fate led two wanderers to a shining place
Where ghostly forms awaited silently.
And thus he spoke: "Choose each from this dream-race,
A guiding-spirit for the years to be."

And one bent eagerly, and chose as his
A radiant being, fair and strong and wise;
The other, watching idly, answered this:
"Choose for me, Master, blinded are my eyes."

And Fate led to him one who stood aside
With folded wings, and weary, joyless breath.
Then to the first, he said, "Life is thy guide,"
And to the second murmured, "Thine is Death!"

True-Tone Saxophones

A Buescher True-Tone Saxophone opens the way for you to double your income, double your opportunities and double your popularity and pleasure. It is easy for the beginner—you can learn to play the scale in one hour's practice and take your place in the band within 90 days. Practice is a pleasure rather than an effort. A clarinet player can make the change almost at once.

The Choice of Professionals

Tom Brown, of the famous Six Brown Brothers, the highest priced musical act: "Your improved models prompted me to adopt them generally. Nearly every member of my several different organizations uses your True-Tone Saxophones to their entire satisfaction."

Will F. Newlan, Director of Newlan's School of Music, Chicago, and former director of the famous Kilties Band: "I have been using a True-Tone Saxophone for 10 years. I recommend them to my friends and pupils because I candidly believe they are the most perfect saxophones made."

Clay Smith, Trombone Soloist, of the popular and well known Smith-Spring-Holmes Orchestral Quintet: "Your new Model 37 Trombone is the best on the market today. I can play my difficult solos better, and with less effort, than ever before."

Guy Holmes, of the widely known Smith-Spring-Holmes Orchestral Quintet: "I do not believe there's a Cornet made that equals the Buescher-Grand. Every note is clear and so easy to blow."

Capt. F. A. Bagley, 11th District Executive Officer of the American Federation of Musicians, Calgary, Alberta: "The True-Tone Saxophones I purchased of your company are very fine indeed and absolutely all that could be demanded of them. I believe True-Tone Saxophones to be the best."

Mrs. Alta R. Walls, of the Apollo Concert Co.: "The Apollo Concert Co. of which I am a member, have now for nearly 3 years been using nothing but True-Tone Instruments, and you may depend upon it that were your instruments not superior to others we would not have used them. Nothing but perfectly accurate instruments would fulfill our requirements."

Nearly every member of the Six Brown Brothers, Tommie Brown's Clown Band, Tommie Brown's Musical Review and Tommie Brown's Highlanders use Buescher Instruments. Ask them.

The Buescher-Grand Cornet

Buescher-Grand Cornets are graceful and classic models of art that completely fulfill the requirements of the Cornetist. Any player with fair ability can play from low to high C or vice versa with accuracy and produce F (5th line), G (1st space above) and B (2nd space above) clearly and distinctly without extreme effort or pinching. The tone is smooth and even throughout the entire compass. Its valve action permits the utmost agility to rapid passages.

Buescher-Grand Trombones enable you to do bigger things musically. Possess an unrivaled smoothness and velvety ease in slides and perfect balance. Let us send you illustrations and descriptive matter. All True-Tone instruments are equipped with our patented Split-No-Tone Bell.

contest: two years of the widest publicity in THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE and SHADOWLAND. This publicity includes special interviews in each of the magazines, cover portraits in colors, special pictures, articles by well-known writers, etc.

THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, SHADOWLAND and the CLASSIC will secure an initial position with one of the prominent producing firms. The judges alone of this contest constitute a hall of fame. Each and every one of them stands pre-eminent in his or her particular line of endeavor. The list of these luminaries of the dramatic and photographic world will be published in a later issue. Watch for it.

This contest is open to every man, woman and child. There is no age limit or, indeed, limit of any kind. There are no residential boundaries, either. If you live between the North and South Poles and New York and Yokohama, in either direction, you are eligible to enter this contest.

Of special interest to those who enter this contest is the announcement that a five-reel drama is now being produced. The honor roll winners will appear in this, as well as the winner or winners of The Fame and Fortune Contest. If this chance to make a mark in the film world interests you, fill out the coupon you will find on the bottom of another page of this issue and send it to us, together with the best photograph you have or can have made, and let the famous judges decide whether you have something in you that the picture lovers all over the world are looking for.

The attractive women who have so far sent us their names and pictures for this contest still outnumber by far the men who have entered. It should be remembered that this contest is open to the men as well as to women, and we again urge our masculine readers who have film stardom aspirations to send us their names and pictures.

We are sure that there are many men among our readers who have these aspirations and have only waited their chance to appear before the lens. Here is your opportunity. Send your photographs to us and they will receive the same consideration from the judges as do those of the fairer sex.

Those entrants who finally make the honor roll are to be congratulated, since the test is very severe. The judges give a careful and painstaking as well as fair and impartial consideration of the claims and photographs of the entrants and those who are picked are therefore the most nearly perfect entrants for each period.

Many moving picture stars enjoy a daily vacuum massage with the Clean-O-Pore which science has acclaimed the only perfect method of massaging.

Vacuum Massage is the greatest natural aid to better health and better appearance. It cleanses the pores as nothing else can, takes out the poisonous trouble-making impurities and puts new life and health into the tissues underneath; does it by creating a free circulation of blood, nourishing and purifying all through the parts massaged.

Think of it! A face, scalp or complete body massage every day for three years at a total cost of only $3.

Simply attach the Clean-O-Pore to any faucet and turn on the water—no electricity needed. The running water creates the vacuum—giving suction massage—massage in its most beneficial form. No water touches the skin. The Clean-O-Pore brings the benefits of massage within the reach of all.

FACE—SCALP—BUST

You can try it 10 days free. Use it on face, scalp or any part of the body—see for yourself how it improves your appearance by stimulating a vigorous circulation that feeds the tissues and carries away impurities—how it brings color to the cheeks and a sparkle to the eyes—how it cleans the pores, smooths out wrinkles and makes firm flesh—how it builds up the neck, bust or other hollow parts of the body—soothes and strengthens the nerves, and relieves headaches—how soothing it is after shaving—how it invigorates the scalp and hair and takes out dandruff—and how it is downright fun to use.

married again in February. She has sold her house on Bronson Avenue, right near Victoria Mix's home, and bought a larger and more beautiful mansion not very distant from the Mixes, for I don't know what Vicky would do without her mother. Those two enjoy shopping together as few mothers and daughters do. Both have exquisite taste and the means to gratify their longing for pretties.

Lee Moran and Eddie Lyons are a pair of cut-ups offstage. When Mr. Moran was laid up with flu, Mr. Lyons continued making scenes in which his partner did not appear according to the script. Upon Lee's return, Eddie said, joyfully, "Glad to have you back, Lee; heard you were dead!" Lee grinned, winked one eye and said, "Heard the same rumor, Eddie, but knew it was a lie, minute I heard it."

Mary Miles Minter will stand as god-mother to Juliet Shelby Whitney, her namesake, on Easter Day, at the famous Mission Inn, Riverside, California. Charlotte Whitney, baby's mother, lives with the Shelbys, since Mary's secretary must be constantly on hand to direct her publicity, answer fan letters and post photographs. Margaret Shelby has an excellent part in Mary's new picture. On April 1st, Mary's eighteenth birthday was celebrated, and she comes of age in California, altho according to the terms of her contract, made in New York, she is not of age, "pictorially speaking," until 1923, when she will be twenty-one.

Miss Minter takes herself very seriously. She is quite a reader and has a talent for writing, and I'm expecting to see her name on a scenario or novel before she's thirty and when she has tired of acting.

Winifred Westover, at last report, was dicking about the payment of salary in the Swedish motion picture concern which stars her for a year abroad. It seems that Winifred wanted the salary paid in American coin, while the promoters wanted to pay her the contract salary in Swedish currency, which would have meant a considerable loss when exchanged. Cablegrams have been sent by all concerned and, as a long-distance disagreement of this sort is rather expensive, we all await the outcome with considerable interest.

The winner of the Fame and Fortune Contest in our magazines is hard at work on the Universal lot. Virginia Brown Faire has adopted the "U" menagerie, even including a vicious horse which she's learning to "stick by."

THE BURDEN

By BETTY EARLE

There was a vast pale sobbing once that leapt
And swelled to anguish as on a sea
Whose mad-drenched rocks the white hands blindly swept—
And then at last a strength came quietly.

So stand I like a shadow, without trace
Of grieving left; only solitude;
And in the cool the night is all my face,
And over all the stars I bend and brood.

Wanted This Year

A grave dearth of story plots now confronts the motion picture industry. Producers will pay you well for any suitable story-ideas. Literary ability not a prime factor. Learn how you can write for the screen.

5000 New Story-Ideas for Motion Pictures

The above figure does not include material needed for religious, commercial and educational films.

SOMEWHERE in America this year scores of new motion picture writers will be developed. (For the motion picture industry must have a continuous supply of good, new story-ideas if it is to survive.)

Most of these new photoplaywrights will be men and women who never wrote a line for publication. They will be people with merely good ideas for stories, who are willing, during spare hours, to learn how picture directors want their plots laid out. Producers will pay them $100 to $500 each for clever comedies, and $250 to $2,000 each for five-reel dramatic scripts. They will pay these prices because they must have stories. 95% of book material is unsuited to their need, and as yet not enough people are writing for the screen to supply the demand.

The above is a statement of fact concerning the motion picture industry. If you have a story-idea as good as some you have seen produced, this opportunity is wide open to you.

There is plenty of proof that producers really do pay the prices stated above. For they are paying these prices constantly to people we have taught to write for the screen—people who never saw a motion picture studio.

In Two Short Years

It was a little over two years ago when the famine in story-plots first became acute. Public taste changed. Playgoers began to demand real stories. Plenty of manuscripts were being submitted, but most were unsuitable. For writers did not know how to adapt their stories for the screen. Few could come to Los Angeles to learn. A plan for home study had to be devised.

Frederick Palmer (formerly staff writer of Keystone, Fox, Triangle and Universal) finally assembled a corps of experts who built a plan of study which new writers could master through correspondence.

The Palmer Course and service has now been indorsed in writing by practically every big star and producer. Back of the Palmer Plan, directing this work in developing new writers, is an advisory council composed of the biggest figures in the industry. It includes Cecil B. DeMille, Director-General of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation; Thomas H. Ince, head of the Thomas H. Ince Studios; Lois Weber, America's greatest woman producer and director; Rob Wagner, well-known motion picture writer for the Saturday Evening Post.

In two short years we have developed dozens of new writers. We are proud of the records they have made, and we prefer to let them speak for us.

A Co-operative Plan— Not a Tedious Course

Our business is to take people who have ideas for stories and teach them to construct them in a way that meets a motion picture producer's requirements. We furnish you the Palmer Handbook with cross references to three stories already successfully produced. The scenarios come to you exactly as used by the directors. Also a glossary of studio terms and phrases such as "Iris," "Lap Dissolve," etc. In short we bring the studio to you.

Our Advisory Service Bureau gives you personal, constructive criticisms of your manuscripts—free and unlimited for one year. Criticisms come only from men experienced in studio staff writing.

Special Contributors

Twelve leading figures in the motion picture industry have contributed special articles to the Palmer Course. These printed lectures cover every phase of motion picture production. Among others these special contributors include: Frank Lloyd and Clarence Badger, Goldwyn directors; Jeanie MacPherson, noted Lasky scenario writer; Col. Jasper Ewing Brady of Metro's scenario staff; Denison Clift, Fox scenario editor; George Beban, celebrated actor and producer; Al E. Christie, president Christie Film Co.; Hugh McCung, expert cinematographer, etc., etc.

Our Marketing Bureau is headed by Mrs. Kate Corbaley, formerly photoplaywright for Mr.

and Mrs. Sidney Drew. In constant touch with the studios, she knows their needs, so that when our members so desire, we submit their stories in person for them. Thus we not only train you to write; we help you to sell your story-ideas.

$3000 for One Story Plot

Our members come from all walks of life; mothers with children to support, school teachers, clerks, newspaper men, ministers, business men, successful fiction writers. In short, we have proven that anyone with an average imagination and story-ideas can write successful photoplays once he is trained.

One student, G. Leroi Clarke, formerly a minister, sold his first photoplay story for $3,000. The recent success of Douglas Fairbanks' "His Majesty the American," and the play, "Live Sparks," in which J. Warren Kerrigan lately starred, were both written by Palmer students. Many students now hold staff positions, four in one studio alone.

We have prepared a book, "The Secret of Successful Photoplay Writing," which will inform you of the Palmer Course and service in greater detail. If you desire to consider the unusual opportunity in this new field of art seriously—this book will be mailed to you free.

At Least Investigate

For there is one peculiar thing to consider in the Palmer Plan. One single successful effort immediately repays you for your work. Not all our members begin to sell photoplays at once—naturally. But most of them do begin to show returns within a few months. And the big majority are not literary folks. They are people who have simply made up their minds to make money out of story-ideas they have in the back of their heads—and incidentally, perhaps, to gain some reputation.

The way is open. Producers are making every effort to encourage new writers. The demand is growing greater every day, and the opportunity is rich in its rewards because it is young. If seriously interested, mail the coupon.

curtain, a bit of gold pasteboard for a crown, she danced, sang and gestured—and created for herself a land of make-believe, a world that none of her family or ancestors, so far as any one knew, had ever dreamed of.

By the time Ellen was fifteen she knew quite definitely that she was going to be an actress. She was not abnormal, unusual in any way. In reality and habit she was like the girl friends with whom she walked arm-in-arm under the old elms of the quaint little city. But deep under every inherited habit there was something that would not be suppressed.

One evening at supper she announced herself: "Mother, grandmother, I have decided that I will not always sing in church; I am going to be an actress!" Had she announced her intention of being a plumber, a butcher, an anarchist, her family could have been no more astonished, more hopelessly bewildered.

Helplessly they searched the family tree to see if they could spy out the branch that had handed down this perverse inclination. For their Ellen to sing in church for a consideration had been bad

Ellen Cassity, J. Stuart Blackton's latest discovery, hails from Tennessee. She came to the screen via the "Ziegfeld Follies," and is the latest beauty of that famous organization to grace the films

Photograph below by Lumière

It's her real name and her stage name: Ellen Cassity. A name that from the press agent's point of view needs no camouflage. Surely the gods of luck must have taken a hand at her christening and in bestowing upon her many more true gifts: brown hair with threads of gold; slate-blue eyes with velvety, dark-fringed lashes; regular features; a perfect skin and a shapely, healthy body. And, if they had the gift of sight and knew that the wee lassie was destined for a career, they gave no sign, for, with the wisdom of their kind, they knew that gods of luck and gods of chance, also careers, must bide their time.

Ellen Cassity was born in Jackson, Tenn., of good old Southern stock; a people proud, upright, uncompromisingly conservative. A family of gentlemen and gentlewomen, careers, for their womenfolk, artistic or otherwise, were not even considered.

When Ellen was five the family moved to Louisville. Shortly afterward it was discovered that the small daughter had a voice of unusual quality. She was given lessons, vocal and instrumental, and at the age of ten had developed into a child prodigy and was solo soprano in a church.

Not only was she soloist on Sundays, but she was also the star of her grade at school entertainments. An omnivorous reader, she spent many a rainy afternoon in grandmother's attic and in Dickens, Scott, Stevenson, and finally a set of Shakespeare's plays, she discovered a secret door to another world.

Unknown to her adoring family, little Ellen began to dream dreams. The old attic, with its low ceilings, its dusty rafters, saw strange sights. Before an ancient mirror with tarnished frame, with an old portière, a lace

How to Make Your Voice Success - Compelling, Friend - Winning

Does Your Voice Attract or Repulse People? Read Here How You Can Have a Perfect Voice—of Magnetic Force That Will Draw Friends and Success to Your Side.

THINK for a moment what a big part the tone of your voice plays in your life! How many times after hearing a person's voice have you remarked,—“Oh, I don't trust him,” or “How tiresome she is,” or “What a nerve-racking experience it is to hear his voice.” And so it is with you.

People are either attracted or repulsed by your voice. If you are a man—it means a great deal to your future business and social success if people can say of you, “I like that man's voice, so strong, deep, and mellow that it just rings sincerity.” If just rings sincerity.” If you are a woman—it means much to you if people can say, “What a sweet, cultured voice she has—it's a real pleasure to listen to her.” Every man or woman in business or social life, every singer or public speaker, every one who stutters, stammers, or lisps, can now, through a wonderful new method of voice culture, gain this splendid power—a perfect voice of success-compelling, friend-winning force.

Make Your Voice Perfect

A perfect voice can now be yours. Eugene Feuchtinger, A.M., the famous voice culturist, has proven that any voice can be made perfect. No matter if your voice is weak or wavering, harsh and grating, droning, nasal, stammering, stuttering or lisping—Eugene Feuchtinger's amazing new system will make it perfect.

A few minutes each day in silent practice soon gives you the perfect singing voice or speaking voice that will open the door to numberless social or business opportunities. Within an amazingly short time you will notice the difference in your voice—it will be reaching that beautiful tone and richness of volume which you have so often admired in others.

Wonderful New Method

A poor voice is a tremendous handicap in business, professional and social life. Wherever you go, the impression you make on others depends upon your voice. If your voice is weak, indistinct, shrill, harsh or hollow, you cannot be judged at your best—you cannot realize your full measure of success and popularity. Whether you use your voice for singing or public speaking, or whether you use it only in the everyday course of your business and social life, you cannot afford the constant handicap of a voice of inferior quality and power. Yet not one person in a hundred knows how to use the voice properly! Nearly everyone has one or more serious faults in his or her voice. The trouble is that scarcely anyone knows how to control the vocal organs which produce the voice. Unless you know the fundamental principles of this control, no amount of practice or exercises of the ordinary kind will make your voice perfect.

But now the secret of a perfect voice can be yours. A wonderful new method enables anyone to quickly develop a voice of surpassing beauty. In an amazingly short time you can have a wider range of tone, more volume, more resonance. A rich, vibrant voice that everyone will admire is easily obtainable through the wonderful scientific discovery of Eugene Feuchtinger, the famous voice culturist. His remarkable, exclusive method has received the endorsement of European operatic singers, of eminent public speakers, of men and women in every walk of life. Here are just a few of the delighted expressions of opinions he has received:

Pittsburgh, Pa.
My Dear Professor Feuchtinger: I want to write you a few lines to tell you of the wonderful benefit I have received from your method of voice production after only a few lessons.

I was quite discouraged until I began to study with you. Now I am delighted with my daily improvement, for your method is precisely what you claim—infallible. No fault can escape your notice and all vocal defects are corrected by your ability.

I am preparing to take up professional work again in a very short time and feel that the strength and brilliancy which my voice is acquiring, will help me to attain the goal of success for which we are all striving.

In conclusion let me say that I have studied under some of the celebrated teachers of New York, but their methods did not help materially, for unlike your method they were not based upon actual science.

SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH, JR.

Chicago, Illinois.
My Dear Mr. Feuchtinger: No doubt you are wondering whether I feel any gratitude for the marvelous results which you and your system have brought about in my voice.

As you know, I have had vocal training before, but the results were negligible. My voice in four months under your system has blossomed out in a way that not only wholly astonished and delighted me—but has created a deep impression on all who have heard me sing. My voice has developed a “violet” style of expression and every time I sing, someone makes that comparison.

To say that I am satisfied, doesn't convey my meaning at all. I am simply wild with delight. You certainly have the one correct method of voice development. Believe me ever,
Your grateful pupil,

enough, but she had the gift of song; rightly used, it might help others and was not unbecoming a gentlewoman. But a public career—the stage!

Quietly but persistently, Ellen sought to overcome parental objections. She studied, she sang in church, in concerts, she took part in school entertainments, she attended the theater whenever possible and she bided her time. Finally a theatrical manager and friend of the family advised her to come to New York and her mother, still unreconciled and secretly hoping that the New York managers would have none of them, came with her.

But alas for maternal hopes! The very first day in New York, thru a lawyer friend whom Mrs. Cassity had known for years, Florenz Ziegfeld saw the beautiful young Southern girl, noted her grace, her charm, and signed her for "The Follies of 1917." During her career with "The Follies" her face was the model for more than a dozen Clarence B. Underwood covers and a well-known photographer won several prizes with art studies of Miss Cassity. Finally she left "The Follies" to sing in "Words and Music" with Raymond Hitchcock. Following this, she had the opportunity to understudy the leading rôle in "Pals First," later going on tour as leading woman.

And then, unfortunately, Miss Cassity was obliged to undergo a severe operation on her throat that resulted in the weakening of her voice. So she decided to accept one of the many flattering offers for screen work.

"I could still dance," she says, "and sing some, but I felt that it would be best to give my voice a rest and try pictures. I am so glad that I did and have no idea now of going back to the stage, but, of course, one never knows.

"While I found the stage interesting, I find the pictures even more so. The stage was, to me, a veritable land of make-believe. But the pictures are more than that. They are a series of wonderful adventures—every day is different from the one before. Not that it isn't hard work, it is. One has to be on the alert every minute. One's physical endurance is put to the test very often, and often there are real dangers to encounter—as, for instance, when we were making 'Checkers' and a piece of glass flew into my eye, causing me to suffer tortures, even endangering my eyesight. All the same, I had a wonderful time making 'Checkers.'

"Just now I am co-starring with Herbert Rawlinson in 'Passers-By,' produced and directed by J. Stuart Blackton, and I want to say that it is a great opportunity to work with Mr. Blackton, who is a gentleman every minute of the day and is consideration itself.

"My favorite parts and hobbies and ambitions? I like drama best, with plenty of action—also light comedy. Am

Cupid says: "Secure a Satin Skin"

A girl likes a fair faced, clean looking, manly fellow. The same fellow prefers natural beauty, a girl with satin skin. The secret of a satin skin is found in Satin Skin Cream (Cold or Greaseless), an essence of perfuming flowers, healing herbal extracts, beautifying balsams. You can make your skin a smooth, satin skin, free from blemish, add to your attractiveness, comfort and charm, by daily using Satin Skin Cream.

SATIN SKIN POWDER is dense, "holds tight," clings with the tenacity of the true friend that it is to your skin. Bestows refined fairness, a "smart" well groomed appearance. The best party and theatre powder, because it stays on. Satin Skin is stunning in street effect, neutralizing the brightness of day and sunlight, with a satiny soft glow. Made in five finest shades: Flesh, white, pink, Brunette, naturelle.

- I. At night apply Satin Skin Cold Cream to wet skin.
- II. Day and evening use Satin Skin Greaseless Cream.
- III. Satin Skin Powder gives satiny finish. Choice of 5 tints:

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eyes, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky salve, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

- The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:
- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator $.75
 - M. T.'s A. B. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads $.75
 - M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair $.50
 - M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan $1.00
 - M. T.'s Minerated Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream" $.75

Why do women weep? Why do men chuckle?

Why does the whole audience clutch their hands and strain their eyes?

REMEMBER how the fat man ha ha'd right out and got the audience giggling and the old lady laughed until the tears ran down her cheeks. What a wonderful picture that was!

And last week even the gruff old bachelor had red eyes when the lights went on. You felt as though you had lost your own sister when Melissy died.

All the way home you discussed the story.

Why do you enjoy this picture or that one so much? Have you ever stopped to think why?

First it was such a human story.

And the star was so sweet in the part. You always did like her. All the characters seemed just like the real people.

And the scenes—real rooms in real houses. The outdoor pictures were like a vacation for you—out in the open—daisy fields, sunshine, mountains, deserts.

Perhaps you didn't notice the photography, you were so interested in the story, but you will remember how clear it was—how beautiful the lighting.

These are the things you will always find in a Goldwyn picture. Interesting stories—your favorite star—beautiful settings—perfect photography. Goldwyn combines them all. When you see a Goldwyn picture you forget your troubles—you forget the baby's croup and the cook's leaving.

You come home feeling as fine as though you'd had an outing.

Never miss a Goldwyn picture. They are the ones you know you will enjoy.

GOLDWYN PICTURES

Lloyd Hughes

His Ship Comes In

By MARY FORRESTER

"That picture," said Lloyd Hughes, "did a lot toward making me realize how much depends upon the way you look at things."

A good illustration of how much depends upon the way you look at things is the story of Lloyd Hughes' own boyhood. Nothing unusual about it; nothing at all. His life was the same as that of innumerable other youngsters. But he looked at the world thru rose-colored glasses and so, at twenty-one, he has found a rose-colored world.

"When I was a kid," he said, "I used to stay around theaters as much as I could. I always liked them. I was stage-struck even then!"

This was when he began delivering papers after school. He used to make plays for himself, imitating the people he met on his route, and later he did the same thing when he got his first job during a school vacation.

"I was a butcher boy," he said, "and that position gave me more material."

Both photographs by Evans, L. A.

LLOYD HUGHES is Youth incarnate.

This doesn't mean that he is frivolous. On the contrary, he is very serious, with the romantic, humor-touched seriousness of the Celt. His cheeks are red, his eyes blue

Lloyd Hughes worked in a hardware store by day and went to a dramatic school by night. Then he began as a studio extra. His hit in King Vidor's "The Turn in the Road" led to his recent Thomas Ince contract and his hair dark, almost black. He celebrated his twenty-first birthday during the making of King Vidor's "The Turn of the Road," and it was in this picture that he played his first leading part; in fact, his first really important part of any kind. He is a real discovery. His ship has just come in and he is beginning to unload it, keenly conscious meanwhile of the romance of it all. His love of romance is, indeed, the most characteristic thing about him. It is hard to picture him in any work which would not be colored by his imagination.

It is a curious thing that "The Turn of the Road" marked in more than one way the turn of the road in his life. Not only did it bring him success, but it changed his entire outlook. It is a picture marked by youth and hope and earnestness. Mr. Vidor, the author and director, is himself little more than a boy—"He's twenty-four," said Lloyd Hughes, as tho that were quite ancient—but he had something to say and said it well—because he meant it.

Do You Know How Rich You Are?

Do You Realize that Your Photoplay Ideas, if Brought to Life Upon the Screen, Might Make You Wealthy?

NO matter what your profession, vocation or trade, be it lawyer, teacher, doctor, newspaper-man, engineer, editor, advertising writer, accountant, clerk, stenographer, salesman, or telephone girl, etc., you have ideas for Photoplays which, if put into proper form, as we can teach you to do, may be worth anywhere from $500 to $5000 each.

A PROFESSION OPEN TO ALL

Photoplay writing is a profession of the first rank, from the standpoint of enormous earnings, and yet it is open to "unknowns" and persons without previous writing experience, to a degree which no other profession is. It is not limited to "Geniuses" and so called "Born Writers"; no one has a monopoly of it. We are bringing forward a new army of photoplay writers, recruited from the ordinary walks of life, and they are producing screen plays of amazing quality. Producers, Artists and Directors are searching for the man or woman who can contribute a fresh note or new idea, and are ready to reward them handsomely.

ADRIAN JOHNSON FORMULATES SYSTEM

The profession of photoplay writing has been brought to your very desk. Adrian Johnson, the master scenarist of the entire profession, whose name you see, almost weekly, thrown upon the screen, or in electric lights over the theatre entrance, as author of the play, has reduced the science of screen writing to a teachable, learnable system of simplicity and accuracy. The person of average intelligence can master and put it to practical application. His system covers the basic rules of photoplay writing which experienced writers invariably follow and which beginners must know to get their material in required form. It comprises 20 lessons, 2 model Scenarios of successful productions, to study, imitate and as patterns for your Scripts; A Dictionary of "Studio Language," the very words, terms, phrases and expressions used among Artists, Directors and Producers, besides a wealth of necessary, inspirational and developmental information gleaned from the personal experiences of this famous writer, in his meteoric rise from an "unknown" to the highest pinnacle of success in this profession. With this material at hand, you know when your scripts measure up to professional form, and that they will reach the producers in condition to invite reading and not rejection.

That remarkable photoplay, "The Miracle of Love," featuring the brilliant young star, Miss Lucy Cotton; "April Folly," with Miss Marion Davies, and "Checkers," Mr. Johnson's latest three successes, are now being shown from coast to coast. Mr. Johnson has written 300 additional produced photoplays.

ADVISORY AND SALES BOARDS

Mr. Johnson heads the Advisory board which reads, criticizes and suggests the necessary improvements to make your scripts saleable. Our Sales Department exists on commissions earned by the sale of successful scripts. It is an expert organization with entree to all producers, artists and directors who buy plays, and is as eager to receive a saleable script as you are to write one.

So unqualified is our confidence in our System, and the service we provide, that the complete system is sent you on approval, allowing you several days to decide whether it can teach you photoplay writing.

Dear Mr. Johnson:

Your system is proving what I have always contended—that there is ample genuine writing talent in any group of men and women in any vocation, if it can be organized.

What they lack is a knowledge of the mechanics of writing, and that you can teach this there is not the slightest doubt.

Sincerely,
John G. Koepf

Dir. for Robertson Cole in forthcoming Georges Carpentier productions.

New York, N. Y.,
Feb. 15, 1920.

Dear Adrian Johnson:

I have spent several hours nosing through your photoplay system. It is at once, the most complete, comprehensive and satisfying thing in correspondence instruction that I have seen.

It is amazingly simple and I am not at all surprised that usable scripts are coming in from lawyers, teachers, newspaper men, and folks who have never written before, as your correspondence shows.

We need this new infusion of writing blood. Very truly,

Lucy Cotton

Star "Miracle of Love."

The Adrian Johnson System,
New York City.

Gentlemen:

I have critically read your Photoplay System and consider it the most concise and satisfying text-book produced up to date, on how to write photoplays.

It deals clearly with fundamental principles of writing for the screen, and anyone who has a good idea and possesses a little common sense, is assured of a good margin of success by following this valuable system.

Very truly yours,

Edmund Bellm

Dir. "Parlor, Bedroom and Bath."

Are YOU a Man or a Mannikin?

A man's happiness largely depends on his Vital Powers; his success in social, domestic and business life all centres around this. If he is not vigorous, he is not magnetic, forceful or attractive; neither is he sought after—his very strength is the axis upon which all else relating to him revolves. Men become weak through overwork, worry, and bad habits, and gradually lose their strength and manhood. When they reach the stage when they find their strength on the wane, it is the forerunner of failure, and domestic happiness is then soon upset. Young men become incapable of marriage, listless and purposeless; their brain power decreases as their manhood fails. Strongfortism so strengthens the internal muscles, which are responsible for general health and physical strength, and the most obstinate and long standing cases can give way in a short time, to its internal action.

MAKE A MAN OUT OF YOURSELF

The only way to do it is to build up your body—all of it through Nature's methods, NOT by pampering your poor stomach and giving it extra work to do. Don't be a pill-feeder, and don't think fast is making you a failure. The real REASON why you don't succeed doubtless lies in your poor, enfeebled condition, not short cuts, which are only a waste of money and your unhealthy skin. This world has no use for weak, sickly people; nobody wants to have them around.

BUILD UP YOUR BODY

You can do it, if you will ONLY WILL to do it, and so about it in Nature's way. You can make your figure manly and symmetrical and at the same time strengthen your heart, lungs, stomach and every other vital organ, by developing the INTERNAL muscles on which their action depends, as well as your external muscles. You can free yourself from constipation, indigestion, Dyspepsia, Bilioussness or any other chronic ailment that is handicapping you and holding you back. WHEN YOU HAVE NATURE ON YOUR SIDE. Get back your health, strength and a big store of reserve vitality, by taking advantage of the tremendous revitalizing power which Nature has implanted in every human organism.

STRONGFORTISM

The principles of Strongfortism are based upon my discovery—that internal muscular activity governs Health, Strength and Life itself. Most forms of disease are caused from the muscles losing their power of rapid contraction. As these muscles are responsible for holding the internal organs in position, when they are relaxed, the organs gradually fall out of their place and rest upon other organs, upsetting their functioning and causing almost every known form of disease. Strongfortism gives contractile power to these muscles and quickly makes them normal and so draws the sagging organs back to their position.

What I have done for thousands of other weak, ailing, discouraged men and women, I can do for YOU. There isn't the slightest doubt of it. What your condition is, or whatever brought you to it, I GUARANTEE to improve you if you will follow my directions for a few months.

SEND FOR MY FREE BOOK

"Promotion and Conservation of Health, Strength and Mental Energy" will PROVE to you that STRONGFORTISM can and will do for YOU what it has done and is doing every day for other men and women who have TURNED TO NATURE for the restoration of their lost vitality. Remember, there's no medicine of any kind in Strongfortism; no expensive apparatus required; no interference with your business, work or occupation. Fifteen or twenty minutes daily in the privacy of your own bedroom will work wonders for you.

Lloyd Hughes

I saw him at his home on Coronado Street, Los Angeles. It is an attractive bungalow, painted green, with a wide lawn and plenty of flowers, as pretty and homelike a place as any one could find in a long day's journey. Here he lives with his mother, father and two brothers. One brother is eleven and the other seventeen years old. His father is a locomotive engineer, and Lloyd's earliest ambition, the only one he had before he thought of being an actor, was to follow in his father's footsteps. This was in Arizona, where he lived on a ranch near Bisbee, close to the Mexican border. Incidentally, he has lived almost all over Arizona. During school months, the monotony of life in Bisbee was broken by forbidden swims in the reservoir and regular pitched battles with little Mexicans—the sort of life out of which Hamlin Garland made literature.

When his family came to Los Angeles, Lloyd went to work for a wholesale hardware company as a salesman. Now there is plenty of romance in the wholesale hardware business—after you have left it. While you are in it, however, there is plenty of work. The stock contains everything from a needle to railroad iron. In addition to his regular work he went to a dramatic school and memorized a part in a play every week. He must have worked and studied all of the time. He saved a large portion of his wages from week to week and at last quit and started in doing extra work at the studios. This was about two years ago. A great deal of work came his way. There were even occasional bits and small parts, but these were few. He has certainly worked very hard to bring his ship to port. It only remains to be seen if he will work equally hard unloading its cargo. Unless one has an unusual character, success at such an early age is often fatal to continued success later on. Lloyd Hughes does not seem to face this danger. He is a sincere, earnest boy, fully conscious of the heights still above him. It is certain he will go far.

His first part was in a two-reel comedy-drama with King Vidor. This part led to an engagement with the American Film Company at Santa Barbara to play a juvenile lead with Margarita Fisher. From there, he came back to Los Angeles and worked at Universal City as the Third Brother with Dorothy Phillips in Allan Holubar's "The Heart of Humanity."

"After that," said Lloyd, "came 'The Turn of the Road.' The rest, I suppose, you know."

He started to work with Enid Bennett and when the picture was half finished he was given a two-year contract by Thomas Ince. He was recently loaned to Paramount for the making of one picture with Vivian Martin.

Asked about what advice he would give to the screen aspirant, (the screen aspirant always wants advice, you know), he said:

American beauties who were on the honor roll of our 1919 contest. You can have this feature run in your local theater if you will communicate with Murray W. Garsson, Foundation Film Corp., 1600 Broadway, New York, who is presenting this film.

The second honor roll winners are: Eleanor Stahl, who lives at 17 W. 44th Street, New York City. She has yet to appear before the footlights or the camera. She was born in Russia. She is 5 feet 2 inches in height and weighs 110 pounds. She is of a fair complexion and has a wealth of dark-brown hair. Her eyes are of the ocean depths, for they are green-blue.

Ione M. White, 415 Frasco Street, San Antonio, Texas, is a Dixie girl with blue-grey eyes and golden hair, weighing 106 pounds and being just one-quarter of an inch short of five feet. She has had some amateur experience on the stage and screen.

Dolly Davis is a native Windy City girl, living at 1536 W. Chicago Avenue, Chicago, Ill. She is a golden-haired, blue-eyed maid and is 5 feet 2 inches in height and weighs 98 pounds. She has had no professional stage or screen experience as yet.

Irene Anna Snow is a native of Erie, Pa., living at 308 E. 12th Street. She has hazel eyes and medium brown hair, is 5 feet 3 inches in height and weighs 120 pounds. She has not yet graced the screen or the footlights.

Marie Protich Zorka, of the golden-brown hair and dark-brown eyes, is a native of France. At present she is living at the Rivinton Apartments, 777 Burrard Street, Vancouver, B. C., and she has made several public appearances as an eccentric and classical dancer. She has the clear olive complexion of Southern Europe and is 5 feet 6 inches tall and weighs 122 pounds.

Winnie Charlotte Rowley is a native of New York's greatest borough and lives at 427 Dean Street, Brooklyn. She is blessed with a combination of light-brown hair and blue eyes. She is just two inches over five feet and weighs 115 pounds. Up to the present neither stage nor screen has had the pleasure of her appearance.

Here are a few things to remember in connection with this contest:

It has been decided that August 1st will be the closing date of the Fame and Fortune Contest.

Never give up trying to get on the honor roll. If you do not succeed at first, try again.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by E. B. Davison of New York, one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality to-day.

"The time will come," writes the same authority, "when millions of people will be writers—there will be countless thousands of playwrights, novelists, scenario, magazine and newspaper writers—they are coming, coming—a whole new world of them!" And do you know what these writers-to-be are doing now? Why, they are the men—armies of them—young and old, now doing mere clerical work, in offices, keeping books, selling merchandise, or even driving trucks, running elevators, street cars, waiting on tables, working at barber chairs, following the plow, or teaching schools in the rural districts; and women, young and old, by scores, now pounding typewriters, or standing behind counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are the Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the Imagination free rein they might have astonished the world!

But two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. We simply learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. The greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, searching all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the flossam and jetsam of life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you'd be amazed to find your story would sound just

Be An Artist

Release the Talent in Your Pencil

Everybody has the ability to draw. True, some have more ability than others—but that is because it has been developed. Just as you have been taught to read and write, you can be taught to draw. It's simply a question of the proper training. Why stick at a routine job, wasting your life away, when there is a crying demand for trained illustrators—cartoonists—and designers? Our wonderful NEW METHOD of teaching art by mail has qualified hundreds of our students for high-salaried positions. Under our instruction, your undeveloped ability will flow forth in streams of saleable pictures, and you will have

A Career—Not a Job

A career is open to you as commercial artist that has definite possibilities. There is no future for you in a "job." There are thousands of big paying Artist's positions open right now. And these positions are actually going begging because of the scarcity of trained artists. Magazines, newspapers, advertising agencies, business concerns—all are looking for men and women who can handle their illustrating. With the tremendous boom in both foreign and domestic business, commercial art is more in demand than ever—and that demand is growing every day! Get in this fascinating game NOW!

$100 for One Drawing

That is what many of our students are now getting for one drawing! Many, after completing this wonderful course, have even started in at $60 a week! Often, even before the student has finished his course, he has made more than enough through the sale of his drawings to pay for his tuition. Why? Because he learned to draw under the personal instruction of one of the country's foremost commercial artists—Will H. Chandlee. The Chandlee system does away with all superfluous technique and entangling hindrances of the ordinary art school. It brings the principles of successful drawing right down to fundamentals in a course of instruction that can't be beat. You can get all the benefits of studio instruction right in your own home, and for just a few cents a day! Your spare time is all that is required. Our valuable book "How to Become an Artist" tells all about it. Send for it today! It's FREE!

This department is for information of general interest only. Those who desire answers by mail, or a list of the film manufacturers, with addresses, must enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Address all inquiries to The Answer Man, using separate sheets for matters intended for other departments of this magazine. Each inquiry must contain the correct name and address of the inquirer at the end of the letter, which will not be printed. At the top of the letter write the name you wish to appear. Those desiring immediate replies or information requiring research, should enclose additional stamp or other small fee; otherwise all inquiries must await their turn.

TONY'S ADMIRER.—Hold on to what you have rather than reach for that you cannot get. Oh, yes, I have met Antonio Moreno. In fact, lunched with him. Alla Nazimova has signed up for two more years with Metro.

CHATTERBOX.—Remember, if you want to be answered in THE CLASSIC, be sure to write CLASSIC at the top of your letter. Grace Darling has joined Goldwyn for three years. She is in Los Angeles.

A GOOD FELLOW. Shake! I like a regular fellow. And a lot of my readers are regular. No, I couldn't call June Caprice a decided blonde. In fact, she hasn't decided yet. Claire Whitney played leading parts opposite House Peters in "You Never Know Your Luck," produced by Sunset Pictures.

ADELAIDE M.—If you mean in book form, get in touch with Brentano, Fifth Avenue, New York City.

OLD NEW HAMPSHIRE.—Yes, Harold Lockwood has appeared on the speaking stage. Now Conrad Nagel has gone and married. Both leads of "Forever After," Conrad Nagel and Alice Brady, married inside of a month, but not to each other.

MILDRED S.—Haven't heard of Marguerite Courtot doing cabaret work. May Allison is out in Los Angeles, and Elsie Ferguson is working in New York. Our sailors wear the black scarf in memory of sailors who have died in previous wars. The wide, flaring trousers are a matter of adaptability to conditions. They have to roll them up to the knees when scrubbing decks.

VERBENA B.—You've got the right idea there! Call again.

K. S. SHOYA.—Which Mabel do you refer to? But, after all, life is at best full of dangers, and but few of us ever get out of it alive. Write me some more.

NORMA TALMADGE FOREVER.—Sure thing Wanda Hawley played opposite Doug Fairbanks. Also opposite Bill Hart. William Shay had the lead in "Secret Service Sam." The magazine you mention is out of business now. "Safety Curtain" was not published in our magazine.

BUCKSKIN BILL.—Hello, Bill! Well, I reckon the Amazon discharges the largest amount of water of any river in the world, and the St. Lawrence next. Rose Tapley is doing special exhibitor work for Paramount. Ruth Roland is in Los Angeles now. You refer to Ann Forrest.

S. V. H.—This is out of my line, but when my mahogany desk becomes stained from dampness, I wipe it with a polish made of one tablespoonful of turpentine and three tablespoonfuls of linseed oil to a quart of boiling water. Not inflammable. Tyrone Power is now in Canada. Lionel Atwell is to play opposite Florence Reed for United. You want to know if Theda Bara showed any special signs of talent before becoming an actress. Hardly think the real and true information is obtainable. She started with Fox.

THREE SISTERS.—Yes, it is true Betty Gray, of Biograph and Vitagraph fame, recently died. Frank Lanning is playing for Robertson

Cole, Los Angeles. William Hart, Los Angeles.

CONNIE.—Oh, so you like the snappy answers I give. What snappy thing can I say to you without snapping at you? No relation. You want an interview with Constance Binney. Write Nazimova, Metro Studio, Los Angeles, Cal. Surely you can be my friend, why not?

SARAH H.—You say movies will never be the same to you until Norma Talmadge and Engene O'Brien play together and Constance Talmadge and Harrison Ford play together. This thing must be fixed up somehow, so the movies will be the same to you.

LILLIAN L.—Interview with Harrison Ford. He seems to be in great demand today. Oh yes, X-rays have been used to tell ages. Some of you gurlies had better keep away from the X-ray. You say Tom Chatterton and Belle Bennett are playing in stock in San Francisco.

ESTHER M. F.—A good game to play is to take photographs of the moving picture players and tack them to the wall, numbered, and give prizes for those who guess the most correctly. Conway Tearle is now in the West. Wallace MacDonald is out in Los Angeles.

BRITISHER.—I beg his Royal Highness's pardon. King George's birthday is on June 3d, and not on the 5th, as I said. No, never saw them.

FLO-FLO.—Why dont you send for a list of film manufacturers?

CAREFREE DOT; SIS HOPKINS; T. M. P.; JANE C.; FI-FI; SUSIE G.; MARGARITA, NEW ORLEANS; LILLIAN F.—Please see above for yours, and dont fail to write again.

MARY JANE.—Glad to hear from you. You say a "perfectly good man getting only $9.50 per week." How do you know I am perfectly good? How can I be perfect and good too? Broncho Billy has given up the picture business for theatricals.

CHRIS.—You should have entered your picture in the Fame and Fortune Contest. The editor didn't think it safe for me with all the beauties coming in, so he sent me on a vacation. We had some exciting times here.

H. B., STAMFORD.—Yes, write to the players direct.

CASCARETS.—So that's your name, is it? Yes. I have heard orators get up and say they didn't have anything to say and then talk endlessly. I cant tell you why they do it. Your letter was so interesting I am going to quote a paragraph. You say "I knew a little girl six years old, who was sick for four years with oaralysis. She recently died, and every evening her mother used to have to tell her some story in which Mary Pickford played, often she told the same one over many times, as Mary didn't play in new ones every day. Ruth finally passed away one evening just as her mother finished telling her a new story of Mary."

A READER.—All right, but be sure to sign your name and address next time. And I shall greet you à bras ouverts. Viola Dana is out West.

A Résumé of the Fame and Fortune Contest, Past and Present

Fame and Fortune Contest of last year and for this year, that we think it advisable briefly to review the history of the contest from the beginning.

Late in 1918 we conceived and started the Fame and Fortune Contest and, during the year 1919, it was featured in all three of our publications. Nearly every issue of each magazine contained several pages of the leading contestants, which we called the Monthly Honor Roll. Photographs came pouring in from every nook and corner of the country, and while we never counted them, it was estimated that we received over fifty thousand.

Our idea was to go thru the country with a fine tooth comb, as it were, bringing out all of the young girls who had motion picture possibilities. We feel safe in declaring that there were very few villages thruout the country which had not heard of this contest and were not talking about it. Nearly every town sent in a representative to the contest. Those who read our announcements and saw the pictures of the leaders in each issue of our three magazines talked about it to friends and neighbors, and even wrote to distant cities, recommending that certain young ladies enter the contest.

For example, in one case a lady living in Dallas, Texas, had a niece who lived in Denver, Colorado. She sent a copy of our magazine to the young lady and advised her to enter the contest, and she did so. Thus, even those who were not regular readers of our publications learnt of the contest, and we believe that the country was well covered.

However, it was our first venture and we made several mistakes. This year we are making good use of our first experience, and we are confident that the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920 will far outshine the previous one.

On account of the recent printers' strike, and traffic and freight troubles, together with a far-reaching shortage of paper, we have been very much handicapped, as have all other publications, and several important announcements regarding the contest did not find their way into our columns. But for these and other difficulties we would have been publishing each month the usual two pages of beautiful pictures of the contestants. All obstacles have been surmounted; the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920 is now well under way and running in full force.

Last year the judges of the contest were Mary Pickford, Thomas Ince, Cecil de Mille, Maurice Tourneur, James Montgomery Flagg, Howard Chandler Christy, J. Stuart Blackton, Samuel Lumière and Eugene V. Brewster.

The judges for the 1920 contest will probably be Mary Pickford, Mme. Olga Petrova, Howard Chandler Christy, Thomas Ince, J. Stuart Blackton, Mau-

I Teach Piano A Funny Way

So people said when I first started in 1891. But now, after over twenty-five years of steady growth, I have far more students than were ever before taught by one man. I make them skilled players of the piano or organ in quarter the usual time at quarter the usual cost.

To persons who have not previously heard of my method, this may seem a pretty bold statement. But I will gladly convince you of its accuracy by referring you to any number of my graduates in any part of the world. There isn't a state in the Union that doesn't contain a score or more skilled players of the piano or organ who obtained their entire training from me by mail.

Investigate by writing for my 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

My way of teaching piano or organ is entirely different from all others. Out of every four hours of study, one hour is spent entirely away from the keyboard—learning something about Harmony and The Laws of Music. This is an awful shock to most teachers of the "old school," who still think that learning piano is solely a problem of finger gymnastics. When you do go to the keyboard, you accomplish twice as much, because you understand what you are doing. Within four lessons I enable you to play an interesting piece not only in the original key, but in all other keys as well.

I make use of every possible scientific help—many of which are entirely unknown to the average teacher. My patented invention, the COLOROTONE, sweeps away playing difficulties that have troubled students for generations. By its use, Transposition—usually a "night-mare" to students—becomes easy and fascinating. With my fifth lesson I introduce another important and exclusive invention, QUINN-DEX. Quinn-Dex is a simple hand-operated moving picture device, which enables you to see, right before your eyes, every movement of my hands at the keyboard. You actually see the fingers move. Instead of having to reproduce your teacher's finger movements from MEMORY—which cannot be always accurate—you have the correct models before you during every minute of practice. The COLOROTONE and QUINN-DEX save you months and years of wasted effort. They can be obtained only from me and there is nothing else anywhere even remotely like them.

Men and women who have failed by all other methods have quickly and easily attained success when studying with me. In all essential ways you are in closer touch with me than if you were studying by the oral method—yet my lessons cost you only 43 cents each—and they include all the many recent developments in scientific teaching. For the student of moderate means, this method of studying is far superior to all others, and even for the wealthiest student, there is nothing better at any price. You may be certain that your progress is at all times in accord with the best musical thought of the present day, and this makes all the difference in the world.

My Course is endorsed by distinguished musicians who would not recommend any Course but the best. It is for beginners or experienced players, old or young. You advance as rapidly or as slowly as you wish. All necessary music is supplied without extra charge. A diploma is granted. Write today, without cost or obligation, for 64-page free booklet, "How to Learn Piano or Organ."

Greatest of All Popularity Contests

Unique Competition in Which the Voters Share in the Prizes

WHO IS THE ONE GREAT STAR OF THE SCREEN?

Is it CHARLIE CHAPLIN or ELSIE FERGUSON?

Is it RICHARD BARTHELMESS or WILLIAM S. HART?

Concerning this matter there is great difference of opinion. Every fan, in fact, has his own idol. The Wall street broker swears by MARY PICKFORD; his wife thinks TOM MIX is the best actor the cinema has produced; the office boy has a "crush" on THEDA BARA and the stenographer collects photographs of DOUGLAS FAIRBANKS.

What do you think? If you had a vote would you give it to NAZIMOVA or to LILLIAN GISH? Would you vote for a man or a woman or for little BEN ALEXANDER?

Shadowland, Motion Picture Magazine, and Motion Picture Classic—the three great magazines of the Motion Picture world—have decided to refer this question to their readers by taking a popular, world-wide vote. In regard to matters concerning the stage and theater their audience is the most intelligent and discerning; the most wide-awake and well-informed in the world today. If any picture patrons can pick out the leading star, it will be those who read Shadowland, the Magazine and Classic.

The coupons will show you how to enter your own name and the name of your favorite player. But you may vote on an ordinary sheet of paper in Class Number 2 provided you make the ballot the same size and follow the wording of this coupon. We prefer the printed coupons for uniformity and convenience in counting.

There will be prizes for voters and prizes for stars.

Votes registered in Class Number 1 will probably be cast by favor. Votes registered in Class Number 2 will call for a wide knowledge of the Motion Picture business, keen powers of perception and skill at detecting the trend of popular favor. You cannot guess the winner offhand.

RULES OF THE CONTEST

1. The contest began on December 1, 1919, and will close on June 30, 1920.
2. There will be seven ballots as follows:

December	1919 ballot
January	1920 ballot
February	1920 ballot
March	1920 ballot
April	1920 ballot
May	1920 ballot
June	1920 ballot
3. The result of each month's ballot will be published in each one of our magazines the second month following such ballot.
4. No votes will be received prior to the opening date or after the date of closing.
5. Each person entering the contest and observing the rules thereof shall have the privilege of voting once in each class, each month, for each one of our magazines. You may send us one vote in each class for Shadowland every month, and the same for Motion Picture Magazine and yet again the same for Classic. Thus, you will have three votes in Class No. 1 each month, and three votes in Class No. 2 each month.

of Nutritious Quaker Oats

Save 90%

And Serve Vastly Better Breakfasts

One dollar spent for Quaker Oats buys about as much nutrition as $10 buys in meat and fish and eggs.

So a Quaker Oats breakfast, compared with a meat breakfast, saves you some 90 per cent.

And in oats you get the supreme food.

You get an ideal food—almost a complete food.

You get a food which, measured by calories, is twice as nutritious as round steak.

And you get the needed minerals.

What $1 Buys

Note how much $1 buys in Quaker Oats. It will serve a hundred breakfasts.

That same $1 in some other foods will buy you only ten breakfasts.

Then compare by calories—the energy measure of food value. That's the way foods should be figured. You buy them for nutrition.

Here is what $1 buys in calories at this writing in some necessary foods:

What $1 Buys At This Writing in Calories

In Quaker Oats . . .	18,000	calories
In Average Meats . . .	2,200	"
In Average Fish . . .	2,000	"
In Hen's Eggs . . .	1,400	"
In Broilers . . .	600	"

One needs variety in food, regardless of the cost. But the basic breakfast should be Quaker Oats.

That is the food which everybody needs. And its trifling cost will average up your food bills.

The Story of Wallace Beery

By FRITZI REMONT

There was a time in the life of Wallace Beery when he hustled trunks for a living in Ringling Brothers' Circus. Long trunks and tiny trunks, unruly trunks and tractable trunks came under his supervision, but instead of carrying make-up and tarlatan skirts, ringmaster's high hat and Prince Albert, jockey's caps and scarlet coats, clowns' sugar-loaf "bonnets" and Pierrots, those trunks were usually loaded with peanuts and hay.

Having departed from school hurriedly and with great vexation of spirit, young Wally joined a circus and was initiated in the art of elephant training. That was the start of his dramatic career. He handled the biggest "effalunt" in captivity, old "Twenty-Six," on whom circus-going kiddies lavished special tidbits. "Twenty-Six" and Wally grew to be fast friends and baby elephants grew into husky stunt artists under Mr. Beery's tutelage.

Later, discovering an excellent basso profundo within his well-developed chest, a basso which could hold its own above the din and roar of side-shows and ear-splitting band music, Mr. Beery decided that comic opera would be the right channel for his talents. He had been a good mimic always, and it wasn't difficult to obtain a hearing with producers of musical mirth.

So those of you who have seen "Floradora," "The Prince of Pilsen," "The Burgomaster" and dozens of other stage entertainments may dig up the old programs and there discover Wallace Beery listed in the merry, merry.

His real opportunity arrived as understudy to Raymond Hitchcock. Finally Beery was given his chance. He sang the title part, put over the "business" until the house was in a riot, and awoke next day to find himself famous. It's happened before, of course, but, nevertheless, it thrilled Mr. Beery and fired his ambitions. He advanced rapidly, played a season with Sir Henry Irving, had a lead with Margaret Illington, did a character part in Orrin Johnson's company, and finally took the highroad to pictures.

For seven years Mr. Beery has been doing unusual characterizations. His first real screen hit, however, came with "The Unpardonable Sin," in which he played the German officer.

"I owe a great deal to Mr. Neilan and Miss Sweet," said Mr. Beery. "You should have seen the man-hunt going on for a suitable type. Every one was suggesting that Mr. Neilan should send to New York for some 'high-light' of the stage or screen. I had called on him at his suggestion, and was finally given the part, altho I was really not well known, having played a great deal in stock up to that time. I studied the part carefully with Miss Sweet and found her most helpful and liberal in giving me opportunity to show what I could do.

"I have done three pictures with Maurice Tourneur, who was well pleased with my work for Neilan, and perhaps my best recent part was in 'Behind the Door,' another of those bad German officers. I played with Wallace Reid in 'The Love Burglar' and Priscilla Dean in 'The Beautiful Beggar.' Then Lois Weber came to me and said she had in mind a wonderful story—after seeing 'The Unpardonable Sin.' But before I can work with her I have a number of other productions in which strong parts are given me."

"You are not under contract, then?"

"No; I free-lance, but I am always engaged for five or six pictures ahead—it's not a case of worrying over the next engagement, thank the Lord!" said Mr. Beery, cheerily.

"How do you develop your characters? Do they grow on you as the play progresses, or can you see the whole thing from the very first inception of the role?"

"By no means. I always find them unfolding new possibilities as we go along. Of course, I have a general idea of what I shall do. For instance, in Tourneur's 'Romany Rye,' in which a peculiar English type was requisite, I made up as a Dickens character. I spent several days at the public library with a whole set of Dickens, studying the old pictures and reading his wonderful character sketches. Then I made up like one of the pictures, always keeping in mind the peculiar character given by Dickens. Mr. Tourneur was highly pleased with the result.

"When I was cast for 'The Round-Up,' I visited San Francisco and made an intensive study of Remington's famous pictures. You know his Westerns—those half-breeds, cowboys, Indians or Mexicans? I had a great part in 'The Round-Up.' You know, that is giving 'Fatty' Arbuckle a chance to drop comedy for a while. They hunted everywhere for a suitable type, until some one suggested that Mr. Arbuckle might be induced to play a part in the drama, for he's been wishing to get out of comedy for a long time.

"It was funny at meal time while we were on location. The food up in the mountains was of the type which never saw seasoning. Roscoe would empty nearly a whole pepper-shaker over his meat stew and say that he couldn't get the poor flavor originally found because the pepper gave it some character. Finally we all followed his advice and the landlord said he'd have to charge us extra for condiments. Talk about city profiteering. Why, the mountain folk aren't so far behind!"

"You lived in Japan, didn't you?"

"I had five months over there with my company. It is a poor place to live. All the meats have to be shipped in from our country or Australia, and they're rather stale most of the time. There is no way

THE MISSOURI WALTZ

Little Lessons That Mean Fortunes to Those Who Learn Them—History Repeats and Fame Is Achieved—An Old Story Retold

During the summer of 1914 John Valentine Eppel, who leads the Eppel Dance Orchestra at Oskaloosa, was a visitor down in the Ozark Mountains of Missouri, and while there he heard the natives humming a bit of a waltz tune that was a part of their very life. He brought it forth and tried it out as a dance offering. It was a waltz and the wise people all said that a waltz was impossible—that people wanted nothing but the fox trot or a one-step; but that is the way people generally say and do when a good thing is about to be started on its onward march.

Frederick Knight Logan took that little theme and arranged it for the piano. He then tried to sell it to the Barnhouse Publishing Co., of Oskaloosa, Ia. And, by the way, one real reason why Barnhouse just naturally turned it down was found in the fact that this same Frederick Knight Logan also lived at Oskaloosa.

Young Logan found that it was quite easy to compose music, but it wasn't so easy to sell it to a publisher. So he proceeded to publish it himself. That was in 1914. He first got out the arrangement for a piano, then he put it out for eleven parts and piano as an orchestra; then as a full orchestra. It was later arranged as a band number. By that time this young local venturer found himself swamped with orders, and he had about worn out the family wheelbarrow transporting his output to the post-office, so one day he got on the train and came to Chicago, determined to find a real publisher.

Of course the usual thing happened. The big city publishers pronounced it too cheap; it was really musically rotten to all of them—except F. J. A. Foster. That lustling, pushing plugger soon saw his judgment rewarded with orders. The more orders he received the more advice he also received, most of which was to the effect that he had picked a flivver.

Ask your dealer to show you how many ways the "Missouri Waltz" has been published; see if you can find any sort of arrangement that it hasn't been put thru; see if your player piano doesn't offer it in a half dozen different styles, then run it down and see how many different kinds of talking machine records you would have to buy if you would own one of each kind. These household necessities have the "Missouri Waltz" in every conceivable style, from its own original instrument, the mouth organ, to a symphony orchestra record. Grand opera stars and cabaret singers, soloists and choristers have all taken a trial at presenting this number. More than 2,000,000 records have been made of the "Missouri Waltz."

Not long ago we were sitting in a little confab discussing music and its relation to the lyceum and chautauqua movement when a cablegram was received by the publisher, asking for 100,000 copies of this same international favorite and with it the sales rights for the German-speaking countries.

Yes, the "Missouri Waltz" is an international affair. Not simply because F. J. A. Foster holds an international copyright on it, but because the people all over the world sing it, play it and listen to it. More than a million copies have been sold abroad, and it is still raging

This is more than mere boost for a song for the "Missouri Waltz" does not need boosting—to boost it is like attempting to paint the lily. What we have written is for those who want to learn the lessons that this wonderful success has to teach.

Don't think that Frederick Knight Logan grabbed this success right out of the air. He worked for it. He earned it. It didn't come to him—he went after it. For years he worked to prepare for his service. Those who saw his mother at the convention and saw her efficient help, saw the talented, inspirational assistance that she rendered, didn't need any one to demonstrate that song poem with words that tell of the "lingering moments divine" that animate her work and her very life as she collaborates with her talented son in the work that has made Frederick Knight Logan, "The Waltz King" of our day.

Marie Antoinette SKIN BLEACH

of getting fresh vegetables, and the rice riots were going on—so we were all glad to get back to God's country. In Tokio alone last year 85,000 women died of tuberculosis. That little country is just about the size of one of our smallest states and it's overcrowded. I don't wonder they all seem to want to come to California!"

"How about morals over there?"

Mr. Beery laughed. "I think the difference is that in this country we know the difference between right and wrong and do wrong anyway, and over there they don't know the difference and so they sin, too. I guess immorality is pretty much the same the world over—only motives may be different. They have two religions; the followers of Buddha are somewhat stoical, but the newer Shintoism allows lots of fun and gaiety. We used the old Buddhist temples for backgrounds, and it was marvelous to see what had been accomplished in rare carvings and decorations. I enjoyed that part immensely."

"Did your brother precede you in pictures, Mr. Beery?"

"Noah came in thru me. I'm thirty-three and he's thirty-eight—and both of us keen on the photodrama. The art of portraying unusual characters opens up a field not overcrowded, so that I am happily so placed that I may choose my next production field. That gives one opportunity to play in worth-while dramas. Leading men often have to take whatever is offered—and I always think that it must be very tiresome to act as 'feeder' to a strong feminine star. I prefer the individualistic work—in short, emotional characters."

In "Soldiers of Fortune," Mr. Beery had ample opportunity to show his talent for make-up. He's not a handsome man, but his face betrays force, the brown eyes are kindly, and there's a twinkle of mirth at the lip- corners. He is tall and supple, very athletic. One of the funniest early make-ups of Wallace Beery was in the "Swedie Series," done long ago by Essanay and remembered by fans all over the world. He used to enjoy doing comedy quite as much as he now leans to heavy character parts.

Married? Not now. The beautiful Gloria Swanson, who plays on the same lot nowadays, was formerly Wally Beery's wife. He leads a bachelor existence.

I might have known that you had gone Before they told me.

I might have known before.
The aspen-tree beside the gate—
Its leaves were still . . .
As still as death.

Lift Corns out with Fingers

A few drops of Freezone loosen corns so they peel off

Apply a few drops of Freezone upon a tender, aching corn or a callus. The soreness stops and shortly the entire corn or callus loosens and can be lifted off without a twinge of pain.

Freezone removes hard corns, soft corns, also corns between the toes and hardened calluses. Freezone does not irritate the surrounding skin. You feel no pain when applying it or afterward.

A small bottle of Freezone costs but a few cents at drug stores anywhere.

Wanted: Screen Faces for the Movies

Thousands of All Types Needed—Beauty or Experience Not Necessary

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for screen aspirants everywhere to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live or whether you are considered good looking, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

We do not teach "movie" acting. Ralph Ince, famous Selznick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his work in directing Mary Pickford, says: "I am convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." P. A. Powers, of Universal says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," just off the press, which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

Remember that salaries in this profession are big—that beauty plays but a small part—that experience is not necessary—and that thousands of all types will be needed to meet the tremendously growing demand. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrapping this new guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Address: Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-2, Wilmington, Delaware.

If you are not sincere in your desire to get in the movies, please do not send for this printed guide.

A Résumé of the Fame and Fortune Contest, Past and Present

rice Tourneur, Samuel Lumière, Carl Laemmle, Jesse Lasky, David Belasco, Blanche Bates and Eugene V. Brewster.

In September, 1919, the judges announced twenty-five honor roll beauties and invited them to come to New York for the making of final test scenes. Twenty-two responded promptly and arrived at the offices of our magazines on the appointed date, whence they were taken in automobiles to the country estate of Mr. Brewster, president and editor-in-chief of our three publications, at Roslyn, Long Island. Under the direction of Wilfrid North, the well-known motion picture director, the test scenes were made of these young ladies on that date and also on the following day. When these pictures were developed, printed and shown to the judges it was decided to spend two more days making test pictures of some of these twenty-two young ladies, and also of some others who had since appeared. It was also decided to write a scenario in which the young ladies would appear. Miss Gladys Hall, of our editorial staff, wrote the scenario, entitled "A Dream of Fair Women," suggested by Tennyson's poem, and Mr. North and some of the judges made a cast from this list of twenty-five young ladies. The play was completed in due course.

Nearly five thousand feet of film were taken, out of which about twenty-one hundred feet were selected and put thru the usual course of printing, cutting, titling, etc. Then a meeting of the judges was called to see the finished product. Some of the judges were unable to be present and photographs of the young ladies were sent to them. The result was that the following young ladies were selected as winners:

Miss Blanche McGarrity, San Antonio, Texas; Miss Virginia Brown, New York City; Miss Anetha Getwell, Chicago, Ill.; and Miss Anita Booth, Reading, Pa.

We had agreed to give the winners of the contest two years' publicity in our publications and to secure for them a contract with some good producing company. At the time the contest closed we expected there would be only one winner, but the result was that we had four to look after.

Miss McGarrity found it necessary to return to her home in Texas and decided not to accept a contract for the present. Miss Brown, who was only fifteen years old, was placed with the Universal Film Company under a contract which was approved by the Supreme Court, and which calls for a salary of $75.00 a week to begin with and ending at $750.00 a week. Miss Getwell was promptly placed with the American Cinema Corporation at $150.00 a week. She has also received other offers. Miss Booth received several offers and at the present writing is playing with Ralph Ince and is receiving $250.00 a week.

We also wish to add that among the near-winners were several who have also been successfully placed. Albert E. Smith, president of the Vitagraph Company, said that he would take four of the young ladies at a salary of thirty dollars a week, but at this writing none has accepted.

Miss Fay Brennan, of Washington, D. C., has been playing with a company which is producing in Washington; Miss Lanessa Carroll has been doing small parts for Goldwyn and other companies. Miss Helen Lee Worthing has been playing at the new Capitol Theater in New York City. Miss Margaret Falconer has been playing in Ziegfeld's Midnight Frolic in New York City, and also several others have been doing small parts here and there.

On the other hand, quite a number of the twenty-five were found to be not quite the types that are now required on the screen, and they returned to their homes, perhaps discouraged. They learnt that beauty and grace are not all that the screen requires, and that some of the most beautiful girls do not screen well, while many girls who are not so beautiful do. We have also learnt that it is impossible to pick winners from mere photographs.

In some cases the Editorial Committee, acting for the judges, wrote to the contestants advising them to call at our offices, if convenient, and many did so. In some of these cases the decision was favorable.

This year we have adopted the system of having a moving picture camera on hand, and as the contestants appear and pass the preliminary tests, they are put before the camera and a test picture is made to see how they photograph. If the committee thinks the contestant is not eligible, a test picture is not made of her, but her picture remains in the contest, nevertheless. Even if she does not pass the preliminary inspection, she still has a chance of winning the contest. With all the experience of ten years, and all of our accumulated knowledge of stars, present and gone, we do our best to give a verdict which will bear the test of the final review. It is obviously impossible to make a test of every one that comes. This would require a hundred cameras and operators and would involve an expense of many thousands of dollars. Only those who seem "to have everything" are accepted for test scenes.

This year we are making a five-reel feature in which will be embodied the test scenes of the twenty-five honor roll beauties. This picture will be a drama, and it calls for a number of characters other than the contestants themselves; hence we are making test scenes of girls, boys, young men and young women, and even of much older people in order to see if they will fit into the cast. Before the year is over we expect to have a classified list of screen possibilities of all types and ages. We shall make this list available for the producing companies and we hope in this way to find motion picture employment for many who would otherwise find no means of securing it. We are confident that the contest last year has produced at least two stars who will become internationally known, admired and classed with any ten stars that might now be mentioned. If we accomplish no more than this, we believe that our work has been well done. This year we intend to do still more, and there seems to be no limit to the possibilities.

As to the play which we produced, "A Dream of Fair Women," it is now on the market. All theaters in the United States will be able to show it. If you want to see it all you have to do is to ask your exhibitor for it. If he does not know where he can get it, tell him to write or telegraph Murray W. Garsson, 1600 Broadway, New York City, N. Y. It is a two-reel picture of decided beauty and interest. You will see in it some very pretty girls and some excellent acting on the part of young girls who had never been before a motion picture camera. You will see a few whom you may not think beautiful but who possess screen personality. However, we want you to see this little play and judge for yourself.

You will be doing a favor to your neighbors or distant friends by telling them about it so that they may enter the contest themselves or tell others. As the poet says, "Full many a flower is born to blush unseen and waste its fragrance on the desert air," but with the Fame and Fortune Contest running there is no excuse for any undiscovered Mary Pickford to say that she never had a chance.

"My brother wants to go on the screen—the brother that is seventeen—and I don't know what to tell him. I'm not sure that I want him to break in as an extra man. Only too often it is a case of once an extra man, always an extra man. The directors put you in that class and are afraid to take a chance on you for fear you'll spoil the picture. But, on the other hand, the continuous extra work accustoms you to different methods of direction and you lose all feeling of self-consciousness before the camera. Then, too, if you do get anything you appreciate it and don't let it drop in a hurry."

Which goes to show that he is a very wise young man.

But the most serious thing of all is—a girl! He didn't mention her name, of course, but he left no doubt as to her existence. However, he's not married yet, not even engaged—officially. And so, ladies, cheer up! There may be many girls before one finally proves fatal!

Dont Let Your Right Eye Know What Your Left Is Doing

By FRITZI REMONT

There was a time in the life of Bernard Turpin, popularly known by the nickname which dignifies a certain alarm clock—Ben—when his crossed eyes meant a tragedy. Now he has those same eyes insured for ten thousand dollars against their becoming un-crossed.

Almost every story ever written about Ben has given a different cause for his ability to see everything double save a pay-check. He had waited for us before confessing the truth. Here it is. While playing Happy Hoolligan for three years, he had to look cross-eyed nightly for from ten to twelve minutes, (not to mention the daily matinees), and one morning he awoke to the matutinal shave and discovered jest had been turned to earnest.

"If I'd been handsome, I'd have been a dramatic actor right along, but with these eyes wished on me I had to find something to do that would keep me in a permanent job," he said. "I didn't know the ropes in the old days of pictures, so when Essanay offered me twenty dollars a week, I thought I was on the way to Paradise. You see, I'd never earned more than twenty-five on the vaudeville circuits. I used to do everything from mopping floors to camera-grinding from scene-numbers. Anything to stay on that lot and earn a regular salary.

"Then the mash notes began coming my way. Sure, I have had them—only they are worse now, but that might be because I have a business manager and an income," he added, as he noted the peculiar look in my eye, which I tried in vain to conceal.

"I'm from old New Orleans, a Frenchman, all right. I began to act on the streets on amateur nights, in little side-shows. About the time I was seventeen I got married and went into vaudeville. It didn't take—the marriage, I mean, and as for the other, that didn't put me on easy street by any means. When I was thirty-three I tried it again—marriage, I mean, and if I were any happier—in spite of my facial handicap—or maybe because of it—I couldn't stand it, that's all."

Ben Turpin, like most comedians, is a better tragedian than many who are cast in heavy lines of straight drama. He is a comedian by birth, for France is the nation of mimics, and yet, if outward appearance allowed, he would probably be luxuriating in the tragic rôle of Hamlet.

"I really owe all I am to Charlie Chaplin and Mack Sennett," said Mr. Turpin. "The very first time I met Charlie Chaplin, he laughed for two hours, couldn't act at all. They told him to straighten up and get to business, but he said, 'I cant—that chap's blank expression has me laughing so I

Seeing the Pictures You Like

It's mighty important, these days, to see only the kind of pictures you like—especially when considering the wide range you have to choose from. You probably make your selection by choosing certain brands of pictures or by following your favorite players.

You do this because then you can be sure of seeing exactly the kind of pictures you like to see. You know beforehand which brand of picture stands for the very best or which star plays in only the best pictures.

And that's the safest way to choose a movie magazine. By selecting one which has been longest in building and which has the largest following.

MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE has been elected "First, Finest and Foremost." 495,000 movie fans did the electing. The May magazine will be over one-half million. Here are some of the articles to be featured—

A real heart-to-heart talk with Geraldine Farrar, operatic star and movie queen, beautifully illustrated, by Adele Whitely Fletcher.

Jimmy Morrison, the same Jimmy of old, comes back to us in a realistic chat by Gladys Hall.

Evelyn Martin, "Peg o' My Heart" of the speaking stage, is chatted by Lillian Montanye.

There is an article of unusual interest with unusual illustrations, entitled "Cinema Relations," by Truman B. Handy.

There is chat and gossip, the latest reviews of the silversheet, splendid fictionalizations, including "The Stolen Kiss," featuring Constance Binney.

The cover is from a painting by Evelyn Martin.

ture, "Treasure Island," (Paramount), and a little circus romance, "Her Elephant Man," (Fox).

Mr. Tourneur succeeded in catching a fair measure of Stevenson's rollicking spirit of a devil-may-care in the filming of his merry tale of pirates, buried gold and that boy of boys, Jim Hawkins. Mr. Tourneur followed the lead of a recent stage production in casting a girl for the rôle of Jim. There is no love element in "Treasure Island" and, psychologically, the presentation of a girl serves subconsciously to help fill this dramatic want. We rather like Miss Mason's mock boyishness. Tourneur's deftness of photography and screen picture is at its very best in "Treasure Island."

Miss Mason's "Her Elephant Man" really deserves little comment. It is simply a very crude and claptrap melodrama of circus life, with the little star as a bareback rider. Miss Mason gives a pleasant performance, but the single other thing we can now recall about "Her Elephant Man" is a fairly well done cyclone which wrecks the tent show.

Turning to weightier things, we pause before Lionel Barrymore's "The Copperhead," (Paramount), based upon Augustus Thomas' drama of a simple farmer who suffers every possible loss and indignity that he may serve the North as a spy thru the Civil War.

We were not particularly impressed with Charles Maigne's direction, which seemed to lack accent and gradation. Nor with the loose scenario. Moreover, Mr. Thomas' play, to our viewpoint, is a gloomy presentation of a rather futile sort of patriotism. We cannot reconcile our mind to the thought that the great Humanitarian, Lincoln, conceived and directed such a ghastly sacrifice.

We admit the force of Lionel Barrymore's playing as Lem Shanks, but Doris Rankin seems weak as "Ma" Shanks. And the ex-waiter who essays Lincoln is quite awful. Briefly, "The Copperhead" is very drab.

Speaking of Lincoln, Ralph Ince did the Emancipator in a two-part special, "The Land of Opportunity," (Selznick). Flashing back to Lincoln and an incident of his early campaigning days, this purports to hit at so-called Bolshevism, now believed to menace America. In the old Vitagraph era Mr. Ince seemed to us an admirable and graphic Lincoln. Not so now. Moreover, this two-reeler is but passably done.

While on the subject of two-reel productions, let us consider Mrs. Sidney Drew's celluloiding of Julian Street's "The Charming Mrs. Chase," in which she advances the theory that the quest of thrills after thirty is too much trouble for any sort of satisfaction. With fine and characteristic touches of subtlety, Mrs. Drew paints the gradual interest of a placidly satisfied husband in a charming "other woman," his lame search for romance, and his return to his home and comfortable chair with a sigh of relief. John Cumberland is delightful as the recreant hubby. There are a hundred and one little touches to lift the mild little comedy into the unusual and again stamp Mrs. Drew as a leader of the human cinema school. But one thing we deny Mrs. Drew and Mr. Street. That is the theory that thrills are missing after thirty. We're just over the thirty mark and we don't believe it—not yet!

"Huckleberry Finn," (Paramount), William D. Taylor's screening of Mark Twain's epic of boyhood, disappointed us, too. The scenario attempted to crowd too much of Twain into the photoplay, with the result that the film version is episodic and jumpy. There is a sickening effort to make the freckled Huck into a sentimentalist. But, with it all, Lewis Sargent does excellent work. His Huck Finn is a spontaneous and commendable bit of playing.

Allan Dwan's second independent production, "The Luck of the Irish," constructed from a Harold McGrath story, seems rather conventional in handling. It is a picturesque tale, a romance between a plumber and a pretty school-teacher extending all round the world. But, for all that, it runs in time-worn grooves, with the usual rich waster villain, a freckled boy for comic relief, and so on. We approve of James Kirkwood as the pipe expert hero, but Anna Q. Nilsson lacks sincerity as the cause of all the trouble and happiness.

"The 13th Commandment," (Paramount), with Ethel Clayton starred, is a sermon preaching the text, "Thou shalt not spend more than thou earnest." It runs along conventional lines. Miss Clayton deserves better material.

We found "Piccadilly Jim," (Selznick), which is screenically built for Owen Moore from the magazine story, by P. G. Wodehouse, to be fairly entertaining stuff. Piccadilly is a brash young American who gets into all sorts of scrapes, but manages to solve the difficulties of others and win the girl of his choice. We like Moore as Piccadilly, and a fine bit, of the spoiled child, "Oggie" Pett, is done by Reginald Sheffield. Zena Keefe does not, however, arouse our interest as the girl of the story.

Constance Talmadge is advancing once more. She plays with a delightful buoyancy in "Two Weeks," adapted from an Anthony Wharton play, "At the Barn." It is structurally weak, being another invasion of a bachelor Eden by a sprightly young woman, but Miss Talmadge invests it with sparkle and high humor. Conway Tearle is an excellent foil. George Fawcett makes his bit stand out vividly; indeed, he well nigh runs away with the whole comedy. Sydney A. Franklin's direction lacks incisiveness in places, but, on the whole, he has done rather well.

How You Can Have a Charming Personality

To Women! Dear Friends of my Sex:— Truly, I have good reason to be one of the happiest women in the world. For every mail brings me so many letters of appreciation. If you were in my place, you would be delighted to know that you were a real help to so many, to feel that you could be a sort of fairy god-mother to someone in need of just the kind of knowledge you had stored up and just the kind of sympathy you have in your heart.

Oh, the letters! How I love them all. They fairly breathe appreciation and friendship for the good things they attribute to me and my work. Here is one from a little woman in Allentown. I remember the first time she wrote me. Such a pathetic little letter it was, a sigh from beginning to end, mingling with a sort of forlorn hope that I, Juliette Fara, might be able to help her.

Yes, to help her. To show her how she might attain success, how she might throw aside the mantle of a gray, uninteresting and even repellant personality and be just what the Creator intended her to be, a glorious, magnetic little woman radiating charm and personality, captivating hearts of men and women alike with a new found power sparkling with the attraction that draws friends like a magnet, compels admiration, respect and all the other things in life worth having.

That's what my little friend wanted and that is what all of us want. Now she writes and tells me that she has attained the desire of her heart, and that to me—think of it, to me—she owes the credit of her success. Can you blame me for being elated and happy?

But hers is not a new story to me. I have dedicated my life to helping women overcome their imperfections, my whole being is wrapped up in a desire to enable you, dear Reader, as well as others of my sex, to attain the success that comes to those who will acquire the exquisite and charming ways which are so necessary if we women are to achieve the feminine success so dear to our hearts.

Perhaps you know that I spent years of my life in Paris, watching, studying, and analyzing the captivating ways of the French woman, she whose fame has spread to every land, she who holds in her hand the destiny of her country and her men, she to whom the power of attraction is an art and a science to be cultivated just as one would learn to play the piano or sing. What secrets have been revealed to me! What amazing things I have found in the French woman's treasure box of personality!

There was Mademoiselle Polaire, for instance, one of the most fascinating little bits of femininity I ever knew. Beautiful? Dear me, no! Mademoiselle was positively ugly of feature. But her people raved over her.

Juliette Fara

But Mademoiselle Polaire had personality, she understood the very things that I would like to teach to you who are far from being ugly, you—an American Girl—equipped as no other girl in the

CONSTANCE TALMADGE

THIS esteemable young lady has won a place in the hearts of millions. Study her picture well; it will make you think.

What man, woman or child has not been charmed by her superb acting, her magnetic personality, even as she has captivated you.

Note the tilt of her head, the sweet, quiet unassuming dignity in her easy, graceful pose. Remember—you have never heard her utter a word. She has no opportunity of portraying her thoughts and emotions in vivid, eloquent speech. By pose, motion and facial expression, she holds your attention, thrilling you, amusing you, leaving you with a lingering memory of her charming mannerisms.

All that Juliette Fara teaches, Miss Talmadge employs to her direct personal advantage, so much so that a prominent director said: "Mentally and physically she is able to adopt any attitude with the greatest ease and to express any emotion or shade of feeling. That is why she attained such nation-wide popularity."

Miss Talmadge has heartily indorsed the instructive knowledge which Juliette Fara imparts to women, and what Miss Talmadge indorses you should know. "How" you also can use the secrets which she uses to such advantage is explained to you in the free book "How" which the Gentlewoman Institute will send for the asking.

whole world is equipped, to cultivate a charming personality, to use the secrets I am ready to impart to you so that you can be just the wonderful, admiration-compelling woman you would like to be.

How often have you wished you could reach out your arms and draw close to your heart the devotion, the luxuries of life, the tender love that you see others enjoying! How often have you envied the woman who seemed so supremely happy in the shelter of a wonderful home and perfect love, the woman with scores of admirers at her feet, or another with an enviable position!

You have wondered why, gifted to no particular degree with beauty of either face or form, or endowed with but ordinary intellect or education—why some women attain their desires so easily.

I will answer you. They have personality.

the winsome charm that all women can have, once they know, the secrets.

Now, dear Reader, I do not want to seem the least bit mysterious, but you who wish to acquire a winning personality should know the secrets which I have found out. These I would like to whisper in your ear, to tell you confidentially, woman to woman, how I have achieved my success, and how I have helped so many of my sisters achieve theirs.

How many women there are who in some way or other find it desirable and even necessary to use every bit of honest persuasion they can summon to control the love and hold the interest of the men of their hearts! Sometimes they win over the thoughtless, indifferent or erring ones by weeping or arguments. But more often do they fail when they do not understand the true secret of winning personality for women.

Yes, if they only knew. If they would but work with head and heart instead of only the latter, using the knowledge, the secrets which would make the task so easy, the results so wonderful and everlasting. How I have longed to go to these women and say: "Let me teach you," instead of which I must stand aside and await the time they must realize that I have what they want.

Of course, there are all types of women in the world. Among those who have yet to attain a charming personality is the loud, aggressive, rather forward girl. Then there's the woman who is too shy and retiring. If you are either of these types, or if some other imperfection stands between you and your desires, I am sure I can help you. As the beautiful butterfly issues from the homely cocoon so should you emerge from the darkness and obscurity with a new found power at your command, with the alluringly beautiful personality of a woman whose hand is firmly on the throttle of her own destiny.

I want to make you sought after by both men and women. I want you to be the real center around which revolves every social function you attend. I want you to rise in business and make yourself so independent that you can choose your own pathway through life, gain and hold the love of the man of your heart, dispelling your troubles like fog before the bright sunshine. So I want you to learn what I have learned, to share with me the secrets of a winsome manner.

But this is not all I have to tell you. I would like to know you better and have you know me better. So first I suggest that you write for a little book into which I have written some of the wonderful secrets I know.

The Celluloid Critic

Wallace Reid has another spirited and amusing comedy in "Double Speed," (Paramount). Reid plays a harum-scarum young millionaire, Speed Car, who starts across the continent by automobile, has his car stolen, lands in Los Angeles as a hobo and gets a job as The Girl's chauffeur. Reid is clean-cut and likeable, as usual, and Wanda Hawley is a pretty reward for Speed Car's tribulations.

Will Rogers' "Water, Water, Everywhere," (Goldwyn), does not measure up to his previous comedy, "Jubilo." Indeed, this is slow and frequently dull. Rogers plays a big-hearted cowboy who sacrifices his own secret love for a young woman in aiding the reform of the man of her heart, a young doctor who is a victim of drink. Irene Rich lends an ingratiating characterization.

A certain warmth of spirit and the pungent odor of the Cumberland pines permeates "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come," (Goldwyn). Jack Pickford depicts the hero of John Fox, Jr.'s, widely read novel of the nameless lad who finds a name, a manhood and a love in the fiery test of the Civil War. As the primitive hero of the forests, young Pickford does well, but, to us, he falls distinctly short of the Fox hero in the wartime moments. Yet, on the whole, it is a pleasant picture. Clara Horton is as becurled a blonde cutie as any young movie hero might hope to find, but Pauline Stark has been ill advised as to facial make-up as the wistful mountain girl, Melissa. Dwight Crittenden stands out as the village schoolmaster. Wallace Worsley's direction is adequate, particularly in the choice of fine scenic locations.

Sewell Ford's nervy young hero, Torchy, has reached the screen in the person of Johnny Hines. The first of the series, (Master Films), is not particularly inspired. Hines seems too old for the boyish hero, we regret to report.

Photoplay Writing

offers a great opportunity to those who have ideas. The increased demand for motion pictures has brought hundreds of new producing companies into the field. The supply of good stories is not keeping pace with the demand and it is to the outside writer that the producers must look for new material.

As literary skill is not essential, the field is open to all. There are a number of things, however, that must be known in order to be able to put the story into acceptable form. This information—the information needed—may be obtained without any great expenditure of money or time. Our treatise offers you complete and detailed instructions.

Read what those who know have to say about our work: "Would be helpful to anyone who wants to learn the technique of writing for the screen"—Douglas Fairbanks Studio. Our "Young Visitors"

By FAITH SERVICE

Not so very long ago we had three distinguished young visitors for luncheon at No. 175 Duffield Street, Brooklyn. I use the term "young" advisedly. The three were Dorothy Gish, Lillian Gish and Mother Gish. "Mother," said Lillian, speaking of some recently taken family photographs, "is the beauty of the family" . . .

It is said by a very great many authorities on the diverse subject that Art is Realism. If this be so, the quintessence of Art can be handed, sans dispute, to Dorothy and Lillian Gish. Lillian is, in real life, the origin and source of her wistful screen prototypes. She is gentle; she is finely, gently intelligent; she is resourceful. There is to her an appealing personal charm even as the charm she gives us screenically.

Dorothy is Dorothy. She has humor. She has verve. She has "pep" and action. One is never certain what her next move will be, nor her next speech. Possibly she is not quite certain herself. Mother Gish regards "The Little Disturber" with something of apprehension.

We found no ostentation and no flurry of excitement at that luncheon. It would not be supposed that young visitors of fame were with us. Lillian asked questions, for the most part. And Dorothy lamented the fact that she plays in comedies when she had much, much rather play in drama, and lamented, still further, the fact that she had to work at all. "I never," she said, "crack a smile in between pictures. I couldn't be induced to."

Lillian, quietly, with the little air she has of one apart, observed that the ruling characteristic of human nature is to long to do the things one is not doing and for which one is not fit. She herself, she said, would much prefer to write.

At the time of their lunching with us they were house-hunting in Westchester county, to be near the new Griffith studio. We asked them what manner of home they were seeking and they informed us that it was to be a farm. Dorothy interpolated that a cow was to be the first object of their search. She couldn't, she said, conceive of what they would ever do with a cow. Now, chickens, a dog, cats, pigeons, even pigs . . . but a cow . . . We gathered that Dorothy has a probably wholesome fear of cows and we delicately suggested the same.

"Mother is the only brave one in the family," agreed Dorothy with equanimity. "We had a burglar scare in California, and Lillian and I nearly died of fright—under the bedclothes—goose-flesh and all that. Mother, on the contrary, sat straight up in bed, levelling a pistol at the door thru which her grimly intended victim was to come. She ac-

Presented by

MURRAY W. GARSSON

This picture shows the types wanted, as selected from the 1919 contest, and coincident with the running of the picture your exhibitor will conduct a local contest, the winner of which will be placed on the honor roll of the 1920 contest.

Tell your exhibitor to get in immediate touch with his exchangeman, or with Mr. Garsson, Foundation Film Corp., 1600 Broadway, New York City, regarding this film and the local contest.

Behind the Screen

Mary Pickford has been divorced from her husband, Owen Moore. The decree was granted by Judge Lanogan at Minden, Nev., on March 1, on the grounds of desertion.

Alice Joyce was married to James B. Regan, Jr., son of James B. Regan, proprietor of the Knickerbocker Hotel, one of the biggest New York hostels, on March 6th. The marriage took place at the Church of the Holy Innocents, New York, the ceremony being performed by the pastor, Rev. Thomas Lynch. Mr. Regan is a graduate of Yale, class of 1915, and he served in both the British and American armies in the recent war. Miss Joyce was previously married to Tom Moore, brother of Owen and Matt Moore.

Realmart announces Wanda Hawley as its new star.

King W. Vidor's first release on the First National program is "The Family Honor," Florence Vidor being featured.

Adolph Zukor, president of the Famous Players-Lasky Corporation, sailed on the Imperator on March 8th for Europe. So did William A. Brady.

Mrs. Sidney Drew has been visiting on the coast.

Sylvia Breamer has joined the Mayflower forces. She is to have the leading rôle in Robert W. Chambers' "Athalie." Sydney A. Franklin is directing.

Corinne Griffith has signed a new Vitagraph contract for another three years.

Winchell Smith, the playwright, has joined the Metro staff of scenario writers at Hollywood, Cal.

Myron Selznick has signed Arline Pretty as lead for his production of Wilford Mack's "The Prince of Pines."

During early March Pearl White and her William Fox company worked on the production of "The Tiger's Cub" at Port Henry, N. Y., with a temperature of 35° below zero. Thomas Carrigan was leading man.

Marcus Loew, who now owns 100 per cent. of the Metro Film Corporation, announces that the Metro will greatly increase the number and quality of its productions. From fifty to seventy-five productions will be released during the coming year and a $2,000,000 studio built on Long Island. The Loew interests are now building forty theaters.

Conway Tearle is to be starred by Nat Spitzer. The productions are to be made at the Bull's-Eye California studios.

Cartoon Stars make big money

Sidney Smith, Clare Briggs, Fontaine Fox and other cartoon stars make from $10,000 to $50,000 a year. Bud Fisher makes over $50,000 a year from Mutt and Jeff. R. L. Goldberg's yearly income is more than $125,000. Yet both Fisher and Goldberg started as $15 a week illustrators. Ministers, bookkeepers, and mechanics have become successful illustrators and cartoonists through the Federal School of Applied Cartooning. Don't let your present job hold you back. Capitalize your cartoon ideas. The way is now open to you.

Send Six Cents for "A Road to Bigger Things"

This book shows studio pictures of the 32 greatest American cartoonists who are on the staff of the Federal School. It tells how in one course you can learn cartooning, animated cartooning, chalk talking, and window card writing. One of these is your big field. It shows how, by home study, you can learn the skill, stunts, short-cuts, and the professional touch of these famous cartoon stars on the Federal Staff.

These stars make big money from simple cartoon ideas. Do you want their fame and incomes? Just fill in your name, age, occupation and address, and mail the coupon with six cents postage for this book that tells you how. Do it Now.

You Have a Beautiful Face BUT YOUR NOSE?

IN this day and age attention to your appearance is an absolute necessity if you expect to make the most out of life. Not only should you wish to appear as attractive as possible for your own self-satisfaction, which is alone well worth your efforts, but you will find the world in general judging you greatly, if not wholly, by your "looks," therefore it pays to "look your best" at all times. PERMIT NO ONE TO SEE YOU LOOKING OTHERWISE; it will injure your welfare! Upon the impression you constantly make rests the failure or success of your life. Which is to be your ultimate destiny? My new nose-shaper "Trados" (Model 24) corrects now ill-shaped noses without operation quickly, safely and permanently. Is pleasant and does not interfere with one's daily occupation, being worn at night.

Write today for free booklet, which tells you how to correct Ill-Shaped Noses without cost if not satisfactory.

The Old Canoe—Moonlight —and Us Two

Isn't it easy to bring to mind the cosy scene? The swish of limpid waters; subdued voices; the seductive harmony of stringed instruments—lilting notes—dreamy—elusive—soothing as a sweetheart's touch—crashing chords and syncopation, the spontaneous expression of the tingling joy of life and youth. Honestly, whether it be in the memory or but half-acknowledged hope, don't you thrill with the sweet intimacy of that cooling, moon-lit, music-caressed solitude?

But listen to a secret: It isn't the canoe—nor the moon, nor the water that plants the thrills in our hearts. It is the MUSIC—the lingering melodies that haunt us with thoughts of happy hours. And 'tis the same in any setting. Summer's shady nooks; snugly evenings of early Fall; Winter's cheery firesides—always and everywhere the music of the good old Gibsons seems to furnish the indefinable "something" that just naturally eliminates formality, makes hearts brighter, friendships more dear, and love the sweeter, and fills memory's storehouse with precious thoughts. This is the secret, but really there is no secret at all, for anyone can own and play a GIBSON.

Gibson Instruments

GIBSON Instruments are easy to play, and easy to pay for. They bring self-performed music within the reach of everyone. They are the ideal home and companion instruments, bringing into the lives of thousands, pleasure, privileges, cultural and social advantages that would otherwise be inaccessible.

Gibsons have played a part in hundreds of little romances—confidential human histories—about which we shall be glad to tell you. Also the Gibson book and free trial proposition sent for the asking. These will help you to become better acquainted with the Gibson family.

Dont Let Your Right Eye Know What Your Left Is Doing

cant stop. If you want me to work—get him out of here.’

“At that time I was getting twenty-five and Charlie was drawing twelve, fifty!”

I gave a pretty good imitation of Ben’s famous blank expression at this remark. Mr. Turpin settled his eyes on a couple of figures in the carpet and continued, unmoved. “Twelve hundred and fifty a week!” he said slowly. “I’d have thought that a slight prevarication if I hadn’t seen a check or two.

“Then one day Broncho Bullets Anderson came to me and offered a contract for two years at twenty-five per week. Nothing to worry about, he couldn’t discharge me—I couldn’t quit—and always a steady living for twenty-four months, hot or cold, stormy or sunshine!

“I reached for a pen with my fingers shaking. ‘Where?’ I said. Broncho Bullets pointed to a line near the bottom of the page, and it was all I could do to see it with my right eye. The left was off the job looking far into the future. Just for a bluff, I swirled the penholder around like a man getting ready to write fancy cards. Then I wrote—just as firm—Bernard Turpin! That settled me for two years—we worked at Niles, upper California.

“Then at last it dawned on me that I had sold myself for a mess of pottage. I began to hear of salaries. I discovered that I had made more than three million for the Essany—actually cleared that much on my pictures . . . and I was living on a clerk’s salary. We had hard work in those days—slapstick of the roughest sort.”

“How do you manage to look so blank when you know a piece of pie is coming at you, or that ice-cream is going down your back?”

“Never anticipate anything.”

“How can you help anticipating when you just know it is coming?” we persisted.

“Just dont—that’s all. Think of nothing, keep your mind an absolute blank—or you cant look blank, of course. I didn’t mind the custards or soft soap or soot and flour so much in the good old slapstick days,” he said, “but cold ice-cream running down your back is something that you cannot forget in a hurry. I’m glad those days are about over. We’re depending more on expression and funny situations now.”

“You are a scream in ‘Salome vs. Shenandoah,’” we hurried to say.

“I dont like it—and I dont like the public appearance I make as John the Baptist. I consider it sacrilegious—even if it is a travesty on the Theda Bara play. I was brought up better than that,” concluded Mr. Turpin, soberly and sadly, and if you ever want to know just how sad he can look, go and see one of his comedies.

Ben turns out a picture about eleven times a year. He is a hard worker, and even when he is not featured in a Sennett comedy, he is usually “rung in” for an extra bit.

A few months ago, he lost four of his best front teeth, because a man who was to kick him in the chest “lost his bearings and aimed too high.” Ben has been in the hospital thirty times for operations or breaks, occasioned by rough comedy. Such is the life of a comedian.

“When did you begin to think yourself worth more than twenty-five dollars weekly?” we asked, wishing to lead the conversation back safely to Mr. Turpin’s intrinsic value.

“I was playing with Charlie Chaplin in ‘A Night Out,’ and it was like costarring plus getting an extra’s wages. When we had finished two reels, Charlie said we were going out on a location on Monday. This was Friday. I said, ‘I’m not going a step unless I get five hundred dollars in cash—no checks for mine!’ There were two more reels and I made up my mind I’d quit pictures or earn what I thought I was worth. He coaxed and talked—but I said it was five hundred or nothing. He told me I must be ready to go on Monday at eight A. M. I said, ‘Not on your life. I stay right here unless I get the price in cash.’

“Monday he did not start. He finally offered three hundred, but I told him curfew would not ring that night. The company hung around until Tuesday, then five hundred pretty little bones were placed in my willing hands, and from that time on I considered myself a motion picture actor—and a fixture, including my eyes.”

Now Turpin owns his home, drives his own seven-passenger Studebaker and is a member of the Elks.

“Yes, I guess I’m getting popular,” admitted Mr. Turpin, without vanity. He is one of the most matter-of-fact individuals who ever faced a hard fall. Surprises mean nothing in his bright young life. “One lady fan—she’s married, too—wrote and asked me for one of my most cross-eyed pictures to hang in her bedroom, for she says that when she and her husband quarrel, she feels cheered up right afterwards if she can go and laugh at my picture. That’s doing good in the world, aint it?”

And, as to Ben’s famous mustache, he let me into a deep-dyed secret. The first one he ever wore was cut off the end of his own toupee! He almost had the style patented, he avers, but finally decided that while other men might imitate his “crêpe hair” appendage, they never could hope to attain the eloquence of ten-thousand-dollar eyes, so now a wig-maker has a steady contract to make these waterfall effects by the hundred.

And, like the immortal Pope, Bernard Turpin believes that “Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll; charms strike the sight—but merit wins the soul” of film fans everywhere.

We Believe in Everybody Who Believes in Himself

Reel Realities

At last the Church has actively enlisted the motion picture. This spring sees the Interchurch World Movement, the new coöperative organization formed by most of the Protestant denominations of the United States and Canada, using films to put the needs of the world before the country.

During the winter an expedition, numbering the Rev. A. V. Casselman, E. Lloyd Sheldon and Harry Keepers, sailed from San Francisco to film interesting things of the Far East. At about the same time another expedition, numbering Willard Price, editor of World Outlook, and Horace D. Ashton, departed from New York for North Africa and the Near East.

These two expeditions were sent out by the Interchurch World Movement in coöperation with the Educational Films Corporation. These represent, as pointed out by the Educational Film Magazine, the first sincere attempt of the Church to film the work of missions in foreign lands and to obtain unusual pictures of interest in this particular field. The expeditions will thus obtain two groups of films. The first, covering mission work and activities, will be later shown in churches. The second, to be released under the title, "World Outlook on the Screen," will be shown in motion picture theaters. Some 100,000 feet of film will be obtained in all.

This second group of motion pictures will delve into odd bits of strange lands never seen by tourists. Thus, for instance, they will touch upon the life of the women of the East as affected by modern progress. Again, they will reveal how the world war has brought civilization to the Arab and Bedouin in lonely desert spots.

The Far Eastern expedition sailed on the Persia on December 21st, and eight months will be spent in India, Burma, China, Japan and Korea. The Rev. Casselman is a widely known missionary leader. Mr. Sheldon is well known as an author, playwright and scenario writer. Mr. Keepers is the camera-man of the expedition. It will interest MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC readers to know that he was the camera-man responsible for the prize picture, "A Dream of Fair Women," now being shown thruout the country and made under the direction of Wilfrid North.

The other expedition will visit Egypt, Algeria, Turkey, Syria, Armenia, Palestine and parts of Italy. Mr. Price has attained prominence as an editor and Mr. Ashton is one of the best known photographers and motion picture men of two hemispheres. He is a fellow of the American Geographical Society and a member of the New York Academy of sciences.

Judging from British and Continental film publications, a certain steady falling off in sales of American photoplays is manifesting itself in England, Italy and Spain.

Indeed, in England the threat has been made of a high protective tariff on films. But this is hardly probable. American productions are being crowded by cheaper films of British, Italian, Scandinavian and even German make.

Many German films have piled up during the war and German manufacturers are trying to find a market for them everywhere. These make their appeal because they are workmanlike and cheap. British producers are distinctly worried over the situation. Can the ill-nourished infant British production stand this added competition, they ask. A movement is on foot to force the printing of the country of origin upon each and every film. This is to prevent the camouflaging of German films as Dutch, Swedish, Norwegian and Danish.

The rivalry between American and British films goes merrily on in England. Just now they are pointing with interest to the fact that, in the year 1918, there was a fall of 3,500,000 feet in the export of American film to England. Also that, in December, 1919, Britain exported films to an amount two and one-half times as great as the corresponding month of 1918. Yet The London Kinematograph sums up the matter clearly when it asks British screen men to drop the idea that Americans dislike British productions and seek to prevent their importation. "Let the British film maker drop the habit of appealing for 'equal treatment' from America until he has established his ability to give equal value. . . . The British producer who first achieves success on this firm basis of equality will, we venture to think, laugh heartily at the pitiful attempts occasionally made today to picture him as a hard-luck case."

A certain resentment runs thru British comments upon American productions. With some truth we must admit they protest the "naive faith of some American producers that one soldier of the United States is worth a few dozen of any other country."

Yet David Griffith's "Broken Blossoms" appears to have scored a triumph in London. The Daily Mail said:

"The whole production is filled with the spark of genius which raises it above any film drama yet made and opens a new road for the expression of the highest dramatic art on the screen."

And The Sunday Telegram said: "It is in every sense a masterpiece. David Wark Griffith has no equal. Others may emulate, but they never manage to get quite the same touch. 'Broken Blossoms' will be one of the big things of the year."

Camel Turkish and Domestic blend!

Camel CIGARETTES

YOU will prefer Camels smooth, delightful blend of choice Turkish and choice Domestic tobaccos to either kind smoked straight! It gives you an entirely new idea of cigarette enjoyment.

Camels never tire your taste no matter how liberally you smoke. They are always appetizing—and satisfying, because they have a desirable, mellow body.

Camels leave no unpleasant cigarettety aftertaste nor unpleasant cigarettety odor. In fact, every angle you get on Camels is so different from any other cigarette that you will be won as you were never won before!

That's why we say frankly—compare Camels with any cigarette in the world at any price! We know the answer.

Camels are sold everywhere in scientifically sealed packages of 20 cigarettes for 20 cents; or ten packages (200 cigarettes) in a glassine-paper-covered carton. We strongly recommend this carton for the home or office supply or when you travel.

ALADDIN HOMES

Readi-Cut

SAVE
$1000

Lumber shortages—a virtual famine of lumber—exists in many parts of the country. Reports indicate it is impossible even now to get material for certain needs. Stocks were never as low as they are now. The demand was never as great as it is now. THIS MEANS STILL HIGHER LUMBER PRICES. It means that prices will go upward rapidly—that it will possibly take $150 in six months or a year to buy $100 worth of lumber. Will you be forced to pay these prices? Will your need for a home in six months cost you a 50% or a 100% penalty?

Four Greatest Forests—Aladdin Lumber Yards

The Aladdin lumber yards are the four greatest forests of the United States. Each one has sufficient standing timber to take care of the needs of the country for many years. The possible lumber famine predicted in all parts of the country will not affect the Aladdin Co. Every Aladdin Home manufactured in 1920 will be shipped quickly and completely. No shortage of a few grades of material from the Aladdin house order. No hold-up on the job on account of lack of material.

BUY NOW—DON'T DELAY

Early buyers of Aladdin Homes are assured delivery. Aladdin buyers are also assured a big saving—from $300 to $1,000. BUT quick action is necessary. The enormous demand for homes will soon fill the Aladdin Mills to capacity. Your order will possibly be too late. An important message to every builder is contained in the Aladdin catalog. It is the message to you from the world's greatest homebuilding organization. Send to-day for this 100-Page Book, No. 2031.

tually fired a shot, altho it didn't make the mark. The burglar, however, was frightened away. I told mother that she had the heart of a murderer."

The Editorial Staff shook with a sort of composite mirth. It would be hard to suppose a murderer's heart in a Gish breast. There is something about each one of them, even to the more earthly Dorothy, suggestive, reminiscent of lavender and old lace, of quaint custom and lyric verse, of melodies fingered forth on a spinnet, of potpourri and minuets. It is the aroma of these things which they have brought with them to a hitherto less lovely medium of expression. They are, each one of them, whimsically characteristic. They have, individually and together, an atmospheric charm, from Mother Gish, who is but a slightly-grown-older Lillian, to Lillian herself, slender and potential, to Dorothy, sparkling and keen and young.

They are quite utterly unprofessional in their manner, in their point of view, in their bearing and talk. They might never have seen the inside of a studio. There are none of the earmarks. Probably there are no two girls more perfectly themselves. They have given a great deal and borrowed nothing. They do not talk of their work, if they can gracefully avoid it. They do not speak of their ambitions, nor of their successes, past, present or future. There is about them a fine reticence. They love their mother, their home and the best artistic expression of the work they are doing. These things come naturally to them and they express them naturally.

After they had been regretfully ushered out by Mr. Brewster and the rest of us, we asked each other the inevitable question after some one of the stars has taken luncheon with us at our more modern Round Table—"What do you think?," we wanted to know—and we all thought the same. Lillian was as we had thought she would be, from her portrayals on the silversheet. She was gentle, she was lovely, she was poetic, she was a thinker and a dreamer.

Dorothy was as we had thought she would be, must be, from her portrayals on the screen, humorous, lovable, vivid, "regular."

Mother Gish is the mother of the two, an eminently satisfactory arrangement, pro and con.

For these young visitors the house of the Big Three is ever open, the arms of the Editorial Staff the same, and the table ever round, with a capacity for being rounder!

LU LU 'HUCHON.—What do you mean by accusing my beard of being fluffy and kinky? You come in some day and I'll let you stroke it. So your brother thinks Elsie Janis is a regular "peachero." I dont know what that is, but tell your brother I agree with him. And just tell that brother of yours he's got me wrong with the ladies. Yes, I sure do admire Charlie Ray. So you like Tamar Lane's stuff in the MAGAZINE. Yes, he's almost as bright as I am. Write again.

ONE MILLION DOLLARS A YEAR

is being made by several persons in the Motion Picture Industry.

One Hundred Dollars a Week

is being made by thousands of persons in the Motion Picture Industry.

Hundreds of Thousands of People are asking every day such questions as these:

- How can I get into the Motion Picture business?
- Can I become a photographer?
- Have I sufficient talent?
- Have I the necessary personality?
- How can I become a Motion Picture Director?
- Can I become financially interested in Motion Pictures?
- Can I write for Motion Pictures?
- Have I a "Motion Picture face"?
- Can I train myself for any branch of the business?
- If I have the talent and ability to become a picture star, how can I get a start?

These are questions that have long remained unanswered. But they can be answered. There have been schools that pretend to teach Motion Picture acting, but they are generally frowned upon by the profession. Personality, charm, winsomeness and beauty are God-given gifts. They can be cultivated and improved, but not created. Acting is a natural talent. Some have it, others acquire it, but most people who haven't it never will learn it. Grace is natural to some, but most people can acquire it. There is no rule about beauty, grace, charm, etc., and some may win without any one of the supposedly necessary requirements.

If you want to try to win a place in the great Motion Picture Industry, send five cents in stamps for this booklet, "Who Can and Who Cannot Get Into the Pictures and Why?" Address it to

THE GREAT

1920 FAME AND FORTUNE CONTEST

Are you beautiful?
 Do you possess charm?
 Do you think yourself a potential Mary Pickford or Theda Bara?
 Does your environment make it impossible for you to act, but not to dream?
 Do you live in a make-believe world all your own, far removed from the dull reality of your daily life?
 Do you dream of fame and fortune and all the big things of life? Do you long for a fairy godmother who will some day touch you with her magic wand—and like Cinderella-of-the-ashes, transform you from a dull, drab cocoon into a beautiful butterfly?

The New Fame and Fortune Contest

Is the fairy godmother of all the movie fans of the country. By the magic power of the press, she will seek you out, no matter how small your hiding place. She will open up to you a new world—a new vista of life with all its wonderful gifts! Thru the power of the greatest motion picture publications, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, the golden opportunity of your life is offered to you. Remember the old adage which, tho it may bore you by its familiarity, yet carries the force of a great truth—Opportunity knocks but once!

Go to your photographer. Have him make a photo of you which will be you.
 Send it in as early as possible.

It may interest you to know that a great five-reel feature drama has been written and will be produced in connection with The Fame and Fortune Contest of 1920. The Honor Roll girls will all appear in this picture.

“A Dream of Fair Women”

Which brought the twenty-five Honor Roll girls of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest before the eyes of the world, has been completed and you may see this wonderfully interesting picture in your own home town! If the manager of your home town theater has not already secured this film for exhibition, tell him to get in touch with Murray W. Garsson, Foundation Film Corp., 1600 Broadway, New York. See it! It will give you an idea of what you will be doing if you are one of the Honor Roll winners.

RULES FOR THE CONTESTANTS

Contestants shall submit one or more portraits. On the back of each photo an entrance coupon must be pasted. The coupon must be from either THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, CLASSIC or SHADOWLAND, or a similar coupon of your own making.

Postal card pictures and snap-shots not accepted. Tinted photographs cannot be reproduced in magazine.

Photos will NOT be returned to the owner.

Photographs should be mailed to CONTEST MANAGER, 175 Duffield St., Brooklyn, N. Y. Send as many as you like.

The contest is open to every man or woman, except those who have already played prominent screen or stage rôles. There is no age limit.

Contest closes Aug. 1, 1920.

Portraits of Your Favorites

TWENTY-FOUR LEADING PLAYERS

What is a home without pictures, especially of those one likes or admires? How they brighten up bare walls and lend a touch of human sympathy, alike to the homes of the rich and poor!

And what could better serve the purpose of decoration for the homes of motion picture enthusiasts than portraits of the great film stars, who have become world-wide famous?

The publishers of the three leading motion picture monthlies, the MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND, have accordingly prepared at great expense, especially for their subscribers, an unusually fine set of portraits of twenty-four of the leading players.

These portraits are 5 1/8" x 8" in size, just right for framing, printed in rich brown tones by rotogravure, a process especially adapted to portrait reproduction, and are artistic, accurate and high-grade in every way.

You will like these portraits, and you will enjoy picking out your favorites. You will delight in framing them to be hung where you and your friends may see them often.

Regarding Delays

As we have announced before, the great printers' strike in New York interfered seriously with the publication and distribution of every periodical that was printed in and around New York City. Many publications went bankrupt, and several have not yet recovered from the catastrophe. Every one of them has suffered immeasurably. Not only did the strike mean several months' delay in getting out the magazines, but it meant a terrible confusion in every editorial office.

Those publishers who tried to get their magazines out in spite of the strike, adopted various methods, among which was the sending of one piece of work out of town and another piece of work to another town, and still another part of the publication to some other place or to be done by some other process. Some of this matter was lost, other parts were printed so badly that they could not be used, and the working machinery of every editorial office was sadly disrupted.

On the top of this came blizzards with their accompanying traffic obstructions, and for weeks it was impossible to move the printed magazines from the printeries to the post-offices. Then came blizzards and freight congestions in other parts of the country, which further delayed matters. It never rains but it pours, and to add to our troubles, came the announcement that there was a serious shortage of paper in the world, necessitating the cutting down of the supply used by various publishers. It is certain that some publications must go out of existence, and it is well known that many large newspapers and magazines have been compelled to cut down either the size of their edition or the number of pages.

But now, since the strike is over and the winter also, the sun shines once more and we emerge from the maze of difficulties more hopeful than ever.

Unless something unforeseen occurs, our three magazines will be published on time hereafter, and the contents will be superior. We have taken up the missing threads of various departments and now have them well in hand. Those readers who have been lenient with our shortcomings and patient with us for the numerous delays in getting their magazines, have our warmest thanks and gratitude. We are looking for better things in the future, and we can see no reason why we shall not be able to give you finer magazines than ever, and give them to you on the very day that we promise them.

Stars Needed

Any exhibitor will tell you that there are not enough stars. Good stars are scarce, and they are nearly all tied up with contracts with a very few companies. New companies are forming every day and they require stars. This makes the demand greater than the supply. The producers have been objecting to the High Cost of Stars, and the exhibitors are complaining of the High Cost of Films. Some have even gone so far as to state that the Star System must go. But there will always be a demand for stars and when there are enough stars to supply the demand there will be a better feeling all around and the film industry will advance and prosper. Again, it is evident that many of our well-known stars are passing out—some retiring of their own accord, and some losing their popularity and drawing power. It is quite clear, therefore, that we must have more stars. Where are they to come from? We maintain that there is no better way to discover and introduce new stars than the Fame and Fortune Contest, which is conducted every year by the three leading magazines,—MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND. This being true, it should be warmly supported by producers, exhibitors and public alike.

YOU CAN GET INTO THE MOVIES IF YOU WANT TO

Maybe you're all ready now, but don't know exactly how to go about it, or maybe there's a few technicalities unfinished or overlooked; or possibly there's a whole lot you don't know and need to know.

In any case, we are in a position to offer you sound suggestions. Cut out the coupon below, and enclose 5c for postage for our booklet "CAN I GET INTO THE MOVIES?" Then you judge!

Pathé Serials

"An exciting story, please!"
How many times have those words been spoken over the desk at the Public Library!

Exciting stories! How much in demand they are with the readers of the popular magazines! The love for them is universal; it begins and ends with no one class or creed.

Pathé Motion Picture Serials are always exciting; they are written, produced and acted for the great public that wishes to be lifted for a little while from the hum-drum facts of everyday life. They are thrilling, entertaining and always clean. There is a motion picture theater in your vicinity that shows Pathé serials; it will be easy to find it!

Now showing: Ruth Roland in "The Adventures of Ruth;"
George B. Seitz in "Bound and Gagged;" Pearl White in "The Black Secret" from Robert W. Chambers' book "In Secret;"
Jack Dempsey in "Daredevil Jack."

Coming: "Trailed by Three" with Frances Mann and Stuart Holmes; George B. Seitz in "Pirate Gold," (with Marguerite Courtot) and others.

Conspicuous Nose Pores How to reduce them

COMPLEXIONS otherwise flawless are often ruined by conspicuous nose pores. The pores of the face are not as fine as on other parts of the body. On the nose especially, there are more fat glands than elsewhere and there is more activity of the pores. These pores, if not properly stimulated and kept free from dirt, clog up and become enlarged.

To reduce them: wring a soft cloth from very hot water, lather it with Woodbury's Facial Soap, then hold it to your face. When the heat has expanded the pores, rub in very gently a fresh lather of Woodbury's. Repeat this hot water and lather application several times, stopping at once if your nose feels sensitive. Then finish by rubbing the nose for thirty seconds with a piece of ice.

Notice the improvement the very first treatment makes—a promise of what the steady use of Woodbury's Facial Soap will do. But do not expect to change completely in a week a condition resulting from long continued exposure and neglect. Use this treatment persistently. It will gradually reduce the enlarged pores and make them inconspicuous.

Begin TONIGHT the treatment your skin needs

Get a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap and begin tonight the treatment your skin needs. You will find Woodbury's on sale at any drug store or toilet goods counter in the United States or Canada. A 25c cake will last a month or six weeks.

In the booklet which is wrapped around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap, you will find complete treatments for the commoner skin troubles, including Conspicuous Nose Pores, Blackheads, Skin Blemishes, Oily Skin and Shiny Nose, Coarsened Skin, Tender Skin, Sluggish Skin, etc.

Sample cake of soap with booklet of famous treatments and samples of Woodbury's Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream for 15c

For 6c we will send you a trial size cake (enough for a week or 10 days of any Woodbury Facial treatment) together with the booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch." Or for 15c we will send you the treatment booklet and samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream. The July Motion Picture Magazine!

Some ten or twelve years ago a small periodical, hiding its trepidation under a cover photograph of Thomas A. Edison, went forth on its first journey alone, out into a very indifferent world. The trip could be easily compared to the first trip made by the brain-child of Robert Fulton.

This humble instrument of literature was none other than THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, the same magazine of today—and yet not quite the same, for the growth of its popularity has been remarkable—and tho the seas have sometimes been rough and the sailing uncertain, it has weathered all storms, arriving in port as the greatest magazine of its kind in the world!

You think this a rash statement, perhaps? Get the July number and judge for yourself!

The cover is the latest portrait of Miss Blanche McGarity, a winner of the Fame and Fortune Contest of 1919. There is also an interview with this newly arrived motion picture star.

Wonder what a studio mail clerk thinks about? Especially when he has to stagger daily under the carloads of movie fan letters. In "The Confessions of a Studio Mail Clerk," by himself, you will find many new sidelights on this all-important subject.

Bert Lytell is seen thru the fascinated eyes of Elizabeth Peltret. Sometimes it is pretty nice to be an interviewer, says Elizabeth!

Brides are always interesting in the honeymoon stage, and when the bride happens to be Alice Joyce, the bright star of Vitagraph—well, you just have to read what Gladys Hall has to say about it in that interview she had with Alice toher day!

And the new novelizations—and the new pictures of all the popular stars! And the latest California gossip told by "one who knows."

THE GIRL ON THE COVER

(Painted by Leo Sielke, Jr., from a photograph by Albin.)

THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC takes a great deal of pleasure in presenting Virginia Brown Faire, one of the four winners of the 1919 Fame and Fortune Contest, as its cover subject. Miss Faire is already well upon her way to fame and fortune with the Universal Company, having a most unusual five-year contract.

Before the Fame and Fortune Contest discovered her, little Miss Faire was absolutely unknown. Her remarkable type of beauty quickly singled her out from among the thousands of contestants and later won her a place among the Universal featured players.

Wanted: Screen Faces for the Movies

Hundreds of All Types Needed. You May Have Perfect Screen-Features

For the first time in the history of moving pictures it is now possible for you to get consideration from the big film directors. No matter where you live, we get your photograph before the directors, many of whom are in urgent need of new "screen-faces."

Ralph Ince, famous Selznick director, says: "There are many young girls who could make good in the movies. I will be very glad to take advantage of your service." Marshall Neilan, known everywhere for his wonderful production, "The River's End," says: "I am convinced that the service you render screen aspirants offers many new personalities to moving picture directors." E. A. Powers, of Universal, says: "A new crop of film stars will be needed at once to supply the insistent demand."

With the assistance of famous directors and motion picture stars we have prepared a printed guide, "The New Road to Film Fame," just off the press, which tells you what to do and gives full directions.

It also contains endorsements of our service from famous people, statements from directors, portraits of celebrated stars and direct advice to you from Mollie King.

This is a fascinating profession paying big salaries. Don't miss this opportunity. Send ten cents (Postage or Coin) to cover postage and wrapping this new guide. Get it at once—it may start you on the road to fame and fortune. Screen Casting Directors Service, Dept. B-3, Wilmington, Delaware.

If you are not sincere in your desire to get in the movies, please do not send for this printed guide.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

(Readers in distant towns will do well to preserve this list for reference when these spoken plays appear in their vicinity.)

Astor.—Fay Bainter in "East Is West." The story of a quaint little Chinese maid who falls in love with a young American. Racial barriers seem insurmountable, but there is a happy and surprising ending. Has all the ingredients of popular drama.

Belasco.—"The Son-Daughter," with Lenore Ulric. George Scarborough and David Belasco's highly colored Chinese melodrama with the vivid Miss Ulric. One of the big hits of the season.

Booth.—"The Purple Mask," with Leo Ditrichstein. A stirring, romantic melodrama of the days of the First Consulate in France; tense, colorful and highly interesting. One of the best evening's entertainments in New York. Mr. Ditrichstein is delightful as the royalist brigand, the Purple Mask; Brandon Tynan is admirable as the republican police agent, Brisquet; Lily Cahill is a charming heroine, and Boots Wooster makes her bit of a peasant girl stand out.

Broadhurst.—"Smilin' Through," with Jane Cowl. An odd, but effective, drama which purports to show how those who have gone before influence and watch over our lives. Miss Cowl is exceedingly good as a piquant Irish girl and also as a spirit maid whose death occurred fifty years before. "Smilin' Through" will evoke your smiles and tears.

Casino.—"My Golden Girl." A passable musical entertainment with a score by Victor Herbert. A chorus girl, Jeannette Dietrich, scores the hit of the show.

Central.—"As You Were," with Irene Bordoni and Sam Bernard. A delightful musical show in which Miss Bordoni dazzles as the various sirens of history. Pleasant music and a pleasant chorus lend effective aid.

Century.—"Florodora." The much-heralded revival of the widely popular musical show of some twenty years ago. Done with charm, distinction and humor. Eleanor Painter's singing stands out vividly and George Hassell's humor is highly diverting. Then, of course, there is the famous "s sextette." Here is a revival that really revives.

Cort.—"Abraham Lincoln." You should see this if you see nothing else on the New York stage. John Drinkwater's play is a noteworthy literary and dramatic achievement, for he makes the Great American live again. "Abraham Lincoln" cannot fail to make you a better American. Moreover, it is absorbing as a play. Frank McGlyn, a discovery, is a brilliant Lincoln.

Comedy.—"My Lady Friends." Highly amusing entertainment adapted from a Continental farce. Much of the humor is due to the able work of Clifton Crawford in the rôle of the guileless young publisher of Bibles whose efforts to spend money get him into all sorts of difficulties. June Walker scores in Mr. Crawford's support.

Eltine.—"Breakfast in Bed," with Florence Moore. A rather amusing farce satirizing the movies with vaudeville's lady clown, Miss Moore, working very hard to put it over.

Empire.—"Déclassée," with Ethel Barrymore. One of the big things of the dramatic season is this clever play by Zoe Akins. Whether or not it has the basis of truth, it is brilliantly written and is well played by Miss Barrymore.

Forty-Eighth Street.—"The Storm." A well-told melodrama of the lonely Northwest with a remarkable stage effect of a forest fire. Helen MacKellar is admirable as the piquant French-Canadian heroine.

Forty-Fourth Street.—"Look Who's Here," with Cecil Lean. A passable musical entertainment that entertains when Mr. Lean and Cleo Mayfield hold the center of the stage.

Globe.—"Apple Blossoms." The ambitions and much-heralded operetta of Fritz Kreisler and Victor Jacobi plus colorful Joseph Urban settings. An offering far above the musical average. John Charles Thomas sings admirably, Wilda Bennett is an attractive heroine and Florence Shirley lends a piquant personality to the proceedings.

Harris.—"Three Showers." A musical comedy of Dixie, staged by the Coburns, who produced "The Better 'Ole." Rather dull and not very inspired. Anna Wheaton is the featured member of the cast.

Hippodrome.—"Happy Days." Big and spectacular production typical of the Hippodrome. The diving girls are again a feature, disporting in the huge "Hip" tank.

Hudson.—"Clarence." Booth Tarkington's delightful comedy, built about the way a returned soldier renited a disturbed but typically American household. Superb performances by Alfred Lunt, Glenn Hunter and Helen Hayes give the comedy a fine verve.

Knickerbocker.—"Shavings." A pleasant bucolic entertainment based upon Joseph C. Lincoln's familiar Cape Cod stories. Harry Berestord is featured in a gentle, whimsical characterization.

Little Theater.—"Beyond the Horizon," by Eugene O'Neill. This powerful drama was produced at a series of special matinees and proved so successful that it won a theater all its own. A gripping study of a human being crushed by environment, told with compelling force. One of the biggest native dramas of years. Richard Bennett heads a remarkable cast.

Marine Elliott's.—"What's In a Name?" The most beautiful musical entertainment, with the possible exception of the Ziegfeld revues, yet seen on Broadway. Colorful new art stage designs, remarkable use of lights and gorgeous costumes lift it into the realm of the exquisite. Intelligently written and put together, too.

Morocco.—"Sacred and Profane Love," with Elsie Ferguson. An absorbing—if loosely conceived—drama by Arnold Bennett which marks the return of Miss Ferguson to the speaking stage. It is the story of the remarkable love of a keenly mental authoress for a musical genius who slips into the slough of drugs. Miss Ferguson has many admirable moments and Jose Ruben contributes some brilliant playing as the drug wreck.

New Amsterdam Roof.—Ziegfeld 9 o'clock and midnight revues. Colorful entertainments unlike anything to be found anywhere else. Mlle. Spinely, a Parisian favorite, is now in the cast of the two revues. Mary Hay stands out and the entertainers include Fanny Brice, Carl Randall and W. C. Fields.

Nora Bayes Theater.—"Lassie." A charming and pleasantly tuneless little musical comedy of Scotland and London in the picturesque sixties. Based upon Catherine Chisholm Cushing's "Kitty MacKay." Tessa Kosta sings pleasantly and Mollie Pearson and Roland Bottomley are prominent. Dorothy Dickson and Carl Hyson contribute some delightful dance interludes.

Playhouse.—"The Wonderful Thing." A human play built around a poverty-stricken but blue-blooded English family into which Jeanne Eagels comes as a wealthy heiress and wife of the eldest son. Pleasant drama.

Republic.—"The Sign on the Door." A very good melodrama which boasts many instances of the unexpected—and Marjorie Rambeau in highly emotional scenes.

Shubert.—"The Blue Flame," with Theda Bara. A lurid melodrama with the famous Theda in the dual rôle of an ingénue with and without a soul. It is breaking box-office records, proving that every one wants to see Miss Bara "in person."

Thirty-Ninth Street Theater.—"Scandal." Cosmo Hamilton's daring drama which Constance Talmadge played on the screen. Francine Larrimore and Charles Cherry have the leading rôles in the excellent footlight production.

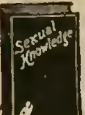

Winter Garden.—"The Passing Show of 1919." A typical girly garden show in which the famous runway gets plenty of use. The revue presents a number of travesties upon current attractions, particularly colorful being that of "The Jest," with Charles Winniger doing a clever burlesque of Lionel Barrymore.

How I Improved My Memory in One Evening

The Amazing Experience of Victor Jones

"Of course I place you! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle.

"If I remember correctly—and I do remember correctly—Mr. Burroughs, the lumberman, introduced me to you at the luncheon of the Seattle Rotary Club three years ago in May. This is a pleasure indeed! I haven't laid eyes on you since that day. How is the grain business? And how did that amalgamation work out?"

The assurance of this speaker—in the crowded corridor of the Hotel McAlpin—compelled me to turn and look at him, though I must say it is not my usual habit to "listen in" even in an hotel lobby.

"He is David M. Roth, the most famous memory expert in the United States," said my friend Kennedy, answering my question before I could get it out. "He will show you a lot more wonderful things than that, before the evening is over."

And he did. And as he went into the banquet room the toastmaster was introducing a long line of the guests to Mr. Roth. I got in line and when it came my turn, Mr. Roth asked, "What are your initials, Mr. Jones, and your business connection and telephone number?" Why he asked this, I learned later, when he picked from the crowd the sixty men he had met two hours before and called each by name without a mistake. What is more, he named each man's business and telephone number, for good measure.

I won't tell you all the other amazing things this man did except to tell how he called back, without a minute's hesitation, long lists of numbers, bank clearings, prices, lot numbers, parcel post rates and anything else the guests gave him in rapid order.

* * * * *

When I met Mr. Roth—which you may be sure I did the first chance I got—he rather bowled me over by saying, in his quiet, modest way:

"There is nothing miraculous about my remembering anything I want to remember, whether it be names, faces, figures, facts, or something I have read in a magazine.

"You can do this just as easy as I do. Anyone with an average mind can learn quickly to do exactly the same things which seem so miraculous when I do them.

"My own memory," continued Mr. Roth, "was originally very faulty. Yes it was—a really poor memory. On meeting a man I would lose his name in thirty seconds, while now there are probably 10,000 men and women in the United States, many of whom I have met but once, whose names I can call instantly on meeting them."

"That is all right for you, Mr. Roth," I interrupted, "you have given years to it. But how about me?"

"Mr. Jones," he replied, "I can teach you the secret of a good memory in one evening. This is not a guess, because I have done it with thousands of pupils. In the first of seven simple lessons which I have prepared for home study, I show you the basic principle of my whole system and you will find it—not hard work as you might feel—but just like playing a fascinating game. I will prove it to you."

He didn't have to prove it. His course did; I got it the very next day from his publishers, the Independent Corporation.

When I tackled the first lesson, I suppose I was the most surprised man in forty-eight states to find that I had learned in about one hour—how to remember a list of one hundred words so that I could call them off forward and back without a single mistake.

That first lesson stuck. And so did the other six.

Read this letter from Terence J. McManus, of the firm of Olcott, Bonyong, McManus & Ernst, Attorneys and Counsellors at Law, 170

"Of course I Place You! Mr. Addison Sims of Seattle"

Broadway, and one of the most famous trial lawyers in New York:

"May I take occasion to state that I regard your service in giving this system to the world as a public benefaction. The wonderful simplicity of the method, and the ease with which its principles can be acquired, especially appeal to me. I may add that I already had occasion to test the effectiveness of the first two lessons in the preparation for trial of an important action in which I am about to engage."

Mr. McManus didn't put it a bit too strong. The Roth course is priceless! I can absolutely count on my memory now. I can call the name of most any man I have met before—and I am getting better all the time. I can remember any figures I wish to remember. Telephone numbers come to mind instantly, once I have filed them by Mr. Roth's easy method. Street addresses are just as easy.

The old fear of forgetting (you know what that is) has vanished. I used to be "scared stiff" on my feet—because I wasn't sure. I couldn't remember what I wanted to say.

Now I am sure of myself, and confident, and "easy as an old shoe" when I get on my feet at the club, or at a banquet, or in a business meeting, or in any social gathering.

Perhaps the most enjoyable part of it all is that I have become a good conversationalist—and I used to be silent as a sphinx when I got into a crowd of people who knew things.

Now I can call up like a flash of lightning most any fact I want right at the instant I need it most. I used to think a "hair trigger" memory belonged only to the prodigy and genius. Now I see that every man of us has that kind of a memory if he only knows how to make it work right.

I tell you it is a wonderful thing, after groping around in the dark for so many years to be able to switch the big searchlight on your mind and see instantly everything you want to remember.

This Roth course will do wonders in your office. Since we took it up you never hear anyone in our office say "I guess" or "I think it was about so much" or "I forgot that right now" or "I can't remember" or "I must look up his name." Now they are right there with the answer—like a shot.

Have you ever heard of "Multigraph" Smith? Real name H. O. Smith, Division Manager of the Multigraph Sales Company, Ltd., in Montreal. Here is just a bit from a letter of his that I saw last week:

"Here is the whole thing in a nutshell: Mr. Roth has a most remarkable Memory Course. It is simple, and easy as falling off a log. Yet with one hour a day of practice anyone—I don't care who he is—can improve his Memory 100 per cent in a week and 1,000 per cent in six months."

My advice to you is don't wait another minute. Send to Independent Corporation for Mr. Roth's amazing course and see what a wonderful memory you have got. Your dividends in increased power will be enormous. VICTOR JONES.

While Mr. Jones has chosen the story form for this account of his experience and that of others with the Roth Memory Course, he has used only facts that are known personally to the President of the Independent Corporation, who hereby verifies the accuracy of Mr. Jones' story in all particulars.

Send No Money

So confident is the Independent Corporation, the publishers of the Roth Memory Course, that once you have an opportunity to see in your own home how easy it is to double, yes triple, your memory power in a few short hours, that they are willing to send the course on free examinations. Oh, that delightful, smooth, sweet, clean feeling that comes from using Boncilla Beautifier! No woman desirous of a beautiful skin should ever be without this perfect toilet requisite—Ethel Clayton.

Boncilla Beautifier

Prepared from Mme. Boncilla's famous formula CLEARs THE COMPLEXION
REMOVES BLACKHEADS
LIFTS OUT THE LINES
CLOSES ENLARGED PORES

Gives the skin a velvety softness and youthful texture. You can now take these treatments yourself by a simple application of this wonderful preparation.

In a few minutes after applied you feel the soothing, lifting sensation that assures you of its work of youthful restoration. It lifts out the lines.

Boncilla Beautifier is more than a skin treatment. It acts on the muscles and tissues of the face, giving a firmness and youthfulness in place of any sagging of the skin or tissues of the face. It also renews the circulation of the blood in the face, giving it a renewed fresh, clear, radiant glow of health.

You will note the improvement from the first treatment. Use twice a week until you get the face free from lines and other imperfections, then occasionally to keep it so.

You shall not be disappointed, for if it does not fully satisfy you, we return to you the full price paid, as per our guarantee with each jar.

If your dealer will not supply you promptly, send $1.56 covering price and Revenue Stamps.

Stage Plays That Are Worth While

ON TOUR

"Mamma's Affair."—Rachel Butler's admirably written comedy—a study of that deadly human specie, the hypochondriac who fancies herself suffering from all sorts of ills. Done with distinction and fine discernment. Ida St. Leon scores and important members of the cast are: Effie Shannon, Robert Edeson, Katherine Kaelred and George Le Guerre.

"The Little Whopper."—Lively and amusing musical comedy with tuneful score by Rudolf Friml. Vivienne Segal pleasantly heads the cast, which also numbers Harry C. Browne, who does excellent work, Mildred Richardson and W. J. Ferguson.

"The Cat Bird," with John Drew.—A leisurely little play by Rupert Hughes, dealing with an elderly ecologist who straightens out the romances of several people according to the principles derived from his studies among the flowers and insects. Mr. Drew returns to the New York stage after two years as the ecologist. A suave evening's amusement.

"Wedding Bells."—A bright and highly amusing comedy by Salisbury Field. Admirably written and charmingly played by Margaret Lawrence and Wallace Eddinger. One of the things you should see.

"Aphrodite."—Highly colored and lavish presentation of a drama based upon Pierre Louys' exotic novel of ancient Alexandria. Superbly staged adaptation of the play that caused a sensation in Paris. Dorothy Dalton, the screen star, returns to the stage in the principal rôle of the Galilean courtesan, Chrysis, and scores. McKay Morris is admirable in the principal male rôle.

"The Frivolities of 1920."—G. M. (Broncho Billy) Anderson's girl revue. Lively, speedy musical show with a large measure of vulgarity, but many pretty girls.

"The Royal Vagabond."—A Cohanized opera comique in every sense of the words. A tuneful operetta plus Cohan speed, pep and brash American humor. Also tinkling music.

"The Girl in the Limousine."—A decidedly daring boudoir farce by Wilson Collison and Avery Hopwood, in which a pink and white bed is invaded by every member of the cast during the progress of the evening. John Cumberland is very funny and Doris Kenyon, fresh from the screen, is both pretty and pleasant as the heroine.

"Nightie Night."—Described by the program as a "wide awake farce." "Nightie Night" lives up to its billing. It has plenty of verve, ginger and some daring. There are scores of laughs. Heading the very adequate cast are Francis Byrne, Suzanne Willa, Malcolm Duncan and Dorothy Mortimer.

"The Magic Melody."—A "romantic musical play" with a tuneful score and a picturesque Willy Pogany setting. Charles Purcell, Julia Dean, Earl Benham and Carmel Myers, the last two well known to the screen, head the cast.

Elsie Janis and "her gang."—Lively entertainment built about the experiences of the A. E. F. on the other side. Well put together by Miss Janis, who shines with decided brightness. A pleasant entertainment.

E. H. Sothern and Julia Marlowe in Shakespearean repertoire.—These artists represent the best traditions of our theater and their revivals of "Twelfth Night," "Hamlet," and "The Taming of the Shrew" are distinguished in every sense of the word.

In "The Wonder Book for Writers," which we will send to you ABSOLUTELY FREE, these famous Motion Stars point out the easiest way to turn your ideas into stories and photoplays and become a successful writer.

Millions of People Can Write Stories and Photoplays and Don't Know It!

THIS is the startling assertion recently made by E. B. Davison of New York, one of the highest paid writers in the world. Is his astonishing statement true? Can it be possible there are countless thousands of people yearning to write, who really can and simply haven't found it out? Well, come to think of it, most anybody can tell a story. Why can't most anybody write a story? Why is writing supposed to be a rare gift that few possess? Isn't this only another of the Mistaken Ideas the past has handed down to us? Yesterday nobody dreamed man could fly. To-day he dives like a swallow ten thousand feet above the earth and laughs down at the tiny mortal atoms of his fellow-men below! So Yesterday's "impossibility" is a reality today.

LETTERS LIKE THIS ARE POURING IN!
 "I wouldn't take a million dollars for it."—MARY WATSON, FAIRMONT, W. VA.
 "It is worth its weight in gold."—G. MOCKWITZ, NEW CASTLE, WASH.
 "Every obstacle that menaces success can be mastered through this simple but thorough system."—MRS. O. L. IVE MICHAUX, CHARLESTON, PA.
 "It contains a gold mine of valuable suggestions."—A. BAILEY, Mt. VERNON, ILL.
 "I can only say that I am amazed that it is possible to set forth the principles of short story and photoplay writing in such a clear, concise manner."—GORDON MATHEWS, MONTREAL, CAN.
 "I received your Irving System some time ago. It is the most remarkable thing I have ever seen. Mr. Irving certainly has made story and play writing amazingly simple and easy."—ALFRED HORTO, NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.
 "Of all the compositions I have read on this subject, I find yours the most helpful to aspiring authors."—HAZEL SIMPSON NAYLOR, LIBRARY EDITOR, MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE.
 "With this volume before him, the veriest novice should be able to build stories or photoplays that will find a ready market. The best treatise of its kind I have encountered in 24 years of newspaper and literary work."—H. PIERCE WELCH, MANAGING EDITOR, THE BINGHAMTON PRESS.
 "When I first saw your ad I was working in a shop for $2 a week. Always having worked with my hands, I doubted my ability to make money with my brain. So it was with much skepticism that I sent for your Easy Method of Writing. When the System arrived, I carefully studied it evening after work. Within a month I had completed two plays, one of which sold for $500, the other for $450. I unhesitatingly say that I owe it all to the Irving System."—HELEN KINDON, ATLANTIC CITY, N. J.

counters, or running spindles in factories, bending over sewing machines, or doing housework. Yes—you may laugh—but these are The Writers of Tomorrow.

For writing isn't only for geniuses as most people think. Don't you believe the Creator gave you a story-writing faculty just as He did the greatest writer? Only maybe you are simply "bluffed" by the thought that you "haven't the gift." Many people are simply afraid to try. Or if they do try, and their first efforts don't satisfy, they simply give up in despair, and that ends it. They're through. They never try again. Yet if, by some lucky chance, they had first learned the simple rules of writing, and then given the imagination free rein, they might have astonished the world!

BUT two things are essential in order to become a writer. First, to learn the ordinary principles of writing. Second, to learn to exercise your faculty of Thinking. By exercising a thing you develop it. Your Imagination is something like your right arm. The more you use it the stronger it gets. The principles of writing are no more complex than the principles of spelling, arithmetic, or any other simple thing that anybody knows. Writers learn to piece together a story as easily as a child sets up a miniature house with his toy blocks. It is amazingly easy after the mind grasps the simple "know how." A little study, a little patience, a little confidence, and the thing that looks hard often turns out to be just as easy as it seemed difficult.

Thousands of people imagine they need a fine education in order to write. Nothing is farther from the truth. Many of the greatest writers were the poorest scholars. People rarely learn to write at schools. They may get the principles there, but they really learn to write from the great, wide, open, boundless Book of Humanity! Yes, seething all around you, every day, every hour, every minute, in the whirling vortex—the flotsam and jetsam of Life—even in your own home, at work or play, are endless incidents for stories and plays—a wealth of material, a world of things happening. Every one of these has the seed of a story or play in it. Think! If you went to a fire, or saw an accident, you could come home and tell the folks all about it. Unconsciously you would describe it all very realistically. And if somebody stood by and wrote down exactly what you said, you might be amazed to find your story would sound just as interesting as many you've read in magazines or seen on the screen. Now, you will naturally say, "Well, if Writing is as simple as you say it is, why can't I learn to write?" Who says you can't?

LISTEN! A wonderful FREE book has recently been written on this very subject—a book that tells all about the Irving System—a Startling New Easy Method of Writing Stories and Photoplays. This amazing book, called "The Wonder Book for Writers," shows how easily stories and plays are conceived, written, perfected, sold. How many who don't dream they can write, suddenly find it out. How the Scenario Kings and the Story Queens live and work. How bright men and women, without any special experience, learn to their own amazement that their simplest Ideas may furnish brilliant plots for Plays and Stories. How one's own Imagination may provide an endless gold mine of Ideas that bring Happy Success and Handsome Cash Royalties. How new writers get their names into print. How to tell if you ARE a writer. How to develop your "story fancy." How to weave clever word-pictures and unique, thrilling, realistic plots. How your friends may be your worst judges. How to avoid discouragement and the pitfalls of Failure. How to WIN!

This surprising book is ABSOLUTELY FREE. No charge. No obligation. YOUR copy is waiting for you. Write for it NOW. GET IT. IT'S YOURS. Then you can pour your whole soul into this magic new enchantment that has come into your life—story and play writing. The lure of it, the love of it, the luxury of it will fill your wasted hours and dull moments with profit and pleasure. You will have this noble, absorbing, money-making new profession! And all in your spare time, without interfering with your regular job. Who says you can't make "easy money" with your brain? Who says you can't turn your Thoughts into cash? Keep your skin fine in texture

A SKIN like a child's!"—but do you realize what makes a child's skin so beautiful? More than anything else it is the exquisitely smooth, fine texture which men and women alike so often lose in later life.

Examine your face in a strong light. Do the pores seem to be growing enlarged? If so, your skin is not functioning properly—the pores are not contracting and expanding as they should.

To restore your skin to healthy, normal activity and give it back the fine, smooth texture it should have, begin tonight to give it this special treatment:

Just before you go to bed, dip your washcloth in very warm water and hold it to your face. Now take a cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap, dip it in water, and rub the cake itself over your skin. Leave the slight coating of soap on for a few minutes until your face feels drawn and dry. Then dampen the skin and rub the soap in gently with an upward and outward motion. Rinse your face thoroughly, first in tepid water, then in cold. Whenever possible, finish by rubbing your face with a piece of ice.

Special treatments for each different skin condition are given in the famous booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap. Get a cake today and begin using your treatment tonight. A 25-cent cake of Woodbury's lasts for a month or six weeks of any treatment or for general cleansing use. Sold at all drug stores and toilet goods counters in the United States and Canada.

An oily skin and shiny nose can be corrected. In the booklet of treatments that is wrapped around every cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap learn how to overcome this condition.

The famous treatment for blackheads

A PPLY hot cloths to the face until the skin is reddened. Then with a rough washcloth, work up a heavy lather of Woodbury's Facial Soap and rub it into the pores thoroughly, with an upward and outward motion. Rinse with clear, hot water, then with cold—the colder the better. Finish by rubbing the face for thirty seconds with a piece of ice. To remove blackheads already formed, substitute a flesh brush for the washcloth in the treatment above. Then protect the fingers with a handkerchief and press out the blackheads.

A sample cake of soap, the booklet of famous treatments, and samples of Woodbury's Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream sent to you for 15 cents.

For 6 cents we will send you a trial size cake (enough for a week or ten days of any Woodbury facial treatment), together with the booklet of treatments, "A Skin You Love to Touch." Or for 15 cents we will send you the treatment booklet and samples of Woodbury's Facial Soap, Facial Powder, Facial Cream and Cold Cream. beach at Waikiki or some such spot, altho, in truth, our cold was abating. What cold could do otherwise before Miss Compson? For she is—here we find ourselves weeks later still groping for a vivid enough adjective—dazzlingly beautiful. Which is hackneyed, but true.

The cinema camera has never caught the real Compson beauty. A slender, elusive, delicate sort it is, quite Elsie Fergusonish.

All this we enthusiastically conceded to Miss Compson. "Very nice—for a tired editor with chills," she admitted.

Firmly removing our gaze from the Compson profile, we asked the first-aid query of all interviewers: "Your hopes, your real dreams, all that sort of thing, please."

"Betty Compson's career really began slightly over a year ago," she started impersonally. "Before that I had rather drifted along aimlessly and without particular ambition.

RIGHT at the start we must confess to a fearful interview faux pas.

We did something no interviewer has ever admitted, as far as we know.

We sneezed. It was an editorial sneeze, but still it was a sneeze.

And Miss Betty Compson did something never before admitted of an interviewee. She sneezed.

When you realize that this occurred in the tea-room of the Claridge, you begin to comprehend the enormity of it all.

It was with this spirit of cold camaraderie that our chat began. It was Miss Compson's first outdoor—at least as far out as the tea-room—appearance in four days. We were doing our best to forget terrific chills in huge cups of oolong, said oolong being the only . . . But that is another story.

"'S awful," sighed Miss Compson, from behind the daintiest of handkerchiefs, referring, of course, to the weather.

"'S awful," we admitted—between chills.

"Wonderful city," continued Miss Compson. Despite a haze of bromo-quinine, we suspected a note of satire. But we were wrong. Miss Compson really meant it.

We murmured a long-suppressed longing for a warm

Betty Compson says her career really started over a year ago, with her rôle in "The Miracle Man." "Before that," she says, "I had drifted along aimlessly and without particular ambition. Life was an adventure—and that was all. I never thought of tomorrow. Nobody in particular gave me a second thought. I didn't myself"

"I started as a kiddie in vaudeville and I played a violin in endless theaters. My youth," (we smiled at the youthful Miss Compson's use of the word), "was just one railway station, hotel hall-room and dreary dressing-room after another. It was a livelihood—life was an adventure—and that was all I never thought of tomorrow.

"Then I tried pictures. I gained a little place for myself on the screen. Those were the days when I played in comedies with Roscoe Arbuckle and others. But I never quite struck fire. Nobody in particular gave me a second thought. I didn't myself.

"One day I came to George Loane Tucker, who was seeking a girl for 'The Miracle Man.' I was tired and discouraged—I guess I looked the rôle. Anyway, Mr. Tucker gave it to me.

"From that moment dates my career, whatever it may be. The character interested me and I fairly lived it during the making of the photoplay. Then, for the first time, I felt ambitious and I began to try."

Miss Compson smiled whimsically. "I hadn't read much of particular value before, but I began with a vengeance. I have put my months to good use, I think, for in that time I have read most of Wells, much of Shaw and nearly everything of the younger English authors." Miss Compson paused.

"The world is really just beginning to unfold. I was a dull outsider before—now—well, it's nice."

"Looking backward," we queried, "what impresses you most?"

(Seventeen)

Miss Compson pondered the question. "It's that I think I have discovered at least a part of the secret of screen success. It consists of sincerity. If you are not sincere you cannot possibly last in the films.

"You must feel your rôles. I am positive that Norma Talmadge sinks herself into her parts; that Mary Pickford forgets her identity; that Elsie Ferguson feels her film moods. Sincerity must be there.

"Then, too, you must have some brains to go any distance.

fifteen and eighteen are those best calculated to set on fire the masculine hearts in the movie audiences; (2), cuddly blondes are the most desirable, most marriageable objects on earth; (3), demure brunettes with dimpled knees and a healthy smile are the lineal progeny of the famous Mrs. Venus, and, (4), that Titian-haired sorceresses—the kind rapturous poets have raved over as cavorting about in sylvan dells while moonbeams bathe

LEAVE it to the movies to bring forth a new variety of sand witch—a lovely damsel of youth and beauty and perfection of form, who looks so intrinsically luscious that Eastern producers of musical revues have changed their standard of ladies of the ensemble. Indeed, they are now judging chorus aspirants by the mack-sennettian rules and regulations the silent stage formally “adopted” at least two years ago as being the dernier cri of feminine pulchritude.

In days more or less gone by pictures used to pick their pippins from the stage choruses. Witness Kay Laurel, the delectable Olive Thomas and the lily-white Marion Davies. But, having plucked from the stage tree a half dozen lemons—frizzly blonde ladees with as many wrinkles as a palm-leaf fan—to every one real peach, experts on the subject of cinematic saccharinity decreed that: (1), innocent belles between the ages of their white-white skin in silver hues—are quite the very best means of making the mere men of the country want to leave home.

And it is no use denying that Mr. Mack Sennett was the first to put the sin into cinema. And, to be even more explicit and perhaps a bit more in-time, as the French say, it behooves us to admit that Mr. Sennett had his finger jolly well placed on the public pulse when he ordained Miss Sweet Sixteen as the vestal virgin of his comedy temple.

And, inasmuch as Sennettism is more or less indigenous to the California soil, he picked his "decorative background" from the beaches.

Being a mere male myself,

Above, Peggy Davis, a lorelei of the Christie company and, left, the sprightly Marie Prevost of the Sennett beauty squad. Only one girl in 10,000 can qualify for the bathing comedies, says Mack Sennett. Miss Prevost would qualify out of a million

I hereby confess that I am wont to get considerable "kick" out of the screen picture of Marie Prevost in her one-piece bathing-suit. And this, I assure you, is precisely the reason that the movies have stepped forward with their bevy of beautiful bathers.

The sand witches in question must have large quantities of "pep"—and, moreover, their figures must be as perfectly proportionate as that of the Venus of Milo. No angles nor sharp corners for the wind to whistle around.

Brains aren't an absolutely necessary adjunct. Nevertheless, they're always a help, and if a present-day bathing girl chances to possess them she stands an equal chance of achieving the good fortune—and, incidentally, the gowns—acquired by Gloria Swanson.

Every feminine visitor to the Sennett, Fox-Sunshine, Rolin, Christie or other studios making particular use of the decorative feminine background is carried back to her boarding-school days. The dormitory dressing-rooms where the girls hold forth are precisely like the boudoirs at a socially exclusive finishing school. The walls are covered with the usual feminine assortment of Art, chocolates are on the chairs and gum under the window-sills, ouija boards are on the dressing-table and the spirit of Youth permeates everywhere.

Impression has it that the average comedy beauty is a peculiar variety of fish; a creature who spends the totality of her waking hours in the studio swimming pool, and who eats, sleeps, talks and dreams of—water.

Fact is, the majority of the girls cant swim, and nine out of every ten have never had their feet wet by the splashing ocean.

A very poetical male once wrote that the New York chorus girl is an exotic flower—an orchid which blooms for an hour and then fades. At any rate, she's a distinctive creature who thrives peculiarly under lights—on Broadway after theater hour.

The movies' midday frolickers, on the other hand, have a clause in their contract which makes them liable to dismissal if they're caught out in public later than ten o'clock on week-day nights. Being a camera subject, a girl has to have a "photographic" face—one that will not look like the bird's-eye view of a plowed field.

In addition, she must have qualities that make her individual and different from the average run of females. In other words, she just "is" or she "isn't." If you can lose a girl in a crowd she has no chance on the screen. If her personality does not stand out among other personalities, she simply cant qualify.

Provided she has passed the acid test, she is required to report each morning at 8:30. With another girl she shares one of the aforementioned dressing-rooms. She must exercise; she cant get fat. If walking wont turn the trick, the studio matron requires her to don a gym suit and take a "workout" on a vacant stage. Or perhaps she has to roll.

Stage chorus girls have of the foregoing routine, plus: rehearsals at eleven; lunch; performance at two; rest and dinner; evening show at eight—plenty of one-two-three-kick exercises. No chance to get hefty.

None of the successful contemporary comedy girls—Phillis Haver, Marjorie Payne, of Christie's; Marie Prevost, Peggy Davis, Vera Steadman, Bessie True, of Sunshine; Norma Canterno, Harriet Hammond—have ever had stage experience. The majority have come to the studio directly from school. None have ever seen a theatrical agency, and nearly all have been brought to the attention of the producers by other girls on the "lot."

One girl invites a pal to visit the studio and together they go giggling to interview the manager. Some day the pal is employed in a mob scene. If she "is," she is regularly added to the company, and it is not infrequently that she develops real talent. More than one current first-magnitude star got her start in the swimming tank.

In the beginning, an anxious mother usually accompanies the newcomer. Seeing her cherub

The Cost of the Modern Photoplay

By HARRISON HASKINS

NOWADAYS, when motion picture profits and losses are reckoned in millions, few stop to consider the actual cost of production. From a few hundred dollars the cost of filming a regular release photoplay has climbed from the $30,000 of a year or so ago to $40,000 or $60,000, while a feature production easily runs up to from $125,000 to $150,000.

No director is more competent to discuss studio costs than Allan Dwan, who is essentially a business-man director. "I smile when directors talk loudly of art," says Dwan. "I look upon a photoplay in the making as a commercial product, and endeavor to create a picture that will make the broadest entertainment appeal."

It was then that Dwan began detailing production costs. "The average standard release—such as the products of the Famous Players-Lasky, Metro and other concerns—runs above tical thing in the world, for it is the force, the energy behind action, creating a subtle spiritual power that finds its expression thru the individual who has courage to listen to its call.

Remembering the Vidor pictures, which are ever like a breath of clean, fresh wind sweeping aside the accumulating stale and sordid elements which frequently mar the present-day films, I am glad that he has unflinchingly followed his ideal.

"What is the human photoplay?" I asked, as I tried to memorize the creed before me.

After a thoughtful pause, Mr. Vidor set on record a satisfying definition as he replied, "A human photoplay is one that depicts people and things as they really are—one that is based on truth, life and naturalness, built on drama but devoid of melodrama—a theme that is comprehensive and discernible by the greatest number of people!

"Human life consists of struggle," he continued, "struggle up and out of false beliefs and superstitions that hamper, and it is only thru right thinking that this can be done, so in my stories on the screen, if I can portray a bit of life, a simple story universal in its appeal, carrying an

ALARGE photographed copy of the Vidor creed hangs over the desk in King Vidor's private study. It dominates the room, even as its lofty principles dominate the life and work of this young director and producer, who has fearlessly broken down many of the cherished traditions in his endeavor to bring better films, with better themes, into motion pictures.

The first time I met King Vidor was in the flush of the phenomenal success following the showing of his initial picture, "The Turn in the Road," and, tho he was pleased and happy over the praise showered upon his work and the honors it brought him, he had not lost his head nor his sane balance. I met him again a year later, when, having backed up this success by several pictures of rare merit, he had demonstrated that his first effort was no accident, but the result of keen judgment guided by an absorbing ideal.

He was still unspoiled, eager and boyish, with a little more confidence, perhaps, but sincerely viewing his past achievements merely as the finger pointing to greater work yet to be accomplished.

After all, an ideal is the most prac-

I believe in the motion picture that carries a message to humanity.

I believe in the picture that will help humanity to free itself from the shackles of fear and suffering that have so long bound it with iron chains.

I will not knowingly produce a picture that contains anything I do not believe to be absolutely true to human nature, anything that could injure anyone or anything unclean in thought or action.

Nor will I deliberately portray anything to cause fright, suggest fear, glorify mischief, condone cruelty or extenuate malice.

I will never picture evil or wrong except to prove the fallacy of its lure.

So long as I direct pictures I will make only those founded upon the principle of right, and I will endeavor to draw upon the inexhaustible source of good for my stories, my guidance and my inspiration.

uplifting thought that will help, I shall be happy. Life can be excitement and thrills and still be human, or it can be all of this and not be human if it is too far removed from daily experience, too much toward types and exceptions, and so narrowed in its application that only the few can understand."

"Going back to 'The Turn in the Road,'" I prompted, recalling that marvelously human film that had sent its vital message into the hearts of many.

"Well, in that picture," began Mr. Vidor, "I had this idea in mind—how can I make it so real, so true, that it will hit home; in other words, make it so universally human that every one who sees it will get the thought and be with the characters as they work out the story, for emotions tend to unite humanity thru the sharing of sympathies!

"With this hope before me, I laid the scenes in a small town, introduced several incidents that would touch any neighborhood and selected characters of every-day folks whom all know.

"In watching motion picture audiences I have noticed that during what I call the human scenes, they are interested and intense, while during the romantic episodes their attention is frequently diverted."

"Then you don't consider the love story an essential ingredient?" I asked, amazed at this iconoclastic suggestion.

Center, the Vidors in their new car, and, below, little Suzanne gets her first taste of motion picture direction. Ben Alexander appears with Mr. and Mrs. Vidor

"Not what is termed the juvenile love interest, unless it upholds the theme," he replied, laughing at my surprise. "In the many letters I received from young people regarding 'The Turn in the Road,' few of them mentioned the love story; it was the struggle toward the light that interested them, and many spoke of the help it had afforded, which all goes to show the trend of thought in the audiences of today.

"In my last picture, 'The Family Honor,' it is the love of a sister for her two brothers and her unswerving loyalty which is the theme, the love story being wholly secondary; while in 'The Jack-Knife Man,' by Ellis Parker Butler, my next film, there are no young people in the cast, except a four-year-old boy, and the story is woven around the devotion of an old man for this child.

"Romance on the screen is usually too vividly portrayed, too obvious, too highly colored to be natural and so lacks interest. It is the simple story, simply told, in simple surroundings with which all are familiar, and with characters like themselves, such as they can understand, that has what we call the universal appeal with an audience.

"For instance, the majority of people are not handsome, and in their hearts they haven't the sympathy with those who are, and a handsome hero, like Wallace Reid, has more to overcome in reaching his audience than does a plainer man. Will Rogers made one of his clever remarks when he said, 'Guess they put me in motion pictures so all the homely birds will feel good—there are so many of us!'

"What is the most important element in the successful photoplay?" I questioned, finding Mr. (Continued on page 75) as a son, a dear and devoted one, and—"We're all so happy!" added the little wife, with a new and sweetly serious note in her voice.

Miss Dean is a stunning-looking girl, with her slim young figure, dancing black eyes, rosy cheeks and a radiant smile that shows her merry good humor as well as her pretty teeth.

She is still the "Wildcat," oh, dear yes, irresistible and irresistible in her vivacity and gay spirits. Her name and her piquant face may be flashing all over the world, but she is not a bit "up-stage," nor the least spoiled—just a democratic, generous "good fellow." She had a jolly "Hello!" for every one who chanced to pass our bench, whether it was her director, Tod Browning, or Erich von Stroheim, the maker and builder of "Blind Husbands," an elderly electrician or a property boy in faded overalls.

"Sure," laughed Priscilla, when I spoke of this. "They are all good scouts; I like 'em and I believe they all like me. They treat me to candy and I play games with them—we are just kids together out here.

"Sometimes I try to be gentle and demure," she exclaimed, gaily, "but what's the use! I just can't be quiet; I must be up and doing every minute, and I'm all over the place, teasing and joking every one."

"I don't see how he ever did it!" I said, watching the eager little face beneath the drooping hat.

"Who did what?" demanded Priscilla, briskly.

"Wheeler Oakman——" I began.

"Oh-h!" she interrupted, laughing. "Well, Mae Murray introduced us a long time ago when he was her leading man, but we immediately forgot all about each other. He was in service fourteen months, in France, too, and one afternoon after he returned I met him on the street, but we just spoke and passed on."

Priscilla Dean and Wheeler Oakman were secretly married recently. The romance came about during the filming of the Universal feature, "The Virgin of Stamboul." In the center is a glimpse of Miss Dean "making up" her new husband

THE great romance has come to the little "Wildcat of Paris," and recently Priscilla Dean and Wheeler Oakman slipped away and were quietly married!

It is still a dead secret, but as Priscilla and I talked it all over, sitting on a wooden bench under the huge pepper trees in the Universal studio grounds, I reminded her that these love stories will leak out eventually, so she consented to my announcing the interesting news.

No one knew of their plans except Mary, as Priscilla calls her mother and best pal, and, of course, Mary went along, and tho her heart was a little heavy at the thought of sharing her daughter's life with another, she had already accepted Wheeler

When my picture, 'The Virgin of Stamboul,' came along, Wheeler was cast as leading man, and that's when it began. It just grew and grew until, when we went on location up at Oxnard and were working awfully hard on our desert scenes, he proposed to me. He bet that we would be married within the year, and I bet we wouldn't, but—you see—I lost. Really, this is the first serious love affair I ever had. There wasn't any use waiting, so we just up and married without any fuss or excitement.

"We are planning to build a little white colonial bungalow in Hollywood. Wheeler is crazy about a home, and I am domestic, too, for I can cook and wash dishes and scrub and, what is more, I am glad that I know how. We're already scrapping about the dogs—that we won't! Wheeler wants a bulldog and I want a wire-haired terrier. Isn't that a peaceful combination?"

"We both love to entertain our friends with formal dinners and suppers, and we like to swim and play tennis and dance and ride horseback, but neither of us can see golf—looks like a lot of walking around with nothing doing. We're picture fans, too, and our chief sport is following serials—we like the thrills!" and the little star's contagious giggle made several smile as they passed us.

Priscilla Dean was born in New York city and at an early age went to the stage with her mother, May Weston-Dean. When she was four she was playing in "Rip Van Winkle," with the great Joseph Jefferson, and she also played with that other actor, James A.

Hearne, in "Shore Acres" and "Hearts of Oak."

At fourteen she did a song-and-dance act—it was too dancing, too—at the opening season of the Folies Bergere in New York, and later made a hit with Harry Pilcer in his famous whirlwind dance.

Then came a period of stage work and pictures, mixed, and four years ago she came to Los Angeles to play comedy for the National.

"You remember that the company busted," recalled Priscilla, cheerfully, "and I was stranded, without a nickel. I met a man connected with the Buick agency, and he suggested that I try for the coming Ascot beauty contest. He had the car dolled up in gay cretonne, and I wore a simple little summer dress, while Dorothy Dalton, Edna Goodrich and the other contestants were all beautifully gowned. I was lucky, tho, for the crowd was with me right from the start and I won the first prize. A little later I won a bathing-suit prize at Venice and, as this had given me much publicity, Universal made me leading woman for Eddie Lyons and Lee Moran in their

The MAN WHO KILLED

Told in story form from the George Fitzmaurice-Mae Murray Photoplay

By DOROTHY DONNELL

GLORIA, LADY FALKLAND, had been dead five years, but, unfortunately, they do not hurry women whose bodies are still able to move about, and eat and drink and breathe. So she carried her dead heart about with her, sepulchred under her beautiful breasts, and looked out at the world with dead, beautiful eyes that never wept, never smiled, even when she gazed down into the face of her little son.

Lady Falkland never looked at Archie without the terror of seeing something of his father in the soft baby curves of him, without fear of some vague hint of the cold cruelty, malice and cynicism that had murdered her girlish hopes beginning to show in the rosy baby flesh. After all, he was his child as well as hers.

Yet it was the boy who had kept her in Constantinople these last hideous years, enduring all Sir Archibald's slights, insults, indiscretions, because not to endure them would have meant disgrace for the boy and possibly separation from him. Constantinople, with its hard glare of brassy sun, its heartless gaiety of color on housetop and in market square, its senseless, soulless laughter that jangled discordantly on alien ears—she hated the place—until even the powers of hating had become dulled.

Tonight, muffled in moonlight, it lay along the Hellespont a dream city, with frail minarets and towers like fingers pointing upward. The waters under the prow of her skiff were blue and tipped with little light golden flames, the air was clean and scentless upon her forehead, robbed of the heavy, sickly odors of the day.

It might have been a breath out of the greenness of other springs long ago in England, so long ago that they seemed to her sometimes like a thing she had dreamed and wakened from.

The boatman, a muffled shape in the prow, began to sing a native chant, but the soul of his passenger was far away. There is something about beauty that leads the thoughts toward some he did or how he insulted her wifehood or what the insolent, ruddy Lady Edith, with her painted lips and hard glitter of rings, plotted against her. The dead do not feel shame, cannot be humiliated, and she was wholly dead of heart at last.

The cry that rose to her lips now was not of fear, tho the frail boat staggered under the impact of the other skiff that had materialized without warning out of the shadows. "Dick!" said Lady Falkland, "Dick!" and held out her hands with a beautiful, simple gesture to the man who stared incredulously down at her from the other boat. In the prows the two Turks quarreled fiercely over the mishap and the blame thereof. The city lay very far away, and the present, while the two travelers from the past touched hands in greeting.

"God, but you haven't changed, Gloria," swore Richard Loring, and then the moon looked out from her face veil of cloud and fell mercilessly upon the lifted face of Lady Falkland and the words died on his lips. Beautiful still, with hollows where there had been curves, shadows where there had been light, and her eyes—the man gave a stifled groan. "Gloria! What has he done to you?"

"He has only killed me, Richard," smiled the woman, in self-mockery, "killed the heart of me. He would do that, you know, where it would be kinder to kill my body. I'm not the Gloria you knew. I'm her ghost. But I keep right on living. I'm so dreadfully healthy, Richard. It's—rather a shame."

He shook. She felt him even across the space that separated them. Perhaps her soul was closer, I do not know beautiful thing, and Gloria was back again, six years back, in Sussex with the white hawthorn hedges, like ghost flowers, all about them, and a nightingale setting the moon to silver music and a man's hands touching hers, reverently, as an acolyte his shrine, a man's voice throbbing in her ears. "I love you, Gloria—oh, I love you——"

It had been her beautiful moment and she had let it be taken from her, stolen, cast contemptuously aside to wither even like one of those tender, budding hawthorn sprays. Love! Bah! A word for babies and fools, they had told her. A penniless girl could not afford love when she might have marriage with one of the great men of her country, a lord, wealthy, too—come, come, be sensible!

The clean wind of the Sussex downs. The oaks and little thatched cottages and hedges and a deep voice that faltered over foolish words—"I love you, Gloria——" The hawthorn blossoms that would never bloom for her again——

"Oh," said Lady Falkland aloud, with a little broken laugh of pity, "she was so very young, and she believed so many things, and she put her hand out trustingly to life," for it seemed to the disillusioned woman in the skiff that the girl who had worn a white gown in the Sussex dusk was some one else who had lived and died a long time ago. Surely she was not one with the flouted, scorned creature who had sickened at the shame of sitting at the table where her husband and his mistress made wanton love before her face and crept out here into the dusk for a merciful moment of respite.

The slender boat shell moved silently thru the water, leaving a ribbon of golden ripples behind. The woman sat quite motionless, brooding, her white hands folded lightly in her lap. And suddenly she knew that she did not care any longer what

But at once, because she was a woman, and women spare those whom they love, she changed her tone, began to speak lightly of conventional things. How did it happen, she asked, that he was here in the East, when she had supposed him in London? Her tone shook, speaking the name, and he sensed something of the awful exile of her soul.

Less tactful than she—men always prefer the fundamentals—he answered her briefly. He was an attaché to the Consul, very lately arrived—yes, yes, every one she knew was well in England when he left. But she, he stammered, he had heard things—gossip—idle reports—“And now,” he said, suddenly violent, “now I know they’re true! That beast! Yes, I must say it, Gloria—that’s what he is; no man could treat a woman so, a woman like you, so little, and sweet and breakable . . .”

The boatsmen, from anathemas had progressed to amenities and were now become bosom friends, embracing, to the peril of their craft. Lady Falkland stirred suddenly and looked about her with startled eyes. “It’s late. I must go back.” She was all at once a hunted thing. “If he finds me gone—you see, he’s so anxious to find something he can use—”

“Use?” Loring repeated thickly. “You dont mean—” She nodded dully. “He wants a divorce. Lady Edith—he would marry her if he could, but I wont ask for one. For the boy’s sake. And so—he’s watching—for a chance to sue me. He’s even chosen the man—a Russian prince with great, thick, red lips. You see, I have to be”—she laughed, breathlessly—“careful. I couldn’t lose Archie, you know. He’s the only thing I’ve got in all the world.”

“You’ve got me, Gloria,” the man in the other skiff said, very low. In the dim light his eyes burned down into hers with a clean, clear flame. “I—haven’t changed. I never shall. Some men are like that—they want only one woman and you’re my woman. It’s something stronger than we are, stronger than life, even. It’s drawn us together again after all these years, and it will keep on drawing us until there is no more parting. I dont know how. I just know it’s so. Look at me, Gloria. Dont you believe it, too?”

She shook her head. “I’m dead, I tell you! Can you raise the dead, Richard? There’s nothing left here,” her hands touched her breast, “nothing but ashes . . .”

But that night, within her own chamber, behind the locked door, she knelt for a long time, while the sleepy maid nodded in her corner, wondering why the God of the white race required such endless prayers. But Lady Falkland was not praying, or if she prayed, it was with strange words. “After all these years, and I so changed. Am I still beautiful, I wonder? I haven’t looked into a mirror for so long, but he sneers at me and says no man could be expected to be faithful to such a scrawny thing!”

The thin stuff of her negligée slipped back from her outflung arms, showing their wasted beauty. She had been rather a plump girl, all firm, rosy curves and dimples. The worn beauty of her lifted face was stamped with horror. “Let me stay dead, God!” Lady Falkland prayed. “Living means suffering, and I’m so tired. So tired of feeling—too tired even to love. Let me stay dead, please, God!”

Sir Archibald Falkland was very cordial to the new attaché at the consulate, a trifle too cordial. Robert Loring, seething at the thought of the wrongs a certain woman had suffered at the hands of this stout, jovial, effusive person, could hardly restrain a savage desire to plunge heir to his wife's old friends, eh, Loring?" and presently he went, his fingers into the flabby flesh of his throat. But if he was to help Gloria, it could not be by such direct methods, and so he accepted Falkland's invitation to call at his house. "A man falls

The woman who came to meet him, one thin hand on the shoulder of a little four-year-old lad, was the colorless Lady Falkland that all Constantinople knew, light hair dragged back from her forehead, all her careful ginning not quite concealing her pitiful lack of flesh. She gave him a cold, nervous hand. "You should not have come," she quivered. "Oh, I wish you had not come! Of course, he asked you, but he means something dreadful. I can always tell, because then he's almost kind to me."

It was a shameful thing to see how she shrank and trembled at the thought of her husband, and how the little boy looked uneasily about him and drew closer to her. It made Richard Loring physically sick when he thought what long tutelage had schooled them in this fear. "Gloria," he said, when, after a short, formal call he stood in the hall taking his leave, "I can't stand this. Why don't you end it? Leave him, go back to England! There's no law that can compel a woman to endure what you have to endure!"

"No, but there's a law that would take my baby away from me if I left him," Lady Falkland reminded him, "and so I shall stay. And I shall endure whatever I must, even if it's more than I've had to bear before. But it will be easier if you don't come any more. I'm afraid, Richard, afraid——"

"Not of me, surely, dear?" he asked her. And she shook her head, smiling painfully.

"I'm afraid of—myself," Lady Falkland whispered.

That night Sir Archibald was very drunk indeed. So drunk that he was quite amorous toward his wife, and in horror of his caresses she fled to a small pavilion on the lawn where she had fitted up a little room, a refuge when he made merry with his chosen intimates in the house, as he frequently pleased to do. Lady Edith laughed at his discomfiture. "When a man finds he has a rival," she sneered, "it adds attractions even to a wife, eh, Archie? My word, you were quite taken with Lady Bones tonight! Quite touching to see such husbandly devotion."

The man grew sullen under her gibes, then flared to fury. "Damn her!" he fumed. "I won't stand her virtuous airs any longer. As for Loring, what do you think I invited him here for, if it wasn't to get her where I want her? I'll be rid of her—but I'll keep the boy. She'll whine and whimper to him, and by and by she'll send for him, and then——"

"And then?" Lady Edith fawned, leaning her blowzy beauty to him. "Then, Archie, old boy, what about me?"

He leered at her with rheumy eyes. He liked 'em a good armful, with plenty of color. "Then I'm damned if I don't marry you, Edie," he promised, "if we're still friends."

The woman got up restlessly and moved to the window to hide a frown. If they were still friends! The longer that milk-faced fool hung on to him, the less her chances, for she knew well that her lord's affections were fitful as the wind. She leaned her forehead against the glass, staring out into the night, which was torn apart violently now and again with jagged splinters of lightning, and, so staring, uttered a cry of delight.

"Would you call it grounds for divorce," she pointed triumphantly,

"I shall sleep well," murmured Lady Falkland, "so soundly that I think I shall not even dream—"
She took a step towards the edge of the parapet

"if a married woman receives a Russian prince in her bedroom at this hour?"

Sir Archibald was at her side in an instant, peering with the face of an eager devil into the thick dark. When, for an instant it lifted, he saw thru the window of the pavilion his wife struggling desperately in the arms of the unsavory Prince Stanislaus de Cernurez, whom he had brought to the house a month before in the hopes of this very thing.

"Call the servants. We must have witnesses!" he directed. "I'll go confront them! Give herself damn' virtuous airs, will she?"

The eyes of the two of them, bad man, bad woman, met, and the woman, because she was a woman, had an instant's compunction. "He's a beast—and she hates him . . . it isn't sporty . . ."

"Don't you give yourself virtuous airs!" Sir Archibald snarled. "She could have sued me years ago, and she wouldn't, just out of spite. Keep out of this, Edie—it's just as much your advantage as mine."

In the pavilion, from which the Prince had incontinently fled at the first sign of approaching footsteps, the husband and wife faced one another, the woman clutching and asked ridiculously big salaries. And then, he said, the managers decided to punish him for thinking himself indispensable by dispensing with him entirely.

He seems to have reacted to outside events with characteristic intensity. Apparently, he was always too elated or overly cast down. It did not occur to him that this misfortune might be temporary. He had been given such an intoxicating draught of great success that, when the cup was taken away from him, it must have seemed like the end of the world.

He didn't go into detail. He simply said that he walked the streets for hours and then enlisted in a regiment bound for British East India.

"I suppose that I had some idea of punishing myself," he said. He told me that he does not believe anything happens in life which is not according to a perfect plan and necessary to human development.

He left the army convinced that he was very much the better in every way for his experience. He had grown to love India, and South Africa, too, where he also served. In England, again, he found that his entire viewpoint of life had changed. The confinement of his once dearly beloved profession was quite unendurable to him. He had

Alec Francis has had an adventurous career. He served in the British army in British East India. Long stage years preceded his screen debut, which was with Vitagraph

ALEC BUDD FRANCIS was born in London, England, and originally destined for the law. But the law did not appeal to him. He liked the idea of presenting an argument to a jury, but that was the only thing he did like; all the rest was drudgery. However, he did his best for a while in order to please his father, who was a prominent barrister, and then, one day, fully convinced that he would not gain greatness there, he left the paternal office to embark on the career he had chosen for himself. You are right—he became an actor.

Now, it is probable that but for his extreme sensitiveness, the very sensitiveness that made him dislike the law, he would be a favorite of the London stage today. Certainly he would never have been a pioneer in moving pictures. His success was too great for him to have left the stage in time.

He was with the Kendals for two seasons and appeared in "The Solicitor," which ran for 365 nights in London. This was followed by two more big successes, "The Barrister" and "The Guardsman."

He became very elated, he told me, become imbued with the spirit of "The Empire Builders," so he left the stage again and went to Canada to make his fortune.

"I did every kind of work that I could do," he said, "from running a ranch to nursing in a hospital."

But the fortune did not materialize. It took him several years to work off his restlessness. Finally, however, after wandering a long way around, he came back to the place from which he started—the stage. But it was the New York stage; he has never returned to England.

Alec Francis is now one of the mainstays of the Goldwyn dramatic personnel. Sometime or other he plans to return to his first love—the stage—for just one production. After that it will be the films again.

He was married while he was on tour with a production named "Comin' Thru the Rye." His wife was a member of the same company.

His first screen appearance was with Vitagraph. He was with Florence Turner in the first two-reeler ever made, "Auld Lang Syne." From Vitagraph he went to World, starring in the first screen production of "Alias Jimmy Valentine," which was directed by Maurice Tourneur. Of his Goldwyn pictures those that come most readily to mind are, "The Face in the Dark," "The Cinderella Man," "The Flame of the Desert," "The Street Called Straight" and "Earthbound," a spiritualistic picture from the story by Basil King.

You must imagine him as I saw him at the Goldwyn studio in Culver City. He was sitting erect in a straight-backed chair, one hand clasped over the other, resting on the curved handle of a light-colored cane. He wore a fawn-colored overcoat. His hair is grey, his skin very fair and his eyes a peculiarly intense, "electric" blue.

I amused myself by imagining that I was seeing him in his own house. I could easily fancy myself writing, "The place is marked thruout with an elusive atmosphere of the Orient. This is all the more peculiar because the colors are subdued and the furniture arranged with British nicety."

I dont know whether this would be the case or not. He told me that he loves the Orient. I have said that he impressed me as being a mystic. He also impressed me as being a man with a very highly developed sense of order.

"I have been house-hunting all week," he said. "It seems quite impossible to find a place to live in. My wife and I are alone, (my step-children are both married), but we want a

Seena Seen Scenically

Photographs by Abbe

I MIGHT add, Seena seen mentally, too, were it not for the cumbrous fact that said addition would make a cumbrous title, and meaning must go by the board when such a point is at stake. Hence . . .

Seena Owen combines—to the outer eye—the bearing and sophistication of the effete East with the love of open spaces, homey people, Colts and Bill Hart photoplays with mustangs and shooting

The setting was the Biltmore, on a Saturday afternoon at tea-time. Scenically, the value of this depends upon one's point of view.

The background was the spiralling of cigaret smoke, grey-blue, which added to the dull gold of Seena's hair, and there was Hawaiian music, against which she did vociferously protest, and also, there were coffee and considerable French pastry. There is something exceedingly clean-cut about the indubitable beauty of Seena. She moves well, too, and she has a charming carriage. She has a rather indolent air and a detached manner, and yet you find, upon after-contemplation, that she has said a great many things which must, necessarily, have come from a fund of thought and feeling. She is unostentatious to a degree. If she is subtle she conceals it, and yet her simplicity is ultra rather than simple.

It would seem super-discriminating to cavil at the necessity of stopping at the Biltmore, yet Seena was so cavilling. Not, however, exclusively at the Biltmore, but at living in New York City generally. "I feel as tho I cant breathe, as tho I will choke," she lamented. "People in prison must have the same feeling—as if great walls are closing in on them. I miss the blue skies and the open spaces acutely. I could never stand life in a city. And the crowds! It's so different in Los Angeles. It's so homey. Like one big family. Here, you could die of sheer loneliness and there would be no one who would necessarily know nor care. It's a city of strangers. Of course, I do enjoy the café life and seeing the theaters and all that sort of thing, temporarily. But I could never stand it, day by day. I know that. Being born in the West, I suppose . . .

"I like to do Western pictures, too," she went on, "the kind I have done with Bill Hart. I had much, much rather do that type of work than the slinky society lady variety. There's something tô a Western picture; something every one cant do. Anybody can do the drawing-room stuff. I like to ride and shoot and throw up my hat. I can do it, so why not? It has real life in it."

of a Colt and Seena dashing about on a mustang . . . rather a far stretch of the imagination, but, (this we say modestly), we have an elastic imagination and a great credulity, and we 'ave seen what we 'ave seen!

Seena was here, she knew not whether temporarily or no, it seemed. She was, at the time we talked, just free-lancing, but future plans were more or less in abeyance and pending further consideration. Then, too, there were stage plans. She was quite electric when I asked her whether she would like the stage. "I would be crazy about it!" she declared.

It being a few days prior to the arrival of the Yuletide saint, the conversation ran to said arrival and to the wee generation to whom the arrival looms so importantly. "There is going to be," said Seena, not without wistfulness, "some sort of gathering of the kiddies at the Grand Central Palace on Christmas Day. I am going down there to play with them for a while, since I can't be with Patricia." (Patricia, be it said, is three-year-old Patricia Walsh and a very important part, indeed, of Seena, viewed scenically or any other way.)

"I haven't dared to break the news to them at home," said Seena, "that I will not be with them Christmas Day. We're an awfully chummy family, mother, my sister, Mr. Walsh, my brother and the baby and I. I've been sending all sorts of vague telegrams in an effort to break the ice, but I haven't dared to attempt the final word yet. It's hard to be away, tho, on Christmas Day. I never have before."

We spoke of the general irreconciliation of the woman who, so especially in this day and age, is endeavoring to be at once professional and domestic, to combine the child and the career.

Seena admits to puzzlement. The two, she thinks, are, really, irreconcilable; and yet, paradoxically, no woman reaches a high stage of personal development, and hence a high stage of artistic development, until she has known the possession of a child. "I," said Seena, "never knew anything until I had Patricia. I dont know much now," she added, with a pretty depreciation, "but I knew even less before."

"Perhaps," she said, thoughtfully, after a little, "the very struggle between the personal and the professional, the child and the career is part, a very large part, of the development.

It is hard, but . . . I dont know . . ." She shrugged her shoulders and laughed. "One thing I do know," she said, with a glance which took in the pleasant dalliance of the room, "I could never do nothing. I would rather be rushed to death than to be idle. That would be to me the one thing I never could stand. I dont see how it's done."

Seena believes in laughter. Lots of it. For all sorts of things, physical and mental. No physician, she thinks, can do for you what laughter can do, mere fooling. "I was so depressed a couple of hours ago," she told me, "that I didn't think I should be able to say three connected words, and then, about an hour ago Clarine Seymour came in and we just sat up in my room and laughed and laughed and kidded away like two-year-olds, and now I feel like one. The depression is gone. I dont know any one I have more fun with than I do with Clarine, anyway."

Seena is a sort of an illustration of the impossibility of East of "professionals" and their friends, know of its existence. One does not enter—one is admitted at a ring of the bell, volubly greeted in Italian and politely conducted up a wide flight of stairs to rooms that must have been, in days of yore, the scene of many notable gatherings, a place where the elite, the favored few, entertained—and were entertained. A place of charm and dignity, with its many quaintly fashioned old chandeliers, high arched doorways, long mirrors, bare polished floors, tables gleaming with nاپery and silver at which were gathered interesting and congenial groups.

We were a party of four, Miss Cassinelli, her mother, a friend, myself. While Mrs. Cassinelli was giving her attention to the menu, Dolores was holding court. From this table and that came artists from the Metropolitan stage, from the concert stage, a few from the speaking stage, to greet her, speaking always in soft, liquid, eager tones, their mother tongue. Listening to the inconsequent chatter, the gay laughter, the manifest compli-

SHE claims the distinction of being the only Italian screen artist, and is proud that this is true. She is proud, too, of the fact that she is an Italian, that she was born in the land of sunshine and blue skies, of music and song, of a race with the subtle charm of older civilization and culture than ours—poets, artists, thinkers—of the race that is ready to "kiss or kill," a hot-blooded, warm-hearted people, with the keen sense of justice that quickly recognizes and seeks to right a wrong.

It was Caruso who gave to his young countrywoman the title, "The Cameo Girl," and the name has clung. Not because Caruso gave it, but because Dolores Cassinelli is, in truth, a cameo girl—and far more beautiful in reality than she is on the screen. She has the splendid glow, the sparkle, the effervescence of champagne. One sees in her pure, clear-cut profile, her Madonna-perfect face, the wistfulness, the immortal faith of youth; in the flame of her dark eyes the magic of deathless romance. Love, wisdom, comedy, tragedy—are all combined in her.

The interview was accomplished in a restaurant—if a place so unusual and interesting can be called by that commonplace name—on one of New York's cross streets. I fancy that few New Yorkers, aside from Metropolitan artists, a certain class ment, one could picture Dolores Cassinelli in her own Italy. A court with vivid flowers blooming, the tinkle of a fountain, olive-skinned swains adoring a dark, vivacious girl picturesquely garbed, behind one small ear a deep red rose.

And then, with a wave of a slender hand, she dismissed her cavaliers and turned to me, a thoroly modern American girl, delightfully girlish in her grey jersey frock, with its glorified vest of old-rose.

Over the delicious Italian dinner I marvelled at her perfect English. "I speak French and Spanish, too," she said. "Languages come easily when one begins young. Of course, I like my own language best of all and love to speak it. But I have tried very hard to perfect myself in English, because I came to America when a mere child and it is really my home. I like the people immensely. They have been more than kind to me. Americans are, perhaps, more cold, more reserved than my people, but it's merely a difference in temperament. Italians

They cannot spend so much time on little things because they are doing so many big things—and one cant do everything."

"And you?" I inquired of Mrs. Cassinelli.

"Yes," she said, emphatically. "America has been kind. Dolores is really an American. She was educated, grew up here. She has not been back to Italy. I have been back many times, but here I shall be most of the time, because Dolores needs me. I am her manager and attend to all business.

"I, too, have had many offers to act in pictures, but," with a deprecatory shrug, "I have no desire and no time. It is all I can do to look after Dolores—not that she is hard to manage," she said, looking across the table at her daughter, and one saw in the glance they exchanged that they are the most understanding of friends.

Dolores Cassinelli has had a varied career. As she grew up, her abiding love for music, which is one of the characteristics of her race, grew apace with her, and at an early age she began her career upon the concert stage. While doing concert work

By OLIVE CAREW

"SHE says," moaned John Weems, "she says she's going to get a divorce. My God, what shall I do?"

"Let her get it and thank your lucky stars." But Reginald Jay did not say this aloud. He was too much perturbed at the prospect evoked by his friend—blonde Constance, a trifle inclined to stoutness, more than a trifle romantic, free and husbandless, preying upon whom she willed! In spite of the testimony of his mirror and of ladies' eyes, Jay was a modest young man, but even modesty could not blind him to the fact that Connie had been very tender that night in the Forest of Arden. He groaned aloud, and the afflicted husband echoed the groan.

"Yes, think of it! To lose that peerless woman, and all because of a terrible mistake. Oh, why did I ever show that woman over your property? Why did I ever go into that infamous roadhouse to telephone? Why did I fire that chauffeur? And some men can take chorus girls to Palm Beach and get away with it by calling it a business trip!"

John Weems, president of the Weems Patent Clothes Wringer Co., ("Ring out the old, wring in the new," Pat. 1900), was not built for tragedy. A movie director would have cast him in the rôle of the prosperous banker or the successful business man. He was stoutish, baldish, with a mind that worked like ticker-tape and conversation flavorful of the Wall Street Journal, but tonight he was undoubtedly moved.

Chalmers, the detective, was inclined to take a more cheerful view of the situation. "Come, come! She's only got two witnesses, seeing as how the lady in the case has disappeared. Lor' love you, sometimes we have to fix up a dozen! The chauffeur wont count for much. He was sore at being fired and, anyhow, juries dont take much to chauffeurs since the taxi fares has went up. That leaves this gentleman here——"

"I'll lie," Reginald Jay declared, "like a gentleman."

"That wont do, sir." The detective shook his head sagely. "The question is, can you lie like a liar?"

"The court will ask you," moaned Weems, "what you were doing yourself at Fender's Place at one o'clock in the morning, and what will you say then?"

Reginald thought deeply. "I might say," he suggested, "that I was attacked by redskins from the bushes, or bitten by a rabid Bolsheviki, or I stopped to buy a postage stamp to mail a letter to my maiden aunt. Or I could say that I was afraid of the night air, or that I felt an attack of and by gettin' Mr. Weems hung! You'll have to fade, that's all, afore the process servers get you."

"Fade?" Jay repeated vaguely. "I'm sorry, but I dont just—"

"Vamoose! Skip! Beat it! Make your getaway!" the detective snapped. "Without your testimony the lady cant get the goods on her husband, and seeing he was doing you a favor by carrying the lady around"—and here he winked with the eye farthest from Weems—"it's up to you to take a little trip to Canada till the whole thing blows over."

Reginald Jay opened his lips, but the shrill pealing of the only hope, too. "I'd prefer the flew to the flu," he ventured, with ghastly humor, "but you provide the doctor and I'll provide the corpse—er—that is, the patient. And perhaps"—hopefully, as one determined to see the bright side of things—"perhaps my case will be desperate enough to call for a dose of Green River every hour or so."

It was a very sick man who lay, groaning dismally, the next morning when Chalmers ushered in two small and weedy gentlemen, equipped with black bags and tall silk hats, and introduced them cheerily as "Doctor Widner and Dr. Flexner, who will attend to your case."

Under cover of a groan, Jay pulled the detective down. "Doctors?" he whispered. "Real M.D.'s?"

Chalmers grinned. "N.D.'s—nearly doctors," he reassured him. "The Van Dyke beards and the hats are props, m' boy. They understand the situation, and have no objections to a door-bell interrupted him. When he returned, he carried a legal-looking paper which brought a disgusted "Hell!" from Chalmers. "Too late! Y' cant leave the State now!"

Weems collapsed heavily on the davenport. His flabby cheeks quivered, a small, forlorn tear trickled down the side of his nose. "My Constance! Married for four years and I've been faithful to her—never hired a stenographer under fifty, even. And if she gets her divorce she'll marry some other man—"

Young Jay started, paled perceptibly as a vision was vouchsafed him of Constance, coy and determined, piloting him up the aisle to the triumphant strains of Mendelssohn. What was it she had called him while they wandered thru the darkness that night, trying to find the inn—Orlando? Yes, that was it, her Orlando! "I—I might commit suicide, I suppose!" he cried. "That would be better than getting married—"

"You mean than getting divorced," Weems corrected him. He sat up suddenly on the couch, a pale gleam of hope flickering in his watery gaze. "Look here; couldn't you be sick? Sick-a-bed? Out of your head? Forbidden to testify under the doctor's orders? Jay, you must do it! It's my only hope—"

Reginald Jay considered. Bed for an indefinite stay was bad enough, but Constance was worse. It was his well patient, provided the fee is all right. Doctors, I wish you would make an examination of this gentleman."

The doctors opened their bags and drew out sundry impressive-looking implements that caused Jay to turn pale and start to rise, only to be forced back upon the pillows, while Messrs. Widner and Flexner listened solemnly at his chest, took his temperature, counted his pulse and wagged their heads mournfully. "Very serious, very. My dear fellow, your life depends on your remaining in bed for two weeks at least, without seeing any callers."

Wing Chow, the impassive butler, was called in and given instructions to admit no one. An official-looking chart was hung over the bed, the shades were drawn and a large bottle and a spoon arranged on the stand beside the bed. Chalmers, obviously impressed by these realistic arrangements, shook hands with Jay feelingly. "Good-by, old man, and if worst comes to worst, God bless you!"

The patient's smile was painful. "Do you know a nice, kind-hearted undertaker?"

"Leave that to us," Dr. Flexner assured him cheerily; "we'll attend to all those little details."

Left alone in the dimmed bedroom, Reginald was forced to admit that he did have a queerish feeling—in his heart, it was, or perhaps his lungs. Come to think of it, his grandfather had died of Bright's disease, and a great-uncle had passed away of phthisis at the age of ninety-two. The more he reflected, the worse he felt. He hadn't a single grandfather or grandmother left—in fact, nearly all his ancestors had died from something or other. There had been a surprising amount of mortality among them . . .

He groaned with real feeling, and then groaned again with still more feeling. For the door had been unceremoniously flung open and Constance Weems burst plumply into the room. "Reginald Jay!" she accused him; then, in a softened tone, "Orlando, how could you treat your Rosalind so?"

The sick man gave a really brilliant imitation of one in the last throes of dissolution. "Very—sick," he trailed out, and sank beneath the bedclothes; "think—going to—die—"

"Nonsense!"

The irritation got the upper hand in the lady's voice, giving it the pleasing quality of a nutmeg grater. "You know as well as I do that it's all a put-up job to cheat me out of a divorce. But if you and my husband think for one moment that I'm going to be stopped by child's play like this, you'll find you're very much mistaken!"

Reginald Jay spoke pleadingly, "Have a heart! I'm really ill. It—it came on me suddenly."

Mrs. Weems sniffed, then drew out a handkerchief bedewed with delicate scent and dabbed at her eyes. "It's because I have a heart that I want to be free. Have you forgotten our Forest of Arden? Orlando! Orlando! My heart is fluttering like a bird—a little, tender homing-bird that would fly to its own nest!"

"Help! I'm dying!" moaned Reginald, and, as if in answer, the door opened to admit Dr. Widner, followed by the apologetic Wing Chow.

"I no can helpee! Lady velly bigger than me. I say no can come in. She say go-to-hellee!"

"I am sorry, madam," bowed the doctor, "but this gentleman cannot be disturbed. A very serious case of—hem—post-mortem anterior metabolism, with complications. Quietness is essential. Wing Chow will keep you informed as to his progress," and the amazing little man actually succeeded in bowing the lady out and closing and bolting the door behind her. Jay sat up in bed and shook hands with him.

"You're a wonder! A moment more and she'd have got her divorce and married me!" he exclaimed, wiping his bedewed brow. "Some women rob the cradle, and some rob the grave. My God, I'd stay in bed a year to keep my old friend Weems safely married!"

"On the whole," the doctor mused, "on the whole, I think I shall prescribe a nurse for you. An—ornamental nurse," he hastened to add, at signs of explosion, "one whom it will not hurt the eyes of an invalid to look upon."

There are compensations to everything, even to sickness. Nurse Durant was such a compensation. She had a neat little figure which the prim blue uniform set off to perfection; she had soft, wavy brown hair with glints of gold in it which the absurd little cap made no pretense of hiding, and she had a smile that made one pray fervently—but not for speedy recovery. Then and there Reginald Jay determined that his illness should be lingering if it did not become chronic.

"There, there!" cooed Nurse Durant, smoothing his forehead, quite professionally, of course; "you mustn't get excited"

"Have you brought your trunk?" he asked, feebly. "I'm going to be sick more than a suit-case worth."

The nurse seemed surprised. "And yet you look so well!"

"Do you think so?" Jay cried, eagerly. "Of course, I need a shave, but when I'm dressed up I've been told I ought to try for a place in the movies. There's a photograph over there on the bureau somewhere—"

Nurse Durant blushed and made a great pretense of studying the chart at the head of the bed. "Temperature normal—pulse normal," she read aloud. "Mr. Jay, how long have you had this—this illness?"

"It began," explained the patient sadly, "with a love affair."

"Oh!" The nurse's tone was suddenly remote. She was turning away, but Jay caught her skirt.

"You dont understand. It wasn't that I was in love, but the lady. Listen—oh, please listen! You cant blame me if a married woman insists upon falling in love with me, can you? Her husband was an old friend of mine, and I never dreamed of such a thing. But she asked me to go to walk, and a storm came up and we couldn't find our way back to the inn till midnight. And she kept talking about how romantic it was!"

"I suppose she's very beautiful?" but the pretty nurse's tone was a trifle less frigid.

"Beautiful!" Jay growled. "With her hair all out of curl and plastered over her face! And she would skip, tho she weighs fifty pounds too much, and now she's trying to get a divorce from her husband because I happened to meet him coming out of a roadhouse that same night with a woman he'd been showing real estate lots to! And she wants me to be her witness, and afterwards she means to——" He broke off, shuddering.

"There, there!" cooed Nurse Durant, smoothing his forehead, quite professionally, of course; "you mustn't get excited. It's very bad for a man as sick as you are. Dont worry at all. No one shall marry you while I'm around."

Ensued several delightful days during which Jay's chart testified that he was at least holding his own. Constance and the Forest of Arden were quite forgotten, while Nurse Durant and her patient discovered singular similarities of taste. They both liked limburger cheese, ragtime music, Robert W. Chambers, auction bridge and Coney Island. They both disliked the subway, highbrow plays, blondes, bologna and grand opera. And when they both at the same moment stated that their favorite movie star was Norma Talmadge, they looked at one another awed. It was almost supernatural to feel so much alike about all the essential things.

But even a nurse has to have some sleep and, late one evening, while Reginald lay unprotected and helpless, the resourceful Constance appeared via the fire-escape to reiterate her plea that he recover and help to free her from a man who could never understand her soul-needs. She was just getting nicely under way when voices outside the door warned of the approach of a visitor.

"My husband!" Connie whispered, dramatically. "Well, it is Fate!" However, she showed distinct uneasiness, and just as Jay was on the point of fainting away she plopped plumply into the clothes hamper and drew the cover down, concealing all but one peroxide curl. At the same moment the door burst open and Weems flung himself in, quite purple with some emotion which he immediately proceeded to explain.

"I've got the evidence!" He waved a small pink slip of note-paper threateningly. "A letter in her own hand, beginning 'My Own Orlando,' and now, as soon as I find who the fellow is, I'll start a counter suit—what's the matter, Jay?"

For his friend had choked alarmingly, and now sat up among his pillows, regarding the clothes hamper, which was swaying violently to and fro in a very odd manner indeed. Luckily, Weems was too full of his own grievance to notice. "Yes, sir," he declared, violently, "I'm on the track of Orlando right now, and when I find him—" He brought his fist down on the lid of the hamper by way of emphasis.

"Wing!" called Jay, faintly, "Wing Chow!" And as the Chinaman appeared sleepily in the doorway he pointed to the hamper. "Take the laundry basket out into the other room. The man will be here for it tomorrow morning, and it's always well to be forehanded. Take it out! And keep it out—don't let it get back in here!"

Doctors Flexner and Widner wore a distinctly worried look as they entered the sick chamber the next morning and silently laid upon the bed a court order that Dr. Macklyn, the prominent physician, should be allowed to examine one Reginald Jay on behalf of Mrs. Constance Weems, who claimed that he was not sick enough to claim exemption from testifying in her divorce suit.

"There's just one thing to be done," Flexner observed, gloomily, to Widner, across the prone form of the patient, "and we'll have to do it or go to jail."

"Certainly," agreed his co-practitioner, "and the sooner the better. That Macklyn may be here at any moment."

They then both regarded Jay with an expression that caused lively foreboding in that gentleman's mind. "What do you mean?" he asked irritably.

"Which would you prefer to have?" Flexner inquired, as he opened his case, removed several small vials and a hypodermic needle and held them one after the other, to the light. "Now, we can give you a beautiful case of cholera, or perhaps you'd prefer leprosy? Or a touch of Asiatic fever? Come, come; choose and be quick about it? You can't expect us to go to jail because you aren't really sick. Be reasonable!"

"I'll be da—" Jay began, but the appearance of Nurse Duncan changed the expletive to "switched." She was bearing the breakfast tray and looked puzzled.

"Dr. Richard Macklyn is outside," she said; "what can he want? Do you know?"

"Then you've got a case for life"—he kist her—"for I have the best medical authority that my case is incurable!"

The two pseudo doctors collapsed with two groans onto two chairs, while the invalid showed strongly marked symptoms of getting out of bed, but sank back on second thought upon his pillows, running his fingers distractedly thru his hair. "Oh, we know, all right!" he said, dismally. "He wants to prove I'm faking sickness so he can send these fellows here to jail and marry me off to Con—to Mrs. Weems. Now, I wouldn't care if it meant jail for me, but—the other! And she'll marry me sure as fate if she gets her divorce . . ."

"Never!" cried Nurse Durant. These nurses have such a wonderful devotion to their duty! She set down the tray beside the bed, gave her hair a touch at the mirror and sailed out of the room militantly, returning in a moment with a disagreeable-looking man, carrying a battered medicine case and scowling over thick-lensed spectacles.

"Here is the patient, Dr. Macklyn," she said sweetly, "and these are the attending doctors. Any questions you may want finally gives up his life in a battle with natives, and the waster, stirred by his ideals and religious faith, becomes regenerated in the love of the island maid.

This clash of untrammelled passions and age-old conventions is not new, of course, but at least we expected Griffith to weave it into a human fabric. But "The Idol Dancer" never approaches reality anywhere and is merely bald melodrama working up to the inevitable Griffith chase, this time a boatload of natives, led by the beachcomber, racing back to the village in order to save it from headhunters. These savages, by the way, live up to Griffith tradition by spending hours battering away at the missionary's door.

Clarine Seymour is the island girl and as piquant a figure as ever we hope to see celluloided. No such half-caste girl ever existed on a tropical island, but why quibble at reality? Richard Barthelmess is effective as the derelict beachcomber, if rather youthful for a waster of such experiences as the subtitles paint. And Creighton Hale handles his role of the tubercular lad from the States very well. Here and there are "Griffith touches," but "The Idol Dancer" is a distinct disappointment.

DAVID WARK GRIFFITH is a man of unique personality. He can be good, bad and indifferent, all within the scope of a few weeks. It is his latest celluloid creation, "The Idol Dancer," which prompts us to this comment.

"The Idol Dancer" is Griffith at his worst, despite as colorful and exotic a background as any screen painter could desire. Griffith places upon a desert isle a picturesque triangle: a beautiful half-caste girl thru whose veins throbs the blood of several passionate races, a beachcomber waster and a missionary's sickly nephew from New England. Then comes the inevitable clash of passion and ideals. The weak youth

We rate the Metro visualization of Sir Gilbert Parker's "The Right of Way" as the best thing created by that organization since Alla Nazimova's unforgettable "Revelation." It is a tragic story, and Metro went at least a step in the right direction by preparing two endings. One presents the novel as the author saw it and the other offers it as motion picture producers imagine audiences demand it. The production is admirable as to consistent continuity plus direct and sincere handling. And Bert Lytell contributes one of the best characterizations of the year as that arch-cynic, Charley Steele. Another fine bit of work is that of Gibson Gowland as Joe Portugais.

John Barrymore's "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," (Paramount), will likely be an unforgettable thing in the minds of those who see it. For Barrymore makes the Robert Louis Stevenson creation a ghoulish thing of nightmares. True, he idealizes Jekyll into a poetic and melancholy youth of classic profile and lacy waistcoats. But his Hyde is a terrible being, with the most ghastly make-up we ever recall seeing in the films. Memories of the bent and gloating Hyde, loping thru the London fogs, will haunt your dreams. The film adaptation isn't the original story of Stevenson, since all sorts of things, from the addition of feminine interest on, have been done with it. Yet it is a finely workmanlike piece of screen-craft. Out of the cast stands a vivid figure of the London depths, played in remarkable fashion by one Nita Naldi. You will hear more of Miss Naldi, or we miss our guess. Martha Mansfield makes a rather pretty figure as Dr. Jekyll's sweetheart.

Universal apparently spent a small fortune upon "The Virgin of Stamboul" as a super-vehicle for Priscilla Dean. It is all about the desperate tribulations of a pretty beggar girl of Constantinople who is desired by a villainous sheik, a gentleman who apparently cares nothing for the H. C. of L. in combating harem overhead expenses. Then, too, the girl is beloved by an American soldier of fortune. We give you one guess as to who wins. But it doesn't happen until scores of camels and horses chase each other across the Sahara, endless extras walk up and down the streets of Stamboul and a desert city "in the direction of Mecca" is stormed.

and keep up with her class at school. She was in the first year at high.

"Virginia will not give up her studies, however," she told me. "She is fond of them, in the first place, and we realize that the wider her knowledge, the more conversant she is in different subjects, the better her work will be. She is particularly fond of French and literature, but there will be other subjects as well. One of the first things we'll attend to when we reach California is securing a good tutor."

I asked Virginia if she liked picture work.

"I love it," she answered, and I have come to know that Virginia loves many things. She loves dancing, swimming and EVERY time I have seen Virginia Brown Faire—and I have seen her often and under many widely varying conditions—I think of a rose. Not of a deep red rose, nor of a white or pale yellow rose—rather of a pink rose, delicate and fragile, not full blown, but in the bud.

Virginia is the essence of girlishness—still in her 'teens, she has not stopped to question why. She is fortunate in having a mother who is a pal and a father who takes his pleasure in making her happy. If she has weighed the world it has not been to find it wanting—and yet she is not selfish thru the things which have come to her. There has been an element of wisdom in the love which she has known.

Before signing her Universal contract and leaving for California, she came often to the magazine offices, and there has been no more welcome visitor. Her utter naturalness and the lack of any desire upon her part to impress went so far as to impress even the office-boy—that, in itself, is superlative. And there is no one who knows her who is not delighted over her good fortune—there could be no greater test of sincerity of feeling.

"How did I feel when I learnt I was one of the contest winners?" she reiterated. "Why, very happy. At first it seemed too good to be true, and when Universal offered me the five years' contract and the generous salary—well, I just didn't know any one could be so happy."

Her mother was with her and she told me that Virginia had left school this term, because they knew she could not accept any offer horseback riding—and she loves people. Perhaps that is why people love her, for there is no more mutual thing than love. Love begets love.

"I expect it will be ever so much nicer now, working with one company and knowing just what I will be required to do from day to day," she said. "I have done just a little motion picture work, you know—not very much, but I love it," and she smiled a Virginiaesque smile.

Virginia Brown Faire loves dancing, swimming and horseback riding. All of which comes in good stead in her motion picture work. Readers of THE CLASSIC should watch for her forthcoming Universal appearances

On this day she was thinking of the new frocks it would be necessary to take to California with her, and, like every other girl in her 'teens world over, she was quite absorbed in the question.

"I'm having the prettiest new evening dress," she said, happily. "It is maize color, of chiffon and very simple. Do you think gold cloth slippers would be prettiest with it?"

I thought so, and into my mind there came a picture of Virginia at her first party in the movie colony at Hollywood. In her shy little way she will be as charming as the most brilliant star—no one will be lovelier than our little Virginia in her delicate yellow frock, with her black curls pinned upon her pretty head and her skin like rose-tinted ivory. I wish that I might see her.

The next time I saw her the metamorphosis was quite complete—tangibly, of course; intangibly it was non-existent. She has taken the family name of Faire and hereafter we will know her as Virginia Faire. Her contract with Universal had been sealed, signed and delivered—she stood on the brink of stardom. But with it all she was the same little girl who entered the contest—shy, modest and appealingly winsome, supremely happy in honors which had come to her, most appreciative of all that had been done for her, but entirely lacking in any pose or affectation.

What the Fame

WE are a link in the great chain of the motion picture industry. We are a medium of expression between the silversheet, with all that lies behind it; i.e., the producer, the director, the scenario, the star, and the spectator. Daily the gigantic force of the screen grows in strength and, as a part of this new world-power, we realize its possibilities.

We firmly believe that the motion picture industry is—as all great industries should be—a field open to all. We know that the opportunity in this particular field is greater than that of any other industry of its size. Why? Because it is practically new. It is the youngest of world industries. It is the second largest and most powerful!

As a medium of expression between the silversheet and the spectator, we are trying to strengthen the connecting chain as much as possible. Last year we inaugurated a Fame and Fortune Contest. At the conclusion of this contest we launched four winners upon a career of unlimited possibility; four young women who would otherwise have never been given an opportunity to show their talent.

The results of last year's contest were so unusual as to make us decide upon a repetition of the contest. We were able to profit largely by our experience and to map and Fortune Contest Means

out a course which would tend to place the new venture on a higher scale. After much thought and deliberation, we decided upon the following plans for our new 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest:

First of all, the contest is open to every one, male and female, the only limitation being previous professional experience. Secondly, we have decided to produce a five-reel feature drama, the scenario for which has already been secured, and in which all the members of the final honor roll and, of course, the winners will take part.

Thirdly, for the final winners of the contest, we shall procure contracts with leading motion picture companies—and shall launch each winner with a two-year publicity campaign, thru our three magazines, THE MOTION PICTURE MAGAZINE, THE MOTION PICTURE CLASSIC and SHADOWLAND.

It is a source of great pleasure to us to know that we have been the means of serving our readers, as well as the screen profession. This feeling has caused us to back the 1920 Fame and Fortune Contest with all enthusiasm, and we intend that it shall surpass in every way any previous contest of its kind.

THE popularity contest is booming.
The intense interest manifested by votes and letters from Canada, South America,

Australia and New Zealand, as well as from nearly every town and city in America, is an inspiration to our editorial offices and is blazing the way for a greater popularity for our stars than ever before enjoyed by them.

Our readers are both intelligent and discerning and, in the letters received, it is interesting to note the reasons set forth for choosing their favorites. Most of the feminine stars are chosen for their beauty, or because of a certain appeal, but the male characters are chosen for their rugged strength or for their fun-loving proclivities. With or without reason, every movie fan has one or more favorites.

The interest is twofold, too, for not only does the reader have the opportunity of boosting the player who has given them the most happy hours, each reader also has the opportunity of winning one of the splendid prizes depicted and described in detail on another page.

Beginning with this number there will be in each issue of our magazines a tabulation of all the players listed in the contest with their representative number of votes. Here is the result of the contest at the time that this issue of the magazine went to press:

Feminine stars: Mary Pickford, 13,160; Pearl White, 10,481; Norma Talmadge, 9,875; Nazimova, 4,002; Viola Dana, 2,851; Constance Talmadge, 2,247; Elsie Ferguson, 1,450; Shirley Mason, 1,247; Lillian Gish, 1,150; Theda Bara, 1,057; Dorothy Gish, 981; Ruth Roland, 981; May Allison, 900; Mary Miles Minter, 900; Anita Stewart, 900; Marguerite Clark, 870; Marie Osborne, 750; Irene Castle, 647; Geraldine Farrar, 603; Mildred Davis, 550; Margarita Fisher, 550; Olive Thomas, 550; Gloria Swanson, 550; Pauline Frederick, 523; Marie Prevost, 518; Ethel Clayton, 451; Vivian Martin, 451; Mae Murray, 450; Marie Walcamp, 447; June Caprice, 489; Priscilla Dean, 489; Madame Petrova, 489; Dorothy Dalton, 356; Bebe Daniels, 356; Alice Joyce, 313; Juanita Hansen, 216; Alice Brady, 212.

The Prince Chap

Told in story form from the Paramount Photoplay

By FAITH SERVICE

"AND so," finished Peyton, "the Prince Chap went away and left the Be-u-tiful Princess spinning the mantle for his Glad Returning in her Faithful Tower."

Claudia's rapt eyes held a certain puzzlement. "If he loved his Be-u-tiful Princess so much," she said, in her eight-year-old treble, "and she loved her Prince Chap so much, why did he go away? Peoples who love like to stay close, I think."

Peyton sighed and shook his head. "All around Love, my child," he said, "there are the Briars of Necessity. The Be-u-tiful Princess had to have silken sandals for her milk-white feet and a mantle of true blue for her slender shoulders and a cap of moonshine and stardust for her golden head. The Prince Chap had neither gold nor precious stones, and so he had to go out among the briars and brambles and find the fortune to lay at his lady's feet. He is still searching, child, very sad at heart sometimes and often sore of foot. But when he is most tired and most sad, when the way seems the roughest and longest, he thinks of his truly blue Princess in her Tower of Faithfulness and his way is made glad again . . . and he can shut his eyes . . . and dream . . ."

"That's loving . . ." said the child, in an awed little whisper. "Oh, Prince Chap, I hope, some day, I will be a Princess in a Tower of Faithfulness waiting for my Prince Chap to come down the path of the Moon."

Peyton leaned over and kissed her. The little lovely touches of womanhood were becoming perceptible even now, he thought. And the thought brought an ache to his heart.

Two things happened to little Claudia when she was eight and a half. Two productive things, which, in their effects, were to remain with her and tinge all her years. One was that she learnt that fairy tales are, almost always, true. At any rate, the fairy story which had delighted her bedtime hour since first her mother had given her, as God was taking her, to Peyton, was true. The

At Christmas time there came a box of toys for Claudia

Prince Chap was her "Daddy" Peyton and the mythical, golden-haired Princess Alice in her Tower of Faithfulness was a lovely lady named Alice Travers, who lived in a distant country called, rather pleasantly, California. The lovely lady had a father with many millions and lived in a palace set among showering roses. It was all as beautiful as the fairy tale, Peyton told her, one lonely twilight hour when waiting and pain had made him take the child as confidante for the love that was gnawing away his resistance.

But it wasn't a fairy tale . . . Claudia could not quite explain why, but it made it different. It made it all very different. Suddenly, she didn't want to hear about it any more. Not any more, ever. She didn't want Peyton to be the Prince Chap and she didn't want the Princess with the shining hair to be the lovely lady in her garden of showering roses in that land called California.

Of course, she didn't know it, but with the merging of the fairy tale into a reality of pain, jealousy was born in her . . .

The second thing was the arrival, in person, of the lovely lady. That, as may be imagined, was a most tremendous happening.

Claudia had been reading Grimm's, quite alone, in the window seat. Peyton was out for the afternoon, but had promised to take her to supper and the play later on. They did things like that, the lonely man and the fanciful child. Sometimes some of the other sculptors and artists in the building went along. Claudia was the Queen of them all. They had, each and every one of them, known her beautiful mother when, in the heyday of her youth and beauty, she had made them rapturous, artistically, by posing for them. They, each and every one of them, accepted her little girl as a sacred trust, even tho she had chosen to give her into the specific keeping of Peyton.

It had been just about twilight. Claudia loved to read fairy tales at twilight. Peyton had very solemnly assured her that none of these tales could ever, ever come alive.

There had come a rap at the door, very gently . . . Claudia had called "Come!" very dulcetly, too. And then the door had swung open and Claudia had known at once that the lovely lady was before her. Her first instinct, too, was one of a fierce little pain. S'pose and s'pose the lovely lady had come to take Peyton home with her to that land called California, where, Claudia knew, he had been as a little boy . . . ? S'pose and s'pose she should take him away from her . . . ? A pain, unchildlike in its bitterness, stabbed her small and loudly thumping heart.

There was something unfriendly, almost distrustful in the way the lovely lady came into the room and over to the window seat, from which, with difficulty, Claudia managed to rise and bow.

"Arc you," the lady said, in a tone as thumpy-sounding as Claudia's heart, "arc you . . . Mr. Peyton's little . . . girl?"

"Yes," said the child, for the first time, inadequate.

The lovely lady dropped into the chair Claudia held out for her.

"I have come a long way," she said, "to find out."

"Didn't you know," Claudia said, "about me?"

"I had heard." the lady said, "things . . ." There was a silence, then, "What do you call him, my dear?" she asked.

"Daddy, of course," said Claudia, adding, "that is, when I dont call him Prince Chap."

The lady didn't answer, and Claudia took the silence to be an invitation. "You see," she said, entertainingly, "Daddy tells me a fairy story, or he used to tell me a fairy story, and it was all about a Be-u-tiful Princess who sat in a Tower of Faithfulness spinning a mantle for his Glad Returning. He used to tell it to me most every evening, just about now. It helped him when he was sad. Then, one day, he was sadder than ever, and he told me that it wasn't a fairy story at all. The Prince Chap was himself and the Princess was . . ." Claudia paused and caught her breath . . . "The Princess was make-believe," she said. It didn't seem the thing to do to tell the lady with the cold eyes that the Prince Chap wove the twilight with the bright jewels of his radiant love for her. The Prince Chap, it came to Claudia, had been wrong. It had been the wrong sort of fairy tale . . . it had had the wrong sort of Princess . . .

Alice Travers was staring into a space greyer than any space she had ever known before. Grey, and thronged, too, with the ugly images the past few years had brought to her, ever since Bill Peyton had gone away to win fame and fortune, and hadn't won it . . . suspicions nurtured to growth by her father, by her aunt, by Helmer, the man with the millions who wanted to marry her . . . suspicions she had made up her mind to accept or to lay into the dust where she had hoped against hope they might belong. She found her voice and said, rather than asked:

"Your . . . your daddy loved your mother, didn't he?"

"Of course," said the child, with fierce partisanship she felt for the dead she had loved; "everybody loved my mother. Daddy said, often, that hers was a face to 'launch a thousand ships and burn the topless towers of Ilium.' 'Course, indeed, he did love her."

"Of course . . ." said Alice Travers. Claudia thought she had the disagreeablest laugh she had ever heard. It didn't go at all with a dream of a lovely lady, whose voice should be as a tinkling bell.

After the laugh, Peyton came in. When he saw Alice, Claudia hid her small, troubled face in her hands. There was such a glory on it. "I didn't know," thought the child, "he was waiting like that . . ."

Then she heard Alice say words like "suspicions" and "honor" and "tests for me" and then the word "honor" again, reiterated several times. It sifted into her small intelligence that the word honor had, somehow, to do with her. More clearly she got the fact that it had to do with Peyton's sending her, Claudia, away. If he kept her with him the lovely lady would know that he had no honor. If Claudia stayed, the lovely lady would go away . . . definitely . . . forever . . .

"You must accept my word of honor," Claudia heard Peyton say, his voice all stiff with an intolerable ache; "it must be enough for you, Alice . . . oh, my dear . . ."

That last, thought Claudia, must melt the ice away from the coldest blue eyes, must warm to a fierce tenderness the most hidden heart.

"I will not be made a laughing-stock," Alice was saying, "for any living man. That is what you would do with me. You would have me take to my bosom the living token of your infidelity. You are mad."

"I have been," the man said; he added, "dreamers are always mad, I guess . . . they build castles made of hopes and span the very heavens with bridges of their own tears."

"Will you send the child away?" The woman's voice was becoming tense, impatient.

"I will not."

"Do you love her better than you do me?"

"I love her better than this thing you ask me to do for you."

"Then it is good-by. Forever, you understand?"

"I understand. You have made me."

"Very well. Good-by."

"Good-by, dear."

Claudia crept into his arms, there on the old window seat where he had spun for her the fabric of her young imagination. She closed her slender little arms about him and held him in a vise. After a great while, his tears fell on her hair and hung there, emblematic. "She didn't care enough, Claudia," he said.

"She didn't know how," said the child, and kist him fiercely on his eyes, his hair and on his listless hands.

At Christmas time there came a box of toys for Claudia, gaudy affairs, and a note for Peyton announcing the marriage of Alice Travers to Robert Helmer.

The years never effaced for Claudia the memory of Peyton

"I will not be made a laughing-stock," Alice was saying, "for any living man. That is what you would do with me. You would have me take to my bosom the living token of your infidelity. You are mad" playing kid games with her, zestfully, with his heart, hurt to death, in his eyes.

Claudia had a tenacious memory or the memory of Alice would never have persisted, because she was twenty before she saw or ever heard of her again.

She was a very beautiful twenty, too, with dreams in her eyes and tenderness in her fingertips. She was so very beautiful, indeed, and there were so many broken hearts attributed to her that gossip began to wag its finger at the ménage of Peyton and herself, unchaperoned. Peyton, instantaneously alert, engaged a housekeeper. Claudia, instantaneously enraged, protested.

"It's absurd!" she stormed. "I've taken care of you all these years, capably, if I do say so. We are happy just as we are, just the two of us, you and I. We never have needed another living soul. We are complete. Now here you go, blundering, and destroy the whole thing. You bring a woman into our home and pay her wages. Daddy dear, how could you?"

Peyton explained, with what discrimination he could, and Claudia never called him daddy again.

She never did because she never again felt the same as she had before that window-seat talk when Peyton tried to tell her that the little girl was grown up, that he was not her daddy, nor any sort of blood relation, and that the world . . . well, the world . . . and Claudia understood . . .

She understood a great many other things, too. She understood, for instance, the breaking hurt in Peyton's heart the years had never wholly swept away. She understood what it means when a woman loves a man, or a man loves a woman, and there is no way out. She understood why she had never been able to love the Earl of Huntingon or any of the other nice boys who had come to Peyton's studio and sued for her favors. She had never been able to because . . .

She understood why she

It made Peyton's occasional calls elsewhere, without her, intolerable hours had mothered Peyton so all these years, why she had suffered when she had learnt, years ago, that the fairy story of the Prince Chap was not a fairy story at all, and why, when Alice had gone away, she had been able to take the broken man into her arms and kiss him and soothe him as a woman might have done.

All these things had been possible because she had loved him. Because she loved him now. Because she must always love him so long as he was he and she was she and the world revolved about them. She was made for this.

It made everything rather different, of course: Painfully, delightfully different. It made their tête-à-tête teas together stolen paradises. It made Peyton's occasional calls elsewhere, without her, intolerable hours. It made the memory of Alice, still visible in his eyes, an aching dreariness . . . It made a touch a thrill . . . a word a sacrament . . . it gave a fever to her veins, flinging a violence of roses into her cheeks . . . a brilliance almost supernatural into her eyes . . .

It made the coming of Alice into their lives again a cup she could not pass and dared not drain . . .

Claudia learnt a great deal about love after the meeting with Alice. She learnt that part of love which is renunciation. She grew so greatly that she could find peace in the thought of Peyton winning his peace at last after his suffering years.

The night after their meeting Peyton and Alice took a long stroll. They were at a summer hotel, and Peyton told Claudia not to wait up for them. She didn't, but she waited in bed with a heart as cold as ice until their footsteps and their whispered good-nights sent the hot tears flooding down her face.

"Prince Chap," she murmured in the honeyed darkness, "please let me be glad when you are glad . . . you have been sorry like this so long . . . and I have been sorry like this only for a little, little time. You have borne it, and so will I. But oh, my darling, if it could have been me . . . if it could have been me . . ."

The next morning, at the breakfast-table, Peyton told her all about it. It was a habit of theirs to tell each other everything. The habit had precluded, all their lives together, any sort of shred of misunderstanding arising between them.

There was, there had always been, only glad, confident morning in their mutual tie.

"Alice is a widow," Peyton said; "she has been for nearly five years. I . . . you see, Claudia honey, it has been a long while with both of us. Flames abate, even such a flame as there was between us. We think, Alice and I, that there could be no one thing in all the world so fascinating as to set up those ashes, revive that flame, make those dear dead dreams live, lovely things again. We are going to try together to win back our youth, the love of our youth."

"It would be beautiful," said Claudia: "you . . . you might even build . . . again . . . the Tower of Faithfulness and Universal has engaged a "plot doctor," which opens the way for: Scenario surgeons. Photoplay physicians. Philm pharmacists. Drama druggists, etc.

Now we have an epidemic of rural dramas about to descend upon us. Witness David Griffith's "Way Down East" and Metro's "Shore Acres." Watch 'em come.

Another prediction: Watch for studios to be built in Cuba.

Just when all the movie producers start on their spring exodus to Europe, Albert E. Smith, president of Vitagraph, comes back to America. He's visiting in Los Angeles after nine months in Brooklyn.

Suggestion to producers—Why not produce a story touching upon prohibition?

Yeh, divorce is in the air in filmland. The continuities seem to be all wrong. Harold, all wrong. So retakes are in order.

The Pride of

By ELIZABETH

ANNETTE KELLERMAN said she will never, so long as she lives, get over her fear of poverty. She told me this one afternoon as we sat in comfortable rocking-chairs on the lawn in front of a big, typically Californian house in South Pasadena that she has rented for the season. She took this house because, with its broad lawn and orange and lemon groves, and situated as it is on the top of a hill from which she can see miles of open country, it is as far removed from the atmosphere of the theater as tho it were in a different world.

"I remember one period in London, when I was trying to get my first engagement," she said, and you would have guessed from her expression that distance has not greatly softened the memory. "My father had heart disease and we were desperately poor. We got lodging in King's Cross for one pound, (five dollars), a week, which included meals for us both.

My room was in a garret, where the ceiling was so low that I couldn't stand up straight. I used to comb my hair kneeling in front of the bed. One thing I have always been thankful for is that my father never saw that room. He was unable to climb the stairs. It was at that time that I began to be afraid of the poorhouse. The very thought of it was unbearable. It comes back to me now, sometimes, and at the moment I am able to think of all sorts of things that might happen to send me there! And then, at other times, I am glad that I had that experience; I think that it is a good thing." Undoubtedly she feels that this was the principal motive power that drove her on to success, a success that her father never lived to see.

"Do you think that he knows about it?" I asked, and she answered, "Yes, I am certain that he does." She paused. "It is a curious thing," she went on, "I've felt somehow . . ." She finished her sentence with a gesture which clearly meant "that I've had help."

The thing that would impress you most about Annette Kellerman is, of course, her tremendous vitality. Her clothes were designed for comfort and gave no least hint of perfect figure; a figure which has repeatedly been said to be the most perfect in the world . . . she wore white cotton stockings and broad-toed, low-heeled shoes. She has a frank, comradely way of shaking hands. Her voice is the voice of a sports-woman, hearty and free from affectation. There is never a moment in which she appears to be self-conscious of her fame.

As a little girl, Annette Kellerman was an almost hopeless cripple. "I had to wear iron braces on both my legs," she said. "These extended to the hips and hurt me horribly." In addition to this, she was told that there was very little hope for her ultimate recovery. She was sensitive, timid, above all, afraid of the water. But her father, a typical Australian, was resolved that she should learn to swim, and she did, very slowly, she says, but very thoroly. This was in Sydney, New South Wales, where she was born and spent her childhood. Little by little she felt her crippled limbs growing stronger until, at last, there came a day when she was able to discard her braces entirely. With returning health came a new confidence and, by the time she was thirteen years old, she became so proficient a swimmer that she was given an engagement at exhibition swimming with a salary of five pounds, ($25.00), a week, which attracted a great deal of attention.

Soon she began making records with her two, five and ten-mile swims, and her family talked things over and decided that there would be more opportunity for her in some big city, preferably London. So she and her father left Sydney, promising to send for the family with the first dawn of prosperity. But for a while it looked as tho the prosperity was never going to materialize.

The Home-Made Girl

By PEARL MALVERN

Photograph by Lanning

THERE is always something fresh and charming and never-to-come-again about a beginning of anything. Stevenson said something or other very apt and very lovely concerning a first sunset, a first love, the incomparableness of both of these. He might, just as truly, have said the same of the first of a career, especially when that career is the silversheet and is being embarked upon by a young girl with tawny-colored hair, a gentle manner and starry eyes. There is something wholly inspirational, a trifle wistful and very sweet in such an inception. There is so much roseate optimism, so much grave earnestness, so much of the first and tender fruitage of the young success. There is an atmosphere about it of a young bride, a new baby, all the fresh things of life and living. There is so much of hope and faith. Success, full-blown, has never that delicate bloom of success still glimpsed in its entirety upon some dim horizon.

Alice Calhoun had the air, the night I talked with her and with her mother, who is also her best friend, in their apartment on upper Riverside Drive, of a child standing, expectant and delighted, on tiptoes looking into a shop window, marvelously filled. There was about her the unsaid thought, "This is too good to be true."

What she really did say, however, not once, but many times, almost, indeed, the theme of our talk was, "People are too good to be true."

Hers is a grateful as well as an eager little heart. The sunshine of chivalry, of a helping hand, of kind words and encouraging praise falls upon receptive soil, anxious to give back again all and more than it has received.

"Everybody has been so kind," she said. "I think movie people are the most understanding, the most open-hearted, the kindest people in the whole world. I haven't been disappointed in a single one of them, nor in a single thing about the work. I love every bit of it. When I first began going to pictures—remember, mother?—you used to say that you always knew where to look for me after school—in the nearest picture house—Maurice Costello was my hero. I used to say that I was going to marry him when I grew up. I never dreamed in my wildest dreams, tho, that I would ever play in a picture with him. And then, just the other day, down at Vitagraph, I did. I played in a picture with him. It seemed almost too good to be true. And he is just as dear and nice as I thought, courteous and thoughtful and considerate. Vitagraph seems just like another home to me and all the Vitagraph people are like sort of an extension of my own family."

"Would you ever leave?" I wanted to know, realizing that the word "ever" is a little word to the very young.

Miss Calhoun made a small dissenting gesture. A very clean, real sort of loyalty is hers. There is, one perceives, a steel-trueness both in the chiseling of her fine features and the chiseling of her keen young spirit. "I wouldn't want to, I know," she said, "and I certainly never will until I have proven to them that the faith they have placed in me has been justified. They have all said, in so many words, 'Go ahead. We know you can do it,' and I want, more than anything else in the world, to show them that I can do it before I ever leave, even if I ever do then."

"How did it all begin?" I asked.

"Accidentally, in a way," laughed Alice. "Mother and I had just come to New York from Cleveland and were looking for an apartment. We happened, while looking, to run into Frederick A. Thompson, who had an apartment he wanted to lease, or something of the sort, in the very house we were in. While we were all talking together he kept looking at me, and suddenly he said, 'You would screen well, do you know that?'"

"I, of course, just gasped. It was as tho he had put his hand right on my secret dream and dragged it out into the light of day. I guess my eyes told him better than my lips that, of all the things in the world, that very thing was the thing I wanted most to do. I must have 'registered,'

Alice Calhoun invaded the screen accidentally. Seeking a New York apartment, Miss Calhoun and her mother met Frederick A. Thompson, who saw her film possibilities. And so she became a Vitagrapher. In the center is a glimpse of Miss Calhoun in a recent screen drama

Your skin needs Different kinds of Care at Different Times

Before you go out, protect your complexion from the dust, wind and sun
this way

More and more women are discovering how they can remain powdered and free from shine for five or six hours. Before powdering, they apply a bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream

Your skin needs two creams

One without any oil, for daytime and evening needs—Pond's Vanishing Cream. It will not reappear in a shine.

One with an oil base—Pond's Cold Cream. It has just the amount of oil the skin needs.

Neither of these creams fosters the growth of hair or down.

Get a jar or tube of each cream today, at any drug or department store. With these two creams you can give your skin the different kinds of care it needs at different times.

YOUR skin is not a piece of fabric that can always be cared for in the same way. It is a living thing which has different needs at different times.

Before an outing, for example, your skin needs a special kind of care

When you go out, rub a tiny bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream into your skin. It disappears instantly, leaving your face soft and smooth. There is no oil in Pond's Vanishing Cream, so it never reappears in a wretched greasy shine—and it gives your skin the protection it needs from the coarsening caused by dust, wind and sun.

Then, about powdering—do not expect powder to stay on for hours without a powder base.

Before you powder rub a tiny bit of Pond's Vanishing Cream into your face. Instantly it will disappear, leaving the skin softened. Now see how smoothly the powder goes on, how natural it looks. It will stay on two or three times as long as ever before. Because it is without oil, Pond's Vanishing Cream can never reappear in a shine.

At night, before retiring, is the occasion when your skin should have a special kind of cleansing. Only with a good oil cream can the dust that has worked into the pores be removed. Before retiring give your face a thorough cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. It has just the amount of oil to make it best adapted to cleansing the skin and clearing up the clogged pores.

Watch out for the times when your face looks lined and your skin lacking in vitality. These are the times you need massage. Pond's Cold Cream is made exactly the consistency to work well into the pores and give a perfect massage.

The dust specks that work deep into the skin should be removed each night with Pond's Cold Cream

Confessed Calumny

Warner Oland Tells His Secrets of Screen Villainy

By TRUMAN B. HANDY

THIS is a series of confessions!

We who concoct fascinating fripperies anent the cinematic constellation for the daily papers aren't prone to be startled. In other words, we only too often fail to register a thrill.

And, moreover, only too often we've heard how all bad screen villains—the kind that pursue the movie cuties unto the very last reel; the sort of men whom mothers warn their daughters to stay away from—are fond husbands and devoted daddies to a baker's dozen of progeny; how 'Papa Bluebeard' dotingly prepares the evening meal while friend wife whispers honeyed harmonies into his ever-ready ear. And all that—i.e., how all film bad men are home-growing saints in real life. It's gotten to be an old, old story and a sad tale.

Hence, I hesitate to state that Warner Oland, the wickedest of 'em all, is strictly a home product. Such is the case. Sad, but true. How very interesting it would be were we to see Mr. Oland surrounded by a den of vampires, or hatching a plot to dig up his neighbor's favorite rosebushes! What a thrill we would get were we to observe him in the act of choking his wife or of raising hell with his flock of domestics! And how interestingly intricate would it be were we to have definite proof that he were footling a scheme to turn his peaceful home town, Glendale, into a seething hell-hole of anarchy!

As it is, we are forced to record that said gentleman of the voracious viciousness was actually and ostensibly observed to he muchly occupied in the overt act of culling "Toots," his wife's pet poodle, of fleas!

And, furthermore, we shed large quantities of salty tears as we announce that Mr. Oland speaks perfect English in a soft, semi-Southern drawl. And has never even slapped his mother-in-law, the very charming Mrs. Shearn, one of those real, old-time, genuine women who have received advancing years gracefully!

The profession of wreaking screen havoc is one peculiar unto itself, we learn as we hold conversation with him who gave us cold chills when we saw him as the Japanese Baron Somebody in "Patria." Of course, you are always good friends with the leading lady whom the script requires you to calumnize. And, besides, you always feel ashamed of yourself when you have to bind and gag the helpless hero, whom you know in real life to have a wife and seven children to support.

And somehow or other you never can quite get over kicking yourself for having about her the garment, almost torn from her body by the lust of her husband's hireling. She read in his hard, pitiless glance that she was beaten at last in her gallant, desperate game, knew that no words she could say would save her, and yet said them, with trembling lips that strove for control, with fearful, agonizing earnestness, even with piteous, futile little efforts to appeal to his pity, his old affection. His pity! As well might she have struggled to stop the lightning flashes with her small, naked hands.

The Man Who Killed

"Look, at yourself!" he sneered, indicating her uncovered limbs, her torn, disheveled hair. "A likely story! You—" and he called her a vile name that streaked her face like a white whip-lash.

She cowered from him, and from the vision of the future his words evoked, a divorced woman, stained with public shame, driven out of her husband's house to drift in dubious and always more dubious circles in provincial towns upon the Continent, the butt of whispers, the prey of adventuring men . . .

And suddenly she began to shriek in a shrill, tearing, senseless way. She was a cornered animal thing, bereft of humanhood, save that her shrieks took the form of words. "God! Oh, God! Dont let him! Dont let him! Oh! Oh! Please, God!"

He choked the cries with great, cruel hands. "Dont be a damn fool. There's no one to hear you, no one that would care if he did—"

"And there," said a new voice, in an odd, breathless fashion, "there's where you're mistaken, my friend! I heard, and I—care. Take your hands off her or I'll be delighted to kill you, you hound!"

Richard Loring advanced from the threshold, very white and quite ridiculously a man, with his great shoulders squared, his hands clenched into sledgehammers. Sir Archibald made a mistake. He pointed derisively at the shaking figure of the woman, crouched against the wall. He laughed. And Richard Loring sprang toward him, knocking the lamp over as he sprang.

Clutching her torn gown about her, Lady Falkland fled from the pavilion into the storm, and thru a back way to the house and her own rooms, where she fell in a swoon upon the floor. And afterward, with only the maid to watch over her, she fought a hundred desperate, delirious fights all night long.

The finding of Sir Archibald Falkland's bruised body in the disordered pavilion the following morning set all Constantinople buzzing. The mystery was not who could have wished to kill him, but which one of the many who had cause to wish to kill him had finally accomplished the deed. It was Lady Edith, distraught over the ruin of her plans, who accused her rival, the wife of the dead man.

"Ask Lady Falkland where she was!" she clamored. "Ask the servants who saw them quarreling in the pavilion! Ask her maid how her mistress came in last night!"

The obvious absurdity of accusing the frail little woman who lay raving upstairs in the flaming clutch of fever was slightly mitigated by the fact that tho otherwise greatly bruised and torn, it was plain that what had caused the baronet's death was the thrust of a knife which was found beside the body and which Lady Edith instantly identified as belonging to the wife. Within three hours Lady Falkland had been publicly accused of the murder of her husband, and in spite of the fact that she was too ill to be lifted from her bed, the trial was begun in the library of the Falkland mansion.

It had hardly begun when a servant came, soft-footed, to the side of the Marshal, a stout, kindly, conservative Englishman, and whispered to him that some one wished to speak to him outside. In the hall, Richard Loring, haggard with sleeplessness but dressed immaculately and very calm, rose up to meet him.

"I have been told," he spoke, slowly, as tho testing each word, "that Lady Falkland has been accused of the murder of her husband. Is that true?"

The Marshal nodded, regretful but tremendously official. "And she is very ill, too, poor lady. But one mustn't let pity interfere with the law. The trial is even now proceeding within, and the testimony of the servants seems conclusive. No doubt she had cause. I have heard stories, really beastly stories, but what can one do? The law—hem—the law must be preserved."

"Then you shall try another prisoner," Loring said, jaw set in a grim line, "for it was I who killed the degenerate beast who was torturing her. That is, I had the honor of contributing greatly toward the happy result, altho it was a Greater than I who turned his own knife against him in the struggle. I refer to the Lord, who always had great reverence for women."

The Marshal chewed his straw-colored mustache in dire perplexity. "H-m! Most 'straordinary! Two murderers, and you say he was—h-m—torturing her?"

"He was taunting her with the threat that he was going to shame her publicly for the lustful attack made on her by a man in his pay." Richard Loring did not raise his voice, but the low words seemed to fill the hall with hideous clamor. The Marshal, a family man with two young daughters, writhed visibly. "I happen to love the lady. I have loved her for seven years. But if I had been a perfect stranger, I could have done no less than I did, and still call myself a man."

The Marshal walked the hall in deep dejection. "H-m! But there must be an accused. It is obvious there must be an accused Aha!" He actually chuckled, this absurd, simple creature. "I have the idea. There is a criminal, a desperate creature who broke jail last night and was found drowned in the Dardanelles this morning. Now he would make an ideal accused for us—"

On the narrow ledge of the tower parapet Gloria, Lady Falkland stood and looked out dreamily into the pure blue deeps of the sky. Her fragile night draperies floated about her; a strange, mysterious smile curved her white lips. The fever was gone, the horror of the night, and the years before the night was passed and at last freedom awaited, and forgetfulness and peace.

"I shall sleep well," murmured Lady Falkland. "The boy will go back to England to my sister. He will smell the spring in Sussex. He will see the Hawthorn bloom—white—like bridal wreaths—but I shall be sleeping, so soundly that I think I shall not even dream—"

She took a step toward the edge of the parapet. But before she could take another, strong arms were about her, drawing her back to life.

"Not yet, Gloria, my beloved!" cried Richard Loring. "We will go back to England together, and the white Hawthorn shall be your bridal wreath—"

"Dick! You must not keep me," she moaned, tho she clung to him with quite earthly terror, her overwrought mood gone. "They accuse me—and I have written a confession so that they could never accuse you. Dear, it was the only way. I couldn't bear—any more—"

"That is all over," he told her gently; "by and by I will explain. But no one accuses either of us, nor ever will. There is nothing for you to die for. There is everything for you to live for—Gloria! Gloria, listen to me, my dearest. Let me tell you what there is to live for—"

And as he told her Death drew back, discomfited, and all about them the air was splendid with the shinings wings of Love . . .

The Mid-Day Frolic

for the first time in a one-piece bathing-suit before the camera, mother clucks and sputters and follows daughter around the picture camp with a helligerent and watchful eye. But the life she sees and the routine of hard work is so decidedly humdrum that she promptly retires, completely at ease as to the pitfalls and snares in the wake of a virtuous flower, satisfied to let the matron put arnica on bruised knees and to see that the wardrobe mistress fits her into the requisite low-and-behold attire.

The various companies making use of this rarified feminine "atmosphere" differ in their handling of the girls. In the first place, requirements of production differ. Sennett's beauties, such as Phillis Haver and Harriet Hammond, are the languid, gracile type of girl, replete with eyelashes and soulful eyes. Hampton Del Ruth, when he selects girls for Sunshine comedies, never wants a girl who is more than five feet five inches in height. His system of weights and measures is meticulous, as follows:

Height	Weight
5 ft. 1 in.	105 lbs.
5 ft. 2 in.	110 lbs.
5 ft. 3 in.	115 lbs.
5 ft. 4 in.	120 lbs.
5 ft. 5 in.	125 lbs.

Questions relative to height and weight are the first asked at any studio. No experience is necessary. The majority of the producers prefer to get girls unspoiled by any idea of technique or tricks. When a girl comes to Del Ruth with the intimation that she is a second Mary Pickford, he promptly disillusion her.

Both Sennett and Christie, while they use girls in the ensemble, insist upon the beauty being brainy enough to understand the fundamentals of acting, inasmuch as the background has to be decorative enough to play a principal part in the picture. Phillis Haver, for instance, could never have been the beauty in "Salome vs. Shenandoah" if she had not possessed both beauty and histrionic ability. Nor could Marie Prevost have appeared in "Yankee Doodle in Berlin" had she not manipulated her grey matter as well as her shapely legs.

"I got a girl," remarked Al Christie, proprietor of the comedies, "who had not a particularly good figure, but a very winsome smile. I figured that I could use her. We could cover up her underpinning and play up her teeth."

Christie prefers to get girls with experience, inasmuch as each damsel of necessity must be able to do a certain amount of legitimate dramatic comedy. He will consider no girl applicant more than five feet six inches in height. His girls are slightly different from those at the Sennett and Fox studios, because they generally play "dressed-up" parts and are more apt to appear in afternoon tea-gowns than in a bathing-suit, altho one of the Christie beauties, Vera Steadman, wears bathing apparel whenever the scenario editor can find a suitable excuse for it.

But Vera, too, is required to thespianize—to use facial expression as well as a beautiful figure to "put her over." Helen Darling, another of the Christie flock, is a former café dancer, chosen for the comedies chiefly because she is graceful and can walk thru a door without giving the impression that she's all left feet. Dorothy DeVore, perhaps the tiniest girl on the screen, is five feet one inch tall, a former singer in a Los Angeles café. She is a good type, because she has a bright, snappy personality. Marjorie Payne, on the other hand, is taller and of more languid aspect. She is the winner of a national magazine beauty contest and has a wistful, Mona Lisa face. Florence Gilbert was picked particularly for her face, as a type opposite to Miss DeVore, who is a brunette. Miss Gilbert is almost the fluffy blonde type and is possessed of a lovely oval face. Peggy Davis, on the other hand, is the vivacious, sprightly, medium-sized brunette lorelei.

On the Sunshine lot, Dorothy Lee represents the terpsichorean coterie of mirth-maids. She, like Dorothy DeVore, is small and extremely vivacious, with a snappy personality. Norma Canterno, a large-eyed, beautiful Italian girl, is possessed of perhaps the most beautiful shoulders in comedy, while Bessie True, a brunette with light-blue eyes, was selected particularly because of her knees and ankles. Lillian Hackett's feet are the smallest on the "lot," while Dorothy Terry's arms, hands and shoulders are proclaimed ideal.

The lovely, dreamy, blonde Phillis Haver is the ideal girl on the Sennett lot, experts have testified. Miss Haver has deep, baby-blue eyes and lips that form a natural pout. Her arms and hands are slender and her fingers are tapering, and her legs are as perfectly formed as those of a young child. Marie Prevost is her exact countertype, with a live-wire, sprightly manner and a "mickey" personality that has proved extremely attractive to thousands of film "fans."

Only one girl in 10,000 can qualify for the movies' decorative background. So says Mack Sennett, the originator of the mid-day frolic in front of the camera—the Ziegfeld of the films!

It was only a few years ago that Sennett conceived his idea of the feminine atmosphere, inspired by the success of musical revues thru their attractive chorus. Bathing-suits for the movie maids were the most natural garb imaginable, and the California beaches furnished exclusive, original locale.

LEARN DRAFTING

at home in spare time as you would in actual practice. Men and women in great demand for permanent positions as mechanical draftsmen. Our comprehensive Home Study Course qualifies you to secure and hold one of these desirable positions. No previous training is necessary to become a practical, mechanical draftsman by our successful method of home instruction. We have hundreds of successful graduates now holding good positions.

EARN $35.00 to $100 A WEEK

Many of our graduates have reached high salaries rapidly owing to their practical training. They secure excellent salaries at the start—as high as $2,600 the first year. Usual pay of draftsmen is $35.00 to $100 a week. Advancement is rapid.

DRAWING OUTFIT FURNISHED

We supply every student with a Drawing Outfit for use throughout the course. There is no extra charge for this and it becomes your personal property when you have completed the course.

HELP YOU SECURE POSITION

We are frequently able to place our Students in good positions, sometimes before they complete the course. Many concerns write us offering positions to our graduates. The demand for trained draftsmen is greater than the supply. The training we give enables students to secure positions without trouble, on completing the course. Training for Authorship

How to write, what to write, and where to sell.

Dr. E. Esenwein

for many years editor of Lippincott's Magazine, and a staff of literary experts. Constructive criticism. Frank, honest, helpful advice. Real teaching.

One pupil has received over $5,000 for stories and articles written mostly in spare time—"play work," he calls it. Another pupil received over $1,000 before completing her first course. Another, a busy wife and mother, is averaging over $75 a week from photoplay writing alone.

There is no other institution or agency doing so much for writers, young or old. The universities recognize this, for over one hundred members of the English faculties of higher institutions are studying in our Literary Department. The editors recognize it, for they are constantly recommending our courses.

We publish The Writer's Library, 13 volumes, descriptive booklet free. We also publish The Writer's Monthly, the leading magazine for literary workers, sample copy 20c, annual subscription $2.00. Besides our teaching service, we offer a manuscript criticism service.

How to Obtain Beautiful, Rich, Long, Eyelashes and Brows!

EVERY WOMAN should be the rightful owner of beautiful eyes, the essentials of which are, First: Long, rich eyelashes; and Second: Well-cared-for eyebrows. No matter what color your eyes may be,—gray, brown or blue,—if they are shaded by thick, silky lashes, and well-shaped brows, their charm is greatly accentuated.

Nowadays, no one needs to be the dissatisfied possessor of short, thin, uneven brows and lashes; you can greatly assist Nature by simply applying a little of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier at night. This scientific preparation nourishes the eyebrows and eyelashes, causing them to become gradually thick and lustrous, imparting sparkling expression to the eye, and added charm to the face.

M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier, which has been successfully used by thousands, is guaranteed absolutely harmless; it is not a greasy, sticky ointment, but a clean, nicely-perfumed liquid, in a cut glass bottle with glass stopper and applicator. The cut represents actual size of bottle. The active principle of this valuable article is a rare and expensive organic concentration which is unequalled for the purpose of stimulating and strengthening the particular follicles which produce rich, dark eyelashes.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Upon receipt of 75c in stamps, coin or Money Order, I will send you postpaid, in plain wrapper, a bottle of M. T.'s Eyelash and Eyebrow Beautifier together with my copyrighted booklet on Beauty Hints.

The following preparations are of highest standard and well recommended:

- M. T.'s Nature's Beauty Cream, a wrinkle eradicator $.75
- M. T.'s A. E. A. Lotion, for Pimples and Blackheads $.75
- M. T.'s Depilatory to remove superfluous hair $.50
- M. T.'s Freckle Cream, for stubborn freckles and tan $1.00
- M. T.'s Mineralized Quinol, "The Incomparable Vanishing Cream" $.75

Cameo Cassinelli

in Chicago her beauty and charm attracted the notice of the Essanay film producers and in one of their famous productions she made her screen debut. Upon the completion of her contract with Essanay she left the silent drama and again took up concert work as a member of the Chicago Opera Company, meanwhile posing as a model for paintings and etchings for distinguished foreign artists.

After two years of concert work the young artiste again harkened to a flattering call from the movies and returned to the screen to co-star with E. K. Lincoln in Leonce Perret's big production, "Lafayette, We Come." Following this she was featured in many Capellani productions.

The Italian beauty is not keen on talking about herself. "Why should I?" she said. "Does Caruso go about talking of himself? Do any of the great artists, musicians, writers, go about telling how wonderful they are? No! And they have done something worth talking about. I have done nothing but sing a little—act a little—any one can do that.

"My music? Yes. It was born in me to like music. I loved to study it, always. My music is a pleasure, a pastime. I play the piano, I sing because I love it. It is true that I can sing fourteen of the operas, but I have studied and sung them since I was a child. They are just a part of my education."

"And your hobbies—ambitions?" "Music!" she laughed.

"I go to the opera every chance I have, and study, study, study. Some day I hope to sing the great operas in some great opera house. My brother—he, too, sings—even better than I. Together we compose music. Perhaps we may write a great opera. Who knows?"

"And I read—romance, history, adventure. Especially I like D'Annunzio, and one of my ambitions is to screen one of his masterpieces. I should like to idealize the Italian type on the screen—and yes, I should like to go back to Italy and study and work—but not yet."

Mrs. Cassinelli consulted her wrist-watch. Our party was over and we went our separate ways, but with me there remains a memory of an unaffected, girlish girl alive with enthusiasm for her work and all things beautiful, who is giving us thru the medium of the screen "glorious, golden songs of silence."

NEW COMER—Come, right in. Glad you weren't afraid to write. You know I'm drawing $9.50 per to answer questions, so keep me busy. And you haven't received Norma Talmadge's picture after writing three times. She's a very busy lady, but I have reason to believe that she means to treat everybody kindly.

FLO U.—Thanks for the fruit, particularly the dates, altho when I eat them I will be consuming time, and there's none too much. Owen Moore in "Sooner or Later." Yes, he's simple now. Bessie Barriscale in "The Woman Who Understood." You'd rather see action on the screen than to hear the voice on the stage. I'm glad there are a lot more like you.

It was, as Sennett says, a mere adventure at the time, but with the passing of years a precedent has been established. The original coterie of bathing beauties has risen to heights of stardom—Gloria Swanson, Mabel Normand, Juanita Hansen, Ora Carew and Mary Thurman—and tomorrow the lovely ladies who furnish diversion today for the bald heads in the thirty-cent seats may see their names in gleaming electrics over a feature production.

And it has come to pass that the New York managers are commencing to look to the movies for fresh, unspoiled girlhood. The day of the blasé chorus kicker is past, and the café soubrette who screams jazz thru a corrugated-iron throat is passé.

Girlhood is selling at a premium, and the decorative background continues to grow more decorative each time a new baby vamp with dark hair and sparkling, champagne eyes steps out of the classroom into a bathing-suit—and out before the camera.

place by ourselves and a place large enough for ordinary comfort.

"I think I have found one now. It is a rather attractive house in the Wilshire district."

He added that they had been having much trouble with their servants. They had found it impossible to get a capable one.

You feel that these things are very disturbing to Alec Francis. He is undoubtedly overly sensitive for his own happiness. He told me that if two or three things go wrong in succession the accumulated effects will make him flinch in spite of all his philosophy and his power to reason against it.

Occasionally he would lift one hand from his cane and make a short, level, sideways gesture, but for the most part he sat very still.

He told me a story of his first season on the stage which illustrates the changes he has seen take place.

"We had only gas-lights then," he said. "One night, during my big scene, some one noticed that the lights were at half-cock and turned them all on full. Every globe in the house burst." He will never forget the panic that followed. Of all the things that have happened in his eventful life he apparently remembers this most vividly.

"I want to go back to the stage for just one more production," he said, in conclusion. His contract with Goldwyn has another year to run. "I am planning to appear in a comedy-drama which I may produce myself. After that I will return to pictures."

Which goes to show that even a pioneer loves his old home best, and there is no love like a first love after all.

to ask them I am sure they will be only too happy to answer."

"Humph!" Dr. Macklyn opened his case and drew forth a clinical thermometer, squinted at it and shoved it into Jay's unwilling mouth. "Dont want answers. Want facts. Very different things. Humph!"

Jay's eyes sent out an agonized S. O. S. over the glass tube, and the nurse answered it by slipping a piece of ice from the tumbler on the tray between his lips as she stooped to smooth the pillow. The doctor removed the tube, glanced at it once contemptuously, once incredulously, and uttered an exclamation. "My God! The man has no temperature! He ought to be dead!"

He shook the thermometer and reinserted it. Again Jay sent out his wireless and again was answered when Nurse Durant slid a bit of smoking-hot muffin deftly into his mouth, as she drew up the blankets about his chin.

"Heavens alive!" muttered the amazed doctor. "It's gone up to 105 in two minutes. This is terrible!"

He drew out his stethoscope and applied it to the portion of pajama front beneath which Jay's heart beat normally and in perfect health. Nurse Durant did not hesitate. She saw her duty and did it. Stooping over the doctor's head, she implanted a kiss upon Jay's forehead!

"Powers that be!" howled the doctor. "The fellow's heart is speeding away like an express train. He wont last the day out. It's a wonder to me he's still alive!"

From the doorway came a shrill scream. "She did it! I saw her kiss him! Oh, Orlando! Orlando! You have broken my heart!" Constance Weems wailed. At the same instant her husband's burly form shot by her and to the bed, where his brawny hand lifted the invalid by the collar-band and shook him violently.

"Orlando! So you're Orlando!" yelled John Weems. "Well, what d'you mean by making love to my wife, eh?"

"I didn't make love to her!" Jay gasped. "I wouldn't make love to her if she was the last woman on earth!"

This did not tend to placate the infuriated husband. "You wouldn't? I'd like to know why not? She's a woman any man would want to make love to! What do you mean by insulting her?"

A soft voice fell across his rage like cool water. Nurse Durant, very trim and demure in her blue starched uniform, had taken one of Reginald Jay's hands with the most charming blush in the world. "He means," she explained, "that I've agreed to see that he doesn't make love to any other woman, no matter how much he'd like to! Isn't that it, Reggie dear?"

Already the two fake doctors had slipped unostentatiously away. The specialist, scowling ferociously over his glasses, snapped his case to over the stethoscope. "Love-sick! Humph! That accounts for the symptoms!" he growled. "Some day some doctor is going to win everlasting fame and the gratitude of his sex by inventing an antidote. But this case is incurable. Humph! Good-day!"

Her dreams of romance receding, Constance turned her glance upon her husband. After all, a husband, even a patent clothes wringer husband, was preferable to nothing. She cast herself into his arms with a shrill wail, "John! John! Have you come back to me, my ownest own?"

In this feminine manner did she take the ground out from under his feet and put him once and for all indubitably in the wrong, abjectly in the proper masculine position of begging for forgiveness for her sins. And so together they went away, and lived forever after, but whether happily or not the reader must decide on the grounds and evidence presented in this tale.

"Dearest," he began tentatively, and, when nothing happened, "Darlingest," he cried, rapturously, "you've made me the happiest man in the world."

"A nurse has to do her duty," said Nurse Durant, coldly, but it was noticeable that she did not draw perceptibly away. And correctly interpreting this, Reginald Jay arose from his sick-bed and took her in his arms to the scandal of the prim little cap atop the brown curls.

"Then you've got a case for life"—he kist her—"for I have the best medical authority that my case is incurable!"

B. C. 1920

You cannot portray emotions for others if you cannot study and analyze these emotions. And you have to have some grey matter to do that." Miss Compson smiled and added, "That's why I'm reading furiously."

"And beauty—is that needed?" we reminded.

"Perhaps," responded Miss Compson, "of a kind."

"If one had both?" we insisted.

"Gracious," Miss Compson said, "you go right home and do something about that cold."

DOLLS

By CHARLOTTE BECKER

I love them just as much today
As when, a dreamy little girl,
I decked them out in remnants gay,
And proudly smoothed each mussy curl.

And, up and down the busy street
The people that I do not know,
The faces of the dolls repeat,
In toyshops of the long ago.

I long to take each lovely one
And set them in some make-believe,
Quaint games, where they'd have heaps of fun
In thrilling stories that I'd weave.

And all the ugly ones I want
So very nice a time to give,
That they'll forget the jibes that taunt,
And find how good life is to live.

The Human Photoplay

Vidor's vigorous ideas intensely interesting.

"The theme," he replied promptly; "the underlying reason for the picture being made. I try to look at a picture as one, in which all the elements are well balanced and work together harmoniously, but the big idea must be there!"

Artificiality comes when there is no longer a fresh and urging impetus, but this young man—he is only twenty-six—seems to have an inexhaustible supply of visions which promises to stimulate his pictures for some time to come.

In all human endeavor is the element of the unexpected which comes to thwart the best laid calculations; this, of course, creates the plot, and it is the working out of these difficulties in the right way that concerns King Vidor.

It was as a schoolboy down in Galveston, Texas, that Mr. Vidor first decided he wanted to direct motion pictures, and after many disappointments and struggles, during which he was learning much, he finally reached his goal, creating a veritable sensation with his first production, "The Turn in the Road," and he is considered one of the principal possibilities of the screen.

"I am now with the First National," he told me, happily, "and they are affording me a greater opportunity and more freedom than I have ever had, and with my new studio, which is being built, I hope to make my pictures reach the highest standard."

A year ago little Suzanne could only gurgle delightedly at me, for she had been a Christmas gift to the Vidors and was but a few months old. Now she is a regular chatterbox, and I predict she will be a comédienne, with her twinkling eyes and merriment. And she should be, for her pretty mother, Florence Vidor, who is her husband's leading woman in all his pictures, excels in emotional work, and King Vidor believes there should be an equal amount of drama and comedy in each film.

"Comedy," he told me, "serves to make people forget their troubles and gives them a chance to see life in its true perspective. Much of the worry of the world comes from trying to plan ahead. There is no past, no future, only the glorious present, and if we are striving for the right, all our needs will be met at the proper time!"

Who knows but the name of King Vidor will prove a pivotal one, by reason of what he will accomplish and of his far-reaching influence on the motion picture art itself!

SAPHO.—Church bells were first suggested by Paulinus, an Italian bishop, and were intended for "driving away spirits and ridding the air of devils." No, Carol Dempster is not engaged to Richard Barthelmess. You're right; come again.

HAROLD R.—Write Gloria Swanson, Los Angeles, Cal. No, Harold, I don't think I have written anything yet that will live. I have been answering questions for nearly ten years, and I am thankful that I still live, even if my answers don't. Write me again some time.

The Famine

Stars and producers are searching the country for new, workable motion picture stories. Literary genius is not a prime factor. They want new story-plots told in the language of the screen. 95% of the book material is unsuited to motion picture production. (This figure does not include material needed for religious, commercial or educational films.)

HOW many times in the last few years have you felt that you could write a better plot for a story than some you have seen in the motion picture theatres?

Well, perhaps you could. At least there are many people who could. And producers want you to make the attempt. For there has been a big change in motion pictures in the last few years. People don't go for the novelty any more. They want to see a story with a good plot. A scene with fat women rolling down hill no longer packs a theatre. The star is no longer able to carry a poor story to success.

But at the present time producers cannot get enough good stories. Over 5,000 are needed each year. 95% of book material is not suited to the screen. And at present there are simply not enough men and women writing for the screen, even though incredible prices are being paid. More must be trained if the industry is to live. So if you have a spark of creative imagination, if you have any story-ideas, the opportunity is golden.

Literary Genius Not Essential

The Palmer Photoplay Corporation makes no extravagant claims. It merely points to the list of successful photoplaywrights it has developed through Correspondence. People from all walks of life—mothers with children to support, ministers, clerks, magazine writers who failed when they tried for the screen. In short, we have demonstrated that anyone with good ideas can write photoplays, once he learns the fundamental principles.

$2,000 for a Story Not Uncommon

Producers now pay $100 to $500 for a clever comedy; $250 to $2,000 for a five-reel manuscript.

One of our students, formerly a minister, sold his first story for $2,000. The recent success of Douglas Fairbanks, "His Majesty the American," and the play, "Live Sparks," in which J. Warren Kerrigan starred, were both written by Palmer students. James Kendrick of Texas has sold six stories since enrolling less than a year ago.

Many of our members have taken staff positions in studios, four in one studio alone.

Not a Tedious Course of Study

Most of our successful students begin to sell their photoplays a few months after enrolling. For you start to work on your manuscript almost immediately. We teach by direct example.

We furnish you with the Palmer Handbook with cross references to scenarios that have been produced.

We give you a glossary of studio terms and phrases. In short, we bring the studio to you.

Then you begin the real work with our Advisory Service Bureau. This Bureau gives you personal, constructive criticisms of your manuscripts—free and unlimited for a year. Every critic in this Bureau is an experienced photoplay writer.

Special Contributors

Included in the Palmer Course is a series of lectures by twelve leading figures in the motion picture industry. They cover every technical phase of motion picture production.

You can judge their value from the fact that they are contributed by such notables as Frank Lloyd and Clarence Badger, Goldwyn directors; Jeanie MacPherson, noted Lasky scenario writer; Col. Jasper Ewing Brady, of Metro's scenario staff; Denison Clift, Fox scenario editor; George Beban, celebrated actor and producer; Al E. Christie, president Christie Film Co., Hugh McClung, expert cinematographer, etc., etc.

Our Marketing Bureau, headed by Mrs. Kate Corbaley, formerly photoplaywright for Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Drew, helps you sell your work. In constant touch with the studios, she knows their needs. When members so desire, she submits their plays to Directors and Scenario Editors in person.

Send For This Book and Investigate

For those who are really interested in this great new opportunity, we have prepared "The Secret of Successful Photoplay Writing," which lays before you the Palmer Course and service in greater detail.

If you have any story-telling ability, you owe it to yourself to write for this book.

Remember that many photoplaywrights have never written a line for periodicals. Literary ability is not what is wanted. Producers want outline plots written from a knowledge of their specific needs. A simple story with one good new thought is enough.

There is one peculiar thing to remember about the Palmer Plan. Unlike any other course in special training, one single successful effort immediately pays you for all your work.

In this new uncrowded field success is rapid. The need is growing greater every day. Never were rewards greater and quicker than in the new art. At least investigate. Mail the coupon.

Confessed Calumny

kicked up such a cinematic rumpus over a package of mere blank writing paper, which the scenario has designated as the million-dollar plans of an imaginary movie mine.

All this from Oland, as he continues fleeing "Toots" for the leaping dandruff!

Mr. Oland, as I have said, resides in the peaceful suburb of Glendale, twenty minutes by Cadillac (this is a perfectly free gratis ad) from Los Angeles. His house is precisely like any other comfortable abode, with a piano, victrola, hot-and-cold running water, Jap boy, flower-garden and various other comforts of home. You step into a spacious sun-parlor, and you are confronted by an unfinished oil painting on an easel.

Does Mr. Oland paint? This you ask breathlessly.

No, Mr. Oland does not paint, you learn, but Mrs. Oland does. You glance at the piano and note a ballade of Mousorgsky thereon. Another disappointment! Mr. Oland does not play, neither does he sing. It is Mrs. Oland who is thusly accomplished. You see a large-sized box of Murads, (another free ad), reposing temptingly on a mission oak table in the sun-parlor. Still another heartache, because you, being a writer, are plebeian and inhale the aroma of Virginia's purest weed, rather than that of Turkey-on-the-Hudson.

The thrillingest bit of dirty work Oland ever did on the screen was when he nearly pushed Pearl White off a fast-moving box-car. Of course, the aforesaid box-car wasn't going fast, but the camera made it look as if it simply burned up the track. And the camera box was nailed onto the hind end, some three feet below the level of the roof. Oland was escaping, and the darned heroine positively insisted upon following him by climbing over the roof of the moving train.

The director wanted him to kick her in the face—gently, of course, but, nevertheless, to implant a healthy boot in the center of her proboscis.

"I really couldn't do that," Oland confessed. "Miss White was such a nice girl. And then the director coyly suggested that I step on her hands as they clenched the roof of the car. And I just couldn't bring myself to do that, either. And so we compromised by my pounding her lily-white fingers gently with my fist, and she, suffering only the exquisite agony capable of screen heroines, dropped to the camera-stand three feet below!"

And it was in "The Witness for the Defense" that he had to choke Elsie Ferguson! Actually choke her!

"How did she feel?" I inquired, gasps punctuating my breathing spells.

"Oh," drawled Oland, languidly, "she just thought of it as a dramatic situation and told me to be rough with her for the sake of art."

"And you?" again from breathless me.

"Oh, I'd been married to her seven years in the story, and while Elsie is a charming girl, the scenario writer insisted that I'd had enough of her. And I choked her lovingly, gloatingly. It was a good scene and we didn't have to do a retake."

"The result?"

"Miss Ferguson merely had to retire to her dressing-room to again make up her neck so that we could continue the day's labor."

"It's the first time in his life he ever mistreated a woman!" Mrs. Oland insisted, indignant. "The things they have him do! No wonder he gets temperamental after he's worked on a picture for months."

But hearken! I haven't told the half of it.

"My pet trick," added Oland, "when my picture prey wont tell the hiding-place of the diamonds, is to twist his wrist. Camera-man takes a close-up, and the public shudderingly shivers, 'How awful!'"

"You know, I never really hit them in pictures. I generally plan all the screen dirty work, and my 'adherents' put in the actual punches. If I do hit them, I'm ever so gentle. Why should I want, merely because I'm the heavy, to hurt them? They never get a chance to come back at me, and—well, my conscience always fails me."

This screen villainy is commencing to be a fad with our subject. He eats and sleeps slinkingly, slyly, thinking up new dastardly tricks to play on the members of his company on the morrow.

But what he wants to do is to play the part of a farmer! He has a farm in Massachusetts, where, when possible, he retires to rest and Mrs. Oland to paint, and both to collaborate in translating Strindberg, twelve volumes of which have been thus far anglicised by the Olands.

You'd think, from seeing Oland on the screen, that he is a Japanese and, from hearing him talk, that he's English. Wrong again! He was born in the northern part of Sweden, of Swedish-Russian parents. America claimed him at an early age, but, nevertheless, he's wholeheartedly in love with the literature of Bjorkman, Hauptmann, Strindberg, Sudermann and other Norsemen, and when he's not too busy villaining you'll likely find him working on English translations of their works.

And he has, for years, been intensely interested in the little-theater movement. In fact, when he produced and played in Strindberg's "The Father," his own translation, some years ago at the now defunct Berkeley Theater, New York, the presentation was the forerunner of the art-theater wave in this country.

Originally he was to have been a grand opera baritone. Fate later sent him to the Boston School of Expression, where he became interested in the drama while comedies. They are two fine boys, and comedy is good training, for it teaches you to think and act fast—that's why I like it. After I began doing heavier work I had to keep slowing down the speed all the time.

Romance Comes to Priscilla

"Of course, my favorite rôle was the Wildcat of Paris—I loved her. She was a regular spitfire; laughing or crying, she was full of pep, never quiet a minute. Anyway, I like wild parts—the wilder, the better!"

Miss Dean went on to tell me about "The Virgin of Stamboul," a seven-reeler by H. H. Van Loan, which proved to be her romance picture, culminating, as it did, in her marriage to Mr. Oakman in real life as well as on the screen.

"I lost pounds making that picture," declared the little star, solemnly, "for we worked so hard, and all night long many times. Tod Browning has directed me in nearly all my pictures, and he understands me so thoroly that we have to do little rehearsing. That helps a lot. Funny how things happen—he and my mother used to play in the same company on the stage, and I have known him always."

"My next picture, 'False Colors,' in which I play dual rôles, a naughty French actress and an American girl, will afford the first chance I have had to wear gorgeous clothes before the camera, and I'm having a beautiful time designing them. They're mostly of satin—all shimmery and very long and snaky! Cant you see me swishing around in them?" For my personal wardrobe I prefer plain, trim suits and sport togs, and always of the quietest colors. Surprising, isn't it?"

As we watched the animated panorama of studio life which the noon hour brings, Priscilla confided that the lure of the stage still holds her and that she never sees a musical comedy without wanting to jump on the stage and take part in the singing and dancing.

Of course, she is still so young that many new triumphs on both screen and stage await her. Already several overtures have been made by big producers to induce her to bring her fascinating type of madcap personality to the stage. However, her contract with Universal still holds good and the present—with her devoted husband—is absorbing her thoughts, for, after all, before the actress is the woman, and Priscilla Dean is at all times essentially feminine!

HILLS

By BETTY EARLE

The patient hills wait also.
I lasso them with my loneliness; tho far away
I clutch them close and closer.
A heart I yield to them with human heart-beats.
I rumple their leaves to manifold whispers; I expose my soul to their wandering pathways;
I weave in shadows the pattern of my gloom.
Together now we face the mourn of owl, the wind's low urge, the solitary star's blue quietude.
Yet feel no loneliness; only a kindred faith.
Because we wait together.
