heat, the entire column was soon enveloped in the cloud of alkali dust raised by the tramp of the horses' feet, coating both horses and men with a mask of a dirty white color. No one would have minded the effect produced by this upon his personal appearance; but constant breathing of this dust caused an acute irritation in the nostrils and throat, accompanied by a violent thirst. This could be partially allayed by the men with the water in their canteens, although that was warm and almost nauseating, but no such relief was available for the poor horses.

After entering the plain, the dim trail we were following ran almost parallel to the general trend of the mountains, and did not seem to approach them. We thought nothing of this for some time, under the supposition that the guide knew his business, and that it was necessary to the country, as if he was in doubt as to our location.

It soon became evident that our guide did not know where we were, and he finally acknowledged that we were far south of the location of the spring, and that, if there was any trail leading to it, we had passed it without his discovering the fact. When he finally owned up to his blunder it was well toward evening, and too late to retrace our steps to Bluewater in the then exhausted condition of the horses. Our only course was to continue on the trail, in the hope that it would, eventually, lead us to water, though when and where none of us could tell. The guide was of the opinion that the course we were following would soon bring us to water, though none of us considered his opinion of much value after our experience with him in the past few hours. To make our condition worse, it was keep on in this direction in order to reach some opening in the mountains by which we could enter. But, as the afternoon went by and we still kept on in the same general direction, getting no nearer the mountains, we noticed that the so-called guide had an anxious look on his face, and was examining very closely the features of found that many of the younger men, in spite of orders to the contrary, finding the water in their canteens unpalatable, and supposing we would soon reach camp, had emptied them in order to lighten the load on their tired horses. This was very creditable to their humanity, but not so much so to their common sense.
